Dear Clients:

The last few years have seen a transformation in class action and collective action litigation involving workplace issues. This came to a head in 2014 and 2015 with several major class action rulings from the U.S. Supreme Court. Likewise, the present economic climate is likely to fuel even more lawsuits. The stakes in these types of employment lawsuits can be extremely significant, as the financial risks of such cases are enormous. More often than not, class actions adversely affect the market share of a corporation and impact its reputation in the marketplace. It is a legal exposure which keeps corporate counsel and business executives awake at night.

Defense of corporations in complex, high-stakes workplace litigation is one of the hallmarks of Seyfarth Shaw's practice. Through that work, our attorneys are on the forefront of the myriad of issues confronting employers in class action litigation.

In order to assist our clients in understanding and avoiding such litigation, we are pleased to present the 2016 Edition of the Seyfarth Shaw Annual Workplace Class Action Litigation Report. This edition, authored by the class action attorneys in our Labor & Employment Department, contains a circuit-by-circuit and state-by-state review of significant class action rulings rendered in 2015, and analyzes the most significant settlements over the past twelve months in class actions and collective actions. We hope this Annual Report will assist our clients in understanding class action and collective action exposures and the developing case law under both federal and state law.

Very truly yours,

J. Stephen Poor
Chairman, Seyfarth Shaw LLP

Author's Note

Our Annual Report analyzes the leading class action and collective action decisions of 2015 involving claims against employers brought in federal courts under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII"), the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA"), the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA"), the Employee Retirement Income Security Act ("ERISA"), and a host of other federal statutes applicable to workplace issues. The Report also analyzes class action and collective action rulings involving claims brought against employers in all 50 state court systems, including decisions pertaining to employment laws, wage & hour laws, and breach of employment contract actions. The key class action and collective action settlements over the past year are also analyzed, both in terms of gross settlement dollars in private plaintiff and government-initiated lawsuits as well as injunctive relief provisions in consent decrees. Finally, the Report also discusses important federal and state court rulings in non-workplace cases which are significant in their impact on the defense of workplace class action litigation. In total, there are 1,314 decisions analyzed in the Report.

The cases decided in 2015 foreshadow the direction of class action litigation in the coming year. One certain conclusion is that employment law class action and collective action litigation is becoming ever more sophisticated and will continue to be a source of significant financial exposure to employers well into the future. Employers also can expect that class action and collective action lawsuits increasingly will combine claims under multiple statutes, thereby requiring the defense bar to have a cross-disciplinary understanding of substantive employment law as well as the procedural peculiarities of opt-out classes under Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the opt-in procedures in FLSA and ADEA collective actions.

This report represents the collective contributions of a significant number of our colleagues at Seyfarth Shaw LLP. We wish to thank and acknowledge those contributions by Richard L. Guide To Citation Formats

As corporate counsel utilize the Report for research, we have attempted to cite the West bound volumes wherever possible (e.g., Brown, et al. v. Nucor Corp., 785 F.3d 895 (4th Cir. May 11, 2015)). If a decision is unavailable in bound format, we have utilized a LEXIS cite from its electronic database (e.g., Chen-Oster, et al. v. Goldman, Sachs & Co., 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29813 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 10, 2015)), and if a LEXIS cite is not available, then to a Westlaw cite from its electronic database (e.g., Harris, et al. v. Amgen, Inc., 2015 WL 3372373 (9th Cir. May 26, 2015)). If a ruling is not contained in an electronic database, the full docketing information is provided (e.g., Lehman, et al. v. Warner Nelson, Case No. 13-CV-1835 (W.D. Wash. April 24, 2015)).

Search Functionality

This Report is fully searchable. Case names, Rule 23 terms, and class action topics can be searched by selecting Edit and then Find (or Ctrl+F), and then by typing in the word or phrase to be searched, and then either selecting Next or hitting Enter.

eBook Features

The 2016 Workplace Class Action Litigation Report is also available as an eBook. The downloaded eBook is accessible via freely available eBook reader apps like iBook, Kobo, Aldiko, etc. The eBook provides a rich and immersive reading experience to the users.

Some of the notable features include:

1. The eBook is completely searchable.
2. Users can increase or decrease the font sizes.
3. Active links are set for the table of contents to their respective sections.

A Note On Class Action And Collective Action Terms And Laws

References are made to Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) throughout this Report. These are the two main statutory sources for class action and collective action decisional law. Both are procedural devices used in federal courts for determining the rights and remedies of litigants whose cases involve common questions of law and fact. The following summary provides a brief overview of Rule 23 and § 216(b).

Class Action Terms

The Report uses the term class action to mean any civil case in which parties indicated their intent to sue on behalf of themselves as well as others not specifically named in the suit at some point prior to the final resolution of the matter. This definition includes a case in which a class was formally approved by a judge (a certified class action), as well as a putative class action, in which a judge denied a motion for certification, in which a motion for certification had been made but a decision was still pending at the time of final resolution, or in which no formal motion had been made but other indications were present suggesting that class treatment was a distinct possibility (such as a statement in a complaint that the plaintiffs intended to bring the action on behalf of others similarly-situated).

Although certified class actions may receive considerable attention if they are reported publicly, defendants also must confront putative class actions that contain the potential for class treatment as a result of filing a motion for certification or because of allegations in the original complaint that assert that the named plaintiffs seek to represent others similarly-situated. Even if such cases are never actually certified, the possibility of the litigation expanding into a formal class action raises the stakes significantly, perhaps requiring a more aggressive (and costlier) defense or resulting in a settlement on an individual basis at a premium.

Rule 23

Rule 23 governs class actions in federal courts, and typically involves lawsuits that affect potential class members in different states or that have a nexus with federal law. Rule 23 requires a party seeking class certification to satisfy the four requirements of section (a) of the rule and at least one of three conditions of section (b) of the rule. Under U.S. Supreme Court precedent, a district court must undertake a "rigorous analysis of Rule 23 prerequisites" before certifying a class. General Telephone Co. of Southwest v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 161 (1982). More often than not, plaintiffs will support their motion for class certification with deposition testimony, declarations of putative class members, and expert opinions in the form of affidavits of expert witnesses. Courts often observe that the appropriate analysis in reviewing this evidence is not equivalent to an examination of the merits or a battle between the parties' experts. Rather, the salient issue is whether plaintiffs' legal theories and factual materials satisfy the Rule 23 requirements.

The Rule 23(a) requirements include:

- Numerosity – The individuals who would comprise the class must be so numerous that joinder of them all into the lawsuit would be impracticable.
- Commonality – There must be questions of law and fact common to the proposed class.
- Typicality – The claims or defenses of the representative parties must be typical of the claims and defenses of putative class members.

- Adequacy of Representation – The representative plaintiffs and their counsel must be capable of fairly and adequately protecting the interests of the class.

The standards for analyzing the commonality requirement of Rule 23(a)(2) were tightened in 2011 with the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, et al., 131 S. Ct. 2541 (2011). As a result, a "common" issue is one that is "capable of class-wide resolution – which means that determination of its truth or falsity will resolve an issue that is central to the validity of each of the claims in one stroke." Id. at 2551.

Once a plaintiff establishes the four requirements of Rule 23(a), he or she must satisfy one of the three requirements of Rule 23(b). In practice, a plaintiff typically establishes the propriety of class certification under either Rule 23(b)(2) or Rule 23(b)(3) in an employment-related case.

Because application of each rule depends on the nature of the injuries alleged and the relief sought, and imposes different certification standards on the class, the differences between Rule 23(b)(2) and (b)(3) are critical in employment-related class action litigation. In the words of the rule, a class may be certified under Rule 23(b)(2) if the party opposing the class "has acted or refused to act on grounds generally applicable to the class, thereby making appropriate final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief with respect to the class as a whole." In other words, plaintiffs seeking to certify class actions under Rule 23(b)(2) are restricted to those cases where the primary relief sought is injunctive or declaratory in nature. Rule 23(b)(2) does not extend to cases in which the appropriate final relief relates exclusively or predominantly to money damages. Rule 23(b)(2) provides for a binding litigation order as to all class members without guarantees of personal notice and the opportunity to opt-out of the suit.

Rule 23(b)(3) is designed for circumstances in which class action treatment is not as clearly called for as in Rule 23(b)(1) and Rule 23(b)(2) situations, when a class action may nevertheless be convenient and desirable. A class may be certified under Rule 23(b)(3) if the court finds that questions of law or fact common to the members of the class predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action is superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy. Pertinent considerations include the interest of the members of the class in individually controlling the prosecution of separate actions; the extent and nature of any litigation concerning the controversy already commenced by members of the class; the desirability of concentrating the litigation of the claims in one particular forum; and the difficulties likely to be encountered in the management of a class action.

To qualify for certification under Rule 23(b)(3), therefore, a class must meet not only the requirements of Rule 23(a), but also two additional requirements: "(1) common questions must predominate over any questions affecting only individual members; and (2) class resolution must be superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy." *Amchem Products, Inc. v. Windso*r, 521 U.S. 591, 615 (1997). While the common question requirement of Rule 23(a)(2) and the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3) overlap, the predominance requirement is more stringent than the common question requirement. Thus, even though a case may present common questions of law or fact, those questions may not always predominate and class certification would be inappropriate.

Rule 23(b)(3) applies to cases where the primary relief sought is money damages. The Supreme Court has determined – in Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corp., 527 U.S. 815 (1999) – that unlike in Rule 23(b)(2) class actions, each class member in a Rule 23(b)(3) class action for money damages is entitled as a matter of due process to personal notice and an opportunity to opt-out of the class action. Accordingly, Rule 23(c)(2) guarantees those rights for each member of a class certified under Rule 23(b)(3). There are no comparable procedural guarantees for class members under Rule 23(b)(2).

Finally, two recent decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court have established a gloss on the Rule 23 requirements that play out in class certification proceedings in a significant manner, including: (i) Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, et al., 131 S. Ct. 2541 (2011), as referenced above, which tightened commonality standards under Rule 23(a)(2); and (ii) Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, 133 S. Ct. 1426 (2013), which interpreted Rule 23(b)(3) – that requires "questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members" – to mandate that plaintiffs' proposed damages model show damages on a class-wide basis. In Wal-Mart and Comcast, the Supreme Court reaffirmed that lower federal courts must undertake a "rigorous analysis" of whether a putative class satisfies the predominance criterion set forth in Rule 23(b)(3), even if that analysis overlaps with the merits of the underlying claims.

29 U.S.C. § 216(b)

This statute governs multi-plaintiff lawsuits under the ADEA and the FLSA. Generally, such lawsuits are known as collective actions (as opposed to class actions).

Under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), courts generally recognize that plaintiffs and other "non-party" individuals may not proceed collectively until they establish that that they should be permitted to do so as a class. Under § 216(b), courts have held that "similarly-situated" individuals may proceed collectively as a class. The federal circuits have not agreed on the standard according to which such a class should be certified. Two competing standards for certification are recognized.

The first approach adopts the view that the "similarly-situated" inquiry is coextensive with the procedure used in class actions brought pursuant to Rule 23. Using this methodology, the court analyzes the putative class for factors including numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequacy of representation. This typically occurs after some discovery has taken place. This approach is unusual and is not favored.

The second approach is a two-tiered approach involving a first stage conditioned certification process and a second stage potential decertification process. It is more commonly used and is the prevailing test in federal courts. In practice, it tends to be a "plaintiff-friendly" standard.

In the context of the first stage of conditional certification, plaintiffs typically move for conditional certification and permission to send notices to prospective class members. This generally occurs at an early stage of the case, and often before discovery even commences. Courts have held that a plaintiff's burden at this stage is minimal. A ruling at this stage of the litigation often is based upon allegations in the complaint and any affidavits submitted in favor of or in objection to conditional certification.

Courts have not clearly defined the qualitative or quantitative standards of evidence that should be applied at this stage. Courts are often reluctant to grant or deny certification on the merits of a plaintiff's case. This frustrates defendants with clearly meritorious arguments in defense of the litigation, such as those based on compelling proof that would establish the exempt status of the plaintiffs and other employees alleged to be similarly-situated.

Instead, courts appear to find the most convincing proof that certification is improper based on evidence that putative class members perform different jobs in different locations or facilities, under different supervisors, and potentially pursuant to differing policies and practices. Courts also have held that certification is inappropriate when individualized inquiries into applicable defenses are required, such as when the employer asserts that the relevant employees are exempt.

Where conditional certification is granted, a defendant has the opportunity to request that the class be decertified after discovery is wholly or partially completed in the subsequent, second stage of decertification. Courts engage in a more rigorous scrutiny of the similarities and differences that exist amongst members of the class at the decertification stage. The scrutiny is based upon a more developed, if not entirely complete, record of evidence. Upon an employer's motion for decertification, a court assesses the issue of similarity more critically and may revisit questions concerning the locations where employees work, the employees' supervisors, their employment histories, the policies and practices according to which they perform work and are paid, and the distinct defenses that may require individualized analyses.

Opt-In/Opt-Out Procedures

Certification procedures are different under Rule 23 and 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Under Rule 23(b)(2), a court's order binds the class; under Rule 23(b)(3), however, a class member must opt-out of the class action (after receiving a class action notice). If he or she does not do so, they are bound by the judgment. Conversely, under § 216(b), a class member must opt-in to the lawsuit before he or she will be bound. While at or near 100% of class members are effectively bound by a Rule 23 order, opt-in rates in most § 216(b) collective actions typically range from 5% to 40%.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

I. Overview Of The Year In Workplace Class Action Litigation

A. Executive Summary

Workplace class action litigation often poses unique "bet-the-company" risks for employers. An adverse judgment in a class action has the potential to bankrupt a business. Likewise, the on-going defense of a class action can drain corporate resources long before the case reaches a decision point. Companies that do business in multiple states are also susceptible to "copy-cat" class actions, whereby plaintiffs' lawyers create a domino effect of litigation filings that challenge corporate policies and practices. Hence, workplace class actions can adversely impact a corporation's market share, jeopardize or end the careers of senior management, and cost millions of dollars in defense fees. For these reasons, workplace class action litigation risks are at the top of the list of problems that keep business leaders up at night.

Skilled plaintiffs' class action lawyers and governmental enforcement litigators are not making that challenge any easier. They are continuing to develop new theories and approaches to prosecuting complex employment litigation. In turn, the events of the past year in the workplace class action world demonstrate that the array of litigation issues facing businesses are continuing to accelerate while also undergoing significant change. Governmental enforcement litigation pursued by the U.S. Equal Employment Commission ("EEOC") and the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") also manifests an aggressive "push-the-envelope" agenda of two activist agencies, with regulatory oversight of workplace issues continuing as a high priority. The combination of these factors are challenging businesses to integrate their litigation and risk mitigation strategies to navigate these exposures. These challenges are especially acute for businesses in the context of complex workplace litigation.

B. Key Trends Of 2015

An overview of workplace class action litigation developments in 2015 reveals five key trends.

First, class action dynamics increasingly have been shaped and influenced by recent rulings of the U.S. Supreme Court. Over the past several years, the Supreme Court has accepted more cases for review – and issued more rulings – than ever before that have impacted the prosecution and defense of class actions and government enforcement litigation. The past year continued that trend, with several key decisions on complex employment litigation issues, and more cases accepted for review that are posed for rulings in 2016. While the Supreme Court led by Chief Justice John Roberts is often thought to be pro-business, the array of its key rulings impacting class action workplace issues is anything but one-dimensional. Some decisions may be viewed as hostile to the expansive use of Rule 23, while others are hospitable and strengthen the availability of class actions. Further, the Supreme Court has declined several opportunities to impose more restraints on class actions, and by often deciding cases on narrow grounds, it has left many gaps to be filled in by – and thereby fueled disagreements arising amongst – lower federal courts. Suffice it to say, the range of rulings form a complex tapestry that precludes an overarching generalization that the Supreme Court is pro-business or pro-worker on class actions.

Second, the monetary value of employment-related class action settlements reached an all-time high in 2015. The plaintiffs' employment class action bar and governmental enforcement litigators successfully translated their case filings into larger class-wide settlements at unprecedented levels. The top ten settlements in various employment-related categories totaled $2.48 billion over the past year as compared to $1.87 billion in 2014. As success in the class action litigation context often serves to encourage pursuit of more class actions by "copy-cat" litigants, 2016 is apt to see the filing of more class actions than in previous years.

Third, federal and state courts issued more favorable class certification rulings for the plaintiffs' bar in 2015 than in past years. In addition to converting their class certification rulings into class action settlements with higher values and pay-outs, plaintiffs' lawyers continued to craft refined and more successful class certification theories to counter the more stringent Rule 23 certification requirements established in Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. 2541 (2011), and Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, 133 S. Ct. 1426 (2013). In the areas of employment discrimination, wage & hour, and ERISA class actions, the plaintiffs' bar scored exceedingly well in securing class certification rulings in 2015. In sum, class actions continue to be certified in significant numbers and certain "magnet" jurisdictions continue to issue decisions that encourage – or, in effect, force – the resolution of large numbers of claims through class action mechanisms.

Fourth, complex employment-related litigation filings are up from past years, but by far and away, wage & hour class actions and collective actions are the leading type of "high stakes" lawsuits being pursued by the plaintiffs' bar. Case filing statistics for 2015 reflected that wage & hour litigation outpaced all other categories of lawsuits, and increased yet again over the past year, with no end in sight of the crest of the tidal wave of case filings. Additional factors set to coalesce in 2016 – including new FLSA regulations, the impact of digital technology, and increased scrutiny of independent contractor and joint employer relationships – are apt to drive these exposures even higher for Corporate America.

Fifth, government enforcement lawsuits brought by the DOL and EEOC continued the aggressive litigation programs of both agencies. Settlement numbers for government enforcement litigation in 2015 increased substantially over 2014, as did the litigation dockets of the DOL and the EEOC. This trend is critical to employers, as both agencies have a focus on "big impact" lawsuits against companies and "lead by example" in terms of areas that the private plaintiffs' bar aims to pursue.

C. Significant Trends In Workplace Class Action Litigation In 2015

(i) The Impact Of U.S. Supreme Court Rulings

Over the past decade, the U.S. Supreme Court – led by Chief Justice John Roberts – increasingly has shaped the contours of complex litigation exposures through its rulings on class action and governmental enforcement litigation issues. Many of these decisions have elucidated the requirements for pursuing employment-related class actions. The 2011 decision in Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes and the 2013 decision in Comcast Corp. v. Behrend are the two most significant examples. Both of those rulings are at the core of class certification issues under Rule 23. To that end, federal and state courts cited Wal-Mart in 521 rulings in 2015; they cited Comcast 244 times in 2015.

In terms of direct decisions by the Supreme Court impacting workplace class actions, this past year was no exception. In 2015, the Supreme Court decided six cases – four employment-related cases and two class action cases – that will influence complex employment-related litigation.

The rulings included two EEOC cases, two ERISA cases, and two cases on civil procedure issues.

– DirecTV, Inc. v. Imburgia, et al.*, 2015 U.S. LEXIS 7999 (U.S. Dec. 14, 2015) – In DirecTV, the Supreme Court held that because the California Court of Appeal's interpretation of an agreement that included a binding arbitration provision with a class arbitration waiver – which specified that the entire arbitration provision was unenforceable if the "law of your state" made class arbitration waivers unenforceable, but also declared that the arbitration clause was governed by the Federal Arbitration Act – was preempted by the Federal Arbitration Act, such an arbitration agreement is enforceable. As a result, the decision continues the trend of pro-arbitration Supreme Court precedents that arm corporations with the ability to use arbitration agreements to manage class actions risks.

– EEOC v. Abercrombie & Fitch Stores, Inc.*, 135 S. Ct. 2028 (2015) – In Abercrombie & Fitch, the Supreme Court held that to prevail in a disparate treatment claim of religious discrimination under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the EEOC need only establish that an applicant's need for an accommodation was a motivating factor in the employer's decision, not that the employer actually knew of the applicant's need. The decision largely favored the EEOC's position, and makes it easier for the Commission and plaintiffs to prevail in religious discrimination lawsuits.

– EEOC v. Mach Mining, LLC*, 135 S. Ct. 1645 (2015) – In Mach Mining, the Supreme Court held that a district court may review whether the EEOC satisfied its statutory obligation to attempt conciliation before filing suit; at the same time, because the EEOC has extensive discretion to determine what kind and amount of communication with an employer is appropriate in any given case, the scope of that review is narrow. The decision rejected the EEOC's position that its pre-lawsuit conciliation conduct was beyond judicial review.

– Gelboim, et al. v. Bank of America*, 135 S. Ct. 897 (2015) – In Gelboim, the Supreme Court held that when a district court dismisses the only claim in a case that has been consolidated with other actions for pre-trial proceedings in multidistrict litigation ("MDL"), the district court's order is a final and appealable order, even if claims remained in other actions included in the MDL. The impact of the decision is to allow more immediate appeals in high stakes, multi-district class actions.

– M & G Plymers USA, LLC v. Tackett, et al.*, 135 S. Ct. 926 (2015) – In Tackett, the Supreme Court held that to determine whether retiree health-care benefits survive the expiration of a collective bargaining agreement, federal courts should apply ordinary contract principles. Those principles do not include the longstanding principle from International Union, United Auto, Aerospace, & Agricultural Implement Workers of Am. v. Yard-Man, Inc., 716 F. 2d 1476 (6th Cir. 1983), which created an inference that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, collective bargaining agreements intend to vest retirees with lifetime benefits. In rejecting the Sixth Circuit's application of its own three-decade-old decision in Yard-Man, in finding that the Yard-Man presumption and its progeny were out of step with contract law, the Supreme Court's decision placed its thumb on the legal scale in favor of finding vested retiree benefits in high-stakes ERISA litigation.

– Tibble, et al. v. Edison International*, 135 S. Ct. 1823 (2015) – In Tibble, the Supreme Court held that because a fiduciary normally has a continuing duty to monitor investments and remove imprudent ones, a plaintiff may allege that a fiduciary breached a duty of prudence by failing to properly monitor investments and remove imprudent ones. The Supreme Court determined that such a claim is timely under the ERISA as long it is filed within six years of the alleged breach of continuing duty. The Supreme Court's decision in Tibble – that an ERISA plan fiduciary has a continuing duty to monitor investments – has long been recognized to be an essential tenet of trust law. The more significant impact of Tibble may involve what the Supreme Court did not say and what it did not decide, but instead left open for the lower courts to consider, i.e., at what point, and under what circumstances, will an ERISA plan fiduciary be considered to have violated that "continuing duty"? Obviously recognizing that the "devil is in the details," by declining to provide guidance or guidelines, the Supreme Court in Tibble simply left it for the lower courts to examine the details, and identify the devils in those details. This has the potential to be a time-consuming and expensive one, where each case will turn on its particular facts, and it will take time before reliable standards emerge.

Equally important for the coming year, the Supreme Court accepted four additional cases for review in 2015 – that are likely to be decided in 2016 – that also will impact and shape class action litigation and government enforcement lawsuits faced by employers. Those cases include two employment lawsuits and two class action cases. The Supreme Court undertook oral argument on three of the cases in 2015; the other will have oral arguments in 2016. The corporate defendants in each case have sought rulings seeking to limit the use of class actions or control government enforcement lawsuits.

– Spokeo v. Robins, No. 13-1339 – Widely considered the most important class action of the current Supreme Court term, the Spokeo case concerns whether people without an injury can still file class actions. The Supreme Court heard argument on the case in November of 2015 about whether a job applicant should be able to bring complaints against credit reporting firms under the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"), where the plaintiff alleged that a people search engine violated the FCRA when it reported he was wealthy and had a graduate degree; in reality, he was struggling to find work. The defense is looking to overturn the Ninth Circuit's revival of the suit. Among the issues in the case is whether an applicant without a pocket book injury has standing to prosecute a class action and whether a company can defend itself by pointing to FCRA-compliant processes it has in place, even if they did not fully prevent the publication of misinformation.

– Campbell-Ewald v. Gomez, No. 14-857 – The Campbell-Ewald case concerns whether a company can moot and defeat a class action by offering a settlement, and what happens to potential class actions when such deals are accepted. The Supreme Court heard argument on the case in October of 2015. If the Supreme Court were to find that the offer of a settlement makes a lawsuit moot and kills off potential class actions, it could allow companies to attempt to cut off such cases with quick-strike settlements. The Supreme Court also may decide whether, in order for the strategy to work, defendants have to make the offer before class certification, according to Gottlieb.

– Tyson Foods v. Bouaphakeo, Case No. 14-1146 – The Tyson Foods case involves review of an Eighth Circuit ruling where workers sued for unpaid work and overtime for time spent putting on and taking off hard hats, work boots, hair nets, aprons, gloves and earplugs; a jury awarded the workers $2.89 million, which turned into $5.8 million with liquidated damages, which the Eighth Circuit upheld. The Supreme Court heard argument in November of 2015. The case presents an opportunity for the Supreme Court to allow or forbid class actions that rely on a composite or "average plaintiff" or "average class member" for damages purposes, also sometimes dubbed as "trial by formula." At issue is whether the Supreme Court will determine that differences between class members essentially prohibit class treatment or that averaging and aggregation are permissible. Further, the Supreme Court may pronounce any new standards for the use of statistics for dealing with damages in class actions, or limit the use of statistical proof to demonstrate Rule 23(b)(3) factors or proving class-wide damages.

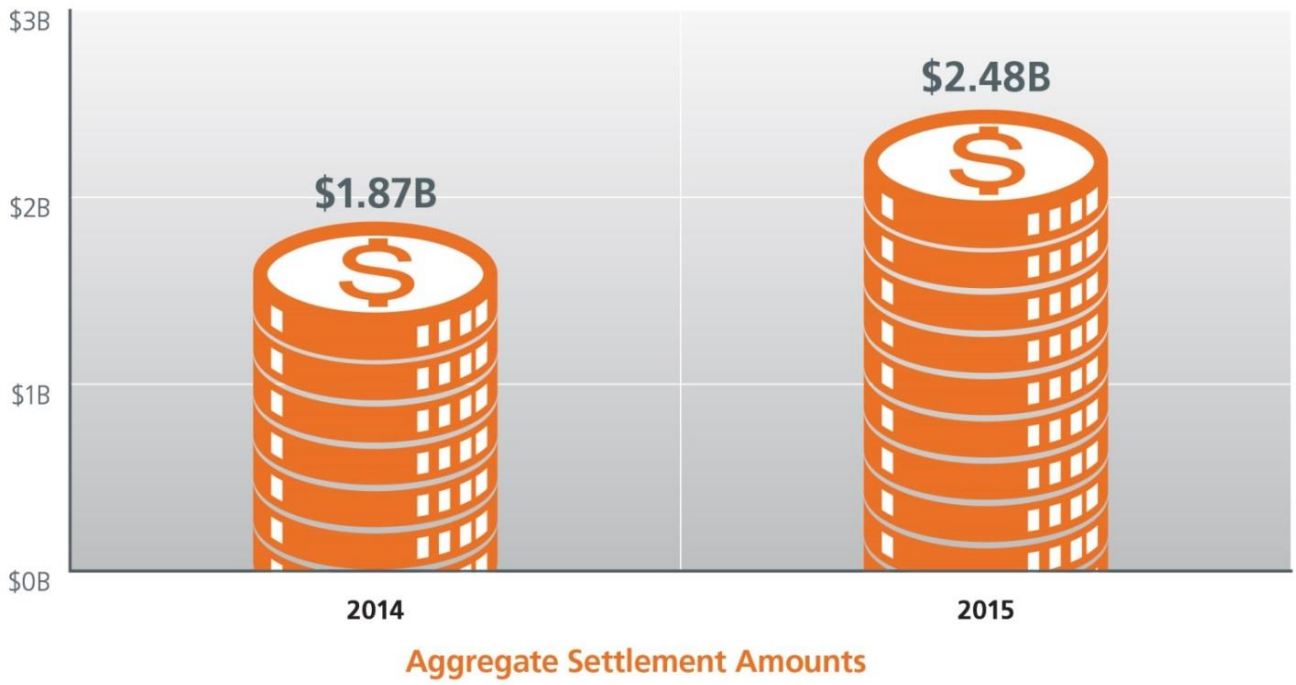
– CRST Van Expedited Inc. v. EEOC, Case No. 14-1375 – This case concerns the largest fee sanction award – approximately $4.7 million – ever issued against the Commission. It arose from a systemic sexual harassment lawsuit that the agency lost for failing to meet pre-suit obligations relative to the claims of 67 claimants over whom the EEOC sued but failed to investigate before filing suit. The dispute over legal fees arose when the employer subsequently secured a fee award for its expenditures in fighting the claims. The Eighth Circuit subsequently upended that award on the basis that the district court improperly ruled that it had to determine on an individual basis whether each of the 67 claims in question were frivolous or groundless. The Supreme Court accepted the case for review in December 2015. The Supreme Court is likely to determine the obligations of the Commission in prosecuting systemic lawsuits and the grounds on which it may be sanctioned for inappropriate litigation.

The decisions in Spokeo, Campbell-Ewald, Tyson Foods, and CRST Van Expedited are expected to be issued by June of 2016, and are sure to shape and influence class action litigation in a profound manner.

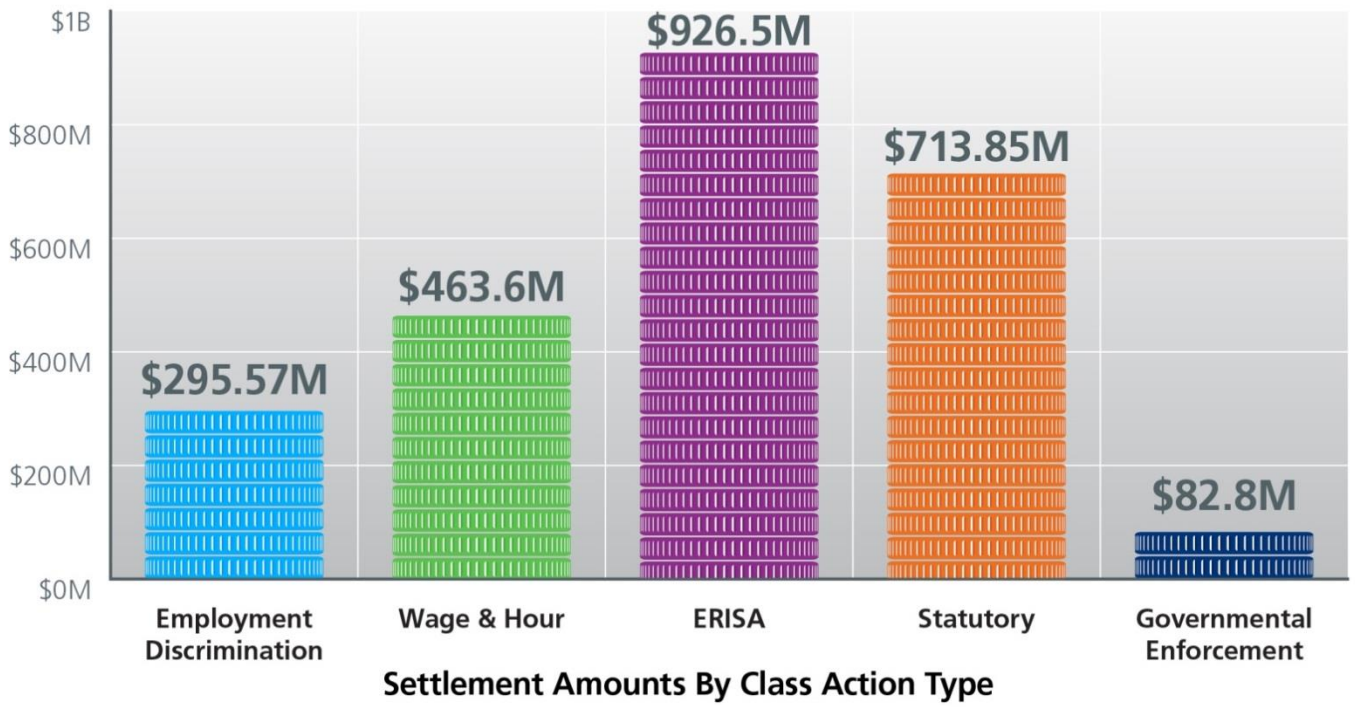
(ii) Higher Class Action Settlement Numbers In 2015

As measured by the top ten largest case resolutions in various workplace class action categories, settlement numbers increased to record high levels in 2015. This reversed a trend that began with the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Wal-Mart in 2011. By tightening Rule 23 standards and raising the bar for class certification, Wal-Mart made it more difficult for plaintiffs to convert their class action filings into substantial settlements.

The statistics for 2015 showed a reversal of this trend. This manifests a maturing of case architecture considerations, whereby plaintiffs' lawyers have "re-booted" their strategic approaches to take account of Wal-Mart, and crafted and refined class certification theories with better chances of success. Considering all types of workplace class actions, settlement numbers in 2015 were at an all-time high of $2.48 billion. This represented a significant increase over 2014 levels, when the aggregate settlement numbers totaled $1.87 billion.

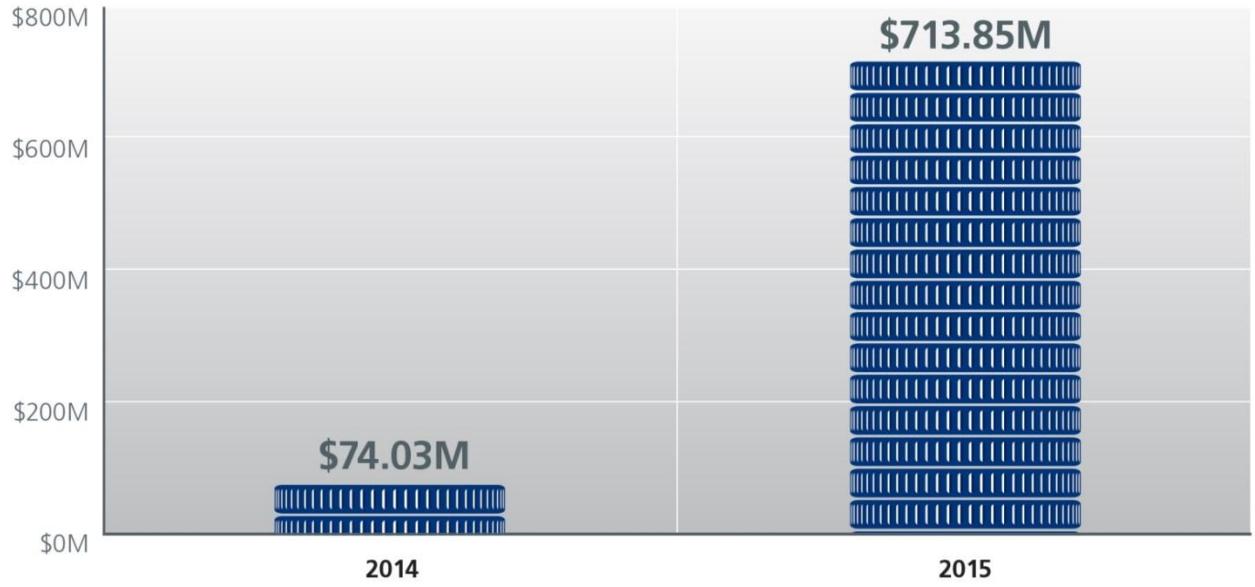


In terms of the upward trend, breakouts by type of workplace class action are instructive. There was an upward trend in each area except ERISA class actions, which decreased slightly but still accounted for a massive aggregate total. This is shown by the following chart:



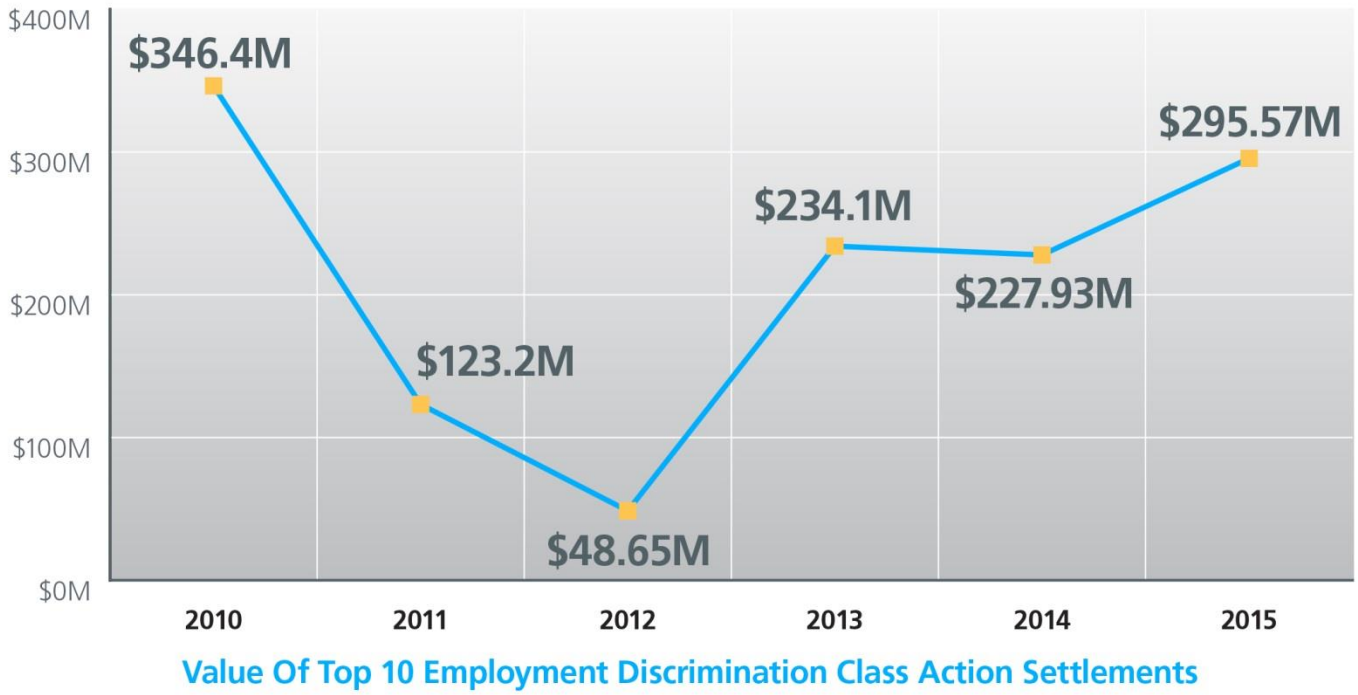
Settlement Amounts By Class Action Type

By type of case, settlements in private plaintiff statutory workplace class actions experienced the most significant increase. They increased to $713.85 million in 2015 from $74.03 million in 2014. The following chart shows this nearly ten-fold increase:



Value of Top 10 Private Statutory Workplace Class Action Settlements

Most telling, however, the reversal of the "Wal-Mart effect" is shown by the pattern for employment discrimination class action settlements in 2015. This trend is illustrated in the following chart:



Value Of Top 10 Employment Discrimination Class Action Settlements

Thus, in 2015, the value of the top ten largest employment discrimination class action settlements was the highest since 2010,[1] and reversed the downward trend that started in 2011 and depressed settlement amounts over a 3-year period.

The trend is even more pronounced with wage & hour class action settlements. In 2015, the value of the top ten wage & hour settlements increased after two years of declining numbers; in fact, the value of those settlements more than doubled.[2] Wal-Mart has had far less of an impact in this substantive legal area, as FLSA settlements are not explicitly tied to the concepts on class certification addressed in Wal-Mart (and instead, are based on the standards under 29 U.S.C.§ 216(b)). This trend is illustrated by the following chart:

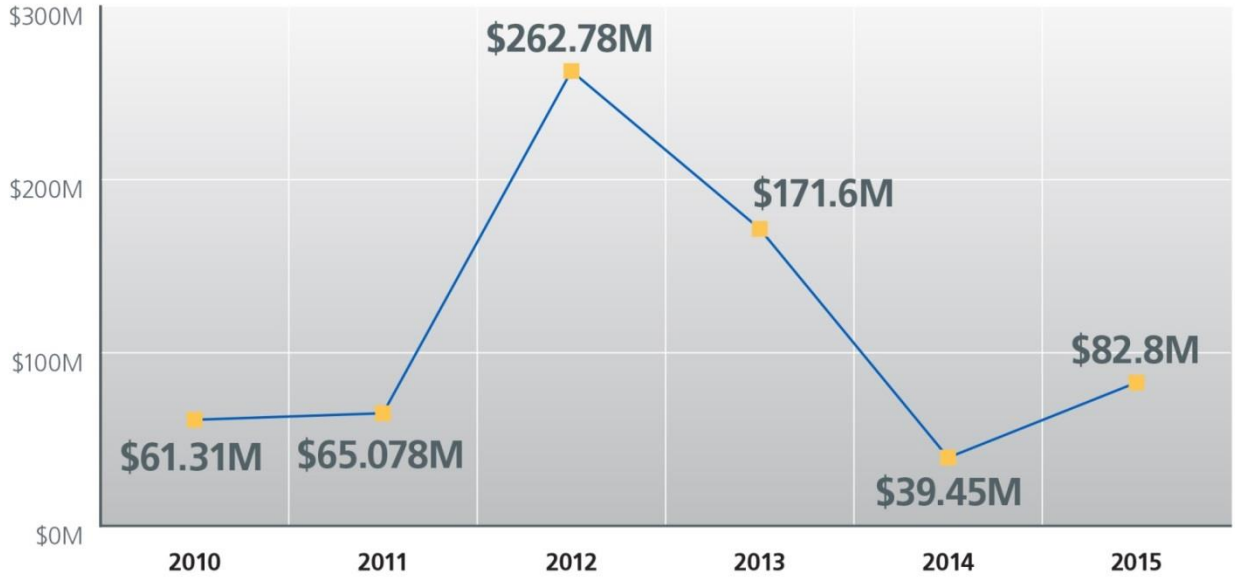
[1] An analysis of settlement activity is set forth in Chapter II of this Report. The total of $295.57 million for the top ten largest employment discrimination class action settlements in 2015 is the second highest total since 2006; the figures for each year were as follows: 2014 – $227.93 million; 2013 – $234.1 million; 2012 – $48.6 million; 2011 – $123.2 million; 2010 – $346.4 million; 2009 – $86.2 million; 2008 – $118.36 million; 2007 – $282.1 million; and 2006 – $91 million. With the issuance of the Wal-Mart decision in June of 2011, settlements were decidedly lower in 2012, and relatively depressed in 2013 and 2014. A chart of the all-time largest employment discrimination class action settlements is set out at Appendix II of the Report.

[2] The total for the top ten wage & hour class action settlements in 2015 was $463.6 million, compared to $215.3 million in 2014 and $248.45 million in 2013.

Value Of Top 10 Wage & Hour Class Action Settlements

Relatedly, government enforcement litigation also followed this trend, and settlements in 2015 increased over 2014, when settlements hit their lowest point in the last eight years.[3] This trend is illustrated by the following chart:



Value Of Top 10 Government Enforcement Litigation Settlements

[3] The total for the top ten government enforcement litigation settlements was $82.8 million, compared to $39.45 million in 2014, $171.6 million in 2013 and $262.78 million in 2012.

In contrast, ERISA class action settlements topped $926.5 million in 2015. While this aggregate number was nearly ten times greater than in 2013,[4] it represented a slight decrease from 2014 (when settlements were $1.31 billion). Nonetheless, ERISA class action settlements this past year were fueled by several mega-settlements. This trend is illustrated by the following chart:

(iii) Class Certification Certification Trends In 2015

Anecdotally, surveys of corporate counsel confirm that complex workplace litigation – and especially class action and multi-plaintiff lawsuits – remains one of the chief exposures driving corporate legal budget expenditures, as well as the type of legal dispute that causes the most concern for their companies. The prime concern in that array of risks is now indisputably wage & hour litigation exposures.

While plaintiffs continued to achieve initial conditional certification of wage & hour collective actions in 2015, employers also secured significant victories in defeating conditional certification motions and obtaining decertification of § 216(b) collective actions.[5] It is expected that the vigorous pursuit of nationwide FLSA collective actions by the plaintiffs' bar will continue in 2016, and that the pace of wage & hour filings will increase yet again over the next year.

An increase in FLSA filings likewise caused the issuance of more FLSA certification rulings than in any other substantive area of complex employment litigation. The analysis of these rulings – discussed in Chapter V of this Report – shows that more cases are brought against employers in more plaintiff-friendly jurisdictions such as the judicial districts within the Second and Ninth Circuits. This trend is shown by the following map:

U.S. Courts Of Appeal – Analysis Of FLSA Certification Decisions

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	D.C. Circuit
Conditional Certification Motions Granted	3	18	7	9	9	3	10	7	35	7	7	0
Conditional Certification Motions Denied	1	10	2	0	3	2	8	2	8	0	2	0
Decertification Motions Denied	0	0	0	1	1	1	1	3	4	0	3	0

8 Decertification Motions Granted / 14 Decertification Motions Denied

The map of FLSA certification rulings is telling. First, it substantiates that the district courts within the Ninth Circuit and the Second Circuit are the epicenters of wage & hour litigation. More cases were prosecuted and conditionally certified – 35 certification orders in the Ninth Circuit and 18 certification orders in the Second Circuit – in the district courts in those circuits than in any other areas of the country. The district courts in the Seventh, Fourth, and Fifth Circuits were not far behind, with 10, 9, and 9 certification orders respectively in those jurisdictions.

Second, as the burdens of proof reflect under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), plaintiffs won the overwhelming majority of "first stage" conditional certification motions (115 of 153 rulings, or approximately 75%); in terms of "second stage" decertification motions, plaintiffs also prevailed in a majority of those cases (14 of 22 rulings, or approximately 64% of the time). These certification statistics are more favorable to the plaintiffs' bar than 2014, when they won 70% of "first stage" conditional certification motions, and beat "second stage" decertification motions in 52% of the cases.

Third, it reflects that there has been an on-going migration of skilled plaintiffs' class action lawyers into the wage & hour litigation space. Securing initial "first stage" conditional certification – and foisting settlement pressure on an employer – can be done quickly (almost right after the case is filed), with a minimal monetary investment in the case (e.g., no expert is needed unlike the situation when certification is sought in an employment discrimination class action), and without having to conduct significant discovery (per the case law that has developed under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b)). As a result, to the extent litigation of class actions by plaintiffs' lawyers is viewed as an investment, prosecution of wage & hour lawsuits is a relatively low cost investment, without significant barriers to entry, and with the prospect of immediate returns as compared to other types of workplace class action litigation.

At the same time, the rulings in Wal-Mart and Comcast also fueled more critical thinking and crafting of case theories in employment discrimination and ERISA class action filings in 2015. The Supreme Court's two Rule 23 decisions has had the effect of forcing the plaintiffs' bar to "re-boot" the architecture of their class action theories.[6] It is clear that the playbook on Rule 23 strategies is undergoing an overhaul. Filings of "smaller" employment discrimination class actions have increased due to a strategy whereby state or regional-type classes are asserted rather than nationwide mega-cases. In essence, the plaintiffs' playbook is more akin to a strategy of "aim small, miss small." In turn, employment-related class certification rulings outside of the wage & hour area were a mixed bag or tantamount to a "jump ball" in 2015, as 3 of 7 were granted (and 4 were denied). The following map illustrates this array of certification rulings:

U.S. Courts Of Appeal – Analysis Of Employment Discrimination Decisions

Certification Motions Denied	0	1	0	0	1	0	1	0	0	0	0	1

Total: 3 Granted / 4 Denied

[6] An analysis of rulings in employment discrimination class actions in 2015 is set forth in Chapter III. An analysis of non-workplace class action rulings that impact employment-related cases is set forth in Chapter IX.

In terms of the ERISA class action litigation scene in 2015,[7] the focus continued to rest on the U.S. Supreme Court as it shaped and refined the scope of potential liability and defenses in ERISA cases. The Wal-Mart decision also has changed the ERISA certification playing field by giving employers more grounds to oppose class certification. The decisions in 2015 show that class certification motions have the best chance of denial in the context of ERISA welfare plans, and ERISA defined contribution pension plans, where individualized notions of liability and damages are prevalent. Nonetheless, plaintiffs were more successful than defendants, winning 5 of 7 certification rulings. A map illustrating these trends is shown below:

U.S. Courts Of Appeal – Analysis Of ERISA Decisions

Total: 5 Granted / 2 Denied

So what conclusions overall can be drawn on class certification trends in 2015? In the areas of employment discrimination, wage & hour, and ERISA, the plaintiffs' bar is converting their case filings into certification of classes at a high rate. Whereas class certification was a coin toss for employment discrimination cases (3 granted and 4 denied in 2015), class certification is easier in ERISA cases (5 granted and 2 denied in 2015), but most prevalent in wage & hour litigation (with 115 conditional certification orders granted and 38 denied, as well as 8 decertification motions granted and 14 denied).

[7] An analysis of rulings in ERISA class actions in 2015 is set forth in Chapter VI.

The following map depicts this array of rulings:

The lessons to be drawn from these trends of 2015 are multi-faceted.

First, while Wal-Mart undoubtedly heightened commonality standards under Rule 23(a)(2) starting in 2011, and Comcast tightened the predominance factors at least for damages under Rule 23(b) in 2013, the plaintiffs' bar has crafted theories and "work arounds" to maintain or increase their chances of successfully securing certification orders. In 2015, their certification numbers were up and their settlement figures were at record levels.

Second, the defense-minded decisions in Wal-Mart and Comcast have not taken hold in any significant respect in the context of FLSA certification decisions for wage & hour cases. Efforts by the defense bar to use the commonality standards from Wal-Mart and the predominance analysis from Comcast have not impacted the ability of the plaintiffs' bar to secure certification orders under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Third, while monetary relief in a Rule 23(b)(2) context is severely limited, certification is the "holy grail" in class actions, and certification of any type of class – even a non-monetary injunctive relief class claim – often drives settlement decisions. This is especially true for employment discrimination, ERISA, and wage & hour class actions, as plaintiffs' lawyers can recover awards of attorneys' fees under fee-shifting statutes in an employment litigation context.

Fourth, at the certification stage, courts are now more willing than ever before to assess facts that overlap both certification and merits issues, and to apply a more practical assessment of the Rule 23(b) requirement of predominance, which focuses on the utility and superiority of a preclusive class-wide trial of common issues. Courts are also more willing to apply a heightened degree of scrutiny to expert opinions offered to establish proof of the Rule 23 requirements. Notwithstanding these shifts in proof standards and the contours of judicial decision-making, the likelihood of class certification rulings favoring plaintiffs are "alive and well" in the post-Wal-Mart and Comcast era.

(iv) Complex Employment-Related Litigation Trends In 2015

While shareholder and securities class action filings witnessed an increase in 2015, employment-related class action filings remained relatively stable, but with a pronounced increase in certain categories, especially wage & hour lawsuits.

By the numbers, filings for employment discrimination and ERISA claims were down slightly over the past year, while the volume of wage & hour cases increased substantially. By the close of the year, ERISA lawsuits totaled 6,925 (down slightly as compared to 7,163 in 2014), FLSA lawsuits totaled 8,954 (up significantly as compared to 8,066 in 2014), and employment discrimination filings totaled 11,550 lawsuits (a decrease from 11,867 in 2014). In terms of employment discrimination cases, however, employers can expect a significant jump in the coming year, as the charge number totals at the EEOC in 2014 and 2015 were among the highest in the 48-year history of the Commission; due to the time-lag in the period from the filing of a charge to the filing of a subsequent lawsuit, the charges in the EEOC's inventory will become ripe for initiation of lawsuits in 2016.

By the numbers, FLSA collective action litigation increased again in 2015 and far outpaced other types of employment-related class action filings. These filings represented another year-after-year increase in wage & hour litigation filed in federal courts since 2000; statistically, wage & hour filings have increased by over 450% in the last 15 years. Given this trend, employers can expect to see record-breaking FLSA filings in 2016. Various factors are contributing to the fueling of these lawsuits, including new FLSA regulations on overtime exemptions in 2016, minimum wage hikes in many states, and the intense focus on independent contractor classification and joint employer status, especially in the franchisor-franchisee context. Layered on top of those issues is the difficulty of applying a New Deal piece of legislation to the realities of the digital workplace that no lawmakers could have contemplated in 1938. The compromises that led to the passage of the legislation in the New Deal meant that ambiguities, omitted terms, and unanswered questions abound under the FLSA (something as basic as the definition of the word "work" does not exist in the statute), and the plaintiffs' bar is suing over those issues at a record pace.

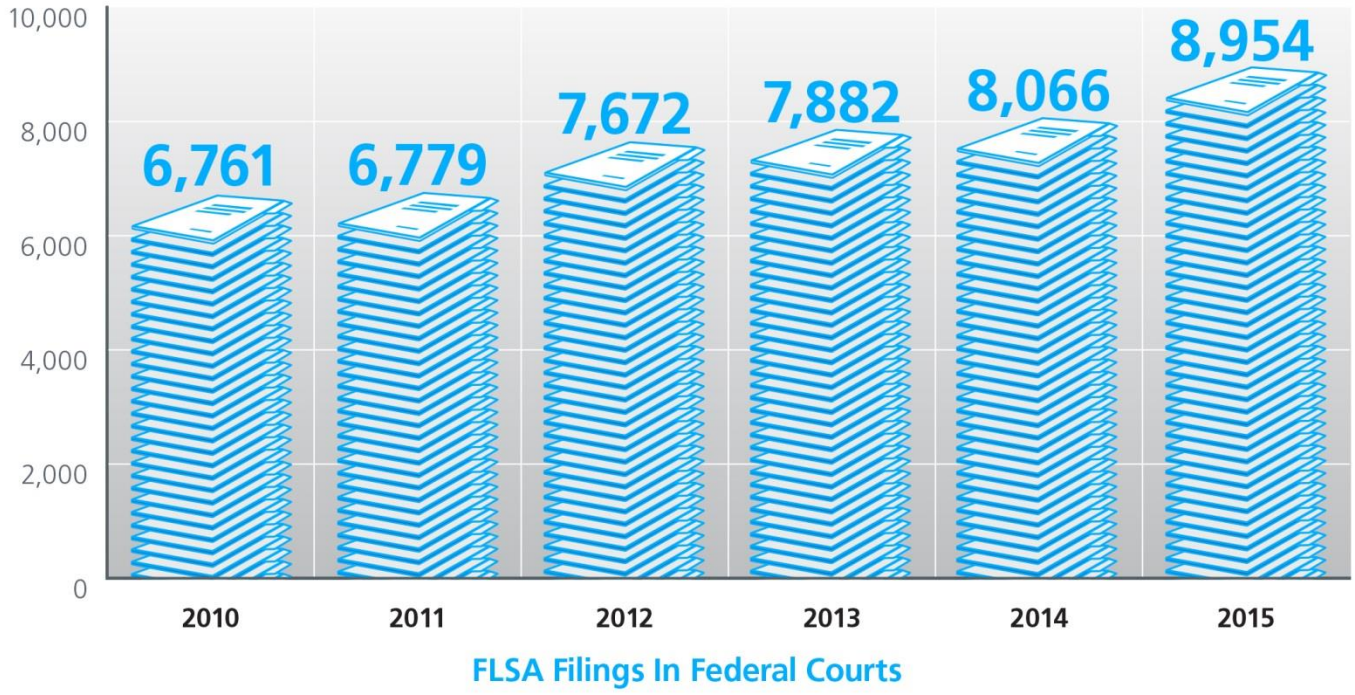
Virtually all FLSA lawsuits are filed as collective actions, so these filings represent the most significant exposure to employers in terms of any workplace laws. By industry, retail and hospitality companies experienced a deluge of wage & hour class actions in 2015.

This trend is illustrated by the following chart:



The story behind these numbers is indicative of how the plaintiffs' class action bar chooses cases to litigate. It has a diminished appetite to invest in long-term cases that are fought for years, and where the chance of a plaintiffs' victory is fraught with challenges either as to certification or on the merits. Hence, this reflects the various differences in success factors in bringing employment discrimination and ERISA class actions, as compared to FLSA collective actions. Obtaining a "first stage" conditional certification order is possible without a "front end" investment in the case (e.g., no expert is needed unlike the situation when certification is sought in an ERISA or employment discrimination class action) and without conducting significant discovery due to the certification standards under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Certification can be achieved in a shorter period of time (in 2 to 6 months after the filing of the lawsuit) and with little expenditure of attorneys' efforts on time-consuming discovery or with the costs of an expert. As a result, to the extent litigation of class actions by plaintiffs' lawyers are viewed as an investment, prosecution of wage & hour lawsuits is a relatively low cost investment without significant barriers to entry relative to other types of workplace class action litigation. As compared to ERISA and employment discrimination class actions, FLSA litigation is less difficult or protracted, and more cost-effective and predictable. In terms of their "rate of return," the plaintiffs' bar can convert their case filings more readily into certification orders, and create the conditions for opportunistic settlements over shorter periods of time.

An increasing phenomenon in the growth of wage & hour litigation is worker awareness. Wage & hour laws are usually the domain of specialists, but in 2015 wage & hour issues made front-page news. The widespread public attention to how employees are paid almost certainly contributed to the sheer number of suits. Big verdicts and record settlements also played a part, as success typically begets copy-cats and litigation is no exception. Yet, the pervasive influence of technology is also helping to fuel this litigation trend. Technology has opened the doors for unprecedented levels of marketing and advertising by the plaintiffs' bar – either through direct soliciting of putative class members or in advancing the overall cause of lawsuits. Technology allows for the virtual commercialization of wage & hour cases through the Internet and social media.

Against this backdrop, wage & hour class actions filed in state court also represented an increasingly important part of this trend. Most pronounced in this respect were filings in the state courts of California, Florida, Illinois, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania. California, in particular, continued its status in 2015 as a breeding ground for wage & hour class action litigation due to laxer class certification standards under state law, exceedingly generous damages remedies for workers, and more plaintiff-friendly approaches to class certification as well as wage & hour issues under the California Labor Code. For the third year out of the last four, the American Tort Reform Association ("ATRA") selected California as the nation's number one "judicial hellhole" as measured by the systematic application of laws and court procedures in an unfair and unbalanced manner.[8] Calling California the "worst of the worst" jurisdictions, the ATRA described the Golden State as home to "irrepressibly plaintiff-friendly lawmakers and judges," with "its often preposterous lawsuits and sometimes incredible court decisions that only encourage still litigation …"[9]

(v) Governmental Enforcement Litigation Trends In 2015

Meanwhile, on the governmental enforcement front, both the EEOC and the DOL expanded and intensified their administrative enforcement activities and litigation filings in 2015. At the same time, recoveries by settlement – measured by the top 10 settlements in government enforcement litigation – were more than double the level in 2014.

The EEOC marked important milestones in 2015, including the 50th anniversary of its founding, the 25th anniversary of the passage of the Americans With Disabilities Act, and the issuance of two Supreme Court decisions on key litigation issues for the Commission. The EEOC continued to follow through on the enforcement and litigation strategy plan it announced in April of 2006; that plan centers on the government bringing more systemic discrimination cases affecting large numbers of workers. As 2015 demonstrated, the EEOC's prosecution of pattern or practice lawsuits is now an agency-wide priority. Many of the high-level investigations started in the last three years mushroomed into the institution of EEOC pattern or practice lawsuits in 2015. Under the Obama Administration, increases in funding expanded the number of investigators.

The Commission's 2015 Annual Report[10] also announced that it expects to continue the dramatic shift in the composition of its litigation docket from small individual cases to systemic pattern or practice lawsuits on behalf of larger groups of workers. The EEOC's FY 2015 Annual Report detailed the EEOC's activities from October 1, 2014 to September 30, 2015. The EEOC's Report indicated that:

[9] Id. at 5. The "ten worst" jurisdictions according to the ATRA report are: (1) California, (2) New York, (3) Florida, (4) Missouri, (5) Illinois, (6) Louisiana, (7) Texas, (8) Virginia, (9) West Virginia, (10) Pennsyvania, and (11) New Jersey.

- The Commission completed work on 268 systemic investigations in FY 2015, which resulted in 26 settlements or conciliation agreements that yielded a total recovery of $33.5 million for systemic claims; six of the settlements involved 50 alleged victims or more, and 13 settlements included 20 or more alleged victims. The FY 2015 recoveries represent an increase over recoveries in FY 2014 when the Commission netted only $13 million based on resolution of 78 systemic investigations.
- The EEOC recovered $356.6 million for alleged victims of employment discrimination in FY 2015 through mediation, conciliation, and settlements. This represented an increase of $60.5 million over FY 2014, when the Commission garnered $296.1 million for its enforcement efforts.
- For its lawsuits, the EEOC secured $65.3 million in recoveries in FY 2015. This figure was up more than $42.8 million as compared to the FY 2014 recoveries of $22.5 million. However, the EEOC resolved fewer lawsuits than it did last year, and recovered less money from those cases. Specifically, the EEOC resolved 155 lawsuits during FY 2015 for a total recovery of $65.3 million.
- The EEOC filed 142 lawsuits in 2015 (up slightly from the 133 lawsuits it filed in 2014), of which 16 cases involved claims of systemic discrimination on behalf of more than 20 workers, and 26 cases involved multiple alleged discrimination victims of up to 20 individuals. The EEOC had 218 cases on its active lawsuit docket by year end, of which 40% involved multiple aggrieved parties and 25% involved challenges to alleged systemic discrimination. Overall, this represented increases in these categories in terms of the make-up of the Commission's litigation being tilted toward systemic cases.
- The EEOC also received 89,385 administrative charges of discrimination, which was slightly up from the FY 2014 total of 88,778 charges. Thus, charge activity was one of the heaviest in the 52 year history of the Commission.
- More than in any other time in its history, the EEOC encountered significant criticism in the manner in which it enforced anti-discrimination laws. This criticism took various forms in terms of judicial sanctions, suits against the Commission by private litigants and States, and questioning by Congress over the EEOC's alleged lack of transparency.

Against this back-drop, 2015 saw modest recovery numbers in recent years on the part of the EEOC.

While the inevitable by-product of these governmental enforcement efforts is that employers are likely to face even more such claims in 2016, the EEOC's systemic litigation program is not without its detractors. Several federal judges entered significant sanctions against the EEOC – some in excess of seven figures – for its pursuit of pattern or practice cases that were deemed to be without a good faith basis in fact or law.[11] The U.S. Supreme Court accepted for review in December 2015 the largest fee sanction ever leveled against the Commission – the $4.7 million fee award in CRST Van Expedited v. EEOC – and a ruling on the case is expected in 2016. Nonetheless, until then, the EEOC shows no signs of adjusting its litigation strategy in light of those sanction rulings, and employers can expect that the coming year will entail aggressive "push-the-envelope" litigation filings and prosecutions by the EEOC, as well as the filing of larger systemic cases.

[11] An analysis of rulings in EEOC cases in 2015 is set forth in Chapter III, Section B.

Fiscal year 2015 marks another year in the EEOC's 2012-2016 Strategic Enforcement Plan ("SEP"). The SEP was created in 2012 as a blueprint to guide the EEOC's enforcement activity. Its most controversial and perhaps most far-reaching effect on the agency's activity is the priority it gives to systemic cases: those pattern or practice, policy, or class-like cases where the alleged discrimination has a broad impact on an industry, profession, company, or geographic area. Systemic cases have been the main driver of EEOC litigation over the past few years, and likely will be well into the future. The EEOC is now fighting challenges to its power to bring those cases on a number of fronts. Among other things, it is aggressively challenging any court's ability to review how it conducts certain statutorily-mandated procedures before bringing suit, including how it investigates its cases and tries to conciliate those cases with employers. If successful in those efforts, the EEOC will have greatly eased its path to pursuing systemic cases.

The EEOC is not only expanding its reach in procedural terms, but also it is attempting to broaden the scope of its authority through an expansion of the scope of anti-discrimination laws themselves. In a number of recent cases, the EEOC has advanced novel legal theories that would, among other things, expand anti-discrimination protections to cover transgender employees and require employers to reasonably accommodate pregnant employees, even those who are experiencing normal pregnancies. The EEOC continues to push the edge of the envelope in any way it can, viewing itself as an agency that not only enforces the law, but one that expands the scope of those laws as well.

For this and other reasons, the agency has come under increasing scrutiny and criticism by Republican members of Congress. Such criticism is unlikely to stem the tide of systemic cases or deter the EEOC from continuing to try to expand its enforcement powers. There is still one year left to go in the 2012 SEP. Employers can expect the EEOC will use the next year to continue to push for expansion of its procedural and substantive limits.

The DOL also undertook aggressive enforcement activities in 2015. Over the past several years, the DOL's Wage & Hour Division ("WHD") fundamentally changed the way in which it pursues its investigations. Suffice to say, the investigations are more searching and extensive, and often result in higher monetary penalties for employers. According to the DOL, since early 2009, the WHD has closed 172,000 cases nationwide, resulting in more than $1.246 billion in back wages for over 250,000 workers. In FY 2015, the WHD collected more than $246 million in back wages, an increase of $6 million over the past year. Hence, in 2015, employers finally saw the impact of these changes on the WHD's enforcement priorities, and 2016 is apt to bring much of the same. With new DOL leadership in place, employers can expect the WHD to find renewed vigor in its enforcement program.

The DOL also focused its activities on wage & hour enforcement on what it terms "24/7." The WHD's new Administrator, Dr. David Weil, is an architect of the WHD's fissured industry initiative. This initiative focuses on several priority industries, including food services (both limited service/full service establishments), hotel/motel, residential construction, janitorial services, moving companies/logistics providers, agricultural products, landscaping/horticultural services, healthcare services, home healthcare services, grocery stores, and retail trade. In FY 2015, the WHD assessed nearly $4 million in civil penalties to sub-groups within these fissured industries, representing an increase of $1 million over the previous year.

In 2016, the WHD is likely to continue its pursuit of strategies that focus at the top of industry structures – the companies that affect how markets operate. Employers can expect the WHD to engage in coordinated investigation procedures, focus on related business entities (e.g., franchisees, sub-contractors, staffing companies, etc.), rather than individual workplaces. As part of those investigations, the WHD will use its full spectrum of enforcement tools, including persuasion, education, penalties, hot goods provisions, and other legal tools.

On the ERISA enforcement front, the DOL's Employee Benefits Security Administration ("EBSA") recovered $696.3 million in benefits for direct payments to plans, participants, and beneficiaries. These enforcement efforts included 2,441 civil investigations and 89 lawsuits in FY 2015.

Not to be outdone, the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB") undertook an ambitious agenda in 2015 too. It reconsidered well-settled NLRB principles on joint employer rules and representative elections, entertained the possibility of extending the protections of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") to college athletes, and litigated novel claims seeking to hold franchisors liable for the personnel decisions of franchisees. More than any other area impacting workplace litigation, the NLRB also remained steadfast in its view that workplace arbitration agreements limiting class or collective claims are void under § 7 of the NLRA.

D. Trends For The Future Of Workplace Class Actions

The developing trends in workplace class action litigation are continuing to evolve. These trends require corporate counsel to plan and re-order their compliance strategies to stay ahead of and mitigate these risks and exposures.

So, what can corporate counsel expect in 2016?

Based on the developing trends, we anticipate significant developments in the coming year relative to certification rulings in employment discrimination and ERISA class actions; aggressive governmental enforcement litigation prosecutions; continuing growth in wage & hour litigation (fueled by new overtime regulations, local minimum wage legislation, challenges to independent contractor status and the "gig" business model, and litigation seeking to expand joint employer concepts); and more litigation over class action waivers in arbitration agreements.

Employment Discrimination Class Action Litigation – Both in terms of private plaintiff cases and government enforcement litigation brought by the EEOC, employers can expect this area to remain "white hot" in 2016. On the employment discrimination front, corporate counsel can expect to see the following developments:

- The plaintiffs' bar will continue the process of refining the architecture of employment discrimination class actions to increase their chances to secure class certification in the post Wal-Mart and Comcast era. Their focus is likely to be on smaller class cases (e.g., confined to a single corporate facility or operations in one state) as opposed to nationwide, mega-class action cases, as well as cases confined to a discrete practice – such as a hiring screen (e.g., a criminal background check) – that impacts all workers in a similar fashion.
- In terms of certification theories, the plaintiffs' bar is apt to pursue hybrid or parallel class certification theories where injunctive relief is sought under Rule 23(b)(2) and monetary relief is sought under Rule 23(b)(3), as well as a range of partial "issues certification" theories under Rule 23(c)(4). The take-away from this strategy is an effort to "aim small" in order to certify a piece of the litigation, and use fee-shifting statutes on attorneys' fees to pressure employers into class-wide settlements.
- Plaintiffs are also likely to pursue certification of liability-only classes, while deferring damages issues and determinations, and pressuring employers to settle due to the transaction costs of individualized mini-trials on damages. In effect, this tactic is an end-run around the limitations on Rule 23(b)(3) articulated in Comcast.

Government Enforcement Litigation – At least until there is a potential change of the political party in control of the White House, employers can anticipate agressive enforcement of employment-related laws and regulations by the EEOC, DOL, and NLRB.

- In 2015, the EEOC continued to push its agenda through high-profile systemic cases. Employers can expect more of the same in 2016. The EEOC defines such cases as those that address policies or patterns or practices that have a broad impact on a region, industry, or an entire class of employees or job applicants. The EEOC has stated that it believes that those cases are key to its enforcement mission because they impact a large number of employees directly, and because they can drive change in company policies and industry standards.
- The EEOC's systemic litigation program therefore is expected to expand in 2016, with more filings, larger cases, and bigger monetary demands as the agency continues its aggressive enforcement activities. Corporate counsel also can expect to see more systemic administrative investigations relative to hiring issues (e.g., use of criminal histories in background checks) and those based on challenges to pay and promotions practices based on disparate impact theories due to alleged gender or race discrimination.
- Despite harsh criticism from employer groups and Republican members of Congress, as well as a series of courtroom setbacks for the EEOC in 2015 (with federal judges entering significant sanctions and fee awards against the Commission, which the government has uniformly appealed), it is expected that these rulings will embolden rather than damper the EEOC's aggressive enforcement of workplace bias laws. Additionally, the Supreme Court's future decision on the fee sanction award in the CRST Van Expedited case may well impact the EEOC's future philosophy in litigating pattern or practice lawsuits.
- The DOL, the NLRB, and the EEOC are likely to continue to "push the legal envelope" on joint employer, franchisor/franchisee, and the propriety of arbitration/class waiver issues.
- As the WHD seeks to put its imprimatur on DOL regulations and interpretations, it is apt to continue its aggressive enforcement activities. The WHD is posed to continue its focus on what it calls "fissured" industries, including restaurants, hotels, construction, janitorial services, healthcare, home healthcare, grocery, and retail. In its investigations, an increasing number of which appear to have been coordinated at higher levels of the agency, the WHD has been using its full assortment of enforcement tools, including the assessment of liquidated damages and civil money penalties, investigations spanning the three-year period for willful violations, and the use of media to influence the behavior of employers.

ERISA Class Action Litigation – The coming year in ERISA litigation promises to be yet another year of change and new rulings, with the U.S. Supreme Court expected to issue at least two ERISA decisions, one on equitable remedies, and another on ERISA preemption. On the ERISA front, corporate counsel can expect to see the following developments:

- Wal-Mart continues to play a central role in the certification of ERISA class actions, although it remains to be seen how much plaintiffs are able to make use of issue certification under Rule 23(c)(4) and sub-class certification to avoid commonality defenses.
- Following the Supreme Court's recent decision in Fifth Third Bancorp v. Dudenhoeffer, 134 S. Ct. 2459 (2014), more ERISA "stock drop" class actions are apt to be filed, after years of success by the defense bar in beating back these cases.

Wage & Hour Class Action Litigation – On the wage & hour front, the deluge of FLSA filings – making wage & hour claims the most predominant type of workplace class action pursued against corporate America – is expected to continue with no end in sight. The wave of wage & hour filings has yet to crest. Corporate counsel, therefore, can expect to see a consistent level of significant litigation activity. Key areas to watch include:

- In terms of novel litigation theories, employers can expect an increase in off-the-clock litigation brought by non-exempt employees, fueled by new theories attacking employer rounding practices, and increased off-duty use of PDA's and other mobile electronic devices vis-à-vis the application of the continuous workday rule.
- Increased litigation also is expected over issues in independent contractor misclassification and joint employer liability cases, as well as off-the-clock work (including donning and doffing cases), unpaid overtime, missed or late meal and rest breaks, time-shaving, and improper tip pooling.

Proposed Overtime Regulations – In July of 2015, the WHD proposed the most significant change to federal wage & hour law in decades to effectuate revolutionary revisions to the "Section 541" regulations that define the "white-collar" exemptions to the FLSA. The bottom-line effect of the proposed regulations would be to disqualify millions of employees from the FLSA's overtime exemptions. In summary, the DOL proposes to more than double the salary level necessary to qualify for the executive, administrative, and professional exemptions, and to increase substantially the threshold salary level for the highly compensated employee exemption. It also suggested that its final rule would provide for automatic annual increases, indexed to one of two metrics discussed in the DOL's notice of proposed rule-making. If adopted, such indexing would surely raise minimum salary levels much higher in the future. Finally, the DOL suggested that the new regulations might include changes to the definitions of duties that qualify an employee as exempt. Not surprisingly, the proposed regulations have been widely publicized and debated. While the DOL has not provided any clear indication of when the final rules will be issued, a plausible estimate is summer or fall of 2016, with an effective date 90 days later.

Movement For Dramatic Local Minimum Wage Increases – The past year also saw major gains for the movement to increase the minimum wage to $15 per hour. While only a few major cities (e.g., Los Angeles, San Francisco and Seattle) have actually adopted ordinances that will raise the minimum wage to that level, the organized labor-backed push has received widespread media attention and a number of other cities and some states are considering similar proposals. As a result, employers can expect more local minimum wage increases in 2016.

Challenges To Treatment Of Service Providers As Independent Contractors – Another major substantive development has been a push to require businesses to treat more workers as employees, and therefore subject to wage & hour laws, rather than independent contractors whose compensation is unregulated. In July 2015, the WHD issued an "Administrator's Interpretation," in which it puts an aggressive spin on court decisions that distinguish employees from independent contractors and seeks to expand the DOL test applicable to the FLSA for determining employment – as opposed to independent contractor – status. Almost all service providers, the WHD intends to argue, must be treated as employees. As a result, employers can expect significant litigation in 2016 challenging independent contractor classification of large groups of workers.

Spill-Over Effect Of The DOL's Focus – Plaintiffs' wage & hour lawyers increasingly share the WHD's focus on challenging the use of independent contractors. This trend may be intensified by several large settlements in 2015 involving this issue, including FedEx's class action settlement of $228 million to California-based delivery drivers who claimed that their classification as independent contractors was improper. As success by the plaintiffs' class action bar often serves to encourage "copy-cat" lawsuits, employers are apt to see an increase in private party class actions in this context.

Challenges To The "On Demand/Gig" Business Model – Increased scrutiny of independent contractors is also on a collision course with the growth of the "on-demand" marketplace, or "gig" economy, where the use of independent contractors is at the heart of many businesses' operating models. Most prominently, Uber faces a class action claiming that it must treat its drivers as employees instead of independent contractors; the case is set for trial in June of 2016. The outcome of this closely watched case could have far-reaching consequences and a profound impact on the viability of many other new-economy businesses. It might also deprive individuals of the informal work arrangements that are often available to independent contractors but incompatible with the highly regulated nature of an employment relationship.

Expansion Of Joint Employment Liability – The past year also saw significant steps by government enforcement litigators to expand the "joint employment" doctrine, which could impose additional wage & hour liabilities on many "upstream" businesses. In 2016, employers also can expect the EEOC and the private plaintiffs' bar to push for expansion of joint employment status in government enforcement lawsuits and employment discrimination class actions. In its widely discussed Browning Ferris decision in 2015, the NLRB ruled that even indirect, unexercised ability to affect working conditions of a group of workers may be sufficient to make a company a joint employer of the workers, even if they are employees of a different entity. The WHD has promised an Administrator's Interpretation, expected in 2016, advocating a similarly broad concept of joint employment in the FLSA context. Businesses that could be vulnerable to joint employer claims in 2016 include suppliers, contractors, lessors, private equity and venture capital investors, companies that outsource work, staffing agencies, franchisors, creditors, and parent entities that have subsidiary businesses.

Workplace Arbitration – In response to these substantive developments and the continued torrent of wage & hour cases, employers have looked for additional defenses. One continued bright spot was arbitration. As a result, the trend toward enforcing agreements to submit employment disputes, including wage & hour claims, to arbitration – and specifically to individual, non-class arbitration – continued. While the NLRB continues to insist that agreements to arbitrate on an individual basis violate the National Labor Relations Act, federal courts overwhelmingly continue reject this argument. Further, courts have increasingly ruled that the question of whether an arbitration agreement calls for class rather than individual arbitration is within the province of judges, not arbitrators. This development is important because courts have been far less willing than arbitrators to interpret arbitration agreements as authorizing class arbitration even when the agreements do not mention class arbitration at all. The Supreme Court also has made clear, most recently in its DirecTV decision, that it will not allow courts to engage in creative interpretation of arbitration agreements so as to allow class arbitration. Notwithstanding the FAA and the supremacy clause of the U.S. Constitution, California courts continued to bridle at enforcing arbitration agreements as written. In 2014, the California Supreme Court ruled in Iskanian, et al. v. CLS Transportation, 59 Cal. 4th 349 (2014), that the right to pursue state-wide penalties under the California's Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA") is non-waivable and therefore that an arbitration clause cannot limit an employee to seeking recovery based on his or her own personal harm. In 2015, the U.S. Supreme Court declined to review both Iskanian and Fowler, et al. v. Carmax, Inc., 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 559 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Jan. 28, 2015), a California appellate decision following it. Employers continue to ask the U.S. Supreme Court to review the Iskanian rule, as applied in new cases, in hopes of gaining even greater assurance that they can agree with their employees to resolve disputes through ordinary bilateral arbitration without being forced into arbitration on a class, collective, or other representative basis. Finally, despite the cases that continue to uphold class action waivers in arbitration agreements, employers still seem reluctant to implement arbitration programs or revise their current arbitration agreements. The debate about the scope of class action waivers seems to be an obstacle, and there is still no "prevailing wisdom" as to whether to use class action waivers for all claims or to limit them to wage and hour disputes. Plaintiffs' attorneys were diligent in 2015, however, in their efforts to remain the veritable thorn in employers' collective sides by accepting as fact that class waivers are enforceable and that their class and collective actions are likely to be decertified, even if certified – or conditionally certified – earlier in a case. A number of those plaintiffs' class action firms willingly, and almost gleefully, pursued claims in arbitration or in court on behalf of individual claimants or plaintiffs. Because of their zeal, in 2015 a number of employers faced hundreds of individual claims in arbitration after compelling several away from the courts where a sole litigant or several plaintiffs sought class or collective action relief. Other employers faced a similar surge of individual or multi-plaintiff cases filed in separate courts by former class or putative class members across multiple jurisdictions after convincing a court to decertify or refuse to certify a class that would otherwise have contained them. The plaintiffs' lawyers' mantra seems to have been that they will give employers the arbitrations and decertification they desire, followed by the scourge of numerous individual actions (and the concomitant pressure to settle due to the cost of defense). In sum, these conditions add up to a litigation environment where arbitration defenses are apt to spawn various new and varied litigation approaches by both the plaintiffs' class action bar and the defense bar. Employers can expect these litigation strategies to play out in earnest in 2016.

Certification Standards – The standards for certifying a class action under Rule 23, and for permitting employees to opt-in to would-be collective actions, remain important battlegrounds. Employers have enjoyed increasing success in preventing certification or moving for decertification, but plaintiffs' counsel have responded by seeking certification of class actions as to specific issues, attempting – sometimes successfully – to expand the applicability of Rule 23(c)(4). When a class action or collective action has been decertified, some plaintiffs' counsel – hoping to replicate the settlement pressure of a class or collective action – have filed individual wage & hour suits by many of the employees who were class or collective action members. The strategy appears to be to "win" a single plaintiff case and then seek multiple settlements on behalf of other individual plaintiffs. Some plaintiffs' counsel have stated that their initial class action was filed primarily to obtain discovery and a class list of contact information, so that they can locate multiple individual plaintiffs for multiple individual lawsuits. Employer strategies to counter these efforts were sometimes successful in 2015, but plaintiffs' counsel are likely to continue to try this tactic. Employers also have high hopes that the U.S. Supreme Court will limit the use of statistical sampling based in putative or certified class or collective actions, in which large numbers of employees each assert small-dollar claims. In Tyson Foods, Inc. v. Bouaphakeo, the Supreme Court agreed to consider whether plaintiffs can use statistical averages as proof that that a class of employees was denied overtime pay; and whether an overtime class action can include employees who did not actually suffer any lost overtime pay. At oral argument in November of 2015, however, the Supreme Court focused, instead, on the far narrower question of whether plaintiffs can rely on the burden-shifting rule of a 1947 opinion – Andersen v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co. – to prove that a wage & hour violation occurred. It remains to be seen how this issue will play out in 2016.

Use Of Rule 68 To Counter Class Actions – The Supreme Court also agreed in 2015 to consider the circumstances in which a defendant might be able to block a class action from proceeding by making a Rule 68 offer of judgment for the full value of the named plaintiffs' individual claims. A decision in the case – Campbell-Ewald Co. v. Gomez – expected in 2016, and is likely to have an important effect on employers' ability to avoid wage & hour class or collective actions by mooting the named plaintiffs' claims.

E. Conclusion

The one constant in workplace class action litigation is change. More than any other year in recent memory, 2015 was a year of great change in the landscape of Rule 23. As these issues play out in 2016, additional chapters in the class action playbook will be written.

The lesson to draw from 2015 is that the private plaintiffs' bar and government enforcement attorneys are apt to be equally, if not more, aggressive in 2016 in bringing class action and collective action litigation against employers.

These novel challenges demand a shift of thinking in the way companies formulate their strategies. As class actions and collective actions are a pervasive aspect of litigation in Corporate America, defending and defeating this type of litigation is a top priority for corporate counsel. Identifying, addressing, and remediating class action vulnerabilities, therefore, deserves a place at the top of corporate counsel's priorities list for 2016.

II. Significant Class Action Settlements In 2015

By any measure, 2015 was a year of blockbuster class action settlements. The plaintiffs' bar and government enforcement attorneys obtained many significant settlements over the last year. Particularly in the areas of employment discrimination class actions, wage & hour collective actions, and governmental enforcement lawsuits, the settlements were for record amounts.

For employment discrimination, wage & hour, and government enforcement litigation, the settlement values represented increases over settlements obtained in 2014. Conversely, the value of ERISA settlements declined slightly. This Chapter evaluates the top ten private plaintiff-initiated monetary settlements, government-initiated monetary settlements, and noteworthy injunctive relief provisions in class action settlements.

A. Top Ten Private Plaintiff-Initiated Monetary Settlements

Plaintiffs' lawyers secured many large settlements in 2015 for employment discrimination, wage & hour, and ERISA class actions. The top ten settlements from these categories totaled $1.77 billion in 2015. This represented a significant increase from 2014, when the top ten settlements in these categories totaled $1.67 billion; by further comparison, in 2013 the top ten settlements in these categories totaled $638.15 million.

The plaintiffs' bar also pursued a myriad of other statutory workplace class actions. In recognition of the growing exposure these claims present to employers, this Chapter has been expanded to include a section analyzing the top ten settlements in this area. These cases involve class actions for violations of workplace antitrust laws, the Fair Credit Reporting Act, the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act, and other workplace-related statutory laws. The top ten settlements in this category totaled $713.85 million in 2015. This represented nearly a ten-fold increase over 2014, when the top ten settlements were $74.03 million.

In sum, based on all categories, the top ten aggregate settlement numbers in 2015 reached an all-time high of $2.48 billion as compared to $1.87 billion in 2014.

Settlements In Private Plaintiff Employment Discrimination Class Action Lawsuits

For employment discrimination class actions, the monetary value of the top ten private plaintiff settlements entered into or paid in 2015 totaled $295.57 million. This represented a significant increase from the prior year. By comparison, the top ten settlements in 2014 totaled $227.93 million, while in 2013 they totaled $234.1 million.

1. $128 million – City Of New York
2. $76.3 million – City Of New York
3. $37 million – Lawrence Livermore National Security, LLC
4. $22 million – Signal International LLC
5. $8.2 million – Daiichi Sankyo, Inc.
6. $8 million – Novartis AG
7. $7.8 million – City Of Chicago
8. $3 million – BAE Systems Norfolk Ship Repair, Inc.
9. $2.87 million – Publicas Group

10. $2.4 million – Daimler Trucks North America LLC

The biggest settlements involved pay and promotions class actions. By category, there were four gender and four race discrimination class actions, as well as two class actions based on age and national origin discrimination.

1. $128 million –The Vulcan Society, Inc., et al. v. City Of New York, Case No. 07-CV-2067 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 11, 2015) (final approval granted for a class action settlement to resolve claims alleging that certain aspects of the City's policies of the pass-fail and rank ordering used on written exams had an unlawful disparate impact on African-American and Hispanic candidates for entry-level firefighters positions).

2. $76.3 million – Andrews, et al. v. City Of New York, Case No. 10-CV-2426 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 26, 2015) (final approval granted for a class action settlement for female school safety agents suing over the City's alleged violations of the Equal Pay Act, Title VII, and the New York Human Rights Law, claiming that they were paid less than male counterparts, including $33 million in back pay and $43.3 million in retroactive raises).

3. $37 million – Andrews, et al. v. Lawrence Livermore National Security, LLC, Case No. RG09453596 (Cal. Super. Ct. Sept. 30, 2015) (settlement of an employment discrimination class action involving 129 workers who claimed the company discriminated against them on the basis of age in a workforce restructuring).

4. $22 million – David, et al. v. Signal International, LLC, Case No. 08-CV-1220 (E.D. La. July 12, 2015) (settlement through bankruptcy of class action claims of 500 foreign-based workers who alleged discrimination under 42 U.S.C. § 1981 due to their national origin in terms of their recruitment and treatment at oil-rig repair and construction sites in Mississippi and Texas).

5. $8.2 million – Wellens, et al. v. Daiichi Sankyo, Inc., Case No. 13-CV-581 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 16, 2015) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement involving gender pay discrimination allegations of 1,400 female employees who claimed the company paid them less than their male peers).

6. $8 million – Dickerson, et al. v. Novartis AG, Case No. 15-CV-1980 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 23, 2015) (request for settlement approval for class action and collective action claims by female employees alleging gender discrimination relative to pay and promotions).

7. $7.8 million – Godfrey, et al. v. City Of Chicago, Case No. 12-CV-8601 (N.D. Ill. May 28, 2015) (final approval granted for a class action settlement brought by female African-American applicants against the Chicago Fire Department alleging discrimination on account of physical strength and other testing).

8. $3 million – Aviles, et al. v. BAE Systems Norfolk Ship Repair, Inc., Case No. 13-CV-00418 (E.D. Va. Sept. 28, 2015) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement for gender discrimination claims involving 177 female workers who asserted they were victims of discrimination while working in the shipyard).

9. $2.87 million – Da Silva Moore, et al. v. Publicis Group, SA, Case No. 11-CV-1279 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 13, 2015) (request for settlement approval for class action relative to gender discrimination claims of former female public relations executives regarding pay and pregnancy leave).

10. $2.4 million – Avakian, et al. v. Daimler Trucks North America LLC, Case No. EEEMRC140925-11355 (Oregon Bureau of Labor and Industries Jan. 27, 2015) (conciliation agreement for settlement of the complaints of minority workers alleging threats and slurs at the company's truck manufacturing plant.)

Settlements In Private Plaintiff Wage & Hour Class Actions

For wage & hour class actions, the monetary value of the top ten private settlements entered into or paid in 2015 totaled $463.6 million. This is a significant increase – more than double – from the value of the top ten settlements in 2014, which totaled $215 million, and in 2013, which totaled $248.45 million.

1. $225 million – Fed Ex Ground Package System, Inc.
2. $80 million – U.S. Indian Health Services
3. $36 million – Bank Of America Corp.
4. $30 million – Publix Super Markets, Inc.
5. $28 million – Schneider National Carriers, Inc.
6. $16.5 million – Bob Evans Farms, Inc.
7. $15 million – RCI Hospitality Holdings, Inc.
8. $13.1 million – Southeastern Pennsylvania Transportation Authority
9. $10 million – Source Refrigeration & HVAC, Inc.
10. $10 million – Dick's Sporting Goods, Inc.

The top ten settlements were split evenly between nationwide and state-specific claims, and all but three of the top ten settlements involved wage & hour lawsuits pending in either federal or state courts in New York and California.

1. $225 million – Alexander, et al. v. Fed Ex Ground Package System, Inc., Case No. 05-CV-38 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 15, 2015) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement of wage & hour claims of drivers asserting that they were misclassified as independent contractors and deprived of benefits and wages accorded to employees).

2. $80 million – Labors' International Union Of North America, et al. v. U.S. Indian Health Services (HHSD May 26, 2015) (resolving multiple grievances, the U.S. Indian Health Services agreed to settle class action claims by employees for overtime on extended shifts at healthcare facilities, as well as for off-the-clock work and uncompensated travel time).

3. $36 million – Boyd, et al. v. Bank Of America Corp., Case No. 13-CV-561 (C.D. Cal. Aug. 24, 2015) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement of wage & hour claims involving misclassification of residential real estate appraisers as exempt from overtime).

4. $30 million – Ott, et al. v. Publix Super Markets, Inc., Case No. 12-CV-486 (M.D. Tenn. Feb. 3, 2015) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement of wage & hour claims alleging a failure to pay the required amount of overtime to department managers and assistant department managers who were paid overtime base on a "fluctuating workweek" calculation method).

5. $28 million – Bickley, et al. v. Schneider National Carriers, Inc., Case No. 08-CV-5806 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 15, 2015) (request for settlement approval for class action regarding wage & hour claims involving California-based truckers who alleged their employer failed to provide meal and rest breaks).

6. $16.5 million – Snodgrass, et al. v. Bob Evans Farms, Inc., Case No. 12-CV-768 (S.D. Ohio Oct. 23, 2015) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement of wage & hour claims involving 2,500 assistant managers who allegedly were misclassified as exempt from overtime).

7. $15 million – Hart, et al. v. RCI Hospitality Holdings, Inc., Case No. 09-CV-3043 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 22, 2015) (final approval granted for a class action settlement of wage & hour claims brought by exotic dancers accusing an adult night club operator of misclassification of the dancers as independent contractors and refusing to pay minimum and overtime wages).

8. $13.1 million – Bell, et al. v. Southeastern Pennsylvania Transportation Authority, Case No. 11-CV-4047 (E.D. Penn. Aug. 24, 2015) (approval granted for a FLSA collective action settlement involving claims that the transit agency failed to pay drivers for pre-shift work).

9. $10 million – Galeener, et al. v. Source Refrigeration & HVAC, Inc., Case No. 13-CV-4960 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 11, 2015) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement of wage & hour claims against a refrigeration company, which alleged a failure to pay technicians for attending meetings and miscalculating their overtime rates).

10. $10 million – Lapan, et al. v. Dick's Sporting Goods, Inc., Case No. 13-CV-11390 (D. Mass. Dec. 11, 2015) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement of wage & hour claims involving allegations of shorting employees of wages and overtime pay by misclassifying them).

Settlements In Private Plaintiff ERISA Class Actions

For ERISA class actions, the monetary value of the top ten private settlements entered into or paid in 2015 totaled $926.5 million. This amount was down slightly from 2014, when the total monetary value of the top ten private settlements reached $1.31 billion; in 2013, by comparison, the top ten settlements totaled $155.6 million.

1. $354.5 million – United Automobile Aerospace And Agricultural Implement Workers Of America
2. $140 million – Nationwide Life Insurance Co.
3. $90 million – The Boeing Co.
4. $82 million – Meriter Health Services Employee Retirement Plan
5. $62 million – Lockheed Martin Corp.
6. $57 million – The Boeing Co.
7. $40 million –American International Group, Inc.
8. $36 million – Northern Trust Investments N.A.
9. $33 million – FreightCar America, Inc.
10. $32 million – Novant Health, Inc.

The largest ERISA class action settlements involved disputes over breach of fiduciary duty, use of revenue sharing agreements, reduction of retiree benefits, and/or investing pension or 401(k) assets into company stock.

1. $354.5 million – Office And Professional Employees International Union, Local Union 494, et al. v. United Automobile Aerospace And Agricultural Implement Workers Of America, International Union, Case No. 14-CV-14868 (E.D. Mich. Nov. 6, 2015) (final approval granted for settlement of an ERISA class action resolving claims that the labor union made unauthorized changes to the employees' health plan and allegedly violated its collective bargaining obligations).

2. $140 million – Haddock, et al. v. Nationwide Life Insurance Co., Case No. 01-CV-1552 (D. Conn. April 9, 2015) (final approval granted for settlement of an ERISA class action involving various claims over Nationwide's collection of undisclosed revenue sharing payments from non-proprietary mutual funds).

3. $90 million – Society For Professional Engineering Employees In Aerospace, IFPTE Local 2001, et al. v. The Boeing Co., Case No. 05-CV-1251 (D. Kan. Sept. 28, 2015) (final approval granted for settlement of an ERISA class action filed by several unions that contended that employees who lost their jobs following the 2005 sale of a Kansas commercial aircraft facility were entitled to retirement benefits).

4. $82 million – Johnson, et al. v. Meriter Health Services Employee Retirement Plan, Case No. 10-CV-426 (W.D. Wis. Jan. 5, 2015) (final approval granted for settlement of an ERISA class action relative to claims by employees alleging that pension payments were improperly calculated).

5. $62 million – Abbott, et al. v. Lockheed Martin Corp., Case No. 06-CV-701 (S.D. Ill. July 20, 2015) (final approval granted for settlement of an ERISA class action alleging mismanagement of workers' 401(k) retirement plan).

6. $57 million – Spane, et al. v. The Boeing Co., Case No. 06-CV-743 (S.D. Ill. Nov. 17, 2015) (preliminary approval granted for settlement of an ERISA class action relative to breach of fiduciary duties over payment of excessive pension administration fees).

7. $40 million – In Re American International Group, Inc., ERISA Litigation II, Case No. 08-CV-5722 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 18, 2015) (final approval granted for settlement of an ERISA class action alleging that employee pension plans improperly invested in the company's own ineffectively performing stock following the 2008 mortgage crisis).

8. $36 million – Diebold, et al. v. Northern Trust Investments N.A., Case No. 09-CV-1934 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 8, 2015) (final approval granted for settlement of an ERISA class action that alleged Northern Trust breached its duties to retirement plans and their participants and beneficiaries).

9. $33 million – Zanghi, et al. v. FreightCar America, Inc., Case No. 13-CV-146 (W.D. Pa. Sept. 21, 2015) (final approval granted for settlement of an ERISA class action over the company's termination of retiree medical and life insurance benefits).

10. $32 million – Kruger, et al. v. Novant Health, Inc., Case No. 14-CV-208 (M.D.N.C. Nov. 9, 2015) (preliminary approval granted for settlement of an ERISA class action relative to breach of fiduciary duties in overpaying fees for fund investments).

Settlements In Private Plaintiff Statutory Workplace Class Actions

Plaintiffs' lawyers also pursued a myriad of statutory claims in workplace class actions brought against employers (outside of the areas of employment discrimination, wage & hour, and ERISA class actions).

These cases involved statutory claims for workplace antitrust violations, Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act ("WARN") violations, Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") violations, and other federal and state statutory law violations. The top ten settlements in this category increased exponentially, as they totaled $713.85 million in 2015; in contrast, they totaled $74.03 million in 2014.

1. $415 million – Google, Inc.
2. $125 million – State Of Connecticut
3. $75 million – City Of New Orleans
4. $42 million – VHS Of Michigan, Inc.
5. $18 million – Fulton County, Georgia
6. $10.1 million – Orange County Attorneys Association
7. $9 million – District Of Columbia
8. $8 million – Sony Pictures Entertainment, Inc.
9. $7 million – American Managed Care, LLC
10. $4.75 million – Sterling Infosystems, Inc.

The top 10 biggest settlements involved five contract/civil service class actions, two workplace antitrust class actions, as well as one class action for FCRA claims, one WARN Act class action, and one workplace data breach class action.

1. $415 million – In Re High-Tech Employee Antitrust Litigation, Case No. 11-CV-2509 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 2, 2015) (final approval granted for settlement of a workplace antitrust class action over claims accusing Google Inc., Apple Inc., and others of illegally agreeing not to poach each other's engineers).

2. $125 million – State Employees Bargaining Agent Coalition, et al. v. State Of Connecticut, Case No. 03-CV-221 (D. Conn. April 28, 2015) (final approval granted for a class action settlement involving claims that state officials violated labor organizations' and state employees' First Amendment rights to freedom of association by discriminatorily laying-off only union members when reducing the state's workforce).

3. $75 million – New Orleans Firefighters Local 632, et al. v. City Of New Orleans, Case No. 81-11108 (La. Civil Dist. Ct. Oct. 15, 2015) (settlement of a class action by city firefighters over civil service and pension entitlements).

4. $42 million – Cason-Merenda, et al. v. VHS Of Michigan, Inc., Case No. 06-CV-15601 (E.D. Mich. Sept. 11, 2015) (preliminary approval granted for settlement of a workplace antitrust class action brought by 24,000 nurses accusing eight Detroit-area hospitals of conspiring to keep their wages low).

5. $18 million – Andrews, et al. v. Fulton County, Georgia, Case No. 2012-CV-223498 (Ga. Super. Ct. Nov. 18, 2015) (settlement of a class action brought by municipal employees over premium pay, civil service, and pension issues).

6. $10.1 million – Orange County v. Orange County Attorneys Association, Case No. 30-2013-638110 (Cal. Super. Ct. May 12, 2015) (final approval granted for settlement of a class action relative to union's allegations against Orange County supervisors who illegally imposed changes to the labor terms of county attorneys).

7. $9 million – Jones, et al. v. District Of Columbia, Case No. 07-CV-1206 (D.D.C. Oct. 14, 2015) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement alleging improprieties in the Disability Compensation Program administered by the District of Columbia for employees).

8. $8 million – Corona, et al. v. Sony Pictures Entertainment Inc., Case No. 14-CV-9600 (C.D. Cal. Nov. 16, 2015) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement of claims for breach of privacy of employees whose personal information was hacked and stolen off the company's IT systems).

9. $7 million – Universal Health Care Group, Inc. v. American Managed Care, LLC, Case No. 13-BK-1520 (M.D. Fla. Mar. 19, 2015) (final approval granted for a class action settlement of claims brought by former employees of health care company claiming violations of the WARN).

10. $4.75 million – Ernst, et al. v. Sterling Infosystems, Inc., Case No. 12-CV-8794 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 13, 2015) (final approval granted for a class action settlement alleging violations of the FCRA on behalf of job applicants).

B. Top Ten Government-Initiated Monetary Settlements

The EEOC and the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") aggressively litigated government enforcement actions in 2015.

Based on preliminary figures for the U.S. Government's 2015 fiscal year,[12] the EEOC filed 142 new merits lawsuits, including 26 non-systemic multi-party suits and 16 systemic pattern or practice lawsuits. In 2015, the EEOC resolved 155 pending lawsuits and secured $65.3 million in settlements for allegedly injured victims of job bias, an increase of $42.8 million as compared to the previous year. The EEOC also received a total of 89,385 private sector charges of discrimination, which were approximately 600 more charges than the previous year (and one of the highest totals in any year since 1964). In addition, the EEOC's docket of systemic pattern or practice cases grew to over 20% of the Commission's case load.

The DOL was equally aggressive in 2015.[13] It recovered $246.8 million in back wages for 240,340 workers, an increase of $6.8 million in recoveries over 2014. The back wages collected in 2015 stemmed primarily from FLSA enforcement, as $137.7 million was for overtime violations and $37.8 million was for minimum wage violations. For enforcement of the ERISA, recoveries were $837.5 million.

For all types of government-initiated enforcement actions, the monetary value of the top ten settlements entered into or paid in 2015 totaled $82.8 million. This entailed a significant increase over 2014, when the top ten settlements totaled $39.45 million, but was lower than the top ten settlements in 2013, which totaled $171.6 million.

1. $18.3 million – Halliburton, Inc.

2. $14.5 million – Patterson-UTI Drilling Company, LLC

3. $13 million – General Information Services, Inc.

4. $12.7 million – Local 28, Sheet Metal Workers' International Association

5. $5 million – National Consolidated Couriers, Inc.

6. $5 million – Signal International LLC

7. $4 million – Hillshire Brands Co.

8. $3.8 million – Consolidated Edison Co. Of New York

9. $3.5 million – Masse Contracting

10. $3 million – Stanford Yellow Taxi Cab

Five of the settlements involved EEOC pattern or practice lawsuits, four settlements involved federal DOL enforcement actions, and one settlement involved a CFPB action.

Settlements Of Government-Initiated Enforcement Actions And Pattern Or Practice Lawsuits

1. $18.3 million – U.S. Department Of Labor v. Halliburton, Inc., Case No. 1724773 (DOL Sept. 22, 2015) (approval of a settlement granted for overtime wages involving an oil and gas service provider that allegedly misclassified employees as exempt from overtime pay).

2. $14.5 million – EEOC v. Patterson-UTI Drilling Company, LLC, Case No. 15-CV-600 (D. Colo. April 17, 2015) (consent decree approved in an EEOC pattern or practice lawsuit alleging race discrimination).

3. $13 million – In Re General Information Services, Inc., Case No. 2015-CFPB-28 (Oct. 29, 2015) (settlement of violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act in a consent order before the U.S. Consumer Financial Protection Bureau relative to the use of employment background screening reports issued to employers).

4. $12.7 million – EEOC v. Local 28, Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Case No. 71-CV-2877 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 30, 2015) (consent decree approved in an EEOC pattern or practice lawsuit involving claims of race discrimination on behalf of minority sheet metal workers).

5. $5 million – U.S. Department Of Labor v. National Consolidated Couriers, Inc., Case No. 15-CV-3224 (N.D. Cal. July 15, 2015) (consent judgment entered in an FLSA action for unpaid wages and damages due to misclassification of more than 600 delivery drivers in California as independent contractors).

6. $5 million – EEOC v. Signal International LLC, Case No. 12-CV-557 (E.D. La. Dec. 18, 2015) (approval of consent decree through bankruptcy relative to the EEOC's pattern or practice claims of national origin discrimination for over 500 foreign-based workers due to their national origin).

7. $4 million – EEOC v. Hillshire Brands Co., Case No. 15-CV-1347 (E.D. Tex. Dec. 18, 2015) (consent decree approved in an EEOC pattern or practice lawsuit alleging race discrimination and hostile environment claims).

8. $3.8 million – EEOC v. Consolidated Edison Co. Of New York, Case No. 520-2007-03938 (EEOC Sept. 9, 2015) (conciliation agreement between the EEOC and employer resolving allegations of sexual harassment and discrimination against women in field positions between 2006 and 2015).

9. $3.5 million – U.S. Department Of Labor v. Masse Contracting, Case No. 1701126 (DOL June 22, 2015) (settlement of FLSA claims brought against six Gulf Coast staffing firms on behalf of 3,000 workers alleging violations of the FLSA due to payment of regular wages mislabeled as per diem payments to cheat workers out of correct overtime wages).

10. $3 million – U.S. Department Of Labor v. Stanford Yellow Taxi Cab, Case No. 13-CV-4208 (N.D. Cal. May 13, 2015) (approval of settlement of FLSA claims involving allegations that the employer misclassified drivers as independent contractors).

C. Noteworthy Injunctive Relief Provisions In Class Action Settlements

Generally, the types of relief obtained in settlements of employment discrimination class actions can be grouped into five categories, including modification of internal personnel practices and procedures; oversight and monitoring of corporate practices; mandatory training of supervisory personnel and employees; compensation for named plaintiffs and class members; and an award of attorneys' fees and costs for class counsel. In addition to substantial payments for overtime liability, settlements of FLSA collective actions often involve changes to payroll practices and procedures. In ERISA class action settlements, the terms typically include monetary payments along with injunctive orders barring fiduciaries and third-parties from serving as plan fiduciaries or managers.

Class action settlements involving private plaintiffs generally contain one or more of these items of non-monetary injunctive relief, but rarely contain all of them. Attorneys representing the U.S. Government in enforcement litigation actions also secured several settlements in 2015 that had noteworthy injunctive relief provisions. This reflects in some measure the significant "public interest" component of government-initiated enforcement litigation.

Among the more novel and/or onerous non-monetary relief requirements imposed on employers in 2015 were the following:

- Adopt and implement a language access program to ensure non-English speaking workers can obtain governmental services;
- Extend offers of employment to applicants who were allegedly denied positions due to their gender or race;
- Revise hiring procedures and recruitment policies to eliminate any requirement for hiring only U.S. citizens and/or including U.S. citizenship requirements in job postings and recruitment materials, including modification of the employer's on-line application software;
- Adopt reporting procedures to the EEOC to account for applicant flow and hiring data to enable the Commission to monitor compliance with affirmative hiring obligations;
- Perform a validation study on hiring and selection procedures to avoid discrimination in hiring, promotions, and terminations;
- Develop marketing and advertising materials to feature females in photographs in such materials, and engage in outreach recruitment to attract qualified females for job openings;
- Adopt new testing and evaluation procedures for hiring, promotion, and compensation; and,
- Adopt hiring goals for applicants based on their minority status.

The top ten settlements in 2015 involving significant injunctive relief provisions include:

1. U.S. Department of Labor v. Washington State Department Of Labor & Industries*, Case No. 12-WA-006 (DOL Oct. 1, 2015). Based on a complaint of national origin and disability discrimination, the State of Washington agreed to a case resolution in which it will develop and implement a language access program to ensure non-English speaking workers are not impaired from obtaining governmental services.

2. U.S. Department Of Labor v. Fastenal Co.*, Case No. 1725248 (DOL Oct. 9, 2015). Based on hiring discrimination claims, the company agreed to a case resolution in which it will hire 171 African-American and female applicants to fill future job openings.

3. EEOC v. AJ 3860, LLC*, Case No. 14-CV-1621 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 10, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that the employer discriminated against African-American employees and retaliated against a manager who objected to alleged workplace racism. The employer operated a series of clubs in Florida. Based on a default judgment, the Court enjoined Defendants from on-going discriminatory practices, and required the employer to report applicant flow and hiring data for African-American applicants to the EEOC so that the Commission could monitor compliance with the injunctive relief order.

4. Foster, et al. v. Pittsburgh Bureau Of Police*, Case No. 12-CV-127 (W.D. Pa. Nov. 18, 2015). Plaintiffs sued the Pittsburgh Bureau Of Police alleging disparate treatment and disparate impact claims based on Title VII. Plaintiffs alleged that the City's hiring process operated as a pattern or practice of systemic discrimination with respect to African-American applicants, and had an adverse impact on those applicants. As part of the consent decree ordered by the Court, the Bureau of Police agreed to validate its hiring and selection procedures so as to eliminate any issues relative to disparate impact upon minority applicants.

5. EEOC v. Cintas Corp.*, Case No. 04-CV-40132 (E.D. Mich. Nov. 11, 2015). The EEOC sued the employer for failing to recruit or hire females for the position of route sales driver/service sales representative. As part of a consent decree, the Court ordered Defendant to feature photographs of females in marketing and advertising materials, and engage in affirmative outreach recruitment to attract qualified females for job openings.

6. U.S. Department Of Labor v. Foreclosure Connection, Inc.*, Case No. 15-CV-653 (D. Utah Sept. 22, 2015). The U.S. Department of Labor sued the employer alleging that it terminated, retaliated, and discriminated against current and former employees who had participated in the DOL's investigation of alleged payroll practices that violated the FLSA. The Court entered an injunction requiring Defendant to notify its workforce that employees have the right to speak to DOL investigators, as well as the employer's duty to avoid any behavior that could impede or retaliate against current or former employees. To that end, the Court ordered an officer of Defendant, in the presence of a representative of DOL, to read out loud in a workplace meeting of all employees – in both English and Spanish – a statement to workers informing them of the right to speak with representatives of the DOL free from retaliation or threats of retaliation or intimidation by Defendants.

7. Sims, et al. v. Pfizer, Inc.*, Case No. 10-CV-10743 (E.D. Mich. Nov. 13, 2015). Plaintiffs sued an employer alleging that it violated the Labor-Management Relations Act, the ERISA, and applicable collective bargaining agreements by withdrawing healthcare benefits to retired workers. As part of a class action settlement, Defendant agreed to provide lifetime healthcare benefits to a group of retired workers for the rest of their lives.

8. EEOC v. United Airlines, Inc.*, Case No. 10-CV-1699 (N.D. Ill. June 8, 2015). The EEOC sued an employer under the ADA on the grounds that it denied reasonable accommodations to disabled employees by declining to reassign them to vacant positions for which they were qualified. As part of the consent decree ordered by the Court, the company agreed to adopt new personnel policies with regard to reassignments as a reasonable accommodation for employees with disabilities.

9. United States v. City Of Eugene*, Oregon, Case No. DJ-197-61-109 (DOJ Aug. 5, 2015). The U.S. Department of Justice asserted citizenship discrimination claims against the Eugene Police Department for improperly restricting law enforcement positions to U.S. citizens at the time of hiring. The City's Police Department affirmatively asked applicants for employment about their citizenship and excluded any applicant who was not a U.S. citizen at the time of hire. As part of the resolution of the claim, the City agreed to train hiring officials about the anti-discrimination provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act, to cease its practice of limiting hiring to U.S. citizens for law enforcement positions, and to modify its on-line application software to remove questions related to an applicant's citizenship status.

10. U.S. Department Of Labor v. G & K Services, Inc.* (DOL Nov. 17, 2015). The DOL investigated the employer regarding hiring, promotion, and pay policies that allegedly caused racial and gender discrimination against applicants and employees throughout its locations in the United States. As part of the resolution of the DOL's claim, the employer agreed to extend offers of employment to female and African-American employees allegedly discriminated against during the hiring process. The employer also agreed to adopt written compensation guidelines and to revise its pay practices for general labor positions.

III. Significant Federal Employment Discrimination Class Action And EEOC Pattern Or Practice Rulings

This Chapter examines rulings in 2015 in employment discrimination class action cases arising under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as well as "pattern or practice" enforcement actions brought by the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Rulings are divided into these two substantive sections, and sub-divided into the federal circuits in which the appellate or district court rendered the decision.

The plaintiffs' bar had mixed success on Rule 23 motions in 2015, as illustrated by the following map:

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	D.C. Circuit

A. Cases Certifying Or Refusing To Certify Employment Discrimination Class Actions Under Title VII Of The Civil Rights Act Of 1964

(i) First Circuit

No reported decisions.

(ii) Second Circuit

Chen-Oster, et al. v. Goldman Sachs & Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 100852 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former female employees women, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants discriminated against them by denying them equal compensation and opportunities for promotion on the basis of their gender in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and New York City Human Rights Law. Id. at *2. Following the Magistrate Judge's recommendations to strike Plaintiffs' class allegations from their complaint, the Court held that persons not currently employed lacked standing to seek injunctive and declaratory relief and could not seek to certify a class under Rule 23(b)(2). Id. at *3. Although Plaintiffs later sought to amend the Court's ruling and to hold that the named Plaintiffs have standing to assert claims for injunctive relief, the Magistrate Judge found that the law of the case doctrine applied, and therefore, a class could not be certified under Rule 23(b)(2). Id. at *4-5. The Magistrate Judge also found that certification of a liability class under Rule 23(c)(4) was unwarranted in light of the unavailability of injunctive relief and the highly individualized causation and damages issues. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs subsequently sought reconsideration of the Magistrate Judge's recommendation that class certification under Rule 23(b)(2) should be denied to the extent it was predicated on the Court's holding that the named Plaintiffs lacked standing to seek injunctive relief. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiffs argued that the Magistrate Judge should not have applied the law of the case doctrine to a ruling on jurisdiction. Id. at *7. Denying reconsideration, the Magistrate Judge found that Plaintiffs misunderstood the applicability of the law of the case doctrine to jurisdictional determinations, which was applied here with full force. Id. at *7-9. The Magistrate Judge also held that Plaintiffs failed to offer any new controlling authority of facts or law for reconsideration that they did not already present in briefing the class certification motion. Id. at *9-10. The Magistrate Judge, therefore, denied Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration. The Magistrate Judge, however, granted the motion to intervene two named Plaintiffs who purportedly had standing to request an injunction. The Magistrate Judge found that: (i) the motion to intervene was timely; (ii) the interveners shared common issues with Plaintiffs in this action; (iii) the parties would not be unduly prejudiced by the intervention, but the interveners would risk prejudice if denied the intervention; (iv) the interveners presented the same core legal and factual issues raised by Plaintiffs; (v) the case had not progressed to a point where intervention would be disruptive; and (vi) it would be more efficient to proceed with a single case. Id. at *31. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge denied Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration and granted two named Plaintiffs' motion to intervene.

(iii) Third Circuit

No reported decisions.

(iv) Fourth Circuit

Brown, et al. v. Nucor Corp.,* 785 F.3d 895 (4th Cir. May 11, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of African-American steel workers, brought a class action alleging that Defendants discriminated against them on the basis of their race, denied them promotion and subjected them to a hostile work environment in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII"). Id. The District Court had originally denied class certification of both claims, which the Fourth Circuit had reversed ("Brown I"). On remand, the District Court revisited certification and decertified the promotions class in the light of Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. 2541 (2011). Id. Plaintiffs once again appealed, and the Fourth Circuit vacated the district court's decision in part and remanded for re-certification of the class. The Fourth Circuit noted that the promotions claim rested on alternative theories of liability under Title VII. Id. Plaintiffs' promotions claim first alleged a pattern or practice of disparate treatment, and secondly, charged that Defendants' neutral promotions policies and procedures had a disparate impact based on race. Id. at 899. The Fourth Circuit observed that both these theories were grounded in a statistical analysis of racial disparities in job promotions at the plant combined with anecdotal evidence of discrimination. The Fourth Circuit noted that the parties' central dispute concerned the data used to analyze the period from December 1999 to January 2001, when Defendants failed to retain actual bidding records. The Fourth Circuit opined that the critical question was not whether the data used was perfect, but instead, whether it was reliable and probative of discrimination. The District Court first questioned the assumption that the job changes on the 27 forms represented promotions, and relying on the dissent's finding in Brown I, found that the forms may represent job changes unrelated to promotions. The Fourth Circuit, however, determined that 19 of the 27 change-of-status forms expressly stated that they were a promotion for a successful bidder on a higher position, or for a new position that was awarded or earned. Id. at 905. Two of the forms described changes in job classification accompanied by an increase in pay. Id. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit concluded that the 27 forms were related to promotions. The District Court further ruled that the statistical and anecdotal evidence were insufficient for class certification insofar as the evidence did not demonstrate a uniform class-wide injury that spanned the entire plant. The District Court observed that Wal-Mart required Plaintiffs to present a common contention capable of being proven or disproven in "one-stroke" to satisfy commonality, and a claim based on discrimination in employment decisions without some glue holding the alleged reasons for all those decisions together that would make it impossible to say that examination of all the class members' claims for relief would produce a common answer to the critical question "why was I disfavored." Id. at 909. The Fourth Circuit reasoned that Plaintiffs presented two such common contentions capable of class-wide answers under Title VII. Under a disparate treatment theory, the common contention was that Defendants engaged in a pattern or practice of unlawful discrimination against black workers in promotions decisions. Id. Under the disparate impact theory, the common contention was that a facially neutral promotions policy resulted in a disparate impact based on race. Id. The Fourth Circuit observed that whereas there may have been many answers in Wal-Mart to the question of why any individual employee was disfavored, Plaintiffs had sufficiently alleged that there was only one answer to the question of why Defendants' black workers were consistently disfavored. Id. at 915. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit vacated the District Court's decertification of Plaintiffs' promotions class and remanded the case with instructions to certify the class.

(v) Fifth Circuit

Robinson, III, et al. v. General Motors Co.,* Case No. 15-CV-158 (N.D. Tex. Oct. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs filed a putative class action against Defendant alleging that it violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by denying Plaintiffs' religious accommodations of unpaid leave to observe their respective holy days, despite the availability of volunteers to cover their shifts. Plaintiffs demanded damages and a class-wide injunction ordering Defendant to allow unpaid leave on holy days, to inquire about the availability of volunteer coverage, and seek no-cost methods of allowing religious leave. Id. at 2-3. Plaintiffs alleged that, in 2008, two employees of Defendant's Arlington, Texas facility began making requests for unpaid leave to observe their respective religious holy days. Plaintiffs alleged that General Motors ("GM") employee James Robinson, III ("Robinson") requested and received unpaid leave for religious holy days, including Saturdays. Id. at 1-2. Plaintiffs alleged that GM employee Chris Scruggs ("Scruggs") requested but was denied unpaid leave for religious holy days until Defendant began granting his requests for unpaid leave in 2010. Id. at 2. Plaintiffs were of different faith communities; Robinson is a member of the Seventh Day Sabbatarian Community of Tyler Sabbath Fellowship, and Scruggs is a member of the Messianic Jewish Beth Yeshua Congregation. Id. at 1-2. Plaintiffs alleged that, in 2013, Defendant began denying Robinson's requests for unpaid leave to observe holy days and, once Robinson's attorney identified Scruggs as another employee being denied similar unpaid leave, Defendant resumed denial of Scruggs' requests for unpaid leave to observe holy days. Id. Plaintiffs sought certification of a class of "all General Motors workers within the United States subject to the 2011 UAW-GM National Agreement and who may seek unpaid leave for a holy day because of a religious belief." Id. at 5. Defendant opposed the motion by arguing that the class that Plaintiffs purported to represent incorporated an impermissible "hypothetical – i.e., the possibility that GM employees may seek unpaid religious leave at some time in the future," and would require individualized inquiries not suited for class treatment. Id. Finding that the Plaintiffs' class definition "includes any GM employees who might request unpaid religious leave in the future," the Court determined that the class was not adequately defined or ascertainable. Id. at 6. Noting that the Court would be required to evaluate each class member's religion, that religion's holy days, and the days that each class member requested for leave, the Court determined that Plaintiffs failed to identify common questions of law or fact applicable to the class and failed to prove numerosity. Id. at 6. The Court observed that "[c]lass relief is most appropriate where the issues in the case turn on questions of law or fact 'applicable in the same manner to each member of the class.'" Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, but allowed leave to Plaintiffs to file an amended complaint and to propose a definition of a more ascertainable class. Id. at 7.

(vii) Seventh Circuit

Brand, et al. v. Comcast Corp., Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 153623 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former African-American employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendant created a hostile work environment at its 112th Street facility in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and 42 U.S.C. § 1981. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs moved to certify five classes. The Court certified Plaintiffs' hostile work environment class and found that the other four classes lacked commonality. Id. at *4. Subsequently, the parties concluded their merits discovery and Plaintiffs moved to amend the Court's class certification order. Plaintiffs contended that three crucial facts came to light during discovery that warranted certifying a promotions class and a discipline class. Id. at *5. First, Plaintiffs claimed that through Defendant's performance improvement plan program, ("PIP program"), a much larger percentage of 112th Street technicians would be placed on PIP program than technicians in other areas. Id. Second, Plaintiffs argued that contrary to Defendant's representations, the PIP program applied to areas including 112th Street and Defendant did not fully discontinue the PIP program until the end of 2011. Id. at *6. Third, Plaintiffs claimed that during depositions, Defendant's representatives revealed that at the time the company set its performance metrics for technicians to qualify for advancement (known as "Qualify to Pursue" ("QTP")), Defendant was aware that only 2% of technicians in 112th Street's area would qualify. Id. Accordingly, Plaintiffs sought to certify a PIP class and a QTP class. The Court noted that Plaintiffs' PIP class was narrower than their proposed discipline class because instead of seeking to certify a class of African-American technicians subjected to discriminatory discipline, they sought certification of employees who were placed on PIP. Id. at *11. The Court observed that Seventh Circuit case law authority had repeatedly held that placing an employee on a PIP was not enough by itself to constitute actionable adverse employment action. Id. at *12. The Court found that Plaintiffs did not suggest that every worker at the 112th street who was placed on a PIP suffered the same type of injury. Id. at *13. In fact, the Court noted that Plaintiffs suggested in their first motion that some class members who were placed on PIP were disciplined while others were not, and some were terminated, while others were not. Id. at *14. The Court held that ascertaining injury would therefore require determining individual issues, and accordingly, declined to certify the PIP class. Id. at *14. Further, the Court observed that the QTP class was also a revision of the earlier promotion class. Plaintiffs defined the QTP class to consist of African-American technicians who failed to satisfy Defendant's performance metrics. Id. at *15. Plaintiffs contended that Defendant designed and implemented this metric even though it was fully aware that 112th Street technicians would disproportionately fail. Id. at *15. The Court found that even if Plaintiffs proved that Defendant set its performance metrics knowing that African-American employees at 112th Street would be disproportionately disciplined and denied promotion, the named Plaintiffs would need to prove that they were subjected to an adverse employment action as a result of intentional discrimination. Id. at *18. The Court held that simply proving that Defendant knew that 112th Street workers would struggle to meet its performance metrics would not be enough. Id. Thus, the Court determined that Plaintiffs' proposed common questions did not predominate over individual issues as required by Rule 23(b)(3). Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to amend the class certification order.

Chicago Teachers Union, et al. v. Board Of Education Of The City Of Chicago,* 307 F.R.D. 475 (N.D. Ill. 2015). Plaintiffs, three individual teachers and their union, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII") by carrying out a series of large-scale lay-offs that resulted in the termination of employment of numerous African-American teachers and paraprofessionals. Id. at 477. Plaintiffs moved for certification of a class of all African-American employees whose employment as a tenured teacher or staff member was terminated pursuant to Defendant's lay-off policy in 2011. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Id. at 487. The Court found that Plaintiffs met all the required elements of Rule 23. Plaintiffs met numerosity as the proposed class, which included over 500 members, was sufficiently numerous. Id. at 479. Plaintiffs established commonality as Plaintiffs' claim clearly depended upon a common issue, i.e., whether Defendant's policy of selective schools for lay-offs caused a disparate impact on African-American employees in violation of Title VII. Id. at 479-80. The Court found that Plaintiffs met typicality as all of the proposed class representatives based their claims on the same legal theory, i.e., racial discrimination in violation of Title VII. Id. at 482. According to the Court, the fact that individual Plaintiffs were tenured teachers, while the class also included staff subjected to the collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") between the union, meant that Defendant did nothing to affect the typicality of the claims. Id. at 481. The Court opined that Plaintiffs met adequacy as there was nothing about the union per se to make it an inadequate representative of its members' interests, and Defendant pointed to no single conflict of interest that could impair the ability of any of the individual Plaintiffs to represent the interests of the class fairly and adequately. Id. at 482-83. The Court also found that certification under Rule 23(b)(2) would be proper as the injunctive relief sought would affect the class as a whole and would be final. Id. at 485. Plaintiffs sought two forms of injunctive relief, including an order enjoining Defendant from applying the policies that guided the 2011 lay-offs to any future lay-offs that might occur and a reinstatement order so that class members could return to their jobs. Id. at 484. Because a reinstatement order would be a single order that applied to all class members and any such order would be preceded by a class proceeding that determined the question of Defendant's liability as to all class members at once, the Court determined that certification under Rule 23(b)(2) would be proper. Id. at 485. Plaintiffs also sought class certification under Rule 23(b)(3) and the Court granted that request, finding that the central issue of liability predominated and significantly outweighed the individual issues. Id. at 486. Although damages would have to be calculated separately for each class member, Plaintiffs asserted that the precise level of each class member's lost earning could be ascertained based on the pre-determined wage levels by the CBA, and the Court agreed with Plaintiffs that this would make any potential damages award more likely amenable to class adjudication. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Id. at 487.

Chicago Teachers Union, et al. v. Board Of Education Of The City Of Chicago,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13831 (7th Cir. Aug. 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, three individual teachers and their union, brought an action alleging that Defendants violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act by carrying out a series or large-scale lay-offs that resulted in the termination of numerous African-American teachers and paraprofessionals. Plaintiffs sought class certification, which the District Court denied, finding that Plaintiffs did not meet their burden of establishing a common issue by a preponderance of evidence. Id. at *9. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit reversed and remanded. Defendants argued that the facts of Plaintiffs' case aligned with those in Wal-Mart v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. 2541 (2011), that the decision to reconstitute the schools was not made pursuant to a central uniform policy or even by a single decision-maker, but rather was based on subjective, qualitative factors that were not uniformly applied. Id. at *14. The Seventh Circuit noted that the Chief Executive Office ("CEO") of Chicago Public Schools first identified all schools eligible by state law for reconstitution due to poor past performance. Id. Then the CEO reduced that list of 226 schools to 74 schools by removing those that met the objective criteria of a composite Illinois Standard Achievement Test ("ISAT") score above the network average for elementary schools, or a five-year graduation rate above network average for high schools. Id. In the third step, the CEO and the other high-level board members attended a series of meetings at which they discussed the types of information that the group would consider concerning schools eligible for reconstitution, and then analyzed that information. Id. The Seventh Circuit remarked that Plaintiffs alleged that the objective criteria in the first two steps narrowed the pool in such a way as to have a disparate impact on African-American teachers. Id. at *18. The Seventh Circuit opined that a subjective, discretionary decision could be the source of a common claim if it was, for example, the outcome of employment practices or policies controlled by higher-level directors, if all decision-makers exercised discretion in a common way because of a common policy or practice, or if all decision-makers acted together as one unit. Id. at *23. The Chicago Board of Education ("Board") maintained that no single criteria was used in the third step, i.e., each of the 26 schools chosen for reconstitution was chosen after being considered individually. Id. at *24. The Board went on to describe the numerous factors considered in the various schools, and stated that there was a specific, unique rationale for each decision. Id. at *25, 28. The Seventh Circuit observed that the scenario in this case was different from that of Wal-Mart, where there was no way of knowing why each of the thousands of individual managers made distinct decisions regarding promotions and pay in millions of employment decisions. Id. at *29. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit concluded that Plaintiffs had demonstrated commonality by asserting that a uniform employment practice (i.e., the set of criteria used to evaluate the school) used by the same decision-making body to evaluate schools was discriminatory. Id. at *31. As to Plaintiffs' request for certification under Rule 23(b)(2) on their claim for injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief, the Seventh Circuit noted that certification was appropriate because the class was requesting the same injunction and declaratory relief for all. Id. at *39. The Seventh Circuit explained that Plaintiffs sought a declaratory judgment that the Board's turnaround policies violated Title VII, and prospective injunctive relief including a moratorium on turnarounds and the appointment of a monitor to evaluate and oversee any new turnaround process. The Seventh Circuit concluded that the District Court erred because the proposed 23(b)(2) class did not seek individual relief, as it requested issuance of a declaration that the Board's practice violated Title VII. Id. at *35. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit reversed and remanded.

(xii) District Of Columbia Circuit

Smith, et al. v. Ergo Solutions, LLC*, 306 F.R.D. 57 (D.D.C. 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants created a corporate and organizational culture where the environment promoted and perpetrated sexual harassment, in violation of both Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("title VII") and the District of Columbia Human Rights Act. Id. at 61. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that Ergo Solutions' CEO sent female employees a sexually explicit video, made sexual advances, touched them inappropriately, and attempted to initiate sex in the office. Id. at 60-61. Plaintiffs moved to certify the class, which the Court denied. Id. at 68. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs' motion for class certification was untimely because Local Civil Rule 23.1(b) provides that a motion for class certification shall be filed within 90 days after filing of a first complaint. Id. at 65. Plaintiffs filed the motion nearly five months after filing their initial complaint; thus, they argued that their error constituted excusable neglect. Given the procedural history, and Defendants' failure to point to any unfair prejudice they had suffered as a result of delay, as well as in the absence of any allegation of bad faith on the part of Plaintiffs, the Court concluded that the equities counseled against denying class certification on the basis of a relatively short delay alone. Id. at 66. The Court found, however, that Plaintiffs' allegations were too vague to make the necessary showings under Rule 23. Id. at 67. First, the Court remarked that Plaintiffs' estimation of the number of female employees and independent contractors affected – unsupported by any record evidence – did not affirmatively demonstrate that there were in fact sufficiently numerous parties. Id. The Court also determined that it could not ascertain whether Plaintiffs established commonality and typicality requirements from a bare list of alleged victims of discrimination and the generalized allegations of hostile work environment in the amended complaint. Id. Further, the Court remarked that Plaintiffs failed to submit any affidavits, deposition testimony, statistical evidence, or company documents to demonstrate the requisite commonality of questions of law or fact or typicality of claims or defenses among the purported class members. Moreover, the claims of female employees who experienced actual harassment were different from those who experienced only the allegedly hostile workplace environment. Id. The Court, however, opined that it could not take the allegations lightly. The Court noted that given that the alleged purveyors of the hostile environment were the owners of the company, Plaintiffs' plight might not be limited to one division or sub-class of female employees. Id. at 67-68. The Court required, however, at least some information to determine whether Plaintiffs' experiences were indeed common or typical among Defendants' female employees more generally. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied class certification, but permitted additional pre-certification discovery. Id. at 68.

(xiii) U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission

Meyer, et al. v. Department Of State,* EEOC Case No. 0520140506 (EEOC Feb. 19, 2015). A job applicant for the U.S. Foreign Service filed a complaint with the EEOC against the U.S. Department of State ("the Agency") alleging that the Agency discriminated against her on the basis of her disability due to its "worldwide availability" policy. Id. at 2. Complainant asserted that the worldwide availability requirement required every candidate to be able to work wherever the Foreign Service had a post, without the possibility of reasonable accommodation. Plaintiff alleged that the Agency's worldwide availability policy, as administered, disparately treated and impacted qualified individuals with disabilities who were over 40 years of age. Complainant sought to certify a class comprised of all applicants for career Foreign Service employment with a disability whom the Agency had denied employment since October 7, 2006, because the Agency's Office of Medical Services denied them "Class 1 – Unlimited Clearance for Worldwide Assignment" type clearance. Id. at 2. The EEOC Administrative Judge ("AJ") had certified the class, finding that the Agency's policy requiring worldwide availability affected all members of the purported class. The AJ had found that the centralized policy involved common questions of fact in that all applicants received conditional offers, but the Agency denied a position because of their actual, perceived, or record of disability. Id. The EEOC affirmed the AJ's class certification order, but stated that the class definition should include all qualified applicants to the Foreign Service for whom the Agency denied employment, or delayed employment pending application for and receipt of a waiver (because the Agency deemed them not "worldwide available" due to their disability). Id. The Agency requested reconsideration, and the EEOC denied the request. The Agency argued that the EEOC's legal finding of commonality and typicality was erroneous because it was based on an incorrect understanding of its medical clearance process. Id. at 3. Even if the EEOC did not overturn the class certification determination, the Agency requested that the class definition be modified to "all applicants for career Foreign Service employment who were denied employment since October 7, 2006 because the Agency deemed them not 'worldwide available' due to their disability." Id. The EEOC noted that a reconsideration request is an opportunity to demonstrate that the previous decision involved a clearly erroneous interpretation of material fact or law, or would have a substantial impact on the policies, practices, or operations of the Agency. Id at 4. Here, the EEOC found that the Agency's request failed to meet that criteria. The EEOC determined that the Agency had simply reiterated the arguments previously made to the AJ. While the Agency clearly disagreed with the decision, the EEOC reasoned that the Agency had not presented persuasive evidence that supported its contention that the decision was clearly erroneous. Id. Moreover, the EEOC noted that because the decision directed the Agency to continue processing the complaint, it could continue raising appropriate arguments and concerns to the AJ as the litigation progressed. Accordingly, the EEOC denied the Agency's request.

B. EEOC Pattern Or Practice Cases

"Pattern or practice" lawsuits brought by the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission are not governed by Rule 23. Instead, Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 governs these types of lawsuits. Under the statute, the EEOC need not satisfy the Rule 23 requirements in order to sue on behalf of a group of allegedly injured individuals. Instead, the EEOC must follow the framework established by the U.S. Supreme Court in International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324 (1977). Nonetheless, EEOC pattern or practice cases tend to involve litigation issues similar to private party Rule 23 class actions.

The EEOC launched a new systemic litigation initiative in 2006. As a result, the volume of rulings in EEOC pattern or practice lawsuits increased significantly in 2015. The 143 rulings over the past year covered a wide gamut of issues, including the proper scope of an EEOC lawsuit based on the Commission's administrative investigation; motions for summary judgment in EEOC pattern or practice cases; defenses to EEOC administrative enforcement proceedings; the proper scope of discovery in an EEOC lawsuit, both with respect to an employer's discovery as to the EEOC and the Commission's discovery relative to private employers; monetary sanctions against the EEOC for frivolous litigation; summary judgment on a class-wide basis in EEOC pattern or practice lawsuits; the scope of injunctive relief available as a remedy in EEOC litigation; the viability of various affirmative defenses to EEOC pattern or practice claims; the burdens of proof and discovery limits between § 706 and § 707 claims in an EEOC pattern or practice lawsuit; the standards for enforcement of EEOC administrative subpoenas; the appropriate statute of limitations for § 707 claims asserted by the EEOC; the availability of discovery against the EEOC relative to its own personnel practices; the propriety of late amendments to EEOC complaints; the scope of an employer's defense based on the EEOC's breach of its duty to engage in good faith conciliation prior to filing a lawsuit; and the interpretation of employer obligations in EEOC consent decrees.

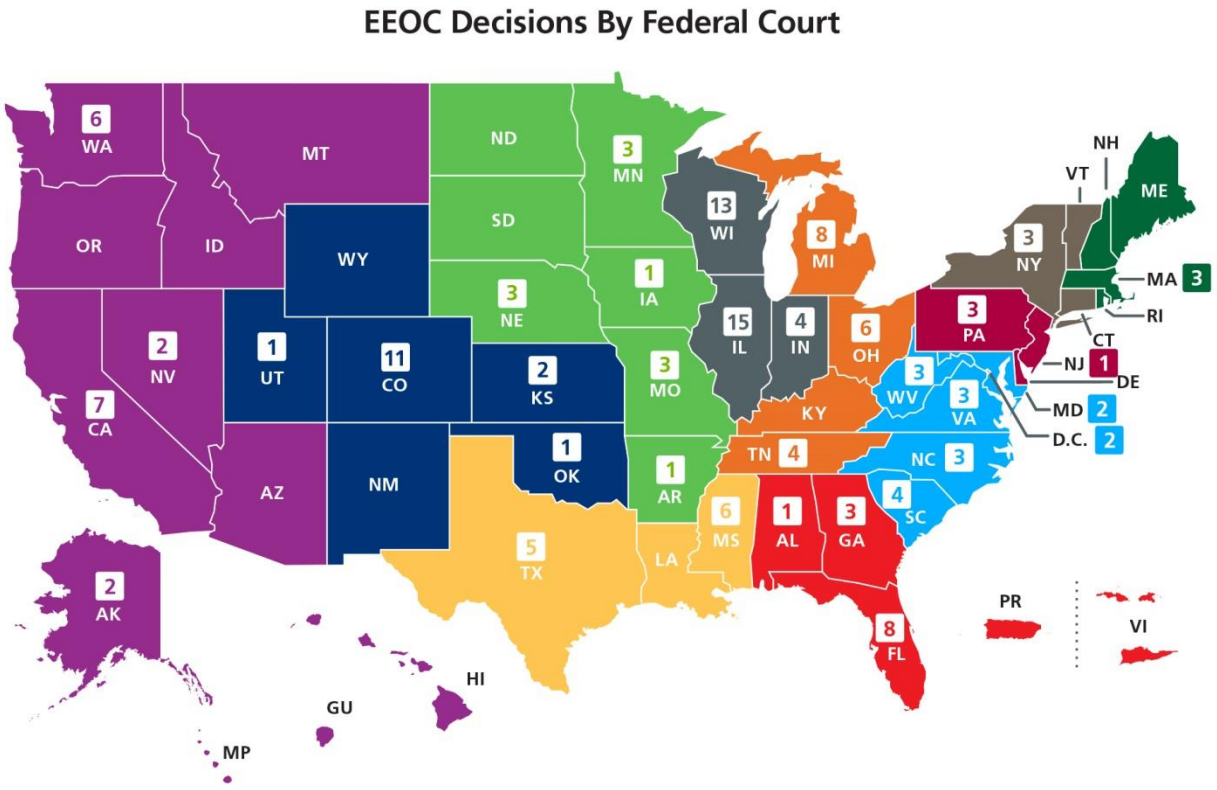
In terms of geographic distribution of rulings on EEOC lawsuits, the following map illustrates that decision-making:



(i) First Circuit

EEOC v. Chipotle Mexican Grill,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42187 (D. Mass. Mar. 30, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant terminated a worker, Amanda Connell, due to her disability in violation of the American With Disabilities Act. Defendant hired Connell, who suffered from cystic fibrosis, as a cashier and front-line worker at its restaurant. Each of the roles required substantial customer interactions. Defendant contended that it terminated Connell for a non-discriminatory reason that she treated a customer disrespectfully, as evidenced in video footage. Id. at *1. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that the EEOC presented no direct or indirect evidence of discrimination; and the EEOC cross-moved for sanctions, contending that Defendant's failure to preserve the video footage constituted spoliation of evidence. The Court denied both the motions. First, in denying the EEOC's motion for sanctions, the Court noted that the EEOC failed to demonstrate that the destruction occurred at a time when Defendant was on notice that the evidence might be relevant to potential litigation. Id. at *23. The Court opined that the video footage was not a "personnel or employment record" in any usual sense of the term, but rather evidence of an employee action on which Defendant based the employee's termination. Id. at *26. The Court therefore rejected the EEOC's argument that Defendant disregarded a preservation duty imposed by 29 C.F.R. § 1602.14. Moreover, the uncontroverted evidence indicated that the surveillance footage was erased automatically and not through any intentional act on the part of Defendant. Id. In the absence of clear authority requiring an employer to preserve such video footage, the Court held that there was no basis to conclude that Defendant allowed the footage to be destroyed in knowing or negligent dereliction of its obligations. Id. The Court therefore denied the EEOC's motion for sanctions based on spoliation of evidence. Further, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment, finding that the EEOC established a prima facie case of disability discrimination, and that there was substantial and undisputed evidence weighing against Defendant's explanation for Connell's termination. Id. at *45. Although it was undisputed that Defendant received multiple complaints during a short period of time about Connell's attitude and interaction with customers, it was also undisputed that the incident in question in which a customer complained occurred the day before Defendant learned about the existence of a medical procedure that Connell underwent as part of her treatment. Id. at *47-48. Considering the evidence as a whole, in combination with the timing of Connell's discharge, the Court concluded that the EEOC had adduced minimally sufficient evidence to permit a reasonable fact-finder to conclude that Defendant terminated Connell due to her disability. Id. at *48-49. Accordingly, the Court denied both the EEOC's motion for sanctions and Defendant's motion for summary judgement.

EEOC v. Texas Roadhouse, Inc.,* Case No. 11-CV-11732 (D. Mass. April 3, 2015). The EEOC brought an action against Defendant, a Kentucky-based restaurant chain, alleging that it engaged in a nationwide pattern or practice of age discrimination in hiring hourly front-of-the-house employees. Specifically, the EEOC alleged that since at least 2007, Defendant had been discriminating against a class of applicants for front-of-the-house and other public, visible positions, such as servers, hosts, and bartenders, by refusing to hire applicants 40 years of age and older. Moving to compel discovery, Defendant asked the Court to order the EEOC to produce information concerning the EEOC's hiring practices for its internship program positions, entry-level positions, and honor program positions. Id. at 2. This discovery included 52 requests for admissions, 20 requests for documents, and an interrogatory asking for detailed information about any request for admissions that the EEOC denied or did not respond to with an unqualified admission. Id. The time period of the requested information covered seven years, from January 2007 to December 2014, and Defendant also requested information from every part of the EEOC. Id. Defendant argued that the EEOC's own hiring practices were relevant to this case as they related to the legality of Defendant's hiring procedures, and to determine whether the EEOC was estopped from bringing this action. Id. at 6. The EEOC responded that Defendant based its request on a faulty logic. It contended that if it were found to have discriminated in hiring on the basis of age, that finding would not justify any private employer's age discrimination. Id. It also argued that ruling for Defendant on this point would require that in every case it brings, it would have to disclose its personnel practices on the issues raised in the case. Id. The Court agreed with the EEOC and denied Defendant's motion. First, the Court found that the cases cited by Defendant in its motion did not support its arguments. The Court noted that, while the EEOC, alleging disparate treatment, was seeking to prove that Defendant acted with deliberate, unlawful animus toward a class of workers, the issues in the cases cited by Defendant included whether the employers could establish, as a defense, that the neutral practice they engaged in had a discriminatory impact that was consistent with business necessity. Id. at 7. Defendant argued that if the EEOC used practices that were specifically designed to intentionally discriminate against older candidates, then the EEOC's own intentional use of these practices were all the more relevant in a disparate treatment case. Id. at 8. The Court, however, rejected Defendant's arguments. The Court noted that cases relied on by Defendant were inapposite and that they could be distinguished from this case for the reason that there was no defense of business necessity here, and the discovery sought could not be justified on this ground. Id. The Court also found that Defendant's requests were unduly burdensome. The Court referred to Defendant's attempt to equate its jobs to programs at the EEOC as "far-fetched," and held that the issue of whether Defendant engaged in a practice of discriminating against job applicants aged 40 and over who applied for front-of-the-house positions had nothing to do with the EEOC's own policies. Id. at 8-9. Finally, the Court held that Defendant was not entitled to any discovery on the basis of an estoppel defense. Explaining that estoppel requires that a party must have relied on its adversary's conduct in such a manner as to change his position for the worse, and that the reliance must have been reasonable (in that the party claiming the estoppel did not know that the adversary's conduct was misleading), the Court found that Defendant made no showing that it relied on any policy of the EEOC in formulating its own hiring policies. Id. at 10-11. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to compel discovery.

EEOC v. Texas Roadhouse, Inc.,* Case No. 11-CV-11732 (D. Mass. Dec. 2, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant discriminated against job applicants on the basis of their age in violation of Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA"). The EEOC alleged that Defendants hired younger, less experienced applicants for jobs at its restaurants and avoided hiring works over the age of 40. During discovery, the EEOC found 19 e-mails that appeared to be from or copied to former counsel for Defendants. Id. at 1. Defendants notified the EEOC that it intend to "claw back" thousands of documents, and later accused the EEOC of violating the Court's order by looking at certain documents. Id. The Court ordered that the parties meet and confer concerning documents that were in dispute and ordered Defendants to provide the Court with a privilege log and any remaining documents claimed to be privileged for an in camera review. Id. Finding that 16 documents were still in dispute, Defendants filed an ex parte brief and submitted copies of the documents to the Court. After consideration of the applicable law, the Court found that certain e-mail chains that were the result of meetings between Defendant and the in-house counsel, the e-mails concerning request for information from counsel, review of attachments, and seeking legal advice were all privileged and protected attorney work-product. Id. at 7-8.

(ii) Second Circuit

EEOC v. Local 28, Sheet Metal Workers International Association*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21341 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 19, 2015). In these three Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 racial discrimination actions, the Special Master, pursuant to Rule 53(g)(1), applied for an increase in the Special Master's court-approved hourly rate from $380 to $460. The Court granted the application. The Special Master has been serving in these lawsuits for more than three decades and the last raise he received was in 2008. The Special Master asserted that his office overhead costs had increased by approximately 32% over the seven years since his last pay boost. Further, the Special Master pointed out that the rates set over the years for other special masters in the Southern District and the Eastern District of New York had substantially exceeded his current rate, as well as exceeded even the modestly elevated rate that he sought. Id. at *5. The Court observed that the pertinent factors in considering an application for increase in such fees include the difficulty of the issues presented, the thoroughness of the Special Master's services, the time spent by the Special Master on the project, his or her ability and distinction, the importance of the matter involved, and the assistance that the Special Master has given to the final disposition of the issues that were referred to her or him. Id. at *6. The Court found that the Special Master continued to produce high-level work in a variety of complex labor-related disputes under the relevant civil rights laws, and because his decisions were rarely challenged, his efforts had saved the Court much time and effort. Id. The Court found that the Special Master's credentials were impeccable and his experience in this area were impressive. The Court also determined that the rate that the Special Master sought represented a significant discount from his commercial rate. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court approved the Special Master's hourly rate increase to $460.

EEOC v. Mavis Discount Tire, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121527 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 11, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants engaged in a pattern or practice of sex discrimination in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The EEOC alleged that Defendants discriminated against an applicant, Nicole Haywood, and other similarly-situated female applicants in favor of hiring less qualified men for positions in their branch stores. Id. at *7-11. The EEOC also argued that Defendants' record-keeping practices were not effective in retaining applicants' application forms. Id. at *12. Each of the unsuccessful female applicants identified by the EEOC testified that she submitted an application for employment, but Defendants were unable to locate all the application materials. Id. The EEOC filed a motion for summary judgment, which the Court denied. Defendants argued that the EEOC does not have the authority to bring a pattern or practice claim under § 706 of Title VII. Defendants asserted that § 707, which explicitly references pattern or practice suits, provides the EEOC's only avenue for maintaining such a claim. Id. at *34. The Court observed that whether the EEOC could bring the pattern or practice claim under § 706 was significant because of the different burden-shifting frameworks between the two provisions, and the different remedies available. Id. Defendants argued that § 707 claims must proceed under the framework established in International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. U.S., 431 U.S. 324 (1977), as opposed to § 706, which has to proceed under burden shifting framework of McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green, 411 U.S. 792 (1973). Defendants contended that the EEOC was attempting to avail itself of the more advantageous Teamsters burden-shifting framework applicable to § 707 in claiming compensatory and punitive damages, which are only available under § 706. Id. at *35. The Court noted that the Second Circuit has clarified that a pattern or practice case is not a separate and free-standing cause of action, but merely another method by which disparate treatment can be shown. Id. at *39. The Court explained that permitting the EEOC to bring pattern or practice cases under § 706 did not render § 707 meaningless or superfluous. The Court remarked that it did not view an interpretation that results in statutory overlap as running contrary to Congress' intent. Id. at *43. Further, the Court disagreed with Defendants' point that any unfairness inures to employers from the application of the Teamsters burden-shifting framework rather than the McDonnell Douglas framework. Id. Accordingly, the Court ruled that the EEOC may maintain a pattern or practice claim under § 706, as well as under § 707. The Court next noted that the EEOC moved for summary judgment on its pattern or practice claim, contending that its expert's findings – of Defendants' statistically significant hiring shortfalls of female employees, the presence of an "inexorable zero" of female hires, and the anecdotal evidence from female applicants – conclusively showed that Defendants engaged in a pattern or practice of discrimination against women in hiring. Id. at *47. The Court observed that the EEOC's statistical analysis was buttressed by the undisputed fact that Defendants hired zero female store managers, mechanics, or technicians during the relevant period. Id. at *52. The Court further remarked that the EEOC had bolstered its prima facie case with anecdotal evidence that Haywood was not hired for a position even though three of her male colleagues whom she had trained were hired. Id. at *55. The Court observed that Defendants failed to show in any categorical fashion that female applicants who were rejected were less qualified than the males they hired. Id. at *57. The Court, however, noted that Defendants challenged the probative nature of the statistical evidence in the EEOC's expert report because of their decentralized hiring system. Id. at *62. The Court opined that at the summary judgment stage, all that Defendants were required was to show that factual disputes existed. Id. at *63. The Court concluded that Defendants' challenge to the report's probative nature was sufficient to deny summary judgment to the EEOC on its pattern or practice claims. Id. The Court similarly denied summary judgment to the EEOC's record-keeping claims, finding that there triable issues to be determined by the jury. Id. at *70.

EEOC v. Sterling Jewelers, Inc.,* 801 F.3d 96 (2d Cir. 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant engaged in a nationwide pattern or practice of sex-based pay and promotion discrimination in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (Title VII"). After the EEOC initiated its investigation, the parties participated in a mediation and the EEOC entered into an agreement to suspend its investigation during mediation. Id. at 99. Under a confidentiality provision in the agreement, the EEOC agreed to not rely on information disclosed during the mediation. Id. When the mediation failed, the EEOC issued a letter of determination concluding that Defendant discriminated against female workers on a nationwide basis. The EEOC subsequently sued Defendant. Defendant moved for summary judgment after the EEOC investigators invoked the deliberative privilege and declined to answer numerous questions at their depositions about the investigation. The Magistrate Judge recommended granting summary judgment to Defendant, finding that the EEOC failed to conduct a pre-suit investigation of nationwide pay and promotional practices, and the District Court adopted the recommendation. On appeal, the Second Circuit reversed and vacated the order of summary judgment. At the outset, the Second Circuit found that Title VII does not define or prescribe the steps that the EEOC must take in conducting an investigation. Id. at 100. The Second Circuit also noted that the purpose of an EEOC investigation is to determine whether there is reasonable cause to believe that the charge is true, and its nature and extent is a matter within the sole discretion of the EEOC. Id. at 103. The Second Circuit found that the EEOC took multiple steps to investigate the claims against Defendant according to the investigative file and the testimony of the EEOC investigators. Id. at 102. Thus, the Second Circuit accepted the EEOC's argument that the Magistrate Judge improperly reviewed the sufficiency of the investigation rather than whether or not there was a nationwide investigation. The Magistrate Judge had held that the investigation was not nationwide. The Second Circuit, however, remarked that the discrimination charges were from women in nine states across the country, and thus, the record was sufficient to establish that the investigation was nationwide. Id. at 103. Defendants also contended that EEOC could not introduce the labor economist's analysis (of an alleged pattern of nationwide discrimination) from the mediation as evidence of the scope of the EEOC's investigation. The Second Circuit found that the EEOC was not precluded from relying on the analysis to ascertain potential violations of Title VII. Id. at 104. Accordingly, the Second Circuit reversed and vacated the District Court's order granting summary judgment.

(iii) Third Circuit

EEOC v. Allstate Insurance Co.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 2330 (3d Cir. Feb. 13, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant retaliated against its independent contractor sales agents by requiring them to sign a release of claims against Defendant in conjunction with a business reorganization. Pursuant to a reorganization program, Defendant shifted to an independent contractor model and terminated most of the employee agents. In connection with their termination, Defendant provided agents four options, including: (i) conversion to independent contractor status (the "conversion option"); (ii) $5,000 and an economic interest in their accounts, to be sold to buyers approved by Defendant (the "sale option"); (iii) severance pay equal to one year's salary (the "enhanced severance option"); or (iv) severance pay equal to 13 weeks' pay (the "base severance option"). Id. at *5. Those who selected any of the first three options had to sign a release of all legal claims against Defendant related to their employment or termination, which had accrued by the time the terminated employees signed it. Id. at *7. The release, however, did not bar them from filing charges with the EEOC. The EEOC alleged that Defendant illegally retaliated against its agents by allowing them to continue their careers only if they waived any discrimination claims. The District Court granted summary judgment to Defendant. On appeal, the Third Circuit affirmed. The Third Circuit noted that employers can require terminated employees to release claims in exchange for benefits to which they would not otherwise be entitled, and the employment discrimination statutes do not undermine this rule. Id. at *12. The EEOC argued that this rule was inapplicable here, and that the conversion option was inadequate consideration because Defendant did not give the terminated agents anything in exchange for releasing their claims. The Third Circuit, however, observed that the agents were not entitled to continued employment because they were originally at-will employees and they were also not entitled to severance pay because Defendant terminated them pursuant to a group reorganization program. Id. at *15. Further, even though Defendant allowed agents to convert to independent contractor status during the decade preceding the restructuring, the Third Circuit opined that the conversion option was significantly more advantageous because it: (i) offered guaranteed conversion, whereas Defendant had previously retained discretion to deny conversion; (ii) came with a bonus; (iii) excused repayment of any outstanding office-expense advances; and (iv) gave the converting agent a transferable interest in his or her business after two years, rather than five. Id. at *15. Thus, the Third Circuit found that the conversion option offered terminated agents something of value to which they were not otherwise entitled, and remarked that the EEOC failed to articulate any good reason why an employer cannot require a release of discrimination claims by a terminated employee in exchange for a new business relationship with the employer. The EEOC also argued that Defendant violated the anti-retaliation statutes by creating a policy that agents who refused to sign the release would not be permitted to continue their careers, and then by enforcing this policy and actually withholding the conversion option from those agents. Id. at *18. The Third Circuit disagreed with the EEOC that refusing to sign a release constituted opposition to unlawful discrimination because such inaction did not communicate opposition sufficiently specific to qualify as protected employee activity. Id. at *19. Although the release barred its signatories from bringing any claims against Defendant concerning their employment or termination, the Third Circuit reasoned that agents who refused to sign it might have done so for any number of reasons unrelated to discrimination. Thus, the Third Circuit affirmed the grant of summary judgment in favor of Defendant, holding that Defendant did not violate the federal anti-retaliation laws by requiring that agents to sign the release in order to avail themselves of the conversion option.

EEOC v. Court Of Common Pleas Of Allegheny County, Fifth Judicial District Of Pennsylvania,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 117796 (W.D. Pa. Sept. 3, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant discriminated against its former employee, Carolyn J. Pittman, based on her age in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). The EEOC alleged that Defendant discharged Pittman because she was too old to adequately perform her job and made too many errors. Id. at *1. After a period of discovery, the parties advised the Court that all discovery was complete with the exception of the deposition of the EEOC investigator, Mark Delledonne. Among the documents produced in discovery was the EEOC's investigative file. Defendant, however, sought Delledonne's deposition. The EEOC filed a motion for protective order against Delledonne's deposition based on three grounds, including: (i) lack of relevance; (ii) lack of independent knowledge; and (iii) undue burden. The Court denied the motion. The EEOC first argued that Delledonne's deposition was not relevant to the claims and defenses of the case because the EEOC would try its case de novo at trial and the EEOC met its obligation of attempting conciliation prior to filing the lawsuit. The EEOC also argued that Defendant had not provided a reason for Delledonne's deposition besides a concern that Pittman's deposition was inconclusive. Defendant asserted that Delledonne's deposition was necessary to bolster the defense that Pittman was not sufficiently competent to do the job by showing that she was in a state of confusion when meeting with the EEOC and was unable to keep the facts of her termination and different EEOC forms straight. Id. at *6. The Court remarked that deposing Delledonne was relevant to Defendant's defense that Pittman was fired for poor job performance. Id. at *7. The Court reasoned that this evidence was crucial for Defendant to show that Pittman was discharged for a legitimate, non-discriminatory reason. Accordingly, the Court denied the EEOC's motion.

EEOC v. FAPS, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28274 (D.N.J. Mar. 9, 2015). The EEOC brought an action under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Americans With Disabilities Act to correct unlawful employment practices on the basis of race and disability, and to provide relief to a class of potential and actual applicants who were adversely affected by such practices. In July 2013, the EEOC sent a letter request to the Court claiming that Defendant's counsel hired a private investigator to conduct ex parte interviews of the 28 claimants and potential claimants listed in the EEOC's second amended Rule 26 disclosures. The EEOC's letter had requested that the Court intervene to prevent Defendant's investigator from conducting any further interviews. Defendant had claimed that no attorney-client privilege existed between claimants and the EEOC, and that it had instructed the private investigator to terminate the interviews and cease contact with the claimants if they informed the investigator that their counsel represented them. Id. at *3. In September 2013, the Court ordered both the parties to cease all fact discovery and prohibited the parties from engaging in further discovery. Id. at *5. The Court found that both the parties continued to engage in discovery after the expiration of the fact discovery deadline, and thus violated the existing case management order ("CMO"). Id. Both parties subsequently moved for reconsideration of the Court's Order in September 2013. The Court denied both the motions. Defendant claimed that because no attorney-client relationship existed between the claimants and the EEOC, no inquiry into the claimants' representation was required prior to conducting the interviews. Id. at *8. The Court acknowledged the differing case law precedents regarding the parameters of the attorney-client relationship between the EEOC and claimants and noted that while several jurisdictions allow ex parte communications with the EEOC claimants prior to the establishment of the attorney-client relationship, ex parte communications should be undertaken with caution. Id. The Court remarked that although the presumption against the existence of an attorney-client relationship was stronger than the presumption in favor of an attorney-client relationship, in this instance, defense counsel did not take sufficient precautions to determine whether an attorney-client relationship existed prior to engaging in ex parte communications. Id. at *8-9. Because Defendant had failed to show an intervening change in the controlling law, the availability of new evidence, or the need to correct a clear error of law or fact to prevent manifest injustice, the Court denied Defendant's motion for reconsideration. Id. At the same time, the EEOC claimed that the questionnaire the EEOC expert had sent to claimants constituted expert discovery and therefore did not violate the fact discovery deadline set forth in the CMO. Id. at *6. The Court, however, found that the EEOC had failed to demonstrate any intervening changes of law or new evidence which would cause the Court to reconsider its decision. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court also denied the EEOC's motion for reconsideration.

EEOC v. Grane Healthcare Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123133 (W.D. Pa. Sept. 15, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants violated the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") by conducting pre-offer drug tests on job applicants to determine the use of illegal drugs. According to the complaint, Defendants conducted pre-employment medical examinations along with drug tests. Although the purpose of the drug tests was to determine illegal drug use, which was permissible under the ADA, four applicants who tested positive asserted that their positive drug test results were due to the use of lawful prescription medications. The EEOC argued that the pre-offer drug tests violated the ADA because the test of the applicants' urine specimens constituted a "medical examination" that elicited medical information about the applicants, even if the tests were only intended to detect evidence of illegal drug use. Id. at *105. The Court earlier held, for purposes of deciding summary judgment motions, that the pre-offer drug test conducted by Defendants qualified as "medical examinations" because each urine sample was tested for both medical and drug-use purposes before being discarded. Id. After the bench trial, the Court concluded that the evidence showed that the drug tests "were proper drug screens" and thus it did not constitute medical examinations under the ADA. Id. at *106. Under the ADA, in order for a drug test to be considered a medical examination, a claimant must show that the drug test in question was not administered to determine the illegal use of drugs, and that the drug test did not, in fact, return a positive result for the illegal use of drugs. Id. at *108. The Court noted that Defendants presented credible testimony at trial that their only intent in performing pre-offer drug testing was to determine whether the applicants were using illicit drugs. Id. A defense witness testified at trial that when an applicant tested positive for a controlled substance, she would cross-check the positive result for controlled substance with the list of medications used by the applicants, and only at this point would Defendants discover whether an applicant was taking a lawfully prescribed medication. Id. Defendants thus submitted that the drug screen itself did not reveal whether or not an applicant was taking a lawfully prescribed medication. The Court found the testimony credible and observed that the review of an applicant's medication list was intended only to make employment decisions based on illegal drug use, rather than merely a positive test result. Id. at *109. Because such procedure was acceptable under the ADA, the Court concluded that Defendant's pre-offer drug test was not medical examination that violated the ADA. Id. As to four applicants who tested positive and were not hired, the Court noted that the EEOC failed to establish that the drug tests were incorrect, or that the applicants had valid prescriptions for lawful medications. Id. at *110-112. The EEOC also failed to establish a claim for disability discrimination with regard to individual claimants, and failed to causally link any claimant's alleged damages to the pre-offer medical examination. Id. at *178. The Court therefore concluded that Defendants had legitimate, non-discriminatory reasons for declining to hire the applicants and accordingly, entered judgment in Defendants' favor.

(iv) Fourth Circuit

EEOC v. BMW Manufacturing Co., LLC,* Case No. 13-CV-1583 (D.S.C. May 26, 2015). The EEOC brought a Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 action alleging that Defendant's use of its criminal conviction background check policy constituted an unlawful employment practice. The EEOC sought an order compelling Defendants to provide a full and complete response to the EEOC's fourth set of interrogatories. Interrogatory no. 24 stated that if Defendant claimed that the information in any cell in the spreadsheet it provided was inaccurate, it needed to: (i) identify each cell that contained inaccurate information; (ii) state what it contended would be accurate information for the cell; and (iii) identify the source of the information supporting its claim. Id. at 3. Defendants asserted that the interrogatory exceeded the 25 interrogatory limitation set by Rule 33(a) and the agreed discovery plan. The EEOC contended that the interrogatory satisfied the "common theme" test applied within the Fourth Circuit and, therefore, it should be counted as a single interrogatory. Id. at 3. The Court noted that an interrogatory containing sub-parts directed at eliciting details concerning a common theme should be considered a single question; however, an interrogatory with sub-parts inquiring into discrete areas is likely to be counted as more than one for purposes of the limitation. Id. at 2. The Court found that the interrogatory contained a single question with numerous sub-parts that should be considered separate from the primary question of the numbered interrogatory. The Court reasoned that the interrogatory was a separate question with respect to each individual for whom the EEOC sought to have Defendant confirm the accuracy of the spreadsheet data. The spreadsheet contained approximately 724 separate individual names with corresponding information regarding race and disposition. The Court noted that although questioning with respect to each individual may constitute a single theme for that individual, the same questioning with respect to each additional individual introduced a line of inquiry that was separate and distinct as to each person listed. The Court thus concluded that interrogatory no. 24 comprised at least 724 separate inquiries, thereby exceeding the limitations outlined in Rule 33(a). Id. at 4. Accordingly, the Court denied the EEOC's motion to compel.

EEOC v. BMW Manufacturing Co., LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125367 (D.S.C. July 30, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant's criminal background check policy constituted an unlawful employment practice in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The EEOC contended that Defendant's policy had a disparate impact on black employees and applicants and was not job-related or consistent with a business necessity. Id. at *3. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment and to exclude the testimony of each other's expert. The Court denied both motions. At the outset, the Court noted that to establish a prima facie case of disparate impact discrimination, the EEOC must demonstrate that the facially neutral employment practice had a statistically significant discriminatory impact. Id. at *5. In addition, the Court observed that the employment practice must impose a substantially disproportionate burden upon a protected group as compared to a favored group within the total set of individuals to whom it is applied. Id. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that the EEOC failed to submit evidence showing disparate impact because the set of 724 employees that the EEOC analyzed was inadequate to demonstrate that the criminal background check had a disparate impact. The EEOC asserted that when analyzing the set of 724 individuals, it showed a statistically significant disparate impact, thereby entitling it to summary judgment. Id. at *7. After reviewing the parties' arguments and the evidence, the Court concluded that there were genuine issues of material fact concerning which individuals were similarly-situated for purposes of determining disparate impact. Id. The Court expressed concern regarding whether the set of 724 individuals was adequate to determine disparate impact, but at this stage of the case, it held that summary judgment was not appropriate for either party.

EEOC v. CCR*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62431 (W.D.N.C. May 7, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant terminated an employee, Megan McCloskey, during her pregnancy in violation of the federal law. The EEOC asked the Court to: (i) order McCloskey's deposition within one week after Defendant had responded to the EEOC's first set of interrogatories; (ii) issue a protective order governing discovery materials; and (iii) compel responses to the EEOC's interrogatories and requests for production. The Court granted the motions in part. The EEOC argued that it could not prepare for McCloskey's deposition without adequate responses to its interrogatories and requests for production. Id. at *2. The Court agreed and granted the protective order, directing that McCloskey's deposition would take place one week after Defendant responded to the first set of interrogatories. Id. Defendant opposed the EEOC's request to respond to Interrogatory No. 4 and Requests for Production Nos. 12 and 31 because those items concerned financial status, which it asserted was irrelevant to the dispute. The Court agreed and denied the EEOC's motion to compel production of financial information. The Court, however, granted the EEOC's motion to compel the response and production of information and documentation that supported the affirmative defenses raised in Defendant's answer, finding that the information was relevant to the dispute. Id. at *3.§

EEOC v. Consol Energy, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1326 (N.D. W. Va. Jan. 7, 2015). The EEOC brought an action seeking a permanent injunction and monetary relief for Beverly Butcher, Defendants' employee, alleging that Defendants instituted practices that denied Butcher a religious accommodation. Defendants allegedly refused to accommodate Butcher's religious belief that submitting to a newly installed biometric hand-scanner for tracking of employees' time and attendance conflicted with his beliefs as an evangelical Christian. Butcher worked in Defendants' mine, and Defendants installed a hand-scanning technology in June 2010 for tracking employee time and attendance. Butcher informed Defendants that he could not submit to the hand-scanning device because he believed that such scanning would make him take on the "Mark of the Beast." Id. at *2. Defendants offered only an alternative of using left hand palm up instead of right hand palm down, reasoning that based on the Book of Revelation, the "Mark of the Beast" could only occur if the right hand was scanned. Eventually, Butcher involuntarily retired and complained to the EEOC. Moving for summary judgment, the EEOC argued that Defendants knew that

Butcher's beliefs were genuinely held, he only retired because Defendants did not accommodate his requests, and that there were suitable alternatives to the hand scanner. Id. at *3. Defendants also cross-moved for summary judgment, arguing that Butcher chose to retire before it could explore different accommodations, and that the alternatives suggested by Butcher would result in more than de minimis hardship to Defendants because they had already spent time and money on the new system, no system was in place for a time clock, and the old manual system had cost them millions of dollars in overtime. Id. at *9. Defendants further filed a motion in limine asserting that bifurcation of the EEOC's claim for punitive damages would be required as they would otherwise be prejudiced unfairly if the jury were to consider Defendants' finances and corporate wealth at the same time that it considered liability and/or compensatory damages. Id. at *12. The Court denied both motions for summary judgment. The Court found that there were material issues of facts as to whether or not Butcher was disciplined for failure to comply with Defendants' hand scanning policy, whether or not Defendants provided a reasonable accommodation or were unable to provide certain accommodations because of undue hardship, and whether or not Butcher's retirement was forced by the implementation of the hand scanning disciplinary policy and the actions taken by Defendants. Id. at *16-22. The Court granted Defendants' motion in limine regarding the EEOC's claim for punitive damages, finding that it could not at that time reach the question as to whether or not a reasonable accommodation was given, as there were still genuine issues of material fact remaining as to the constructive discharge and whether a prima facie religious accommodation claim had been made by the EEOC, and thus whether or not a reasonable juror could find that Butcher was entitled to punitive damages. Id. at *26. The Court therefore concluded that issues of liability could be determined during the first phase of trial, and if the jury determine that punitive damages could be awarded, evidence of the appropriate amount, including that of Defendants' wealth or financial condition where relevant, could be permitted in the second phase. Id. at *28-29. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' motions for summary judgment, and granted Defendants' motion in limine for bifurcation of the claim for punitive damages.

EEOC v. Consol Energy, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 60520 (N.D. W. Va. May 8, 2015). The EEOC brought a Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII") action alleging that Defendants instituted practices that denied one of its employees, Beverly R. Butcher, a religious accommodation. When the Court set the action to hear oral argument and receive evidence concerning damages, Defendants sought to exclude any evidence of accommodations to other employees, and the EEOC brought motions to exclude argument and evidence concerning any irrelevant and hypothetical rationale for Defendants' actions, and to exclude argument and evidence concerning hypothetical union grievances or hypothetical labor arbitrations outcome. The Court granted the EEOC's motions and denied Defendants' motion. Regarding its first motion, the EEOC argued that evidence as to state of mind of Mike Smith, Defendant's executive, should not be admitted as any belief by Butcher as to Smith's state of mind was pure speculation. Id. at *3. The EEOC contended that Smith was not involved in the decision-making regarding Butcher's request and thus this evidence was irrelevant. The Court found that the suggested testimony and evidence was speculative as to what Butcher thought Smith believed, and hence would not provide actual proof of Smith's state of mind. Id. at *4. Further, the Court opined that the value of such evidence would be substantially outweighed by the danger that the jury might be misled or confused. The EEOC also sought to exclude Defendants from arguing that Butcher should have accepted disciplinary action and a discharge, and then filed a union grievance, instead of retiring because he likely would have prevailed in an arbitration. Id. at *4-5. The EEOC contended that it was irrelevant because Title VII does not require an employee to seek arbitration nor does it require an employer to refuse a reasonable accommodation unless ordered to do so by an arbitrator. Id. at *5. The Court found that evidence regarding the union grievance was irrelevant as federal labor law could not trump Butcher's rights under Title VII. Id. at *6. Further, the Court determined that the offered evidence was not relevant as to Defendants' constructive discharge claim and other defense theories. The Court thus concluded that introduction of such evidence would constitute unfair prejudice, and accordingly, granted the EEOC's motions. Id. Finally, Defendants argued that evidence of accommodations requested by two other employees should be excluded as it was irrelevant because they did not make a religious accommodation requests, but rather had physical abnormalities which impeded their ability to use the scanner. Id. at *7. The EEOC, however, argued that the approach used by other miners was proof that Defendants did not offer Butcher a reasonable accommodation and thus this evidence was relevant. The Court found that the evidence regarding other miners was relevant and should not be excluded. Id. The Court determined that accommodations provided to other miners would be a fact that would be of consequence in determining whether Defendants provided Butcher with a reasonable accommodation. Id. at *7-8. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion in limine.

EEOC v. Consol Energy, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110728 (N.D. W. Va. Aug. 21, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by denying its employee a religious accommodation involving an exemption from using a biometric hand scanner. The employee, Beverly R. Butcher, repeatedly informed Defendant and its officials that he could not comply with Defendant's hand scanning policy because it violated his sincerely held religious beliefs as an Evangelical Christian. Defendant refused to consider alternate means of tracking Butcher's time and attendance, and eventually Butcher resigned involuntarily. At trial, the jury ruled in favor of the EEOC and awarded Butcher $150,000 in compensatory damages. Id. at *42. Prior to trial, the parties filed motions in limine concerning certain issues relating to damages, which were held in abeyance pending trial. Id. at *2. Following the trial verdict, the EEOC sought additional back pay, front pay, and other damages on behalf of Butcher; and it filed a motion for a permanent injunction. Id. The Court granted the EEOC's motion, determining that Defendant must pay Butcher an additional $436,860.74 in back pay and front pay for the Title VII violations found by the jury, and ordered a permanent injunction for a three-year period barring Defendant from denying reasonable accommodations for religion in connection with its use of biometric hand screening. Id. at *42-43. Regarding the monetary damages, the parties disputed on the amount of back and front pay Butcher should receive. While the EEOC argued that the pension benefits Butcher received should not be used as an off-set to any back or front pay as they were collateral – not paid directly from and entirely by Defendant – Defendant argued that the pension benefit should off-set any economic damages as the pension plan was 100% employer-funded and thus a non-collateral source. Id. at *3-4. The Court agreed with the EEOC and held that the pension benefits were a collateral source as there had been no evidence that the fund was meant to be used as an indemnifying fund for potential litigation that was not in an employer's favor, and there had been no evidence that the applicable collective bargaining agreement contained a provision contemplating a set-off of benefits received in a case such as this. Id. at *8. Similarly, the Court found that supplemental pension benefits were also collateral as they were based on Butcher's length of employment and there was no indication that the collective bargaining agreement required a set-off. Id. at *11. Defendant argued that Butcher's back and front pay award should be limited as he failed to adequately mitigate his damages by failing to seek similar employment in the coal mining industry and by failing by apply for available openings in the coal industry that he was likely aware. Id. at *14. The Court, however, found that Butcher reasonably mitigated his damages, given the limited available positions in the coal mining industry, his personal economic circumstances, and his limitations due to his age and education for higher-paying jobs in his area. Id. at 20-24. Further, Butcher had testified that he did not completely forego a search for coal mining jobs, and that he would have accepted a mining job if the pay and benefits provided the same security he had with the pension benefits. Id. at *25. The Court therefore declined to make any deductions from Butcher's damages award for either back pay or front pay, and awarded him $436,860.74 in damages. Regarding the injunction request, the Court found that a permanent injunction was necessary as Defendant did not meet its heavy burden of proving that future discrimination would not occur. Id. at *38. Although Defendant attempted to take curative actions after the underlying incident and reported that no other incidents of discrimination occurred, the Court was skeptical because all four employees involved in the incidents continued to be Defendant's employees. Id. Further, the Court found that the scope of injunction was reasonable as the injunction specifically targeted religious discrimination based on precedential case law and the biometric hand scanning device, and was limited to a three-year span which would allow Defendant to put in place the required policies and procedures. Id. at *39. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motion for additional monetary damages and a permanent injunction.

EEOC v. DHD Ventures Management Company, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 167906 (D.S.C. Dec. 16, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants subjected a group of employees to a racially hostile work environment, and that they were discharged in retaliation for complaining of alleged hostile work environment in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint, and the Court denied the motion. In their motion to dismiss, Defendants had argued that the Court lacked personal jurisdiction over them, and that the suit was barred by failure to exhaust administrative remedies. Id. at *9. The Magistrate Judge had recommended that the Court grant the motion to dismiss. The EEOC filed Rule 72 objections to the Magistrate Judge's recommendations and sought leave to conduct discovery on the issue of personal jurisdiction and the statute of limitations. Id. at *11. The Court found that the EEOC should be given time to conduct discovery regarding whether the Court could exercise personal jurisdiction over Defendants. Id. at *12. The EEOC also sought leave for discovery to determine the respective role of Defendants as to jurisdictional and statute of limitations issues. Id. The Court found that discovery on those issues would be helpful for a determination as to whether the allegations were barred by the statute of limitations. Id. Accordingly, the Court permitted discovery on the personal jurisdiction and the statute of limitations issues, and denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

EEOC v. FedEx Ground Package System, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21801 (D. Md. Feb. 24, 2015). The EEOC brought an Americans With Disabilities Act action alleging that Defendant discriminated against and failed to accommodate deaf or hard-of-hearing individuals employed as either package handlers or who had applied for a package handler position. Defendant moved to transfer the lawsuit to the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania, which the Court granted. Id. at *2. The Court found that although the government's choice of venue is entitled to some deference, the convenience of the parties' factor favored transfer. The Court noted that it was more convenient for Defendant to have this case proceed in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, where its headquarters was located. Many of its officers and directors were located in and around Pittsburgh, and Defendant asserted that relevant documentation including personnel records and documents related to the development of certain technology and equipment used by package handlers was located in Pittsburgh. Id. at *4. On the other hand, the EEOC contended that the investigation of this matter was centered in its Baltimore office and that its lead investigator worked under the supervision of managers in the Baltimore office. Further, the EEOC argued that its field office in Pittsburgh was small, had little support staff, and that no one in that office had worked on this investigation. The Court remarked that the EEOC's arguments centered more on the convenience of its attorneys, which is not a proper consideration for transfer of venue. Id. at *5. Even considering the convenience of the package handlers themselves, only one charging party was employed in a facility located in Maryland, and the rest worked or applied to work in facilities throughout the country. Thus, the Court concluded that this factor slightly favored transfer. The Court also found that the convenience of the witnesses factor strongly favored transfer. Defendant argued that its employees responsible for developing and implementing the training and orientation provided to package handlers, and those responsible for selecting and developing the equipment and technology used by package handlers, worked at its headquarters in Pittsburgh and lived in the Pittsburgh area. The EEOC, however, argued that the key witnesses were the aggrieved individuals themselves and the front-line managers and human resources officials from each distribution facility. The Court noted that only one distribution facility was located in Maryland, and the rest were disbursed across the country. Thus, with the exception of those potential witnesses connected with the Maryland facility, the Court opined that Baltimore was more convenient than Pittsburgh. Further, the Court observed that to determine the liability of the corporation under the anti-discrimination statutes, the finder of fact needs to understand how the official policy is developed, communicated, and monitored. Id. at *9. While the understanding of what was happening at the different distribution centers could come from witnesses dispersed around the country, the Court determined that the understanding of the official policy would come from witnesses who predominately worked and lived in Pittsburgh. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the convenience of witnesses factor favored transfer. Finally, the Court found that because Western District of Pennsylvania was less congested than the District of Maryland, transfer was appropriate in the interest of justice. Accordingly, the Court transferred the action to the Western District of Pennsylvania.

EEOC v. Freeman, Inc.,* 778 F.3d 463 (4th Cir. 2015). The EEOC brought a Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 action alleging that Defendant, a corporate events service provider, conducted credit and criminal background checks on applicants and employees that resulted in a disparate impact on black and male job applicants. Defendant required criminal background checks for all applicants, and credit checks for positions involving money handling or access to sensitive financial information. Defendant's policy disqualified applicants if their credit or criminal histories revealed "certain prohibited criteria." Id. at 465. Defendant modified these criteria from time to time, ultimately phasing out the use of credit checks. The EEOC commenced an investigation into Defendant's policy based on a charge of discrimination filed by an applicant in 2008, and later brought a pattern or practice lawsuit. The EEOC relied on a statistical report prepared by its expert, Dr. Kevin Murphy, an industrial and organizational psychologist, to support its disparate impact claim. Defendant moved for summary judgment on the basis that the EEOC's expert report was insufficient to demonstrate a prima facie case of disparate impact discrimination. Granting summary judgment to Defendant, the District Court excluded Murphy's expert report as it was "rife with analytical errors" and "completely unreliable." *Id. a*t 466. Upon the EEOC's appeal, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the District Court's judgment. In rejecting Murphy's expert report, the Fourth Circuit catalogued the "mind-boggling number of errors and unexplained discrepancies" identified by the District Court, including missing data, basic mathematical errors, and incorrect coding of race and background check results. Id. at 467. The Fourth Circuit particularly emphasized Murphy's highly selective sample, which analyzed only a limited number of background checks and excluded the data pertaining to "hundreds, if not thousands, of applicants" that were available for the relevant time period. Id. at 466. Although the EEOC attempted to correct the expert report through supplementation, the Fourth Circuit agreed with the District Court's finding that Murphy's attempt to fix errors was not only inadequate, but also in fact created fresh errors. Id. at 467. The Fourth Circuit found that "the sheer number of mistakes and omissions in Murphy's analysis renders it outside the range where experts might reasonably differ." Id. The Fourth Circuit therefore concluded that the District Court properly excluded Murphy's report, and accordingly, affirmed the summary judgment for Defendant.

Editor's Note: The ruling in EEOC v. Freeman constitutes the most notable decision against the Commission in 2015. Adding to the scathing majority opinion, the Concurring Judge further reprimanded the EEOC for its "disappointing litigation conduct" including its continued reliance on Murphy whose testimony was fatally flawed in multiple respects. Id. at 468. The Concurring Judge explicitly referenced a recent Sixth Circuit case where the EEOC relied on Murphy and lost, noting that the expert was no stranger to having courts reject his work for improper sampling. Pointing out that the EEOC's conduct suggested a lack of exercise of vigilance, the Concurring Judge cautioned it "to reconsider how it might better discharge the responsibilities delegated to it or face the consequences of failing to do so." Id. at 472-73.

EEOC v. Freeman, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS. 118307 (D. Md. Sept. 3, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant conducted criminal and credit background checks that had a disparate impact on African-American and male employment applicants. The Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, which was affirmed on appeal. Defendant then moved for an award of attorneys' fees. Id. at *6. The Court granted the motion. The EEOC argued that Defendant was not entitled to attorneys' fees because its case was not factually groundless. The Court observed that EEOC needed to present reliable statistical evidence that Defendant's policies had a disparate impact to make out a prima facie case of discrimination. Id. at *10. The Court remarked that the EEOC argued that it could have been possible for the EEOC to show evidence of disparate impact, but that it failed to do so. Id. at *10-11. The Court opined that the possibility that some evidence existed somewhere to back-up a claim did not constitute reasonable grounds for continuing to litigate that claim. The Court reasoned that cases should be litigated based on evidence actually produced, and not on hunches. Id. at *11. Without reliable statistical evidence produced by an expert, which was absent in this case, the Court concluded that the EEOC could not make its prima facie case. Id. The Court also noted that it was unreasonable for the EEOC to continue to litigate on the basis of obviously flawed report from its expert, Dr. Kevin Murphy. Defendant's motion to exclude Dr. Murphy's expert report detailed the flaws in the report, and given those flaws, the Court determined that the EEOC could not possibly continue to rely in good faith on its expert's reports. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court concluded that because the EEOC relied on a severely and obviously flawed expert report, Defendant was entitled to its reasonable attorneys' fees. Id. at *29. The EEOC also objected to Defendant's fee request for the amici work on appeal, but the Court rejected the EEOC's objections, finding that the amici presented various relevant arguments in support of Defendant's position on appeal. Id. at

*37. The EEOC also objected to allegedly excessive hours spent by defense counsel on summary judgment briefing, fees related to ancillary, unsuccessful, or unfiled motions, and for fees related to the appeal. Defendant sought a total of $1.5 million in fees. After determining the reasonableness of the fees demanded by various attorneys, and the different stages of the litigation, the Court reduced the fee to $938,771.50. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for attorneys' fees in part.

EEOC v. Metro Special Police & Security Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88698 (W.D.N.C. Jan. 21, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant committed unlawful employment practices on the basis of sex and retaliation. With the assistance of a mediator, the parties settled, and subsequently filed a joint motion to enter a consent decree. Id. at *2. The Court issued a settlement order adopting the consent decree. The EEOC then moved to show cause why Defendant should not be held in contempt for violating and failing to comply with the terms of the consent decree, including paying the settlement money. The Magistrate Judge recommended that the motion be denied. At the outset, the EEOC asserted that Defendant voluntarily agreed to settle the case and agreed to the payment of $155,000 as part of the settlement, but refused to pay, and therefore, it should be held in contempt. Id. at *3. Defendant responded that from the time the settlement was final, the EEOC was aware that that it was incapable of making any payments under the settlement without third-party financing. Id. The Magistrate Judge observed that the consent decree specifically described the recourse available to the EEOC in the event Defendant failed to timely make payments. The consent decree stated that upon Defendant's failure to make timely payments, the parties expressly agree to the entry of an executed consent judgment in the amount of $155,000. Id. at *9. The Magistrate Judge, however, found that neither party specifically addressed the applicable consent decree language in their briefs, which both parties voluntarily agreed to in settling this case. Id. Moreover, the parties' agreement did not anticipate or allow for contempt proceedings; rather, it specifically provided for the entry of a consent judgment. Id. Thus, the Magistrate Judge was not persuaded that Defendant by its conduct violated the terms of the consent decree, and had knowledge of such violations; rather, it found that the EEOC was in violation of the consent decree by pursuing its contempt motion instead of the agreed-upon remedy of entry of the consent judgment. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the EEOC's motion be denied.

EEOC v. Metro Special Police & Security Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 90913 (W.D.N.C. July 8, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant committed unlawful employment practices on the basis of sex and retaliation. Subsequently, Defendant settled the case pursuant to a consent decree. Later, the EEOC moved to show cause why Defendant should not be held in contempt for failing to comply with the terms of a consent decree, as Defendant failed to make payment of agreed upon monetary settlements. Id. at *1. The Magistrate Judge noted that paragraph 5 of the consent decree specifically described the recourse available to the EEOC in the event Defendant failed to timely make payments to the claimants. If Defendant did not make timely payments, the parties expressly agreed to the entry of an executed consent judgment in the amount of $155,000, and that the EEOC immediately could file a motion for entry of the consent judgment and proceed with collection. Because the parties' agreement did not anticipate or allow for contempt proceedings, the Magistrate Judge recommended denying the EEOC's motion. Id. at *1-2. The EEOC sought review of that recommendation per Rule 72. The parties thereafter filed a status report stating that they had reached an agreement that Defendant would make monetary payments to the individual claimants by June 1, 2015. Id. at *2. On June 23, 2015, the EEOC filed a notice of withdrawal of its motion, informing the Court that the Defendant made monetary payments in compliance with the agreement. As a result, the Court denied the EEOC's motion to show cause as moot.

EEOC v. TNT Propane, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10755 (D.S.C. Jan. 30, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants subjected a female employee to a sexually hostile work environment that resulted in the employee resigning from her position. Defendants' counsel moved to be relieved as counsel, which the Court granted. Counsel for Defendants had sent a copy of the motion to his clients via electronic mail and UPS overnight mail, and notified them that they must retain new counsel because corporate entities cannot represent themselves, that new counsel must be admitted to practice in the Court, and Defendants may be held in default if new counsel was not retained within a reasonable time. Id. at *1-

2. Counsel also notified Defendants that they could object to his request to be relieved by filing, through other counsel, a response to the motion within 17 days of the filing date. Additionally, counsel for Defendants provided Defendants with the notice of hearing and informed them of the requirement that someone must appear on their behalf. However, no representative for Defendants, legal or otherwise, appeared at the hearing. Id. at *2. Accordingly, the Court granted defense counsel's motion to be relieved, and granted Defendants 30 days' time to retain a new counsel.

EEOC v. Womble Carlyle Sandridge & Rice, LLP*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10874 (4th Cir. June 26, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the ADA by terminating Charlesetta Jennings, Defendant's employee, after she was diagnosed with lymphedema, a condition caused by breast cancer treatment, which affects the circulatory and immune systems. Jennings began working for Defendant in 2000 as a support services assistant ("SSA"), and in 2008 was diagnosed with breast cancer, and took intermittent leave while undergoing chemotherapy. Id. at *3. In November 2009, Jennings was diagnosed with lymphedema, and she devised alternate methods for accomplishing her work-related tasks to avoid further injury for about seven months. Id. at *4. In 2010, Jennings suffered an injury at work, and submitted a doctor's note that she could not lift more than 10 pounds. Id. at *5. Defendant accommodated her and in 2011, Jennings provided an updated doctor's note stating that she could lift up to 20 pounds. The office manager reassessed Jennings' condition to transfer her to another job position, and concluded that she might be qualified to work as a receptionist or message center operator, but those positions were already filled. Accordingly, in February 2011, Defendant placed Jennings on a medical leave of absence, and terminated her employment after the medical leave ran out. Id. at *8. The District Court granted Defendant summary judgment, and on the EEOC's appeal, the Fourth Circuit affirmed. The EEOC argued that Jennings could perform the essential functions of SSA job even without reasonable accommodation. Alternatively, the EEOC argued that requiring SSAs to help with tasks that involved lifting over 20 pounds was a reasonable accommodation that would have enabled Jennings to perform essential functions of the job. The Fourth Circuit disagreed, finding that the SSA position was multifaceted – requiring the ability to perform a wide variety of tasks during one shift – and many of those tasks could at any time require lifting over 20 pounds, the ability to lift that amount was an essential function of the job. Id. at *14. The Fourth Circuit noted that even though Jennings worked primarily in the copy room, she could have, at any time, been called upon to move heavy furniture or carry heavy packages. Id. In addition, it was undisputed that SSA tasks required lifting over 20 pounds. Because so many facets of the SSA job may at any time require lifting over 20 pounds, the ability to do so bore more than a marginal relationship to the job, and was thus an essential function of the position. Id. at *16. Because Jennings was unable to lift that amount, the Fourth Circuit concluded that she was unable to perform an essential function of the job. Id. The EEOC, however, argued that despite Jennings' inability to lift over 20 pounds, she could nevertheless perform the essential functions of the SSA job, as evidenced by her strong performance reviews. The Fourth Circuit, however, determined that Jennings' testimony reflected that she did lift more than 20 pounds prior to her injury, and her alternate work methods did not prevent her from having to lift more than 20 pounds and injuring herself. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit found the EEOC's arguments unpersuasive and affirmed the grant of summary judgment to Defendant.

EEOC v. Young And Associates, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1236 (W.D. Va. Jan. 7, 2015). The EEOC brought an ADA action on behalf of Brooke McCarter, a restaurant server, alleging that Defendant wrongfully discharged her because of her disability. McCarter had a specific medical impairment that substantially limited the proper function of her digestive system. When McCarter confirmed her disability in response to her manager's inquiry, the manager required her to provide a doctor's note affirming that she could work safely at the restaurant. Id. at *2. McCarter produced the note the very next day, but the manager refused to accept or even review the note, and immediately discharged her due to her disability. Id. Defendant moved to dismiss, arguing that the EEOC failed to allege sufficient facts to support the claim. The Court denied the motion. The Court disagreed with Defendant that to survive a motion to dismiss, the EEOC must plead sufficient facts to support a prima facie case of wrongful discharge. Instead, the Court observed that Rule 8(a)(2) requires only that a pleading contain a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief, and that a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face. Id. at *3-4.

Further, regarding the standard for employment discrimination claims, the Court found that in order to survive a motion to dismiss, the EEOC is not required to plead facts that constitute a prima facie case, but that a complaint's factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level. Id. at *4. Here, the complaint provided Defendant fair notice of the grounds for the EEOC's claims and stated a claim for which relief could be granted under the ADA. The complaint alleged that McCarter was within the ADA's protected class and suffered an adverse employment action because of her disability. Id. at *6. The complaint also alleged that McCarter was able to successfully perform her duties as a server, and that Defendant discharged her because she had a disability that impaired her digestive system. Id. Further, the complaint pointed out the precise circumstances surrounding McCarter's discharge, and that Defendant discharged her without reviewing or accepting her doctor's note. Id. Because these alleged facts gave rise to a reasonable inference that Defendant was liable for the misconduct alleged, and because they sufficiently nudged the EEOC's claims from conceivable to plausible, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss. Id.

(v) Fifth Circuit

EEOC v. A'Gaci, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14319 (W.D. Tex. Feb. 5, 2015). The EEOC filed a subpoena enforcement action against Defendant seeking data and information relating to Chris Daiss' charge that Defendant terminated him in retaliation for complaining about potentially discriminatory hiring practices. Defendant moved to seal the EEOC's application to enforce its administrative subpoena, and to file exhibits in response under seal, which the Court granted. Further, Defendant moved to seal EEOC's reply and for a protective order, which the Court granted in part. Regarding the motion to seal the EEOC's application, Defendant pointed to 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-8(e), which makes it unlawful for the EEOC to make public in any manner whatever any information obtained by the EEOC pursuant to its authority under this section prior to the institution of any "proceeding" under this sub-chapter involving such information. Id. at *5. Defendant also pointed to § 2000e-5(b), which provides, in relevant part that charges shall not be made public by the Commission. Id. at *6. In EEOC v. Associated Dry Goods Corp., 449 U.S. 590, 602 (1990), the U.S. Supreme Court suggested that filing an application to enforce an administrative subpoena did not qualify as a "proceeding" under § 2000e-8(e). Id. at *6. Thus, the Court opined that pursuant to § 2000e-8(e), the EEOC erred in making public information it obtained while investigating the charge. Further, the Court observed that the legislative purpose behind § 2000e-5(b)'s ban on making charges public was to prevent making available to the general public unproven charges, and that it was improper for the EEOC to quote directly from the charge in its application. Id. at *7. Nevertheless, the Court determined that the right to public access required parts of the application to remain in the public record because applications to enforce EEOC subpoenas are an important part of the EEOC's mission of vindicating the public interest in preventing employment discrimination. Id. at *8. Thus, the Court balanced the competing interests by granting Defendant's motion to seal the application currently in the record, and by ordering the EEOC to produce a redacted version of the application for the public record. Further, regarding Defendant's motion to file exhibits in its response under seal, the Court observed that the exhibits included Daiss' charge, the EEOC's notification of the charge, Defendant's position statement, and correspondence between the EEOC and Defendant. The Court granted the motion, holding that these documents should not be made public pursuant to Title VII's prohibitions on making public the charge and information obtained in the course of the investigation before a formal proceeding commences. Id. at *11. Similarly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to seal the EEOC's reply, and ordered the EEOC to produce a redacted copy of the reply for the public record. The Court observed that the EEOC repeatedly ignored the clear statutory prohibition on making charges of discrimination public, and even after Defendant's counsel alerted the EEOC to its obligations under the statute, the EEOC failed to redact the confidential excerpts from its filings. Thus, the Court granted Defendant's motion for a protective order prohibiting the EEOC from quoting from the charge and information obtained in the course of investigating the charge in future filings, until such time as a lawsuit may be filed regarding the charge. Id. at *13.

EEOC v. A'Gaci,* LLC, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144732 (W.D. Tex. Oct. 26, 2015). The EEOC investigated Defendant after one of its employees, Chris Daiss, filed a charge alleging that he was terminated in retaliation for complaining about potential discriminatory hiring practices. The EEOC issued a subpoena to Defendant requesting various data and information in connection with Daiss' allegations. Id. at *2.

Defendant filed a petition to modify or revoke the subpoena, which the EEOC subsequently denied. The EEOC filed an application to enforce the administrative subpoena, and Defendant filed a motion to seal the EEOC's application, filed a motion to submit any exhibits in response under seal, and then filed a motion to seal the EEOC's reply. The Court granted Defendant's first two motions to seal, and granted the third motion in part. The EEOC moved to reconsider those orders, which the Court denied. The EEOC first asked the Court to reconsider its finding that it violated 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5 by reproducing large parts if Daiss' charge in the record. In its previous order, the Court held that the EEOC had an obligation not to publicly disclose the charge of discrimination. The Court noted that § 2000e-5(b) restricts the EEOC from making public the contents of the charge without written consent of the concerned parties. Id. at *4. The Court found that the EEOC had demonstrated no manifest error of law as to the non-disclosure, and concluded that it was not entitled to reconsideration on this issue. Id. at *6. The EEOC also sought reconsideration of the Court's holding that an application to enforce an administrative subpoena did not qualify as a "proceeding," and therefore it could not make public any information that the EEOC obtained. Id. The Court observed that at this stage of the EEOC's investigation, no charges were proved against Defendant, and in fact, the EEOC had not even determined whether or not Daiss' charge had merit. Id. at *7. The Court ruled that it would be unfair if the EEOC could publish information obtained in the course of the investigating a charge before any determination is made as to whether the charge states a valid complaint. Id. Finally, the EEOC pointed to its authority to investigate and issue subpoenas under § 2000e-9, which incorporated by reference § 11 of the NLRA. The EEOC pointed to NLRB v. Friedman, 352 F.2d 545 (3d Cir. 1965), where the Third Circuit referred to an action brought to compel compliance with the NLRB-issued subpoenas as a proceeding. Id. at *9. The Court found that in Friedman, the Third Circuit used the term "proceeding" in the general sense and made no specific finding that the action to compel was a proceeding within the meaning of the statutory provision applicable to the EEOC. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied the EEOC's motion for reconsideration.

EEOC v. Dolgencorp, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12571 (S.D. Miss. Feb. 3, 2015). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of Demetrice Hersey, Defendant's lead sales associate, alleging racial discrimination and retaliation in violation of Title VII. The EEOC contended that Defendant did not promote Hersey to an assistant store manager position because she was black, and then retaliated against her by issuing written discipline when she filed a charge of discrimination with the EEOC. Defendant moved for summary judgment, which the Court granted in part. Regarding its racial discrimination claim, the EEOC presented evidence that store employees heard the store manager frequently using the word "nigger" when referring to black persons, and once called Hersey a "lazy black nigger." Id. at *2-4. The EEOC also presented evidence that the store manager had made a comment in April 2011 that she did not "want a nigger working for her" and that she was trying to get Hersey to leave when there was an assistant store manager position open in 2011. Id. at *4. The Court found that the EEOC had not challenged Defendant's failure to promote Hersey in 2011, but challenged only its failure to promote her in 2009 and 2010. Therefore, the Court observed that the store manager's 2011 comments – 15 months after the last challenged promotion – were too remote in time to constitute direct evidence of race discrimination. Id. at *6-7. The Court, however, observed that there was ample evidence in the record from which it could find that racial animus was also a factor. Id. at *9. The Court opined that the testimony regarding the store manager's comments about blacks in general, and Hersey in particular, could also constitute circumstantial evidence. The Court observed that if the jury believed this testimony, the jury could conclude that racial animus was a motivating factor in the store manager's decision not to promote Hersey. Id. at *9-10. Therefore, the Court concluded that summary judgment was inappropriate as to the EEOC's racial discrimination claim. Id. at *10. Regarding the retaliation claim, the Court noted that generally a written reprimand, without evidence of consequences, does not constitute an adverse employment action. Id. at *11. The Court relied on the facts that in a three-month period immediately after Hersey filed her EEOC charge, the store manager documented five instances where Hersey was responsible for the cash registers being short at the end of the day. Id. at *11-12. In addition, the store manager subsequently documented seven instances of dissatisfaction with Hersey's productivity and adherence to office procedures. Id. at *12. This contrasted with three written reprimands during all of 2008 and 2009, and it appeared to the Court that Defendant moved Hersey along a disciplinary track toward termination. Id. The Court, however, found that despite this, there was no practical effect on Hersey's conditions of employment including a possible termination.

Hersey left Defendant only after finding other employment, and not under threat of termination. Further, Defendant never removed Hersey from her position and never placed her on any type of performance improvement plan to address alleged performance deficiencies. Id. The Court found that those inconsequential disciplinary notices were the store manager's minor complaints about Hersey's work put into writing. Id. at *12-13. Thus, the Court concluded that the disciplinary notices that posed the potential threat to Hersey's conditions of employment were too speculative to make them materially adverse employment actions. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to the EEOC's retaliation claim, and denied as to the racial discrimination claim. Id. at *13-14.

EEOC v. EMCARE, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102868 (N.D. Tex. Aug. 5, 2015). The EEOC brought a Title VII action against Defendant for sexual harassment and retaliation of an employee, Gloria Stokes. Previously, the jury found that Stokes was sexually harassed by her supervisor and awarded $250,000 in punitive damages. Subsequently, Stokes moved for entry of judgment to include attorneys' fees for her counsel, Fielding, Parker & Hallmon, LLP. Id. at *2. Defendant objected to Stokes' application, contending that she failed to provide the Court an adequate basis on which to award the requested fees. Id. Stokes asserted that she was entitled to recovery of $249,542.50 for work performed by her lawyers on the case. Id. at *6. Stokes further requested $25,000 for work on post-verdict, and judgment motions and hearings. Id. The Court noted that the affidavit of Stokes' counsel set out the hourly billing rates for work performed by counsel, ranging between $295 to $300 per hour, and paralegal charges of $165 to $170 per hour. Stokes' counsel attested that the fees requested were reasonable and commensurate with the size and complexity of the case and issued involved in this matter. Id. at *7. Defendant contended that because the affidavit lacked testimony regarding the prevailing local rate for similar work performed by an attorney of similar skill, experience, and reputation, Stokes failed to meet her burden establishing entitlement to the fee. Id. at *8. The Court applied the three factor test set out in Johnson v. Georgia Highway Express, Inc., 488 F.2d 714 (5th Cir. 1974), to determine the lodestar. The Court found that Stokes received a notable benefit from co-prosecution by the EEOC's lawyers. Id. at *13. Therefore, to reach a fair and reasonable attorneys' fee, the Court reduced the lodestar. Id. Defendant further argued that the $274,542.50 that Stokes asked the Court to award was clearly disproportionate to the $250,000 result obtained, and was per se unreasonable because it would award counsel more money than that recovered by Stokes. Id. Defendant asserted that Stokes' pleadings did not seek punitive damages and thus did not properly put those damages before the Court. The Court, however, held that as it was reducing the lodestar on grounds already addressed, it would not make an additional reduction on this argument. Thus, the Court found that, Stokes, as a prevailing party, was entitled to recover reasonable attorneys' fees for successful prosecution of her sexual harassment and punitive damages claims. Id. at *14. The Court concluded that a 33% reduction in the requested attorneys' fees was appropriate and awarded Stokes $183,028.34 in attorneys' fees. Id. at *15.

EEOC v. Koch Foods Of Mississippi, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84924 (S.D. Miss. June 30, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant was engaged in a pattern or practice of sexual harassment, discrimination, and retaliation against female Hispanic workers. The EEOC alleged that supervisors sexually assaulted Hispanic women at work, charged them money for such things as using the bathroom, threatened the workers based on their immigration status, and retaliated against them when they complained about this conduct. Previously, the Magistrate Judge had permitted Defendant to conduct discovery regarding the employees' attempts to obtain U-Visas. Id. at *5-6. The Court had only partly affirmed the Magistrate Judge's order, concluding that discovery tailored to attempts to obtain U-Visas was not precluded by estoppel, the U-Visa statute and regulations, or concerns over the in terrorem effect of such discovery, but that the discovery could be obtained only from the aggrieved individuals, and not from the EEOC. Id. at *6. The Court, however, had permitted the use of a protective order to redact irrelevant information from the aggrieved individuals' immigration histories. Id. The EEOC moved for certification for interlocutory appeal and to stay the action pending resolution of the appeal, which the Court granted. The EEOC sought certification, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), of the following questions for interlocutory appeal: (i) whether efforts to obtain U-Visas and other immigration protections were discoverable to test credibility ("question 1"); and (ii) whether federal law protected aggrieved individuals from disclosing U-Visa application information ("question 2"). Id. at *7. At the outset, the Court found that question 1 failed to present a question of law, as it required a fact-intensive consideration, whereas question 2 presented a controlling question of law because if the Court of Appeals disagreed with its reasoning, the litigation would be fundamentally affected. Id. at *9-10. The Court found that resolving question 2 would have an extraordinarily significant impact on this litigation, and concluded that there was substantial ground for difference of opinion as to question 2. Finally, the Court noted that the requirement that an appeal may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation is closely tied to the requirement that the order involves a controlling question of law. Id. at *12. Because the Court found that question 2 was indeed a controlling question of law, it concluded that its resolution would materially advance the litigation. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motion to certify for interlocutory appeal and motion to stay pending the appeal. Id. at *15.

EEOC v. Lawler Foods, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120946 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 10, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant discriminated against applicants with discriminatory hiring and recruiting practices in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII"). The EEOC filed a motion to bifurcate discovery and trial, which the Magistrate Judge granted in part. The EEOC contended that the U.S. Supreme Court had approved the bifurcation of trials into class-wide liability and individual damage phases in pattern or practice discrimination cases brought by the federal government under § 707 of Title VII. Id. at *2. However, the Magistrate Judge noted that the parties had not consented to trial before a Magistrate Judge, and the case was referred for pre-trial management only. Id. at *3. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge left the issue of bifurcation of trial to the District Court. Regarding bifurcation of discovery, the Magistrate Judge noted that the EEOC claimed to have identified over 200 aggrieved individuals, and expected that number to rise as the case continued. Id. at *4. Unlimited discovery into the circumstances of each rejected applicant's claims for damages was certain to be very costly and time consuming. Id. The EEOC argued that its burden in a pattern or practice case was to prove that discrimination was the company's standard operating procedure, and that statistical proof together with evidence from the employer's files was necessary to meet that burden. Id. at *4-5. The Magistrate Judge observed that the EEOC's proof of pattern or practice hiring discrimination was expected to consist of documents from employer files, as well as testimony from company officials and employees, expert witnesses, and a select number of allegedly injured persons who applied for jobs but were not hired. Id. at *5. The Magistrate Judge agreed with the EEOC that at this stage of the litigation, the focus was properly on the employer's conduct, and in particular, whether there was sufficient pattern or practice evidence to warrant a trial on the merits. Id. The Magistrate Judge remarked that until that issue was resolved, economy and efficiency considerations weighed heavily in favor of postponing discovery regarding "second stage" issues, such as eligibility of individual victims of alleged discrimination for monetary relief and their alleged damages. Id. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge granted bifurcation of discovery.

EEOC v. Lawler Foods, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 167178 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 4, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants discriminated against African-American and Hispanic job applicants in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The EEOC filed a motion for partial summary judgment, which the Court granted. Defendants did not dispute that the EEOC conducted an investigation, or made multiple offers to settle its claims, and instead argued that the EEOC failed to provide a meaningful opportunity to remedy any unlawful employment practices by withholding certain information during the conciliation process. Specifically, Defendants alleged that the EEOC failed to disclose that two African-American and one Hispanic applicant were told that Defendants was not interested in hiring them. Id. at *7. The Court noted that in Mach Mining, LLC v. EEOC, 135 S. Ct. 1645 (2015), the U.S. Supreme Court held that the EEOC's conciliation efforts are subject to cursory review. Applying Mach Mining, the Court found that the EEOC satisfied its statutory duty to attempt conciliation with Defendants. The EEOC gave notice of the allegations in its pre-suit letters and made multiple offers of settlement. Id. at *6. The Court observed that the undisputed evidence indicated that the EEOC notified Defendants that it had found a pattern or practice of intentionally failing to hire African-American and Hispanic applicants and the use of applicant screening techniques that disparately impacted African-Americans and Hispanics. Id. at *8. In other words, the EEOC informed Defendants what unlawful practices it had engaged in, and which class of employees had suffered, as required by Mach Mining. Id.

at *9. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motion for partial summary judgment on the issue of its duty of conciliation.

EEOC v. Rite Way Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42113 (S.D. Miss. Mar. 31, 2015). The EEOC brought an action against Defendant, a janitorial cleaning services provider, alleging that it violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII") by terminating an employee in retaliation for participating in an internal investigation concerning a sexual harassment complaint submitted by a co-worker. Id. at 14. According to the complaint, Defendant employed Mekeva Tennort between 2009 and 2011 as a janitor at Biloxi Junior High School. In August 2011, Tennort gave a statement to supervisors investigating a complaint by another employee who had alleged sexually offensive conduct. Following Tennort's participation in the police investigation, Defendant required a written statement from Tennort. Later, in September 2011, Defendant terminated Tennort based on poor performance. Tennort filed a charge of discrimination with the EEOC claiming that Defendant retaliated against her after she provided the written statement. Id. at *13. Defendant moved for summary judgment, contending that the EEOC could not establish a prima facie case of retaliation because Tennort never engaged in protected activity. Id. at *14. The Court agreed and granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *32. It was undisputed that, at the time of Tennort's discharge, neither she nor the co-worker had filed a charge with the EEOC or otherwise instituted proceedings related to the alleged retaliation. Id. at *20. The Court therefore found that the EEOC could not rely upon the "participation clause" to demonstrate that Tennort engaged in protected activity. Id. The Court determined that the EEOC could not establish that Tennort opposed an employment practice that she believed to be barred by Title VII. According to the Court, a single, isolated incident of alleged sexual harassment that occurred once over the span of approximately three weeks did not rise to the level of being as severe or pervasive as to alter the condition of employment or create an abusive working environment. Id. at *24-27. The Court therefore concluded that the EEOC failed to establish a prima facie case of retaliation, and accordingly, granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *32.

EEOC v. Stone Pony Pizza, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40312 (N.D. Miss. Mar. 30, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to hire qualified African-American applicants on the basis of their race and maintained a racially segregated workforce in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII"). Before the Court could rule on motions for summary judgment, Defendant filed for bankruptcy. Id. at *2. In line with other Title VII cases where an employer files a bankruptcy while an action is pending, the Court dismissed the case by reason of the pending bankruptcy, but retained jurisdiction over the action in case further litigation was necessary. Id. The EEOC filed a motion to vacate the dismissal on the basis that the automatic stay prescribed by the Bankruptcy Code does not apply to government entities seeking to enforce their police powers. Id. The Court then vacated the order of dismissal and re-opened the motion for partial summary judgment. The Court noted that upon filing of a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, 11 U.S.C. § 362 (a) provides an automatic stay of the continuation of judicial proceedings against the debtor except for an action or proceeding by a governmental unit to enforce such governmental unit's police or regulatory power. Id. at *2-3. The Court observed that in EEOC v. McLean Trucking Co., 834 F.2d. 398 (4th Cir. 1987), the Fourth Circuit determined that: (i) because the EEOC was a governmental unit attempting to enjoin and fix damages for violations of Title VII; and (ii) the EEOC, by bringing the action, was enforcing its regulatory power; therefore, (3) the underlying action was not subject to the automatic-stay provision of the Bankruptcy Code until the prayer for relief, including monetary relief, was reduced to judgment. Id. at *3. Based on the language in the Bankruptcy Code and other Title VII cases prosecuted by the EEOC, the Court concluded that the automatic stay provision was not applicable in this case. Id. at *3-4. Accordingly, the Court vacated the order of dismissal, and re-opened the motions for partial summary judgment and summary judgment. Id. at *4.

EEOC v. Vicksburg Healthcare, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52812 (S.D. Miss. April 22, 2015). The EEOC brought an Americans With Disabilities Act action alleging that Defendant terminated its employee, Beatrice Chambers, because of her alleged disability. The EEOC served a request to inspect the general operations of the Surgical Services Department (the "Department") of Defendant's medical center facility (the "Facility"), the type of equipment and/or instruments commonly in use, the layout of the Department, and the feasibility of certain accommodations for the limited purpose of fact discovery. Id. at *5-6. The EEOC also wanted to collect measurements as to the amount of force required in order to push/pull certain equipment, and observe the day-to-day job functions and duties of the Licensed Practical Nurse ("LPN") position, the LPN II position, and other positions. Id. at *6. The inspectors/observers would include Chambers, the EEOC's attorney, and a vocational rehabilitation expert. Id. Defendant objected on the grounds that the Facility had already provided information related to the essential functions or particular tasks of the relevant functions of the job, it was undisputed that the lifting and pushing of heavy objects were essential, and that the inspection would necessarily reveal confidential information subject to the physician-patient privilege and the HIPPA. Id. at *7. The Court declined to allow the inspection. Id. at *15. First, the Court noted that the right to inspect under Rule 34 has ultimate and necessary boundaries, and the degree to which the proposed inspection would aid in the search for truth must be balanced against the burdens and dangers created by the inspection. Id. at *8-9. The EEOC argued that observing the equipment commonly used by LPNs within the Department – and measuring the force required to push, pull, or lift equipment, as well as the distances that LPNs must traverse and the ease with which the LPNs could call on each other for assistance – would allow it to gain an understanding of the normal operations of the department and the duties of an LPN II; further, it would allow the EEOC's expert to render an opinion regarding the essential LPN functions and whether Chambers could perform them with or without reasonable accommodations. Id. at *9-10. In addition, the EEOC sought to interview employees during the inspection. Id. at *10. The Court found, however, it was unlikely that the three-hour inspection the EEOC wished to conduct would reliably establish which tasks LPNs commonly performed or which equipment they commonly used. Id. at *10. The Court observed that according to the Vice President of Human Resources at the Facility, the essential functions, including the lifting and pushing of heavy objects, were not necessarily performed on any given day. Id. at *10-11. Similarly, the amount of force required to push, pull, and/or lift equipment such as gurneys, beds, and wheelchairs would depend on the weight of the patient and the equipment. The Court concluded that the EEOC failed to establish that the three-hour inspection would allow it to observe a representative sample of patients or duties. Id. at *11. In addition, the Court found that the possible disruption of patient care and the risk of compromising patients' rights to confidentiality were significant concerns. Id. at *12. The EEOC also had sought to test equipment being utilized to treat patients, and subject personnel at the Facility to roving depositions while they attempted to perform their duties. Id. at *12-13. Moreover, although the EEOC asserted that its inspectors and observers would not seek to communicate with any patient, attempt to make any requests of patients, seek medical records or personally identifiable information, or observe patients undergoing any procedures, the Court opined that observing the normal operations of the Department would likely include the communication or observation of patients' confidential information. Id. at *13. Accordingly, in light of these concerns, and because the information gathered during the EEOC's requested inspection would likely be of limited use, the Court denied the EEOC's motion to compel. Id. at *15.

EEOC v. Vicksburg Healthcare, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 113869 (S.D. Miss. Aug. 27, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants terminated Beatrice Chambers, a nurse, because of her disability and also failed to provide her with a reasonable accommodation in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Chambers was a nurse for Vicksburg Healthcare, LLC d/b/a River Region Medical Center ("River Region"). After taking medical leave for shoulder surgery, Chambers' physician sent a note to River Region stating that she could return to duty as long as she was limited to "light work." Id. at *3. Because River Region concluded that Chambers could not perform the essential functions of her job when limited to "light work," River Region terminated Chambers. Id. The day after Chambers was terminated, Chambers' physician filled out a disability insurance claim form, which stated that Chambers had a "temporary total disability." Id. at *4. Chambers reviewed the form and sent it to her insurer. The EEOC filed suit on Chambers' behalf, claiming she could perform the essential functions of her job while being limited to light duty and that her termination violated the ADA. The Court began by noting that "[t]o establish a prima facie discrimination claim under the ADA, a Plaintiff must prove: (i) that he has a disability; (ii) that he was qualified for the job; and (iii) that he was subject to an adverse employment decision on account of his disability." Id. at *7. The Court then considered whether the EEOC could prove that Chambers was qualified to perform the essential functions of her job in light of the statement in her insurance claim that she was totally disabled. Id. at *7-8. The Court noted that Cleveland v. Policy

Management Systems Corp., 526 U.S. 795, 806 (1999) held that "'when faced with a Plaintiff's previous sworn statement asserting 'total disability' or the like, the court should require an explanation of any apparent inconsistency with the necessary elements of an ADA claim.'" Id. The Court concluded that the EEOC would, in light of Cleveland, have to present an explanation that would allow the Court to conclude that Chambers could perform the essential functions of her job despite her insurance claim. Id. at *8. According to the EEOC, the fact that Chambers applied for disability benefits after her termination explained the discrepancy between her insurance claim and her litigation position. Id. at *8-9. The Court disagreed, finding the explanation insufficient to explain the discrepancy. Id. at *9-10. The Court thus granted summary judgment to River Region, finding that the EEOC had not met its burden of producing sufficient evidence supported by specific facts that Chambers was qualified to perform the essential functions of her job. Id. at *12.

(vi) Sixth Circuit

EEOC v. Cintas Corp.,* Case No. 04-CV-40132 (E.D. Mich. Mar. 16, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant had engaged in a pattern or practice of sex discrimination when it refused to recruit and hire a class of females on the basis of their sex. The class comprised all females who applied at one of Defendant's facilities in Michigan from 1999 to at least April 1, 2005 and were not hired to be a Route Sales Driver/Service Sales Representative. Id. at 2. The EEOC brought the action pursuant to § 706 of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII"), which does not contain explicit authorization for suits under a pattern or practice theory. Id. at 1. Accordingly, the District Court ruled that because the EEOC filed suit under § 706, and not under § 707, it could not proceed under a pattern or practice theory. Id. at 2. The Sixth Circuit relied on its earlier opinion in Serrano v. Cintas Corp., 699 F.3d 884 (6th Cir. 2012), and ruled that the EEOC could proceed in the action under a pattern or practice theory even though it filed the action under § 706 alone. Id. Upon remand, the EEOC sought to prove the alleged discrimination claim via the pattern or practice framework. Although the parties agreed that the trial should be bifurcated into two stages, the parties disagreed as to whether the EEOC should be required to identify the individual females on whose behalf the EEOC would seek money damages. Id. The EEOC contended that the District Court should not order it to disclose the individuals on whose behalf it might seek damages because it had already indicated that it could seek such damages for every female applicant during the applicable period, and those individual damages determinations were not at issue until phase II of the litigation. Id. at 3. The EEOC asserted that because Defendant knew the affected class period, Defendant had the information as to the potential pool of individuals who could obtain monetary relief at a phase II trial. In addition, the EEOC stated that it expected to seek damages in the phase II trial on behalf of approximately 50 different alleged victims. Id. Defendant, however, argued that there were at least 1,300 applicants, and that by pointing to every single female applicant, the EEOC was in essence refusing to identify both the females it alleged Defendant should have hired and the claimants on whose behalf it would ultimately seek monetary relief. Id. The District Court concluded that the EEOC should identify the names of the approximately 50 applicants on whose behalf it intended to seek monetary damages, so that it could issue a scheduling order that would address all of the outstanding issues.

EEOC v. Cintas Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 55889 (E.D. Mich. April 29, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of unlawful sex discrimination in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII"). Previously, the Court had ruled that because the EEOC filed suit under § 706 and not under § 707, it could not proceed under a pattern or practice theory. Id. at *3. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit reversed that order, holding that the EEOC could proceed under a pattern or practice theory per § 706 alone. Id. Following remand, the parties agreed that the trial should be bifurcated into two stages, but disagreed as to several issues concerning how the case should proceed. Both parties filed cross motions on their positions. The Court ruled that the trial should be bifurcated into two stages, and then ruled on the parties' disagreements. Since both parties wished to file amended witness lists, the Court concluded that an additional 12 months of fact discovery was appropriate prior to the phase I trial. Id. at *8. Among other things, the remand order vacated the previous ruling that provided that the EEOC could not depose Defendant's CEO Scott Farmer; therefore, the Court instructed the parties to meet and confer and to coordinate a mutually agreeable date for the deposition. Id. at *9. Finally, the parties disagreed as to when a jury should consider the punitive damages claim. The EEOC contended that the jury should determine the punitive damages during the phase I trial, while Defendant contended that should be done in phase II. Id. at *11. The Court, however, adopted a third position where the availability of punitive damages would be decided at phase I, but the amount of punitive damages would be decided in phase II. Id. at *11-12. The Court relied on Ellis v. Costco Wholesale Corporation, 285 F.R.D. 492 (N.D. Cal. 2012), which had adopted this third position, and concluded that while the availability of punitive damages should be adjudicated in stage I of the trial, determination of the aggregate amount and individual distribution of punitive damages should be reserved for stage II. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court ordered the parties to meet and confer, while also re-opening fact discovery for a period of 12 months. Id. at *13-14.

EEOC v. Cintas Corp.,* Case No. 04-CV-40132 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 20, 2015). The EEOC brought an action under § 706 of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 alleging that Defendant engaged in gender discrimination by refusing to recruit and hire females for the position of route sales drivers/service sales representatives at its facilities. During discovery, Defendant requested the EEOC to identify each individual on whose behalf the EEOC intended to seek damages, and the EEOC failed to respond. In an order dated March 2, 2010, the Magistrate Judge ordered the EEOC to produce the identities of the women on whose behalf the EEOC would be pursuing damages from Defendant. Id. at 2. The EEOC neither objected to that order nor provided the requested information. Meanwhile, in a separate order, the District Court held that the EEOC could not proceed the action under a pattern or practice theory because the EEOC brought the action under § 706, and not under § 707. Id. On the EEOC's appeal, the Sixth Circuit reversed, holding that the EEOC could proceed the action under a pattern or practice theory. On remand, Defendant sent the EEOC an interrogatory request asking it to identify each individual on whose behalf it would seek equitable relief, back pay, and/or compensatory damages. Id. at 2-3. The EEOC responded by stating that the class on whose behalf it would seek monetary relief composed of females who applied at one of Defendant's facilities in Michigan from 1999 to at least April 1, 2005, and were not hired to be Route Sales Drivers or Service Sales Representative. Id. at 3. The EEOC also stated that Defendant could derive the names of the individuals from the application materials that Defendant provided during discovery. Id. In an order dated March 16, 2015, the District Court required the EEOC to file a list of the names of female applicants on whose behalf the EEOC intended to seek monetary damages. Id. at 4. The EEOC subsequently submitted a list containing the names of approximately 800 individuals, and stated that it would be seeking back pay relief for a number of positions equal to the shortfall. Id. at 5. Defendant then filed a motion for sanctions, arguing that the EEOC failed to comply with Magistrate Judge's March 2, 2010 order. The District Court denied the motion on the basis that the EEOC's latest list provided Defendant a responsive answer to its interrogatory by identifying each individual on whose behalf the EEOC would seek equitable relief, back pay, and/or compensatory damages. Id. at 7-8. The District Court pointed out that it ordered the EEOC only to file a list of names of the female applicants on whose behalf it intended to seek monetary damages, and the EEOC complied by filing the list. Id. at 8-9. The District Court therefore found no basis to impose sanctions. Defendant next asserted that the EEOC was judicially estopped from pursuing monetary damages on behalf of more than 125 individuals at any damages trial. Defendant based its assertion upon statements the EEOC made while responding to Defendant's petition for a writ of certiorari after the Sixth Circuit's reversal on pattern or practice theory. Id. at 11. In its briefing, the EEOC had mentioned a figure of approximately 125 women for measuring damages. Id. at 12. The District Court found that Defendant's judicial-estoppel argument failed because it could not establish that the EEOC had successfully or unequivocally asserted that it would seek damages only on behalf of 125 individuals at any damages trial. Id. at 12-13. According to the District Court, the EEOC basically responded to Defendant's argument, that the action might turn into a massive action if it proceeded as a pattern or practice case, by asserting that Defendant overstated the numbers as being more than 1,300 and offered two potential ways of measuring damages that would involve far fewer than 94 and 125 members. Id. at 13. The District Court therefore declined to view the EEOC's statements as taking an unequivocal position that the number of individuals who could receive monetary damages in the action would be limited to 125. Id. Accordingly, the District Court denied Defendant's motion for sanctions.

EEOC v. Dunecraft, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58263 (N.D. Ohio May 4, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant discriminated and retaliated against its former employee, Kevin Marken, in violation of the ADEA. The EEOC alleged that Defendant's owner and CEO, Grant Cleveland, frequently and publicly ridiculed Marken with age-based criticism, and subjected him to a hostile work environment, and subsequently, fired him because of his age. Id. at *2. Defendant moved for summary judgment. The EEOC first claimed that circumstantial evidence proved that Marken was fired because of his age. To counter the first element of Marken's prima facie case, Defendant argued that Marken did not remain qualified for his position, as demonstrated by his multiple written warnings and low ratings on performance reviews. The Court noted that some affidavits labeled Marken as incompetent, but others described him as a hard worker and effective team member. Id. at *10. The Court, therefore, ruled that the EEOC satisfied the lenient standard of demonstrating that Marken was at least qualified for his job. Id. The Court noted that Marken was fired and was over 40 at the time, and a younger person replaced Marken. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court ruled that the EEOC established a prima face case of age based discrimination. The Court also observed that Defendant met its burden of showing that it had a legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for terminating him. Defendant provided a litany of reasons for firing Marken that were unrelated to age, and maintained that Marken worked poorly with others, did not improve his work after warnings, and cost the company tens of thousands of dollars in fines for late shipping. Id. At the same time, the Court observed that the alleged frequency and specificity of Cleveland's age-related comments provided evidence that Marken's age, and not his work performance, may have actually motivated the firing. Id. at *12. Defendant, nevertheless, maintained that it was its former Operations Manager, Andrew Johnson, and not Cleveland, who actually fired Marken. Defendant asserted that Johnson was the relevant decision maker for Marken's termination, making Cleveland's alleged comments irrelevant. Id. The Court, however, noted that Cleveland was directly involved in Marken's termination, as he was present during the termination and was the person that actually informed Marken that he was fired. Id. Thus, the Court concluded that a reasonable jury could find that Cleveland made that decision to fire Marken. The Court similarly found that the EEOC made a prima facie case for retaliatory termination, based on Cleveland's constant and continuous comments and Marken's complaints to Cleveland. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

EEOC v. Ford Motor Co.,* 782 F.3d 753 (6th Cir. 2015). The EEOC brought an action under the ADA alleging that Defendant failed to reasonably accommodate Jane Harris, a steel resale buyer. Id. at 757-58. Resale buyers acted as intermediaries between Defendant's steel suppliers and its parts manufacturers, and according to Defendant, the position was highly interactive. Id. at 758. Harris suffered from irritable bowel syndrome, and as an accommodation for her condition, she requested that Defendant allow her to work from home as needed and up to four days per week. After several meetings, Defendant advised Harris that it could not accommodate her telecommuting request because it would prevent her from performing the essential functions of her job. Particularly, Defendant found that out of Harris' ten job responsibilities, four could not be performed from home effectively and two were not significant enough to support telecommuting. Id. at 759. Defendant offered her other accommodations, including moving her closer to the restroom and jobs more suited for telecommuting. Id. at 760. Harris turned down these accommodations, sent an e-mail to Defendant claiming that the denial of her accommodation request violated the ADA, and filed a charge with the EEOC. The EEOC subsequently sued Defendant on Harris' behalf. The District Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, concluding that working from home up to four days per week was not a reasonable accommodation under the ADA. Id. The EEOC appealed, and the Sixth Circuit affirmed. Id. at 761. The Sixth Circuit found that regular and predictable on-site attendance was essential for Harris' position and her repeated absences made her unable to perform the essential functions of a resale buyer. Id. at 752-53. The Sixth Circuit pointed out several facts that suggested that telecommuting would not permit Harris to perform her essential job functions. Although Defendant had in fact allowed Harris to telecommute on an ad hoc basis on several occasions, those telecommuting experiments had failed, and Harris had agreed that four of her ten primary duties could not be performed at home. Id. at 763. Moreover, Harris proposed to work from home "as needed" and without a set schedule. Id. The Sixth Circuit noted that, although a few of Defendant's other resale buyers telecommuted, they did so only on one set day per week and they agreed to come to work if needed. Id. The Sixth Circuit therefore determined that Harris' up-to-four-days telecommuting proposal, which removed the essential functions of her job, was not a reasonable accommodation for Harris. Id. The Sixth Circuit also found that Harris' testimony that she could perform her job functions from home did not create a genuine dispute of fact because an employee's opinion about what functions were essential was not relevant. Id. at 763-64. The Sixth Circuit further rejected the EEOC's argument that technology had advanced to the point that telecommuting was now a more viable accommodation option. Id. at 765-66. The Sixth Circuit reasoned that the fact of advancing technology in the abstract was not a proof that technological advances made Harris' highly interactive job one that could be effectively performed at home. Id. The Sixth Circuit therefore concluded that the District Court properly granted summary judgment. Id. at 766. The Sixth Circuit further held that Defendant did not retaliate against Harris for making a charge of discrimination. Id. at 767. While agreeing that the timing of Harris' discharge seemed suspicious, the Sixth Circuit found that temporal proximity could not be sole basis for finding pre-text. Id. at 767-68. According to the Sixth Circuit, Harris' meetings with a non-decisionmaker could not prove pre-text because actions by non-decisionmakers could not alone prove pre-text, and Harris' poor performance review after the charge could not establish pre-text because it was as poor as her last pre-charge performance review. Id. at 768-69. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's grant of summary judgment. Id. at 770.

EEOC v. Gregg Appliances, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 108963 (M.D. Tenn. Aug. 17, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant retaliated against a former employee, Courtney Keen, in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Keen worked at Defendant's store as an office manager until she completed a management-in-training program and was promoted to assistant manager in 2008. In December of 2008, Keen reported to her district manager that her general manager had been sending her sexually harassing text messages. After an investigation, Defendant terminated the general manager and replaced him with Ken Sundwall. Sundwall issued Keen fourteen correction action reports ("CARs") in less than four months and eventually terminated her employment in April 2009. The case went to trial on March 31, 2015. At trial, the EEOC presented evidence that Keen's career with Defendant was successful and progressing until Defendant replaced Keen's general manager with Sundwall, and that Defendant had a retaliatory motive in disciplining and terminating Keen. Sundwall explained that he disciplined Keen solely based on her performance and her failure to improve. Id. at *12. The jury entered a verdict in Defendant's favor, rejecting EEOC's various theories and finding sufficient evidence for Defendant's decision to terminate Keen based on her performance. Id. at *19. The EEOC filed a motion for a new trial on the basis that certain jury instructions and evidentiary issues were prejudicial and that the jury's verdict in Defendant's favor was contrary to the weight of the evidence presented at trial. The Court denied the motion. Considering and comparing all of the evidence at trial, the Court concluded that a reasonable juror could only find in favor Defendant. Id. at *18. Although the jury could have been easily persuaded by the EEOC's circumstantial evidence, particularly as to the highly suspicious timing of events and allegedly preferential treatment of a male employee, the Court found that the jury could have been swayed just as well by Defendant's evidence, based largely on direct testimony that Sundwall was an unbiased taskmaster. Id. at *18. While Keen testified generally that the CARs were "very inaccurate," she provided little evidence to back-up that assertion. Id. The Court, therefore, accepted the jury's verdict under the circumstances. Id. at *19. The EEOC also contended that the Court erred by issuing an instruction addressing the jury's assessment of those employees similarly-situated to Keen and by refusing to issue a spoliation instruction. Id. The Court, however, declined to find that it erred in giving jury instructions. Since the EEOC argued at trial that Defendant treated similarly-situated employees, who had not engaged in protective activity, better than Keen, the Court delivered Defendant's proposed instruction addressing EEOC's reliance on the evidence of similarly-situated employees. Id. at *21. The EEOC argued that the instruction suggested that Keen's comparators must have committed literally the same conduct as Keen in order to be considered similarly-situated. Id. at *24-25. The Court found that the EEOC's argument focused narrowly on the same conduct language and ignored the remaining sentences that informed the jury to consider surrounding circumstances when evaluating the conduct. Id. at *25. The Court, therefore, held that its instruction regarding similarly-situated did not rise to the level of plain error. The Court also ruled that a spoliation instruction was not appropriate or its omission was not prejudicial because the EEOC offered no evidence that Defendant destroyed Keen's reviews at a time when it was obligated to preserve them and the Court was not persuaded that Keen's 2006, 2007, and 2008 evaluations would have meaningfully supported the EEOC's position. Id. at *31. The Court thus found no error or prejudice in its jury instructions. Accordingly, the Court denied the EEOC's motion for a new trial.

EEOC v. Helping Hand Home Health Care Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65698 (E.D. Mich. May 20, 2015). In this subpoena enforcement action brought by the EEOC, the Court denied Defendant's motion for reconsideration. The Court had previously entered an order to show cause as to why the EEOC's subpoena should not be enforced. In Defendant's papers moving for reconsideration, the Court observed that Defendant raised the same arguments previously presented to the Court as to jurisdiction, exhaustion, and the EEOC's status relating to the subpoena it issued to Defendant. Id. at *2-3. The Court determined that it had addressed those issues in its previous order, and that Defendant, in effect, simply repeated the same arguments made in its previous submissions. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for reconsideration.

EEOC v. Kyklos Bearings International, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30037 (N.D. Ohio. Mar. 11, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the Americans With Disabilities Act by terminating an employee based on her status as a cancer survivor. The EEOC alleged that Defendant put the employee on a medical restriction when she found it difficult to move a train of overloaded carts after she returned to her job as a tugger following recovery from breast cancer. Although the employee provided Defendant with documents from her doctor establishing that she had been cleared to work without any medical restriction, Defendant relied on its own doctor's opinion, who diagnosed her with lymphedema and imposed a permanent seven pound limit on lifting. Defendant eventually terminated her employment. Id. at *7. The employee subsequently filed a disability discrimination charge with the EEOC. Id. The EEOC claimed that Defendant unjustifiably and unlawfully regarded the employee as disabled. Id. at *8. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that the employee had a medical restriction that limited her ability to lift and it could not accommodate her due to lack of any light-duty work. Id. at *10. The Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *12. The Court found that a rational jury could find that Defendant failed to conduct an individualized inquiry into the employee's actual medical history and condition. Id. at *10. The Court noted that the seven-pound lifting restriction imposed by Defendant's doctor was unsupported by any concrete medical findings and was at odds with the objective evidence in the record. Id. at *12. The Court therefore denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *13.

EEOC v. Mel-K Management Co.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8733 (N.D. Ohio Jan. 26, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging racial harassment against Defendant on behalf of a group of African-American employees, and race-based and sex-based harassment and retaliation against the charging party. Id. at *1. Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint or alternatively to stay the proceedings based on the EEOC's failure to conciliate in good faith prior to filing its lawsuit. Id. The EEOC moved to strike Defendant's motion and supporting exhibits, arguing that they impermissibly disclosed confidential conciliation communications without the written consent of the EEOC. Id. at *2. The EEOC's motion also clarified that it had no objection to the use of non-confidential information in Defendant's motion. Id. The Court granted the EEOC's motion. Id. at *3. The Court ruled that the EEOC must first attempt a resolution using informal methods of conference, conciliation, and persuasion before filing suit under Title VII against an employer. Id. at *2. Further, the Court observed that nothing said or done during and as a part of conciliation may be made public by the EEOC, its officers or employees, or used as evidence in a subsequent proceeding without the written consent of the persons concerned, and that there was no exception to this prohibition. Id. at *2-3. Defendant's motion to dismiss included exhibits, several exchanges of correspondence about conciliation between counsel for both parties, and referred to this correspondence in its motion, including lengthy direct quotations. Id. at *3. The Court determined that using these documents as evidence in Defendant's pleading without the written consent of the EEOC violated the prohibition against disclosure contained in Title VII. Id. On this basis, the Court granted the EEOC's motion to strike the confidential conciliation communications and documents cited in Defendant's motion. Id.

EEOC v. Memphis, Light, Gas & Water Division,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 100810 (W.D. Tenn. July 31, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") by not selecting a current employee, Carlos Phifer, for the position of computer operator specialist 1 ("COS 1") because of his age (57). Phifer, who was employed as a service advisor, submitted a timely application for the COS 1 position posted by Defendant both internally and externally.

Defendant's policies and procedures required a qualified full-time employee to be awarded a position over a part-time, temporary, or external applicant. Id. at *6. After reviewing applications, Defendant selected three individuals, including Phifer, for interviews; after the interviews, the panel determined that Phifer was the most qualified and the best fit to fill the vacancy. Id. at *10. According to the EEOC, when the panel reported its selection of Phifer to manager Elvis Morgan, he challenged the selection. Morgan allegedly "kept talking about" Phifer's age, retirement, and health condition. Id. at *11. Defendant eventually selected an external candidate. After discovery, Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that it had a legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for not selecting Phifer to fill the position, and therefore, was entitled to judgment as a matter of law. The Court denied Defendant's motion on the basis that the evidence was sufficient to permit a reasonable jury to conclude that Phifer's age was the "but for" cause of Defendant's employment decision. Id. at *29-30. The Court found that Morgan's comments about Phifer's age, retirement, and health conditions did not rise to the level of direct evidence of age discrimination because they required a trier of fact to make inferences in order to conclude that Morgan's decision was based on his discriminatory animus. Id. at *24. The Court also found that Morgan's statement, "[w]e're looking for young blood with new ideas" did not rise to the level of direct evidence of age discrimination because it could also be reasonably construed to mean that Morgan wanted to hire another candidate because he thought she was better qualified for the modified COS 1 position and viewed her as someone who had fresh ideas. Id. The Court, however, found that Morgan's comments provided support to show that Defendant's employment decision was impermissibly based on Phifer's age, as the EEOC presented evidence that Phifer received the highest score of the three candidates and the interview panel had unanimously determined that Phifer was the most qualified and the best fit to fill the vacancy. Id. at *28-29. The evidence further showed that the panel had placed the successful external candidate in the lower "clearly acceptable" category, and Defendant had failed to follow its own policies and procedures by selecting an external candidate over a qualified full-time internal candidate. Id. at *29. The Court found this evidence sufficient to permit a reasonable jury to conclude that Phifer's age was the "but for" cause of Defendant's employment decision. Id. at *29-30. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *33.

EEOC v. New Breed Logistics,* 783 F.3d 1057 (6th Cir. 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant, a supply-chain logistics company, unlawfully discriminated against three female workers who objected to a supervisor's sexual advances. Id. at 1061. The three female employees, supplied by a temporary staffing agency, asserted that their worksite supervisor made sexually-suggestive comments to each of them on a daily basis and sometimes engaged in physical contact with one of them. Each of the three female employees opposed the misconduct, telling the supervisor to "stop touching [her]" and to "leave [her] alone." Id. at 1062. A male co-worker who overheard the sexual comments told the supervisor to "calm down on making comments." Id. at 1063. Shortly after objecting to the harassment, Defendant warned one of the female employees about her attendance and a week later terminated her. While the supervisor learned that the other two female employees intended to make an anonymous complaint against him through a hotline, he recommended terminating their employment based on their performance. Defendant subsequently terminated them. Defendant also terminated the male co-worker, shortly after it interviewed him regarding the supervisor's alleged harassment, reasoning that he clocked-in early and stayed late without authorization. Id. at 1064-65. The EEOC brought an action alleging harassment and retaliation in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII"). A jury found in favor of the EEOC and awarded all four employees compensatory and punitive damages totaling over $1.5 million. Id. at 1065. Defendant moved for a new trial challenging the sufficiency of the evidence as to liability and damages. Id. The District Court denied the motion, concluding that the evidence supported the jury's verdict. Defendant appealed. Defendant did not dispute the harassment finding, but argued that there was no evidence that the employees had engaged in any protected conduct or that it terminated the employees in retaliation for such conduct. Id. at 1066. The Sixth Circuit rejected Defendant's arguments and upheld the District Court's judgment. Id. at 1077. The Sixth Circuit held that an employee's demand to a harassing supervisor that the supervisor cease his harassing conduct constituted protected activity under Title VII. Id. at 1067. The Sixth Circuit reasoned that, because sexual harassment is an unlawful employment practice, "[i]f an employee demands that his/her supervisor stop engaging in this unlawful practice – i.e., resists or confronts that supervisor's unlawful harassment – the opposition clause's broad language confers protection of this conduct." Id. at 1067-68. Although the language of the retaliation provision of Title VII does not specify as to whom protected activity must be directed, the Sixth Circuit found that it would be unfair to read into Title VII that opposition to harassment be directed to a "particular official designated by the employer." Id. at 1068. Defendant also argued that there was no evidence that the decision-makers who terminated the employees knew that the employees had confronted their supervisor when the decision-makers decided to terminate them. The Sixth Circuit, however, held that the EEOC had presented sufficient evidence for the jury to find that the supervisor was the driving force behind the decision-makers' actions. Id. at 1069-70. Finally, the Sixth Circuit ruled that the temporal proximity between the protected conduct and the terminations was sufficient to support the jury's decision that Defendant terminated them because of their protected conduct. Id. at 1070-71. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling denying Defendant a new trial. Id. at 1077.

EEOC v. OhioHealth Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84016 (S.D. Ohio June 29, 2015). In August 2013, the EEOC filed a complaint alleging that Defendant failed to reasonably accommodate a former employee in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act. Id. at *1. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment in which it argued, in part, that the EEOC failed to satisfy all required conditions precedent to filing its lawsuit, including good faith conciliation. Id. The Court held that this threshold issue of conciliation must be decided before reaching the merits since if it did otherwise, it would be "put[ting] the cart before the horse" Id. The Court described that the EEOC's duty under Mach Mining LLC v. EEOC, 135 S. Ct. 1645 (2015), is two-fold – first, the EEOC must inform the employer about the specific allegation, and second, the EEOC must try to engage the employer in some form of discussion so as to give the employer an opportunity to remedy the allegedly discriminatory practice. Id. at *3. Here, the issue presented to the Court was whether the EEOC met its second required duty. Id. In trying to demonstrate that it satisfied its conciliation obligation, the EEOC presented a sworn affidavit attesting to the agency's conciliation efforts. Id. at *4. In relevant part, the EEOC's affidavit indicated that it issued a determination on September 15, 2011, engaged in communications with Defendant until October 14, 2011, and only brought suit after Defendant rejected the EEOC's conciliation proposal. Id. Defendant submitted its own declaration, the crux of which was that the EEOC presented its demand as a take-it-or-leave-it proposition, failed to provide Defendant with requested information and declared conciliation efforts failed even though Defendant made it clear that it was "ready and willing to negotiate." Id. at *4-5. Preliminarily, the Court rejected the EEOC's argument that OhioHealth waived its failure to conciliate defense by not raising it sooner because failure to conciliate is not an affirmative defense; rather, it is a condition precedent for the EEOC brining suit which did not have to be raised prior to summary judgment. Id. at *5. With respect to the merits, the Court held that the conciliation obligation was not satisfied because there were numerous conflicting facts which gave the appearance that the EEOC was "engaged in the production of bookend letters that failed to reflect a good faith conciliation effort" and thus, "if the proceedings were for appearances only, then there never was a real attempt to engage in conciliation as the law requires." Id. at *6. The Court also found that conciliation failed because the EEOC indicated in its original determination letter that an EEOC representative would "prepare a dollar amount that includes lost wages and benefits, applicable interest, and any appropriate attorneys' fees and costs." Id. at *6-7. Nothing the EEOC presented to the Court demonstrated that it ever provided Defendant with such a proposal. Id. at *7. As viewed by the Court, "absent disclosure of this calculation to OhioHealth, the conciliation process could have been nothing but a sham." Id. Absent this information, "the EEOC can hardly be said to have given the employer an opportunity to remedy the allegedly discriminatory practice." Id. As such, the Court held that "an unsupported demand letter such as the one involved here alone cannot logically constitute an attempt to inform and engage in the conciliation process." Id. As a result of the EEOC's failure to conciliate, the Court stayed the case pending the EEOC's mandated efforts to obtain voluntary compliance. Id. at *8.

Editor's Note: The ruling in EEOC v. OhioHealth Corp. was one of the first to apply the new standards established by Mach Mining LLC v. EEOC.

EEOC v. R.G. & G.R. Harris Funeral Homes, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52016 (E.D. Mich. April 21, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant, a Detroit-based funeral home, discriminated against a funeral director/embalmer on the basis of her sex in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII"). Defendant employed Amiee Stephens as a funeral director/embalmer beginning in October 2007. In or around July 2013, Stephens informed Defendant and her co-workers that she was undergoing a gender transition from male to female, and that she would soon begin to present as a woman. Two weeks later, Defendant fired Stephens, telling her that what she was "proposing to do" was "unacceptable." Id. at *4. The EEOC brought its action alleging that Plaintiff's termination violated Title VII. Id. at *9. Recognizing that transgendered, or transsexual status is currently not a protected class under Title VII, the EEOC alleged that Defendant's decision to fire Stephens was motivated by sex-based consideration, in that Defendant fired Stephens because she was transgendered, because of Stephen's transition from male to female, and/or because Stephens did not conform to Defendant's sex- or gender-based preferences, expectations, or stereotypes. Id. Defendant moved to dismiss on the ground that Title VII does not protect transgendered individuals. Id. at *10-11. The Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss. Id. at *25. Although the Court agreed that transgender persons are not a protected group under Title VII, it noted that the EEOC did not allege that Defendant fired Stephens solely because of transgendered status. Id. The Court explained that had the EEOC alleged that Defendant fired Stephens based solely on Stephens' status as a transgendered person, it would be inclined to grant Defendant's motion to dismiss. Id. The EEOC, however, did not make such sole assertion. The Court pointed out the significance of the EEOC's allegation that Defendant fired Stephens because she did not conform to Defendant's sex- or gender-based preferences, expectations, or stereotypes. Id. at *11. According to the Court, even though transgendered/transsexual status is currently not a protected class under Title VII, the statute nevertheless "protects transsexuals from discrimination for failing to act in accordance and/or identify with their perceived sex or gender." Id. at *11-12. Because the EEOC based its theory of liability, in part, on Defendant's alleged sex-based consideration, the Court concluded that the EEOC had sufficiently pleaded a sex-stereotyping gender-discrimination claim under Title VII. Id. at *22-23. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss. Id. at *25.

EEOC v. R.G. & G.R. Harris Funeral Homes, Inc., Case No. 14-CV-13710 (E.D. Mich. Sept. 24, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII") of by terminating a transgender employee, Aimee Stephens, on the basis of her sex. Defendant employed Stephens as a funeral director in 2007, and terminated her in 2013. Defendant did so after informing Stephens, who was a male when hired, that her intention of dressing as a woman was unacceptable. Id. at 2. Defendant moved to dismiss the claim on the grounds that gender identity disorder was not a protected class under Title VII. Id. The Court denied the motion on April 23, 2015, finding that the EEOC's complaint did not allege that Defendant terminated Stephens based solely upon Stephens' status as a transgender person, but also because Stephens did not conform to Defendant's sex or gender-based preferences, expectations, or stereotypes. Id. Defendant then served discovery seeking information relating to the prior and current status of Stephens' sexual anatomy, the progress of Stephens' gender transition, and Stephens' familial background and relationships. Id. at 3. The EEOC moved for a protective order to preclude discovery into these areas on various grounds. The Court granted in part and denied in part the EEOC's motion for protective order. The Court grant the EEOC's motion to the extent Defendant's discovery requests concerned Stephens' sexual anatomy, her familial background and relationships, and any medical or psychological records related to the progress of her gender transition. The Court opined that these discovery topics were all irrelevant in light of the Court's previous ruling that the EEOC's salient claim was limited to "gender stereotyping." Id. at 5-6. According to the Court, the relevant inquiry underlying the EEOC's theory of liability was a subjective one – whether Defendant's supervisors perceived Stephens as a man who was acting like a woman – rather than an objective one, i.e., whether Stephens was ever actually a woman. Hence, it would be harassing and oppressive to require the disclosure of information of the most intimate and private nature information, given that Defendant failed to show its relevance to the disposition of the EEOC's gender-stereotyping claim. Id. at 7. The Court, however, required the EEOC to respond to Defendant's two other interrogatories, finding that they were distinguishable from the prohibited discovery requests because they sought information that Stephens presented publicly or to third-parties, i.e., Stephens' physical appearance at work and her communications with other employees, as opposed to private facts of an intimate nature. Id. at 8. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part the EEOC's motion for protective order.

EEOC v. R.G. & G.R. Harris Funeral Homes, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 161314 (E.D. Mich. Nov. 25, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII") by terminating a transgendered employee, Aimee Stephens, on the basis of her sex. Defendant hired Stephens as a funeral director in 2007, and terminated her in 2013. The Magistrate Judge granted in part the EEOC's motion for protective order, relative to Defendant's discovery regarding Stephen's personal sexual information. On Defendant's subsequent Rule 72 objections, the Court rejected Defendant's position. Id. at *1. The Court observed that Defendant's objections to the Magistrate Judge's order were based on its assumption that all the EEOC's case theories remained in limbo, and therefore, the discovery requests should not be deemed irrelevant. Id. at *2. The Court rejected Defendant's objections, finding that it had conclusively determined the sustainable theories on which the EEOC could bring its Title VII claim. Id. The Court explained that the EEOC asserted two different Title VII claims against Defendant. The EEOC's first claim was that Defendant discriminated against Stephens by terminating her because she is transgender; because of Stephens' transition from male to female; and because she did not conform to Defendant's sex or gender-based preferences, expectations, or stereotypes. Id. at *3-4. Second, the EEOC alleged that Defendant violated Title VII by providing a clothing allowance to male employees and not to female employees. Id. at *4. The Court opined that when it denied Defendant's motion to dismiss on the EEOC's first Title VII claim, it ruled that the EEOC could pursue a Title VII claim based upon the theory that Stephens' failure to conform to sex stereotypes was the driving force behind the termination. Id. at *5. The Court therefore concluded that the EEOC's complaint stated a Title VII claim as to Stephens' termination, and the Magistrate Judge correctly determined that Defendant's discovery was not relevant to that claim.

EEOC v. Skanska USA Building, Inc.*, 80 F. Supp. 3d 766 (W.D. Tenn. 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging racial discrimination and retaliation on behalf of Maurice Knox, Samuel Burt, and Robert Vassar, three African-American employees who were hired by C-1, Inc. at the construction site for which Skanska USA Building, Inc. was a general contractor. The parties filed cross motions for summary judgment. Id. at 770. The Court denied Defendant's motion, and granted the EEOC's motion in part. Id. First, the Court noted that to determine whether harassing conduct is sufficiently severe or pervasive to establish a hostile work environment; whether the totality of the circumstances should be considered, including the frequency of the discriminatory conduct; its severity, and whether it is physically threatening or humiliating. Id. at 772. Because there was evidence that there was a racially discriminatory hostile work environment, the Court denied Defendant's motion on this claim. Id. at 773. Further, Defendant claimed that it first knew of Knox's harassment when he complained after a co-worker threw a mixture of chemicals and urine on him. Defendant asserted that it investigated the complaint and took action, including posting signs that stated that harassment would not be tolerated. The Court, however, noted that there was an extensive record of racial harassment on the site prior to Knox's arrival that Defendant knew or should have known about and failed to adequately respond to, and further remarked that the eventual response to Knox's complaints did not excuse Defendant for its failure to respond to his earlier complaints. Id. at 774. Thus, the Court denied Defendant's motion with regard to Knox's hostile work environment claims. Id. The Court reasoned that Knox had complained multiple times about the harassment, and that there was an adverse employment action against his employer when Defendant suspended C-1's contract after his complaints. Id. at 775. Although Defendant reinstated the contract, two weeks later it permanently removed Knox from the site for allegedly using his cell phone while working. The Court stated that this evidence of disparate treatment created a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Knox's termination was in retaliation for his racial harassment complaints. Id. Defendant also removed Burt from the jobsite approximately two months after he first complained about racial harassment without being given a reason for his dismissal. The Court found that there was a causal connection between the complaints and the adverse employment action, and that the allegations made out a prima facie case of retaliation. Id. at 775-76. The Court further noted that the EEOC is not precluded from bringing suit on claims that were not included in the charge of discrimination if facts related to the charged claim would prompt the EEOC to investigate a different, uncharged claim. Id. at 778. Here, Knox filed a charge of discrimination alleging racial harassment and retaliation. Because the facts of Knox's charged claim gave rise to the investigation of the similar claims on behalf of Burt and Vassar, the Court opined that these claims were within the scope of the EEOC's investigation, and accordingly, granted summary judgment to the EEOC on Skanska's affirmative defense that the Court lacked jurisdiction over the subject matter of that claim. Id. at 778-79. The Court also found that the EEOC had attempted to conciliate in good faith the claims of Knox and a class of other C-1 employees before instituting the suit. Id. at 778. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment and granted in part the EEOC's motion for partial summary judgment. Id. at 781.

EEOC v. Tepro,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 134901 (E.D. Tenn. Sept. 28, 2015). The EEOC brought an Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") action on behalf of 25 former employees alleging that Defendant engaged in a discriminatory reduction-in-force ("RIF"). Id. at *4. According to the complaint, Defendant, a manufacturer of rubber products for the automotive industry, re-classified its employees over the age of 40 from "Tech II" to "Tech III" positions, which resulted in the re-classified employees losing their seniority dates and ultimately being laid-off. Id. at *2. The EEOC alleged that, by the end of June 2009, Defendant improperly re-classified more than 25 employees in the protected age group before their lay-off. Id. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that the EEOC presented no direct evidence of discrimination, the EEOC could not meet its burden of establishing a prima facie case of discrimination, and even if it could, the EEOC could not establish that Defendant's legitimate non-discriminatory reason for the lay-offs were a pre-text for age discrimination. Id. at *56-57. Defendant further argued that several individual employees should be dismissed because their testimony demonstrated that age was not the "but for" reason for their termination. Id. at *57. The Court denied Defendant's motion, finding that, although the EEOC failed to present any direct evidence of discrimination, it submitted enough circumstantial evidence to conclude that issues of fact remain as to whether Defendant discriminated against its employees based on their age. Id. at *61-65. The statistical evidence suggested that older employees were overrepresented at a statistically significant level in both the re-classification efforts and the RIF, and it showed significant disparities in the employer's pattern of conduct toward a protected class. Id. at *65-66. Further, a multitude of facts – that Defendant focused on employees' ages in the numerous lists that it made for the re-classification and RIF, Defendant did not advise the employees that their seniority would be affected by their decision to re-classification to Tech III status, the temporal proximity between the re-classification efforts and the RIF, the testimony from certain employees that they felt pressured to accept re-classification, and the fact that no employees younger than 40 were re-classified to Tech III status or subjected to RIF – all constituted circumstantial evidence that Defendant might have targeted the employees based on their age. Id. at *66-67. Defendant argued that a workforce reduction was necessary due to its financial position and that Tech II employees with the shortest length of service in that position were chosen for lay-off pursuant to the terms of Defendant's employee handbook, and because terminating them would have the least impact on the company's overall operations. Id. at *68. Although the undisputed facts confirmed that Defendant was in financial distress, that it took numerous cost saving measures that were ultimately unsuccessful, and that a RIF was necessary for it financial survival, the Court found that genuine issues of material fact remain as to whether Defendant appropriately followed the lay-off policy set forth in its employee handbook. Id. at *75. The EEOC requested the Court to view the re-classification and RIF as a single continuous action designed by Defendant with the goal of moving older employees into positions that easily could be eliminated. The Court found that the statistical and circumstantial evidence, along with the timing of the lay-offs of Tech III employees immediately upon the heels of a large scale effort to re-classify employees into that position, was suspicious. Id. at *73. Thus, finding that genuine issues of material fact remain as to Defendant's stated reasons for subjecting the 25 employees to the RIF, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment. The Court also rejected Defendant's affirmative defenses, finding that it did not prove that it was entitled to summary judgment on the doctrine of laches and that there was no dispute that the EEOC attempted good faith conciliation before filing its lawsuit. Id. at *77-82.

EEOC v. The Pines Of Clarkston,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 55926 (E.D. Mich. April 29, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant, an assisted living facility, terminated Jamie Holden as a nursing administrator on the basis of her epilepsy in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") and Michigan's Persons with Disabilities Civil Rights Act. Holden underwent a pre-employment drug screen the day after Defendant hired her, and she tested positive for marijuana. Id. at *2-3. She disclosed to Defendant that she used marijuana for epilepsy. Defendant questioned Holden about her epilepsy and later terminated her. Id. at *3. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that it was not an "employer" within the meaning of the ADA and that it had a legitimate reason for its employment decision since Holden failed the drug test. Id. at *2. The Court denied Defendant's motion. Id. First, the Court found that Defendant had admitted that it employed at least 15 employees in its answer to the EEOC's complaint, and thus it was a covered "employer" under the ADA. Id. at *8. Defendant argued that it should not be bound by its admissions in its answers because it had alleged in its responses to the EEOC's requests for admissions and interrogatories that it employed less than 15 employees. Id. at *9. The Court, however, noted that the discovery closed months before Defendant raised this issue. Id. at *11. Further, the EEOC had conducted no discovery on the issue and relied on Defendant's judicial admissions. Id. The Court thus found that it would be unfair to force the EEOC to address this new defense without re-opening discovery, and re-opening discovery at this stage would not be appropriate as the case was near trial. Id. at *11-12. The Court therefore concluded that Defendant was bound by its admission that it employed the requisite 15 employees at the time of the adverse employment action. Id. at *12. Next, the Court found that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether Defendant discharged Holden because of her epilepsy. Id. at *16. Defendant's argument that it dismissed Holden for failing her drug test conflicted with its managers' stated rationales to the EEOC that it terminated her for failing to disclose her medication or that Holden could not perform the duties of the position given her medical condition. Id. at *16. While the Court agreed that discharge for illegal drug use was a permissible non-discriminatory reason, it also noted that an employer's changing rationale for making an adverse employment decision could be evidence of pre-text. Id. Moreover, Holden's evidence indicated that Defendant knew of her epilepsy, the managers questioned her about her condition, and they told her that she could not perform the job because of her medical condition. Id. at *18. Under these circumstances, the Court found that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether Defendant gave a legitimate non-discriminatory reason for the firing or whether it was a pre-text for disability discrimination. Id. at *18-20. Further, the Court found that Defendant was not entitled to summary judgment under the "honest belief" doctrine because Defendant never told Holden that it terminated her for illegal drug use. Id. at *19-20. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *20.

(vii) Seventh Circuit

EEOC v. Amsted Rail Co., Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 94807 (S.D. Ill. July 21, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant's medical screening process for potential employees discriminated against qualified applicants based on their record of disability or because Defendant regarded them as disabled in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). The EEOC sought injunctive relief as well as compensatory and punitive damages. Defendant asserted 10 affirmative defenses, including: (i) Defense 1 – failure to state a claim; (ii) Defense 4 – actions against employees were taken for legitimate, non-discriminatory reasons; (iii) Defense 5 – Defendant made good faith effort to comply with the law; (iv) Defense 6 – the lack of subject-matter jurisdiction because of the EEOC's failure to conciliate; (v) Defense 7 – damages sought by the EEOC were not recoverable under the ADA; (vi) Defense 8 – laches; (vii) Defense 9 – the EEOC's after-acquired evidence; and (viii) Defense 10 – Defendant's reservation of its right to add defenses. Id. at *2. The EEOC moved to strike those defenses or, in the alternative, for judgment on the pleadings on some of those defenses. The Court granted the motion in part. The EEOC asked the Court to strike for judgment on the pleadings on defenses 1-6 as they were not supported by sufficient facts as required by Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 533 (2007), and that it would prejudiced by having to litigate them. The Court noted that under Rule 12(f), it may strike pleadings to prevent unnecessary expenditures of time and money litigating spurious issues. Id. at *3. Defendant subsequently sought permission to withdraw defenses 1, 4, and 9; therefore, the Court granted the EEOC's motion as to those three defenses. Id. at *2. The Court found that the EEOC had not carried its burden with respect to defenses 5, 6, 7, and 8. The Court explained that Defense 5 had a logical connection to the EEOC's ADA claims in that it asserted a good faith defense to punitive damages in a discrimination claim. Id. at *4. Similarly, the Court found that defenses 6, 7, and 8 were good faith defenses, which the EEOC must answer. Id. at *4. More importantly, the Court found that the EEOC did not show that it would be prejudiced from allowing those defenses to remain in Defendant's answer. Id. Finally, the Court found that defense 10 was not a defense at all but essentially a declaration of exemption from Rule 13's rules on amending pleadings. Id. at *5. The Court remarked that this declaration had no relation or logical connection to the claims in this case, and accordingly struck it down. Id.

EEOC v. Aurora Health Care, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63321 (E.D. Wis. May 14, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") in discriminating against Kelly Beckwith, a job applicant, by rescinding an offer of employment after learning that she was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis ("MS"). Defendant operated the Aurora Visiting Nurse Association ("AVNA"), which provided home care and hospice services to patients, and hired nurses to work unsupervised in the homes of patients. Id. at *3. Defendant's hiring process required that after a prospective employee filled out the form, a licensed practical nurse ("LPN") or medical assistant ("MA") measured the applicant's vital signs, blood pressure, and weight; administered a vision and grip test; and, occasionally, drew blood from the applicant. Id. at *6-7. After the LPN or MA had completed the initial examination and review, a physician would review the form with the applicant and perform the actual physical examination before the applicant underwent a drug screen. Id. at *7. The EEOC contended that after reviewing Beckwith's application and interviewing her, Defendant offered her employment with AVNA, which was contingent upon her passing a pre-employment physical. Id. at *16. During her physical, Beckwith filled out a form and did not disclose she was prescribed Rebif as her medication for MS, because she was not compliant with the medication at that time. Id. at *20. Defendant contended that its LPN noticed that Beckwith's records showed a prescription to Rebif that she had not disclosed. Having found out that Beckwith was diagnosed with MS, Defendant rescinded the job offer on the basis of her dishonesty regarding her medical records. Id. at *27. The EEOC asserted that this course of events was different from Defendant's typical practice, where it performed an investigation before rescinding a job offer for dishonesty. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. Id. at *39-40. As a preliminary issue, the Court found that Defendant's action would not violate the ADA unless Beckwith had a disability as defined by 42 U.S.C. § 12102. Id. at *42. Defendant contended that Beckwith was never substantially limited in her life activities given her mild case of MS. The Court observed that while the EEOC had not presented evidence to carry its burden to show that Defendant regarded Beckwith as disabled, at the same time the EEOC had offered enough evidence to preclude Defendant's motion for summary judgment on this point. Id. at *44-45. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' motions on the issue of disability. Id. at *45. Defendant also argued that Beckwith's discrimination claim should be dismissed because the EEOC could not prove that Defendant rescinded her offer because of her MS. Id. at *47. The EEOC asserted that Defendant's honesty policy was per se discriminatory because Defendant applied its honesty policy only to people with disabilities. Defendant argued that it had a reason for focusing on dishonesty that was related to a significant medical condition, and that the form was designed to help Defendant determine whether prospective employees would need any accommodations to perform their job. Id. at *49-50. The Court found that the EEOC had not produced any direct evidence of discriminatory animus; however, it identified only one piece of evidence, i.e., the allegedly suspicious timing of Defendant's decision to rescind Beckwith's offer. The EEOC posited that had Defendant rescinded Beckwith's offer for falsifying or omitting responses from the form, then her disease would not have been relevant or warranted comment. Id. at *51. The Court found that this piece of evidence was enough for the EEOC to overcome summary judgment. Id. The Court, however, granted summary judgment for Defendant as to the EEOC's confidentiality claim insofar it relied upon a physician assistant ("PA") (who disclosed the information to an employee health specialist ("EHS") who was responsible for making sure that AVNA nurses could meet the physical demands of their jobs). Id. at *54-57. The Court ruled that Defendant could not be held liable for the PA's disclosure to the EHS. Id. Finally, the Court granted the EEOC's motion for summary judgment on Defendant's equitable defense of failure to state claim, finding that moving to dismiss after answering to the complaint was untimely. Accordingly, the Court granted both parties' motions for summary judgment in part and denied in part. Id. at *68.

EEOC v. Autozone Inc*., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101347 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 4, 2015). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of an African-American employee alleging disparate treatment under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII") and claiming that he was transferred from one store to another on the basis of his race. The employee initially worked in one location and after eight months was transferred to Defendant's "Kedzie" store, in the same position and at the same rate of pay. Id. at *2. Thereafter, Defendant promoted the employee to a part-time sales manager position and in a few weeks' time transferred him to two other stores, both in Chicago. In 2011, Defendant transferred the employee back to the Kedzie store, and in 2012 transferred him to another store. Id. at *3. The employee believed that his transfer from the Kedzie store in July 2012 was based on race because Defendant's district manager wanted to make the Kedzie store predominantly Hispanic. Id. at *3-4. Defendant moved for summary judgment, which the Court granted. Id. at *15. The EEOC asserted that this action was not being brought under 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(a)(1), but instead under § 2000e-2(a)(2), contending that Defendant's conduct was unlawful because it transferred the employee as part of a plan to limit, segregate, or classify employees on the basis of race. Id. at 6. The Court observed that although § 2000e-2(a)(2)* creates a broad substantive right that extends far beyond the simple refusal or failure to hire, the EEOC failed to point to any legal authority that it was not required to present evidence of an adverse employment action under its theory of liability. Id. at *7. The Court observed that in Seventh Circuit cases involving § 2000e-2(a)(2)'s prohibition of limiting, segregating, or classifying employees, the case law requires that the EEOC establish that the alleged victim suffered an adverse employment action. Id. The Court remarked that while adverse employment actions extend beyond readily quantifiable losses, not everything that makes an employee unhappy is an actionable adverse action. Id. at *12. Here, when Defendant transferred the employee from the Kedzie store in 2012, he did not receive a reduction in pay, a change in benefits, or any change in job duties. The Court remarked that a transfer that does not involve a demotion cannot rise to the level of a materially adverse employment action. Id. Further, there was no evidence in the record that the 2012 transfer from the Kedzie store resulted in an objectively humiliating or degrading change in work conditions; instead there was evidence that the employee objected to the transfer to store 2290 because of the distance from his home and the resultant inconvenience of a longer commute. Id. at *13-14. The Court opined that this disruption, without more, did not amount to an adverse employment action under Title VII. Id. at *14. Thus, because employee did not suffer any material adversity in relation to his July 2012 transfer, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *14-15.

EEOC v. AutoZone, Inc.*, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 149849 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 4, 2015). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of three employees alleging that Defendants discriminated against them on the basis of their disabilities by failing to accommodate them and discharging them in violation of the ADA. Defendants filed its answer and affirmative defenses, and moved to limit the scope of the litigation to three of its stores at issue, which the Court denied. The crux of Defendants' argument was that the EEOC did not conduct an adequate nationwide investigation to support its decision to file suit against Defendants for employment discrimination in any of the stores other than the three Illinois stores where the three employees worked. Id. at *7. The Court observed that the Seventh Circuit had held that EEOC lawsuits are not confined to claims typified by those of a charging party, and the lawsuit should not be limited to claims that are supported by the evidence obtained in the EEOC's investigation. Id. at *8. The Court explained that the rationale for prohibiting parties from challenging the sufficiency of the EEOC's investigation is because this would improperly place the focus of employment discrimination litigation on the EEOC's administrative efforts, rather than the validity of the actual claims of discrimination. Id. The Court further observed that in Mach Mining, LLC v. EEOC, 135 S. Ct. 1645 (2015), the Supreme Court determined that a sworn affidavit from the EEOC stating that it has performed its obligations would show that the EEOC had met its conciliation requirement. Id. at *11. Here, the Court noted that the EEOC's amended determinations clearly put Defendants on notice that the EEOC had conducted an investigation of Defendants' attendance policy, and that it would pursue charges against Defendants for discrimination that has occurred in Defendants' stores throughout the United States. Id. at *14. The Court remarked that this was sufficient for the Court to make its determination. In addition to challenging the sufficiency of the EEOC's investigation, Defendants also asked the Court to limit the scope of the litigation because the EEOC had not provided an explanation as to what prompted it to rescind its original determination on the charges of the three employees. The Court, however, held that the EEOC was not required to explain why it issued the original determination, and then issued amended determinations. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion.

EEOC v. Celadon Trucking Services, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84639 (S.D. Ind. June 30, 2015). The EEOC brought an action on behalf job applicants for driver positions, alleging that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of discrimination by refusing them jobs in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Defendant, an interstate motor carrier company, is subject to various Department of Transportation ("DOT") regulations, including those prescribing health and safety standards for its drivers. Id. at *1-2. Among those requirements were that all drivers pass DOT-sanctioned medical examinations and otherwise possess certain minimum medical qualifications. Id. at *2. The EEOC brought suit on behalf of two groups of applicants, including: (i) 23 unsuccessful applicants, 22 of whom never received certifications that they had passed the required DOT physical and thus never received employment offers; and (ii) 6 individuals who were refused employment after health personnel did not certify them as having passed their DOT physical exams. Id. at *8. The EEOC claims that these six individuals were not only subject to Defendant's policy of pre-hire medical inquiries and examinations, but also were victims of intentional employment discrimination on the basis of real or perceived disabilities. Id. at *9. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment, which the Court granted in part. Id. at *97. The EEOC first alleged that as part of its standard hiring process for drivers, Defendant made medical inquiries of its applicants and required them to submit to physical examinations before they were extended offers of employment. Id. at *17-18. Defendant's written application form contained three health-related questions. The first question broadly asked applicants to disclose if they had ever been injured, hospitalized, had surgery, or been treated by a doctor on an outpatient basis. The Court remarked that leaving aside the questions of business-relatedness, the questions in the applications appeared to be the type of open-ended inquiries that Congress sought to restrict by enacting 42 U.S.C. § 1211(d)(2), which restricts prospective employers from using disclosed information to screen out applicants whose hiring would entail providing an accommodation. Id. at *18. Defendant contended that § 12112(d)(2)'s prohibitions shielded only qualified individuals, those who, with or without reasonable accommodation, could perform the essential functions of the job in question. Id. at *22. The Court noted that all circuits, including the Seventh Circuit, had implicitly rejected Defendant's interpretation and have held that § 1211(d)(2)-(4) does not require that an individual be disabled to state a claim. Id. at *28. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the EEOC need not establish that the job applicants who were subjected to pre-employment inquiries and examinations were otherwise qualified. Id. at *30. Defendant next argued that even if § 12112(d)(2) applied to all job applicants, the EEOC did not state a claim because it could not establish that any of the class members suffered an injury-in-fact. Id. at *31. The Court observed that although an individual must demonstrate a tangible injury resulting from the company's conduct to recover damages, the EEOC was situated differently than an individual Plaintiff. Id. at *31-32. The Court reasoned that EEOC v. Waffle House, Inc., 534 U.S. 279 (2002) held that EEOC's standing to bring a suit challenging a violation of the ADA is not derivative of a class members' personal claims; it stems directly from the statute, and the EEOC's own statutory enforcement authority. Id. at *32. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the EEOC suffers an injury sufficient to give rise to an Article III standing when a violation of § 102 ADA occurs. Id. at *33. Defendant also argued that its hiring questions fit within the safe harbor for job-related inquiries provided in § 12112(d)(2) because they were all directly related to the applicant's ability to secure DOT medical certifications as well as their ability to safely drive trucks. Id. at *36. The Court observed that the DOT's certifications were mandatory, but Defendant failed to show a nexus between the inquiries it actually made and the undeniably important regulations under which it was obliged to operate for the public good. Id. at *44. The Court found that Defendant established no genuine dispute of material fact regarding the job-relatedness of the questions. Id. Therefore, the Court granted EEOC's motion for summary judgment. Likewise, the Court granted in part the EEOC's motion for summary judgment on Defendant's failure to hire the six individuals. The Court found that the EEOC had established a prima facie case as to four applicants, but failed to do so for the remaining two. Id. at *97. Accordingly, the District Court granted in part the EEOC's motions for summary judgment. Id.

EEOC v. CVS Pharmacy, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 21963 (7th Cir. Dec. 17, 2015). The EEOC alleged that certain provisions of Defendant's standard severance agreement violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 because they interfere with an employee's right to file charges, communicate voluntarily with the EEOC and other state agencies, and participate in agency investigations. Id. at *5. The case arose out of a former CVS pharmacy manager who was discharged in July 2011. Id. at *3. The charging party filed a charge with the EEOC alleging that Defendant terminated her due to her sex and race. Id. On June 13, 2013, the EEOC dismissed the charge, but it then sent Defendant a letter saying that it had reasonable cause to believe that Defendant was engaged in a pattern or practice of resistance to the full employment of rights secured by Title VII by virtue of the severance agreements that charging party and others signed at their terminations. Id. at *5-6. Specifically, the EEOC claimed that the agreement deterred the filing of charges and interfered with the employee's ability to communicate voluntarily with the EEOC, and other federal and state agencies. Id. Subsequently, the EEOC filed suit, which Defendant moved to dismiss. The District Court dismissed the EEOC's case on purely procedural grounds, as it was undisputed that the EEOC did not engage in any effort to conciliate prior to bringing suit. Id. at *8. The EEOC argued that it was not required to engage in conciliation procedures because it was not bringing a garden-variety pattern or practice claim under § 707(e), but rather was alleging a pattern or practice of resistance to the full enjoyment of rights created by Title VII. Id. That "resistance" claim was brought under § 707(a), which does not mandate the same pre-suit procedures as are required under § 707(e). Id. On its appeal to the Seventh Circuit, the EEOC asserted that the District Court erred because: (i) § 707(a) authorizes the agency to bring actions challenging a "pattern or practice of resistance" to the full enjoyment of Title VII rights without following any of the pre-suit procedures contained in § 706, including conciliation; (ii) Defendant's use of a severance agreement that could chill terminated employees from filing charges or participating in EEOC proceedings constitutes a "pattern or practice of resistance" for purposes of § 707(a); and (iii) a reasonable jury could conclude that the agreement deterred signatories from filing charges with the EEOC because of its length, small font, and the fact that it is drafted in "legalese," thus making summary judgment for CVS improper. Id. at *9. The Seventh Circuit summarily rejected the EEOC's first argument, and therefore, did not address the additional grounds set forth by the EEOC in support of its appeal. With respect to the EEOC's contention that it was not required to engage in any pre-suit procedures, the Seventh Circuit rejected "the EEOC's … novel interpretation of its powers under § 707(a) that extends beyond the pursuit of unlawful unemployment practices involving discrimination and retaliation, and that frees the EEOC from engaging in informal methods of dispute resolution as a prerequisite to litigation," as it "cites to no case law….nor has any case been found that supports the distinction between the two sections as argued by the EEOC." Id. at *14. Moreover, because the Seventh Circuit found no difference between a suit challenging a "pattern or practice of resistance" under § 707(a) and a "pattern or practice of discrimination" under § 707(e), it reasoned that the EEOC must comply with all of the pre-suit procedures contained in § 706, including conciliation. Id. at *18. As the Seventh Circuit noted, "[i]f we were to adopt the EEOC's interpretation of § 707(a), the EEOC would never be required to engage in conciliation before filing a suit because it could always contend that it was acting pursuant to its broader power under § 707(a). In other words, the EEOC's position reads the conciliation requirement out of the statute." Id. at *19. The Seventh Circuit therefore affirmed the District Court's ruling dismissing the EEOC's claims.

EEOC v. Costco Wholesale Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 168187 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 15, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the rights of Dawn Suppo, an employee, under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, by subjecting her to a hostile work environment consisting of sexual comments, unwelcome touching, and advances and stalking by a customer at the store. Suppo repeatedly complained to her manager about the customer's stalking and unwanted contacts, and eventually obtained an order of protection against the customer, and when the situated persisted, Suppo complained to the police and subsequently requested an extended medical leave pursuant to her employment agreement. Id. at *16-17. Suppo took a medical leave of absence and when the leave expired, she requested an additional one to two years of leave. Defendant refused and later terminated Suppo. Id. at *21-22. The EEOC alleged that Defendant subjected Suppo to a hostile work environment and that it constructively discharged Plaintiff because she left her job due to Defendant's failure to remedy the harassment. Id. at *22. Defendant moved for summary judgment on both claims. The Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion. The Court entered judgment in Defendant's favor on the constructive discharge claim, finding no genuine issue of material fact regarding whether Suppo resigned. Id. at *28. The Court noted that, to prevail on a claim for constructive discharge, the EEOC must show that Suppo "was forced to resign because [her] working conditions, from the standpoint of the reasonable employee, had become unbearable." Id. at *35. The undisputed evidence here showed that Suppo never resigned; instead, she stopped reporting to work, took an extended medical leave, and Defendant ultimately terminated her after her medical leave ran out. Id. at *36. Because a constructive discharge claim arise only when an employee actually resigns, and fact that Suppo requested and obtained medical leave from Defendant showed a continuing employment relationship, and not resignation, the Court concluded that Defendant could not be liable for her constructive discharge. Id. at *38-39. The Court, however, denied Defendant's request for summary judgment on Suppo's hostile work environment claim, finding factual disputes surrounding what steps Defendant took to make the charging employee feel safe so that she could return to work. Id. at *33. Although Defendant tried to defuse the situated by banning the stalking customer from the store, the Court noted that it did not take this step until after the employee had been subjected to harassment by the customer for more than a year. Id. at *34. The Court thus could not conclude as a matter of law that Defendant took reasonable steps to end the alleged harassment. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

EEOC v. Dolgencorp, LLC*, Case No. 13-CV-4307 (N.D. Ill. April 20, 2015). The EEOC brought a Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 action alleging that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of conducting criminal background checks on potential employees that had a disparate impact on African-American job applicants. The parties disagreed about discovery; Defendant brought a motion for a protective order relative to aspects of the EEOC's discovery and the EEOC moved to compel. First, the Court denied Defendant's motion for a protective order in relation to the two store manager depositions. The Court, however, required the EEOC to provide a listing of topics that it intended to cover in the dispositions of the two store managers. Id. at 1. Next, the Court granted in part the EEOC's motion to compel answers to interrogatories and requests for production of documents. The Court directed Defendant to produce the most recent Desired Behavioral Assessment ("DBA") used to screen applicants and the scoring for the DBA. Id. at 2. The Court also ordered Defendant to produce documents reflecting any studies, testing, or analysis of whether Defendant's use of the DBA had resulted in reductions in employee theft and shrinkage since 2004. The Court further ordered Defendant to produce the most recent policy relating to drug testing, as well as policies relating to credit checks and reference checks. Id. In addition, the Court directed Defendant to identify all security measures used in its stores and to produce documents reflecting any studies, testing, or analysis of whether its use of security measures in retail stores had been effective in reducing workplace violence and employee theft since 2004. Id. at 3. Finally, to the extent that Defendant refused to respond to any interrogatory on the ground that the EEOC served too many interrogatories, the Court overruled the defense objection. The Court, however, determined that the EEOC could not serve additional interrogatories without leave of the Court.

EEOC v. Dolgencorp, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58994 (N.D. Ill. May 5, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant's use of criminal background checks for applicants and employees violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 as it had a disparate impact on African-American job applicants. Both parties moved to compel discovery. The EEOC sought production of Defendant's electronically-stored information ("ESI") regarding conditional hires. Specifically, the EEOC wanted ESI data with names, social security numbers, addresses, and telephone numbers. Id. at *2. The EEOC also requested that Defendant reproduce certain ESI that Defendant redacted due to a purported lack of relevance. Id. at *3. In granting the motion, the Court found that the requested data fields were unquestionably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence by permitting the EEOC and its experts to analyze the statistical impact of Defendant's use of criminal background checks. Id. at *4. The Court rejected Defendant's assertion that producing the requested information would infringe upon the privacy of its conditional hires, noting that there was a confidentiality order in place that expressly prohibited the use or disclosure of personal information except as necessary for purposes of the litigation. Id. at *5. Regarding the redacted data, Defendant argued that it should be permitted to maintain the redactions because the information was proprietary and not relevant to the litigation. The Court disagreed, noting that even irrelevant information might be relevant to understanding the context of a document. Id. at *6-7. Since Defendant failed to establish that the information was sufficiently sensitive to warrant such redactions, the Court ordered Defendant to reproduce the data in full, noting that the confidentiality order in place provided protections regarding the proprietary data. Id. at *7-8. Defendant also sought discovery from the EEOC relative to its internal policies and procedures regarding its own use of criminal background checks in making employment decisions, and any statistical analyses the EEOC had regarding the purported disparate impact of Defendant's background check policy. Id. at *8. The EEOC refused to turn over its internal policies and procedures, arguing that it was not relevant, and that the deliberative process privilege and work-product doctrine protected the statistical analyses from discovery. Id. at *10. While agreeing with Defendant that a government agency's employment policies could be discoverable in employment discrimination litigation, the Court denied Defendant's motion to compel production of the EEOC's background check policies and procedures, finding that such information would only be discoverable if Defendant could potentially use it to show that its use of criminal background checks was "job-related for the position in question." Id. at *13. The Court remarked that the policy was not relevant here because Defendant had not shown that "functions performed by its employees were in any way comparable to those undertaken by the EEOC's employees." Id. at *13-14. Regarding the statistical analyses, the EEOC argued that it prepared the analyses during the EEOC's investigation to determine whether to issue a reasonable cause determination of discrimination, and thus, the analyses were protected by the deliberative process privilege. Id. at *9-10. The EEOC also contended that the work-product doctrine protected its analyses because the EEOC's attorneys used the analyses in making the decision to sue Defendant and because one of the analyses was provided to an EEOC investigator by an EEOC attorney. Id. at *11. Because the Court could not determine the legitimacy of the EEOC's deliberative process and attorney work-product assertions without reviewing the documents in question, the Court ordered the EEOC to deliver copies of the withheld documents for in camera review. Id. at *11-12. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motion to compel in entirety, and granted Defendant's motion to compel in part. Id. at *22.

EEOC v. Dolgencorp, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80140 (N.D. Ill. June 19, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant used criminal background checks while considering potential employees, which resulted in a disparate impact on African-American job applicants in violation Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. As part of the extensive and contentious discovery process, the Court had resolved cross-motions to compel discoveries. Id. at *1-2. Defendant then filed a motion for reconsideration of the order requiring it to produce electronically-stored information containing personal identifying information ("PII") of Defendant's conditional hires. Defendant also sought reconsideration of the portion of the ruling in which the Court declined to require the EEOC to produce information relating to the agency's own use of background checks and criminal history records when making employment decisions. Id. at *3. Finally, Defendant sought reconsideration of the denial of its motion to compel the EEOC to produce information and documents regarding other employers whose criminal background checks and policies previously had been found to be reasonable. Id. The Court granted the motion to stay but denied the motion to reconsider. The Court noted that in its order for the production of PII of conditional hires, it considered the EEOC's arguments that it required the information to link separate databases maintained by Defendant and two of its vendors, and to analyze whether any statistical effect observed was due to race as opposed to other demographic factors. Id. at *4. Defendant argued that the Court rejected the affidavit of its consultant and economist stating that the relevant databases could be easily linked without the PII, by merely using the last four digits of candidates' social security numbers, and the city and state of candidates' residence. Id. Although the Court agreed with Owens, it believed that the additional information comprised by the PII was itself relevant. Id. at *5. Defendant further argued that the EEOC was not entitled to undertake an analysis of non-racial demographic factors and thus, the Court's reliance on the EEOC's need to do so was a manifest error that required reversal. Id. at *5-6. The Court remarked that when it noted that the full PII would allow the EEOC to determine whether non-racial demographic factors may have caused a statistical impact, it was not giving the EEOC leave to make new or different discrimination claims, rather it was merely indicating that the additional PII data fields could be used as controls in conducting an analysis of the disparate impact on African-Americans of Defendant's criminal background check policy. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for reconsideration. The Court also denied Defendant's request to compel the production of data relating EEOC's background checks and criminal history. Id. at *10-11. The Court reasoned that because the business necessity defense applied only where the challenged practice was job-related for the position in question, any practices utilized by the EEOC were irrelevant to Defendant's business necessity defense. Id. at *9. The Court also denied Defendant's motion for reconsideration of its order denying its request of seeking other employers' use of background checks and criminal history records. Id. at *11-12. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to stay and denied Defendant's motion for reconsideration. Id. at *12.

EEOC v. Dolgencorp, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 154842 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 17, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of conducting criminal background checks on potential employees that had a disparate impact on African-American job applicants in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Id. at *1. The Court referred the matter to the Magistrate Judge for supervision of discovery. Id. Defendant subsequently filed two Rule 72 objections to the Magistrate Judge's discovery rulings, and the Court overruled the objections. Id. First, Defendant objected to portions of the Magistrate Judge's April 20, 2015 order granting the EEOC's motion to compel. Id. at *2. At issue was Defendant's use of its desired behavior assessment ("DBA"), credit checks, reference checks, and drug testing. Defendant challenged the Magistrate Judge's ruling and argued that the materials were irrelevant. The Court held that all of the tests that the EEOC sought were relevant to the EEOC's rebuttal of Defendant's business necessity defense. Id. at *7. The Court determined that if the EEOC met its burden of showing that the challenged criminal background checks caused a disparate impact on the basis of race, Defendant would have the opportunity to prove that the criminal background checks were job-related and consistent with the business necessity. Id. Furthermore, the Court noted that if Defendant was able to establish its business necessity defense, the EEOC would have the opportunity to rebut that defense by demonstrating that an alternative employment practice exists and that Defendant refused to adopt it. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court overruled Defendant's objections. Defendant also objected to Magistrate Judge's order on the ground that the EEOC exceeded the 25-interrogatory limit imposed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The EEOC asserted that it needed more than 25 interrogatories because the case was nationwide in scope, raised complicated data issues, and involved many different legal and factual areas. Id. at *12. On this basis, the Court held that Magistrate Judge did not err in allowing over 25 interrogatories. Defendant also objected to Magistrate Judge's May 26, 2015 order, finding that certain materials that Defendant sought in discovery from the EEOC were protected by the deliberative process privilege. The Court noted that the deliberative process privilege protects communications that are part of a governmental agency's decision-making process. Id. at *13. Here, the EEOC asserted this privilege in response to certain interrogatories and requests for production of documents, to which the Court ordered the EEOC to deliver copies of the withheld documents for an in camera review with the Magistrate Judge. Id. The Magistrate Judge reviewed the documents and found that the EEOC had properly asserted the privilege. The Court reviewed those documents once again and found that the Magistrate Judge did not commit any error, and overruled Defendant's objection. Id. at *14.

EEOC v. Flambeau, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173482 (W.D. Wis. Dec. 31, 2015). The EEOC filed an action against Defendant, a manufacturer of plastic products, alleging that it violated the ADA by requiring its employees to complete health risk assessment and biometric screening tests before they could enroll in Defendant's health insurance benefit plan. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment. The Court denied the EEOC's motion, granted Defendant's motion, and entered judgment in Defendant's favor. Id. at *2. The EEOC contended that Defendant violated 42 U.S.C. § 12112(d)(4)(A), which generally prohibits employers from requiring their employees to submit to medical examinations, by conditioning participation in its employee health insurance plan on completing a "health risk assessment" and a "biometric screening test." Id. at *1. Defendant argued that its practice of conditioning enrollment in its benefit plan on completion of the wellness program was protected by the ADA's "safe harbor" for insurance benefit plans set forth in 42 U.S.C. § 12201(c)(2). Id. at *7. The Court noted that when an employer sponsors a wellness program that is not part of the employer's benefit plan, it cannot avail itself of the § 12112(c)(2) safe harbor, but it may still rely on the employee health program exception in § 12112(d)(4)(B) if it satisfies that provision's requirements. Id. at *10. The EEOC contended that the Court was compelled by traditional principles of statutory interpretation to construe § 12201(c)(2) narrowly because it is an "exception" or "proviso," and that by contrast, the ADA is a remedial statute and must be construed with all the liberality necessary to achieve such purposes. Id. at *11. In rejecting this argument, the Court noted that the fact that wellness programs may fall within the scope of the exception set forth in § 12112(d)(4)(B) does not mean that they cannot also be protected by § 12201(c)(2)'s safe harbor. Id. at *12. Finally, the Court found that there was no evidence that Defendant used the information gathered from the tests and assessments to make disability-related distinctions with respect to employees' benefits. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Court denied the EEOC's motion for summary judgment, granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, and entered judgment in Defendant's favor. Id.

EEOC v. GGNSC Holdings, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96806 (E.D. Wis. July 24 2015). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of Juanette Barbee, a former employee, alleging that Defendants discriminated against her in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). The EEOC sought to file a second amended complaint adding GGNSC Administrative Services as a Defendant, and the Court granted the motion. Id. at *2. Defendant asserted that because Barbee did not name GNSC Administrative Services in her charge of discrimination, it could not be a Defendant in this action. Id. The Court observed that while a party not named in an EEOC charge ordinarily cannot be sued by the EEOC under the ADA, the rule has two exceptions. Id. First, the "actual notice exception" applies when the unnamed party has been provided with adequate notice of the proceedings aimed at voluntary compliance. Id. at *2-3. Second, the "identity-of-interest exception" applies if the named party sufficiently represented the unnamed party's interests when negotiating possible conciliation. Id. at *3. The Court remarked that it could not determine at that time which exception applied, as it needed more information to clarify the relationship between GGNSC Administrative Services and the two Defendants. Id. Absent that information, the Court remarked that that it could not conclude that the amendment sought by the EEOC would be futile. Id. Because the EEOC's amendment would not cause undue delay or undue prejudice to either Defendant, the Court granted the EEOC's motion for leave to file a second amended complaint. Id.

EEOC v. Hufcor, Inc., d/b/a Total Quality Plastics,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7536 (E.D. Wis. Jan. 21, 2015). The EEOC brought an action against Defendant alleging sex discrimination and retaliation in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII"). Katy Degenhardt, a former employee of Defendant, moved to intervene as a Plaintiff. The Court granted the motion. Id. at *2. The Court noted that under Rule 24(a)(1), an interested party is given an unconditional right to intervene by federal statute as long as their motion to intervene is timely filed. Id. at *1. The Court found that Degenhardt had filed her complaint in a timely manner. Thus, the Court concluded that Degenhardt had an unconditional right to intervene. Id. at *2. The Court further reasoned that even if Degenhardt did not have the right to intervene, it had the discretion to allow her to intervene under Rule 24(b)(2) if there was a common question of law or fact and independent jurisdiction. Id. The Court concluded that Degenhardt met those two elements because her claims arose under Title VII and were identical to the EEOC's claims. Id. For these reasons, the Court ruled that permissive intervention was appropriate, and accordingly granted Degenhardt's motion to intervene. Id.

EEOC v. Northern Star Hospitality, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 1465 (7th Cir. Jan. 29, 2015). Dion Miller, an African-American, was a cook for Northern Star Hospitality, Inc. d/b/a Sparx Restaurant ("Sparx" or "Hospitality"), and alleged that he was subjected to discrimination in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, when his co-workers put a display featuring a noose and a picture in the kitchen cooler. Miller had another co-worker take a photograph of the display in the cooler and lodged a complaint with the restaurant's general manager. The general manager learned that two of Miller's superiors – the kitchen manager and kitchen supervisor – admitted that they were responsible for the display. As a result of the complaint, the kitchen supervisor was given a warning, with the kitchen manager receiving no discipline at all. After Miller's complaint, the kitchen manager and supervisor began to criticize Miller's performance. Miller was then terminated less than one month after the display was put up. On March 27, 2012, the EEOC filed suit against Defendant on Miller's behalf, claiming that he was the victim of racial harassment and that he was wrongfully terminated for opposing that harassment. On September 7, 2012, the EEOC amended its complaint to add Northern Star Properties, LLC ("Properties") and North Broadway Holdings, Inc. ("Holdings") and claimed that they also were liable for this conduct. By this time, Sparx had closed and Hospitality had dissolved. Sparx was replaced by a Denny's Restaurant franchise owned by Holdings, while Properties owned the building where Sparx and the Denny's Restaurant were located. Hospitality, Properties, and Holdings were all owned by the same individual. After trial, the jury awarded the EEOC $15,000 in compensatory damages for Miller's wrongful termination while denying him punitive damages. The EEOC petitioned the District Court to award Miller front pay and back pay, as well as a tax award to off-set income tax liability on the back pay award. The District Court granted the EEOC's request for back pay and awarded Miller an additional $43,300.50, plus $6,495 to off-set his resulting tax liability. Because Hospitality no longer existed and thus could not pay these damages, the EEOC sought to have Properties and Holdings pay these damages either on a successor liability theory or by piercing of Hospitality's corporate veil. The District Court granted the EEOC's request under both theories. Defendants appealed. The Seventh Circuit began its analysis by noting that "successor liability is 'the default rule . . . to enforce federal labor or employment laws.'" Id. This is because "[w]ithout [successor liability], 'the victim of the illegal employment practice is helpless to protect his rights against an employer's change in the business.'" Id. The Seventh Circuit laid out "a five-factor test for successor liability in the federal employment-law context, including: (i) whether the successor had notice of the pending lawsuit; (ii) whether the predecessor could have provided the relief sought before the sale or dissolution; (iii) whether the predecessor could have provided relief after the sale or dissolution; (iv) whether the successor can provide the relief sought; and (v) whether there is continuity between the operations and workforce of the predecessor and successor." Id. The Seventh Circuit found that the first factor was satisfied, reasoning that Holdings had notice of the lawsuit because both Holdings and Hospitality were owned by the same individual. Id. With respect to the second factor, the Seventh Circuit determined that, because Hospitality paid a number of its bills before its dissolution, as well as several bills that would benefit Holdings, it could have paid the judgment prior to its dissolution. Id. at *4. It held that, since Hospitality no longer existed, Hospitality could no longer pay the judgment, thus satisfying the third factor. Id. It determined that the fourth factor was satisfied since Holdings was a going concern and thus could pay the judgment entered in favor of Miller. Id. With respect to the fifth factor, the Seventh Circuit ruled that there was a continuity between the operations and workforce of Hospitality and Holdings because "[Holdings] moved into a building prepared for it by Hospitality to the specifications of the Denny's Corporation, hired more than half of the employees previously employed by Hospitality, hired Hospitality's management team, the members of which had been trained by Denny's at Hospitality's expense, and used the same work rules for the employees that Hospitality had used at Sparx. In other words, Holdings carried on the restaurant business at 1827 North Broadway, albeit with a different name and theme." Id. Having concluded that all the factors were satisfied, the Seventh Circuit held that Holdings was liable as a successor to Hospitality. Id. It held this even though Holdings did not exist at the time of the alleged wrongful conduct. Id. Having decided that Holdings was liable as a successor to Hospitality, the Seventh Circuit declined to review whether the District Court was correct when it decided to pierce the corporate veil of Hospitality to reach Properties and Holdings. Id. at *5. It further declined to consider whether Properties was also a successor entity of Hospitality. Id. at *4.

EEOC v. Northern Star Hospitality,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74875 (W.D. Wis. June 9, 2015). In this action brought by the EEOC on behalf of Defendant's employee, Dion Miller, the jury found that North Broadway Holdings, Inc. had violated Miller's rights under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and awarded damages. The EEOC then moved to compel North Broadway to produce all relevant documents, provide complete answers to the EEOC's interrogatories, and to pay reasonable attorney fees. The EEOC also contended that North Broadway failed to comply with the Court's order to file an annual statement of compliance until the EEOC moved for contempt, and had failed to pay judgment and costs to the EEOC and to Miller. Id. at *1. The EEOC pointed out that North Broadway did not respond to the EEOC's interrogatory, which sought a list and detailed description of all real or personal property owned by North Broadway in the past four years, including the purchase price, current value, amount of any loan balance against the property and the location of the property. Id. at *1-2. Moreover, North Broadway had not produced a list of inventory or copies of its insurance policies. The Court found that North Broadway's failure to turn over that information, coupled with its refusal to cooperate earlier on the alleged ground that all of its documents were in the possession of its tax preparer, appeared to warrant an award of attorneys' fees and costs to the EEOC. Id. at *2. The EEOC also sought a writ of continuing garnishment to Peoples State Bank that maintained a checking account for North Broadway. While North Broadway opposed issuance of the writ and asserted a right to be heard before it was issued, the Court remarked that the garnishment proceedings would provide North Broadway an opportunity to be heard after the garnishee North Broadway had filed its answer with the Court and served a copy on the EEOC. Id. at *2-3. Thus, the Court granted the EEOC's application for a writ of continuing garnishment, and denied North Broadway's motion for a pre-garnishment hearing. Id. at *3. In addition, the Court set a hearing to consider the EEOC's motion for an award of reasonable expenses, including attorneys' fees, for North Broadway's failure to comply promptly with the EEOC's motion to compel responses to post-judgment discovery from North Broadway, and any objections the EEOC or North Broadway had to the garnishment.

EEOC v. Northern Star Hospitality,* Case No. 12-CV-214 (W.D. Wis. July 28, 2015). The EEOC brought suit claiming that Defendant fired an employee in retaliation for complaining about a racist posting in his workplace in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. A jury rendered a verdict in favor of the EEOC. Defendant failed to pay the judgment, and the EEOC began efforts to collect the amount owed of over $82,000. The EEOC sought information about Defendant's financial status and assets and ultimately obtained a court order that required Defendant to provide the information. Defendant failed to comply as ordered, and the EEOC moved for an order of civil contempt. The Court held Defendant in contempt and imposed a fine of $1,000 for every day until Defendant complied with the Court's order by providing complete information to the EEOC. Id. at 2. The Court also ordered Defendant and its counsel to pay the EEOC's attorneys' fees for bringing the contempt motion.

EEOC v. Northern Star Hospitality,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 112896 (W.D. Wis. Aug. 26, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants discriminated against a former employee on the basis of his race. Previously, the EEOC sought for an order of civil contempt, contending that Defendant had failed to provide discovery in compliance with the Court's order, which was vacated on August 7, 2015. Id. at *1. Subsequently, another hearing was held on the EEOC's motion to compel and the Court's order of civil contempt. Defendants argued that they had complied with the Court's order to provide the information sought by the EEOC in its attempt to collect the judgment entered against Defendants. The amount of judgment entered was $64,795.50 and was affirmed on appeal. The Court found that Defendants failed to submit the necessary financial information on the basis that the information was in the hands of their tax preparers, without even making any apparent attempt to obtain copies of the information from the tax preparers. Id. at *2. In addition, the Court determined that they had changed bank accounts after the Court granted Plaintiff's motion to garnish Peoples State Bank, where Defendant's had an account. Furthermore, Defendants were asked for a detailed description about real or personal property they owned in the preceding four years whose value exceeded $500, together with the loan balance against the property, if any, and the location, including the county, and if the property was transferred, the name, address and telephone number of the person or entity; however, Defendants failed to comply with this request. Id. Thus, the Court directed the EEOC's counsel to confer with Defendants' counsel and develop an agreed upon resolution of Defendants' obligation. Accordingly, the Court ordered both parties to submit written statements to the Court on the status of their commitments.

EEOC v. Northern Star Hospitality,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 153655 (W.D. Wis. Nov. 13, 2015). The EEOC brought suit claiming that Defendants fired an employee, Dion Miller, in retaliation for complaining about a racist posting in his workplace in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Id. at *1. The jury awarded Miller almost $65,000 in damages, which the Seventh Circuit affirmed. Id. at *3-4. Defendants failed to pay the judgment. Id. at *5. The EEOC filed a motion to garnish a bank account at Peoples State Bank, which had a balance of $3,431.72. Id. The EEOC then filed a second writ of garnishment, directed this time to Central Bank, and after receiving the writ, Central Bank indicated that Defendants' account had a balance of $26.03. Id. at *6. The EEOC next sought a writ of garnishment for a third bank, Dairy State Bank, reportedly having a balance of $14,908.18. Id. Defendants, however, filed an affidavit stating that the account represented funds belonging to Rice Lake Harley-Davidson, Inc., a corporation owned by Christopher Brekken, the sole shareholder of each of Defendant's corporations. Id. at *7. Defendants maintained that the account was beyond the EEOC's reach because the bank had entered into an agreement with Rice Lank under Wisconsin law. Id. Finding this argument unpersuasive, the Court granted the writ of garnishment directed at Dairy State Bank. Id. At the same time, the Court granted Defendants' request to respond to the EEOC's allegations, and to present evidence of their inability to pay the judgment in full and show that they never had the cash or assets from which they could have satisfied the judgment. Id. After hearing the parties, the Court granted the EEOC's motion for entry of an order granting final disposition of writs of garnishment directed at Central Bank and Dairy State Bank. The Court remarked that under the Federal Priority Statute 31 U.S.C. § 3713(a)(i), the EEOC, being an agency of the United States, stood first in line for the money in the Dairy State Bank account. Id. at *9. The Court explained that under this statute, the federal government is to be paid first when a person indebted to the government is insolvent, and without enough property to pay all debts makes a voluntary assignment of property. Id. Defendants consistently maintained that they were without property to satisfy the judgment, despite making repeated voluntary assignments of property in violation of the statute. Id. Defendants advised the EEOC on September 23, 2015, under oath, that they had no bank accounts of any kind, yet on October 14, 2015, their account showed a balance of $14,908.18. Id. at *9-10. The Court found that even if it was not clear whether the source of the funds in the Dairy State Bank was an infusion of cash deposited by Rice Lake Harley-Davidson for Defendants' use, the EEOC was entitled to the funds because they were deposited in a bank account in Defendants' name at a time when Defendants were insolvent and owed money to EEOC. Id. at *10-11. Accordingly, the Court granted EEOC's motion for final disposition of writs of garnishment directed to garnishee Defendants' account at Central Bank and Dairy State Bank.

EEOC v. Northern Star Hospitality,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 169261 (W.D. Wis. Dec. 17, 2015). In this action filed by the EEOC alleging discrimination and retaliation claims, the EEOC moved to hold Christopher Brekken, the sole stockholder of all of Defendant's corporations, liable for the unpaid portion of the judgment entered in the EEOC's favor. The Court granted the motion. The EEOC contended that although Brekken was not a named Defendant, he could be held responsible under the Federal Priority Statute for satisfying the judgment, if he paid part of the corporations' debts before paying the government's claim. Id. at *1-2. Brekken argued that he moved funds to various accounts rather than paying the judgment because he believed that it was reasonable for Defendants to devote their income and assets to keeping the business afloat financially and thus maximize the amount of money that would be available to pay the judgment. Id. at *3. The Court, however, found that he never explained this to the EEOC nor obtained its permission to delay the payments, nor took steps to work out a payment schedule. Id. Brekken argued that he did not violate the Federal Priority Statute when he paid off AnchorBank, the mortgagee of Defendant Northern Star Properties, because that mortgage had been perfected before the EEOC filed its abstract of judgment and thus the payments were not a voluntary assignment of property. Id. at *4. The Court found that this was an improper transfer because North Broadway Holdings – and not Northern Star Properties – was not the owner of the personal property of the business. Therefore, the Court found that because AnchorBank's mortgage did not extend to Holdings, the bank had no claim under that mortgage to property belonging to Holdings. Id. at *5. The Court ruled that even if Properties had been the mortgagor of the personal property, it could not have turned the sale proceeds from the sale of the personal property over to AnchorBank without violating the EEOC's prior right to the funds. Id. The Court noted that the Federal Priority Statute recognized the priority of obligations that were based on a choate lien. Further, liens on personal property are not choate liens, because the loan agreement does not refer specifically to the items of personal property that are covered by the loan. Id. Here, Defendants had not shown that AnchorBank's lien was one in which the identity of the personal property subject to the lien had been established. Id. at *6. Further, the Court found that under § 3713(b), the representative of a person or an estate paying any part of a debt of the person or the estate before paying a claim of the government is liable to the extent of the payment for unpaid claims of the government. Id. Brekken had made no showing that he did not know that Defendants owed a debt to the EEOC or that Defendants were insolvent when they paid other debts ahead of the debt to the EEOC, and therefore the Court found that he was in violation of § 3713. Id. at *7. The EEOC also contended that Brekken and Defendants should be held liable for the amount of the EEOC's judgment because they were in contempt of the Court. The Court found that Defendants evaded the Court's orders and the EEOC's efforts to collect on its judgment. Further, Defendants failed to send to the EEOC the annual statement of compliance until the EEOC obtained an order of contempt, and they eluded the EEOC's discovery requests and failed to answer interrogatories in a timely manner. Id. at *8-9. Additionally, the Court held that Defendants resisted a writ of garnishment directed to two banks by maintaining insufficient balances. Id. at *9. Thus, the Court concluded that these acts demonstrated contempt, and it awarded the EEOC the amount remaining uncollected on the judgment, along with the interest, costs, and penalties. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motion to hold Brekken liable for the unpaid portion of the judgment entered against Defendants.

EEOC v. Office Concepts, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170587 (N.D. Ind. Dec. 22, 2015). The EEOC brought a charge on behalf of Lynsey Burd alleging that Defendant discriminated against and wrongfully terminated Burd due to her gender and pregnancy. The EEOC's notice of the charge included instructions to Defendant to preserve payroll and personnel records related to the charge. Id. at *5. Defendant deleted Burd's computer profile and e-mail weeks later, and eventually replaced all of the computers in her immediate area. Id. at *5-7. The EEOC moved the Court to sanction Defendant for spoliation of evidence, while Defendant filed a motion to strike attorney-client privileged documents and communications referenced by the EEOC in its motion for sanctions. Id. at *1. The Court denied the motion to strike and denied the motion for sanctions. Id. at *27. First, in addressing the motion to strike, the Court noted that it initially would determine whether it may consider the evidence Defendant sought to strike when ruling on the motion for sanctions. Id. at *7. After Burd's co-worker discovered inappropriate e-mails on her computer while Burd was on leave due to a pregnancy-related illness, Defendant's counsel sent Defendant's president an e-mail that contained a draft separation agreement. Defendant argued that this e-mail, in addition to any and all communications with counsel that were produced, were attorney-client privileged. Id. at *12. The Court rejected this argument, noting that Defendant could not assert privilege over any and all communications between Defendant and its counsel, but rather had to produce a privilege log identifying which of its documents were privileged. Id. The Court further held that the seven-week delay in issuing the privilege log (after having been informed by the EEOC that potentially privileged documents had been produced) was unreasonable. Id. at *17-18. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to strike. Id. at *18-19. The Court then used a two-part inquiry to analyze the EEOC's motion for sanctions regarding spoliation, including: (i) whether Defendant had a duty to preserve the evidence; and (ii) whether the evidence was destroyed in bad faith. Id. at *20. Regarding the first prong, the Court found that Defendant was on notice of Burd's claim and therefore had a duty to preserve the evidence on the computer. Id. at *23. Noting that Defendant deleted Burd's account as part of standard procedure following her termination, and further replaced all of the computers in the area due to them being outdated, the Court held that Defendant's conduct did not rise to the level of bad faith. Id. at *25-26. Therefore, since the second prong regarding bad faith was not met, the Court denied the EEOC's motion for sanctions due to spoliation. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to strike and denied the EEOC's motion for sanctions. Id.

EEOC v. Office Concepts, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53174 (N.D. Ind. April 23, 2015). The EEOC brought an action under the Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 alleging that Defendant discriminated against Lynsey Burd, its employee, by terminating her due to her pregnancy. The parties moved for approval of two different proposed Stipulated Protective Orders ("SPO"), which the Court denied without prejudice. Id. at *1. The first proposed SPO stemmed from the parties' dispute concerning the confidentiality provision of a settlement agreement between Defendant and Terry Forsyth, a non-party former employee of Defendant who was identified in both parties' initial disclosures as a person likely to had discoverable information about the claims and defenses in the action. Id. The parties stated that Forsyth believed the settlement agreement prohibited her from discussing certain information with the EEOC and could subject her to economic and non-economic penalties for violating the agreement. Id. at *1-2. Therefore, the parties submitted a proposed SPO stating that Defendant agreed that it would not exercise its rights under the settlement agreement because of Forsyth's communication with the EEOC, and that violation of the order could be remedied by the Court's contempt authority. Id. at *2. The Court, however, found that the entry of a SPO between the parties, which actually pertained to a non-party, was not justified at that stage. Id. Moreover, the Court found that Defendant could instead provide Forsyth with a limited waiver of the confidentiality provision without need for the Court's involvement. Id. The second proposed SPO sought to protect Defendant's trade secrets and corporate financial information. Id. at *3. The Court, however, was reluctant to approve the proposed order as it contained a provision that the order "shall continue to be binding for a period of 20 years after the conclusion of this proceeding". Id. The Court thus declined to enter a protective order that expressly suggested that the Court would retain jurisdiction of any kind after the resolution of the case. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied without prejudice the two motions for entry of a proposed SPO. Id. at *4.

EEOC v. Orion Energy Systems, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 86428 (E.D. Wis. July 2, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant discriminated against its employee, Scott Conant, on the basis of a disability, retaliated against him, and terminated him for requesting an accommodation in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Id. at *1. Conant had severe mobility issues after he suffered an injury while exercising in the company's fitness room, and was informed by his doctor that he had a lesion in the spinal cord, and that the lesions causing the partial paralysis would remain and Conant should not expect any major improvement of mobility. Id. at *3. Shortly thereafter, Conant began using the wheelchair at work, and his manager relocated his work space from the IT bullpen where workers had to walk up the stairs to the Tech Center, which had two elevators. Id. at *3-4. Subsequently, Conant requested additional accommodations, including: (i) that he work part-time from home; and (ii) power assisted doors to be installed in the building and bathroom. Id. at *4. Conant provided no specific medical diagnosis or prognosis because he had not yet been given any himself. Id. Defendant offered Conant work from home and flexible working hours to enable him to attend to his doctor's appointments, but denied his request to install power assisted doors in the building. Id. at *4-5. The EEOC contended that Defendant later asked him to attend to his team meetings in the IT bullpen, to which Conant agreed provided the accessibility issues were resolved. Id. at *7. The EEOC asserted that Conant was fired the next day and was informed that his position was being outsourced. Id. Defendant filed a partial motion for summary judgment on the failure-to-accommodate claims, which the Court denied. Id. at *11. At the outset, the Court noted that a failure-to-accommodate claim under the ADA requires a prima facie showing that: (i) the individual is qualified and has a disability; (ii) the employer was aware of the disability; and (iii) the employer failed to reasonably accommodate the disability. Id. at *8. Defendant conceded that Conant was qualified and that he was in a wheelchair, but argued that it did not know whether his condition was permanent or only temporary due an injury he suffered while exercising. Id. The Court reasoned that under the 2008 ADA Amendments Act, a person with an impairment that substantially limits a major life activity, or a record of one, is disabled, even if the impairment is transitory and minor. Id. Therefore, the Court concluded that it was immaterial if Defendant did not know that Conant's limitation was permanent, or that it was unaware of the precise nature of his disability. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court held that the second element was satisfied. Id. at *9-10. As to the third element, Defendant argued that at the time it fired Conant, it was still not clear whether his condition was permanent, and that it was waiting for a definitive diagnosis so as to determine if it was economically reasonable to incur the expense of installing door assists to help Conant. Id. at *10. The Court remarked that because permanent impairment was not a criterion for providing a reasonable accommodation, it would leave the issue to be determined by the jury regarding Defendant's delay in accommodating Conant. Id. at *10-11. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for partial summary judgment. Id. at *11.

EEOC v. Orion Energy Systems, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 153216 (E.D. Wis. Nov. 12, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant administered involuntary medical examinations and disability-related inquiries as part of its wellness program in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act. The EEOC instituted this action after Defendant's former employee, Wendy Schobert, filed a charge alleging that Defendant terminated her employment because she refused to participate in a wellness program. Id. at *2. Defendant asserted numerous affirmative defenses, but failed to assert a statute of limitations defense based on the fact that Schobert did not file her administrative complaint within 300 days from her termination date. Defendant moved to amend its answer and affirmative defenses to add a statute of limitations defense, which the Court denied. Id. at *2. At the outset, the Court noted that a party seeking to amend the pleadings after the deadline has passed must show good cause as required under Rule 16(b)(4). Id. at *3. Here, Defendant argued that it exercised diligence in seeking this amendment because it only learned the basis for its statute of limitations defense after Schobert's recent deposition. In response, the EEOC argued that Defendant had notice of this issue as early as February 2011, when the EEOC began investigating Schobert's initial complaint. Id. at *3. The Court observed that pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 12117(a), the statute of limitations ends 300 days after the alleged unlawful employment practice. Id. at *5. The Court also noted that there was a two prong test to fix a date of termination: (i) the ultimate decision to terminate the employee; and (ii) the employer's notice of its final termination decision. Id. at *6. The Court reasoned that Defendant's decision to terminate Schobert had become final by the time she overheard a conversation about her termination. Id. at *7. The Court remarked that an employer must give the employee unequivocal notice of its final decision; therefore, in this case, where the facts showed that Schobert simply overheard a conversation that an unnamed employee would be fired, Defendant had not meet that standard. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court denied the motion to amend on the basis that Defendant did not diligently pursue its statute of limitations defense.

EEOC v. Rosebud Restaurants, Inc.*, 85 F. Supp. 3d 1002 (N.D. Ill. 2015). The EEOC brought a Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII") action alleging that Defendants had a practice of refusing to hire African-Americans on the basis of their race. Id. at 1004. The EEOC alleged that the individual who owned or controlled Defendants' restaurant had expressed a preference not to hire black applicants, and as a result, few African-Americans were employed at Defendants' restaurants. Id. Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim, which the Court denied. Id. at 1006. Specifically, Defendants contended that EEOC's complaint failed to identify a specific individual aggrieved by the alleged discrimination as required under § 706 of the Title VII. Id. at 1004. Defendants argued that in contrast to § 707 of Title VII, which allows for the filing of a civil action against an employer engaged in a "pattern or practice of resistance," § 706 does not contain the "pattern or practice" phrase. Id. at 1005. Thus, Defendants argued that § 706 only authorized the EEOC to bring actions to assert the rights of aggrieved individuals and at least one injured individual must be named in the complaint. Id. The Court found that the language of Title VII did not support that argument because § 706's authorization of EEOC actions contained no provision limiting such actions to matters brought on behalf of individuals; instead, § 706 authorizes the EEOC to prevent any person from engaging in any unlawful employment practice prohibited by Title VII. Id. The Court noted that the failure to hire an individual because of his race was a practice made unlawful by § 703(a)(1), and when performed on a regular, purposeful, and widespread basis, remained a sub-set of the types of discrimination prohibited by Title VII. Id. Thus, the Court concluded that because widespread discriminatory actions were within the category of discrimination prohibited by Title VII, they were also within the authority granted to the EEOC by § 706. Id. The Court reiterated the Supreme Court as well as the Seventh Circuit precedents that the EEOC may bring an action under § 706 in its own name to vindicate the public interest in preventing employment discrimination. Id. Defendants relied on EEOC v. Bass Pro Outdoor World, Inc., 884 F. Supp. 2d 499 (S.D. Tex. 2012), to contend that the EEOC must name an aggrieved individual to pursue a § 706 action. Id. The Court pointed out, however, that Bass Pro did not find the EEOC's complaint insufficient solely based on failure to name aggrieved individuals; instead, it found the small number of racial incidents alleged to be too few and too isolated to raise a plausible inference of a nationwide pattern or practice under § 707. Id. at 1005-06. Here, the Court found the allegations of the complaint readily distinguishable because, while the EEOC alleged that a single person who either owned or controlled each of the Defendants possessed the intent to discriminate and made that intention known, the holding in Bass Pro construed the EEOC's § 706 claims as retaliation claims and it was in that context that the Court faulted the EEOC for failure to name any aggrieved individual. Id. at 1006. Accordingly, the Court concluded that, because Bass Pro assessed retaliation claims, which triggered different pleading standards than those raised by the discrimination complaint in this action, its ruling offered no basis for a similar disposition of the EEOC's claims in this case. Id. On this basis, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss. Id.

EEOC v. Rosebud Restaurants, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 138342 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 7, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants refused to hire African-American applicants in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The EEOC moved to strike Defendants' first affirmative defense that the EEOC failed to comply with its administrative obligation to engage in good faith efforts to conciliate before filing suit. Id. at *2. The EEOC contended that it attempted to eliminate the alleged unlawful employment practices through conciliation before the filling the lawsuit. In their answer, Defendants argued that the EEOC unilaterally determined that conciliation had failed without responding to Defendants' settlement overtures, and the EEOC had a duty to conciliate as a condition precedent to filing suit and that the duty had not been satisfied. Id. at *2-3. The EEOC asserted that those denials must be stricken because they did not comply with Rule 9(c). The Court, however, found that Defendants' denials were pled in compliance with Rule 9(c) and therefore denied the EEOC's motion to strike Paragraphs 21 and 22 of the answer. Id. at *3-4. Regarding the EEOC's motion to strike Defendants' first affirmative defense, the Court found that Defendants failed to show that the EEOC lacked good faith in its conciliation efforts and that they merely denied the complaint's allegations that all conditions precedent to the filing of this action had been fulfilled. Id. at *4. Thus, the Court granted the EEOC's motion to strike Defendants' first affirmative defense. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC'S motions in part and denied in part.

EEOC v. Source One Staffing, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 152853 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 9, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant subjected employees to discrimination on the basis of their gender. The parties eventually settled, and the Court entered a consent decree resolving the Parties' dispute and memorializing the terms of the settlement. Id. at *1. Defendant moved to clarify the consent decree, and the EEOC filed a motion to show cause why Defendant should not be held in contempt for violating the terms of the consent decree. The Court granted Defendant's motion, and denied the EEOC's motion to show cause. The EEOC interpreted the consent decree to require Defendant to collect, maintain, and make available to the EEOC a list of its employees with information about their gender identification. Defendant interpreted the consent decree to require day and temporary labor service agencies, like Defendant, to track only gender-related data that employees volunteered to their employees. Id. at *3. Since the inception of the consent decree, Defendant's employees had not self-reported information about their gender and Defendant had not asked them for that information. Accordingly, Defendant did not maintain such data and it had not given the EEOC any data on the gender of its employees pursuant to the consent decree. Id. The Court remarked that the consent decree was the product of careful negotiation, and the purpose of the consent decree was to ensure that Defendant did not use gender as a basis for assigning its employees work. Id. at *6. The EEOC negotiated for the appointment of a monitor for mechanisms to ensure that the monitor could determine whether Defendant was in compliance with the consent decree. The Court observed that the consent decree required Defendant to maintain and provide the EEOC a list of its employees with gender identification information. Id. at *7. The Court reasoned that the consent decree did not give Defendant the option of obtaining or maintaining that information, it simply said that the Defendant should collect and maintain data of temporary laborers who self-identified their gender. Id. at *8. The Court remarked that this did not necessitate initiating contempt proceedings against Defendant, particularly when the consent decree provided for dispute resolution if the parties failed to comply with the decree. Id.

EEOC v. Trinity Health Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 60994 (N.D. Ind. May 11, 2015). Pursuant to a charge filed by Simore Hasan alleging that Defendant, a non-profit Catholic healthcare system, violated the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") by suspending and later terminating her based on a disability-related absence, the EEOC issued an administrative subpoena to Defendant demanding information about all its employees who had been adversely affected by its no-fault attendance policy. Id. at *1-2. Defendant objected, arguing that the information sought was irrelevant to Hasan's claims and that production would be unduly burdensome. Id. at *3. The EEOC subsequently brought an administrative enforcement action relative to its subpoena. The Magistrate Judge ordered Defendant to comply with the subpoena. Id. at *3-4. Defendant thereafter filed Rule 72 objections to that ruling. The Court adopted the Magistrate Judge's order enforcing the EEOC's administrative subpoena. Id. at *13. The Court agreed with the EEOC's assertion that Defendant's own assessment of the facts relating to Hasan's claim should not be considered in determining what was relevant to the EEOC's investigation. Id. at *8-9. Defendant argued that, because the information sought included the identity of the individuals who were not similarly-situated, the information was not relevant to Hasan's claims. While Defendant did not discharge Hasan, who was eligible for and had not exhausted her Family and Medical Leave Act ("FMLA") leave, for violating the attendance policy, it terminated other individuals, who were not eligible for FMLA leave or had exhausted their FMLA entitlement under its no-fault attendance policy. Id. at *5-6. Defendant thus argued that it should not be required to help the EEOC identify other employees who might have other claims against Defendant. Id. at *6. The Court, however, disagreed. The Court explained that because Hasan had alleged that Defendant subjected her to discrimination when it suspended her and then terminated her based on disability, the EEOC had the authority to investigate her charge of disability bias with access to "virtually any material that might cast light on the allegations against the employer." Id. Early in its investigation of Hasan's claim, the EEOC had obtained information from Defendant about its no-fault attendance policy. Believing that there was evidence that the policy might have adversely impacted her, the EEOC investigator determined that additional information about the policy was necessary and relevant to the investigation. Id. at *7-8. To that end, the Court found that Defendant's disagreement with the EEOC's evaluation of what evidence was necessary to its investigation did not demonstrate that the EEOC's determination of what was relevant was "obviously wrong." Id. at *8-9. While Defendant might ultimately have the opportunity to argue the merits of Hasan's allegations, the Court agreed with the EEOC that a subpoena enforcement proceeding was not the proper forum for that determination, as the EEOC was tasked with the responsibility of assessing relevance. Id. at *8. The Court also found that Defendant's assertion that the sole purpose of the subpoena was to identify other employees who might have claims was insufficient to establish that the information being sought was intended for an illegitimate purpose. Id. at *10-11. Because Defendant was sufficiently equipped to absorb the costs of production based on its own estimate, and because the relevance of the requested information to the question of whether it discriminated against Hasan in violation of the ADA outweighed the identified costs, the Court rejected Defendant's contention that complying with the subpoena would pose an undue burden. Id. at *12-13. Accordingly, the Court overruled Defendant's objection to the Magistrate Judge's findings and ordered it to comply with the EEOC's subpoena. Id. at *13.

EEOC v. Ulta Salon, Cosmetics & Fragrance, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 148486 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 29, 2015). The EEOC investigated a charge filed by an employee alleging that Defendant denied her a reasonable accommodation for her disability and discharged her during her medical leave of absence. During its investigation, the EEOC learned that Defendant did not allow employees to extend leave taken under the Family and Medical Leave Act ("FMLA") under any circumstances and did not allow the employees to return from medical leave with medical restrictions. Id. at *2. The EEOC subsequently issued a subpoena seeking an electronic database of information about employees who sought reasonable accommodations, and regarding Defendant's Illinois-based employees who requested medical leaves. Id. The EEOC brought a subpoena enforcement action when Defendant objected to the EEOC's subpoena. Defendant contended that the EEOC's demand for its employees' personal information was overly broad and unreasonable. Defendant also argued that the EEOC's request had no relevance to the investigation of a solitary charge of disability discrimination. Id. at *4. The Court disagreed, and found that the EEOC was free to pursue any of Defendant's policies that were linked to the charge in its investigation. During the EEOC's investigation, Defendant's management reported that Defendant had a common policy that precluded employees from extending leave taken under the FMLA under any circumstances and did not allow employees to return employees with medical restrictions. Id. at *5. The Court remarked that, if true, these practices likely violated the Americans With Disabilities Act. The Court concluded that investigating whether Defendant had a procedure or practice that failed to reasonably accommodate employees who have taken a medical leave of absence was related to the EEOC's investigations into the charge. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's application to enforce its subpoena.

EEOC v. Union Pacific Railroad Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57305 (E.D. Wis. May 1, 2015). Defendant's former employees, Frank Burks and Cornelius Jones, filed charges of race discrimination and retaliation under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII") alleging that Defendant denied them the opportunity to take a test for an "assistant signal person" position. Id. at *1. The EEOC requested information about Defendant's data and software systems that stored personnel information, as well as information about Defendant's assessment program for assistant signal person applicants in 2011. Id. at *1-2. When Defendant refused, the EEOC brought a subpoena enforcement action. During the investigation, the EEOC issued right-to-sue notices to the charging parties, who sued Defendant in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois for Title VII violations. Id. at *2. The Court in that case granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment and dismissed the case. As a result, Defendant filed a motion to dismiss the subpoena enforcement action, arguing that the EEOC no longer had authority to investigate the charges because it had issued right-to-sue notices and Burks and Jones had lost their civil suit based on the same charges; Defendant alternatively argued that the subpoena sought information not relevant to the charges. Id. at *2-3. The Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss. Id. at *12. At the outset, the Court noted that the Fifth and Ninth Circuits had addressed a similar issue previously. The Fifth Circuit in EEOC v. Hearst Corporation, 103 F.3d 462, 469-71 (5th Cir. 1997), held that in a case where the charging party received a right-to-sue notice and was engaged in a civil action that was based upon the conduct alleged in the charge filed with the EEOC, that charge would no longer provide a basis for the EEOC investigation. Id. at *3-4. The Ninth Circuit, however, came to the opposite conclusion in EEOC v. Federal Express Corporation, 558 F.3d 842, 854 (9th Cir. 2009), holding that the EEOC retains the authority to issue an administrative subpoena against an employer even after the charging party received a right-to-sue letter and instituted a private action based upon that charge. Id. at *4. The Court found the reasoning of the Ninth Circuit more persuasive and concluded that the issuance of right-to-sue notices, the charging parties' civil suit, and the judgment in favor of Defendant did not divest the EEOC of authority to continue its investigation. Id. at *5. First, the Court noted that no federal statute or regulation would support Defendant's argument that the EEOC's authority to investigate a charge ends at a certain point. Second, the Court opined that the EEOC does not simply represent the interests of private parties; it also represents the public interest independent of the charging parties' interests. Id. at *6. Third, the Court reasoned that it was irrelevant that the charges in this case alleged only individual discrimination rather than a pattern or practice of discrimination. Id. at *6-7. Because the EEOC's investigation could encompass more than the charging parties' individual claims, the summary judgment decision in favor of Defendant did not deprive the EEOC of continuing authority to investigate the charges. Id. at *8. As the EEOC received two separate discrimination charges, and during the course of investigation, it learned about Defendant's alleged discriminatory promotion practices, the Court concluded that the EEOC was justified in seeking evidence related to an alleged pattern or practice of discrimination despite the fact that the charges did not specifically allege a pattern or practice. Id. at *10. Finally, although Defendant argued that unreasonable delay in the investigation prejudiced it because it had to comply with the EEOC's subpoena when it had already litigated the underlying discrimination charges, the Court found that Defendant was responsible for some of the delay because it refused to cooperate with the EEOC's subpoenas, which required the EEOC to petition the Court to enforce them. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss. Id. at *12.

EEOC v. United Airlines, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 79312 (N.D. Ill. June 8, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant unlawfully denied the charging parties and similarly-situated disabled employees the reasonable accommodation of reassignment to a vacant position for which they were qualified, and which they needed to accommodate their respective disabilities. Id. at *1-2. The parties subsequently entered into a consent decree, which the Court approved. Id. at *2. Although the consent decree comprised the full and final resolution of all claims arising out of the charges filed by the charging parties and all Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") claims pled by the EEOC, it did not resolve any future charges or charges that may be pending with the EEOC. Id. at *2-3. Pursuant to the consent decree, the Court enjoined Defendant from unlawfully failing to provide reasonable accommodation to a qualified individual with a disability; or retaliating against any person because he or she: (i) made a request for a reasonable accommodation; (ii) opposed discriminatory practices made unlawful by the ADA; or (iii) filed a charge of discrimination or assisted and participated in the filing of a charge of discrimination or in an investigation or proceeding brought under laws prohibiting discrimination or retaliation. Id. at *3-4. The Court directed Defendant to revise its policies or adopt new policies with regard to reassignment as a reasonable accommodation for disabled employees, and provide a non-competitive procedure by which disabled employees who were unable to work in their current position due to a disability were considered for reassignment to a vacant position as a reasonable accommodation if feasible. Id. at *4-5. Further, the Court directed Defendant to provide timely written notice to any applicable employee regarding the availability of reassignment as a possible reasonable accommodation, when such employee was unable to continuing working in his/her current position due to a medical condition and/or was placed on extended illness status. Id. at *5. The Court instructed noted that reassignment candidates whom Defendant deemed minimally qualified for an available lateral or lower level vacant position, for which they applied, would be reassigned to the position, and directed Defendant to provide the individual with an explanation of the reason for the non-placement into the position and inform the individual that they should continue to utilize Defendant's on-line job posting/application. Id. at *6. Additionally, the Court required Defendant to provide training regarding reassignment as a reasonable accommodation to all human resources employees with reasonable accommodation responsibilities. Id. at *6-7. The Court also agreed that Defendant should pay relief to claimants in the amount of $1,040,000, and that the EEOC should solely determine the identity of the claimants. Id. at *9-10. Id. at *9-10. Accordingly, the Court approved the consent decree. *Id. at 2.

EEOC v. V&J Foods, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88620 (E.D. Wis. July 7, 2015). While investigating a disability discrimination charge filed by Defendant's employee, Glen Shaw, the EEOC served a subpoena seeking that Defendant produce all communications of any kind; telephone records, personnel records, performance reviews, leave records, attendance records, return to work records, work assignment records, calendars or schedules; including any of such records kept by Shaw's supervisor, Todd Wittenberg, Defendant's Human Resources Department, or any other managers. Id. at *1-2. The subpoena also sought a variety of files, including Shaw's personnel file. Id. at *1. The EEOC subsequently brought a subpoena enforcement action, claiming that Defendant did not comply completely, with its request. The Court granted the EEOC's application to enforce the subpoena. Id. at *3. Defendant argued that the EEOC did not make a reasonable attempt to explain its theory of liability. The Court, however, found this argument to be tangential to the relevance requirement, which was easily satisfied. Id. The Court remarked that the EEOC's request to produce documents relating to Shaw could "cast light" on his allegations of disability discrimination. Id. at *2. Moreover, the subpoena was within the EEOC's authority and not indefinite. Therefore, the Court held that it must be enforced. Id. Because Defendant played coy as to whether it had more responsive documents, the Court directed it to certify under penalty of perjury that it had produced all responsive documents. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's application and ordered Defendant to produce all the relevant documents and a declaration of compliance, and further ordered that the EEOC is entitled to costs. Id. at *3-4.

(viii) Eighth Circuit

EEOC v. Audrain Health Care, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71582 (E.D. Mo. June 3, 2015). The EEOC brought an American With Disabilities Act action on behalf of Cynthia Hodges, a former nurse, alleging that Defendant discriminated against her by terminating her on the basis of her disability. While the EEOC contended that Hodges was able to perform the essential functions of her job with a reasonable accommodation, Defendant argued that there were no reasonable accommodations that could be made that would allow Hodges to perform the essential functions of her job. Id. at *1-2. Both parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The Court denied both motions. Id. at *1. The parties did not dispute that Hodges possessed the requisite skills, education, certification, or experience necessary for the job as a nurse. The parties, however, disputed whether Hodges could, despite her impairments, perform the essential functions of the job either with or without reasonable accommodation. Id. at *3. The Court found that the record established that issues of fact remained as to whether Hodges requested reasonable accommodations, whether the proposed accommodations were reasonable, and whether Defendant participated in an interactive process to determine possible accommodations that could be made. Id. at *6. The Court thus concluded that summary judgment was not appropriate for either party, and denied the cross motions for summary judgment. Id. at *7.

EEOC v. CRST Van Expedited, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 166797 (N.D. Iowa Dec. 14, 2015). On September 27, 2007, the EEOC filed a lawsuit on behalf of Monika Starke and a class of similarly-situated female employees of Defendant pursuant to § 706 of Title VII. Id. at *2. On August 13, 2009, the Court found that EEOC was barred from seeking relief on behalf of 67 individuals because the EEOC "wholly abandoned its statutory duties" by: (i) failing to investigate those individuals' claims until after the EEOC filed the complaint; (ii) not including the 67 individuals as members in the EEOC's letter of determination until after the EEOC filed the complaint; (iii) failing to make a reasonable cause determination as to the specific allegations of any of the 67 individuals; and (iv) not attempting to conciliate the specific allegations of the 67 individuals prior to filing the complaint. Id. at *2-3. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit affirmed, and after remand, the Court entered a fee sanction award against the Commission. While the parties continued to litigate the fee award rendered against the Commission, the EEOC did not seek U.S. Supreme Court review of the Eighth Circuit's decision regarding the order of dismissal based on the EEOC's lack of compliance with the pre-suit requirements. Shortly after the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in Mach Mining v. EEOC, 135 S. Ct. 1645 (2015), the EEOC filed a motion for relief pursuant to Rule 60(b)(6) seeking to vacate the Court's 2009 decision; the EEOC asserted that Mach Mining "clarified the EEOC's pre-suit obligations" and that the Court's decision dismissing the 67 allegedly aggrieved individuals was contrary to Mach Mining. Id. at *4. The Court noted that relief under Rule 60 is "an extraordinary remedy for exceptional circumstances" and that "a change in the law that would have governed the dispute, had the dispute not already been decided, is not by itself an extraordinary circumstance warranting Rule 60(b) relief from a final judgment." Id. at *5. The Court rejected the EEOC's argument that Mach Mining "changed the governing law and established the incorrectness of the dismissal of the case." Id. at *6. First, the Court noted that the issue in Mach Mining was to what extent a Court may inquire into the EEOC's conciliation process. The so called "class definition" – which was at issue in EEOC v. CRST – was not a contested issue in Mach Mining. Id. at *7. Therefore, the Court held that "Mach Mining is inapplicable to the instant action, insofar as it concerns inquiry into the specifics of the EEOC's conciliation process." Id. The Court determined that "it is the Court's opinion that Mach Mining's statement that the appropriate remedy is to order the EEOC to undertake the mandated efforts to obtain voluntary compliance does not necessarily prevent a Court from dismissing a case where no investigation occurs" as "the issue in Mach Mining was limited to the sufficiency of the EEOC's conciliation process and the permissible level of judicial inquiry into that process. Mach Mining did not address the appropriate remedy when the EEOC fails to engage in any investigation of claims prior to the conciliation process." Id. at *7-8. The Court therefore held that " to grant relief in the instant action would open the floodgates for countless other decisions that were issued based on laws that may have changed in the interim. This scenario is the basis for the importance of the finality of judgments and the need for limiting relief under Rule 60(b) to truly extraordinary cases, cases where the denial of relief offends justice." Id. at *12.

EEOC v. Cummins Power Generation, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 131462 (D. Minn. Sept. 28, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") and the Genetic Information Non-Discrimination Act ("GINA") by discriminating and retaliating against Grant P. Habighorst, an employee. The EEOC claimed that as part of a fitness-for-duty assessment, Defendant, through its vendor Cigna and Dr. Charles Pearson ("Pearson"), required Habighorst to sign various medical release forms that sought information not related to his work, including Habighorst's family medical history. Id. at *4-5. Defendant also informed Habighorst that he had to sign a release before taking the assessments, and when he objected, Defendant terminated him. Id. at *5. The EEOC asserted that Defendant made unlawful disability-related inquiries under the ADA, made unlawful requests for genetic information under the GINA, engaged in a retaliatory discharge by terminating Habighorst for his objection, and unlawfully interfered with Habighorst's exercise of his rights under the ADA. Id. at *6-7. In its answer, Defendant asserted numerous affirmative defenses, including that the EEOC failed to join indispensable parties, specifically Cigna and Pearson. The EEOC and Habighorst moved for judgment on the pleadings, contending that the joinder of Pearson or Cigna was not necessary because Defendant was liable for the alleged ADA and GINA violations no matter what role Cigna or Pearson played in drafting or sending the allegedly offending forms. Id. at *8. The EEOC also contended that the interests of Cigna and Pearson would not be impaired by their absence from this action because Defendant had no claim for contribution or indemnification against them. Id. The Court granted the motion for judgment on the pleadings, finding that Defendant's indispensable parties' defense failed as a matter of law. Id. at *13. The Court determined that complete relief would be possible amongst the present parties without joining Cigna or Pearson because an employer is not necessarily shielded from liability by the fact that a third-party engaged in the discriminatory practices that formed the basis for the EEOC's lawsuit against the employer. Id. at *14. The Court explained that both the ADA and the GINA make it an employer's responsibility to conduct fitness-for-duty exams in a non-discriminatory manner, and Defendant was thus required to ensure that Habighorst's assessment conformed with applicable laws, regardless of third-parties' involvement in the discrimination. Id. at *17-18. The ADA has a broad remedial purpose in preventing and remedying discriminatory employment practices, and according to the Court, it would be inconsistent with this purpose if Defendant were allowed to avoid liability by claiming Cigna or Pearson failed to abide by the ADA or the GINA. Id. at *18-19. The Court further reasoned that the resolution of this action would not impair on either Cigna's or Pearson's interests, and the fact that Defendant might later seek indemnification or contribution from Cigna or Pearson did not create an interest that made them necessary parties. Id. at *22. The Court therefore concluded that Defendant, as the employer, bore the burden of ensuring Habighorst's assessment was conducted in a lawful manner. Accordingly, the Court granted the motion for summary judgment of the EEOC and Habighorst.

EEOC v. JBS USA,* Case No. 10-CV-318 (D. Neb. Jan. 28, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant, a meat packing company, discriminated against a group of Somali Muslim employees by failing to accommodate their requests for prayer breaks. The EEOC also alleged that Defendant unlawfully fired 80 Muslim employees who participated in work stoppage over the issue, and retaliated against them for complaining about the lack of accommodations. On April 15, 2011, the parties agreed to bifurcate discovery and trial into two phases. The parties agreed to address the EEOC's pattern or practice claims in Phase I and to address all individual claims for relief, as well as any claims for which no pattern or practice was found, in Phase II. Id. at 4. From May 7, 2013 through May 13, 2013, the Court held a trial on the EEOC's Phase I pattern or practice claims, and found that: (i) Defendant did not discipline or discharge any of its Muslim employees for praying; (ii) Defendant terminated Somali-Muslim employees who "walked out" of the plant for withholding work and violating the collective bargaining agreement ("CBA"); and (iii) the workers' requested religious accommodations would impose an undue hardship on Defendant. Id. at 5-6. Defendant then moved for partial summary judgment on two grounds. First, it argued that the Court's findings in Phase I precluded the EEOC from pursuing claims of religious discrimination and retaliation in Phase II. Second, it argued that the EEOC failed to meet the pre-conditions for bringing its Phase II claims. Specifically, Defendant contended that the Court's findings established that its reasons for the terminations were legitimate and non-discriminatory and precluded the EEOC from arguing that Defendant terminated or otherwise retaliated against the workers for requesting religious accommodations. Id. at 6. The Court granted in part Defendant's motion with respect to issue preclusion and denied the motion without prejudice with respect to pre-conditions to suit. The Court noted that a party asserting issue preclusion must demonstrate that the non-moving party was in privity with a party to the original lawsuit, that the issue it seeks to preclude is the same as an issue actually litigated in the prior action, was determined by a valid and final judgment, and was essential to the prior judgment. Id. First, the Court found privity between the EEOC and the individual workers because, even though the EEOC could not seek damages for the individual workers in Phase I, the interests of the EEOC and those of the individual workers did not diverge. Id. at 7-8. Second, the Court found identity of issues because the underlying facts supporting the EEOC's patterns or practice claims in Phase I formed the basis for the individual workers' claims, as the EEOC had previously asserted that the claims "are closely related and stem from essentially the same factual allegations." Id. at 9. Third, the Court found that the parties fully litigated Defendant's undue hardship defense and that its findings with respect to that issue were essential to the Phase I judgment. Id. at 11. Fourth, the Court, however, determined that its other findings with respect to the remaining individual claims were not essential to its Phase I judgment, and thus would remain. Id. at 12. Although the Court determined that Defendant did not discipline Somali-Muslim employees for praying, and terminated them for violating the CBA, it held that it "did not need to address all the EEOC's claims because [Defendant] proved its undue hardship defense." Id. at 13. The Court therefore concluded that Defendant established each element necessary for issue preclusion as to religious accommodation claim. Defendant also moved for summary judgment on the ground that the EEOC failed to adequately conciliate each individual worker's claim prior to bringing suit. The Court refused to resolve the issue because in Mach Mining, LLC v. EEOC, 134 S. Ct. 2872 (2014), the U.S. Supreme Court was currently considering the question of whether and to what extent the EEOC's duty to conciliate may be examined and enforced. Id. at 18. The Court held that it would not preclude Defendant from reasserting its position following the Supreme Court's ruling. Accordingly, the Court partly granted Defendant's motion for partial summary judgment.

EEOC v. JBS USA, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 61368 (D. Neb. May 11, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant engaged in unlawful employment practices and discriminated against its Somalian Muslim employees on the basis of religion, national origin, and race in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The Court bifurcated the action into two phases; Phase I addressed claims based on Defendant's alleged pattern or practice of religious discrimination and Phase II addressed individual claims for relief. Id. at *5. After a bench trial of Phase I, the Court entered a final judgment and resolved numerous post-trial issues. Id. Defendant filed a bill of costs, to which the EEOC partially objected. The Court granted the EEOC's motion in part. Id. at *16. The EEOC argued that the Court should not rule on the bill of costs because it was premature as the litigation was still pending. The Court observed that Rule 54 provides that costs should be allowed to the prevailing party, and here, Defendant was the prevailing party because it successfully defended Phase I claims and received a final judgment, and avoided all of the relief sought by the EEOC. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the issue of costs for the Phase I proceedings could be settled in the litigation. Id. Defendant sought $43,757.33 for printed or electronically recorded transcripts. Defendant also sought $20,373 associated with 17 videotaped depositions. Defendant contended that both video and paper transcripts were necessary in this case for the Somali-speaking witnesses because they were listed as potential testifying witnesses, and they neither read nor spoke English. Id. at *9. The Court agreed with Defendant and ruled that it was reasonable to believe that both recordings and paper transcripts could be necessary for the case. Id. The Court, however, noted that there was only one English speaking witness, whose deposition need not have been recorded in both forms. Accordingly, the Court reduced Defendant's bill of costs in the amount of $475, representing the cost the videotaped deposition of the English speaking witness. Id. at *12. Similarly, the Court allowed Defendant's bill of costs as to costs associated with delivery, deposition transcripts, and an interpreter's compensation. Id. at *12-17. In all, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's bill of costs, and taxed the EEOC with costs in the amount of $83,487.95. Id. at *15.

EEOC v. JBS USA, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96946 (D. Neb. July 24, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by discriminating against Muslim employees on the basis of religions by engaging in a pattern or practice of retaliation, discriminatory discipline and discharge, harassment, and denying its Muslim employees reasonable religious accommodations. On May 26, 2011, the Court bifurcated the case into two phases. Phase I addressed the EEOC's pattern or practice claims under § 707, and Phase II proposed to address all individual claims for relief under § 706 and any claims for which no pattern or practice liability was found in Phase I. Id. at *5. At trial in May 2013, the Court found that the EEOC had satisfied its initial burden of proving a prima facie case of religious discrimination, but concluded that Defendant had established its affirmative defense of undue hardship, and entered judgment in Defendant's favor. Id. at *6. Defendant subsequently filed motion of judgment on the pleadings and a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. Defendant argued that the EEOC's complaint should be dismissed because it failed to identify the individuals for whom the EEOC was bringing each type of claim, and failed to describe the factual circumstances surrounding the discharge of any individual employees. Id. at *16. The Court granted both motions. Id. at *33. The Court found that the allegations in the EEOC's complaint and the aggrieved individuals on the list for whom the EEOC sought relief, taken together, rendered the EEOC's Phase II claims unclear. Id. at *21. The Court ruled that neither it nor Defendant could reasonably determine which Phase II claims were associated with particular individuals, and the EEOC failed to provide adequate indication of the size and scope of the class of individuals for whom it sought relief. Id. at *21-22. The Court also found that the EEOC's dependence upon facts supporting pattern or practice claims rendered the EEOC's complaint ambiguous and potentially confusing for purposes of the § 706 allegations of Phase II. Id. at *22-23. The Court noted that, other than an indirect reference to Ramadan 2008, the allegations failed to provide a timeframe in which the alleged § 706 violations occurred; instead, the EEOC, provided only a general indication of the types of conduct to which the named claimants and the unidentified class members were subjected. Id. at *23. Nevertheless, the Court granted leave to the EEOC to amend the complaint, reasoning that Defendant was generally aware of the EEOC's principal allegations and the amendment would streamline discovery to allow Defendant to respond and to defend only those allegations related to Phase II claims. Id. at *23-24. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motions for judgment on the pleadings and for dismissal for failure to state a claim while allowing Plaintiff, EEOC, and interveners to amend their complaints. Id. at *33.

EEOC v. Mayo Clinic,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 104031 (D. Minn. Aug. 7, 2015). The two consolidated matters concerned the enforceability of a subpoena duces tecum issued by the EEOC to the Mayo Clinic in the course of its investigation of a charge of employment discrimination. Id. at *1. Previously, the Magistrate Judge had denied Mayo Clinic's petition to quash the subpoena duces tecum, and granted the EEOC's application for order to show cause why a subpoena should not be enforced. Id. at *1-2. Because Mayo Clinic did not oppose the report and recommendation, the Court adopted it in its entirety.

EEOC v. New Prime, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 167496 (W.D. Mo. Aug. 31, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant, a trucking company, discriminated against female truck driver applicants by adopting a same-sex driver policy that stated that the women who applied to be student or entry-level trainees would be assigned to a female trainer only, resulting in delaying or denying them employment, in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The EEOC sued on behalf of 63 women who applied for driving positions with the Defendant and were placed on a waiting list, a practice which the Court found to be discriminatory based on the gender of the applicants. Id. at *2. The Court entered an order appointing Jeff Schaeperkoetter to serve as Special Master "for the purpose of determining the availability and amount of any back pay due to the claimants in this case." Id. at *1. Consequently, the Special Master conducted a hearing, received testimony from four expert witnesses, and received other evidence in the form of transcribed depositions of those witnesses and some of the claimants and other documentary evidence. Id. The Special Master then performed a claimant-by-claimant review, as suggested by the experts' testimony and the parties' pre-hearing briefs, and described the methodology adopted in making the recommendations for back pay for each claimant. Specifically, the special maser: (i) used the application date and start date contained in Dr. Mullins' "estimation of earnings differential" to determine the beginning day for any period back pay eligibility; (ii) determined the end day for any period of back pay eligibility after a complete review of the evidentiary documents for each claimant and after consideration of a broad range of factors relevant to the issue of mitigation; (iii) determined the period of eligibility or qualifying period, expressed in a specified end date and by the number of quarters; (iv) determined each claimant's "but-for earnings" based upon Dr. Mullins' present value of "but for" earnings plus benefit for the specific period of eligibility; (v) determined specific period of eligibility by subtracting each claimant's off-setting earnings from other employment, including imputed earnings when appropriated from the claimant's "but-for earnings;" and (vi) determined each claimant's back pay award and adjusted claimed out-of-pocket expenses for some claimants. Id. at *37-39. The Special Master asserted that his methodology was reasonable because it provided an attrition element to each claimant that were based on the facts of each claimant's circumstances, and because applying separate industry or firm-specific attrition rates would be duplicative and punitive to the claimants. Id. at *40-42. The Special Master also provided that the report and recommendations, if adopted, would have no res judicata or collateral estoppel effect on the claimants. Thus, providing a list of back pay amount and total damage awards to be made to each claimant based on his detailed methodology adopted, the Special Master submitted his report and recommendations for the Court's approval.

EEOC v. New Prime, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 166656 (W.D. Mo. Dec. 14, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant, a trucking company, discriminated against female truck driver applicants when it adopted a same-sex driver policy which stated the women who applied to be student or entry-level trainees would only be assigned to a female trainer, unless she had a pre-existing relationship with a male instructor or trainer. Id. at *2. The policy resulted in qualified female applicants being placed on a waiting list due to a lack of female trainers, thus delaying or denying them employment. Id. On August 14, 2014, the Court entered an order finding Defendant's policy was facially discriminatory in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Id. Later, the Court entered an order appointing a Special Master for the purpose of determining the availability and amount of any back pay due to any allegedly injured applicants. Id. at *3. After three days of evidentiary hearings, the Special Master submitted a report and recommendation summarizing the total back pay as the difference between the claimants' adjusted "but for" earnings, including fringe benefits, and a claimant's "interim" earnings, which consisted of the claimant's actual earnings during the quarter or any earnings imputed by the Special Master to the claimant during the quarter. Id. at *4-5. The Special Master also included claimants' alleged out-of-pocket expenses in the final back pay award. Id. at *5. Both parties filed objections to the report and recommendation. While the EEOC objected to the pre-judgment interest rate used by the Special Master to bring the "but for" earnings to present value and to the imputation of income, Defendant objected to the Special Master's refusal to apply the pre-judgment interest rate to the claimants' "interim" earnings in addition to their "but for" earnings. Id. The Court adopted in part and rejected in part the Special Master's report and recommendations. The Court overruled the EEOC's objection to the pre-judgment interest rate adopted by the Special Master. The Special Master employed Defendant's expert's method of "interest off-set" by using the weekly average 1-year constant maturity Treasury yield rather than the IRS underpayment tax penalty rate as suggested by the EEOC's expert. Id. at *10. The EEOC argued that the IRS underpayment tax penalty rate employed by its expert was more "in line" with both economic reality and the purposes for awarding pre-judgment interest, and the Treasury rate did not make the victims of discrimination whole in this case. Id. The Court, however, found that the Treasury rate was widely accepted to determine back pay in discrimination cases, and because the interest off-set calculation of Defendant's expert, which was adopted by the Special Master, also applied consumer price indexes on top of the Treasury rate to account for inflation, it was sufficient to make the victims whole without punishing Defendant. Id. at *11. The Court, however, sustained the EEOC's objection to the Special Master's imputation of earnings, finding that reduction of back pay for amounts the claimants could have earned with reasonable effort was inappropriate in light of the Special Master's findings that each of the claimants, until the date specified as their back pay eligibility cut-off date, made "a good faith effort to minimize damages" and the Special Master was "unable to find that the lengthy period of unemployment in some fashion resulted in a failure to mitigate damages." Id. at *19. The Court also sustained Defendant's objection to the Special Master's refusal to apply the pre-judgment interest rate to the claimants' interim earnings, finding that the correct procedure for calculating back pay would be to calculate the total amount of back wages due by subtracting the interim earnings from the "but for" earnings and then applying the appropriate interest rate to that amount, and thus, the pre-judgment interest should apply to both the claimants' "but for" earnings and the claimants' interim earnings. Id. at *13-14. The Court then addressed each party's objections to the amount of back pay calculated for specific claimants, and recommended re-calculation of the back pay for each claimant. Accordingly, the Court adopted in part and rejected in part the Special Master's report and recommendations.

EEOC v. Old Dominion Freight Line, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 81977 (W.D. Ark. June 24, 2015). The EEOC brought an action against a trucking company on behalf of Charles Grams, Defendant's employee, alleging that Defendant discriminated against him in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). After trial, the jury found that Defendant violated the ADA by terminating Grams' employment as a driver because he was an alcoholic and refused to accommodate him when Grams self-reported his alcohol abuse. The jury awarded $119,612.97 to Grams in back pay. Id. at *2. In its post-trial motions, the EEOC asked the Court to: (i) determine whether Defendant's self-reporting policies violated the ADA; (ii) enjoin Defendant from continuing to enforce those policies; (iii) order Defendant to reinstate Grams and pay him pre-judgment interest; and (iv) reimburse the EEOC for certain litigation costs. Id. The Court granted the EEOC's motions. Id. *49-51. Defendant sought to overturn the verdict in a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Id. at *51. At the outset, the Court remarked that given the jury's verdict, it must determine whether Defendant's company-wide policy violated the ADA. The Court observed that under the ADA, an employer is not permitted to summarily decide, without engaging in any interactive process, that no accommodation is potentially available to permit an alcoholic employee to return to driving. Id. at *16-17. The Court found that Defendant violated the ADA, particularly in light of the fact that the Department of Transportation ("DOT") regulations expressly contemplate the possibility of a return to driving even after a clinical diagnosis of alcoholism. Id. The Court held that Defendant improperly believed that it could fashion its policy with respect to its employees in safety-sensitive positions without any reference at all to the ADA. Id. at *17. The Court reasoned that this belief came from a misreading of the ADA's safe harbor provision, which exempts employees employed in a transportation industry subject to DOT regulations, including complying with such regulations that apply to employment sensitive positions in such an industry. Id. The Court found that safe harbor does not apply, however, when an employee engages in some aspect of safety-sensitive employment that is not regulated by the DOT. Id. The Court, therefore, concluded the ADA makes clear that any employee in a safety-sensitive position who is subject to DOT regulations regarding the use of alcohol must comply with those regulations without reference to the ADA. Id. at *19-20. However, when an employer's policies impose burdens on disabled employees that are not mandated by the DOT due to safety concerns, a close look at those policies is warranted in order to determine whether the policies otherwise comply with the ADA. Id. at *20. Under the circumstances, the Court held that Defendant created a policy that imposed greater restrictions on drivers who self-reported alcohol abuse than those restrictions imposed by the DOT. Id. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Defendant's policies violated the ADA, and that it failed to provide at least the possibility of a reasonable accommodation once the driver had been given a current clinical diagnosis of alcoholism. Id. at *24. The Court also found that Defendant's policy of offering drivers disabled by alcoholism an accommodation that did not provide the driver with at least the possibility of a return to his former job was not reasonable as a matter of law and violated the ADA. Id. Accordingly, the Court permanently enjoined Defendant from enforcing such a policy. Id. The Court further denied Defendant's alternative requests for judgment as a matter of law or for a new trial, finding that there was sufficient evidence presented at trial for a reasonable jury to conclude that Grams was disabled and suffered an adverse employment action due to disability discrimination. Id. at *25. Having made this finding, the Court also granted the EEOC's request to reinstate Grams as a driver. Id. at *35. Since EEOC was the prevailing party, the Court also granted its request for costs, and directed Defendant to reimburse $5,438.16 to the Commission for its costs. Id. at *48. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motions for reinstatement and costs. Id. at *50-51.

EEOC v. PMT Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 113882 (D. Minn. Aug. 24, 2015). The EEOC brought an action against Defendant under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII") and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") alleging that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of discrimination on the basis of sex by failing to hire females for sales representative positions and on the basis of age by failing to hire applicants over the age of 40 for sales representative positions. Id. at *1-2. The EEOC also alleged that Defendant failed to make and preserve records in accordance with Title VII and the ADEA. Id. at *2. The parties disputed how discovery and trial should proceed in this matter. The EEOC moved to bifurcate the action into two phases. The EEOC proposed to have a first phase to determine whether Defendant was liable for a pattern or practice of sex and age discrimination, whether Defendant was liable for punitive damages under Title VII and liquidated damages under the ADEA, and whether Defendant liable for record-keeping violations. Id. at *10. The EEOC asserted that the second phase would occur only if there was a finding of liability against Defendant regarding one or both of the EEOC's pattern-or-practice claims, and it would address the issues of whether Defendant could meet its burden of proof as to each class member, the remedies to which that class member was entitled, and Defendant's defenses such as failure to mitigate damages on individual claims. Id. at *10-11. The Court denied the EEOC's motion to bifurcate the trial without prejudice. Id. at *13. According to the Court, the issue could be more appropriately addressed to the judge who would actually try the case, and thus it need not determine at this stage which issues would be tried in which phase to resolve the current dispute over how discovery should proceed in this matter. Id. at *11. The Court, however, granted the EEOC's motion to bifurcate discovery, finding that phased discovery would increase the efficiency in the case by focusing the parties' efforts first on whether Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of discrimination and issues pertaining to the class as a whole. Id. at *29. The Court noted that if the EEOC was not able to establish that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of discrimination, the case would be over and the parties would not waste time and resource on the more costly and time-intensive discovery on damages that each class member might have suffered. Id. at *25-26. Moreover, the Court reasoned that Defendant would not be prejudiced by the phased discovery. Id. at *30. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motion to bifurcate discovery and ordered the parties to prepare a joint proposal for the first phase of discovery addressing issues pertaining to the class as a whole. Id. at *30-31.

EEOC v. BNSF Railway Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10517 (W.D. Wash. Jan. 29, 2015). The EEOC brought an Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") action alleging that Defendant withdrew its offer of employment to an applicant, Russell Holt, when he refused to procure an MRI at his own expense after being cleared by a company doctor. Defendant offered Holt a position as a patrol officer, contingent upon Holt passing a post-offer, pre-employment medical examination. The EEOC alleged that Defendant discriminated against Holt when, after Defendant's contract doctor cleared Holt for the position based on a routine medical examination required of all applicants, it demanded that Holt procure a follow-up MRI. Id. at *2. The EEOC contended that the MRI was an improper additional inquiry not required of all entering employees. Defendant moved to dismiss the EEOC's ADA claim, which the Court denied. The EEOC argued that the MRI requirement, because of its cost, functioned as a screening criterion that screened out Holt, and that screening out Holt in such a manner was impermissible because the criterion was not job-related or consistent with business necessity, thereby violating sections 42 U.S.C. § 12112(d)(3)(A) and (C) of the ADA. Id. at *5. The Court opined that the statute does not authorize an employer to require that an entering employee pay for the follow-up examination where only applicants with disabilities are asked to provide the follow-ups, especially where a company doctor had already cleared that employee as fit for the position. Id. at *6. The Court noted that a company doctor had already cleared Holt for work, and at the time of his application, Holt had been performing patrolman duties as a police officer for 11 years without any accommodation. Id. at *7. Although Defendant cited case law authority in support of its interpretation of the statute, none of the cases relied on whether the employer required the applicant to pay for a follow-up examination or required a follow-up after its doctor had already cleared the applicant for work. Id. at *7-8. Thus, the Court found that the EEOC stated a plausible claim upon which relief could be granted, and accordingly, denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

EEOC v. City Of Richmond,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 540 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 2, 2015). The EEOC commenced an administrative investigation against the City of Richmond based upon an employee's charge of discrimination for gender, race, religion, and age; unlawful disclosure of confidential medical information; failure to accommodate a disability; and retaliation. The EEOC moved to enforce an investigative subpoena directed to the City after it declined to produce information that the EEOC sought in its investigation. Id. at *1. The Court granted the EEOC's motion. Id. at *4. At the onset, the Court noted that an administrative subpoena is enforceable only if the EEOC demonstrates that: (i) the subpoena is within the agency's authority; (ii) the agency has satisfied its own procedural requirements; and (iii) the information sought is relevant to its investigation. Id. at *2. The Court found that through the sworn declarations of the EEOC's employees (including the EEOC's regional director, an attorney, and a staff member), the EEOC had established the elements of authority, procedure, and relevance. Id. First, the Court observed that the EEOC had statutory authority to issue administrative subpoenas during the course of investigations into charges of discrimination and retaliation under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Americans With Disabilities Act, and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act. Id. Second, the Court found that the EEOC had complied with all procedural requirements set forth the Commission's regulations, most of which pertained to the inclusion of certain information in the subpoena itself. Id. at *3. Finally, the Court observed that the EEOC had also established that the evidence sought – notably, personnel records and documents reflecting the City's policies and procedures, disciplinary records, and employee complaint records – was relevant to the discrimination and retaliation charge that the EEOC was investigating. Id. Thus, the Court held that the EEOC had demonstrated that it had authority to issue the administrative subpoena, had followed the necessary procedural requirements, and that the subpoena itself sought documents relevant to the discrimination investigation. Id. at *4. For these reasons, the Court concluded that the administrative subpoena was enforceable, and additionally fees and costs in relation to the instant motion. Id.

EEOC v. Global Horizons, Inc.*, Case No. CV-11- 3045 (E.D. Wash. Feb. 3, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by discriminating against Thai and Asian individuals hired to perform agricultural work. The EEOC primarily alleged claims of discrimination, hostile work environment, constructive discharge, and retaliation on behalf of the Thai workers. The EEOC and one Defendant, Global Horizons, Inc., cross-moved for summary judgment. The Court granted the EEOC's motion in part, and denied Global's motion. Id. at *2. The question before the Court was whether the EEOC presented evidence sufficient enough to show that Global had a pattern or practice of discrimination based on race and national origin against the Thai workers it brought to work in Washington at Valley Fruit Orchards ("Valley Fruit") and Green Acre Farms ("Green Acre") through the H-2A program. In addition, both the EEOC and Global asked the Court to resolve Global's affirmative defense of laches in their favor as a matter of law. The Court observed that to establish laches, Global must prove that the: (i) EEOC unreasonably delayed in filing this action; and (ii) that Global was prejudiced by the EEOC's delay. The Court found that the record was insufficient to make a conclusive ruling on the laches defense, and left it for trial. Id. at *59. In order to prove a pattern or practice of discrimination, the EEOC was required to establish that the discriminatory actions were Global's standard operating procedure, and not unusual practice or the mere occurrence of isolated or accidental or sporadic discriminatory acts. Id. at *66. It was undisputed that Global took the Thai worker's national origin into account when hiring them through the H-2A program and then returning Thai workers to Thailand when their visa had expired or when work was no longer available. Id. at *66-67. However, the Court observed that it was disputed whether Global's other conduct, including providing housing that failed to comply with state law housing requirements, was based on the Thai workers' race or national origin. Id. at *67. The Court proceeded to analyze each of claims under the prima facie burden shifting factors. As to the disparate treatment claims, the Court found that each of the allegations – including (i) paying different pay scales to Thai workers; (ii) that Thai workers were forced to reside in unsafe and filthy housing; and (iii) meting different treatment between Thai and Latino workers – fell short of being a pre-text for discrimination. Id. at *70. The Court determined that the EEOC failed to show that the Thai workers could have been provided better working conditions vis-à-vis Latino workers, but were not due to racial profiling. Accordingly, the Court ruled that summary judgment was inappropriate as to disparate treatment claim. Similarly, the Court opined that genuine disputes of material fact existed as to whether Global had a pattern or practice of subjecting the Thai workers to an objectively and subjectively severe work environment because of their race or national origin. Id. at *72. Finding similar discrepancies in the EEOC's evidences to establish claims of constructive discharge and retaliation, the Court denied the EEOC's motion.

EEOC v. Global Horizons, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 37674 (E.D. Wash. Mar. 19, 2015). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of Thai workers that Defendants hired pursuant to a federal H-2A guest-worker program. In 2004 and 2005, Thai individuals were brought to the United States by Defendant Global Horizons to work at Defendants Green Acre Farms and Valley Fruit Orchards, as well as other agricultural businesses. Id. at *9. Many of the Thai workers later filed charges of discrimination with the EEOC claiming that Defendants discriminated and retaliated against them on the basis of their national origin. Id. at *10. Almost a year after the lawsuit was filed, the EEOC served its Rule 26(a) initial disclosures, and attached a list of Thai claimants, including 87 claimants as to Green Acre, and 37 claimants as to Valley Fruit. Id. at *29. The EEOC asserted that it sought $300,000 in emotional distress and punitive damages for each of the 140 claimants as to Green Acre with a total of $42 million in damages, and for the 85 claimants as to Valley Fruit, a total of $25.5 million in damages. Id. Subsequently, the Court granted the Grower Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to untimely claimants and ruled that the EEOC could not pursue relief on behalf of untimely claimants. Id. at *33. The Court ordered the EEOC to disclose the names of the claimants on whose behalf it timely sought relief. The EEOC later filed declarations of various Thai workers relative to their experiences at the Grower Defendants' orchards. Id. In these declarations, the Thai workers declared that they were paid late, worked less than 40 hours a week, and were threatened with deportation if they did not meet their quotas. Id. at *34. After reviewing the declarations and other evidence, the Court granted summary judgment to the Grower Defendants. Thereafter, the Grower Defendants filed motions for attorneys' fees, which the Court also granted. At the outset, the Court observed that this case presented challenges to the EEOC, such as numerous non-English speaking Thai individuals working at a variety of farms in the U.S., and residing at various locations in the U.S. or Thailand. The Court noted that detailing what conduct and events occurred at what farm may have been challenging, but that could not be an excuse for the EEOC to forego a reasonable diligent investigation of the allegations of discrimination as to each business before bringing the lawsuit. Id. at *35. The Court remarked that the EEOC's unpreparedness was highlighted by the ever changing number of Thai claimants throughout the lawsuit. The Court determined that the EEOC could not claim that it was unaware of such deficiencies in its investigation against the Grower Defendants as their counsel repeatedly advised the EEOC that the charges of discrimination, and the subsequent letters or determination, failed to alleged the purported discrimination with sufficient specificity. Id. at *37. Further, the Court opined that the EEOC frivolously sought back pay and reinstatement for the Thai claimants, when by then it knew that Defendant Global was no longer approved to provide H-2A guest workers to American farms and that many Thai individuals were not lawfully in the United States. Id. at *43. Accordingly, an award of back pay was inappropriate and reinstatement of the workers was impossible relative to the Grower Defendants. Accordingly, the Court concluded that an award of attorneys' fees for the Grower Defendants was justified.

EEOC v. Global Horizons, Inc.,* Case No. 11-CV-3045 (E.D. Wash. Sept. 24, 2015). The EEOC brought an action against Defendant and eight farms in Hawaii and Washington, including Green Acre Farms Inc. and Valley Fruit Orchards ("Grower Defendants"), alleging violations of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII") for engaging in a pattern or practice of harassment and discrimination against Thai workers. The Court had previously granted the Grower Defendants summary judgment on all of the EEOC's Title VII liability claims, finding that the EEOC failed to provide evidence that the Grower Defendants subjected the Thai workers to hostile work environment. The Court had also determined that the Grower Defendants were entitled to seek reasonable attorneys' fees and costs incurred in defending the action, finding that the EEOC failed to conduct an adequate investigation to ensure that its Title VII claims could be brought against the Grower Defendants, and pursued a frivolous theory of joint-employer liability. Id. at 2. While the Grower Defendants moved for an award of attorneys' fees of $1,041,188 and costs of $80,577.94, totaling $1,211,765.90, the EEOC moved for reconsideration of the Court's ruling that the Grower Defendants were prevailing parties entitled to recover their reasonable attorneys' fees and expenses. First, the Court denied the EEOC's motion for reconsideration, finding that the EEOC's lawsuit against the Grower Defendants was unfounded and frivolous, and the EEOC failed to present any newly discovered evidence or highlight a clear error that warranted reconsideration. Id. at 4. Further, the Court granted in part, denied in part, and held in abeyance in part the Grower Defendants' motion for an award of attorneys' fees and costs. In support of their motion, the Grower Defendants submitted time charts listing the date, attorney, or paralegal performing the work, the individual's hourly rate, and work performed, for each of the three law firms – Stokes Lawrence, Seyfarth Shaw LLP, and Freeman – retained by the Grower Defendants. Id. at 1. The Grower Defendants also filed a chart summarizing their costs, as well as copies of the related receipts and billing statements. Id. at 2. The Court reviewed the time charts, especially in light of the EEOC's concern that the Grower Defendants overstaffed this action by having multiple attorneys and out-of-state law firms, and conducted an hour-by-hour analysis, to conclude that the vast majority of the hours were reasonable and necessary. Id. at 12-13. The Court noted that the action involved a number of motions, ranging from motions to dismiss, motions to stay, a motion to intervene by the U.S. Department of Justice, discovery motions, motions for sanctions, and summary judgment motions, and the Grower Defendants reasonably required the assistance of a number of attorneys, who necessarily spent time conferring with one another and the Grower Defendants to determine the best strategic defense. Id. at 13-14. The Court found the requested hourly rates for attorneys of Stokes, Lawrence, and Freeman as set forth in the time chart to be reasonable based on its familiarity with rates charged in the District. Id. at *15. The Court, however, was unable to determine based on the evidence before it whether the other attorney rates were reasonable. Id. at 17-18. Although the Grower Defendants filed declarations from experts to support its hourly rates, the Court noted that none of it stated whether the hourly rate charged was the prevailing market rate for an attorney of comparable skill, experience, and reputation within the community where the particular attorney worked. Id. at 17. Further, the Grower Defendants provided no declaration by other lawyers working in the same legal community who could attest the reasonableness of the charged rate. Id. The Court therefore ordered the Grower Defendants to supplement its fee request with declarations establishing the attorneys' hourly rates and cautioned that if failed, the Court would utilize the District's hourly rates for attorney and paralegals engaging in similar work to determine the attorneys' fees. Id. at 18. Accordingly, the Court granted in part, denied in part, and held in abeyance the Grower Defendants' joint motion for an award of attorneys' fees and costs.

EEOC v. Global Horizons, Inc.,* Case No. 11-CV-3045 (E.D. Wash. Oct. 21, 2015). The EEOC brought an action against Defendants, Global Horizons, Inc. and eight farms in Hawaii and Washington, including Green Acre Farms Inc. and Valley Fruit Orchards ("Grower Defendants") alleging violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 for engaging in a pattern or practice of harassment and discrimination against Thai workers. The Court previously ruled on the majority of the issues raised in the Grower Defendants' joint motion for award of attorneys' fees and costs, in which the Grower Defendants requested attorneys' fees of $915,734.07 of Stokes Lawrence, $124,859 of Seyfarth Shaw LLP, and $595.00 of Freeman Freeman & Smiley. Id. at 1. The EEOC objected to the award of attorneys' fees for work performed by defense counsel at an out-of-district rate. Id. The Court, therefore, held the Grower Defendants' motion for attorneys' fees in abeyance. Id. The Court found that it was reasonable for the Grower Defendants to have retained Seyfarth Shaw to associate with Stokes Lawrence, as this was challenging and complicated case, and Seyfarth Shaw had a national reputation for defending EEOC litigation. Id. Thus, the Court found that the Grower Defendants prudently associated Seyfarth Shaw in the case. Id. The EEOC argued that the Seyfarth Shaw hourly rates were higher than those charged in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Washington for attorneys of similar skill. Id. The Court agreed in part with the EEOC that the Grower Defendant's Declaration failed to provide a basis for an award of claimed fees at the rates sought for the out-of-district attorneys. Id. Subsequently, the Court ordered the Grower Defendants to submit a revised time chart reflecting the awarded hourly rates to enable the Court to determine a reasonable fee. Id. at 4. Accordingly, the Court held the Grower Defendants' motion in abeyance.

EEOC v. Global Horizons, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 148410 (E.D. Wash. Nov. 2, 2015). The EEOC brought an action against Defendants, Global Horizons, Inc. and eight farms in Hawaii and Washington, including Green Acre Farms Inc. and Valley Fruit Orchards (the "Grower Defendants") alleging violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 for engaging in an alleged pattern or practice of harassment and discrimination against Thai workers. The Court rejected the EEOC's case theory and evidence, and granted Defendants' motions for summary judgment. Previously, the Court had analyzed the fee request of the attorneys for the Grower Defendants and the EEOC's objections to the fee request. The Court found that it was reasonable and necessary for the Grower Defendants to retain counsel outside the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Washington given the nature of the case. The Court determined that it was particularly reasonable to retain Seyfarth Shaw, LLP, because of its familiarity with both EEOC litigation and the related EEOC litigation in Hawaii against Global Horizons. Id. at *3. Additionally, the Court also found that the hours claimed by the attorneys at Stokes Lawrence, Seyfarth Shaw, and Freeman, Freeman & Smiley were reasonable given the complexity of the case and the intensity of the litigation. Id. The Court reduced only Stokes Lawrence fee request of $915,734.07 by $9,189.50. Id. at *4. In this order, the Court contemplated its lodestar analysis. The Court first observed that because the lodestar is strongly presumed to be a reasonable fee, any enhancement to the lodestar is appropriate only in rare and exceptional circumstances. Id. After carefully considering the hourly rates and the number of hours claimed, the Court found them to be reasonable. Id. at *8. Given the complexity of the issues and the intensity of the litigation between the Grower Defendants and the EEOC and involving the large amount of damages claimed, and the time and skill required by counsel for the Grower Defendants to properly represent them, the Court found that the reduced fee award of $886,881.82 to Stokes Lawrence was reasonable and proper. Id. For the same reasons, the Court also found that a fee award of $85,156.50 to Seyfarth Shaw, and an award of $595 to Freeman, Freeman & Smiley was also reasonable and proper.

EEOC v. GNLV Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71186 (D. Nev. June 1, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant subjected its employees to a hostile work environment based either on sex or race, and retaliated against them. The EEOC filed a motion for summary judgement on Defendant's affirmative defenses. Defendant's third affirmative defense claimed that the EEOC's complaint was barred because Defendant's conduct at all times was privileged as it had always engaged in conduct within its rights in a permissible way. The Court allowed the defense to the extent it related to Defendant's claim that it exercised reasonable care in preventing harassment and that the claimants unreasonably failed to take advantage of corrective opportunities. Id. at *8-9. Defendant's next affirmative defense contended that the EEOC failed to allege facts sufficient to give rise to a claim for punitive damages. Id. at *9. Because the complaint asserted that Defendant acted with malice or with reckless indifference to the employees' federal protected rights, the Court found that this conformed with the applicable standard in awarding punitive damages. Id. at *9. The Court also denied the EEOC's motion as to the tenth affirmative defense, which alleged that the damages suffered by the individual employees were caused by their own willful acts, negligence, or omission. Id. at *10-11. One of the issues was whether Defendant knew or should have known about the discriminatory comments directed at Susie Fein, an employee. The Court remarked that if Fein's alleged failure to report the instances of discrimination prohibited Defendant from discovering and addressing the offensive conduct, then Fein's damages would be a result of her own omissions. Id. at *11. Defendant also asserted defenses that claimed that the EEOC failed to exhaust administrative remedies before filing the action. The Court observed that the EEOC can pursue any violations of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII") that are ascertained in the course of a reasonable investigation of a charge. Id. at *12-13. Here, in the course of investigation into the claims alleging racial harassment and retaliation by the charging party, Robert Royal, the EEOC had discovered that Defendant also allegedly retaliated against other employees, and had subjected them to racial and sexual harassment. Id. at *13. The Court thus disagreed with Defendant that the EEOC failed to follow procedure or exhaust remedies and accordingly, granted the motion in this respect. Defendant's affirmative defenses also asserted that the doctrine of laches barred the EEOC's claims. Id. The Court found that the three-and-a-half year gap between the time the EEOC received Royal's complaint and the filing of this action was unjustified, and denied the motion as to this defense. Id. at *14-15. Defendant's fourteenth affirmative defense contended that the EEOC's complaint was untimely. Because the statute of limitations does not apply to Title VII claims brought by the EEOC, and Defendant's interest in having this case timely pursued was better protected under its laches defense, the Court granted the motion as to the EEOC's Title VII claims. Id. at *15. The Court, however, denied the motion as to the emotional distress claim and any other claim for damages arising from state law. Id. at *15-16. Finally, Defendant's affirmative defenses also reserved its right to amend its answer to assert any applicable, additional, or other defenses constituting an avoidance or affirmative defense at such time as the nature of the EEOC's claims and facts related to them were revealed to Defendant. Because an affirmative defense must give the EEOC fair notice of the defense, and because this defense of Defendant offered no specific defense thereby failing the pleading requirement, the Court granted the motion for summary judgment on Defendant's affirmative defenses. Id. at *20-21. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part the EEOC's motion.

EEOC v. McLane Co.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 18702 (9th Cir. Oct. 27, 2015). An employee, Damiana Ochoa, filed a charge of discrimination against Defendant. Ochoa alleged that when she tried to return to work after taking maternity leave, Defendant informed her that she could not resume her position unless she passed a physical capability strength test. Id. at *2. Ochoa attempted the test three times. Id. Each time she failed, and, as a result, Defendant terminated her. Id. The EEOC undertook an investigation into the charge, requesting certain information from Defendant, including information on the strength test and the employees who had been required to take the test. Id. at *4. Defendant complied with most of the EEOC's requests, but refused to disclose pedigree information of its employees and the reasons it terminated employees who took the test. Id. The EEOC filed a subpoena enforcement action against Defendant seeking this information. The District Court denied the EEOC's request for this information and the EEOC appealed. In considering whether the EEOC was entitled to employee pedigree information, the Ninth Circuit opined that the EEOC is entitled to "virtually any material that might cast light on the allegations against the employer." Id. at *9. Under this loose standard, the Ninth Circuit held that employee pedigree information was relevant to the EEOC's investigation because such information could be used by the EEOC to speak with other employees who took the test and determine whether there was any truth to Ochoa's allegations. Id. at *11-12. The Ninth Circuit rejected Defendant's arguments against the enforcement of the subpoena. Id. at *12-17. First, it rejected Defendant's argument that pedigree information was not relevant to the charge because Ochoa only alleged a disparate impact claim, not a disparate treatment claim. Id. at 12. The Ninth Circuit found such information was nonetheless relevant, reasoning that Ochoa's charge was framed "general enough" to support either theory. Id. Second, it rejected Defendant's argument that pedigree information was not necessary to the EEOC's investigation. The Ninth Circuit stressed that the governing standard was relevance, not necessity, and noted that the pedigree information was clearly relevant to Ochoa's charge. Id. at *13. Third, the Ninth Circuit rejected Defendant's position that pedigree information was not relevant because the strength test was neutrally applied, which, Defendant argued, cannot, by definition, give rise to disparate treatment, systemic or otherwise. Id. at *15. The Ninth Circuit reasoned that even if the strength test applied to everyone, the test still could be applied in a discriminatory manner. Id. at *15-16. For example, Defendant could fire the women who failed the test, but not the men who failed. Id. Finally, the Ninth Circuit turned to the issue of whether the EEOC was entitled to the reasons Defendant terminated employees who took the test. Id. at *17-18. Although it determined that this information was relevant to the EEOC's investigation, it noted that Defendant did not have to produce this information if it would be unduly burdensome. Id. The Ninth Circuit thus remanded this issue to the District Court for further consideration.

EEOC v. Parker Drilling Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34937 (D. Alaska Mar. 20, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant, an Alaska-based oil drilling company, violated the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") when it refused to hire a worker based on his visual impairment. Although Defendant extended a conditional offer of employment to the worker, who was blind in his left eye, it withdrew that offer after it received a post-offer medical evaluation report. Id. at *2. Defendant moved for partial summary judgment, asserting that the EEOC's claims should be dismissed due to the EEOC's failure to meet its prerequisite obligation to conciliate prior to filing the suit. Id. at *4. The Court denied Defendant's motion, finding that the EEOC met its burden to conciliate the matter. Id. at *20. The Court noted that, in a letter dated September 14, 2012, the EEOC had notified Defendant of its determination that the worker was a "qualified individual" under the ADA, and that his work history and demonstrated ability to work in the position undermined Defendant's explanation for denying him employment. Id. at *8-9. The Court found that the EEOC's letter had adequately outlined to Defendant the reasonable cause for its belief about a potential Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 violation. Id. at *9. The Court further determined that the EEOC and Defendant had exchanged formal communications through counsel regarding conciliation, and in a letter dated December 7, 2012, the EEOC had outlined its initial offer of settlement. In the offer, the EEOC sought $354,617.74 in estimated back pay and $150,000 in compensatory and punitive damages. Id. at *9. Defendant responded to the EEOC by stating that the proposal greatly exceeded everything the EEOC could potentially recover even if successful in litigation. Id. at *10-11. Subsequently, the parties exchanged numerous letters on the proposal for resolution, and finally, in a letter dated April 12, 2013, the EEOC informed Defendant that the efforts to conciliate had been unsuccessful, and further conciliation efforts would be futile. Id. at *14. Defendant asserted that the EEOC did not conciliate in a meaningful manner as it did not provide the basis of the alleged damages or the settlement demand. Id. at *16. According to Defendant, the EEOC could not generically respond to an employer's request for a basis for the EEOC's calculations by stating that the demand was comprised of "back pay, compensatory damages and front pay" without setting out a basis for its calculations. Id. The Court, however, noted that Defendant had sufficient information to be able to evaluate the reasonableness of the EEOC's settlement proposal because the EEOC's letter had set out the factors it included in its back pay calculation. Id. at *17. The Court also reasoned that the record indicated that during the conciliation process, the EEOC had adequately explained its position and exchanged multiple letters with Defendant. Id. at *19. The Court opined that the EEOC's obligation to seek conciliation in good faith did not require it to convince Defendant of the merits of its position or to compromise claims it considered meritorious for the sake of avoiding litigation. Id. The Court therefore concluded that the EEOC's approach to conciliation was reasonable and responsive in light of all the circumstances. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for partial summary judgment.

EEOC v. Parker Drilling Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 69608 (D. Alaska May 29, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant discriminated against Kevin McDowell for his monocular vision by rescinding a job offer to him in February 2010 for a manager position on an oil rig. The EEOC proceeded to trial on the claim. The jury concluded that the EEOC had proven the disability claim but the jury did not award non-economic damages for that claim. Id. at *2. The jury also found that Defendant had violated the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") and awarded McDowell $15,000 in non-economic damages for that claim. Id. at *2-3. The jury did not award punitive damages. The Court then set forth its findings of fact and conclusions of law on the award of economic losses and an injunctive remedy. Regarding the award of back pay, the Court noted that if McDowell had been hired by Defendant as a junior rig manager in 2010, he would have received 11 months of income during that year for a salary of $114,989, and started working as a senior rig manager in 2011 and continued in that position through trial. Id. at *5. For the first three months of 2014, McDowell earned $55,908 as a rig manager while working for Inlet Drilling. In May 2014, McDowell became a consultant for an oil company and continued in that position throughout most of 2014. Id. at *7. McDowell introduced consulting invoices for work performed through October 2014 and for additional consulting work through December 2014. The Court thus estimated that McDowell's income for 2014 was $200,033. McDowell, however, did not receive any employee benefits after the first three months of the year. Id. at *7-8. The Court opined that McDowell was entitled to back pay from February 2010 to the date of trial because he remained steadily employed through most of that time, and continued to look for work after December 2014, when the consulting job ended, up until trial and because McDowell had used reasonable diligence in seeking and retaining employment. Id. at *8. The Court awarded back pay based on the difference between the actual earnings and the value of Defendant's benefits McDowell would have received. Id. at *9-10. As to other monetary relief, the Court declined to award front pay. Id. at *10-11. Based upon McDowell's job history, the evidence regarding the volatility of employment in the oil industry in Alaska, and the average tenure at which McDowell had stayed at various positions during his career, the Court found it more likely than not that McDowell would not have continued working at Defendant after March 2015 if he had begun there in February 2010, a period of over five years. Id. at *11. Moreover, based upon his 2014 earnings, the Court noted that with reasonable diligence, and beginning in April 2015, McDowell was more likely than not to find employment at an earnings level commensurate to what he would have earned had he been working at Defendant. Id. Further, the Court reasoned that reinstatement was not warranted because the award of the approximate five years in back pay was the appropriate remedy to make McDowell whole. Id. Finally, because there was no evidence of any other instances of disability discrimination at any time since February 2010, and because there was no risk of future disability-based discrimination against job applicants, the Court ruled that injunctive relief was unnecessary. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court awarded McDowell $230,619 in back pay and denied an award of front pay and injunctive relief. Id. at *17-18.

EEOC v. Peters' Bakery,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26601 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 4, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant had subjected an employee to racial and ethnic slurs and terminated her on the basis of race and/or national origin in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. On December 22, 2014, the Court had disqualified Defendant's counsel and stayed proceedings for 30 days to allow Defendant to retain new counsel. Although the Court had granted Defendant an extension of the stay in order to prepare a petition for writ of mandamus to challenge the ruling, the extended stay expired by its own terms on February 13, 2015. Defendant thereafter filed its second motion to extend the stay, whereby it sought to continue the stay pending resolution of its petition for writ of mandamus. Id. at *1-2. The Court denied Defendant's motion. Id. at *2. The Court found that Defendant had not demonstrated a likelihood of success on the merits of its petition for writ of mandamus. Id. at *3. Given the extraordinarily high standard for mandamus, the Court found that Defendant had not raised any serious question on the merits of its petition. Id. at *3-4. Although the Court noted that the disqualification of a party's first-choice counsel was unquestionably harmful, it found that fact discovery in this action had not concluded (in fact, the Court had stayed discovery on October 30, 2014, pending resolution of the disqualification motion, which disrupted a number of scheduled depositions). Id. at *4. The Court reasoned that any potential harm to Defendant from having to retain new counsel could be mitigated through adjustments to the case schedule. Moreover, the Court found that the EEOC had an interest in completing discovery and "obtaining timely justice," and it would be extremely prejudicial to stay this action indefinitely. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's second motion to extend the stay. Id. at *4-5.

EEOC v. Peters' Bakery*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 86920 (N.D. Cal. July 2, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant harassed and discriminated against an employee, Marcela Ramirez, based upon her race and national origin, and retaliated against her in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Defendant had previously terminated Ramirez's employment, and then reinstated her following an union arbitration. Id. at *2. The EEOC claimed that Defendant continued to harass and retaliate against Ramirez following reinstatement. The EEOC sought a temporary restraining order ("TRO") and a preliminary injunction enjoining Defendant from terminating Ramirez once again and from disciplining or harassing her, which the Court granted in part. The EEOC presented evidence that following her reinstatement, Ramirez was told that she was being fired for lying. Id. at *3-4. The Court noted that in Winter v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 555 U.S. 7 (2008), the U.S. Supreme Court found that a party seeking preliminary injunction must show: (i) he is likely to succeed on merits; (ii) he was likely to face irreparable harm; and (iii) the balance of equity was in his favor. Id. at *4. As to the EEOC's allegations of threatened termination, the Court found the language that Defendant used in the meeting with Ramirez, coupled with offering no legitimate business reason for terminating her, was sufficient to satisfy the first factor. Id. at *6. The Court found that the second factor also favored the EEOC because Ramirez stated in her declaration that if she lost her job, she would not have enough money to pay her mortgage and keep her children in private Catholic school. Id. The Court similarly found that the third and fourth factors also favored the EEOC as to the threatened termination claim. As to the EEOC's discipline and harassment claims, the Court remarked that the EEOC failed to establish a likelihood that such conduct was likely to cause irreparable injury absent a TRO. Id. at *7. The Court observed that Ramirez's declaration focused upon the repercussions of losing her job rather than the effects of Defendant's day-to-day conduct. Accordingly, the Court granted TRO as to the threatened termination claim, but denied as to discipline and harassment.

EEOC v. Peters' Bakery*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96432 (N.D. Cal. July 22, 2015). In September 2013, the EEOC filed suit against Defendant alleging that it subjected an employee, Marcela Ramirez, to harassment and discrimination based upon her race/national origin and that Defendant had retaliated against Ramirez after she engaged in protected activity of filing a charge with the EEOC. The EEOC also alleged that Defendant terminated Ramirez' employment in August 2011, but was forced to reinstate her after an arbitrator ordered Defendant to do so in a union grievance proceeding. On June 30, 2015, Defendant informed Ramirez that she was being fired, effective July 3, 2015. When asked why, Defendant allegedly stated that Ramirez "knew why," and that it did not have to give Ramirez "a fucking reason." Id. at *3. The EEOC filed an application for a temporary restraining order ("TRO") and an order to show cause for entry of a preliminary injunction on July 2, 2015. The Commission sought to enjoin Defendant from terminating, disciplining, threatening, or harassing Ramirez. The Court granted the TRO in part, thereby enjoining Defendant from terminating Ramirez pending a hearing on the motion for preliminary injunction. Id. at *4. On July 22, 2015, following oral argument, the Court granted the EEOC's request for a preliminary injunction in part, thereby enjoining Defendant from terminating Ramirez' employment pending resolution of the lawsuit. The Court first addressed Defendant's argument that the EEOC was seeking a mandatory injunction reinstating Ramirez, and thus the EEOC has a heavier burden. Id. at *6. The Court rejected this argument, noting it was not supported by the evidence because Ramirez had not been fired before the TRO of July 2, 2015. Id. at *6-7. Rather, the Court found that Ramirez had been given notice that she would be fired effective July 3, 2015. Id. at *7. Additionally, the Court held that even if the EEOC was requesting reinstatement, the EEOC would be entitled to such relief under the Court's broad authority to grant preliminary injunctive relief and due to the fact that reinstatement is a form of relief specifically provided for by Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Id. at *8. The Court applied the four part test for a preliminary injunction set forth in Winter v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 555 U.S. 7 (2008). Under this four part test, a Plaintiff seeking a preliminary injunctive relief must establish: (i) that he is likely to succeed on the merits; (ii) that he is likely to suffer irreparable harm in the absence of preliminary relief; (iii) that the balance of equities tips in his favor; and (iv) that an injunction is in the public interest. Id. at *5. The Court found that the EEOC satisfied its burden to establish each of these four elements with regard to the threatened termination, but not with regard to the harassment and discipline. Id. at *13. The Court found the EEOC established the first Winter factor – likelihood of success on the merits – because the EEOC submitted evidence that Defendant previously terminated Ramirez in August 2011 without cause, refused to comply with an arbitrator's order to reinstate her; used language on July 30, 2015 giving rise to an inference of improper motive; and gave no legitimate business reason for terminating Ramirez. Id. at *8. The Court also found that the EEOC satisfied the second factor – likelihood of irreparable harm – citing Ramirez' declaration, which stated that if she was fired, Ramirez would not have enough money to pay her mortgage, keep her children in private school, lose healthcare benefits, lose the positive relationships she developed with co-workers over the last 14 years working at Peters' Bakery, and lose her seniority in the union. Id. at *9. The Court also noted that terminating Ramirez may have a chilling effect on other employees who might wish to file charges with the EEOC and could interfere with the EEOC's mission. Id. at *9-10. As to the third and fourth Winter factors – the balance of equities and whether an injunction is in the public interest – the Court found that the equities tipped in the EEOC's favor. Id. at *10. The Court denied the EEOC's request for a preliminary injunction to enjoin discipline and harassment. Id. at *13. The Court noted that the EEOC did not present specific evidence regarding the irreparable harm Ramirez would suffer if the harassment and discipline was not enjoined. Id. Further the Court found the injunction would be hopelessly vague to the point of threatening Defendant's due process rights. Id. Accordingly, Plaintiff's application for a preliminary injunction was granted in part. Id. at *13-14.

EEOC v. Placer Arc*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 90736 (E.D. Cal. July 13, 2015). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of a deaf employee, Homeyra Kazerounian, alleging that Defendant retaliated against her for seeking an accommodation on the basis of her disability and constructively discharged her in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Id. at *2. Defendant was a not-for-profit organization that provided programs for the support, education, and well-being of individuals with intellectual and developmental disabilities, and Defendant hired Kazerounian as an instructional aide. Id. at *7-8. Defendant produced e-mails to Kazerounian noting and detailing her performance deficiencies, including that she: (i) failed to implement the training she received through an interpreter; (ii) failed to follow her daily schedule; and (iii) failed to effectively communicate with Defendant's clients. Id. at *12. In addition, one of Kazerounian's supervisors testified that she often needed to be led through her daily tasks, and needed more guidance than other staff members. Id. at *13. Kazerounian subsequently terminated her employment because she felt that she might get fired since Defendant had given her negative feedback. Defendant moved for summary judgment, and the Court granted the motion in part. At the outset, the Court noted that in order to establish a prima facie case under the ADA, a Plaintiff must show that she was able to perform the essential functions of a job requirement. Id. at *17. Here, the essential functions included instructing classes in areas of general life skills, teaching independent living skills, and helping consumers to increase their communications skills. Id. at *18. Defendant contended that Kazerounian failed to perform her job duties. The Court found that the EEOC raised a triable issue as to Kazerounian's ability to perform her essential job duties with sworn declarations from five co-workers stating that she was "very good with clients," and a "great team member." Id. at *19-20. The Court observed that the Ninth Circuit has held that co-workers' testimony was relevant and probative in employment discrimination claims. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the EEOC raised a genuine dispute of material fact as to Kazerounian's capability of performing the essential functions of her job. Defendant next sought summary judgment on the ground Kazerounian's requested accommodation of an ASL interpreter at every staff meeting was an undue hardship. Id. at *22. Defendant submitted declarations supporting its position that hiring Kazerounian a certified ASL interpreter posed a financial hardship. Id. at *23. The Court, however, noted that as Defendant had retained an interpreter for at least some staff meetings from 2005 to 2008, and hired Sheila Maas in part to serve as an interpreter, which undermined a showing of hardship. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the EEOC had established a triable fact as to Defendant's undue hardship defense. The EEOC claimed that Defendant retaliated against Kazerounian when she filed an internal complaint and retained an attorney, who contacted Defendant in 2008 about her allegations of discrimination. Defendant argued that the EEOC failed to point to any causal link between Kazerounian's complaints and Defendant's allegedly adverse actions in March 2009. Id. at *28. The Court noted that the disciplinary write-up in March 2009, the letter in April 2009, and the subsequent warnings in September and October 2009 occurred after Kazerounian contacted an attorney in October 2008, and after she lodged an internal complaint in February 2009. Id. The Court remarked that although causation can be inferred from the temporal proximity, the fact that Kazerounian received negative performance feedback going back to 2007 showed that Defendant's actions were not a pre-text for discrimination. Id. at *30. Accordingly, the Court granted summary judgment to Defendant on the EEOC's retaliation claim. The Court however, denied summary judgment to Defendant on the EEOC's constructive discharge claim, finding a genuine dispute as to whether Defendant's failure to accommodate led to Kazerounian's resignation. Id. at *31.

EEOC v. Placer Arc,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 159585 (E.D. Cal. Nov. 25, 2015). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of a deaf employee, Homeyra Kazerounian, alleging that Defendant retaliated against her for seeking an accommodation on the basis of her disability and constructively discharged her in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Id. at *2-3. Defendant, a non-profit organization that provides programs for the support, education, and well-being of individuals with intellectual and developmental disabilities, hired Kazerounian as an instructional aide in 2005. During her first three years, Kazerounian worked at a facility under the supervision of certified sign language interpreters. Later, Defendant transferred her to another facility, and hired Sheila Mass as an instructional aide with the understanding that Mass would provide interpretation services to Kazerounian. Id. at *3. Kazerounian, however, found Mass' interpretation services unsatisfactory and left Defendant in May 2010. The EEOC alleged that Defendant did not reasonably accommodate Kazerounian's disability because it did not provide qualified sign language interpreters or other reasonable and affective accommodations after her transfer to new facility. Id. at *4. The EEOC also alleged that Defendant retaliated against Kazerounian for asserting her rights under the ADA, and that her work conditions became so intolerable that she was forced to resign. Id. Defendant moved for summary judgment, which the Court granted in part on the claim of retaliation in violation of the ADA. Id. at *4-5. Defendant then filed motions in limine seeking to exclude the EEOC's expert witness, Shana Williams, from offering an opinion about Kazerounian's functional ability to communicate in American Sign Language ("ASL") and in English. Id. at *5. Defendant argued that Williams' testimony was inadmissible because: (i) Williams' 2014 testing could not establish Kazerounian's communicative and cognitive skills during the time she worked at Defendant's facility between 2005 and 2010; (ii) Williams' opinions about the reasonableness of Defendant's accommodation in those years would be speculative because Williams lacked facts and data about Kazerounian's cognitive and language abilities between 2008 and 2010; and (iii) Williams' opinion about the deaf culture did not account for either Kazerounian's immigration from Iran in 2000 or the differences between the Iranian deaf culture and the deaf culture in the United States. Id. at *13. Denying Defendant's motion, the Court found that Williams' opinions were reliable, despite her reliance on test results that post-dated Kazerounian's employment. Id. The Court noted that no evidence suggested that Kazerounian's communicative and cognitive abilities transformed between 2005 and 2014, or that she experienced head trauma, sinus conditions, or changes in her physical health or environment. Id. at *14. The Court found that Williams' opinions had a reliable factual basis because she read Kazerounian's deposition, spoke to Kazerounian, reviewed her job description, and considered other documents from Kazerounian's time at Defendant's facility. Id. at *15. Williams also considered the results of the tests she conducted and found that with certain specific accommodations, Kazerounian would likely have been able to perform the tasks listed in her job description. Id. Regarding Williams' comparison of the deaf culture in Iran and the U.S., the Court found that although Defendant's argument was plausible as a general matter, Defendant offered no evidence to illustrate the differences, and thus failed to show that Williams' testimony was unreliable or irrelevant. Id. at *16. Defendant also moved to exclude testimony by Lindy Hicks, a former employee, about her role in hiring Kazerounian, including inquiries about reasonable accommodations she would need to perform her job and other related topics. Id. at *18. The Court held that Hicks could offer testimony about Kazerounian's ability to perform the essential functions of an instructional aide, reasoning that if Hicks testified that Kazerounian could perform the essential functions of her job in 2007, it was more likely the EEOC would establish that Kazerounian could also perform those same essential functions in 2008. Id. at *21. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motions in limine.

EEOC v. Pioneer Hotel, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6561 (D. Nev. Jan. 13, 2015). The EEOC brought a Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 action alleging that charging party Raymond Duarte and a class of similarly-situated individuals suffered harassment constituting a hostile work environment on the basis of their national origin. During discovery, Defendant sought to depose the two EEOC investigators were responsible for conducting the investigation. The EEOC moved for a protective order seeking to prevent Defendant from deposing the investigators, which the Magistrate Judge granted. Id. at *3. Defendant filed an objection to the Magistrate Judge's order per Rule 72, which the Court remanded to the Magistrate Judge. Defendant contended that the Magistrate Judge's order was erroneous because after the order, the EEOC changed its position on the relevancy and admissibility of its Letter of Determination, which was created after the EEOC investigation. Id. at *3-4. The EEOC stated that the letter was irrelevant to the underlying charge of discrimination and thus it would not seek to use the letter as evidence at trial. Id. at *4. The Court, however, observed that the EEOC had not stated that it intended to offer the letter at trial and in support of forthcoming motions for summary judgment. Id. The Court noted that the EEOC's initial statement during the hearing that it would seek to enter the Letter of Determination as evidence was part of the Magistrate Judge's reasoning in granting the protective order. Id. Although the EEOC argued that offering the Letter of Determination into evidence in this action would not affect the Magistrate Judge's ruling, the Court concluded that only the Magistrate Judge could make such a determination. Id. Accordingly, the Court remanded Defendant's Rule 72 objection to the Magistrate Judge for further proceedings consistent with this order. Id.

(x) Tenth Circuit

EEOC v. Beverage Distributors Co., LLC,* 780 F.3d 1018 (10th Cir. 2015). The EEOC brought an action under the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") alleging that Defendant withdrew its conditional offer of employment to applicant Michael Sungaila after it learned that he was legally blind. The EEOC proceeded to trial. Although the jury found that Defendant was liable for discrimination and that Sungaila did not pose a direct threat (thereby rejecting the employer's defense), the jury eventually awarded the EEOC a reduced back pay award, finding that Sungaila had failed to mitigate his damages. Id. at 1020. After considering the EEOC's post-trial motions, the District Court reinstated the full damage award, finding that Defendant had failed to prove as a matter of law that Sungaila failed to mitigate his damages, and also granted the EEOC's motion for a tax penalty off-set to compensate Sungaila for the additional tax liability resulting from the lump-sum award of back pay. Id. On appeal, Defendant argued that the direct threat instruction constituted reversible error, and that the District Court abused its discretion in awarding the tax off-set. Id. The Tenth Circuit reversed, finding that the direct threat jury instruction constituted reversible error. Id.

The Tenth Circuit, however, remarked that if the EEOC prevailed upon retrial, Sungaila could be entitled to a tax off-set. First, the Tenth Circuit agreed with Defendant that the direct threat instruction constituted reversible error because the instruction inaccurately conveyed the direct threat standard. Id. The Tenth Circuit noted that under the ADA, although an employer cannot discriminate on the basis of a disability, an employer may decide not to hire disabled individuals if they pose a "direct threat" to the health or safety of themselves or others. Id. Further, a "direct threat" involves a significant risk of substantial harm to the health or safety of the person or others that cannot be eliminated or reduced by reasonable accommodation. Id. at 1020-21. The Tenth Circuit found that the instruction was erroneous. Id. at 1022. While the first part of the instruction inaccurately stated that Defendant had to prove that Sungaila posed a direct threat, the second part of the instruction did not cure the error by directing the jury, without explanation, to consider the reasonableness of Defendant's belief. Id. The Tenth Circuit concluded that the jury might have relied on the erroneous direct threat standard. Id. Because the instruction and verdict form could have misled the jury on the standard, the Tenth Circuit reversed the order. Id. The Tenth Circuit, however, declined to address Defendant's argument that the evidence could have allowed the jury to find a failure to mitigate damages. Id. The Tenth Circuit reasoned that the District Court did not err in awarding a tax off-set because the award fell within the District Court's discretion. Id. at 2013. The Tenth Circuit observed that Sungaila obtained a lump-sum damage award that would increase his tax liability, and that the District Court acted within its discretion in compensating Sungaila for the added tax burden. Id. Accordingly, the Tenth Circuit concluded that the District Court did not err in awarding a tax off-set. Id.

EEOC v. Blinded Veterans Association*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 118730 (D. Colo. July 7, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant discriminated against two employees, Suzanne Matthews and Lazaro Martinez, on the basis of their age in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA"). Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that: (i) the EEOC did not make a good faith attempt to conciliate, and (ii) the EEOC did not conduct independent investigations of the charges of discrimination at issue. The Court denied the motion. At the outset, the Court noted that § 7(b) of the ADEA requires that the EEOC should attempt to eliminate the discriminatory practice, and to effect voluntary compliance with the ADEA through conciliation before filing an action. Id. at *5-6. The Court observed that the text of the ADEA does not contain a clear statement that § 7(b)'s conciliation requirement was jurisdictional. Id. at *8. The Court noted that § 7(b) requires that the EEOC take certain actions before instituting any action under this section, but it does not indicate that the failure to comply deprives a Court of jurisdiction. Id. In addition, the Court noted that the legislative history of the 1978 amendments to the ADEA confirmed that conciliation was not a jurisdictional prerequisite to maintaining a cause of action under the act. Id. at *9. Moreover the Court reasoned that in Federal Express Corp. v. Holowecki, 552 U.S. 389 (2008), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that a private ADEA action may be stayed to allow an opportunity for conciliation and settlement, even if the EEOC has not begun conciliation efforts. Id. at *14. The Court remarked that Holowecki showed that conciliation was a non-jurisdictional prerequisite to the suit. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the Defendant's motion was improper. The Court, however, remarked that if it ruled on Defendant's motion under the summary judgment standard, neither party would be prejudiced, and it would also give Defendant a benefit of the doubt to consider whether it was entitled to relief. Id. at *19-20. As the ADEA and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII") contained similar language, the parties agreed that the standard of review used in Title VII also applied to the ADEA's conciliation requirements. Id. at *20. The Court observed that the EEOC communicated its claims to Defendant, allowed Defendant to respond, engaged in discussions, and decreased its requests for monetary relief in response to Defendant's counter-offers. Id. at *21-22. Defendant did not dispute these facts, but argued that the EEOC did not adhere to the intent of the conciliation requirement. Defendant argued that when the parties reached an impasse with respect to one of the employees' claims, the EEOC should have engaged in separate conciliation as to the other employees. Id. The Court rejected this argument, finding that it was undisputed that the EEOC engaged in conciliation efforts, and gave Defendant all opportunities to remedy the issues. Id. at *23. The Court concluded that this was sufficient to show that the EEOC satisfied its statutory duty to conciliate. Id. at *27. Defendant also contended that the EEOC failed to independently investigate the charges, and that an investigation was mandatory prerequisite to the action. Based on the records, the Court observed that the EEOC gathered information, conducted interviews, reviewed charges, and issued letters of determination based on the investigative record. Id. at *28. The Court remarked that Defendant failed to point to any facts supporting its assertion that the EEOC failed to investigate. Id. at *31. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

EEOC v. BNSF Railway Co.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3790 (D. Kan. Jan. 13, 2015). The EEOC brought a disability discrimination action against Defendant under the Americans With Disabilities Act on behalf of a job applicant who was denied employment after a medical examination revealed that because of a physical impairment in one hand, he was unable to perform the essential functions of the job. The EEOC and Plaintiff-Intervener jointly moved to compel Defendant to answer the request for admissions filed by them, which the Court granted in part. Id. at *1. First, Defendant objected to the timeframe as to several requests for information concerning job requirements, which included periods beyond Plaintiff-Intervener's employment. The EEOC argued that such evidence would be relevant to a determination of whether job requirements were or were not essential. Id. at *2. The Court observed that parties may obtain discovery regarding any matter, not privileged, that is relevant to the claim or defense of any party, and that discovery ordinarily should be allowed unless it is clear that the information sought can have no possible bearing on the subject matter of the action. Id. The Court opined that these questions were within the scope of discovery, and thus, granted the motion as to these objections. Id. at *4. Defendant also objected as to the relevance of two requests that asked for an admission that certain documents produced in discovery were not provided to the EEOC during its administrative investigation. The Court remarked that neither the EEOC's investigation nor its conclusions were relevant in this case, and observed that it had previously denied similar discovery. Id. Because the EEOC failed to demonstrate the relevance of these requests, the Court sustained Defendant's objections and struck the answers. Id. The Court observed that if an answer is not admitted, the answer must specifically deny the request or state in detail why the answering party cannot truthfully admit or deny it. Id. Although the EEOC challenged certain qualifications added to Defendant's admission of requests, the Court stated that they were not good faith qualifications as required by the rule. Id. at *5. Thus, each of those requests remained admitted and the Court remarked that it would need to decide whether the qualification comments were irrelevant surplusage or should be included with the response if submitted to the jury. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' joint motion to compel Defendant to answer its request for admissions. Id.

EEOC v. BNSF Railway Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110830 (D. Kan. Aug. 21, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") by discriminating against a job applicant on the basis of the applicant's actual or perceived disability and by revoking a conditional offer of employment based on the results of a post-offer medical evaluation. Id. at *1-2. The EEOC also alleged that Defendant violated the ADA by using the result of the pre-employment medical examination to disqualify the applicant from the position. The job applicant intervened in the action alleging additionally that Defendant failed to engage in an interactive process with him to assess adequately his abilities to perform the job and to address Defendant's safety concerns. Id. at *2. Defendant moved for summary judgment on all claims, which the Court granted. Id. While it was undisputed that the job applicant had a physical impairment and functional limitations relating to his right hand, there was no evidence in the record that his impairment prevented him from doing activities that were of central importance to most people's daily lives. Id. at *14-16. The Court noted that the job applicant's impairment did not substantially limit his ability to perform manual tasks, and he had admitted that he could perform tasks with his right hand that involved holding, grasping, turning and pulling; and he did not need any assistance with any activities of daily living. Id. at *21. The Court thus held that the EEOC failed to present sufficient evidence to permit a jury to find a severe restriction in the job applicant's ability to perform a range of manual tasks, and thus could not satisfy the rigorous standard for proving an actual disability under the ADA. Id. at *23-24. The EEOC also contended that Defendant believed, based on the applicant's impairments to his right arm and hand, that he was substantially limited in the major life activities of performing manual tasks and working. Id. at *25. In support of its argument, the EEOC contended that Defendant's medical director had reported that the applicant's impairment prevented him from firmly gripping tools with both hands and from climbing ladders in compliance with an industry-wide three-point contact safety rule, which showed that Defendant regarded the applicant as substantially limited in working those jobs. Id. at *31. The Court, however, declined to find that a perceived inability to grip tools firmly was sufficient to support a claim that Defendant regarded the job applicant as substantially limited in the major life activity of working. Id. at *35. Similarly, the Court declined to find that the statements of Defendant's medical director linked to the applicant's impairment relative to the job tasks of climbing on and off locomotives was sufficient to create a factual issue on whether Defendant regarded him as substantially limited in performing a class of jobs or a broad range of jobs in various classes. Id. at *38-40. The Court found no evidence to conclude that Defendant regarded the job applicant as significantly limited in his ability to perform any job other than the locomotive electrician job because of the safety concerns implicated by his perceived inability to comply with Defendant's three-point contact rule as it related to that job. Id. at *42. According to the Court, the evidence reflected only that Defendant, at most, believed that the job applicant's impairment disqualified him from any job which required the ability to comply with its three-point contact rule, but not that he would be disqualified from any other jobs. Id. at *50. Because no reasonable jury could conclude that Defendant believed that the job applicant's impairment substantially limited his ability to work in a class of jobs or a broad range of jobs in various classes, and because the EEOC failed to establish that the job applicant was a qualified individual with a disability or that an accommodation was necessary for the job applicant or possible with respect to Defendant's medical evaluation process, the Court concluded that the EEOC failed to establish a prima facie case of employment discrimination under the ADA. Id. at *50-57. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *58.

EEOC v. CollegeAmerica Denver, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 127808 (D. Colo. Sept. 21, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant denied its former campus director, Debbi Potts, and other employees the right to exercise their rights under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act. The EEOC also alleged that Defendant retaliated against Potts by filing a state court action against her. After the Court ruled on the dispositive motions, only the retaliation claim remained. Id. at *2. The EEOC claimed that Potts exercised her statutorily-established right to file a charge of discrimination and that Defendant retaliated against her for doing so by filing the state lawsuit against her. Defendant filed a motion to compel the EEOC to provide Defendant its responses to its request for production of documents ("RFP") numbers 8, 9, and 10, which the Court granted. As to RFP numbers 9 and 10, Defendant limited the scope to information contained in Potts' Facebook and LinkedIn messages and in RFP number 8, Defendant limited the scope of the responsive messages from September 1, 2012 to March 21, 2013. Id. at *2. Defendant argued that the information requested was relevant to the EEOC's remaining claim and may lead to the discovery of admissible evidence. Defendant contended that Potts' e-mails and other social media communications could address relevant issues in the case. Id. at *5. The Court considered the arguments of the parties and held that the information that Defendant sought was relevant, discoverable, and may lead to admissible evidence at trial. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel.

Editor's Note: The Court's ruling manifests the ever increasing frequency of discovery into social media postings in EEOC litigation.

EEOC v. CollegeAmerica Denver, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144302 (D. Colo. Oct. 23, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant discriminated against Debbi Potts, an employee, in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") and sought to use an unlawful and invalid waiver to interfere with Potts' protected rights under the ADEA. Id. at *5. The EEOC's letter of determination requested Defendant to revise its "form severance agreement" to comply with the ADEA and make it clear that employees retain the right to file charges and cooperate with the EEOC. Id. at *5-6. In response, Defendant sent a letter to the EEOC in which it noted the requested changes to its "form severance agreement" and clarified that the agreement Potts signed following her resignation was distinguishable from its form severance agreements ("separation agreements"). Id. at *6. Defendant eventually moved to dismiss the EEOC's claim that the separation agreements that Defendant provided to the EEOC in connection with the EEOC's investigation of Potts' charge of discrimination denied employees other than Potts the full exercise of their rights under the ADEA and interfered with the statutorily assigned responsibility of the EEOC to investigate charges of discrimination under the ADEA. Id. at *1-2. The Court granted Defendant's motion, finding that it had no jurisdiction over the claim as a result of the EEOC's failure to satisfy the ADEA requirements of notice and conciliation. Id. at *2. The EEOC moved to reconsider the dismissal based on the subsequent U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Mach Mining, LLC v. EEOC, 135 S. Ct. 1645 (2015), which considered whether and to what extent the EEOC's efforts at conciliation under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 may be reviewed. The Court denied reconsideration because it ruled that the dismissal of the EEOC claim was proper. The Court noted that, after receiving Defendant's response to the EEOC's letter of determination, there was no evidence that the EEOC revised or supplemented the letter or otherwise notified Defendant that the scope of its investigation had expanded beyond Potts' charge of discrimination to include the separation agreements. Id. at *6. Further, there was no evidence that the parties addressed the separation agreements at their conciliation meeting or that EEOC provided the requisite notice to Defendant that the agreements were part of the EEOC's investigation. Id. at *7. The Court therefore concluded that the EEOC failed to satisfy both the notice and conciliation requirements of the ADEA, and it efforts with respect to the separation agreements remained inadequate even under the standards set forth in Mach Mining. Id. at *8. In addition, the Court found that even if it had jurisdiction, the EEOC's claim as to the separation agreements failed as a matter of law. Id. at *12-13. The Court noted that Potts did not sign any of the separation agreements that formed the basis of the EEOC's claim, and the EEOC failed to identify any instance in which the waiver provisions in the separation agreements affected its rights and abilities to enforce the ADEA for the benefits of any other of Defendant's employee or to justify interfering with an employee's right to file an EEOC charge or participate in an EEOC investigation or proceeding. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court denied the EEOC's motion for reconsideration of the dismissal order.

EEOC v. CollegeAmerica Denver, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 163816 (D. Colo. Dec. 3, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant filed a retaliatory lawsuit against an employee, Debbi Potts, for filing a charge of discrimination with the EEOC alleging violations of the ADEA. The EEOC filed a motion to compel Defendant to respond fully to the EEOC's interrogatories and request for production as to its electronically-stored information, which the Court granted in part. The Court overruled Defendant's objections to the EEOC's discovery, finding that Defendant only responded in a generic fashion as to its information technology team. The Court granted the EEOC's motion in part, and directed Defendant to provide specific names and titles. Id. at *3-4. As to the remaining disputes, the Court found that Defendant has responded completely, and sustained the objections. Id. at *4.

EEOC v. JBS USA, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32827 (D. Colo. Mar. 17, 2015). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of Somali, Muslim, and black workers at Defendant's meat packaging plant, for alleged violations of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The EEOC asserted several pattern or practice claims alleging discriminatory harassment, disparate treatment, denial of religious accommodation, retaliation, and discipline and discharge. Id. at *28. The Court ordered to conduct trial in two phases: in Phase I EEOC would present its claim that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of denial of religious accommodation, retaliation, and discipline and discharge, and in Phase II EEOC would present claims for hostile work environment and pursue individual damages for claims presented in Phase I. Id. at *29. The Court also granted the EEOC's request to bifurcate discovery, and entered a scheduling order governing Phase I. Section 8(d)(2) of the scheduling order specifically provided deadlines for the parties to identify witnesses. Id. at *31. Defendant deposed 103 witnesses who were not identified within the deadlines stipulated in § 8(d)(2). Accordingly, the Court struck those witnesses as they were not identified pursuant to § 8(d)(2). Id. at *32. Defendant then moved to amend the scheduling order, and sought leave to identify those witnesses after the pre-discovery deadline, which the Court granted. The Court granted Defendant's motion. Defendant argued that the Court misapprehended its position because the Court treated the disclosures at issue as identification of witnesses made pursuant to § 8(d)(2) or Rule 26. Defendant maintained that permitting it to list witnesses would be consistent with the unique features of this case, including the fact that EEOC itself served supplemental witness disclosures without complying with § 8(d)(2). Defendant also offered the declaration of its counsel Heather Vickles and attached a variety of exhibits purporting to show how each witness was identified during Defendant's investigation into the incidents at issue in this litigation. Id. at *39. The EEOC argued that Defendant failed to show a good cause for the amendment. At the outset, the Court noted that Rule 16(b) allows for amendment of scheduling order deadlines for good cause and with the judge's consent. Id. at *43. The Court observed that through the Vickles declaration and the chart, Defendant offered evidence that it did not know the details of specific witnesses' testimony and could not identify by the § 8(d)(2) deadline every specific person or important subject area that would become significant during the course of the depositions and require responsive witnesses. Id. at *44. Vickles explained that as the depositions continued, Defendant continued to investigate allegations in testimony, particularly certain inconsistencies that were becoming apparent, or new information about people than what had been provided in previously produced documents. Id. The Court observed that Vickles also explained that after the parties made the § 8(d)(2) witness identification, new topics became important or increased in importance and that, as a result, Defendant continued to investigate and identify additional witnesses. Id. at *46. These topics included how other companies accommodated religious prayer breaks, Defendant's pre-suit internal investigation of the Muslim worker's complaints, and workplace conduct on the production line. Id. The Court accordingly found that Defendant showed good cause to amend the Phase I witness list under § 8(d)(2) of the scheduling order. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to amend the scheduling order to include the 103 witnesses.

EEOC v. JBS USA, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93244 (D. Colo. July 17, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant, JBS USA, LLC, discriminated against its Muslim employees at its Colorado beef processing facility on the basis of religion by engaging in a pattern or practice of retaliation, discriminatory discipline and discharge, harassment, and denying reasonable religious accommodations in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Id. at *28. The issues in the case started during Ramadan in 2008, when Muslim employees requested that Defendant accommodate their need to leave the production line to pray at or near sundown, and Defendant refused, leading to suspension and termination of a large number of Muslim employees. Id. at *27. On August 8, 2011, the Court bifurcated the case wherein Phase I proposed to address the EEOC's religious accommodation and retaliation and discrimination claims. Id. Defendant then moved for summary judgment, arguing that the U.S. District Court for the District of Nebraska's dismissal of a similar action brought by Muslim employees at Defendant's Nebraska plant collaterally estopped the EEOC from re-litigating the issues. Defendant argued that the evidence relevant to the EEOC's proposed accommodations theory and Defendant's undue hardship defense in both cases was virtually identical. Id. at *63. While granting summary judgment to Defendant, the Court in Nebraska had ruled that Defendant's termination of 80 Muslim employees as a one-time event was insufficient as a matter of law to establish a pattern or practice of unlawful termination or retaliation. Id. at *54-55. The Court in Nebraska had also found that the proposed accommodations would create undue hardship to Defendant as uneven work periods and shorter work periods would place a greater than de minimis burden on non-Muslim co-workers. Id. at *56. Accordingly, in this case, the Court denied Defendant summary judgment, finding differences in the two plants. The Court opined that Defendant failed to establish that the factual differences between this action and the Nebraska case were legally insignificant. Id. at *68-69. The EEOC identified multiple differences between the Colorado and Nebraska plants, including that over-crewing occurred at higher levels in Colorado, which meant that, when combined with other measures, it could have effectuated the unscheduled break accommodation at the Colorado Plant without undue hardship. Id. at *64. The evidence also showed that staffing levels differed between the plants, and the collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") in operation at the Colorado plant, unlike the Nebraska CBA, had a larger time window in which management could schedule breaks during the shift. Id. at *65-66. Further, the Nebraska case was premised on transforming a rolling meal break into a mass break at a different time, whereas Plaintiffs here did not request an additional mass break but asked that the normal rolling meal break be moved to an earlier time during Ramadan, which did not implicate additional costs, food safety concerns, or overcrowding issues. Id. at *67. Moreover, as the EEOC was not permitted to present evidence related to the Colorado plant in the Nebraska case, the Court concluded that the EEOC was denied a full and fair opportunity to litigate the undue hardship with respect to the Colorado plant. Id. at *69. Defendant also failed to make any meaningful attempt to establish the identity of issues with respect to the EEOC's retaliation and discrimination claims. The Court held that the ruling in Nebraska could not have "actually and necessarily determined" the question of whether the events of Ramadan 2008 constituted a pattern or practice of retaliation or discrimination as a matter of law. Id. at *72-73. The Court therefore ruled that the EEOC was not collaterally estopped in litigating the claims raised in this action. Because a genuine dispute of material fact remained as to the issue of the reasonableness of the EEOC's proposed accommodations theory, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

EEOC v. Jetstream Ground Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 131386 (D. Colo. Sept. 29, 2015). Defendant had a cabin cleaning contract with United Airlines at Denver International Airport. Defendant offered job interviews to employees of its predecessor contractor. Id. at *3-4. Defendant used several criteria in its hiring process, one of which was the applicant's willingness to wear a gender neutral uniform of pants, shirt, and hat. Id. at *8. Five Muslim women of Ethiopian or Somali nationality ("Interveners"), applied for the position of aircraft cleaner, but were not offered employment. The Interveners filed charges of discrimination with the Colorado Civil Rights Division, alleging that Defendant discriminated against them on the basis of their sex (female) and religion (Muslim), and denied them the religious accommodations of wearing a hijab to cover their hair, ears, and neck, and of wearing long skirts to cover the form of their bodies. Id. at *3. After the charges were filed, Jetstream amended its uniform policy "based on legal issues regarding the burka headgear" to allow secured headscarves within specifications for dimension and color. Id. at *7. The Colorado Civil Rights Division transferred the charges to the EEOC, which broadened its investigation through a series of requests for information. On August 29, 2012, the EEOC issued a letter of determination as to each Intervener's charge, stating that it had found reasonable cause to believe Jetstream had violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by: (i) refusing to provide Interveners and a "class" of other female Muslim employees or applicants a reasonable accommodation based on their religion; (ii) refusing to hire Interveners "and others like" them for the position of aircraft cleaner based on sex or religion; and (iii) by retaliating against them for engaging in protected activity. Id. at *9. A number of conciliation proposals were exchanged between the EEOC and Jetstream, and the parties met once. Id. at *11. During the conciliation process, the EEOC identified two other women it characterized as "aggrieved," and submitted a conciliation proposal including: (i) a lump sum demand for $775,000 in damages; (ii) the creation of a settlement fund of $436,500 to be paid to other aggrieved individuals identified by the EEOC in the course of its investigation; and (iii) Defendant's development of a plan for accommodating deviations from its uniform policy. Subsequently, the EEOC reduced its demand twice. Id. Defendant, however, offered $75,000 for back pay and compensatory damages, and conciliation was terminated. Id. at *12. The EEOC subsequently brought its lawsuit against Defendant on August 20, 2013. In the lawsuit, the EEOC also asserted individual claims on behalf of the two "aggrieved" individuals who had been employed by Defendant and who had not filed charges. On October 13, 2014, Defendant made offers of full-time employment to Interveners, stating that the Interveners "may wear a headscarf at work that meets their religious requirements but does not present safety risks," but also requiring that they "wear pants at work, as they claim they are willing to do." Id. at *20. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment arguing that: (i) the EEOC failed to satisfy its pre-suit conciliation obligations; (ii) the claims of Interveners Oba and Haji were deficient for various reasons; and (iii) the damages alleged were limited by Defendant's offers of employment to the Interveners. The EEOC filed a cross-motion for summary judgment regarding Defendant's defenses of exhaustion of administrative remedies and prerequisites, statute of limitations, waiver, estoppel and laches, and undue burden. Id. at *2. The Court granted and denied each motion in part. Defendant sought summary judgment against the EEOC on the basis of its failure to meet its pre-suit conciliation obligation. The Court rejected Defendant's arguments that the EEOC did not conduct a "sincere and reasonable conciliation" by negotiation a fund for aggrieved individuals the EEOC had not yet identified, and that the EEOC acted in bad faith by making an "unsubstantiated" lump sum demand rather than individual demands for each Intervener. Id. at *32. Relying on the recent decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in Mach Mining LLC v. EEOC, 135 S. Ct. 1645, 1655-56 (2015), the Court reasoned that the scope of its judicial review of the EEOC's conciliation efforts was "narrow." Id. The Court further determined that the EEOC need only show that it endeavored to conciliate, that the EEOC is not required to engage in any specific steps or measures in its conciliation process, and that it is up to the EEOC to decide when conciliation has failed. Id. at *31-33. The Court then turned to Defendant's motion for summary judgment on the EEOC's claims for Amina Oba, an employee who never requested accommodation. Co-workers observed Oba change from her headscarf and long skirt to the company's uniform while at work, and who subsequently was laid-off. Relying on EEOC v. Abercrombie & Fitch Stores, Inc., 135 S. Ct. 2028, 2031 (2015), the Court determined that an employee need only show that his or her need for accommodation was a motivating factor in the employer's decision. Id. at *36. Denying summary judgment on the EEOC's claims for disparate treatment and discrimination, the Court ruled there was a triable issue of fact as to whether Defendant knew "or, at the very least, suspected" that Oba desired an accommodation. Id. at *39. Turning to the EEOC's claim for retaliation, which requires an employee to engage in "protected activity" under Title VII to be actionable, the Court considered "as a matter of first impression" whether Oba engaged in protected activity merely by wearing religious clothing on the employer's premises but during her breaks. Id. at *50. On this issue, the Court granted Defendant summary judgment on the grounds that Oba did not actually convey to Defendant any concern about unlawful practices. Id. at *52. Regarding the EEOC's individual claims for Milko Haji, who allegedly had her hours reduced on account of her religion and desire to wear a hajib and pants, the Court observed that the EEOC had failed to accurately establish Haji's actual start date at Defendant, limiting the EEOC's provable loss to eight hours of pay. Finding this potential amount of loss to be "de minimis," the Court granted Defendant summary judgment on the EEOC's claims for discrimination, failure to accommodate, and retaliation. Id. at *54. Finally, the Court rejected Defendant's contentions that the EEOC's claims for Oba should be dismissed because Oba had not filed a charge and not exhausted her administrative remedies, on the grounds that the EEOC has enforcement power to bring suit in its own name on behalf of others. Id. at *62. In rejecting Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to damages, the Court observed that only "unconditional" offers of employment could end on-going liability for back pay. Id. at *70. Accordingly, the Court found there was a triable issue as to whether a reasonable person would have rejected the terms of Defendant's offers of employment. Id. The Court then addressed the EEOC's cross-motion for summary judgment. Finding that Defendant, through expert evidence, raised a triable issue of fact as to whether wearing a long skirt climbing steps constituted a "task interference" that could increase the risk of injury, the Court denied the EEOC's motion for summary judgment regarding Defendant's defense of undue hardship in accommodating long skirts in the workplace. However, based on Defendant's own actions in amending its policy to allow hijabs to specifications and making offers of employment that conceded wearing hijabs on-duty, the Court granted summary judgment to the EEOC regarding the defense of undue hardship in allowing hijabs in the workplace. Id. at *82. The Court further granted summary judgment to the EEOC on Jetstream's defenses of failure to exhaust administrative remedies, statute of limitations, waiver, and estoppel.

EEOC v. Patterson-UTI Drilling Co. LLC*, Case No. 15-CV-600 (D. Colo. Mar. 24, 2015). In this case, the EEOC received a number of charges of discrimination filed by employees and former employees of Defendant, a Texas-based oil and gas drilling company, alleging discrimination based on race or national origin. The EEOC concluded that there was reasonable cause to believed that Defendant engaged in nationwide discrimination against its minority employees. On March 24, 2015, the EEOC filed a lawsuit against Defendant, alleging that individuals of Hispanic, Latino, African-American, American Indian, Asian, and Pacific Islander race and/or national origin were subject to harassment, a hostile work environment, and disparate treatment. Specifically, the EEOC alleged that Defendant's minority employees were subject to racial and ethnic slurs, jokes, and comments and verbal harassment and intimidation. The EEOC further alleged that Defendant's minority employees were relegated to lower-level positions, were denied training, and were subject to disparate treatment in discipline. In addition, the EEOC alleged that Defendant retaliated against employees who complained about discrimination or harassment. The EEOC asserted that Defendant engaged in this prohibited conduct on a nationwide basis. Defendant and the EEOC entered into a settlement on the same day the Complaint was filed. To that end, the parties filed a proposed consent decree with the Court. Under the terms of the settlement, Defendant agreed to pay $12,260,000 to a settlement administrator to provide compensation to Defendant's purportedly aggrieved minority employees. Such compensation will be available to any minority employee who worked for Defendant from January 1, 2006, to the date the proposed consent decree is entered. In addition to agreeing to provide monetary relief, Defendant also consented to wide-ranging equitable relief. Among other things, Defendant agreed to be enjoined from engaging in any employment discrimination practice which discriminates on the basis of race or national origin. It also agreed to develop new equal employment opportunity policies and to annually train its employees on its equal employment opportunity policies. It also agreed to create a Vice President position dedicated implementing the consent decree and ensuring Defendant's employees were protected from unlawful discrimination. The Court accepted and approved the consent decree.

EEOC v. PJ Utah LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51928 (D. Utah April 3, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to accommodate the charging party, Scott Bonn, who had Down's Syndrome, in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act. Bonn sought leave to intervene into the action, and Defendants moved to compel arbitration. The Court denied Bonn's leave to intervene and granted Defendants' motion to compel arbitration. Id. at *2. At the outset, the Court observed that Bonn's mother, who was also his legal guardian, had executed an arbitration agreement with Defendants on Bonn's behalf at the beginning of his employment. Id. The Court held that Bonn's mother, as a guardian of a developmentally disabled teenage son, had the power to execute the agreement, and therefore Bonn was bound to the arbitration agreement. Id. The Court noted that in EEOC v. Woodmen of the World Life Insurance Society, 479 F.3d 561 (8th Cir. 2007), the Eighth Circuit found that an employee has a right to intervene in a EEOC enforcement lawsuit, but the employee also has a right to execute a contract to arbitrate his or her claims, which is enforceable in the context of an EEOC lawsuit. Id. at *2-3. Similarly, the Court held although Bonn had a right to intervene into this action, he contracted with Defendant to arbitrate his claims. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Bonn's motion for leave to intervene into the action, and ordered him to submit his claims to arbitration. Id. at *3.

EEOC v. Safia Abdulle Ali,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 131386 (D. Colo. Sept. 29, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant, JetStream Ground Services, Inc., discriminated against female Muslim cabin cleaners on the basis of their religion when it failed to hire them based on their request to wear hijabs and long skirts. Id. at *1-2. In December 2008, Defendant assumed overnight and daytime cleaning operations from AirServ Corp. ("AirServ") and interviewed AirServ's prior employees for its new operations. Id. at *3. Defendant's uniform policy required cabin cleaners to wear pants while working, and five of AirServ's female cabin-cleaning employees filed EEOC charges claiming that Defendant did not hire them during the transition because their religious beliefs required them to cover their hair, ears, and neck with a hijab. Id. at *4. The EEOC issued a letter of determination notifying Defendant that it had reasonable cause to believe that Defendant had violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 in refusing to provide the female employees a reasonable accommodation based on their religion. Id. at *15. The EEOC initially proposed a settlement of $775,500, as well as the creation of a $436,500 settlement fund, which would be paid to other "aggrieved individuals" identified by the EEOC in the course of its investigation. Id. at *18-19. The EEOC concluded that the conciliation was unsuccessful after Defendant terminated the negotiations by making a last offer to pay $75,000 to cover the employees' back pay and compensatory damages. Id. at *19. The EEOC then filed its complaint on August 30, 2013. Defendant argued that the EEOC failed to satisfy its conciliation requirements and filed a motion for summary judgment. Id. at *31-32. Defendant contended that the EEOC's negotiations on behalf of employees evidenced its bad faith because the EEOC did not negotiate in an individualized manner, but rather demanded an unsubstantiated lump sum of $755,500, while rejecting Defendant's individualized offers, and because the EEOC demanded that Defendant reinstate all other aggrieved individuals that it could identify. Id. at *32. The Court denied summary judgment, finding that Defendant's objections to the EEOC's efforts all related to the substantive terms of the bargaining and not to the process of conciliation, and it was undisputed that the EEOC engaged in substantive conciliation efforts by exchanging multiple settlement offers and in meeting in person with Defendant. Id. at *32-34. Defendant also moved for summary judgment on claims asserted by the EEOC as to two other employees, Milko Haji and Amina Oba, whom the EEOC identified during discovery as "aggrieved individuals." Id. at *35. The EEOC had claimed that these two women were laid-off or given reduced hours because of their religious beliefs. Id. at *25-26. Although it was undisputed that Plaintiff Intervener Oba never requested an accommodation, did not discuss her religion during her interview, and always wore pants and never wore a hijab while working for Defendant, the Court agreed that there was sufficient evidence to create a dispute issue of fact as to whether Defendant's decision-makers knew or suspected that Plaintiff Intervener Oba desired an accommodation and laid her off to avoid giving her one because she consistently wore religious garments in the workplace during non-work hours, including during work breaks and when she arrived and left for the day. Id. at *39-40. The Court, however, dismissed Plaintiff Intervener Haji's claim finding that her de minimis reduction in hours over the course of only three shifts did not qualify as an adverse action. Id. at *61. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *95.

EEOC v. Smokin' Spuds, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48805 (D. Colo. April 14, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants engaged in unlawful discrimination by creating a hostile work environment based on sex and retaliating against women who complained about or otherwise opposed Defendants' alleged discrimination, or who participated in an investigation or other proceeding under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Three interveners moved to intervene as Plaintiffs in the action, which the Court granted. Id. at *6-7. Defendant Farming Technology, Inc. ("FTI") argued that the proposed interveners should not be permitted to intervene because they failed to exhaust their administrative remedies against FTI specifically. Id. at *3. FTI maintained that any claims against it were unexhausted because the proposed interveners' EEOC charges each identified Defendant Smokin' Spuds, Inc. d/b/a MountainKing Potatoes ("Smokin' Spuds") as the sole employer and only claimed that a "MountainKing" employee subjected the proposed interveners to a hostile work environment. Id. at *4. The Court found that the EEOC's amended complaint alleged that FTI and Smokin' Spuds both did business as "MountainKing Potatoes," operated as a single integrated and/or joint employer, and used the trade name "MountainKing Potatoes" to refer to the branded potatoes they grew and packaged. Id. at *5. Although Defendants denied these allegations, they failed to demonstrate that FTI did not operate under the trade name "MountainKing Potatoes." Id. Thus, the Court found that the proposed interveners' reference to "MountainKing Potatoes" in their respective charges of discrimination constituted an informal reference to FTI, which was sufficient to exhaust their administrative remedies with respect to FTI. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court allowed the proposed interveners to intervene as Plaintiffs. Id. at *6-7.

EEOC v. Unit Drilling Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41441 (N.D. Okla. Mar. 31, 2015). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of female job applicants alleging that Defendant wrongfully denied them employment in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Defendant operated drilling rigs in various locations in the United States, and the intervening Plaintiff, Patsy Craig, applied for rig position in September 2008. Defendant did not hire Craig, and allegedly told her that the men on the rig "would look at her instead of working." Id. at *5. Another rig manager indicated that Defendant did not have housing for her, and a hiring manager stated that Defendant could not afford to provide her housing. Id. Defendant allegedly denied employment to four other female applicants, stating that it could not accommodate females working on a rig, and that one of them was "too pretty" and that the men "wouldn't get anything done" with her around. Id. at *8-10. Craig filed a discrimination charge, and the EEOC's investigation became national in scope, resulting in this action. Defendant moved for partial summary judgment as to the four applicants who did not intervene, arguing that the EEOC could not establish a prima facie case of discriminatory failure to hire. The Court denied Defendant's motion. The Court found that the EEOC could establish that Defendant's legitimate non-discriminatory reason of hiring more qualified candidates was a pre-text for discrimination. The Court noted that the EEOC had demonstrated inconsistencies in the reasons cited by Defendant for refusing to hire the applicants. Id. at *22-23. Defendant originally told Craig that having a woman on a rig would distract the male employees. Defendant later told Craig that it could not hire her because it did not have any housing available for women, and now claimed that it hired more qualified candidates. Id. at *23. The Court found that, in light of these conflicting reasons, a jury could reasonably conclude that Defendant's legitimate, non-discriminatory reason was simply an after-the-fact justification for its discrimination. Id. The Court further determined that the EEOC had created a question of fact as to whether Defendant hired more qualified men than female applicants. The parties disagreed as to the proper pool of comparators. Defendant argued that the pool should be limited to only individuals who applied at the same locations and were hired within 30 days. Id. at *24. The EEOC, however, submitted evidence that Defendant had no uniform process for removing an application from consideration after 30 days and that the hiring officials often disregarded the "location where applying" field on the application. Id. According to the Court, this evidence left the identities and qualifications of the comparators uncertain, and thus an issue of fact remained as to Defendant's offer of a legitimate, non-discriminatory reason. Id. The Court also held that the EEOC's statistical evidence was probative of pre-text because it suggested a "gross disparity in hiring practices" that could ultimately support findings of individual discrimination as to each claimant. Id. at *25-27. The evidence showed that, despite applications by females, Defendant did not hire any females out of the 1,600 floor hands hired during the two-year period across three divisions. Id. at *27. The Court stated that, "[w]hen the numbers are this stark and the job description itself does not render females inherently less qualified, the statistics can be probative of individual discrimination." Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

(xi) Eleventh Circuit

EEOC v. AJ 3860, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62099 (M.D. Fla. May 12, 2015). The EEOC brought an action against Defendant alleging employment discrimination and retaliation. After the EEOC filed its second amended complaint ("SAC"), Defendant requested for extension of time to respond to the SAC as its counsel moved to withdraw from the case on the basis of irreconcilable differences between counsel and client. Id. at *2. The Court granted the motion to withdraw, asked Defendant to file a notice of appearance of new counsel within a prescribed period of time, and informed Defendant that a corporation must be represented by counsel and cannot appear pro se. Id. Because Defendant failed to secure representation of counsel and to respond to the SAC within the prescribed time, the Court subsequently issued an order finding Defendant in default, and warned that it would enter a default judgment. Id. at *3. Out of an abundance of caution, however, the Court further extended the time and warned Defendant that any further failure would result in striking its pleadings. Id. In spite of repeated warnings from the Court, Defendant failed to retain new counsel and also failed to respond to the SAC. Id. at *4. Accordingly, the Court struck Defendant's pleadings, and directed the EEOC to move for the entry of a clerk's default against Defendant. Id. at *5.

EEOC v. AJ 3860, LLC,* Case No. 14-CV-1621 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 10, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants discriminated against black employees and retaliated against a manager who objected to alleged workplace racism by terminating him in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Defendants operated several adult entertainment clubs in Florida, and in February 2012, Patrick Franke, a manager, hired Quatavia Harden to work as a bartender. A couple of days later, the regional manager instructed Franke to terminate Harden because Defendants did not want black employees working at their clubs. Although Franke resisted, he terminated Harden, and Harden subsequently filed a charge of discrimination with the EEOC. Defendants suspended Franke after receiving Harden's discrimination charge. Defendants failed to respond to the EEOC's lawsuit and the Court entered a default judgment. Subsequently, the Court determined that Defendants were liable for discriminatory conduct and awarded the EEOC monetary relief totaling $365,024.47, including punitive damages, compensatory damages, back pay, interest, and tax penalty off-sets for Franke and Harden. Id. Additionally, the Court granted injunctive relief requiring Defendants' multiple adult entertainment clubs to cease their discriminatory practices, to adopt non-retaliation and non-discrimination polices, and to report applicant flow and hiring data for the EEOC to monitor compliance. Id. at 3.

EEOC v. Darden Restaurants, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 149897 (S.D. Fla. Nov. 3, 2015). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of a group of job applicants alleging that Defendants engaged in unlawful employment practices on the basis of age and denied them employment in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA"). A group of non-parties to the action filed a motion to intervene, which the Court denied. At the outset, the Court noted that the non-parties had no conditional or unconditional right to intervene in the ADEA action because the ADEA expressly eliminates such a right upon the EEOC's filing of an action on a person's behalf. Id. at *4. The Court cited 29 U.S.C. § 626(c)(1), which provides that a person's right to bring civil action under the ADEA terminates when the EEOC brings an action to enforce the right of such employee. Id. at *5. The Court also noted that 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a) provides that where a District Court has original jurisdiction, it shall also have supplemental jurisdiction over all other claims that are related to claims in the action within the original jurisdiction that formed part of the controversy. Id. at *5-6. The Court further observed that the Eleventh Circuit has clarified that § 1367(a) allows supplemental jurisdiction only when there is already original jurisdiction. Id. at *6. As the Court did not have original jurisdiction over the non-parties' age discrimination claims, the Court concluded that the non-parties could not justify intervention by alleging age discrimination claim under the Florida Civil Rights Act. Id. Therefore, the Court denied the request for intervention.

EEOC v. Darden Restaurants, Inc.*, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 151742 (S.D. Fla. Nov. 9, 2015). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of two applicants alleging that Defendants discriminated against them on the basis of their age and denied them employment in violation of the ADEA. The EEOC moved to bifurcate the trial and discovery into two phases. Phase I would encompass the pattern or practice of liability and a determination of whether liquidated damages were appropriate; Phase II would deal with individual liability and damages. The Court denied the motion. Id. at *4. The EEOC maintained that splitting the case into two phases of discovery and trial would be an efficient and convenient way to handle pattern or practice claims because it would permit the determination of whether there is a pattern or practice of discrimination prior to investigating and proving damages for individual instances of discrimination. Id. at *6. Defendants argued that the EEOC's speculative statement that bifurcation would put off hundreds or thousands of mini-trials was unsupported by any factual basis, and the bifurcation scheme unduly prejudiced Defendants because it allowed the EEOC to limit discovery to only a small number of individuals selected by the EEOC. Id. Though Defendants were adamantly against bifurcating discovery, as to the bifurcation of trial request, Defendants indicated that the Court could deny the current motion without prejudice to renewal after the completion of discovery and once the issues for trial have been narrowed. Id. The Court concluded that discovery should proceed consistent with the current scheduling order. The Court also denied the EEOC's request to bifurcate the trial.

EEOC v. Doherty Enterprises, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 116189 (S.D. Fla. Sept. 1, 2015). The EEOC brought an action seeking to enjoin Defendant from using its arbitration agreement, which the Commission alleged had deterred employees from filing charges or cooperating with the EEOC or State Fair Employment Practices Agencies ("FEPAs"). Id. at *1. The EEOC asserted that Defendant's arbitration agreement constituted a pattern or practice of resistance to the full enjoyment of rights secured in § 707(a) of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII"). Id. at *3. Defendant moved to dismiss the EEOC's complaint, and the Court denied the motion. Defendant first argued that the EEOC lacked standing to bring this action in the absence of an underlying charge of discrimination. The Court observed that Title VII sets forth two mechanisms by which the EEOC may challenge unlawful employment practices pursuant to §§ 706 and 707. Id. at *7. The Court noted that § 706 grants the EEOC authority to bring an action on behalf of the aggrieved persons, and § 707 grants the EEOC the power to bring suit against any person when that person is engaged in a pattern or practice of resistance to the full enjoyment of any of the rights secured under Title VII. Id. The Court observed that the Fifth Circuit's decision in U.S. v. Allegheny-Ludlum Industries, Inc., 517 F.2d 826 (5th Cir. 1975), and the statutory language of § 707(a) provides that the EEOC only needs reasonable cause before filing a complaint. Id. at *11. In other words, the Court opined that § 707 does not require the EEOC to receive a charge before suing. Id. Defendant contended that the EEOC did not possess authority to proceed under § 707(a), and that the EEOC may only proceed under § 707(e), which requires conformance with the prerequisites of § 706. Defendant relied on EEOC v. Shell Oil Co., 466 U.S. 54 (1984), claiming that it overruled Allegheny-Ludlum, and required that a charge be filed as a prerequisite to all EEOC enforcement cases. Id. at *13. Defendant also contended that § 707(a) only applied to the Attorney General's right to bring a pattern or practice claims against federal, state, and local governmental units. The Court found that the issue in Shell Oil was not the EEOC' authority under § 707; instead, it examined the EEOC's authority to request judicial enforcement of its subpoenas, including whether the EEOC included adequate factual information in a charge to obtain judicial enforcement of its subpoena. Id. The Court accordingly reasoned that Shell Oil did not overturn Allegheny-Ludlum, and rejected Defendant's argument that the EEOC cannot bring an action under § 707(a) without an underlying charge. Defendant also challenged the concept of a separate cause of action under § 707(a) for a pattern or practice of resistance to the full enjoyment of any rights secured by Title VII. Defendant contended that § 707(a) cases were limited to unlawful employment practices. The Court relied on U.S. v. Original Knights of Ku Klux Klan, 250 F. Supp. 330 (E.D. La. 1965), which enjoined the KKK (i.e., a group of private individuals) from engaging in threats and violence to deter African-Americans from seeking employment and deter employers from hiring them. Id. at *15. The Court found that those acts by non-employers were determined to constitute a pattern or practice of resistance to Title VII rights, and that case did not involve discrimination or an adverse employment action by an employer against African-Americans. Id. Defendant also cited to EEOC v. CVS Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 70 F. Supp. 3d 937 (N.D. Ill. 2014), which ruled that the EEOC could bring an action under § 707(a) without a charge of discrimination, but the EEOC may sue only after it attempted to secure a pre-suit conciliation agreement. Id. at *17. The Court noted that CVS relied upon the procedures set forth in § 706 as authority for the requirement to conciliate, despite the fact that Seventh Circuit precedent did not require the filing of a charge of discrimination. Id. at *18. The Court remarked that the holding in CVS was internally inconsistent, and relied on Supreme Court case law that did not discuss § 707. Id. at *8-9. Accordingly, the Court concluded that CVS was not binding, rejected Defendant's argument, and denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

EEOC v. Fannin County, Georgia,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 133881 (N.D. Ga. July 16, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant Fannin County violated the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") by terminating its employees pursuant to a reduction-in-force ("RIF") on the basis of their age. Id. at *1. Defendant employed several kinds of employees, including laborers, bush hog operators, motor grader operators, and mechanics, and it maintained personal policy and procedures manuals which included an anti-discrimination policy. Id. at *5-6. In November 2011, Defendant decided to reduce its workforce due to budget deficit and chose to lay-off 11 employees, seven of whom were older than 60 years of age. Id. at *24-26. Subsequently, when Defendant's revenues improved, Defendant re-hired three of the four employees who were under 60 years of age within a few months of being laid-off; however, it did not re-hire some of the employees who were older than 60. Id. at *26-27. The EEOC alleged that Defendant unlawfully discharged the employees who were above 60 years of age in violation of the ADEA. Id. at *31. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that the EEOC could not make out a prima facie case because the record did not show that Defendant intended to discriminate on the basis of age when it included employees Weldon Thomas and Donnie Green, both over the age of 60, in the 2011 RIF. Id. at *37. The Court granted Defendant's motion, finding that the EEOC failed to create a genuine issue of material fact concerning whether Defendant's articulated legitimate, non-discriminatory reasons for terminating Thomas and Green during the November 2011 lay-offs were a pre-text of age discrimination. Id. at *38. Defendant presented evidence that it identified the employees for lay-off by considering: (i) who performed mostly seasonal work as opposed to others who were cross-trained on equipment used regularly year around; (ii) who held certifications in skills such as flagging, soil and water erosion control, or who held commercial driver's licenses; and (iii) who had volunteered to be on after-hours call-in list indicating a willingness to come in for emergencies. Id. at *40. Defendant included Green in the lay-off list because he was going to retire in the spring, he was not cross-trained on equipment other than the motor grader, he was not on the class-in list, and he did not have any certifications. Id. Similarly, Defendant included Thomas in the RIF because Thomas had never done anything besides running a bush hog. Id. at *40-41. The Court thus found that Defendant demonstrated a legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for deciding to terminate various employees, including Green and Thomas, in November 2011. Id. at *41. The EEOC argued that Defendant's offered reasons – the budget issues – were pre-textual because there was no budget issue that required lay-offs, and it was a subterfuge to get rid of older employees. Id. at *42. The Court noted that the EEOC, however, failed to make a showing that Defendant was not having any issues in 2011 as Defendant had experienced an economic downturn in 2010 and 2011. Id. at *56-58. Regardless of the discrepancies in how Defendant created the lay-off list, the EEOC failed to show that Defendant did not focus on the seasonal nature of employees' work or their ability to work while selecting the employees for inclusion in the list. Id. at *63. The EEOC did not raise a genuine issue of fact concerning the reasons Defendant selected Green and Thomas for the lay-off list. Id. Although there was a correlation between Green's retirement and his age, the Court found that Defendant's reliance on his stated intention to retire as a factor in deciding to include him in the RIF did not by itself constitute age discrimination, especially given that Green met Defendant's other criteria for determining whom to lay-off. Id. at *65-66. Further, because the EEOC did not show that Defendant retained younger employees in spite of the fact that they met the criteria for lay-off, the Court could not make a meaningful statistical comparison between the employees that Defendant retained and those who were laid-off based on their relative ages for purposes of determining that the EEOC demonstrated pre-text. Id. at *68-69. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *22.

EEOC v. J & R Baker Farms, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 104821 (M.D. Ga. Aug. 11. 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants discriminated against a group of employees on the basis of their national origin and/or their race in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII"). Defendants moved to dismiss, arguing that the complaint provided a factually insufficient basis to support the purported claims of alleged discrimination. Defendants argued that the complaint did not allege specific events of alleged discrimination or the identities of the individuals involved in the alleged acts of discrimination. Id. at *5. Defendants claimed that the vague and speculative conclusions drawn by the EEOC in the complaint failed to meet the requisite pleading standard and neglected to place Defendants on notice of claims raised against them pursuant to Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007). Id. at *6. At the outset, the Court noted that a Plaintiff proceeding under a theory of disparate treatment must establish that Defendant had a discriminatory intent or motive for taking the job-related action. Id. at *6. The Court observed that such an exacting standard of proof is not required at the pleadings stage, and there was no requirement that the complaint allege facts sufficient to withstand the classic Title VII burden-shifting framework. Id. The Court observed that the EEOC's complaint set forth sufficient factual allegations to raise a facially plausible claim for disparate treatment. Id. at *7. The complaint alleged that the discrepancy in the treatment experienced by African-American workers was premised on their national origin and resulted in them receiving fewer hours of compensable work and less pay than the foreign-born workers employed by Defendants. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the EEOC had presented enough factual matter to suggest that Defendants subjected the charging parties to disparate treatment. Id. at *9. Defendants also sought dismissal of the EEOC's termination claims. The Court reasoned that the complaint offered illustrations of Defendants' practice of disproportionately terminating African-American workers based on their national origin and/or their race. Id. at *11. The Court held that this was sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss, and accordingly, denied Defendants' motion to dismiss in its entirety.

EEOC v. J & R Baker Farms, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 153469 (M.D. Ga. Nov. 13, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant discriminated against a group of employees on the basis of their national origin and/or their race in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Defendants filed a motion to compel discovery responses from the EEOC seeking a list of all individuals who allegedly had been either involuntarily terminated or constructively discharged by Defendants, along with information pertaining to the circumstances of the alleged discharges. The EEOC contended that, considering the vast size of the approximately 2,000 allegedly injured individuals, it would be an insurmountable task to comply with Defendants' discovery requests. Id. at *3. The Court directed the EEOC to set forth anecdotal information of at least 250 individuals. Id. The EEOC subsequently filed a motion for reconsideration seeking to revise the terms of the order to reduce the number of allegedly injured individuals for whom the EEOC had to produce discovery. The Court denied the motion. The EEOC contended that it mistakenly had represented the the number of allegedly injured individuals to the Court, and the "new" number was accurately measured at 332 members. Id. at *5. The EEOC asserted that providing anecdotal information for 75% of those persons would impose an injustice and hardship on the EEOC. Id. at *5. The Court noted that it was disinclined to revise its previous ruling, finding that it was the EEOC's responsibility to review its own documentation diligently and to be prepared to provide accurate information to the Court. Id. The Court further explained that there was no evidence that the information used to arrive at the revised number was somehow unavailable to the EEOC at the time of the prior hearing, and the EEOC's inability to manage its case was an error of its own making, and not of the Court's making. Id. Finally, the Court opined that the EEOC simply reiterated arguments that it already had considered, and the Court was not persuaded that its previous ruling was clearly erroneous. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court denied the EEOC's motion to reconsider.

EEOC v. Jacksonville Association Of Firefighters, Local 122*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 137651 (M.D. Fla. Oct. 8, 2015). The EEOC, the U.S. Department of Justice ("DOJ"), and a group of African-American and Native-American firefighters, all brought lawsuits against the City of Jacksonville and a local union to stop what they alleged to be a racially discriminatory process of promoting firefighters. Previously the Court entered an order denying the EEOC's motion to partially lift the stay in this case. Id. at *1. At the same time, the Court ruled in a related lawsuit of United States v. City of Jacksonville, Case No. 12-CV-451 (M.D. Fla.), that the DOJ had established its prima facie case in phase one of the litigation. Id. Based on the Court's ruling on a disparate impact issues, the EEOC renewed its motion to lift the stay to permit limited discovery, which the Court denied. Id. at *1-2. The Court remarked that in its finding on the motion to stay, it referenced the disparate impact ruling, stating that notwithstanding the prima facie case established by the DOJ, it was premature for the EEOC to litigate a claim against the union for its role in negotiating in favor of the promotion practice at issue unless the City's promotion practice was found unlawful. Id. at *2. The Court explained that for the reasons explained on in its earlier orders, it remained convinced that a stay as to the EEOC's case was the best way to manage those cases. Id. The Court also remarked that it had previously directed the union to retain all documents that could potentially relate to the issues raised by this case, which would remain in place, thereby mitigating the EEOC's concern that discovery would be made more difficult by the passage of time. Accordingly, the Court denied the EEOC's renewed motion to lift the stay.

EEOC v. Outokumpu Stainless, USA, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 129228 (M.D. Ala. Sept. 25, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant engaged in unlawful employment practices in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("title VII"). Defendant filed a motion to transfer venue from the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Alabama to the Southern District of Alabama, which the Court granted. Defendant sought the transfer pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a), which requires that the alternate venue be one in which Plaintiff could have brought the case originally. Id. at *5. Defendant contended that the case could have been brought in the Southern District of Alabama because a Title VII case is properly brought in any judicial district in which the unlawful employment practice is alleged to have been committed, in the judicial district in which the employment records were maintained and administered, or in the judicial district in which the aggrieved person would have worked but for the unlawful practice. Id. The EEOC conceded this point, and the Court found that the case could have been brought originally in the Southern District of Alabama. Id. The EEOC cited case law from outside the Eleventh Circuit for the proposition that Plaintiff's choice of forum should be given special deference in a Title VII case. The Court, however, noted that in the Eleventh Circuit, a Title VII case is subject to the same analysis under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) as other cases, pursuant to which Plaintiff's choice of forum is its home forum. Id. at *8. Because the Middle District of Alabama is not the EEOC's home forum, the Court concluded that the EEOC's choice to file its case in the Middle District of Alabama, while legally proper, was not entitled to great weight in the overall § 1404(a) analysis. Id. at *9. The Court noted that the parties were in agreement that the residence of the majority of the material witnesses was an important factor to consider. The Court found the charging parties and Defendant's decision-maker all lived in the Northern District of Alabama. Id. at *12. The Court determined that eight witnesses lived in the jurisdiction of the Southern District of Alabama. The Court, accordingly, concluded that the convenience of the witnesses over the charging parties weighed in favor of the transfer. Id. at *13. The Court also noted that the other factors such as the location of documents, the availability of compulsory process, the forum's familiarity with the governing law, and the public interest all weighed in favor the transfer. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to transfer venue.

EEOC v. St. Joseph's Hospital, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19272 (M.D. Fla. Feb. 18, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") violations on behalf of Defendant's former employee, Leokadia Bryk. Bryk worked for Defendant as a nurse in the Behavioral Health Unit ("BHU") and was demoted from a Clinical Nurse III ("CN III") position to a Clinical Nurse II ("CN II") due to her admission to an accreditation surveyor that she allowed patients to sleep in the hallway during staff shortages. Id. at *2. In 2009, Bryk underwent a hip replacement surgery, and began using a cane on her return to work. The Director of Behavioral Health Operations, Susan Wright, began supervising Bryk, and determined that it was unsafe for Bryk to use the cane, as it posed a risk to Bryk, other employees, and patients. Id. at *4. Defendant notified Bryk that it could not accommodate her and terminated her employment. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment and the Court granted each motion in part. The EEOC moved for summary judgment, arguing that Bryk had a disability in the form of stenosis, which significantly impaired her ability to walk, but she was able to perform all of her work duties while using the cane, and never had an incident where a patient attempted to grab her cane. Id. at *7. Defendant argued that because Bryk never informed it of her stenosis, it could not be the underlying disability from which the EEOC could claim a failure to accommodate. The Court found that Bryk's primary physician indicated that she had a gait dysfunction due to her hip replacement. The Court noted that Bryk's hip replacement along with her obesity caused her to walk with a severe limp, and that the cane helped in diminishing her risk of falling. Id. at *10. The Court opined that gait dysfunction was sufficient to establish that Bryk was a disabled person under the ADA at the time of her termination and therefore granted the EEOC's motion for summary judgment on that issue. Id. at *12. The Court also observed that it was undisputed that performing her duties in a safe manner and generally keeping patients safe was an essential function of Bryk's position as a CN II nurse. The EEOC contended that Defendant had two options to accommodate Bryk's disability, including: (i) permit her to use a lightweight cane; or (ii) reassign her to a vacant position outside the BHU. The Court noted that the EEOC had not demonstrated that Bryk could use the cane safely in the BHU, as it admitted that given her age and size, she was a likely target in the event a patient wanted to use her cane as a weapon. Id. at *17. The Court therefore held that Bryk's use of a case was not a reasonable accommodation as a matter of law. The Court reasoned that Bryk applied for three vacant positions and was not assigned to any of those positions. Id. at *21-24. The Court, however, found that the issue of why Bryk was or not was assigned to any of the three vacant positions are issues for a jury to determine.

EEOC v. St. Joseph's Hospital, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106041 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 12, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant discriminated against its employee, Leokadia Bryk, in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act. The EEOC asserted that Bryk, a nurse, was terminated from her position because she started using a cane due to a hip surgery and other health problems affecting her mobility. Defendant advised Bryk to secure an alternate position within 30 days. Bryk applied to a seven open positions, three of which were at issue at trial, including education specialist, care transition coordinator, and home health clinician II. Id. at *3. Defendant ultimately terminated Bryk's employment, stating that she did not have the requisite experience needed for the positions and instead hired other candidates. At trial, the jury found that Defendant failed to provide a reasonable accommodation by not assigning Bryk to one of the three positions. The jury also found that Defendant made good faith efforts to identify and make a reasonable accommodation for her. Id. at *5. Neither party made specific objections to the jury's verdict. The EEOC argued that the evidence in the record was insufficient to support the jury's finding that Defendant made good faith efforts to identify and make a reasonable accommodation for Bryk. The Court, however, held that the evidence at the trial supported the jury's finding that Defendant acted in good faith to accommodate Bryk. Id. at *9. The Court remarked that Bryk failed to apply for any positions for three weeks after being notified that she had 30 days to locate a new position. Thus, the Court held that under the factual circumstances, the jury acted reasonably in finding that Defendant engaged in good faith efforts, even though it did not result in an accommodation. Id. at *11. The EEOC moved to alter the judgment, arguing that the judgment entitled Bryk to damages including equitable and injunctive relief, back pay in the amount of $184,425.20, pre-judgment interest in the amount of $11,594.98, and a tax penalty off-set in the amount of $13,043.90. Id. at *12-13. The EEOC contended that the good faith defense applied only to compensatory and punitive damages and therefore, it did not absolve Defendant from liability or other damages. Defendant argued that it was not liable as it acted in good faith and the employee's lack of participation resulted in a failure to accommodate. The Court found that an employer's defense based on good faith alone precluded only compensatory and punitive damages, not liability. Id. at *18. Thus, the Court granted the EEOC's motion for alteration of the judgment. Further, the Court denied the EEOC's request for equitable relief, stating that the facts in the case did not support the requested relief for the same reasons the Court denied the EEOC's motion for judgment as a matter of law. The Court also found that the evidence justified denial of back pay and front pay and held that Defendant should not be responsible for back pay in an amount exceeding $100,000, where it acted in good faith. Id. at *21. Moreover, the Court also denied front pay, concluding that Bryk was entitled to an opportunity for reinstatement. Thus, the Court ordered that Bryk must identify and apply for vacant positions and Defendant shall reinstate Bryk if a position was found for which she was equally or better qualified than other applicants. Accordingly, the Court denied the EEOC's motion for judgment as a matter of law and granted in part the EEOC's motion for alteration of judgment and equitable relief.

EEOC v. West Customer Management Group, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 76943 (N.D. Fla. June 15, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant discriminated against the charging party, Derrick Roberts, based on his national origin in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII"). After the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment, the case proceeded to trial. The jury returned a verdict for Defendant, finding that Roberts was not qualified for the customer service representative position for which he applied. In an amended Report and Recommendation ("R&R") entered on July 28, 2014, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the EEOC be required to pay attorneys' fees and costs to Defendant pursuant to Title VII. The Court adopted the R&R subject to certain modifications and referred the matter to the Magistrate Judge to conduct all further proceedings in the event the parties could not agree on a reasonable award of costs. After the Court entered its order adopting and modifying the R&R, Defendant filed a supplemental motion for attorneys' fees and non-taxable expenses, seeking fees and expenses incurred in litigating the attorneys' fee issue. The Magistrate Judge found that the hours, rates, and fees requested by Defendant were reasonable. The EEOC objected to the Magistrate Judge's recommendation. The Court overruled the EEOC's objections, adopted the R&R, and granted Defendant's supplemental motion for award of attorneys' fees and non-taxable expenses. The Court opined that despite the absence in the R&R of a line-by-line review of the hours billed addressing each of the EEOC's arguments, the Magistrate Judge expressly rejected the EEOC's arguments regarding Defendant's expert affidavit, the rates and hours billed, the fact that Defendant used more than one attorney during the trial, and the EEOC's objection to compensating for attorney travel time. Id. at *2. The Court found that the Magistrate Judge also properly considered the contentious nature of the litigation and observed that the EEOC's conduct throughout the proceedings had been unusually aggressive, if not vexatious. Id. at *3. The Court also agreed with the Magistrate Judge that the requested rates and hours were reasonable based on the expert's affidavit. Id. Accordingly, the Court awarded Defendant $90,541.50 in attorneys' fees and $7,319.67 in non-taxable expenses incurred from the date of the pre-trial conference through the conclusion of the trial. Id. at *8. Moreover, the Court agreed with the Magistrate Judge's recommendation that Defendant should also be awarded its fees and expenses incurred in litigating the attorneys' fee issue. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's supplemental motion for award of attorneys' fees and non-taxable expenses. Id.

(xiii) U.S. Supreme Court

EEOC v. Abercrombie & Fitch Stores, Inc.*, 135 S. Ct. 2028 (2015). The EEOC brought a Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII") employment discrimination action on behalf of a female job applicant alleging religious discrimination in Defendant's hiring practices. Defendant allegedly refused to hire the female applicant because she insisted on wearing a headscarf, which was against Defendant's "look policy." Id. at 2030. The District Court granted summary judgment, which the Tenth Circuit affirmed on the ground that failure-to-accommodate liability attaches only when the applicant provides the employer with "actual knowledge of his need for an accommodation." Id. On further appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed. The U.S. Supreme Court noted that 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(a) prohibits an employer from failing or refusing to hire because of such individual's religion, and § 2000e(j) defines the word "religion" to "includ[e] all aspects of religious observance and practice, as well as belief, unless an employer demonstrates that he is unable to reasonably accommodate to" a "religious observance or practice without undue hardship on the conduct of the employer's business." Id. at 2032. Defendant argued that to show disparate treatment, an applicant must first show that an employer had actual knowledge of the applicant's need for an accommodation. The U.S. Supreme Court, however, reasoned that an applicant has only to show that his need for an accommodation was a motivating factor in the employer's decision. Id. The U.S. Supreme Court observed that § 2000e-2(a)(1) does not impose a knowledge requirement, and that instead, the intentional discrimination provision prohibits certain motives, regardless of the state of the actor's knowledge. Id. at 2032-33. Further, the U.S. Supreme Court opined that an employer who has actual knowledge of the need for an accommodation does not violate Title VII by refusing to hire an applicant if avoiding that accommodation is not his motive, and that conversely, an employer who acts with the motive of avoiding accommodation may violate Title VII even if he has no more than an unsubstantiated suspicion that accommodation would be needed. Id. at 2033. The U.S. Supreme Court further noted that an employer may not make an applicant's religious practice, confirmed or otherwise, a factor in employment decisions. Id. Alternatively, Defendant argued that a claim based on failure to accommodate an applicant's religious practice must be raised as a disparate impact claim, not a disparate treatment claim.

Because Congress, however, defined "religion," for Title VII's purposes, as including all aspects of religious observance and practice, as well as belief, the U.S. Supreme Court held that a religious practice is one of the protected characteristics that cannot be accorded disparate treatment and must be accommodated. Id. at 2033-34. Accordingly, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed the grant of summary judgment to Defendant.

EEOC v. Mach Mining, LLC*, 135 S. Ct. 1645 (2015). In December 2013, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit ruled that an alleged failure to conciliate is not an affirmative defense to the merits of an employment discrimination suit brought by the EEOC. In essence, the Seventh Circuit determined that the EEOC's pre-lawsuit conduct in the context of conciliation activities was immune from judicial review. The U.S. Supreme Court subsequently granted certiorari to determine whether that was correct and, if not, what standard federal courts should use to review the EEOC's conciliation efforts. The U.S. Supreme Court unanimously rejected the Commission's position that its conciliation activities are beyond judicial review. It began by discussing the fact that Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII") requires the EEOC to "endeavor to eliminate [the] alleged unlawful employment practice by informal methods of conference, conciliation, and persuasion." Id. at 1647 (quoting 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(b)). The U.S. Supreme Court observed that "Congress rarely intends to prevent courts from enforcing its directives to federal agencies," and that, for that reason, the U.S. Supreme Court would "appl[y] a strong presumption favoring judicial review of administrative action." Id. at 1651. The U.S. Supreme Court reasoned that "[c]ourts routinely enforce . . . compulsory prerequisites to suit in Title VII litigation." Id. As an example, the U.S. Supreme Court pointed to the fact that courts routinely dismiss discrimination complaints of parties that failed to file a timely charge of discrimination with the EEOC. Id. The U.S. Supreme Court found that this supported judicial review of the EEOC's compliance with the conciliation requirement. Id. at 1652. The U.S. Supreme Court also rejected the EEOC's argument that "Title VII provides no standards by which to judge the EEOC's performance of its statutory duty," thus showing that "Congress demonstrated its intent to preclude judicial review." Id. The U.S. Supreme Court concluded that the EEOC's position was incorrect because, while the lack of a standard might indicate Congress' intent to give the EEOC wide latitude in conducting the conciliation process, it did not give the EEOC the authority to ignore the conciliation process. Id. Specifically, the U.S. Supreme Court opined that, if the Commission's position were correct, the EEOC could file suit without any attempt at conciliation, and federal courts could do nothing to remedy the failure to engage in conciliation. Id. The U.S. Supreme Court then addressed the proper scope of judicial review to determine whether the EEOC had met its conciliation obligation. The U.S. Supreme Court declined to adopt the standard offered by Mach Mining as well as the Commission. The U.S. Supreme Court began its analysis with the plain language of the statute, noting that Title VII describes the statutory obligation as requiring "conference, conciliation, and persuasion." Id. Those specified methods must therefore involve communication between the parties, including an exchange of information and views about the alleged unlawful employment practice. In sum, the EEOC must "tell the employer about the claim – essentially, what practice has harmed which person or class – and must provide the employer with an opportunity to discuss the matter in an effort to achieve voluntary compliance." Id. In defining the scope of judicial review, the U.S. Supreme Court threaded a line between the EEOC's position and the position of the defense. The EEOC argued for the most minimal review possible based on facial examination of documents prepared and submitted by the agency itself. In this case, the EEOC argued that the U.S. Supreme Court should be satisfied with two letters sent from the Commission to Defendant, including: (i) the reasonable cause letter, which informed the company that the EEOC would contact the party to initiate the conciliation process; and (ii) a second, later letter, which simply stated that the conciliation process had occurred and failed. Id. at 1653. The U.S. Supreme Court rejected the EEOC's proposed level of review, holding that it simply failed to prove what the government claims, namely, whether the agency actually did what it said it did. Defendant argued for a more searching review. In its briefs, the company had argued that a federal court should satisfy itself that the EEOC had negotiated conciliation in good faith. Working off of a standard set forth in the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"), the company argued for some minimum prerequisites as to what "good faith" negotiation would look like, including setting forth the factual and legal basis for its positions and refraining from making "take-it-or-leave-it" offers. Id. at 1653-54. The U.S. Supreme Court rejected that approach, holding that the NLRA is directed toward the process of negotiation itself. The law's purpose is to create a sphere of bargaining to address labor disputes. Id. at 1654. Title VII, on the other hand, is about compliance with the law. While the law favors cooperation and voluntary compliance, it gives the EEOC wide latitude to pursue that goal, since "Congress left to the EEOC such strategic decisions as whether to make a bare minimum offer, to lay all its cards on the table, or to respond to each of an employer's counter-offers, however far afield." Id. The U.S. Supreme Court also held that the company's proposed standard of review would fall afoul of Title VII's protection of the confidentiality of the conciliation process. A detailed review of that process would necessitate public disclosure of information in violation of the statute's non-disclosure obligations. Id. at 1656. The U.S. Supreme Court held that a sworn affidavit from the EEOC – stating that it has performed its obligations – often should be enough to show that it met its conciliation efforts. Id. But if employers counter with a credible affidavit of their own or other evidence that demonstrates that the EEOC "did not provide the requisite information about the charge or attempt to engage in a discussion about conciliating the claim," then a court must conduct the fact-finding necessary to decide that dispute. Id. If the EEOC's efforts were inadequate, the court must then order the agency to undertake the necessary efforts to ensure that it has satisfied its conciliation obligations. Id.

Editor's Note: The U.S. Supreme Court's ruling forcefully rejected the EEOC's position that it is above judicial review.

IV. Significant Collective Action Rulings Under The Age Discrimination In Employment Act

Multiple-plaintiff age discrimination claims under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") are not governed by Rule 23. Instead, these claims are known as "collective actions," and are governed by the litigation procedures in the Portal-to-Portal Act at 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Courts and litigants commonly refer to these lawsuits as "§ 216(b) actions."

Collective actions brought under the ADEA raise "opt-in" issues quite similar to those arising under the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA"). In other words, class members (technically, "collective action" members, as class actions do not exist under the § 216(b) framework) do not become part of the litigation unless and until they affirmatively opt-in to the lawsuit (whereas under Rule 23, a class member must opt-out of the class action or otherwise will be bound by any judgment in the litigation).

The plaintiffs' bar typically utilizes the FLSA's two-step procedure under § 216(b) to obtain conditional certification of ADEA collective action claims. This approach, based upon the Tenth Circuit's seminal decision in Thiessen, et al. v. General Electric Capital Corp., 267 F.3d 1095 (10th Cir. 2001), involves substituting "pattern or practice" claims for evidence of commonality and typicality. The pattern or practice vehicle by definition requires a higher threshold of proof, but plaintiffs have taken advantage of the more lenient step one process in the ADEA's two-step procedure for certifying collective actions. In the "notice" or "conditional" certification stage, there is a lower threshold of proof than in cases brought under Rule 23, where Supreme Court decisional law requires a "rigorous analysis" of a plaintiff's claims and evidence. Conditional certification under the ADEA authorizes plaintiffs to send class notices based on minimal evidentiary showings and enables them to gain leverage over employers who must then endure extensive discovery as plaintiffs seek to gather further proof of their claims.

Stockwell, et al. v. City And County Of San Francisco*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 61577 (N.D. Cal. May 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of San Francisco Police Department ("SFPD") officers, brought a class action alleging that Defendants denied them advancement opportunities because of their age. Each of the Plaintiffs was an SFPD officer with extensive investigative experience, who took and passed the test for a Q-35 Assistant Inspector position. Id. at *3. Traditionally, the City filled its investigative positions by promoting officers from the Q-35 list. However, starting in 2007, the City began assigning investigative duties to newly-promoted sergeants who had taken the Q-50 exam, rather than to assistant inspectors promoted from the Q-35 list. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that the practice of filling investigative positions from the Q-50 list had a substantial adverse impact on officers over the age of 40. Id. Plaintiffs asserted causes of action under California's Fair Employment and Housing Act ("FEHA") and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA"). After the District Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification on their FEHA claims for the second time, the Ninth Circuit reversed the decision, and remanded for the District Court to determine if the Rule 23(b) requirements were satisfied. The Ninth Circuit took no position on whether the statistical showing the officers had made was adequate to make out their merits case, but found that commonality on Plaintiffs' disparate treatment claims was met because the officers were challenging a single policy that affected them adversely. Plaintiffs renewed their Rule 23 motion after remand from the Ninth Circuit. The District Court found that the Rule 23(a) requirements were satisfied, but as to the predominance requirement, the Ninth Circuit had acknowledged that a number of issues may well show that individual issues predominated. The individual issues that the Ninth Circuit identified included: (i) whether an officer took the 2006 Sergeants exam or not; (ii) comparisons of individual rank and between the 1998 Assistant Inspector list and the 2007 Sergeants list; (iii) the relative qualifications of each officer on the list; and (iv) other factors affecting an assignment to the Investigations Bureau. Id. at *20-21. At a hearing, the District Court had expressed the view that individual issues predominated over the class of 133 members, because there were only 55 investigative positions filled during the class period, and the District Court would necessarily need to consider the individual qualifications of each class member to determine which of the 55 officers or individuals would have been promoted if the City had made promotions from the Q-35 list rather than the Q-55 list. Id. at *21. Plaintiffs acknowledged that individual issues predominated, but relied on Houser v. Pritzker, 28 F. Supp. 3d 222 (S.D.N.Y. 2014), which certified a liability class but not a damages class. Id. at *24. Houser expressly found that a damages class could not be certified under Rule 23(b)(3), and instead certified a liability-only class because Plaintiffs moved for such a class under Rule 23(b)(2). Id. at *27. In contrast, Plaintiffs made clear that they sought certification under Rule 23(b)(3), and nowhere did they invoke Rule 23(b)(2) as a basis for their motion. Overall, the District Court found the same problems in this case that were present in Houser. The District Court explained that as in Houser, the proposed class included individuals who were not entitled to back pay under the proposed theory of liability because they would not have been hired even absent the alleged discrimination. Id. at *27. The District Court remarked that, in fact, the proposed class would contain 78 members who were not entitled to any back pay because Plaintiffs admitted that only 55 of the 133 proposed class members would have been promoted in the "but-for" scenario. Id. In other words, the majority of the class would be made up of individuals with no claims for relief. In addition, the District Court ruled that Plaintiffs had at best shown that an individual's rank on the Q-50 list was an indicator of whether that individual was likely to receive a promotion to the rank of sergeant. However, for the purposes of class certification motion, the District Court reasoned that Plaintiffs' showing fell short in two ways. First, it did not account for the City's consideration of an individual's qualifications when making promotion decisions, and thus, did not solve the problem that plagued the class of 133 proposal. Second, Plaintiffs failed to show how the City's procedure for making Q-50 Sergeant promotions was relevant to its procedure for making "but-for" Q-35 Assistant Inspector promotions. Id. at *37. Accordingly, the District Court found that predominance requirement was not satisfied and denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

B. Other Federal Rulings Affecting The Defense Of ADEA Collective Actions

Numerous federal courts issued rulings in ADEA collective actions in 2015 that implicated § 216(b) certification issues. These rulings included Equal Pay Act litigation; tolling in ADEA collective action litigation; discovery in ADEA collective action litigation; experts in ADEA collective action litigation; notice issues in ADEA/EPA collective action litigation; OWBPA issues in ADEA collective action litigation; and disparate impact issues in ADEA collective actions.

(i) Equal Pay Act Litigation

Barrett, et al. v. Forest Laboratories, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51495 (S.D.N.Y. April 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of sales representatives, brought a putative collective and class action against Defendants alleging denial of equal pay and other discriminatory treatment in violation of the EPA and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act ("Title VII"). During discovery, Plaintiffs moved to compel Defendants to produce electronically-stored personnel data for sales representatives employed on or after January 1, 2008, and also sought the names of all such employees. Id. at *3. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion in part. The Court noted that Plaintiffs had sought data reflecting, among other information, gender, compensation, and employment history that was designed to unearth evidence of disparate pay and other unequal treatment between genders. Id at *3-4. The parties disagreed on the temporal scope of any production, at least at that stage. Regarding that temporal scope, Defendants invoked the Court's prior 2014 ruling, which narrowed the scope of a Title VII class to individuals employed on or after February 6, 2010 in deferral states and July 6, 2010 in non-deferral states. Id. at *4. Premised on those cut-off dates, Defendants had been producing data for individuals employed on or after February 6, 2010 to enable Plaintiffs to make a statistical case in support of their forthcoming EPA conditional certification motion. Id at *5. Defendants argued that the additional data that Plaintiffs sought concerning employees as of January 1, 2008 was not necessary and that, in light of the Court's Title VII ruling limiting the class period, Plaintiffs' request was overbroad. Regarding Plaintiffs' request for names, Defendants argued that the scope of targeted production encompassed about 5,000 past and present employees, and that some of the data that was embodied in the production was quite sensitive, including medical information and employment terminations. Id. The Court found Defendants' objections regarding the timeframe for relevant ESI discovery to be unpersuasive. First, the Court pointed out that relevance, and not necessity, is the applicable standard for discovery under Rule 26(b)(1). Id. at *6. Second, the Court observed that the parties were pursuing merits, as well as class discovery, at the same time; and hence, Defendants' focus on what Plaintiffs needed for their motion improperly narrowed the field of data. Id at *6-7. Moreover, the Court found that Defendants' reliance on the cut-off dates for Plaintiffs' Title VII class was misleading because under Title VII and under the EPA, some of Plaintiffs' claims may encompass employment practices that occurred as early as 2008. Id at *7. In addition, the Court found Defendants' argument ignored the fact that employer behavior prior to the earliest date on which a claim may have arisen was potentially relevant and useful in a discrimination analysis. Id. Finally, regarding the names of the employees whose employment data was to be produced, the Court noted that some of the data to be revealed was potentially quite sensitive. Id. at *8. The Court concluded that although Plaintiffs would have need for disclosure of the names of collective action members if their forthcoming conditional certification motion was granted, they failed to make a persuasive case for immediate disclosure of all names at this stage.

Barrett, et al. v. Forest Laboratories, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88299 (S.D.N.Y. July 8, 2015). Plaintiffs brought individual and collective action and class action claims under the Equal Pay Act ("EPA") and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act ("Title VII"), alleging that Defendants discriminated against female employees with respect to pay and promotions. In April 2013, Defendants filed a motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' second amended complaint ("SAC"), and the Court decided the motion in August 2014. In September 2014, the parties began to meet and confer and desired to seek expedited discovery of certain information and equitable tolling for the EPA claims. Id. at *4. Accordingly, when discovery was on-going, Plaintiffs moved to toll the statute of limitations from the date on which Defendants filed their motion to dismiss the SAC through the date conditional certification for the EPA collective action was granted. The Court denied the motion. The Court noted that in a collective action, the statute of limitations for each Plaintiff runs until he or she opts-in to the lawsuit by filing written consent with the Court, not when the named Plaintiff files a complaint, and that such signed consents do not relate back to the original filing date of the complaint. Id. at *6. Further, under American Pipe & Construction Co. v. Utah, 414 U.S. 538, 554 (1974), the commencement of a class action suspends the applicable statute of limitations as to all asserted members of the class who would have been parties had the suit been permitted to continue as a class action. Id. at *6-7. Thus, the Court opined that while Plaintiffs' institution of this action automatically tolled the claims of potential Title VII class members, it did not do so for potential EPA collective action members. Plaintiffs, however, contended that they had been assiduously pursuing potential collective action members' rights, but procedural and discovery delays forestalled them from seeking conditional certification of their EPA claims because this case was effectively stayed while Defendants' motion to dismiss was pending. Id. at *9. The Court, however, remarked that Plaintiffs failed to articulate any reason why they could not have at least tried to proceed with discovery during the pendency of the motion to dismiss, and noted that except in cases covered by the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, a motion to dismiss does not automatically stay discovery. Id. at *10. Further, although the Court observed that the parties should meet on their own as soon as practicable after a case begins to work out a proposed discovery plan. The Plaintiffs' counsel did not begin the meet and confer process until one month after the Court decided the motion to dismiss and over two years after commencement of this action. Id. Although Plaintiffs attempted to shift the blame to Defendants for not producing documents before the litigation ever began, the Court opined that Defendants were under no obligation to provide any information prior to the commencement of this litigation and thus could not be faulted for not doing what they need not have done. Id. at *11. Additionally, although the delay in deciding a motion may in some circumstances, amount to an extraordinary circumstance justifying equitable tolling, the Court ruled that the motion to dismiss did not actually present a barrier to the discovery Plaintiffs sought. Id. at *15. Finally, the Court observed that equitable tolling provides the Court with limited discretion to depart from the general rule in rare and exceptional circumstances, and that there were no such circumstances here, notwithstanding the consequences of this decision for potential EPA collective action members. Id. at *18. The Court reasoned that to grant the exceptional remedy of equitable tolling for the pendency of a motion to dismiss, when there was nothing standing in the way of Plaintiffs pursuing conditional certification, would be tantamount to tolling the statute of limitations for FLSA claims as a matter of course for all potential Plaintiffs whenever the first Plaintiff files a complaint, which would lead to a result plainly contrary to the procedural rules that govern FLSA collective actions. Id. at *18-19. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to toll the statute of limitations.

Barrett, et al. v. Forest Laboratories, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 117203 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of female sales representatives, brought an action alleging gender-based pay discrimination claims against Defendant employer under the Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Equal Pay Act ("EPA"). Following the denial, in part, of Defendant's motion to dismiss, ten of the Plaintiffs moved for certification of a collective action under the EPA. Id. at *3. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion, finding that Plaintiffs' evidence presented a colorable case of gender-based discrimination. Id. at *27. Plaintiffs provided declarations stating that they worked for various periods of time in different regions of the country as Defendant's sales representatives; that all sales representatives operated under the same corporate standards governing skill requirements, training, the type of work performed, and compensation; and that based on their observations and experiences, Defendant paid male sale representatives more than female sales representatives. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiffs also provided corporate documents showing that the job description for the sales representative position, the skill sets demanded for hiring and retention, and the required training process were uniform and national; as well as documents showing that Defendant had a single set of standards for initial base pay and annual and merit raises, and that it had single set of procedures for determining the amount of compensation and a centralized system for reviewing any proposed increases. Id. at *7. In addition, Plaintiffs presented evidence that Defendant maintained a centralized set of geographically-based criteria, referred to as the COLA tiers, premised on a cost-of-living factor, to determine the degree of differential in pay for different geographic regions. Id. Plaintiffs further submitted an expert economist's report identifying a statistically significant difference between the pay of male and female sales representatives when controlling for a series of pertinent variables, such as experience for the period from 2009 through 2014. Id. at *8. The Court found Plaintiffs' evidence sufficient to justify certification of a collective action under the EPA. Id. at *10. Defendant's declarations indicated that sales representatives needed different skills depending on where they worked, that decisions as to pay increases embodied a subjective element in evaluating the sales representatives, and that the division managers approved salaries for some Plaintiffs that compared favorably with the salaries of most or all of the male sales representatives on their respective teams. The Court found that these facts were inadequate to show that the proposed opt-in Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated in terms of skill, effort, and responsibility. Id. at *17-18. Moreover, the Court reasoned that Defendant's assertion that sales representatives required different skills depending on the demographic and/or geographic circumstances of a specific location was inconsistent with the documentation in the record reflecting that the stated job description and its specification of the required skills for that position did not make any distinction based on the demographic or geographic circumstances. Id. at *19. Further, Defendant's own expert's critique of Plaintiff's expert report failed to show that there was no basis for the statistical inference of impermissible deviations in pay by gender. Id. at *20-21. Although Plaintiffs listed only male comparators who were paid more than them, the Court noted that the fact that Defendant paid male sales representatives more than their female equivalents at least raised a question as to whether the disparities were inconsistent with the statutory mandate. Id. at *22-23. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs sufficiently demonstrated that they were similarly-situated for the purposes of conditional certification. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action under the EPA. Id. at *29.

Coates, et al. v. Farmers Group, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 165817 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of female attorneys, brought a putative class and collective action alleging that Defendant engaged in systemic gender discrimination against its female employees through unequal pay in violation of the Equal Pay Act ("EPA") and and other federal and state laws. Id. at *1-2. Defendant's Claims Litigation Department employed approximately 500 attorneys in over 40 branch legal offices nationwide, and Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant paid the female attorneys less than their male counterparts, even though the female attorneys performed the same or substantially equal work to the male attorneys. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs alleged that they and putative collective action members were similarly-situated, and moved for conditional certification of an EPA collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). In opposition, Defendant argued that the phrase "similarly-situated" must be interpreted different for EPA collective actions compared to FLSA collective actions because to be "similarly-situated" for an EPA collective action, Plaintiffs and the opt-in Plaintiffs must show that they performed "substantially equal" or "virtually identical" work to each other and the other proposed collective action members. Id. at *26-27. The Court rejected Defendant's argument and granted Plaintiffs' motion. The Court found no basis to adopt Defendant's "substantially equal" work as a measure of establishing the similarly-situated standard for an EPA collective action, either as a matter of statutory interpretation or due to prudential considerations such as manageability. Id. at *27. The Court noted that Defendant failed to point to anything in the text of the FLSA or the EPA that suggested that "substantially equal" work and "similarly-situated" were interpreted in the same manner. The Court explained that, to show an EPA violation, a female Plaintiff need to show only that she performed "substantially equal" work to a higher-paid male comparator, and thus the focus of inquiry would be on the relationship between the female employee and the male comparator. Id. at *27-28. Plaintiffs made a modest factual showing that the putative collective action members were the victims of a single decision, policy, or plan, and the record showed that attorneys performed the same tasks, followed the same standardized case management guidelines, and were subjected to the same compensation and relative performance evaluation polices across job titles, salary grades, and geographic area. Id. at *34-35. Plaintiffs also presented evidence that the policies resulted in unequal pay for female attorneys, specifically the evidence that Defendant paid female attorneys less than male attorneys, on average, and identified a higher-paid male comparator for each Plaintiff. Id. at *36. Defendant argued that any EPA collective action would necessarily be unmanageable unless all of the proposed collective action members did substantially equal work. The Court disagreed and found that Defendant ignored the possibility of sub-classes, wherein each sub-class could offer common proof that the members of the sub-class performed substantially equal work. Id. at *29. The Court further explained that even in a case with multiple sub-classes, the entire collective action could offer proof of Defendant's uniform compensation and performance evaluation polices, and proof that such policies lead to systematic unequal pay for women. Id. at *30. The Court thus held that manageability could be better addressed after discovery, and after analysis of the issues of common proof, and the number, geographic location and job duties of any opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. at *31. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs and the proposed collective action members were similarly-situated for this lenient notice stage standard for conditional certification, and accordingly, granted Plaintiffs' motion for EPA conditional collective action certification.

(ii) Tolling In ADEA Collective Action Litigation

Barrett, et al. v. Forest Laboratories, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144340 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former female sales representatives, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of gender-based discrimination against its female employees in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Equal Pay Act ("EPA"). After the Court conditionally certified a collective action under the EPA, the parties agreed on all aspects of the proposed collective notice except for the cut-off date for identifying potential members of the collective action. Id. at *3. The Court had previously denied tolling based on the filing of the complaint, and therefore Defendant asserted that the trigger of notice was September 15, 2015, which would cause notice to go to all female sales representatives employed by Defendant since September 15, 2012. Plaintiffs, however, asked for notice to be given to all potential opt-ins who were employed by Defendant since July 20, 2011. At the outset, the Court observed that the collective notice should be directed only to those who were employed by Defendant within three years prior to the Court's approval of notice. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs suggested that: (i) they intended at some point to seek equitable tolling for the period since they filed their certification motion on May 22, 2015; and (ii) they pointed to a tolling agreement between parties running from July 20, 2011 for the filing of a suit that Plaintiffs could bring, either in their individual capacity or as class representatives. Id. The Court observed that the case law precedents have routinely approved notice periods going back three years from the filing of the complaint even though time period can substantially exceed the statutory limitations period, which runs three years from the filing of an opt-in consent. Id. at *7. The Court remarked that this approach would leave room for opt-ins to pursue a request for tolling based on their own specific circumstances and that the timeliness of their claims would be determined in future proceedings. The Court held that the future opt-ins whose employment ceased before September 15, 2012 should be given notice or they will effectively be denied the opportunity to attempt to defend the timeliness of their claims and that a notice period that ran at least for three years from the filing of the certification motion, i.e., from May 22, 2012 was justified. Id. Accordingly, the Court held that the collective notice must be provided to all females who worked for Defendant as sales representatives at any time since May 22, 2012.

Kassman, et al. v. KPMG LLP*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 118542 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 4, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a collective action alleging that Defendant paid female client service professionals less than their male counterparts in violation of the Equal Pay Act ("EPA"). Plaintiffs moved for equitable tolling of the statute of limitations for collective action members' claims under the EPA. The Court granted the motion in part. Plaintiffs sought to toll the statute of limitations for opt-in Plaintiffs from the date when Defendant filed its opposition to Plaintiffs' motion to file the second amended complaint, and asked that the claims and consent forms of opt-in Plaintiffs be deemed filed as of that date. The Court opined that Plaintiffs showed that extraordinary circumstances caused the passage of almost four years when this action was commenced and the last date on which opt-in Plaintiffs could join this action. This delay was caused by several factors, with the most significant being attributable to the Court. The case was assigned to three separate judges between its filing and the approval of notice to opt-in Plaintiffs, and the Court remarked that such circumstances were not part of the ordinary course of litigation and could not be attributed to Plaintiffs. Id. at *10-11. Additionally, the Court noted that probably due to the reassignment of judges, the Court spent an extraordinary amount of time considering motions, including one motion for leave to file an amended complaint, two motions to dismiss, the first iteration of the equitable tolling motion, and the conditional certification motion. The motions were pending for about 27 months of the almost four-year delay, and the Court observed that significant delays attributable to the Court may constitute "extraordinary circumstances." Id. at *11. Defendant argued that equitable tolling, as a "rare and exceptional" remedy, must be strictly construed because Congress had already weighed the equities in setting limitations. Id. at *13. Although the Court agreed with Defendant that equitable tolling should not be routinely applied in FLSA collective actions, it opined that equitable tolling requirements are not applied mechanistically, and the exercise of the Court's equity powers must be made on a case-by-case basis, mindful that in specific circumstances, and it is often hard to predict in advance what cases warrant special treatment. Id. at *13-14. The Court found that Plaintiffs had exercised reasonable diligence during the time period they sought to have tolled. Plaintiffs alleged that they were paid less than their male counterparts for performing substantially equivalent work, and that they could not readily discern these pay disparities that were the basis of the EPA claims at the time of the payments. In support, Plaintiffs submitted the testimony of a senior manager, which affirmed that she did not know how much her peers made or how much her subordinates made because people did not talk about compensation. The Court observed that difficulties of uncovering the facts giving rise to pay disparity claims were widely acknowledged. Id. at *14. The Court remarked that it was not for lack of diligence that the opt-in Plaintiffs relied on Court-ordered notice to alert them, not only to the existence of this litigation, but also to the facts that were the basis for their claims. Further, the Court noted that the delay also was caused by not so extraordinary circumstances outside the opt-in Plaintiffs' control, such as Defendant's vigorous opposition at every juncture, as well as Defendant's resistance to providing information necessary for the conditional certification motion. The Court stated that delays caused by Defendant may warrant equitable tolling, even without any evidence of bad faith. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion, but set the date for tolling from the date on which Defendant's first motion to dismiss became fully briefed. Further, the Court held that statute of limitations was not tolled for the opt-in Plaintiffs who failed to file timely claims by the deadline stated in the notice.

Kassman, et al. v. KPMG LLP*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 134888 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 2, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action alleging that Defendant paid its female client service professionals in its tax and advisory functions less than their male counterparts in violation of the FLSA as amended by the Equal Pay Act. Plaintiffs filed a motion for equitable tolling to allow Plaintiffs who opted-in late to the lawsuit, which the Court granted in part. Defendant moved for reconsideration of the equitable tolling decision, which the Court denied. At the outset, the Court noted that Defendant did not identify any intervening change of law or newly-discovered evidence, and had simply argued that the opinion should be reconsidered to prevent manifest injustice. Id. at *3. Defendant asserted that the opinion impermissibly presumed diligence on the part of opt-in Plaintiffs despite controlling Second Circuit precedent requiring individualized analysis of equitable tolling. Id. The Court explained that as noted in its opinion, the Second Circuit had not addressed equitable tolling in a collective action, and the case law authorities had tolled the statute of limitations in FLSA cases without engaging in an individualized inquiry. Id. at *3-4. The Court remarked that the opinion's description of the circumstances that delayed issuing notice, and the evaluation of Plaintiffs' diligence explained why tolling was appropriate. Id. at *4. Defendant also argued that the opinion penalized Defendant for vigorously defending this case. The Court remarked that Defendant's vigorous opposition at every juncture, as well as its resistance to providing information necessary for the conditional certification motion, provided the context for the opinion's holding regarding Plaintiffs' diligence. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court rejected this argument as well. Similarly, the Court rejected Defendant's arguments that the tolling opinion granted an excessive tolling period and deprived Defendant its right to raise individual defenses. For these reasons, the Court refused to reconsider its previous opinion on equitable tolling.

Romero, et al. v. Allstate Insurance Co.,* Case No. 01-CV-3894 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employee agents, brought a putative class action alleging unlawful retaliation by Defendant in violation of the ADEA and other federal statutes. Plaintiffs had sought certification of a class consisting of all employee agents whose contract with Defendant was involuntarily terminated as part of its program and who executed a release in connection therewith. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for certification after finding that the issues surrounding the validity of the release involved numerous individual inquiries that were so inextricably intertwined with the common question that they eliminated any benefit to certification. Id. at 2. On December 11, 2014, the Court clarified its order (i) denying class certification, (ii) holding that the order was not intended to and did not finally resolve whether issues going to the merits of Plaintiffs' claims could be subject to certification for resolution on a class-wide or collective action basis, and (iii) that, after concluding any currently scheduled trial with respect to release issues, any party could move for certification under Rule 23 with respect to claims or issues involving the merits of Plaintiffs' claims. Further, the Court clarified that the order restarted the running of the statute of limitations for any current or former employee agent of Defendant who, between November 10, 1999 and June 30, 2000, signed the release prepared by Defendant in connection with the "Preparing for the Future Group Reorganization Program," and who now wished to challenge the validity of the release in order to pursue substantive claims against Defendant that would otherwise be contractually barred. Plaintiffs moved for clarification or, in the alternative, for reconsideration of the Court's order of December 11, 2014, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs contended that because the release was asserted as an affirmative defense to the substantive claims, challenges to the validity of that release were not subject to any specific statute of limitations. Id. at 1. The Court, however, observed that Plaintiffs misunderstood both the purpose behind tolling in a putative class action and the scope of the Court's certification ruling. Id. The Court noted that tolling does not continue indefinitely; if the Court denies certification, or if it certifies the class but later decertifies it, tolling ceases. Id. at 1-2. The Court stated that the putative class members who signed the release were no longer entitled to tolling of the statute of limitations. Id. at 2. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion.

(iii) Discovery In ADEA Collective Action Litigation

Apsley, et al. v. The Boeing Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1181 (D. Kan. Jan. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees of The Boeing Co., brought a collective action alleging age discrimination in hiring decisions when Boeing sold off the assets of its commercial facilities to Defendant Spirit Aerosystems in 2005. Plaintiffs were former Boeing employees who were not hired by Spirit when it bought Boeing's facility. Following the grant of summary judgment in Defendants' favor on Plaintiffs' collective action claims, Defendants filed a motion to dismiss the claims of 26 Plaintiffs who alleged individual counts of age discrimination. Defendants argued that all 26 Plaintiffs should be dismissed for failure to provide complete discovery responses to requests for production and all responsive documents. Id. at *5. The Court granted Defendants' motion. The Court noted that, in March 2014, Defendants had filed a motion to compel and asked for sanctions for Plaintiffs alleged failure to comply with their discovery obligations, and a week later, the Magistrate Judge had denied the motion, ordering Plaintiffs to provide a complete response to Defendants' requests for productions and all responsive documents. The Magistrate Judge also stated that if any Plaintiffs failed to respond as required by the order, their claims would be dismissed with prejudice and without further notice as a sanction for failure to comply with their discovery obligations and to prosecute their action. Id. Although all 26 Plaintiffs provided a verified answer to Defendants' interrogatories and responded to Defendants' requests for production, the Court analyzed the responses of each Plaintiff individually and found that none of the Plaintiffs complied with the discovery order. Specifically, none of the 26 Plaintiffs provided the tax returns for all years from 2005 to 2013, as required. Defendants sought tax returns to verify that all income had been disclosed. The Court explained that in an employment discrimination case like this, a terminated employee must mitigate damages, and post-termination income would show an employee's effort to satisfy that obligation. Id. at *20. While the Court acknowledged that coordinating production of nine years of tax returns for 26 Plaintiffs was a daunting task, it also noted that it was a task that Plaintiffs' counsel signed up for and agreed to complete pursuant to an agreement between the parties and the discovery order, and due to which Defendants withdrew their motion to compel and motion for sanctions. Id. The Court further noted that Plaintiffs had been given multiple opportunities to respond to Defendants' discovery, which they were entitled to have, and despite being warned of dismissal of the action, they fell significantly short of the obligations outlined in the discovery order. Id. at *22. The Court therefore concluded that dismissal with prejudice would be the appropriate sanction for all 26 Plaintiffs, and accordingly, dismissed the action.

Apsley, et al. v. The Boeing Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 45743 (D. Kan. April 8, 2015). In this age discrimination collective action, Defendants moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims due to Plaintiffs' failure to comply with a last-chance order compelling discovery. Plaintiffs did not appear at a hearing regarding their on-going failure to adequately participate in the litigation, and the District Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claims on January 7, 2015. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs moved for leave to file notice of appeal out of time on February 9, 2015, asserting that on January 31, 2015, Plaintiffs' counsel received news of such a personal, sensitive, and debilitating nature that demanded immediate action such that because of excusable neglect, he was unable to file the notice of appeal until February 9, 2015, one business/counting day after the expiration of the purported last day to file the notice. Id. The Tenth Circuit directed Plaintiffs to make the request to the District Court, and accordingly, Plaintiffs filed motion for leave to file notice of appeal to the District Court using virtually identical language. Id. at *7-8. The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion. The District Court remarked that although a date missed by one day due to the excusable neglect of miscalculation could be condoned, Plaintiffs had not sought relief on those grounds. Id. at *9. Further, the District Court found that Plaintiffs offered nothing more than the naked assertion of an intervening event. The District Court opined that drafting a notice of appeal was a simple process that would not take more than five to ten minutes, and it does not contain lengthy legal argument, nor voluminous procedural compilation of relevant documents. Id. at *11. Further, the District Court expressed surprise as to how an event purported to have happened on January 31, 2015, could have prevented the preparation and filing of such a simple document six days later. Id. The District Court was also skeptical of the reasons for "excusable neglect" asserted by Plaintiffs' counsel and was further frustrated with Plaintiffs' inattention to the case. Id. The District Court noted that Plaintiffs failed to appear at the hearing on Defendants' motion to dismiss on October 22, 2014, a date that was set specifically to accommodate Plaintiffs' counsel. Id. at *13. Moreover, although the District Court had repeatedly warned Plaintiffs' counsel that he was in default of maintaining his active status, Plaintiffs' counsel failed to either apply for a continuance or to confer with opposing counsel on that issue. Id. at *15. In addition, the District Court observed that Plaintiffs' counsel did not appear at the hearing because he indicated that he had a pre-surgery appointment for his son's tonsils surgery. Id. Contrary to this asserted fact, information came to the Court that Plaintiffs' counsel could not attend the hearing because he was dealing with the death of his grandmother. Id. at *16. The District Court found this assertion dramatically at odds with what he told the District Court, and thus concluded that Plaintiffs (and, significantly, their counsel) continued to have an "apparent lack of interest in pursuing the case." Id. at *17. The District Court indicated that it had lost confidence in the reliability of anything Plaintiffs' counsel told it, and that loss of confidence, coupled with a complete failure to give the District Court anything other than a "naked assertion" of the grounds for excusable neglect, compelled it to conclude that Plaintiffs had not shown excusable neglect for failing to timely file their notice of appeal. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the District Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for leave to file notice of appeal out of time.

Caraway, et al. v. United States,* Case No. 15-CV-434 (Fed. Cl. Sept. 29, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former managers and supervisors of the Federal Aviation Administration ("FAA"), brought a collective action seeking an award of back pay under the FAA's Personnel Management System ("PMS"). Id. at 1. Pursuant to an agreement between FAA and the National Air Traffic Controllers Association ("NATCA") that required FAA to grade airport facilities, FAA graded Atlanta TRACON, where Plaintiffs worked, at ATC-12 in 2001. While the agreement provided that if a facility was upgraded, the pay schedule of the facility's employees would be raised to the next level, the FAA did not upgrade the facility to ATC-13 even after it became the world's business airport in 2001, and later split the Atlanta TRACON into two facilities, eliminating their eligibility for an upgrade. Id. at 2. The NATCA filed a grievance with the FAA, and the parties' settlement required the FAA to pay back pay to all bargaining unit employees who worked at Atlanta TRACON during the dispute periods of time, including 2011 retirees. Id. The FAA then unilaterally extended the settlement to non-bargaining unit employees, but in March 2011, it modified that position, deciding that non-bargaining unit employees who retired or separated at the time of the 2011 settlement would not receive settlement funds. Id. Plaintiffs filed a collective action in the District Court alleging that the FAA's decision discriminated against them based on age. The District Court dismissed the collective action, ruling that Plaintiffs' allegations did not give rise to any plausible inference of age discrimination, and the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the dismissal. Id. at 3. Plaintiffs then filed this collective action challenging their exclusion from the settlement by seeking back pay under the PMS, a regulatory regime promulgated by the FAA, and asserting jurisdiction under the Tucker Act. Id. Defendant moved to dismiss arguing that the PMS back pay provision vest jurisdiction exclusively in forums other than the Court of Federal Claims, the Court of Federal Claims lacked jurisdiction because Plaintiffs did not seek presently due money, and even if it had, Plaintiffs failed to state a claim. Id. at 4. The Court of Federal Claims agreed and dismissed Plaintiffs' collective action. Although the PMS permitted an award of back pay, the Court of Federal Claims noted that the grievance, appeals, and the executive system appeals procedures applied only to a limited number of circumstances listed in the PMS, and an employee aggrieved under the PMS might appeal agency actions not covered by the specifically listed procedures to the Merit Systems Protection Board under the Back Pay Act. Id. at 5. The Court of Federal Claims thus noted that FAA employees could seek judicial review of the FAA's refusal to award back pay, if at all, only from a federal Court of Appeals or the Board, and PMS ostensibly withdrew any grant of Tucker Act jurisdiction by vesting judicial review exclusively in forums other than the Court of Federal Claims. Id. at 6. The Court of Federal Claims therefore concluded that it lacked subject-matter jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' claims. Id. at 7. To the extent Plaintiffs sought back pay on the grounds that the Atlanta TRACON should have been upgraded, and thus they should have received a pay increase, the Court of Federal Claims held that it had no jurisdiction to consider Plaintiffs' claim because Plaintiffs did not seek presently due money, and they did not allege that they were ever appointed to a higher pay grade. Id. at 8. Accordingly, the Court of Federal Claims granted Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' action for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

(iv) Experts In ADEA Collective Action Litigation

Karlo, et al. v. Pittsburg Glass Works, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 90429 (W.D. Pa., July 13, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a collective action alleging that Defendant's reduction-in-force ("RIF") in 2010 created a disparate treatment and had a disparate impact on the class in violation of the ADEA. Defendant filed motions to bar Plaintiffs' experts Anthony G. Greenwald, Michael Campion, and David Duffus, which the Court granted in part. Plaintiffs retained Dr. Greenwald to provide his opinion in the area of social psychological research on attitudes, prejudices, and stereotypes, which included the topic of implicit bias. Id. at *9. Dr. Greenwald explained that his original research in the area of implicit social cognition included the invention and development of a specific research method known as the Implicit Association Test ("IAT"). Id. at *10. Dr. Greenwald summarized his opinion based on research-established findings that had a bearing on the case, including (i) implicit biases were pervasive in more than 70% of Americans, who regarded themselves as unprejudiced; and (ii) implicit bias is scientifically established as a source of discriminatory behavior in employment. Id. at *13-14. Defendant sought to exclude Dr. Greenwald as an expert, arguing that (i) his methodology was unreliable, (ii) he lacked requisite qualifications to offer any opinion about a RIF, and (iii) his testimony regarding corporate culture and generalized stereotyping in the workplace was inadmissible under Rule 404 of the Federal Rules of Evidence. Id. at *18. The Court observed that other decisions had also barred Dr. Greenwald as an expert witness. The Court explained that Dr. Greenwald did not visit Defendant's plant or speak to any current and former employees, interview the managers who took part in the RIF, or subject any of those individuals to his self-invented IAT. Id. at *25. In addition, the Court found that Dr. Greenwald's methodology was unreliable, to the extent that IAT informed his analysis and provided a basis for his opinion that most people experienced implicit bias. Id. at *26-27. Accordingly, the Court barred Dr. Greenwald's testimony at the trial. The Court next noted that Dr. Michael Campion made a statistical analysis to examine whether there was any evidence of adverse impact by age in the RIF. Defendant contended that that Dr. Campion, a non-statistician, was not qualified to opine in the field of statistics, and that his analysis used the wrong methodology and failed to specifically examine Plaintiffs' situations. Id. at *42. The Court observed that Dr. Campion relied on the four-fifths rule, the reliability of which had been criticized. Id. at *45. The Court noted that in using this rule, Dr. Campion claimed to find evidence of disparate impact in older sub-groups despite not finding any statistical significance in the base 40-plus-age-group analysis. Id. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Dr. Campion's statistical report did not meet the requirements of Rule 702, and therefore, barred his testimony. Similarly, the Court barred Dr. Campion's expert opinion on reasonable human resource practices, where he found that Defendant failed to follow reasonable HR practices in many different ways when it conducted the RIF terminations. Id. at *48. Finally, the Court noted that Plaintiffs retained Dr. Duffus to give his opinion and to rebut Defendant's certified expert in turnaround and restructuring practices. Id. at *55. The Court rejected Defendant's attacks on the reliability of Mr. Duffus' opinion or his methodology because Defendant cherry picked aspects of Mr. Duffus' rebuttal of Defendant's expert with which Dr. Duffus disagreed. Id. at *60. The Court, however, noted that Dr. Duffus' rebuttal on Defendant's expert was filed untimely, and thus, limited his testimony. The Court therefore granted Defendant time to respond to Dr. Duffus' rebuttal. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to exclude Dr. Duffus' testimony in part.

(v) Notice Issues In ADEA/EPA Collective Action Litigation

Barrett, et al. v. Forest Laboratories, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144340 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of female sales representatives, brought a collective action under the Equal Pay Act ("EPA") alleging that Defendants engaged in discriminatory employment decisions against women, including paying them less than the male counterparts, as well as discrimination in promotions, work assignment, and discrimination against pregnant women and mothers. In September 2015, the Court granted conditional certification to a collective action of female sales representatives employed by Defendants between 2009 and 2014. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs requested the Court's approval of notice to all potential opt-ins employed by Defendants since July 20, 2011. Plaintiffs argued that they were entitled to a notice period dating back to July 20, 2011, because they planned to seek equitable tolling during the pendency of their motion for conditional certification – filed on May 22, 2015 – coupled with a tolling agreement between both parties that began on July 20, 2011. Id. at *4. Because the Court had earlier denied tolling based on the filing of the complaint, Defendants asserted that the trigger for notice should be September 15, 2015, which would cause the notice to go to all female sales representatives employed by Defendants at any time since September 15, 2012. Id. at *3. The Court authorized provision of notice to all female sales representatives employed by Defendants as of May 22, 2012. The Court noted that a number of case law precedents have concluded that the determination of tolling issues for any of the eventual opt-ins should be dealt with after the notice and opt-in period had concluded, and that therefore notice might be ordered for a universe of employees that include individuals whose claims ultimately might be determined to be time-barred. Id. The Court also observed that the case law precedents routinely had approved notice periods going back three years from the filing of the complaint even though that time period could substantially exceed the statutory limitations period, which runs three years from the filing of an opt-in consent, and that such an approach leaves room for opt-ins to pursue a request for tolling based on their own specific circumstances. Id. at *7. The Court therefore declined to limit the scope of the notice based on an assumption that future opt-ins whose employment ceased before September 15, 2012 would be unable to demonstrate a basis for tolling and they should be given notice or they would effectively be denied the opportunity to attempt to defend the timeliness of their claims. Id. at *7-8. Accordingly, the Court ruled that collective notice would be provided to all females who worked for Defendants as sales representatives at any time since May 22, 2012.

(vi) OWBPA Issues In ADEA Collective Action Litigation

Barnes, et al. v. Hershey Co.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 89947 (N.D. Cal. July 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought an action alleging that Defendant fired them due to their age as part of its plan to terminate older workers. The Court noted that Defendant placed one of the named Plaintiffs, Mary Frazier, on a performance improvement plan ("PIP") several times between 2007 and 2010, when she was ultimately terminated. Frazier believed that she was discriminated against because of her age, and that she signed a release only in order to receive the severance pay. Id. at *12. Similarly, other named Plaintiffs, including Richard Nelson, Lori DeLaRue, Mary Wasson, May Weeks, David Bolle, and James Bombeck, all claimed that Defendant terminated them after performance reviews, which invariably stated that they need improvement. Id. at *14, 26. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant coerced them into signing a waiver of their age discrimination claims under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") in exchange for a severance payment in violation of the Older Workers Benefit Protection Act ("OWBPA"). Id. at *2. Parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment on the issue of whether the waiver that each Plaintiff signed was valid. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion, and partially granted Defendant's motion. At the outset, the Court noted that the OWBPA allows waivers only if the employer strictly complied with various statutory requirements, which include a longer waiting period and increased disclosure requirements if a waiver is executed in connection with a group termination program instead of an individual termination. Id. at *28. It was undisputed that the waivers complied with the statutory requirements for an individual termination. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that rather than being terminated in a series of individual terminations, their terminations were actually connected by the January 2010 Career Planning Meeting that was the epicenter of Defendant's concerted effort to terminate long tenured older workers on the basis of age discrimination. Id. at *28-29. The Court noted that accepting Plaintiffs' best possible version of the facts, there was no genuine question of fact that Plaintiffs Frazier, Nelson, DeLaRue, Wasson, and Weeks were not part of any group termination and thus validly waived the ADEA claims they sought to press in this action. The Court observed that as for age discrimination, Plaintiffs assumed that because Defendant allegedly targeted longer-tenured workers, and the passage of years in a particular role also made those employees older, Defendant violated the ADEA. Id. at *34. The Court remarked that this was not a tenable ADEA theory. The Court explained that to state a valid ADEA claim, the adverse employment action must be based on age, and when an employer's decision is motivated by factors other than age, the problem of inaccurate and stigmatizing stereotypes disappears even if the motivating factor correlates with age. Id. at *35. The Court further opined that age and years of service are analytically distinct, and an employer can take account of one while ignoring the other, and thus, it would be incorrect to say that a decision based on years of service is necessarily age-based. Id. at *36. The Court found that based on the records, it was clear that the terminations of Plaintiffs Frazier, Nelson, DeLaRue, Wasson, and Weeks were based on observations that they had stagnated in their respective positions. Id. at *37. Since these terminations were not part of the alleged group terminations, the Court concluded that their OWBPA waivers were valid, and granted summary judgment on those claims. Id. Defendant contended that Plaintiff David Bolle was terminated as part of its restructuring and not based on performance. The Court noted that at the time of Bolle's termination, Defendant cited to his PIPs in early 2009 as supporting reasons, making Defendant's offered reason a pre-text for discrimination. Id. at *44. Accordingly, the Court denied summary judgment to Defendant on Plaintiff Bolle's claims. The Court, however, granted summary judgment to Defendant on Plaintiff Bombeck's claim, finding that his termination was not based on his age. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion in part.

McLeod, et al. v. General Mills, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144396 (D. Minn. Oct. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") by terminating approximately 850 employees as part of a corporate restructuring plan. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant violated the ADEA because the lay-off affected employees aged 40 or over at much higher rates than younger employees and that Defendant replaced terminated employees with younger employees. Id. at *3. In support, Plaintiffs cited statistics derived from employee termination data, which purportedly showed that older employees were many times more likely to be laid-off than younger employees during the restructuring. Id. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' complaint and compel arbitration under the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"), alleging that each Plaintiff had signed a binding arbitration agreement and general release agreement as a condition of receipt of a severance package. Id. at *9. The Court denied Defendant's motion because the language of the Older Workers Benefit Protection ("OWBPA") mandates that any worker challenging the validity of a waiver of ADEA rights "shall have the burden of proving in a Court of competent jurisdiction that a waiver was knowing and voluntary." Id. at *20. Because Plaintiffs disputed that the substantive waivers of their ADEA claims did not meet the requirements of OWBPA, the Court found that OWBPA required Defendant to assert the validity of that waiver in Court, not an arbitral forum. The Court reasoned that the plain language of the statute embodies a congressional command that it was mandatory for Courts, not arbitral tribunals, to hear a dispute over the validity of a waiver of substantive claims under the OWBPA's waiver requirements found in 29 U.S.C. § 626(f)(1). Id. at *22. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that "Court of competent jurisdiction" also meant an arbitral forum, since many Courts, and arbitration agreements themselves, have recognized that "Court of competent jurisdiction" refers to a Court. Id. at *23. The Court therefore denied Defendant's motion to dismiss and to compel arbitration and allowed the case to proceed for further motion practice and an eventual determination as to whether the release agreements at issue complied with the waiver provisions of the OWBPA.

(vii) Disparate Impact Issues In ADEA Collective Actions

Villarreal , et al. v. R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 20718 (11th Cir. Nov. 30, 2015). In November 2007 Plaintiff, then age 49, submitted an application for employment to Defendant for the position of Territory Manager. Id. at *4. Plaintiff never heard back from Defendant, took no action, and was not aware of a potential claim against Defendant until he spoke with a group of Plaintiffs' lawyers. Id. at *5. Plaintiff then filed a charge of age discrimination with the EEOC on May 17, 2010, two and a half years after the submission of his unsuccessful job application. While the charge was pending, Plaintiff unsuccessfully applied for the Territory Manager position five more times. Id. The EEOC issued Plaintiff a right-to-sue notice in April 2012, and Plaintiff filed a collective action complaint alleging claims including disparate impact discrimination in violation of the ADEA. Plaintiff's disparate impact claim was premised on allegations that Defendant, assisted by recruiting services, used a set of "resume review guidelines" to screen applicants for the position of Territory Manager. These guidelines included targeting candidates "2 to 3 years out of college" and advised hiring managers to "stay away from" candidates with 8 to 10 years of "prior sales experience." Id. at *3. Of the 1,024 individuals Defendant hired into the position of Territory Manager from September 2007 to July 2010, 19 were over the age of 40. Id. The District Court dismissed the lawsuit, reasoning that the ADEA only authorizes disparate impact claims for current employees. Id. at *5. The District Court also dismissed as untimely all claims for hiring decisions made before November 19, 2009, being more than 180 days before Plaintiff filed his EEOC charge. Id. In this respect, the District Court specifically found that Plaintiff himself was not entitled to equitable tolling of his ADEA claim because he failed to allege in his complaint what facts he came to know prior to filing his EEOC charge, or how he came to know them. Id. The District Court also denied Plaintiff's motion to amend his complaint, explaining that Plaintiff could not state a valid basis for equitable tolling because he did not pursue his rights by contacting Defendant to find out why his job application had been rejected, and further because he failed to allege any misrepresentation or concealment by Defendant. Id. at *7. Plaintiff appealed the decision to the Eleventh Circuit. At issue was whether § 4(a) of the ADEA, which was interpreted to give rise to employee claims of disparate impact discrimination in Smith v. City of Jackson, Mississippi, 544 U.S. 228 (2005), reasonably could be read to authorize claims of disparate impact discrimination brought by job applicants. Section 4(a) provides that it is unlawful for an employer "…to limit, segregate or classify his employees in any way which would deprive or tend to deprive any individual of employment opportunities or otherwise adversely affect his status as an employee, because of such individual's age." Id. at *8. While Defendant argued that the phrase "his employees" expressly limits the applicability of § 4(a) to employees, Plaintiff argued that § 4(a) must include applicants because Congress chose to use the broader phrase "any individual" in close proximity with yet in contrast to the preceding phrase "his employees." Id. at *10. Finding § 4(a) of the ADEA to be "vague," the Eleventh Circuit determined to defer to the interpretation and policy choices of the EEOC. It reasoned that: "The EEOC enforces the ADEA. We therefore defer to its views on the ADEA's interpretation and application unless those views are unreasonable." Id. at *26. In this respect, the Eleventh Circuit cited the EEOC's disparate impact regulations under its rule-making authority as applying to "individuals within the protected age group," without distinguishing between applicants and employees. Id. at *27. Although Defendant argued that the EEOC's construction of its regulations was not entitled to deference because its regulations deal with different provisions of the ADEA and did not clearly address the issue at hand, the Eleventh Circuit rejected this argument, stating "we still owe deference to the EEOC's view because the agency has reasonably and consistently insisted in this view for decades." Id. Citing the EEOC's own regulations and interpretations by the EEOC and the U.S. Department of Labor, the Eleventh Circuit concluded that § 4(a) of the ADEA can reasonably be read to authorize disparate impact claims by applicants, thereby requiring reversal of the District Court's dismissal of Plaintiff's disparate impact claim. Id. at *28. Turning to Plaintiff's claim for equitable tolling, the Eleventh Circuit also rejected the District Court's reasoning that the doctrine of equitable tolling requires misrepresentation by the employer, and opined that it has expressly held that equitable tolling does not require any misconduct on the part of a Defendant. Id. at *41. Particularly because "[s]ecret preferences in hiring and even more subtle means of illegal discrimination, because of their very nature, are unlikely to be readily apparent to the individual being discriminated against," the Eleventh Circuit explained that it has regularly reaffirmed the "reasonably prudent" person standard in ADEA cases. Id. at *39. Although the Eleventh Circuit could "offer no view on whether [Villarreal] will ultimately be able to benefit" from the doctrine of equitable tolling, it reversed the District Court's dismissal of Plaintiff's pre-November 2009 claims and remanded for further proceedings. Id. at *47.

V. Significant Collective Action Rulings Under The Fair Labor Standards Act

Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA") collective action litigation continued at a rapid pace in 2015. FLSA collective actions were filed more frequently than all other types of workplace class actions.

Statistically, plaintiffs were successful in securing conditional certification almost 75% of the time. In terms of "second stage" decertification motions, plaintiffs also prevailed in a majority of those cases (approximately 64% of the time). A map showing these rulings is as follows:

U.S. Courts Of Appeal – Analysis Of FLSA Certification Decisions

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	D.C. Circuit
Conditional Certification Motions Granted	3	18	7	9	9	3	10	7	35	7	7	0
Conditional Certification Motions Denied	1	10	2	0	3	2	8	2	8	0	2	0
Decertification Motions Denied	0	0	0	1	1	1	1	3	4	0	3	0

8 Decertification Motions Granted / 14 Decertification Motions Denied

Whereas in Title VII class actions the courts undertake a "rigorous analysis" required by the U.S. Supreme Court decisional law for determining class-worthiness under Rule 23, courts have continued the trend of utilizing a two-step process for determining certification in FLSA collective action cases under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Under the first step of this approach, known as "notice" or "conditional" certification, courts generally impose a much lighter burden on plaintiffs to obtain conditional certification and to authorize a notice being sent to all putative collective action members. It is only at a second-stage proceeding, usually when considering a motion to decertify after discovery has been taken, that courts apply a more rigorous analysis of the evidence offered by plaintiffs.

A. Cases Certifying Or Refusing To Certify FLSA Collective Action Claims

(i) First Circuit

Garcia, et al. v. E.J. Amusements Of New Hampshire, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48161 (D. Mass. April 13, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, a carnival ride provider, failed to pay minimum wages and overtime as required by Massachusetts and New Hampshire law. Plaintiffs moved for certification of a class of current and former hourly employees. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. At the outset, the Court found that Rule 23 standards – rather than the allegedly "more lenient" standards provided by Massachusetts and New Hampshire law – applied to Plaintiffs' motion. Id. at *5. The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to explain how state substantive law required a different analysis. Id. at *6-9. The Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied all of the prerequisites of Rule 23. First, Plaintiffs satisfied the numerosity requirement because they identified more than 160 workers who allegedly suffered wage and overtime violations under Massachusetts and New Hampshire law. Id. at *12. Second, Plaintiffs established the commonality requirement because they demonstrated that the action potentially involved a number of important factual and legal questions that could be resolved for the entire class simultaneously. In particular, because Defendant failed to keep records of the specific number of hours worked by each employee and instead kept a "gang time" payroll that tracked the maximum number of hours that any employee could have worked each week, the parties could use common sources of proof to: (i) establish the number of hours worked each week; (ii) show how much Defendant was required to pay each week; and (iii) evaluate Defendant's defenses that it used a pre-payment plan and an end-of-year lump sum payment plan to off-set or compensate for unpaid overtime or minimum wages. Id. at *26. Third, Plaintiffs satisfied the typicality requirement because, despite minor differences, Plaintiffs' claims that Defendant failed to maintain an adequate system of paying minimum wage and overtime were sufficiently similar to the rest of the class. Id. at *22. Fourth, Plaintiffs established the adequacy requirement because no conflicts of interest existed between Plaintiffs and the proposed class, and their counsel was experienced and more than capable of proceeding with the litigation. Id. at *23-24. Finally, Plaintiffs satisfied the predominance requirement because the factual and legal issues that could be addressed on a class-wide basis predominated over any individualized question. Although each individual employee earned a different weekly salary, and establishing liability for the minimum wage claims would require a brief examination of each class member's pay stubs, such a task would not be arduous because the "gang time" payroll showed many hours each employee presumptively worked each week. Id. at *26-27. Although calculating the precise damages owed to each class member might require some individualized inquiry, the Court found that the method for calculating each class member's damages likely would be mechanical, based on the individual's salary and common evidence about the typical number of hours worked. Accordingly, the Court determined that questions of individual damage calculations would not inevitably overwhelm the common questions. Id. at *28. Finally, the Court ruled that a class action would be the superior method for adjudicating this controversy because the class was comprised of small individual claims, and many of the class members were low-income, uneducated, and lacked resources to litigate on their own. Id. at *31. The Court, therefore, granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

LeVecque, et al. v. Argo Marketing Group, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 76150 (D. Me. June 12, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of customer service representatives and sales personnel, brought an action under the FLSA, the Maine Employment Practices Act, and the Maine Minimum Wage and Overtime Law seeking unpaid wages and overtime. Defendant employed Plaintiffs to sell and service various products offered by third-party vendors such as weight loss, energy, and sexual enhancement products. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant failed to pay them for the "period between logging-in to Shift Planner and download of information from VACD or Atmosphere software, the two 10-minute rest breaks, and bathroom breaks." Id. at *5. Seeking to represent similarly-situated employees, Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) of the FLSA. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion, finding that Plaintiffs met their burden of proving that they and other customer service representatives were similarly-situated and suffered from a common unlawful policy or plan. Id. at *23. Plaintiffs submitted a total of four affidavits and one supplemental affidavit in support of their motion, and stated that the job duties of the named Plaintiffs, the opt-in Plaintiffs, and the putative collective action members were essentially the same as one another regardless of the call centers they worked at or the products they sold. Although Defendant also submitted affidavits that contradicted Plaintiffs' affidavits, including Plaintiffs' assertions that they were similarly-situated or that Defendant subjected them to a single decision, policy, or plan, the Court found that it should not in resolved them for purposes of the motion for conditional certification. Id. at *42. To the extent Defendant took issue with the number of affidavits submitted by Plaintiffs (in arguing that Plaintiffs' showing was legally insufficient because it was based on a mere four declarations), the Court noted that five named Plaintiffs with three submitting affidavits and six others wishing to opt-in was sufficient to demonstrate a showing of other individuals interested in joining the action. Id. at *41. Because Plaintiffs submitted affidavits from employees who worked at the Portland and Pittsfield locations in Maine, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' experiences were unique and in no way representative of the experience of employees in Lewiston or working from home, and therefore could not establish liability at other Defendant's locations in Maine. Id. at *44-46. Although Plaintiffs did not submit any affidavits from customer service representatives who worked in Lewiston, the largest location of Defendant, and significant variations existed in the way each location dealt with lag time, bathroom breaks, and work breaks, the Court found that the differences could be best considered at the second certification stage after discovery provided a more extensive and detailed factual record. Id. at *46-47. Because Defendant allegedly subjected both customer service representatives and sales personnel to the same terms and conditions of employment, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs met their burden of a modest factual showing that the proposed collective action members were similarly-situated. Id. at *48. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of FLSA collective action.

Rios, et al. v. Current Carrier Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40362 (D. Mass. Mar. 30, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendants violated the FLSA and Massachusetts wage laws by capping the number of hours they paid to their couriers for each delivery, by failing to pay wages for certain waiting and travel times between deliveries, and by failing to properly reimburse couriers for all transportation expenses. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action under the FLSA, and Rule 23 class certification for their state law claims, which the Court denied without prejudice. First, regarding the motion for conditional certification under § 216(b) of the FLSA, the Court noted that Plaintiffs each had submitted an affidavit that made conclusory statements about the general treatment of couriers. Id. at *3. The Court pointed out that none of the Plaintiffs' extensive briefing contained facts about other employees sufficient to compare their situations relative to Plaintiffs' situations, nor did Plaintiffs know the circumstances of the other employees. Id. at *3-4. Specifically, Plaintiffs acknowledged that they worked alone as couriers and thus did not have the same opportunity to communicate with other alleged similarly-situated employees as would employees who worked in the same office. The Court maintained that although such a work environment was hardly a bar to FLSA recovery in this case, Plaintiffs appeared to be wholly unaware of the situations of the others they sought to represent. Id. at *4. At the very least, the Court determined that Plaintiffs had not put forth a sufficient description of the circumstances of the other employees to permit a reasoned evaluation of whether those other employees were similarly-situated in relevant respects to Plaintiffs. Id. The Court thus concluded that because Plaintiffs' affidavits established that Plaintiffs had no personal knowledge of the practices of Defendants' management in other divisions or offices, conditional certification was inappropriate. Id. at *5-6. Similarly, the Court found that Plaintiffs' Rule 23 motion for class certification suffered from the same factual deficiencies as in the § 216(b) motion, and denied Plaintiffs' motions without prejudice.

Saunders, et al. v. Getchell Agency, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35978 (D. Me. Mar. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of house managers, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA, the overtime provisions of 26 M.R.S.A. § 664(3), and the minimum wage requirements of 26 M.R.S.A. § 664(1). Defendant provided residential care services to disabled individuals and employed Plaintiffs as house managers to work in the residences. Defendant paid Plaintiffs on an hourly basis and required them to be with consumers 24 hours per day. Plaintiff alleged that they frequently cared for consumers at night and Defendant routinely failed to compensate them for these hours. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs sought to certify a state-wide class on behalf of all hourly paid house managers who worked at any time in the last six years and whom Defendant required to be with the consumers for 24 hours per day. Id. at *3-4. Following the Magistrate Judge's recommendation to certify the class, Defendant filed a Rule 72 objection to the findings on commonality, predominance, superiority, and ascertainability. The Court rejected Defendant's arguments and granted class certification. First, the Court found that the class as proposed by Plaintiffs was ascertainable. The Court noted that, because Defendant required Plaintiffs to remain at the residences with the consumers for 24 hour periods as part of their job description, determining class membership would require viewing a putative class member's timecards, and this was both objective and administratively feasible. Id. at *21-22. The Court also found that the questions of whether Defendant had a uniform, unlawful policy of withholding pay for overnight hours and whether those overnight hours were compensable under Maine law were capable of class-wide resolution. Id. at *11. The Court noted that Plaintiffs had provided sufficient and significant proof to support their allegations that Defendant had a general policy of withholding overnight pay. Id. at *7. Specifically, the Court observed that Plaintiffs submitted more than 200 timecards, purporting to represent complete sets of Defendant's timecards from four different weeks, which showed that only three house managers received compensation for any overnight hours. Id. The Court also determined that the timecards showed no instance of an employee being compensated for a brief period during overnight hours, which contradicted Defendant's assertions that it encouraged employees to put hours on their timecards if they had to tend to the consumers overnight. Id. at *7-8. The evidence further showed that, at least during the shifts where they remained in a residence overnight, Defendant expected Plaintiffs to be on-call to attend to consumers' needs, and this showed that Plaintiffs' overnight hours were hours "actually worked." Id. at *11. According to the Court, this was sufficient to establish that Plaintiffs' theory of liability could be proved on a class-wide basis. Finally, the Court found that adjudication of Plaintiffs' state law claim would not require significant consideration of individual issues at the liability stage. Id. at *18. Although Defendant placed great emphasis on the fact that some house managers, on occasion, returned to their own homes during overnight hours and argued that the issue of whether Plaintiffs' overnight hours were compensable must be resolved for each employee individually, the Court opined that the issue did not necessitate the resolution of individual issues on the scale Defendant suggested. The Court explained that if Plaintiffs established that hours spent on-call in a residence were hours "actually worked," then hours spent off-site at a house manager's private home were not compensable, and thus not implicated in liability. Id. at *13. Defendant further argued that the possible application of an overtime exemption for domestic service employees would raise individual issues. The Court, however, ruled that it was unclear whether any exemption would be actually applicable here, and even if applicable, the scale of any individual issues it could generate was unclear. The Court therefore concluded that individual issues did not overwhelm common ones in this litigation, and a class action would be superior means to resolve the dispute. Id. at *18-21. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

(ii) Second Circuit

Aldo, et al. v. United Talmudical Academy Of Kiryas Joel, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111076 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 18, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group kitchen staff employees, brought an action on behalf of themselves and others similarly-situated, alleging that Defendant, a private Jewish educational institution and its administrators, violated the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL") by failing to pay them a minimum hourly wage or overtime wage. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant failed to provide them with complete and accurate wage statements or keep proper time records. Plaintiffs moved to certify a class on their state law claims pursuant to Rule 23, which the Magistrate Judge recommended be granted. The Magistrate Judge found that Plaintiffs satisfied the numerosity requirement as Defendant produced a list showing that they employed 51 individuals as non-managerial kitchen staff at its facilities. Id. at *8. The Magistrate Judge opined that the proposed class could be easily identified from Defendant's own records. Id. at *14. The Magistrate Judge also determined that Plaintiffs satisfied the commonality requirement as they identified questions common to the class, including whether Defendant knowingly failed to pay a minimum wage, whether they maintained adequate time records, and whether they furnished employees with adequate wage statements. Id. at *9. The Magistrate Judge also noted that Plaintiffs' assertion that Defendant paid each member of the proposed class a flat wage no matter how many hours they worked was uniquely amenable to class-wide resolution. Id. In addition, the Magistrate

Judge held that Plaintiffs satisfied the typicality requirement as Plaintiffs and the other class members employed in Defendant's kitchen had the same job responsibilities, and Defendant injured all class members by failing to meet their federal and state law obligations. Id. at *11. Further, the Magistrate Judge ruled that Plaintiffs satisfied the adequacy requirement by demonstrating their intention to prosecute the case zealously through actions like retaining qualified counsel, assisting in the preparation of pleadings, and sitting for depositions. Id. at *12. The Magistrate Judge also found that Plaintiffs satisfied the predominance requirement as the number of common questions central to Plaintiffs' claims could be resolved through class adjudication, including whether Defendant's school-wide compensation scheme for non-managerial kitchen employees violated federal and state wage & hour laws. Id. at *15-16. Finally, the Magistrate Judge concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied the superiority requirement as their individual damages were not significant enough to justify the expense of individual litigation. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended granting Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Augustyniak, et al. v. Lowes Home Centers, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110359 (W.D.N.Y. Aug. 20, 2015). Plaintiff, a Human Resource Manager ("HRM") brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified her as exempt and denied her overtime pay in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action. The Court denied the motion. The parties previously were involved in another FLSA action in the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Florida (the "Lytle action") which they described as parallel and virtually identical. Plaintiff argued that the main issue was whether the HRMs exercised independent judgment and discretion on matters of significance and agreed that the Court could consider evidence and discovery from the Lytle action. Id. at *5. In Lytle, many of the opt-in Plaintiffs testified that they participated in significant decisions at their stores, especially with respect to hiring; many testified that they led their store's recruiting efforts and were involved in disciplinary decisions; and many testified that they had 50% input into all final hiring decisions at their stores. Id. The Court noted that Plaintiff failed to make a "modest showing" that members of the proposed collective action were similarly-situated with respect to alleged violations of the FLSA and failed to make any showing that she was similarly-situated to any of them with respect to such violations. Id. at *7. Indeed, Plaintiff made only two submissions that related to her, including the amended complaint and her consent to join, neither of which were in proper evidentiary form. Id. The Court, accordingly, concluded that Plaintiff failed to make even the modest showing required for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) and denied the motion.

Benitez, et al. v. Demco Of Riverdale, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 79570 (S.D.N.Y. June 15, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought an action asserting wage and overtime claims in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law. Plaintiffs moved for certification as a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Plaintiffs asserted that they were non-exempt employees eligible for overtime, and that over the course of several years, they were not paid the minimum wage or overtime while regularly required to work at least 65 hours per week. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs also claimed that Defendant paid them a set wage per week, regardless of the fact that they should have been classified as hourly employees, and regardless of the number of hours they worked each week. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs claimed that their primary duties centered upon the preparation of food and beverages. Id. at *4. All the proposed collective action members were employees of Defendant's Planet Wings, Inc. establishments. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant did not pay other cooks minimum wage or overtime and that they were personally familiar with the fact that other cooks worked more than 40 hours. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant subjected them and others employed as cooks to a common discriminatory scheme. Defendant argued that the named Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated to the proposed class members because they were not cooks, but managers who were paid on a salaried basis and eligible for benefits. Id. at *11-12. The Court, however, remarked that Plaintiffs had satisfied the modest factual showing required by § 216(b), and that they demonstrated that they were victims of the practice of receiving no pay for overtime and also that this practice was common to the establishments at three locations. Id. at *12. The Court opined that by alleging that they were together the victims of a common policy or plan that violated the law, Plaintiffs had met their minimal burden. Id. at *13. Defendant argued that collective action certification was improper because the responsibilities of the employees could differ and require additional investigation. The Court determined that the alleged differences among Plaintiffs had little to do with whether Plaintiffs were similarly-situated with respect to their allegations that the law had been violated. Id. Further, although there was a clear dispute of fact as to whether Plaintiffs were misclassified as exempt employees, the Court ruled that to balance the parties' competing affidavits at this stage would require determination of the facts and resolution of legal contentions, all of which the conditional certification and potential later decertification process is structured to avoid. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court conditionally certified the collective action.

Bhumithanarrn, et al. v. 22 Noodle Market Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 90616 (S.D.N.Y. July 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of fast food restaurant employees, brought an action alleging that Defendant required them and at least 25 other workers to work over 40 hours per week for less than minimum wage and without overtime pay. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendant reduced workers' pay by a "tip credit" and took other improper deductions from employees' wages and tips, including requiring them to purchase and maintain uniforms. Id. Alleging violations of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"), Plaintiffs moved for an order conditionally certifying this action as an FLSA collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. It found that Plaintiffs met the minimal burden of demonstrating that Defendant subjected them to a common policy or practice, and thus they were similarly-situated to one another and to potential opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. at *9. The Court noted that Plaintiff's affidavit stating that she and at least 25 other workers employed by Defendant regularly worked for less than minimum wage, without overtime pay and that Defendant forced them to share tips was sufficient to meet the low standard for conditional certification. Id. The Court therefore held that Plaintiffs could send § 216(b) notice to other potentially similarly-situated employees informing them of their right to bring FLSA claims and advising them that they might be required to provide information, appear for a deposition, or testify if they opt-in to the conditional class action. Id. at *14-15. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Callari, et al. v. Blackman Plumbing Supply, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43820 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiff, an assistant branch manager and a former inside sales representative, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL") by improperly classifying him and other assistant branch managers as exempt executives. Plaintiff asserted that the inside sales representatives and assistant managers had the same primary job duties and did not involve any significant managerial responsibilities. Id. at *4. Plaintiff moved for Rule 23 class certification of a class of employees who performed work as inside sales representatives and assistant managers for Defendant. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion, finding that Plaintiff failed to establish commonality and typicality. The Court found no basis to believe that the questions proposed by Plaintiff – whether Defendant required both inside sales representatives and assistant managers to work overtime, whether they did in fact work overtime, and whether Defendant refused to pay them for such overtime – were common questions for assistant branch managers and inside sales representatives. Id. at *20. While the evidence suggested that Defendant had a policy requiring both salaried inside sales and counter employees to work one four-hour uncompensated Saturday a month in addition to their 40 hour workweek, there was no evidence that this policy also applied to assistant branch managers. Id. The Court therefore found that the question of whether the class members worked in excess of 40 hour per week would require it to make individual determinations with respect to each class member. Id. at *22. Therefore, the Court found that the only potential common question raised by Plaintiff was the question of whether Defendant properly classified class members as exempt from overtime requirements, but Plaintiff failed to demonstrate that Defendant classified both inside sales representatives and assistant branch managers as "executives" exempt from overtime compensation. Id. at *23. Although the evidence demonstrated that Defendant had a policy whereby it classified assistant branch managers as exempt from overtime requirement, Plaintiff failed to provide evidence that Defendant had a similar policy for inside sales representatives. Id. at *24. The Court therefore found that the question of whether Defendant misclassified class members as exempt from overtime was not common to all of the proposed class members. The Court also determined that, even if the proposed class satisfied commonality, it would still fail to satisfy the typicality requirement because unlike the inside sales representatives that Defendant did not classify as exempt, the assistant branch managers' NYLL claims would be subject to a unique defense, i.e., whether Defendant properly classified them as executive employees. Id. at *30. According to the Court, this question would require it to examine the duties and responsibilities of each individual assistant branch manager because the evidence suggested that the duties of sales representatives and assistant branch managers varied across Defendant's 20 branches, and Defendant did not define their duties pursuant to any general policy. Id. at *31-38. Plaintiff relied on statements made in his own declaration and that of an opt-in Plaintiff to argue that the duties of assistant branch managers and inside sales representatives were similar across all branches. The Court, however, ruled that the declarations were not trustworthy in light of their inconsistent deposition testimony and the lack of their personal knowledge as to the duties of assistant branch managers and inside sales representatives of other Defendant's branches. Id. at *37. The Court accordingly denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Callari, et al. v. Blackman Plumbing Supply, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171719 (E.D.N.Y. Dec. 23, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action on behalf of inside salespersons and assistant branch managers ("ABMs") of Defendant's plumbing supply company, alleging violations of the New York Labor Law. After the Court previously denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification, Plaintiff moved the Court to reconsider its previous order pursuant to Local Civil Rule 6.3. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion for reconsideration. Id. at *2. In the underlying motion for certification, Plaintiff asserted that the proposed class satisfied the commonality and typicality requirements set forth in Rule 23(a) because both inside salespersons and ABMs shared similar duties and responsibilities and both groups were classified by Defendant as exempt from overtime, and therefore, were all deprived of their rightful overtime compensation. Id. at *3-4. In moving for reconsideration, Plaintiff asserted that Defendant did not argue that inside salespersons were not classified as exempt from entitlement to overtime, and thus the Court should have adopted Plaintiff's assertion that both inside salespersons and ABMs were classified as exempt and not paid overtime. Id. at *4. The Court rejected this argument, noting it is Plaintiff's burden to establish that the requirements of Rule 23 are satisfied by a preponderance of evidence. Id. Plaintiff also contended that the Court erroneously relied on testimony by Susan Cook, Defendant's human resources administrator. Id. at *5. The Court found that at the very least, her testimony supported a finding that for part of the proposed class period, which ran from March 31, 2009 to March 31, 2015, inside salespersons, unlike ABMs, did receive overtime. Id. at *6-7. Accordingly, the Court held that its factual finding on this issue was not clearly erroneous, contrary to what Plaintiff suggested. Id. at *7. Plaintiff further contended that the Court erred in finding that Plaintiff had sufficient opportunities to engage in discovery since Defendant failed to produce relevant discovery regarding the names of inside salespersons and ABMs dating back to 2008 and un-redacted versions of certain documents. Id. at *11. The Court rejected this argument on the basis that Plaintiff failed to offer any legal authority for the proposition that he was entitled to renew his motion for certification pursuant to Rule 23 because additional discovery might reveal new documents supporting class certification. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for reconsideration of the Court's previous order denying class certification. Id. at *19.

Chime, et al. v. Peak Security Plus, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 131727 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 9, 2015). Plaintiff, a security guard, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to compensate him and similarly-situated employees despite knowing that they worked over 40 hours per week in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Id. at *2. Plaintiff alleged that he and other similarly-situated employees often worked in excess of 40 hours per week primarily because: (i) Defendant asked security guards to cover a co-worker's shift, resulting in that guard working six to eight hours beyond his regular weekly schedule; (ii) Defendant required guards to arrive at their posts at least fifteen minutes before their shifts began; and (iii) Defendant did not permit guards to leave their post until relieved by their co-workers. Id. at *3. Defendant moved to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiff's FLSA claims were time-barred and failed to state a claim. At the same time, Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action with respect to the FLSA claims, and for class certification with respect to the NYLL claims. Id. The Magistrate Judge recommended granting Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification and class certification, finding that although Plaintiff did not allege a formal policy in violation of the FLSA, he showed that Defendant's policies required security guards to work beyond their scheduled shifts without compensation, and thus showed the existence of a common policy or plan that violated the FLSA. Id. at *38-41. Further, Plaintiff's affidavit provided specific allegations that Defendant did not pay appropriate overtime compensation to other employees who performed the same or similar work, and thus he met the lenient evidentiary standard that the proposed opt-in Plaintiffs were similarly-situated. Id. at *43. In granting Rule 23 class certification, the Magistrate Judge found that Plaintiff met the numerosity requirement as he showed that more than 40 guards worked for Defendant over the course of six years. Id. at *52. Plaintiff also met the commonality and typicality requirements, as Plaintiff alleged that Defendant subjected him and the proposed class members to the same practice of underpayment, raising the common questions of whether Defendant violated the NYLL by failing to pay overtime payment, pay for all overtime hours worked, or furnish wage statements. Id. at *54. Defendant did not make any substantial opposition to the showing on the predominance requirement, and therefore the Magistrate Judge concluded that Plaintiff met all aspects of certification required under Rule 23. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended granting Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification and class certification.

Escobar, et al. v. Motorino East Village, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 104348 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them appropriate minimum wage and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law. Plaintiffs moved to conditionally certify a collective action, which the Court granted. The Court observed that Defendant produced voluminous documentation in the form of Defendant's affidavits and payroll logs in opposition to Plaintiffs' motion, attempting to demonstrate that no violation occurred and no collective action should be conditionally certified. Id. at *6. The Court, however, found that Plaintiffs submitted sufficient evidence in support of their motion under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), including three factual declarations making similar allegations of off-the-clock work, failure to pay the appropriate rate of overtime, improper retention of the tip credit, failure to pay for tools of the trade, and unwarranted deductions from tips paid by credit card. Id. The Court observed that this was enough for Plaintiffs to meet the modest burden placed on them at the conditional certification stage under § 216(b). Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Flood, et al. v. Carlson Restaurants, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6608 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former tipped employees at TGI Friday's restaurants, brought a nationwide class and collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA because they paid tipped employees less than the minimum hourly wage by availing themselves of the federal tip credit. They also asserted state law class claims under Massachusetts, New Jersey, and New York law. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), which the Court granted. Plaintiffs submitted declarations stating that Defendant paid them less than the full minimum wage, yet failed to properly notify them of the FLSA regulations regarding the tip credit and minimum wages. Id. at *8. The declarants also stated that Defendant allegedly subjected the tipped workers to mandatory tip pooling arrangements, and that tipped workers spent a substantial amount of time performing non-tip producing side work. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs contended that although Defendant had a time-keeping system that tracked multiple job codes, they were not asked to punch in under a separate job code or keep track of the time spent performing side work. Id. The Court noted that Plaintiffs' declarations and depositions contained common allegations of FLSA violations, including Defendant's denial of full minimum wage and overtime compensation for tipped workers, which together with the evidence of Defendant's centralized control over TGI Friday's restaurants nationwide, sufficed to meet the minimal burden for conditional certification. Id. at *14. Although Defendant claimed that they had policies that prohibited the alleged FLSA violations, the Court reasoned that the existence of a formal policy in compliance with the FLSA should not immunize a Defendant where, as here, Plaintiffs presented evidence sufficient that this policy was commonly violated in practice. Id. at *15. Because Plaintiffs made the requisite factual showing, the Court granted their motion for conditional certification of a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Fonseca, et al. v. Dircksen & Talleyranc, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 136427 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant employees, brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to properly distribute tips, pay them for all hours worked, and comply with legally mandated tip credit requirements in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs, on behalf of all captains, front-waiters, back-waiters, bussers, and bartenders, alleged that Defendants required all tipped employees to participate in a tip pool, where gratuities were pooled together and then distributed based on a points system. Id. at *3. The tip pool included polishers, and expeditors/back-waiters, positions that, according to Plaintiffs, required no direct customer service. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants calculated Plaintiffs' hours based on a fixed number of hours for each shift worked instead of by actual hours worked. Id. After the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), Plaintiffs moved for class certification on their NYLL claims, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs identified eight questions common to the class, including whether Defendants employed class members under New York law, and the policies, practices and procedures regarding the handing and distribution of gratuities class members received. Id. at *7. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs' testimony established that the answers to the common questions varied significantly from position to position and person to person, and therefore Plaintiffs could not satisfy the commonality requirement of Rule 23(a)(2). Id. at *8. The Court remarked that commonality did not mean that all issues must be identical as to each class member, and that the need for an individualized determination of damages suffered by each class member generally did not defeat commonality. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that commonality was satisfied. The Court also found that typicality was satisfied because Defendants employed all class members as tipped, front-of-house employees, and were denied tips that they were entitled to receive. Id. at *10-11. The Court further ruled that predominance was satisfied because Plaintiffs challenged Defendants' commonly applied employment policies and practices. Id. at *13. The Court reasoned that the issues of whether Defendants' tip pool was lawful and whether Plaintiffs were paid for all hours worked predominated over all individualized inquiries. The Court thereby held that a class action was the superior mode of adjudication, and certified the NYLL claims under Rule 23.

Gauman, et al. v. DI Restaurant Development, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 146254 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 28, 2015). Plaintiff, a restaurant employee, brought an action alleging that Defendant paid him less than the minimum wage and failed to pay overtime in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court granted Plaintiff's motion. Plaintiff submitted an affidavit in support of the motion for conditional certification. Id. at *3. Plaintiff alleged that he worked as a dishwasher and prep cook between 75 to 81 hours per week over the course of three years, for which he was compensated approximately $400 per week. Id. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant employed approximately 17 others, many of whom were paid in the same manner. Plaintiff also named seven individuals that he specifically alleged were paid similarly, and provided hour and salary information for four of them. Id. at *4. Plaintiff's knowledge of schedules was based on his observations from working in the same business environment, and his knowledge of wages were based on conversations where each of the four individuals shared their compensation arrangements with him. Id. at *6. The Court found that these facts were sufficient to support a conclusion that the four individuals in addition to Plaintiff, and thus at least 29% of Defendant's workforce, may be similarly-situated to Plaintiff, and that they were subject to a common policy or plan of payment that violated the FLSA and NYLL. Id. The Court remarked that Plaintiff's affidavit supporting the evidence was more than sufficient to establish he and the other individuals were similarly-situated. Id. at *6-7. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification per 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Glatt et al. v. Fox Searchlight Pictures, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 11435 (2d Cir. July 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of unpaid interns, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them as employees during internships as required by the FLSA's and NYLL's minimum wage and overtime provisions. Plaintiffs contended that they worked as unpaid interns on Defendant's distributed film Black Swan at their corporate offices in New York City. Plaintiffs Eric Glatt, Alexander Footman, and Eden Antalik contended that their job duties resembled those done by employees and that they were therefore employees. Id. at *4-6. The District Court had concluded that Plaintiffs Glatt and Footman were improperly classified as unpaid interns and granted their motion for partial summary judgment, and also granted Plaintiff Antalik's motions to certify the class of New York interns and to conditionally certify a nationwide FLSA collective action. Id. at *7. On appeal, the Second Circuit vacated both the orders and remanded the action. At the outset, the Second Circuit noted that the U.S. Supreme Court was yet to address the difference between unpaid interns and paid employees under the FLSA. At the same time, the Second Circuit also noted that in Walling v. Portland Terminal Co., 330 U.S. 148 (1947), the Supreme Court recognized that unpaid railroad brakemen trainees should not be treated as employees, and thus they were beyond the reach of the FLSA's minimum wage provisions. The Second Circuit further noted that in 1967, the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") issued informal guidance that enumerated six criteria and stated that a trainee is not an employee if all of the criteria were met. Id. at *10. The six criteria were: (i) the internship, even if it included actual operation of the employer, was similar to training given in an educational environment; (ii) it benefited the intern; (iii) it did not displace regular employees; (iv) the employer received no immediate advantage from the activities of the intern; (v) the intern was not entitled to a job at the end of the internship; and (v) both parties understand that the interns are not entitled to wages for the internship. Id. at *11. The Second Circuit noted that the District Court evaluated Glatt's and Footman's employment using the DOL's six-factor test, and found that the first four factors weighed in finding that the two were employees, and concluded that they were misclassified as unpaid interns. Id. at *12. The Second Circuit observed that the proper question here was whether the intern or the employee is the primary beneficiary of the internship. Id. at *15. The primary beneficiary test focuses on what the intern receives in exchange for his work, and examines the economic reality, as it exists between the intern and the employer. Id. In addition, the Second Circuit reasoned that the following considerations must be looked into in the context of unpaid interns: (i) the extent to which the intern and the employer understand that there is no expectation of compensation; (ii) the internship provides training as it would be given in an educational environment; (iii) the internship is tied to formal education program; (iv) it accommodates academic commitments; (v) the duration is limited to the period internship provides intern with beneficial learning; (vi) the extent to which intern's work complements rather than displaces paid employees; and (vii) the understanding that the internship does not entitle a job at the conclusion of the intern ship. Id. at *16-17. Accordingly, the Second Circuit vacated the summary judgment order as to Plaintiffs Glatt and Footman and remanded the action, directing the District Court to apply these considerations in making its determinations as to employee status. Id. at *19. Further, on Defendant's appeal, Plaintiff Antalik argued that the evidence suggested that Defendant sometimes used interns as opposed to employees, which was sufficient to establish commonality under Rule 23. Id. at *22. The Second Circuit, however, found that this evidence would not necessarily mean that every intern was likely to prevail on her claim that she was an employee. Accordingly, the Second Circuit vacated the order conditionally certifying the FLSA collective action, as well as the class certification order as to the state law claims.

Griffith, et al. v. Fordham Financial Management*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30869 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 12, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay their stockbrokers and cold-callers minimum and overtime wages and made improper wage deductions, in violation of the FLSA and New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Defendant Fordham, a brokerage firm that provides financial services, including investment banking, employed individuals who sell stocks and other financial products to clients as stockbrokers and trainee brokers, and referred to them as "cold-callers." Id. at *2. After the Court granted FLSA conditional certification, Plaintiffs moved for Rule 23 class certification of their NYLL claims. The Court denied the motion, finding that Plaintiffs had failed to establish either the commonality or the preponderance requirements. First, the Court found that Plaintiffs had failed to demonstrate that potential class members' employment status was capable of class-wide proof. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs claimed that all potential class members were employees, because Defendant required them to work from 8:00 a.m. to 6:00 p.m. from Monday through Thursday and from 8:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. on Fridays. Id. at *7-8. The Court noted that although Plaintiffs were generally in the office during those times, there was no particular fixed schedule applicable to all stockbrokers, and some Plaintiffs did not attend work at all on certain days. Id. at *8. In addition, the Court found that the method of compensation varied among potential class members. Id. at *9. The Court remarked that although Defendant compensated stockbrokers based solely on commissions, thereby weighing in favor of an independent contractor relationship, and paid cold callers $60 per day, which suggested an employee relationship, cold-calling was essentially broker training. Further, the Court noted that some cold-callers earned both a percentage of commissions and a daily salary. Moreover, the Court determined that during the putative class period, some potential class members worked as both cold-callers and brokers, others worked only as cold-callers, and still others worked only as brokers. Id. at *9-10. Plaintiffs also asserted that Defendant entered into "employee contracts" and not "independent contractor agreements" with stockbrokers. Id. at *10. The Court pointed out, however, that not all potential class members signed such contracts. Some Plaintiffs signed documents titled "employment agreements," while others signed entirely different agreements, and at least one Plaintiff did not have any written agreement. Id. at *10-11. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant made unauthorized deductions from their wages. The Court noted, however, that because some of the signed employment agreements affirmatively agreed to specified deductions, this would require an individual assessment of which potential class members agreed to deductions, and what those deductions were. Moreover, the Court found that Defendant enforced the terms of the employment agreements inconsistently among potential class members who signed them. Id. at *11-12. Finally, the Court opined that Plaintiffs' testimony indicated substantial disagreement regarding the level of control Defendant exercised over potential class members' day-to-day responsibilities. Id. at *12-13. Further, the Court remarked that in addition to individual issues regarding potential class members' employment status, Plaintiffs had not established that their damages theory could accurately calculate damages on a class-wide basis. Plaintiffs intended to prove damages through representative testimony that Defendant required class members to work at least 48 hours per week and via Defendant's payroll records. The Court noted, however, that some Plaintiffs testified they did not work 48 hours every week, whereas others testified that they regularly worked more than 48 hours per week. Id. at *14-15. The Court reasoned that calculating damages based on a 48-hour per week workweek would therefore over-compensate some class members and under-compensate others, without a basis for the number of hours class members actually worked. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs had failed to establish predominance and commonality, and denied class certification. Id.

Guzman, et al. v. Three Amigos SJL Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 99716 (S.D.N.Y July 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of entertainers, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law. Plaintiffs worked at one of Defendant's businesses, the Cheetahs Gentlemen's Club & Restaurant ("Cheetahs"). Plaintiffs alleged that during their employment, they were required to pay Cheetahs a "house fee" of approximately $40 or $60 to $100 or $120 per shift worked, and they were also required to pay for arriving late to work or for not working a scheduled shift. Id. at *7-9. They were further required to tip-out other individuals who worked at Cheetahs. Plaintiffs contended that throughout their employment, Cheetahs enforced a uniform policy that required all the entertainers to wear club-approved outfits, hairstyles, and make-up, and to purchase, launder, and maintain their uniforms at their own expense. Id. at *9-10. Plaintiffs also contended that Cheetahs supervised and controlled many aspects of the entertainers' working conditions. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. At the outset, Plaintiffs contended that they were similarly-situated to the other entertainers because Cheetahs subjected all entertainers to the same compensation policies. The Court noted that to demonstrate that the proposed group of employees were similarly-situated, Plaintiffs need only make a modest factual showing. Id. at *17. Defendant contended that Plaintiffs' declarations were insufficient because they merely set forth broad conclusory assertions, and lacked personal knowledge that other entertainers were similarly-situated. Id. at *18. The Court, however, remarked that existence of some conclusory assertions did not negate the more specific factual statements contained in the declarations that stated: (i) the declarant was not paid hourly wages, (ii) she was not required to share her tips with workers who did not provide service; and (iii) Defendant retained a portion of Plaintiffs' tips. Id. On this record, the Court found that none of Defendant's arguments were sufficient to defeat Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification. Id. at *23. Defendant also asserted that there were four categories of dancers with different agreements with Defendant. However, the Court reasoned that even though the type of agreement varied from entertainer to entertainer, Defendant failed to explain how this had any bearing on whether the entertainers might be similarly-situated with respect to Plaintiffs' allegations that the FLSA had been violated. Id. at *23. Moreover, regarding Defendant's contention that several of the named Plaintiffs were bound by arbitration agreements, the Court remarked that applicable case law had consistently held that the existence of arbitration agreements was irrelevant to conditional certification of a collective action because it raised a merit-based determination. The Court also found that not all entertainers had arbitration agreements and Defendant had not moved to compel arbitration of any of the named Plaintiffs for whom they assert arbitration agreement existed. Furthermore, the Court also denied Defendant's request to direct further discovery to identify if the Plaintiffs were similarly-situated, inasmuch as extensive discovery was not appropriate at the notice stage. Id. at *24-25. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Iriarte, et al. v. Café 71, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 166945 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 11, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay Plaintiff overtime wages and minimum wages in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Defendant controlled and operated two food service establishments and employed Plaintiff on an "as needed" basis as a delivery person, pizza maker, and sandwich preparer at Café 71 and 94 Corner Café. Id. at *3. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant paid him an hourly rate of $8.50, which is below the New York State minimum wage rate of $8.75, and that Defendant never gave him proper meal breaks when he worked six hours or more in a workday. Id. at *4. Plaintiff also alleged that he never received a wage & hour notice as required under the NYLL, and because Defendant paid solely on cash, he never received any form of wage statements. Id. Providing his own declaration and a list of the first names of eleven other employees who were subjected to the same wage & hour policies of Defendant, Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of collective action under the FLSA. Id. at *5. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion, finding that Plaintiff met the similarly-situated requirement for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court noted that Plaintiff satisfied the low burden that he was similarly-situated with the proposed collective action members by declaring that Plaintiff had personal knowledge from his observations and his conversation with his co-workers that he and "all other employees at the Cafés" were victims of Defendant's practices of not compensating its staff overtime wages. Id. at *10. Although Defendant tried to defeat Plaintiff's motion by arguing that Plaintiff's declaration contained false statements, the Court declined to resolve such factual disputes at this stage of litigation. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification and authorized that notice be sent to potential collective action members in the form authorized pursuant to § 216(b) of the FLSA. Id. at *18. The Court further ordered Defendant to provide Plaintiff with the names and last known address of all potential collective action members who worked in the positions of cooks, dishwashers, grill workers, deli workers, sandwich preparers, salad preparers, cashiers, pizza makers and delivery persons at the Cafés for three years from the date of the filing of the action. Id.

Jacob, et al. v. Duane Reade Holdings, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 2040 (2d. Cir. Feb. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay its assistant store managers ("ASMs") overtime in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The District Court conditionally certified the collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) and also certified Plaintiffs' NYLL class claims under Rule 23. Subsequently, the District Court decertified the class action with respect to damages only. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed. Defendant argued that the District Court failed to rigorously examine all the evidence relevant to class certification. The Second Circuit observed that when certifying a class, a District Court must conduct a rigorous analysis that may overlap with the merits of Plaintiff's underlying claim and found that here, the District Court had applied the appropriate standard. The District Court did not rely on the pleadings alone to decide Plaintiffs' motion, and instead went beyond the pleadings to consider the parties' evidentiary submissions and make factual findings where those submissions conflicted. Id. at *4. Defendant also argued that the District Court's commonality analysis failed to identify evidence sufficient to generate common answers to class-wide questions. The Second Circuit opined that the relevant inquiry was whether a class-wide proceeding is capable of generating common answers apt to drive the resolution of the litigation, and that the common contention to be proved was whether Defendant misclassified its employees as exempt from New York's overtime requirements. Id. at *5. The District Court had found that this contention was subject to class-wide resolution, and had relied on evidence showing that Defendant uniformly classified all ASMs as exempt without an individualized determination of each ASM's job responsibilities, and that the ASMs carried out their duties pursuant to a uniform policy, uniform training, and uniform procedures across all stores. Further, the District Court had concluded that the deposition testimony of Defendant's former director of training and development established that the ASMs had similar baseline responsibilities from store to store, and that all ASMs shared similar primary job responsibilities. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Second Circuit ruled that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that a class-wide proceeding could generate a common answer to the question of whether Defendant misclassified ASMs. Defendant also argued that under Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, 133 S. Ct. 1426 (2013), the District Court should have analyzed whether common questions predominated over individual questions in the case as a whole before certifying the class with respect to any particular issue. Id. at *7. The Second Circuit, however, observed that Comcast held simply that a model for measuring class-wide damages relied upon to certify a class under Rule 23(b)(3) must actually measure damages that result from the class' asserted theory of injury, which had little application in this case. Id. at *8. In decertifying the class with respect to damages, the District Court concluded that although the individualized nature of the damages inquiry would defeat Rule 23(b)(3) predominance in the case as a whole, predominance was satisfied with respect to issue of liability alone. Id. The Second Circuit concluded that the District Court's ruling was not an abuse of discretion. Accordingly, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's order certifying the class with respect to the issue of liability.

Klein, et al. v. Octagon, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 136410 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 30, 2015). Plaintiff, an unpaid intern, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant misclassified interns as exempt and failed to pay them the minimum wage and earned wages in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action, and the Court denied the motion. Plaintiff submitted his own declaration and four other interns' declarations in support of his motion, which stated that they did not receive compensation for the work they performed. Id. at *3. Plaintiff also submitted a copy of Defendant's summer internship program brochure, which outlined uniform policies for intern conduct, electronic communication, and social media use. Id. at *5. The Court cited the case of Glatt v. Fox Searchlight Pictures, where the Second Circuit adopted the "primary beneficiary test" as the standard to be applied at the conditional certification stage. Id. at *7. The Second Circuit described the primary beneficiary test as a highly individualized inquiry that requires consideration of individual aspects of the intern's experience. Id. Applying this new standard, the Second Circuit vacated the conditional certification in Glatt. Id. at *8. The Court noted that Plaintiff's evidence was indistinguishable from the generalized proof described in Glatt. Id. at *9. The Court determined that Plaintiff's primary evidence that the collective action members were similarly-situated consisted of the assertion that the declarants worked or knew of other interns who were not being compensated for performing similar duties. Id. The Court observed that this did not answer the questions posed by the primary beneficiary test, such as whether a given internship was tied to an education program, whether training occurred, and if so, what type of training the intern received. Id. The Court therefore found that Plaintiff failed to provide evidence relevant to the primary beneficiary test. The Court opined that since the internships differed substantially, the differences would necessitate individualized inquiries, and therefore denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification. Id.

Li, et al. v. Lychee House, Inc.*, Case No. 15-CV-1646 (S.D.N.Y. July 13, 2015). Plaintiff, a former delivery employee, brought a collective action on behalf of himself and other current and former delivery employees alleging that Defendants failed to pay workers minimum wages and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff sought unpaid wages, liquidated damages, attorneys' fees, and costs. Plaintiff brought an unopposed motion for conditional certification of a collective action consisting of all current and former delivery employees employed by Lychee House Chinese Restaurant, located at 141 East 55th Street, New York, from July 13, 2012, to the present. Id. at 1. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion. In addition, the Court approved publication of Plaintiff's proposed notice and consent to sue forms to members of the collective action. Id. As a result, the Court directed Defendants to furnish to Plaintiff's counsel a list containing the names and contact information (excluding social security information) of collective action members in an electronic format. Id. at 1-2. The Court held that on or before 20 days after Defendants furnish the list of names and contact information to Plaintiff's counsel, the notice and the consent to sue form – in both English and Mandarin or Cantonese (whichever is more likely to be spoken by the majority of the members of the collective action) – should be mailed to collective action members by first class mail. Id. at 2. Finally, the Court directed Defendants to post the notice and consent to sue form in a conspicuous location in their place of business.

Editor's Note: An order to translate a § 216(b) notice into Mandarin or Cantonese is novel. It underscores the substantial discretion courts have to fashion notice in FLSA collective actions.

Marcus, et al. v. AXA Advisors, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43016 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendant, a licensed broker-dealer of financial products, violated the FLSA by failing to pay its pre-contract associates and employee-agents the minimum wage and overtime, and the

New York Labor Law ("NYLL") by misclassifying them as independent contractors and outside sales agents. According to the complaint, individuals seeking to join Defendant as sales agents first affiliated with Defendant as "pre-contract associates," and after signing pre-employment agreements and obtaining the necessary licenses, Defendant required them to sell a certain number of production credits before the end of their six-month pre-contract period, and paid them on commission. Id. at *5-7. Plaintiffs contended that Defendant required pre-contract associates to prospect for business during the licensing phase of their pre-employment, forcing them to work for Defendant's benefit without compensation. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs also contended that Defendant required them to be in the office during the pre-contract period for training, district meetings, call times, and regulatory compliance meetings, although some of these meant for full-time employees. Id. at *10. As to employee-agents, Plaintiffs contended that the agents spent 5 to 6 days a week in Defendant's offices, only occasionally going on sales calls outside of the office, and that they regularly worked over 40 hours a week, but received less than the basic minimum wage during weeks when they made few or no sales. Id. at *14-15. Proposing a class consisting of individuals engaged by Defendant in the state of New York as pre-contract associates and employee-agents during a defined period, Plaintiffs moved for class certification. In support, Plaintiffs submitted deposition testimony and a selection of e-mails from seven proposed class members and 14 managers, questionnaires submitted by opt-in Plaintiffs, and a declaration by an executive. Id. at *17. The Court denied class certification, finding that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy Rule 23 commonality requirement. Id. at *46. Although Plaintiffs contended that they satisfied the commonality requirement as to pre-contract associates because they suffered a common wrong (i.e., classification as independent contractors), the Court noted that the category of pre-contract associates consisted of two sub-categories, unlicensed and licensed associates, and Plaintiffs failed to offer a common way of establishing the proper classification of either category. Id. at *34-35. The record showed that as Defendant treated unlicensed and licensed pre-contract associates differently, that could potentially affect the Court's determination on the merits of the question of Defendant's control over pre-contract associates. The Court found that the record did not credibly establish that Defendant had any state-wide policies requiring unlicensed pre-contract associates to study in the office, solicit business, or perform work for Defendant's benefits, and the differing practices among the offices with respect to supervision and control of pre-contract associates during the study phase of their pre-employment rendered common answers to the question of Defendant's control unlikely. Id. at *38-39. The evidence provided by both parties also demonstrated that there was substantial variation with respect to employee-agents' sales work such that determining a putative class member's eligibility for inclusion in the class would be based on a myriad of individual determinations about the agent's sales activity. Id. at *42. Although the record showed a greater degree of uniform treatment with respect to Defendant's treatment of licensed pre-contract associates, the Court found that Plaintiffs' sole proposed class representative for the pre-contract associate class was not typical of the class because he never obtained his licenses and therefore never proceeded to the second stage of the pre-contract process. Id. at *47. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Mok, et al. v. 21 Mott St. Restaurant Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 83420 (S.D.N.Y. June 26, 2015). Plaintiff, a waiter at Defendant's restaurant, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant willfully failed to pay him minimum wages, overtime, and spread-of-hours compensation in violation of the FLSA. Id. at *4. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant failed to provide pay statements or post notices explaining wage rights or maintain records of employees' pay and hours. Id. Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action, and submitted an affidavit stating that Defendant employed twelve or thirteen waiters and cooks who worked approximately 10 to 13 hours per day. Id. at *5. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion, and found that Plaintiff made the necessary modest factual showing that he and other potential opt-in Plaintiffs together were victims of a common policy or plan that violated the law. Id. at *6. The Court further approved Plaintiff's proposed notice form to be disseminated to prospective collective action members limited to Defendant's wait staff and cooks and directed Plaintiff's counsel to remove a clause that allowed the consent forms to be received by the Clerk of Court (as opposed to counsel directly). Id.

Moreira, et al. v. Sherwood Landscaping, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43919 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of laborers, brought an action alleging that Defendant, an exterior landscaping service provider, violated the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL") by failing to pay them overtime wages. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that they and similarly-situated employees regularly worked 66 hours per week and their paychecks never showed any hours worked in excess of 40 hours per week, notwithstanding the number of hours they actually worked. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiffs further asserted that Defendant regularly paid Plaintiffs "straight time" for the hours worked each week, including hours worked in excess of 40 hours per week, and that Defendant should have paid them at the statutory rate of time and one-half of the regular rate of pay after the 40 hours in a workweek. Id. at *5. Following conditional certification of a collective action of the FLSA claims, Plaintiffs moved for class certification of their NYLL claims. The Court granted class certification, finding that Plaintiffs met all of the Rule 23 requirements. First, the Court found that Plaintiffs met the numerosity requirement as they identified a potential class of over 70 members. Although the parties disputed whether Plaintiffs improperly included 13 exempt employees in their proposed class, the Court noted that, even if it resolved the dispute in Defendant's favor, Plaintiffs' proposed class would still exceed 40 potential members and therefore satisfy the numerosity baseline requirement. Id. at *22. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that class certification would not lead to judicial economy, since the FLSA collective action had already provided for easy participation in the action. Id. at *24-25. Second, the Court found that Plaintiffs met the commonality and typicality requirements, for the named Plaintiffs' claims and the proposed class members' claims arose from the same course of conduct, i.e., Defendant's alleged practice and policy of failing to pay overtime at the statutory rate, and raised the common issue of law and fact as to whether Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation at the statutory rate for all hours worked over 40 hours each week and to maintain complete records of the hours worked by members of the proposed class. Id. at *29-30. Although Defendant argued that the proposed class included employees who received different rates of pay and different job functions in different departments under different managers, the Court found that the differences concerned the amount of damages to which any individual class member might be entitled, and not the amenability of Plaintiffs' claims to class certification. Id. at *30-31. Third, the Court determined that Plaintiffs met the adequacy requirement as Defendant failed to show that the ability of any of Plaintiffs to represent the interests of the NYLL class fairly and adequately had been impaired by their prior termination by Defendant. Id. at *34. The Court also found that Plaintiffs satisfied the predominance requirement as the determination on the legality or illegality of Defendant's practices was susceptible to common proof. Specifically, the Court reasoned that the documentary evidence, such as the employee punch cards and payroll records, could be used to help resolve issues of Defendant's liability on Plaintiffs' overtime claims, and individualized inquiries as to damages did not bar certification. Id. at *37. Finally, the Court held that Plaintiffs satisfied the superiority requirement as Plaintiffs' proposed class was significantly numerous and possessed relatively small individual claims, and a class action appeared to be the only device by which many of the proposed a class members could obtain relief. Id. at *39-40. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Murphy, et al. v. Philippe LaJuanie,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97531 (S.D.N.Y. July 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former servers, bussers, and bartenders, brought an action seeking minimum and overtime wages. Defendant maintained separate tip pool policies, and participants in the tip pool included maître d's, servers, bussers, runners, and bartenders (collectively the "tip pool employees"). The tip pool employees were allocated a certain number of points in or percentage of the tip pool based on their positions. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs alleged that the maître d's had authority to hire and fire employees, and that the maître d's assigned tasks, controlled employee schedules, and calculated the tip distribution. Plaintiffs moved for certification of a class comprised of all non-exempt employees at the restaurants in any tipped positions. The Court granted the motion. The Court noted that Plaintiffs met the numerosity requirement because they identified 257 class members who worked for Defendant for a portion of the class period. Regarding commonality, the Court observed that common questions included whether: (i) the maître d's were eligible to receive tips; (ii) Defendant's policy of distributing a portion of the tips to maître d's and bar managers was unlawful; and (iii) Defendant's policy, practice, and procedure of not paying a spread of hours premium when class members' spread of hours exceeded ten hours was unlawful. Id. at *12. Because class members were affected by the same policies, the Court opined that their claims shared a unifying thread that warranted class treatment. Id. at *13. Further, the Court determined that the harm that the named Plaintiffs allegedly suffered was the same harm suffered by each class member because it resulted from policies that applied to all tip pool employees at the restaurants. The Court also noted that Plaintiffs satisfied the typicality requirement because Plaintiffs' injuries and the class members' injuries derived from a unitary course of conduct. Id. at *14. Both the named Plaintiffs and the proposed class members were tip-eligible employees who were affected by the same restaurant-wide tip pooling, overtime, and minimum wage policies. Although the restaurants had slightly different policies for how tip pool employees received their tips, the policies applied to all of the tip pool employees at each location. Plaintiffs also met the adequacy requirement because the six class representatives did not have any interests that were antagonistic to the other class members, and Plaintiffs were prepared to fully prosecute the action and had no conflicts with any class members. Further, the Court observed that the class was easily ascertainable because Defendant had records of all of the tip pool employees who worked at the restaurants. Regarding predominance, the Court found that common questions predominate in wage & hour actions brought on behalf of a class of employees of the same employer challenging allegedly illegal policies and practices. Id. at *18. Here, the issues of whether the tip pool, spread of hours, and minimum wage policies were lawful predominated over all individualized inquiries, and the Court held that the fact that each class member's damages could vary was not relevant to the predominance inquiry, because damages calculations merely entail the application of simple mathematical computations that were consistent with the theories of liability. Id. at *19. Finally, the tip pool employees were affected by the same tip pooling, minimum wage, and overtime policies, and the Court opined that a class action was superior manner of adjudication because potential class members were aggrieved by the same policy, the damages suffered were small in relation to the expense and burden of individual litigation, and many potential class members were currently employed by Defendant. Id. at *19-20. Accordingly, the Court certified the proposed class.

Roach, et al. v. T.L. Cannon Corp.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 2054 (2d Cir. Feb. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendants did not pay hourly employees an extra hour of pay when working a ten-hour workday as required by New York state law, and that managerial staff subtracted pay for statutorily-mandated rest breaks that the employees did not actually take. The District Court denied class certification, finding that Plaintiffs did not offer a model of damages susceptible of measurement across the putative class. While holding so, the District Court construed Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, 133 S. Ct. 1426 (2013), as holding that the failure to offer a damages model that is susceptible of measurement across the entire class for purposes of Rule 23(b)(3) is fatal to certification. Id. at *6. On appeal, the Second Circuit vacated the District Court's order. The Second Circuit noted that before Comcast, it was well established under its case law precedents that the fact that damages may have to be ascertained on an individual basis is not sufficient to defeat class certification, and that it was only one factor that had to be considered in deciding whether issues susceptible to generalized proof outweighed individual issues when certifying the case as a whole. Id. at *9-10. Further, the Second Circuit observed that Comcast did not hold that a class could not be certified under Rule 23(b)(3) simply because damages cannot be measured on a class-wide basis, as the holding in Comcast was narrower. Id. at *14. Although Comcast held that a model for determining class-wide damages relied upon to certify a class under Rule 23(b)(3) must actually measure damages that result from the class' asserted theory of injury, the Second Circuit reasoned that it did not require that proponents of class certification must rely upon a class-wide damages model to demonstrate predominance. Id. Further, although Comcast reiterated that damages questions should be considered at the certification stage when weighing predominance issues, the Second Circuit determined that this requirement was entirely consistent with its prior holding that the fact that damages may have to be ascertained on an individual basis is a factor that required consideration in deciding whether issues susceptible to generalized proof outweighed individual issues. Id. *15-16. In addition, the Second Circuit noted that Comcast did not foreclose the possibility of class certification under Rule 23(b)(3) in cases involving individualized damages calculations. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Second Circuit vacated the District Court's order denying class certification.

Romero, et al. v. ABCZ Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58765 (S.D.N.Y. April 28, 2015). Plaintiff, a former disc jockey at Defendants' strip club, VIP Club, brought an action alleging that pursuant to a corporate policy, Defendants improperly classified him and all other disc jockeys and dancers who worked at VIP Club at any time from May, 2011 as independent contractors and did not pay them wages in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law. Id. at *2. Plaintiff asserted that tips from customers were the only compensation that they received. Id. Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action and to provide notice to members of the proposed collective action. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion, finding that Plaintiff had made a modest factual showing that he and potential opt-in Plaintiffs together were victims of a common policy or plan that violated the FLSA. Id. at *4. Further, the Court found that Plaintiff identified three other disc jockeys and 113 dancers to whom Defendants subjected to the same policy. Id. at *5. The Court stated that those assertions were sufficient at the conditional certification stage to demonstrate that potential opt-in Plaintiffs were similarly-situated to Plaintiff. Defendants contended that dancers at VIP Club were not similarly-situated to Plaintiff because: (i) dancers' arrangement for providing services was different from that of disc jockeys; (ii) the very nature of Plaintiff's work differed from that of dancers; and (iii) the manner in which Defendant compensated Plaintiff differed from that of dancers. The Court, however, found that Defendants' arguments were unavailing because the relevant issue was not whether the Plaintiff and potential opt-in Plaintiffs were identical in all respects, but rather whether they all allegedly were subject to a common employment policy that violated the FLSA. Id. at *6. Further, to Defendants' argument that Plaintiff did not offer declarations or affidavits from dancers, the Court remarked that an affidavit detailing the personal observations of a single Plaintiff may be sufficient. Id. at *7. As to § 216(b) notice, the Court tentatively approved Plaintiff's proposed notice subject to certain modifications, and directed Defendants to post copies of the revised notice and opt-in consent form in conspicuous locations at the VIP Club. Finally, the Court directed Defendants to produce a list of all names, addresses, telephone numbers, and e-mail addresses for all potential opt-in Plaintiffs that Plaintiff requested. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of the collective action.

Ruiz, et al. v. Citibank, N.A.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34489 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 19, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of personal bankers, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to compensate them for overtime hours worked in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law. After the class notice was sent, 447 current and former personal bankers opted-in to the FLSA collective action. Id. at *5. The Court granted Plaintiffs' request and ordered discovery inquiries limiting to a sample of opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. at *6. The parties settled upon 30 representative opt-ins, with 15 chosen by each parties, and 23 of them were deposed. Id. Upon conclusion of this discovery, Plaintiffs moved for class certification of their state law claims under Rule 23, and Defendant moved to decertify the FLSA collective action. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, and granted Defendant's motion to decertify the FLSA collective action. At the outset, the Court found that the state law classes lacked questions of law or fact common to the class under Rule 23(a)(2). The Court observed that Defendant's policies were comparable to those Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. 2541 (2011), where the Supreme Court denied class certification. Id. at *26. The Court found that in Wal-Mart, the Supreme Court disclaimed the notion that anecdotal evidence must follow a strictly proportionate relationship to the size of the class. Id. at *29. Here, the record showed that Defendant's formal, company-wide policies were entirely legal and appropriate, and that there was no evidence of a common plan or scheme to subvert those policies. Id. at *41. A class-wide determination of liability thus depended upon demonstrating that appropriate policies were reliably translated into inappropriate managerial behavior across the width and breadth of the class. Id. The Court found the evidence insufficient to demonstrate either common direction or a common mode of exercising discretion. Therefore, it ruled that the commonality requirement was not satisfied. Id. at *42. In their motion to decertify the FLSA collective action, Defendant argued that the opt-in Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated. The Court observed that when the collective action was conditionally certified, the Court had found that Plaintiffs had met the minimal burden of showing that they were similarly-situated to one another and to potential opt-in Plaintiffs at that stage. The Court remarked that after discovery, Plaintiffs now were tasked with establishing that they were indeed similarly-situated with appropriate evidentiary support. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs largely relied on anecdotal allegations of violations, second-hand statements regarding a company-wide policy to force unpaid overtime attributed to branch managers, and upon a few entirely appropriate workplace policies across Defendant's many branches. Id. at *53-54. The Court remarked that such evidence may suffice for conditional certification, but it was insufficient to show that the collective action members were similarly-situated under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court observed that even the evidence of the sample opt-in Plaintiffs showed massive disparities that were apparent in the policies of their branch managers; the difficulty in meeting their sales targets; and the frequency with which they received overtime, etc. Id. at *55. Because Plaintiffs failed to show a common policy that operated to a common effect, or some other mode of evidencing shared experiences, the Court concluded that they could not proceed as a collective action. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to decertify the FLSA collective action.

Ruiz, et al. v. Citibank, N.A.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101777 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 4, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a nationwide action alleging that Defendant failed to compensate its personal bankers for overtime hours in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to certify three state-wide classes under state overtime wage laws and granted Defendant's motion to decertify a conditionally certified nationwide collective action under the FLSA. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs moved for reconsideration, and the Court denied the motion. First, Plaintiffs argued that the Court improperly required them to show a common nationwide pattern or practice, rather than state-wide patterns or practices within New York or Illinois. Id. at *6. The Court rejected this argument explaining that, based exclusively on Plaintiffs' briefing in support of their motion for class certification, rather than proving a common policy or practice within each relevant state, Plaintiffs sought to demonstrate a nationwide policy that could be imputed to each state. Throughout their briefing in support of their motion for class certification, Plaintiffs indiscriminately intermingled the testimony of New York and Illinois personal bankers and managers with the testimony of Defendant's employees in other states. Id. at *7. In fact, in arguing commonality, Plaintiffs specifically highlighted the geographical disparity of the sample opt-ins from which they drew their evidence, arguing that the strikingly consistent nature of the sample opt-ins' testimony helped demonstrate the existence of centralized, nationwide policies. Id. at *8. Second, Plaintiffs contended that, because the Court looked at nationwide evidence, it overlooked the evidence demonstrating a pattern or practice in New York and Illinois. The Court noted that Plaintiffs now sought to do what they never did in arguing for certification, i.e., amass the evidence within New York and Illinois to demonstrate commonality within the bounds of the proposed Rule 23 classes. The Court explained that it already had found the testimony of eleven New York personal bankers and three Illinois bankers insufficient to demonstrate commonality across a class of over 2,000 New York personal bankers and 330 Illinois bankers. Id. at *11. Third, Plaintiffs argued that the Court improperly applied the stringent standard of Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. 2541 (2011), to their wage & hour claims. The Court found that Plaintiffs misunderstood the nature of their burden at the class certification stage. The Court never required Plaintiffs conclusively to prove a pattern of wage violations; rather, it merely held them to their burden to establish commonality by a preponderance of the evidence, as required by precedent predating Wal-Mart. Id. at *15. Plaintiffs next argued that the Court overlooked the importance of the U.S. Supreme Court's burden-shifting test set out in Anderson v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co., 328 U.S. 680 (1946), which held that, where an employer has kept inaccurate or unclear records, the employee need only prove that he in fact has performed work for which he was improperly compensated and produce evidence sufficient to show the amount an extent of that work as a matter of just and reasonable inference. Id. at *17. The Court noted that, in discussing both commonality and predominance, it determined that Plaintiffs could not demonstrate liability on a class-wide basis, and the Mt. Clemens doctrine did nothing to alter that decision. Id. at *19. Finally, Plaintiffs asserted that the Court could have modified the class definition and created sub-classes instead of denying certification altogether. Id. at *20. The Court noted that it already had considered and rejected this possibility in connection with Plaintiffs' opposition to decertification because there was no apparent sub-division that would correct the fatal flaws in Plaintiffs' attempt to maintain a collective action. Id. at *22. Plaintiffs offered the Court no reason to reconsider this reasoning or doubt its equal application to the creation of sub-classes within New York and Illinois. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration.

Wang, et al. v. The Hearst Corp.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 11516 (2d Cir. July 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of unpaid former interns, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the minimum wage requirements, overtime provisions, and record-keeping requirements of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs asserted that they were Defendant's employees, sought class certification, and filed a motion for partial summary judgment, which the District Court had denied. On appeal, the Second Circuit vacated in part and remanded. Plaintiffs argued that the District Court erred in denying them summary judgment because the interns were employees who provided an immediate advantage to the employer. Alternatively, they argued that the District Court erred because Defendant could not establish the six criteria as a matter of law under the relevant Department of Labor ("DOL") test. The Second Circuit found that both arguments lacked merit because as established in Glatt v. Fox Searchlight Pictures, Inc., 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 11435 (2d Cir. July 2, 2015), an unpaid intern was an employee under the FLSA, when the employer, rather than the intern, was the primary beneficiary of the parties' relationship. Id. at *3. Glatt also set out a non-exhaustive set of factors to answer that question. Id. The Second Circuit observed that here, the District Court applied a totality of the circumstances test. Therefore, it remanded, directing the District Court to consider the Glatt factors. Id. at *4. Further, the Second Circuit noted that in denying the class certification, the District Court found that there was no uniform policy with respect to the contents of the internships, including interns' duties, training, and supervision, such that the analysis would have to be individualized. Id. On appeal, Plaintiffs contended that Defendant's common practices would be decisive of the merits and that representative testimony could be used to establish those common practices. The Second Circuit noted that Glatt framed the relevant inquiry to analyze how the internship was tied to the intern's formal education, the extent of the intern's training, and whether the intern continued to work beyond the period beneficial learning. Id. at *5. The Second Circuit found that irrespective of the type of evidence used to answer them, these questions required individual determinations. The Second Circuit observed that the District Court correctly recognized that interns' experiences varied across the numerous departments at each of the 19 magazines that Defendant operated in New York, which was the requirement under Glatt. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Second Circuit concluded that the District Court did not err in denying Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Watson, et al. v. Visionpro,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 117168 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of cable installers/technicians, brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them overtime wages and that their compensation was subject to additional unlawful deductions in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs moved for class certification of their New York state law claims and Defendants moved for summary judgment. The Court denied both motions. Plaintiffs contended that Defendants employed them to provide installation and services for Cablevision Systems Corp.'s customers, and they were compensated on a "piece-rate" basis and paid according to the task or service performed, regardless of the amount of time required. Id. at *2. Furthermore, Plaintiffs alleged that their credits for compensation were reduced if they received a parking ticket or other moving violation, or lost any tools or equipment, and their compensation was also subject to additional unlawful deductions since they were required to fuel the vehicles with their own money and were never properly reimbursed. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants' unlawful practice of making deductions for parking tickets or other moving violations, for lost equipment, or for fueling the vehicles Plaintiffs used for work, created claims that were common and typical to the proposed class. Defendants asserted that Plaintiffs were paid a commission based on the service performed and the skill level of the technician providing the service. Defendants also stated that the technicians received a minimum of $8.10 per hour for all hours worked up to 40, and $12.15 per hour for all hours worked over 40 hours in a week. The Court, upon review of the parties' submissions, found that questions of fact existed regarding whether the putative class members had suffered the same deductions allegedly in violation of NYLL and also whether such claims predominated over questions affecting only individual members. Id. at *4-5. As a result, the Court found the need to hold an evidentiary hearing on whether Rule 23's requirements were met, and therefore, denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification without prejudice. Id. at 5. In addition, Defendants asserted they were entitled to summary judgment on Plaintiffs' overtime claims since Plaintiffs were exempted from overtime requirements under federal law and New York law. Id. at *6. Defendants also argued that even if Plaintiffs were not exempt, they were paid properly for any hours worked over 40 a week. Id. After reviewing the parties' submissions, the Court found that various questions of fact existed that precluded summary judgment. Accordingly, the Court denied both the parties' motions.

Zhou, et al. v. Jia Xing 39th, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43062 (S.D.N.Y. April 1, 2015). Plaintiff brought a collective action on behalf of current and former tipped employees alleging various wage & hour violations of the FLSA. Plaintiff, a former delivery person, alleged that during his employment he worked 11 hours per day, six or seven days per week, for a fixed daily salary of $40 per day, or roughly $3.64 per hour, and that he never received overtime. Id. at *2. Plaintiff moved to conditionally certify a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), and the Court granted the motion. At the outset, the Court noted that Plaintiff asserted a colorable claim that Defendant failed to pay him proper minimum wage and overtime compensation while serving as a tipped employee. Id. at *7. Based on Plaintiff's conversations with co-workers transferred from other locations, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant implemented the same wage & hour policies for all tipped employees at all of Defendant's restaurants. Id. at *8. The Court observed that for each of the FLSA violations, Plaintiff affirmed that his statements were based on his personal observations and conversations with co-workers, i.e., other tipped employees at all the four restaurants that Defendant operated. Id. The Court found that these declarations were sufficient to satisfy the modest factual showing that Plaintiff was similarly-situated to tipped employees from all four restaurant locations that Defendant operated. Id. Defendant relied on Morales v. Plantworks, Inc., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4267 (S.D.N.Y. Feb 2, 2006), in opposition to conditional certification. The Court, however, noted that in Morales, conditional certification was denied because the affidavit and exhibits that Plaintiffs submitted made no reference to any employee other than the named Plaintiff, and they made no allegations of a common policy or plan to deny Plaintiffs overtime. Id. at *11. The Court found that Plaintiff's showing was different, as Plaintiff had made a modest showing that he was similarly-situated to other employees at all of Defendant's locations, and accordingly, granted his motion for conditional certification.

(iii) Third Circuit

Bland, et al. v. PNC Bank, N.A.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 159579 (W.D. Pa. Nov. 25, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of mortgage loan officers ("MLOs"), brought a class and collective action alleging that Defendant classified MLOs as non-exempt employees with regard to the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiffs also asserted claims under the Pennsylvania Minimum Wage Act and the Pennsylvania Wage Payment and Collection Law. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court granted the motion. At the outset, the Court noted that Plaintiffs set forth sufficient facts to conditionally certify the collective action. Id. at *5. Defendant primarily argued that notice at this juncture was premature and would not result in efficient litigation of Plaintiffs' claims. The Court found that argument unavailing since judicial economy and efficiency is the precise purpose for early notification in FLSA collective actions. Id. at *6. Defendant also argued that Plaintiffs' affidavits were unreliable and could not support Plaintiff's modest burden to show that potential opt-ins were similarly-situated. Id. The Court reasoned that the factual support was slight for one of Plaintiffs' claims, but determined that the balance of Plaintiffs' claims were based upon policies that Defendant uniformly applied to all MLOs. Id. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied their modest burden at this stage of the litigation, and granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification. Id. at *7.

Bouder, et al. v. Prudential Financial, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23736 (D.N.J. Feb. 26, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of Prudential representatives, brought a putative collective action and class action alleging that Defendant made improper deductions from their pay toward business expenses as well as failed to pay them overtime wages. Plaintiffs alleged that despite their primary duty to render financial advice, Defendant misclassified them as "exempt salespersons." Id. at *143. Plaintiffs moved for class certification, proposing state law sub-classes, including deduction sub-classes and overtime sub-classes for Illinois, Pennsylvania, New York, and California. The Court granted certification to the deduction sub-classes, but denied it as to the overtime sub-classes. In granting certification to the deduction sub-classes, the Court found that each class had more than 40 members. Regarding the commonality requirement, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant violated respective state laws that prohibit an employer from making certain deductions from an employee's earnings, and in California, a law requires reimbursement of an employee's necessary work expenditures. Id. at *153. The Court thus found that Plaintiffs raised the common question of whether Defendant's policies violated such state laws and whether Defendant failed to reimburse necessary work expenditures in California. Id. The Court also found that Plaintiffs met typicality and adequacy requirements, as the class representatives asserted the same legal theories against Defendant that they asserted on behalf of the classes, and that no unique defenses applied to any class members. Id. at *155. Because Plaintiffs brought their claims based on Defendant's company-wide written policies, the Court rejected Defendant's contention that evidence of each individual Plaintiff's subjective understanding would be required. Id. at *157-158. The Court further rejected Defendant's argument that different treatment was required for representatives within the same class during different periods as Defendant allegedly subjected them to practices and agreements that changed over time. Because Plaintiffs separated their classes into sub-classes in order to specify which polices and practices each was challenging, the Court found Defendant's argument unavailing. Id. at *158. Defendant also failed to point to any specific variations in its policy that could disrupt the structure of Plaintiffs' sub-classes. Finally, because the cost of litigation resources and sophistication of Defendant would likely deter individual Plaintiffs to pursue separate actions, the Court concluded that a class action would be the superior means to resolve Plaintiffs' claims of the deductions sub-classes. Id. at *162. The Court, however, found that Plaintiffs' overtime sub-classes were not amenable to class treatment. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' argument that an expert's report was enough to overturn an earlier denial of class certification based on the finding that Plaintiffs' primary duty was sales. While Plaintiffs argued that they had eliminated the issues that resulted in their first motion for certification being denied, the Court found that Plaintiffs' expert neither spoke with Plaintiffs nor read their depositions, and thus, did not offer a reliable opinion as to Plaintiffs' primary duty. Id. at *164. Although Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant uniformly required them to treat proper financial advices as their primary duty, the Court found that individual inquires would be required to determine how Plaintiffs actually spent their day, and whether they were exempt salespersons. Id. at *168. Accordingly, the Court denied class certification to the overtime sub-classes and granted certification to Plaintiffs' deduction sub-classes.

Diabate, et al. v. MV Transportation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93762 (E.D. Pa. July 20, 2015). Plaintiff, a driver, brought a collective action under the FLSA and a class action under the Pennsylvania Minimum Wage Act and Wage Payment Collection Law, alleging that that her former employer failed to pay required wages and overtime for certain pre-shift and post-shift activities and for work performed during periods of time designated as uncompensated meal breaks. Plaintiff moved for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) and class certification under Rule 23. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification in part, and denied her motion for class certification. At the outset, the Court noted that 90 consent notices were filed by Plaintiff's counsel, and a substantial amount of discovery was completed. Id. at *17. Plaintiff argued that she had made the modest factual showing that she and the putative collective action members all worked for Defendant's Philadelphia operation as hourly, non-supervisory paratransit workers during the class period, were subject to common policies and practices, and were not paid overtime wages. Id. at *19. With regards to drivers, the Court held that Plaintiff had satisfied her burden to show that the potential collective action members were similarly-situated to Plaintiff. However, the Court ruled that Plaintiff did not satisfy her burden to show that drivers' aides were similarly-situated. Id. The Court found that aides did not drive vehicles, but rather were assigned to ride along with drivers on certain tours, and were not subject to any pre-tour and post-tour policies that applied to drivers. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification as to the drivers, but denied the motion as to the aides. In its analysis of the Rule 23 class certification motion, the Court relied on Babineau v. Federal Express Corp., 576 F.3d 1183 (11th Cir. 2009), a case similar to this action, which affirmed the denial of class certification because individual issues predominated over common issues. Id. at *27. The Court remarked that just as in Babineau, there was no common proof of Plaintiff's pre-shift claims, as there was no simple way to determine, without resorting to individualized inquiries, whether a driver arrived early on any given day, the reasons for doing so, and whether the driver engaged in work without compensation during that time. Id. at *28. The Court observed that as was the case in Babineau, permitting Plaintiff's claims to proceed as a class action would deprive Defendant of the ability to explore whether an individual employee was engaged in non-work activities during the gap period and would thus limit Defendant's ability to properly defend the claims. Id. at *33. Similarly, the Court found that Plaintiff failed to establish her burden of commonality and predominance of her meal breaks, post-shifts, and overtime claims theories. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Henry, et al. v. Express Scripts Holding Co.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22287 (D.N.J. Feb. 24, 2015). Plaintiff brought an FLSA action alleging that in early December 2013, Defendant decided to re-classify 170 employees as non-exempt, but failed to pay back overtime wages to any of the 170 re-classified employees. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a FLSA collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court denied the motion, finding that the facts Plaintiff asserted did not satisfy the requirement for a modest factual showing of FLSA violations. Id. at *3. The Court determined that Plaintiff failed to show facts to suggest that any of the re-classified employees were victims of a common policy or plan that evaded the law. Specifically, the Court opined that there were no facts suggesting that: (i) the previous classifications as exempt were incorrect at the time; (ii) the previous classifications as exempt originated in a common policy, such that the misclassified employees were similarly-situated; or (iii) that the previous classifications as exempt resulted in FLSA violations. Id. The Court reasoned that re-classification alone does not evidence any FLSA violations. Id. at *3-4. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Jones, et al. v. SCO, Silver Care Operations LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 126425 (D.N.J. Sept. 22, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of certified nursing assistants, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA, New Jersey's Wage & Hour, and the New Jersey Wage Payment Law. Defendant moved to dismiss or stay Plaintiffs' complaint pursuant to the parties' collective bargaining agreement ("CBA"). Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' claims for overtime and meal break violations required interpretation of the CBA and therefore must be arbitrated pursuant to the CBA's arbitration provision. Id. at *5. The Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss or stay, and found that Plaintiffs' allegations that they experienced deductions of 30 minutes of pay without receiving breaks in violation of the FLSA, which was a dispute distinct from any right included in the CBA. Id. at *6. The Court held that Plaintiffs demonstrated through the pleadings and their pay stubs that they each worked at least one week over 40-hours without receiving overtime compensation. The Court accordingly denied Defendant's motion. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Plaintiffs sought conditional certification of overtime pay claims, and meal break policy claims. Id. at *12. In support of their proposed collective action, Plaintiffs relied on the pleadings and sworn affidavits, which contained assertions substantiated by the pay stubs, time records, letters written by Defendant, and the parties' CBA. Id. at *13. The Court found that these submissions were adequate to establish the prerequisites for conditional certification. Id. Further, the Court determined that Defendant's various arguments against conditional certification related to the substantive heart of the disputed issues, and could not defeat Plaintiffs' showing that other employees' pay was calculated the same as the Plaintiffs. Id. Accordingly, the Court certified the collective action and issued notice per § 216(b).

Myers, et al. v. Jani-King Of Philadelphia, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29566 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 11, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of franchisees, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors in violation of Pennsylvania's Wage Payment and Collection Law ("WPCL"). Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant sold them the rights to cleaning services franchise, and that the franchise agreements that secured those rights were illegal employment agreements. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs moved to certify a class, which the Court granted. The Court noted that the central issue in this case was that Defendant misclassified franchisees as independent contractors. Plaintiffs contended that under WPCL, the class members should have been treated as employees and not as independent contractors. The Court observed that if Plaintiffs were in fact misclassified, then the class members, who were bound by the universal policies and procedures, would be entitled to relief. Id. at *18. On the other hand, if they were not misclassified, the same policies would have negated an employment relationship. Accordingly, the Court concluded that determination of this issue was common across the class, and that the commonality requirement was satisfied. Id. Defendant challenged the adequacy of representation requirement, and contended that named Plaintiff Brooks was not qualified to represent the class since he operated his franchise as a corporate entity. Id. at *23. The Court agreed that a corporate entity could not bring claims under WPCL, but remarked that it did not preclude Plaintiff Brooks and similarly-situated individuals from bringing WPCL claims. Id. at *24. Defendant further claimed that there was a conflict between the class members because some franchisees might prefer to remain independent contractors rather than be regarded as employees. The Court, however, rejected this argument, finding that in any substantial class action, there was the possibility that some members of the class would take a position different from that of the class representatives. Id. at *27. The Court ruled that this was insufficient to deny the class certification motion, and concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied the adequacy requirement. Id. at *29. As to predominance requirement, Plaintiffs contended that Defendant's right to control workers could be proved by common evidence, including the franchise agreement, the procedures manual, and the representative testimony from Defendant's managers and cleaning workers. Defendant, on the other hand, claimed that Plaintiffs' WPCL claims would require separate discovery and rulings for each franchise. Defendant contended that Plaintiffs' evidence was only sufficient to guarantee the quality of its franchised product, but insufficient to establish an employment relationship. The Court agreed with Defendant that to satisfy the predominance requirement, Plaintiffs must show that Defendant had the right of control where franchisees performed their day-to-day activities through common evidence. Id. at *39. The Court, however, found that Pennsylvania law was solely concerned with whether the franchisor had the ability to control the manner of the franchisee's work, and in analyzing that law, the franchise agreement should be looked at specifically to see how the nature and extent of the franchisor's right to control is defined. Id. at *40. The Court concluded that it was satisfied that Plaintiffs met the predominance requirement, and could establish through policies manual, the franchise agreement, and the training manual that they were employees. Id. at *41. Accordingly, the Court certified the class.

Reed, et al. v. Empire Auto Parts, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21112 (D.N.J. Feb. 23, 2015). Plaintiff, a full-time delivery driver, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and New Jersey Wage & Hour Law ("NJWHL") by failing to pay overtime to him and other drivers. Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that he and other drivers regularly worked more than 40 hours per week and rarely took an uninterrupted, 30-minute meal break. Id. at *3. Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action pursuant to the FLSA, and certification of a Rule 23 class action for violations of the NJWHL. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion. The Court found that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate that he was similarly-situated to the other employees, or to present evidence of the alleged unstated policy for purposes of 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Although Defendant had a policy of automatic meal break deductions, Plaintiff argued that it was a sham and resulted in Defendant knowingly failing to pay overtime wages. Plaintiff supported his argument with his own and other drivers' declarations, stating that they occasionally skipped meal breaks to finish their routes faster and did not notify management when they skipped the break. Id. at *14. Plaintiff thus asserted that skipped meal breaks suggested that Defendant maintained an unwritten policy of discouraging drivers from taking meal breaks. Id. Plaintiff also contended that the presence of GPS in drivers' vehicles to track their routes constituted sufficient evidence of the requisite "factual nexus" between Defendant's policies and the effect of those policies on the drivers. Id. The Court, however, found that an automatic meal deduction was not per se unlawful, and the fact the Plaintiff chose not to tell his supervisors that he skipped meal breaks shed no light on the experience of other drivers. Id. at *15. Further, the evidence did not show that Defendant knew or should have known that drivers were skipping breaks, or that Defendant used GPS data for payroll purposes. Id. Moreover, Plaintiff's own testimony suggested that his situation was different from other drivers, as his routes were unique, and he did not know whether other drivers took their lunch break or not. Id. at *17. Although some drivers testified that they occasionally skipped a break to finish faster and did not report this to managers, the evidence did not show that it was due to the alleged unwritten policy or because of the GPS tracking. The Court therefore denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification. For similar reasons, the Court also denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification. The Court found that the difference between Plaintiff's experience and that of the other drivers underscored the fact that Plaintiff could not demonstrate commonality, and the necessarily individualized nature of the inquires needed into each driver's individual circumstances with respect to breaks defeated predominance. Id. at *26. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion in its entirety.

Robles, et al. v. Vornado Realty Trust,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111038 (D.N.J. Aug. 21, 2015). Plaintiff brought putative collective action against Defendant relating to overtime violations of the FLSA. Plaintiffs worked as lease accountants and Defendant allegedly did not pay them overtime compensation despite Plaintiffs working more than 40 hours per week. Plaintiff moved to conditionally certify a collective action consisting of all employees who were denied overtime wages. In opposition, Defendant argued that Plaintiff lacked personal knowledge as to whether putative collective action members and other lease accountants were receiving overtime compensation. Defendant also argued that they had affirmatively shown that the proposed collective action members were not similarly-situated. Id. at *4. The Court noted that the declarations that Plaintiff submitted were substantially similar, i.e., all of the opt-in Plaintiffs stated that they worked as lease accountants for Defendant and mentioned their department and sub-group in the Financial Operations Department. Id. at *7. Plaintiff and the other declarants also indicated that they were not aware of an employees in the Financial Operations Department who were paid overtime. Id. Despite these declarations, Defendant contended that the opt-in Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated to the named Plaintiff. The Court found that Plaintiff had submitted sufficient evidence that she was similarly-situated to the potential collective action members, as she showed that she and the opt-ins shared the same job responsibilities and were all subject to policies requiring them to work more than 40 hours per week without overtime compensation. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion, and conditionally certified the collective action and issued notice.

Vasil, et al. v. Dunham's Athleisure Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 162872 (W.D. Pa. Dec. 4, 2015). Plaintiff, a former assistant store manager ("ASM"), brought an action alleging that Defendant denied him and other similarly-situated current and former employees' overtime wages in violation of the FLSA, the Pennsylvania Minimum Wage Act, and the Wage Payment and Collection Law. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), and the Court granted the motion. During his employment with Defendant, Plaintiff performed managerial duties less than 20% of the time, and in addition to the managerial duties he worked at registers, assisted customers, stocked merchandise, and performed janitorial duties and other non-managerial tasks. Id. at *2-3. According to Plaintiff, Defendant frequently asked ASMs to perform intense manual labor, and the work was substantially similar to that performed by non-exempt hourly employees. Id. at *3. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's intentional misclassification of ASMs as exempt was part of Defendant's pattern or practice of misclassifying all ASMs to exempt them from being paid overtime compensation as required by law. Id. at *4. Plaintiff argued that his declaration and the declarations of two other former ASMs provided adequate grounds to meet the conditional certification standard. Defendant contended that conditional certification was inappropriate because: (i) the only policy that Plaintiff identified as the universal job description for ASMs was not illegal or improper under the FLSA; and (ii) Defendant obtained declarations from 150 of its 215 ASMs showing that ASMs' work responsibilities varied greatly by location. Id. at *5. The Court found that Plaintiffs had met their modest burden for the conditional certification. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs merely needed to show a factual nexus between the manner in which the alleged policy affected them and the manner in which it affected other employees such that they ultimately may be found to be similarly-situated. Id. at *8. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs had satisfied this burden, and further determinations and assessments that Defendant sought were beyond the scope of this inquiry. Id. at *9. The Court explained that there was a discrete and readily identifiable group of employees who worked under similar circumstances, and that Plaintiffs showed that at least some of the employees within the group were subjected to a working environment that violated the FLSA in a manner that would support a finding that they were similarly-situated. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

(iv) Fourth Circuit

Banks, et al. v. Wet Dog, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11623 (D. Md. Feb. 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of car washers and detailers, brought an action alleging that Defendant's employment policies required them to remain on Defendant's premises for idle periods without pay as required by the FLSA. Under the policy, employees could clock-in only when customers arrived for car washes, and after each car wash was completed, employees were required to clock-out and to remain on Defendant's premises until new customers arrived. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs alleged that because of this policy, Defendant's compensated them below the minimum wage and without overtime. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. The Court found that Plaintiffs made the requisite factual showing that they were similarly-situated to other employees who worked for the Defendant during the period in question. The 11 declarations Plaintiffs submitted consistently spoke of underpayments and unpaid overtime, and attested that Defendant had the authority to control, manage, and direct Plaintiffs' work and that of other similarly-situated employees. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs' declarations all contended that Defendant refused to fully compensate employees by mandating a punch-in, punch-out policy before and after cleaning cars on-site, and that Defendant required employees to clean the work area and attend bi-weekly meetings while they were off-the-clock. Id. at *6-7. Although the Court noted some differences among Plaintiffs, such as rates of pay, duration of tenure, and the location at which they worked, it reasoned that these minor inconsistencies did not mean that Plaintiffs were necessarily dissimilar. Id. at *7. The Court therefore granted conditional certification of a collective action comprised of all individuals who had not received proper overtime pay or had not received the minimum wage for all hours worked.

Degidio, et al. v. Crazy Horse Saloon And Restaurant, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 132558 (D.S.C. Sept. 30, 2015). Plaintiff, an adult entertainer at Defendant's club, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and South Carolina Payments of Wages Act ("SCPWA") by failing to pay the appropriate minimum wages for all hours worked and by improperly denying overtime wages. Defendant classified its entertainers as lessees or independent contractors, and paid them no wages. Id. at *3. The entertainers received tips from customers for their performances, and Defendant often required them to pay a nightly "house fee." Id. at *4. Defendant further offered guests artificial currency referred to as "Golden Dollars" for tipping or buying private dances, and required entertainers to pay Defendant a 10% fee in order to have the Golden Dollars redeemed for U.S. currency. Id. at *4-5. Defendant also fixed the minimum payment amounts for the various types of individualized services offered by its entertainers, and did not allow the entertainers to charge less than Defendant's stated minimum fee for semi-private performances. Id. at *6. Defendant additionally used entertainers in its promotions, and it did not have any written rules for entertainers. Id. at *7. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant misclassified entertainers as independent contractors as it controlled the behavior and work of its entertainers, and that Defendant's practice resulted in improper deductions from compensation. Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant enforced a wide range of rules beyond those required by law, including but not limited to dress code requirements, sign-in requirements, sequence of performances, house fees, minimum prices for dances, tip-sharing requirements, and various policies intended to maintain "a sense of class" in the establishment. Id. at *23. In moving for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), Plaintiff alleged that the putative collective action members were similarly-situated. The Court agreed with Plaintiff and granted conditional certification. The Court found sufficient evidence in the record that established similarity, as Defendant treated entertainers in a common or similar manner, and subjected them to the same requirements regarding house fees and fees for couches, Jacuzzis, and VIP rooms. Id. at *61. The Court further found that Defendant subjected them to guidance regarding their attire, discouraged certain behaviors and tip-outs, and adopted a common approach toward its entertainers. Id. at *62. The Court refused to find that the potential need for individualized damage calculations precluded collective action treatment, finding that such potential issues could exist in any FLSA collective action. Id. at *65. Defendant also referred to the arbitration agreement signed by the entertainers and argued that it precluded their participation in this action. Id. at *67. The arbitration agreement waived the signatory's right to participate in a class action against Defendant, including any class that might be certified in this case. The Court noted that Defendant began having its entertainers sign the arbitration agreement more than a year after this action was filed, but one month before Plaintiff moved for certification. Id. The Court therefore questioned the enforceability of the arbitration agreement as it pertained to this action, and raised concerns about the statements in the affidavits of employees who signed the agreements that suggested that they might have received inaccurate or incomplete information about the implications of participating in the proposed class. Id. at *68-69. The Court held that entertainers who signed the agreements should be permitted to preserve their rights until the issue was resolved. Id. at *71. The Court therefore granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of the FLSA claim.

Desmond, et al. v. Alliance, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 59708 (D. Md. May 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of residential rehabilitation coordinators ("Coordinators") and lead residential rehabilitation coordinators ("Leads"), brought a collective action seeking minimum and overtime wages under the FLSA. Plaintiffs worked for a non-profit organization that provides community-based services to people with mental illnesses and developmental disabilities. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs contended that they often worked through lunch and late into the evening, and their evening hours usually totaled more than 40 hours. Id. at *4. According to Plaintiffs, their supervisors instructed them not to fill out their timesheets to reflect more than 40 hours, and in lieu of overtime pay, the supervisors told them a "flex time" plan would allow them to take off a day they were scheduled to work. Id. Plaintiffs contended that they were rarely able to take off this extra day because of the demands of their employment. Id. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion, and ruled that through their declarations, Plaintiffs made the necessary modest showing that they were similarly-situated to other Coordinators and Leads. Id. at *7. The Court observed that Plaintiffs' detailed declarations suggested they performed the same job duties, and explained how under-staffing caused them to work more than 40 hours per week. Id. at *8. Named Plaintiff King attested that at company-wide meetings she discussed these issues with other Coordinators, and those Coordinators indicated that they were subjected to the same unlawful practices. Id. The Court observed that this was sufficient to make a modest showing that they were similarly-situated to other putative collective action members. Defendants argued that the Coordinators and the Leads could not be similarly-situated to each other because Leads had certain responsibilities that Coordinators did not. Id. at *9. Defendants contended that Coordinators worked at some locations where Leads did not, and the two positions had different pay scales. The Court rejected this argument, finding that Plaintiffs need not show that the potential collective action members had identical positions for conditional certification, and remarked that Plaintiffs could be similarly-situated even though there were distinctions in their job titles, functions, or pay. Id. Accordingly, the Court conditionally certified the collective action.

Gardner, et al. v. Country Club, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 162009 (D.S.C. Dec. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of exotic dancers, brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them minimum and overtime wage in violation of the FLSA and the South Carolina Payment of Wages Act ("SCPWA"). Defendants engaged Plaintiffs to work on stage and on the floor of the club, and Plaintiff relied on the money received from the customers, including tips and payments for private performances. Id. at *5-6. Defendants did not pay Plaintiffs any wages or include them in their payroll, and required Plaintiffs to pay a nightly "house fee" to the club in order to dance. Id. at *7. Defendants also took a portion of the fees charged for individualized services of Plaintiffs, and did not allow them to charge more or less than the club's recommended amounts. Id. at *8-9. Alleging that Defendants misclassified them as independent contractors, and thereby denied them minimum and overtime wages, Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action under the FLSA and for class certification of their state law claims under Rule 23. The Court granted conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), but denied Plaintiffs' motion for Rule 23 class certification. Id. at *4. The Court noted that this action was similar to Degidio v. Crazy Horse Saloon, Inc., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 132558 (D.S.C. Sept. 30, 2015), and thus its analysis in Degidio controlled here as well. On September 30, 2015, the Court had issued an exhaustive order granting the motion for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) and denying class certification under Rule 23 in Degidio, and had indicated a desire for this case and Degidio to proceed in parallel considering the similarity of issues in both the actions. Id. at *2-4. The Court had also instructed Defendants to comply with its September 2015 order. Before the Court could issue its statement of reasons, Defendant filed a motion seeking relief from that order and permission to appeal. Defendants argued that the Court failed to analyze the facts of this case and simply assumed that the outcome in Degidio would control the outcome here as well. Id. at *30. After careful review of the records in this action, the Court determined that the analysis set forth in detail in Degidio controlled. Id. at *31. The Court applied the six-factor test for determination of employee status and ruled that Plaintiffs were employees under the FLSA. Similar to Degidio, the Court found that Defendants exercised sufficient control over Plaintiffs, including that Defendants retained the authority and responsibility to hire and fire Plaintiffs, and exercised control over Plaintiffs' appearance. The Court noted that the fact that Defendants issued written rules, required Plaintiffs to work a minimum number of shifts each week, and required them to submit to a breathalyzer and obtain a "see-ya" pass before leaving the club at the end of the shift, easily made up for the few practices employed by the club in Degidio that Defendants claimed were distinct. Id. at *45-46. The Court therefore concluded that all the factors weighed in favor of finding an employer-employee relationship between Plaintiffs and Defendants. Id. at *53. Defendants argued that it should be allowed to off-set its wage obligations to Plaintiffs for the fees that customers paid for table-side dances, couch dances, and other VIP-area dances. Id. at *55. Defendants asserted that its practices were in line with guidance previously received from the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") Id. at *59. The Court, however, found that the DOL letter was 20 years old and very outdated and that Defendants were not entitled to rely on it because it had not complied with the record-keeping requirements prescribed by the letter. Id. at *60-62. The Court therefore held that Defendants failed to submit any evidence to show that this action was distinguishable from Degidio in any manner that warranted the Court to alter its ruling regarding certification. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification under the FLSA and denied the motion for class certification under Rule 23 for the reasons set forth in Degidio.

McCoy, et al. v. RP, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 142521 (D.S.C. Oct. 19, 2015). Plaintiff, a former employee, brought a collective action on behalf of himself and others similarly-situated seeking unpaid minimum wages and overtime wages pursuant to the FLSA. Specifically, Plaintiff asserted that Defendant paid some employees an hourly wage lower than the statutory minimum wage using the FLSA's tip credit provision and that Defendant required certain employees to contribute a portion of their net sales to tip pools to compensate other employees. Id. at *2. Plaintiff further alleged that some back-of-the-house employees who did not qualify to share in the tip pools and who did not customarily receive tips received money from the tip pools. Id. at *2-3. Seeking to represent individuals employed at Kickin' Chicken to whom Defendant paid an hourly rate less than the statutory minimum wage and the employees who either contributed money to a tip pool or received money from a tip pool, Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. at *8. The Court conditionally certified the proposed collective action, but modified the collective action as "all Kickin' Chicken servers at each location who were paid an hourly rate less than the statutory minimum wage of Seven and 25/100 dollars per hour at any time since October 19, 2012." Id. at *12. The Court found that Plaintiff produced sufficient factual evidence to support his allegation that the proposed collective action members were similarly-situated. Plaintiff submitted an affidavit stating that he worked at the downtown Kickin' Chicken location and that servers from other Kickin' Chicken locations had told him that all had a mandatory tip-out policy. Id. at *11. Plaintiff also produced evidence that Kickin' Chicken employed a common scheme or policy of requiring servers to participate in tip pools with allegedly ineligible employees. Id. Defendant pointed out that Plaintiff did not produce any evidence from employees of the other Kickin' Chicken locations or identify the declarants who told him about the policies at those locations. Id. at *12. While agreeing with Defendant, the Court held that such arguments were better suited for second stage, decertification proceedings. Id. Although Plaintiff's affidavit did not identify the declarants who told him about tip pools at other Kickin' Chicken locations, the Court found that the information was nonetheless within his personal knowledge as it was a result of his conversations with other servers and with a member of management, whether accurate or not, of the tip pooling practices at other Kickin' Chicken locations, and such knowledge might be considered by the Court at the notice stage under § 216(b). Id. at *28. The Court therefore held that Plaintiff's evidence was sufficient to demonstrate that the proposed members of the collective action were similarly-situated to Plaintiff, and thus he met his lenient burden for conditional certification. The Court also granted Plaintiff's request for an order requiring Defendant to produce the names, addresses, telephone numbers, e-mail addresses, and dates of employment of all potential Plaintiffs, and held that Plaintiff might request additional address information for any potential collective action members whose U.S. Mail Notice was returned and whose e-mail notice was undeliverable. Id. at *16-20. The Court, however, declined to authorize any third-party administrator to send text messages via cell phone to any potential collective action member, or to post any laminated notice in any of Kickin' Chicken locations. Id. at *21-25. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification, subject to certain modifications and limitations.

Meeker, et al. v. Medical Transport, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43143 (E.D. Va. April 1, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former ambulance crew personnel, brought a FLSA collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay for automatic deductions of the 30-minute meal breaks without reimbursement ("meal break deduction claim") and off-the-clock activities such as returning calls and e-mails ("off-the-clock claim"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification, which the Court granted. At the outset, the Court noted that Plaintiffs had demonstrated that they and other potential collective action members were victims of a uniform policy or practice that violated the law. Regarding the meal deduction claim, Plaintiffs relied exclusively on a written policy that applied to every employee. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs alleged that the policy was unlawful because it suggested that the reimbursement of overtime payment was optional and dependent on the employee seeking reimbursement. Id. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to sufficiently prove the existence of an unlawful policy or practice because automatic break deduction policies were generally lawful. Id. at *8. The Court remarked that Plaintiffs had met their burden because they did not argue that the policy itself was unlawful; rather, they challenged the process for reimbursement after the automatic deduction as unlawful. Id. Regarding the off-the-clock claim, Plaintiffs asserted that the uniform policy or practice was the absence of a method of tracking and reporting off-duty work, and that employees were obligated to obtain required training on their own time without compensation. Id. The Court found that this practice was sufficient to carry Plaintiffs' burden at the first stage of conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. at *9. Second, the Court found that Plaintiffs had established that they were similarly-situated to members of the putative collective action. The Court explained that for the meal deduction claim, all members of the ambulance crew were subjected to the automatic deduction policy, regardless of the crew member's position or location of operation. Id. Similarly, for off-the-clock claim, the Court noted that all crew members were subjected to the same lack of a method for tracking and recording off-duty work. Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs had satisfied their burden to show that they were similarly-situated, and conditionally certified the collective action.

Rehberg, et al. v. Flowers Banking Co. Of Jamestown, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36939 (W.D.N.C. Mar. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of bakery product distributors, brought an action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors and denied them benefits under the FLSA and the North Carolina Wage & Hour Act ("NCWHA"). The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action. Subsequently, Plaintiffs sought Rule 23 class certification for their NCWHA claims, and Defendant moved to decertify the FLSA collective action. The Court certified the Rule 23 class, and denied Defendant's motion. At the outset, the Court found that Plaintiffs had met their burden of showing that all the requirements of Rule 23(a) were met and that class certification was appropriate pursuant to both Rue 23(b)(2), and Rule 23(b)(3). Defendant argued that the record showed material differences existed between Plaintiffs as to: (i) the level of control they were subjected to by Defendant; (ii) the exercise of entrepreneurial business opportunities; (iii) the level of investment and practice of hiring helpers; (iv) degree of skill; and (v) duration of their relationship with Defendant. The Court remarked that there was sufficient common evidence as it had found in its Rule 23 analysis to every factor that it must assess. As to the degree of control, the Court noted that while each distributor may have carried out the essential functions of his job slightly differently, such differences did not destroy commonality. Id. at *22. The Court explained that all distributors were instructed to carry out their jobs subject to the distributor agreement, had substantially similar job duties, and were subject to common policy of being misclassified as independent contractors. As such, the Court found that there was a question common to all putative class members that could be resolved in a single stroke. Accordingly, the Court concluded that common evidence of Plaintiffs' factual and employment settings leaned in favor of a finding that all distributors were similarly-situated for the purposes of the FLSA. Defendant argued that several individualized issues warranted decertification of the FLSA collective action. First, Defendant contended that determining whether the distributors were subjected to either the motor carrier exemption or the outside sales exemption under the FLSA would require the fact-finder to hear and weigh significant individualized evidence. Id. at *47. The Court, however, found that those exemptions, if applicable to any distributors, did not overwhelm the similarly-situated analysis under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court further explained that the primary inquiry at this point was to determine whether or not all distributors were misclassified as independent contractors and whether they were truly employees within the meaning of the FLSA. Id. at *48. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the members of the collective action were similarly-situated for the purposes of collectively adjudicating their FLSA claims, and denied Defendant's motion for decertification.

Siquic, et al. v. Star Forestry, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135674 (W.D. Va. Oct. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of migrant workers employed on a seasonal or temporary basis, brought an action seeking unpaid minimum wages. Plaintiffs alleged that besides delaying payments, Defendant did not provide pay stubs or any records regarding hours, wages paid, or deductions taken from their paychecks. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant deducted money from Plaintiffs' wages for business expenses, and that Plaintiffs were not compensated for traveling long distances as part of their employment. Id. Plaintiffs moved for class certification of their Rule 23 claims and conditional certification of their FLSA claims, and the Court granted the motions. First, the Court found that the proposed class was readily identifiable because they were required to obtain H-2B visas to work in the United States, and their passports would specify their employer and the periods of employment. Regarding numerosity, Star Forestry, LLC generally applied for at least 75 visas per season, and the retention rate for workers from season to season was between 50% and 75%. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs, thus, estimated that there were about 19 to 38 new temporary migrant workers per season, and the Court opined that Plaintiffs' estimate of 200 proposed class members constituted a good faith estimate that established numerosity. Regarding commonality, Plaintiffs filed several declarations confirming Defendant's alleged failures. Defendant also admitted that they did not save handwritten calculations that were used to ensure that employees received the prevailing wages, paid workers in cash, and did not give them pay stubs until the most recent season. The Court opined that these facts demonstrated that the putative class members suffered a common injury. The Court also noted that there were common questions of law, such as whether Defendant's employment practices violated the AWPA and the FLSA. The Court observed that Defendant's failures affected all the class members, and that differences in the amount of damages suffered by the class members did not make their legal claims atypical. Id. at *13. The Court also opined that Defendant's liability with respect to its employment practices would be subject to resolution in a single adjudication; although there would be differences in the putative class members' individual damages, the Court ruled that such differences were of minimal consequence, given the common questions of law and fact among the proposed class members. Id. at *18. Thus, the Court held that the common questions of law and fact predominated over questions affecting individual members. Further, the Court observed that individual putative class members had little interest, if any, in bringing their own individual actions because they resided in Guatemala, did not speak English, were indigent, were unfamiliar with U.S. law, and due relatively small sums of money. The Court concluded that all these factors made a class action a superior mode of adjudication. For these reasons, the Court granted class certification. The Court also certified the proposed collective action because Plaintiffs showed they were similarly-situated to the proposed collective action members, and bolstered their allegations with declarations from several potential collective action members.

Walter, et al. v. Buffets, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 82507 (D.S.C. June 25, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant servers, brought an action alleging that Defendant had a corporate policy to limit labor costs across each of its 300 restaurants in 35 states, which resulted in servers being assigned significant amounts of non-tip producing work for which they should have been paid the standard minimum wage, but were paid at tip credit rates in violation of the FLSA and the Ohio Minimum Fair Wage Standards Act. Plaintiffs moved to conditionally certify a FLSA collective action, but after the completion of discovery they also moved to narrow the scope of the FLSA class, citing Defendant's tenuous financial situation and limited the class to servers who worked at restaurants overseen by 11 named area directors. The Court conditionally certified the collective action, but denied the motion to narrow the scope of the FLSA claim. Plaintiffs provided affidavits that supported the allegations in the complaint from eight servers in six different states, referring to conversations with managers about corporate-level policies that resulted in the alleged violations. Id. at *14. In addition, Plaintiffs also provided copies of the "Server Opening Duties Checklist" and the "Line Server Opening Beverage Bar Duties" checklist, which listed a number of non-tip-producing duties that servers were required to perform. Id. at *14-15. The Court found that these affidavits provided ample evidence for Plaintiffs to meet the modest showing required to conditionally certify a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. at *15. Plaintiffs proposed to limit the scope of the collective action, arguing that Defendant's financial condition required narrowing the collective action, and that the proposed narrowed collective action would be more efficient. Id. at *16. The Court, however, observed that when the number of parties who would opt-in remained speculative, its concern was not with narrowing the scope of the collective action due to concerns such as Plaintiffs had with Defendant's financial status; the concern was to ensure that the scope of the collective action properly defined those with a cognizable injury. Id. at *17. The Court, however, determined that the proposed definition of the collective action required some alteration. Id. at *16. The Court thus conditionally certified a collective action of all individuals from July 11, 2010 to July 18, 2012, who worked as tipped employees earning a sub-minimum, tip credit wage. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to conditionally certify a FLSA collective action and denied Plaintiffs' motion to narrow the scope of the FLSA class.

Zelaya, et al. v. A+ Tires, Brakes, Lubes, And Mufflers, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 130225 (E.D.N.C. Sept. 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and the North Carolina Wage & Hour Act ("NCWHA"). Plaintiffs worked for one of two separate Defendants using the same employee handbook. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs contended that despite having overtime policies, Defendants frequently denied overtime wages. Id. at *3. Specifically, Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants did not pay workers if they arrived early or worked late, which included time spent loading and unloading vehicles and traveling to jobsites. Id. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), and class certification of their NCWHA claim per Rule 23. At the outset, the Court noted that Plaintiffs met the requirements for conditional certification. The Court observed that Plaintiffs made a factual showing that they were subject to several common policies that violated the FLSA. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs and putative collective action members, through their declarations, showed that Defendants systematically reduced employees' hours to reflect less hours than employees actually worked, which resulted in employees not being paid overtime wages. Id. at *9. The Court found that this was sufficient to meet the modest burden under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), and certified the collective action. Similarly, the Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied the Rule 23(a) requirements on their NCWHA claims. The Court observed that Plaintiffs met the commonality requirement as they showed that they were affected by several common policies and practices, since employees had their hours reduced when those hours were not approved, and employees were not reimbursed for meals while traveling. Id. at *12. The Court also determined that Plaintiffs satisfied the predominance requirement as the common issues predominated over individual issues. Id. at *13. The parties disputed when and how the statute of limitations would apply, under both the FLSA and the NCWHA. The Court observed that under Rule 15(c), amendments will relate back to an original complaint when the amendment asserts a claim or defense that arose out of the conduct, transaction, or occurrence set out in the original pleading. Id. at *16. The Court reasoned that here, the original complaint centered on Defendants' failure to pay overtime wages, and that failure provided the factual nexus between the original complaint and the amendments. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' NCWHA amendments related back to the original complaint. Id. The Court, however, found that FLSA claims did not relate back to the original complaint. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motions in part.

(v) Fifth Circuit

Bryant, et al. v. United Furniture Industries, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40308 (N.D. Miss. Mar. 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees at a furniture manufacturer, brought an action alleging violations of the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant forced its employees to begin work before clocking-in and forced them to clock-out before completing work. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action, and Defendant argued that a previously settled lawsuit precluded certification. First, the Court found that the doctrine of res judicata did not apply. Defendant argued that the case involved claims that already had been certified for collective action treatment and subsequently settled in Carothers v. United Furniture Industries, Inc., Case No. 13-CV-00203 ("Carothers"), another lawsuit within the same Court. Id. at *4. The Court noted that Carothers involved similar claims of FLSA violations by persons employed by Defendant as non-exempt factory workers in Mississippi, North Carolina, and California during a similar time period. Id. The Court observed, however, that none of the Plaintiffs named in the present action were among the nearly 500 employees who opted-in to the Carothers action. Id. at *7. The Court explained that, without affirmatively opting-in to Carothers, the employees pursuing relief in this case could not have been parties to Carothers and therefore they could not benefit from or be bound by the Carothers judgment. Id. at *7-8. Second, the Court granted in part Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification. Plaintiffs sought conditional certification of a collective action of non-exempt employees at Mississippi locations who Defendant required to work off-the-clock without overtime compensation. In addition to the Plaintiffs, eleven other potential Plaintiffs had filed written consents with the Court seeking to join the action. Id. at *15. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs and opt-ins submitted affidavits alleging FLSA violations that pervaded different positions, occurred at various facilities in Mississippi, and involved a wide range of Defendant's supervisors. Specifically, Plaintiffs identified employees holding ten different positions, at four facilities, who allegedly worked off-the-clock at the direction of 12 different individuals with supervisory authority. Id. at *16. The Court concluded that such widespread and pervasive allegations constituted evidence of an illegal decision, policy, or plan such that the employees were sufficiently similarly-situated for purposes of 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), and therefore conditional certification was proper. Id. at *16-17. Finally, the Court narrowed Plaintiffs' proposed collective action. The Court determined that Plaintiffs' proposed definition was overly broad because Plaintiffs identified no discernable time period, and because it included Plaintiffs and opt-ins in Carothers who already had settled their claims. Id. at *17-18. Accordingly, the Court conditionally certified a smaller action consisting of persons employed by Defendant from January 1, 2010 until December 30, 2013, in the state of Mississippi who worked off-the-clock without overtime wages under the FLSA, excluding those who previously opted-in to the Carothers settlement. Id. at *18.

Caballero, et al. v. Kelly Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 137475 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of recruiters on the Weatherford International account of Defendant, a temporary staffing services firm, brought a collective action under the FLSA alleging that Defendant required them to work substantially more than 40 hours per workweek without receiving overtime compensation. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs worked on-site at Weatherford locations and/or remotely from their own homes, and Defendant originally classified them as exempt from overtime. Id. Defendant later sent an e-mail informing Plaintiffs that it had improperly classified Plaintiffs as exempt and that their position would be re-classified as non-exempt, and that Plaintiffs would be eligible for overtime compensation. Id. Alleging that Defendant never compensated them for overtime, Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action of recruiters that received the e-mail dated March 27, 2012, that indicated that they were not exempt from overtime. Id. at *10. Defendant opposed the motion, arguing that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated, and that collective action treatment would be inappropriate because the claims would require individualized inquiries. Id. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion, finding that Plaintiffs failed to carry their burden of presenting meaningful admissible evidence that they were similarly-situated to other potential collective action members. Id. at *11. The Court noted that Plaintiffs did not identify a single decision, policy, or plan that unified the allegation, but relied on factors that were not probative of whether there was an unlawful practice imposed by Defendant. Id. at *12. Although Plaintiffs contended that they were similarly-situated because they all shared the same primary job duties and received the same e-mail regarding their FLSA classification as non-exempt employees, the Court found that Plaintiffs did not meet their burden of presenting evidence that the alleged FLSA violations grounded on an alleged unwritten practice stemming from a single decision, policy, or plan. Id. at *13-14. Plaintiffs relied heavily on a declaration from Defendant's former supervisor, who supervised two recruiters on the Weatherford account, to argue that the supervisory employees directed recruiters not to record overtime they worked. Id. at *15-16. The Court, however, determined that the declaration did not provide evidence of relevant acts by Defendant or its supervisory employees taken at the direction of Defendant as it only amounted to one supervisor's impressions of Defendant's practices without specifying any acts or statements that provided a basis for those impressions. Id. Further, the declaration did not provide sufficient facts to extrapolate a company-mandated national management practice that affected the many other potential Plaintiffs. Id. at *18. The Court held that Plaintiffs did not provide sufficient information regarding the structure and practices of the management who oversaw the proposed collective action to infer a national unwritten practice from Plaintiffs' admissible evidence, and thus, resolution of the proposed collective action members' claims would require individualized inquiries on essential factual issues. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Dyson, et al. v. Stuart Petroleum Testers, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 113509 (W.D. Tex. Aug. 27, 2015). Plaintiff, a flow tester responsible for monitoring oil and gas wells, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant improperly classified him as an independent contractor and denied him overtime pay in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant set up a paper profile designed to create the impression that flow testers were independent contractors, although in reality they were employees of Defendant. Id. Plaintiff sought to conditionally certify a collective action consisting of all current and former hourly-paid workers classified as independent contractors who performed work for Defendant associated with monitoring and maintaining oil and gas wells throughout the United States within the last three years. Id. at *5. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion. Plaintiff supported his motion with declarations from himself and another tester, Alvin Garvey ("Garvey"). Id. at *5-6. Defendant argued that Plaintiff failed to show sufficient evidence of potential opt-in Plaintiffs because he provided only two declarations and the mere existence of other similarly-situated individuals did not guarantee that those individuals actually would seek to join the lawsuit. Id. at *6. The Court rejected Defendant's argument in opposition to the motion because the case was in its very early stages, no discovery had been conducted, and Plaintiff did not need to submit evidence identifying other interested persons. Id. at *7. Moreover, the Court found that Plaintiff had presented at least some evidence of other opt-in Plaintiffs. In their declarations both Plaintiff and Garvey averred that other flow testers were subject to the same working and pay conditions and may be interested in joining the lawsuit. Id. The Court found this showing sufficient to carry Plaintiff's burden at the conditional certification stage. Id. Defendant also contended that Plaintiff failed to provide evidence of a widespread illegal practice or plan because he relied solely on identical, conclusory statements in two declarations that fell short of the evidence necessary for conditional certification. Id. at *8-9. The Court again rejected Defendant's argument. Although Plaintiff couched the declarations in general terms, the declarants stated that they worked with other flow testers who performed work for Defendant and that the other flow testers performed similar work, were paid hourly, and were not paid overtime. Id. at *9. Moreover, Garvey stated that, because he worked for Defendant for over a year, he became familiar with company-wide practices due to the fact that he worked closely with other flow testers and "visited with them" about their jobs, pay, and hours. Id. at *9-10. The Court found Garvey's testimony sufficient to show a widespread illegal plan. The Court, therefore, concluded that Plaintiff presented sufficient evidence to meet the slight burden imposed at that initial conditional certification stage under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. at *10-11.

Jones, et al. v. Cretic Energy Services, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 164786 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 9, 2015). Plaintiff, an employee, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified equipment operators and supervisors as exempt employees and denied them overtime wages under the FLSA. Plaintiff alleged that he worked for Defendant as a member of a coil tubing crew, and his job duties primarily involved operating and tending to power-driven, stationary, or portable pumps and manifold systems used to transfer gases and oil to and from various vessels. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff filed a motion to conditionally certify the collective action, and the Court granted the motion. Defendant argued that the proposed collective action was overly broad, because Plaintiff worked as an equipment operator, and the proposed collective action included service supervisors who were not similarly-situated to Plaintiff. Id. at *13. The Court observed that to satisfy the modest burden for conditional certification, Plaintiff only needed to show that there was a reasonable basis to believe that other individuals also existed in the putative collective action. Id. at *14. Plaintiff attached declarations of two other coil tubing crew members, both of whom stated that despite working for over 40 hours, Defendant did not pay them overtime wages. Id. at *14-15. Plaintiff also submitted another employee's declaration who stated that he worked for Defendant on coil tubing crews in multiple positions, including both as an operator and supervisor, and was not paid overtime wages. Id. at *15-16. In all the three declarations, the employees stated that they knew of others similarly-situated who would be interested in joining the litigation. Id. at *16. Defendant argued that supervisors were not similarly-situated to operators because the operators had no staff management duties, while the supervisors supervised the equipment managers, assisted in recruitment, and were responsible for performance evaluations, etc. Id. at *20. Defendant also contended that the supervisors were not similarly-situated to operators because it classified supervisors as exempt under the executive exemption to the FLSA, and it classified operators as exempt under the motor carrier exemption. Id. at *20. Plaintiff argued that the supervisors were similarly-situated to operators because both worked the exact same hours from start-to-finish, performed the same type of manual labor in the oil field, were paid a salary plus a bonus, and were uniformly misclassified as exempt. Id. at *21. The Court noted that the evidence showed that the members of the coil tubing field crews worked the same hours side-by-side as a team, traveled together from jobsite to jobsite, and spent most of their time physically operating and maintaining coil tubing equipment in oil fields. Id. at *23-24. The Court determined that employees with different job titles were similarly-situated for the purposes of an opt-in FLSA collective action when their day-to-day job duties did not vary substantially. Id. The Court reasoned that the job duties of the supervisors and the operators were substantially similar despite the additional responsibilities given to the supervisors. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the supervisors were similarly-situated to the operators, and conditionally certified the collective action.

Jones, et al. v. Yale Enforcement Services, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 83221 (E.D. La. June 26, 2015). Plaintiff brought a collective action seeking unpaid wages and overtime pay under FLSA alleging that Defendant ordered him and eight other individuals to report to Lakeview Regional Medical Center ("LRMC") and remain there 24 hours a day for four days, during the landfall and aftermath of Hurricane Isaac. Id. at *2. Plaintiff moved for partial conditional certification, which the Court granted. Defendant argued that Plaintiff failed to show that his entire stay at LRMC was compensable time. In support of its contention, Defendant included: (i) the affidavit of Defendant's senior payroll administrator stating that Plaintiff received pay for 77.75 hours of work during the week of Hurricane Isaac; (ii) the affidavit of Defendant's CEO stating that Defendant was only complying with the emergency procedures initiated by LRMC; and (iii) the employee handbook decreeing sleeping on the job as a punishable offense, which, according to Defendant, made clear that Plaintiff could not have thought such activity was part of being "on duty," and thus compensable. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiff argued that the Code of Federal Regulations, 29 C.F.R. § 785.22, extended compensable time to sleeping and other activities when an employer requires an employee to be on-duty for more than 24 hours, and there was no employment contract to the contrary. Id. at *5-6. Although the Court found that Defendant's argument that "Plaintiff had not alleged that he was on-duty after his set shift ended" had some merit, it opined that it was appropriate to weigh such arguments at the second step of the certification process. Id. at *6. The Court pointed out that the exact scope of Plaintiff's duties would be further clarified by discovery. The Court maintained that it was sufficient at that point that Plaintiff had alleged that, contrary to normal procedures, Defendant required Plaintiff and others to report to and remain at LRMC for several days without leaving. Because the allegations pertained only to a very small group of individuals during a very short period of time within a very specific geographical territory, the Court concluded that collective action would better address the parties' claims. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for partial conditional certification of a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216 (b).

Kelly, et al. v. Healthcare Services Group*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64258 (E.D. Tex. May 18, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of account managers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt employees and therefore denied them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Defendant provided housekeeping management in nursing homes and similar facilities. Id. at *5. In facilities where Defendant supplied the labor, account managers also provided labor to help keep the facilities clean. Id. Account managers were characterized as salaried exempt employees and hourly non-exempt employees. Id. Defendant determined the exempt or non-exempt status of an account manager was based on the manual labor performed by the individual as opposed to the account manager's actual day-to-day duties. Id. at *5. After the Court conditionally certified the collective action, Defendant moved for decertification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court denied Defendant's motion to decertify. Defendant claimed that opt-in Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated because disparate factual and employment settings were present. The Court observed that the opt-in Plaintiffs relied on a company-wide job description and uniform standardized job routines for Defendant's account managers. Id. at *14. The job description included certain managerial duties and non-managerial, labor intensive duties, including heavy housekeeping. Id. The Court reasoned that the uniform job description, together with the precise job routines, were pieces of evidence that suggested uniformity and defined the potential scope of the opt-in Plaintiffs' job duties. Id. at *16. In addition, Plaintiffs also pointed to deposition testimony showing that the account managers spent the vast majority of their workday performing manual labor. Id. at *18. The Court found that the reason this occurred was because the account managers worked the routines of a hourly employees, covered for staff, and were required to compete a number of special projects that kept the facilities clean. Id. As a matter of fact, the account managers were expected to perform some managerial functions, but the overwhelming weight of the testimony showed that they spent their time in cleaning, and not managing. Id. The Court also observed that the opt-in Plaintiffs' depositions consistently told the same story, establishing that they were all similarly-situated. Defendant contended that the "person-specific factors" and "facility-specific factors" showed that opt-in Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated. Id. at *32. Defendant asserted that person-specific factors – such as each regional manager had independent discretion to set policies and priorities within the regions and districts – showed that how an account manager worked depended on the regional manager. The Court observed that Defendant relied on testimony taken out of context, and re-characterized them to fit its arguments. Id. at *40. The Court therefore concluded that the person-specific factors were non-existent. The Court ruled that Defendant's reliance on facility-specific factors to show that the opt-in Plaintiffs were not subject to a uniform policy failed because there was overwhelming evidence to show that the opt-in Plaintiffs across all facilities performed similar job duties, and that they were denied overtime wages. Id. at *50-51. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for decertification of the collective action.

Lindsey, et al. v. Harris County,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 158027 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former officers employed by Harris County Constable's Office Precinct 3 ("Precinct 3"), brought an action against Defendants for violations under the FLSA and Title VII. Plaintiffs sought conditional certification of the FLSA claims. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion. Plaintiffs alleged that officers were instructed not to record all the hours they actually worked, and as a result were denied overtime pay. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs stated that they feared being retaliated against if they reported all of the time they worked. Id. Defendants argued that: (i) Plaintiffs failed to offer substantial evidence of common policy or plan; and (ii) Plaintiffs did not show personal knowledge of the existence of similarly-situated collective action members. Plaintiffs claimed that they were similarly-situated to all non-exempt law enforcement officers within Precinct 3, and alleged that all officers were subjected to the same common policy, i.e., all officers were required to close out investigation scenes, draft incident reports, work community events, attend community meetings, and be on call outside of their regularly scheduled shifts without appropriate compensation. Id. at *11-12. In support of a common policy, Plaintiffs stated in their affidavits that the management team did not look favorably upon deputies reporting time worked outside of their scheduled shift. Id. at *12. The affidavits stated that Plaintiffs knew that most of the other precinct officers also worked over 40 hours in a week. Id. The Court remarked that Plaintiffs did not offer sufficient evidence of a common plan or a policy to deny all officers' overtime compensation. Id. at *13. Officers self-reported their timesheets, and Plaintiffs failed to explain that Defendants knew or should have known that any officers were actually working overtime hours without compensation. Id. at *14. The Court reasoned that an employee has a duty to notify his employer when he works more than 40 hours per week. Id. Defendants provided evidence that they paid overtime for reported hours for hours worked beyond 40 per week, and had a grievance policy in place for officers who disagreed with pay decisions. The Court determined that Plaintiffs failed to meet their initial burden of showing a common policy or plan or that a potential collective action contained similarly-situated individuals. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs failed to meet even the lenient standard of conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), and denied Plaintiffs' motion.

Lopez, et al. v. Hal Collums Construction, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 155910 (E.D. La. Nov. 18, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of laborers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants denied them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. Plaintiffs submitted declarations of two named Plaintiffs and an opt-in Plaintiff that provided details regarding the allegations in the complaint. Id. The Court found that the complaint and the attached declarations set forth substantial allegations that the putative collective action members were together victims of a single decision, policy, or a plan. Id. at *15. The Court observed that Defendant's alleged policy of failing to pay employees overtime for work performed over 40 hours was common throughout the proposed "class." Id. at *15-16. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied their lenient burden of showing that they were similarly-situated to members of the purported collective action. Defendants contended that conditional certification should be limited to employees who worked as laborers for Defendants at hourly rates between $9 and $11, the wages that Plaintiffs earned. Id. at *17. The Court remarked that similarly-situated does not have to mean identically situated. Further, Plaintiffs did not allege that they were singled out for underpayment, but that all hourly employees working alongside them performing manual labor were not paid the proper overtime rate. Id. at *18. Although Plaintiffs asserted that they were paid between $9 and $11 per hour, they claimed that their co-workers, who performed the same duties, were paid between $10 and $14 per hour. Id. Given these facts and the lenity with which conditional certification decisions must be made, the Court found that the collective action should be conditionally certified. The Court, however, rejected Plaintiffs' request for six months for opt-in Plaintiffs to file their consent form, and found that an opt-in period of 90 days was appropriate in this action.

Mason, et al. v. Amarillo Plastic Fabricators,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95624 (N.D. Tex. July 22, 2015). Plaintiff, an employee, brought a collective action seeking back pay, unpaid overtime, and other compensatory damages. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant conspired to violate the FLSA by altering employee timesheets and timecards, falsifying paychecks, failing to withhold taxes from employee paychecks, and improperly classifying workers as independent contractors. Id. at *2. Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Plaintiff submitted a single declaration in support of her motion, wherein she stated that she worked from 8:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. five days a week as an hourly employee, and that Defendant permitted her to work overtime, whereby she began arriving to work by 7:15 a.m. to 7:30 a.m. Id. at *8-9. Plaintiff also stated that she performed work duties during her lunch hour and was not paid for all of the time she spent working, including overtime hours, and that the human resources manager altered her timecards to avoid paying her regular time hours and overtime hours. Id. at *10. The Court indicated that Plaintiff's declaration provided no factual support for the allegations that other hourly employees were denied regular and overtime pay in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff's declaration did not identify any other potential Plaintiffs who might be interested in opting-in to her lawsuit and focused solely on her own work schedule and the alleged FLSA violations that she personally suffered. Id. The Court reasoned that the declaration did not suggest that Plaintiff had personal knowledge of other employees who were subjected to similar FLSA violations. Further, not one potential Plaintiff submitted an affidavit or declaration in support of Plaintiff's motion, and that the only potential Plaintiffs who submitted affidavits were two employees who submitted affidavits on behalf of Defendant, explicitly stating that they had no interest in joining the action. Id. Because Plaintiff did not identify potential Plaintiffs, no potential Plaintiffs submitted affidavits, and no evidence of an alleged widespread illegal plan was submitted by Plaintiff's counsel, the Court concluded that the potential collective action members were not the victims of a single decision, policy, or plan that violated the FLSA. Id. at *13. Thus, the Court was unable to determine whether the potential collective action members were similarly-situated, and accordingly denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Pacheco, et al. v. Wessam Aldeeb,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40944 (W.D. Tex. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of food service workers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant required them to perform unrecorded and unpaid work before and after shifts, to clock-out during compensable break time, and routinely made unlawful deductions from the paychecks of Plaintiffs and similarly-situated employees. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action per 29 U.S.C. § 216 (b) and for notice to potential collective action members, which the Court granted in part. Plaintiffs first showed that they each worked overtime and were paid the same hourly rate for their overtime work, and spoke with other employees who stated they also did not receive overtime pay for time worked over 40 hours per week. Id. at *11. Plaintiffs also demonstrated that Defendant deducted pay from their paychecks based on cash register shortages. Id. Plaintiffs' pay stubs indicated that each worked more than 80 hours in a two-week pay period and did not receive overtime pay, the Court found that this evidence was sufficient to credit the allegations that Defendant failed to appropriately compensate Plaintiffs and similarly-situated employees. Id. at *11-12. While Defendant argued that Plaintiffs had no evidence of a common policy of forcing employees to work off-the-clock, Plaintiffs contended that Defendant consistently deducted a 30-minute lunch break from their paychecks although they generally worked through lunch. Id. at *12-13. Plaintiffs further attested that Defendant required them to perform work outside of their shifts, and refused to compensate them for that work. Id. at *13. The Court found those statements sufficient to show a reasonable basis for the existence of a policy of forcing employees to work off-the-clock for the purposes of conditional certification. Id. Defendant further argued that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated to the proposed collective action members because Plaintiffs worked in a managerial capacity, and that named Plaintiff Pacheco was not similarly-situated to other Plaintiffs. Id. at *14. While the fact that Plaintiffs served in a managerial capacity did not preclude them from representing employees who worked for Defendant in a non-managerial capacity, the Court found that named Plaintiff Pacheco was not similarly-situated to other Plaintiffs. Id. at *15-16. Because Pacheco's additional responsibilities and different compensation scheme would require a different analysis than that presented with respect to employees whose only compensation was an hourly wage, the Court found that Pacheco could proceed as an individual Plaintiff, but not on behalf of a similarly-situated collective action members. Id. at *19-20.

Perkins, et al. v. Manson Gulf, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21427 (E.D. La. Feb. 23, 2015). Plaintiff, a rigger, brought a FLSA collective action seeking overtime compensation for time spent on attending various meetings and travelling to and from the worksite. Plaintiff moved for conditional certification, which the Court granted. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant did not pay employees who worked offshore for participation in mandatory safety meetings prior to or subsequent to the start of their shifts; travel time spent mobilizing and demobilizing prior to and following each hitch; mandatory fire and abandon drills; mandatory "man overboard" and muster drills; and other work-related activities. Id. at *7. Plaintiff worked aboard the E.P. PAUP, which was owned by Defendant, and there were about 30 other employees consisting of riggers, mechanics, oilers and crane operators. Plaintiff asserted that he and his fellow hourly offshore personnel had not received pay for the safety meetings and travel time, and that this policy was Defendant's payroll practice throughout his period of employment and was applicable to all hourly offshore personnel company-wide. Id. at *8. The Court opined that the policy of failing to pay for allegedly compensable meetings and travel time constituted a factual nexus which bound the named Plaintiff and the potential collective action members together, and that there was no indication that this policy related to specific circumstances personal to Plaintiff. Id. at *9. Further, because Plaintiff attested that it was within his personal knowledge that all offshore hourly employees company-wide received pay pursuant to this policy, the Court found that he satisfied his lenient burden for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. 216(b). Id. at *10. Although Defendant emphasized that Plaintiff failed to identify any other particular individual who was interested in joining the class, the Court observed that there was no categorical rule that Plaintiff must submit evidence at that stage that other individuals sought to opt-in to the case. Id. at *10-11. The Court also noted that Plaintiff had affirmed that he knew other similarly-situated individuals would join the litigation. Defendant, however, argued that Plaintiffs' proposed collective action included a broad spectrum of employees who worked in various positions. The Court remarked that it need not find uniformity in each and every aspect of employment to determine that a group of employees is similarly-situated. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court conditionally certified a collective action comprised of all hourly offshore personnel who were employed as riggers, mechanics, oilers, and/or crane operators by Defendant within the last three years.

Rios, et al. v. Classic Southern Home Construction, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171391 (E.D. La. Dec. 22, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of manual laborers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant deprived them of overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs moved to conditionally certify a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), which the Court granted in part. The Court found that the complaint alleged that Plaintiffs and the putative collective action members frequently worked more than 40 hours a week over six or seven days per week, and Defendant paid them at an hourly rate and incorrectly treated them as exempt from the FLSA's overtime requirements. Id. at *7. The Court further considered seven declarations of Plaintiffs where they affirmed that they did not receive an overtime rate of pay for hours in excess of 40 per week. Id. at *8. Thus, the Court found that the complaint and Plaintiffs' affidavits set forth substantial allegations that the putative collective action members were together the victims of a single decision, policy, or plan of non-payment of overtime. Id. at *9. Defendant, however, disputed the merits of the named Plaintiffs' claims for non-payment of overtime and argued that they received full compensation. Id. at *10. The Court remarked that questions regarding whether overtime was paid went well beyond the scope of the conditional certification issue and into the merits of Plaintiffs' FLSA claims, and that a full evaluation of the merits was not appropriate at this stage. Id. at *11. Defendant also asserted that various Plaintiffs secured employment with falsified documentation and used false names. The Court concluded that Defendant's allegations regarding Plaintiffs' immigration status were not germane to the conditional certification issue under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. at *12. Finally, Defendant referred to an alleged insurance fraud and other purported motivations Plaintiffs had to sue them. The Court opined that these issues were not responsive to the question of conditional certification and would be reserved for the second-step of decertification after notice and discovery. Id. As to Plaintiffs' § 216(b) notice, the Court found that Plaintiffs' request for a six-month opt-in period was excessive and unwarranted, and therefore a notice with a 60-day opt-in period was appropriate. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court granted in part Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Wedel, et al. v. Vaughn Energy Services, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 138036 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 9, 2015). Plaintiff, a survey engineer, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant denied the survey engineers overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Previously, the Magistrate Judge recommended granting Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification. On Defendant's Rule 72 objections, the Court adopted the Magistrate Judge's recommendation. The Court noted that under Lusardi v. Xerox, Corp., 118 F.R.D. 351 (D.N.J. 1987), a Plaintiff seeking conditional certification must present a minimal showing that: (i) there is a reasonable basis for crediting assertions that aggrieved individuals exist; (ii) that those aggrieved individuals were similarly-situated to Plaintiff in relevant respects given the claims and defenses asserted; and (iii) that those individuals want to opt-in to the lawsuit. Id. at *3. Defendant challenged the third factor, objecting to the Magistrate Judge's accounting of those wishing to join the lawsuit because it included individuals who opted-in between Defendant's response to the pending motion to certify and the recommendation. Id. Defendant, however, conceded that at the time of its response, two or three individuals had been named as putative opt-in Plaintiffs. The Court found that the addition of the two individuals satisfied the third Lusardi factor, and overruled Defendant's objections. Id. at *3-4. The Court similarly found that the evidence before it, including three sworn declarations and the payroll records, was sufficient to show that potential collective action members were together the victims of a single decision, policy, or plan. Id. at *4-5. Accordingly, the Court adopted the Magistrate Judge's recommendation and certified the collective action.

(vi) Sixth Circuit

Garcia, et al. v. Sar Food Of Ohio, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111677 (N.D. Ohio. Aug. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of hourly restaurant workers, brought an action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt from the overtime requirements of the FLSA and applicable state labor laws. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant frequently required workers to continue working beyond the scheduled shifts and that the additional hours usually amounted to several hours each week without pay. Following conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) and discovery, Defendant moved for decertification. Defendant argued that the named Plaintiff Garcia never filed the requisite consent forms under § 216(b) and the individual Plaintiffs' circumstances were highly disparate, precluding resolution of the allegations as a collective action. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs maintained that the named Plaintiffs and opt-in Plaintiffs were similarly-situated because the company used a "unified" work hour reporting approach that violated the FLSA. Id. at *4. The Court granted Defendant's motion, finding that although the named Plaintiff Garcia had viable claims as he filed his § 216(b) consent form within the limitations period, he failed to show that he was similarly-situated to the opt-in Plaintiffs. Plaintiff identified no single FLSA-violating policy that unified the claims of the collective action members. Id. at *7. The records indicated that each store presented a separate factual setting with different managers across locations presenting unique legal and factual questions as to whether the store stayed open late. Id. Plaintiff argued that a common practice could be found in the lack of alteration to the timesheets when testimony indicated that stores sometimes stayed open 10 to 30 minutes after closing. The Court, however, found that the discrepancy might be the basis for individual FLSA claims, but the lack of alterations alone did not demonstrate a "single-FLSA-violating policy." Id. at *8. The Court determined that none of the opt-in Plaintiffs presented any evidence that demonstrated a cohesive or unified theory of the alleged FLSA violation. Id. at *10. The Court, therefore, concluded that the alleged violations could not be litigated as a collective action, and granted Defendant's motion for decertification.

Hughes, et al. v. Gulf Interstate Field Services, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88205 (S.D. Ohio. July 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of field service workers ("FSW"), brought an action under the FLSA and the Ohio Minimum Fair Wage Standards Act ("OMFWSA"), seeking to recover unpaid wages and other damages Defendant allegedly owed to workers under the day rate payment system. Both named Plaintiffs worked on the MarkWest Ohio Project, and under the day rate payment system they received a flat fee for each day worked with no overtime compensation. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a nationwide collective action comprising of all FSW who received pay under the day rate payment system. Plaintiffs also moved for Rule 23 certification of a class comprising all FSWs in Ohio. The Court granted the motions in part. FSWs included the job titles of Chief Inspector, Assistant Chief Inspector, Coating Inspector, Welding Inspector, Sr. Welding Inspector, General/Utility Inspector, Tie-In Inspector, Safety Inspector, Environmental Inspector, Sr. Electrical Inspector, Electrical /Instrument Inspector, Lead Pipe Mill Inspector, Office Manager, Office Clerk, and Office Administration. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs provided affidavits and formal letters on Defendant's letterhead, describing the terms and conditions of the affiants' employment ("offer letters"). The Court noted that rather than a nationwide class of FSWs, Plaintiffs made a modest showing that they and other Inspectors or equivalent positions on the MarkWest Ohio Project performed similar job duties and were subject to similar pay practices. The affidavits and offer letters stated that the Inspectors tested and observed the pipeline construction, welding, and coating processes to ensure compliance with MarkWest specifications, and that Defendant subjected them to similar pay practices. Id. at *9-10. Plaintiffs, however, failed to submit any sufficient evidence to support a class outside of the MarkWest Ohio Project, and the Court remarked that generalized statements in the affidavits that Defendant paid all other pipeline inspectors on a day rate basis was not specifically directed at projects outside of the MarkWest Ohio Project. Accordingly, the Court limited the collective action to FSWs on the MarkWest Ohio Project. Further, Defendant argued that four separate exemptions from the OMFWSA overtime compensation provisions applied to the proposed class members, including: (i) administrative; (ii) executive; (iii) combination; and (iv) highly compensated. Id. at *15-16. The Court reasoned that the applicability of each of these exemptions involve fact-specific inquiries regarding an employee's specific job duties, the independent judgment exercised in the performance of said duties, the percentage of time devoted to each duty, and the supervisory capacity, if any, of each employee. Id. at *18. Although the affidavits Plaintiffs provided answered some of these questions regarding the individual affiants, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy their burden of demonstrating that all individuals in the proposed class would have common answers, such that a determination of whether these exemptions apply was capable of class-wide resolution. Id. Additionally, the Court opined that Plaintiffs failed to affirmatively demonstrate that commonality existed between a nationwide class of FSWs paid on day rate basis. Even with respect to the narrower collective action the Court certified under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), the Court held that Plaintiffs did not demonstrate commonality. The affidavits only pertained to pipeline and welding inspectors, leaving out all other types of inspectors on the MarkWest Ohio Project, and Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that the answers to these duties questions applied equally across identical job titles and were not individualized per employee. Accordingly, the Court denied Rule 23 class certification.

Plaintiffs, a group of door-to-door workers who solicited residential customers for Defendant's energy services, brought an action alleging that Defendant's commission-based compensation system deprived them of minimum wages and overtime pay in violation of the FLSA and the Ohio Minimum Fair Wage Standards Act. The Court previously had certified a nationwide FLSA collective action for minimum wage and overtime claims, and a state-wide Rule 23 class action for overtime claims under Ohio law. Id. at *3. The Court then bifurcated the proceedings into a liability phase and a damages phase. During the liability phase, the jury found that Defendant had not proved Plaintiffs were exempt outside salespeople, and Defendant were therefore liable for unpaid wages and overtime. Id. at *4. Defendant subsequently moved to decertify the FLSA collective action and the Rule 23 class for the damages phase of the case, arguing that the individualized evidence necessary to establish what damages were owed to each Plaintiff made continuing class treatment inappropriate. The Court denied the motion without prejudice. First, the Court remarked that damages were difficult to determine because Defendant failed to keep adequate records of the hours that employees had worked. The Court, however, noted that Defendant did have records of how much each Plaintiff was paid. Both parties agreed that, if hours worked could be determined, then a mathematical formula could be used to determine damages based on each employee's hours worked and wages earned. Id. at *7. Regarding the Rule 23 class, the Court noted that because Plaintiffs' claims all proceeded under the same damages theory, Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, 133 S. Ct. 1426 (2013), did not require that class to be decertified. Id. Furthermore, although the damages would be unique for each class member, the Court found that they would all be determined by applying a consistent methodology. The Court ruled that this was a predominating common issue that allowed for continued class treatment under Rule 23. Id. Moreover, the Court remarked that with proper management, class treatment was likely to be less burdensome to the parties than handling a large number of individual cases because of the small dollar values at stake for each Plaintiff. Id. at *7-8. Alternatively, the Court suggested that in this case a claims process could be used where each Plaintiff, through submission of a standardized form, could assert how many hours he or she worked and thereby significantly streamline discovery and facilitate settlements. Id. at *9. The Court held that because the standard for substantial similarity is less stringent than the Rule 23 predominance standard, the FLSA collective action also should be continued. Id. at *10. The Court remarked that the identical theory and formula that would cover all Plaintiffs' damages claims made them similarly-situated, even though they worked different hours. Id. The Court observed that if Plaintiffs presented evidence about how many hours they worked, the jury could infer that non-testifying employees worked a similar number of hours and award back pay to the entire membership of the collective action. Id. at *10-11. The Court pointed out, however, that if Plaintiffs intended to proceed using that type of proof, then sub-classes for each office and further sub-classes for workers within each office may be appropriate and Plaintiffs would need to offer representative testimony from each of those sub-classes to establish damages. Id. at *11. Finally, the Court determined that if the Rule 23 class was to proceed using proof-of-claim forms, it may be simpler and more efficient for the FLSA collective action to use a similar process that would make full-blown damages trials using representative testimony unnecessary. Id. The Court concluded, however, that until the final structure of the damages phase was determined, it would be premature to make a final decision on that issue. Id. at *11-12. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for decertification without prejudice.

Kutzback, et al. v. LMS Intellibound, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 37946 (W.D. Tenn. Mar. 25, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative FLSA collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay their uploaders overtime wages and minimum wages. Plaintiff sought to conditionally certify a collective action of all uploaders employed by Defendant during the past three years in 239 or more locations on a nationwide basis. Id. at *2. The Magistrate Judge determined that because Defendant had similarly compensated Plaintiff and other potential opt-in employees, and that all had allegedly worked while off-the-clock without compensation, Plaintiff met the lenient standard for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. at *6. Defendant raised three primary objections to the Magistrate Judge's Report and Recommendation, which the Court overruled on Defendant's Rule 72 obligations. First, Defendant objected to the Magistrate Judge's finding that Plaintiff's showing of a common plan or policy that violated the FLSA was sufficient to obtain conditional certification. Id. at *7. The Court found that the Magistrate Judge properly adhered to the standard adopted by the Sixth Circuit because she concluded that all unloaders performed the same or similar jobs and received compensation by a production-based method that was possibly in violation of the FLSA. Id. Second, Defendant objected to the Magistrate Judge's finding that Plaintiff was similarly-situated to the other unloaders employed by Defendant in its various locations across the nation. Id. at *11. In particular, Defendant argued that the Magistrate Judge failed to find the existence of other potential collective action members who similarly worked off-the-clock without pay. Id. The Court determined that the objection was unpersuasive because not only did the Magistrate Judge determine that Defendant subjected Plaintiff and the proposed opt-in Plaintiffs to a common policy or plan that violated FLSA, she also stated that any factual differences or particularities regarding their workplace environments were prematurely raised during the discovery phase of the case. Id. at *11-12. The Court pointed out that during the notice stage, a Plaintiff merely needs to demonstrate that his position is similar, not identical to positions held by the putative class members. Id. at *12. Finally, Defendant objected to the Magistrate Judge's recommendation that the Court facilitate notice to all potential opt-in Plaintiffs employed by Defendant nationwide during the past three years. Id. at *12-13. Defendant contended that conditional certification would be overly broad and unmanageable and proposed that should the Court grant conditional certification, the collective action should be limited to the five work locations about which Plaintiff and the opt-ins had personal knowledge. Id. at *13. The Court observed that Plaintiff had narrowly tailored their collective action to unloaders within the past three years who had received compensation based on production, and excluded all other warehouse workers. The Court thus concluded that the collective action was not overly broad and unmanageable. Accordingly, the Court overruled Defendant's objections, and adopted the Magistrate Judge's Report and Recommendation to conditionally certify a collective action of other unloaders who had worked for Defendant in any of its 262 nationwide locations anytime during the preceding three year period. Id. at *15-16.

Perry, et al. v. Randstad General Partner (US) LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 61822 (E.D. Mich. May 12, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a collective action alleging that Defendant, a staffing services company, misclassified them as exempt from the overtime requirements of the FLSA. Plaintiffs worked for Defendant at its branch in Troy, Michigan. They worked in various office and administrative positions as account managers, assistant branch managers, and staffing consultants. Their base pay ranged from $32,000 to $48,125, and they were also eligible for commissions and bonuses. Defendant classified all of the Plaintiffs, except one, named Plaintiff Choudhury, as exempt. Choudhury alleged that no one ever informed her that she was non-exempt or permitted her to claim overtime pay. Id. at *2. Id. Defendant's work planning index ("WPI") measured an employee's productivity, and assigned a certain point value to various tasks. Plaintiffs claimed Defendant required them to complete certain tasks to add up to 100 points each week, and that was impossible to do so in 40 hours per week. Id. at *4-5. While Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), Defendant moved for summary judgment on the grounds that Plaintiffs were covered by the administrative exemption to the FLSA's overtime requirements. The issue in Defendant's motion was whether Plaintiffs exercised discretion and independent judgment with respect to matters of significance. Id. at *6. In classifying Plaintiffs as exempt, Defendant contended that it relied upon an opinion letter of the Department of Labor ("DOL") dated October 25, 2005, in which the DOL determined that staffing managers at a temporary staffing agency qualified for the exemption. Further, various case law precedents have found recruiters for staffing agencies, who performed duties similar to those performed by Plaintiffs, to qualify for the administrative exemption. Id. at *6-8. Plaintiffs, in turn, argued that they did not qualify because Defendant's WPI micromanaged and constrained their work. Id. at *9. The Court, however, pointed out that WPI was a spreadsheet – a method for tracking the completion of tasks – but it did not determine how the employee completed those tasks. Id. The Court observed that Plaintiffs performed inherently discretionary tasks, such as finding the candidates who were the best fit for the client and resolving issues when candidates did not perform as expected. Further, Plaintiffs had the authority to assess candidates and to decide whether to present certain candidates to clients, built relationships with clients, resolved issues between clients and candidates, and coached candidates about meeting the client's expectations. Id. at *9-10. In addition, the Court observed that Plaintiffs did not persuasively distinguish either the DOL opinion letter or the relevant case law regarding recruiters/staffing agencies. Id. at *10. Thus, the Court held that Plaintiffs who worked as account managers, assistant branch managers, and staffing consultants qualified for the administrative exemption. Alternatively, the Court found that even if those positions did not qualify for the administrative exemption, Defendant was entitled to the application of the good faith defense available under the Portal-to-Portal Act because Plaintiffs' duties were sufficiently similar to those described in the DOL letter, so as to make Defendant's reliance on it reasonable. Id. at *10-11. The Court found, however, that Choudhury's claim was different because she did not perform her duties with the same level of discretion and independent judgment as the exempt Plaintiffs; and Defendant itself classified her as non-exempt. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court concluded that while summary jugement was not appropriate as to Choudhury's claim, it granted summary judgment against all other three Plaintiffs. As to Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), the Court found that even under the relatively lenient standard, Plaintiffs had not demonstrated that conditional certification was appropriate as to the claim brought by Choudhury because they had not alleged facts suggesting that there were any other employees similarly-situated to her or that Defendant had a policy or practice of denying non-exempt employees overtime. Id. at *14-15. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Russell, et al. v. Citigroup, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171205 (E.D. Ky. Dec. 22, 2015). Plaintiff, a telephone representative, brought a class action alleging that Defendant, a global enterprise furnishing financial services and products, failed to compensate its phone representatives for their off-the-clock work. Id. at *2. Defendant initially paid phone representatives based on their timesheets submitted at the end of each week, and later introduced programs called "ePay" and "Time and Attendance Tracker" for time tracking, which operated in conjunction with an internet-based system called the "North American Time and Attendance" ("NATA") program. Id. at *4. Defendant gave phone representatives approximately ten minutes at the beginning of their scheduled shifts to become "call-ready," and managers retained discretion to cancel this time, known as "closed-key" time, if there was a particularly high call volume. Id. at *6-7. A few months later, Defendant implemented a remediation program and implemented the "Collections Time Tracking System," which tracked when a phone representative hit "control/alt/delete on their computer keyboard and fed that time stamp into NATA." Id. at *8. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant unjustly enriched itself by requiring its phone representatives to clock-in at the precise time that their scheduled shifts began, even though they performed several work-related tasks to become "call-ready," including starting their computers, opening applications, and reading bulletins. Alleging that Defendant failed to compensate them for their off-the-clock work, Plaintiff moved for certification of class of phone representatives who worked at its Florence and/or Louisville, Kentucky call centers at any time between July 2007 and April 2010. The Court denied class certification. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's policy and practice of requiring phone representatives to perform uncompensated work was susceptible to class-wide proof as Defendant imposed similar time-keeping practices, pay scales, and remediation schemes on all phone representatives. Id. at *18. The Court, however, found that a determination that Defendant had such a policy would not resolve issues central to the validity of each putative class member's unjust enrichment claim. The Court noted that Plaintiff's allegation depended upon an unofficial, unwritten policy, and would be subject to varying levels of enforcement depending upon the managers in charge of each group at each location. Id. at *18-19. Moreover, even if Plaintiff established that the policy applied on a class-wide basis, the Court noted that it would still have to look at the individual circumstances of each class member and determine whether he or she actually conferred a benefit on Defendant, whether Defendant appreciated that benefit, and whether it would be inequitable to retain such benefit without payment for its value. Id. at *19. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiff failed to satisfy commonality. Because the Court would have to take into account each phone representative's subjective understanding of how he or she would be compensated, and individualized circumstances of each phone representative would delineate the equities in this action, the Court also concluded that Plaintiff's claim was not typical of the putative class. Id. at *22-23. In light of the absence of any common interests between Plaintiff and the unnamed members of the class and given the equitable nature of the claim, the Court doubted whether any representative would be able to fully and adequately represent the interests of the putative class. Id. at *24. Thus, finding considerable difficulties in managing this case as a class action, the Court concluded that class certification would be inappropriate. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Waggoner, et al. v. U.S. Bancorp,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 81918 (N.D. Ohio June 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant denied them wages and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs claimed that they were employed in Defendant's various branches as co-managers, and Defendant misclassified the co-manager position as exempt for purposes of the FLSA and statutory provisions, notwithstanding the fact that the primary duties they performed were limited to non-exempt functions involving customer service, sales, and operations. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of the collective action, which the Court granted. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs offered declarations of two named Plaintiffs and three potential opt-in Plaintiffs stating that they regularly worked more than 40 hours a week, performed non-exempt duties, and were never paid overtime compensation. Id. at *13. Plaintiffs maintained that this evidence more than satisfied the modest burden required at the preliminary stage of the proceedings. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' evidence demonstrated that co-managers regularly performed managerial job duties, such that those employed in the co-manager position would qualify as exempt from overtime wages under the executive exemption to the FLSA. Id. at *19. The Court remarked that it would be inappropriate to consider the merits of Defendant's defense at this early stage, before the record had been fully developed. Id. The Court similarly refused to consider Defendant's evidence of co-managers' varying duties to show that the job duties significantly differed from branch to branch and co-manager to co-manager. Id. at *21. Regarding conditional certification, the Court noted that Plaintiffs had met their initial lenient burden under the FLSA. The Court, however, remarked that it had serious concerns that this litigation could be maintained as a collective action. The Court explained that the declarations of the potential opt-in Plaintiffs contained only generalized statements about the job duties of other in-store co-managers, and that Plaintiffs failed to indicate how they knew that all in-store managers were subject to the same compensation system. Id. at *22-23. The Court, nevertheless, found that the declarations, along with the job postings, supported a preliminary finding of a company-wide policy, and that Plaintiffs established that they and the potential opt-ins were similarly-situated. Id. at *30. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification, and directed the parties to meet and confer regarding the content of the notice to be issued pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

(vii) Seventh Circuit

Aguilera, et al. v. Waukesha Memorial Hospital, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 79143 (E.D. Wis. June 18, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of certified nursing assistants and housekeepers, brought an action under the FLSA and Wisconsin's Wage & Hour Law alleging that Defendant failed to pay them for time they spent working during meal periods. Plaintiffs' claim related to their use of communication devices, which they carried all times, including during meal periods. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant frequently interrupted them by calls on these devices during their meal periods and they often skipped their meal periods to perform work in response to those calls, and thus they were entitled to have their meal periods treated as compensable time. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs moved for class certification, seeking to represent a class of all housekeepers who worked for Defendant at any time since November 2011 and did not receive pay for meal periods during which they carried, monitored, and/or answered a hospital-based communication device. The Court denied certification of the proposed class, finding that Plaintiffs failed to meet the commonality requirement. The Court noted that Defendant did not adopt any hospital-wide policies that resulted in proposed class members using their communication devices in the same manner such that a jury could simply assess whether the policy resulted in all class members performing work during meal periods. Id. at *12. Particularly, the Court found that the question of whether Plaintiffs carrying, monitoring, or answering communication devices during unpaid meal periods constituted work could not be answered for the entire class in one stroke because the phrase "carrying, monitoring, or answering communication devices" described a wide spectrum of activities, some of which might be work and some of which might not. Id. at *11. The Court explained that on one end of the spectrum, an employee simply carried the device during the meal period but received no calls or ignored any calls he or she received; at the other end of the spectrum, an employee monitored the devices, the calls constantly interrupted his or her meal period, and he or she frequently had to leave meal period to perform a task. Id. at *11-12. This also included employees whose experiences included things like receiving a call but forwarding it to another employee who was on-duty, responding by doing no more than informing the caller that the employee was on break, or answering a work-related question. Id. Similarly, Defendant did not have a written policy regarding Plaintiffs leaving hospital premises during their meal periods. Id. at *18. The evidence showed that supervisors had different practices with respect to contacting a housekeeper during a meal period, the extent and frequency of the interruptions, and their option of leaving their devices at the hospital if they wanted to leave for lunch. Id. at *14-20. The Court therefore concluded that there was no single answer to the question of whether Plaintiffs carrying, monitoring, or answering communication devices during unpaid meal periods constituted work and whether Plaintiffs were free to leave the premises during their meal periods. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Bell, et al. v. PNC Bank, National Association,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 15403 (7th Cir. Aug. 31, 2015). Plaintiff, a banker, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay her overtime wages in violation of the FLSA, the Illinois Minimum Wage Law, and the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection. Id. at *1. Although Defendant contended that its written overtime policy explicitly required payment of time and a half for any hours worked over 40 hours in any workweek, and that it had paid overtime at every branch, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant had an unofficial policy or practice that required employees to work off-the-clock without compensation. Id. at *19-21. The District Court concluded that whether Defendant had an unofficial policy that required employees to work off-the-clock overtime hours was a common question and certified a class of employees from 26 branches in Illinois as to Plaintiff's state law claims. Id. at *23-24. Defendant appealed. Defendant argued that the District Court abused its discretion in certifying the class without requiring Plaintiff to prove the existence of an unwritten policy and by treating individualized liability issues as damages issues. Id. at *24. Addressing each of Defendant's arguments, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court. The Seventh Circuit found that the question of whether Defendant had an unofficial policy or practice that required employees class-wide to work off-the-clock overtime hours was indeed a common one capable of class-wide resolution. Id. at *31-33. Plaintiff alleged that she was told not to record overtime and offered evidence that the denial of overtime pay came from a broader company policy and not from the discretionary decisions of individual managers. Id. at *31. Further, the District Court had chronicled plentiful evidence suggesting that many employees worked overtime without proper compensation, including an affidavit from Plaintiff's branch manager stating that Defendant regularly required off-the-clock work. Id. Moreover, Defendant's investigation reports revealed that employees from at least six other branches had complained that their managers told them that Defendant had an unofficial policy against compensative overtime work. Id. at *37. The Seventh Circuit, therefore, ruled that Plaintiff sufficiently raised a common question as to whether Defendant had an unwritten practice or policy that required employees class-wide to work off-the-clock overtime hours. Defendant argued that even if it had an alleged unwritten policy, each class member still would be required to prove each element of his or her claim, i.e., that the class member worked unrecorded hours, that his or her manager knew or had reason to know of the work, and that the unrecorded time caused the class members to work more than 40 hours in a week. Id. at *38. The Seventh Circuit, however, noted that Plaintiff did not need to prove that every class member had been harmed before she could obtain class certification and that Rule 23 did not require a Plaintiff seeking class certification to prove each element of her claim through class-wide proof. Id. at *43-45. The Seventh Circuit reasoned that whether or not Defendant had an unlawful policy denying required compensation was relevant to whether Defendant willfully denied overtime pay to its employees or whether such denials occurred despite a good faith attempt to comply with the statutes, these questions were, in turn, relevant to the extent of damages under Illinois law and the FLSA. Id. at *46. Thus, the Seventh Circuit concluded that the District Court correctly concluded that a class action would be an appropriate and efficient pathway to resolution. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's order granting Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Brunner, et al. v. Jimmy John's, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 46018 (N.D. Ill. April 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought an action under the FLSA and the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL") alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt and thus denied them overtime compensation. Plaintiffs sought to represent all individuals who were employed nationwide as salaried assistant store managers at any of Defendant's shops and to whom Defendant did not pay all wages pursuant to the IMWL. Id. at *19. Defendant moved to strike the class claims, contending that Plaintiffs' class claims sought to impose the IMWL on a nationwide class of Plaintiffs. Id. at *18. The Court granted Defendant's motion, finding that Plaintiffs could not maintain their IMWL nationwide class claim against Defendant as it was facially and inherently deficient. Id. at *21. The Court noted that "the IMWL is absolutely devoid of any indication that the law can or should be applied to workers outside of Illinois." Id. Thus, in the absence of explicit legislative intent indicating the permissibility of the IMWL to apply to out-of-state employees, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' claim under IMWL for a putative nationwide class could not stand. Id. Defendant also moved to dismiss on the basis that Plaintiffs performed work which fell under the executive and administrative exceptions to the FLSA. The Court denied the motion, since it could not make the necessary factual inquiry into Plaintiffs' job responsibilities at this juncture, as the action was merely in the pleading stage of the proceedings. Id. at *28. Although Plaintiffs satisfied the initial administrative exemption inquiry involving their weekly compensation exceeding $455 per week, the Court noted that the manual duties which Plaintiffs enumerated to perform over 90% of their workday, including making sandwiches, stocking supplies and shelves, and cleaning, did not amount to the job duties typically performed by administrative or executive employees. Id. at *27-28. The Court, therefore, held that Defendant failed to establish that Plaintiffs fell under the executive or administrative employees exemptions to the FLSA. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to strike the class allegations, and denied to dismiss Plaintiffs' FLSA claims.

Brunner, et al. v. Jimmy John's, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110751 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 19, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of assistant store managers ("ASMs"), brought an action alleging that Defendant, a franchisor, violated the FLSA and the Illinois Minimum Wage Act by improperly classifying them as exempt employees to avoid paying them for time worked in excess of 40 hours a week. Plaintiffs brought claims individually and on behalf of a putative nationwide class. Plaintiffs filed a consolidated amended complaint seeking to hold Defendant, as a franchisor, liable for the FLSA violations of thousands of independently operated franchises on the premise that Defendant was a joint employer. Plaintiffs also sought to join the franchisees through a "Rule 23 Defendant Class" mechanism. Id. at *5. Defendant moved to strike the class allegations, which the Court granted in part and denied in part. The Court granted Defendant's motion to strike the class allegations regarding Plaintiffs' newly alleged nationwide "FLSA Franchisee Defendant Class," finding that the FLSA does not permit Defendant classes. Id. at *8-9. Although none of the named Plaintiffs claimed to have worked for any unnamed putative Defendant and some named Plaintiffs admittedly did not work for Defendant, Plaintiffs based their certification theory on the "juridical link" doctrine outlined in Payton v. County of Kane, 308 F.3d 673 (7th Cir. 2002), which provides that "[w]here the particular class representative has not been injured by the entire class of Defendants, the standing to sue all named Defendants is established under the 'juridical link' doctrine." Id. at *12. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant uniformly exercised control over all aspects of all company-owned and franchised locations, created, mandated, and implemented uniform policies at its company-owned and franchised shops, and that franchisees followed the explicit, precise, and detailed instructions and mandates, policies, and practices issued by Defendant. Id. at *14-15. Plaintiffs attempted to demonstrate a uniform failure to abide by the FLSA by misclassifying ASMs as exempt and thereby justify application of the "juridical link" doctrine. Id. at *15. The Court, however, noted that the statute expressly provides for a collective action of employee Plaintiffs, but not for Defendant employers. Id. at *9. According to the Court, Plaintiffs' allegations showed that the extreme and unwieldy measure of a bilateral class action involving an Illinois or nationwide "Franchisee Defendant Class" under the "juridical link" doctrine was unnecessary because relief might be obtained in a suit against Defendant alone, just as Plaintiffs had sought in their last three complaints. Id. The Court thus found that the case lacked justification for the application of the "juridical link" doctrine based on a "state or local statute" requiring "common action" by all Defendants or the need for one "broad action" against all putative Defendants. Id. at *16. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs' allegations of a nationwide FLSA Franchisee Defendant Class and an Illinois-only IMWL Franchisee Defendant Class failed for lack of standing and were inherently deficient. Id. The Court, however, denied the motion to strike Plaintiffs' newly alleged claims of an Illinois IMWL Plaintiff class, finding that the striking of class allegations at the pleading stage would be premature. Id. at *7-8. The Court held that Plaintiffs' new allegations fell into the category of a claim requiring discovery, and that it could not strike the new allegations merely because Plaintiffs' prior allegations fell short. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion to strike Plaintiffs' class allegations.

Editor's Note: It is believed that the ruling in Brunner is the first decision ever to address the propriety of a "Defendant only" FLSA collective action.

Brunner, et al. v. Jimmy John's, LLC,* Case No. 14-CV-5509 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 11, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of Assistant Store Managers ("ASMs") brought an action alleging that Defendants misclassified them as exempt and denied them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs advanced a case theory that Defendants, as franchisors, nonetheless were liable for wage & hour violations of their franchisees, since Defendants allegedly were joint employers of Plaintiffs and members of the putative collective action (i.e., all ASMs employed by all franchisees nationwide). Asserting that Defendants subjected them to the same company-wide policies and thus they were similarly-situated, Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. at 3. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. The Court found that Plaintiffs' declarations contained information supporting their request for conditional certification that was plainly based on the declarants' direct experiences or observations. Id. at 4. Contrary to Defendants' characterizations of Plaintiffs' declarations as conclusory and speculative, the Court noted that most of the declarations reflected first-hand experience of being paid on a salary basis and regularly working overtime without compensation. Id. at 6-7. The declarations also alleged similar job duties and similar limits on their authority. The Court found that the declarations supported a preliminary finding that Plaintiffs were similarly-situated to each other and to the members of the putative collective action. Id. at 8. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to show that any such similarity was the result of a common unlawful policy. According to Defendants, the evidence showed that each franchisee individually made decisions concerning the roles and responsibilities of ASMs, and thus no common unlawful policy could bind all collective action members together. Id. The Court, however, reasoned that instructions to ASMs during their corporate training suggested a common plan, and the documents indicated some common design surpassing the mere coincidental. Id. at 9. Thus, although Defendants presented contrary evidence regarding the merits of Plaintiffs' FLSA claims, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs nevertheless met the modest factual showing required for conditional certification. Id. at 10-11. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification and directed the parties to meet and confer to finalize the proposed notice to be sent to putative collective action members.

Cook, et al. v. Applebees Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 130159 (S.D. Ill. Sept. 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of hourly employees, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to inform tipped employees of the tip credit provisions in violation of the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL") and the FLSA. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendant maintained a vacation policy that denied hourly employees vacation benefits in violation of the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection Act ("IWPCA"). Plaintiffs moved to certify the class claims under the IMWL and IWPCA, and the Court granted the motion. At the outset, based on Defendant's answers to interrogatories stating that they employed over 5,000 hourly employees, the Court found that the numerosity requirement was satisfied. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs contended that the two common questions were: (i) whether the vacation policy was a "length-of-service" policy under the Illinois law; and (ii) whether separating employees forfeited earned vacation pay as a result of the policy. Id. at *3-4. The Court agreed with Defendant that to answer the second question, it would need to determine whether each individual class member earned vacation. Id. at *4. The Court, however, concluded that the questions regarding the legality of the application of the policy and whether benefits were earned were common to all proposed class members. Id. The Court similarly found that the claims or defenses of the representative parties were typical of the claims or defenses of the class members. Id. at *5. Likewise, the Court determined that Plaintiffs were adequate representatives of the putative class members, and concluded the adequacy of representation requirement was satisfied. Id. at *6. Finding that the Plaintiffs satisfied the predominance requirement, and that deciding whether Defendant's vacation policy violated the IWPCA was a superior mode of adjudication, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Drake, et al. v. Aerotek, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 146653 (W.D. Wis. Oct. 29, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action under Wisconsin Labor Law seeking to recover overtime pay for the work performed as recruiter trainee and subsequently a recruiter for Defendant, an international staffing company. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant violated Wisconsin law by not paying trainees for overtime they worked for the weeks between March 2012 and March 2014, and classifying recruiters as exempt from overtime compensation. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification and proposed two sub-classes, including: (i) individuals who worked for Defendant in Wisconsin during a training period who engaged in the tasks and activities of a recruiter trainee without receiving proper compensation; and (ii) individuals who completed the training period and worked for Defendant as recruiters and whom Defendant classified as "exempt" under state law. Id. at *21. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification. The Court found that, given the absence of proof of a company-wide policy or directive and the wide variation in the class members' experiences, the common questions central to Plaintiff's trainee overtime claim could not be resolved on a class-wide basis. Although Plaintiff contended that Defendant had a uniform set of national polices that applied to every office in Wisconsin that prohibited trainees from working overtime, but at the same time required them to work more than 48 hours a week, Plaintiff failed to answer why Plaintiff and other trainees chose to work overtime without reporting it. Id. at *25-26. The Court noted that the declarations and other trainee statements submitted by Plaintiff varied significantly with respect to the instructions they received and their understanding of how Defendant compensated for overtime. Id. at *26. Defendant paid overtime to some employees, and therefore the Court concluded that it appeared that the decision to pay overtime was left to the discretion of management and varied depending on the circumstances. Id. at *27. The Court determined that Plaintiff failed to show that his trainee claim met the commonality, typicality, and predominance requirements of Rule 23. Id. at *31. The Court also ruled that Plaintiff failed to show that his recruiter claim was appropriate for class certification. Although Plaintiff argued that common issues predominated for the misclassification claim because Defendant had a uniform, corporate policy of classifying recruiters as exempt from overtime pay under the administrative exemption, the key question was whether the potential class members' experiences were so similar that the Court could apply the exemption criteria on a class-wide basis. Id. at *32-33. Defendant contended that the job duties, level of discretion, and need for supervision of its recruiters varied by office, division, and individual, and that these differences would prevent class-wide application of the administrative exemption criteria. Id. at *33. Plaintiff asserted that the differences in the amount of discretion and independence exercised by recruiters were irrelevant because regardless of a recruiter's job title, supervisor, or location, every recruiter had the primary duty of securing quality candidates for Defendant's clients. Id. Although some of Plaintiff's evidence suggested that some trainees and recruiters had the same primary job function, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to established that all 13 types of recruiters across Defendant's Wisconsin offices had the same primary duty. Id. at *35-36. The Court also noted that none of the evidence cited by either party explained how much time recruiters spent on administrative tasks. Id. at *36. The Court, therefore, concluded that Plaintiff has not met his burden of showing that class certification was appropriate. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Elder, et al. v. Comcast Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 70231 (N.D. Ill. June 1, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former service technicians, brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them for all the time they were required to work in violation of the FLSA, the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"), and the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection Act ("IWCPA"). Defendants' service technicians installed and repaired Defendants' products, including cable television and high-speed internet. Id. at *3. Defendants launched a home dispatching program, which required the technicians to drive Defendants' vehicles directly from their home to work assignments and back. Technicians were paid for the time of their commute to their first job assignment. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs contended that Defendants' policies required them to stay at work to log-in to Defendants' dispatching application, called Technect. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs also contended that notwithstanding Defendants' policies regarding start, end, and lunch times, technicians also performed a significant amount of work before they started their shifts, during their lunch breaks, and after their shifts were supposed to be over, but were not compensated for their off-the-clock work. Id. at *7. After the Court conditionally certified the FLSA claims as a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), Plaintiffs moved for Rule 23 certification of their state law claims, and Defendants moved for decertification. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion and decertified the action. At the outset, the Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied the numerosity requirement with regard to the meal break class, as they estimated the class to consist of 3,000 technicians, but failed to provide any estimate of the number of technicians with regard to the pre-shift and post-shift classes. Id. at *19. The Court remarked that it was difficult to ascertain what Plaintiffs believed were questions of law or fact that were common to the class. The Court explained that Plaintiffs first identified common questions such as: (i) whether Plaintiff began work before the start of the scheduled shift without pay; or (ii) did Defendants have a policy or practice to automatically deduct 30 minutes of pay each day. Id. at *20-21. Plaintiffs later identified common legal issues such as documented time spent logging-in to Defendants' routing applications, and time spent working through unpaid and unrecorded meal breaks. Id. at *21. Plaintiffs also characterized their common injuries such as whether Defendants failed in their duty to make and maintain true and accurate time records, and whether Plaintiffs and the class worked before the start of their shifts. Id. at *22. The Court reasoned that the overarching issue with all of Plaintiffs' common questions was their inability to produce common answers apt to drive the resolution of the litigation. Id. at *23. Because the answer for one technician did not necessarily shed light on the answer for the other, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the commonality requirement. Id. Similarly, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to establish common policies mandating off-the-clock work, or that there could generate common answers to determine whether Plaintiffs actually performed any pre-shift or post-shift work. Id. at *25-26. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to meet the commonality requirement, denied class certification, and granted Defendants' motion for decertification.

Garcia, et al. v. J.C. Penny Corp., Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40898 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiffs, for themselves and on behalf of current and former management associates and former part-time non-management associates based in Illinois, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant did not pay them vacation benefits earned pursuant to Defendant's "my time off" vacation policy (the "MTO vacation policy") in violation of the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection Act ("IWPCA"). Id. at *1-2. Initially, Plaintiffs in Tschudy v. J.C. Penney, Case No. 11-CV-1011 (S.D. Cal.) brought an action on behalf of current and former employees of Defendant in California and Illinois. Id. at *2-3. The Court in Tschudy carved off the Illinois portion of that case and transferred it to the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois. Id. at *3. The MTO vacation policy defines "my time off" as a bank of paid time off hours that an employee earns in a month. Id. at *5-6. The amount of vacation benefits accrued by an associate depends on his or her position, length of service, and the average number of hours worked per week. Management associates, who generally work full-time, become eligible to receive MTO vacation benefits on the first day of the third month of employment subject to completion of 60 days of employment. In contrast, part-time non-management associates become eligible to receive MTO vacation benefits on the first day of the month following 12 months of employment if they averaged 25 or more hours per week during the first 48 weeks of employment. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs moved for class certification, which the Court denied without prejudice. The Court observed that the issue in this case was whether Defendant's MTO vacation policy, as applied to management associates and former part-time non-management associates, violated the IWPCA. Id. at *9. The Court found that because the current operative complaint and Plaintiffs' motion for class certification contained different proposed classes, it was impracticable to analyze all of the class certification factors at that time. Id. at *20-21. Nevertheless, the Court held that the named Plaintiffs, both of whom were part-time non-management associates, could not proceed on behalf of the putative class of approximately 38,096 part-time non-management associates and 345 management employees. Id. at *21-22. Plaintiffs alleged that their claims were typical of the claims of all other class members – both management and non-management – because the members of the putative class all challenged Defendant's uniform MTO vacation policy. Id. at *23. Plaintiffs also contended generally that the claims of management associates arose out of the same event, practice, or course of conduct that gave rise to the claims of the part-time non-management associates and were based on the same legal theory. Id. at *23-24. The Court opined that Plaintiffs' position was very broadly correct insofar as the claims of management and part-time non-management associates were based on Defendant's vacation policy, but that broad commonality was not enough to show that the named Plaintiffs' claims were typical of the claims of management associates. Id. at *24. The Court pointed out that the named Plaintiffs had no discernable motivation to litigate issues that applied exclusively to management associates, such as whether Defendant properly barred management associates from receiving vacation benefits during their first 60 days of employment. Id. at *25. Thus, the Court concluded that because Plaintiffs' claims were typical of the claims of other part-time non-management associates, but atypical of the claims of management associates, the putative class could not include management associates. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification without prejudice to renewal of the motion with an amended class definition. Id. at *25-26.

Jacks, et al. v. DirectSat USA, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28881 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of technicians, brought an action alleging violations of the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL") and the FLSA. Defendant moved to decertify the earlier certified class consisting of Defendant's technicians working in the state of Illinois anytime between June 2008 and February 2010. Id. at *2. The Court granted Defendant's motion. The Court noted that this action paralleled two other cases brought by Defendant's technicians for alleged violations of the FLSA and state wage laws entitled Farmer v. DirectSat USA, No. 08-CV-3962 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 30, 2008), and Espenscheid v. DirectSat USA, LLC, Case No. 09-CV-625 (W.D. Wis. Feb. 10, 2011). The Courts decertified both actions, finding unavoidable complications in managing the litigation. Particularly, in both these actions, the Courts found that a class trial was doomed because of variance in class members' damages. Id. at *5. Defendant compensated its technicians on a "piece-rate system," and variances resulted from different technicians performing various tasks without records of the amount of time they worked. Id. at *6. Because Plaintiffs failed to propose a feasible litigation plan, the Courts in Farmer and Espenscheid decertified these cases. The Court found that the same touchstones of variance existed in this case and required decertification. Although Plaintiffs characterized the variance in their damages as "inconsequential," they did not dispute that their damages varied in the same ways that Plaintiffs' damages varied in Espenscheid. Id. at *9. The Court, therefore, concluded that affording class treatment to Plaintiffs' entire IMWL class was "improvident." Id. at *10. Plaintiffs, as an alternative, requested for partial certification as to liability issues. Plaintiffs contended that issues related to Defendant's policies and practices were appropriate for class-wide resolution because common policies and practices caused each class member's individual damages. Id. at *11. The common issues proposed included whether: (i) Defendant defined technicians' workday as the time between when they arrived at their first job and the time they completed their last job; (ii) whether Plaintiffs were entitled to compensation for the time spent driving from home to their first customer site and driving home from their last job of the day; (iii) whether the Employee Commuter Flexibility Act rendered Plaintiffs' commuting time not compensable; and (iv) whether activities such as maintaining vehicles, receiving assignments, loading/unloading equipment, and calling customers are compensable work when not performed between the start and finish of the workday as defined by Defendant's policies. Id. at *21-22. Agreeing with Plaintiffs, the Court granted partial certification for the resolution of liability. The Court found that all the common issues related either to Defendant's policies or practices or to their legality under the IMWL, and were separate and severable from its effect upon individual class members. Id. at *23. The Court thus found that partial certification would ensure consistency in result as only one Court would have to determine the central common issues of liability. Id. The Court cited various circuit cases, including Seventh Circuit, to determine that a class action limited to determining liability on a class-wide basis, with separate hearings to determine damages of individual class members is permitted by Rule 23(c)(4), and would often be the sensible way to proceed. Id. at *12-13. Accordingly, the Court decertified the class for all purposes, and granted partial certification of the class for the resolution of liability.

Jenkins, et al. v. White Castle Management Co.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22241 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 25, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendant required employees to make personal payments to off-set drawer and safe shortages in violation of the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection Act ("IWPCA"). Although Plaintiffs acknowledged that official policy barred employees from paying for drawer and safe shortages, they contended that General Manager Sylvia Anderson held employees at the Dolton location personally accountable and required them to cover drawer and safe shortages. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs moved for certification of a class comprising all individuals employed at the Dolton, Illinois location who received less than the agreed-upon wage rate by the practice of compelled payments. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion because they failed to establish ascertainability and predominance. First, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to identify any objective criterion to ascertain class membership. Although Plaintiffs alleged that they and other employees made payments to off-set drawer and safe shortages at the conclusion of their shifts, no records of these payments existed because employees allegedly made such payments in cash. Id. at *12. Although Plaintiffs pointed to named Plaintiff Jenkins' testimony, in which he claimed that everyone at the Dolton location had to make cash payments for drawer or safe shortfalls, Jenkins recalled only a few specific instances, and the company submitted declarations from other employees affirming that they never made such payments. The Court, accordingly, determined that Jenkins' assertion provided no basis upon which to ascertain class membership. Id. at *13. Further, although Plaintiffs contended that they could identify class members by excluding those who opted-out after receiving class notice, they offered no authority to support the idea that the class could self-define itself in this manner. The Court held that using a putative class member's decision to opt-out was no proxy for class membership because the Court still would have to determine whether an individual who chose not to opt-out belonged to the class. Hence, the absence of objective proof would transform the class proceeding into a series of hearings of individuals without objective proof to support their anecdotal testimony. Id. at *16. Second, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs failed to show that the common question of law – whether Anderson's alleged practice of compelling employees to pay for drawer and safe shortages violated the IWPCA – predominated over individual questions. Id. at *17. The primary evidence Plaintiffs submitted consisted of their own testimony and declarations, which failed to show that their claim was subject to generalized proof. Although Jenkins stated that he likely made 400 payments between 2008 and 2012, at his deposition he recalled making a drawer payment only on two occasions and did not recall the amounts he paid to off-set such shortages. Id. at *19. The Court reasoned that in determining whether other employees were injured, and to what extent, every class member would have to testify regarding the date, amount, and circumstances of each alleged shortage payment. Because the Court would need extensive individual testimony to determine who sustained an injury similar to that of the named plaintiffs, Plaintiffs failed to establish predominance. Accordingly, the Court denied class certification.

Lukas, et al. v. Advocate Health Care Network,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109851 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 19, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of clinicians, brought a putative class action and collective action under the FLSA and the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL") seeking damages for Defendant's alleged failure to pay them overtime wages for work in excess of 40 hours per week. Id. at *2. Defendant classified all full-time clinicians as exempt for FLSA/IMWL purposes and compensated them based on rate sheets that set out: (i) flat fees payable for various types of visits to patients; and (ii) hourly pay for administrative tasks such as attending committee meetings, team meetings, in-service, case conferences, resolving technical problems, covering for supervisors, and working on temporary light duty. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs alleged that subjecting clinicians to a pay scheme that combined per-visit rates with hourly rates did not satisfy the requirements for designating employees exempt from overtime pay under the FLSA and IMWL. Id. at *5-6. The Court initially certified a collective action as to the FLSA claims under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Plaintiffs moved for certification of a state-wide class consisting of all individuals employed as clinicians in their home health care division who were paid on a per visit and hourly basis, and Defendant moved to decertify the FLSA collective action involving the same individuals. Id. at *6-7. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion, finding that Plaintiffs' proposed class met the Rule 23 standards for class certification. Id. at *22. First, Plaintiffs met the numerosity requirement because Defendant employed at least 286 clinicians during the relevant time, and Defendant's payroll records showed that those clinicians received hourly pay for some tasks and fee-based pay for other tasks. Id. at *10-11. Second, Plaintiffs met the typicality requirement because Plaintiffs' legal theory – that Defendant's pay scheme rendered clinicians non-exempt – applied to the claims of the named Plaintiffs and other class members in an identical fashion. The unique features of the named Plaintiffs' work, such as the large geographic area of their visits and their high patient loads, did not render the named Plaintiffs' claims atypical for purpose of Rule 23. Id. at *11-12. Third, Plaintiffs met the adequacy requirement because the named Plaintiffs actively participated in the case, and their attorneys had experience litigating wage & hour class actions. Id. at *13. Fourth, Plaintiffs met the commonality requirement because Defendant classified all clinicians as exempt and compensated them using the same mixed per-visit and per-hour pay arrangement. Id. at *14-15. The Court found that it did not matter which particular tasks were paid hourly to different clinicians so long as each class member received hourly pay for some work activities and per visit pay for other activities. Id. at *16. Further, the Court determined that Plaintiffs met the predominance requirement because the common issue of whether a hybrid pay system rendered an employee ineligible for exemption from the FLSA overtime provisions was dispositive, and resolution of this common question entirely would settle the question of liability, leaving damages as the only remaining issue. Id. at *18. While the Court acknowledged that determining damages owed to each individual class member would be complex because many class members testified that they did not accurately record their work time, it opined that such individualized issues went only to damages and, therefore, did not defeat predominance for class certification purposes. Id. at *18-19. The Court also ruled that, although damages questions varied, a class action was superior to individual trials for each class member during which the legal issue of the pay scheme's compliance would have to be wastefully re-litigated. Id. at *22. The Court concluded that, because Plaintiffs met the Rule 23 standards for class certification, they necessarily met the much lower bar for FLSA collective action certification. The Court, therefore, granted Plaintiffs' motion for class-certification and denied Defendant's motion for decertification of the collective action.

McCaster, et al. v. Darden Restaurants, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40343 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former restaurant employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendant did not pay them their earned vacation pay as part of their final compensation when their employment ended in violation of the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection Act. Plaintiffs contended that Defendant had a vacation policy under which hourly employees earned vacation days based on length of service. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs sought to certify a class of all former Defendant employees in Illinois since December 11, 2003, who were subject to Defendant's vacation policy and who did not receive all earned vacation pay benefits. Defendant moved to strike the declaration of Cristina Calderon, which Plaintiffs submitted in support of their motion. The Court granted Defendant's motion to strike, and denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. First, Defendant contended that Calderon, a paralegal for Plaintiffs' counsel, had done more than simply summarize the data Defendant supplied to Plaintiffs during discovery, and instead, in effect, had given an expert opinion concerning the data. Id. at *5. The Court found that although the costs incurred for paralegal work are likely to be less than that of an expert witness, Plaintiffs could not submit a paralegal's purported summary and circumvent the procedural and substantive requirements for an expert witness. Id. at *6. Regarding the motion for class certification, the Court first found that Plaintiffs failed to establish commonality. The Court noted that although Plaintiffs argued that Defendant employed each member of the proposed class under the same vacation policy, Plaintiffs' own brief and exhibits illustrated that Defendant had a variety of policies at different time periods and in different restaurants with different eligibility criteria. Id. at *10-11. The Court observed that Defendant also had provided evidence showing that different managers at different restaurants administered the vacation policies in a different manner. Id. at *11. The Court thus found that Plaintiffs had failed to identify one consistent policy underlying the reasons for denying vacation benefits to proposed class members. Id. at *12. Although there could be some general similarities in the facts of some of the proposed class, Plaintiffs had not pointed to a single common question of fact or the type of standardized conduct toward members of the class that was required. Id. at *13. Second, the Court held that Plaintiffs' claims were not typical of proposed class members because Defendant had shown that each Plaintiff stood in a unique position that was separate from other proposed class members. Id. at *14. Third, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the adequacy of representation requirement because Defendant had unique defenses against each Plaintiff, which other proposed class members might not face based on the particular policies that such proposed class members were subject to at work. Id. at *15-16. Finally, regarding Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirements, the Court opined that although certain common issues might be resolved in a class action, the parties and the Court would expend significant time and resources analyzing the individual claims of the proposed class members, thereby defeating predominance. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Panwar, et al. v. Access Therapies*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7584 (S.D. Ind. Jan. 22, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of immigrants employed on H-1B visas, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay employees their contracted rate of pay, and that if an employee complained about the underpayment or wanted to quit, Defendant would threaten them with promissory note penalties, visa loss, revocation of lawful permanent resident application sponsorship, and deportation. Plaintiffs alleged violations of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and the Indiana Statutory Wage Law. Plaintiffs were required to sign an employment contract, which set forth the employment term and the wage, as well as a promissory note corresponding with the contract's liquidated damages/recovery of expenses provision. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs also alleged that although some employees were not assigned to paid positions as promised by the employment agreements, they were unable to leave their employment because of the threat to their immigration status and the amount they would have to pay under the promissory note for breaching the employment agreement. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs sought certification of a class comprised of current and former H-1B, lawful permanent residents, and lawful permanent resident applicant employees, who worked for Defendant under potential promissory note penalties or contractual penalties. The Court denied the motion for want of ascertainably and typicality. The Court noted that the class definition was not connected to the claims, and that the proposed definition was very broad and included virtually all former and current employees, whether or not they remained employed with Defendant because of the alleged threat of harm, and whether or not they were paid their contractually agreed wage. Id. at *8. The Court opined that although it was not required that all class members be injured for class certification, the inclusion of a large number of non-injured Plaintiffs rendered the class too broad, and thus not ascertainable. Id. at *9. As to typicality, the Court found that the class definition included all employees whose contract included a specific wage requirement, whether they were underpaid or not. The Court remarked that this definition included employees who would not have claims common to the named Plaintiffs, namely that they were not paid wages owed to them under the contract. In addition, the class definition included all employees regardless of their immigration status and whether or not such status was threatened by Defendant. Id. at *15. The Court observed that the class definition would require an examination of each class member who worked for Defendant to determine: (i) the amount and the terms of the liquidated damages provision of each employment contract; (ii) whether this amount and the associated terms constituted an unenforceable penalty; and (iii) whether the employee ever tried to terminate his or her contract, but was prevented from doing so due to the threat of serious harm of the same nature alleged by named Plaintiffs. Id. at *17-18. Since the proposed class members were not all subjected to the same course of conduct, resulting in differing claims and defenses than those applicable to Plaintiffs, the Court opined that typicality was lacking. Accordingly, the Court denied certification to Plaintiffs' proposed class.

Smith, et al. v. Family Video Movie Club, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43335 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought an FLSA collective action alleging that Defendant, a video rental store chain, failed to include commissions in employees' base pay rates when calculating overtime rates. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant violated the FLSA through its training guide that required employees to run deposits to the bank off-the-clock, and that Defendant's anti-overtime and payroll policies created a de facto work policy requiring employees to perform other off-the-clock tasks, including assisting customers, cleaning and maintaining stores, making phone calls for work-related matters, taking inventory, stocking shelves, balancing the cash register, and running errands. Id. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to conditionally certify a collective action, and the parties commenced discovery. Following discovery, Defendant moved to decertify the conditionally certified collective action. Defendant argued that individual store manager decisions created material variances in the opt-in members' employment situations and these variances would necessitate individualized adjudications of liability. Id. at *5. In response, Plaintiffs sought to narrow their claims to three sub-classes, each addressing distinct claims. Plaintiffs' first proposed sub-class was comprised of those employees who did not have their commissions included in their base rate of pay before calculation of overtime rates, the second proposed sub-class was comprised of those employees who ran bank deposits off-the-clock, and the third proposed sub-class was comprised of employees who performed sundry off-the-clock tasks for Defendant. Id. The Court allowed Plaintiffs to proceed with the first two sub-classes to trial on a collective basis, finding that these two proposed sub-classes constituted similarly-situated employees under the FLSA. First, regarding Plaintiffs' claims of under-calculation of overtime rates, the Court noted that Defendant calculated all hourly employees' commissions and overtime rates based on a same formula used by an outside payroll department and upon computerized transmissions of Defendant's employee payroll data, and Plaintiffs had provided substantial evidence that their claims arose out of a single policy, custom, or practice that lead to FLSA violations. Id. at *12-15. Next, regarding running bank deposits off-the-clock, the Court found that Defendant's requirement of employees to run deposits to the bank off-the-clock was common to the proposed sub-class and capable of a fair and efficient collective-wide adjudication. Plaintiffs cited a corporate training policy requiring employees to first clock-out before taking the deposits to the bank as well as interrogatory responses, deposition testimony and declarations from opt-in Plaintiffs demonstrating that Defendant required every opt-in member to run bank deposits off-the-clock. Based on this showing, the Court found that Defendant's company-wide training policy had company-wide force. Id. at *15-18. The Court therefore denied Defendant's motion to decertify Plaintiffs' first and second proposed sub-classes. The Court, however, ruled that Plaintiffs had failed to demonstrate through substantive evidence of the similarity of opt-in collective members with respect to uncompensated off-the-clock tasks. Although Plaintiffs identified various management policies as evidence of a company-wide de facto policy that permitted off-the-clock work, the Court found nothing facially unlawful about those policies. Id. at *21. Despite 80% of the discovery sample performing off-the-clock tasks, the Court determined that individual variance driven by store manager discretion suggested that the policies Plaintiffs identified did not promote a de facto company-policy requiring off-the-clock work. Id. at *22-23. The Court, therefore, denied Defendant's motion to decertify Plaintiffs' third proposed sub-class. Because none of Defendant's defenses to the FLSA claims raised individualized issues to the point that proceeding as a collective action was improper, the Court also held that Defendant's affirmative defenses either could be resolved collectively or efficiently managed at the damages stage. Id. at *23-26. Accordingly, the Court partly granted and partly denied Defendant's motion to decertify.

Solsol, et al. v. Scrub, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 56426 (N.D. Ill. April 27, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of janitors who worked at the O'Hare International Airport ("O'Hare"), brought a collective action alleging that Defendants' method of determining their compensation based on the Supervisor Payroll Input Sheet ("input sheets") violated the FLSA. Janitors who worked at O'Hare clocked-in and clocked-out at the start of their shifts, and orally reported the amount of time they worked to supervisors. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs contended that the supervisors filled out the input sheets to record the time each janitor worked. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs contended that Defendants used these input sheets and not the timecards or the oral representations to tabulate payroll in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action. The Court observed that Plaintiffs had submitted a substantial amount of evidence in support of their allegations, including testimony from Defendants' witnesses, employee timecards, and declarations from opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. The Court opined that Plaintiffs also presented evidence from multiple employees of Defendants with different levels of responsibility who all stated that the supervisors were trained to engage in the alleged practice. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs had presented more than a modest showing of common practices. Id. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendants violated the FLSA by rounding the janitor time to the nearest 15 minutes when janitors arrived late to work. Id. at *11. Further, Plaintiffs alleged that Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants deducted 30 minutes from the time janitors worked each day to account for meal breaks. Id. The Court observed that Plaintiffs had presented sufficient evidence to make the modest factual showing of a common policy or plan to violate the FLSA in regard to employees who worked at O'Hare. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Watson, et al. v. Jimmy John's, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 154598 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 13, 2015). Plaintiff, an assistant store manager ("ASM"), brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant misclassified him and others similarly-situated as exempt employees and denied them overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and state wage & hour laws. Plaintiff was employed directly by a franchisee operator.

He sued Jimmy John's, the franchisor, on the theory that it was a joint employer for purposes of federal and state wage & hour laws, and therefore liable for the alleged misclassification of ASMs as exempt employees. Plaintiff's case theory posited that Defendant was the joint employer of all ASMs nationwide for over 1,450 independently owned and operated franchisees. Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), and the Court granted the motion. The Court noted that the declaration of another ASM, Adam Kathat, filed in support of the motion for conditional certification, stated that he worked as an ASM at several Jimmy John's stores (the same job held by putative collective action members), and that he was required to follow all of Defendant's corporate policies. Id. at *2. These policies related to such matters as what menu items were sold at the stores; the store's layout and hours; and the store's marketing and promotion strategies. Id. Kapusta averred that he learned that these matters were handled by Defendant at his corporate training session, and by reading Defendant's operations manual setting forth Defendant's corporate policies. Id. Kapusta also asserted that Defendant classified him as an exempt employee, and that he averaged 60 hours per week but he was not paid overtime. Id. at *3. Kapusta also stated that he had no authority to close the store, to establish the payroll budget, or to set or determine employees' pay. Id. Kapusta further declared that he observed ASMs at a Jimmy John's store in Charleston, Illinois, where he trained for three weeks, and based on his observations, their responsibilities were similar to his. Id. Based on Kapusta's declaration, the Court concluded that Plaintiff made a modest showing that he and the putative collective action members were victims of a common policy or plan that violated the law. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that the issue of joint employer status should be decided as a threshold matter, or that a collective action case theory proposed by Plaintiff was inherently unmanageable. Id. at *3. The Court reasoned that these issues go "to the merits," and "will require discovery. . ." Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Watson, et al. v. Jimmy John's LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 166003 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 30, 2015). Plaintiff, an Assistant Store Manager ("ASM"), brought an action alleging that Defendants misclassified ASMs as exempt from overtime compensation. Plaintiff advanced a case theory that Defendants, as franchisors, nonetheless were liable for wage & hour violations of their franchisees, since Defendants allegedly were joint employers of Plaintiff and members of the putative collective action (i.e., all ASMs employed by all franchisees nationwide). Following conditional class certification of the action, Defendants moved for reconsideration on the basis that the Court declined to resolve their evidentiary objections to declarations filed in support of Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification, relying instead on the later filed declaration of Adam Kapusta, which Plaintiffs submitted after briefing was completed. Id. at *1-2. Kapusta stated in his declaration that Defendants classified him as an exempt employee and that he worked 60 hours per week without overtime compensation. He also stated that he spent about 95% of his time working the cash register, greeting customers, preparing and serving food, cleaning the store, unloading delivery trucks, stocking supplies, and making deliveries. He also averred that he had no authority to close the store, to establish a payroll budget, to set the rate of pay for employees, or to determine the raises. Id. at *2. Based on Plaintiff's allegations and Kapusta's statements, the Court concluded that Plaintiff has made at least a modest factual showing that he and the putative collective action members were victims of a common policy or plan. Id. Defendants objected to the declaration, arguing that the declarant lacked personal knowledge about the job duties and responsibilities of other ASMs in the nationwide network of Defendants' stores, and that all of Plaintiff's opt-in declarations were speculative, conclusory, and contained inadmissible hearsay. Id. at *3. After review of the objections, the Court granted Defendants' motion in part and denied it in part. Although acknowledging that some of the defense objections had merit, the Court noted that portions of the declarations were admissible, and those portions, taken together and in conjunction with other evidence, were adequate to satisfy the minimal showing that others in the potential collective action were similarly-situated. Id. at *2. The Court noted that many of the statements in each declaration related to the declarant's description of his or her own job duties and responsibilities, and they obviously had personal knowledge about such matters. Id. at *3-4. Further, although they worked at eleven different stores in seven states, the fact that they nevertheless described nearly identical job duties and activities showed that individual experiences were not the product exclusively of store-level management decisions, but driven by a common policy across the franchise operations. Id. at *4. While the Court acknowledged that one declarant relied, in part, on unspecified conversations with an ASM from Defendants' other location, and some declarations included sweeping generalization that were not reasonably supported, the Court opined those statements had no evidentiary value and thus did not warrant striking the declaration in its entirety. Id. at *6. Defendants insisted that the employment policies Plaintiff challenged were the exclusive domain of franchisees. The Court, however, found that the job postings, including the description, summary, duties, and responsibilities of ASMs were materially identical, supporting an inference of commonality, and the evidence Defendants asserted in rebuttal was precisely the kind that Plaintiff was entitled to test through discovery. Id. at *10-11. Because Defendants' evidence-based arguments underscored the need for discovery, the Court concluded that if discovery confirmed that Plaintiff and any opt-in class members were injured, if at all, by the policies or management decisions of individual franchisees, rather than policies that were common to the franchise, Defendants could move to decertify the collective action at the appropriate juncture. Id. at *13-14. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendants' motion for reconsideration.

Wilkins, et al. v. Just Energy Group, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31902 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 13, 2015).
Plaintiff, a door-to-door salesperson, brought a class action alleging that Defendant misclassified her as an independent contractor and an outside salesperson under the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"). Defendant moved for summary judgment, contending that Plaintiff was outside the scope of the IMWL because she was an outside salesperson. At the same time, Plaintiff moved for class certification. The Court denied Defendant's motion, and granted Plaintiff's motion and certified the class. At the outset, the Court remarked that the proposition that door-to-door workers engaged in sales-related activities was unremarkable, so calling them "salespeople" was accurate and descriptive. Id. at *28. The Court, however, found that this designation did not transform them into an exempt "outside salesperson" as that term was used in the IMWL and the FLSA because job responsibilities, as opposed to job's name, were dispositive. Id. The Court noted that this inquiry would not depend on whether Plaintiff made sales; instead, it would depend on whether, in her sales efforts, Plaintiff was sufficiently independent to qualify for the exemption. Id. at *29. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Plaintiff sought certification of a class consisting of all Illinois door-to-door workers who were treated as independent contractors by Defendant. Plaintiff defined the common question as whether Defendant violated Illinois law when they failed to pay the door-to-door workers minimum wage and overtime pay. Defendant argued that the regional distributors and crew coordinators at its various offices in Illinois had substantial discretion in how the offices were managed and did not necessarily comply with Defendant's global policies. Defendant contended that this resulted in differing levels of supervision and control for door-to-door workers, so that no common questions existed. Id. at *32. The Court reasoned that at the class certification stage, all that mattered was the capacity of a class-wide proceeding to generate common answers apt to drive the resolution of the litigation. Id. at *33. In this instance, the Court observed that Defendant uniformly treated its door-to-door workers as outside the scope of IMWL based on its position that the workers were independent contractors who fell within the outside salesperson exemption. Id. at *34. Accordingly, the Court concluded that these were common issues as to liability. Id. The Court further opined that despite individual questions about damages, the commonality requirement could be satisfied. Regarding predominance, the Court noted that the inquiry would focus on whether the evidence was common or individual-specific. Id. at *28. To determine if an individual is an employee or a contractor under IMWL, several factors are considered. Regarding the first factor of control, the Court observed that many alleged differences between the levels of control over different door-to-door workers were based on whether Defendant's management followed a uniform corporate policy. Id. at *41. However, the common issues – such as requiring the door-to-door workers to follow rules, policies, and procedures – related to the control that Defendant had over them. Id. at *44. Accordingly, the Court concluded that common issues predominated. Similarly, the Court determined that the inquiry into the remaining factors – such as whether a worker was an integral part of the Defendant's business, whether Defendant was significantly invested in its business in a way that eclipsed the investment of the door-to-door workers, whether a worker's opportunity for profit and loss was determined by Defendant, and the permanency of relationship – all showed predominance of common questions over individual ones. Id. at *46-51. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiff satisfied the Rule 23 requirements, and certified the proposed class.

Woods, et al. v. Club Cabaret, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 145588 (C.D. Ill. Sept. 28, 2015). Plaintiff, an adult entertainer, brought an action alleging that Defendant misclassified her and other adult entertainers as independent contractors and denied them minimum wages in violation of the FLSA and the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"). Id. at *1. Defendant provided adult entertainment, and also provided other services such as food, hair care, and nail care. Id. at *2. Defendant employed managers, bartenders, cooks, waitresses, and dancers. Id. at *3. Plaintiff contended that before hiring, dancers filled out an application, had an interview, and were told to obtain an adult-entertainment permit with the County. Id. Plaintiff contended that once hired they were required to follow a work schedule that the club manager fixed and work a minimum of 24 hours per week. Plaintiff contended that every aspect of their engagement with Defendant was regulated by Defendant; however, because of their independent contractor status, Defendant did not pay them any wages. Plaintiffs instead were required to pay the club a fee and kept the gratuities they received from customers. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiff sought conditional certification of a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), which the Court granted. At the outset, the Court noted that Plaintiff had made a modest showing that she was similarly-situated to members of the proposed collective action. The Court explained that Plaintiff and the collective action members all were current or former dancers who worked at a single location owned and operated by Defendant. Id. at *11. Second, the Court noted that the accompanying declarations and the independent contractor agreements established that the proposed collective action members were all subjected to the same working conditions. Id. Defendant argued that some entertainers entered into arbitration agreements, which excluded them from a collective action. The Court observed that the lone agreement containing an arbitration clause that Defendant submitted in support of its opposition was executed well after this action was filed. Id. at *13. The Court remarked that the timing of the agreement submitted by Defendant was not enough to defeat conditional certification. Id. at *14. Finally, Defendant claimed the Court could not conditionally certify the collective action because it must conduct a "case-by-case" analysis on this "complex and fact-intensive inquiry" concerning whether the dancers were employees or independent contractors. Id. The Court, however, remarked that it was not deciding the merits of the case when considering the § 216(b) certification question, and accordingly, it granted Plaintiff's motion to conditionally certify the class. Id. at *15.

(viii) Eighth Circuit

Bonton, et al. v. Centerfold Entertainment Club, Inc*., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65408 (W.D. Ark. May 19, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of exotic dancers, brought an action alleging that Defendant intentionally misclassified them as independent contractors in order to avoid paying them minimum and overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and the Arkansas Minimum Wage Act ("AMWA"). Plaintiffs also claimed that Defendant forced them to pay for the right to work as independent contractors and took improper deductions from their tips. Id at *1. Plaintiffs moved for class certification of the issue of liability under Rule 23, and the Court granted the motion. At the outset, the Court found that the exact size of the potential class was unclear, but the record showed that it was large enough to warrant class certification. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the numerosity requirement was satisfied. The Court also found that questions such as whether an employer-employee relationship existed between the proposed class members and Defendant, or if Defendant was a covered employer under the AMWA, were common across the class. Hence, the Court ruled that the commonality requirement was satisfied. Id. at *5-6. In addition, the Court held that questions such as whether Defendant had a policy or practice of not paying minimum wage to dancers who performed at their clubs predominated over individual questions, thereby satisfying the predominance requirement. Id. at *8-9. Finally, the Court determined that a class action was the superior method of adjudication, and accordingly, certified a liability issue class pursuant to Rule 23. Id. at *10.

Bosewell, et al. v. Panera Bread Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144149 (E.D. Mo. Oct. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of joint venture general managers ("JV GMs"), brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay the full sum owed to them under their employment agreements. Plaintiffs entered into standard employment agreements with Defendant, and under the agreements, Defendant paid them a small annual salary. Id. at *4. The agreements also contained a buy-out clause, which entitled Plaintiffs to a one-time buy-out payment at the end of five years, based on the profitability of the manager's café. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant modified the agreements to include a cap on the buy-out, withholding the money allegedly owed to Plaintiffs. Id. Plaintiffs asserted class claims for breach of contract and fraud under Missouri law, individual claims for fraud and unjust enrichment, and moved for certification of a class defined as all natural persons employed as JV GMs by Defendant at a defined period who received a capped buy-out payment. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs argued that their class-wide breach of contract and fraud claims satisfied all elements of Rule 23 and that the class consisting of at least 61 current and former JV GMs was readily ascertainable. Id. at *6. Agreeing with Plaintiffs, the Court granted the motion for class certification. The Court found that the central liability questions of whether Defendant breached the agreements by imposing a cap on the buy-out and whether Defendant intended to comply with the agreements' buy-out provisions at the time of entering into the agreement were capable of common resolution because every class member received a nearly identical agreement containing an identical buy-out provision, which Defendant either did or did not intend to comply with at the time of signing, and every class member signed the agreement, began working, and thereafter received a uniformly capped buy-out. Id. at *30-31. Further, the Court found no reason to believe that the named Plaintiffs' interest in pursuing their individual fraud and unjust enrichment claims would undermine their incentive to vigorously prosecute the class-wide claims. Id. at *32. Although the named Plaintiffs might have learned about the cap at a different time and in a different format than other class members, the Court found nothing that suggested that the defense of modification or novation, if any, would depend on the timing or format of the new agreements. Id. at *33. The Court determined that Plaintiffs shared the class' interest in procuring relief in the breach of contract and fraud claims, and there was no indication that their interests in procuring additional relief on their individual claims would be at the expense of other class members or would be otherwise antagonistic to the class' interest. The Court, therefore, found that Plaintiffs satisfied the typicality and adequacy requirements. Id. at *32-35. Defendant argued that its various defenses or arguments – including the defense of contract modification or novation – against liability would raise individual issues that would predominate the common issues of the case. The Court, however, found support in Plaintiffs' assertion that continued at-will employment was not valid consideration to create an enforceable modified or novated contract under Missouri law. Id. at *36-37. The Court further ruled that, even if Defendant's modification and novation defenses had merit, they might be resolved by common evidence because neither party provided evidence that any putative class members were uninformed of the cap or objected to the cap before receiving a buy-out. Id. at *38. Since Plaintiffs' punitive damages claims hinged on Defendant's motive in entering the agreement, which was capable of resolution on a class-wide basis, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs demonstrated that common issues would predominate. Id. at *41-42. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Conners, et al. v. Catfish Pies, Inc.,* Case No. 14-CV-2 (E.D. Ark. Feb. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative FLSA collective action against various Defendants challenging their tip policies. Prior to October 2013, Defendant Ben Biesenthal was president and part owner of Catfish Pies, Inc., Pizza Profits, Show Me Pies, Three Buddies, Inc., and Gusano's Pizzeria, Inc., n/k/a Hendrix Brand, Inc. Biesenthal is currently president and part owner of Crazy Pies, Pizza Profits, and Show Me Pies, and Tim Chappel is president and owner of Hendrix. Three Buddies provides administrative services to Catfish Pies, Pizza Profits, and Show Me Pies. Id. at 1. All Plaintiffs and opt-in Plaintiffs were not employees of all Defendants. Id. at 1-2. The Court had previously certified a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). After a period of discovery, Defendants moved for decertification of the conditionally certified collective action and to sever, which the Court granted. The Court noted that Plaintiffs may be similarly-situated if they suffer from a single FLSA-violating policy, and when proof of that policy or of conduct in conformity with that policy proves a violation as to all Plaintiffs. Id. at 4. The Court found that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated in this case because the "lack of employer-employee relationship" defense applied to some but not all Plaintiffs. Id. Although Defendants might have been acting pursuant to similar employee handbooks, the Court remarked that different Defendants employed different Plaintiffs, and all Plaintiffs did not have employer-employee relationship with all Defendants. Id. Accordingly, the Court decertified the action. Furthermore, the Court severed the named Plaintiffs' claims, holding that allowing their claims to be tried in one proceeding would be confusing to the jury and prejudicial to Defendants against whom they did not have claims. Id. at 5. The Court noted that it had already dismissed several named Plaintiffs' claims against Defendants with whom they failed to establish employer-employee relationships. Id. In addition, the Court maintained that although a similar tip policy was at issue in each circumstance, each case would turn on whether a particular Defendants' enforcement of the policy violated the FLSA, which was an individualized inquiry. Id. The Court concluded that trying all the parties' claims in one trial would present additional obstacles to the jury, which was easily avoided by holding separate, and far more simple, trials. Id. Accordingly, the Court severed the named Plaintiffs' claims into four separate trials.

Cruz, et al. v. TMI Property Management, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 147479 (D. Minn. Oct. 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of housekeepers, brought an action alleging that Defendant made them work off-the-clock and confiscated tips left by travelers in violation of the FLSA, the Minnesota Fair Labor Standards Act ("MFLSA"), and the Minnesota Payment of Wages Act ("MPWA"). Plaintiffs testified that Defendant required them to fold linens and prepare their cleaning carts prior to the start of their shifts, and after the end of their shifts, they also continued to clean rooms. Id. at *7-8. Several housekeepers also provided testimony that they did not take rest or meal breaks, did not use the rest room, and did not eat in the rooms they cleaned. Id. at *9-12. Plaintiffs further claimed that Defendant did not have a formal policy regarding tips, and that the supervisors frequently entered the room before the housekeepers and emptied thank-you envelopes including tips. Id. at *12. Following conditional certification of a FLSA collective action, Plaintiffs moved for Rule 23 certification of a class of all current and former housekeepers who worked for Defendant beginning April 15, 2011. Defendant also moved to decertify the conditionally certified collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion and denied Defendant's motion for decertification. Certifying the class with respect to the issue of liability as to Plaintiffs' MFLSA and MPWA claims, the Court found that Plaintiffs met Rule 23's certification requirements. The Court agreed that Plaintiffs satisfied the numerosity requirement as they estimated that 67 individuals met the class definition. Id. at *18. Plaintiffs also satisfied the commonality and predominance requirements as the questions – of whether Defendant required Plaintiffs to work off-the-clock, whether Defendant allowed them to take rest and meal breaks as required by law, and whether Defendant unlawfully took class members' tips – could be answered on a class-wide basis. Id. at *25-28. While the Court acknowledged that there might be individual questions regarding the amount of time that Defendant required a particular individual to work off-the-clock or how often Defendant failed to pay the individuals in a timely manner, it found that those issues related to damages could be handled in a separate phase of litigation. Id. at *27-28. Because Plaintiffs sought redress of a similar grievances under the same legal and remedial theories, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' MPWA and MFLSA claims were typical of those of the potential class members. Id. at *33. The Court rejected Defendant's argument regarding the adequacy of the named Plaintiffs to act as class representatives, and found that Defendant failed to raise an issue sufficient to call into question the named Plaintiff's ability to fairly and adequately protect the interests of the proposed class. Id. at *36. The Court, therefore, concluded that a class action was the superior method of adjudicating Plaintiffs' MPWA and MFLSA claims with respect to issue of Defendant's liability, and accordingly, granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Seeking decertification of the conditionally certified collective action, Defendant argued that determining whether Defendant was subject to liability for overtime or minimum wage violations would require a highly individualized inquiry as to each class member's circumstances every day of every week. Id. at *45. Defendant asserted that, given Plaintiffs' differing hourly rates, different schedules, and varying amounts of alleged off-the-clock work, liability could not be determined on a class-wide basis. The Court, however, found that the factual and employment settings factors supported denying Defendant's decertification motion. There was no dispute that all collective action members worked at the same location, had the same job title, and alleged that they performed off-the-clock work. Id. at *52. The Court also determined that most of Defendant's purported individualized defenses, including the statute of limitations defense against an opt-in Plaintiff, were either questions that could be resolved on a collective basis or questions that relate to damages rather than to liability. Id. at *56. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for decertification and granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Davenport, et al. v. Charter Communications, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3409 (E.D. Mo. Jan. 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of call center employees, brought an action alleging a failure to pay them for the time it took them to access computer applications when beginning to work and to close down computer applications at the end of work. The Court previously had granted FLSA conditional certification of a collective action comprising of non-supervisory hourly employee commonly referred to as advisors, representatives, or agents who worked in Defendant's call centers located in eight states. The Court, however, had denied Plaintiffs' Rule 23 motion with respect to their Missouri state law claims, holding that individualized evidence defeated the requirements of superiority and predominance. Before the close of discovery, Defendant moved for decertification of the FLSA collective action. Defendant contended that the denial of Rule 23(b)(3) certification of Plaintiffs' Missouri claims demonstrated that Plaintiffs' FLSA collective action must likewise be decertified. Plaintiffs moved to stay or deny Defendant's decertification motion until after the close of all discovery. The Court granted Plaintiff's' motion and denied Defendant's motion. The Court observed that motions to decertify are typically resolved after the close of discovery. Id. at *12. Here, although discovery was not complete, the Court had already denied Rule 23 class certification of closely related state law wage & hour claims. The issue therefore was whether the denial of class certification of Plaintiffs' Missouri claims under Rule 23(b)(3) effectively precluded Plaintiffs from proceeding collectively on their FLSA claim and rendered additional discovery on the issue futile. The Court opined that its ruling on Plaintiffs' Rule 23 motion did not moot the FLSA certification issue. The Court noted that Rule 23 actions are fundamentally different from collective actions under the FLSA, and that the rigorous analysis required by Rule 23 does not apply with the same force in the FLSA context. Id. at *14-15. Instead, in order to proceed collectively, Plaintiffs need only demonstrate, based on the totality of evidence, that they are similarly-situated, which Plaintiffs asserted they could with additional discovery. Id. at *16. The Court thus granted Plaintiffs' motion to proceed with discovery before resolving Defendant's decertification motion.

Emily, et al. v. Raineri Construction, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 157076 (E.D. Mo. Nov. 20, 2015). Plaintiff, an hourly construction worker, brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), and the Court granted the motion. Id. at *1. In support of his claim, Plaintiff presented declarations from current and former hourly construction workers indicating that during their periods of employment, they and other hourly paid workers sometimes worked over 40 hours per week and Defendants failed to pay them overtime wages. Id. at *6-7. In response, Defendants filed a declaration from Ashley Raineri averring that Plaintiff was paid overtime at a rate of time and one-half his regular rate of pay. Id. at *8. Raineri also alleged that the company's superintendents were responsible for monitoring and reporting the number of hours that crew worked, and that Plaintiff's contention that he was not compensated for hours he worked directly implicated the superintendents. Id. Raineri therefore contended that there was a conflict of interest such that crew members and superintendents could not be included in the same collective action of similarly-situated co-workers. Id. The Court noted that Plaintiff and the supporting declarations alleged that Defendants had a company-wide policy of not paying overtime and of reducing the number of hours worked by employees. Id. at *9. The Court found that this was sufficient evidence to demonstrate that the putative collective action members were victims of a single decision, policy, or plan. Id. at *9-10. The Court noted that Harris v. Chipotle Mexican Grill, Inc., 49 F. Supp. 3d 564 (D. Miss. 2014), conditionally certified a collective action after finding that the hourly-paid managers were similarly-situated to the crew members, and were subjected to the same policy. Id. at *12. Similar to Harris, the Court concluded that in the early stages of litigation there was no basis to determine the extent of the superintendents' responsibilities and control over Defendants' pay policies. Id. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiff had met his modest burden for conditional certification, and granted the motion. Id. at *13.

Hussein, et al. v. Capital Building Services Group, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 157572 (D. Minn. Nov. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought an action asserting minimum wage, overtime, record-keeping, retaliation, and method of payment violations under the FLSA, the Minnesota Fair Labor Standards Act, the Minnesota Payment of Wages Act, and the Minnesota Whistleblower Act. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of their FLSA claims under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), which the Court granted. Plaintiffs asserted that the members of the proposed FLSA collective action were similarly-situated because they performed the same job duties, they worked in Minnesota under the same direct managers, they were subject to identical payroll and time-keeping policies, and they were subject to a common plan or practice of Defendant's under-reporting and failure to pay Plaintiffs for regular and overtime work. Id. at *19. The Court observed that the eight employee declarations that Plaintiffs submitted provided a colorable basis for the Court to conclude, for the purposes of the first stage of conditional certification, that Plaintiffs were similarly-situated to putative collective action members, and that Defendant's policy or plan with respect to payment of regular and overtime wages inflicted a common injury on Plaintiffs and members of the putative collective action. Id. at *19. The Court also observed that while Plaintiffs were not always denied overtime wages in exactly the same manner, Plaintiffs may be considered similarly-situated when they suffered a single, FLSA-violating policy, and when proof of that policy or of conduct in conformity with that policy proved a violation as to all Plaintiffs. Id. at *22-23. The Court found that Plaintiffs had demonstrated common practices in which their pay did not reflect all hours worked, and Plaintiffs had no way to check their hours to verify accurate reporting and payment because they contended that Defendant did not provide them with earnings statement and pay stubs. Id. at *23. Given Plaintiffs' allegations of earnings statement and record-keeping violations, the Court remarked that it was also not surprising that Plaintiffs generally lacked documentary evidence in support of their claims. Id. at *28. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' allegations were conclusory, overly broad, and that their vagueness made them impossible to refute. The Court disagreed and found that at the early stage of conditional certification under § 216(b) it would make no credibility determinations or factual findings. Id. at *28. Given the lenient standard of review at the first stage of conditional certification, the Court held that Plaintiffs' allegations and evidence sufficiently established that Plaintiffs and putative collective action members were similarly-situated. The Court thereby granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Judkins, et al. v. Southerncare, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1769 (S.D. Iowa. Jan. 6, 2015). Plaintiff, a former community relations specialist ("CRS"), brought an FLSA collective action on behalf of herself and 311 CRSs alleging that the Defendant misclassified CRSs as exempt from the overtime pay and routinely required to them work overtime. The Court conditionally certified the collective action, and 28 individuals opted-in. However, in barring four individuals, the Court dismissed their claims for failure to comply with the discovery order. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs subsequently moved for final, second stage certification, which the Court denied. Although Defendant acknowledged that there was a company-wide job description for the CRS position, it argued that the collective action should be decertified because the amount of discretion and independent judgment exercised by each Plaintiff varied significantly. The Court noted that the major job functions of a CRS included working with clinicians to develop and implement a comprehensive marketing plan for various medical personnel and community organizations. The CRSs made visits to doctor's offices, nursing homes, and other locations in order to generate referrals to Defendant hospice centers. Plaintiffs testified that they had at least some oversight or input from their director about where to spend their time. Defendant argued that the Plaintiffs were told different things about overtime, worked different amounts of overtime, and differed in their time-keeping practices. The Court remarked that minor differences between Plaintiffs' experiences, even with regard to an essential element of their case, does not foreclose the possibility of collective action adjudication. Id. at *15. Here, not only did Defendant apply a blanket overtime exemption and an identical job description to every CRS, Plaintiffs' actual job duties were similar as well. Although there were differences among Plaintiffs, the Court concluded that overall, they were similarly-situated. Although Defendant argued that the various defenses available to it would be individual as to each Plaintiff, thereby rendering a collective action highly inefficient, the Court agreed with Plaintiff that damages issues did not preclude the collective adjudication of the exemption issue. Id. at *17. Finally, Defendant asserted that because Plaintiffs were so few in number, and because the issues would require individualized testimony, there was minimal efficiency in treating these claims in one case. The Court, however, reasoned that although determining if an exemption applies may be an inherently fact-based inquiry, that alone does not preclude a collective action where Plaintiffs share common job traits. Id. at *18. Additionally, the Court opined that although there may be a need for individual testimony, the relatively small number of Plaintiffs mitigated any concern about procedural inefficiency. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for decertification.

Lucas, et al. v. Mike McMurrin Trucking, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135338 (N.D. Iowa Oct. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former truck drivers, brought an action alleging Defendant violated the FLSA and the Iowa Wage Payment Collection Law ("IWPCL"). Previously the Court had conditionally certified Plaintiffs' FLSA collective action. Therefore, Plaintiffs moved for class certification of their IWPCL claims under Rule 23, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs argued that there were 46 proposed class members, and generally there was a presumption that numerosity exists with more than 40 members, and did not exist with fewer than 20 members. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs asserted that fear of retaliation would prevent proposed class members from bringing individual suits, and therefore their motion should be granted. The Court remarked that because Plaintiffs did not present any evidence demonstrating a basis for this argument, it would give only limited consideration to this factor. Id. at *8. The Court, however, found that several factors weighed in favor of finding numerosity. First, the Court determined that based on the proposed class members' length of employment and hourly rate of some class members, recoveries could be relatively small. Id. at *9. Second, the Court opined that many, if not all, proposed class members may not have the financial wherewithal to institute individual lawsuits. Id. at *10. The Court, however, concluded that other factors weighing against numerosity made class certification inappropriate. The Court agreed with Defendants' argument that the close geographic proximity of the majority of proposed class members weighed against class certification. Id. at *10-11. The Court explained that Plaintiffs were aware of all of the potential class members, as well as their addresses and their dates of employment with Defendants, and therefore this factor also weighed against class certification. Id. at *11. The Court remarked that the fact that class members lived close to each other, and that Plaintiffs had knowledge of all class members, meant that the class was not so numerous so as to make the joinder impracticable. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Melgar, et al. v. O.K. Foods, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41807 (W.D. Ark. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of production employees, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them for time spent donning and doffing protective gear, travelling to and from workstations, and time spent waiting for the production line to start. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs asserted claims for violations of the Arkansas Minimum Wage Act, unjust enrichment, and breach of implied contract. Plaintiffs later added a collective action claim pursuant to the FLSA and sought conditional certification of a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Plaintiffs contended that they were all similarly-situated because Defendant paid all its hourly production employees on a "line time" basis for time spent on the production line, and required them to don and doff certain equipment, including during their meal breaks. Id. at *6. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. Defendant contended that it paid Plaintiffs for eight minutes per shift to compensate for time spent donning and doffing protective items, and therefore, the Court would have to make individualized inquiries into the amount of time each employee spent on donning and doffing above the eight minutes. Id. at *7. Defendant also asserted that Plaintiffs could not show a common decision, policy, or plan that affected all putative collective action members in a similar fashion because of significant differences in the types of sanitary and protective items Defendant required then to don, in the time required to don and doff their respective equipment throughout a shift, and the time it took to take them off. Id. The Court, however, concluded that Plaintiffs met their burden of showing that they were similarly-situated to the putative collective action members because Plaintiffs showed that they all worked in the same plant and Defendant subjected them to common policies regarding donning and doffing protective gear, hygiene, and sanitation. Id. at *8. The Court therefore granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification under § 216(b).

Petrone, et al. v. Werner Enterprises, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109225 (D. Neb. Aug. 12, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, brought an FLSA collective action alleging that Defendant failed to compensate them for breaks less than 20 minutes, and failed to compensate for sleeping periods in excess of eight hours in violation of the continuous workday rule. Plaintiffs filed two separate actions, Petrone I alleging FLSA claims, and Petrone II alleging Nebraska law claims based on the same facts as Petrone I. Id. at *7. The cases were consolidated, and both the collective action and the class action were certified. Defendant moved to decertify the class action and the collective action, and the Court denied the motion. Defendant argued that individual issues predominated, that damages could not be proven on a class-wide basis, and that thousands of class members lacked standing. The Court first noted that the class consisted of approximately 50,000 class members, making individualized litigation impractical. Id. at *9. The Court next observed that Plaintiffs possessed the same interests and suffered same injuries even though some factual variations existed. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs pointed to a common policy or practice to demonstrate how they were not properly compensated, thereby satisfying the commonality and predominance requirements. Id. As to the issue of damages, the Court observed that Plaintiffs sought damages for the class-wide injury resulting from Defendant's failure to pay minimum wage. Id. at *10. The Court, therefore, held that common questions of the class predominated, even with some factual variations present. The Court concluded that because Plaintiffs' damages calculation could produce just and reasonable inferences based on their own records, they could prove damages on a class-wide basis. Id. at *11. Finally, Defendant argued that the class contained members who did not suffer damages. The Court rejected this argument, finding that the lack-of-injury rule was not applicable to Nebraska state law. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for decertification.

Tinsley, et al. v. Covenant Care Services, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39163 (E.D. Mo. Mar. 27, 2015). Plaintiff brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay him and all other similarly-situated employees, for all hours worked in a workweek, including straight time and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff represented a group of current and former employees who worked for Defendant as full-time individualized supported living aides. Id. at *3. Plaintiff moved for conditional certification pursuant to § 216(b) of the FLSA, which the Court granted. While Defendant conceded that Plaintiff had met the notice stage burden and agreed to conditional certification of Plaintiff's FLSA claims, Defendant did not waive any argument related to possible decertification of the conditionally certified class, Rule 23 class certification, or any other argument in the action. Id. Plaintiff submitted the sworn statements of himself and another employee, Belinda Miller, in which they averred that they were hourly paid and handled client interactions on behalf of Defendant. Plaintiff and Miller affirmed that they did not receive overtime compensation for all work performed in excess of 40 hours in a workweek, and that they were typically scheduled to work in excess of 40 hours per week. Id. at *4. Further, based on conversations with other aides, Plaintiff and Miller stated that the other employees did not receive overtime compensation for hours worked in excess of 40 hours. Id. The Court found that Plaintiff had sufficiently alleged that the putative class members were together the victims of a single decision, policy or plan. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification, and approved the parties' proposed notice plan modelled on examples provided on the Federal Judicial Center's website.

Vanhorn, et al. v. Tasneem Enterprise, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1933 (E.D. Ark. Jan. 8, 2015). Plaintiff, individually and on behalf of others similarly-situated, brought a collective action alleging minimum wage and overtime wage violations under the FLSA and the Arkansas Minimum Wage Act. Defendant moved for partial summary judgment as to the claims Plaintiff purported to bring on behalf of the other employees as a collective action. The Court granted the motion. The Court noted that although this case had been pending a year, Plaintiff had not filed a motion to conditionally certify a collective action in spite of having had the names and addresses of all potential collective action members since April of 2014. Further, no other employee had given consent to join this action, and trial was set for April of 2015. Id. at *4-5. Further, the affidavits of Defendant's four former and current employees stated affirmatively that they did not consider themselves to be similarly-situated to Plaintiff with regard to his FLSA claims against Defendant. Id. at *5. Other than his own affidavit, Plaintiff had not offered evidence of any potential member of the collective action to support prosecution of a collective action. Because the discovery deadline had passed and the trial was only a few months away, the Court found that Defendant was entitled to certainty in the nature of the action. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's partial motion for summary judgment as to the collective action claims. At the same time, the Court did not dismiss Plaintiff's individual claims.

Alcantar, et al. v. Hobart Service,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 15687 (9th Cir. Sept. 3, 2015). Plaintiff, a service technician, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to compensate its technicians for the time they spent commuting in Defendant's vehicles to and from their homes to Defendant's worksites in violation of California law. Id. at *3. Defendant compensated technicians for the time they spent fixing equipment and for the time they spent driving to and from different assignments. Defendant also compensated technicians, if they commuted in service vehicles, for the time they spent driving from their homes to their first assignments and from their last assignments back home, but only to the extent such travel took longer than their "normal commutes." Id. at *4-5. Plaintiff claimed that California law required Defendant to compensate technicians for their normal commute time. Plaintiff conceded that technicians could leave their work vehicles at their branch offices and drive their personal vehicles to and from their homes, but argued that technicians would have been liable for any break-ins or damage to vehicles left at the branch offices, which did not provide sufficient or secure parking space, and therefore, technicians had no choice but to drive their work vehicles home at night. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiff moved for certification of a class of service technicians employed by Defendant in the four years preceding the filing of the action. The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion on the basis that Plaintiff failed to satisfy the commonality and predominance requirements. Id. at *8. The District Court then granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to Plaintiff's overtime claim for commute time, finding that, because there was no dispute that Defendant did not expressly require technicians to commute in its vehicles, Defendant was not required to compensate for the commute time. Id. at *16. The District Court also granted Defendant's second motion for summary judgment because Plaintiff failed to comply with the notice requirements of the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The Ninth Circuit found that the District Court erred in denying class certification because it evaluated the merits of Plaintiff's case rather than focusing on whether the questions presented were common to the class. Id. at *14. The District Court had held that Plaintiff failed to meet the commonality requirement because he offered no evidence demonstrating that Defendant had a uniform policy requiring technicians to commute in their service vehicles. Id. at *13. The Ninth Circuit, however, identified a common question of fact as to whether Defendant provided a genuine choice for its technicians to use company vehicles for their commute. Plaintiff asserted that technicians, by virtue of their inability to park at Defendant's facilities, were forced to drive Defendant's vehicles to work, and, as a result of the rules applicable to the use of its vehicles, Defendant exercised sufficient control over them to render the time compensable. Id. at *13-14. The Ninth Circuit, therefore, ruled that the District Court erred as a matter of law in denying class certification. The Ninth Circuit also reversed the District Court's order granting summary judgment as to Plaintiff's overtime claim for commute time. The Ninth Circuit held that Plaintiff raised a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether Defendant required technicians, as a practical matter, to commute in Defendant's vehicles, and as to whether the choice to commute was genuine or illusory. Id. at *19-20. The Ninth Circuit, however, affirmed the District Court's dismissal of Plaintiff's PAGA claim for failure to comply with the statute's notice requirements, since the pre-lawsuit letter in which Plaintiff disclosed his allegations against Defendant did not contain sufficient facts to comply with the statute's notice requirements. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed in part and reversed in part the District Court's judgment and remanded for further proceedings.

Amey, et al. v. Cinemark USA, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63524 (N.D. Cal. May 13, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant's uniform policies regularly deprived employees of meal and rest breaks, failed to provide them with reporting time pay ("RTP"), forced them to work off-the-clock without pay, and failed to report the proper hours worked and hourly rates on their wage statement. Id. at *2. Asserting violations of the California Labor Code and the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"), Plaintiffs moved for class certification consisting of all non-exempt employees of Defendant's theatres since December 2008. Id. at *4. The Court denied class certification, finding that Plaintiffs failed to show a uniform policy or practice that could give rise to common questions under Rule 23. Although Plaintiffs argued that common questions of law and fact existed because Defendant implemented uniform policies across all of its theatres that resulted in California Labor Code violations, that Defendant had a uniform practice of understaffing theatres that resulted in the routine denial of employees' meal and rest break periods, and RTP violation resulted in uncompensated overtime, the Court found no single common question of law to the class. Id. at *20-32. Plaintiffs did not contend that Defendant's written meal and rest break policy violated the California Labor Code, but argued that Defendant had a policy that facilitated meal and rest break violations. Plaintiffs, however, produced no direct evidence that Defendant had such an informal policy, such as testimony from salaried general managers regarding Defendant's managerial training or any written memoranda. Id. at *25. The evidence showed that the practice of scheduling breaks differed between managers and Plaintiffs failed to produce sufficient evidence to show that managers' failure to provide the breaks was uniform or reflected a policy instituted by Defendant. Id. at *26-27. Instead, the evidence revealed several other facts that defeated Plaintiffs' theory of class certification. While some witnesses testified that they did not inform management of missed meal and/or rest breaks, some employees voluntarily took a shorter rest break or waived their break altogether. Id. at *29. Although the evidence showed that general managers, senior assistant managers, and assistant managers altered employees' punch records to reflect timely breaks when they were in fact missed or late, Plaintiffs presented no evidence that it was connected to any policy (as opposed to individual managers' efforts to avoid getting in trouble). Id. at *31. Plaintiffs similarly were unable to show any evidence of a consistent policy of failing to credit employees with RTP while sending them home before completing half of their shift. Because the issue whether Defendant sent an employee home early depended almost entirely on the manager on-duty, the Court found that it undermined Plaintiffs' argument that Defendant had a uniform policy. Id. at *34. Plaintiffs also argued that Defendant routinely circumvented overtime pay requirements by forcing employees to work off-the-clock before or after they clocked-in or clocked-out of work. Id. at *36. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant's policy of understaffing and its strong discouragement of overtime work forced employees to work off-the-clock in order to finish their tasks without getting disciplined. Id. The Court, however, found no evidence demonstrating that Defendant knowingly caused employees throughout the proposed class to work off-the-clock without providing them with compensation. Id. at *39. Defendant's written policies provided for overtime pay, and some class members never experienced any overtime pay violations. Under these circumstances, the Court concluded that class certification was inappropriate. Because Plaintiffs' failed to properly plead violations of the California Labor Code as a "direct" wage statement claim, the Court also refused to certify Plaintiffs' wage statement claims. Id. at *63. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Antemate, et al. v. Estenson Logistics, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 83543 (C.D. Cal. June 15, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action on behalf of current and former truck drivers and yard hostlers alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime wages, to provide meal breaks, and to authorize and permit rest breaks and all related derivative claims in violation of California law. Plaintiff moved for class certification of two putative classes including: (i) truck drivers and yard hostlers who received a safety bonus under Defendant's driver safety bonus program ("safety bonus class"); and (ii) a class of yard hostlers ("yard hostler class"). Id. at *1. At the outset, the Court observed that the parties agreed that the safety bonus class, excluding the truck drivers, was certifiable and accordingly, granted certification of the class. Id. at *2. As to the yard hostler class, Defendant conceded that class certification was proper as to Plaintiff's overtime claims, but argued that certification should not extend to Plaintiff's meal and rest break claims. Defendant contended that Plaintiff had not established commonality or typicality under Rule 23(a), and that Rule 23(b)(3) was not met because common questions would predominate. Id. at *6. The Court found that Plaintiff had established commonality because even if individual questions arose, Plaintiff's theory of liability, supported by multiple declarations and depositions, presented questions of law and fact common to the class. Id. at *8. The Court reasoned that despite the fact that Defendant did or did not maintain the allegedly uniform policies and practices, a common legal question arose concerning whether this conduct violated California meal and rest break requirements. The Court also found that Plaintiff had established typicality because Plaintiff offered substantial evidence to support his theory that uniform policies and practices created an environment in which yard hostlers were pressured to skip, delay, or shorten breaks whenever the workload was backed-up. Id. at *8-9. Finally, regarding the Rule 23(b)(3) requirement, the Court held that the proposed class members, California yard hostlers, all appeared equally subject to Defendant's alleged policies and practices, regardless of the particular facility where they work. In other words, Plaintiff's theory of liability, premised on uniform policies applicable to all class members, constituted a significant aspect of the case that could be resolved for all members of the class in a single adjudication. Id. at *11. Thus, the Court concluded that Plaintiff had established that the yard hostler class was certifiable under Rule 23(b)(3), and the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Ash, et al. v. Bayside Solutions, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11323 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 30, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an FLSA action alleging that Defendant denied employees overtime compensation. Defendant, an employment agency, placed Plaintiffs with Chevron. Each Plaintiff signed a standard employment agreement with Defendant, which stated that they would be paid at the regular exempt rate for each hour of work with no overtime. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification on behalf of all employees employed by Defendant pursuant to the agreement, who worked in excess of 40 hours in one week, and did not receive overtime compensation. The Court granted the motion. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs were not hourly employees and hence not eligible for overtime. Defendant asserted that one of its representatives inadvertently used the agreement with the compensation provision at issue when hiring Plaintiffs, when in fact Plaintiffs should have been classified as exempt and not entitled to overtime. Id. at *7. Further, Defendant contended that the four named Plaintiffs and three other independent contractors for Chevron entered into the agreement with the wrong compensation provision, and that upon realizing the error, it had offered the impacted Chevron contractors a $200 per week increase in their wages as consideration for signing a corrected agreement reflecting that they were properly classified as exempt and were paid on a flat salary basis. Id. at *7-8. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs' allegation was not that Defendant improperly classified them as exempt; rather, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant did not classify them as exempt at all, but that Plaintiffs were classified as hourly employees and not paid overtime as required by law. Further, the Court opined that whether the use of the agreement was inadvertent and Plaintiffs were in fact exempt employees, and thus exempt from overtime requirements, was an affirmative defense that was more suitable for the second step of the conditional certification process. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs provided declarations stating that they entered into the agreement, worked in excess of 40 hours a week, and were not paid overtime, and estimated that 140 other employees entered into the same agreement. Id. at *12-13. The Court thus found that Plaintiffs met their burden of making substantial allegations that the proposed collective action members were subject to an illegal policy of not paying overtime compensation to hourly employees, and accordingly, granted conditional certification pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Avilez, et al. v. Pinkerton Government Services, Inc., 596 Fed. Appx. 579 (9th Cir. Mar. 9, 2015). Plaintiff, a security guard, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated California's meal break statutes. Previously, the District Court had certified various classes of current and former employees. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit vacated the District Court's order and remanded for entry of a revised class certification order. Id. at *579. The Ninth Circuit found that the District Court abused its discretion by certifying classes and sub-classes that included employees who had signed class action waivers. The Ninth Circuit opined that Plaintiff's arbitration agreement did not contain a class action waiver and, as the classes and sub-classes included individuals who signed class action waivers, Plaintiff was not an adequate representative of the class and her claim lacked typicality. Id *580. The Ninth Circuit held that since the meal break and wage statement sub-classes included employees who signed class action waivers, the District Court's class certification order was improper. Id. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit remanded the action, and directed the District Court to enter a revised certification decision.

Bowerman, et al. v. Field Asset Services, Inc., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 37988 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, a business entity that arranged cleaning, maintenance, and restoration of foreclosed properties by hiring third-party vendors, misclassified its vendors as independent contractors instead of employees, and as a result, systematically under-compensated them in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs moved for certification of a class consisting of all individuals whom Defendant designated as independent contractors, who personally performed property preservations work in California pursuant to Defendant's work orders, and who did not work for any other entity more than 30% of the time while working for Defendant during the class period. Id. at *3. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. First, the Court found that Plaintiffs established ascertainability by showing that the objective characteristics of the proposed class definition would enable the identification of the vendors who qualified as class members. Id. at *17. The Court noted that the vendor declarations submitted by both the parties indicated that most vendors would be able to self-identify as being in or out of the class. Id. at *21. Second, the Court found that Plaintiffs established numerosity as 347 vendors qualified for class membership. Id. at *44. Third, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs established commonality as Plaintiffs' claim raised the common question of whether Defendant misclassified putative class members as independent contractors instead of employees. Id. at *45. Fourth, the Court determined that Plaintiffs established typicality as the named Plaintiff's claims arose from the same conduct that provided the basis for all class members' claims, i.e., Defendant's alleged misclassification and consequent failure to pay overtime wages and indemnify costs. Id. at *46. Further, the Court found that Plaintiffs established predominance as Plaintiffs showed that, by limiting the class to vendors who "personally performed property preservation work" pursuant to Defendant's work order and who did not "primarily perform rehabilitation or remodel work," any variation among class members with respect to how often and to what extent they negotiated and/or bid for their contracts with Defendant would be greatly diminished.

Id. at *30. Plaintiffs also produced evidence showing that Defendant distributed to vendors pricelists containing the compensation rates for property preservation work performed under its work orders, and Defendant did not identify any evidence indicating significant variation among class members' power of negotiation over the pricelists. Id. at *30-31. The Court thus found that the proposed class definition, limiting the class to a group of vendors whose powers of negotiation and bidding were sufficiently similar, favored class certification. Id. at *31. The Court reasoned that although the class definition continued to encompass some vendors who hire, manage, and pay their own workers, and some who did not, such variation did not defeat predominance in light of the substantial commonalities among the sub-set of vendors who continued to qualify for class members. Id. at *35. The Court therefore concluded that questions common to the class predominated over individual ones. Finally, the Court held that Plaintiffs established superiority by asserting that liability could be established based on the common question of whether Defendant violated the California Labor Code, and damages could be considered only once liability was established. Id. at *40. The Court also approved Plaintiffs' proposed trial plan, and determined that the need for individualized hearings to determine damages did not, by itself, defeat class certification. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Brewer, et al. v. General Nutrition Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 172689 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of non-exempt employees, brought a class action against Defendant alleging, among other things, that as a matter of corporate policy and practice, Defendant did not compensate Plaintiffs for working during meal and rest breaks, time spent making bank deposits, and performing other "closing duties." Id. at *3 The Court had previously granted class certification, resulting in several sub-classes that included meal and rest breaks sub-classes; a sub-class of all sales associates and assistant managers who worked at least one closing shift and who used an automobile to make a bank deposit ("reimbursement sub-class"); and a sub-class regarding the "final pay/waiting time penalties" claims. Id. at *4-5. After discovery, Defendant moved to decertify the class. The Court denied the motion to decertify as to each of the sub-classes. Id. at *8. In regards to the meal and rest break sub-classes, in rejecting Defendant's argument that the class was not properly certified due to a lack of damages for some individuals, the Court noted it would be an error to focus on whether some individuals were able to take breaks or chose to forego breaks. Id. at *3. The Court further found that to the extent the individual off-the-clock claims were based on the theory that Plaintiffs worked during their lunch breaks despite clocking-out, this did not undermine a class claim relying on the accuracy of time clock data. Id. at *4. Thus, the Court denied the motion to decertify as to the meal and rest break sub-classes. Id. In regard to the reimbursement sub-class, Defendant argued that the sub-class lacked predominance. The Court rejected this position, noting that common questions predominated because Defendant maintained several common policies, including: (i) closing duties that required taking the money deposit to the bank; and (ii) reimbursement for driving to the bank was only required if the bank was not on the employee's route home. Id. at *4-5. Finally, as to the sub-class of voluntarily terminated group of Plaintiffs in the "final pay/waiting time penalties" sub-class, Defendant asserted that there was no class representative who was voluntarily terminated and paid by direct deposit, and thus the sub-class was without an adequate representative. Id. at *6. The Court, however, denied the motion to decertify the sub-class on the condition that Plaintiffs offer an adequate class representative for the sub-class and make such representative available immediately for deposition no later than two weeks prior to the first day of trial. Id. Accordingly, the Court conditionally denied Defendant's motion to decertify the voluntarily terminated Plaintiffs of the "final pay/waiting time penalties" sub-class based on that condition. Id. at *8.

Brown, et al. v. Abercrombie & Fitch Co.,* Case No. 14-CV-1242 (C.D. Cal. July 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendants failed to indemnify employees for expenses, failed provide rest breaks, and failed to provide accurate wage statements. Plaintiffs moved to certify six sub-classes consisting of approximately 62,000 non-exempt employees. As a whole, the Court observed that this action was brought on behalf of all non-exempt hourly employees who worked for Defendants during the class period. Id. at 9. Plaintiffs divided the broad class into several sub-classes based on the legal claims asserted and sought certification of each of those sub-classes. Id. at 10. Plaintiffs' first four sub-classes revolved around § 450 of the California Labor Code, which prohibits an employer from compelling or coercing any employee to patronize his or her employer in the purchase of anything of value. Id. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants coerced their employees into purchasing its clothing: (i) to realize profits from those purchases; and (ii) required employees to wear the clothing as a marketing strategy, such that the employees would effectively act as walking advertisements for Defendants. Id. at *11. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants required them to wear distinctive apparel that constituted a uniform yet failed to indemnify the employees for those expenses. Id. Plaintiffs also contended that Defendants coerced them to purchase specific types of footwear. Id. at 12. Plaintiffs asserted that despite Defendants' formal written policy of not requiring employees to purchase or wear Defendants' clothes, their managers coerced store employees to purchase Defendants' clothing. Id. at 13. The Court remarked that as Plaintiffs' theory was grounded on an alleged unwritten policy, one significant question was common to all members of the first and second sub-classes, i.e., the existence of such an unwritten policy or practice. Id. at 14. The Court observed that Plaintiffs had presented evidence of a common practice of informal policy of pressurizing employees to purchase clothing. Id. at 17. Accordingly, the Court concluded Plaintiffs showed common questions based on an asserted policy or practice of coercing store employees to purchase Defendants' clothing. Id. Similarly, the Court found that Plaintiffs established common questions as to the uniform sub-class and the footwear sub-class. Id. at 17-18. The Court noted that the central inquiry underlying the § 450 claims was whether the sub-class members were coerced into purchasing clothing. Id. at 22. Pursuant to Plaintiffs' theory of the case, the main question common to all members of the first sub-class was whether Defendants had a practice or informal policy of coercing store employees into purchasing its clothing. Id. at 23. Defendants asserted that individual differences among sub-class members predominated over the common questions in this case. Id. In essence, Defendants argued that because they had no informal policy or practice of coercing employees to make purchases, Plaintiffs' claims depended entirely on alleged oral statements from certain managers as well as employees' individual subjective feelings as to whether they were required to purchase clothing. Id. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs did not merely rely on the perceptions of individual employees, for they relied on e-mails among upper level managers evidencing a "top-down" pressure of employees to purchase AAA clothing. Id. The Court concluded Plaintiffs' had presented sufficient evidence of a company-wide policy or practice, and therefore, satisfied the predominance requirement. Id. Similarly, the Court found that common issues predominated over individual issues in the remaining sub-classes, and granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Campbell, et al. v. Vitran Express, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 155512 (C.D. Cal. Nov. 12, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, brought an action alleging that Defendant had an unofficial policy of discouraging and denying drivers their meal and rest breaks in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs also asserted claims under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). The Court granted summary judgment to Defendant holding that Plaintiffs' claims were preempted by the Federal Aviation Administration Authorization Act ("FAAAA"). On appeal, the order was reversed. On remand, Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, and the Court granted the motion. The Court found that Plaintiffs demonstrated that there were common questions of law and fact arising from Defendant's alleged practice of violating California labor and unfair competition laws relating to meal and rest breaks. Id. at *12. The common questions included whether Defendant maintained an unofficial policy of impeding and discouraging legally mandated meal and rest breaks, and whether Defendant's official meal and rest break policy comported with California requirements. Id. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs established the typicality requirement as their allegations mirrored the claims of the putative class members who also worked as drivers at various terminals during the class period, and were similarly subjected to Defendant's unofficial meal and rest break policy. Id. at *13. Plaintiffs argued that common question predominated over any individualized issues, because Defendant's unofficial policies and facially defective policies applied to all drivers, thereby rendering the issue of liability amenable to class-wide proof. Plaintiffs contended that the question as to whether Defendant implemented an unofficial policy of pressuring its drivers to forego lunch breaks predominated. Plaintiffs submitted declarations from 13 different drivers who worked at four of Defendant's five terminals. The declarations were identical and all alleged that the employees were constantly intimidated and threatened to comply with Defendant's falsification of records and forced to work through their meal and rest breaks. Id. at *21. The Court held that Plaintiffs had offered sufficient evidence to support the existence of a uniform, unofficial policy that violated the applicable law. Id. at *22. The Court concluded that even if Defendant showed that some employees found time to take a break during the workday, the question of whether Defendant complied with its legal responsibility predominated across the class. Id. at *25-26. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant's company policies were facially defective because they failed to fully and accurately state the meal and rest break requirements mandated by California law. The Court noted that Plaintiffs had submitted substantial evidence from putative class members and one supervisor showing that Defendant's policies strayed from California's meal and rest break requirements. Id. at *31. The Court observed that the defective policy claim like the unofficial policy hinged on the evidentiary record. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied the predominance requirement. The Court, therefore, granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Casarotto, et al. v. Exploration Drilling, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 167636 (D. Mont. Dec. 15, 2015). Plaintiff, a flowback operator, filed a motion to conditionally certify a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Magistrate Judge recommended granting Plaintiff's motion in part. The Court adopted the Magistrate Judge's report and recommendation. In filing Rule 72 objections to the report and recommendation, Defendant argued that the Plaintiffs' declarations filed in support of his motion were incompetent. Id. at *3. The Court noted that the declarations were mostly based on personal knowledge, and although one declarant had included some hearsay, his declaration was not incompetent. Id. at *4. Second, Defendant objected to the two-step test used by the Magistrate Judge and argued that this Court should apply the test set forth in Shushan v. University of Colorado, 32 F.R.D. 263 (D. Colo. 1990), wherein the Court had utilized Rule 23 requirements to FLSA conditional certification. The Court remarked that no case law authorities in the Ninth Circuit had favorably cited Shushan or its method for certifying collective actions, and had instead followed the majority approach and proceeded under the two-step test. Id. The Court further noted that if Congress intended to tie the requirements of Rule 23 to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), pursuant to Shushan, it could have explicitly done so; however, the Congress used the term "similarly-situated" to have a different standard applied to collective actions brought under § 216(b). Id. at *5. The Court found that Plaintiff provided substantial allegations that Defendant subjected him and other flowback operators to a policy that violated the FLSA, and given the lenient standard at the first step of conditional certification, he met his burden of showing that he and the putative collective action members were similarly-situated. Id. at *6. Third, Defendant objected that the statute of limitations could not be equitably tolled until the date that it supplied the contact information on putative collective action members to Plaintiff. The Court noted that Defendant opposed the motion and relied on the often-rejected approach used in Shushan and delayed the conditional certification process as long as it could. Therefore, the Court reasoned that equitable tolling countered the advantage that Defendant gained by withholding potential Plaintiffs' contact information, and delaying the order on conditional certification through no fault of Plaintiff and collective action members. Id. at *7. Additionally, tolling did not prejudice Defendant as it was on notice of the potential claims when Plaintiff filed this action. Id. at *8. Defendant also asserted that the proposed § 216(b) notices lacked neutrality. The Court, however, disagreed and stated that in the introduction, the initial notice contained the statement that the Court had not yet ruled on the merits of claims or defenses asserted by any party to the case. Id. The Court granted approval to provide the notices to potential collective action members for the previous three years. Id. at *9. Finally, the Court found that Defendant was not entitled to preliminary discovery as the Court did not have to resolve factual disputes, decide substantive issues on the merits, or make credibility determinations at the conditional certification stage. Accordingly, the Court adopted the Magistrate Judge's recommendations.

Collinge, et al. v. IntelliQuick Delivery, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35858 (D. Ariz. Mar. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former delivery drivers, brought an action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors in violation of the FLSA and various state wage & hour laws. The Court had conditionally certified Plaintiffs' FLSA collective action, and subsequently Defendant moved for decertification, arguing that Plaintiffs and the collective action members were not similarly-situated. Plaintiffs also sought class certification of four sub-classes of freight drivers, route drivers, on-demand drivers, and FMLA-covered drivers. The Court denied Defendant's motion, and granted Plaintiffs' motion in part. As to Defendant's motion, Plaintiffs claimed that opt-in class members were similarly-situated to the named plaintiffs because they were victims of a common policy or plan that mischaracterized them as independent contractors when in fact they were employees. Both parties agreed that the test for determining whether the drivers were employees was the economic realities test, which utilized a non-exhaustive list of six factors set forth by the Ninth Circuit in Real v. Driscoll Strawberry Associates, Inc., 603 F.2d. 748 (9th Cir. 1978). Id. at *6. Defendant conceded that Plaintiffs were similarly-situated as to Real factors four, five and six, but argued that numerous disparities within the collective action as to Real factors one, two and three, including: (i) the degree of the employee's control over the work performed; (ii) the employee's opportunity for profit or loss; and (iii) the employee's investment in equipment used for the task. Id. at *7-8. The Court noted that all of Defendant's drivers were subject to the same work contract that, according to Defendant, set forth the parameters of the working relationship. Id. at *8. More importantly, once hired, Defendant trained the drivers and subjected them to a series of uniform standard operating procedures. Id. Despite this evidence, Defendant asserted that it exercised a disparate degree of control over its individual drivers' work performance. The Court observed that the declaration of a driver, on which Defendant relied on to establish that they did not exercise enough control, was too vague to be informative. Id. at *12. Accordingly, based on the evidence, the Court concluded that all drivers were similarly-situated with the other drivers. Second, Defendant argued that drivers were not similarly-situated with regard to the second Real factor. Defendant pointed out that the three named Plaintiffs were able to increase profits by requesting more on-demand work beyond regular routed delivery work; were able to order deliveries to achieve maximum deliveries; and were able to reduce operating costs by investing in a vehicle with good gas mileage. Id. at *22. The Court found that Defendant's argument failed because they did not establish that Defendant deprived other drivers of these same opportunities. Id. Finally, Defendant asserted that the drivers were not similarly-situated with regard to the degree with which they invested in their own equipment or materials. Defendant pointed out that various Plaintiffs purchased their own cargo scanners and other communication devices, whereas others did not. The Court observed that the evidence established that at least with respect to those items, Plaintiffs did invest in equipment required for the job to varying degrees, which weighed in favor of decertification. Id. at *24. The Court, however, remarked that the drivers were similarly-situated with regards to five of the six economic realities test factors, which was sufficient to defeat Defendant's decertification motion. The Court reasoned that there was nothing unfair about litigating a single corporate decision in a collective action, especially where there was robust evidence that the workers performed uniform, cookie-cutter tasks mandated by a one-size-fits-all corporate manual. Id. at *26. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for decertification. Relative to Plaintiffs' motion for Rule 23 class certification on the state claims, the Court granted it in part, but denied it as to claims for unjust enrichment and restitution for Defendant's allegedly unconscionable contracts. Because a class-wide proceeding would not be able to generate common answers apt to drive the resolution of Plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claims, the Court concluded that commonality was lacking and accordingly, denied class certification under Rule 23.

Cortes, et al. v. Market Connect Group, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 133750 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 30, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, a nationwide service organization, violated the California Labor Code through the combined effect of its handbook policies, actual practices, and time-keeping system. Id. at *4. Defendant employed hourly non-exempt sales staff, which it called field representatives, who worked at retail stores and promoted sales. Id. at *2. Defendant used two software systems – Komtel and Natural Insight – to record time, and both systems recorded time in blocks. Id. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's time-keeping system violated the California Labor Code because both the systems failed to capture the gaps in shift times, and neither system allowed employees to record meal or rest breaks. Id. Plaintiff further alleged that although Defendant did not subject its employees to daily observation or instruction, it issued a standardized, nationwide field handbook that outlined the company's employment policies and procedures, and the policies and actual practices violated California's Labor Code. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant failed to reimburse the expenses associated with employees' use of computers, printers, internet connections, and cameras ("technology expenses"), and the expenses associated with employees' use of vehicles to travel between multiple assignments on the same day ("mileage expense"). Id. at *19. Plaintiff moved for certification of a class of all of Defendant's non-exempt, hourly employees, and sub-classes for his meal and rest period claims, and reimbursement for former employee claims. The Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiff's motion for class certification. The Court found that the nature of the work, work assignments, and working conditions made meal and rest break claims difficult to certify. Id. at *12. The evidence showed that the employees worked varying schedules without regular supervision, many worked part-time, and some moved from one assignment to another during the day, thereby showing that most class members might have taken breaks as desired. Id. The evidence also suggested that at least some of Defendant's employees either took breaks that complied with California law or followed the policies of the stores in which they worked, and thus there was insufficient evidence showing that the entire class was subjected to the same non-compliant practice with regard to meal and rest breaks. The Court thus found that Plaintiff's proposed meal and rest break class failed to raise a common issue, and the amount of variations or possible variation in practice precluded a finding of predominance as to the sub-class. Id. at *17-18. The Court similarly determined that different travel requirements precluded class treatment for Plaintiff's mileage claim. Although it was undisputed that Defendant required some employees to travel between assignments, but did not pay them for their travel, Defendant pointed to evidence that it subjected different types of employees to different scheduling requirements and allowed employees to choose the days to carry them out within the deadline given, and for some it was optional. Id. at *21-23. The Court, however, reasoned that there was a significant common question concerning the necessity of the technology expenses because Defendant's handbooks required employees to have access to a personal computer and the internet, and required them to download and review materials for each new assignment, but Defendant failed to reimburse employees for these expenses. Id. at *19-20. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiff's reimbursement claims, and all derivative claims, including a former employee sub-class, were suitable for class-wide treatment. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Court granted in part Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

David, et al. v. Bankers Life And Casualty Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 85968 (W.D. Wash. June 30, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a state court class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime pay in violation of the Washington Minimum Wage Act. Defendant, an insurance company, contracted with insurance sales agents to sell its products. While Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant's agents were employees, Defendant contended that its agents were independent contractors. After Defendant removed the action, the Court remanded the case, finding that Defendant failed to establish that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. On remand, the state trial court certified a state-wide class of more than 1,000 agents and former agents, following which Plaintiffs asserted a claim for damages exceeding $16.9 million. Defendant again removed the case and moved to decertify the class, which the Court granted. Previously, the state trial court had certified a class of all individuals who worked as agents for Defendant in Washington between June 16, 2008 and December 2, 2013, and who were classified as independent contractors. Id. at *2-3. The state trial court held that Defendant exerted a substantial degree of control over what products agents could sell, as well as their training, prospecting, marketing, sales, and customer service methods. Id. at *3. The state trial court emphasized that, under Washington law, it should liberally construe the requirements of Washington Civil Rule 23 and err in favor of certification, although it must conduct a rigorous analysis of each of Rule 23's requirements to determine whether class certification is appropriate. Id. Defendant argued that the state trial court's liberal construction of Washington Rule 23 was inconsistent with how federal Rule 23 is interpreted, and that the state trial court's ruling should be viewed as erroneous or at least revisited now that the action had been removed. Id. Defendant further contended that the certified class failed to satisfy Rule 23's commonality and predominance requirements, as Defendant did not control how its agents performed their job duties and the agents controlled their ability to make profits. Id. at *3-4. The Court found the evidence established some agents, depending on such factors as their seniority and their manager, had control over their schedules, location, and work hours; could forego reporting to managers; were permitted to sell products other than those of Defendant; and were able to hold other employment. Id. at *17-18. The Court observed that was not the case for all class members, and such variations would materially affect the employment-status analysis. Id. at *18. Looking at the economic reality of agents' experiences, the Court determined that different class members had different relationships with the company during the class period. Id. at *19. The Court opined that determining whether class members were employees or contractors under the economic-dependence test would require an individualized inquiry into each agent's employment experience. Id. If the class action was maintained, the Court would have to undertake individualized inquiries into each agent's ability to regulate his own hours. Id. at *22. Because a central question in this case was not subject to common proof and would necessitate mini-trials that would overwhelm the litigation, the Court concluded that common issues did not predominate. Id. at *22-23. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to decertify the class.

Frlekin, et al. v. Apple, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92768 (N.D. Cal. July 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of hourly-paid and non-exempt employees, brought a class action seeking compensation for time spent undergoing exit searches pursuant to Defendant's bag search and technology-card search policies and for time spent waiting for such searches. Id. at *4. Concerned with internal theft of its products, Defendant implemented a written policy called the "employee package and bag searches" policy, which imposed mandatory searches of employees' bags, purses, backpacks or briefcases whenever they left the store. Id at *5-6. Defendant kept employee time-keeping systems within the store and required employees to clock-out prior to undergoing a search, and thus employees' recorded hours worked which did not account for the time waiting for a search to be completed. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs alleged that under the FLSA and various state laws, including the California Labor Code, the time spent waiting for bag searches to be completed was compensable. Id. Defendant moved for summary judgment against all individually-named Plaintiffs for all claims. The Court denied summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' California state law claims in light of the varying fact patterns regarding wait times and reasons for bringing a bag. Id. at *4. Following the U.S. Supreme Court's review of Busk v. Integrity Staffing Solutions, Inc., 713 F.3d 525 (9th Cir. 2013), which addressed the compensability of security screenings under the FLSA, the Court later dismissed Plaintiffs' FLSA claims, as well as New York, Massachusetts, and Ohio state law claims. Plaintiffs then moved for certification of a class of over 12,400 current and former hourly-paid and non-exempt specialists, managers, and "genius bar" employees who worked in Defendant's 52 retail stores in California since July 25, 2009. Id. at *3-4. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion because Plaintiffs met Rule 23's requirements. First, the Court found that Plaintiffs met the requirements of ascertainability, numerosity, commonality, and typicality. Plaintiffs submitted that they could identify more than 12,400 employees through Defendant's computer-based employee records, and that they all allegedly suffered a similar injury, i.e., unpaid wages due to Defendant's enforcement of bag search policy. Id. at *14. Further, the Court determined that Plaintiffs met the adequacy requirement as the interests of each class representative were aligned with the class members. Id. at *15. Finally, the Court limited the theory of liability to the issue of whether Defendant had to pay Plaintiffs for standing in line without regard to the reason they brought the bag. The Court had earlier raised a concern that individual issues would predominate in a class-wide adjudication because employees could choose not to bring a bag in the first place, and inquired as to whether the case could be limited to the issue of whether Defendant had to pay Plaintiffs for standing in line without regard to the reason they brought the bag. Id. at *19. After two rounds of supplemental briefing on the issue, Plaintiffs' counsel agreed to limit the theory of liability to the main issue, and the Court therefore certified the class to adjudicate whether or not Defendant had to compensate employees for time spent waiting for bag searches to be completed "based on the most common scenario, that is, an employee who voluntarily brought a bag to work purely for personal convenience." Id. at *21. Because the notice would invite members of the class with special needs to bring a bag to work to intervene or to opt-out, the Court noted that consideration of issues raised by way of intervention would be manageable, and thus, common issues would predominate over any individual issues likely to be actually raised. Id. at *21-22. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Frlekin, et al. v. Apple, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 151937 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of hourly non-exempt employees, brought an action seeking compensation for time spent waiting for and undergoing exit searches pursuant to Defendant's bag search and technology-card search policies. Id. at *4. Defendant implemented a written policy called the "Employee Package and Bag Searches" policy, which imposed mandatory searches of employees' bags, purses, backpacks, or briefcases whenever they left the store. Id. Defendant kept employee time-keeping systems within the store and required employees to clock-out prior to undergoing a search, and thus their recorded hours worked did not account for the time waiting for a search to be completed. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs alleged that under the FLSA and various states' labor laws, the time spent waiting for bag searches to be completed was compensable. Id. Following denial of summary judgment to Defendant as to Plaintiffs' California state law claims, Plaintiffs moved to certify a class of current or former hourly-paid employees who worked at one or more California retail stores from July 2009 to the present. Id. at *8-9. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. It certified the class to adjudicate whether or not Defendant had to compensate its employees for time spent waiting for bag searches "based on the most common scenario, that is, an employee who voluntarily brought a bag to work purely for personal convenience." Id. The Court also gave both parties a second opportunity to move for summary judgment. After both parties filed summary judgment motions, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment and denied Plaintiffs' motion. The Court found that simply because the bag searches solely benefitted Defendant and were mandatory did not mean that the time was compensable, particularly when employees could have decided not to bring bags to work. The Court noted that Plaintiffs brought bags for personal convenience, and that some employees did not bring bags to work and thus avoided the exit bag search. Id. at *20-21. The Court also found that Defendant's searches had no relationship to Plaintiffs' job responsibilities; instead, they were peripheral activities relating to Defendant's theft polices. Id. at *33. According to the Court, Defendant could have alleviated theft concerns by prohibiting its employees from bringing personal bags or personal Apple devices into the store. However, Defendant took the lesser step of giving its employees the optional benefit of bringing such items to work, which came with the condition that they must undergo searches when leaving the store. Id. at *28. The Court therefore concluded that participating in the exit bag search was completely optional, not a work requirement, and thus not compensable. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, and denied Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment.

Green, et al. v. Federal Express Corp.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 10500 (9th Cir. June 22, 2015). Plaintiff, a handler and customer service agent, brought a class action alleging that FedEx failed to pay hourly employees for work during unpaid meal and rest breaks, and failed to pay for all hours worked, including off-the-clock work. Plaintiff sought to certify two classes of employees that FedEx failed to pay, including: (i) for all clocked from the time they started their scheduled shift and from the time they ended their shift to the time they clocked-out (the "unpaid on-the-clock class"); and (ii) for work performed during unpaid meal breaks (the "working meal break class"). The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's order. The Ninth Circuit held that absent a policy that prevented FedEx employees from using that time for their own benefit, Plaintiff could not show class-wide control by FedEx. Id. at *3. Without demonstrating class-wide control, Plaintiff could not satisfy the requirements of Rule 23(b)(3), because individual fact inquiries concerning whether FedEx controlled each employee would predominate over any common question. Id. at *3-4. The Ninth Circuit concluded that the District Court's finding – that FedEx did not have a policy limiting how employees could use their time when they were clocked-in but not on-shift – was not clearly erroneous. Id. at *4. Each of FedEx's Rule 30(b)(6) designees had testified that FedEx did not have a policy limiting what an employee could do with their time when they were clocked-in but not on-shift. Id. The designees had also testified that they saw no reason why the employees would not be able to leave the FedEx premises after clocking-in as long as they returned and were ready to work by the time their shift started. Id. While some employees at the Los Angeles branch thought that they could not leave the premises after clocking-in, employees at the San Diego office testified that they were free to leave the premises after clocking-in. Id. at *4-5. The Ninth Circuit thus determined that taken together, this evidence demonstrated that the District Court's conclusion was not clearly erroneous relative to the issue that FedEx did not have a uniform policy that automatically placed all of the potential class members under FedEx's control as soon as they clocked-in. Id. at *5. The Ninth Circuit found that the District Court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to certify the working meal break class. Id. The District Court had concluded that Plaintiff's evidence did not adequately tie her allegation that FedEx failed to pay employees for time spent working on meal breaks to a proper and reliable measure of damages for work done on those breaks. Id. at *6. The Ninth Circuit opined that Plaintiff's common method of proof – electronic scans of packages during designated meal breaks – did not show that FedEx knew or should have known that its employees were working during their break periods. Id. The Ninth Circuit reasoned that FedEx had no obligation to sift through the volumes of electronic data produced by the scanning devices to determine whether its employees were actually taking their authorized breaks. Id. at *7. The Ninth Circuit thus held that Plaintiff had failed to provide a common method of proof that would require FedEx to compensate its employees on a class-wide basis. Id. For these reasons, the Ninth Circuit ruled that the District Court's decision to deny class certification under Rule 23(b)(3) was not an abuse of discretion. Id.

Hanks, et al. v. Briad Restaurant Group, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23536 (D. Nev. Feb. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay the lawful minimum wage because Defendant improperly claimed eligibility to compensate employees at a reduced minimum wage rate under Article XV, § 16 of the Nevada Constitution. The Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss in part, and denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Id. at *2. First, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' claims under the Nevada Constitution should be dismissed because there was no private right of action or relief provided under the statute. Id. at *9-10. Whether a private cause of action can be implied is a question of legislative intent, and the Court observed that without this intent, it could not create a cause of action no matter how desirable that might be as a policy matter, or how compatible with the statute. Id. at *11-12. Here, neither party disputed that §§ 608.102 and 608.104 of the Nevada Amendment Code ("NAC") do not explicitly provide for a private right of action, and the Court did not find intent by the Nevada Legislature to create a private right of action pursuant to these regulations. The Minimum Wage Amendment ("MWA"), however, provided that an employee claiming violation of this section may bring an action and shall be entitled to all remedies available under the law or in equity appropriate to remedy any violation of this section. Id. at *12-13. Thus, the Court found that it was the MWA, and not the NAC, which provides a private right of action for minimum wage violations by employers. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court dismissed with prejudice Plaintiffs' claim under §§ 608.102 and 608.104. Id. Defendant also contended that Plaintiffs' claim of an alleged violation of the MWA should be dismissed for failure to allege a claim upon which relief may be granted. The MWA requires that employers provide qualifying health benefits when it pays an employee a wage less than the upper-tier minimum wage. Qualifying health benefits are benefits for the employee and the employee's dependents at a total cost to the employee for premiums of not more than 10% of the employee's gross taxable income from the employer. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant offered three of the named Plaintiffs the company health insurance plan, which failed to cover those categories of health care expenses that are generally a deductible by an employee on his or her individual federal income tax return, if such expenses had been borne directly by the employee. Id. Plaintiffs also alleged that the health plan offered had premium costs that exceeded the constitutionally-prescribed maximums. The Court opined that these allegations sufficiently plead a cause of action for violations of the MWA, and thus denied Defendant's motion as to this claim. Id. at *14. Plaintiff also sought certification of a class comprised of all employees in Nevada who received less than the upper-tier hourly minimum wage set forth in Nevada Constitution. Id. at *16. The only evidence Plaintiffs provided was a table showing the Nevada minimum wage rates over the past eight years and a resume setting forth their law firm's qualifications for representing the proposed class. The Court observed that a party seeking class certification must provide at least some evidence to support each contested Rule 23 requirement for certification. Id. at *20. Because Plaintiffs failed to provide such evidentiary support, the Court denied the motion for class certification without prejudice. Id.

Hurst, et al. v. First Student, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 143638 (D. Ore. Oct. 22, 2015). Plaintiff, a bus driver, brought a putative class action in state court alleging that Defendant failed to pay drivers for hours spent completing driver training and an orientation program and sought unpaid minimum wages and a civil penalty under Oregon labor laws. After the state court certified the class, Defendant removed the case. Defendant then moved for summary judgment against the civil penalty portion of the case, and for an order decertifying the civil penalty class, which the Court denied. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment on the basis that Plaintiff's civil penalty claim was time-barred from collecting civil penalty. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's claim could be split into two separate causes of action, including one for unpaid minimum wages, and one for an additional civil penalty. The Court, however, found that based on a plain reading of ORS § 653.055, where there is a single act by an employer (e.g., failing to pay a minimum wage for hours worked), Oregon case law authorities have held that civil penalty can arise from an employer's failure to pay minimum wages, and is not a separate cause of action. Id. at *6. The Court determined that the common contention was whether Defendant employed Plaintiff and others similarly-situated during its training program and failed to pay them a minimum wage. Id. at *8. The Court remarked that the answer to this question would establish whether Defendant was liable for damages to the entire class. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff met the typicality requirement because an employer's single act or course of conduct giving rise to class members' claims was sufficient to show typicality. Id. As to the adequacy requirement, Defendant contended that Plaintiff's inability to collect a civil penalty created a conflict with class members who were entitled to the penalty. Id. at *9. The Court, however, remarked that once a Plaintiff proves a violation of Oregon's minimum wage law, Defendant is liable for unpaid minimum wages and is potentially liable for a civil penalty. Id. The Court noted that collection of a civil penalty was limited by a three-year statute of limitations. Id. Plaintiff did not dispute that he was outside the limitations period, and the Court noted that the only difference between Plaintiff and the individuals outside the statute of limitations was the amount of damages that they could collect if Defendant was liable for failing to pay minimum wage. Id. The Court observed that under the Ninth Circuit law, the measure of damages was not a disabling conflict of interest; in other words, so long as Plaintiffs were harmed by the same conduct, disparities in how much they were harmed did not defeat class certification. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff's individual claim for civil penalties, and declined to decertify the civil penalty portion of the class.

Johnson, et al. v. The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co.*, Case No. 15-CV-5745 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 22, 2015). Plaintiff, an employee at an auto service center owned by Defendant, a tire wholesaler that also operates auto services centers offering retail automotive repair services, claimed that he was not paid for taking money to the bank after hours, that his bonus was not factored into overtime, and that his wage statements were deficient with respect to the monies paid and including an employee identification number. Plaintiffs brought this action under the FLSA and various California state laws regulating payment of wages. Plaintiff moved for class certification under Rule 23 of two sub-classes regarding the California claims, including one relating to employees who were not paid enough (either overtime or base pay that they were owed) and one relating to defective wage statements. Id. at 2. The Court denied certification as to all classes, finding that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate predominance of common questions as required by Rule 23(b)(3). Id. Regarding the uncompensated bank runs, the Court held that because the company's policy required paying employees for this time and the testimony indicated that the policy's application varied based on supervisors and locations, class certification was not appropriate because there was no common policy of denying payment. Id. at 3-4. Similarly, with respect to the overtime calculation, Plaintiff did not produce sufficient evidence that the alleged violation was subject to class-wide proof. On the deficient wage statements, the Court held that because the application of the identification number law differed based on whether employees utilized paper or electronic wage statements, common issues did not predominate. In light of these factors, the Court denied class certification. Id. at 6.

Kellgren, et al. v. Petco Animal Supplies, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 118615 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 3, 2015). Plaintiff brought a collective action alleging that Defendant willfully and improperly classified Assistant Store Managers ("ASMs") as exempt under the FLSA. Plaintiff claimed that he performed primarily non-managerial duties, and that he was denied overtime pay because of the alleged willful misclassification. Plaintiff moved for conditional certification, which the Court granted. Id. at *18. The written job description for the ASM position circulated by Defendant's company headquarters showed that the ASMs maintained the same, company-wide job description. Id. at *7-8. The testimony of Defendant's corporate designee, Lance Schwimmer, also established that all ASMs participated in the same training program to ensure uniformity in stores nationwide. Id. at *8. Defendant provided an Assistant Manager Training Guide to train ASMs nationwide. The Court also noted the testimony of Plaintiff and two opt-in Plaintiffs, that not only shown that ASMs were subject to the same company-wide job description and corporate policies, but also that they performed similar tasks and duties while working as ASMs. Id. Additionally, Schwimmer testified that all ASMs were classified as exempt from the FLSA's overtime provisions and were paid on a salaried basis. The Court reasoned that while the exemption status may not alone establish that potential collective action members were similarly-situated, Plaintiff presented evidence beyond ASMs' exempt status to demonstrate similarity. Id. at *9-10. Defendant argued that Plaintiff failed to show he was similarly-situated to potential collective action members with respect to performing primarily non-exempt duties as an ASM. Id. The Court observed that arguments pertaining to the merits of claims during the first stage of the collective action certification analysis were not determinative. Id. at *12. Plaintiff showed that he and potential opt-in Plaintiffs were commonly affected by Defendant' centralized policies and procedures for ASMs. Id. at *12-13. Further, the Court remarked that if ASMs were entitled to overtime wages, it was because of Defendant's overarching policy to classify ASMs as exempt, despite the non-managerial duties they primarily perform. Id. at *13. The Court opined that Plaintiff had established the necessary common treatment of all ASMs to warrant notice to potential opt-ins and conditionally certify the collective action. Id. at *13-14. Moreover, the Court held that Plaintiff was not required to show that Defendant's policies for training, instructing, and compensating ASMs were unlawful at the initial state of the certification analysis, and that requiring Plaintiff to establish that ASMs were misclassified as exempt employees at this stage forced it to prematurely decide the merits of Plaintiff's claim based on a disputed and incomplete factual record. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion to conditionally certify the collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. at *18.

Kenneth, et al. v. Enterprise Drilling Fluids, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 146388 (E.D. Cal. Oct. 28, 2015). Plaintiff, a mud engineer, brought an action under the FLSA and the California Labor Code seeking wages and compensation for meal and rest periods. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant required mud engineers to work 24-hour shifts, often for periods of two weeks or more at Defendant's worksite, and that they routinely worked with no actual rest period. Id. at *3. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant regularly and systematically, as a policy and practice, failed to pay Plaintiff and class members all wages due. Id. at *4. Plaintiff sought certification of a class of all mud engineers who worked for Defendant for hours which they were not compensated at the minimum wage or fully compensated at the properly calculated overtime wage. Id. Plaintiff also sought to represent a California-based class, including all mud engineers or mud engineer trainees in California who worked for Defendant within the four years preceding the filing of this action. Id. at *5. In addition, Plaintiff identified a sub-class which included only class members that ended their employment with Defendant during the class period, but who were not timely paid the accrued and unpaid wages owed to them. Id. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's class claims and strike the class allegation on the basis that Plaintiff was not similarly-situated to the other individuals in the FLSA collective action. Defendant argued that the collective action definition was improper because Plaintiff defined the FLSA collective action to include mud engineers who worked for Defendant Enterprise Drilling Fluids, Inc., Berry Petroleum Company, LLC., and/or Linn Operating Inc., and thereby attempted to join three different and separate classes into one. Id. at *8. Plaintiff acknowledged the error and sought leave to amend the complaint. The Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss with leave to amend. Id. As to the California-based class and its sub-class, Defendant argued that classes could not satisfy Rule 23 requirements. The Court disagreed. Although Plaintiff failed to state the number of mud engineers with whom he worked, or facts to support a determination that the proposed sub-class was sufficiently numerous to satisfy the requirements of Rule 23(a), the Court noted that Plaintiff alleged facts sufficient to support his assertion that he was an adequate representative, and that common issues predominated over individual inquiries. Id. at *13-17. In his complaint, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant acted as co-employers and/or joint employers of Plaintiff and the class members, and subjected Plaintiff and the class members to the same unlawful business practices. Id. at *13. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant determined the class members' daily rate of pay, set their hours and/or work schedule, and had the power to cause the class members to work and/or prevent them working. Id. at *16. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant had a policy and practice of failing to pay Plaintiff and class members the wages due to them and a policy and practice of failing to properly calculate overtime pay due to them. Id. The Court therefore found that the pleadings sufficiently supported that a class action was the superior method of adjudicating the claims. Id. at *18. The Court therefore denied Defendant's motion to strike the class action allegations and granted leave to Plaintiff to file a second amended complaint.

Kilbourne, et al. v. The Coca-Cola Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 118756 (S.D. Cal. July 29, 2015). Plaintiff, a delivery driver, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, despite having an official policy prohibiting off-the-clock work, practiced a de facto policy of requiring drivers to keep working through their breaks in violation of the California Labor Code. Id. at *2-2. Plaintiff alleged that drivers routinely performed work activities – specifically, generating invoices, delivering products, and driving between customer locations – while clocked-out for meal periods. Id. at *3. Plaintiff moved for certification of a class of 1,445 current and former employees in California for unpaid off-the-clock claims and proposed two sub-classes for his off-the-clock and derivative claims. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's own records would show that drivers worked off-the-clock. Id. Defendant required each driver to record work hours using the Kronos computerized time-keeping system, and Plaintiff contended that Defendant maintained a "corporate charge" or directive requiring its supervisors to review driver manifests and a document register, which would show that drivers worked off-the-clock. Id. at *4. Thus, according to Plaintiff, the existence of Defendant's records, coupled with the corporate charge or directive, would generate a common, class-wide answer to the question of whether Defendant had constructive knowledge of drivers working off-the-clock.

Id. at *26. The Court denied class certification, finding that Plaintiff failed to show commonality. Id. Specifically, Plaintiff failed to demonstrate the existence of Defendant's purported directive requiring supervisors to review the document registers during driver debriefs. Id. at *26-27. The Court found that the delivery optimization modules, upon which Plaintiff relied to support his driver debrief process, were not company-wide directives, but training materials that articulated a recommended process, which each individual distribution center decided whether or not to implement. Id. at *27. Furthermore, Defendant offered significant evidence in the form of declarations from approximately 20 Distribution Center Managers throughout California, who represented that they did not follow the recommended debrief process outlined in the modules, and that the distribution centers did not have one common, streamlined approach to reviewing or using driver records. Id. at *30. The Court reasoned that determining whether supervisors reviewed document registers during driver debriefs or otherwise and thus had constructive knowledge of employees working off-the-clock would require an inquiry into each distribution center or supervisor's respective practices. Plaintiff argued that the existence of Defendant's Kronos records and document registers alone were sufficient to establish a common method of proof among the class. Id. at *31-33. While it was undisputed that Defendant supervisors reviewed Kronos records for missed meal periods, the Court held that Plaintiff failed to provide evidence that Defendant required supervisors to review document registers or the documents that would show that drivers worked while clocking-out for lunch. Id. at *33-34. The Court thus concluded that, without evidence of a company-wide practice of reviewing and comparing the Kronos data with the document registers, Plaintiff's purportedly common method of proof amounted to no more than determining liability on an individualized basis. Id. *41-42. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

McCowen, et al. v. Trimac Transportation Services Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171591 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 23, 2015). Plaintiff, a truck driver, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant was liable for a wide variety of wage & hour violations under the California Labor Code, including failure to pay drivers the compensation they were due and failure to provide meal and rest breaks. Plaintiff sought to certify four sub-classes, asserting claims under the California Labor Code, California's Unfair Competition Law, Industrial Welfare Commission Wage Order Nine, and the California Private Attorneys General Act. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification. Id. at *2. Defendant did not oppose certification of the wage claims or of the derivative claims to the extent they were based on the wage claims. Id. at *10. Defendant opposed certification of the meal and rest break claims on the grounds that they failed to meet the commonality and typicality requirements of Rule 23(a) and the predominance and superiority requirements of Rule 23(b). Id. Defendant argued that the record was insufficient to establish that its employees were uniformly deprived of meal and rest breaks. Id. at *15. The Court rejected this argument, holding that common legal and factual questions existed regarding the extent of such conduct. Id. at *18. As to the typicality requirement, the Court found that the named Plaintiff was a California-based local, intrastate driver who worked for Defendant throughout the relevant class period, and frequently missed meal breaks. Id. at *20-22. Accordingly, the Court found that the typicality requirement was met. Id. at *21-22. The Court further determined that the predominance requirement was established since Plaintiff sufficiently demonstrated that class-wide legal questions predominated because the legality of Defendant's compensation system, which was applied uniformly to drivers, was at the foundation of each of the wage claims. Id. at *24. Finally, the Court ruled that superiority was satisfied as class treatment was likely to reduce litigation costs and promote efficiency. Id. at *28. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification. Id. at *29.

Medlock, et al. v. Taco Bell Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 167132 (E.D. Cal. Dec. 11, 2015). In these consolidated class actions, Plaintiffs asserted claims against Defendants arising from alleged violations of the California Labor Code relating to payment of minimum wages and overtime and the provision of meal and rest breaks. Plaintiffs also asserted claims under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). Plaintiffs moved to certify eight sub-classes. The Court only certified the meal break sub-class and denied the motion for certification of the seven other sub-classes. Id. at *5. The Court later granted Plaintiffs' motion to amend the class certification order in part, and certified a meal premium class and a rest break class. Id. at *7. Defendants filed a motion to decertify the class, and the Court denied the motion. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to meet the commonality and typicality requirements. Defendants asserted that the named Plaintiffs were not typical to the class. The Court, however, noted that all three named Plaintiffs were non-exempt employees of Defendants during the class period, and were subjected to Defendants' policies for meal period and rest break scheduling. Id. at *13. Therefore, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs were typical to the class. Plaintiffs argued that California law requires employers to provide meal breaks to the fifth hour of work and that Defendants' meal break policy violated California law because they provided for meal breaks after the fifth hour of work. Id. at *14. Plaintiffs pointed to §§ 226.7 and 512 of the Labor Code, and the Industrial Welfare Commission's ("IWC") Wage Order No. 5, in support of their argument that an employer must give mandatory meal breaks after the fifth hour. Id. at *14-16. In order to establish commonality, Plaintiffs focused on language in Defendants' "Hourly Employee Guide," which stated that an employee was required to take a full 30-minute, uninterrupted meal period after 5 hours of work, unless 6 hours completed their work. Id. at *16-17. The Court found that the wording of the Hourly Employee Guide was persuasive evidence, which supported Plaintiffs' claim that Defendants had a policy to not give meal breaks until after the fifth hour of work. Id. at *23. The Court also acknowledged the language in Brinker Restaurant Corp. v. Superior Court, 53 Cal. 4th 1004 (2012), where the California Supreme Court stated that employer liability with respect to a class of employees may be premised on a uniform policy which violates California wage & hour law. Id. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs identified a common issue that established this liability, and accordingly, denied Defendants' motion as to extended meal break class. In their underpaid meal period premium class, Plaintiffs contended that the automatic payment system generally underpaid employees for meal premiums because it paid only a half-hour's worth of pay when California law requires a full hour's worth of pay. Id. at *27. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs met the commonality requirement because the focus of the action would be on the conduct of Defendants and their policy as opposed to the conduct of the individual class members. Id. at *28. Similarly, the Court found that Defendants' written policy documents suggested that Defendants did not authorize a second rest break in some circumstances where California law requires a second rest break. Id. at *31. Finding that this was an issue common to the entire class, the Court held that the commonality requirement was satisfied. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to decertify Plaintiffs' underpaid meal period premium class and rest period class.

Melgar, et al. v. CSK Auto, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170833 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 22, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of Store Managers ("SMs"), Assistant Store Managers ("ASMs"), and Retail Service Specialists ("RSSs"), brought a putative class action for Defendant's failure to reimburse business expenses pursuant to California Labor Code. Defendant had a policy that required each store to make a daily bank deposit. Plaintiffs alleged that they regularly used personal vehicles to make trips to the bank, and Defendant did not reimburse them for these expenses even after numerous complaints about not being reimbursed. Id. at *3-4. In seeking certification, Plaintiffs proposed a class of all current and former employees of Defendant who worked at least one shift as SMs, ASMs, and/or RSSs in California at any time from June 26, 2009, through the conclusion of the action. Id. at *2. The Court granted certification, but narrowed the class definition as all current and former employees for Defendant who worked at least one shift as SMs, ASMs, and/or RSSs in the State of California at any time from June 26, 2009 through the date of class certification, who used a personal vehicle to make a bank deposit on behalf of Defendant, and who was not reimbursed for incurring that business expense. Id. at *40. In narrowing the class definition, the Court agreed with Defendant that the proposed class definition was overbroad and was not reasonably tied to the alleged wrongful conduct. Id. at *17. The Court noted that Defendant had a clear policy communicated to employees that they were entitled to reimbursement for use of personal vehicles for company business if the employee first made a request for reimbursement, and a class could not be certified if it was apparent that it could contain many employees who did not suffer an injury. Id. at *17-18. The Court further found the proposed class definition problematic in that it put an end date for the class period as "through the conclusion of this action," and Plaintiff did not explain how the end date was workable. Id. at *19. The Court therefore modified the class definition. To the extent Defendant criticized the use of self-identification as an unreliable process, the Court pointed out that Defendant could have kept records indicating whether an employee used a personal vehicle to make a bank deposit and whether the employee was reimbursed for that business expense, and thus Defendant's failure should not be held against its employees so as to preclude class certification. Id. at *23. The Court found that any potential conflict due to the unique interests of SMs could be dealt with by setting up sub-classes. The Court acknowledged that there might be potential conflict unique to SMs such that their interests might be different from those of ASMs and RSSs. Id. at *38. The Court therefore proposed to redefine the class by creating an ASM/RSS sub-class and a SM sub-class. The Court otherwise found that Plaintiffs met Rule 23 requirements. The Court noted that a fair number of the 4,000 employees used their personal vehicles to make a bank deposit but were not reimbursed, and there was a common proof that Defendant expected daily bank deposits to be made, knew that personal vehicles could be used to make the trips, and did not do anything at a company-wide level to encourage reimbursement requests other than making its policies available to employees. Id. at *27-28. While the Court agreed that some individualized inquiries were likely, because each class member would have to affirmatively certify that he or she used a personal vehicle and was not reimbursed, it noted that the individualized inquiries would not be as extensive as Defendant suggested. Id. at *31-32. To the extent Defendant argued that the affirmative defenses of equitable estoppel and laches would lead to individualized inquiries, the Court noted that Defendant gave no indication that its defense would be different from the rejected waiver defense, i.e., that the employee failed to make a request for reimbursement for the first instance. Id. at *33-34. The Court accordingly granted in part Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Minns, et al. v. Advanced Clinical Employment Staffing LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71946 (N.D. Cal. June 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of healthcare providers, brought an action against Defendants alleging violations of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Defendant Advanced Clinical Employment Staffing, LLC ("ACES") contracted with Defendant Sutter East Bay Hospitals ("Sutter") to provide temporary employees during labor disputes between Sutter and its permanent employees. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant HRN Services Inc. ("HRN") contracted with ACES to provide nurses to Sutter. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants failed to pay for all hours worked, failed to pay a premium wage for missed meal and rest periods, and failed to provide accurate wage statements. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs moved for class certification, and the Court granted the motion. HRN contended that the sub-class of HRN employees was not sufficiently numerous and that its employees were not geographically dispersed. At the outset, the Court observed that Rule 23 does not require class members to be geographically dispersed to maintain a class action. Id. at *19. The Court remarked that Plaintiffs submitted evidence showing that there were over 1,400 class members, 149 of whom were employed by HRN, and these individuals traveled to California from 32 different states. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied the numerosity requirement. HRN further contended that the class was defined too broadly, making it unmanageable. HRN also argued that the proposed class included a great number of individuals who could not have been harmed by HRN's allegedly unlawful conduct, and that the class and sub-class were improperly based on subjective criteria. Id. The Court opined that contrary to HRN's arguments, the class and the sub-class were defined in objective terms based on employment with HRN and/or ACES and placement in California during the labor dispute, and that the class members could be identified from Defendants' employment records. Id. at *21. The Court explained that the class definitions did not rely on any subjective criteria, and that the challenged practices applied to the entire class and sub-class. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the class definitions were not overly broad. Plaintiffs contended that common issues predominated and that Plaintiffs could prove their claims through common proof. Plaintiffs asserted that common questions – such as whether traveling by bus to cross picket lines was a principal activity and therefore, compensable, and whether waiting at the hospital upon arrival and prior to departure was compensable – predominated over individual issues. The Court found that these issues could be established thorough common proof. For example, whether Defendants were joint employers could be determined based upon the contracts between Defendants and class members. Id. at *24. In addition, the Court observed that Defendants' liability for transit time and waiting time depended on whether traveling by bus to cross a picket line was a principal activity of a strike replacement nurse, which could be determined by common proof. Id. With regard to meal and rest breaks, the Court determined that Plaintiffs had submitted evidence that prior to May 2013, Defendants had a policy of not paying missed meal and rest breaks, and that they did not inform class members of their entitlement to take a second meal break. Id. The Court, therefore, reasoned that this too could be determined through common proof. Id. at *26. Accordingly, the Court held that common issues predominated and granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Moore, et al. v. Ulta Salon, Cosmetics & Fragrance, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 159477 (C.D. Cal. Nov. 16, 2015). Plaintiff, on behalf of a group of current and former employees, alleged that Defendants failed to compensate them for time spent off-the-clock undergoing mandatory exit inspections in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiff contended that Defendants required all hourly employees to have an exit inspection each time an employee left the store for a rest break, meal break, or at the end of their shift. Id. at *7. Plaintiff asserted that Defendants' 2011 New Hire Orientation manual included a chart entitled "end of shift routine" that identified certain tasks and expectations regarding those tasks such as: (i) clean up/close all incomplete projects; (ii) unlock belongings; and (iii) bag checked at front. Id. at *7-8. Plaintiff moved for class certification, and the Court granted the motion. The Court noted that Plaintiff presented common questions such as whether the manual and handbook required employees to: (i) use clear bags when bringing personal items into the stores; (ii) lock those items in lockers while they were working; and (iii) undergo exit inspections before they exited the store. Id. at *36. Defendants argued that even if the bag checks occurred off-the-clock, the time spent waiting for and undergoing exit inspections was de minimis and not compensable. Id. at *38. The Court observed that Defendants had not raised their de minimis defense in their pleadings, and even if they did, the common questions; i.e., testimony by Plaintiff and her experts explaining whether off-the-clock inspections were required and/or permitted, and how much time employees spent waiting for and undergoing bag checks, were susceptible to common proof. Id. at *39. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff satisfied the commonality requirement. As to predominance, Defendants argued that its policy was not uniformly carried out. The Court, however, rejected this argument, finding that to the extent that there were minor deviations from the policy at the store level, they had not yet been shown to predominate over the critical common question, i.e., whether the application of Defendant's written exit inspection policy resulted in employees not being properly compensated for their work. Id. at *65. The Court remarked that even if Defendants succeeded in showing that their written policy was applied in different ways in different stores, common questions still predominated over any individual ones that would likely arise. Id. at *66. The Court reasoned that liability questions – such as: (i) whether time spent waiting for and undergoing exit inspections was hours worked under California law, (ii) whether hourly employees were paid for all hours worked, and (iii) Defendants' de minimis defense – were all susceptible to common proof, and predominated over individual questions. The Court held that those questions could all be answered through common evidence, and did not require individualized determinations. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Nelson, et al. v. Avon Products, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51104 (N.D. Cal. April 17, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of District Sales Managers ("DSMs"), brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant improperly misclassified them as exempt from overtime wages in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant hired them mainly for recruiting representatives to sell its products, and provided them with materials to assist in prospecting and training representatives, including promotional materials, product samples, recruiting tents, and other props. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs also alleged that they exercised no control over Defendant's operating or managerial policies, and Defendant subjected them to substantial supervision. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs moved to certify a class of all individuals employed by Defendant in California as DSMs from April 8, 2009 to the present. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion, finding that Plaintiffs met all the Rule 23 requirements. While Defendant did not dispute that the class was sufficiently numerous, it vigorously disputed commonality. Defendant contended that individualized inquiries would be necessary to determine how each DSM spent his or her time. The Court, however, considered each of Plaintiffs' proposed common questions to determine its capability of generating common answers, and held that Plaintiffs satisfied the commonality requirement. First, the Court found that the question of whether DSMs' duties and responsibilities involved work directly related to management policies or general operations could be determined on a class-wide basis because it did not rise or fall depending on how much time each DSM engaged in those activities. Id. at *19. Second, the Court found that the question of whether DSMs customarily and regularly exercised discretion and independent judgment was susceptible to common proof because Plaintiffs alleged that California precluded them from exercising direct control over representatives who were independent contractors. Id. at *20-21. Third, the Court found that the question of whether DSMs worked under general supervision was susceptible to common proof because the evidence showed that Defendant subjected class members to far more than just general supervision, including a uniform attendance policy, access to each DSM's daily calendar, and the monitoring of a DSM's performance goals. Id. at *21-22. The Court, however, found that the question of whether DSMs' duties and responsibilities involved the performance of non-manual work was not susceptible to class-wide resolution due to the wide disparity in testimony from named Plaintiffs and other DSMs regarding how much of their work involved manual labor. Id. at *19. Because even a single common question could satisfy the commonality requirement, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs met the commonality requirement. The Court also found that Plaintiffs met the typicality requirement as the named Plaintiffs and absent class members' claims were reasonably co-extensive with one another and slight variations in the manner in which Plaintiffs performed their jobs did not render them atypical. Id. at *24. Finally, the Court ruled that, even though individual differences existed among the named Plaintiffs and absent class members, the issues common to the class members predominated over those differences. The Court noted that Defendant's own argument that DSMs' responsibilities were directly related to management policies because they independently managed their own Avon business undercut Defendant's argument that individual inquiries would be required. Id. at *30. Because Plaintiffs did not base their theory on the specific type of supervision one Division Manager imposed on one DSM, but rather on Defendant's corporate policies that gave Division Managers wide latitude to exercise supervisory control over DSMs, and to impose additional supervision as needed, the Court concluded that the individual differences among DSMs as to whether they worked under only general supervision did not render class treatment inferior to individual actions. Id. at *31-32. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Nikmanesh, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.*, Case No. 15-CV-202 (C.D. Cal. Aug. 18, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former pharmacists, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant required them to take a training course, but paid them only for the course and the classroom portion, and did not compensate them for time spent on the home study and test portions. Id. at 2. In asserting FLSA violations, Plaintiffs estimated they worked anywhere from 11 to 20 hours of overtime to complete those portions of the course. Id. Plaintiffs sought to conditionally certify a collective action consisting of all current and former non-exempt employees who took the training course and were not compensated for the home study and test portions. Id. The Court granted the motion. The Court noted that at this early stage, Plaintiffs had to show that the course was an employer-sponsored training course, and that Plaintiffs were similarly-situated to the putative collective action members. Id. at 5. Under the facts of this case, the Court remarked that to show that an employer-sponsored training course is working time, Plaintiffs must show that at least one of the following criteria was not met: (i) attendance was outside the employee's regular working hours; (ii) attendance was in fact voluntary; (iii) the course, lecture, or meeting was not directly related to the employee's job; and (iv) the employee did not perform any productive work during such attendance. Id. The Court observed that there was no dispute that Defendant sponsored the course, and therefore, under the relevant regulations it was considered as hours worked, so long as it was directly related to the pharmacist's job. Id. at 6. Defendant argued that the training provided advancement for the pharmacists, and that it was not required for their present positions. The Court found that the training merely equipped pharmacists to perform another task in their existing roles. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs met their modest burden of showing that the course was employer-sponsored and directly related to the pharmacist's job. Id. Defendant also argued that Plaintiffs failed to show that they were similarly-situated to other Plaintiffs. Defendant contended that even if they failed to properly pay for hours worked on the course, this was not unlawful under the FLSA unless it resulted in underpayment of overtime or weekly minimum wages. Id. at 7. Therefore, according to Defendant, Plaintiffs must show that other pharmacists either took the course on an overtime basis or received less than a weekly minimum wage for the cumulative hours they worked. Id. The Court rejected this argument, finding that while collective action treatment required Plaintiffs to be similarly-situated, it did not require all inquiries to be common ones, and that the potential need for case-by-case review was not enough to defeat conditional certification at the early stage. Id. Accordingly, the Court conditionally certified the collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

O'Connor, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 116482 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 1, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors, and thereby denied them various California Labor Code protections. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant uniformly failed to reimburse its drivers for all necessary expenditures or losses incurred by the employee in direct consequence of the discharge of his or her duties, and uniformly failed to pass on the entire amount of any tip or gratuity that was paid, given to, or left for an employee by a patron. Id. at *5-6. Representing a putative class of approximately 160,000 drivers in the state of California, Plaintiffs moved for class certification. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion, finding that Plaintiffs met their burden of showing that a class could be certified on both the threshold employment classification question and their claim for converted tips under the Labor Code. Id. at *9. First, the Court found that Plaintiffs met the ascertainability requirement as Defendant maintained business records with respect to each of its drivers, and thus membership in the class could be easily ascertained from the records. Id. at *22. Second, the Court determined that Plaintiffs met the numerosity requirement as the records showed that roughly 160,000 individuals drove for Defendant in California since August 2009, which would meet the class definition. Id. at *24. Third, the Court reasoned that Plaintiffs met the commonality requirement as numerous legal questions in the litigation would have answers common to each class member, including the common issue of whether all class members should be classified as employees or independent contractors. Id. at *25. Fourth, the Court held that Plaintiffs met the typicality and adequacy requirements as the named Plaintiffs' legal claims arose from essentially the same conduct underlying their fellow class members' claims, and none of the named Plaintiffs' credibility problems were sufficiently severe to undermine their ability to serve as class representatives. Id. at *34-39. In addition, the Court found that Plaintiffs met the predominance requirement as it appeared that common questions would substantially predominate over individual inquiries with respect to class members' proper employment classification, and every consideration under the California common-law test of employment could be adjudicated with common proof on a class-wide basis. Id. at *112. Specifically, the Court noted that Defendant exercised a uniform amount of control over its drivers' work schedules; Defendant maintained a uniform ability to monitor certain aspect of its drivers' performance, and a uniform right to unilaterally terminate its drivers without cause. Id. at *61-78. The Court, therefore, concluded that the threshold question of class members' employment status could be adjudicated on a class-wide basis. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, but excluded all drivers who electronically accepted any contract with Defendant or its subsidiaries unless the driver timely opted-out of the contract's arbitration agreement from the class definition, finding that individualized issues as to whether Defendant's recent arbitration clauses were enforceable against class members would predominate over questions common to all putative class members regarding arbitration. Id. at *121-28.

O'Connor, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 165182 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former drivers, brought an action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors in violation of various protections in the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs brought claims for expense reimbursement and converted tips. Id. at *3. Previously, the Court had certified a class under Rule 23, but excluded all drivers who operated for a distinct third-party transportation company. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiffs then filed a supplemental motion for class certification of: (i) an expense reimbursement class; and (ii) a sub-class of drivers who worked for distinct third-party transportation companies. Id. at *5. The Court granted the motion in part. The Court observed that in its previous order, it declined to include in the class any drivers who drive through a third-party transportation company, as it was concerned that including the drivers would result in material variations that could defeat predominance. Id. at *10. The Court had explained that it was not foreclosing class certification for such drivers, but that a sub-class might be necessary if Plaintiffs were to demonstrate that an additional class of such drivers could be certified. Id. Thus, the Court had concluded in its previous order that while Plaintiffs could certify a sub-class of drivers who drive for Defendant more than 30 hours a week, Plaintiffs did not meet their burden to how such a class could be certified. Id. at *11. The Court had explained that Plaintiffs did not offer concrete evidence to show how many members of the sub-class could be identified for ascertainability purposes. Id. As to Plaintiffs' new motion, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to submit proof that they could define and objectively identify all drivers who drove for Defendant more than 30 hours per week. For this reason, the Court declined to certify a class of drivers who drive FOR a third-party transportation company. Id. at *14. The Court noted that in its previous certification order, it had excluded drivers who accepted contracts between June 21, 2014, and November 10, 2014 containing the Court's approved notice and opt-out procedures. Id. at *18. In doing so, the Court had relied on Gentry v.

Superior Court, 42 Cal. 4th 443 (2007), where the California Supreme Court held that contract with a conspicuous but meaningful opt-out class was procedurally unconscionable, if the agreement did not adequately disclose the disadvantages of the arbitration. Id. Relying on Gentry, the Court had found that determining whether a party felt free to opt-out required an individualized inquiry, it had excluded those drivers. Id. at *19. The Court further stated that in Sanchez v. Valencia Holding Co., 61 Cal. 4th 899 (2015), the California Supreme Court held that the contract drafter was under no obligation to highlight an arbitration clause, and any state law imposing such an obligation was preempted by the Federal Arbitration Act. Id. Plaintiffs argued that the arbitration agreement contained a non-severable waiver for claims under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"), making it unenforceable without every inquiring into whether there is procedural unconscionability. Id. The Court observed that when the illegal object is the very essence and mainspring of an agreement, the offending clauses cannot be severed. Id. at *40. Accordingly, the Court ruled that because the PAGA waiver could not be severed from the arbitration agreement, the arbitration agreement as a whole was unenforceable on public policy grounds. Id. at *43. Because the arbitration agreements were unenforceable, the Court concluded that it would not need to perform an individualized inquiry to determine if a driver was subject to general economic pressures per Gentry. Id. at *48. Accordingly, the Court certified the class of drivers who did not opt-out of Defendant's contracts from June 2014 to November 2014. Id. at *49. The Court also certified a class consisting of individuals to pursue their tips claim and expense reimbursement claim. Id. at *63.

Ogiamien, et al. v. Nordstrom, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22128 (C.D. Cal. Feb. 24, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay her and other non-exempt employees for the time spent on the bag check at the beginning and end of rest breaks and for waiting in line to conduct the bag check. Plaintiff moved for certification of a class comprised of non-exempt employees at Defendant's retail locations, excluding those who worked as commissioned salespersons at Defendant's full-line stores for the time periods during which they held that position, and excluding those who signed Nordstrom's Dispute Resolution Agreement, which contained a class action waiver. Id. at *3. The Court denied the motion for failure to establish predominance. The controlling issue before the Court was whether the common questions regarding the bag check policy and lost wages predominated over individual questions of liability, such as how many employees did not carry bags or were not checked. Id. at *8. The Court noted that case law precedents are less willing to certify classes where individualized inquiries are necessary to determine liability. Id. Here, Plaintiff conceded that employees without bags were not subject to the policy, and acknowledged that she could have avoided the inspections if she chose not to bring her bag. Further, Defendant's expert, who analyzed more than 1,700 employees in 12 different stores, found that more than a quarter of employees he observed left the store without any bags. The Court reasoned that if an employee did not carry a bag to work, the bag-check policy did not create any liability for Defendant with respect to that employee, and there were simply no lost wages. Id. at *9. Additionally, Plaintiff did not identify a specific company-wide policy or practice that allegedly gave rise to consistent liability. The plain language of the policy only stated that bags needed to be checked without mentioning the frequency. Although Plaintiff asserted that the bag checks were mandatory, the Court opined that the relevant question was not whether a bag check was mandatory once commenced, but whether the store mandated that all employees undergo checking before they left the workplace. Id. at *11. Here, the actual language of the policy did not indicate that bag checks were required each time an employee left the store, and at best, the language in the policy was ambiguous. Because Defendant's unrebutted evidence strongly suggested that the policy was tailored for random checks in design and in practice, the Court rejected Plaintiff's claims of lapsed enforcement. Id. at *12. Thus, without a specific, unlawful policy to establish consistent liability, the Court ruled that it would have to identify which employees took bags to work, identify the days the bags were carried, and determine whether a random inspection was conducted on those days. Id. at *15-16. Accordingly, the Court concluded that these individual questions predominated over questions affecting the entire class, and denied the motion for class certification.

Palana, et al. v. Mission Bay Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88091 (N.D. Cal. July 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former care workers, brought an action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt employees, and failed to pay them overtime and to provide meal and rest breaks in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs moved for certification of three classes, including: (i) an overtime class comprised of hourly employees who worked over 40 hours in a week or eight hours a day without overtime wages; (ii) a meal period class consisting of hourly employees who worked shifts of six hours or more without an unpaid 30 minute meal period; and (iii) a rest break class of hourly employees who worked shifts of more than six hours without unpaid 10-minute rest breaks every four hours or a fraction thereof. Id. at *6-7. The Court granted the motion. First, the Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied the numerosity requirement because they showed that there were 147 employees in the overtime class and estimated that most of the 152 employees for whom they received data qualified for the meal and rest break classes. Second, the Court determined that the questions of whether Defendant's uniform policy of denying overtime wages violated the FLSA and California law, and whether Defendant's uniform policy violated California law because it failed to pay Plaintiffs for an on-duty meal and to provide rest breaks, were common to the class. Id. at *9. Third, the Court opined that Plaintiffs satisfied the typicality requirements because Defendant subjected Plaintiffs to the same policies and they suffered the same injury as a result of the policies as did the class members. Fourth, regarding the adequacy requirement, Defendant asserted that the named Plaintiff Palana demanded $20,000 from Defendant to settle his case, and the named Plaintiff Soliven harassed a former employee and promised him that he would get $30,000 if he was part of the lawsuit. The Court noted that there is inadequacy only where the class representative's credibility is questioned on issues directly relevant to the litigation or there are confirmed examples of dishonesty. Id. at *12. Thus, because Defendant failed to show that the credibility of Palana and Soliven involved issues directly relevant to the litigation, the Court opined that they were adequate class representatives. Although Defendant's written policies stated that overtime would not be paid unless approved by management first, they argued that the Court could not determine whether Defendant properly classified any individual employee as exempt without a mini-trial on the exemption defense. Id. at *16. Plaintiffs contended that even if some employees did perform some work inside of clients' homes, in contravention of Defendant's policies, it was incidental to their jobs as caregivers and could not satisfy the requirements of the exemption under the FLSA or California law. The Court observed that the common question of whether a care worker employee, who performed, incidental to his or her work, some work inside a client's home was exempt from overtime pay under the FLSA or the California Labor Code predominated over questions affecting individual Plaintiffs and was a question for a jury's determination. Thus, the Court opined that the question of whether Plaintiffs were exempt, which was common to all class members and could be resolved on a class-wide basis, predominated. Id. at *19. Regarding the meal break class, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' assertion that Defendant enacted a uniform meal break policy that required employees to remain on-duty during meal breaks, thereby violating California law, constituted a question susceptible to common proof and capable of class-wide resolution. Id. at *20-21. The Court also opined that Plaintiffs' theory of liability that Defendant violated wage & hour requirements by failing to adopt a policy that authorized and permitted rest breaks was a legal issue capable of class-wide resolution. Id. at *22. Finally, the Court reasoned that because the complexities of class action treatment did not outweigh the benefits of considering common issues in one trial, class action treatment was the superior method of adjudication. Id. at *23. Accordingly, the Court certified Plaintiffs' proposed classes.

Plaintiffs, a group of food production and processing employees, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them for time spent donning and doffing mandatory personal protective equipment, and failed to provide them duty-free rest and meal breaks as required by the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs moved for certification of a class consisting of Defendant's current or former non-exempt hourly employees who worked at any time in the last four years. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs also proposed four sub-classes, including: (i) a donning and doffing sub-class; (ii) a mixed hourly worker sub-class; (iii) a waiting time penalties sub-class; and (iv) a wage statement sub-class. Id. at *7. The Court partly granted and partly denied Plaintiffs' motion. First, the Court denied certification of the donning and doffing sub-class. Although Plaintiffs complained that Defendant uniformly required them to perform off-the-clock donning, doffing, and sanitizing activities, they failed to show the predominance of common questions. Despite testimony from several dozen employees that Defendant required off-the-clock donning and doffing, an effectively equal body of testimony from the named Plaintiffs and putative class members described on-the-clock donning and doffing. Id. at *25. Several deponents who testified to donning and doffing off-the-clock also contradicted themselves, testifying also to doing so on-the-clock. Id. Further, the time for donning and doffing varied for each employee, and depended on their locations and efficiency. The Court found that, in light of such disparate applications, each class member would be required to make an individual case to establish Defendant's liability. Id. at *26. The Court therefore denied certification to the donning and doffing sub-class. Second, the Court granted certification of the mixed hourly worker sub-class as to their meal break claims. Plaintiffs defined this sub-class to include those who were required to be back at work within 30 minutes for meal breaks and within 10 minutes for rest breaks. Id. at *32. Plaintiffs described common issue of law and fact only as to the meal break violation asserting a company-wide policy. Defendant's employee handbook provided for a 30 minute lunch period without pay if employees worked more than 6 hours per day. Id. at *45. It informed employees that a supervisor would advise them of the length and time of the lunch period. Id. The handbook further provided for one additional 10-minute paid rest period after ten hours of work. Id. The Court found that Defendant's policy did not comply with California law, and the policy, as described in the handbook and its waiver practices, superseded the need for individual inquires. Id. at *52. Plaintiffs, however, failed to put forth any similar evidence on their rest break claim. Although the time-keeping data showed several thousand instances of meal break violations inconsistent with the policy expressed in the handbook, the evidence did not disclose when employees took rest breaks; therefore, Plaintiffs could not show whether Defendant actually offered putative class members rest breaks or not. Id. at *47-50. The Court therefore denied certification to the mixed hourly worker sub-class on their rest break claims. Third, the Court granted certification to the waiting time sub-class to the extent the claims were derivative of the meal break claims and contingent upon the same evidence. Id. at *64. Finally, the Court denied certification to the wage statement class, finding that Plaintiffs had not provided sufficient evidence to allow certification. Plaintiffs offered only one wage statement to show that Defendant offered non-compliant wage statements, and did not even show that all class members in fact received pay stubs. Id. at *70. Accordingly, the Court partly granted and partly denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Rai, et al. v. Santa Clara Valley Transportation Authority,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22175 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of transportation operators, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant forced them to work off-the-clock without compensation in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs moved for class certification, which the Court granted. The Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied the numerosity requirement as the evidence indicated that Defendant employed at least 1,083 people during the proposed class period. Id. at *14. Second, the Court determined that Plaintiffs satisfied the commonality requirement by presenting substantial evidence that Defendant maintained a policy not to pay operators for "split shift travel time" and not to compensate them for "pre-departure time" and "turn-in time." Id. at *17-18. Plaintiffs also presented evidence that Defendant maintained common policies and practices not to compensate operators for the time spent on checking bulletin boards and time spent with supervisors, and a common policy of compensating operators for driving time based on a pre-determined schedule rather than the actual time the operators spent driving. Id. at *25-26. As to these policies, the Court held that Plaintiffs raised common questions of whether the categories of time for which Plaintiffs sought payment were compensable and whether Defendant's compensation scheme violated law. Because the resolution of these questions would resolve "in one stroke" whether the class members have a legal right to compensation for the categories of time mentioned, the Court determined that Plaintiffs satisfied the commonality requirement. Id. at *28. Third, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs satisfied the typicality requirement because their claims were reasonably coextensive with the claims of the other class members. Although Plaintiffs' claims were not substantially identical to the other class members' claims, the Court found that the differences did not negate the fact that all proposed class members' claims were grounded on Defendant's same policies, practices and procedures. Id. at *37. Fourth, while Plaintiffs presented sufficient justification for their chosen strategy to establish that it was a method by which they could prosecute the action vigorously on behalf of the class, the Court found that the proposed class counsel's engagement in alleged misconduct in another lawsuit did not rise to a level sufficient to establish that they were not qualified and competent to represent Plaintiffs. Id. at *41-43. Further, the Court opined that Plaintiffs satisfied the predominance requirement under Rule 23(b)(3). In light of the prevailing nature of the common questions identified, the Court rejected Defendant's assertion that individual issues essential to liability predominated. Id. at *45. Plaintiffs also sufficiently explained to the Court as to how they intended to prove damages for their unpaid wages claims on a class-wide basis. Particularly, Plaintiffs offered the opinion of an expert who asserted that he could determine damages using standard methodology premised on data common to all class members. Id. at *49. Finally, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied the superiority requirement because the damages at issue were too modest for individual lawsuits to be practical, and each class member's potential damages recovery did not provide the incentive for any individual to bring a solo action prosecuting his or her rights. Id. at *52-53. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Randolph, et al. v. Centene Management Co., LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58873 (W.D. Wash. May 4, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendant uniformly misclassified her and other case managers as exempt from the FLSA's overtime protections. Plaintiff sought to conditionally certify a collective action consisting of case managers who worked as utilization review nurses for Defendant. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion. Id. at *11. Plaintiff submitted her own declaration and the declarations of nine opt-in Plaintiffs asserting that they worked for Defendant as case managers during the relevant statutory period, that they performed the same primary job duty, that they received compensation in the same manner, and that Defendant subjected them to similar performance standards and expectations. Id. at *7-8. They also attested that Defendant misclassified them as exempt and denied them overtime pay. Id. at *8. Although Defendant contended that the "cookie cutter" declarations submitted by Plaintiff were insufficient to establish her burden, the Court found that at the lenient first stage of conditional certification, the use of similarly worded or even cookie cutter declarations was not fatal to a motion to certify an FLSA collective action. Id. Defendant also attempted to highlight the individual differences between Plaintiff and putative collective action members' job duties. The Court, however, stated that in deciding whether potential Plaintiffs should receive notice, individual differences between putative collective action members need not be considered. Id. at *9. Defendant further argued that the Court should deny Plaintiff's motion because of manageability concerns, but the Court found the argument premature. Id. at *9-10. The Court determined that Plaintiff had met her burden of showing that she and the putative collective action members were similarly-situated, as she had submitted evidence that she and the putative collective action members had similar job titles, primary job duties, compensation policies, and performance standards. Id. at *10. Further, the Court found that Plaintiff's submissions indicated strong similarities among the putative collective action members and thus a reasonable basis for Plaintiff's claims of class-wide injury. Id. The Court thus concluded that this showing satisfied the lenient standard for conditional certification, and accordingly, granted Plaintiff's motion. Id. As a result, the Court directed the parties to meet and confer to determine whether they could provide a stipulated § 216 (b) notice form, and accordingly, reserved ruling on the proposed notice. Id. at *10-11. In addition, the Court directed Defendant to provide Plaintiff with a list of all collective action members and their contact information. Id. at *11.

Robinson, et al. v. Open Top Sightseeing San Francisco, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171555 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 22, 2015). Plaintiff brought a collective and class action against Defendant, a provider of sightseeing tours, alleging that Defendant failed to pay tour operators at an overtime rate for weeks where they worked more than 40 hours. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff had previously moved for conditional certification of an FLSA opt-in collective action, which the Court had granted. Plaintiff then moved for Rule 23 certification of two additional classes, including: (i) a "California class" to whom Defendant allegedly did not provide accurate wage statements and who also endured waiting time penalties; and (ii) a "section 17200 class" who were employed by Defendant prior to November 2009. Id. at *3-4. In regards to the Rule 23(a) factors to assess for class certification, while the Court found the numerosity, commonality, and typicality factors to be easily met, the parties disputed the factor of adequacy of representation. Id. at *7-9. Defendant challenged the adequacy of the named Plaintiff based on the fact that he was a former employee and that he only worked for Defendant for a few months. However, Plaintiff successfully moved the Court to add a new class representative, thus mooting this argument. Id. at *8. Defendant also challenged the adequacy of Plaintiff's counsel, accusing them of offering money to class members to keep them in the class. Id. at *8-9. In support of this argument, Defendant submitted a declaration of a putative class member who asserted that he was offered $800 by an employee of Plaintiff's counsel to meet with him after he withdrew his opt-in consent form. Id. at *9. After holding an evidentiary hearing, the Court found that there was not enough evidence presented to implicate Plaintiff's counsel so as to render them inadequate. Id. at *11-12. The Court also found that the Rule 23(b) factors were met, noting that predominance existed since the claims all involved a failure to pay overtime, failure to provide accurate wage statements, and failure to pay wages due upon termination. Id. at *12-13. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification. Id. at *14.

Sandoval, et al. v. M1 Auto Collisions Centers,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120136 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought an action alleging that Defendant's compensation scheme violated the FLSA and the California Labor Law. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's method of compensating rest breaks based on a "flag hour," which was an estimate of the amount of time it took to complete a particular job, did not compensate workers for rest breaks. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs also contended that Defendant's overtime compensation practices violated both the FLSA and the California Labor Law, and that Defendant did not compensate them for activities such as cleaning and attending meetings. Id. Plaintiffs sought to certify three classes, including: (i) a global piece-rate class; (ii) an overtime class; and (iii) a tolling class and three sub-classes, including an Autovest sub-class; a Serramonte sub-class; and a M1 sub-class. The Court partly granted the motion for conditional certification. Defendant first challenged Plaintiffs' standing with respect to the M1 sub-class, because no named class representatives worked at Defendant's Sunnyvale, Fremont, and Concord locations. Id. at *17. The Court noted that all three locations were part of the same legal entity registered under a fictitious name, with the real owner listed as M1 Collision Care Centers, Inc. Id. at *18. Since the named Plaintiff Sandoval worked at the Concord location, the Court concluded that he had a standing to represent a class of workers from all three locations. Id. The Court denied class certification as to the tolling class, finding that this case was related to Juarez v. Ali, Case No. 08-CV-121859, where class certification had been denied. Id. at *19. The Court found that by bringing this action, class members from Juarez were seeking to re-litigate class certification. Id. at *19-20. Plaintiffs next relied on Bluford v. Safeway, Inc., 216 Cal. App. 4th 864 (2013), where the California Supreme Court found that commonality exists on the question whether Defendant's piece-rate policy failed to compensate piece-rate workers with a separate payment for rest breaks in violation of California law. Id. at *25. The Court found that this case was similar to Bluford, as here Plaintiffs were paid an hourly flag rate based on an estimate of how long it took the average employee to perform the repair, including time for, among other things, rest breaks. Id. at *26-27. As this issue was common to all potential class members, the Court opined that the commonality requirement was satisfied. Id. at *29. The Court, however, found that Plaintiffs failed to show commonality on their non-repair tasks claim, because there was no evidence that Defendant maintained a formal policy of not compensating workers for training and waiting time. Id. at *32. Similarly, the Court determined that Plaintiffs did not show commonality on their overtime claims because Plaintiffs based their argument on the fact that Defendant should have calculated how many flag hours were completed during the first eight hours of work and paid overtime rates based on any flag hours completed thereafter. Id. at *35. The Court held that determining whether Defendant violated California overtime laws under this method appeared to be impossible to prove with common evidence. Id. at *36. The Court, however, ruled that Plaintiffs established commonality on their claim for violation of § 226 of the Labor Code, which requires employers to provide an accurate itemized statement in writing of the wages earned. Id. at *40. Finding that Plaintiffs also satisfied the other provisions of Rule 23, the Court certified a class limited to Plaintiffs' rest break and § 226 violations, consisting of all non-exempt piece-rate workers who worked for Defendant during the class period. Id. at *56.

Saravia, et al. v. Dynamex, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 136516 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 6, 2015). Plaintiff, a delivery driver, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified him and other drivers as independent contractors and denied them minimum and overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action. The Court granted the motion. The Court noted that Plaintiff submitted evidence that the delivery drivers had similar duties, as they performed local deliveries to Defendant's customers pursuant to the terms negotiated by Defendant. Id. at *24. The drivers signed agreements that classified them as independent contractors. The agreements did not have specific end dates, and did not include overtime or minimum wage protections. Id. at *24-25. Drivers were also responsible for paying many of their own expenses. Id. at *25. The Court observed that the deposition testimony of Defendant's Rule 30(b)(6) witness and the declarations of several opt-in Plaintiffs supported Plaintiffs' allegations. Id. The Court remarked that these similarities demonstrated that there was some factual basis for Plaintiff's allegations that Defendant misclassified its delivery drivers as independent contractors and improperly denied them minimum wages and overtime pay. Id. Defendant contended that there were numerous material difference among service providers that would make conditional certification inappropriate. Defendant demonstrated that while the agreements followed the same template as Plaintiff's agreement, they included different pay structures, such as straight commission, a per-route fee, or some combination of the two. Id. Defendant therefore argued that determining whether its delivery drivers were misclassified was a fact-intensive determination. Defendant cited to Silverman v. Smithkline Beecham Corp., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80030 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 15, 2007), where conditional certification was denied because the members of the collective action worked in eight different business units that operated in different ways, and Plaintiff failed to provide evidence that the alleged similarities were common across the different business units. Id. at *29. The Court remarked that while Defendant's transportation services providers used different business models and pay structures, they performed the same duties, they were all subject to the agreements based on the same templates, and they were all classified as independent contractors. Id. The Court reasoned that this case was far different from Silverman, and that Plaintiffs satisfied their modest burden at the conditional certification stage under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Accordingly, the Court conditionally certified the collective action.

Scott-George, et al. v. PVH Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 157410 (E.D. Cal. Nov. 19, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of non-exempt employees, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA by denying them overtime compensation and subjecting them to numerous illegal policies and procedures. Plaintiffs sought certification of eight sub-classes. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' two overtime sub-classes did not meet the numerosity requirement because Defendant's time records indicated that only 58 non-exempt California employees worked over 12 hours in one day. Id. at *8. Defendant contended that membership in the security bag check sub-class (sub-class III) was impossible to ascertain because there was no way to know which employees were subjected to bag checks. Id. at *9. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' pay card sub-class (sub-class IV) might be mooted by the settlement in Chavez v. PVH Corp., Case No. 13-CV-01797 (N.D. Cal.). Id. Defendant also contended that Plaintiffs failed to show numerosity concerning the meal period sub-class (sub-class V). Id. At the outset, the Court noted that although not all of the non-exempt employees would be included in each class, a large percentage of those employees were all subjected to the same pay structure. Id. at *10. As to the overtime sub-class, the Court observed that even if Defendant's number was true, 58 class members was sufficient for numerosity. Id. Defendant argued that determining the identify of class members for sub-class III was impossible because there was no way to determine which employees were subjected to bag checks. The Court remarked that a large percentage of the employees would have carried bags or purses to work in order to carry their belongings, such as wallets, keys, and phones. Id. at *11. These employees would be part of the sub-class and would therefore satisfy numerosity. Id. The Court also determined that because final approval of the settlement had not yet been granted in Chavez, it would not base its determination of whether to certify a class on the probability of what might happen in another legal matter. Id. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied numerosity. Defendant further asserted that common questions of law did not predominate for sub-class III's claims because individualized inquiries were required to determine whether time spent undergoing bag checks was compensable and to determine whether the de minimis defense was applicable. The Court observed that that the bag check policy was a universal policy that was applied to all employees who brought purses or bags to work. Id. at *27. Even assuming that the de minimis defense applied, the Court opined that the question of whether it was a valid defense was a common question that would generate a class-wide answer. Id. at *28. Likewise, the Court found that the legality of Defendant's policy that entailed automatic pay card issuing to employees did not require the Court to delve into each employee's subjective perception, and therefore Plaintiffs met the predominance requirement for sub-class IV. Id. at *29. Defendant also argued that managers had discretion as to the precise time an employee could take meal or rest breaks, and thus, common questions did not predominate for sub-classes V and VI. Defendant acknowledged that its policy provided a 30 minute meal period for every 5 consecutive hours, and a 10 minute paid break for every 4 hours worked. The meal and rest period policies were distributed to store managers via memos from Defendant's Human Resources Department with instructions to review the policy with all employees. Id. at *31. Plaintiffs averred that both policies were facially defective, and there was nothing ambiguous about the language of Defendant's policy. Id. The Court observed that the reasonable inferences that could be drawn by Plaintiffs' allegations constituted sufficient evidence to satisfy Plaintiff's burden of establishing predominance. Id. at *32-33. Accordingly, the Court certified the various sub-classes.

Senne, et al. v. Kansas City Royals Baseball Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 143011 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of minor league baseball players, brought a collective action under the FLSA alleging that Defendants, Major League Baseball ("MLB"), its member franchises, and its former Commissioner, failed to pay them the minimum wages and overtime compensation. According to the complaint, the Major League Rules ("MLR") gave MLB and the franchises extensive control over minor league baseball and the franchises paid the salaries and benefits of the minor league players. Id. at *44-45. Under the Minor League Uniform Player Contract ("UPC"), minor league players received payment only during the championship season despite obligating them to perform professional services on a calendar year basis, including the championship playing season, training season, exhibition games, and any official play-off series. Id. at *48-49. The UPC also required the minor league players to participate in the exhibition games and maintain their playing condition and weight during the off-season without any pay. Id. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action of all minor league players who worked for the MLB or any MLB franchise under the UPC since February 7, 2011. Id. at *49. Plaintiffs contended that they were similarly-situated under the FLSA because, under the MLR and the UPC, all of them worked without compensation during the off-season, played six to seven games a week, engaged in protracted travel during the championship season without receiving overtime pay, and adhered to the same grueling daily schedule on game days without receiving minimum wages. Id. at *84. Plaintiffs also claimed that during the championship seasons they worked more than 40 hours a week without any overtime compensation, and offered 40 declarations by minor league players which contended they shared common duties, responsibilities, and obligations regardless of the franchise or affiliate. Id. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion, finding that Plaintiffs met their lenient burden of showing that they were similarly-situated. Id. at *85. The Court noted that all of the declarations submitted by Plaintiffs stated that the players performed work during the off-season without any compensation. Id. Defendants argued that conditional certification should not be granted because the nature and quantity of the work performed by Plaintiffs during the off-season varied depending on numerous factors, including skill level and team, and that the activities Plaintiffs performed did not constitute work under the FLSA. The Court rejected these arguments and stated that such contentions could be appropriately addressed at the second stage certification process, when it could analyze the disparate factual and employment settings of the individual Plaintiffs and various defenses available to Defendants with respect to the individual Plaintiffs. Id. at *86. Plaintiffs demonstrated a nexus between their claims based on the fact that Defendants subjected them all to a uniform policy of paying a set salary without regard to the number of hours worked in a week, and therefore the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' allegations that they were subject to a uniform policy that resulted in failure to meet the minimum wage requirements and overtime compensation of the FLSA were sufficient under 29 U.S.C. § 216 (b). Id. at *90-91. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Taylor, et al. v. FedEx Freight, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64177 (E.D. Cal. May 15, 2015). Plaintiff, a truck driver, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, a leading transportation company, violated the California Labor Code by failing to pay adequate wages. Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that because Defendant compensated drivers solely based upon the mileage they drove, the compensation did not take into account non-driving activities performed during the course of a trip, including pre-and-post-trip inspections, trip related paperwork/placarding, and limited delay intervals. Id. at *7. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant did not provide meal and rest breaks and failed to provide accurate wage statements. Id. at *3. Plaintiff moved to certify a class of current and former line-haul drivers based on Defendant's alleged failure to pay adequate wages. Id. at *2. The Magistrate Judge recommended certifying the class. First, the Magistrate Judge found that Plaintiff met the numerosity requirement, as the evidence demonstrated that there were at least 100 line-haul drivers in California during the defined class period. Second, the Magistrate Judge determined that Plaintiff met the commonality requirement as Plaintiff challenged uniform policies and systemic practices that applied uniformly to the class of employees. Id. at *19. Because Defendant did not dispute the existence of the company-wide policy of mileage pay for non-driving activities, the Magistrate Judge concluded that the issue of whether Defendant's policies and practices complied with California's specific requirement was the type of question that could be answered on a class-wide basis. Id. at *18-19. Third, the Magistrate Judge ruled that Plaintiff met the typicality requirement as he presented a theory that involved Defendant's common practice and policy of denying all class members minimum wage for hours worked, and Plaintiff suffered the same injury as a result of the policies. Id. at *20. Fourth, the Magistrate Judge found that Plaintiff met the adequacy requirement as his current claims and interests were identical to the class, and his litigation record demonstrated his zealous advocacy on behalf of the class. Id. at *23. The Magistrate Judge noted that in Plaintiff's deposition, he admitted that he had filed several lawsuits against Defendant and would have filed more if he was still working; however, the Magistrate Judge opined that this did not rise to a level sufficient to show that he was an unduly antagonistic litigant against Defendant. Further, the fact that he had reached a settlement with Defendant in another class action alleging similar unpaid wage claims militated against any concern that Plaintiff was improperly motivated by animus toward Defendant. Id. at *21-24. The Magistrate Judge therefore concluded that Plaintiff was an adequate class representative. Further, the Magistrate Judge found that Plaintiff met the predominance requirement as Defendant's uniform pay policy was amenable to class-wide treatment. Id. at *30. Although Defendant argued that it was difficult to determine whether drivers used compensated time to perform other non-driving activities, the Magistrate Judge noted that Plaintiff's theory of liability did not require identifying specific hours that Defendant did not compensate below minimum wages; rather Plaintiff asserted that Defendant's pay plan systematically failed to separately compensate employees for non-driving activities, which was an appropriate class question that predominated over any individual questions. Id. at *32-34. Finally, the Magistrate Judge ruled that class action was a superior method to resolve the issue because all class members' allegations were based on uniform policies and practices giving rise to predominantly common questions of fact and law. Id. at *47. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended granting Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Thurmond, et al. v. Presidential Limousine,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109588 (D. Nev. Aug. 19, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of limousine drivers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them minimum wage and overtime in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs sought conditional certification of a collective action comprised of similarly-situated limousine drivers who worked for Defendant and were not paid overtime and minimum wages, and who were required to improperly share a portion of their tips with Defendant and/or their managers and owners. Id. at *2. The Court granted the motion in part. Id. at *11. Noting that the burden placed on Plaintiffs at the conditional certification stage is minimal, the Court found that Plaintiffs met their threshold burden of showing that they were similarly-situated to other limousine drivers employed by Defendant who did not receive overtime pay. Id. at *6-7. The Court, however, found that Plaintiffs failed to show that they were similarly-situated to a proposed collective action of drivers who were not paid minimum wage and/or required to share a portion of their tips with Defendant and/or their owners and managers. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court granted in part Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Torres, et al. v. Mercer Canyons, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 50492 (E.D. Wash. April 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of farm workers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Worker Protection Act and the Washington Consumer Protection Act by not informing them about the availability of higher-paying H-2A visa jobs. According to the complaint, Defendant hired the Washington Farm Labor Association to help it recruit H-2A workers for the 2013 season, and the DOL approved Defendant's H-2A application and issued a clearance order approving 44 workers for a defined period. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant never informed them of these jobs. In seeking class certification, Plaintiffs proposed an "inaccurate information class" consisting of all domestic migrant and seasonal farm workers employed as vineyard workers by Defendant in 2012, who sought employment or worked at Defendant's farm for a defined period. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs also proposed a sub-class of "unequal pay workers" who received less than $12 per hour without further referrals. Id. The Court granted class certification, finding that Plaintiffs met the Rule 23 requirements. First, the Court held that the proposed class and sub-class were sufficiently ascertainable, as the class could be determined through employment documents of Defendant and its contractors, and the sub-class by Defendant's payroll records. Id. at *6-7. Second, the Court determined that Plaintiffs met the numerosity requirement, since the putative class consisted of more than 600 identified individuals, and the sub-class of more than 200. Id. at *8. Third, the Court found that Plaintiffs met the commonality requirement because Plaintiffs presented the common question of whether Defendant had a consistent practice of failing to tell its workers about the availability of $12 per hour work for the inaccurate information class, and the question of whether Defendant had a practice of willfully withholding wages by failing to pay $12 per hour for the work covered by the clearance order for the sub-class. Id. at *8-9. Fourth, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs met the typicality requirement, as the representative Plaintiffs' claims arose from the same practice or course of conduct as those of the class members. Fifth, the Court concluded that Plaintiff met the adequacy requirement, for there was no evidence of any conflicts, Plaintiffs' attorneys were qualified and experienced, and the named Plaintiffs were able to act on behalf of the entire class. Further, the Court found that Plaintiffs met the predominance requirement as the question of whether Defendant had a policy to provide misleading information to job-seekers predominated over the exact interaction between individual job-seekers and Defendant. Id. at *16. Although Defendant contended that individual proof would be necessary to calculate the damages for each class member, the Court determined that a class action would be superior to other methods for resolving the controversy, since the cost of pursuing the claims individually outweighed any potential recovery, and there appeared to be no major impediments in managing the matter as a class action. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Tschudy, et al. v. J.C. Penny Corp., Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 165897 (S.D. Cal. Dec. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of part-time associates, brought a class action alleging that Defendant's "My Time Off Policy" ("MTO Policy") violated § 227.3 of the California Labor Code, which requires that all part-time and full-time employees receive a pro rata share of their vacation benefits when their employment with Defendant terminates. Id. at *3. In moving for class certification, Plaintiff proposed a class of part-time non-management associates ("PTNMAs") and management associates ("MAs") employed in California by Defendant for a defined period, who did not received MTO deposits. Id. at *6. Defendant moved for decertification of the class or, in the alternative, to modify the class definition on the basis that the class definition was overbroad. The Court granted Defendant's motion and determined that the class definition was overly broad and ambiguous. Id. at *13. First, the Court found that MAs were improperly included in the class definition. Defendant subjected MAs to a different vacation benefits package, and Plaintiffs, all PTNMAs, participated in different vacation benefit plans with a different waiting period and additional terms. Id. at *8-9. Second, the Court determined that Defendant's current employees must be excluded from the class. Plaintiffs' central allegation was that Defendant violated § 227.3 by not paying them for unused vacation time at the time they terminated their employment with Defendant. Because current employees could not have such a claim, the Court held that they should be excluded from the class. Id. at *10. Third, the Court held that PTNMAs with arbitration provisions should be excluded from the class. Defendant asserted that all PTNMAs employed after July 2009 were subject to arbitration as part of the employment relationship, and thus putative class members with arbitration provisions could not be included in the class. Finally, the Court ruled that the class was so ambiguously defined that three of the four named Plaintiffs did not appear to be class members because they received MTP deposits during the class period. Id. at *19. In addition, the analysis revealed that members of the class who worked the requisite number of hours, but did not comply with the one year employment condition to work until the first of the following month, would have unique claims requiring the application of principles of equity and fairness to resolve their claims. Id. Given such ambiguity, the Court declined to certify the proposed class, but granted Plaintiffs leave to file an amended class definition. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to decertify the class.

Vasquez, et al. v. First Student, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30631 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 12, 2015). Plaintiff, a former school bus driver, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the California Labor Code by failing to pay its drivers minimum wages for all hours worked and by failing to provide accurate wage statements. Plaintiff also asserted that Defendant paid drivers based upon the activities they performed without accounting for rest breaks as required by the California Labor Code. Plaintiff moved for class certification and proposed various sub-classes, including: (i) a minimum wage sub-class;

(ii) a rest break class; (iii) a wage statement sub-class; (iv) a piece-rate wage statement sub-class; and (v) a derivative wage statement sub-class. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion, finding that Plaintiff failed to meet the predominance requirement. Id. at *14. At the outset, the Court found that Defendant did not use a piece-rate plan to pay drivers as Plaintiff asserted. The applicable collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") showed that Defendant paid its drivers on varying hourly wages depending on driver's seniority. Further, although Defendant allocated set hours for each task to the drivers, drivers had the opportunity to correct the schedule with the actual hours worked if they found any discrepancies. Id. at *17. The Court thus found that Defendant did not pay drivers a single rate based on the task itself, but rather based on his or her hourly wage rate for the number of hours worked. Id. According to the Court, to the extent this system involved any discrepancies, it could not be resolved on a class-wide basis. As the Court explained, for Plaintiff to prove Defendant's liability relying upon a piece-rate system, an individualized inquiry would have to be conducted to determine: (i) whether drivers actually worked more than the time allocated for each task on a given day; (ii) whether drivers filled out an exception form to indicate he or she worked more hours; and (iii) whether Defendant paid drivers for the extra time worked. Id. at *17-18. The Court determined that individual issues predominated over any common issues that might exist relating to Plaintiff's minimum wages claim, and accordingly, denied certification to the proposed minimum wage class. The Court next found that substantial manageability problems precluded certification for the proposed rest break class. Plaintiff submitted no viable method "of determining when (or if) a particular driver took a rest break on a particular day, short of obtaining testimony regarding each driver at each location." Id. at *21-22. The parties lacked any records of rest breaks and provided conflicting declarations. The Court therefore held that individualized inquiries, unassisted by wage statements or similar date, rendered the rest break class unmanageable. Finally, the Court denied certification to the wage statement class and the proposed sub-classes, finding lack of sufficient evidence to allow certification. The Court noted that Plaintiff submitted only her own non-compliant wage statement, thus failed to show a common class-wide injury. Id. at *25. The Court further noted that, to the extent that drivers received non-compliant wage statements, an individualized inquiry would be necessary to see which wage statements did not comply (and if any complied after Defendant contacted its third-party vendor, who generated wages statements, about the error). Id. at *26. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Walden, et al. v. State Of Nevada Department Of Corrections,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 33129 (D. Nev. Mar. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of correctional officers, brought a collective and class action on behalf of themselves and all other similarly-situated individuals alleging various causes of action for unpaid wages under both the FLSA and the Nevada Revised Statutes. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant subjected all proposed class members to a common plan, policy, or practice of requiring them to perform various activities "off-the-clock" and without compensations allegedly in violation of the FLSA. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendant maintained this policy in regulations, operating procedures, and communications applicable to all its hourly paid correctional officer employees. Id. at *6. The uncompensated tasks allegedly included attending roll-call, picking up and dropping off equipment, and providing or receiving work-related information and communications prior to each shift. Id. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs had sufficiently alleged that they were "similarly-situated" to the proposed opt-ins to grant circulation of § 216(b) notice. Id. at *5. Although the proposed notice was based in large part upon other forms approved for use, Defendant raised several objections to it, including limiting the class claims to individuals who were not sergeants or lieutenants, and requesting a specific date to be set for filing the consent to join. Id. at *6-10. While the Court overruled Defendant's objection to limit the class claims, finding no basis to such limit, it agreed and held that the notice should be amended to include a date by which to file the consent form. Id. at *7-8. The Court also ordered amendments to the proposed notice to include disciplinary issue information relating to the effect of joining the action, and the information about the required approval of certain settlement amounts that exceed the statutory cap. Id. at *8-9. The Court further tolled the statute of limitations during the notice period, finding that equity warranted such tolling. Id. at *10-11. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for circulation of notice pursuant to § 216(b). Id. at *11.

Woods, et al. v. Vector Marketing Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32370 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of college-aged sales representatives ("SRs"), brought an action seeking minimum wage for the training program they underwent before starting as SRs. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs alleged that they were qualified as employees under the FLSA during their training program. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. This action was related to Harris v. Vector Marketing Corp., Case No. 08-CV-5198, a similar FLSA claim by California SRs, where the Court had granted certification. Id. at *4. Here, it was undisputed that the training program and payment policy were sufficiently uniform to make Plaintiffs similarly-situated to the putative collective action members. Further, Defendant's Legal Affairs Manager attested that the training program was subject to certain company-wide policies that were in place since 2011, including requesting personal recruit lists on the third day of training and requesting that the trainees identify prospective customers during the second day of training. Id. at *8. The Manager also stated that over 90% of Defendant's SRs had completed the initial training seminar. Id. Although Defendant did not dispute conditional certification, it argued that the universe of individuals subject to conditional certification and notice was overbroad and included individuals who were not similarly-situated to Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs offered to meet and confer to address Defendant's objections, including those related to individuals who completed on-line-only training, those related to individuals who agreed to arbitration, those related to individuals who did not complete all three days of training and did not provide a personal recruitment list, those related to individuals whose claims were time-barred, and those related to excluding members of the certified Harris collective action. Id. at *9-10. As a result, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification, subject to the parties' agreement on language defining the scope of the collective action. Plaintiffs proposed using a short Facebook advertisement, such that when a collective action member clicked on the advertisement, he or would be redirected to the case website that had the long-form notice and consent to join form. Id. at *12. The Court opined that using a Facebook advertisement was a useful form of ensuring actual notice because a substantial majority of the potential Plaintiffs were college-aged, who were particularly likely to maintain a social networking presence. The Court, however, opined that the exemplar ad provided by Plaintiffs needed refinement, and directed the parties to meet and confer regarding a stipulated form of the Facebook ad. The Court also concluded that electronic signatures were appropriate and granted Plaintiffs' request for electronic opt-ins. Electronic signatures were part of the ordinary course of business at Defendant's company, including with respect to its SRs, and Plaintiffs proposed sufficient safeguards, including a robust identity verification process, to ensure that the electronic signatures would be obtained in a way that minimized any disputes regarding authenticity. Id. at *17. Finally, the parties stipulated to toll the statute of limitations from May 15, 2014 through the date that the Court disposed of the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment. Plaintiffs also sought equitable tolling, on the basis of the delay caused by the case reassignment and argued that Defendant could have shortened the process of moving for conditional certification by informing Plaintiffs that it would not oppose substantial portions of the motion. The Court observed that consistent with the FLSA, good faith motion practice by a Defendant does not amount to wrongful conduct warranting equitable tolling of FLSA claims. Id. at *20. Further, the Court remarked that although the conduct of Defendant's counsel may not have been exemplary of the highest professional courtesy, Plaintiffs failed to show that counsel engaged in misconduct or misrepresentations reflective of bad faith or otherwise of the type that justified equitable tolling. Id. Thus, the Court denied Plaintiffs' request for equitable tolling.

Editor's Note: The notice provisions authorized by the Court in Woods represent some of the most pro-social media terms ever approved under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Woods, et al. v. Vector Marketing Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 118678 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 4, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and state labor laws by not paying trainees who underwent Defendant's mandatory three-day program. Defendant sold CUTCO-brand kitchen cutlers, kitchen accessories, and sporting knives through a "direct marketing" sales model that involved in-home sales appointments conducted by Defendant's sales representatives, whom Defendant required to attend training either on-line or via a three-day classroom seminar. Id. at *4-5. Although Defendant barred the trainees from selling any CUTCO knives during the training period, it asked them to make lists of potential customers and to schedule appointments with those people for demonstrations once training was completed. Id. at *7. Defendant also asked its trainees to provide a list of friends and other potential recruits who might want to train to become Defendant's sales representatives. Id. Defendant did not pay its recruits for any time they spent in training. Plaintiff represented employees who attended the classroom seminar, and alleged that Defendant's recruits were its employees, and Defendant improperly denied them wages. Id. at *8. After the Court granted conditional certification of the collective action relative to Defendant's trainees in California, Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a nationwide FLSA collective action and Rule 23 certification of classes of Defendant's employees who underwent in-person sales training in California, Florida, Illinois, Michigan, and New York. Id. at *12-15. The Court granted Plaintiff's motions, finding that the collective action members were similarly-situated and Plaintiff met the Rule 23 requirements for his state law class claims. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that a portion of the conditionally certified class should be decertified because there was a potential for variation on the issue of whether Defendant derived immediate advantage from the trainees' activities. Id. at *22. Specifically, Defendant argued that recruits that attended all three days of Defendant's training but who did not provide any recruit names to Defendant were not similarly-situated to those other recruits who provided recruit lists. Id. at *22-23. The Court found that any such variance was not sufficient to defeat final FLSA certification because it was undisputed that Defendant provided the same nationwide working environment for all its trainees and it had an undisputed policy of not compensating recruits for time spent in training. Id. at *23-24. Moreover, according to the Court, any such variance could be easily resolved at summary judgment or during a trial. Id. at *25. The Court therefore granted final certification of a collective action under the FLSA. In addition, the Court granted class certification relative to Plaintiff's state law claims, finding that Plaintiffs' proposed classes satisfied the Rule 23 requirements. The state-based classes included 23,000 potential members in California, 8,000 in Florida, 8,000 in New York, 4,000 in Illinois, and 3,000 in Michigan. Id. at *34. Plaintiff met the commonality requirement by raising the common question of whether Defendant's recruits were its employees under the laws of each of the five states at issue. Id. at *35. Plaintiff met the typicality and adequacy requirements, as there was no dispute that the named Plaintiff and putative class members suffered the exact same injury i.e., all were denied wages for the time they spent in training and were subjected to the same uniform policies and practices during training. The Court held that Plaintiff had no conflict of interest with the class members, regardless of whether any particular individual provided a recruit list or not. Id. at *40-41. Because each state law class action could be resolved on a uniform basis using class-wide common proof, the Court concluded that Plaintiff also satisfied the predominance requirement. Id. at *43. Finally, the Court rejected Defendant's argument that low percentage of opt-in responses meant that class members had individual interests in controlling his or her own individual lawsuit against Defendant, reasoning that Defendant's position was predicated on a fundamentally flawed premise, and Defendant presented no evidence to support its argument. Id. at *45-46. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification and final certification of a collective action.

Zackaria, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 67048 (C.D. Cal. May 18, 2015). Plaintiff, an asset protection coordinator ("APC"), brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant knowingly misclassified him and other class members as exempt employees in violation of the California Labor Code and thus failed to pay them overtime compensation, missed meal periods, or rest breaks. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs moved for class certification of all California-based salaried APCs in California from four years preceding the filing of the action to the final judgment. The Court denied certification, finding that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3). Id. at *14. The payroll records suggested that the day-to-day activities and level of discretion exercised by employees varied greatly from one APC to the next. While APCs supervised anywhere from one to twelve of more hourly-paid asset protection associates ("APAs"), certain APCs supervised only one employee, which showed that some putative class members did not customarily and regularly direct the work of two or more other employees sufficient to satisfy the factors of the managerial exemption. Id. at *28-29. The record further showed significant variation among APCs relative to their authority to hire and fire. Id. at *31. While many APCs testified that they did not have the authority to hire or fire employees, some of their declarations indicated differences in the way store managers delegated hiring and firing responsibilities to the APCs. Id. at *32. Regarding the administrative exemption factors, although many APCs stated that their primary tasks included conducting quality control audits and described it as "ordinary inspection work" that only required filing out checklists, some stated that they worked more on quality, safety and health, and compliance policy and it was actually supervisory work furthering the organization's goals regarding safety and security. Id. at *33-36. The Court also observed that the evidence suggested that the extent of supervision under which each APC operated differed by store and store manager, by experience level, by market asset protection manager, and over periods of time. Id. at *40. With such individualized APCs' work experiences, the Court concluded that the issue whether they primarily engaged in exempt duties could not be answered with common proof. Id. at *44-45. According to the Court, the common proof that APCs received very similar training and had identical overall job expectations was insufficient to establish the presence or absence of nearly all of the exemption conditions, and thus the merits could not be resolved without significant individualized inquiries. Id. at *49-50. The Court therefore held that common questions did not predominate, and accordingly, denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification. Id. at *50.

(x) Tenth Circuit

Blair, et al. v. Transam Trucking, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110188 (D. Kan. Aug. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of truck drivers, brought an action alleging that Defendant, a trucking company, violated the FLSA and the Kansas Wage Payment Act ("KWPA") by misclassifying them as independent contractors and by failing to pay minimum wages and making improper deductions. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action under the FLSA and for class certification under Rule 23. Id. at *4. The Court found that Plaintiffs established all the Rule 23 requirements and granted the motions. Plaintiffs established ascertainability by proposing a sufficiently precise and objective class of all leased drivers employed by Defendant who entered into an independent contractor agreement with Defendant and who leased a truck through Defendant's wholly-owned subsidiary since August 21, 2006,. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs established numerosity by estimating that class members included more than 1,000 drivers. Id .at *10. Plaintiffs showed commonality by raising the common question of whether class members were employees or independent contractors. Id. at *11. Plaintiffs established typicality and adequacy of representation as the named Plaintiffs' claims were similar to the claims of other class members, and they had no interests that were antagonistic to the rest of the class. Id. at *12. Plaintiffs proved predominance by submitting common evidence of the owner-operator handbook and independent contractor agreement, and the equipment lease agreements that were substantially the same for all drivers; based on this evidence, Plaintiffs asserted that the question of whether Defendant had the right to control Plaintiffs could be determined from this common evidence. Id. at *20. Plaintiffs established superiority by establishing similar claims among class members that made a class action a preferable method to resolve the dispute. Id. at *21. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs' proposed class satisfied the Rule 23 requirements and granted class certification for Plaintiffs' KWPA claims. In addition, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification under the FLSA on the basis that Plaintiffs were similarly-situated. The Court agreed that all potential collective action members received the same training and handbook of polices, and entered into the same independent contractor and equipment lease agreements. Id. at *26. Further, they all had essentially the same job duties of driving to make deliveries, and Defendant paid them all under similar per-mileage pay polices. Id. The Court thus found that Plaintiffs established that they were victims of a single decision, policy, or plan, sufficient to grant conditional certification at this notice stage of the case pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motions for class certification and conditional certification of a collective action.

Bustillos, et al. v. Board Of County Commissioners Of Hidalgo County,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 143522 (D.N.M. Sept. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of correctional officers, sergeants, and lieutenants, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and state wage & hour laws, as well as state law claims for breach of contract and unjust enrichment, by requiring them to work longer than the time allotted for their scheduled shifts without any compensation for the extra work. Id. at *2. According to the complaint, Defendant paid all Plaintiffs on the basis of pre-assigned shifts, did not allow them to leave their posts until relieved by the incoming employee for the next shift, and required them to do various clerical tasks after the end of their shift, such as reconciling call logs. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's practice resulted not only in Plaintiffs losing regular pay for the work done after the end of their shifts, but also resulted in Plaintiffs losing out on overtime pay. Id. at *3. Proposing two sub-classes of employees, Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action under the FLSA and certification of a class action under Rule 23 on their state law claims. Plaintiffs alleged that they performed largely the same duties within the proposed sub-classes and that Defendant subjected them to the same practices and all suffered the same method of calculation of wages owed. Id. at *8-10. The Court conditionally certified the case as a collective action but denied Plaintiffs' request for class certification without prejudice. Id. at *83. In granting conditional certification, the Court found that Plaintiffs have pled sufficient facts to demonstrate that they were similarly-situated within the meaning of the FLSA. The Court noted that Defendant employed Plaintiffs and other putative collective action members and that they worked in the same location performing similar job duties. Id. at *86-87. Further, Plaintiffs were all members of the same bargaining unit governed by the same County Labor Ordinance, and their damages were all derived from the same decision, policy, or plan of allegedly requiring pre-shift, post-shift, or on-call work. Id. at *87. Plaintiffs also supported their assertion that they were similarly-situated to putative collective action members by presenting proof through Defendant's posted job descriptions, deposition testimony, and its policies and procedures manuals. Id. at *94. The Court thus concluded that Plaintiffs showed a colorable basis for the claim of similarity, and accordingly granted conditional certification of a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court, however, denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification under Rule 23, finding that the class failed to meet the numerosity requirement. Id. at *100. Plaintiffs estimated 50 potential Plaintiffs and contended that joining each of them would be difficult in the extreme. Plaintiffs, however, failed to explain how joining those potential class members would be so difficult as only a handful of the proposed Plaintiffs resided out of state. Id. at *101. Further, Plaintiffs failed to establish that all 50 potential Plaintiffs were deprived of compensation, and at the hearing, Plaintiffs' counsel reiterated the possibility that significantly fewer than 50 people might join the litigation. Id. at *102. The Court therefore exercised its discretion in concluding that a class of potentially fewer than 50 employees did not satisfy Rule 23 requirement of numerosity. Although the Court found that Plaintiffs met all other requirements, including commonality and predominance, because of the uncertainty regarding the number of Plaintiffs eligible to join the action, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to certify under Rule 23 without prejudice and allowed Plaintiffs to renew their request later. Id. at *114. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action and certification of a class action.

Colbert, et al. v. Monarch Transportation, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7586 (D. Kan. Jan. 23, 2015). Plaintiff, a transportation aid, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant had a general policy and practice that willfully denied its hourly, non-exempt employees overtime pay in violation of the FLSA. Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant required its employees to work off-the-clock, including time before and after their shifts and during the mandatory unpaid meal break. Defendant admitted in its response brief that it operated under the policies with regard to automatic meal time deductions and on-call compensation. Id. at *2. Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action under § 216(b) of the FLSA for: (i) all hourly transportation aids, drivers, and others in similar positions who worked on-call for Defendant at any time during the last three years (the "on-call" collective action members), and (ii) all hourly, non-exempt employees who worked for Defendant and experienced an automatic meal break deduction at any time during the last three years (the "off-the-clock" collective action members). Id. at *6-7. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion. Id. at *19. Defendant focused its opposition on the fact that Plaintiff's declaration contained very conclusory and general allegations, and that she failed to provide the Court with names of any potential opt-in Plaintiffs, let alone actual declarations of other potential opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. at *8-9. The Court observed that there was not only Plaintiff's allegation that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of not paying overtime, but also Defendant's admission that the policies in question indeed existed. Id. at *16-17. Thus, the Court found that Plaintiff's allegations, combined with the fact that Defendant admitted to having the policies in question, was sufficient to satisfy the lenient notice-stage standard for conditional certification. Id. at *17. The Court approved Plaintiff's proposed notice of claims and consent to join. Id. at *18. The Court also directed Defendant to provide to Plaintiff a list of all employees constituting the collective action, with their last known addresses, phone numbers, and dates of employment in an agreeable format for mailing. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification. Id. at *19.

Geiger, et al. v. Z-Ultimate Self Defense Studios LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32731 (D. Colo. Mar. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former chief instructors, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors and failed to pay them minimum wage and overtime pay in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of the collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant had created a complex matrix of corporate entities that operated martial arts dojos. They contended that this scheme was specifically designed to shield Defendant from liability for violations of state and federal law, including the FLSA. Id. at *8. The Court remarked that while Plaintiffs' proposed notice generally provided adequate notice to potential Plaintiffs, Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate a valid basis to include in the notice the statement, "You are eligible to join this lawsuit if you believe you were paid less than $670.62 in any one-week period." Id. at *10-11. The Court noted that the statement must be excised from the notice. The Court ruled that because potential issues concerning tolling of the statute of limitations may remain, the notice would be distributed to Chief Instructors who worked for Defendant between March 10, 2011 and the present. Further, the Court ordered that the form of notice delivered to potential Plaintiffs would provide that any and all consent to join forms must be received by Plaintiffs' counsel no later than June 10, 2015. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action subject to amendment of Plaintiffs' proposed notice.

Koehler, et al. v. Freightquote.com, Inc.,* 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 182887 (D. Kan. Mar. 18, 2014). In this action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA by failing to pay overtime to three categories of its employees, Plaintiffs sought to represent sub-classes comprised of Defendant's employees who worked as account representatives, customer activation specialists, and truckload coverage specialists in the past three-year period. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant violated the FLSA by classifying these employees as exempt from the FLSA's overtime requirements, thereby denying them overtime pay. Id. at *2. In granting Plaintiffs' motion, the Court found that the evidence supported Plaintiffs' argument that they were similarly-situated to the putative collective action members because they had similar job requirements and pay provisions, and Defendant classified them as exempt under a common decision. Id. at *11. Moreover, Defendant conceded that employees in the three relevant job categories had similar job duties and that it did not pay overtime to the employees working in those three job categories. Id. at *13. The Court found these facts sufficient to conditionally certify Plaintiffs' FLSA claims as a collective action under the lenient notice stage standard, and therefore granted Plaintiffs' motion. The Court, however, denied Plaintiffs' request to approve the proposed notice to putative collective action members giving the parties time to mutually agree on a notice form and submit a joint proposal. Id. at *15. The Court also denied Plaintiffs' request for putative collective action members' social security numbers and dates of birth, finding that Defendant had already provided the information Plaintiffs sought to locate potential collective action members, and that the putative collective action members' privacy interests outweighed Plaintiffs' need. Id. at *16-17. The Court further denied Plaintiffs' request to order Defendant to post the proposed notice in conspicuous locations at its offices because Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate the need to post such notice. Id. at *18. Finally, the Court denied Plaintiffs' request to toll the statute of limitations period for the putative collective action members from the date of filing of Plaintiffs' motion for conditional class certification until the close of the opt-in period, since the request was premature. Id. at *22-23. The Court determined that it lacked sufficient information about the potential collective action members' diligence and that Plaintiffs might raise the issue again at the conclusion of the opt-in period when the Court would have more information about the putative collective action members. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification and denied Plaintiffs' other requests.

Lozoya, et al. v. AllPhase Landscape Construction, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42066 (D. Col. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendant's alleged policy of failing to pay employees for time spent traveling to jobsites ("windshield time") and of taking deductions from wages for equipment damaged on the job violated the FLSA and Colorado's minimum wage law. The Court had previously conditionally certified an FLSA collective action consisting of all Defendant's current and former hourly employees who performed landscape services and/or snow removal within the state of Colorado on or after April 28, 2009. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs then sought to certify the same class under Rule 23 with respect to their state law claims, which the Court granted. Id. at *2-3. First, the Court found the putative class consisted of approximately 450 employees. Id. at *3-4. Hence, numerosity was clearly established. Second, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to establish commonality because of differences in treatment between the different types of employees, e.g., foremen received pay for travel time whereas other employees did not, and that whether particular deductions were improper must be determined on an employee-by-employee basis. The Court found, however, that the issues of what Defendant's policies were and whether they were illegal were common to the class. Id. at *4. Third, Defendant argued that the named Plaintiffs were not typical of the class because they did not have each of the challenged types of deductions from their wages, none of them had deductions for H-2B visas, and none were irrigation technicians. The Court determined that Plaintiffs satisfied the typicality requirement because if they successfully proved that Defendant's policies were illegal, those types of differences among the Plaintiffs were predominantly an issue of individual damages. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs argued that certification was appropriate under Rule 23(b)(2) because they sought declaratory and injunctive relief to enjoin Defendant from continuing its allegedly illegal pay policies and procedures. Id. at *6. On the contrary, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs sought primarily money damages, and that Plaintiffs had not shown that the disputed policies were still in effect. Id. The Court ruled that class certification was appropriate under Rule 23(b)(2) because an injunction or declaratory relief could be fashioned that enjoined Defendant from continuing the main practices challenged in the complaint. Id. Finally, regarding Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement, Defendant argued that individualized questions predominated because certain employees did not have any deductions taken from their wages and foremen actually received pay for their travel time. Id. at *7. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied predominance because there were common questions as to what Defendant's policies were and whether they were illegal, and the more individualized issues could be dealt with as part of individual damages calculations. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Id.

Turner, et al. v. Chipotle Mexican Grill, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110933 (D. Colo. Aug. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees of Chipotle Mexican Grill, brought an action pursuant to the FLSA and state laws of Arizona, California, Colorado, and New Jersey, alleging that Defendant had a company-wide policy of requiring non-exempt hourly paid employees to work off-the-clock without pay. Id. at *4. Defendant operated a chain of non-franchised Mexican-style restaurants and employed more than 217,000 hourly employees known as "crew members." Id. Although Defendant's official time-keeping policy explicitly prohibited any off-the-clock work, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant deprived its hourly paid employees of compensation by incentivizing managers to understaff restaurants as well as through time-keeping devices that automatically punched employees off-the-clock, even if they continued working. Id. at *7. While Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action, Defendant argued that the lead Plaintiff, Leah Turner, had her chance to seek national collective certification in a related action entitled Harris v. Chipotle Mexican Grill, Inc., Case No. 13-CV-719, filed in the District Court of Minnesota, and thus her claim should be dismissed on claim preclusion and res judicata grounds and be limited to an individual action only. Id. at *9. The Court rejected Defendant's argument and granted Plaintiffs' motion. The Court noted that the named Plaintiff originally filed an action against Defendant in March 2013, but voluntarily dismissed it in October 2013, after consenting to join the Harris action then pending in Minnesota. Turner was excluded from the Harris action after the judge in that case rejected conditional certification of a nationwide collective action and limited the lawsuit to a single Minnesota store. Id. at *8. As a result, Turner re-filed her complaint in Colorado, moved for conditional certification of a collective action, and sought to toll the statute of limitations. Turner also included a proposed form of notice, a proposed consent to join form, three complaints filed with the Minnesota Department of Labor and Industry by Defendant's employees alleging new overtime violations, and declarations from four former employees supporting her allegations. Id. at *9. Finding that Plaintiffs' allegations established that the putative class members were together the victim of a single decision, policy, or plan, the Court granted conditional certification of a collective action. In doing so, the Court rejected the two-step certification approach to FLSA collective actions, finding that the FLSA was uniformly interpreted as allowing liberalized permissive joinder of any party Plaintiff "similarly-situated, " and the only requirement, per the statute, was that each Plaintiff files his consent in writing to become such a party and such consent was filed in the court in which such action was brought. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action and tolled the statute of limitations for 90 days.

Editor's Note: The decision in Turner is unique, and represents a distinct minority approach to interpretation of 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

(xi) Eleventh Circuit

Bradford, et al. v. CVS Pharmacy, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103616 (N.D. Ga. Aug. 7, 2015). Plaintiff, a Regional Loss Prevention Manager ("RLPM"), brought a collective action alleging that Defendant improperly classified him and all other RLPMs as exempt under the FLSA and therefore failed to pay overtime. Id. at *1. Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action consisting of current and former RLPMs. Thirty-eight individuals opted-in to the action after the Court granted conditional certification. Defendant subsequently moved for decertification, arguing that multiple distinctions in the job duties performed by various opt-in Plaintiffs revealed after discovery would necessitate individual inquiries into Plaintiff's claims. Id. at *4. In support, Defendant introduced testimony of various opt-in Plaintiffs, which revealed a number of differences in the duties they each performed. The differences included varying degrees of responsibility, unique duties, different levels of discretion, and independent judgment exercised by the various Plaintiffs in conducting investigations and audits. Id. at *5-7. The Court granted Defendant's motion, finding that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated. The Court held that the differences in the duties performed by the various Plaintiffs, as well as the varying degrees of discretion and independent judgment they each exercised, would make individualized inquiries inevitable when determining the applicability of a particular FLSA defense. Id. at *7. Plaintiff argued that the collective action members shared the same primary duty of performing audits and investigations, and the Court should only consider this relevant to the executive and administrative exemptions. Id. at *14-15. Defendant, however, submitted evidence to support its claim that Plaintiffs did not just perform audits and investigations. While the name Plaintiff testified that he only had auditing and investigating as primary responsibilities, an opt-in Plaintiff testified that his primary responsibilities included auditing, investigating, and training. Id. at *14. Given the various differences among the job duties, the Court found that it would have to conduct an individualized inquiry for each Plaintiff to determine his or her primary duties. Id. Plaintiff also argued that, because Defendant asserted only one defense against Plaintiffs, the issues could be heard together. The Court, however, rejected the argument, finding that Defendant had asserted two defenses; the executive and administrative exceptions, and even if Defendant had asserted only one defense, given the material distinctions between the respective job duties of Plaintiffs, it would still have to conduct a separate analysis for each Plaintiff to determine the applicability of that defense. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for decertification.

Boston, et al. v. United Florala, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28244 (M.D. Ala. Mar. 9, 2015). In this action alleging denial of overtime compensation under the FLSA, Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action comprised of hourly employees working at Florala Memorial Hospital's campus at any time in last three years period without receiving overtime pay for work in excess of 40 hours in any seven-day workweek. Plaintiffs presented declarations stating that Defendant did not pay its hourly employees overtime compensation if they worked in excess of 40 hours in a seven day workweek, unless the number of hours they worked exceeded 80 hours in a pay period. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs also stated that they did not enter into an agreement that Defendant would use a 14 consecutive day period to calculate overtime instead of a seven day period. Plaintiffs' declarants also averred that there were at least 50 employees subjected to Defendant's overtime practice, and that the number would likely exceed 100. Id. at *6-7. On this record, the Court found that Plaintiffs had met that stage one lenient standard for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) by submitting declarations detailing that Defendant did not pay them overtime pay. Id. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to identify a single practice that applied to the employees as the potential collective action members held different positions. Id. at *8-9. The Court, however, found that Plaintiffs' declarations established that Defendant did not pay its hourly employees overtime for hours over 40 in a workweek due to Defendant's practice of not paying overtime unless an employee's hours exceeded 80 within a two-week pay period. Id. at *9-10. Further, the Court determined that Defendant itself had identified that practice, asserting in its answer that it was entitled to pay overtime based on a period other than a seven-day workweek under 29 C.F.R. § 778.601(a). Id. at *10. Therefore, contrary to Defendant's characterization, the Court held that it was the application to hourly employees, regardless of their job duties, of a single employment practice which made the employees similarly-situated. Id. While Defendant argued that the number of individuals within the proposed collective action was not sufficiently numerous, Plaintiffs pointed out that the number of potential collective action members they had identified exceeded the minimum number referenced by the Eleventh Circuit under the higher standard required for Rule 23 class certification. Id. at *10-11. Because Plaintiffs had estimated that the total number of potential collective action members would exceed 50, the Court found that under the more relaxed collective action standard of § 216(b), Plaintiffs had adequately demonstrated that sufficient potential collective action members existed. Id. Finally, the Court disagreed with Defendant that a different burden of proof should apply in the case because Plaintiffs had already informally notified some potential members of the collective action. As a result, the Court conditionally certified the collective action.

Calderone, et al. v. Michael Scott*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92528 (M.D. Fla. July 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees of the Lee County Sheriff's Office, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them overtime compensate in violation of the FLSA and the Florida Minimum Wage Act ("FMWA"). Plaintiffs moved for both conditional certification of their FLSA claims under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) and Rule 23(b)(3) certification of their FMWA claims. The Court granted the motions in part. The Court first noted that over 30 others had opted-in to the lawsuit since the action was filed. Id. at *4. The Court found that under the lenient standard, Plaintiffs demonstrated that there were additional similarly-situated individuals who wished to opt-in. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs sought conditional certification of a collective action consisting of seven different categories of current and former deputies and sergeants. The Court observed that the second, third, and sixth categories did not describe the nature of the uncompensated work performed by the putative collective action members. The Court remarked that the descriptions of Plaintiffs' second, third, and sixth categories should be modified to more clearly specify the nature of the uncompensated work at issue, and thus, granted conditional certification subject to such modifications. Regarding Rule 23 certification, the Court opined that an FMWA class action was not a superior means of adjudication because the overlapping FLSA collective action and FMWA class action were mutually exclusive and irreconcilable. Id. at *14. The Court noted that while the FLSA requires putative collective action members who wish to join the action to affirmatively opt-in, Rule 23 class actions require putative class members who do not wish to join the class to affirmatively opt-out. Id. at *14-15. The Court reasoned that where the putative FLSA and FMWA classes are identical, the opt-in and opt-out procedures cannot be reconciled. Id. at *15. Thus, if a hypothetical Plaintiff – who was a member of Plaintiffs' putative class but did not wish to have her minimum wage claims adjudicated – would do nothing upon receiving notice of the FLSA action, the FLSA provides that she is not bound by the outcome of this case unless she opts-in. Id. However, upon receiving notice of the FMWA action, she would have to affirmatively opt-out, and if she did not opt-out, she would become a member of the FMWA action by default and her minimum wage claims would be adjudicated. Thus, the Court remarked that any putative class member who did not wish to be bound by the outcome in this case would have to affirmatively opt-out, despite the fact that the FLSA requires precisely the opposite. Id. Thus, the Court denied Rule 23 certification because Plaintiffs' overlapping FLSA and FMWA class actions were mutually exclusive and irreconcilable.

Cordova, et al. v. R & A Oysters, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24443 (S.D. Ala. Feb. 27, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of migrant agricultural workers who worked under temporary visas, brought an action alleging violations of the FLSA and the Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Workers Protection Act. Plaintiffs sought conditional certification of a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. Plaintiffs proposed a collective action consisting of all non-supervisory workers admitted at H-2B temporary foreign workers employed by Defendant during the "class" period. Id. at *4. Defendant did not oppose conditional certification, but they objected to Plaintiffs' request to the Court to direct them to produce names, addresses, and telephone numbers of potential collective action members. Plaintiffs suggested that Defendant should provide them the telephone numbers because many potential collective action members permanently resided in isolated rural regions of Mexico, where mail service was unreliable and slow. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs also pointed out that the majority of the workers frequently changed addresses and/or were absent from their permanent residences for months at a time due to the migrant labor they performed. Id. The Court observed that other case law authorities have taken a variety of approaches to the disclosure of the telephone numbers of the potential collective action members. Id. at *7. Because Plaintiffs did not addresses those approaches, and also because Defendant did not have the opportunity to respond, the Court declined to select any approaches to this issue. Id. However, the Court granted Plaintiffs' request to grant a five-month period for filing the opt-in notices, which provided Plaintiffs ample opportunity to contact potential collective action members by mail. Id. at *7.

Daza, et al. v. Total Quality Logistics, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 131411 (M.D. Fla. Sept. 29, 2015). Plaintiff filed an action under the FLSA and Florida Minimum Wage Act, seeking overtime and unpaid minimum wages from Defendant. Id. at *1. Only one opt-in Plaintiff joined the action. Defendant filed a motion to deny certification of the class on the grounds that Plaintiffs failed to present any evidence to support a collective action or class action. Plaintiffs filed a reply stating that they no longer intended to pursue a collective action or class action and moved to convert the opt-in Plaintiff to a named Plaintiff. The Court granted Defendant's motion to deny certification of both a collective action and a class action and dismissed Plaintiff motion to convert the opt-in Plaintiff to a named Plaintiff. The Court found that Plaintiffs did not seek either collective action or class certification, but only sought to litigate the wage claims. Id. at *2. Because the original named Plaintiff never moved for certification of either a collective action or a class action, the Court concluded that Defendant's motion must be granted. Id. at *6. Further, the Court ruled that the appropriate remedy was to dismiss the opt-in Plaintiff without prejudice. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss, and dismissed the opt-in Plaintiff without prejudice.

Geter, et al. v. Galardi South Enterprise, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65219 (S.D. Fla. May 19, 2015). In this FLSA action brought by Plaintiffs, a group of adult entertainers, alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors, the Court declined to decertify an earlier certified collective action. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated to the collective action members as each Plaintiff would have to testify as to the number of hours and the dates each entertainer performed, and the amount of money earned and paid out by each entertainer during each workweek. Defendant also pointed out that some Plaintiffs did not work enough to earn overtime wages, and the house fees and tip-outs varied among Plaintiffs. The Court remarked that it was unlikely that any real-world collective action would involve opt-in Plaintiffs with the same, or even similar, schedules and earnings, and opined that the identified differences were irrelevant to the decertification decision. Id. at *11. Regarding Defendant's argument that different rules applied to Plaintiffs, such as the amount of the house fee and number of days Plaintiffs had to work, the Court observed that such distinctions did not favor decertification, because it impacted the amounts potentially owed for back wages. Further, because Plaintiffs had different job duties, Defendant argued that certain entertainers had greater opportunities for tips from high-end customers, and would frequently earn more money than other entertainers. The Court, however, found that the different job duties all involved performing at the club and did not concern the central dispute of whether Plaintiffs were independent contractors or were owed unpaid wages. Id. at *13. Further, some Plaintiffs signed written independent contractor agreements, and Defendant allowed them to keep certain service charges which Defendant charged customers. Plaintiffs kept as tips amounts paid in excess of these minimums. Id. at *14. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs violated their agreements by bringing this action and could not retain the minimum service charges while demanding hourly compensation, and claimed that if Plaintiffs prevailed, Defendant was entitled to the difference between the service charge and the minimum wage. The Court remarked that Defendant provided no authority to show that a party's counterclaims – claims not based on the FLSA – should impact the decision on a motion to decertify an FLSA collective action. Id. at *14-15. Additionally, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs would be affected differently by the statute of limitations, depending on when they started performing, and whether they asserted willful violations of the FLSA. The Court, however, noted that different limitations periods, if any, related primarily to the amount of back wages recoverable by Plaintiffs, not any fundamental issue of liability of Defendant, which did not compel decertification. Id. at *15. The Court also opined that Plaintiffs were similarly-situated because they substantially performed the same job, worked in the same location, and the alleged violations took place during the entirety of Plaintiffs' time at the club. Moreover, Defendant subjected all Plaintiffs to similar policies and practices that their management apparently established in a similar manner. Thus, because there were no significant differences among Plaintiffs with regard to their independent contractor status, the Court denied Defendant's motion for decertification.

Harris, et al. v. Performance Transportation, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 33566 (M.D. Fla. Mar. 18, 2015). Plaintiff brought an FLSA action alleging that Defendant failed to pay him proper overtime during any workweek of his employment. Plaintiff worked as a driver at Defendant's Dover, Florida warehouse facility, and his duties included delivering food products to local restaurants and unloading trucks, generally working a total of 50 hours per week. Plaintiff's compensation was based off of the number of cases of product he hauled, the number of miles driven, each stop, safety pay, and start up pay. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant failed to pay him overtime compensation to which he was entitled. Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action comprised of all similarly-situated drivers working since October 27, 2011, and also for authorization of notice to members of the collective action. The Magistrate Judge recommended granting the motion in part, rejecting Defendant's contention that Plaintiffs were exempt from FLSA coverage under the motor carrier exemption. The Magistrate Judge remarked that although the motor carrier exemption may apply to Plaintiffs, that did not mean that Plaintiffs are not similarly-situated for the purpose of conditional certification. Defendant brought Rule 72 objections to the Magistrate Judge's ruling. The Court overruled Defendant's objection, adopted the report and recommendation of the Magistrate Judge, and granted in part Plaintiff's motion. The Court conditionally certified a collective action comprised of each driver that Defendant employed at its warehouse in Dover, Florida, and who drove for Defendant only within Florida. Id. at *2. The Court directed Defendant to produce the full name, the last known address, the telephone number, and the e-mail address for each member in the collective action who worked for Defendant at the Dover, Florida, warehouse from the last three years. Id. The Court also directed the parties to submit a revised notice and a revised consent form correcting the deficiencies addressed in the Magistrate Judge's report and recommendation.

Isaacs, et al. v. One Touch Direct, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6211 (M.D. Fla. Jan. 20, 2015). Plaintiff, a telephone service representative ("TSR"), brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendant failed to compensate her and others similarly-situated for overtime hours in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant: (i) required employees to arrive at work early to perform tasks integral to their work before their shift began; (ii) failed to include commissions in employees' regular rate of pay; and (iii) failed to compensate employees for break time. Id. at *2. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), and contended that the Court should permit notice of the action to all full-time TSRs who worked at Defendant's Florida call centers over the last three years, and who were subject to Defendant's illegal pay practices and policies. Id. at *2-3. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion. First, the Court found that Plaintiff had demonstrated that other employees desired to opt-in to this action because five other employees had filed opt-in notices. Id. at *5. While Plaintiff also demonstrated the similarly-situated element, and provided evidence that Defendant's allegedly unlawful pay practices applied to all TSRs company-wide, regardless of their specific location and program, Defendant argued that Plaintiff's proposed notice encompassed 5,600 TSRs and that TSRs' compensation differed depending on the specific program they worked on and their location. Id. at *5-6. The Court, however, reasoned that Defendant's attack on the merits of Plaintiff's claims was premature at the conditional certification stage, and accordingly granted Plaintiff's motion. Id. at *6. At the same time, the Court agreed with Defendant that the notice should include language to the recipient that he or she might be responsible for a share of Plaintiff's costs associated with the lawsuit if Plaintiff did not prevail on the claims. Id. The Court also agreed that it was unnecessary to post the notice at Defendant's locations or send a reminder notice postcard to potential collective action members. Id. at *6-7. The Court, however, overruled Defendant's objection to a 90-day opt-in period, because such opt-in periods are routinely granted, and any issue of willful violation of the FLSA would be better addressed on a motion for decertification. Id. at *7. Id.

Lopez, et al. v. Hayes Robertson Group, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 132673 (S.D. Fla. Sept. 29, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of hourly-paid tipped servers and bartenders, brought an action seeking minimum wages under the FLSA and corresponding state law. Nearly 21 of the Plaintiffs in this action had filed a putative class action in Bennett, et al. v. Hayes Robertson Group Inc., Case No. 11-CV-10105 (S.D. Fla.). Plaintiffs in Bennett moved to certify a Rule 23(b) class, which the Court had denied, and then dismissed the claims directing them to re-file those claims as individual actions. Plaintiffs from the Bennett action and several other individuals filed their own minimum wage actions including this action. The Magistrate Judge granted certification of a class action pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3), and the FLSA, finding that this action involved different named Plaintiffs, a different class action, and a significantly more developed factual record than was available in Bennett. Subsequently, the individual actions were consolidated into this action. After the Court had denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment, Defendant moved to decertify both the FLSA and Rule 23 classes, which the Magistrate Judge denied. At the outset, the Magistrate Judge rejected Defendant's arguments concerning decertifying the FLSA collective action as the parties had stipulated this matter was being pursued solely as a Rule 23 class action. Id. at *7-8. Citing FLSA standards, Defendant argued that the class was not numerous as no one had opted-in. Id. at *14. The Magistrate Judge, however, ruled that as Rule 23 was not an opt-in procedure, Defendant's argument was meritless. Id. Moreover, as the Court had already found that there were 50 to 120 members of the class, Defendant presented no new facts concerning that finding. Id. As to commonality, the Magistrate Judge found two common questions, including: (i) did Defendant deduct $3 per shift; and (ii) whether Defendant's policies invalidated their reliance on the tip credit exemption, which resulted in denial of the required minimum wage. Id. at *15. The Magistrate Judge observed that Defendant selectively quoted one sentence from order on summary judgment, which referred to factual disputes that precluded summary judgment. Id. at *16. The Magistrate Judge reasoned that the order had also found that the parties had presented conflicting evidence regarding the validity of Defendant's tip credit, as there was an issue of appropriateness of the notice that Defendant gave Plaintiffs of the credit. Id. Moreover, the Magistrate Judge found that merely because summary judgment was denied, it did not automatically preclude a class action from proceeding. Id. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge found Defendant's argument regarding commonality was unpersuasive. Defendant also argued that because Plaintiffs received return envelopes for approximately 30 class members and received letters from 3 class members indicating that they wished to opt-out, due process concerns for those class members who may not have been properly noticed should generate concern and cause the Court to refrain from continuing this case under Rule 23. The Magistrate Judge observed that there was no dispute that Plaintiffs attempted individual notice of all putative class members, or that certain putative class members did not receive that notice. The Magistrate Judge, however, ruled that due process did not require that class members actually receive notice. The Magistrate Judge, therefore, concluded that Defendant presented no challenge to the actual means of notice attempted here. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge denied Defendant's motion for decertification.

Miller, et al. v. Spence,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53187 (S.D. Ala. Mar. 25, 2015). Plaintiff brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay their servers and bartenders the required minimum wage in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff worked as a server/bartender at a Defendant's restaurant in Gulf Shores, Alabama, and Defendant paid her an hourly wage of $2.13 as a server and $5.00 as a bartender. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant required servers/bartenders to remit a portion of their tips to a tip pool and improperly distributed it to employees who did not customarily receive tips, such as food expeditors, oyster shuckers, and dishwashers. Id. at *3. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant required servers to perform cleaning and other side work "off-the-clock" before and after their regularly scheduled shifts, and that the District Manager instructed managers to "roll back" or reduce the hours recorded if employees worked over 40 hours a week. Id. Seeking to represent all other similarly-situated employees, Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). In support, Plaintiff submitted declarations from five individuals who stated that Defendant employed each one of them at its restaurants, that Defendant required them to contribute to a tip pool with non-tipped employees, and that Defendant required them to perform work off-the-clock. Id. at *8. Four of the five also submitted consent forms indicating their desire to join the action. The consent form related solely to Defendant's policy or practice of requiring servers/bartenders to contribute to a tip pool, which included expeditors, dishwashers, or other kitchen staff. Id. at *7. Defendant opposed conditional certification, arguing that Plaintiff had failed to show that she was similarly-situated to the putative members of the collective action. Recommending that Plaintiff's motion be partly granted, the Magistrate Judge stated that the collective action could be conditionally certified as to individuals employed as servers at Defendant's Steamer restaurants in Gulf Shores ("Steamer"), Mikee's Seafood in Gulf Shores ("Mikee's"), and Shrimp Basket restaurants located in Gulf Shores and Foley and who contributed to a tip pool that included employees customarily not entitled to tips. Id. at *16. The Magistrate Judge found that Plaintiff had made a substantial showing that Defendant treated servers at these restaurants similarly and subjected them to same hourly wage and the same policy/practice regarding the tip pool. Id. at *20. Although Defendant alleged that Plaintiff was not similarly-situated to other collective action members because she also worked as bartender and assistant manager who did not contribute to a tip pool, her claims regarding off-the-clock work would require individualized treatment, and the collective action claim related solely to the tip pool policy. The Magistrate Judge ruled that the asserted differences were not sufficient to defeat conditional certification. Id. Because Plaintiff met the burden only with respect to servers and the tip pool policy utilized by Defendant at Mikee's, Steamers, and the Shrimp Basket locations in Gulf Shores, Orange Beach, and Foley, the Magistrate Judge granted Plaintiff's motion only with respect to these restaurants, and denied it with respect to bartenders and non-server employees, as well as individuals who were employed at other Shrimp Basket locations. Id. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended the partial grant of Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Roman, et al. v. Burger King Corp.*, Case No. 15-CV-20455 (S.D. Fla. June 2, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action alleging that Defendant willfully misclassified its trainees and sales, profit, and operation coaches ("coaches") as exempt employees and failed to pay them overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff alleged that trainees spent the majority of their time performing menial, non-exempt job duties, and that they did not supervise other employees or use their discretion and independent judgment with respect to matters of significance. Further, the primary duty of coaches was to perform audits of Defendant's franchise restaurants using automated, routine, and standardized audit forms. Id. at 2. Plaintiff moved to conditionally certify a collective action of coaches, and trainees, including coach trainees or operations trainees who spent greater than two weeks working in Defendant's restaurants during their training. The Court found that Plaintiff was similarly-situated to the putative collective action members. Id. at 3-4. First, the Court noted that all of the opt-in Plaintiffs held the same job titles. Plaintiff presented the declarations of 25 former coaches, many of whom began their employment as trainees, along with declarations of five former employees who worked only as trainees. Plaintiff also provided the job posting for the coach position from an employment website showing one job description, indicating uniformity regardless of geographic location. Id. at 4. The opt-in Plaintiffs trained and/or worked in at least 21 states throughout the country. Because Plaintiff and a majority of the opt-in Plaintiffs were employed during the same time period, the Court observed that Plaintiff's claim for unpaid overtime wages for the three years prior to the filing of the complaint covered the same period of alleged violations of other collective action members. Id. at 4-5. Fourth, the Court found that the opt-in Plaintiffs' declarations showed a common practice or scheme that Defendant classified them as exempt employees, and did not pay wages for the overtime hours they worked. The Court remarked that at the conditional certification stage, Defendant's decision to classify all trainees and coaches as exempt from overtime under the same FLSA exemption supported a finding that they were similarly-situated. Id. at 5. Finally, the Court considered the degree to which the claimed violations were similar. Both Plaintiff and the trainee opt-in Plaintiffs alleged that they worked more than 40 hours a week without overtime pay; that they performed standardized duties and had the same job responsibilities; and they spent the majority of their time working in restaurants performing non-exempt jobs such as cooking and serving customers. Id. at 5. Similarly, Plaintiff and the coach opt-in Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant required them to follow standardized policies and procedures; paid them a quarterly non-discretionary bonus based on the performance and sales at the restaurants in their territories; required them to work at least seven to eight hours a day; and required them to follow a quarterly store visit schedule. Id. at 6. The Court found that the alleged violations were similar, and granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Sterling, et al. v. Bridgewater & Associates, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15307 (N.D. Ga. Feb. 9, 2015). Plaintiff brought an FLSA action alleging that Defendant had a policy and practice of refusing to pay hourly employees overtime compensation for hours worked over 40 hours per week. Plaintiff moved to conditionally certify a collective action of employees working in support staff positions. The Court found that declarations submitted by Plaintiff and five opt-ins demonstrated that Plaintiff was similarly-situated to the proposed collective action members because they worked as hourly employees in support staff positions, and they performed administrative duties such as data entry, receiving and sending orders to and from clients, invoicing, and answering the telephone. Id. at *2. The Court opined that Plaintiff, the opt-in Plaintiffs, and other support staff were subject to a common plan or practice because they routinely worked off-the-clock hours, and Defendant knew they did, required them to falsify their timesheets, and pressured support staff to work over 40 hours per week to complete their assignments. Id. After discovery, Defendant moved to decertify the collective action, which the Court denied. Defendant argued that Plaintiff was not similarly-situated because Plaintiff was an exempt operations manager and the collective action members were hourly staff employees. Id. at *4. The Court reasoned that Plaintiff's title of operations manager was insufficient to support that Plaintiff was employed in a bona fide executive capacity and thus exempt from the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Under the FLSA an "employee employed in a bona fide executive capacity" means any employee who customarily and regularly directs the work of two or more other employees and whose primary duty is management. Id. at *5. Plaintiff performed administrative tasks such as data entry and printing orders, which did not demonstrate that Plaintiff customarily and regularly directed the work of two or more other employees or that her primary duty was management. Id. Further, Defendant did not provide any evidence to support that they employed Plaintiff in a bona fide executive capacity and thus exempt from the overtime provisions of the FLSA. In her declaration, Plaintiff asserted that she worked as an hourly employee in various administrative positions, that she did not have the power to hire, fire, promote, or discipline any employee, or recommend such action, and that she did not choose or participate in choosing her daily duties. Id. at *6. The Court thus concluded that Plaintiff was similarly-situated to the hourly, non-exempt support staff she sought to represent, and denied Defendant's motion for decertification.

Villoch, et al. v. Ultimate Fitness Group LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101856 (M.D. Fla. July 16, 2015). Plaintiff, a former employee, brought an action alleging a failure to pay for all hours worked in violation of the FLSA and Florida's unpaid wages law. Defendants operated a company called Orange Theory Fitness ("Orange Theory"), which comprised multiple franchised fitness studios in 35 different states and five foreign countries. Id. at *2. Ultimate Fitness Group ("UFG") franchised the Orange Theory studio locations and Orange Theory brand, and Tampa Fitness Partners, LLC ("TFP") and Tampa Fitness Partners IV, LLC ("TFP IV") were Orange Theory franchisees. Id. Plaintiff worked as a fitness coach at two different studio locations owned by TFP IV. Plaintiff alleged that Defendants only compensated fitness coaches for work during standard 60-minute workout sessions, and did not compensate for working time outside of those workout sessions, such as reviewing exercise templates, attending employee meetings, preparing and conducting special seasonal programming, attending webinars, and training. Plaintiff moved for both conditional certification of her FLSA claims and class certification of her state law claims, which the Court denied. Plaintiff asserted that she had personal knowledge of other fitness coaches who were subject to the same pay policies, and that she expected that many would like to participate in the collective action, especially given that over 1,000 personal trainers sought to participate in a similar, if not identical, collective action against L.A. Fitness. Id. at *8. Plaintiff, however, failed to identify any specific fitness coach or coaches who had expressed an interest in joining her lawsuit, and since the filing of this action no one had made any effort to join her action. The Court remarked that Plaintiff's statement that she expected other fitness coaches would opt-in was speculative, vague, and conclusory, and that she failed to demonstrate that other aggrieved individuals existed. Accordingly, the Court denied conditional certification of the FLSA claims under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). As to Plaintiff's Rule 23 class claims, her proposed class was comprised of all fitness coach employees in Florida who were not paid their agreed upon hourly wage for all hours worked. Pointing to Orange Theory's website, which confirmed that more than 200 fitness coaches were employed by UFG in Florida in any given year, Plaintiff estimated that the class size could be as large as 400 individuals. Further, although Plaintiff contended that TFP employed about 20 fitness coaches and possibly additional fitness coaches formerly employed by Defendants during the class period, she failed to provide any evidence to confirm those numbers. Thus, the Court was unable to determine how many employees could potentially make up the class, and determined that Plaintiff failed to establish numerosity. The Court also found that Plaintiff failed to establish whether UFG or any of Orange Theory's 60 different franchised fitness studios in Florida implemented a common policy to not compensate their fitness coaches for activities performed outside the 60-minute training session. Furthermore, because franchisees directly hired, managed, and paid their fitness coaches, the Court reasoned that each studio was likely to also have their own policies regarding the pay practices, and different managers and supervisors could implement those policies uniquely and could also have different time-keeping systems to track their employees' time. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff failed to establish commonality as well, and therefore denied class certification.

B. Other Federal Rulings Affecting The Defense Of FLSA Collective Actions

Throughout 2015, federal courts issued a wide variety of rulings on procedural and substantive matters in FLSA collective action litigation. Those rulings included procedural and notice issues In FLSA collective actions; mootness in FLSA collective actions; individual executive liability in FLSA collective actions; awards of attorneys' fees in FLSA collective actions; application of Twombly pleading standards in FLSA collective actions; FLSA collective actions for donning and doffing; exemption issues in FLSA collective actions; discovery in FLSA collective actions; public employee FLSA collective action litigation; preemption and immunity issues in FLSA collective actions; independent contractor issues in wage & hour class actions; communications with class members in FLSA collective actions; venue issues in FLSA collective actions; pay policies and bonuses in FLSA collective actions; arbitration of wage & hour class claims; settlement approval issues in wage & hour class actions and collective actions; DOL wage & hour enforcement actions; application of statute of limitations in FLSA collective actions; concurrent state law claims in wage & hour class actions; joint employer, employee status, and employer status issues in FLSA collective actions; litigation of tip pooling and tip credit claims under the FLSA; sanctions in wage & hour class actions; issues with opt-in rights in wage & hour class actions; trial issues in FLSA collective actions; issues with interns, volunteers, and students under the FLSA; tolling issues in wage & hour class actions; interlocutory appeals in wage & hour class actions; amendments in FLSA collective actions; foreign worker issues in wage & hour class actions; travel time issues in wage & hour class actions; retaliation issues in wage & hour class actions; the first to file doctrine in FLSA collective actions; the Motor Carrier Act exemption in FLSA collective actions; Davis-Bacon Act issues in wage & hour class action litigation; stays in wage & hour class actions; settlement bar and estoppel issues in wage & hour class actions; intervention issues in wage & hour class actions; Portal-to-Portal Act issues in FLSA collective actions; and liquidated damages in FLSA collective actions.

(i) Procedural And Notice Issues In FLSA Collective Actions

Acosta, et al. v. Tyson Foods, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 15043 (8th Cir. Aug. 26, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current or former unionized employees at one of Defendants' beef processing facilities, brought an action against Defendants seeking overtime and minimum wage payments for certain pre-shift and post-shift activities under the Nebraska Wage Payment and Collection Act and the FLSA. Previously, the District Court had granted summary judgment in favor of the class on all liability issues, and after a bench trial, the District Court awarded $19 million in damages to Plaintiffs. Defendant appealed the class certification and summary judgment rulings, and the Eighth Circuit reversed the judgment. Defendant argued that the District Court should have dismissed the named Plaintiff's FLSA claims for failing to file timely consents as required by 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The named Plaintiff argued that he was not required to file a written consent, because the FLSA claim was an individual action brought for only himself, and not a collective action. The Eighth Circuit observed that the complaint was styled as a class action and collective action compliant, and asked the District Court to permit the action to go forward as a collective action pursuant to § 216(b). Id. at *7. Further, in a joint planning report filed with the District Court, the parties specified that any motion for conditional certification of a collective action would be filed by December 15, 2008. Id. Further, the named Plaintiff never moved for conditional certification, but filed 55 consents weeks after the deadline had passed. Id. In addition, the named Plaintiff never amended the complaint to allege an individual action. The named Plaintiff argued that his complaint was commenced as an individual action, and no collective action was ever commenced because the required consents were never filed. The Eighth Circuit, however, reasoned that this was a hollow argument, as the complaint continued to allege a collective action, and Plaintiff filed consents from other employees several weeks after the deadline for the certification motion. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit concluded that the named Plaintiff was required to file a § 216(b) consent. Defendant also challenged the judgment in favor of the class under the Nebraska Wage Payment and Collection Act ("NWPCA"), which provides a cause of action for employees to recover only those wages that an employer had previously agreed to pay. Id. The Eighth Circuit found that the employees' claim under the NWPCA failed as a matter of law because Plaintiffs did not present sufficient evidence that Defendant previously agreed to pay the wages. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit concluded Defendant was entitled to judgment on the state law claims.

Editor's Note: The decision in Acosta overturned the largest wage & hour class action verdict of 2015.

Armijo, et al. v. Star Farms, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 166947 (D. Colo. Dec. 14, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of migrant farm workers, brought a class action alleging that Defendants violated the FLSA and the Agricultural Workers' Protection Act ("AWPA"). The parties settled and moved for preliminary approval of the settlement agreement. The Court deferred ruling on the motion pending clarification and modification of the notice, claim, and objection procedures. Parties proposed giving notice by: (i) first class mail to each known class member; and (ii) placing an ad in the legal notices section of a Spanish language newspaper. Id. at *3-4. The Court noted that the class in this case was composed of migrant, seasonal, and often undocumented immigrant farm-workers, and the parties made no mention was made as to whether the potential class members could be found during the working season, much less in winter months when parties proposed to give the notice. Id. at *4. Similarly, the Court observed that the parties did not mention the form of the notice and whether it could be easily understood by class members. Consequently, the Court expressed doubts as to whether the proposed notice was meaningful and practical, and ordered the parties to consider efforts such as tolling the time until the next harvest season when a number of possible class members may return to the area, contacting agencies that recruit migrant farm workers, or other methods helpful for distributing notice to this potential class. Id. at *4-5. Accordingly, the Court deferred ruling on the motion until parties clarified and modified the notice.

Brown, et al. v. Discrete Wireless, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18774 (M.D. Fla. Feb. 17, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a collective action alleging that Defendants improperly and willfully classified certain sales representatives as exempt employees and denied them overtime wages. Plaintiffs moved for enlargement of the notice period and for Defendant to provide the social security numbers of the proposed collective action members. The Court granted the motion in part. Previously, the Court had certified the collective action and directed Plaintiffs to issue an initial notice via certified mail to all individuals whose contact information was provided by Defendants within 25 days. Id. at *2-3. The order also specified that if notice to any individual was returned, Plaintiffs could make an additional attempt to notify such individual via certified mail, and provide notice to Defendants along with proof of return of service, and make one telephone call to the individual to confirm the individual's address. Id. at *3 Subsequently, the Court granted Plaintiffs' request for the full social security numbers of putative collective action members whom Plaintiffs' counsel had been unable to reach by both mail and telephone, and stated that Defendants' production of full social security numbers was limited to notices which have been returned as undeliverable due to incorrect or outdated addresses only. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs then requested a 21-day extension of the opt-in deadline, and additional social security numbers from Defendants. Defendants argued that they had fully complied with the terms of the Court's previous order regarding social security numbers. After examining the parties' respective positions, the Court determined that Defendants should not be required to furnish additional social security numbers. Id. at *6. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs did not demonstrate any failure by Defendants with respect to its previous order to warrant a complete disclosure and denied Plaintiffs' motion in this respect. Id. The Court, however, granted Plaintiff's motion to extend the opt-in deadline by 21 days.

Brown, et al. v. American Airlines, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 150672 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 5, 2015). Plaintiff, an employee, on behalf of herself and those similarly-situated, filed a putative wage & hour class action against Defendant alleging violation of California law. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant failed to pay overtime, failed to pay the correct overtime rate, failed to provide proper wage statements, and engaged in unlawful business practices. Plaintiff also asserted violations of the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff previously filed a motion for class certification, which the Court had denied. In denying the motion, the Court concluded that Plaintiff was not an adequate representative for one of the claims and that the predominance requirement was not met. Defendant subsequently filed a motion to dismiss Plaintiff's PAGA claim. Defendant first argued that the Court should grant the motion because it had denied the motion for class certification. The Court, however, remarked that denial of a class certification motion does not entail judgment on pleadings, and it refused to strike the state law claims. Defendant also argued that Plaintiff cannot pursue a representative action under the PAGA without complying with Rule 23. The Court noted that the California Supreme Court in Arias v. Superior Court, 46 Cal. 4th 969 (2009), and the Ninth Circuit in Baumann v. Chase Investment Services Corp., 747 F.3d 1117 (9th Cir. 2014), held that a PAGA claim is not governed by Rule 23. Id. at *8-9. Accordingly, the Court rejected Defendant's argument. Defendant further argued that Plaintiffs' PAGA claims were unmanageable and impracticable. The Court observed that in its order regarding class certification, it had found that individual issues predominated as to Plaintiff's overtime pay claims. Id. at *10. The Court, therefore, ruled that manageability issues existed as to the overtime claims. Plaintiffs also sought PAGA penalties regarding improper wage statements. Plaintiffs contended that under California law, employers are required to provide employees with accurate itemized statements for each pay period reflecting the correct number of wages earned during the pay period. Id. at *11. The Court noted that to the extent that Defendant failed to properly compute overtime compensation, Defendant necessarily provided them with inaccurate wage statements. Id. The Court found that Plaintiff's PAGA claims could go forward regarding the wage statement claims, but not on the overtime pay claims, due to management issues. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to strike PAGA penalties in part.

Faust, et al. v. Comcast Cable Communications Management, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16563 (D. Md. Feb. 11, 2015). Plaintiffs brought two separate actions alleging that Defendant required its customer account executives ("CAEs") to work off-the-clock without pay. In the first action – Faust v. Comcast Cable Communications Management, LLC, Case No. 10-CV-2336 – the Court conditionally certified a collective action of CAEs who worked at the call center at 8110 Corporate Drive in White Marsh, Maryland (the "8110 Call Center"), where both named Plaintiffs worked. Id. at *4. The Court, however, denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification of their state law claims finding that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate commonality. In the second action – Andrews v. Comcast Cable Communications Management, LLC, Case No. 12-CV-2909 – the Court denied class certification for the same reasons. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs in Faust then moved to add as named Plaintiffs nine of the 11 opt-ins deposed during pre-certification discovery, and Defendant the moved to sever the claims of the three Andrews Plaintiffs into three separate proceedings. Plaintiffs in both actions also moved for discovery sanctions. The Court granted the motion to sever, and denied the remaining motions. Regarding the motion to sever, the Court noted that its earlier decision finding most of the critical issues not susceptible to common proof aligned with a decision to grant the motion. Id. at *12-13. Although the three named Plaintiffs had the same job title, worked in the same department at the same time, and asserted claims that they worked off-the-clock without pay, their specific claims and the proof of those claims were highly individualized. Defendant maintained an official policy that prohibited any CAE from working off-the-clock and required all time that CAEs spent working to be recorded and compensated. Id. at *17. The Court observed that the relevant witnesses for each Plaintiff's claims would be different because each Plaintiff asserted that an unofficial instruction to work off-the-clock came from a different source. Further, the relevant data – including timesheets, pay records, log-in data, and badge-swipe data – would be entirely different for each Plaintiff. Thus, considering the highly individualized nature of the proof of each Plaintiff's claims, the Court opined that Plaintiffs' claims did not arise out of the same transaction or occurrence and that severance was appropriate. Id. Regarding the motion to add named Plaintiffs in Faust, the Court noted that the addition of the new Plaintiffs would result in a trial consisting of 11 mini-trials of marginally related claims. When it denied class certification, the Court determined that there was no common practice or policy requiring off-the-clock work at the 8110 Call Center and that the claims were based on the alleged instructions of various supervisors given at various times, as understood by various individual CAEs. Id. at *19-20. Thus, because the claims of the individual Plaintiffs would depend on the testimony and credibility of different witnesses and the individualized data related to each claim, the Court denied the motion to add named Plaintiffs. Finally, regarding the motion for discovery sanctions, Plaintiffs argued that Defendant failed to begin preserving "First NT Log-in data" at the point in time that Plaintiffs believed Defendant was obligated to begin preserving that data. Id. at *21. Defendant informed Plaintiffs in June 2012 that there was no NT Log-in data for the time period in question, but Plaintiffs took no action on that information until filing these motions more than two years later. The Court, therefore, denied Plaintiffs' motions for discovery sanctions as untimely.

Flood, et al. v. Carlson Restaurants, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 149272 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former tipped employees, brought a collective and class action alleging that Defendants paid its tipped employees less than the minimum hourly wage by availing themselves of the federal tip credit in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law. The Court conditionally certified a collective action and fixed a deadline for collective action members to opt-in to the action. The parties negotiated an agreed upon a notice process, and the Court entered the parties' stipulation as an order. Notice then issued to members of the collective action. On the eve of the expiration of the notice period, Plaintiffs requested a 45-day extension of that deadline, and leave to mail and e-mail a reminder notice to members who initially were sent notice under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), but had not yet returned consent to join forms. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs contended that the FLSA should be construed in a broad fashion to effectuate the purposes of the law; therefore, since the number of opt-ins was low, the Court should extend the opt-in period to allow more workers to join the collective action. Defendants objected. Defendants argued that the stipulation that the parties negotiated and filed on February 9, 2015 provided that the collective action members could opt-in no later than 60 days from the date notice to opt-in was mailed. Id. Defendants contended that the extension Plaintiffs proposed would disturb the parties' stipulation as to the notice process in this action. Both parties cited case law supporting their respective positions on whether Courts routinely grant extensions of § 216(b) opt-in periods and the appropriate amount of time to allow the collective members to opt-in. Id. at *8. Defendants asserted that absent evidence of misconduct or efforts to coerce putative collective action members from opting-in to the action (of which there was no evidence), the Court had no basis to extend the opt-in period. The Court observed that the differing rulings in the case law authorities showed that the decision to extend the opt-in period was within the Court's broad discretion. Id. Additionally, the Court remarked that Defendants did not adequately explain why extending the opt-in period would prejudice them specifically, asserting only that an extension would delay discovery generally and would be contrary to the interests of efficiency and judicial economy. Id. Plaintiffs contended that the extension was fair because, as of October 8, 2015, only 6.7% of the potential collective action members had joined the case, and also because mailings to 7,186 potential collective action members were returned as undeliverable. Id. The Court remarked that although these numbers were not abnormally low and that the claim administrator had already attempted to re-deliver notice packages to those who had insufficient addresses, it did not dissuade the Court from giving Plaintiffs an additional opportunity to provide accurate and timely notice. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to extend the opt-in period by 45 days.

Editor's Note: The ruling in Flood is one of the first to ever extend a § 216(b) opt-in period absent evidence of misconduct of a Defendant in trying to coerce or dissuade employees from joining a collective action.

Garcia, et al. v. TWC Administration, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 50384 (W.D. Tex. April 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of inbound sales agents, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay the required minimum wage and denied them overtime compensation in alleged violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs alleged that because they were required to spend the entirety of their shifts on the phone taking customer calls, they spent a significant amount of time each day working off-the-clock and without pay. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action and for issuance of § 216(b) notice. Defendant did not challenge conditional certification but objected to the Plaintiffs' proposals regarding the manner, timing, and content of notice to putative collective action members. The Court granted the motion in part. Plaintiffs requested that notice be prominently posted at Defendant's place of business and that a copy of the proposed notice be included with each putative collective action member's paycheck, and that a second notice be sent out 30 days before the opt-in deadline passed, but only to those individuals who did not opt-in. Because posting notice in a workplace is often used to inform employees of their rights in labor disputes, repeatedly had been approved as an appropriate form of notice in FLSA cases, and was not unduly burdensome, the Court approved the posting. Id. at *16. The Court, however, determined that sending notice forms along with employee paychecks was both redundant and unnecessary. The Court found that because Plaintiffs failed to identify any particular reason why a reminder notice was necessary to ensure sufficient notice, a reminder notice was inappropriate. Plaintiffs also argued that the proper limitations period runs from three years prior to the date on which the action was commenced to the present. The Court noted that a cause of action arising out of a willful violation of the FLSA may be commenced within three years after the cause of action accrued, and that the limitations period is not tolled as to individual claimants until the claimant files a written opt-in consent form with the Court. Id. at *17-18. Thus, the Court opined that the limitations period here should confine collective action certification to inbound sales agents who worked for Defendant in the three years prior to the date on which conditional certification was granted, and that each potential Plaintiff should opt-in within three years of employment as an inbound sales agent. The Court directed that the notice should reflect both of these dates. Further, the Court observed that potential opt-in Plaintiffs may be required to pay taxable court costs if the judgment was not favorable to them, and that the proposed notice form is not completely accurate without such an advisory because it is necessary for potential Plaintiffs to make an informed decision about whether to opt-in to the lawsuit. Id. at *19. Here, the notice stated that if the inbound sales agents lost, they would receive nothing, but that they would not have to pay anything either. The Court remarked that such language was misleading and inaccurate, and that the notice should inform potential Plaintiffs that they could be liable for their proportional share of taxable court costs if they do not prevail. Finally, because including contact information for defense counsel in the § 216 (b) notice risks violation of ethical rules and inadvertent inquiries, thus engendering needless confusion, the Court stated that the inclusion of defense counsel's contact information in the notice was unwarranted. Id. at *20.

Hill, et al. v. Johnny's Pizza House, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125271 (W.D. La. Sept. 18, 2015). Plaintiff, a pizza delivery driver, brought an FLSA collective action alleging that Defendant failed to reimburse drivers for the reasonable approximate costs of the business use of their vehicles, and that failure caused their wages to fall below the FLSA-mandated minimum wage. Id. at *2. Defendant moved to strike Plaintiff's class allegations because he failed to move for class certification within 90-days of filing his complaint as required by Local Rule 23.1, which the Court denied. Plaintiff contended that Local Rule 23.1 was inapplicable because he was not seeking class certification under Rule 23; rather he was seeking to prosecute a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) of the FLSA. Id. at *3. The Court agreed, and extended the 90-day period for Plaintiff to seek conditional certification under § 216(b). Id. at *5. In addition, the Court found that Defendant did not demonstrate any material prejudice as a result of the delay, and remarked that in fact, a delay inured to Defendant's benefit because, ordinarily the statute of limitations is not tolled until a claimant files written consent with the Court. Id. The Court, however, remarked that the sole prejudice identified by Defendant was the Court's anticipated use of a two-step certification process identified in Lusardi v. Xerox Corp., 118 F.R.D. 351 (D.N.J. 1987). Id. at *6. The Court explained that it would not reach the second step of the Lusardi approach until discovery is completed, and Defendant could then re-visit the issue via appropriate motion. Id. at *7. The Court remarked that under the two-step Lusardi certification process, Plaintiff should require little discovery before filing an initial motion for conditional certification. Id. Accordingly, the Court imposed a 30-day deadline for Plaintiff to file his motion for conditional certification. Id. at *8.

Hobson, et al. v. Murphy Oil USA, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88241 (N.D. Ala. July 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a putative collective action against Defendants seeking unpaid overtime under the FLSA. Defendants moved to compel arbitration and to dismiss Plaintiffs' collective action allegations. The Court granted the motion and dismissed the collective action allegations with prejudice. Id. at *1. The Court then ordered Plaintiffs to submit their individual claims to arbitration. Id. at *1-2. After almost two and a half years, Plaintiffs moved for reconsideration of the order dismissing the collective action allegations. The Court denied the motion. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to submit their claims to arbitration as required by the Court's order. Id. at *2. As a result, the Court ordered Plaintiffs to show cause why their complaint should not be dismissed for failing to adhere to the Court's order. In response, Plaintiffs asserted that they behaved reasonably in waiting to arbitrate, and therefore should not be subject to the harsh penalty of having their complaint dismissed. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs stated that one of the named Plaintiffs, Sheila Hobson, filed an unfair labor practice charge with the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB") against Defendants while the motion to compel arbitration remained pending. Id. The NLRB ruled in Hobson's favor, finding that Defendants violated § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by requiring employees to agree to resolve all employment-related claims through individual arbitration and by taking steps to enforce the unlawful agreements. The NLRB ordered Defendants to rescind the arbitration agreement or revise it in all of its forms to make clear to employees that the agreement did not constitute a waiver of their right to maintain employment-related joint, class, or collective actions in all forums. Id. at *4. The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to cite any authority to support their suggestion that the Court's order was without effect because of a related proceeding before the NLRB, and that instead, Plaintiffs simply disregarded the Court's order. Thus, the Court held that, although Plaintiffs alleged that there was confusion or negligence for the delay in filing of their arbitration proceedings, the circumstances supported the inference that Plaintiffs acted willfully and knowingly. Id. at *7-9. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claims.

Izzio, et al. v. Century Partners Golf Management, L.P.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123182 (N.D. Tex. Sept. 15, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of banquet service workers, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay straight and overtime wages, unlawfully retained gratuities, and failed to reimburse employees for the costs of uniforms, in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs sought to represent a class consisting of banquet service workers at four catering facilities, including Defendant's Harbor Links facility. Id. Three months prior to the filing of this action, another banquet server, Anthony Metzger ("Metzger"), brought a similar action seeking unpaid overtime under the FLSA and the NYLL on behalf of himself and similarly-situated workers at Defendant's Harbor Links facility. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs moved for preliminary approval of a settlement that resolved not only claims they asserted in this action, but also claims that six individuals brought in a stayed action pending in New York state court entitled Law v. CGPM/WMC Operating, LLC, Case No. 150883/2013, on behalf of servers and bartenders at the same four facilities. Id. at *4. Metzger's action was stayed pending the Court's determination of the proposed global settlement. Metzger sought to intervene in this action for the sole purpose of having a portion of the case dismissed or transferred to his stayed action. Id. Metzger moved to carve out the Harbor Links Plaintiffs and their claims to represent that portion of the class in his proceeding. The Court denied the motion. Metzger first argued that his motion to intervene was timely because he filed it within 15 days after learning of this action. The Court, however, noted that adequacy of representation was critical to the inquiry of the timeliness factor. Id. at *8. The Court observed that, if the proposed intervener's interests were adequately represented, the prejudice from keeping him out would be slight, and it found that, because the underlying action included a class action component, absent class members' interests should be adequately represented. Id. at *8. The Court reasoned that Metzger sought to intervene solely to have the Harbor Links claimants and causes of action dismissed, and he did not seek to participate substantively in this proceeding. The Court, therefore, ruled that allowing Metzger to intervene would prejudice the various parties in the consolidated action. Id. at *12. The Court explained that, because all of the related cases had been stayed pending the resolution of the global class action settlement, there were unusual circumstances militating against a finding that the motion to intervene was warranted as a matter of right. Id. at *14. The Court noted that, as a class member, Metzger could raise objections to the settlement without formal intervention and that it could permit absent class members to appear through counsel without going the full length of becoming parties through intervention. Id. at *15. Further, the Court opined that Metzger also could opt-out of the settlement entirely and pursue his independent action in New York. Id. at *15. Finally, the Court held that an excision of the Harbor Links members and claims at this juncture would lead to piece-meal litigation and a likely disruption of the global settlement. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court denied Metzger's motion to intervene.

Mark, et al. v. Gawker Media LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65881 (S.D.N.Y. April 10, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an FLSA action alleging that Defendants improperly designated them as unpaid interns and refused to pay them wages. After granting Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action, the Court had permitted Plaintiffs to propose § 216(b) notice forms that would be disseminated to potential opt-in Plaintiffs by social media. The Court subsequently denied without prejudice Plaintiffs' application to disseminate notice through various forms of social media, finding that the proposals were substantially overbroad, and much of Plaintiffs' notice plan appeared calculated to punish Defendants rather than provide notice of opt-in rights. Plaintiffs renewed their application to disseminate notice through social media and also requested permission to disseminate notice to Defendants' internship applicants for whom there existed no further evidence that they ever became Defendants' interns. The Court granted in part Plaintiffs' requests. At the outset, the Court found that Plaintiffs' revised proposal no longer presented the danger of simply advertising a lawsuit against Defendants, but instead served the primary purpose of a FLSA notice. Id. at *3. The Court adopted Plaintiffs' renewed proposal to disseminate notice through social media, subject to the two limitations Defendants requested. First, the Court determined that Plaintiffs should "unfollow" any interns on Twitter when the opt-in period closed, unless the individual had chosen to opt-in to the action. Id. Second, Plaintiffs should not be permitted to "friend" individuals on Facebook, as it could crete a misleading impression of the individual's relationship with Plaintiffs' counsel. Id. at *3-4. The Court reasoned that these two conditions were prudent limitations that would ensure that Plaintiffs' use of social media notice complied with the general principle governing FLSA opt-in notices. Id. at *4. In addition, the Court denied Plaintiffs' application to send notice to a list of applicants for internships with Defendants, because as a general principle, notice should be sent only to individuals who can assert a claim. Id. The Court found that there was no indication that any of the individuals on the list of applicants that Plaintiffs had obtained actually took internships with Defendants. Id. Moreover, the Court found that any individual names in the list who accepted an internship position with Defendants would likely be identifiable by Plaintiffs through other means. Id. at *5.

Editor's Note: The ruling in Mark is one of the first to recognize the utility of disseminating § 216(b) notice through social media.

Palana, et al. v. Mission Bay Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 161069 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime compensation and failed to provide meal and rest breaks in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Previously, Plaintiffs had moved to certify three classes consisting of hourly employees, including: (i) an overtime class; (ii) a meal period class; and (iii) a rest break class. The Court granted the motion for class certification. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs then filed a motion for to clarify that the certified class included all of Defendants' hourly employees, including non-exempt clerical workers who also had claims for unpaid overtime and meal and rest breaks. The Court denied the motion to clarify. Id. at *4. Defendants argued that this litigation only included claims from care-workers and asked that, if any clarification is made, the Court should add the word "care-worker" in front of the employees in the class definition. Id. The Court clarified that its previous decision certified a class of 163 care-workers to vindicate overtime and meal and rest break claims. Id. at *5. The Court remarked that at this time, it was unclear whether the non-care workers met Rule 23 (a) and (b) requirements. For example, the Court noted that Plaintiffs did not specify as to how many of the 163 class members were not care-workers, which made it difficult to ascertain the numerosity requirement. Id. at *6. The Court concluded that the previous order certifying the class pertained only to care-workers, and Plaintiffs failed to show any evidence as to the class eligibility of non-care workers in their motion. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for clarification.

Pierce, et al. v. Wyndham Vacation Resorts, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 79592 (E.D. Tenn. June 1, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of sales representatives, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants denied them overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. The Magistrate Judge had recommended that the Court certify a collective action. After the Court adopted the recommendation, the parties submitted competing § 216(b) notices for approval. The Magistrate Judge had rejected portions of both notices relating to attorneys' fees and substituted his own. Plaintiffs objected to two separate parts of the notice, and on Rule 72 review, the Court overruled the objections. First, Plaintiffs objected to the language informing potential opt-in Plaintiffs that they could be held responsible for Defendants' legal fees and costs. Considering how unlikely it would be for potential opt-in Plaintiffs to eventually find themselves liable for a portion of Defendants' attorneys' fees, Plaintiffs argued that the chilling effect of the attorneys' fees notice language outweighed the need to provide potential opt-in Plaintiffs with complete information. Id. at *5. Defendants contended that potential Plaintiffs should be given enough information about their rights and obligations to allow them to make informed decisions about whether to participate in the action. Id. at *5-6. The Court found that the language adopted by the Magistrate Judge was not overly harsh, confusing, or likely to have an in terrorem effect on potential opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. Second, Plaintiffs objected to the inclusion of the defense counsel's contact information in the notice. The Court noted that case law authorities were divided on the appropriateness of providing defense counsel contact information in a § 216(b) notice. Plaintiffs failed to offer any controlling authority holding that the inclusion of defense counsel's contact information in a § 216(b) notice was clearly erroneous or contrary to law. Id. at *6-7. Accordingly, the Court overruled Plaintiffs' objections to the Magistrate Judge's ruling. Id. at *7.

Pullen, et al. v. McDonald's Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 107767 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 17, 2015). In this consolidated action brought employees against different owner-operators of McDonald's restaurants alleging that Defendants deducted costs of uniforms from their paychecks, and compensated them at less than the minimum wages in violation of the FLSA, the Court denied Defendants' motion to strike Plaintiffs' class allegations without prejudice. Previously, the Court had denied Plaintiffs motions for conditional certification of their FLSA claim. Id. at *3. Subsequently, Defendants moved to strike the class allegations in Plaintiffs' complaint. The Court remarked that the Sixth Circuit had recognized that Plaintiffs' burden in establishing class certification under Rule 23 was higher and more stringent than establishing a collective action under the FLSA. Id. at *4. The Court reasoned that as it had already denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification under the FLSA, it was unlikely that they would be able to establish grounds for class certification under Rule 23(a). Id. Rather than granting Defendants' motions to strike the class allegations in Plaintiffs' complaints, the Court decided to let the parties proceed with discovery. Thus, Defendants' motion to strike the class allegations in Plaintiffs' complaints was denied without prejudice. Id.

Roe, et al. v. SFBSC Management, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4006 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 12, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former exotic dancers, brought an FLSA action alleging that Defendants misclassified them as independent contractors and denied them minimum wages. Plaintiffs moved to proceed pseudonymously and to allow future Plaintiffs to join this suit by filing their FLSA consents under seal. The Court granted the motion to proceed pseudonymously, but denied the sealing motion. Plaintiffs contended that they needed to proceed anonymously because the action involved highly sensitive and personal details about them. Plaintiffs also asserted that exotic dancing carried a significant social stigma, and that there were risks inherent in working as an exotic dancer, including risk of injury by nightclub patrons if their names or addresses were publicly disclosed. Id. at *3. Further, Plaintiffs argued that disclosure could affect their future employment prospects outside the adult nightclub industry. First, the Court found that Plaintiffs identified an adequate threat of personal embarrassment and social stigmatization that favored allowing them to proceed under pseudonyms. Id. at *8. Second, the Court found that Plaintiffs expressed reasonable concerns that disclosing their identities would threaten them with both career and physical harm, and asserted that for privacy and personal safety reasons, it was customary for the exotic dancers to use stage names at Defendants' dance clubs. Defendants agreed that the public disclosure of an exotic dancer's true identity presented substantial risk of harm. Id. at *10-11. Third, Defendants argued that if Plaintiffs proceeded anonymously, Defendants would face the potential inability to assert a res judicata defense to later filed actions by the same individuals, and that they would be prohibited during discovery from communicating with third-party witnesses about Plaintiffs by name. Id. at *11. Although the Court acknowledged that these were significant concerns, the Court pointed that because the present Plaintiffs had given Defendants their real names, it eliminated Defendants' concerns. Further, the Court opined that if a Plaintiff bound by the eventual judgment in this case later sued Defendants, then Defendants, having Plaintiffs' names, would know this and be able to assert a res judicata defense. Id. at *12. The Court remarked that although it was possible that anonymity would raise problems for discovery, anonymity need not, and should not, impede either party's ability to develop its case. Id. at *12-13. The Court maintained that in case anonymity impedes discovery it would issue limited protective orders revealing the dancers names to pertinent third-parties, in a way that protects the dancers' interests sufficiently, without prejudicing the opposing party's ability to litigate the case. Id. at *13. Finally, the Court found that anonymity did not threaten "the principle of . . . open judicial records" because the result from this case would be open to the public. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court allowed Plaintiffs to use pseudonyms. Further, the Court opined that because Plaintiffs could proceed pseudonymously, sealing the consents was unnecessary, and that the request was too broad. The Court found that although allowing Plaintiffs' anonymity justified redacting their names and other identifying information from filings, requests to seal particular filings, or parts of filings, to remove them wholly from the public record, must relate to specific documents and must be made by a motion that satisfies the Court's local rule on sealing. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to seal future Plaintiffs' FLSA consents to join the action.

Smitherman, et al. v. Iguana Grill, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87807 (N.D. Ala. June 12, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of servers, brought an FLSA action alleging that Defendant paid them an hourly wage of $2.13 per hour, plus tips, instead of the federal minimum wage of $7.25 per hour, and required them to contribute a portion of their tips to food expeditors. Defendant did not oppose Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification, but objected to specific language in the proposed notice of collective action, consent form, and notice procedure. Id. at *3. Defendant objected to certain language in the notice describing the collective action and the lawsuit. After Plaintiffs offered proposed changes to some of Defendant's objections, the parties reached an agreement regarding the language of the notice, and requested a notice period of 75 days. Id. at *3. The Magistrate Judge recommended approving the notice. Id. Although Defendant raised four specific objections to Plaintiffs' proposed consent to join form, the parties eventually resolved the objections. Id. at *6. Finally, Defendant objected to two of Plaintiffs' proposals regarding the procedures for providing notice, including: (i) the proposed requirement to post the notice in the common areas or at the time clocks of each restaurant, and (ii) Plaintiffs' request for telephone numbers, e-mail addresses, and the last four digits of social security numbers for employees and former employees. At the hearing, the parties agreed that the notice would be posted by the time clock in the restaurant, and that Defendant would not challenge production of the requested employee information if a suitable protective order was entered. Id. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended granting Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

(ii) Mootness In FLSA Collective Actions

Ali, et al. v. Jerusalem Restaurant, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36987 (D. Colo. Mar. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of waitresses, brought an action seeking overtime compensation under the FLSA. Defendant moved for summary judgment against named Plaintiff Lena Derani and argued that its offer of judgment pursuant to Rule 68 rendered her claim moot. The Court denied the motion. The Court noted Derani's evidence showed that Defendant's owner was asked directly about overtime wages by at least two employees, permitting an inference that he knew or showed a reckless disregard for the FLSA requirement to pay overtime wages. The Court opined that despite Defendant's showing that it provided benefits it was not legally obligated to provide, Derani's evidence sufficiently permitted an inference that Defendant did not pay her or other employees overtime wages and that its failure to do so was done with knowledge of or in reckless disregard of the FLSA requirements. Id. at *8. Thus, the Court opined that there was an issue of material fact as to whether the three-year statute of limitations applied to Defendant's failure to pay overtime and summary judgment limiting the claim to a two-year time period was inappropriate. The Court observed that an offer of judgment tendering complete relief eliminates the case or controversy of an action and, thus, justifies dismissal. Id. at *14. Here, the offer of judgment applied a two-year statute of limitations, and the Court noted that Derani already overcame her burden at the summary judgment stage to permit a jury finding as to whether the three-year statute of limitations applied. Further, the offer would not make Derani whole because it failed to include attorneys' fees, and the Court noted that in an action brought to enforce the FLSA, a Court shall, in addition to any judgment awarded to Plaintiffs, allow a reasonable attorneys' fee to be paid by Defendant. Id. Although payment of attorneys' fees and costs to a prevailing party in an FLSA action is mandatory, Defendant's offer excluded attorneys' fees despite the mandatory requirement to pay such fees to a prevailing party in an FLSA action. Id. at *15. Thus, the Court held that the offer of judgment did not render moot Derani's overtime claim, and accordingly, denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Compressor Engineering Corp. v. Thomas, et al.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20079 (E.D. Mich. Feb. 19, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by sending unsolicited advertisements to Plaintiff's fax machine. Defendant offered Plaintiff a judgment pursuant to Rule 68 for $1,500, together with the costs of the action and reasonable attorneys' fees. Id. at *7. When Plaintiff did not respond within 14 days, Defendant moved to dismiss the action for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, asserting that Plaintiff's claims were moot in the face of the unaccepted offer of judgment. Id. at *8. The Court denied Defendant's motion. First, the Court distinguished the case from Genesis Healthcare Corp. v. Symczyk, U.S., 133 S. Ct. 1523 (2013), which according to the Court, "assumed without deciding that a named Plaintiff's individuals claims in a collective action pursuant to the FLSA were mooted by an unaccepted offer of judgment pursuant to Rule 68." Id. In Court's view, the limited holding in Genesis Healthcare applied to collective actions pursuant to the FLSA and explained that Rule 23 class actions were "fundamentally different from collective actions under the FLSA…" Id. Next, the Court noted that the offer of judgment must satisfy Plaintiffs' "entire" demand to moot a case or controversy. Id. at *10. The Court agreed with Plaintiff that Defendant's offer did not satisfy its entire demand because it did not offer injunctive relief against further violations of the TCPA as set forth in Plaintiff's complaint. Id. at *13. Although Defendant argued that Plaintiff's injunctive prayer lacked significance, the Court noted that the correct inquiry would be whether Plaintiff's injunctive claim was "so insubstantial" that it failed to present a federal controversy. Id. at *15. Further, to the extent Defendant argued the merits of Plaintiff's injunctive claim, the Court noted that that argument should be made in a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, and not in a motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. Id. at *17. Thus, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss, finding that Defendant's offer failed to satisfy Plaintiff's entire demand.

Hamilton, et al. v. Metropolitan Properties Of America, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8738 (N.D. Ohio Jan. 26, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action on behalf of herself and all other similarly-situated leasing consultants across seven states alleging that Defendant miscalculated her overtime rate in violation of FLSA. Plaintiff alleged that her overtime rate should have taken into account periodic commissions she earned, in addition to her regular hourly wage. Id. at *1-2. After Plaintiff moved for conditional certification, Defendant made offers of judgment under Rule 68 to Plaintiff and three opt-in Plaintiffs specifying that, if they did not accept the offers within 14 days of service, they "shall be deemed withdrawn." Id. at *2. Defendant argued that, because Plaintiff failed to accept the offer, the Court must dismiss her claim as moot. Id. The Court disagreed and ruled that Defendant's theory conflicted with the plain text of Rule 68(a) requiring entry of judgment where an opposing party accepts an offer of judgment in writing. Id. at *2-3. The Court further noted that, according to Rule 68(b), "an unaccepted offer is considered withdrawn, but does not preclude a later offer." Id. at *3. The Court found that Defendant's offer, both by its own terms and under Rule 68, had been withdrawn due to the lapse of time, and that Plaintiff had not accepted any offer, nor was any offer currently on the table. Id. The Court concluded, therefore, that the unaccepted Rule 68 offer did not render Plaintiff's claim moot and did not prevent her from proceeding as the representative of a proposed FLSA collective action. Id. at *4.

Hepler, et al. v. Abercrombie & Fitch Co.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 10424 (2d Cir. June 22, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action and collective action alleging that Defendants failed to comply with notice and record-keeping requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA") and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The District Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claims for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, finding that Defendants' Rule 68 offers of judgment rendered Plaintiffs' claims moot. Id. at *1. On appeal, the Second Circuit vacated the judgment of the District Court and remanded for further proceedings. The Second Circuit found that the District Court erred by dismissing the case for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction based on Defendants' unaccepted offers of judgment to Plaintiffs. Id. at *3. The Second Circuit noted that, if Defendants tender Rule 68 offers that provide less than complete relief, Plaintiffs are free to accept or not accept. If Plaintiffs accept, the District Court must enter judgment accordingly and terminate the case. If Plaintiffs do not accept, the case proceeds. If, on the other hand, Defendants tendered Rule 68 offers that provide complete relief, the District Court should enter judgment pursuant to the terms of that offer, with or without Plaintiffs' consent. Id. at *2. The Second Circuit noted that, by making an offer of judgment for complete relief, a Defendant is, in essence, submitting to entry of a default judgment. Just as a Defendant may end the litigation by allowing default judgment, a Defendant may end the litigation by offering judgment for all of the relief sought. Id. The Second Circuit, however, held that the offer of judgment, by itself, does not moot anything because an offer cannot compel relief; it is the entry of the judgment pursuant to that offer that moots the case. Id. at *3. Accordingly, the Second Circuit found that the District Court erred by dismissing the case for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction based on Defendants' unaccepted offers of judgment, vacated the District Court's judgment, and remanded for further proceedings.

Mays, et al. v. Grand Daddy's LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 733 (W.D. Wis. Jan. 6, 2015). Plaintiff, an entertainer at Defendants' adult club, brought a hybrid collective action under the FLSA and state law class action under Wisconsin's wage & hour laws, alleging claims for unpaid wages, unpaid overtime, and unlawful tip pooling and deductions. Before Plaintiff moved for class certification, Defendants tendered an offer of judgment under Rule 68, which Plaintiff rejected. Id. at *1. Defendants thereafter moved to dismiss the case, arguing that the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction because their offer of judgment had rendered Plaintiff's claims moot. Plaintiff moved to stay briefing and ruling on her Rule 23 motion for class certification until discovery could be completed. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion, and denied Defendants' motion. Plaintiff contended that her case was not moot because Defendants did not offer full relief on all of her claims, and even if they did, the existence of other opt-in Plaintiffs in the collective action would prevent a finding of mootness. Id. at *2. Specifically, Plaintiff argued that Defendants' Rule 68 offer was ambiguous because it did not identify which claims Defendants were offering to settle and was incomplete because it did not include damages plus interest for the value of her claim or twice the amount that Defendants deducted from her wages. Id. at *7. The Court agreed with Plaintiff and remarked that although Defendants claimed that their offer submitted to judgment for everything that Plaintiff had asserted, they failed to clarify this in their offer, stating only that judgment should be entered against them with respect to back wages, overtime pay, liquidated damages, improper deductions, punitive damages, and costs and attorneys' fees. Id. at *7-8. Defendants contended that they offered exactly what Plaintiff identified in her Rule 26 disclosures and asserted that they were entitled to rely on those disclosures in crafting an offer of judgment. Id. at *8. The Court found that Defendants failed to make clear what claims they were seeking to settle. Id. Defendants had not cited any legal authority in support of their argument that in determining whether an offer of judgment would moot their claims, the Court must limit Plaintiff to the calculations initially disclosed as damages under Rule 26, as opposed to the relief sought in the complaint. Id. at *8-9. The Court opined that Plaintiff had substantially complied with Rule 26 by identifying the amount of back wages and deductions that she was seeking and she did not exhibit willfulness or bad faith. Id. at *10. The Court remarked that neither the interest nor double deduction computation was so complex that Defendants were prejudiced by Plaintiff's lack of disclosure. Id. at *11. Thus, the Court concluded that Defendants failed to offer Plaintiff a complete and clear offer of judgment, and accordingly denied Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint as moot. Id. Because Plaintiff had filed her motion for class certification at an early stage to avoid mooting her claims or avoid a buy-off problem, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion to stay briefing on the motion for class certification pending further discovery. Id. at *12.

(iii) Individual Executive Liability In FLSA Collective Actions

Morales, et al. v. Rochdale Village, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144382 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 23, 2015). Plaintiff, a former non-exempt hourly employee, brought a putative class action and collective action alleging that Defendants denied her and others overtime and earned wages in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiff sought to represent five sub-classes asserting claims for failure to pay overtime and straight time wages in violation of the FLSA and NYLL and failure to abide by record-keeping requirements of the NYLL. Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint. The Court denied Defendants' motion. At the outset, the Court noted that, in order to state a plausible FLSA overtime claim, a Plaintiff must sufficiently allege 40 hours of work in a given workweek as well as uncompensated time in excess of the 40 hours. Id. at *5. Here, Plaintiff provided examples of two improper wage & hour practices that operated together to deprive her of compensation for 52 minutes of work during the week of January 6, 2014. Id. at *7. The Court found that Plaintiff's specific examples, combined with her allegations regarding her regularly scheduled 40-hour workweek, were sufficient to defeat Defendants' motion as to Plaintiff's overtime claim. Id. Plaintiff also sought liability against several individual Defendants. The Court noted that, in determining whether individual liability is warranted under the FLSA, the overarching concern is whether the alleged employer possessed the power to control the workers in question. Id. at *8. The Court further observed that a person exercises operational control over employees if his or her role within the company, and the decisions the role entails, directly impact the nature or conditions of the employees' employment. Id. The Court observed that Plaintiff alleged that the individual Defendants both held managerial and directional positions at the company, through which they had control over the wage policies, employees' work schedules, rates of pay, record-keeping practices, and day-to-day labor operations. Id. at *10. The Court, therefore, found that Plaintiff sufficiently had alleged a basis for individual liability. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Stevenson, et al. v. The Great American Dream, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63646 (N.D. Ga. May 14, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former adult entertainers at Pin Ups Nightclub, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants misclassified them as "independent contractors" and wrongfully deprived them of certain mandatory benefits under the FLSA. Id. at *1. Defendants moved for partial summary judgment, arguing that Defendant James W. Lee, Sr., President of The Great American Dream, Inc. ("GAD") and owner of Pin Ups, was not personally liable to Plaintiffs under the FLSA. Defendants maintained that Lee was not an employer within the meaning of the FLSA, and to be considered an "employer" under the FLSA, an officer should either be involved in the day-to-day operation or have some direct responsibility for the supervision of employees. Id. at *3. The undisputed facts established that Lee was not involved in the day-to-day operations of Pin Ups and did not have direct responsibility for the supervision of the entertainers. Further, Lee played no role in the hiring decisions nor did he play any role in forming the policies governing the entertainers' conduct during their shifts. Consequently, the Court found that Lee was not an "employer" under the FLSA. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs, however, argued that Lee, as the President, possessed supervisory authority. The Court remarked that mere possessing supervisory authority did not mean he exercised such authority, and that unexercised authority was insufficient to establish liability as an employer. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs also asserted that Lee admitted he made the decision to classify Plaintiffs as independent contractors. The Court, however, remarked that the evidence cited by the Plaintiffs did not support this assertion. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion for partial summary judgment, insofar as it applied to claims brought against Lee individually.

(iv) Awards Of Attorneys' Fees In FLSA Collective Actions

Bodon, et al. v. Domino's Pizza, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 82039 (E.D.N.Y. June 4, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendant failed to provide services or allowances to employees for maintenance of work uniforms, deducted their wages by requiring them to make certain uniform-related purchases, and retained gratuities in violation of the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The parties ultimately settled, and the Court approved the settlement. The settlement called for monetary relief on a claims-wide basis, and a class consisting of all delivery driver or customer service employees. Id. at *5. The parties failed to settle their fee dispute, and Plaintiffs therefore filed a motion for an award of attorneys' fees and costs. The Court granted the motion with revision to the rate, hours, and total fees. At the outset, the Court noted that in a settlement that involves a common fund, such as this case, attorneys' fees should be calculated based on: (i) a percentage-of-the-recovery method; and (ii) the lodestar/presumptively reasonable fee method. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs contended that the Court should look at the amount of money Defendant would have paid out if 100% of the settlement class timely submitted the claims, i.e., $4,705,145. Using this figure as a baseline, and adding in more than $1.9 million in fees, Plaintiffs calculated the entire fund at $6,626,964.79. Id. at *13. Defendant contended that the appropriate benchmark for Plaintiffs' fees was the benefit actually recovered by the class, or $1,536,872, which was significantly less than what Plaintiffs claimed, therefore bringing the fees down substantially. The Court noted that in Masters v. Wilhelmia Model Agency, 473 F.3d 423 (2d Cir. 2007), Plaintiffs settled for $21.8 million, and gave the Court discretion to determine the mode of disposal of the unclaimed or excess funds. Id. at *14. Plaintiffs' counsel requested 33.3% or $7.28 million of the fund as fees plus $1.5 million in expenses. The Court in Masters resolved the fee issue by awarding fees based on a percentage of only the claims made with a lodestar-check, and distributed the excess fund to various charities that benefited Plaintiffs. Id. at *15. The Second Circuit, however, reversed, finding that the entire fund, and not portion thereof, was created through the efforts of the counsel. Id. at *16. Here, the Court remarked that the Second Circuit's award of a percentage of the entire recovery in Masters did not mean that Plaintiffs' counsel were entitled to a percentage of a hypothetical recovery. Id. at *17. The Court observed that several cases post-dating Masters had expressly recognized that distinction. Id. Likewise, the Court remarked that while Masters was distinguishable from this case, at the same time Masters explicitly reaffirmed the lodestar approach as a viable method of assessing reasonable attorneys' fees in a common fund case. Id. at *20. Under the lodestar method, the Court noted that it must determine a reasonable hourly rate for the legal services performed, using factors such as the labor and skill required, the difficulty of the issues, and the attorney's customary hourly date. Id. at *23. The Court further opined that in assessing the hourly rate, case law precedents typically consider rates awarded in the district in which the reviewing Court sits, pursuant to what is known as the "forum rule." Id. at *23. The Court remarked that once it determines the reasonable hourly rate, it must them multiply this rate by the reasonable number of hours expended, in order to determine the presumptively reasonable fee. Accordingly, using the lodestar method, the Court determined a reasonable hourly rate for each of the attorneys' roles in the case, and awarded a total fee of $551,627.50. Id. at *35.

Gonzalez, et al. v. Scalinatella, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 78620 (S.D.N.Y. June 12, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA by refusing to pay tipped employees the minimum wage and overtime compensation and failing to apprise the employees of their rights, and violated the New York Labor Law ("NYLL") by refusing to pay overtime compensation and failing to provide various notices required under state law. Id. at *2. Although Plaintiff successfully obtained conditional certification of his FLSA claims, no additional Plaintiffs joined the action. Id. at *3. Plaintiff later moved for class certification of his NYLL claims, which the Court denied on the basis that the class was not sufficiently numerous. Subsequently, the parties reached a settlement agreement for $7,500, exclusive of fees. Unable to reach an agreement on the amount of fees, Plaintiff filed an application for $81,252.50 in attorneys' fees. Plaintiff asserted that the requested fee – a lodestar figure representing 249.1 attorney and paralegal hours multiplied by various hourly rates – was reasonable under the case law governing fee awards. Id. at *4. The Court awarded Plaintiff attorneys' fees in the amount of $48,366.50. Although the Court found that the fee award need not be proportionate to Plaintiff's recovery under the settlement agreement, it held that the award must be reduced in light of Plaintiff's unsuccessful motion for class certification. Id. at *6-9. The Court, however, found no reason to reduce Plaintiff's award by a measure related to the conditional certification motion under the FLSA, since the fact that no collective class members filed opt-in consent forms was beyond Plaintiff's control. Id. at *16. The Court similarly refused to reduce Plaintiff's award of fees to account for various unsuccessful discovery applications as alleged by Defendant. The Court summarized the history of discovery disputes in the case, and determined that each of the disputes reflected legitimate positions. Id. at *18-27. Thus, despite Plaintiff's partial failure on each application, the Court declined to disregard any hours Plaintiff spent in pursuit of the unsuccessful arguments regarding discovery disputes. Defendant also argued that the fee award should be reduced under Rule 26 as Plaintiff failed to provide a computation of damages. The Court, however, found no reason or supporting authority to limit or preclude an award of fees based on Plaintiff's allegedly inadequate initial disclosures. Id. at *30-31. The Court therefore identified only the line-items in counsel's records attributable to the unsuccessful motion to certify and reduced the fee award accordingly. The Court then accounted for the number of hours spent on the unsuccessful motion for class certification and the discovery extension request, and found that the total sought-after number of hours was 179.5, compared to the alleged 249.1 hours. Id. at *59. The Court thus determined that a 10% reduction in the hours of the lead counsel across-the-board would be appropriate. Id. Finding the remaining hours expended by the other attorneys and paralegals reasonable, the Court reached a lodestar of $48,366.50, and awarded that amount in attorneys' fees. Id.

Gortat, et al. v. Capala Brothers, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13160 (2d Cir. July 29, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of construction workers, brought an action alleging that Defendants violated the FLSA and New York Labor Law by failing to pay them for overtime hours. After six years of litigation, the case went to trial and the jury returned a verdict in Plaintiffs' favor. Id. at *3. The District Court ultimately awarded Plaintiffs damages totaling $293,212.41. Plaintiffs then sought attorneys' fees of $887,765.85 and costs of $80,324.11. Id. The Magistrate Judge recommended a substantial reduction in the amount requested and proposed a fee award of $514,284 and $68,294.50 in costs. Id. The Magistrate Judge recommended awarding no fees for the hours spent litigating Plaintiffs' defense to Defendants' counterclaims and denying the request of Plaintiffs' counsel for fees for a trial specialist who assisted Plaintiffs. Id. at *4. The Magistrate Judge also disagreed with Defendants' contention that Plaintiffs had engaged in unnecessary and inefficient discovery, reasoning that the delays in the case were due to Defendants' combative and extraordinary conduct that raised many unnecessary disputes regarding case management and discovery. Id. Despite Plaintiffs' concessions that their fee award should be reduced by $5,730 because Plaintiffs actually incurred that in defense of the counterclaims, the District Court adopted the Magistrate Judge's recommendation in its entirety. Id. at *5. Upon Defendants' appeal, the Second Circuit reversed the District Court's judgment insofar as it awarded Plaintiffs' counsel $5,730 in fees that counsel conceded were erroneously billed. Id. at *10. Although Defendants argued that the District Court should have downwardly adjusted the fee award because Plaintiffs did not succeed in every individual motion they filed in pursuit of their claims, the Second Circuit pointed out that there is no rule that Plaintiffs need to achieve total victory on every motion in pursuit of a successful claim in order to be compensated for the full number of hours spent litigating that claim. Id. at *9. The Second Circuit therefore concluded that the District Court did not err in finding the remaining hours reasonably incurred in pursuit of Plaintiffs' affirmative claims. Accordingly, the Second Circuit reversed in part and affirmed in part the District Court's judgment.

Teoba, et al. v. Trugreen Landcare LLC,* Case No. 10-CV-6132 (W.D.N.Y. July 28, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action seeking unpaid wages from Defendant under the FLSA and the minimum wage laws of New York and New Hampshire. The parties settled the litigation, and the Court had found the settlement agreement terms relating to damages and compensation for class members were fair and reasonable, and approved those portions of the agreement. Plaintiffs' counsel then filed a motion seeking attorneys' fees and expenses, which the Court granted. Defendants did not dispute that the Plaintiffs' counsel was entitled to attorneys' fees under the FLSA. The Court, however, expressed concern about whether the dollar amount of the fund being created for the settlement should be used as the denominator in determining what percentage of the settlement was being assigned to attorneys' fees. Id. The Court remarked that by using the sum of money needed to fund all possible claims, as opposed to the sum of money needed to pay reasonably expected claims, Plaintiffs' counsel might artificially overstate the value of the settlement and thereby reduce the percentage of funds from the total portion of the settlement assigned to attorneys' fees. Id. at 4. Responding to the Court's concerns, Plaintiffs' counsel pointed to several relevant considerations, including: (i) the fee portion of the settlement amount represented 31% of the total settlement fund; (ii) 57% of the total claims that could have been filed were in fact filed; and (iii) there was a 92% approval rate. Id. at 4-5. The Court observed that the fees sought represented approximately 31% of the total settlement fund, and noted that a percentage approximating one third of the settlement – using the total settlement fund as the denominator – has been found to be reasonable in similar cases. Id. at 7. In addition, the Court noted that the affidavits of Plaintiffs' counsel indicated that they had expended a total of 1,180 hours in attorney time and 56.5 hours in paralegal time and had incurred $48,024 in expenses. Id. The Court found that this expenditure of time was not unreasonable in the light of the long and hard fought history of the case. Id. Finally, the Court found it significant that Plaintiffs' counsel had submitted an affidavit setting forth what the presumptively reasonable fee would be at normal billing rates (in excess of $800,000) and what the fee would be if the computed hourly rates were used from recently approved in a class action employment discrimination case involving out-of-district lawyers ($576,000). Id. at 8. The Court remarked that this was another indication that $565,000 for attorneys' fees and costs provided by the settlement was fair and reasonable. Id. Accordingly, the Court found that the requested $565,000 in attorneys' fees was reasonable, and granted the motion.

(v) Application Of Twombly Pleading Standards In FLSA Collective Actions

Freeman, et al. v. Zillow, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120501 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 19, 2015). Plaintiff, on behalf of inside sales consultants, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the California Labor Code by failing to pay him overtime wages and failing to provide meal and rest breaks. Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant engaged in a systematic scheme of exploiting and intimidating its employees to miss meal breaks, rest breaks, and work overtime without compensation. Id. at *2. According to the complaint, Defendant required and demanded that employees work beyond the automatically recorded eight hour workday and/or 40-hour workweek without compensation and demanded that employees work through their meal and rest breaks while denying them compensation by automatically detracting this time from their previously auto-populated timesheets. Id. at *2-3. Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint based on Bell Atlantic Corp v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 555 (2007), arguing that Plaintiff did not provide any details about the nature of its policies or practices that resulted in the alleged un-compensation or under-compensation. Id. at *5. The Court granted Defendant's motion. The Court found that Plaintiff had failed to provide sufficient detail about the length and frequency of Plaintiff's unpaid work to support a reasonable inference that Plaintiff worked more than 40 hours in a given week. Id. at *13. Plaintiff had not alleged that Defendant failed to pay him overtime on any specific workday where he worked in excess of eight hours or any specific workweek where he worked excess of 40 hours. Id. The Court further found that Plaintiff's claim for failure to provide meal and rest breaks also failed to satisfy the pleading requirements. Plaintiff had nowhere specified in his complaint any instance of one meal or rest break where he worked through the break and where Defendant failed to pay him for that time. Id. at *15. Thus, although Plaintiff's allegations raised the possibility of violations, the Court concluded that Plaintiff had failed to provide sufficient detail to support a reasonable inference that Defendant violated the California Labor Code. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the complaint without prejudice.

Lico, et al. v. TD Bank,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 70978 (E.D.N.Y. June 2, 2015). Plaintiff, a former bank teller, brought a collective action under the FLSA on behalf of herself and others similarly-situated alleging that Defendant failed to provide her with an adequate space to express breast milk and to take necessary lactation breaks during her workday. Plaintiff's manager informed her that she could take only two daily breaks to express milk. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendants terminated her employment because she tried to exercise her rights as a nursing mother. Id. at *3. Defendants moved to dismiss claims under § 207(r) of the FLSA, which the Court denied. Section 207(r) provides, in relevant part that an employer shall provide: (i) a reasonable break time for an employee to express breast milk for her nursing child each time such employee has need to express the milk; and (ii) a place, other than a bathroom, that is shielded from view and free from intrusion from co-workers and the public, which may be used by an employee for such purpose. Id. at *5. Although Defendants argued that § 207(r) was not privately enforceable, the Court noted that § 207(r) must be read in conjunction with the penalty provision of the FLSA, which explicitly provides a private right of action for all violations of § 7, which includes § 207(r). Id. at *6-7. Further, the Court observed that § 216(b) limits the remedies available for violations of § 207(r), and only permits recovery of lost wages and overtime, liquidated damages, attorneys' fees, and costs. Id. at *7. Likewise, the U.S. Department of Labor has indicated that § 207(r) does not specify any penalties if an employer is found to have violated the break time for nursing mother's requirement, and that in most instances, an employee may only bring an action for unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation and an additional equal amount of liquidated damages. Id. at *8. Because employers are not required to compensate employees for break time to express breast milk, in most circumstances there will not be any unpaid minimum wage or overtime compensation associated with the failure to provide such breaks. Id. The Court thus remarked that this interpretation highlighted a practical enforcement problem, and not a categorical bar to bringing suit. The Court reasoned that it did not mean that the statute is not privately enforceable as a matter of law, and instead a Plaintiff may bring suit individually for a violation of § 207(r), but that she may only recover lost wages that are attributable to the § 207(r) violation. Id. at *8-9. Alternatively, Defendants argued that Plaintiff failed to state a claim because she did not allege that she lost wages as a result of any violation of the requirements of § 207(r). Plaintiff alleged that she missed time at work because she needed to travel home in order to express milk, and had sought compensation for 40.35 hours of wages lost because of Defendants' failure to comply with 207(r) and discriminatory practices. The Court thus opined that Plaintiff plausibly alleged a claim of compensable damages consistent with the remedies permitted under § 216(b), and denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Miranda, et al. v. Coach, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18278 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of retail workers, brought a putative class action under California Labor Code alleging that Defendants required them to submit to a bag check when leaving the store which deprived them of time for breaks and meals, and kept them late without pay at the conclusion of their shifts. Id. at *1. Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint, and the Court partially granted the motion. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs had pleaded conclusory allegations about wage and overtime violations, and such was far short of the requirements of Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants failed to pay wages at the regular rate and for overtime in violation of §§ 510, 1194, and 1199 of the California Labor Code. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants forced them and other similarly-situated employees to work on a regular and consistent basis without receiving compensation for all hours worked at their regular rate or if more than eight hours a day and/or 40 hours per week, at the applicable overtime rate. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendants had a consistent policy of failing to pay them regular rate and/or premium pay for those hours worked. Id. at *4-5. The Court found that those allegations merely restated the statute's obligations without alleging facts sufficient to make a plausible claim and did not specify which, if any, named Plaintiff actually failed to receive full regular wages. Id. at *5. In addition, the Court observed that the overtime allegation used the conditional "if" rather than alleging concrete facts showing that the named Plaintiffs actually worked overtime hours without proper pay. Id. The Court concluded that the allegations were insufficient to state a claim. Id. Defendants also contended that Plaintiffs' allegations under §§ 226.7 and 512 of the California Labor Code and Wage Order No. 7-2001 were conclusory and that they had not alleged facts showing that Defendants denied them a timely and compliant meal or rest break. Id. at *6. The Court disagreed, and found that Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants subjected them to a uniform company policy that required all employees to undergo a bag check by a supervisor prior to leaving the store for all breaks. Plaintiffs further alleged that they often waited between 5 to 30 minutes in order to have their items checked, and due to this they often missed their break entirely, had their breaks cut short, or took their breaks late. Id. at *6-7. The Court determined that these factual allegations were enough to show that Defendants failed to provide Plaintiffs with compliant meal and rest periods. Id. at *7. The Court also rejected Defendants' contention that Plaintiffs failed to plead facts showing that they impeded, discouraged or prohibited Plaintiffs from taking a proper meal break as required by Brinker Restaurant Corp. v. Superior Court, 53 Cal. 4th 1004 (2012). Id. The Court maintained that Defendant's uniform company-wide loss prevention policy impeded Plaintiffs' ability to take 30-minute meal breaks. Id. at *7-8. The Court ruled found that Plaintiffs, being former employees, had no standing to seek injunctive relief enjoining Defendants from violating wage & hour law. Id. at *9-10. The Court also declined to strike Plaintiffs' class allegations and found that the sufficiency of class allegations are better addressed through a class certification motion. Id. at *10.

Nardiello, et al. v. Maureen's Kitchen, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32574 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 17, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant employees, brought an action alleging various violations under the FLSA and New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim, which the Court granted in part. First, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs had not adequately pleaded their unpaid overtime claims based on recent Second Circuit decisions – such as DeJesus v. HF Management Services, LLC, 726 F.3d 85 (2d Cir. 2013), Nakahata v. N.Y. Presbyterian Healthcare System, Inc., 723 F.3d 192 (2d Cir. 2014), and Lundy v. Catholic Health System, 711 F.3d 106 (2d Cir. 2013) – applying the pleading standards of Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), to FLSA overtime claims. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant required them to work on one of four available shifts during their employment, which ran from 6 am to 3:30 pm, and that they therefore regularly worked more than 40 hours per week. Id. at *7. The Court pointed out, however, that the complaint lacked basic information regarding how many days per week, on any week, each Plaintiff worked and therefore failed to adequately allege that Plaintiffs worked in excess of 40 hours per week in any given week. Id. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' unpaid overtime claims without prejudice. Second, Defendant contended that Plaintiffs' minimum wage claims should be dismissed because the complaint did not approximate the hours Plaintiffs worked or identify the time periods during which they allegedly did not receive the applicable minimum wage. Id. at *8. The Court observed that Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant never paid them a minimum wage, only allowed them to collect tips as compensation, and also issued fake paychecks to make it appear as though Plaintiffs were receiving the applicable minimum wage. Id. The Court found those allegations stated plausible minimum wage violations under the FLSA and the NYLL. Id. at *8-9. Third, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant required them to arrive at least 30 minutes before their shift, and work between 20 and 30 minutes after the end of their shift to perform necessary side work without compensation. Id. at *9. Defendant argued that those claims should also be dismissed because they did not meet the Second Circuit's pleading standard for FLSA overtime claims. Id. at *10. The Court disagreed, stating that although those allegations lacked the degree of specificity to state an unpaid overtime claim, they did state plausible claims that Defendant failed to compensate Plaintiffs for off-shift work in violation of the FLSA and the NYLL. Id. Finally, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs had not pleaded with any degree of plausibility that Defendant denied them meal breaks, wage notices, or other statutory requirements. Id. at *10-11. The Court found that although the allegations were sparse, the complaint plausibly alleged violations of § 162 of the NYLL. Id. at *11. The Court also found that Plaintiffs had plausibly alleged violations of § 195 of the NYLL for their assertion that Defendant issued fake paychecks that contained false information regarding Plaintiffs' wages. Id. at *11-12.

Nikmanesh, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52464 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 16, 2015). In this putative class action, Plaintiff, a former pharmacist, alleged that Wal-Mart failed to provide rest breaks and to compensate for off-the-clock time spent taking a job-related training course. Specifically, Plaintiff in her first amended complaint ("FAC") asserted that she took the home study and test portions of the APHA Immunization Certification Training Course (the "Course"), a course directly related to the job of pharmacist, without compensation. Wal-Mart moved to dismiss on the grounds that Plaintiffs' allegations were insufficient under Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 554 (2007). First, the Court found that Plaintiff's scant allegations were insufficient to permit an inference that the Course was work time. The Court opined that the only information Plaintiff provided about the Course was that it was an immunization certification course that was directly related to the job of pharmacist, which was not enough. Id. at *4. The Court observed that it would be absurd to say that an employer must pay for any and all activities "directly related" to its employees' jobs without considering the employer's conduct. Id. The Court noted that many employees undoubtedly spend hours of personal time educating themselves on things "directly related" to their jobs so they might be better, more marketable employees. Id. at *5. The Court remarked that Plaintiff, however, did not allege that Wal-Mart had given the course or required its pharmacists to take the course. Thus, the Court concluded that Plaintiff had not pled sufficient factual content to allow the Court to make a reasonable inference that Defendant was liable. Id. Regarding Plaintiff's rest-break claims, Plaintiff alleged only that Wal-Mart had a uniform policy prohibiting any pharmacist from leaving the pharmacy unattended thereby discouraging or preventing members of class from taking mandated rest breaks. Id. at 4. The Court found that the allegations were insufficient because the FAC alleged no specific incidents of missed rest breaks. Plaintiff asserted facts in her opposition brief that the inability to take rest breaks generally occurred when Plaintiff and putative class members were the only pharmacists scheduled to work and therefore they were discouraged and prevented from taking rest breaks because to do so would mean they would have to close down the pharmacy and not provide timely service to customers; however, Plaintiff did not allege these facts in the FAC. Id. at *6. Specifically, the Court noted that the FAC did not allege that Plaintiff worked alone in the pharmacy, that Wal-Mart failed to provide relief for breaks, or prevented or discouraged her from closing down the pharmacy for breaks. Id. Thus, the Court concluded that the absence of such allegations was fatal to those claims, and dismissed the complaint with leave to amend.

(vi) FLSA Collective Actions For Donning And Doffing

Dekeyser, et al. v. Thyssenkrupp Waupaca, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28471 (E.D. Wis. Mar. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA by failing to pay them overtime for time spent at the end of their shifts showering and changing clothes. Defendant moved to reconsider the Court's order of November 25, 2014, in which it ruled that in order for Plaintiffs to show changing clothes and showering was "required by the nature of the work" at Defendant's foundries, Plaintiffs must convince the finder of fact that changing clothes and showering at work would significantly reduce the risk to the health of the employee. Id. at *1. The Court denied the motion. Defendant contended that the standard used here, which was derived from the tripartite test utilized by the Ninth Circuit in Ballaris v. Wacker Siltronic Corp., 370 F.3d 901, 910 (9th Cir. 2004) – which in itself came from regulations promulgated after enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act, 29 U.S.C. § 254 – was inconsistent with the U.S. Supreme Court's 2014 decision in Integrity Staffing Solutions, Inc. v. Busk, 135 S. Ct. 513 (2014). Id at *2-3. The Court found there was no question that the principles discussed in Integrity Staffing applied to this case because the Supreme Court interpreted the same statutory provisions, regulatory framework, and body of case law that the parties here had examined since this case started. Id. at *7. The Court noted that Integrity Staffing provided significant guidance to applying the integral and indispensable language first articulated in Steiner v. Mitchell, 350 U.S. 247, 252-53 (1956); indeed, Integrity Staffing clarified that those words each meant different things, as "integral" was akin to "intrinsically related to" and "indispensable" was akin to "necessary." Id. Thus, the Court maintained that determining compensability solely on the basis of whether an employer required an activity was wrong because such an analysis ignored the requirement that the activity be integral or intrinsically related to what the employer hired the workers to do. Id. at *8. Likewise, the Court held a test that turned on whether the activity was for the benefit of the employer was similarly overbroad. Id. Further, the Court pointed out that Integrity Staffing did not relate to employee health and safety, yet the concurring opinion highlighted that extrapolating the Supreme Court's reasoning to hold as non-compensable activities that were indispensable/necessary for employees to do their jobs safely would not be warranted. Id. Moreover, it would run contrary to Steiner and the applicable regulations that Integrity Staffing discussed. Id. The Court observed that what was conceded by the employer in Steiner was at issue in this case, i.e., was changing and showering at work integral and indispensable to the employee's productive work? Id. The Court concluded that it had provided a narrower, more specific standard in an effort to assist the parties in determining, essentially, how indispensable a health and safety precaution must be to bring a case within the ambit of Steiner such that the time was compensable notwithstanding the Portal-to-Portal Act. Id. Accordingly, the standard was that the changing and showering was integral and indispensable if "required by the nature of the work," i.e., in other words, if "changing clothes and showering at work would significantly reduce the risk to the health of the employee." Id at *9.

Gomez, et al. v. Tyson Foods, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 15041 (8th Cir. Aug. 26, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former unionized employees at one of Defendants' beef processing facilities, brought a class action and collective action against Defendants seeking overtime and minimum wage payments for certain pre-shift and post-shift activities under the Nebraska Wage Payment and Collection Act and the FLSA. Previously, the District Court had granted summary judgment in favor of the class on all liability issues, and after a jury trial, the District Court awarded nearly $5 million in damages. Defendant appealed the class certification order and the summary judgment rulings, and the Eighth Circuit reversed. Defendant argued that the District Court should have dismissed the named Plaintiffs' FLSA claims for failure to file timely consents as required by 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Eighth Circuit noted that in Acosta v. Tyson Foods, Inc., 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 15043 (8th Cir. Aug. 26, 2015), it had held that an employee must file a written consent within the statute of limitations to proceed as a Plaintiff in an FLSA action. Id. at *5. The Eighth Circuit, therefore, concluded the District Court should have dismissed the FLSA claims. Defendant also contended that Plaintiffs failed to make a submissible case on their claims under the Nebraska Collection Act, which creates a cause of action to recover only those wages that an employer previously agreed to pay, when all conditions stipulated were met. Id. at *6. Defendant acknowledged that it agreed to pay every employee for four minutes per shift to compensate for pre-shift and post-shift activities, but there was no dispute in the record that Defendant paid this amount of time. Id. at *7. The Eighth Circuit noted that there was no evidence of an agreement with Plaintiffs and other employees for additional time spent performing pre-shift and post-shift activities during the relevant period. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit reversed and remanded the action for entry of judgment for Defendant.

(vii) Exemption Issues In FLSA Collective Actions

Alvarado, et al. v. Corporate Cleaning Services*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 5270 (7th Cir. April 1, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former window washers, brought suit claiming that their employer improperly failed to pay them overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"). The District Court held that Plaintiffs fell within the exception from overtime requirements set forth in 29 U.S.C. § 207(i) and, therefore, granted summary judgment to Defendants. The exception has three elements, including: (i) the worker's regular pay exceeds one and half times the federal minimum wage; (ii) more than half of the worker's compensation over a representative period represents commissions on goods and services; and (iii) the worker is employed by a retail or service establishment. Id. at *2-3. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed. First, the Seventh Circuit found that Plaintiffs' annual pay throughout 2007 ranged from approximately $40,000 to $60,000. Id. at *4. Second, the Seventh Circuit concluded that Defendants paid the employees based on commission. Although Defendants called their compensation system a "piece-rate" system, rather than a "commission" system, the Seventh Circuit opined that nomenclature is not determinative. In a piece-rate system, an employer pays a worker by the item produced, even if the employer has not sold the item; in a commission system, an employer pays a worker only when there has been a sale. More importantly, a commission-compensated employee works irregular hours so that the ratio of his pay to his hours is not constant. The Seventh Circuit found that Defendants' employees could work only when a building owner hired Defendants to wash windows, and the peculiar conditions of the window-washing business necessarily made their hours irregular. Third, Defendants qualified as a retail service establishment because they sold their window-cleaning services to building owners and managers. Id. at *11. The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL"), in an amicus brief, embraced Plaintiffs' argument that the building managers who bought Defendants' cleaning services re-sold them to the building's occupants, as if the managers were buying mops that they planned to re-sell to the occupants, such that Defendants did not qualify as retailers. The Seventh Circuit, however, noted that the DOL failed to engage the primary reason for treating Defendants' window washers as commission workers – their irregular work hours – and failed to suggest that window washers would be better off if paid overtime. Id. at *15. The Seventh Circuit therefore, found no connection between the DOL's criteria and the reasons for excusing certain employers from the FLSA's overtime provision. The Seventh Circuit, accordingly, affirmed the District Court's order granting summary judgment in favor of Defendants.

Barks, et al. v. Silver Bait, LLC,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 17310 (6th Cir. Oct. 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of workers at a rural Tennessee worm farm, brought an action under the FLSA alleging that Defendant improperly classified them as exempt under the FLSA's agricultural exemption and thereby failed to pay them overtime compensation. Defendant engaged in housing, growing and packaging bait worms, and employed Plaintiffs to load worms onto empty trays and to feed them. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs also packaged the worms in Defendant's custom packaging, labelled them, and loaded them onto pallets for delivery to retailers. Id. Believing that its employees fell within the FLSA exemption for agricultural workers, Defendant did not pay them overtime. Id. at *4. In 2009, the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") opened an investigation and concluded that the exempt classification was appropriate because Plaintiffs worked on a farm, and Defendant employed them as seasonal workers to cultivate, grow, and harvest agricultural or horticultural commodities. Id. at *5. After a bench trial, the District Court found that the agricultural exemption applied, and issued a declaratory judgment in Defendant's favor. Id. at *6. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed, holding that the FLSA's agricultural exemption covered the growing and raising of bait worms on a worm farm even though that activity was not expressly listed in the statutory definition of agriculture. The Sixth Circuit found that the FLSA definition of agriculture was meant broadly to reach "farming in all its branches" and applied to Defendant. Id. at *13. Although worm farming was not agriculture in a traditional sense, the Sixth Circuit found that raising worms fell within the margins of the term's ordinary meaning as involving the production of animals useful to man and the preparation of products for man's use. Id. at *12. According to the Sixth Circuit, raising and growing bait worms was similar to traditional farming because both involved raising animals for sale as commodity, and bait worms have an agricultural character even though they were not used as food for human beings. Id. at *16-17. The Sixth Circuit reasoned that bait worms were similar to working with other types of animals that case law authorities and the DOL regulations had concluded were covered by the agricultural exemption, including race horses, cattle raised to obtain serum or virus, and animals raised on a farm used only for experimental purposes in connection with an employer's factory. Id. The Sixth Circuit thus rejected a rigid view of the exemption offered by Plaintiffs to limit the scope of the agricultural exemption to the production of only certain types of animals enumerated in the statute such as hogs or cattle. Id. at *17-18. The Sixth Circuit observed that, although not a specifically enumerated farming activity, there was little to distinguish Defendant from a traditional farm other than its focus on worm farming. Id. at *20-21. Accordingly, the Sixth concluded that FLSA's agricultural exemption covered Defendants' activities.

Bucklin, et al. v. Zurich American Insurance Co.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 12497 (9th Cir. July 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of insurance claims adjusters, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as administrative employees exempt from the overtime provisions of the California Labor Code. The District Court granted summary judgment to Defendant, and the Ninth Circuit affirmed. The Ninth Circuit applied California's administrative exemption test as articulated in Campbell v. PricewaterhouseCoopers, LLP, 642 F.3d 820, 831 (9th Cir. 2011). To classify an employee under the administrative exemption, an employer must establish five elements, including that: (i) the employee performs work directly related to management policies or general business operations of either the employer or the employer's clients; (ii) the employee customarily and regularly exercises discretion and independent judgment; (iii) the employee works under only general supervision while performing work along specialized or technical lines requiring special training, experience, or knowledge; (iv) the employee is primarily engaged in exempt work meeting the above requirements; and (v) the employee meets a minimum salary requirement. Id. at *2. The Ninth Circuit found that Plaintiffs primarily performed work directly related to Defendant's management policies or general business operations to the extent that they developed plans of action for resolving claims and represented Defendant while investigating claims, setting reserves, directing litigation, and negotiating settlements. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs also made recommendations to their supervisors when necessary, and supervisors frequently accepted those recommendations. Id. at *3-4. Further, the Ninth Circuit determined that Plaintiffs customarily and regularly exercised discretion and independent judgment because they had authority to set reserves and to settle claims up to specified amounts, after considering factors such as the nature and extent of the injury and the likelihood of the claimant's permanent disability, and, when litigation became necessary, they retained an attorney on behalf of Defendant, developed a litigation strategy, and, when appropriate, settled the case. Id. at *4-5. The Ninth Circuit reasoned that the mere fact that Plaintiffs performed some clerical duties and described their duties as routine did not create a triable issue on the quantitative component of the directly related requirement. Similarly, the fact that Plaintiffs' discretion was restricted by Defendant's best practices manual did not negate their regular exercise of discretion and independent judgment in setting reserves and directing litigation. Id. at *5. In addition, Plaintiffs acknowledged that they engaged in work along specialized or technical lines, rarely operated under direct supervision, and earned more than twice the state minimum wage. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's order granting summary judgment to Defendant.

Burke, et al. v. Alta Colleges, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35789 (D. Colo. Mar. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former field admission representatives, brought an FLSA action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt and sought unpaid overtime compensation and related penalties and damages. After a bench trial, the Court found that Plaintiffs were exempt from overtime requirements of the FLSA, and entered judgment against each named Plaintiff and in Defendant's favor. The Court noted that Plaintiffs were one of the three types of employees tasked with working with prospective students to inform and persuade them to enroll in Defendant's educational programs and services. Id. at *11. The primary role of the field admissions representatives was to selectively prospect, interview, recommend, and enroll individuals into one of Defendant's career-focused education programs and guide the prospects through the enrollment completion process. Id. at *12. The Court noted that after the field admissions representatives were trained, they were responsible for generating the majority of their own leads, and worked with minimal supervision. Id. at *20-21. Field admissions representatives were paid an annual salary, before October 2010, in addition to a base salary, and they also received a bonus. After 2011, based on the Department of Education's new regulations, Defendant stopped paying commissions and bonuses. Id. at *32. The new regulations defined commission, bonus, or other incentive payment to mean a sum of money or something of value, other than a fixed salary of wages, paid to or given to a person or entity for services rendered. Id. The Court remarked that the FLSA generally mandates that an employer pay an employee one-half times the regular rate of pay for hours worked in excess of 40 per week, but exempted from overtime any person employed in the capacity of an outside salesman. Id. at *103. The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") defines an outside salesman as one: (i) whose primary duty was making sales and obtaining orders for services for which he receives a consideration; and (ii) who customarily is engaged away from the employer's place of business in performing such primary duty. Id. at *103-104. The Court observed that an employee's primary duty for purposes of the FLSA is that which is of principal importance to the employer. Id. at *106. The Court remarked that the required analysis should be a functional inquiry that views an employee's responsibilities in the context of the particular industry in which the employee works and accommodates industry-by-industry variations in methods of selling. Id. at *107. Under this standard, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs were making sales. The Court explained that from the time each Plaintiff first contacted the high school until the time the student candidate actually started school at Defendant's College, Plaintiffs were engaging in various activities to finalize the sale, including getting students to complete the enrollment process, attending Defendant's classes, and paying tuition. Id. The Court remarked that all of Plaintiffs' other activities, including time spent calling high schools to schedule meetings or presentations, reviewing career interest cards, and completing weekly activity reports, whether performed in their home office of on the road, or anywhere else they chose to, fell within the outside sales exemption because they furthered their sales efforts. Id. at *108. Accordingly, the Court concluded that in the for-profit education industry, Plaintiffs who work as Defendant's field admissions representatives were generating sales. In addition, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs also bore external indicia of salesmen as Plaintiffs: (i) were hired as salespeople; (ii) received sales training; (iv) solicited new businesses; (v) worked with minimal supervision; and (vi) their compensation and evaluations reflected their sales activities. Id. at *112-117. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs were exempt from overtime requirements under FLSA's outside sales exemption, and entered judgment in Defendant's favor.

Calderon, et al. v. GEICO General Insurance Co.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 22546 (4th Cir. Dec. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of security investigators, brought a collective action under the FLSA alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt and denied them overtime pay. Plaintiffs worked in Defendant's Special Investigations Unit ("SIU"), a part of Defendant's Claims Department, and their primary responsibility was to investigate fraudulent claims. Id. at *3-4. Defendant classified its investigators as exempt under the FLSA, and in 2007, Defendant undertook a review of various employee classification to conclude that it properly classified the investigators as exempt under the administrative exemption. Id. at *8. Alleging that the classification was improper, Plaintiffs requested damages in the amount of their unpaid overtime, liquidated damages, interest, and an award of attorneys' fees and costs. The District Court conditionally certified Plaintiffs' FLSA claim as a collective action, and approximately 48 investigators joined the action as opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. at 11. Plaintiffs subsequently added individual and class action claims for unpaid overtime pay under the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"), and the District Court certified the class. Following discovery, Plaintiffs moved for partial summary judgment, which the District Court granted. In doing so the District Court rejected Defendant's contention that the investigators fell within the FLSA's administrative exemption. Id. at *11-12. The District Court subsequently entered a stipulated order containing a complete formula for the computation of back pay to which each Plaintiff was entitled depending upon the total pay received and the total time worked for each two-week pay period within the applicable two years limitations period. Id. at *12-13. On Defendant's appeal, the Fourth Circuit remanded the action, and concluded that the District Court had not found all of the facts necessary to compute the amount of damages. The District Court subsequently determined the amount of damages for each Plaintiff and entered judgment in Plaintiffs' favor. Defendant again appealed, arguing that the District Court erred in granting partial summary judgement against it on the issue of liability. Id. at *14. The Fourth Circuit affirmed the District Court's findings on the issue of Defendant's liability. The Fourth Circuit found that the summary judgment record clearly showed that Plaintiffs' primary duty was investigating suspected fraud, including reporting their findings, and they had no supervisory responsibility. Id. at *19-24. The Fourth Circuit noted that Plaintiffs were in no way part of the management of Defendant and did not run or service the general business operations; rather, by assisting the claims adjusters in processing the claims of Defendant's insureds, Plaintiffs' duty simply consisted of the day-to-day carrying out of Defendant's affairs to the public. Id. at *24-25. The Fourth Circuit concluded that the primary duty of Plaintiffs – conducting factual investigations and reporting the results – was not analogous to the work in the "functional areas" that the regulations identify as exempt. Id. at *38. The Fourth Circuit therefore held that the District Court correctly granted partial summary judgment to Plaintiffs on the issue of whether Defendant improperly classified Plaintiffs as exempt. The Fourth Circuit also held that the District Court correctly granted partial summary judgment to Defendant on the issue of willfulness under the FLSA, finding no basis upon which a reasonable fact-finder could conclude that Defendant's decision to classify Plaintiffs as exempt was knowingly incorrect or reckless. Id. at *40. The Fourth Circuit noted that Defendant had acted in good faith by reviewing the classification issue multiple times, and that the District Court was within its discretion in refusing to award liquidated damages to Plaintiffs under either the FLSA or the NYLL. Id. at *45. The Fourth Circuit, however, found that an award of pre-judgment interest was mandatory on a NYLL wage claim, and the District Court did not have discretion to decline such an award. Id. at *48. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit affirmed in part and reversed in part the District Court's decision.

Freeman, et al. v. Kaplan, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 128948 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 25, 2015). Plaintiff, a law school student, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL") by failing to pay her a minimum wage in an acceptable medium and in a timely fashion. Id. at *1. Defendant hired law students to help sell its test-preparation products on their law school campuses; Defendant called them "student representatives." Id. at *3. Defendant hired Plaintiff as a student representative in March 2013, and paid her on a per-task basis in credits that could be used toward Defendant's course or third-party gift cards. When Plaintiff earned 25 credits, which was sufficient to qualify for one course, Defendant offered her the position as head representative. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiff accepted that position, and worked for Defendant for just over one year, earning 47 credits. Id. at *7. During that time, she only sold one review course, as she mainly helped the regional director with set up and take-down of sales tables, provided promotional materials to students and answered customer e-mails. Id. While Plaintiff redeemed 25 of her earned credits for one of Defendant's review courses, she was unable to redeem her remaining credits because Defendant incorrectly credited her with only five credits. Id. at *8. Plaintiff contended that Defendant violated the FLSA and the IMWL by failing timely to pay her minimum wages in an acceptable medium. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that Plaintiff was an outside sales employee and therefore exempt from the requirements of both the FLSA and the IMWL. Plaintiff had averred that she agreed to work as heap representative in exchange for 25 credits, which met the threshold for a bar preparation course, and after that she then stopped trying to make her own sales. Id. at *18. Plaintiff further stated that only five of her total credits stemmed from making sales, which constituted a single sale made, and thus the vast majority of her compensation came from completing non-sales tasks. Id. The Court found that since Plaintiff spent much of her time as head representative fulfilling various non-exempt promotional activities rather than doing sales, a jury could conclude that Plaintiff did not have a primary duty of sales. Id. The Court therefore denied Defendant's motion with regard to the period during which Plaintiff worked as a head representative. Defendant also argued that Plaintiff never worked at one of Defendant's places of business and thus she was "customarily and regularly engaged away from Defendant's place of business in performing such primary duty." Id. at *21. The Court concluded that the law school was a place of business for Defendant. The Court noted that Defendant regularly rented space from the school during the student's employment, it maintained sales employees on campus, and regularly directed them to make use of law school properly for meetings and announcements. Id. at *23-23. Defendant submitted that, because Plaintiff spent about 20% of her time working off-campus, she performed her primary duty of sales away from law school "customarily and regularly." Id. at *28. Defendant, however, made no showing as to the frequency or regularity of Plaintiff's work away from campus, and Plaintiff sated that she worked away from school only occasionally. As a dispute of material fact remained as to whether Plaintiff customarily and regularly engaged in the primary duty of making sales away from the law school, the Court concluded that summary judgment would be inappropriate.

Garrison, et al. v. ConAgra Foods Packaged Foods, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 891 (E.D. Ark. Jan. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former team leaders, brought an action seeking to recover unpaid overtime under the FLSA, the Arkansas Minimum Wage Act ("AMWA"), and a common law theory of unjust enrichment. Team leaders were salaried employees and their job duties required them to monitor the performance and behavior of hourly employees, and to identify poor performance and rules violations. Id. at *5. Team leaders were responsible for scheduling over 1,000 hourly employees every day, and were also responsible for determining at the start of every shift whether they had enough employees to run their production for that day. Id. at *9, 12. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that: (i) Plaintiffs were exempt because they were employed in a bona fide executive capacity; (ii) they were exempt from the AMWA's overtime requirements for the same reason; and (iii) that their unjust enrichment claim failed as a matter of law. The Court granted the motion. At the outset, the Court noted that the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") defines an executive employee as one who: (i) is compensated on a salary basis with not less than $455 per week; (ii) whose primary duty is management of the enterprise; (iii) who regularly directs the work of two or more other employees; and (iv) who has authority to hire and fire other employees. Id. at *19. Plaintiffs contended that they did not possess the authority to unilaterally hire and fire any employee. Id. at *20. The Court noted that many different employee duties could satisfy the fourth element; for example, an employer could show that the purported executives' input had more influence than hourly employees' input, or that employee's recommendation are given particular weight. Id. at *21. In addition, the Court observed that, in Burlington Industries, Inc., v. Ellerty, 524 U.S. 742 (1998), the Supreme Court defined a tangible employment action as a significant change in employment status, such as hiring, firing, failing to promote, reassignment with significantly different responsibilities, or a decision causing a significant change in benefits. Id. at *22-23. The Court reasoned that although Plaintiffs may not have been responsible for selecting employees for promotion or advancement, their evaluations and recommendations determined whether an employee would retain such promotions. Id. at *30. In addition, the Court found that Plaintiffs initiated the progressive discipline process, and that Plaintiffs' job descriptions included as part of their supervisory responsibilities rewarding and disciplining employees. Id. at *44. The Court particularly noted that initiating the disciplinary process that leads to an employee's suspension without pay or discharge was enough to comport with the DOL's regulatory requirement that Plaintiffs' disciplinary recommendations and suggestions were given particular weight. Id. at *49. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Defendant met its burden of establishing that Plaintiffs' recommendations for discipline were given particular weight and that the fourth element was satisfied. The Court thereby granted Defendant summary judgment on Plaintiffs' FLSA claim. For the same reasons, the Court granted Defendant summary judgment on Plaintiffs' AMWA claims.

Greene, et al. v. Executive Coach & Carriage,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 1257 (9th Cir. Jan. 27, 2015). Plaintiff, a taxicab driver, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay minimum wage and overtime in violation of Nevada wage & hour laws. The District Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's claim under the Nevada Minimum Wage Amendment, granted summary judgment on Plaintiff's claim under § 608.016 of the Nevada Revised Statute, and denied Plaintiff's request for leave to amend his complaint. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded. At the outset, the Ninth Circuit found that the District Court erred in dismissing Plaintiff's claim under the Nevada Minimum Wage Amendment. Id. at *1-2. The Ninth Circuit noted that the Amendment, which contained no taxicab and limousine exception, superseded and supplanted the taxicab driver exception set out in § 608.250(2) of the Nevada Revised Statutes when it was ratified in 2006. The Ninth Circuit, therefore, rejected Defendant's retroactivity argument. Id. at *2. Plaintiff did not allege that Defendant owed him wages for hours worked prior to 2006, and therefore, the Ninth Circuit reversed the District Court's dismissal of the minimum wage claim. Id. The Ninth Circuit also found that the District Court erred in granting summary judgment on Plaintiff's claim under § 608.016. Id. First, the Ninth Circuit assumed, without deciding, that there was a private right of action to bring this claim because Defendant did not argue otherwise. Id. Second, the Ninth Circuit ruled that the District Court erred in finding that § 608.016 did not apply to commission-based pay arrangements because, regardless of how § 608.016 defines wages, employees still must be paid for each hour that they work. Id. On these grounds, the Ninth Circuit reversed the District Court's entry of judgment on this claim. Id. Finally, the Ninth Circuit determined that the District Court abused its discretion in denying Plaintiff's motion for leave to amend the complaint. Id. at *2-3. The District Court had previously found good cause and granted Plaintiff's motion for leave to amend but, on June 21, 2011, set the deadline for amendment on a date that already had passed on June 15, 2011. Id. at *3. When Plaintiff attempted to amend on June 21, 2011, the District Court denied his request. Id. The Ninth Circuit, therefore, reversed and remanded the action to permit Plaintiff to file an amended complaint. Finally, the Ninth Circuit reversed the District Court's imposition of sanctions on Plaintiff, which was predicated on the conclusion that Plaintiff's effort to amend his complaint was frivolous. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit reversed the District Court's judgment and remanded.

Marzuq, et al. v. Cadete Enterprises, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 21301 (1st Cir. Dec. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of store managers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant improperly classified them as exempt and denied them overtime pay in violation of the FLSA. Defendant owned and operated multiple Dunkin' Donuts franchises, and its store manager's responsibilities included calibrating the equipment to Dunkin' Donuts specifications, handling cash, keeping the store and grounds properly maintained, training and supervising employees, conducting periodic inventory, and completing substantial paperwork. Id. at *4. While Plaintiffs described themselves as being "in charge" and the "captains of the store," they also asserted that they worked more than 60 hours per week and spent a significant amount of doing non-exempt work, such as serving customers, covering other employees' shifts, and cleaning. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs brought this action seeking overtime compensation under the FLSA. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that Plaintiffs fell within the FLSA's overtime pay exclusion for employees serving in a "bona fide executive" capacity. Id. at *6. The District Court granted Defendant's motion, holding that the facts were indistinguishable from a prior First Circuit decision in Donovan v. Burger King Corp., 672 F.3d 221 (1st Cir. 1982), which ruled that the employer properly classified its managers as exempt even though they spent up to 40% of their time doing non-exempt work. Id. at *12-13. The District Court found that Plaintiffs had management as their primary duty, and even though they spent much of their time on non-exempt work and had little discretion to make significant decisions, the undisputed facts showed that Plaintiffs were employed in a bona fide executive capacity. Id. at *15. On appeal, the First Circuit reversed. The First Circuit found disputes of fact regarding Plaintiffs' primary duty. While the First Circuit acknowledged that Plaintiffs were in charge of the store and that they could manage subordinates even when working side-by-side with them and performing non-exempt tasks, the evidence showed that Plaintiffs spent the great bulk of their working time on the floor performing non-exempt work, including serving customers and cleaning, and they were in charge only in title. Id. at *22. Specifically, the First Circuit noted that Plaintiff reported routinely substituting for hourly employees who were sick or absent, and contrary to their job description, a fact-finder could reasonably conclude that Plaintiffs' exempt and non-exempt duties were equally important to the operation of the restaurants. Id. at *23. The record contained evidence indicating that the named Plaintiffs' supervisory role was, at least at times, overwhelmed by non-managerial tasks, and Defendant required them to do various tasks that would take them away from the customer service areas of the store, and hence, appeared inconsistent with employee supervision. Id. at *26. The record also showed that corporate management closely supervised Plaintiffs' work and that they earned less than their non-exempt colleagues on an hourly basis. Id. at *32-35. The First Circuit therefore found that the evidence in the record did not lead inevitably to a conclusion that, in practice, Plaintiffs' primary duty was management. Id. at *35. In light of these factual disputes, the First Circuit concluded that Defendant failed to meet its burden of showing that Plaintiffs fell within the "bona fide executive" exception to the FLSA's overtime pay requirement. Id. Accordingly, the First Circuit vacated the summary judgment for Defendant and remanded the case to the District Court for further proceedings.

Navarro, et al. v. Encino Motorcars, LLC,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 4773 (9th Cir. Mar. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of service advisors, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA by failing to pay them overtime wages. Defendant, an automobile dealership, employed Plaintiffs to diagnose and recommend services and repairs required for vehicles based on the vehicle owner's requests/complaints. Defendant paid Plaintiffs on a commission basis and considered them exempt from the FLSA's overtime pay requirements. Plaintiffs asserted that they were misclassified as exempt employees. The District Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claim, finding that Plaintiffs fell within the salesman exemption. Plaintiffs appealed, and the Ninth Circuit reversed. In doing so, the Ninth Circuit relied on the regulatory definitions of salesman, partsmen, and mechanic of the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL"), which limit the exemption to salesmen who sell vehicles and partsmen and mechanics who service vehicles. Id. at *6. Although the Ninth Circuit acknowledged that there were "good arguments supporting both interpretations of the exemption," it found it appropriate to defer to the DOL's interpretation under Chevron U.S.A. Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837 (1984). Id. at *22-23. The Chevron test of reasonableness requires a two-step inquiry. Step one determines whether the precise question at issue was directly addressed by statute. Id. at *6. If it was not, step two considers an appropriate agency's interpretation of the statute. Id. at *6-7. If the interpretation is deemed reasonable, then the District Court must not substitute its own construction of the statutory provision. Id. at *7. The Ninth Circuit found that the exemption at issue in 29 U.S.C. § 213(b)(10)(A) was ambiguous. The Ninth Circuit noted that the statute could be read broadly by connecting the terms "salesman" and "servicing automobiles" so as to apply to "salesman…primarily engaged in…servicing automobiles," such as Plaintiffs, or to read narrowly to apply only to salesman – those employees who sell cars and partsmen – those employees who requisition, stock, and dispense parts, and to mechanics, i.e., employees who perform mechanical work on cars. Id. at *8. Because both interpretations were reasonable, the Ninth Circuit evaluated whether the DOL's interpretation represented a reasonable reading of the exemption. According to the DOL's interpretation of the exemption, because service advisors did not personally sell cars, even if they were "salesmen" in a generic sense, and because they did not personally service vehicles, they fall outside the statutory definition. Id. at *15. The Ninth Circuit considered this to be a reasonable interpretation of the FLSA. The Ninth Circuit noted that DOL's interpretation was not unduly restrictive, and did not render any statutory term meaningless or superfluous. Id. at *18. The Ninth Circuit therefore concluded that Plaintiffs were non-exempt employees, and accordingly, reversed the District Court's dismissal of Plaintiffs' overtime claim.

Siegel, et al. v. Bloomberg L.P.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5602 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of information technology ("IT") service desk representatives, brought an action under the FLSA and the New York Labor Law alleging that Defendant unlawfully denied them overtime compensation by misclassifying them as exempt employees under the administrative exemption. Plaintiffs moved for summary judgment on the issues of administrative exemption, amount of overtime hours worked, and the applicable rate of pay to any overtime hours worked. The Court partly granted Plaintiffs' motion, determining that the administrative exemption did not apply to Plaintiffs. The Court found that Plaintiffs' duties did not fall within the administrative exemption because neither the level of importance nor consequence of the work Plaintiffs performed rose to the level of a "matter of significance." Id. at *10. The records showed that Plaintiffs provided technical support to employees. The Court noted that Plaintiffs did not carry out major assignments in conducting the operations of Defendant's business and did not perform work that affected Defendant's business operations to a substantial degree. Id. at *11. Further, Plaintiffs did not have authority to formulate, interpret, or implement management policies or operating practices of Defendant or to commit Defendant in matters that had significant financial impact. Id. at *11. The Court therefore found that the administrative exemption did not apply to Plaintiffs. The Court also determined that lack of any binding authority on the applicability of the administrative exemption to IT employees, whose primary duties included troubleshooting and fixing computer problems, confirmed its non-applicability to Plaintiffs. Id. at *12-13. Thus, according to the Court, Plaintiffs did not fall under the administrative exemption to the FLSA. Id. at *15. The Court, however, found that Plaintiffs were not entitled to summary judgment on the issue of overtime hours or applicable rate of pay to overtime hours because the issues involved a genuine dispute as to the amount of in-office and out-of-office hours worked by Plaintiffs and what the parties mutually understood regarding Plaintiffs' employment. Id. at *17-19. Accordingly, the Court partly granted and partly denied Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment.

Velazquez, et al. v. Costco Wholesale Corporation*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 4859 (9th Cir. Mar. 25, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a class action against Defendants for violation of the California Labor Code, and sought overtime wages with interest. The District Court ordered Defendant to pay Plaintiffs unpaid overtime wages with interests and costs, and ordered Defendant to pay a continuing-wages penalty. Defendant appealed the District Court's judgment, and the Ninth Circuit affirmed in part. At the outset, the Ninth Circuit noted that the parties agreed that Plaintiffs established a prima facie case for failure to pay overtime under § 1194 of the California Labor Code. As an affirmative defense, Defendant argued that it properly designated Plaintiffs as exempt from overtime under the executive or administrative exemption. Id. at *3. In Ramirez v. Yosemite Water Co., Inc., 20 Cal. 4th 785 (1999), the California Supreme Court held that exemption status cannot be determined based solely on the number of hours that an employer claimed that an employee should be working. Id. at *3-4. Ramirez held one cannot rely on employee's hours because then an employee could evade a valid exemption through his own substandard performance. Id. at *4. To steer clear from these two pitfalls, Ramirez held that a trial court should consider the realistic requirements of the job, and first consider how the employee actually spent his or her time. Id. Here, the Ninth Circuit concluded that because the District Court did exactly that, and it did not err. The Ninth Circuit explained that the District Court correctly applied Ramirez and considered any expression of displeasure or lack thereof as one factor weighing against Defendant's executive exemption defense, and affirmed the judgment. Id. at *5. In addition to back pay award to named Plaintiff Steven Berry, the District Court ordered Defendant to pay continuing wages after termination as penalty under the Labor Code. The Ninth Circuit found that there was no evidence to support Defendant willfully failed to pay, and accordingly, vacated the judgment ordering Defendant to pay continuing wages. Id. at *6.

Zannikos, et al. v. Oil Inspections (U.S.A.) Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 4986 (5th Cir. Mar. 27, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of marine superintendents, brought a collective action under the FLSA alleging that Defendant wrongfully denied them overtime compensation. Defendant, which oversees and monitors oil transfers to ensure compliance with industry standards, employed Plaintiffs as marine superintendents, and charged them with observing oil transfers to ensure accurate, legal, and safe performance. Id. at *2. As part of their responsibilities, Plaintiffs monitored cargo loading and unloading, reported errors or losses, monitored compliance with safety standards, inspected equipment, and recommended policies, along with a number of other tasks. Id. Defendant contended that Plaintiffs interpreted and implemented management policies, carried out major assignments, and performed work affecting business operations, thereby qualifying for the administrative exemption of the FLSA. Upon both the parties' motions for summary judgment, the District Court found that Plaintiffs did not fall under administrative exemption. Id. at *4. On Defendant's appeal, the Fifth Circuit affirmed. The Fifth Circuit found that the District Court correctly concluded that the work Plaintiffs performed did not extend beyond the application of skill in applying specified standards and thus did not satisfy the "independent judgment" element of the administrative exemption. Id. at *24. The Fifth Circuit noted that Plaintiffs' primary duties of observing and inspecting oil transfer to ensure compliance with relevant standards and specifications set forth by Defendant and its customers simply constituted the application of specific standards described in manuals or other sources and that it did not entail evaluating alternative courses of action after considering various possibilities. Id. at *14-17. Further, Plaintiffs' job descriptions, questionnaires, and depositions suggested that Defendant typically required them to confer with it before making recommendations in the event of non-compliance. Id. at *17. The Fifth Circuit thus found that, any advisory power Plaintiffs possessed was based solely on the development of the facts as to whether there was conformity with the prescribed standards, and thus, they did not formulate, affect, interpret, or implement management policies or operating practices. Id. Although Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' work was significant to customers and very important to their financial interests, the Fifth Circuit pointed out that the financial import of Plaintiffs' work was not sufficient to satisfy the independent judgment element of the administrative exemption. Id. at *17-19. The evidence showed that Plaintiffs' primary duties did not entail making any discretionary decisions based on guidelines, but rather strictly applying guideline and reporting noncompliance. Id. at *27. The Fifth Circuit therefore held that the District Court correctly concluded that Plaintiffs' primary duties did not include the exercise of discretion and independent judgment with respect to matters of significance, and accordingly, affirmed that Plaintiffs were non-exempt under the administrative exemption of the FLSA.

(viii) Discovery In FLSA Collective Actions

Blair, et al. v. Professional Transportation, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29202 (S.D. Ind. Mar. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a collective action alleging that Defendants had paid them less than the minimum wage and denied them overtime pay in violation of the FLSA. Defendants claimed that they had dealt with Plaintiffs in good faith and on a reasonable belief that they had complied with the FLSA; therefore, they were not liable to pay statutory liquidated damages. Plaintiffs moved to compel Defendants to produce communications involving the Crew Hauler's Trade Association ("CHTA"). Specifically, Plaintiffs sought 97 e-mails Defendants had withheld as privileged and unedited copies of documents they had produced in redacted form identified at Entries 60-157 of Defendants' privilege log. Id. at *3. Defendants argued that the CHTA (an association of companies engaged in the business of transporting rail crews to and from train stations throughout the country) was formed in May of 2008 – a period when the FLSA was in flux – for the purpose of advancing the common public policy and legislative positions of the Members. Id. Plaintiffs sought documents that were exchanged among the CHTA, its members, and attorney David Coburn. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion in part. Defendants had asserted both relevance and the attorney-client privilege as bases for non-discoverability. Id. First, the Court stated that Defendants need not produce documents that dealt exclusively with administrative matters like billing or scheduling because they were not likely to lead to any evidence that bore on Plaintiffs' claims or Defendants' defenses. Id. at *4-5. Second, the Court found that the remaining documents included content relevant to the action, and many of the documents Defendants had withheld or redacted were not privileged because they did not include communications made for the purpose of giving or receiving legal advice. Id. at *5-6. For example, many documents dealt strictly with lobbying efforts. Id. at *6-7. Accordingly, the Court held that Defendants must produce those documents in unredacted form. Id. at *7. Third, the Court determined that the remaining documents were protected by the attorney-client privilege because they consisted of legal advice or information provided for the purpose of receiving legal advice. Further, they appeared to be confidential communications, as the addressees of those documents appeared to include only counsel for the CHTA, representatives of the CHTA's member companies, and counsel for the individual member companies. Id. Moreover, Plaintiffs acknowledged that David Coburn – the attorney whose communications were in question – represented the CHTA, and that the CHTA was an association of corporations united for the same purpose of advancing their collective legislative and public policy positions. Id. The Court observed that to whatever extent Plaintiffs argued that those documents exceeded the bounds of an attorney-client relationship, that privilege applied through the common interest exception. Id. at *8. Fourth, the Court remarked that the communications between Coburn and the CHTA's personnel indicated that they shared common legal interests, including: (i) understanding their liabilities and obligations under proposed changes to the law; (ii) understanding and complying with the law as it stood; and (iii) complying with the law in forming the corporation and conducting their lobbying efforts. Id. at *10. The Court pointed out that each of the documents it examined would be privileged or redactable related to one of those interests and, therefore, the common interest exception resolved any threat to those documents' protection. Id. at *10-11. Fifth, the Court found Defendants had withheld many documents in which only segments of the communications related to the dissemination or receipt of legal advice. Id. at *11. The Court held that Defendants must produce certain documents but may redact privileged communications within those documents, subject to the common interest exception. Id. at *11-12.

Cox, et al. v. Aero Automatic Sprinkler Co.,* 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 184121 (N.D. Cal. June 12, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of sprinkler fitters, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants failed them to pay overtime, provide rest breaks, and failed to provide accurate wage statements. After Plaintiffs served discovery related to class certification, they found that Defendants wrote to putative class members admitting the payroll errors, and provided checks to make compensate each impacted worker for those errors. Id. at *3. Defendants also advised the class members that depositing the check would constitute a waiver and release of claims against them. The paychecks did not include itemized statements showing how Defendants calculated wages or whether any amount was in dispute. Id. at *4. Eighty-six of the 102 class members cashed the checks, and Defendants thereafter asserted that the case as to those class members was settled. Id. Plaintiffs moved to require Defendants to disclose details such as the name, address, dates of service, and job title for each fire sprinkler fitter, including apprentices, employed by Defendants, pursuant to confidentiality considerations laid out in the stipulated protective order. Plaintiffs claimed they were incentivized by the federal government under FLSA and deputized under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA") to pursue California Labor Code violations in place of California's Labor Workforce Development Agency. The Court granted the motion. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs' motion was improper because they did not adequately meet and confer before filing their motion. The Court rejected this argument, finding that in the three meet and confer sessions with Plaintiffs, Defendants maintained their position, and refused to provide information relative to the 86 individuals who cashed the checks, making further meet and confer(s) redundant. The Court also observed that where class discovery is sought, Plaintiffs must show that the class action requirements are satisfied, or to show that discovery is likely to produce substantiation of the class allegations. Id. at *7. Here, Plaintiffs alleged numerosity, commonality, and typicality, and the Court found that the identities of the sprinkler fitter class members were required to address these key Rule 23(a) factors. Id. at *8. Further, the Court noted that the Labor Code requires approval of any penalties sought as part of a proposed settlement of PAGA claims, and PAGA claims are not waivable. Id. Further, the Court opined that an agreement by employees to waive their right to bring a PAGA action serves to disable one of the primary mechanisms for enforcing the Labor Code, and because such an agreement has as its object, indirectly, to exempt the employer from responsibility for its own violation of law; as such, it is against public policy and may not be enforced. Id. at *9. In this case, no notices of settlement were filed and the Court had not approved any settlements. Additionally, the Court observed that FLSA claims cannot be settled without its approval, and Defendants had not filed any notices of settlement and had not sought the Court's approval or Department of Labor approval for settlement of the sprinkler fitters' FLSA claims. Id. Finally, the Court held that fairness required that Plaintiffs have equal access to individuals who potentially had an interest in, or relevant knowledge of, the subject of the action, but who were not yet parties. Id. at *13. The Court therefore granted Plaintiffs' motion to compel.

Ellison, et al. v. Autozone, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43877 (N.D. Cal. April 2, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to provide meal breaks and off-the-clock compensation in violation of the California Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). After the commencement of discovery, Plaintiffs sought an order compelling Defendant to designate a Rule 30(b)(6) witness on topics relating to changes in Defendant's policies and practices regarding meal breaks and off-the-clock work. Id. at *3. The Court noted that, although that information was relevant to claims arising under the PAGA, the gravamen of their dispute was whether Plaintiffs' PAGA claim was still at issue, which in turn depended on whether Plaintiffs alleged a class action or a representative claim. Id. Although a representative PAGA claim is not subject to class certification requirements, the Court found that it need not decide the issue because the operative pleading was unclear as to whether Plaintiffs had alleged a representative PAGA claim in the first instance. Id. at *4-5. The Court noted that Plaintiffs labeled the entire pleading a class action and brought allegations pursuant to Rule 23. Id. at *5. Further, the Court observed that Plaintiffs specifically alleged a PAGA class with no separate PAGA cause of action and no reference to such a claim being brought in a representative capacity. Id. at *5-6. Thus, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to compel without prejudice to Plaintiffs' renewing their request after the Court determined the scope of Plaintiffs' PAGA claim. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiffs also requested an order compelling Defendant to designate a Rule 30(b)(6) witness to testify to the facts underlying 18 of the 22 affirmative defenses that Defendant asserted. Id. at *7. Defendant argued that information about the facts underlying its affirmative defenses was more appropriately discovered through interrogatories as opposed to a deposition. Id. The Court found that, while Rule 30(b)(6) questioning regarding the factual basis for affirmative defenses was not improper, interrogatories were the preferred approach. Id. at *7-8. Moreover, the Court noted that, contrary to Plaintiffs' contention that deposition testimony was required because Defendant had refused to provide any factual bases in its interrogatory responses, it appeared that Defendant expressed willingness to respond to interrogatories but Plaintiffs never propounded any interrogatories. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' request for an order compelling Defendant to designate a Rule 30(b)(6) witness to testify about the factual bases of its affirmative defenses without prejudice to renewing the request after Defendant had the opportunity to respond to interrogatories. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to compel without prejudice.

Ensor, et al. v. Chipotle Mexican Grill, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 60578 (S.D.N.Y. May 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of salaried apprentices, brought a nationwide class and collective action alleging that Defendant did not pay them overtime and spread-of-hours compensation under the FLSA and the New York Minimum Wage Act. On March 27, 2015, the Court had granted in part Plaintiffs' motion to compel production of certain documents from Defendant, finding that the report of consultant Cinda Daggett (the "Daggett Report") was not privileged because Daggett was not an agent of Messner Reeves LLC, Defendant's counsel at that time. Defendant sought relief under Rule 60(b). The Court denied Defendant's motion on the basis that Defendant's motion was procedurally improper, its new evidence was unpersuasive, and it had not shown that the Daggett Report was privileged. First, Plaintiffs argued that Rule 60(b) was inapplicable as Defendant had not presented newly discovered evidence within the meaning of the Rule, and even if it had, the March 27 order was still correct. Id. at *6. At the outset, the Court noted that a discovery order related to the attorney-client privilege is in no way a final judgment, and Defendant had not argued anything to the contrary. Id. at *7. The Court opined that Defendant could not bring a motion to challenge a discovery ruling under Rule 60(b). Id. Next, in support of its motion, Defendant offered two newly discovered documents in evidence, including Exhibit A, e-mails between Daggett and John Shunk, an attorney at Messner, and Exhibit B, an unsigned blank confidentiality agreement that Defendant allegedly gave to Daggett. Id. at *8. Defendant argued that these documents, which it received from Shunk, demonstrated that Daggett was, in fact, within the cone of privilege. The Court, however, found that the e-mails in Exhibit A did not demonstrate, as Defendant contended, that Messner used the Daggett Report to provide legal advice to Defendant. Id. Although Defendant argued that Shunk's e-mail indicated that the Report was privileged, the Court noted that a person's subjective belief that the conversation was privileged is not by itself sufficient to establish the privilege. Id. at *9. The Court observed that Daggett's e-mail supported the Court's previous reading of the situation, as it indicated that Daggett was providing services to Defendant to assist in a business decision, not merely to Messner. The Court relied on its previous finding that Messner offered no additional written legal advice after the receipt of the Daggett Report, suggesting that the Daggett Report was not, in fact, integral to Messner's legal advice. Id. at *10. Further, the Court found the confidentiality agreement in Exhibit B similarly unpersuasive because the agreement was not signed or dated, and nothing in the exhibit linked it to Daggett, making it unclear if the agreement was at all related to this issue. In addition, the Court determined that Defendant had not submitted anything that indicated that Messner revised its advice in light of the Daggett Report. The Court concluded that Defendant's newly offered arguments and evidence, alone, were not enough to show that the Daggett Report constituted part of Messner's legal advice to Defendant. Id. at *11. The Court thus concluded that Defendant's new evidence did not alter the Court's previous analysis, as nothing Defendant had presented indicated that the Daggett Report was more necessary to Messner than previously believed. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to be relieved from the March 27 order.

Figueroa, et al. v. Pioneer Hi-Bred International*, Case No. 12-CV-148 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 18, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of migrant agricultural workers, brought a collective action and class action alleging violations of the Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Worker Protection Act ("AWPA") and the FLSA, as well as state law claims for breach of contract, promissory estoppel, and quantum meruit. Defendant moved to dismiss named Plaintiff Gonzales from the action for failure to comply with discovery, and the Court denied the motion. Defendant asserted that it served its first set of interrogatories on Plaintiff Gonzales in June 2014, through his then attorney of record, but he had still not provided his responses. Defendant also contended that there was a lack of communication between Plaintiff Gonzales and his former attorneys. The Court noted that although Rule 37 permits it to dismiss an action if a party, after being properly served with interrogatories under Rule 33, fails to serve its answers, objections, or a written response, dismissal with prejudice is typically appropriate when there is a clear record of delay or contumacious conduct and the party's refusal to obey a discovery order is done willfully and in bad faith. Id. at 2. The Court found that Defendant did not make a sufficient showing that Plaintiff Gonzales acted in bad faith in failing to comply with the discovery requests, and that Defendant did not show that it would be substantially prejudiced without dismissal or that a different sanction would be ineffective. Id. at 2-3. Accordingly, the Court denied the motion.

Garcia, et al. v. E.J. Amusements Of New Hampshire, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26977 (D. Mass. Mar. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of carnival ride operators, brought an action alleging that Defendants paid them a flat rate based on a 40-hour workweek even though they regularly worked up to 14 hours per day for seven days a week, and also failed to reimburse them for immigration-related expenses under Massachusetts and New Hampshire law. During discovery, Defendants issued a subpoena to a non-party, Centro de los Derechos del Migrante, Inc. ("CDM"), a non-profit legal services organization, seeking three categories of information, including: (i) research materials referring to named Plaintiff Garcia that were used to prepare a report on the abuse of migrant workers in the fair and carnival industry ("Category 1"); (ii) CDM's communications with Garcia regarding his employment by Defendants ("Category 2"); and (iii) CDM's correspondence relating to Garcia's attendance at a meeting with labor officials from the United States and Mexico ("Category 3"). Id. at *2. CDM moved to quash the subpoena and sought a protective order on the grounds of attorney-client privilege, academic researcher privilege, attorney work-product, and undue burden. The Magistrate Judge denied the motions without prejudice and ordered CDM to produce a privilege log for all the documents. CDM objected to producing privilege logs for Categories 1 and 3. On CDM's Rule 72 objections, the Court overruled CDM's objections. First, the Magistrate Judge's order required CDM to create a privilege log with respect to certain research materials referring to Garcia, which were allegedly used for a report on the abuse of migrant workers in the fair and carnival industry. Id. at *4. CDM contended that producing a privilege log would necessarily require it to disclose whether Garcia participated in the report. Id. The Court reasoned that the order only required CDM to briefly describe the nature of each document involving a Plaintiff so that the parties and the Court could assess the claims of privilege. Id. at *6. Although the Court recognized that creating a privilege log might necessarily require CDM to disclose whether Garcia was one of the anonymous contributors to its report, CDM's interest in protecting Garcia's identity was diminished because CDM had already agreed to create a privilege log for Category 2, which would functionally disclose Garcia as one of CDM's clients in the advocacy arm of the organization. Id. at *6-7. Further, the Court found that Garcia was unlike the other anonymous contributors in the report because he had filed a lawsuit. Id. at *7. CDM also objected to the Magistrate Judge's order on the grounds that creating a privilege log for Categories 1 and 3 would entail a time-consuming review of all the e-mails, files, and communications, and would yield little if any information relevant to the claims or defenses at issue in this matter. Id. at *7-8. The Court found that CDM failed to outline the number of hours it would take to comply with the Magistrate Judge's order, or to submit the transcript containing any information to support a claim of undue burden. Id. at *8. Thus, the Court concluded that the Magistrate Judge did not err by requiring CDM to produce privilege logs for Categories 1 and 3, and accordingly overruled CDM's objections to the Magistrate Judge's order.

Makaneole, et al. v. Solarworld Industries America, Inc.*, Case No. 14-CV-1528 (D. Ore. June 26, 2015). Plaintiff, a temporary worker, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants engaged in a practice of programming an electronic time-keeping system to deduct minutes from hours worked prior to reporting them to payroll for purposes of computing his compensation in violation of Oregon state law. Plaintiff alleged that he was first employed with Defendant Kelly Services, Inc. ("Kelly"), and then by Defendant Randstad US, LP ("Randstad"), and then by Defendant Solarworld Industries America, Inc. and its affiliates ("Solarworld Defendants"). Defendant Kelly served Plaintiff with its first set of requests for production of documents seeking material acquired by Plaintiff's counsel in his capacity as the legal representative of Fred Bey, a Plaintiff in a currently on-going wage & hour class action that Bey filed against the Solarworld Defendants, to which Plaintiff was not a party. Plaintiff refused to produce the documents on the grounds that those documents were not his to produce, and that most of them were held by his counsel on Bey's behalf subject to a protective order forbidding their disclosure to third-parties to Bey's action. Id. at *6-7. Defendant Kelly filed a motion to compel, which the Court granted in part. At the outset, the Court found that all the requests within Defendant Kelly's motion sought relevant information reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence. Id. at *10. The Court remarked that Plaintiff correctly noted that a case file maintained by an attorney on behalf of a client is the property of the client rather than of the attorney, and argued that that to the extent his counsel possessed documents responsive to the requests at issue, those documents were Bey's, materials and not his to produce in this litigation. Id. at *11. The Court remarked that the complication in applying this principle was that several allegations of Plaintiff's complaint expressly relied on information gained from the Bey lawsuit. Id. at *11-12. The Court opined that allegations in Plaintiff's complaint expressly relied on information gleaned from the Bey litigation. Id. at *12. The Court, therefore, observed that to the extent that Plaintiff's counsel, in drafting those or any other paragraphs of the complaint, specifically relief upon documents produced in the Bey litigation, counsel effectively disclosed their contents to Plaintiff. Id. As such, the Court ruled that Plaintiff's counsel effectively held all such documents not merely on Bey's behalf, but also on Plaintiff's behalf, rendering them discoverable in response to Defendant Kelly's request. Further, Defendant Kelly argued that it would be unfair to permit Plaintiff to select documents for production containing information tending to support the factual allegations made in express reliance on facts gleaned from the Bey litigation without also requiring him additionally to produce documents tending to exculpate the Solarworld Defendants, to mitigate against class treatment of Plaintiff's claims, or otherwise to undercut Plaintiff's position. Id. at *13. The Court disagreed and concluded that insofar as Defendant Kelly believed that Plaintiff was privy to such information, it could be addressed by issuing a third-party record subpoenas to the counsel as opposed to Plaintiff. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant Kelly's motion in part.

Melgar, et al. v. CSK Auto, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1030 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 6, 2015). Plaintiff, an assistant manager, brought a class action under the California Labor Code alleging that employees incurred fuel costs and vehicle wear and tear when they drove their personal vehicle to the bank to make deposits, and that Defendant failed to reimburse these incurred expenses. Plaintiff requested to take a survey of putative class members inquiring into whether they were required to use their personal vehicles to make bank deposits, the frequency with which they made such deposits, and whether they requested and received reimbursement. The Court granted the request. The Court observed that numerous courts have recognized the use of surveys in the pre-certification context. Id. at *2. Defendants contended that Plaintiff's proposed survey would not be probative as to any of the class certification elements or merits questions. The Court, however, noted that Plaintiff's survey was relevant to determining whether the numerosity requirement of Rule 23(a)(1) was satisfied, and that survey questions would shed light as to whether common questions of fact existed, including whether individuals were required to use their personal vehicle to make bank deposits. Id. at *3. Finally, Defendant argued that any responses to the survey could not be extrapolated on a class-wide basis. The Court, however, remarked that Defendant's argument essentially attacked the merits of Plaintiff's class certification motion before it had been drafted and before Plaintiffs had the opportunity to conduct necessary discovery. Further, the Court opined that allowing Plaintiff to conduct a survey did not constitute a ruling on any substantive class certification issue nor did it absolve Plaintiff from meeting Rule 23's requirements at the class certification stage. The Court reasoned that it was merely allowing Plaintiff the opportunity to conduct fact discovery that he reasonably contended was necessary for him to meet the class certification burden. Id. at *5-6. Accordingly, the Court ordered that the survey should be issued and be distributed to those putative class members who received a notice and did not opt-out.

Rosas, et al. v. Alice's Tea Cup, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87780 (S.D.N.Y. July 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former restaurant employees, brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them overtime wages and a "spread of hours" premium for days when they worked more than 10 hours in violations of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Id. at *2. Defendants filed discovery requests demanding that Plaintiffs produce documents verifying their immigration status, work authorization documents, federal and state income tax returns, and documents sufficient to identify the current employer for each Plaintiff. Defendants also requested admissions related to Plaintiffs' immigration status and authorization to work. Plaintiffs moved for a protective order and for leave to amend the complaint, which the Court granted. Defendants claimed that the information sought was relevant to Plaintiffs' ability to recover under the FLSA and the NYLL as well as their credibility, and would explain the absence of some payroll records. Id. at *4-5. At the outset, the Court noted FLSA protections were available to citizens and undocumented workers alike. Id. at *7. Thus, in the context of wage & hour violations under both the FLSA and the NYLL, immigration status has generally been protected from discovery. Id. The Court opined that even if evidence regarding immigration status were relevant, the risk of injury to Plaintiffs if such information were disclosed outweighed the need for its disclosure because of the danger of intimidation and of undermining the purposes of the FLSA. Id. at *11. Because discovery into Plaintiffs' immigration status was irrelevant and impermissible, the Court precluded Defendants from seeking evidence regarding Plaintiffs' immigration status and work authorization. Id. Further, the Court found that Plaintiffs' income tax returns need not be disclosed because Defendants failed to demonstrate either their relevance or a compelling need. Id. at *12-13. Indeed, Plaintiffs' tax returns would only include total income and not details that would be relevant in an FLSA and NYLL suit, such as weekly wages and specific hours worked. Id. at *13. Rather, tax information from Plaintiffs would serve no obvious purpose other than intimidation. Id. Regarding identity of current employers, Defendants sought to prove that Plaintiffs were continuing to be paid on a cash basis precisely because they wanted to avoid scrutiny. Id. at *14. Whatever Plaintiffs' arrangement with their current employers might be, the Court found that the tax returns would say nothing about the hours that Plaintiffs worked for Defendants or what they were paid. Id. Thus, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for a protective order to the extent that Defendants sought discovery of Plaintiffs' immigration status, tax returns, or current employers. Id. at *19.

Ross, et al. v. Jack Rabbit Services, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 45603 (W.D. Ky. April 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former roadside technicians, brought an action alleging that Defendants intentionally misclassified them as independent contractors in an effort to circumvent minimum wage and overtime provisions of the FLSA. The Court conditionally certified the collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), and 236 individuals from 29 states opted-in to the action. Id. at *3. Defendants sent discovery requests to named Plaintiff Ross and the 236 opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. While Plaintiff Ross answered the initial discovery requests, Plaintiffs sought a protective order against discovery on a collective action-wide basis, claiming that individualized discovery would be unduly burdensome, would drastically increase litigation costs, and served no valid purpose. Id. Plaintiffs proposed that a random representative sample of 10% of the opt-ins of the collective action answer the discovery requests. Id. Defendants proposed that all opt-in Plaintiffs answer a shortened form of discovery. Id. Plaintiffs objected on the basis that Defendants' proposal was still burdensome and would require the assistance of counsel. Id. at *4. Subsequently, Plaintiffs moved for a protective order against such discovery, which the Court granted in part. First, the Court considered the size of the collective action and stated that as the size increased, judges are generally less likely to require all Plaintiffs to respond to discovery. Id. at *6. The Court found that the 236 opt-in Plaintiffs represented a moderately-sized collective action and the geographic diversity of its members would significantly add to both the burden and cost of responding to individual discovery requests. Id. at *7. The Court also considered the type of discovery sought. Defendants proposed having all 236 opt-in Plaintiffs answer a shortened form of discovery consisting of five requests for admissions, two interrogatories, and one request for production of documents. Id. Plaintiffs objected, arguing that it would cause undue burden and would be improperly used by Defendants to dismiss non-responsive Plaintiffs. Id. Defendants claimed that the shortened discovery was written in plain language and required no assistance from an attorney to complete. Id. at *8. However, the Court found that the shortened request contained several legal terms and several other terms which, while familiar to those in the legal profession, were rarely used in everyday speech. Id. The Court also noted that Defendants' shortened discovery requests asked for tax returns. Id. The Court held that while individual tax returns were not inherently privileged, it would order the disclosure of tax information only when necessary and with caution. Id. at *9. Consequently, the Court determined that based on the type of discovery sought, it would be difficult for all opt-in Plaintiffs to effectively interpret and respond to the shortened requests without the assistance of counsel and the resulting burden on collective action members and their counsel to facilitate and review responses to nearly 2,000 discovery requests would outweigh the potential benefit to Defendants. Id. The Court also noted that other case law precedents had sanctioned representative sampling even when a Defendant intended to move for decertification. Id. at *10. The Court found that limiting discovery to a significant representative sampling would both minimize the burden on Plaintiffs and their counsel while still affording Defendants a reasonable opportunity to explore and establish an evidentiary basis for their defenses, including any later decertification proceedings. Id. Consequently, the Court ruled that representative discovery was appropriate given the purported similarity among collective action members, the size of the collective action, and the burdensome nature of discovery upon 236 Plaintiffs in 29 different states. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted in part Plaintiffs' motion.

Ruiz, et al. v. Mercer Canyons, Inc.,* Case No. 14-CV-3032 (E.D. Wash. Feb. 4, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of vineyard workers at Defendant's farm, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to inform local workers about the availability of higher-paying H-2 visa vineyard jobs. Defendant had obtained approval to employ 44 foreign workers at $12 per hour under the H-2A program from March 2013 through September 2013. The order had also required Defendant to notify vineyard workers who had worked in 2012 about employment availability. Defendant failed to inform local workers of the available positions and Defendant mostly paid them $9.88 per hour even for some work identified by the H-2A order as $12 per hour work. Plaintiffs thus alleged violations of the Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Worker Protection Act, the Washington Consumer Protection Act, and Washington state wage laws. Defendant moved to stay discovery prior to class certification, which the Court denied. The Court stated that it had already delayed class certification at the behest of Defendant and thus would not delay the case further. Id. at 1. The Court found that the scheduled discovery was potentially relevant to the motion for class certification and the claims of the named Plaintiffs even if the motion for class certification was denied. Id. at 1-2. Seeking a protective order, Defendant argued that the information Plaintiffs sought about matters relating to Defendant's application for and use of the H-2A program was not reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence under Rule 26. The Court, however, found that Defendant misconstrued both the breadth of Rule 26 and the narrow scope of the Court's earlier statement that there was no separate cause of action emanating directly from H-2A regulations. Id. at 2. The Court found that Defendant's actions and obligations under the H-2A program, and alleged recruiting trips to Mexico, could lead to the discovery of admissible evidence. Id. The Court opined that nothing indicated that Plaintiffs were conducting a fishing expedition or otherwise using the discovery process for inappropriate purposes. Id. Thus, the Court refused to enter a protective order limiting Plaintiffs' discovery.

Scott, et al. v. Chipotle Mexican Grill, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40176 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 27, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a nationwide collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as "apprentices" exempt from overtime requirements under the FLSA. Plaintiffs moved to compel the production of a consultative report prepared by Cinda Daggett, an attorney, and other allegedly non-privileged documents. The Court granted the motion in part. In the report, Daggett examined the activities of four employees holding positions as apprentices. Defendant asserted that the report was privileged because it had retained Daggett to help it with a legal issue. The Court disagreed and ordered Defendant to produce the report. The Court found that Defendant had engaged Daggett for factual research and to assist Defendant in making a business decision. Id. at *18-23. Daggett submitted the report only after Defendant received legal advice from two firms, and Defendant submitted no evidence that it used the report for anything beyond making a business decision. Id. at *24. Further, Defendant referred to the report as a "job function analysis," and it reflected a factual investigation pertaining to the responsibilities of an employee or position. Id. at *27. Neither Daggett nor any documents indicated that Defendant hired Daggett to provide legal advice, and the report did not reflect any specialized knowledge that Defendant's attorneys could not have acquired or understood on their own or directly from their client. Id. at *28-29. According to the Court, Defendant's own HR team easily could have undertaken the same investigation as Daggett. Id. at *32. The Court, however, denied Plaintiffs' motion to compel the production of e-mails from Parcheta, an attorney at Mountain State Employers Counsel ("MSEC"), who provided advice to Defendant as part of its membership in MSEC. The Court found the e-mails privileged because Parcheta's advice was legal in nature. Id. at *35. Upon review of the documents, the Court noted that Parcheta wrote to Defendant as a lawyer and discussed and analyzed the law beyond bare recitation of regulations or the giving of non-legal business advice. Id. at *36. The Court then conducted in camera review of disputed privilege log entries and found that some portions of certain documents were privileged because they either contained or referred to legal advice and that some documents contained communications that discussed only business decisions and not legal advice. Id. at *42-43. Because Defendant's descriptions of the relevant documents were sufficiently detailed to give Plaintiffs adequate notice of the underlying claims of privilege, the Court declined to order Defendant to produce entries over which Defendant validly claimed attorney-client privilege. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' motion to compel discovery.

Senne, et al. v. Baltimore Orioles, Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-2940 (D. Md. Nov. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former minor league baseball players, brought a putative class action against Major League Baseball and its 30 member franchises alleging violations of the FLSA and state wage & hour laws. The Magistrate Judge dismissed the named Defendant Baltimore Orioles ("Orioles") was for lack of personal jurisdiction. Id. at 1. Subsequently, Plaintiffs moved to compel the Orioles to produce documents in response to their subpoena duces tecum, or to transfer the motion to the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California pursuant to Rule 45(f). Id. The Court observed that Rule 45 allows for the transfer of subpoena-related motions to the issuing Court if the Court where the compliance is required finds exceptional circumstances. Id. Here, the Court observed that the Magistrate Judge was in a better position to rule on the motion to compel given his familiarity with the issues involved and his knowledge of how the motion could affect the underlying litigation. Id. at 2. The Court explained that the same issues were likely to arise in discovery in many districts, given that, at the time their motions were filed with this Court, Plaintiffs had filed similar motions to compel against several other baseball franchises in several other districts. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that transferring the motion to the Magistrate Judge would avoid potential inconsistent rulings. Id.

Strauch, et al. v. Computer Sciences Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 516 (D. Conn. Jan. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendant misclassified its system administrators ("SAs") as exempt employees in violation of the FLSA and corresponding state laws. Plaintiffs moved to compel production of documents that reflected various pieces of information regarding each prospective class member, including full name; job title; job level or salary grade; job location; social security number; date of hire, transfer to a new location or job position, or termination; all information regarding compensation that Defendant earned or paid to each individual, including the individual's hourly rate; all last known contact information, as well as current and former home address, telephone number, and e-mail address; information reflecting each individual's location within Defendant's organization, including team, group, division, organizational unit; and other detailed organizational information. Id. at *4. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion in part. Plaintiffs contended that, at the early stage of discovery, it was unclear to Plaintiffs how SAs fit into the various job categories Defendant had established in its corporate records. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiffs cited multiple case law authorities for the proposition that pre-certification discovery of potential class members is appropriate within the context of Rule 23, the FLSA, or both. Id. at *6-7. Defendant objected to the pre-certification disclosure of confidential information regarding putative class members as irrelevant and immaterial to Plaintiffs' current claims and argued that Plaintiffs could not articulate any "good faith need" for the information when more than 70 SAs already had opted-in to the case. Id. at *7. The Court agreed with Plaintiffs that pre-certification discovery of some identifying information regarding putative class members was appropriate. Id. at *9-13. The Court, however, found that the information Plaintiffs sought was too excessive and intrusive. The Court noted that the more recent decisions did not permit initial disclosure of social security numbers. Id. at *14. The Court determined that the size of the putative class was significant (approximately 3,000), and there was uncertainty as to the various categorizations that Defendant created. Thus, the Court held that a global breakdown of the number of putative class members who fell within each category and subcategory, including precise job titles or levels, and the location and state in which they worked, would enable the Court to make a more informed decision based upon the additional information. Id. Finally, given the uncertainty of the various categorizations, with respect to the 70 opt-in Plaintiffs, the Court concluded Plaintiffs were entitled to all requested information except the disclosure of their social security numbers. Id. at *14-15.

Strauch, et al. v. Computer Sciences Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74917 (D. Conn. June 10, 2015). Plaintiff, a system administrator ("SA"), brought an action alleging that Defendant misclassified SAs as exempt in violation of the FLSA and Connecticut's wage & hour statues. Previously, the Court had conditionally certified a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), and also addressed the number of opt-in Plaintiffs from whom discovery responses were required, adopting the position that a large representative sample was sufficient in this case of 40% of opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. at *2. Counsel agreed to a three-tier approach for conducting depositions, with the first tier including any class representative identified by Plaintiffs in any pleading or amended pleading filed in this case. Id. at *3. The parties, however, disagreed about who should be identified in the second and third tiers. Defendant argued that the second tier should consist of anyone who submitted a declaration in support of Plaintiffs' motion, objections, or pleadings. According to Defendant, Plaintiffs submitted 24 opt-in Plaintiff declarations. As to the third tier, Defendant reserved the right to depose up to 100 additional opt-in Plaintiffs, not including those who fell in the first and the second tiers. Id. In contrast, Plaintiffs proposed a sliding scale approach, under which the second tier would be 15% of the current 86 opt-ins, or 13 deponents, and for the third tier, Plaintiffs suggested that Defendant be permitted to depose 10% of the next 100 opt-ins, and 5% of the next 300 opt-ins, with a cap of 38 depositions. Given the size of the putative class of approximately 4,000 people, the Magistrate Judge agreed that a sliding scale approach was appropriate, but one that was not as restrictive as suggested by Plaintiffs. Id. at *5. The Magistrate Judge determined that the second tier would consist, as suggested by Defendant, anyone who submitted a declaration in support of Plaintiffs' motions, objections, or pleadings, and of anyone Plaintiffs otherwise identified as a witness. Id. The Magistrate Judge ruled that the third tier would consist of and class representative identified by Plaintiffs in any pleading filed in the case, but did not put a cap on the total number of depositions. Id. at *6.

Thompson, et al. v. Costco Wholesale Corp.,* Case No. 14-CV-2778 (S.D. Cal. Aug. 7, 2015). In this wage & hours class action, Plaintiff served Defendants with 31 requests for production of documents ("RFPs") and 17 interrogatories ("ROGs"). During a discovery conference, the Court overruled all of Defendants' objections, and ordered them to respond to Plaintiff's requests in full. Id. at 2. Subsequently, the Court affirmed its tentative ruling from the discovery conference and waived Defendant's objections to Plaintiff's RFPs and ROGs. Id. Defendants then filed an ex parte application to stay the discovery order, which the Court granted. Defendants asserted that it would file an objection to the discovery order, seeking review by the Court, and also noted that although compliance with the discovery order was due soon, the briefing for its objection would not be complete at that time. Id. at 3. Thus, Defendants argued that, absent ex parte relief, it would be forced to comply with the discovery order before the Court reviewed its objection. Further, Defendants asserted that absent ex parte relief, it would be required to devote approximately 26,350 hours to assembling and producing a privilege log, private and premature putative class contact information, and thousands of irrelevant, premature, and private documents, which the Court might ultimately order need not be produced. Id. The Court remarked that it was granting Defendants' request because it believed that its analysis and ruling were correct, and that Defendant must make a good faith, concentrated effort to fully respond to the discovery requests if the Court order was deemed proper. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' application for stay the discovery order.

Velasquez-Monterrosa, et al. v. Mi Casita Restaurants*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57385 (E.D.N.C. May 1, 2015). Plaintiff, a cook, brought a putative class action and collective action alleging that Defendants denied employees straight time and overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and the North Carolina Wage & Hour Act. The Court issued a scheduling order and adopted a proposed discovery plan that provided for bifurcated discovery. Id. at *3. In Phase I, the Court directed the parties to focus discovery on whether the case was appropriate for class action or collective action treatment. Id. Plaintiff served an initial set of 12 interrogatories and an initial set of 15 requests for production of documents. Defendants asserted objections to each interrogatory but with the exception of Interrogatory No. 3, provided some responsive information. Plaintiff filed a motion to compel seeking responses to interrogatories and document requests, production of a privilege log, and an award of expenses, including attorneys' fees. The Court denied the motion. At the outset, the Court noted that, although Plaintiff's counsel certified that he had conferred in good faith with defense counsel to resolve the instant dispute prior to filing the motion, the correspondence between counsel revealed otherwise. Although defense counsel advised that he was willing to discuss the issues raised by Plaintiff within two or three days of the deadline set by Plaintiff, Plaintiff proceeded with filing the motion and, therefore, deprived the parties of a meaningful opportunity to resolve their dispute without the Court's intervention. Id. at *11-12. Accordingly, the Court denied without prejudice the portions of Plaintiff's motion that addressed issues other than Interrogatory No. 3. Id. at *13. As to Interrogatory No. 3, Plaintiff sought contact information for current and former employees and contended that he needed such information to establish that the case should be certified as a collective action under the FLSA and as a class action under Rule 23. Plaintiff contended that the production of employees' identifying information was necessary for him adequately to pursue his contention that he, along with other employees, were subject to a single decision, policy, or plan. Id. at *21. The Court sustained Defendants' objection on timeliness grounds, and concluded that Plaintiff had not demonstrated that he needed the information prior to determination of his certification motion. Id. at *22. The Court observed that Defendants had produced information and documents responsive to a number of other discovery requests that presumably would aid Plaintiff with his motion for certification. At the same time, production of the requested contact information presented the risk of recruitment of class members outside the bounds of the Court's supervision and an unjustified intrusion on the employees' privacy. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to compel.

Wilson, et al. v. McDonald's Corp.,* Case No. 14-CV-11082 (E.D. Mich. April 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of McDonald's employees, brought an action alleging that Defendants violated the FLSA and Michigan state law by failing to compensate them for time spent waiting to clock-in at the beginning of scheduled shifts and after returning from unpaid mid-shift breaks. Plaintiffs sought information in discovery to support their allegations that the compensation practices at issue were class-wide and susceptible to common proof. Id. at 2. Defendants contended that the Court's earlier denial of Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) limited the permissible scope of discovery to Plaintiffs' claims. Id. In response, Plaintiffs asserted that they remained entitled to discovery to support both their class action allegations and the claims of those employees who opted-in under § 216(b) both before and after the Court denied conditional certification of an FLSA collective action. Id. Plaintiffs moved to compel discovery, and Defendants filed a motion to stay discovery pending a ruling on dispositive motions, including Defendants' motion to strike Plaintiffs' class claims. Id. The Court agreed with Defendants and stayed discovery. The Court noted that the resolution of the pending motions would determine the scope of permissible discovery in the action and, if successful, would dispose of Plaintiffs' class claims against Defendants. Id. at 8. Because Defendants agreed to toll the statute of limitations on the claims of the potential FLSA collective action members for the period from the date of the hearing on the motion to stay until the ruling on the pending dispositive motions, the Court also found that the stay on discovery would cause no prejudice to Plaintiffs. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to stay and denied Plaintiffs' motion to compel without prejudice.

(ix) Public Employee FLSA Collective Action Litigation

Alamo, et al. v. United States*, 2015 U.S. Claims LEXIS 1054 (Fed. Cl. July 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of emergency medical technicians and/or Paramedics employed by the U.S. Department of the Army, brought an action alleging that the government improperly calculated their regularly scheduled overtime pay under the FLSA and the Federal Employee Pay Act ("Title V"). Plaintiffs received pay at pay grade GS-10 or below, and four of the non-exempt Plaintiffs also received stand-by duty premium pay at a rate of 10% of their annual salary. Id. at *3. The government calculated the non-exempt Plaintiffs' pay for regularly scheduled overtime by adding their weekly basic pay and weekly stand-by duty premium pay. Id. This total remuneration was then divided by the total number of hours worked during the week to derive their hourly regular rate. Id. at *3-4. The government multiplied the hourly regular rate by 0.5 and then multiplied this figure by the total number of regularly scheduled overtime hours worked during the week to arrive at Plaintiffs' regularly scheduled overtime pay. Id. at *4. The parties cross-moved for summary judgement, and the Court of Federal Claims granted summary judgment to Defendant. The Court of Federal Claims observed the regulations of the Office of Personnel Management ("OPM"), which has the authority to administer the FLSA for federal employees, provide that FLSA covered employees are entitled to overtime wages. Id. at *12. The OPM's pay regulations also recognized that federal employees who receive stand-by duty premium pay, receive this pay as compensation for their regularly scheduled overtime hours. Id. at *13. Moreover, the regulations state that such employees remain entitled to additional compensation for overtime hours under the FLSA, which is provided by the payment of the FLSA half-time pay. Id. In this instance, Defendant calculated the non-exempt Plaintiffs' pay for regularly scheduled overtime by combining the straight time rate of pay with the FLSA half-time pay. The Court of Federal Claims opined that this method of calculating regularly scheduled overtime pay was fully consistent with OPM's pay regulations. The Court of Federal Claims acknowledged that the OPM's pay regulations appropriately recognize Congress' intent for stand-by duty premium pay to compensate for regularly scheduled overtime hours spent largely in stand-by duty status. Id. at *14. The Court of Federal Claims held that the government appropriately calculated the regularly scheduled overtime pay for the non-exempt Plaintiffs. In addition, the Court of Federal Claims noted that the FLSA requires that the hourly regular rate include all remuneration for employment paid to or on behalf of employees subject to certain enumerated exceptions that did not apply here. Id. at *16. Further, the OPM's pay regulations provide that the hourly regular rate is calculated by dividing the total remuneration paid to an employee in the workweek by the total number of hours of work in the workweek for which such compensation was paid. Id. The Court of Federal Claims opined that the method employed by the government for calculating the hourly regular rate was proper under the FLSA and OPM's pay regulations, and that the non-exempt Plaintiffs' hourly regular rate was properly calculated. Finally, the Court of Federal Claims ruled that Plaintiffs incorrectly maintained that the government must calculate their regularly scheduled overtime pay upon a bi-weekly basis, rather than a weekly basis, because the non-exempt Plaintiffs worked a compressed work schedule. The Court of Federal Claims observed that the government should calculate the pay for all employees who work on a compressed work schedule upon a weekly basis, unless those employees are specifically engaged in fire protection or law enforcement activities. Id. at *18-19. As the non-exempt Plaintiffs were not engaged in fire suppression or law enforcement activities, the Court of Federal Claims found that the government appropriately calculated the non-exempt Plaintiffs' pay upon a weekly basis under the FLSA and the relevant OPM regulations.

Allen, et al. v. City Of Chicago,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 165906 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of police officers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant willfully violated the FLSA by not paying them overtime compensation for the time spent performing off-duty work on their Defendant-issued BlackBerry devices. Id. at *2. According to the complaint, Defendant required Plaintiffs to use their BlackBerry devices to be available to access work-related e-mails, phone calls, and messages while they were off-duty, and Plaintiffs in fact received many such communications and performed work using their BlackBerry devices while off-duty. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant maintained an unwritten policy to deny Plaintiffs compensation for this off-duty work they performed. Id. Over the course of more than five years of litigation, the Court conditionally certified a collective action, denied Defendant's motion to decertify the collective action, and denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *3-4. Ultimately, the Court held a bench trial on the threshold issue of whether Defendant maintained an unwritten policy to deny Plaintiffs compensation for off-duty BlackBerry work they performed, and after weighing all admissible evidence entered a judgment in Defendant's favor. Although Plaintiffs established that they performed off-duty work on their BlackBerrys, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden of showing that Defendant did not compensate them pursuant to any unlawful policy of Defendant or that Defendant suffered or permitted the work to be done without compensation. Id. at *62. Because it was undisputed that Defendant maintained a method by which officers could turn in "time due slips" to report off-duty, overtime work for payroll purposes, the Court held that it would need to turn to specific evidence regarding damages only if there was an unwritten policy that systematically dissuaded Plaintiffs from utilizing time due slips for off-duty BlackBerry work. Id. at *20. Although Plaintiffs contended that Defendant maintained a uniform culture that it was not acceptable for officers to turn in time due slips for off-duty BlackBerry work, the evidence failed to establish such a culture or practice. The evidence showed that dozens of police officers had in fact submitted such slips, which Defendant approved and paid. Id. at *22. Plaintiffs submitted no evidence to show that supervisors knew if or when the police officers were working on their devices off-duty without submitting time due slips. Id. at *23-24. Plaintiffs also submitted no proof that the supervisors had created a culture or unwritten policy that discouraged the police officers from reporting any overtime work. Id. The Court noted, in particular, that the supervisors were often not aware when Plaintiffs were working off-duty, that their off-duty BlackBerry work occurred outside the physical presence of the supervisors and took place with individuals other than their direct supervisors, and that the supervisors did not necessarily know if and when particular officers failed to submit time due slips for off-duty BlackBerry work. Id. Plaintiffs further failed to establish a well-grounded fear of adverse consequence if they submitted time due slips for off-duty BlackBerry work. Id. at *40-42. In light of these findings, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to show "a uniform culture or well-grounded understanding that off-duty BlackBerry work would not be compensated." Id. at *58. Accordingly, the Court ruled in Defendant's favor.

Austin, et al. v. United States,* 2015 U.S. Claims LEXIS 1605 (Fed. Cl. Dec. 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of nurses and healthcare workers, brought an action alleging that Defendants' policies governing holiday pay violated federal statutes under 38 U.S.C. § 7453. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants' policies governing holiday pay for nurses set forth in its handbook did not provide additional pay to nurses who worked a tour of duty that began the day before a calendar holiday and that ended on such holiday. Id. at *5. Further, Defendants only provided additional pay for the first tour of duty when nurses worked two tours of duty that both began on a calendar holiday, and its policy did not provide nurses additional pay for overtime work performed on a holiday. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiffs contended that Defendants' policies were unlawful because a nurse should receive holiday pay for an entire tour of duty, including hours on the calendar holiday, regardless of whether the tour began or ended on the holiday. Id. at *8-10. Plaintiffs asserted claims for back pay and other relief based on alleged violations of 38 U.S.C. § 7453. Both parties moved for summary judgment on the claims, and the Court of Federal Claim granted in part and denied in part the motion. First, the Court of Federal Claims granted summary judgment to Defendants as to Plaintiffs' claim of not affording additional pay for tours of duty that begin the day before but extend into a calendar holiday, finding that it was consistent with 5 U.S.C. § 6103 and Executive Order No. 11582, the federal statute and executive order that govern the observance of holidays by federal agencies. Id. at *33. The Court of Federal Claims noted that, under § 5 of the Executive Order 11582, "[a]ny employee whose workday covers portions of two calendar days and who would, except for this section, ordinarily be excused from work scheduled for the hours of any calendar day on which a holiday falls, shall instead be excused from work on his entire workday which commences on any such calendar day," and § 6 of the Executive Order states that the "workdays referred to in sections 3, 4, and 5 shall be treated as holidays in lieu of the corresponding calendar holidays" for purposes of administering the provisions of law relating to pay. Id. at *26-28. Because Defendants' policy provided in pertinent part that "[w]hen the basic workweek of a nurse includes portions of 2 tours on a holiday, the tour that commences on the holiday shall be treated as the holiday for pay and leave purposes," the Court of Federal Claims concluded that Defendants' policy with respect to nurses who worked two tours of duty that straddle the same calendar holiday did not violate the requirements of 38 U.S.C. § 7453(d), which mandates additional pay for service only when it is performed on a holiday designated by federal statute or executive order. Id. Further, the Court of Federal Claims granted summary judgment to Defendants as to Plaintiffs' claim that Defendants maintained a policy of not paying nurses at holiday rates for overtime work performed on a holiday because Plaintiffs failed to show disputes of material fact. Defendants contended that its policy mandated that nurses receive additional pay for overtime worked on a holiday, and that its systems for time and attendance and payroll were programmed to ensure that when nurses work overtime on a holiday, they received double their regular rate. Id. at *37-42. The Court of Federal Claims, however, granted summary judgment to Plaintiffs on their claim that Defendants' policy restricting additional pay due to nurses who perform two tours of duty beginning on a holiday, finding that Defendants lacked any basis, in either statute or executive order, for such restriction. Because 38 U.S.C. § 7453(d) provides for additional pay for hours worked on holidays designated by federal statute or Executive Order, the Court of Federal Claims determined that it was impermissible under § 7453(d) for Defendants to designate as "a matter of administrative regulation and determination" which hours of work would be considered to fall on a holiday. Id. at *35-36. Accordingly, the Court of Federal Claims granted in part and denied in part the parties' motions for summary judgment.

Balestrieri, et al. v. Menlo Park Fire Protection District,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 15785 (9th Cir. Sept. 4, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of firefighters, brought an action under the FLSA seeking overtime compensation for taking their gear to temporary duty stations. Id. at *2. Defendant required Plaintiffs to wear special gear that they have immediate access to while at work. Although Plaintiffs could take the gear home with them and bring it back at the beginning of their shift, most of them preferred to leave the gear in one of Defendant's seven fire stations because of the bulk and dirt, and the concerns about exposing their families to the materials on soiled gear. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs worked two consecutive 24-hour shifts, and the turnout gear issue arose from occasions when firefighters worked a shift in a fire station other than their home station. Id. at *3. While Defendant compensated Plaintiffs for the time spent picking up gear when they got a phone call at home, between shifts, to take an overtime shift immediately at a visiting station, it did not compensate them for the time it took to get their gear and report to the visiting stations, and to take their gear back to their home stations after the voluntary temporary assignments. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiffs alleged that they transported their firefighting gear from their home station to another fire station while voluntarily covering an extra shift, and thus the time spent moving their equipment from their home station to visiting stations was compensable under the FLSA. Id. at *6-7. Disagreeing with Plaintiffs, the District Court granted summary judgment to Defendant. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's finding that the activity was not "integral and indispensable" to Plaintiffs' principal duties. Id. at *9. The Ninth Circuit found that because a firefighter was free to take his or her gear home and go straight to the visiting station for the overtime shift without having to return to the home station to retrieve the gear, the alleged activity was not integral and indispensable to the firefighter's duties. Id. at *15. The Ninth Circuit cited the U.S. Supreme Court decision in Busk v. Integrity Staffing Solutions, Inc., 135 S. Ct. 513 (2014), concerning the time that Amazon warehouse employees spent going through a security check at the end of their shift. Id. at *13. The Supreme Court had determined that, even though the security check was required and for the benefit of the employer, the time spent need not be paid because it was not integral and indispensable to the employees' duties as warehouse workers. Id. Applying the Supreme Court's analysis, the Ninth Circuit reasoned that moving equipment from a home fire station to a temporary duty was not "tied to the productive work that the employee is employed to perform*." Id.* at *14. The Ninth Circuit made it clear that "[w]hen the firefighter has put his name on the list for overtime calls, he is free to take his gear home, and if he gets a call, he can go to the visiting station for the assigned shift without even stopping by his home station." Id. at *15. The Ninth Circuit, therefore, concluded that driving to the home station first to retrieve gear was not 'indispensable' to Plaintiffs' principal activities. Id. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant's system of paying cash in lieu of unused leave time violated the FLSA. According to Plaintiffs, the pay they received for unused sick leave was a type of bonus that should be considered as part of their "regular rate" of pay for purposes of determining their overtime pay. Id. at *18. The Ninth Circuit noted that the FLSA defines regular rate to mean all "remuneration" for work subject to eight exclusions and various qualifications, including exclusion on payments made for occasional periods when no work is performed due to vacation, holiday, or illness. Id. at *16-17. Although the U.S. Department of Labor has interpreted sick leave buybacks as part of the regular rate of pay, the Ninth Circuit noted that Plaintiffs had an annual leave allowance that did not distinguish between sick and vacation leave. Id. at *19-21. The Ninth Circuit therefore held that Defendant need not include amounts paid for annual leave buyback within its calculation of Plaintiffs' regular rates of pay for purposes of determining their overtime rates of pay. Id. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's grant of summary judgment to Defendant.

Gibbs, et al. v. City Of New York,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7960 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, two female NYPD employees, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to compensate them for attending alcohol counselling and treatment sessions as a condition of continued employment in violation of the FLSA. Defendants identified both Plaintiffs as having a problem with alcohol use and, therefore, required them to attend mandatory alcohol treatment and counselling sessions or face disciplinary action, potentially including termination. Id. at *3. The sessions included: (i) inpatient counselling at a residential treatment facility; (ii) outpatient counselling during regularly-scheduled work hours; and (iii) outpatient counselling after regularly-scheduled work hours. Id. at *3-4. Defendants compensated Plaintiffs for the time they spent attending the inpatient treatment sessions, excluding overtime, and attending the outpatient sessions during regular working hours. Plaintiffs claimed that they deserved overtime compensation for inpatient counselling and outpatient counselling after work hours. Defendants moved for summary judgment, asserting that attendance at the alcohol treatment and counselling sessions did not constitute "work" within the meaning of the FLSA. Id. at *2. The Court granted Defendants' motion. The Court noted that the FLSA requires employers to compensate employees for time spent engaging in activities that are "both controlled or required by the employer and pursued necessarily and primarily for the benefits of the employer and his business." Id. at *20. Although Defendants required Plaintiffs to attend the sessions, the Court determined that Defendants did not "predominantly benefit" from their attendance. Id. at *21. Whereas Plaintiffs' attendance potentially could have benefited Defendants by stopping terminations and, therefore, saving Defendants the costs of hiring and training replacements, the Court noted these are not the kind of benefits that have been recognized as decisive in this context, and something more is required. Id. at *24. Nothing in the record suggested that Plaintiffs were not replaceable or that Defendants' department was short-staffed such that Plaintiffs' continued employment was particularly valuable to Defendants. The Court further held that, even if attending the counselling could constitute work, the sessions were "non-compensable post-liminary activities" under the Portal-to-Portal Act because the sessions were neither indispensable nor integral to Plaintiffs' principal activities. Id. at *38-41. The Court, therefore, granted Defendants' motion for summary judgment.

Lubow, et al. v. U.S. Department Of State,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 6302 (D.C. Cir. April 17, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of diplomatic security special agents, brought a class action challenging Defendant's decision requiring them to repay excess overtime pay they received for work on assignment in Iraq. Each Plaintiff responded to a call for volunteers to serve one-year assignments in Iraq under the Coalition Provisional Authority, and was assigned a temporary duty status at Iraq in 2004. Plaintiffs received "locality pay" – pay in addition to base salary intended to equalize federal employees' compensation with that of non-federal workers in the same geographic area – as if they were working in Washington, D.C., and received a significant number of overtime hours while working in Iraq. Id. at *2. In early 2005, Plaintiffs completed their assignments in Iraq and returned to the United States. Later, Plaintiffs received e-mail messages from Defendant notifying them that it was conducting a review of premium pay earnings involving employees supporting the effort in Iraq, pursuant to federal law, 5 U.S.C. § 5547. Id. at *6. Section 5547 limits the amount of "premium pay" a federal employee may receive, and the premium pay includes overtime pay, holiday pay, Sunday pay, night pay differential, and availability pay. Id. at *3. The message informed each Plaintiff that their earnings to date had put them above the cap for the current pay years and that Defendant would be obligated to seek collection of any over-payments. Id. at *7. Subsequently, each Plaintiff received a letter from Defendant requiring repayment of premium pay received in excess of § 5547(b)(2)'s cap. Each Plaintiff requested Defendant to forgive the entirety of debt pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 5584, which allows an employing agency to waive any claim against an employee arising out of an erroneous payment of pay if collection would be against equity and good conscience and not in the best interests of the United States. Id. at *8. Following Defendant's denial, Plaintiffs filed grievances with the State Department's Foreign Service Grievance Board ("FSGB"). The FSGB found no basis to overturn Defendant's decision that granting a waiver to Plaintiffs would create an unfair gain for them vis-à-vis all those similarly-situated employees who repaid their excess premium pay for 2004. Id. at *11. Plaintiffs sought judicial review in the District Court, and the District Court found that the FSGB had not acted arbitrarily in upholding Defendant's decision to deny Plaintiffs' requests for discretionary waivers under § 5584. Id. at *13. On further appeal, the D.C. Circuit affirmed the District Court's findings. First, the D.C. Circuit found that Defendant permissibly construed the statute capping premium pay when determining that Plaintiffs' overtime pay exceeded the statutory limit. Id. at *22. Although Plaintiffs disputed Defendant's understanding of § 5547(b)(2)'s cap on annual premium pay, the D.C. Circuit found that Defendant's reading of the text was reasonable, and more apparent when compared with the uncertainty of alternative approach offered by Plaintiffs. Id. at *15-20. The D.C. Circuit also found that Defendant and FSGB did not act arbitrarily in denying Plaintiffs a discretionary waiver of their obligation to repay the excess compensation. The D.C. Circuit noted that, despite Defendant's explicit request for additional information, Plaintiffs chose not to supplement the record with evidence about whether collection of the claim would cause serious financial hardship to them or whether the employees had relinquished a valuable right or changed positions for the worse because of the erroneous payment. Id. at *25. The D.C. Circuit thus agreed with the District Court that, given the dearth of information, the FSGB had no choice but to conclude that financial hardship and detrimental reliance factors weighed against waiver, and the District Court could not substitute its judgment for that of the agency under the Administrative Procedure Act's standard of review. Id. Accordingly, the D.C. Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling.

Mercier, et al. v. United States*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 8003 (Fed. Cir. May 15, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of nurses employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs (the "agency"), brought an action seeking overtime pay under 38 U.S.C. § 7453(e)(1), which requires the agency to compensate "officially ordered or approved" overtime work. The Court of Claims dismissed the nurses' claim because they did not allege that the agency officially ordered or approved by express direction to be non-compensable. On appeal, the Federal Circuit reversed and remanded. At the outset, the Federal Circuit remarked that the words "officially ordered or approved" in the Federal Employee Pay Act ("FEPA") was interpreted by the Court of Claims in several cases. In Gaines v. U.S., 131 F. Supp. 925 (1955), the Court of Claims enforced the regulation's requirement that approval be in writing. Id. at *4. In Anderson v. U.S., 136 Ct. Cl. 365 (1956), the Court of Claims held that overtime that is "induced," but not explicitly requirement, is nonetheless "ordered or approved," and that the writing regulation could not limit the scope of that substantive right to overtime pay. Id. at *5. The Federal Circuit observed that relying on Schweiker v. Hansen, 450 U.S. 785 (1981), and Office of Personal Management v. Richmond, 496 U.S. 414 (1990), it held that the rationale of these cases overruled Anderson's holding that the writing regulation was invalid. Id. at *8. The Federal Circuit noted that in Doe v. U.S., 67 Fed. Appx. 596 (Fed. Cir. 2003), it held that the rationale of Hansen and Richmond overruled the holding in Anderson that the writing regulation could not limit the substantive scope of the statutory right to compensation for overtime that was officially ordered or approved. Id. at *12. The Federal Circuit then considered whether this interpretation was entitled to deference under Chevron U.S.A. Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, 467 U.S. 837 (1984), and held that the writing regulation was a reasonable interpretation of FEPA's "officially ordered or approved" requirement. Id. at *13. The Federal Circuit therefore, concluded that Plaintiff bore the burden of showing that the writing regulation was arbitrary or otherwise unreasonable. Id. Doe held that Plaintiffs had not met their burden of proving the regulation was unreasonable because the writing requirement did not contradict the statute's plain text. Doe reasoned that the writing requirement served one of FEPA's purposes, namely, to control the government's liability for overtime and ensuring that employees received overtime compensation. Id. at *14. Here, Plaintiffs alleged that they were required to work overtime on a recurring and involuntary basis in order to perform tasks known as view alerts, which the nurses described as time-sensitive requests for information related to patient care. The Court of Claims had concluded that Doe overruled Anderson in its entirety and therefore, following Doe, entitlement to overtime pay is triggered only when an authorized official of the agency has, either verbally or in writing, expressly directed specified overtime work or approved pay for it after the fact. Id. at 16-17*. The Federal Circuit noted that the Court of Claims did not analyze whether Hansen or Richmond affected more than the writing regulation under the FEPA. The Federal Circuit remarked that the issue here was not whether the nurses were entitled to a payment from the public treasury without Congressional authorization, because the FEPA did authorize the payment of officially ordered or approved overtime work. Id. at *22. The Federal Circuit observed that the question Anderson decided when it interpreted the FEPA provision was whether Plaintiffs' overtime was within the scope of the statutory grant. Id. Here, the nurses alleged that the agency had knowledge that they worked overtime on a recurring and involuntary basis, and that the agency ordered or approved such work through expectation, requirement, and inducement. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Federal Circuit reversed the dismissal of Plaintiffs' claim and remanded for further proceedings under the Anderson standard.

(x) Preemption And Immunity Issues In FLSA Collective Actions

Beaulieu, et al. v. State Of Vermont,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 16505 (2d Cir. Sept. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former employees of the State of Vermont, brought a collective action in the state court alleging Defendant violated the FLSA when it reduced their weekly pay for partial-day absences in excess of their accrued leave, and failed to pay them on a salary basis, thus depriving them overtime pay. Id. Defendant removed the action, where it filed an unsuccessful motion to dismiss. Two years later, Defendant filed another motion to dismiss asserting sovereign immunity. The District Court granted the second motion. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed on the basis that, although Defendant's removal of Plaintiffs' private action from Vermont state court to the District Court resulted in a waiver of its Eleventh Amendment immunity from a federal suit, it had not waived its general sovereign immunity from private lawsuits within the meaning of Vermont state law. Id. at *27. Plaintiffs argued that the statutory provision at Vermont Statutes Title 21, § 384(b)(7), constituted an express waiver of the Vermont's immunity from private actions brought under the FLSA. Id. at *10. The Second Circuit disagreed, and noted that although Title 21 provides that "an employer shall not pay an employee less than one and one-half times the regular wage rate for any work done by the employee in excess of 40 hours during a workweek," the statute further provides that "this sub-section shall not apply to: . . . (7) State employees who are covered by the Federal Fair Labor Standards Act." Id. at *10. Thus, according to the Second Circuit, Plaintiffs' argument misunderstood the difference between the applicability of a federal statute to a state enacting lawful obligations upon the state, and the state's amenability to a private party's suit to enforce such an obligation. Id. at *10-11. While there was no doubt that the FLSA applied to Defendant, the Second Circuit held that Defendant's sovereign immunity – unless waived or forfeited – barred suit by a private party seeking to enforce the FLSA's terms. Id. The Second Circuit therefore held that the fact that Defendant's employees were covered by the FLSA did not mean that those employees were entitled to sue Defendant under the FLSA's private right of action. Id. at *11. As to Plaintiffs' argument that Defendant waived its sovereign immunity by removing the suit, the Second Circuit noted that the Eleventh Amendment relates to the relationship between the states and the federal government, and neither logic nor case law precedent supported the proposition that a state waives its general state sovereign immunity by removing an action from state court to federal court. Id. at *13-14. The Second Circuit therefore concluded that the District Court correctly dismissed the action on the basis of Defendant's general sovereign immunity, which it had not waived.

Berera, et al. v. Mesa Medical Group, PLLC*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 2581 (6th Cir. Feb. 19, 2015). Plaintiff, a nurse, brought a putative class action in state court alleging that Defendant wrongfully collected both her share as well as Defendant's share of the Federal Insurance Contribution Act ("FICA") tax from her wages. As a result, Plaintiff sought unpaid wages under the state law. Defendant filed a motion for a more definitive statement, arguing that Plaintiff's claims were unclear. When Defendant realized that Plaintiff sought a refund of FICA taxes, it removed the action under the Class Action Fairness Act. Id. at *7. The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion to remand, but ordered her to show cause why it should not dismiss her claims for failure to state a claim. The District Court concluded that taxpayers seeking a refund of FICA taxes must file an administrative claim with the IRS before bringing an independent legal action. Id. at *9. Unconvinced by Plaintiff's response, the District Court dismissed the complaint with prejudice. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit modified the judgment, but affirmed it nevertheless. The Sixth Circuit addressed three questions, including: (i) whether Plaintiff's state claims for unpaid wages were a FICA refund claim in disguise; (ii) if Plaintiff did assert a FICA claim, should her claim be dismissed for not filing a claim with the IRS first pursuant to 26 U.S.C. § 7422(a); and (iii) did Defendant timely remove the action. At the outset, the Sixth Circuit noted that the complaint unequivocally stated that the putative class consisted of Defendant's employees who were forced to pay their share of payroll taxes and withholdings. Id. at *12. Although Plaintiff also alleged that this forced payment caused the underpayment to employees, the complaint stated that the underpayment of wages "resulted" from the forced payment of payroll taxes. Id. Therefore, the Sixth Circuit found that the allegation regarding the forced payment of payroll taxes was the factual foundation of Plaintiff's purported state law claims. Although Plaintiff did not expressly mention FICA taxes, the Sixth Circuit concluded that it was understood that the employer must calculate its share of the FICA tax by reference to wages paid by the employer. Id. Second, the Sixth Circuit noted that the exhaustion-of-remedies under § 7422(a) was mandatory, and that a taxpayer is barred from bringing any action for a refund of any tax until a claim for refund has been filed with the IRS. Id. at *14. Because Plaintiff asserted a FICA refund claim, the Sixth Circuit concluded that § 7422(a) required her to first file a claim with the IRC, and hence, the District Court did not err in dismissing her complaint. Finally, the Sixth Circuit found that the removal was timely. The Sixth Circuit explained that Plaintiff's complaint failed to unambiguously inform Defendant that it could remove the case. The Sixth Circuit noted that it was only in the letter that Plaintiff's counsel sent on August 13, 2013, did Defendant realize that the complaint contained at least one FICA claim. Id. at *30. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit concluded that Defendant's notice of removal filed on September 11, 2015 was timely. The Sixth Circuit, however, modified the judgment to dismiss the complaint without prejudice.

Cole, et al. v. CRST Van Expedited, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 6054 (9th Cir. April 14, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant denied meal and rest breaks to employees in violation of California law. Defendant moved for judgment on the pleadings. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's claim was preempted by federal law. The District Court dismissed Plaintiff's claims, finding that the Federal Aviation Administration Act ("FAAA") preempted California's meal and rest break laws. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded. The Ninth Circuit noted that in Dilts v. Penske Logistics, LLC, 769 F.3d 637 (9th Cir. 2014), it had recently held that California's meal and rest break laws were not related to prices, routes, or services, and therefore, were not preempted by the FAAAA. Id. at *2. Based on Dilts, the Ninth Circuit concluded the District Court erred by granting Defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings on the basis of FAAAA preemption. Id. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded.

Hughes, et al. v. United Parcel Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28219 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action in state court alleging that Defendants United Parcel Services ("UPS") and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Local 623 (the "Teamsters") failed to pay them wages earned in violation of the FLSA and the Pennsylvania Wage and Payment Collection Law ("WPCL"). In 2002, Plaintiffs became employed with UPS and joined the Teamsters' union. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs held part-time positions as air drivers, and were not able to secure full-time positions due to their seniority level within the Teamsters. As of January 2012, they remained in the same part-time positions earning wages at an hourly rate of $23.70. In January 2012, Plaintiffs became aware of full-time position openings and asked certain leadership members of the Teamsters whether the full-time positions would lead to a change in their rate of pay. The Teamsters informed Plaintiffs that their hourly rate of $23.70 would not change. Id. at *3. Based upon those representations, the collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") between the parties, and the job descriptions for the full-time positions, Plaintiffs applied for and were hired by UPS for full-time employment as air drivers. Id. Shortly after beginning their new full-time roles, UPS decreased Plaintiffs' hourly pay to $13.50 and eliminated their seniority. Plaintiffs then unsuccessfully contacted a representative of UPS and the National Labor Relations Board for assistance. Plaintiffs further alleged that they filed grievances with the Teamsters concerning the wage decrease. Defendants removed the action on the basis of federal question jurisdiction, and moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' first amended complaint on the basis that § 301 of the Labor-Management Relations Act ("LMRA") preempted Plaintiffs' claims. The Court granted the motion. First, the Court noted that in their response to Defendants' motions, Plaintiffs stated that they were dismissing without prejudice all of their federal claims pursuant to Rule 41 and that they were relying on their state law claims. Plaintiffs objected to Defendants' motions insofar as they relied on the CBA and Plaintiffs asserted that the CBA was inadmissible at that stage. Id. at *6. The Court ruled the CBA was integral to and explicitly relied upon by Plaintiffs in their first amended complaint and therefore Defendants attachment of the CBA to their motions to dismiss, and their reliance upon the CBA, was proper. Id. at *8. The Court found that § 301 preempted both Plaintiffs' state and federal claims. The Court reasoned that based upon the allegations in Plaintiffs' first amended complaint, their state law claims were squarely dependent upon the CBA. Id. at *10. The Court held that each of Plaintiffs' claims was based upon allegations that their employment relationship with UPS was governed by the CBA, that it was pursuant to the terms of the CBA, that Plaintiffs accepted the full-time positions that were the subject of the action, that Defendants breached the terms of the CBA, and that as a result of Defendants' breach of the CBA, Plaintiffs suffered damages. Id. at *10-11. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' argument that § 301 did not preempt all state law claims where the claims were not entirely dependent upon an analysis of the CBA, because Plaintiffs put the CBA squarely at issue by alleging that Defendants breached it and that they suffered injury as a result of that breach. Id. at *12. The Court concluded that the terms of the CBA was the basis of each of their claims. Finally, because Plaintiffs had failed to exhaust the administrative remedies available to them under the terms of the CBA, the Court dismissed their claims for breach of contract, unjust enrichment, and violations of the WPCL. Id. at *14.

Overka, et al. v. American Airlines, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 9870 (1st Cir. June 12, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of skycaps or airport porters, brought an action alleging that Defendant's charge of $2.00 per bag for customers using curbside check-in services at airports – without notifying customers that skycaps would not receive the proceeds from the new charge – decreased their compensation dramatically. The District Court opined that DiFiore v. American Airlines, Inc., 646 F.3d 81 (1st Cir. 2011), and Brown v. United Airlines, Inc., 720 F.3d 60 (1st Cir. 2013), compelled the conclusion that the Airline Deregulation Act ("ADA"), preempted each of the skycaps' claims, and thus it granted Defendant's motion to dismiss. Id. at *3. On appeal, the First Circuit affirmed. The First Circuit noted that an express preemption clause in the ADA, 49 U.S.C. § 41713(b)(1), provides that a State, political sub-division of a State, or political authority of at least two States may not enact or enforce a law, regulation, or other provision having the force and effect of law related to a price, route, or service of an air carrier that may provide air transportation under this sub-part. Id. at *3-4. DiFiore, which had held that the ADA preempted skycaps' claims that Defendant's per-bag fees violated the Massachusetts Tips Law, had reasoned that the airline's conduct in arranging for transportation of bags at curbside was itself a part of the "service" referred to in the federal statute, and the airline's "price" includes charges for such ancillary services as well as the flight itself. Id. at *4. Thus, DiFore reasoned that the Tips Law directly regulated how an airline service is performed and how its price is displayed to customers, which was what the ADA sought to avoid. Id. at *5. In Brown, the First Circuit had explained that DiFiore conclusively resolved in the airlines' favor the issue of whether laws regulating the imposition of baggage-handling fees relate to a price, route, or service of an air carrier within the meaning of the ADA preemption clause. Id. at *5-6. Further, Brown had also held that the skycaps' claims did not fit within the exception to preemption under the ADA recognized in American Airlines, Inc. v. Wolens, 513 U.S. 219, 222 (1995). Id. at *6. Wolens had held that the ADA did not preempt breach of contract claims arising out of an airline's frequent flyer program because those claims had sought remedies for violations of self-imposed, not state-imposed, obligations. Id. Plaintiffs argued that Northwest, Inc. v. Ginsberg, 134 S. Ct. 1422 (2014), undermined the holding in Brown that skycaps' unjust enrichment and tortious interference claims fall outside the confines of the Wolens exception. Ginsberg had held that the ADA preempted a customer's claim alleging that an airline had breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. Id. at *7. Further, Ginsberg held that the Wolens exception did not apply to the customer's claim because Minnesota law prohibited parties from contracting out of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and thus the covenant was a state-imposed obligation rather than a self-imposed one under Wolens. Id. at *8. The First Circuit, however, observed that Ginsberg did not conclude that the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing was not an obligation to which the parties had agreed, that the covenant instead constituted a state-imposed obligation under the applicable law, and thus that the reasoning of Wolens meant that the ADA preempted the customer's implied covenant claim. Id. at *9. The First Circuit also remarked that Ginsberg did not undermine the reasoning in Brown about the application of the Wolens exception to the common law claims Plaintiffs pressed here, as those claims sought to enforce a similarly state-imposed obligation. Id. Thus, the First Circuit opined that the ADA preempted Plaintiffs' common law claims. Regarding claims under the Massachusetts Tips Law, Plaintiffs contended that the District Court's decision with respect to their Tips Law claims should be reversed in light of Massachusetts Delivery Association v. Coakley, 769 F.3d 11 (1st Cir. 2014). Id. at *10. The First Circuit, however, observed that in deciding the preemption question, Massachusetts Delivery Association explicitly reaffirmed its previous holding that the proper analysis looks to the logical effect that a particular scheme has on the delivery of services or the setting of rates. Id. at *12. Thus, because Massachusetts Delivery Association supplied no basis for declining to follow DiFiore, the First Circuit affirmed that ADA preempted Plaintiffs' claims under the Massachusetts Tips Law.

Rueli, et al. v. Baystate Health Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2548 (D. Mass. Jan. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of visiting nurses, brought a class action in state court alleging that Defendants failed to pay them unpaid wages and overtime compensation in violation of Ch. 149 and Ch. 151 of Massachusetts General Laws. The parties' employment contract was memorialized in a collective bargaining agreement ("CBA"), which required employees to request permission from Defendants prior to working hours that would entitle them to overtime compensation. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs did not allege that they followed the CBA protocol for requesting overtime. Defendants removed the case on the grounds that federal law preempted Plaintiffs' claims because the resolution of the claims depended, at least in part, upon the meaning of the CBA. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs moved to remand the case, arguing that removal was improper because interpretation of the CBA was not necessary to resolve their claims. Id. at *6. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion. The Court relied on Cavallaro v. UMass Memorial Health Care, Inc. 678 F.3d (1st Cir. 2012), wherein the First Circuit had ultimately found that an interpretation of the CBA would be required to construe and apply the various peculiarities of industry-specific wage and benefit structures embodied in the CBA. Id. at *8-9. Although Plaintiffs attempted to distinguish Cavallaro, the Court found that Cavallaro governed this case because in both situations, determining whether there were wages owed, would, at least arguably, require construing and applying a portion of the CBA. Id. at *9-10. Plaintiffs contended that because they were not seeking to enforce the threshold under the CBA, it need not be interpreted because Plaintiffs were seeking only to enforce their state statutory right to collect overtime pay. The Court, however, found that interrelationship of the state claims and a CBA could not be avoided merely by refusing to identify the CBA in the complaint. Id. at *10. Thus, the Court found Plaintiffs' contention unavailing insofar as they asserted that interpretation of the CBA could be avoided. Accordingly, given the controlling nature of Cavallaro, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to remand.

(xi) Independent Contractor Issues In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Carlson, et al. v. Fedex Ground Package Systems*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 8810 (11th Cir. May 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of FedEx drivers in Florida, brought an action alleging that FedEx improperly classified them as exempt and asserted several statutory and common law claims. Between 2003 and 2009, drivers in approximately 40 other states filed similar actions that were consolidated in a multi-district proceeding ("MDL Court"). In the consolidated actions, the drivers alleged that, under their respective state laws, they were employees of FedEx and sought, among other things, reimbursement of business expenses, back pay, and overtime. Id. at *3. The Florida drivers sought class certification, and the MDL Court granted their motion. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment, and the MDL Court granted FedEx's motion, finding that the drivers were independent contractors under Florida law because, under the Operating Agreement and FedEx's standard practices and procedures, FedEx did not have the right to control the manner in which the drivers performed their jobs. Id. at *7. The MDL Court then remanded the case to the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Florida for resolution of the individual common law claims. FedEx prevailed on the individual claims and obtained a final judgment in its favor. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's order granting summary judgment on the individual claims, but reversed the MDL Court's order granting summary judgment in favor of FedEx on the Florida drivers' employment status. At the outset, the Eleventh Circuit noted that the Florida drivers' claims depended on the common question of whether FedEx properly classified them as independent contractors. The Eleventh Circuit reasoned that the facts in the record supported each party's theory as to the degree of control that FedEx exercised over the drivers. Accordingly, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded.

Cotter, et al. v. LYFT, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30026 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 11, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, brought a class action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors and thereby owed them money they would have otherwise received as employees. Defendant operated a smartphone application through which passengers/riders were matched to nearby available drivers to transport people in their personal automobiles. Id. at *4. The drivers worked on a donation system, where, at the end of the ride, a passenger could pay the driver a donation that Defendant recommended, or pay a different amount, or pay nothing at all. Id. at *6. Defendant tracked a driver's acceptance rate, and a driver with a low acceptance rate was deactivated after three warnings. Id. at *8. The parties' relationship was governed by Defendant's terms of service, which limited Defendant's liability for a driver's action with a rider. Id. at *9-10. The terms of service also reserved Defendant the right to investigate and terminate a driver's participation. Id. at *10. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment, and the Court denied both motions. At the outset, the Court observed that under California law, if reasonable people could differ on whether a worker is an employee or an independent contractor based on the evidence in the case, then a jury must decide the question. Id. at *21. Defendant first argued that because drivers did not perform any services for it, instead performed service for the riders, there was no need to decide how to classify the drivers. The Court noted that Defendant not only connected a driver to a rider, they also marketed to customers as an on-demand service and gave drivers detailed instructions about how to conduct themselves. Id. at *25. The Court, therefore, rejected Defendant's argument the drivers did not perform any service to Defendant. Further, the Court observed that although drivers enjoyed great flexibility in when and how often to work, once they did accept ride requests, Defendant retained a good deal of control over how they proceeded. Id. at *26-27. The Court remarked that it was difficult to rule as a matter of law whether Plaintiffs were independent contractors when the most important factor for discerning the relationship – the right to control – went the other way. Id. at *29. The Court found that the record also suggested the parties believed that they were entering into an independent contractor relationship, as evidenced by the statements in the terms of service, which supported Defendant's position. At the same time, the Court reasoned that Plaintiffs' position was strengthened by the argument that work performed by the drivers was wholly integral to Defendant's business. Id. The Court therefore denied both motions.

Craig, et al. v. FedEx Ground Package System, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 11770 (7th Cir. July 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former delivery drivers, brought a wage & hour class action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors pursuant to the parties' operating agreement ("OA"). The MDL Court granted summary judgment to Defendant. Id. at *1. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit reversed the MDL Court's order. Following an oral argument, the Seventh Circuit certified two questions to the Kansas Supreme Court, including: (i) if drivers were employees as a matter of law under the Kansas Wage Payment Act ("KWPA"); and (ii) if drivers can acquire more than one service area from Defendant, was the answer to the preceding question different for drivers who have more than one service area. Id. at *1-2. The Kansas Supreme Court answered the first question in the affirmative and the second question in the negative. Id. at *2. The Seventh Circuit noted that, although the MDL Court primarily focused on the OA's statements of Defendant's right to control the drivers, the actual control that Defendant exercised over drivers was not the question. Id. at *3. Defendant argued that, because certified questions involved a purely legal analysis and the Kansas Supreme Court drew adverse inferences from the record, the Seventh Circuit should not follow the Kansas Supreme Court's answers to the certified questions. Id. at *5. The Seventh Circuit found that the application of Kansas law to Defendant's relationship with its drivers had been authoritatively decided by the Kansas Supreme Court under the undisputed facts presented and that the FedEx delivery drivers were employees for purposes of the KWPA. Thus, the Seventh Circuit held that the Kansas Supreme Court's decision necessitated the reversal of the MDL Court's order granting summary judgment in favor of FedEx and denying summary judgment in favor of Plaintiffs. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit reversed the MDL Court's denial of Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment and its order granting Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Further, the Seventh Circuit remanded the case to the MDL Court with instructions to enter judgment for Plaintiffs that they were employees of Defendant for purposes of the KWPA.

Dang, et al. v. Inspection Depot, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 141083 (S.D. Fla. Oct. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of inspectors, brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendants misclassified them as independent contractors in violation of the FLSA. Defendants moved for summary judgment, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs contended that they entered into a contract with Defendants to provide wind mitigation inspection services under Defendants' contract with Citizens Property Insurance Corp. ("Citizen"). Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs asserted that after every inspection, they were required to upload the results of their inspection to Citizen using bridge software developed by Defendants, and failure to comply with the inspection standards resulted in charge backs to the inspectors as outlined in Citizen's contract with Defendants and Defendants' contract with each inspector. Id. at *3. Further, Plaintiffs contended that all inspectors were paid "by the job" in the amount of $85.00 per inspection. Id. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs' claims under the FLSA should be dismissed because Plaintiffs were independent contractors. In support of its argument Defendants contended that: (i) Plaintiffs had absolute and total discretion over their work schedules and the amount of work they wished to take on; and (ii) Plaintiffs had ample opportunity to control their own profits and losses by taking on as many inspections as they wished. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiffs contended that they did not have a specified termination date when they would stop performing property inspections for Defendants, and they exclusively performed inspections for Defendants and no other company during their respective tenures. Consequently, Plaintiffs argued that they were economically dependent on Defendants and could not work for other companies because Defendants held their adjusting licenses during their tenure. Id. at *7. Considering the varying disputes of material facts between the parties as to independent contractor status, the Court concluded summary judgment was not appropriate, and denied Defendants' motion.

Gray, et al. v. FedEx Ground Package System,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 14693 (8th Cir. Aug. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of delivery operators, brought a class action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors. Id. at *1-2. Defendant contracted with operators to take packages from its terminals and deliver the packages to homes and businesses. Operators received a proprietary interest in servicing their territories, an interest that they could sell to others subject to Defendant's approval. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs asserted a host of allegations to show that they were employees, including that Defendant required that operators' vehicles meet certain specifications, that the vehicles bear Defendant's logo, operators use the vehicles for personal use only after covering up Defendant's logo, and provide proof of inspection and maintenance. Id. at *4. Defendant also required drivers to wear uniforms and conducted background checks on drivers. Id. The District Court granted partial summary judgment to Plaintiffs and found that they were employees as a matter of Missouri law. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit reversed and found that the issue should have been submitted to the jury. The Eighth Circuit found that some aspect of the contracts could suggest that Plaintiffs were either employees or independent contractors. Id. at *11. While Defendant's ability to supervise its operators by sending managers to ride in the operator's vehicles up to four times a year could be seen as evidence of Defendant's control, the Eighth Circuit noted that a reasonable jury could also find that being subject to supervision only four times a year was an evidence of independence. Id. at *12. Similarly, while there was evidence that Defendant controlled the order and timing of deliveries and demanded compliance with a host of details, there was also evidence that Defendant exercised different levels of control over each Plaintiff and paid them distinctively, suggesting that they were independent contractors. Id. The Eighth Circuit further noted that employment duration – the shortest time period operated by a Plaintiff being a year and nine months – and the fact that Defendant would not have business without Plaintiffs undisputedly supported a finding that Plaintiffs were employees. Id. at *13-16. Thus, given the mixed evidence in the record and facts supporting each party's position, the Eighth Circuit held that the District Court erred in granting summary judgment to Plaintiffs. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit reversed the District Court's grant of summary judgment, and remanded the action for further proceedings.

Hargrove, et al. v. Sleepy's LLC,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 7832 (3d Cir. May 12, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of deliverers, brought an action alleging that Defendants misclassified them as exempt and denied them protections and benefits under the ERISA and the New Jersey Wage Payment Law. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendants denied them overtime wages. Defendant Sleepy's, LLC, a mattress and bedding company, contracted with individuals and delivery companies to provide delivery services to its customers. Each deliverer entered into a contract known as an independent driver agreement ("IDAs"), which stated that the deliverers were independent contractors and not employees of Sleepy's. Id. at *2. The District Court applied the "right to control" test set forth in Nationwide Mutual Insurance Co. v. Darden, 503 U.S. 318 (1992), and held that Plaintiffs were independent contractors. On this basis, it granted Sleepy's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *3. On appeal, the Third Circuit reversed and remanded. The Third Circuit petitioned the New Jersey Supreme Court to accept certification of the issue to determine which employment test applied to claims that arose under the New Jersey law. Id. at *3-4. The New Jersey Supreme Court held that "ABC" test was appropriate to make employment status determinations in New Jersey. Id. at *5. The Third Circuit noted that "ABC" test presumed an individual was an employee unless the employer can make certain showings regarding the individual, including: (i) the individual was and continued to be free from control; (ii) such a service was outside the usual course of business for which the service was provided; and (iii) such an individual was customarily engaged in an independently established trade or business. Id. Because the District Court's rationale for denying Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment was based on Darden, and did not consider the possible application of the "ABC" test, the Third Circuit vacated the order and remanded the case for further proceedings. Id. at *6.

Meyer, et al. v. United States Tennis Association*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 11037 (2d Cir. June 29, 2015). Plaintiffs, a putative class of tennis umpires who worked at the U.S. Open, brought an action against Defendant seeking unpaid overtime under the FLSA and the New York Labor Law. The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of Defendant, finding that Plaintiffs were independent contractors and not employees. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed. The Second Circuit remarked that Plaintiffs, highly skilled workers who exercised a high degree of independent initiative and control in officiating tennis matches; thus, they were free to decide independently each year whether to apply to officiate at the U.S. Open that lasts for only a few weeks each year, and for the number of days they wished to officiate. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs also remained free to serve as umpires for other tennis associations and to maintain other non-umpiring jobs throughout the year. Id. In addition, the Second Circuit found that Plaintiffs did not receive fringe benefits, were not on Defendant's payroll, and claimed their independent contractor status on their income tax returns. Id. at *4. Accordingly, in view of the totality of circumstances, the Second Circuit concluded that the District Court did not err in determining that Plaintiffs were independent contractors, and not employees.

O'Connor, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30684 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 11, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors and thereby deprived them of employee benefits. Defendant moved for summary judgment, and the Court denied the motion. The Court found a number of disputed facts material to the employee/independent contractor determination that precluded summary judgment. Defendant argued that it had no employment relationship with Plaintiffs because it only generated "leads" for its transportation providers through novel software and network systems that connected drivers with passengers. The Court found that Plaintiffs "performed services" for Defendant, and thus they were Defendant's presumptive employees under California law. Id. at *20-21. The Court noted that Defendant's revenues did not depend on the distribution of its software, but on the generation of rides by its drivers, and Defendant exercised significant control over the amount of any revenue it earned. Id. at *23. Further, the record showed that Defendant claimed a proprietary interest in its riders, which demonstrated that it acted as more than a passive intermediary between riders and drivers. Moreover, Defendant exercised substantial control over the qualification and selection of its drivers and prohibited its drivers from answering riders' queries about booking future rides outside its application. Id. at *24-25. Although Defendant contended that it was a pure "technology company," the Court noted that because Defendant collected fees from drivers and was involved in both ensuring drivers were qualified and that they provided quality services, Defendant engaged in the transportation business and that Plaintiffs rendered services to Defendant. Id. at *32. The Court, however, found that the critical fact of right to control appeared to be in dispute. While Defendant contended that it allowed drivers to make themselves available for work whenever they wanted and allowed them to accept or reject rides once they have been selected, Plaintiffs provided evidence from Defendant's handbook that expressly stated that rejecting too many trips might raise a performance issue that could lead to possible termination. Id. at *43-44. The handbook also provided instructions for drives on dress codes, communication with clients, use of a car radio, and availability of an umbrella in their cars. Defendant responded that it merely provided suggestions and had no ability to ensure that any driver actually complied with any such suggestions. The Court determined that the evidence established that Defendant monitored its drivers to ensure compliance and requested riders to give drivers a star rating, and Defendant's contract with drivers provided that it might terminate any drivers whose star rating "falls below the applicable minimum star-rating." Id. at *47. While the fact that Defendant had little control over its drivers' hours of work heavily weighed in favor of a finding of independent contractor status, the Court noted this did not, by itself, preclude a finding of an employment relationship because a reasonable jury could find numerous other factors, including those pertaining to Defendant's level of control over the manner and means of Plaintiffs' performance, that favored a finding of an employment relationship. Id. at *50-53. Given the material dispute, the Court concluded that summary judgment was inappropriate, and denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Schwann, et al. v. FedEx Ground Package System, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13826 (D. Mass. Feb. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former FedEx drivers, brought a class action alleging that FedEx improperly classified them as independent contractors in violation of Massachusetts labor law. In light of the First Circuit's recent decision in Massachusetts Delivery Association v. Coakley, 769 F.3d 11 (1st Cir. 2014) ("MDA"), the District Court withdrew its previous order granting Plaintiffs summary judgment on Count I – for wrongful classification of pick-up and delivery drivers as independent contractors in violation of Massachusetts General Laws Ch. 149, § 148B) – and granted FedEx's motion for summary judgment. Section 148B provides that a worker is properly classified as an independent contractor if the employer can show that: (i) the individual is free from control and direction in connection with the performance of their service, both under his contract for the performance of service and in fact; (ii) the service is performed outside the usual course of the business of the employer; and (iii) the individual is customarily engaged in an independently established trade, occupation, profession, or business of the same nature as that involved in the service performed. Id. at *2-3. In MDA, a case virtually identical to this case in its relevant respects, the First Circuit held that the Federal Aviation Administration Authorization Act ("FAAAA") preempted the second prong of § 148B. Id. at *3. The FAAAA expressly preempts state laws "related to a price, route, or service of any motor carrier . . . with respect to the transportation of property." Id. The First Circuit stated that § 148B did not directly implicate the transportation of property, and thus any indirect impact on FedEx's price, routes, and services was too attenuated to trigger preemption. Id. Regarding transportation of property, the First Circuit held that because "§ 148B governs the classification of the couriers for delivery services, it potentially impacts the services the delivery company provides, the prices charged for the delivery of property, and the routes taken during this delivery. The law clearly concerns a motor carrier's transportation of property." Id. at *3-4. The District Court observed that the application of § 148B to FedEx and other similar motor carriers would unquestionably have an impact on "price, routes, and services" by proscribing the carrier's preferred business model. Id. at *4. Further, the District Court found that the preempted prong was not severable from the statute as a whole. Id. at *5. The District Court observed that § 148B was a conjunctive test, i.e., an employer must meet its burden as to each prong to properly classify a worker as an independent contractor. Id. at *6. Thus, the District Court concluded that the entire statute must be treated as preempted. Id. Moreover, the District Court found that enforcing prongs one and three of § 148B against motor carriers would result in the "price, routes, and services" offered by motor carriers being impacted by forbidding the preferred business model. Id. Since the FAAAA preempts § 148B as applied to motor carriers like FedEx, the Court granted FedEx summary judgment on Count I. Id. at *7.

Thomas, et al. v. TXX Services, Inc., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 134829 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 30, 2015).
Plaintiffs, a group of delivery drivers, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Previously, the Magistrate Judge recommended dismissal of the claims, finding that Plaintiffs were independent contractors and not employees. On Plaintiffs' Rule 72 objections, the Court adopted the findings in its entirety. Plaintiffs claimed that the Magistrate Judge erred because he: (i) resolved factual disputes in Defendants' favor; (ii) failed to make all reasonable inferences in their favor; and (iii) misapplied the summary judgment standard. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs pointed to evidence, which according to them showed that they were employees within the meaning of the FLSA under the five factor test set forth in Brock v. Superior Care, Inc., 840 F.2d 1054 (2d Cir. 1988). Id. Plaintiffs also cited declarations of other drivers to show that Defendants exercised control over them by setting routes and assigning available routes to drivers. Id. The Court remarked that although the economic reality test analysis was a factual question, the ultimate question of whether a worker is an employee or an independent contractor was a legal question under Superior Care. Id. at *6. The Court observed that the Magistrate Judge correctly found that the parties did not dispute the underlying facts, but instead characterized the facts differently according to their respective legal positions, which did not defeat the validity of the summary judgment order. Id. The Court explained that the Magistrate Judge correctly observed that many of Plaintiffs' asserted factual disputes were semantical, such as whether Defendants terminated a driver, or "no longer engaged" his services. The Court also found that although Defendant set the drivers' routes and schedules, this did not raise a factual issue over control because Defendants' clients and the nature of its business dictated those requirements. Id. at *6-7. Accordingly, the Court held that there was no error in the Magistrate Judge's recommendation and adopted it in its entirety.

(xii) Communications With Class Members In FLSA Collective Actions

Agerbrink, et al. v. Model Service LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 145563 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 27, 2015). Plaintiff brought a collective action alleging that Defendant violated her FLSA rights and those of other "fit models" by misclassifying them as independent contractors. Id. at *2. At a pre-trial conference, Plaintiff raised concerns about an e-mail sent by Defendant's Chief Operating Officer ("COO") to putative collection action members, which contained statements that were misleading and coercive to potential opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. at *2-5. Particularly, Plaintiff contended that the e-mail contained misrepresentations about Plaintiff's counsel, the legal test for determining employee status under the FLSA, the lawsuit's potential impact on putative Plaintiffs' tax status and economic interest, and the consequences of speaking with Plaintiff's counsel. Id. at *10-11. Plaintiff requested the Court to order Defendant to disseminate a corrective notice. The Court determined that a corrective notice was required and placed limited restrictions on future communications to address any harm caused by the e-mail. The Court noted that while communications with putative Plaintiffs prior to class certification was not prohibited, a judicial intervention was warranted when the communications threatened the fairness of the process, adequacy of representation, and the administration of justice. Id. at *6. The Court observed that potential opt-in Plaintiffs might be inclined to defer to Defendant because of the nature of their relationship. Models were not only economically dependent on Defendant, but also looked to it for guidance. The Court found that the fact that models relied on Defendant for advice made it less likely that they would question the information they received and more likely that they would be misled by misrepresentations or omissions in the e-mail. Id. at *13-14. The Court found the e-mail's discussion of tax status misleading in its one-sided presentation of the tax benefits and responsibilities of independent contractors and employees. Id. at *21-22. The e-mail suggested that independent contractors paid fewer taxes because they might deduct "substantial legitimate business expenses" and have "no income withholding for taxes," whereas employees "are limited in what employment business expenses they can deduct" and "have federal, state and city taxes and social security withheld from their pay." Id. at *22. The e-mail, however, did not mention that independent contractors were still liable for income tax, but pay taxes directly rather than having them withheld from earnings. Id. Because the e-mail cataloged specific differences between tax liabilities of employees and independent contractors, the Court reasoned that the putative class members would have no reason to question its accuracy. The Court therefore held that given the parties' relationship, this aspect of the e-mail was both coercive and misleading. Id. at *23. The Court also found that the e-mail's failure to explicitly acknowledge Defendant's specific adverse interests had the potential to mislead by omission. Id. at *28. The Court concluded that the e-mail had the potential to mislead, and determined that its task was to tailor the narrowest possible relief that would protect the respective parties. Id. at *30. Accordingly, the Court ordered a corrective notice and a limited restriction on Defendant's future communications, but declined to enjoin the COO or Defendant from discussing the litigation with the putative collective action members.

Jackson, et al. v. Bloomberg, L.P.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23338 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 25, 2015). Plaintiff, a global customer support representative ("GCSR"), brought an action against Defendant, a multi-national mass media corporation, alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law. After class certification, Defendant sought an order permitting it to contact 10 out of approximately 482 class members, notwithstanding the existence of New York's ethical rule Rule 4.2(a) barring contact with represented parties. The Court granted Defendant's request. Defendant made that application because those 10 individuals, who were direct supervisors of GCSRs during the class period, were also class members themselves based on their earlier jobs as GCSRs. Id. at *3. Defendant contended that it wished to discuss with those direct supervisors their roles as managers and supervisors, and stated that it would not talk to them about anything that occurred while they were GCSRs. Id. First, Plaintiff asserted that there was harm in allowing employers to speak with employees engaged in suing it, particularly when those employees were still employed by the employer. Id. at *7. The Court observed that although the potential for harm existed, there were situations where employers regularly speak with employees engaged in suing it on topics other than the representation. Further, the Court noted that Rule 4.2(a) does not bar all contact with a represented party, but only contact on the subject of the representation. Id. Second, Plaintiff argued that a class member who had contact with Defendant about his or her activities as a GCSR would be coerced into opting- out as a class member. The Court, however, found the potential for coercion minimal because there were only a small number of class members whom Defendant sought to contact, and as Plaintiff's attorney would have every opportunity to counsel those individuals prior to the contact. Id. at *7-8. Third, while Plaintiff characterized the knowledge of those individuals as being of minimal relevance, the Court accepted Defendant's contention that it only needed to speak with those individuals to determine the information they had about the individuals they managed and supervised, to investigate specific allegations about certain team leaders and managers that Plaintiff made, and to satisfy its discovery obligations to produce responsive documents and to prepare a Rule 30(b)(6) witness for deposition. Id. at *9. The Court rejected Plaintiff's argument that Defendant's interests could be satisfied by gathering all the information it required from a class member in a deposition with Plaintiff's counsel present. Id. at *11. Finally, although Plaintiff asserted that approval of Defendant's proposed contact would be unprecedented, the Court observed that its denial would be equally unprecedented. Id. Thus, the Court concluded that Defendant had good reason and had a genuine need to consult with current employees to prepare its defense to the lawsuit because of the 12 current team leads, 10 were class members, and one of those 10 also served as a regional manager and another as a trainer. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court permitted Defendant to contact seven of the tem class members who spent more than a year as team leaders. Id. at *14. The Court, however, placed restrictions on this contact to minimize the potential that the contacts could be perceived as coercive to the individual or harmful to the class as a whole. Id.

Jackson, et al. v. Bloomberg, L.P.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52581 (S.D.N.Y. April 22, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to compensate its global customer support ("GCS") representatives for overtime work in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). After the Court conditionally certified a FLSA collective action and an NYLL class action, Defendant sought an order that would permit contact with 10 members of the certified class outside the presence of Plaintiffs' counsel. Id. at *2. The Magistrate Judge permitted Defendant such contact under certain conditions with seven of the class member employees. Id. Plaintiffs objected to the contact order via a Rule 72 objection, which the Court sustained. First, the Court stated that Rule 4.2 of the New York Rules of Professional Conduct bars lawyers from communicating directly with an opposing party represented by counsel regarding the "subject of the representation," unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the other lawyer or "is authorized to do so by law." Id. at *3-4. The Court noted that Defendant sought to speak with 10 individuals who were direct supervisors of GCS representatives during the class period in a job title called "team leader," who were also class members themselves based on their earlier jobs as GCS representatives. Id. at *5. Further, some of these individuals also held other positions that involved either indirect management or other interaction with GCS representatives. Id. at *6-7. The Court concluded that the contact sought by Defendant would concern the "subject of the representation" because the only reason that Defendant wished to speak with the class member employees at issue was because they possessed information relevant to the action. Id. at *7. The Court remarked that Defendant apparently planned to elicit information by asking those class members about their experience of supervising GCS representatives. The Court found that those questions would nonetheless concern the subject of the employees' representation because the central issues in this case focused on the employment and supervision of GCS representatives. Accordingly, the Court held that Rule 4.2 applied. Id. at *7-8. Next, the Court observed that the only remaining question was whether the contact was "authorized by law," and that there was some uncertainty surrounding the issue of what kinds of contact were included. Id. at *8. The Court found that the Magistrate Judge's order balanced the need asserted by Defendant against the possible harm outlined by Plaintiffs, and ultimately authorized Defendant to contact seven members of a 482-member class under restrictions designed to limit the potential for such harm. Id. at *13. The Court remarked that the ethical rules did not permit the type of contact at issue in this case because Defendant's assertion of a genuine need to speak with class members to prepare its defense was simply inadequate to permit an exception from Rule 4.2. Id. at *13-14. The Court pointed out that only in "exceptional circumstances" may parties engage in contact with represented persons that would otherwise violate that Rule. Id. at *14. The Court found that the situation in this case – where a party sought to speak with class members to aid in the preparation of its defense – did not constitute "exceptional circumstances." Id. In addition, the Court expressed a concern that the requested contact with class members who were currently employed by Defendant could be coercive. Id. at *14-15. The Court concluded that the exception to the no-contact rule for communications authorized by a Court's order could not be extended to encompass Defendant's request, and if Defendant wished to elicit information from class members it must do so through depositions or other discovery. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court sustained Plaintiffs' objections.

Mark, et al. v. Gawker Media LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66013 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an FLSA action alleging that Defendants improperly designated them as interns and refused to pay them wages. After conditionally certifying the FLSA action, the Court permitted Plaintiffs to propose forms of notice that would be disseminated to potential opt-in Plaintiffs by social media ("November 2014 order"). Id. at *1. Plaintiffs requested that the Court adopt their plan for social media notice, which the Court denied in all respects. The Court found that the proposals were substantially overbroad for the purposes of providing notice to potential opt-in Plaintiffs, and much of Plaintiffs' plan appeared calculated to punish Defendants rather than provide notice of opt-in rights. Id. at *3. The Court determined that Plaintiffs' proposal to post notices on websites such as Reddit and Tumblr, and on pages such as "r/OccupyWallStreet" and "r/Progressive," lacked any realistic notion of specifically targeting the notice to individuals with opt-in rights. Id. The Court remarked that the purpose of FLSA notice is to inform those eligible to opt-in to the collective action, and not to advertise a Defendant's alleged violations. Id. The Court also found that Plaintiffs' proposed use of Twitter, LinkedIn, and Facebook was also overbroad. Id. The Court noted that it had approved use of social media notice on the understanding that such notice would effectively mirror the more traditional forms of notice being used in the case, and that it would contain private, personalized notifications sent to identified potential Plaintiffs who might not be reachable by other means. Id. The Court further observed that Plaintiffs' plan attempted to re-raise issues that could or should have been raised earlier. As the Court had indicated in its November 2014 order, its invitation of a social media notice proposal was not to be construed as an opportunity to re-litigate issues already decided or that had never been raised before. Id. at *4. Accordingly, the Court denied without prejudice Plaintiffs' request to provide notice pursuant to their plan.

O'Connor, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171570 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 23, 2015). In a consolidated class actions brought by drivers of ridesharing service Uber, Plaintiffs filed a motion seeking to enjoin Defendant's new December 2015 arbitration agreement promulgated by Uber in light of the Court's prior certification of certain sub-classes following a ruling that earlier arbitration agreements were unenforceable. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs claimed that the agreement, in effect, was an unauthorized communication to class members designed to undermine or discourage lawsuit participation. The Court granted the motion in part and denied it in part. Id. at *8, 13. As to the already certified sub-classes in O'Connor, the Court held that the December 2015 arbitration agreement was unenforceable as to claims through the date of class certification and it ordered Uber to not have any further communications with the class that would likely affect the case or engender confusion (except with permission of class counsel or the Court). Id. at *10. As to the other consolidated cases, the Court refused to bar all future arbitration agreements as Plaintiffs requested, but instead ordered Uber to revise the notice provision in the December 2015 agreement to reflect the litigation and the progress that had already been made. Id. at *15. The Court also ordered Uber not to enforce the December 2015 arbitration provision until it provided the drivers who received it a new cover letter describing it and a new opportunity to opt-out of the agreement. The Court placed very tight specifications on the cover letter, providing that it could not be in a link or attachment, was limited to approximately 1 page, had to inform recipients of the new arbitration clause and new 30-day opt-out period, and had to have an easily accessible opt-out function. Id. at *17. The Court reasoned that given the complexity of the case, the arbitration provision had been misleading and threatened to interfere with the rights of the certified class and of the putative class members, thus justifying its use of discretion to control class communications. Id.

(xiii) Venue Issues In FLSA Collective Actions

Flood, et al. v. Carlson Restaurants, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40170 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 27, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant employees, brought an action alleging that Defendants violated the FLSA by paying tipped workers less than minimum wage, despite requiring them to spend more than 20% of their shifts performing "side work" not directed toward producing tips. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs worked and resided in New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Virginia, and Florida. Defendants' principal executive offices were located in Texas. Defendants moved to transfer venue to the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Texas, which the Court denied. To determine whether a transfer is warranted, the Court noted that it must consider six factors laid out in In Re Collins & Aikman Corp. Securities Litigation, 438 F. Supp. 2d 392 (S.D.N.Y. 2006). The Court noted that the first factor – Plaintiffs' choice of forum – weighed against transfer. The Court explained that a majority of the named Plaintiffs lived in the New York metropolitan area, making the Southern District of New York a convenient forum. Id. at *8. The Court noted that second factor – convenience of witnesses – is accorded more weight than the other factors. The Court observed that on one hand, testimony concerning Defendants' corporate policies and practices were germane to resolving Plaintiffs' claims, and supported transfer. Id. at *9. On the other hand, the Court found that Defendants offered evidence showing that witnesses familiar with these policies and practices would be particularly inconvenienced if this action remained in the Southern District of New York. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the second factor also weighed against transfer. Similarly, the Court found that the third and fourth factors – location of relevant documents and ease of access to sources of proof, and convenience of the parties – also weighed against transfer. Id. at *11-12. Defendants argued that the fifth factor – locus of operative facts – supported transfer. The Court observed that to determine where the locus of operative factor lies, it must look to the site of events from which the claim arose. The Court, however, remarked that in a nationwide FLSA collective action, it is often difficult to fix a single locus of operative facts, because each employee's claim typically arises not only from the objectionable policy's development, but also from its on-site implementation. Id. at *14. Moreover, the Court observed that named Plaintiffs asserted that their claims arose from their employment at Defendants' restaurants in New York, which were in Southern and the Eastern District of New York. Id. at *14-15. Accordingly, the Court ruled that this factor too weighed against transfer. The Court also found that the sixth factor – availability of process –counseled against transfer. For these reasons, the Court denied Defendants' motion to transfer the collective action to the Northern District of Texas.

(xiv) Pay Policies And Bonuses In FLSA Collective Actions

Babcock, et al. v. Butler County*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 20393 (3d Cir. Nov. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of corrections officers, brought an FLSA collective action seeking overtime wages for a portion of their meal breaks. A collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") provided that the officers work eight and one-quarter hour shifts that included a one hour meal period, of which only 45 minutes were paid. During the meal period, the officers could not leave the prison without permission, and they had to remain in uniform in close proximity to emergency response equipment, and they were on-call to respond to emergencies. Id. at *3. Defendant moved to dismiss, arguing that the meal periods were not compensable work because they received the predominant benefit of the meal period. The District Court granted the motion. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Third Circuit affirmed. The Third Circuit observed that the essential consideration in determining whether a meal period is a bona fide meal period or a compensable rest period is whether the employees are in fact relieved from work for the purpose of eating a regularly scheduled meal. Id. at *6-7. Although Plaintiffs faced a number of restrictions during their meal period, the Third Circuit agreed with the District Court that these restrictions did not predominantly benefit the employer. Corrections officers were able to request authorization to leave the prison for their meal period and could eat lunch away from their desks. Further, although the CBA was silent on the compensability of the 15-minute period, it provided corrections officers with the benefit of a partially-compensated meal time and mandatory overtime pay if their meal period was interrupted by work. Id. at *8. The Third Circuit noted that the FLSA does not require more. Id. The CBA also assumed that generally an officer is not working during a meal period, but provided for appropriate compensation when an officer worked during the meal. Id. Accordingly, the Third Circuit found that the officers were not primarily engaged in work-related duties during the daily, agreed-upon 15 minutes of the uninterrupted meal period, and that they received the predominant benefit of the time in question. Accordingly, the Third Circuit held that Plaintiffs were not entitled to compensation under the FLSA.

Jones-Turner, et al. v. Yellow Enterprise Systems, LLC,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 326 (6th Cir. Jan. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of emergency medical technicians ("EMTs"), brought an action alleging failure to compensate them for lunch breaks, and failure to guarantee that they received rest and lunch breaks in violation of the FLSA and Kentucky state law. Plaintiffs contended that Defendants automatically designated a 30-minute break slot during each 8.5-hour shift as an unpaid lunch break. Id. at *2. If an employee was unable to take a lunch break due to call volume, the employee was required to submit a missed lunch slip to the administrative director, who would then determine whether there was indeed a 30-minute period between calls at any point during the employee's shift. Id. at *2-3. If there was such a period, it would be considered the employee's unpaid lunch break, and if there was no such period, the employee would be paid for the missed lunch. Id. at *3. The District Court conditionally certified a collective action, but later decertified the collective action and also denied class certification of the state law claims under Rule 23. The District Court then granted summary judgment to Defendant on all of Plaintiffs' claims. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed. The Sixth Circuit noted that it would apply "predominant benefit" test from Hill v. United States, 751 F.2d 810 (6th Cir. 1984), where it held that a meal period is not compensable as long as the employee can pursue his or her meal time adequately and comfortably; is not engaged in the performance of any substantial duties, and does not spend time predominantly for the employer's benefit. Id. at *8. Here, although employees were required to radio the dispatcher to request a lunch break and EMTs had to eat within one mile of an assigned stand-by location, there was no policy that employees remain in the truck for lunch. The Sixth Circuit noted that Plaintiffs failed to produce evidence that they were ever told they had to eat in the truck, and cited no evidence that while on a lunch break they were required to perform duties beyond responding to a call, or that once approved for a lunch break they were frequently interrupted by radio contact. Thus, the Sixth Circuit reasoned that Defendant's policies did not indicate that the Plaintiffs were engaged in substantial duties during their lunch break, and that the meal breaks were not compensable under the FLSA. Additionally, the Sixth Circuit noted that there was no evidence that Defendant had any actual knowledge that its employees were not receiving their meal breaks and not being compensated for that time. Id. at *12. The Sixth Circuit, therefore, ruled that without a viable claim, Plaintiffs could not represent others whom they allege to be similarly-situated. Id. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's grant of summary judgment, and the denial of class certification.

Perrin, et al. v. Papa Johns International, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88383 (E.D. Mo. July 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of delivery drivers, brought an action under the FLSA and the minimum wage laws of five states alleging that Defendant failed to pay them the minimum wages. Defendant required Plaintiffs to maintain safe, legally operable, and insured vehicles for making deliveries, and reimbursed a flat rate for vehicle expenses to compensate Plaintiffs for costs associated with the use of their personal vehicles for deliveries. Id. at *5. Defendant's reimbursement rate for vehicle expenses included amount for both "fixed costs" and "operating costs." Id. at *7. While the fixed costs included items such as automotive insurance, registration, state taxes, and depreciation, the operating costs included fuel costs and vehicle maintenance. Id. Defendant based reimbursement on a formula that approximated drivers' costs rather than on the actual expenses. Id. Plaintiffs moved for partial summary judgment, claiming that Defendant's vehicle expenses reimbursement was an unreasonable approximation that reduced their wages below the minimum wage. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs also moved for summary judgment regarding Defendant's use of tip credit to calculate Plaintiffs' wages for purposed of determining minimum wage compliance. Id. at *23. Defendant paid Plaintiffs $4.25 per hour – more than the minimum cash wage for tipped employees – for their on-the-road work. Defendant asserted that they were entitled to pay a higher cash wage and take the maximum tip credit of $5.12 in order to off-set any deductions for unreimbursed or under-reimbursed expenses. Id. at *24. Defendant thus argued that, given the maximum tip credit, Plaintiffs would have no minimum wage claims because the tip credit would exceed any alleged under-reimbursement of Plaintiffs' vehicle expenses. Id. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant could only claim a tip credit equal to the difference between their cash wage of $4.25 and the minimum wage of $7.25 and thus had no off-set against the alleged minimum wage violations, and even otherwise, Defendant failed to notify Plaintiffs in advance of the amount of the cash wage paid to tipped employees and the amount of tip credit taken by Defendant, as required by the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") and the FLSA. Id. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion on the issue of Plaintiffs' vehicle expenses and granted it on the issue of the tip credit. The Court found material disputes of fact on the issue of whether Defendant's reimbursement rate was a reasonable approximation of Plaintiffs' vehicle expenses. Id. at *34. Although the FLSA and accompanying regulations do not specify what constitutes a reasonable approximation, Plaintiffs argued that, the DOL Handbook provides that, if employers do not track and reimburse actual vehicle expenses, they must reimburse employees at the IRS standard business mileage rate. Id. The Court remarked that none of the pertinent case law suggested the the IRS rate "is the only" reasonable approximation of such expenses or that Defendant's failure to use the IRS in approximating expenses "is per se unreasonable." Id. at *36. The Court, therefore, denied Plaintiffs' motion on the issue of reasonable approximation of vehicle expenses. The Court, however, granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment on the issue of tip credit, finding that Defendant failed to notify Plaintiffs in advance about the tip credit. Id. at *51. Because Defendant could not take the maximum tip credit without notifying Plaintiffs in advance, and because nothing in the DOL guidance documents, regulations, or the FLSA permit Defendant to claim a higher tip credit retroactively, in order to gain the benefit of an off-set, without having notified Plaintiffs of the higher tip credit, the Court precluded Defendant from relying, post hoc, on a tip credit greater than the difference between Plaintiffs' cash wage and the applicable minimum wage. Id. at *57-58. The Court also denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment regarding the exclusion of fixed costs from the calculation of minimum wage liability on the basis of the substantial overlap between the parties' arguments over fixed costs and the reasonableness of Defendant's overall reimbursement methodology. Id. at *59.

Ridgeway, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 69982 (N.D. Cal. May 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, brought a class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them minimum wage for completing pre-trip and post-trip inspections, rest breaks, time spent completing paperwork, time spent fueling their tractors, time spent washing their tractors and trailers, time spent at weigh scales, wait time and/or unscheduled time, and lay-over time in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs moved for partial summary judgment, which the Court granted. First, Defendant argued that its pay plan compensated drivers for inspections, washing and cleaning, wait time, and fueling because they were subsumed into other activities for which they earned activity pay. The Court noted that Defendant's argument was analogous to the argument brought by the employer in Quezada v. Con-Way Freight, Inc., 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 98639 (N.D. Cal. July 11, 2012). Id. at *18-19. In Quezada, the employer calculated a driver's compensation by multiplying a pre-set mileage rate by the number of miles in a trip, and drivers also received a separate hourly rate for work performed at the company facilities, like loading and unloading. Id. at *19. Further, in Quezada, employees had not received at their hourly rate for the non-driving activities, and the employer argued the time spent on these activities was built into the per-mile rate. Id. In this case, the driver manuals explained that Defendant paid drivers by a mileage rate and for activity pay, unscheduled time, and scheduled time, and specified that activity pay was for duties like arrive, hook, lay-over, live load pay, and chain pay. Id. The manuals also specified activities for which drivers were not entitled to pay, and Defendant argued that the time drivers spent on these activities were subsumed into activity pay. The Court noted that Quezada held that California law requires that an employer compensate employees directly for all time worked, and therefore did not allow an employer to "build in" time spent on non-driving tasks into a piece-rate compensation system. Id. at *19-20. Further, the Court observed that California minimum wage standards apply to each hour worked by an employee, and thus an employer may not refuse to pay for time spent on tasks like completing paperwork. Id. Although Defendant contended that its pay method should not be characterized as a piece-rate compensation plan, the Court opined that the differences in pay structure were non-dispositive of whether Defendant must pay Plaintiffs for all hours worked. The Court indicated that a piece-rate formula that does not compensate directly for all time worked does not comply with the California Labor Code, even if, averaged out, it would pay at least minimum wage for all hours worked. Id. at *20. Thus, the Court found that activities that were not separately compensated and were explicitly listed and recognized as unpaid activities may not be built in or subsumed into the activity pay component of Defendant's pay policies. Id. Plaintiffs also argued that Defendant must pay them for all of the time it subjected them to control, and that Defendant subjected them to control during lay-over periods. The Court observed that an employee who is subject to an employer's control does not have to be working during that time to be compensated. Id. at *22-23. Further, the Court noted the reasoning in Bono Enterprises v. Bradshaw, 32 Cal. App. 4th 968 (1995), that when an employer requires employees to meet at designated places to take its buses to work and prohibits them from taking their own transportation, the employees are subject to the control of an employer and the time spent traveling on the buses is compensable as hours worked. Id. at *23-24. In this case, while drivers could leave their trucks to eat a meal, shop, or exercise, the physical location of the lay-over was specified and controlled by Defendant. Drivers had not received pay for lay-overs taken at their residences without prior approval from management, and the 2008 manual stated that the intent of the policy was for drivers to take the lay-over inside the tractor cab. Thus, because the driver pay manuals subjected drivers to Defendant's control during lay-over periods, the Court ruled that Defendant must pay Plaintiffs for all of the time Defendant subjected them to control. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion.

Ruffin, et al. v. MotorCity Casino*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 236 (6th Cir. Jan. 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of security guards, brought an action alleging that their meal periods constituted working time and were thereby compensable because they spent that time predominantly for Defendant's benefit. Guards were entitled to a paid 30 minute meal period, but they could not leave casino property, have food delivered to the casino, or receive visitors, and had to monitor their radios during meal periods. Id. at *3-4. Although the guards rarely dealt with emergencies during meal breaks, monitoring the radio exposed them to constant, work-related chatter on the radio. Id. at *4. The District Court held that monitoring the radio was a de minimis activity, not a substantial job duty, and thus not compensable. As a result, the District Court granted summary judgment in favor of Defendant. Id. at *5. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed. The Sixth Circuit noted that if an employee can pursue his or her meal time adequately and comfortably, is not engaged in the performance of any substantial duties, and does not spend time predominantly for the employer's benefit, the employee is relieved of duty and is not entitled to compensation under the FLSA. Id. at *7. The Sixth Circuit observed that monitoring a radio is generally a peripheral activity that an employee can perform while spending her meal breaks however he or she likes. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs spent their meal periods adequately and comfortably by eating, reading, socializing, and conducting personal business on their phones despite needing to monitor their radios. Plaintiffs also stipulated they were free to smoke, watch television, use casino-provided computers, and play cards during meal periods, and Plaintiffs introduced no evidence that monitoring the radio interfered with, or prevented them from enjoying, these activities. The Sixth Circuit thus found that the absence of any evidence that Plaintiffs performed a substantial job duty during their meal breaks supported the District Court's holding that those breaks were predominantly for the guards' own benefit. Id. at *10. Further, the Sixth Circuit considered whether the employer's business regularly interrupts the employee's meal period, and noted that the frequency of such interruptions is important because the question is not whether the employees' meals were interrupted, but whether the degree of interruption caused them to spend their meal periods primarily for the employer's benefit. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs stipulated that such interruptions occurred only occasionally, and while one named Plaintiff could not identify a single instance when an emergency interrupted her meal period, another recalled missing only one meal period in more than 10 years of employment. Thus, because Plaintiffs enjoyed their meals without regular interruptions, the Sixth Circuit remarked that the meal periods predominantly benefitted the guards. Id. at *12. Finally, the Sixth Circuit considered the employee's inability to leave the employer's property during meal breaks, and noted a regulation of the U.S. Department of Labor, which states that "it is not necessary that an employee be permitted to leave the premises if he is otherwise completely freed from duties during the meal period." Id. The Sixth Circuit indicated that the relevant inquiry therefore should be whether the employer requires an employee to take meals on the premises as an indirect or round-about way of extracting unpaid work from the employee. Id. at *14. Here, although security guards were required to take their meals on casino property, Plaintiffs did not show that the meal periods predominantly benefitted the casino because Plaintiffs spent their meal periods doing exactly what one might expect an off-duty employee to be doing on a meal break such as eating, socializing, and reading. Thus, because Plaintiffs performed no substantial job duties during meal breaks, emergency calls rarely interrupted the meals, and the guards pursued their meal time adequately and comfortably, the Sixth Circuit ruled that Plaintiffs' meal periods did not predominantly benefit Defendants and were therefore not compensable.

(xv) Arbitration Of Wage & Hour Class Claims

Capital Pizza Huts, Inc. v. Linkovich, et al.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 158854 (W.D. Mo. Nov. 24, 2015). In this action, Petitioner, an employer, challenged an Arbitrator's clause construction award and order granting a motion for conditional collective action certification brought by a group of workers. The workers filed a claim with the American Arbitration Association ("AAA") challenging their employer's policy of reimbursing drivers on a flat rate per-delivery basis, without taking into account the average distance for a delivery. Id. at *3. The workers moved for conditional certification. The employer objected and argued that the arbitration agreement did not authorize class arbitration. Id. Relying on the Supreme Court's precedents interpreting the construction of the contracts, the Arbitrator found that though the arbitration agreement did not explicitly permit or prohibit collective actions in arbitration, it extended to all claims relating to compensation. Id. at *4. Accordingly, the Arbitrator found that a collective arbitration was permissible, and also granted the motion for conditional certification. Id. at *5. The employer moved to vacate the Arbitrator's award, which the Court denied. First, Petitioner argued that the Arbitrator exceeded his authority by nullifying the agreement between the parties by interpreting the arbitration agreement in an improper manner. Id. at *8. The Court observed that this case was similar to Oxford Health Plans LLC v. Sutter, 133 S. Ct. 2064 (2013), where the employer argued that the arbitral panel exceeded its power under 9 U.S.C. § 10(a)(4) by imposing class arbitration without a sufficient contractual basis. Id. at *9. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that the arbitrator construed the contract, and did find an agreement to permit class arbitration. Id. Similarly, in this case, the Court found that the Arbitrator did not exceed his power under § 10(a)(4). Second, Petitioner argued that the Arbitrator manifestly disregarded the law by concluding that the arbitration agreement permitted collective action arbitration. Id. Petitioner argued that the Arbitrator's holding was in conflict with the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") and Stolt-Nielsen S.A. v. AnimalFeeds International Corp., 559 U.S. 662 (2010), and his interpretation was contrary to previous interpretations of the same contract In The Matter Of The Arbitration Between Curtis Hanna And Pizza Hut, Inc. (AAA July 23, 2013). Id. The Court rejected this argument, relying on the Supreme Court's distinction of Stolt-Neiltsen in Sutter, finding that Petitioner misread Stolt-Nielsen, where the arbitral decision lacked any contractual basis for ordering class procedures, and not because it lacked a sufficient one. Id. at *13. Finally, Petitioner argued that the Arbitrator exceeded his authority and violated the employer's due process rights in certifying a collective action that could only be tried by formula. Id. at *16. The Court found that the Arbitrator interpreted the parties' contract and found that differences among potential opt-ins did not prohibit conditional or first stage collective action certification. Id. at *17. The Court also determined that the Arbitrator noted that further arguments regarding trial by formula could be addressed at the second stage of collective action certification through a motion to decertify. Id. Consequently, the Court held that even assuming that the Arbitrator's conclusions were erroneous, vacatur was not warranted because he acted within his delegated authority. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Petitioner's motion to vacate.

Cohen, et al. v. UBS Financial Services*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 11184 (2d Cir. June 30, 2015). Plaintiff, a financial advisor, brought a collective action and class action against Defendants asserting wage & hour claims under the FLSA and California state laws, including the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). Plaintiff was employed by Defendant UBS Financial Services, Inc. ("UBS"), and consented by contract to arbitrate claims concerning compensation, benefits, or other terms or conditions of employment, before the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority ("FINRA"). Id. at *2. UBS moved to stay and compel arbitration. Without disputing the arbitration agreement, Plaintiff argued that its enforcement was barred by Rule 13204 of the FINRA Code of Arbitration Procedure for Industry Disputes ("Industry Code"). Id. The District Court granted Defendant's motion. On Plaintiff's appeal, and the Second Circuit affirmed. At the outset, the Second Circuit noted that Rule 13204 stated nothing about class or collective action waivers, but barred arbitration of a claim so long as it was embedded in a class or collective action. Id. at *8-9. The Second Circuit, however, noted that Rule 13204 does not preserve the right to assert a claim in a class or collective form notwithstanding a contractual waiver. Id. at *9. Plaintiff relied entirely on sub-sections (a)(4) and (b)(4) of Rule 13204 for his claims, which bar the enforcement of arbitration agreements under certain circumstances. Id. at *11. The Second Circuit observed that neither sub-section had anything to do with the enforceability of the waivers. Id. at *11-12. The Second Circuit remarked that although such waivers are often found in arbitration agreements, the two contract terms were conceptually distinct. Id. at *12. The Second Circuit explained that a class or collective action waiver is a promise to forgo certain procedural mechanisms in court, and whereas, an agreement to arbitrate is a promise to have a dispute heard in some forum other than a court. Id. The Second Circuit concluded that Rule 13204 restricts the latter, and not the former, and quoted the FINRA Board of Governors' observation that there was no restriction on firms regarding the content of pre-dispute arbitration agreements with employees. Id. Plaintiff also relied on a 2012 FINRA guidance letter, which stated that any language in a member firm's employment agreement that required employees to waive their right to file or participate in a collective action against a member firm was contrary to the provisions of the Industry Code. Id. at *13. The Second Circuit, however, remarked that because the Board of Governors expressed the contrary view, the 2012 guidance letter had no deference anymore. Id. Accordingly, the Second Circuit concluded that Rule 13204 did not prohibit the enforcement of pre-dispute waivers of class and collective action procedures.

Conners, et al. v. Gusano's Chicago Style Pizzeria,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 3632 (8th Cir. Mar. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former restaurant servers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant maintained an illegal tip pool in violation of the FLSA. A month later, Defendant required all its current employees to execute a new arbitration agreement that required individual arbitration of all employment disputes. Id. at *3. The arbitration agreement contained an explanation of its scope, the required procedures for invoking arbitration, the effect the agreement would have on the employee's ability to pursue relief in court, the right of every employee to opt-out of the agreement free of retaliation, and how to opt-out effectively. Id. at *3-4. Along with the new agreement, Defendant also issued a two-page memorandum describing the agreement's terms and expressly explaining to employees that their failure to opt-out of the new policy would prevent them from joining this action. Id. at *4. Soon thereafter, Plaintiffs, who were not subject to the new agreement, filed an emergency motion to prohibit improper communications with putative class members and sought to preclude Defendant from enforcing the agreement against the collective action employees. Id. at *4-5. The District Court granted the motion and enjoined Defendant from enforcing the arbitration agreement against any employees who choose to join this action. Id. at *6. Upon Defendant's appeal, the Eighth Circuit vacated the District Court's order, finding that Plaintiffs lacked standing to challenge the arbitration agreement. Although Plaintiffs argued that they had standing to challenge the agreement because they suffered "a concrete and particularized injury" in the form of an increased share of litigation expenses, the Eighth Circuit held that, even assuming this to be true, Plaintiffs could not show an "actual or imminent" threat because, at the time of the challenge to the agreement, no current employees had opted-in to the action, and there was no indication that the arbitration agreement had chilled the participation of any current employees. Id. at *10-13. The Eighth Circuit therefore concluded that Plaintiffs lacked standing to challenge the current employees' arbitration agreement. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit vacated the District Court's injunction order and remanded the case for further proceedings.

Coronado, et al. v. D.N.W. Houston, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 134299 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of adult exotic dancers, brought a collective action against Defendants, a group of dance clubs and their owners and managers, alleging that Defendants misclassified them as independent contractors and failed to pay required wages for the hours they worked pursuant to the FLSA. Id. at *6. Defendants moved to dismiss the FLSA claims and compel arbitration pursuant to an arbitration agreement signed by 34 Plaintiffs. Id. at *12. The Court denied Defendants' motion as to the 33 Plaintiffs who signed the agreement after the filing of this action, and granted it as to one Plaintiff who signed a different and new enforceable arbitration agreement. Plaintiff argued that the arbitration clauses in both the agreements were substantively unconscionable because they had a 45-day delay period to mediate before arbitration could be initiated, thereby limiting the FLSA's statute of limitations, and they allowed Defendants to recover fees from dancers no matter which party prevailed in arbitration. Id. at *25. While the Court found that the mediation requirements and procedure were not unconscionable and was not a basis to avoid arbitration, it found that, because the agreements contained provisions allowing Defendants to recoup attorneys' fees from Plaintiffs even if they prevailed on their FLSA claims, the arbitration clauses would be unenforceable unless those provisions were severable. Id. at *31. The Court also determined that, unlike the new agreement signed by a single Plaintiff, the other agreements signed by 33 Plaintiffs did not include a severability clause, and attempting to severe the unconscionable provision would require rewriting the contract based on guessing at the parties' intent. Id. at *32-33. The Court therefore held that the arbitration agreements signed by 33 Plaintiffs were unenforceable. The new agreement signed by one Plaintiff included a provision that the dancer would have to pay back all tips she earned if she were found to be an employee, or else those tips would be used to off-set her wages. Id. at *35. Although the Court reasoned that provision unconscionable because it waived the right under the FLSA to be paid a minimum wage, it held that the arbitration clause was enforceable because the tip-return provision was severable, and the severability clause showed the parties' intent to keep the new agreement intact when a clause contained one part that was not integral and unenforceable. Id. at *35-36. Accordingly, the Court required one Plaintiff who signed the new agreement to arbitrate her claim, and denied Defendants' motion to compel arbitration as to the remaining 33 Plaintiffs.

Espinoza, et al. v. Galardi South Enterprises, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173408 (S.D. Fla. Dec. 31, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of adult entertainers, brought an action against Defendants, the strip clubs where they worked, alleging minimum wage and overtime violations under the FLSA and Florida law. One Defendant moved to compel arbitration against Plaintiffs. The Court denied Defendant's motions to compel arbitration. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs did not dispute that they and the opt-in Plaintiffs signed the arbitration agreements at issue; rather, they argued that the Court should not enforce the agreements in accordance with its responsibility relative to FLSA collective actions. Id. The Court had previously granted conditional certification of a FLSA collective action against Defendants, to which more than 20 claimants opted-in. Id. at *3-4. The Court noted that under its broad and considerable discretion, it had the power to refuse to enforce arbitration agreements foisted on potential opt-in Plaintiffs where the agreements were confusing, misleading, coercive, and clearly designed and implemented to unfairly thwart their ability to opt-in to the litigation. Id. at *9. While the Court noted that the agreements were not unconscionable, it found that Defendant's post-April 8, 2014 presentation of arbitration agreements to its entertainers was motivated, at least in part, by the filing of Plaintiffs' action, and was intended, at least in part, to dissuade the entertainers from participating in the action. Id. at *18. Thus, the Court held it would exercise its managerial powers to prevent confusion and unfairness, and ensure that the potential opt-in Plaintiffs have a fair opportunity to opt-in to the FLSA collective action. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration. Id.

Editor's Note: The ruling in Espinoza is a rare construction of the FLSA, as the Court declared that a workplace arbitration agreement could not be valid insofar as a collective action was concerned.

Ford, et al. v. Yasuda,* Case No. 13-CV-1961 (C.D. Cal. April 29, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of students, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants, a cosmetology institute, required them to provide services to paying clients but failed to pay them wages for their work in violation of the FLSA, the California Labor Code, and the California Unfair Competition Law. Id. at 2-3. Upon enrollment in Defendants' cosmetology career training program, each Plaintiff agreed to submit any disputes with Defendants to binding arbitration. More than 17 months after Plaintiffs filed the complaint, Defendants moved to compel individual arbitration. The Court denied the motion, finding that Defendants waived their right to enforce the arbitration agreement. Id. at 5. First, the Court found that Defendants had knowledge of their contractual right to compel arbitration because Defendants had drafted and required students to sign the agreement as a standard procedure. Id. at 6. Second, the Court opined that Defendants acted inconsistently with their right to arbitration because they actively litigated the case for more than 17 months before they moved to compel. The Court noted that, tellingly, Defendants requested the dismissal of Plaintiffs' second amended complaint, without raising the issue of arbitration, and instead chose to test their theories that Plaintiffs were not employees. Id. at 8. Finally, the Court concluded that granting the motion to compel arbitration would prejudice Plaintiffs. Although Defendants had not propounded any discovery or caused any loss of evidence, the Court found that their delay was undue because they faced no barrier to moving to compel at the outset of this action. Id. at 10-11. Compelling arbitration would require Plaintiffs to re-litigate the matters already decided by the Court on Defendants' motion to dismiss, and thus, would result in prejudice. Id. at 11. The Court, therefore, held that Defendants waived their right to arbitration, and accordingly, denied the motion to compel.

Galen, et al. v. Redfin Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 161111 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 1, 2015). Plaintiffs brought two separate actions in state court alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors. Pursuant to the binding arbitration clause in Plaintiffs' independent contractor agreements, Defendant moved to compel arbitration of Plaintiff Galen's claim. The California trial court denied the motion, and the California Court of Appeal reversed on appeal. Thereafter, the California Supreme Court granted Galen's petition for review. Id. at *3. Defendant then removed the action to the District Court, and moved to compel arbitration in both cases. Galen moved to enforce the law of the case, and alternatively, stay the case pending the decision in Sanchez v. Valencia Holding Co., LLC, 61 Cal. 4th 899 (2015), which addressed the standard of unconscionability in California contract law. Id. at *5. Subsequently, the California Supreme Court decided Sanchez, and consequently dismissed Galen's petition for review in its one-sentence order. Id. at *6. Thereafter, the California Supreme Court vacated its prior dismissal order nunc pro tunc. Galen argued that the trial court's order denying Defendant's motion to compel arbitration was the law of the case, and removal of the case did not change the procedural posture of the case. Defendant argued that the order was not final. The Court noted that generally it must enforce the law of the case unless other changed circumstances exist or a manifest injustice would otherwise result. Id. at *10. The Court opined that appellate reversal of the order constituted changed circumstances, because the appellate ruling clearly undermined the rationale of the original order. The Court found that it would constitute manifest injustice to deny Defendant its right to remove an otherwise removable case in order to ensure that its motion is heard, and unjust to Defendant to treat the order as final even though it had been reversed and was still under review in the state courts. Id. at *13. Given the strange procedural posture of this case, the Court declined to apply the law of the case doctrine. As to Defendant's motion to compel arbitration, the Court observed that the incorporation of professional arbitration rules that delegate the questions of arbitrability can constitute clear and unmistakable evidence that the parties intended to delegate that question. Id. at *16. Here, although it was left ambiguous whether the AAA Commercial Rules or AAA Labor and Employment Rules would apply, the Court noted that both sets of rules included identical delegation provisions. Id. at *17. Further, although Defendant had greater bargaining strength than Plaintiffs, and presented the agreements on a take-it-or-leave-it basis, the Court remarked that the level of procedural unconscionability was not so high as to defeat the delegation clause on its own. Id. at *23. Regarding substantive unconscionability, the Court found that the fee-shifting provision that required the loser to pay costs could be severed without altering the arbitration provision because California law only permits fee-shifting in favor of prevailing Plaintiffs or employees. Id. at *25. The Court also opined that the agreement's selection of Seattle as the forum for arbitration could be severed as it would make significantly harder for the California-based Plaintiffs to litigate their claims. Finally, the arbitration provision applied to any disputes regarding the interpretation or enforcement of the agreement as long as the disputes arose out of or related to the agreement, and the agreement defined the relationship between the parties, and it was the interpretation of that relationship that would be at issue in the dispute. Thus, the Court stated that the question of arbitrability should be delegated to the arbitrator. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motions to compel arbitration in both cases.

Gunn, et al. v. NPC International, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 15321 (6th Cir. Aug. 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current or former employees, filed five separate actions alleging that Defendants denied them minimum wages and overtime compensation under the FLSA. In each of those cases Defendants filed several dispositive and non-dispositive motions and participated in scheduling conferences. After receiving unfavorable rulings on the dispositive motions, and almost over a year after Plaintiffs filed the complaints, Defendants asserted that Plaintiffs' claims were subjected to mandatory arbitration under Plaintiffs' employment contracts. Defendants moved to dismiss the action for lack of jurisdiction, or alternatively to compel arbitration. The District Court concluded that Plaintiffs would suffer unfair prejudice due to the expense of time and money, and denied Defendants' motion. Id. at *4. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed. At the outset, the Sixth Circuit noted that the District Court relied on Johnson Associates Corp. v. HL Operating Corp., 680 F.3d 713 (6th Cir. 2012); and Hurley v. Deutsche Bank Trust Co., 610 F.3d 334 (6th Cir. 2010), where the Sixth Circuit affirmed the denials of motions to compel arbitration. Id. at *5. The Sixth Circuit also observed that in Shy v. Navistar International Corp., 781 F.3d 820 (6th Cir. 2015), which was decided after the District Court's ruling, the Sixth Circuit had vacated the denial of a motion to compel. The Sixth Circuit reasoned that in Hurley, it had denied a motion to compel after Defendant had participated in litigation for two years before asserting its right to arbitration. Id. Shy vacated the denial of motion to compel where the arbitration was first raised 10 months after a third-party moved to intervene, but promptly after intervention was granted and the intervener's complaint was filed. Id. at *6. Distinguishing Johnson Associates, the Sixth Circuit in Shy held that Defendant's pre-litigation conduct was inconsistent with reliance on arbitration, but Defendant did not actively pursue litigation during the pendency of the motion to intervene, and consequently, the intervener did not incur unnecessary expenses amounting to actual prejudice. Id. Here, the Sixth Circuit opined that Defendants moved to dismiss or compel arbitration only after obtaining unfavorable rulings on it initial dispositive motions. Id. at *7-8. The Sixth Circuit ruled that this factor weighed in favor of finding waiver. Defendants argued that its delay caused Plaintiffs minimal prejudice because no discovery was conducted unlike in Johnson Associates. The Sixth Circuit, however, observed that here Defendants deliberately undertook a course of conduct inconsistent with reliance on arbitration for almost twice as long as Defendant in Johnson Associates. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit found that the District Court's denial of the motion to compel was consistent with its precedents.

Guess?, Inc. v. Russell, et al.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 154621 (C.D. Cal. Nov. 12, 2015). After a group of employees filed a class arbitration against their employer before the American Arbitration Association ("AAA") asserting claims for unpaid overtime under the FLSA and state wage & hour laws, the employer brought a declaratory judgment action alleging that the employees were precluded from arbitrating claims on a class-wide basis, and rather must proceed on an individual basis. Id. at *1. The employees moved to dismiss the complaint pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6), and the Court granted the motion. Id. at *2. The employees argued that the availability of class arbitration was a procedural question, which an arbitrator, not the Court, should decide. Id. at *6. At the outset, the Court noted that the question of arbitrability was an issue for judicial determination unless the parties clearly and unmistakably provided otherwise. Id. The parties' agreement stated that all employment-related disputes would be resolved pursuant to the model rules for arbitration of employment disputes of the AAA. Id. at *9. The Court found that by agreeing to resolve their disputes in accordance with the AAA's model rules for arbitration of employment disputes, the parties also agreed to the AAA's supplemental rules for class arbitration, which provided that the arbitrator shall determine whether the applicable arbitration clause permitted the arbitration to proceed on behalf of or against a class. Id. at *12. Consequently, the Court held that the parties clearly and unmistakably agreed that an arbitrator, and not the Court, would determine the availability of class arbitration under the parties' arbitration agreement. Id. Defendant, however, argued that in light of the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Stolt-Nielsen S.A. v. AnimalFeeds International Corp., 559 U.S. 662 (2010), the parties could not be deemed to have consented to arbitrate the availability of class arbitration without a more express provision in their agreement to that effect. Id. at *13. The Court found that while Stolt-Nielsen might be relevant to determining whether a particular agreement authorized class arbitration, it had no bearing on who should make that determination. Id. Moreover, the Court remarked that the weight of authority since Stolt-Nielson – holding that incorporation of the AAA's model rules constituted consent to have an arbitrator decide the availability of class arbitration – belied Plaintiff's argument. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted the motion to dismiss.

Herzfeld, et al. v. 1416 Chancellor, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95256 (E.D. Pa. July 22, 2015). Plaintiff, an exotic dancer, brought a collective action under the FLSA seeking unpaid minimum wages for hours worked for which Defendant failed to pay the mandatory minimum wage, overtime wages, and liquidated wages. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiff also sought to bring a class action on behalf of all dancers performing at Defendant's club under the Pennsylvania Minimum Wage Act, the Pennsylvania Wage Payment and Collection Law, and Pennsylvania common law. Id. at *7. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to a "stage rental license agreement" executed by Plaintiff that contained a broad arbitration clause requiring all disputes related to the agreement to be settled by arbitration. Id. at *5. The Court denied Defendant's motion, finding that the arbitration clause was substantively unconscionable because it eliminated Plaintiff's ability to purse a statutory collective action and class action in arbitration. Id. at *20-21. Although the arbitration clause did not mention class proceedings or contain a class action waiver, the arbitration clause provided that each party would bear its own attorneys' fees. The Court found that the fee provision in the agreement was unconscionable because the arbitration clause, in effect, prohibited Plaintiff from recovering attorneys' fees from Defendant, in contravention of the FLSA, which provides for the recovery of attorneys' fees. Id. at *26. The Court also determined that there was no evidence of a "clear and unequivocal surrender" of Plaintiff's statutory right to a collective action. Id. at *27. The Court explained that, because collective and class action arbitration was unavailable to Plaintiff as a matter of law, the arbitration provision imposing an involuntary, unknowing loss of the FLSA collection action and class action rights was substantively unconscionable. Id. at *29. Thus, according to the Court, the principal ground for unconscionability arose from the loss of Plaintiff's statutory right to a collective action and loss of a class action by operation of law. Id. at *34. The Court further noted that, because Plaintiff's collective FLSA claims also formed the basis of her Pennsylvania claim, severing Plaintiff's state law class action claims from her FLSA overtime claims and ordering piece-meal arbitration would only duplicate, rather than streamline, the parties' effort to resolve the claims. Id. at *32. The Court therefore ruled that the arbitration clause was substantively unconscionable, and accordingly, denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Holick, et al. v. Cellular Sales Of New York, LLC,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 16815 (2d Cir. Sept. 22, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants improperly classified them as independent contractors and unlawfully denied them various forms of compensation and benefits under state and federal labor laws. Id. at *2. Defendants moved to compel arbitration based on an arbitration clause contained in Plaintiffs' employment agreements. When Plaintiffs began their relationship with Defendants, Defendants required them to create a separate corporate entity and sign an independent sales agreement to work as sales representatives. Id. at *3. Defendants later hired Plaintiffs as full-time employees, and the parties executed new compensation agreements, which contained an arbitration provision. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs in this action confined their claims to events occurring prior to the execution of the compensation agreements. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that before the execution of the compensation agreements, Defendants misclassified them as independent contractors when they were actually employees because Defendants controlled their work performance. Id. at *6. Defendants invoked the arbitration provision of the compensation agreements to compel arbitration. The District Court denied arbitration, finding that another contract that was in effect during the time when Plaintiffs' claims arose supported a finding of non-arbitrability. Id. at *2. Defendants appealed and argued that the denial of their motion to compel arbitration conflicted with long-standing federal precedent under which all doubts as to the intent of the parties and the scope of an arbitration clause must be resolved in favor of arbitration. Id. at *6. Defendants asserted that the compensation agreement did not contain an "express temporal limitation," and therefore, could apply to claims prior to the memorialization of the compensation agreement. Id. The Second Circuit disagreed and affirmed the District Court's decision. While the Second Circuit acknowledged that it had held that broad arbitration provisions that contain no express temporal limitation could apply to claims that arose prior to the execution of an arbitration agreement, it was not persuaded by Defendants' argument that it must interpret the arbitration agreement to have a temporal scope simply because it had done so in other cases. Id. at *16-17. According to the Second Circuit, the correct approach was to assess whether the parties intended for the arbitration clause to cover the present dispute. Id. The Second Circuit examined the parties' conduct prior to the execution of the compensation agreements, and found it evident that the scope of the arbitration clause was temporally limited. The Second Circuit reached this conclusion based, in large part, on the fact that when Plaintiffs signed compensation agreements, the parties' contractual positions changed in a way that impacted arbitrability. Id. at *18. The Second Circuit noted that in sales agreements, Defendants agreed that the Plaintiffs' individual companies were not their employees, but later agreed to employ Plaintiffs. This evolving business relationship, as the Second Circuit noted, was directly relevant to whether the parties intended to have an employment relationship prior to executing the compensation agreement. Id. According to the Second Circuit, it would be inconsistent with the parties' conduct to construe the compensation agreements, which referenced "employment," to apply to a period when the parties themselves did not contemplate such a relationship, and Defendants' change in course was just the type of positive assurance required to show that the parties did not intend for the arbitration clause to cover the current dispute. Id. at *18-19. The Second Circuit rejected Defendants' reliance on Plaintiffs' allegations that they were in fact Defendants' employees before they executed the compensation agreement, reasoning that Plaintiffs' factual allegation did not touch matters covered by the arbitration clause because they did not evince the parties' intent to enter into an employment relationship, and the more relevant factual allegation for assessing the arbitration agreement's scope was how Defendants labelled them as non-employees. Id. at *19-20. Accordingly, finding that the parties did not intend for the arbitration agreement to be retroactive, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's denial of Defendants' motion to compel arbitration.

Jimenez, et al. v. Menzies Aviation, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 108223 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 17, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay minimum and overtime wages to its non-exempt employees at the San Francisco International Airport ("SFO"). While the complaint was pending, Defendants adopted a new ADR Policy, which required employees to arbitrate all employment claims. The policy did not contain an express opt-out provision. After Plaintiff Jimenez filed a first amended complaint, she discovered information allegedly entitling a sub-group of putative class members to additional overtime-related damages. Jimenez was not a part of this group. Therefore she obtained leave to file a second amended complaint, adding named Plaintiff Mijos as the new sub-group's class representative. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs then filed the second amended complaint. Defendants moved to compel arbitration of the claims for which Plaintiff Mijos was the class representative. The Court denied the motion. Given that the ADR Policy applied to putative class members' existing class claims and that Defendants sought to compel arbitration of a sub-section of those claims, the Court concluded that the ADR Policy risked interference with the rights of the putative class members. Moreover, Defendants did not inform Plaintiff Mijos or other putative class members about this action, or advise them of the ADR Policy's impact on their rights in this case. Further, Defendants did not provide any opportunity to opt-out of its new policy, making assent to the ADR Policy a condition of employment. The Court opined that the implementation of the arbitration policy was a deliberate effort to undermine the pending class litigation. Id. at *16. Further, the Court held that the issuance of the ADR Policy posed a risk to the rights of Plaintiff Mijos and other putative class members, and accordingly, declined to compel arbitration of Plaintiff Mijos' claims. Id. at *16-17.

Levison, et al. v. Mastect, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 112462 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 25, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of installation and service technicians, brought an action seeking to recover overtime wages. Plaintiffs contended that Defendant DirecTV, Inc., wrongfully established a fissured employment scheme by classifying Plaintiffs as employees of Defendants MasTec, Inc., and MasTec Services Co., Inc., and that the MasTec Defendants wrongfully caused the employees to sign a dispute resolution policy ("DRP"), which waived the rights to pursue class or collective actions and bound them to arbitration. Id. at *2. Defendants moved to compel arbitration, which the Court granted. Defendants sought to compel arbitration primarily relying on a case from the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Florida against MasTec, Inc. entitle Sanchez Cordero v. MasTec, Inc., Case No. 6:15-CV-572 (M.D. Fla. July 28, 2015), that compelled arbitration since the DRP included collective actions and required arbitration of any dispute arising out of or related to the employee's employment. Id. at *4. In Sanchez Corero, the Court had relied on De Oliveira v. Citicorp North America, Inc., 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 69573 (M.D. Fla. May 18, 2012), where the Court had compelled arbitration based on Plaintiffs' acknowledgment of an arbitration policy contained in an employee handbook. Id. Plaintiffs relied on D.R. Horton, Inc., 357 NLRB No. 184 (NLRB Jan. 3, 2012), where the National Labor Relations Board had rejected waivers of collective or class actions in favor of arbitration. Id. at *5. The Court observed that that the Eleventh Circuit had not adopted D.R. Horton. Thus, the Court remarked that the arbitration agreements with collective action waivers were enforceable. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to compel arbitration.

Lopez, et al. v. Kmart Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58328 (N.D. Cal. May 4, 2015). Plaintiff, an employee, brought a class action in the state court alleging that Defendant failed to provide accurate wage statements as required by § 226(a) of the California Labor Code, and engaged in practices that constituted unfair competition under § 17200 of the California Business & Professions Code. In April 2012, Defendant implemented an arbitration policy/agreement ("Agreement") under which participating employees and Defendant each waived the right to pursue employment-related claims in court, and instead agreed to submit such disputes to binding arbitration. Id. at *2. Plaintiff and other employees participated in on-line training and acknowledged their receipt of various employment policies using Defendant's My Personal Information ("MPI") portal and a training system known as "Learn Your Way." Id. at *3. Defendant hired Plaintiff as a cashier when he was 16 years old and a sophomore in high school. Plaintiff acknowledged receipt of the Agreement, but never requested his parents' consent. Plaintiff claimed that he was never explained what an arbitration agreement was or that he could review the terms with an attorney. Id. at *6. Defendant removed the action and moved to compel arbitration, which the Court denied. At the outset, the Court noted that the arbitration agreement is valid only if the elements of viable contract are present and satisfied, including: (i) the ability to contract; (ii) consent; (iii) lawful object; and (iv) consideration. Id. at *10. The questions before the Court therefore, were whether Plaintiff was capable of contracting and consenting to the Agreement, and if he was, whether he was entitled to disaffirm the contract now, and whether the contract was unconscionable. Id. at *11. The Court observed that California law provides that a minor has the capacity to contract, with the exception of those contracts specifically prohibited. Id. The Court also noted that § 6710 of the California Family Code sets forth a minor's right of disaffirmance, stating that a contract of a minor maybe disaffirmed before majority or within a reasonable time afterwards. Id. In addition, the Court observed that California law specifically excludes certain contracts from disaffirmance; however, contracts such as employment or arbitration agreements were not excluded. Id. at *14. Defendant contended that the Agreement here was not subjected to disaffirmance per § 6711 because § 1391 of the Labor Code constitutes the express authority to enter into this type of agreement. The Court noted that § 1391, however, limited the hours that employers may employ minors, and also set forth penalties for violations of those hour rules. Id. at *14-15. The Court determined that Defendant interpreted § 6711 too broadly, as § 1391 does not expressly state that a minor cannot disaffirm an employment contract. Id. at *15. The Court concluded that although Plaintiff entered into a valid arbitration agreement with Defendant, he exercised his statutory right of disaffirmance, thereby rescinding the contract, which rendered it a nullity. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court ruled that the arbitration agreement was unenforceable, and denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Lorenzo, et al. v. Prime Communications L.P.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 20400 (4th Cir. Nov. 24, 2015). Plaintiff, a former employee, brought an action alleging that Defendant unlawfully deprived her of commissions and overtime pay in violation of the FLSA and the North Carolina Wage & Hour Act. Defendant moved to compel arbitration and relied on an arbitration provision contained in its employee handbook, which it had provided to Plaintiff when she began her employment. The District Court denied the motion, and on appeal the Fourth Circuit affirmed. The Fourth Circuit noted that a District Court may order arbitration only when it is satisfied that the parties agreed to arbitrate, and that the question of whether the parties agreed to arbitrate is resolved by application of state contract law. Id. at *9. The Fourth Circuit observed that when Plaintiff received the employee handbook, she also signed an acknowledgment form providing that the terms of the employee handbook, including its arbitration provision, were guidelines only and that they did not create any binding commitments. Id. at *9-10. The Fourth Circuit opined that the District Court correctly recognized that the acknowledgment form expressly disclaimed any implied agreement to be contractually bound by any terms in the employee handbook, and that any implied assent that might have been created by Plaintiff's receipt and review of the handbook and by her continued employment was nullified by the express agreement of the parties not to be bound by any of the handbook's terms. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the order denying Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Maddy, et al. v. General Electric Co.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 20979 (3d Cir. Dec. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of technicians, brought an action seeing unpaid overtime wages under the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA") and various state laws. Defendant had implemented a mandatory alternative dispute resolution program (the "Solutions Program"). Id. at *3. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to the mandatory arbitration provision in the 2009 Solutions Program. The District Court denied the motion. On Defendant's appeal, the Third Circuit affirmed. In denying Defendant's motion, the District Court found that Plaintiffs did not enter into valid agreements to arbitrate when they signed the Solutions Program acknowledgment forms. Id. at *5-6. The Third Circuit noted that, under Texas law, a valid agreement to arbitrate exists if an employee received notice of the employer's arbitration policy, and the employee accepted it, for example, by continuing employment after receiving notice. Id. at *6. The Third Circuit found that, although signing an acknowledgement form and continuing employment ordinarily constitutes a valid agreement, the acknowledgement forms here did not show that Plaintiffs received notice of the arbitration provisions contained in the 2009 Solutions Program. Id. Accordingly, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's order denying Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

McCabe, et al. v. Robert Half International, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 156283 (D.N.J. Nov. 19, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former staffing managers, brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendants had misclassified them as exempt employees in violation of the FLSA. Id. at *4-5. Defendants moved to compel individual arbitration of Plaintiffs' claims, which the District Court granted. The arbitrator subsequently issued a partial final award, ruling that she was authorized to conduct a class arbitration and accepted Plaintiffs' argument to arbitrate any dispute or claim as FLSA collective action. Id. The District Court refused to vacate the arbitrator's award. Defendants appealed to the Third Circuit, arguing that it should decide whether the agreements provided for class arbitration, rather than the arbitrator. Id. The Third Circuit vacated the arbitrator's award, and remanded the case to determine if the employment agreements called for class arbitration. Id. at *6. Upon remand, Defendants moved for an order confirming that the arbitration agreements did not call for class-wide arbitration, and to dismiss the action, which the District Court granted. Id. First, Defendants argued that the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") did not permit an arbitrator to conduct class arbitration unless the parties agreed to participate. Id. at *7. The Court noted that the U.S. Supreme Court had clearly determined that the parties' consent was a basic element of interpreting arbitration agreements under the FAA. Id. The Court found that a party may not be compelled under the FAA to submit to class arbitration unless there was a contractual basis for concluding that the party agreed to do so. Id. at *8. Further, the Court found that the mere agreement to arbitrate was insufficient to infer a party's consent to class arbitration because of the fundamental changes brought about by the shift from bilateral arbitration to class action arbitration. Id. Consequently, the Court noted that the arbitrator may not conduct class arbitration unless the parties agreed to participate and because the agreements here did not explicitly authorize class-wide arbitration, the matter hinged on whether the parties implicitly agreed to class-wide arbitration. Id. at *9. Second, Defendants argued that the absence of any reference to class arbitration weighed against inferring acceptance. The Court found that several case law precedents have weighed against finding implicit consent if there was no explicit mention of class-wide arbitration. Id. at *10-11. Plaintiffs asserted that many case law precedents had found intent to permit class-wide arbitration despite the absence of any express language to that effect. Id. The Court reasoned that almost all cases cited by Plaintiffs were inapplicable to the specific legal question at issue concerning instead whether to vacate an arbitration award. Id. Consequently, the Court concluded that complete silence on the issue of class-wide arbitration weighed against inferring consent and that the agreements in the instant case merely provided that certain disputes or claims "shall be submitted to arbitration pursuant to the commercial arbitration rules of the American Arbitration Association." Id. at *14-15. Third, Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to show an implicit agreement to participate in class arbitration. The Court determined that the language of the agreements did not show any intent to allow class arbitration because the overtime claims of other employees did not arise out of or relate to Plaintiffs' employment, termination, or agreement. Id. Further, the Court opined that the arbitration agreements limited claims to those arising out of the relationship between the contracting parties and generally did not authorize class arbitration of absent parties' claims. Id. Plaintiffs argued that the agreements could have explicitly excluded the possibility of class-wide arbitration. Id. at *16. The Court, however, found that mere absence of explicit exemption did not evince an intent to permit class-wide arbitration. Id. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the action on the basis that class-wide arbitration was not allowed.

Robinson, et al. v. Alston,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 257 (11th Cir. Jan. 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of servers at a restaurant, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them minimum wage and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. The District Court granted the parties' consent motion to stay the proceedings pending arbitration. Id. at *2. Over the next several months, the parties exchanged information but failed to initiate arbitration. Plaintiffs moved to re-open the case, and Defendant failed to respond. Id. The District Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to re-open the case and, several months later, Defendant moved to compel arbitration. Id. The District Court denied the motion, holding that Defendant forfeited his right to arbitration based on this conduct. Id. at *1. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed on the alternative ground that Defendant waived the right to arbitration. Plaintiffs argued that Defendant delayed arbitration to transfer assets from the bankrupt Defendant Ultimate Sports Bar, LLC to Blue Star Kitchen, Inc. Id. at *3. At the outset, the Eleventh Circuit noted that it had established a two-part test to determine whether a party waived its right to arbitrate, including: (i) a District Court decides if, under the totality of the circumstances, the party has acted inconsistently with the arbitration right; and (ii) a District Court looks to see whether, by doing so, that party has in some way prejudiced the other party. Id. at *4. The Eleventh Circuit found that Defendant acted inconsistently with a desire to arbitrate when it ignored correspondence from Plaintiffs seeking to initiate the arbitration proceedings and, instead, chose to retain a bankruptcy attorney and take Ultimate Sports Bar, LLC into bankruptcy. Further, the Eleventh Circuit opined that, by failing to proceed to arbitration, Defendant raised Plaintiffs' litigation costs. Plaintiffs participated in both the District Court and bankruptcy proceedings, and, by ignoring their requests to initiate the arbitration hearing, Defendant forced Plaintiffs to file additional motions with the District Court. Id. at *5. The Eleventh Circuit concluded that the totality of Defendant's conduct constituted a waiver of Defendant's arbitration right and, accordingly, affirmed the ruling of the District Court. Id. at *6-7.

Roe, et al. v. SFBSC Management, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26057 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of exotic dancers, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the California Labor Code and the FLSA. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to "Performer Contracts" that declared Plaintiffs to be independent contractors, and required arbitration to resolve all disputes between the parties. The Court denied Defendant's motion, finding that several terms in the arbitration agreement were unconscionable. Id. at *14. The Court found the agreements procedural unconscionability because Plaintiffs showed that they signed their contracts under conditions in which ordinary people would detect "unequal bargaining power" and would feel that they had no "real" chance to negotiate, no "meaningful choice" but to sign. Id. at *22. Particularly, Plaintiffs asserted that the management at Defendant's clubs told them that all performers had to sign the contracts in order to work, and that management presented them with the contracts when they were "mostly naked." Id. at *16. Plaintiffs also claimed that management sometimes presented the contracts for signing when they were intoxicated, and that the "accept or reject" choice was effectively a sham because if they reject, management either would purposely lose the agreement and present a new one to fill out correctly, or find a reason to fire the performer. Id. at *17. Under these alleged conditions, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs presented at least "mild" procedural unconscionability. Id. at *22. The Court also found that the arbitration agreement contained multiple provisions that were substantively unconscionable. Id. at *31. The Court noted that the ban on Plaintiffs' consolidating claims lacked even a "modicum of bilaterality." Id. at *25. Further, the agreement provided that the costs of arbitration should be borne equally by performer and Defendant unless the arbitrator concluded otherwise. The Court found that "[t]he Ninth Circuit has repeatedly found such provisions to be substantively unconscionable and thus unenforceable under California law," and it saw no significant difference between the cost-allocation terms at issue here and those rejected by previous Ninth Circuit precedent. Id. at *29. Given the multiple unlawful provisions, the Court declined to sever the problematic parts of the contracts, and held that the entire arbitration agreement was unenforceable. Id. at *30-31. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Sakkab, et al. v. Luxottica Retail North,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 17071 (9th Cir. Sept. 28, 2015). Plaintiff, a retail employee, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, an eyewear retailer, misclassified Plaintiff and other employees as exempt supervisors in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Id. at *4. Plaintiff later amended his complaint to add a representative claim under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). Under the PAGA, employees may sue their employer for certain workplace violations on behalf of themselves, as well as other current or former employees, in representative suits similar to class actions. Defendant sought to compel arbitration of all of Plaintiff's claims pursuant to dispute resolution agreement contained in its retail associate guide. Id. at *6. The arbitration agreement expressly precluded Plaintiff from pursuing class, collective, or representative claims, whether in court or in arbitration. Id. Plaintiff had signed an acknowledgment indicating that he understood and agreed to the terms of the dispute resolution. The District Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration of all claims and dismissed Plaintiff's complaint. Plaintiff appealed and argued that his representative claim under the PAGA could not be waived. The Ninth Circuit agreed and reversed the District Court's decision. The Ninth Circuit found that the PAGA claim could not be dismissed based on the California Supreme Court decision in Iskanian v. CLAS Transportation Los Angeles, Inc., 59 Cal. 4th 348 (2014), that barred the enforcement of PAGA waivers. Id. at *8. Although the U.S. Supreme Court found in Concepcion v. AT&T Corp., 131 S. Ct. 1740 (2011), that the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") preempts California's law on unconscionable contracts, the Ninth Circuit opined that the FAA did not preempt the Iskanian rule because it was a "generally applicable contract defense" preserved by the FAA's § 2 savings clause that barred any waiver of PAGA claims, regardless of whether the waiver appeared in an arbitration agreement or a non-arbitration agreement. Id. at *15-17. The Ninth Circuit further determined that the Iskanian rule did not conflict with the FAA's purpose because it did not prohibit outright the arbitration of certain claims, but rather prohibited only the waiver of representative PAGA claims, and thus did not interfere with the FAA's goal of overcoming judicial hostility to arbitration. Id. at *20-21. Moreover, the Ninth Circuit reasoned that the Iskanian rule did not prevent the parties from selecting the procedures they want to be applied in arbitration, and therefore it did not interfere with arbitration. Id. at *23. The Ninth Circuit explained that a PAGA action is brought on the state's behalf and not a mechanism for resolving the claims of other employees; in contrast, a class action is designed to adjudicate the claims of absent class members, and principles of due process mandate that class members' rights be protected by requiring special and formal procedures to resolve those claims. Id. at *24-25. Because representative PAGA claims do not require any special procedures, the Ninth Circuit concluded that prohibiting a waiver of the claims did not diminish the parties' freedom to select the arbitration procedures that best suit their needs. Id. at *26. The Ninth Circuit, therefore, held that a waiver of Plaintiffs' representative PAGA claim could not be enforced, and accordingly reversed the District Court's order dismissing Plaintiff's action.

Sanchez, et al. v. Nitro Lift Technologies, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18670 (E.D. Okla. Feb. 17, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and Oklahoma's Protection of Labor Act. Initially, the District Court had denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration, holding that the arbitration clause within the confidentiality and non-compete agreement signed by Plaintiffs only applied to matters within the scope of that agreement. Id. at *1. On Defendant's appeal, the Tenth Circuit reversed on the basis that the broad arbitration clause, considered together with the language of the narrow contract, created an ambiguity, and that ambiguities about the scope of an arbitration clause should be resolved in favor of arbitration. Id. at *2. Upon remand, the District Court compelled arbitration. First, Plaintiffs argued that the cost and fee-shifting provisions in their contract violated the substantive rights afforded to employees by the FLSA. The agreement provided that the costs of arbitration "shall be borne by the disputing party whom the decision of the arbitrator is against." Id. at *4. The District Court opined that an arbitration agreement that required an employee to pay a portion of the arbitrator's fees was unenforceable under the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") because it undermined federal statutory rights. Id. at *7. The Court pointed out that the FLSA affords an employee the right to bring an action without fear of having to bear his employer's fees unless he litigates in bad faith. Thus, the Court found that the cost and fee-shifting provision was void and unenforceable, and it would deter a substantial number of similarly-situated potential litigants, as they would fear being stuck with substantial costs and fees in the event they did not prevail in their claim. Id. at *7-8. Second, Plaintiffs argued that the forum selection clause would cause employees substantial expense to arbitrate in an inconvenient forum (in Houston, Texas), as opposed to Oklahoma where they worked for Defendant. Id. The Court found that distance between Oklahoma and Houston, and travel expenses combined with Plaintiffs' evidence about their current financial status, was sufficient to show that arbitration in Houston would be prohibitively expensive. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court found the forum selection clause unenforceable. Id. As Defendant offered to waive the unenforceable provisions, the Court determined whether it could sever them without a severance clause. The Court found that the contract law of both Oklahoma and Louisiana encourage severing the enforceable provisions from the unenforceable portions, rather than to declare the entire contract void. Id. at *12-13. Accordingly, finding that the cost and fee-shifting and forum selection provisions were not essential to the agreement to arbitrate, the Court severed those provisions and enforced the arbitration agreement. Id. at *13.

Stanfield, et al. v. Fly Low, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102444 (S.D. Fla. Aug. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former waitresses, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them overtime wages and the required federal minimum wage in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs also asserted claims of retaliatory discharge and invasion of privacy. Id. at *4. Defendants filed a motion to compel arbitration, which the Court granted. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' claims were covered claims under arbitration agreement. Plaintiffs countered that the arbitration agreements could not be enforced because they were signed under duress or forgery. Id. at *7. The Court opined that arbitration agreements incorporated the AAA's Employment Arbitration Rules and mediation process, which provided clear evidence that the parties agreed to having an arbitrator resolve any objections to the validity of the arbitration agreement. Id. at *7. Therefore, the Court ruled that an arbitrator must resolve Plaintiffs' objections as an initial matter. Plaintiffs also argued that compelling them to arbitrate was opposed to the collective action policy in the FLSA. The Court noted that the Eleventh Circuit previously had held in Walthour v. Chipio Windshield Repair LLC, 745 F.3d 1326 (11th Cir. 2014), that an arbitration agreement having a collective action waiver may be unenforceable only if a statute like the FLSA had a contrary congressional command. Id. at *9. The Eleventh Circuit concluded that because the FLSA did not have such a command, the federal policy favored arbitration, even in the face of a collective action waiver. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Steingruber, et al. v. Family Dollar Stores Of Florida*, Case No. 15-CV-199 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 13, 2015). Plaintiff, an assistant store manager, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified her as exempt from the overtime requirements of the FLSA. Plaintiff raised two causes of action in her complaint, including a request for a declaratory judgment regarding the enforceability of the arbitration agreement, and a claim for unpaid overtime wages. Id. at 1-2. Plaintiff alleged that she did not accept or agree to Defendant's arbitration agreement, but rather clicked on a button purporting to accept the agreement only to acknowledge that she read and printed it. Id. at 2. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint because the written arbitration agreement between the parties mandated arbitration of all employment-related claims and also required that the threshold question of arbitrability of the agreement be determined by an arbitrator, not the Court. Id. at 4. The Court noted the arbitration agreement specified that it was an agreement between Plaintiff and Family Dollar, Inc. including its "parents, subsidiaries, partners, divisions, and affiliated entities, and all successors and assigns of any of them." Id. at 5. Thus, because Defendant Family Dollar Stores of Florida, Inc. is a subsidiary of Family Dollar Inc., the Court held it was a party to the agreement. Id. The Court observed that according to the arbitration agreement, challenges to the agreement itself must be resolved by arbitration except as to the "class action waiver," which prohibited the parties from bringing collective actions and required that challenges to the validity of the waiver be determined by a Court and not an arbitrator. Id. The Court pointed out, however, that while Plaintiff challenged the enforceability of the agreement as a whole, she did not specifically challenge the delegation clause. Id. at 6. Specifically, the complaint alleged that the "arbitration agreement was not enforceable as to Plaintiff, was not applicable to the pending claims in whole or in part, and was void or voidable pursuant to law." Id. Thus, the Court found the threshold question of enforceability was a proper issue before an arbitrator and not before the Court. Id. Defendant also moved to enforce the collective action waiver in the arbitration agreement. Id. The Court ruled that Plaintiff could not compel Defendant to submit to class arbitration without agreement and Defendant had clearly not agreed to such actions; instead, the class action waiver in the agreement expressly prohibited class or representative actions. Id. at 8. Further, the Court concluded that enforcement of the class action waiver was required by the terms of the writing and in furtherance of the purposes of the Federal Arbitration Act to enforce agreements according to their terms and to streamline proceedings. Id. Accordingly, the Court ordered the parties to submit to arbitration. Id.

Sutherland, et al. v. Ernst & Young, LLP*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 773 (2d Cir. Jan. 20, 2015). Plaintiff, an audit employee, brought an action alleging that Defendant misclassified her and other similarly-situated employees as exempt in violation of the FLSA and New York Labor Law. Four months after Plaintiff filed her complaint, Defendant moved to dismiss or compel arbitration. The District Court dismissed the action, and the Second Circuit affirmed. On appeal, Plaintiff argued that Defendant waived its right to demand arbitration. The Second Circuit noted that, to determine whether a party has waived its right to arbitration by expressing its intent to litigate the dispute in question, three factors are considered, including: (i) the time elapsed from when litigation was commenced until the request for arbitration; (ii) the amount of litigation to date, including motion practice and discovery; and (iii) proof of prejudice. Id. at *2. Prejudice can be substantive, when a party loses a motion on the merits and then attempts, in effect, to re-litigate the issue by invoking arbitration, or it can be found when a party postpones his invocation of his contractual right to arbitration, and thereby causes his adversary to incur unnecessary delay or expense. Id. at *2-3. Although Plaintiff argued that she had been substantively prejudiced by Defendant's procedural gamesmanship, the Second Circuit held that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate how any gamesmanship disadvantaged her or how she had been prejudiced by Defendant's failure to demand arbitration in a more timely manner. Because Defendant moved to dismiss or compel arbitration four months after Plaintiff filed her complaint, and no substantial motion practice or discovery occurred during that time period, the Second Circuit reasoned that Defendant did not waive its right to compel arbitration. Accordingly, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's order dismissing the action.

Zenelaj, et al. v. HandyBook, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26068 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of cleaning professionals, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors, and thus unlawfully denied them overtime and minimum wages under the California Labor Code. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to an arbitration provision in an agreement executed by the parties. The Court granted Defendant's motion. The Court agreed with Defendant that it could not decide whether the arbitration provision at issue was unconscionable or applicable because the provision delegated this threshold issue to an arbitrator. Id. at *4. The Court found that the parties had clearly and unmistakably agreed to allow an arbitrator to decide the arbitration provision's validity, scope, and application by expressly incorporating the AAA Commercial Arbitration Rules. Id. at *6. Since the parties delegated the question of arbitrability to the arbitrator by expressly incorporating the AAA Commercial Arbitration Rules into their agreement, the Court concluded that any questions regarding the arbitration provision's validity, scope, or application to this dispute must be decided by the arbitrator. Id. Plaintiffs also argued that the arbitration provision did not cover their misclassifications claims because they did not "relate to" the agreement. Id. at *14. The Court, however, found that the broad arbitration provision and a review of the complaint did not foreclose the possibility that Plaintiffs' claims "relate to" the agreement. Id. at *15. The Court noted that the agreement contained much of the evidence that should be considered to determine whether Defendant misclassified Plaintiffs. Although the choice-of-law and forum selection provision arguably did not favor arbitration, the Court held that it would reserve its judgment as to whether the arbitration provision actually covered Plaintiffs' cause of action because an arbitrator should first determine the issue of arbitrability. Id. at *17-18. The Court further stayed Plaintiffs' class claims and representative claims under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"), despite a valid class action waiver and invalid waiver of PAGA claims under state law, finding that the arbitrability of these claims must be decided by an arbitrator in accordance with the clear and unmistakable intent of the parties. Id. at *19-25. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

(xvi) Settlement Approval Issues In Wage & Hour Class Actions And Collective Actions

Ahmed, et al. v. Landry's Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-2186 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay the minimum, overtime, and "spread-of-hour" wages required by law, misappropriated tips owed to Plaintiffs, and failed to provide proper wage notice and statements in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Id. at 1. Before the Court ruled on Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), the parties entered into a settlement agreement and submitted a joint letter requesting the Court's approval of the settlement. Id. at 2. The Court observed that the settlement agreement largely satisfied the FLSA's requirement, as the joint letter outlined the anticipated burdens and expenses avoided by settling Plaintiffs' claims and stated that the agreement was a result of arms' length bargaining between experienced attorneys. Id. at 3. Furthermore, the terms of the agreement required Plaintiffs to release only those claims arising under the FLSA and the NYLL and contained no restrictive confidentiality provisions. Id. at 3-4. The Court acknowledged that no terms in the proposed agreement precluded a finding that the settlement was fair and reasonable. However, the Court held that the parties failed to provide important information including the grounds for the overall settlement amount as well as each named Plaintiff's share thereof and the bases for the reasonableness of the proposed attorneys' fees. Id. at 4. First, the Court found that the parties' joint letter merely stated that Plaintiffs' range of possible recovery was between $0 and $164,165, representing the damages for unpaid minimum wage and record-keeping violations with liquidated damages. Id. Additionally, the Court found that the letter cursorily explained that each Plaintiff's respective share of the settlement amount was based on their individual dates of employment, approximate hours worked, and rates of pay. Id. Further, the Court determined that the letter did not discuss Defendants' potential liability stemming from the other claims in the complaint, including unpaid overtime wages and that Plaintiffs provided no supporting declarations or exhibits substantiating the accuracy of the calculations or the sufficiency of the amount allocated to each individual Plaintiff. Id. Furthermore, the Court noted that the parties cited other cases approving settlements in which similar portions of the settlement amount were reserved for attorneys' fees, but provided no information to conclude that the same determination was warranted here. Id. The Court held that Plaintiffs' counsel must provide records detailing the hours expended and the nature of the work done for each attorney as well as evidence of how the proposed fees compared to Plaintiffs' lodestar. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' request for approval of their settlement agreement without prejudice, and requested the parties submit a supplemental letter on the items enumerated in the Court's order.

Allen, et al. v. Labor Ready Southwest, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 9139 (9th Cir. June 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of day laborers, brought an action alleging a failure to pay wages for time spent while waiting for assignments and for time spent travelling from Defendant's local office to the businesses that needed labor. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant took unlawful paycheck deductions for using cash disbursement machines ("CDM") provided by Defendant. Subsequently, the parties settled the action for a gross amount of $4.5 million, and Defendant agreed to pay $10 for non-CDM claims and $25 for CDM claims to class members submitting timely claims. Id. at *6. Unpaid amounts would revert to Defendant. As a form of injunctive relief, Defendant agreed to shut down the CDMs and replace them with an electronic pay card through which workers would receive their pay daily without charge. Id. at *7. A group of objectors sought to intervene and the District Court denied their motion. Thereafter, the District Court overruled the objectors' concerns, granted final settlement approval, and awarded $1.125 million in attorneys' fees. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the denial of the motion to intervene, and vacated the grant of final approval to the settlement. First, the Ninth Circuit noted that the objectors filed their motion after four years of on-going litigation on the eve of settlement, and threatened to prejudice the settling parties by potentially derailing the settlement, especially where their concerns could have been addressed through the normal objection process. Id. at *10-11. Thus, the Ninth Circuit opined that the objectors' motion was untimely. Next, the Ninth Circuit observed that District Courts must look for subtle signs that class counsel have allowed their own self-interests to infect the negotiations. Id. at *14. Here, all of the money that did not go toward claims actually made, attorneys' fees and costs, and the administration costs would revert to Defendant who agreed not to dispute the award of fees to class counsel, as long as that award did not exceed 25% of the common fund. Id. at *14-15. Further, the attorneys' fee award exceeded the maximum possible amount of class monetary relief by a factor of three. Confronted with these multiple indicia of possible implicit collusion, the Ninth Circuit remarked that the District Court had an obligation to assure itself that the fees awarded per the agreement were not unreasonably high, which the District Court failed to do. Id. at *15. Further, the District Court failed to make express findings about the value of the injunctive relief, which would have justified the reasonableness of class counsel's fee award. There were also no express findings by the District Court on what it considered to be a reasonable lodestar amount when class counsel represented that the fee award was less than his lodestar figure. Considering all these factors, the Ninth Circuit vacated the final approval of the settlement and the attorneys' fee award, and remanded the action. Id. at *18. The Ninth Circuit remarked that the District Court must give the entire class and not just the objectors the opportunity to review class counsel's completed fee motion and to submit objections if they so choose.

Appleman, et al. v. DS Services Of America, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111721 (S.D. Fla. Aug. 24, 2015). Plaintiff, a former sales representative, brought a collective action against Defendant seeking back pay for unpaid overtime under the FLSA. The parties subsequently settled and Plaintiff moved for approval of the parties' settlement agreement, which the Court denied. Id. at *1. Subsequently, two individuals opted-in, and thereafter the parties attempted to resolve the matter as to the entire purported collective action. The proposed collective action was defined as "all individuals employed by Defendant from October 3, 2012 to the date of approval (the "class period") who worked as a sales representatives at any time during the class period." Id. at *2. The Court remarked that the parties agreed to resolve the rights of over 300 potential opt-in Plaintiffs without those Plaintiffs being joined in this action or being able to object to the terms of the action. Id. at *3. The Court opined that the Eleventh Circuit has previously held that collective actions are unique, and unlike Rule 23's opt-out provisions, no person can become a party Plaintiff unless he or she affirmatively "opts-in" by filing his or her written consent. Id. at *4. The Court determined that if the parties sought to resolve the case by settlement, they should first seek conditional approval of the proposed collective action and offer adequate notice procedures to allow potential Plaintiffs to opt-in to the case. Thus, the Court held that it could not approve the agreement at present, and accordingly, denied Plaintiff's motion to approve the settlement agreement.

Augustyniak, et al. v. Lowes Home Centers, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57592 (W.D.N.Y. May 1, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former human resource managers ("HRMs"), brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them overtime wages and violated the FLSA and the New York Labor Law. The parties subsequently reached a settlement. It contemplated that Defendants would pay up to $3 million to class members and up to $1.5 million for attorneys' fees. The $3 million was based on an average payment of $3,700 for every person who opted-in to the lawsuit, assuming that over 800 of the approximately 2,279 class members would opt-in. Id. at *4. The settlement would be apportioned among the opt-in Plaintiffs based on the number of workweeks each individual opt-in Plaintiff worked during the relevant class period; thus, a Plaintiff who worked as HRM during most of the period would receive $8,000, while a Plaintiff who worked as a HRM only a few weeks would receive less than $1,000. Id. at *5. Each named Plaintiff also would receive a $3,000 incentive payment. The parties jointly sought approval of the settlement, which the Court denied. The Court first found that the settlement class could not be conditionally certified. The Court explained that the parties relied on discovery from a previous action – Lytle v. Lowes Home Centers, Inc., 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3227 (M.D. Fla. 2014) – where a collective action was conditionally certified; Plaintiffs here argued that this proved that the class members were similarly-situated to them. The parties contended that the main dispositive issue in both cases was the same, i.e., whether Defendants HRMs exercised discretion and independent judgment during the relevant period. That was the issue that was the subject of most of the written and deposition discovery in the Lytle action, and which inevitably would consume much of the focus in this case. The Court noted that numerous HRMs in the Lytle action testified that they made significant decisions, and had influence into almost all final decisions at their stores. Id. at *10. The Court found that these statements undercut the allegations made by Plaintiffs, and denied conditional certification of the collective action. As to the fairness of the settlement, the Court noted that there was no bona fide dispute as to the appropriate statute of limitations for FLSA claims. Since the parties conceded that there was no basis for a determination that any FLSA violation was willful, the statute of limitations was two years. Id. at *15. In effect, there was no bona fide reason for including HRMs falling outside that time period in this settlement. The Court, therefore, remarked that for those HRMs who had no viable FLSA claim, the proposed settlement would be a gift. Id. In addition, the Court remarked that the benefits of a collective action depend on employees receiving accurate and timely notice so that they can make informed decisions about whether to participate. However, the proposed notice made no mention of the fact that the HMRs who had no valid FLSA claims would opt-in to the settlement, increasing the likelihood that the $3 million settlement would be reached or exceeded. Id. Finally, the Court found that the attorneys' fees award of $1.5 million had no basis for a lodestar award. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the settlement was not fair, and denied the motion.

Calderon, et al. v. Form Works/Baker JV, LLC,* Case No. 13-CV-21438 (S.D. Fla. April 14, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought an FLSA action alleging failure to pay overtime, failure to pay the prevailing wage for all hours worked, and intentional misclassification into lower-paying job categories. Plaintiffs also sought a declaratory judgment based on these allegations. Subsequently, the parties settled the action, and moved for approval of their settlement agreement on a confidential basis. The Court denied the motion. At the outset, the Court found that the motion failed to discuss the Court's subject- matter jurisdiction. Id. at 1. Earlier, the Court had determined that Plaintiffs' statement of claim ("Statement") indicated the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction over this controversy. Id. at 2. Therefore, the Court dismissed the case, which was reversed on appeal on the basis that the Statement did not have the status of a pleading and was not an amendment to the complaint. Id. The Court remarked that regardless of the existence of subject-matter jurisdiction based on the complaint alone, the Court must be satisfied that subject-matter jurisdiction existed at that stage. Because the motion did not address that point, Defendant had repeatedly insisted no subject-matter jurisdiction existed, and the Court's earlier order made clear that it was an important issue in the controversy, the Court declined to approve the settlement. Id. In addition, the Court noted that even if subject-matter jurisdiction existed, it must scrutinize the settlement to determine whether it was a fair and reasonable resolution of a bona fide dispute. Id. at 2-3. The Court that the motion did not include even a dollar figure of the proposed settlement, which precluded the Court from determining whether it was fair and reasonable. Id. at 3. Accordingly, the Court directed the parties to submit a new motion and settlement agreement that would address the Court's concerns and conformed to the FLSA.

Chavez, et al. v. PVH Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17511 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 11, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of retail store employees, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the California Labor Code by paying employees with payroll debit cards, and providing employees with inaccurate or incomplete wage statements. Plaintiffs' action was one of three putative class action lawsuits filed against Defendant that raised similar and overlapping allegations regarding its use of payroll debit cards. In the first of the three class actions, Scott-George v. PVH Corp., Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant failed to pay wages for meal breaks, rest breaks, bag checks, overtime, double overtime, and vested vacation pay, and also failed to provide compliant wage statements, in violation of the California Labor Code. Id. at *3. Two months later, Plaintiffs brought this class action alleging that Defendant had a pattern or practice of paying employees their final wages upon termination via payroll debit cards that required fees for usages, which resulted in employees not receiving all wages owed upon termination. Id. at *4. The third class action, Lapan v. PVH Corp., alleged that Defendant paid employees through a payroll card program, which required that employees pay certain fees and charges, allegedly resulting in employees not receiving their full wages. Id. at *6. The Lapan Plaintiffs alleged breach of contract, and violation of the FLSA and numerous provisions of the California Labor Code, including § 203. Id. Thereafter, the Scott-George Plaintiffs filed an amended complaint adding, for the first time, the allegation that Defendant paid them with payroll debit cards that resulted in reduction of earned wages. Id. at *7. Two months after the amendment, Plaintiffs reached a settlement with Defendant. The agreement of $1,850,000 provided that, after deducting the maximum amounts for attorneys' fees, litigation costs, and enhancement awards, approximately $1,276,250 would be distributed to class members who submit timely claim forms. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs from Lapan and Scott-George objected to the proposed settlement, arguing that it was the result of a "reverse auction," whereby Defendant sought to settle the claims for a relatively low amount of money. Id. at *12. The objectors also alleged that Defendant intended to use the release in the settlement to bar claims brought pursuant to § 203 in the related suits. Id. They further argued that the release language in the settlement was impermissibly broad, as it released claims based on facts not alleged in the complaint. Id. The Court agreed and denied approval of the proposed settlement. The Court noted Plaintiffs and Defendant acknowledged that they intended to use the release in this action to bar claims based on facts other than those alleged in the complaint, and such an action violates the rule in the Ninth Circuit that a class action settlement only could release claims based on an identical factual predicate as the claims alleged in the operating complaint. Id. at *13. Although the language of the settlement agreement, on its face, appeared to release only those claims that were raised or could have been raised related to the facts of the case, at the final settlement hearing, both Plaintiffs and Defendant stated that the release would also release claims based on facts which were not alleged in their compliant, including § 203 claims. Id. at *15-16. Thus, because the settlement purported to release claims beyond the scope of Plaintiffs' complaint, the Court found the settlement unfair and inappropriate for approval. In addition, the Court found that the proposed notice to be sent to class members was inadequate and misleading because it did not inform the class members that they might be releasing claims based on facts beyond those alleged in the complaint; rather, it informed the class members that they were only releasing claims that were raised or could have been raised related to the facts of the this action. Id. at *21. The notice also failed to inform the class members of the existence of related, pending litigation. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Court denied final approval of the settlement.

Cheeks, et al. v. Freeport Pancake House, Inc.,* 796 F.3d 199 (2d Cir. 2015). Plaintiff, a restaurant server and manager, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law. Id. at 200. Plaintiff also alleged that, when he complained about Defendant's failure to pay him and other employees the required overtime wages, Defendant retaliated against him by demoting and terminating him. Id. The parties appeared at an initial conference before the District Court and engaged in pre-trial discovery. During that span, they entered into a private settlement and filed a joint stipulation and order of dismissal with prejudice pursuant to Rule 41(a)(1)(A). The District Court declined to accept the stipulation, concluding that Plaintiff could not agree to a private settlement of his FLSA claims without either the approval of the District Court or the supervision of the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL"). Id. The District Court directed the parties to file a copy of the settlement agreement on the public docket and to "show cause why the proposed settlement reflected a reasonable compromise of disputed issues rather than a mere waiver of statutory rights brought about by an employer's overreaching." Id. Rather than disclose the terms of their settlement, the parties asked the District Court to stay further proceedings and certify the question for interlocutory appeal. Because both parties advocated in favor of reversal, the Second Circuit solicited the views of the DOL. The DOL argued that the FLSA fell within the "applicable federal statute" exception to Rule 41(a)(1)(A), such that the parties lacked authority to enter into a binding stipulation of dismissal without the involvement of the District Court or the DOL. Id. at 201. The Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's order and remanded. Rule 41(a)(1)(A) provides, in relevant part, that: "[s]ubject to Rules 23(c), 23.1(c), 23.2, and 66 and any applicable federal statute, the Plaintiff may dismiss an action without a Court order by filing: (i) a notice of dismissal . . . or (ii) a stipulation of dismissal signed by all parties who have appeared." The Second Circuit reviewed the phrase "any applicable federal statute" and found that two decisions from the Supreme Court – Brooklyn Savings Bank v. O'Neil, 324 U.S. 697 (1945), and D.A. Schulte, Inc. v. Gangi, 328 U.S. 108 (1946) – operated to preclude private settlements. Id. at 201-02. The Second Circuit noted that these two cases established that employees may not waive the right to recover liquidated damages under the FLSA, and employees may not privately settle the issue of whether an employer is covered under the FLSA. Id. at 203. Although these cases left open the question of whether employees could enforce private settlements of FLSA claims where there was a bona fide dispute as to liability, in considering that question, the Eleventh Circuit in Lynn's Food Stores, Inc. v. United States Department of Labor, 679 F.2d 1350 (11th Cir. 1982), answered "yes," but only if the DOL or a District Court first determined that the proposed settlement was fair and reasonable. Id. Although the Second Circuit discussed a District Court split that distinguished between "enforcement of a private settlement" and dismissal with prejudice by parties to a private settlement, it ultimately held that a private settlement of an FLSA claim could not serve as the basis for a Rule 41 dismissal with prejudice. Id. at 204. Accordingly, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's order and remanded for further proceedings.

Coffin, et al. v. MRI Enterprises,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34385 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 19, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The parties settled their dispute and filed a motion seeking approval of their settlement. The Court denied the motion. The Court remarked that it was unable to determine whether the settlement was fair and reasonable because the parties failed to provide the Court with enough information. Id. at *2. The Court explained that in seeking approval, the employer should articulate the reasons for disputing the employee's right to a minimum wage or overtime, and the employee must articulate the reasons justifying his entitlement to the disputed wages. Id. The Court determined that the parties failed to provide sufficient information regarding the time periods during which Plaintiffs were employed and the applicable hourly wage such that the Court could analyze if the settlement amount was fair and reasonable. Id. Additionally, the Court found that it could not approve the settlement agreement because it contained a confidentiality provision, which was contrary to well-established public policy and impeded one of the goals of the FLSA to ensure that all workers were aware of their rights. Id. at *3. The Court explained that, by including a confidentiality provision, an employer thwarts the informational objective of the FLSA by silencing the employee who had vindicated a disputed FLSA right. For these reasons, the Court denied the parties' motion for settlement approval.

Dynabursky, et al. v. Alliedbarton Security Services LP*, Case No. 12-CV-2210 (C.D. Cal. July 29, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant's company-wide policy precluding security officers from taking off-duty meal and rest breaks violated California law. The parties reached a settlement and submitted a joint stipulation to refer the case to arbitration for class action settlement purposes. The parties wanted to resolve the case, along with two related state court class actions, by submitting one joint class settlement agreement to a single third-party arbitrator for preliminary and final approval. Id. at 2. The Court refused to approve the stipulation and directed parties to submit a regularly-noticed motion addressing the issue. The parties then jointly moved to submit the class action settlement to arbitration, wherein the arbitrator would resolve all three cases in a single proceeding. The Court denied the motion again. The Court noted that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure expressly contemplated that the Court, not an arbitrator or other third-party, would approve any class action settlement. Id. at 3. The parties argued that the Court could confirm any eventual arbitral award, or refuse to confirm any eventual arbitral award if the Court found it unfair, unreasonable, or inadequate. Id. at 4. The Court disagreed. The Court noted that its power to review an arbitral award is extremely limited. It may reverse an arbitration award – even in the face of an erroneous interpretation of the law – only where the moving party shows that the arbitrator understood and correctly stated the law but then proceeded to disregard the law. Id. The Court also rejected the parties' comparison of the proposed settlement mechanism to the Court's delegation of matters to a Magistrate Judge. The Court noted that, although the Court can set aside a Magistrate Judge's order as contrary to law, the Court lacks the power to vacate an arbitration award simply because it is contrary to law. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' motion to refer the case to arbitration.

Flood, et al. v. Carlson Restaurants, Inc., Case No. 14-CV-2740 (S.D.N.Y. May 6, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a nationwide collective action against Defendants alleging a failure to pay overtime for off-the-clock work under the FLSA. Several Plaintiffs and Defendants agreed to individual settlements, and jointly moved the Court to conduct a confidential in camera review of nine private settlement agreements. The Court denied the motion. It noted that under the common law right to access, a presumption of public access attaches to any "judicial document," defined as a document "relevant to the performance of the judicial function and useful in the judicial process." Id. at 1. If a presumption applies, the Court must first determine the weight to be given to the presumption based on the role of the materials at issue in the exercise of Article III judicial power and the value of such information to those monitoring the judicial system. Further, the Court opined that it should weigh the presumption against any countervailing interests such as the privacy interests of those resisting disclosure, judicial efficiency, and the danger of impairing law enforcement. Id. The Court reasoned that FLSA agreements should not be confidential. The Court found that the FLSA settlements "indisputably" implicate the "judicial function," as they require judicial approval. Id. Therefore, the Court concluded that such agreements were considered as judicial documents subject to the presumption of access. The Court remarked that the rationale for rejecting confidential FLSA settlements from public scrutiny could thwart the public's independent interest in assuring that employees' wages are fair. The parties contended that confidentiality was warranted as public disclosure of those settlements might cause interference in the on-going litigation or possible settlement. The Court, however, concluded that the public's interest outweighed the parties' purported privacy interest, and denied the parties' request. Id. at 2.

Flood, et al. v. Carlson Restaurants, Inc., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88068 (S.D.N.Y. July 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of tipped employees at TGI Friday's restaurants, filed suit claiming that Defendants improperly availed themselves of the tip credit and wrongfully paid tipped employees less than the full statutory minimum hourly wage in violation of the FLSA and various state wage & hour laws. Defendants reached settlements with nine individual Plaintiffs and moved for approval of the settlement agreements. The Court denied the motion on two grounds. First, the agreements prohibited Plaintiffs from disclosing the existence of the agreements, the communications leading to the agreements, or the terms and provisions of the agreements with any person other than their attorneys, immediate family, or tax consultants, and provided Defendants liquidated damages of two percent of the settlement amounts for each breach. Id. at *4-5. The Court found that these provisions ran afoul of the purposes of the FLSA and the public's independent interest in assuring that employees' wages are fair. Id. The Court noted that, even when settlement papers are publicly available on the Court's docket, non-disclosure provisions defeat well-established public policy because they undermine the FLSA's primary goal of ensuring that workers are aware of their rights. Id at *6. The Court reasoned that barring Plaintiffs from publicly speaking about their experiences would frustrate Congress' intent to ensure widespread compliance with the statute by silencing employees who have vindicated disputed FLSA rights. Id. Second, the agreements contained waiver and release clauses under which Plaintiffs waived any possible claims against Defendants, including unknown claims and claims unrelated to wage & hour issues. Id. The Court found these waivers and releases too sweeping to be fair and reasonable because they covered any possible claims against Defendants, including unknown claims and claims that had no relationship whatsoever to wage & hour issues. The Court opined that such releases were "doubly problematic" in the FLSA context, where Courts have a duty to police unequal bargaining power between employees and employers. Id. The Court noted that, unless the releases were limited to claims relating to the existing suit, the Court would not approve the agreements. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion for approval of the settlement agreements.

Litty, et al. v. Merrill Lynch & Co., Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74693 (C.D. Cal. April 27, 2015). Plaintiff, a Financial Advisor ("FA"), brought a putative class action and collective action alleging that Defendants misclassified FAs as exempt and did not provide overtime compensation. Following the parties' agreement to settle, Plaintiff moved for certification of settlement class and preliminary approval of settlement. The Court denied certification of the settlement class, finding that Plaintiff failed to satisfy the commonality requirement. The Court had previously denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification on the basis that variations in how and where the FAs performed their primary duties was fatal to commonality. Id. at *10. Although Plaintiff had amended his complaint alleging claims on behalf of a more narrowly-defined class, the Court noted that it was still fatal to commonality as Plaintiff did not address any of the Court's concerns since the first failed class certification motion. Id. Plaintiff further failed to present any evidence demonstrating that his claims were typical of the claims of the class, despite the Court's previous finding that variation among job duties showed each claim atypical. Id. at *12-13. Although Plaintiff removed some of the senior FA positions from the proposed class, the Court determined that the record still showed significant disparities in duties, and how and where the putative class members performed their duties. The Court, therefore, concluded that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate that common question could be adjudicated on a class-wide basis, and thus a certification pursuant to Rule 23 would not be appropriate. Id. at *15. Because Plaintiff failed to provide substantial allegations and the modest factual showing that he was similarly-situated to other proposed collective group members' job requirements and pay provision, the Court also ruled that Plaintiff's action could not proceed as a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. As to settlement, the agreement proposed a total settlement amount of $5 million, out of which Plaintiff's counsel could seek $1 million in fees. After subtracting the requested attorneys' fees and costs, the California Labor & Workforce Development Agency payment, service awards, and anticipated administrative costs, the remaining net settlement fund was approximately $3.8 million. Id. at *24. The parties claimed that this was a significant recovery for class members in light of the risks and costs of further litigation. The Court, however, found that the amount offered weighed against preliminary approval. Because the Court had stricken all class, collective, and representative allegations, the Court found that the action was not as complex as Plaintiff purported. According to the Court, there was no substantial risk to the class members because Plaintiff's counsel did not represent them, and Plaintiff was in an exceedingly poor position to broker a class settlement of any kind. Id. at *26. It appeared to the Court that Defendants took advantage of Plaintiff's compromised position in order to negotiate a sweeping agreement to settle Plaintiff's case as well as two other class actions brought by the proposed interveners asserting off-the-clock and misclassification claims. Id. at *28. The Court therefore concluded that the settlement agreement was neither fair, reasonable, nor adequate. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for certification of settlement class and preliminary approval of a settlement.

Lopez, et al. v. KMDG LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111626 (E.D. Wis. Aug. 24, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action against Defendants for unpaid overtime wages under the FLSA and Wisconsin's wage & hour laws. The parties moved for settlement approval. The Court remarked that the proposed stipulation raised several questions and could not be approved until they were resolved. Id. at *1-2. The Court remarked that while seeking approval of the settlement, the parties had not addressed the collective action aspects of the case, and other than having the additional individuals who opted-in, Plaintiff had not sought conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. at *2. The Court remarked that the parties' stipulation also cited two cases regarding the attorneys' fees, both of which were class actions. Id. In addition, the Court expressed concern regarding the impact of Damasco v. Clearwire Corp., 662 F.3d 891 (7th Cir. 2011), on Plaintiffs' claims Id. Therefore, the Court directed the parties to file a response to those questions before conducting a hearing on the settlement agreement. Id. at *2-3.

Myles, et al. v. AlliedBarton Security Services, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 156760 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 9, 2015). Plaintiff, on behalf of herself and a putative class of approximately 11,500 security officers, brought an action against Defendant, her former employer, for violations of § 203 of the California Labor Code. Previously, the parties moved for approval of a proposed class settlement, which the Court denied because the proposed deal was replete with indicia that it would benefit Defendant and class counsel at the expense of the absent class members. Id. at *2. Subsequently, the parties filed a second proposed class settlement, which the Court denied again as the parties failed to correct many of the prior problems that doomed the first effort. Id. The Court opined that although parties had made some marginal improvements, they had not addressed the two most fundamental issues, including: (i) the settlement amount was extremely low in comparison to the only mathematical estimates of liability the parties provided and they did not provide any justification for the steeply discounted settlement amount; and (ii) because the release covered putative class members who received notice even if they made no claim for money, Defendant's liability would be limited on a "claims-made" basis. Id. at *5. Regarding the first issue, the Court observed that Plaintiff had estimated total potential liability at $18,975,000, based on multiplying the average hourly wage of the putative class by their average daily shift of right hours, multiplied by the approximate average delay in payment of vacation pay under § 203, multiplied by the average number of people in the putative class, plus a PAGA penalty of $100 per class member and a § 226 penalty of $50 per class member. Id. at *3. Although, the Court realized that the litigation was risky, the gross settlement amount of $1,750,000 was a tiny fraction of the total potential liability recoverable at trial, and that fraction was reduced further by class counsel's fees, settlement administration costs, and an "incentive" payment to the class representative. Id. at *4. The Court remarked that even if the baseline payment per class member was $114, most of the putative class members would never make a claim, which would reduce Defendant's pay-out to as little as half of the gross settlement amount. The Court, therefore, concluded that with a statute like § 203, whose references to "penalties" clearly contemplates a deterrent effect, that was an additional strike against the settlement, and although, such a strike might be mitigated by a convincing explanation of how the settlement amount was arrived at, the parties had provided no such explanation. Id. at *4-5. Accordingly, the Court again denied the parties' proposed class settlement.

Ramirez, et al. v. Ricoh Americas Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. 11789 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 30, 2015). Plaintiff, a technician, brought an action seeking unpaid wages and overtime compensation under the FLSA, the New York Minimum Wage Act, and the New York Labor law. Pursuant to a settlement agreement between the parties, Plaintiff moved for preliminary approval of a class settlement. The proposed settlement provided for a payment of of $325,000 inclusive of attorneys' fees and costs, the reasonable fees and expenses of the settlement administrator, and any class representative service award. Id. at *2. The proposed class consisted of about 400 members, and included all individuals employed by Defendant as a technician or in a comparable position in New York at any time between December 23, 2007, and July 14, 2014. The Court denied approval, finding that the proposed settlement agreement was substantially unfair. Although the negotiation process appeared to be procedurally fair, the Court found that Plaintiff did not provide enough details to back-up the settlement terms. Although Plaintiff contended that much more discovery would be required prior to trial to establish liability and damages, including depositions of Defendant, class members, and possibly experts, the Court found that Plaintiff failed to identify how much more discovery would be required, how many class members would need to deposed, and what experts would possibly be required in an action such as this one. Id. at *10. Plaintiff also failed to identify the conflicting case law or what the anticipated expense and likely duration of the litigation might be in the absence of the agreement. Id. at *11. Plaintiff further failed to show that the litigation would be complex, expensive, and time-consuming. Additionally, the Court pointed out other factors – such as the lack of evidence showing that the putative class members support the settlement as well as the lack of details provided regarding the amount of payroll documents, time records, and other information exchanged between parties, or about the number of workers whom Plaintiff interviewed, and the fact that only one deposition had been taken over the 7-month time period between the filing of the complaint and the settlement – to conclude that it did not militate in favor of granting settlement approval. Id. at *12-13. Plaintiff also failed to identify the risks of establishing liability and damages, or to address the range of reasonableness of the settlement fund. Id. at *14-16. The Court therefore found that none of the factors favored settlement approval. The Court further pointed out to the inconsistency of the proposed class definition in Plaintiff's notice of motion and memorandum of law, and the absence of a definition of the proposed class in the proposed settlement agreement and notices. Id. at *17. Plaintiff failed to explain what a comparable position to the position of technician would mean, and according to the Court, the inconsistency in the definition alone warranted rejection of the proposed settlement agreement. Id. The Court also identified other inconsistent, misleading, and ambiguous terms in the agreement, and therefore rejected Plaintiff's motion for preliminary approval of the settlement.

Ravenell, et al. v. Avis Budget Group, Inc., Case No. 08-CV-2113 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of shift managers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. The parties subsequently settled the action and moved for settlement approval, which the Court denied. The total amount of the settlement fund amounted to $7,800,000 and the net amount to be distributed to the 251 Plaintiffs amounted to $4,866,600, after payment of attorneys' fees and costs, service payments to the named Plaintiffs, and settlement administration costs. Id. at 3. The settlement agreement did not provide the final amount that each Plaintiff would receive, or the underlying data with which the distribution calculations would be made. The Settlement stipulated that each of the 251 Plaintiffs would receive each Plaintiff's settlement calculation, which would be calculated by the number of workweeks a Plaintiff worked as a shift/operations manager during each of their respective applicable statute of limitations periods, excluding workweeks that were released in any prior litigation and excluding workweeks during any leave of absence period, divided by the total number of workweeks worked by all Plaintiff as a shift/operations manager for either Defendant during the applicable statute of limitations period and multiplying that fraction against the net settlement fund. Id. The Court remarked that this formula alone did not enable a determination of fairness, and observed that to determine fairness, the Court must review the underlying data that would be used to calculate the distributions, as well as the final amount to be distributed to each Plaintiff. Id. Plaintiffs' counsel also requested approval of their attorneys' fees of $2,597,400, which constituted one-third or 33.3% of the total settlement fund and costs of $251,000. The Court found that Plaintiff's counsel failed to submit any factual basis regarding the reasonableness of the fees. Accordingly, the Court concluded that due to the lack of information, it was unable to determine if the settlement was fair and reasonable, and accordingly, denied the motion.

Schneider, et al. v. Habitat For Humanity International, Inc., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14679 (W.D. Ark. Feb. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them one and a half times their regular rate for all time that they worked in excess of 40 hours per week in violation of the FLSA and the Arkansas Minimum Wage Act. The parties settled the litigation. Pursuant to their settlement, the parties filed a joint motion requesting the Court to review the FLSA settlement in camera, and to approve the settlement. The parties argued that the private settlement agreement did not need the Court's approval; however, if the Court determined its approval was necessary, then its review should be performed in camera and the settlement agreement should be filed under seal. Id. at *2. The Court noted that the U.S. Supreme Court held in Brooklyn Savings Bank v. O'Neil, 324 U.S. 697, 707 (1945), that in the absence of a bona fide dispute, a party may not waive his rights under the FLSA to minimum wages, overtime wages, or liquidated damages. Id. at *2-3. Further, the Supreme Court observed that statutory rights conferred on private parties cannot be waived if those rights affect the public interest and if their waiver would contravene the statutory policy. Id. at *3. The Supreme Court pointed out that permitting private parties to waive the FLSA guaranteed protections against substandard wages in the absence of a bona fide dispute would nullify the purposes of the FLSA. Id. Further, the Eleventh Circuit in Lynn's Food Stores, Inc. v. United States, 679 F.2d 1350, 1353 (11th Cir. 1982), held that settlement agreements waiving FLSA rights were unenforceable when they were neither entered as a stipulated judgment nor negotiated or supervised by the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL"). Id. at *4. In absence of any Eighth Circuit precedent to the point, the Court remarked that the risk was minimal that an unreasonable settlement would result from "unequal bargaining power as between employer and employee" in FLSA lawsuits where each of the following three criteria was met: (i) the lawsuit was not a collective action; (ii) all individual Plaintiffs were represented by an attorney thought the proceedings ; and (iii) all parties had indicated to the Court in writing through their attorneys that they wished for their settlement agreement to remain private and that they did not wish for any reasonableness review of their settlement to occur. Id. In such cases, the Court held that any reasonableness review or public filing of an FLSA settlement was unnecessary. Accordingly, as each of the requirements was met, the Court denied the parties' motion, and instructed them to file a joint stipulation of dismissal. Id. at *7-8.

Editor's Note: Though not a certified collection action, the result in Schneider adopts a minority view that FLSA settlements need not be approved by the Court or the DOL.

Sharobiem, et al. v. CVS Pharmacy, Inc.,* Case No. 13-CV-9426 (C.D. Cal. Sept. 2, 2015). Plaintiff, a pharmacist, brought a class action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime compensation. After the parties settled the matter, Plaintiff moved for preliminary approval of the settlement and provisional class certification, which the Court denied. The Court observed that Plaintiff failed to provide sufficient information on how she estimated the class had claims for $4.26 million in overtime compensation. Id. at 2. The Court observed that Plaintiff merely stated that Plaintiff's counsel conducted a detailed analysis of class member data to arrive at that amount, but otherwise gave no explanation of that analysis. Id. The Court noted that Plaintiff failed to provide a reasoned analysis of why the case was properly discounted to the $2,937,600 settlement amount, which was approximately 69% of the estimated total possible recovery of $4.26 million. Id. The Court noted that Plaintiff claimed in a cursory fashion that the settlement was appropriate given the continued risks of litigation, including the uncertainty of achieving class certification, increased fees, and costs of taking a case through trial and possible appeal. Id. The Court found that Plaintiff failed to provide sufficient information about class members' pay rates for the Court to determine whether the recovery amount was within the range of reasonable allocations of the $2,937,600. Id. at 3. The Court, accordingly, refused to give preliminary approval to the class settlement. The Court next observed that Plaintiff did not explicitly request certification of an FLSA collective action, yet the settlement agreement included provisions regarding the release of FLSA claims, clearly contemplating the existence of an FLSA collective action. Id. For this reason, the Court ruled that Plaintiff must first move for preliminary certification of both a class action and collective action supported by the relevant declarations. Further, the Court expressed serious reservations about the scope of the FLSA release. The Court explained that the FLSA authorizes only opt-in collective actions, and under no circumstances could Plaintiff's counsel collude to take away the FLSA rights including the worker's right to control his or her own claim without having the burden of having to opt-out of someone else's lawsuit. Id. Here, no separate value was being paid for the FLSA release, and yet, if a class member choose not to opt-into the FLSA collective action by not filing a claim form, he or she would have released all state law claims for no compensation at all. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the settlement was not fair, reasonable, and adequate. Id. at 4. The Court also expressed concerns with the claim form, as the form's instructions were unfairly confusing, and did not differentiate between a class action and the FLSA collective action. Id. at 5. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for approval of the settlement.

Stewart, et al. v. USA Tank Sales, Inc.*, Case No. 12-CV-5136 (W.D. Mo. Aug. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former tank makers, brought a collective and class action alleging that Defendant denied them overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the Missouri Minimum Wage and Maximum Hour Law. Subsequently, the parties settled the action, and Plaintiffs moved for approval of a joint settlement stipulation. Pursuant to the settlement agreement, Defendant paid $12,629.58 to Plaintiff Shawn Stewart; $12,687.16 to Plaintiff Brian Damann; $8,406.93 to Plaintiff Grant Oilar; $20,019.23 to Michael Hagermann; $13,896.38 to Nathan Damann; $12,847.31 to Plaintiffs' counsel for reimbursement of expenses; and $57,013 to Plaintiffs' counsel for attorneys' fees. Id. at 2. In return, all five of the named Plaintiffs agreed to waive their FLSA claims against Defendant. Id. The Court, however, determined that the record was missing necessary information regarding the settlement, because the settlement provided payment to two individuals, Michael Hagermann and Nathan Damann, who were not parties to this lawsuit, and there was no explanation on the record explaining why they were receiving money. Id. Furthermore, nothing in the existing record explained how this litigation involved a bona fide wage & hour dispute, how the proposed settlement was fair and equitable to all parties, or the reasonableness of the proposed attorneys' fees award. Id. at 3. Thus, the Court concluded that it could not approve the settlement. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for settlement approval.

Stubrud, et al. v. Daland Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114505 (D. Kan. Aug. 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former delivery drivers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants failed adequately to reimburse Plaintiffs' automobile expenses, which led their net wages to fall below the federal minimum wage. The parties subsequently settled, and Plaintiffs moved the Court for approval of a collective action settlement and attorneys' fees. The Court denied the motion. The Court noted that, although the FLSA does not require a fairness hearing like that required for settlements of class actions brought under Rule 23, many judges have determined that fairness hearings should be held unless the parties notify the Court that the opt-in Plaintiffs received notice of the settlement and had an opportunity to object. Id. at 1. The Court found that Plaintiffs' submissions did not reflect that opt-in Plaintiffs had received notice of the settlement and had an opportunity to object. However, the Court declined to set a fairness hearing because it found that it could not approve the settlement agreement in its existing form. Id. The Court held that the settlement agreement should not be kept confidential and should not prohibit or penalize collective action members for sharing information about the settlement with others. The Court found that, because the parties' agreement contained a provision that penalized members from disclosing the terms of the settlement, the Court could not approve it. Finally, the Court determined that the exhibit referred to in the settlement agreement – containing the list of all opt-in Plaintiffs and the corresponding settlement amounts calculated – was not attached with the agreement. Id. at 2. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to approve the collective action settlement and attorneys' fees and ordered the parties to submit a revised settlement agreement.

Valdez, et al. v. The Neil Jones Food Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9284 (E.D. Cal. Jan. 26, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of non-exempt hourly employees, brought a class action against Defendant alleging failure to provide meal and rest breaks and failure to pay overtime. The parties settled and sought approval of the class action settlement. The Court denied preliminary approval of the parties' settlement, and subsequently Plaintiffs filed a second motion for preliminary approval. The Magistrate Judge again recommended denying the motion. The parties sought to approve a single class for the purposes of settlement consisting of hourly employees within California. The Magistrate Judge found that Plaintiffs failed to establish commonality. While the named Plaintiff Valdez testified that he did not receive overtime on three occasions, Plaintiff Martinez testified that she never worked more than eight hours without receiving overtime. Id. at *16. Regarding the meal breaks claim, Plaintiff Martinez contended that Defendant knew she could not go to lunch because she was the only mechanic. The Magistrate Judge remarked that even if that were the case, it did not establish commonality for the class as a whole. Plaintiff Martinez testified that for a period of time Defendant told her to take a 20-minute rather than a 30-minute lunch break. The Magistrate Judge found that although this claim might prove to be sufficient to establish commonality with those employees working under the same conditions, the motion for preliminary approval did not raise this question. Id. at *17. In addition, Plaintiffs' testimony about the period of rest breaks Defendant permitted varied. As a result, the Magistrate Judge concluded that Plaintiffs failed to raise a common question that was capable of class-wide resolution. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Court denied class certification. The Magistrate Judge also noted that in the initial motion for preliminary approval, the parties only provided for notice to be mailed to the last known address of the employee, which Defendant had to provide to the settlement administrator. The Court found that this was not sufficient to meet the notice requirement. Although the revised agreement required the settlement administrator to do a skip trace for any mail that was returned without a forwarding address and mail a notice to any newly discovered address, the Magistrate Judge remarked that this did not remedy the earlier concern. Because Defendant's employees were seasonal workers, over half of the proposed class members had not worked for Defendant for a year or longer. Thus, the Magistrate Judge found that there still existed the concern that the addresses provided by Defendant would not be current. Id. at *25-26. Finally, the Magistrate Judge noted that after deducting $268,000 in attorney fees from the total settlement amount of $850,000, the net settlement fund of $531,758 provided for $3.33 to compensate each pay period equivalent that included Defendant's share of the payroll taxes. Given that 75% of any undistributed funds would revert to Defendant, the Magistrate Judge opined that the parties may have agreed upon an inflated settlement fund, knowing that a large number of the class members would not receive notice or submit claim forms, in order for class counsel to receive substantial attorneys' fees with Defendant not significantly at risk of actually incurring the obligation to pay the majority of the net settlement fund. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended denying preliminary approval to the settlement.

Vargas, et al. v. General Nutrition Centers, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35330 (W.D. Pa. Mar. 20, 2015). In this FLSA collective action seeking overtime pay, the parties, following a settlement, filed a joint motion to file their settlement agreement and release under seal citing their mutual understanding that the documents should be deemed confidential. Id. at *2. The Court denied the motion. The Court determined that the FLSA settlement agreement submitted to the Court for approval is a judicial record and, as such, the FLSA settlements are subject to the right of access doctrine and available to the public unless the parties make a sufficient showing to override the strong presumption of access. Id. The Court indicated that the parties, however, had ignored that body of law and had instead sought the Court to deem their settlement agreement and release to be confidential. The Court noted that a stipulation to seal would not overcome the strong presumption, nor would the mere fact that the settlement agreement contained a confidentiality provision. Id. at *3. Thus, the Court concluded that the parties had failed to make sufficient showing to override the strong presumption in favor of the public's right of access. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' motion.

Wallace, et al. v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc.,* Case No. 08-CV-1463 (C.D. Cal. April 17, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of branch account executives, brought a putative class action and a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt and denied them overtime pay in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Defendant allegedly classified Plaintiffs as exempt from overtime pay requirements from 2002 to 2004. Later, Defendant re-classified them as non-exempt and paid them overtime pursuant to a voluntary back pay program. Under the program, Defendant sent each qualifying employee an acknowledgment letter explaining the details of the back pay programs, and paid five hours of overtime pay per week of employment. Id. at 2-3. Plaintiffs brought this action challenging Defendant's program of distributing back pay. Eventually, the parties reached a settlement on behalf of a class of the branch account executives who received compensation in connection with Defendant's back pay program. Id. at 5. Under the settlement agreement, each member of the settlement class who timely submitted a claim was entitled to receive the lesser of: (i) $1,500; or (ii) the number of overtime hours the class member contended to have worked in excess of five hours per week multiplied by 1.5 times the regular rate for each pay period. Id. at 6. The settlement agreement also provided that each of the three named Plaintiffs could apply for an enhancement award of $7,500 and that Plaintiffs' counsel could apply for an award of costs not to exceed $150,000 and attorneys' fees of up to $3,150,000. Id. The settlement agreement estimated a maximum total settlement pay-out of $10,500,000. Plaintiffs moved for final approval of settlement and Plaintiffs' counsel sought $3,150,000 in attorneys' fees. The Court granted final approval of the settlement finding it fair, reasonable, and adequate. The Court noted that in light of the risks and uncertainties, the settlement amount represented a positive result for the settlement class and it included a fair, reasonable, and adequate scheme for distributing payments to class members. Id. at 11. The Court further granted Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees, finding that a departure was warranted from the Ninth Circuit's benchmark of 25% of the common fund recovery. Id. at 21. The Court found the requested fees reasonable in light of the entire history and circumstances of the case. Id. at 17-18. The Court noted that the settlement created a $6,271,500 settlement fund for 4,181 potential class members, and 1,079 class members would receive payments ranging up to 41,500, and totaling approximately $1,509,596.98. Id. at 18. The Court found that Plaintiffs' counsel achieved significant results on behalf of the class, expending thousands of attorney and paralegal hours on this complex case over its nine and a half year history, and this weighed in favor of awarding the requested fee. Moreover, the lodestar cross-check also confirmed the reasonableness of the requested fee. The Court noted that Plaintiffs' counsel submitted a lodestar figure of $3,424,687.50, calculated at rates between $350 to $600 per hour, and sought the maximum amount of fees and costs available under the settlement agreement, which represented a 0.92 fee multiplier under the lodestar approach. Id. at 21. The Court therefore found Plaintiffs' counsels' requested attorneys' fees in the amount of $3,150,000 reasonable, and accordingly, granted final approval of the settlement.

Willner, et al. v. Manpower, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 2, 2015). Plaintiff, an hourly employee, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to furnish accurate wage statements, and failed to pay all wages to employees who received their wages by U.S. mail in violation of the California Labor Code. The parties settled the action and filed a motion for preliminary approval, which the Court denied without prejudice. The Court had identified three obvious deficiencies in the settlement agreement, including: (i) the release was overly broad; (ii) it omitted the average payment that each claimant could expect to receive; and (iii) it omitted the amount that was expected to be paid to the claims administrator. The parties subsequently filed an amended settlement agreement and the Court granted settlement approval. Under the settlement agreement, Defendant agreed to make a maximum settlement payment of $8,750,000, which consisted of (i) all settlement payments to class members; (ii) class counsel's attorneys' fees; (iii) the class representative's incentive payment; (iv) the settlement administrator's fees and costs; (v) the hold-back fund to cover any required payments to the claimants who were mistakenly omitted from the class list; and (vi) the payment under the Private Attorney General Act to the state. Id. at *15. The Court found that the amended settlement agreement had corrected the three obvious deficiencies identified in its previous order. First, the parties revised the language of the release to clarify that it applied only to claims that "arise out of the allegations in the lawsuit." Id. at *8. Although the original version of the settlement agreement erroneously contained the words "or are related to," the parties discovered the mistake and corrected it. Id. Second, the proposed notice now reflected that there were approximately 20,270 class members; identified the average payment each claimant could expect to receive; identified the amount expected to be paid to the claims administrator; and listed the address and contact information of the claims administrator. Id. at *9. Finally, the settlement agreement provided class members with 60 days to opt-out or object to the settlement. In light of the parties' amendments to the proposed settlement agreement, the Court concluded that the settlement fell "within the range of possible approval," and granted Plaintiff's motion for provisional certification of the settlement class. Id. at *10. The Court clarified that the certification was for settlement purposes only, and would not constitute or be construed as an admission by Defendant that this action was appropriate for class treatment for litigation purposes. Id.

Willner, et al. v. Manpower, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80697 (N.D. Cal. June 22, 2015). Plaintiff, an hourly employee, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, a temporary staffing firm, violated the California Labor Code by failing to furnish accurate wage statements and to timely pay all wages to employees who received their wages by U.S. mail. Id. at *2. The parties eventually settled. Following preliminary approval of the parties' proposed settlement agreement and a conditional certification of a putative class for settlement purposes, Plaintiff moved for final approval of the settlement. The settlement required Defendant to create a fund of $8,750,000, which represented 30% to 35% of the estimated recovery. Id. at *4. The amount included payments to the class, attorneys' fees and costs, any service award to Plaintiff, penalties under the Private Attorney General Act in the amount of $65,625, a $25,000 hold-back fund to cover payments to mistakenly omitted claimants, and an estimated $102,000 for the cost of settlement administration. Id. The Court granted the motion for final approval of the settlement, finding that the strength of Plaintiff's case, its risk, complexity, and the likely duration of litigation, as well as and risk of achieving and maintaining class action status all favored approval. Id. at *8-10. The Court further determined that the parties had conducted sufficient discovery that allowed them to make an informed decision regarding the adequacy of the settlement, and the percentage of recovery was fair and reasonable given the uncertainties attached to the litigation of Plaintiff's claims. Id. at *12-13. The Court thus found the settlement fair, reasonable and adequate. The Court, however, rejected the request of Plaintiff's counsel for a 33.33% fee award totaling $2,916,666.67. Although Plaintiff argued that class counsel obtained substantial monetary relief and a policy change valued at as much as $13,125,000, and faced substantial risks in prosecuting the litigation, the Court opined that an award of 33.33% of the common fund was not appropriate given that class counsel provided no way for the Court to confirm the correctness of policy change's value. Id. at *18-20. While the parties did not provide sufficient information from which the Court could place a specific value on it, the Court noted that if it valued the policy change at an amount equaling at least $1,750,000 – about 13% of the estimate of Plaintiff's counsel's– then a fee award of $2,625,000 would represent 25% of the total actual and constructive relief obtained by counsel. Id. at *21-22. Because the briefs and declarations submitted in connection with the motion for fees adequately supported the anticipated $1,251,463 total lodestar, the Court concluded that a fee award of $2,625,000 was reasonable. Id. at *22. The Court therefore awarded attorneys' fees in the amount of 30% of the common fund in the amount of $2,625,000.

(xvii) DOL Wage & Hour Enforcement Actions

Gate Guard Services, LP, et al. v. U.S. Department Of Labor*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 11480 (5th Cir. July 2, 2015). Following an investigation by the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") that Gate Guard Services, LP violated the FLSA, and that an enforcement action was imminent, Gate Guard sued the DOL seeking a declaration that it was in compliance with the FLSA. In 2010, acting on a tip from a former gate attendant that Gate Guard was misclassifying its attendants as independent contractors, DOL investigator David Rapstine opened a formal investigation. Id. at *4. Rapstine had little training or experience in contractor misclassification cases, and in what appeared to be a cursory investigation based on his failure to ask basic questions, concluded that Gate Guard misclassified 400 gate attendants as independent contractors, and therefore, it failed to abide by the FLSA's minimum wage and overtime requirements. Id. at *6. Before this complaint was served, the DOL filed its own FLSA enforcement action for back wages and injunctive relief, and both cases were consolidated. After having opposed every move from Gate Guard, it became clear that the DOL had no viable position due to a nearly identical case entitled Mack v. Talasek, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42485 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 28, 2012), which found that gate attendants were not FLSA-covered employees. The District Court granted Gate Guard summary judgment against the DOL's claims, and the DOL did not appeal. Gate Guard then moved to recover attorneys' fees under the Equal Access to Justice Act's ("EAJA") bad faith provision, 28 U.S.C. § 2412(b). Id. at *12. The District Court concluded that the DOL's conduct was not sufficiently egregious to constitute bad faith, and denied the request. Id. The District Court, however, allowed Gate Guard to recover attorneys' fees under the EAJA's substantially justified provision under the § 2412(d). Gate Guard then reframed its original fee request, and the District Court found that the DOL's position was not substantially justified and awarded over $565,000 in attorneys' fees. Both sides appealed and the Fifth Circuit found that the award of attorneys' fees under the EAJA's bad faith provision was appropriate. At the outset, the Fifth Circuit noted that the EAJA provides two paths for recovering attorneys' fees: (i) under § 2412(b), the federal government may be liable for attorneys' fees to the same extent that any other party would be liable under common law, i.e., District Courts can award fees when a party has acted in bad faith; and (ii) under § 2412(d), which allows District Courts to award attorneys' fees unless the position of the federal government was substantially justified. Id. at *13. Here, the Fifth Circuit found that the DOL's position was poorly documented and legally dubious as of the commencement of the litigation. Id. at *19. As the case progressed, the Fifth Circuit remarked that the government's intransigence in spite of its legally deteriorating case, combined with extreme penalty demands and outrageous tactics, together supported a bad faith finding. Id. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit concluded the government's bad faith was established. The Fifth Circuit remarked that the government's extraordinarily uncivil and costly litigation tactics strongly suggested that it hoped to prevail by oppressively pursuing a very weak case, which left Gate Guard at a tremendous and unfair disadvantage. Id. at *22-23. The Fifth Circuit observed that without Rapstine's notes or witnesses statements, Gate Guard had no way of assessing its risk in this case or evaluating its settlement potential. Only by expending over $800,000 in attorneys' fees, wasting countless hours of employees' time, and marshalling affidavits from 94 gate attendants was Gate Guard able to vindicate itself. Id. at *22. The Fifth Circuit concluded these expenditures were needless, and accordingly, remanded the case to the District Court for calculation of attorneys' fees under § 2412(b). Id. at *25.

Home Care Association Of America, et al. v. Weil,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4401 (D.D.C. Jan. 14, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of trade associations that represent third-party home care providers, brought an action challenging the U.S. Department of Labor's ("DOL") narrowed definition of "companionship services" and the DOL's third-party employment regulation. Id. at *2. The companionship services exemption under 29 U.S.C. § 213(a)(15) exempts employers from paying minimum wage and overtime wages to employees in domestic service who provide companionship services to individuals who are unable to care for themselves. Id. at *3-4. The DOL's implementing regulations define "companionship services" to mean those services which provide fellowship, care, and protection for persons who, because of advanced age or physical or mental infirmity, cannot care for their own needs. Id. at *4. Under the definition, companionship services can include limited general household work not to exceed 20% of total weekly work hours. Id. In 2013, the DOL issued a final rule revising its domestic service employment regulations at 29 C.F.R. Part 552. The final rule eradicated the exemption for third-party employers and contained a new, significantly-narrowed, definition of "companionship services." Id. at *5. The final rule defined "companionship services" to mean the provision of fellowship and protection to elderly persons or persons with illness, injuries, or disabilities who require assistance in caring for themselves. Id. Although the new definition included the provision of care, it required that the care be attendant to, and in conjunction with, the provision of fellowship and protection and limited the provision of care to 20% of the total hours worked per person and per workweek. Id. Plaintiffs moved to vacate the DOL's new definition of "companion services," arguing that this definition violated the language and legislative intent of FLSA because it removed "care" from the regulatory definition. Id. at *9. The Court granted the motion. Although Congress has not defined the outer bounds of companionship services, it has addressed whether that definition must include, in a meaningful way, the provision of care. The Court held that the exemption clearly targets workers who provide services to those who need care, and limiting that care to only 20% of a worker's total hours defies logic and Congressional intent. Id. at *15. Congress did not limit the companionship services exemption to services provided on a "casual basis," as it did for its babysitter exemption within the same statutory provision, and, when discussing the companionship services exemption in particular, legislators expressed their concern with the ability of their constituents to pay for in-home care provided on a regular basis. Id. at *16. Home care workers have been providing care to the elderly and disabled, under the umbrella of the companionship services exemption, since the enactment of the 1974 FLSA Amendments. Although Congress has made numerous changes to the FLSA exemptions, the Court observed that it had not cabined the definition of companionship services, which has been interpreted by the DOL the same way for 40 years. Id. at *19. The Court opined that Congress' intent in 1974 to exempt from minimum and overtime wage requirements domestic workers providing services, including care to the elderly and disabled, was as clear today as it was 40 years ago. Accordingly, the Court vacated the DOL's regulation defining "companionship services," promulgated in 78 Fed. Reg. 60,557 and to be codified at 29 C.F.R. § 552.6.

Home Care Association Of America, et al. v. Weil,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 14730 (D.C. Cir. Aug. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, three associations of home care agencies, brought an action challenging the U.S. Department of Labor's ("DOL") extension of the FLSA's minimum wage and overtime provisions to employees of third-party agencies who provide companionship services and live-in care within a home. Id. at *5. The FLSA exempts "domestic service" workers providing either companionship services of live-in care for the elderly, ill, or disabled, from its protections guaranteeing a minimum wage and overtime pay. Id. at *3-4. Until recently, the DOL interpreted these exemptions to include employees of third-party providers. However, the growing demand for long-term home care services and the rising cost of traditional institutional care fundamentally changed the nature of the home care industry, and correspondingly, professionals employed by third-party agencies increasingly have started providing the residential care services. Id. at *4-5. In response to these developments, the DOL adopted regulations bringing the companionship-service and live-in workers employed by third-party agencies within the FLSA's minimum wage and overtime protections. Id. at *5. The District Court invalidated the DOL's new regulation, concluding that they contravened the terms of the FLSA exemptions. Id. at *5-6. On the DOL's appeal, the D.C. Circuit reversed the District Court, finding that the DOL's decision was grounded on a reasonable interpretation of the statute and was neither arbitrary nor capricious. Id. at *6. The D.C. Circuit agreed with the DOL that its revised regulation was within the scope of its rule-making authority under the general agency delegation in § 29(b) of the 1974 Amendments because the subject matter of the regulation concerned a matter in respect to which the agency was expert. Id. at *13-15. Plaintiffs argued that, even if the regulation amounted to a valid exercise of the DOL's authority, it exceeding its authority when, instead of "defining" the terms of the companionship-services exemption, it issued a rule providing that third-party employers "may not avail themselves" of the exemption. Id. at *18. The D.C. Circuit rejected Plaintiffs' argument on the grounds that the DOL's authority did not flow solely from the language of the authorizing section, but from the general grant provided by § 29(b) to "work out" the statutory "gaps" through rules and regulations. Id. Plaintiffs also argued that DOL's new rules conflicted with the legislative history of the FLSA Amendments. The D.C. Circuit, however, found that the statute's legislative history provided no clear answer to the third-party employment question. Id. at *19. Further, because Congress' overriding intent was to bring more workers within the FLSA's protection and the 1974 Amendments intended to expand the coverage of the FLSA to include all employees whose vocation was domestic service, the D.C. Circuit held that the DOL reasonably determined that the companionship-services and live-in exemptions from coverage should be defined narrowly in the regulations to achieve the law's purpose. Id. at *21. Moreover, the DOL justified its shift in policy based on the "dramatic transformation of the home care industry since the promulgation of the third-party employer regulation in 1975." Id. at *25. The DOL suggested that the new rule would improve the quality of home care services, because it would bring more workers under the FLSA's protections, which would create a more stable workforce by equalizing wage protections with other health care workers and reducing turnover, and it would benefit consumers because supporting and stabilizing the direct care workforce would result in better qualified employees, lower turnover, and a higher quality of care. Id. at *29. In light of the DOL's explanation, the D.C. Circuit concluded that the DOL's conduct was neither arbitrary nor capricious. Accordingly, the D.C. Circuit reversed the District Court's order and remanded for the entry of summary judgment in the DOL's favor.

In The Matter Of Texas Roadhouse Management Corp.,* 2015 DOL Ad. Rev. Bd. LEXIS 39 (DOL July 21, 2015). In this action, an employer appealed a decision and order of a U.S. Department of Labor Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ"), which affirmed the Wage & Hour Division's ("WHD") assessment of a civil money penalty for repeated violations of 29 U.S.C. §§ 206 and 207. Based on the WHD's investigation in late 2011 and early 2012 of Texas Roadhouse's restaurant in Hickory, North Carolina, the WHD determined that the employer repeatedly violated §§ 206 and 207. Id. at *1. The WHD found that the employer: (i) improperly paid 12 head waitresses a tip credit wage for performing administrative work at the end of their shifts; and (ii) failed to properly factor production bonus payments into one employee's overtime compensation, resulting in underpayment of wages. Id. at *2. The WHD determined that Texas Roadhouse owed a total of $5,055.92 in back wages to 13 employees. Id. Similarly, in early 2012, the WHD conducted an investigation of Texas Roadhouse's restaurant in Bangor, Maine, and found multiple FLSA violations. In 2013, the WHD notified Texas Roadhouse that it was assessing a civil money penalty, pursuant to the FLSA, in the amount of $880 related to the Bangor violation. It cited the Hickory violations as the previous violation for imposing a civil money penalty for a repeat violation of the FLSA. An Order of Reference was subsequently filed with the Office of Administrative Law Judges that submitted the matter for final determination by an ALJ regarding entry of the assessment and the amount of the penalty. The only issue before the ALJ was whether Texas Roadhouse engaged in repeated violations of the FLSA. Upon cross-motions by the parties, the ALJ issued an order granting WHD's motion. On Texas Roadhouse's appeal, the ARB affirmed. At the outset, the ARB noted that a violation of §§ 206 and 207 of the FLSA shall be deemed a "repeated violation" where the employer has previously violated §§ 206 or 207, provided the employer had previously received notice. Id. at *5. Citing the FLSA's plain meaning and its implementing regulations, the ALJ found the employer engaged in repeated violations as defined by § 16(e)(2) of the FLSA. The ARB agreed with the ALJ that neither the FLSA nor its implementing regulations require the previous and subsequent violation to be the same or similar, as Texas Roadhouse had argued. Id. at *6. Moreover, the ARB agreed with the ALJ that even if the FLSA were interpreted to require similar violations before civil penalties could be imposed, the Hickory and Bangor violations were similar to the extent that both involved the improper payment to employees for the hours they worked. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the ARB affirmed the civil penalty.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Cathedral Buffett, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 153800 (N.D. Ohio Nov. 13, 2015). Plaintiff, the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL"), brought an enforcement action on behalf of 238 current and former employees of Defendants, alleging violations of the FLSA's minimum wage, overtime, record-keeping, and child labor provisions. Id. at *2. Defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted and for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. The Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss. First, the Court found that the DOL had adequately alleged facts to state a claim under the FLSA sufficient to meet the threshold pleading requirements of Rule 8(a)(2). Id. at *3. The Court observed that the complaint provided fair notice to Defendants and contained allegations that their employees had not received the minimum wage and overtime as required by the FLSA, and that Defendants improperly employed minors and failed to maintain required payroll records. Id. at *4.

Defendants argued that the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction over the allegations that Defendants violated the provisions of the Act which prohibited the employment of oppressive child labor. Id. at *6. The Court opined that the DOL had dual roles in recovering prospective injunctive relief for employees and in assessing civil money penalties for child labor violations. Id. The Court found that the FLSA authorized the assessment of civil money penalties for child labor violations and an injunction against Defendants to restrain them from violating §§ 12(c) and 15(a)(4) of the FLSA, 29 U.S.C. §§ 212(c) and 215(a)(4). Id. at *7. Consequently, the Court found that nothing in the FLSA or the regulations suggested that payment of civil money penalties foreclosed on the DOL's ability to obtain injunctive relief for child labor violations. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

U.S. Department of Labor v. El Tequila, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171446 (N.D. Okla. Dec. 22, 2015). The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") brought an action alleging that Defendants violated the FLSA by failing to pay their employees the statutory minimum wage and overtime wages, and by failing to maintain sufficient records of their employees' wages and hours. Id. at *9-10. The Court had earlier granted the DOL summary judgment with respect to the calculation of damages and application of liquidated damages, except to the issue of willfulness of Defendants' violations. Referring the issue to the jury, the Court instructed that Defendants' violations of the FLSA were willful if Defendants either knew that their conduct violated the FLSA or showed reckless disregard for the matter of whether it did. The jury heard testimony from a number of witnesses on the issue of willfulness, and determined that Defendants willfully violated the FLSA during the relevant time. Id. at *11-12. Defendant Carlos Aguirre, who controlled the operations of Defendant El Tequila, LLC, admitted that he paid employees a set salary regardless of the number of hours they worked. Id. at *13. Although Aguirre kept handwritten records of how much he actually paid his employees in cash and checks, he admitted that he falsified records, and sent fake information to his accountant to make it look as if paid his employees the minimum wage and overtime. Id. at *4-5. Aguirre admitted to hiding this information from a DOL investigator in 2010 and instructing his employees also to tell the same lies. Id. at *20. The Court determined that Defendants knew that they were breaking the law and took steps to cover it up. Id. at *25. The Court thus held that Defendants' violations met the standard for willfulness under the FLSA, and accordingly, granted the DOL's renewed motion for judgment as matter of law.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Howes, LLC*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 10476 (6th Cir. June 22, 2015). The Secretary of the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") brought an action alleging that Defendant, Darryl Howes, owner of Darryl Howes Farms, paid less than minimum wage to workers, failed to keep adequate time records for workers, provided substandard housing to workers, and interfered with the DOL's investigation into his labor practices in violation of the FLSA, and the Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Worker Protection Act ("MSPA"). The District Court granted the DOL's motion for summary judgment, which the Sixth Circuit affirmed on appeal. The District Court had determined, contrary to Howes' contentions that: (i) Howes' cucumber harvesters were employees, and not independent contractors; (ii) Howes controlled the facilities used to house the migrant farm workers in 2011, and thus was liable for violations of the MSPA in regard to the provision of substandard housing; and (iii) Howes unlawfully interfered with the DOL investigation. Id. at *1-2. The Sixth Circuit noted that while granting the DOL summary judgment, the District Court carefully distinguished the Sixth Circuit's opinion in Donovan v. Brandel, 736 F.2d 1114 (6th Cir. 1984), where it had held that the pickling cucumber harvesters were not employees under the FLSA. Id. at *2. Because the District Court had correctly addressed the arguments that Defendant now raised on appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's judgment. Id.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Pacific Coast Foods,* Case No. 13-CV-877 (W.D. Wash. Mar. 24, 2015). In this enforcement action, the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") alleged that Defendants failed to comply with the minimum wage, overtime, and record-keeping requirements of the FLSA. After a jury decided in the DOL's favor, the Court entered judgment against Defendants and permanently enjoined and restrained Defendants from violating the FLSA. Specifically, the Court restrained Defendants from requiring any of their non-exempt employees to work in excess of 40 hours without paying one and one-half times the regular rate of their normal pay. Id. at 2. The Court also restrained Defendants from requesting, soliciting, or suggesting to any employee to return any money wages previously due. Id. at *2-3. The Court further enjoined Defendants from discriminating, retaliating, or discharging any employee who filed a complaint, testified in a wage proceeding, or cooperated in a government investigation. Id. at 3. The Court ordered Defendants to pay $579,903.62, which represented the unpaid overtime compensation. Id. at *4. The Court also ordered Defendants to pay $72,956, which represented the unpaid minimum wage compensation. Id. The Court required Defendants to further pay an additional sum of $652.859.62 as liquidated damages, $31,800 due in damages for retaliation. Id. at *5. In sum, the Court ordered Defendants to jointly and severally liable to pay $1,337,519.20 for violating the FLSA.

(xviii) Application Of Statute Of Limitations In FLSA Collective Actions

Baugh, et al. v. CVS RX Services, Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-14 (E.D. Pa. July 24, 2015). Plaintiff, a former floater pharmacist, brought an action alleging that Defendant denied him overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and Pennsylvania's Minimum Wage Act and Wage Payment and Collection Law. Defendant moved for summary judgment, which the Court granted. At the outset, the Court noted that a Plaintiff must bring his overtime claims under the FLSA within two years, and, if he proves a willful violation, the statute of limitations is extended to three years. Here, the Court found that Plaintiff adduced no evidence that Defendant willfully disregarded its obligations under the FLSA. Id. at *2. The Court observed that an employer has not willfully violated the FLSA if it acts reasonably in determining its legal obligation. Id. at *3. The Court therefore, ruled that absent willfulness, Plaintiff's claims were covered by the two-year statute of limitations. The Court noted that as Plaintiff was terminated on October 7, 2012, she filed this action on January 5, 2015, and therefore, her FLSA claims were time-barred. Id. As to Plaintiff's state law claims, the Court remarked that it can exercise supplemental jurisdiction over state claims only if they are related to claims upon which it has original jurisdiction. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's state law claims because her FLSA claims were dismissed. Id. at *4. The Court reasoned that 28 U.S.C. § 1367(d) ensures that Plaintiff's state law claims were tolled while pending for at least an additional 30 days after dismissal. Id.

Tyus, et al. v. Wendy's Of Las Vegas, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32591 (D. Nev. Mar. 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them the lawful minimum wage in violation of Nevada Statutes. Id. at *2. Defendants moved for partial judgment on the pleadings, which the Court granted. Defendants asserted that Nevada Revised Statute ("NRS") § 608.260 provided that the applicable statute of limitations was two years for minimum wage claims, and therefore, Plaintiffs' class and individual claims falling outside the two year statute of limitations must be dismissed. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs, however, asserted that NRS § 608.260 did not apply to this case, as the Minimum Wage Amendment that contained no limitation for actions to enforce its terms had impliedly repealed NRS § 608.260. Id. The Court noted that in Rivera v. Peri & Sons Farms, Inc., 735 F.3d 892 (9th Cir. 2013), the Ninth Circuit ruled that "although the Minimum Wage Amendment is silent on the limitation period for minimum wage actions, such silence did not imply a repeal of the two-year limitation period of NRS § 608.260." Id. at *5. Plaintiffs, however, argued that Nevada Supreme Court's holding in Thomas v. Nevada Yellow Cab Corp., 327 P.3d 518 (Nev. 2014), impliedly repealed NRS § 608.260. In Thomas, the Nevada Supreme Court held that "when a statute is irreconcilably repugnant to a constitutional amendment, the statute is deemed to be impliedly repealed by the amendment." Id. at *5-6. The Court found that unlike the statutory provision in Thomas, the two-year statute of limitations period found in NRS § 608.260 does not necessarily and directly conflict with the Minimum Wage Amendment, which would make it irreconcilably repugnant. The Court maintained that the statutory provision could be construed in harmony with the Nevada Constitution. Id. at *6. Thus, the Court concluded that although the Minimum Wage Amendment was silent on a limitations period, it did not impliedly repeal the two-year statute of limitations period found in NRS § 608.260. Accordingly, the Court dismissed with prejudice all wage claims accruing more than two years before Plaintiffs filed suit.

Zhou, et al. v. WU,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26411 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former delivery workers, brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay minimum and overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Defendants included three restaurants ("China Fun," "China Fun East," and "China Fun West"), and three individuals who ran them. Plaintiffs Weizhen Song and East Guangli Zhang were formerly employed with China Fun; and Plaintiff Zhang was also employed at China Fun West, along with Plaintiff Zhongwei Zhou. Id. at *1-2. Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint, which the Court granted in part. Defendants sought dismissal arguing that statute of limitations on the claims of Song and Zhang had lapsed. The Court noted that Song stopped working at China Fun East on March 31, 2007, and therefore, his claims for a willful violation under the FLSA stopped on March 31, 2010. Id. at *9. Similarly, Defendants contended that Zhang left China Fun East on December 5, 2006, and China Fun West on December 5, 2010. Therefore, Defendants argued that Zhang's claims against China Fun East lapsed on December 5, 2009, and his claims against China Fun West lapsed on December 5, 2013. Defendants argued that since the complaint was filed on March 14, 2014, all of the claims were time-barred. The Court noted that equitable tolling allows extensions to statute of limitations, but only if a Plaintiff alleges that: (i) he has been pursuing his rights diligently; and (ii) some extraordinary circumstance stood in his way and prevented a timely filing. Id. at *11. In addition, the Court observed that deciding whether a Plaintiff acted with reasonable diligence under the circumstances, it may consider: (i) the party's efforts at the earliest possible time to secure counsel; (ii) the party's lack of education or funds to consult a lawyer; and (iii) the party's direct access to other forms of legal assistance. Id. The Court held that the question of equitable tolling was a factual issue that cannot be resolved on the pleadings. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion based on equitable tolling.

(xix) Concurrent State Law Claims In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Chaplin, et al. v. SSA Cooper, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 59058 (D.S.C. May 6, 2015). Plaintiff, a former employee, brought an action seeking unpaid overtime compensation under the FLSA and the South Carolina Payment of Wages Act ("SCPWA"). Defendant filed a motion to dismiss Plaintiff's SCPWA claim on the grounds that it was a duplicative, alternately-pled cause of action for an FLSA violation. Id at *3. The Court denied the motion. Plaintiff contended that he based his SCPWA claim on Defendant's failure to pay bonuses required by Defendant's employment contracts and/or compensation policies, and he based his FLSA claim on Defendant's failure to pay overtime compensation. Id. at *3. The Court noted that the SCPWA provides remedies under South Carolina law to recover unpaid wages, and the FLSA provides statutory remedies for failure to pay overtime compensation. Id at *3. The Court acknowledged that several case law authorities had found that the FLSA preempted SCPWA claims when employees sought to recover unpaid overtime compensation or minimum wages provided by the FLSA. Id. at *4. Here, however, Plaintiff's SCPWA claim did not implicate a violation of federal statutory law; rather, Plaintiff's SCPWA claim arose out of Defendant's alleged failure to pay a non-discretionary bonus mandated by the employee compensation plan. Id. at *5. Specifically, the Court reasoned that Plaintiff alleged that Defendant deducted time from his compensable hours in order to avoid paying a bonus, even though he otherwise met the thresholds for the bonus. Id. The Court found that Plaintiff's allegations were separate and distinct from those asserted under the FLSA, and, therefore, Plaintiff's SCPWA claim was not preempted by the FLSA. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's partial motion to dismiss.

Foster, et al. v. M5 Hospitality Group, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111413 (D.S.C. Aug. 24, 2015). Plaintiff, on behalf of a class of non-exempt employees, brought a collective and a class action, alleging that Defendant's practice of deducting 1% of tips for a mandatory tip pool, and requiring its servers to remit $1.00 per day back to Defendant from tips they received for "breakage" violated the FLSA provisions related to tip pools and minimum wages. Id. at *4. Plaintiff worked as a server at Defendant's restaurant, and Defendant allegedly paid him an hourly wage less than the statutory minimum wage by taking the tip credit under the FLSA. Id. Plaintiff alleged that the employees were entitled to full minimum wage of $7.25 per hour, without credit for the tips received, and also the total amount of the tips deducted. Id. at *5. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant must pay for all hours worked over 40 hours in a workweek without any credit for tips received. Id. In addition, Plaintiff alleged that money received as tips constituted wages under the South Carolina Payment of Wages Act (the "SC Wage Act"), and that Defendant illegally deducted amounts from the wages of Plaintiff and the members of the class without providing proper written notice as required. Id. at *6. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's claim under the SC Wage Act, arguing that FLSA preempted the claim because it was predicated upon a finding of FLSA violations relating to the tip credit and tip pool, and was duplicative of the FLSA claims. Id. at *9. Defendant also asserted that the SC Wage Act does not contain any provisions regarding a tip credit or tip pool and that, in order to establish a violation under the SC Wage Act, Plaintiffs would have to establish FLSA violations first and then seek the remedies provided by the exclusive FLSA enforcement scheme. Id. The Court denied Defendant's motion on the basis that Plaintiff plausibly stated a claim under S.C. Code Ann. § 41-10-30. Id. at *13. The SC Wage Act requires employers to notify employees in writing of the wages agreed upon and the deductions that will be made from the wages. Id. at *12-13. It further provides for recovery of an amount equal to three times the full amount of the unpaid wages in addition to other relief. Id. at *13. Because Plaintiff was not seeking payment of minimum wages or overtime under the SC Wage Act, but seeking return of the mandatory tip pool deductions and breakage deductions that Defendant allegedly made without proper notice, the Court found that Plaintiff plausibly stated a claim under the SC Wage Act. Id. The Court explained that the SC Wage Act is broader than the FLSA in that it is not limited to controversies involving minimum wage and overtime, but applies to all wages due, and thus Plaintiff's claim based on lack of written notice of deductions was separate and distinct from his FLSA claims. Id. at *13-14. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's claim under the SC Wage Act.

Hurst, et al. v. First Student, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 143638 (D. Ore. Oct. 22, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant failed and refused to pay him and similarly-situated individuals for hours spent during training and orientation in violation of Oregon's minimum wage law. Id. at *1. Plaintiff attended Defendant's employment training program, which consisted of training on company policies, scenario analysis, first aid, and pre-trip bus inspection. Id. at *2. Defendant allegedly did not pay Plaintiff any wages for the time spent completing the training program. Plaintiff's action sought unpaid minimum wages and a civil penalty. Defendant moved for partial summary judgment as to the civil penalty claim, arguing that Plaintiff was time-barred from collecting the civil penalty. Under Oregon's minimum wage law, once a Plaintiff proves a violation of minimum wage law under ORS § 653.055, the employer is liable for unpaid minimum wages and a civil penalty as provided in ORS § 652.150. Id. at *5. Defendant argued that the two statutory sub-sections have different statute of limitations – six years for unpaid wages and three years for civil penalty – and thus, Plaintiff's claim could be split into two separate causes of actions, i.e., one for unpaid minimum wages and one for an additional civil penalty. Id. The Court disagreed, and held that an examination of the provisions revealed that the unpaid minimum wages and the civil penalty were merely distinct types of damages, not separate claims. Id. at *4. Although the Court agreed with Defendant that the two statutory sub-sections have different statute of limitation, it found that Defendant offered no authority for the proposition that different limitation periods create distinct causes of action. Id. at *5. According to the Court, the civil penalty was one type of damages that could arise from an employer's failure to pay a minimum wage, and not, as Defendant impliedly asserted, a separate claim or cause of action. Id. at *6. Defendant also argued that Plaintiff lacked standing to claim a civil penalty. The Court rejected the argument, finding that Plaintiff's claim that he did not receive any wages for the time he spent in Defendant's training program was an injury-in-fact, sufficient to show standing. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff's individual claim for civil penalties.

Lemus, et al. v. Denny's Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 10284 (9th Cir. June 18, 2015). Plaintiff, a former manager, filed a putative class action in state court alleging violations of the California Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA") and the California Labor Code. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant coerced him and other aggrieved employees to purchase slip-resistant shoes from Defendant's preferred vendor and deducted the cost of the shoes from the employees' wages. After Defendant removed the case to the District Court on the basis of diversity, the District Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, and denied as moot Plaintiff's motion for class certification. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed. First, the Ninth Circuit noted that, under § 2802(a) of the California Labor Code, an employer must indemnify an employee for all necessary expenditures or losses incurred by the employee in direct consequence of the discharge of his or her duties. Id. The Ninth Circuit, however, found that Plaintiff had not argued that the black, slip-resistant shoes that Defendant allegedly coerced him into buying were part of a uniform or otherwise were not generally usable in the restaurant occupation. Id. at *3. Therefore, despite the general indemnification provision in § 2802, the Ninth Circuit held that Defendant was not required to reimburse the cost of slip-resistant footwear. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiff also argued that Defendant violated § 221 of the Labor Code when Defendant deducted the cost of slip-resistant footwear from the wages of its employees. Id. at *4. Plaintiff asserted that he did not expressly authorize in writing wage deductions when he ordered slip-resistant shoes electronically. Id. at *5. The Ninth Circuit, however, rejected Plaintiff's argument because California law explicitly states that "if a law requires a record to be in writing, an electronic record satisfies the law." Id. Because Plaintiff ordered his shoes on-line and logged-on to the computer using a personal password, the Ninth Circuit found that the District Court did not err in granting summary judgment on Plaintiff's claim. Id. Finally, the Ninth Circuit determined that there was no evidence that Defendant threatened Plaintiff or indicated that it would punish Plaintiff if he did not buy his shoes from its preferred vendor. Id. at *6-7. The Ninth Circuit noted that, although the facts showed some pressure to purchase from the preferred vendor, Defendant did not utilize physical force or threat of force, nor did it exert overwhelming pressure on its employees. Id. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the District Court did not err and affirmed the District Court's order granting Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Makaneole, et al. v. Solarworld Industries America, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28333 (D. Ore. Mar. 9, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action and alleged that Defendants' practice of programming an electronic time-keeping system to deduct minutes from hours worked denied him wages and overtime pay in violation of Oregon state law. In December 2014, the Magistrate Judge had recommended dismissal with prejudice Plaintiff's third claim as to all Defendants. Id. at *1. The Magistrate Judge noted that Plaintiff's third claim – for Defendants' failure to pay wages on termination – was based on the same factual allegations as those underlying Plaintiff's second claim for Defendants' failure to pay overtime. Id. at *2. The Magistrate Judge found that under Oregon law, a Plaintiff may not seek two penalties for violations of wage & hour laws based on the same underlying facts. Id. Thus, the Magistrate Judge recommended dismissal Plaintiff's third claim with prejudice, since Plaintiff sought two penalties based on the same set of facts. Id. at *3. Plaintiff filed Rule 72 objections, asserting that the Magistrate Judge erred in recommending dismissal of Plaintiff's third claim with prejudice because: (i) Oregon permits recovery of a double penalty based on facts that allege more than one wage & hour law violation; and/or (ii) in this putative class action there could be Plaintiffs who have claims for regular wages that remain unpaid even though their employment had ended, but who did not have overtime claims. Id. Plaintiff contended that if the Court dismissed Plaintiff's third claim with prejudice, the class members who only had claims for regular wages that remain unpaid after termination would be unable to obtain any penalty because they would be ineligible to recover a penalty for Defendants' failure to pay overtime wages and they would be foreclosed from seeking a penalty for Defendants' failure to pay regular wages on termination. Id. The Court found that the Magistrate Judge did not err when he ruled that Plaintiff sought penalties in his second claim – for Defendants' alleged failure to pay Plaintiff overtime wages upon termination – that were duplicative of the penalties Plaintiff sought in his third claim for Defendants' alleged failure to pay overtime wages during employment. Id. at *3-4. The Court also concluded that the Magistrate Judge did not err when he found that Plaintiff was barred from seeking such duplicative penalties. Id. at *4. The Court, however, ruled that a party may raise alternative claims pursuant to Rule 8(d)(2), and if a party makes alternative statements, the pleading is sufficient if any one of them is sufficient. Id. Thus, the Court permitted Plaintiff to plead claims in the alternative. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's third claim without prejudice, but permitted him to file an amended complaint curing the deficiencies. Id.

Miranda, et al. v. Coach, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51768 (N.D. Cal. April 17, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former sales associates, brought a putative class action seeking unpaid and overtime wages under the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants required them to submit to a bag check when leaving the store that deprived them of time for breaks and meals, and kept them late without pay at the end of their shifts. The Court had previously dismissed Plaintiffs' overtime claims and request for injunctive relief, and had denied Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' meal break and rest period claims. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs then amended their complaint realleging their overtime claims but not the injunctive relief claim. Defendants again moved to dismiss, and the Court denied the motion. At the outset, the Court remarked that when it dismissed the complaint, it gave Plaintiffs leave to amend, and that is exactly what they did. Id. at *2. The Court remarked that Plaintiffs made no changes that substantively altered their allegations, or that would require the Court to reverse its previous order denying Defendants' motion to dismiss meal and rest break claims. Id. at *2-3. The Court stated that it had previously dismissed the claims because the original allegations merely parroted the statute without alleging concrete facts showing that the named Plaintiffs actually worked overtime hours without proper pay or failed to receive full regular wages. Id. The Court remarked that Plaintiffs had cured that defect in their amended complaint. Id. at *5. Because Plaintiffs had adequately alleged the remaining claims, it refused to dismiss the remaining claims. Defendants then argued that the time spent waiting for bag checks was non-compensable under the U.S. Supreme Court's opinion in Integrity Staffing Solutions, Inc. v. Busk, 135 S. Ct. 513 (2014), which held that time spent by employees waiting for and undergoing security screenings before leaving the workplace is not compensable under the FLSA. Id. at *6. The Court noted that while Integrity Staffing Solutions was premised on an interpretation of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947 and how it exempts employers from liability for certain categories of work-related activities, California law's definition for "hours worked" is defined differently and California law does not include an exemption similar to the Portal-to-Portal Act. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Moodie, et al. v. Kiawah Island Inn Co., LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111394 (D.S.C. Aug. 4, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of Jamaican residents working under the H-2B visa program, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and the South Carolina Payment of Wages Act ("SCPWA") by failing to pay them the minimum wages and the prevailing wages. Id. at *4-5. According to the complaint, Defendant contracted with Florida East Coast Travel Services, Inc., to act as its agent and to assist in obtaining H-2B workers from Jamaica, and notified Plaintiffs that they had been hired or re-hired and had to travel to Kingston, Jamaica to undergo medical processing as a condition of obtaining their H-2B visas, and then to Defendant's jobsite in South Carolina. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant effectively paid them less than the minimum wage by not compensating them for the travel costs and medical costs they incurred while applying for visas in Kingston, Jamaica, and then in traveling to South Carolina. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant improperly deducted housing and daily transportation costs from their pay and did not pay them the higher supplemental prevailing wage required by the DOL in 2013 in non-overtime weeks. Id. at *5- 8. Plaintiffs further alleged violations of the SCPWA and breach of contract claims for failure to pay the H-2B prevailing wage. Id. Defendant moved to dismiss all claims except the claims based on unreasonable deductions for housing and transportation. The Court denied Defendant's motion in part and granted in part. The Court denied Defendant's claim that it did not have to reimburse Plaintiffs' travel expenses because Plaintiffs were on H-2B work visas, not H-2A visas. Id. at *14. The Court found no reasonable basis to distinguish the costs of visas and inbound travel for H-2A and H-2B workers, which they incurred primarily for the benefit of Defendant. Id. at *16-18. The Court also denied Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' claim of medical expenses, finding that the medicals testing was done primarily for the benefit of Defendant, and it served no purpose other than to allow Plaintiffs to work for Defendant on H-2B visas. Id. at *18-19. The Court further denied Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' claim based on the DOL's notification regarding overtime finding that Defendant failed to state a basis for dismissal. Id. at *29. The Court reviewed the regulatory background that led to the new 2013 prevailing wage determination and found nothing that supported Defendant's conduct of not complying with the DOL's supplemental prevailing wage determinations. Id. at *26-30. The Court, however, granted Defendant's motion to dismiss to the extent Plaintiffs sought payment of the federal minimum wage or payment at the supplemental prevailing wage rate on their state claims. The Court found that Plaintiffs' state law claims were not merely duplicative of their FLSA claims as they sought the prevailing wage, which was higher than the federal minimum wage and the higher supplemental prevailing wage issued by the DOL in 2013 in non-overtime weeks. Id. at *31-32. Since Plaintiffs could not seek this compensation under the FLSA, the Court held that Plaintiffs were not barred from asserting state law claims for which FLSA failed to provide a remedy. Id. at *32. The Court also granted Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' breach of contract claim to the extent Plaintiffs relied on promises Defendant made to the DOL that it would pay the prevailing wage as the terms of the employment contracts consisted of what Defendant promised Plaintiffs and not what it promised a third-party. Id. at *34-35. The Court, however, agreed with Plaintiffs that the H-2B regulation, which required the payment of the prevailing wage, was the law at the time the contract was created, and therefore, Plaintiffs stated a valid contractual breach claim based on H-2B regulations. Id. at *37-38. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims to the extent it was duplicative of the FLSA claims and relied on promises made by Defendant to the DOL, and denied the motion in all other respects.

Parham, Jr., et al. v. The Wendy's Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 33531 (D. Mass. Mar. 17, 2015). Plaintiff, a former maintenance technician, brought a putative class action against Defendant seeking unpaid wages pursuant to the FLSA and Massachusetts overtime law. Defendant counterclaimed, asserting misrepresentation, breach of implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and breach of the duty of loyalty. Specifically, Defendant alleged that Plaintiff recorded work hours when he was not actually performing Defendant's work. Id. at *2. Both parties moved for partial dismissal. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's Massachusetts overtime law claim, and Plaintiff moved to dismiss the counterclaims against him. The Court denied Defendant's motion and partly granted Plaintiff's motion. Denying Defendant's motion, the Court found that Defendant failed to support its position that Plaintiff's work fell within the "restaurant" exemption enumerated in the Massachusetts overtime law, G.L. ch. 151, § 1A ("Section 1A"). The statute includes 20 enumerated exemptions, including one for "any employee who is employed…in a restaurant." Id. at *8. Defendant argued that Plaintiff worked "in a restaurant" within the meaning of this statue, and thus was not entitled to overtime pay. In support, Defendant relied on an opinion letter issued by the Massachusetts Department of Labor Standards ("DLS") pertaining to overtime exemptions listed in Section 1A concerning employees who were employed "in a hotel, motel, motel court or like establishment." Id. at *10. The DLS issued the letter in response to an inquiry about whether banquet servers employed by a hotel, who performed work in a hotel or on hotel property, were exempt from overtime pay. Id. The Court found that the DLS opinion letter did not support Defendant's assertion. Although Plaintiff worked in some aspect of restaurant operations, the Court reasoned that it was not enough to bring Plaintiff's job within the "restaurant" exemption. Id. at *11. The Court noted that Plaintiff was not employed in a traditional restaurant occupation, such as a host, cashier, server, cook, or dishwasher, and his job entailed traveling between Defendant's restaurants, performing maintenance and repair work both inside and outside the restaurants, and numerous other duties not tied to a particular restaurant, such as taking inventory of truck stock, purchasing parts from suppliers, or managing truck maintenance. Id. at *9-10. The Court also noted that, like traditional restaurant positions, Plaintiff did not report to on-site restaurant manager, but to a regional maintenance manager and a National Director of Facilities. Id. The Court pointed out that DLS, in its letter, has specifically declined to extend coverage to situations where services "are arguably no longer performed in a hotel." Id. The Court therefore declined to give the restaurant exemption enumerated in Section 1A the broad reading that would be needed to encompass Plaintiff's duties as Defendant's maintenance technician as alleged, and accordingly denied Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's Massachusetts overtime law claim. Id. at *12. In addition, the Court partly granted Plaintiff's motion to dismiss the misrepresentation and breach of loyalty counterclaims, and found that Defendant's allegations did not provide the required specific allegations to pursue those claims. Id. at *14-17. The Court also denied Plaintiff's motion to dismiss the counterclaim alleging breach of implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and allowed Defendant to establish that Plaintiff breached an agreement to record only those hours he worked for Defendant, and that he breached that agreement by performing "side-work" and gained undue economic advantage. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss, and partly granted Plaintiff's motion to dismiss.

Raphael, et al. v. Tesoro Refining And Marketing Co., LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 130532 (C.D. Cal. Sept. 25, 2015). Plaintiff, a former employee, brought a class action alleging that Defendant engaged in a uniform policy of denying him and other similarly-situated employees with all wages owed in violation of the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA") and for several provisions of the California Labor Code. Defendant moved for summary judgment, and the Court granted the motion. Defendant argued that the PAGA action must be dismissed because Plaintiff failed to allege and establish that class certification was appropriate within 90-days as required by Local Rule 23-3. In response, Plaintiff asserted that PAGA actions do not need to meet class action requirements. The Court noted that while the Ninth Circuit had not yet decided whether Plaintiffs suing under the PAGA must satisfy Rule 23 requirements, there have been numerous rulings that PAGA claims must comply with Rule 23 guidelines, and that failing to move for certification would result in dismissal. Id. at *4. The Court remarked that it was inclined to follow its prior rulings and similar rulings, and accordingly, held that Plaintiff lacked standing to represent the rights and interests of the aggrieved employees in this action. Id. at *5. The Court further remarked that even if Rule 23 did not apply to PAGA representative claims, such claims should be stricken if they were unmanageable. Here, the Court noted that Plaintiff's claims were on behalf of himself and thousands of current and former employees. The Court observed that Defendant provided a non-exhaustive list of 26 relevant inquiries and requirements that the Court found essential to assess in order to determine the appropriate penalties. Id. at *7. The Court found that it would have to engage in a multitude of individualized inquiries, thereby making PAGA action unmanageable and inappropriate. Id. Furthermore, the Court observed that Plaintiff's notice to the California Labor and Workforce Development Agency, pursuant to § 2699.3(a)(1) of the California Labor Code, did not include sufficient facts and theories and put the agency on notice on his PAGA claims. Id. at *8-9. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Saucedo, et al. v. John Hancock Life & Health Insurance Co.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13646 (9th Cir. Aug. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought an action alleging Defendants failed to maintain a farm labor contractor's license and failed to make certain disclosures to Plaintiffs that farm labor contractors were required make in violation of the Washington Farm Labor Contractor Act ("FLCA"). The John Hancock Insurance Co. and the Texas Municipal Plans Consortium, LLC (collectively "Hancock") owned apple orchards, which it leased to Farmland Management Services ("Farmland") under two Master Lease and Management Agreements. Id. at *8-9. Farmland sub-leased the orchards to NW Management and Realty Services ("NWM") under an Orchard Management Agreement. Id. at *9. Hancock and Farmland's Master Leases required Farmland to obtain any necessary licenses, or require any third-party hired to do so. Id. at *11. NWM failed to obtain a farm labor contractor license from the Washington Department of Labor & Industries. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that Farmland and Hancock were jointly and severally liable with NWM for the FLCA violations because they used the services of an unlicensed farm labor contractor without either inspecting NWM's license or asking the director of the Department of Labor & Industries whether NWM was licensed. The District Court denied Hancock and Farmland's motions to dismiss the claims, holding that the FLCA imposed an affirmative duty on Hancock and Farmland to verify that NWM was properly licensed. Further, the District Court denied all Defendants' motions to dismiss on the ground that although NWM was an "agricultural employer," "agricultural employers" and "farm labor contractors" were not mutually exclusive, and that agricultural employers who are paid to farm another's land – such as NWM – are required to obtain licenses under the FLCA. Id. at *12. Thereafter, the District Court granted Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, finding that NWM was a farm labor contractor because it engaged in employing agricultural workers for a fee, that NWM was required to comply with the FLCA but did not, and that Hancock and Farmland were jointly and severally liable for NWM's violations because they did not take the affirmative steps to determine whether NWM was licensed. Id. at *13. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit certified two questions of law regarding the interpretations of the FLCA to the Washington Supreme Court. The first question was whether the FLCA, in particular Washington Revised Code § 19.30.010(2), included in the definition of a "farm labor contractor" an entity who is paid a per-acre fee to manage all aspects of farming – including hiring and employing agricultural workers as well as making all planting and harvesting decisions, subject to approval – for a particular plot of land owned by a third-party. The second question was whether the FLCA makes jointly and severally liable any person who uses the services of an unlicensed farm labor contractor without either inspecting the license issued by the director of the Department of Labor & Industries to the farm labor contractor or obtaining a representation from the director of the Department of Labor & Industries that the contractor is properly licensed, even if that person lacked knowledge that the farm labor contractor was unlicensed. The Ninth Circuit opined that because of the complexity of these state law issues and because of their significant policy implications, the Washington Supreme Court, which had not yet interpreted the relevant provisions of the FLCA, was best suited to answer the certified questions in the first instance. Id. at *14. The Ninth Circuit also opined that the Washington Supreme Court's authoritative answers were necessary to dispose of this proceeding, and accordingly certified the questions of law.

Steger, et al. v. Life Time Fitness, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120805 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of personal trainers, brought an action alleging that Defendants had a practice of not recording all hours worked by personal trainers and failed to provide them with wage statements or pay stubs setting forth all hours actually worked in violation of the FLSA and various state laws of California and Illinois. Plaintiffs alleged that because of Defendants' practice, they were not paid for off-the-clock work or overtime for any work in excess of eight hours a day, or 40 hours a week. Defendants moved to dismiss named Plaintiffs' Jared Steger and David Ramsey's Illinois Wage Payment Collection Act ("IWPCA") claims, which the Court granted in part. At the outset, the Court noted that the IWPCA does not establish a substantive right to overtime pay or any other kind of wage, but rather allows for a cause of action based on compensation wrongfully withheld pursuant to an employment contract or agreement. Id. at *4-5. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs' claims failed because they did not allege that they had an agreement to pay off-the-clock work. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants' incentive compensation plan promised certain wages for every hour worked, and that Defendants routinely failed to record hours for off-the-clock work such as time spent for marketing activities, completing paperwork and reports, and cleaning equipment. Id. at *6. The Court found that Plaintiffs sufficiently showed that an agreement existed with Defendants to pay 1.5 times the applicable minimum wage. Id. at *7. Defendants further argued that Plaintiffs' claim for unused vacation time or paid time off ("PTO") failed under its policy of "use-it-or-lose," which provides that accrued and unused PTO is not carried over from year to year. Id. at *8. The Court remarked that pursuant to the PTO policy, Defendants never agreed to pay Plaintiffs carry over accrued and unused vacation from year to year; in fact, the policy stated the opposite. Accordingly, the Court concluded that without an agreement to compensate them for the vacation time, Plaintiffs' used vacation time under the IWPCA claims failed.

Tyus, et al. v. Wendy's Of Las Vegas, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111594 (D. Nev. Aug. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant employees, brought a class action for failure to pay the lawful minimum wage, alleging that Defendants improperly claimed the right to compensate employees below the upper-tier hourly minimum wage level under Nevada law. Defendants moved for partial judgment on the pleadings and Plaintiffs moved for partial summary judgment. The Court granted Defendants' motion and denied Plaintiffs' motion. Plaintiffs' sole surviving claim was for unpaid minimum wages under the Nevada Minimum Wage Amendment. Defendants urged the Court to find that Nevada would adopt rationales articulated in previous case law precedents that punitive damages are unavailable to Plaintiffs claiming violations of minimum wage laws. Id. at *7. The Court reasoned that Nevada had long subscribed to the rule that where a statute gives a new right and prescribes a particular remedy, then such remedy must be strictly pursued, and is exclusive of any other. Id. at *8. Further, the Court observed that the right to receive a minimum wage arises from legislative mandate and did not exist under common law. Id. Accordingly, the Court opined that remedies available for violating minimum wage laws are limited to those expressly provided by statute and constitutional amendment. Id. at *8-9. Further, the Court noted that because damages for violations of the Nevada Minimum Wage Amendment are limited to those expressly provided by the amendment and there is no provision in the amendment for punitive damages, Plaintiffs could not recover punitive damages for their claims. Id. Additionally, the Court observed that although Nevada law permits the awarding of punitive damages for tort claims where Defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice or where such damages are explicitly provided by statute, an award of punitive damages cannot be based upon a cause of action sounding solely in contract. Id. at *10-11. Thus, though Plaintiffs' minimum wage claims arose from Defendants' alleged failure to pay a statutory obligation, the Court reasoned that when a statute imposes additional obligations on an underlying contractual relationship, a breach of the statutory obligation is a breach of contract that will not support tort damages beyond those contained in the statute. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs could not seek punitive damages based solely on a claim for violations of the Nevada Minimum Wage Amendment, and dismissed their claims for punitive damages.

Williams, et al. v. Tri-State Biodiesel, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7926 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought a putative collective and class action under the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL") alleging that Defendant failed to pay them certain overtime wages. Defendant collected used cooking oil ("UCO") from restaurants and other producers, and paid its employees their normal hourly rate for hours worked up to 50 per week. Id. at *2-5. Initially, Defendant used a system of self-reporting to track hours employees worked, under which an employee would fill in a signed timesheet. Id. at *6. Defendant then switched to an automated timecard system, which required employees to punch-in and punch-out. Plaintiff asserted that he worked an additional 10 to 15 hours per week from home, for a total of 70 to 75 hours per week, and that Defendant failed to pay him overtime. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that Williams drove interstate on several occasions, and thus he was exempt from the overtime provisions of the FLSA and the NYLL. The Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion for summary judgment. The Court denied Defendant's motion on Plaintiffs' overtime claims under the FLSA and the NYLL based on the motor carrier exemption, finding a dispute of material issues on whether the exemption applied to employees for all the relevant workweeks. Id. at *39. The record did not disclose whether the interstate travel that Williams undertook was a "natural, integral, and inseparable part" of his duties. Id. at *37. The Court noted that the only interstate trips that Defendant asserted Williams made occurred during the period of November 2010 through June 2012, and that Defendant was not engaged in interstate activity at all until it began picking up UCO from New Jersey in late 2010 or early 2011. Id. at *38. The Court thus concluded that a jury might easily conclude that even if Williams' interstate activity beginning in November 2010 placed him within the motor carrier exemption, his interstate activity prior to that date did not. Id. Because Defendant sought summary judgment as to the entire period of William's employment, and failed to show that the other named Plaintiff made even one interstate trip, the Court concluded that Defendant was not entitled to summary judgment under the motor carrier exemption. Id. at *40-41. The Court also denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment on Williams' unpaid wages claims, as Williams asserted that he worked extra hours per week that were not reflected in the records and Defendant specifically told him that he would not be paid extra for the work he performed at home. Id. at *46-48. The Court, however, granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' claims for "spread of hours" pay under the NYLL, which requires employers to pay employees "one hour's pay at the basic minimum hourly wage rate, in addition to the minimum wage," for any day in which the employee works for more than 10 hours. Id. at *42. The Court also granted Defendant's summary judgment on the issue of willfulness in claiming the motor carrier exemption, for Plaintiffs pointed to no testimony from Defendant's employees, documents, or anything else that could allow a trier of fact to find that Defendant's alleged violations were willful. Id. at *51-52. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Zackaria, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 151351 (C.D. Cal. Nov. 3, 2015).
Plaintiff, on behalf of a group of current and former employees, brought a class action in the state court alleging that Defendant knowingly misclassified the employees as exempt under the state law, and denied them overtime wages, and wages for missed meal periods and rest breaks. Plaintiff asserted violations of the California Labor Code, and sought civil penalties under the California Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). After Defendant removed the action under the CAFA, Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification. The Court denied the motion. Subsequently, each party filed two motions in limine. The basis of Defendant's motion was that since the Court denied class certification because the exemptions questions at issue in this action did not lend themselves to common proof, Plaintiff could not pursue a representative PAGA claim on behalf of an unidentified number of additional non-party employees. Id. at *4. The Court denied the motions in limine. The Court noted that under the PAGA, an aggrieved employee may bring a civil action personally and on behalf of current and former employees to recover civil penalties for violations of the labor code. Id. at *7. The Court also observed that a majority of case law authorities have found that representative PAGA claims do not need to be certified under Rule 23 to proceed. For example, in Baumann v. Chase Investment Services Corp., 135 S. Ct. 870 (2014), the U.S. Supreme Court found that a PAGA suit was fundamentally different than a class action, and were not sufficiently similar to Rule 23 class actions to trigger jurisdiction under the CAFA. Id. at *9. Defendant argued that Shady Grove Orthopedic Associates, P.A. v. Allstate Insurance Co., 559 U.S. 393 (2010), held that a New York statute concerning the ability of a Plaintiff to pursue a representative action did not trump Rule 23's application. Id. at *14. The Court observed that in Shady Grove, the Supreme Court held that Rule 23 was merely a procedural device that allowed for joinder of parties, and as such, applied to claims asserted in federal court even if the state law did not provide for such a procedure in state court. Id. at *15. The Court noted that this reasoning applied to the PAGA claims, and it found that the PAGA specifically permitted recovery for unnamed parties, and was a procedural mechanism by which litigants may recover for absent Plaintiffs, akin to a class action. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that denial of class certification had no bearing on the PAGA claim. Id. at *19. Defendant asserted that a Plaintiff pursuing a representative PAGA action must prove the alleged underlying Labor Code violations as to their own claim, and as to all aggrieved employees. Id. at *20. Defendant contended that a Plaintiff pursuing a representative PAGA claim must also face the challenge of showing that the PAGA claim was manageable for resolution. Id. at *20-21. The Court, however, observed that Defendant's manageability argument was inconsistent with the PAGA's purpose and statutory scheme. Id. at *21. The Court explained that the purpose of the PAGA was to incentivize private parties to recover civil penalties for the government that otherwise may not have been assessed and pursued by overburdened state enforcement agencies. Id. at *22. The Court observed that PAGA actions were unlike class actions; they were distinct in purpose and function from a purely procedural rule, and unlike Rule 23, the purpose of the PAGA was not to allow a collection of individual Plaintiffs to sue the same Defendant in one consolidated action for the sake of convenience and efficiency. Id. at *23. The Court concluded that the imposition of a manageability requirement, which finds its genesis in Rule 23, does not apply in this context. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied the motions in limine.

(xx) Joint Employer, Employee Status, And Employer Status Issues In FLSA Collective Actions

Abreu, et al. v. Russian Palace, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 11795 (11th Cir. July 9, 2015). Plaintiff, on behalf of himself and other similarly-situated, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants, their former employer, Russian Palace, Inc. (Russian Palace), and Dmitri Kotikovski individually, failed to pay them weekly and overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Previously, the District Court had granted Kotikovski's motion for summary judgment. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed. After consideration of the parties' briefs and upon review of the record, the Eleventh Circuit found that summary judgment was proper because Plaintiff failed to present evidence that Russian Palace exceeded the gross annual revenue threshold of $500,000 required to establish enterprise coverage under the FLSA, and Plaintiff also failed to establish that employees were entitled to individual coverage under the FLSA as cooks, chefs, servers, and managers because their job duties were inconsistent with duties that have been considered to include activities of interstate commerce. Id. at *1-2. Accordingly, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's judgment granting Kotikovski's motion for summary judgment.

Ash, et al. v. Anderson Merchandiser, LLC,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 14691 (8th Cir. Aug. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint. The District Court granted the motion without a hearing and entered judgment in Defendants' favor. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs moved to vacate the District Court's order pursuant to Rules 60(b) and 59(e) and requested leave to file an amended complaint. The District Court denied Plaintiffs' request. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit affirmed the District Court's order. At the outset, the Eighth Circuit noted that the District Court dismissed the complaint because Plaintiffs failed to allege that Defendants were their employer for purposes of the FLSA, and Plaintiffs failed to state a substantive cause of action under the FLSA. Id. at *2. In their complaint, Plaintiffs made only one allegation with regard to Defendants' status as their employer, i.e., that, during all relevant times, Defendants were part of an integrated enterprise and, as such, were Plaintiffs' employer. Id. at *3. The Eighth Circuit noted that, under the FLSA, the test of employment is one of economic reality. Plaintiffs did not include any facts describing the economic reality of their employment, such as their alleged employers' right to control the nature and quality of their work, the alleged employers' right to hire or fire, or the source of compensation for Plaintiffs' work. Id. at *4. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit concluded that Plaintiffs failed to state a claim under the FLSA. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs also argued that the District Court should have granted their motion to vacate the judgment and their request for leave to file an amended complaint. The Eighth Circuit found that the District Court properly exercised its discretion to deny Plaintiffs' request, and Plaintiffs failed to establish that the District Court abused its discretion. Id. at *10. The Eighth Circuit noted that Plaintiffs did not seek leave to amend their complaint until nine days after the District Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss and two days after the District Court entered judgment. Id. Because Plaintiffs delayed in making their request, the Eighth Circuit concluded that it could not hold that the District Court abused its discretion. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit affirmed the District Court's order.

Benitez, et al. v. Demco Of Riverdale, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20325 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 19, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of store managers of Planet Wings franchises, brought an action alleging that Defendants misclassified them as exempt from overtime provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Planet Wings Enterprises, Inc., Planet Wings Inc., Planet Wings Management, Inc., and their principals (the "Planet Wings Defendants") were franchisors of Planet Wings restaurants. The Planet Wings Defendants argued that they were not Plaintiffs' employer, and moved to dismiss this action. The Court denied the motion. The Court noted that to be liable under the FLSA and the NYLL, a person or entity must be the employer of the party seeking recovery. The definition of "employer" under both statues includes any person acting directly or indirectly in the interest of any employer in relation to an employee. Id. at *3. Further, the Court observed that these factors focused on whether the person or entity possessed the power to control the workers in question, with an eye to the economic reality presented by the facts of each case. Id. Additionally, the Court noted that economic reality is dependent on whether the purported employer: (i) had the power to hire and fire the employees; (ii) supervised and controlled employees' work schedules or conditions of employment; (iii) determined the rate and method of payment; and (iv) maintained employment records for the employees. Id. at *4. The Court found that the determination of whether a franchisor was a joint employer with its franchisee as to the employees who worked in the franchisee's restaurants presented a question of fact that could not be resolved on a motion to dismiss. Accordingly, the Court denied the motion to dismiss, finding that the issue could be raised anew on a properly supported motion for summary judgment after discovery.

Chen, et al. v. Major League Baseball Properties, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 14275 (2d Cir. Aug. 14, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants failed to pay the minimum wage in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiff alleged that he worked without pay as a volunteer for FanFest, a five-day event organized in conjunction with Major League Baseball's 2013 All-StarWeek in New York City. Id. at *2. Plaintiff contended that he worked three shifts, totaling approximately 14 hours, but he was not compensated for the work. Id. at *5. Plaintiff sought class certification of all similarly-situated uncompensated volunteers. Defendants moved to dismiss, contending that Plaintiff was exempt under the FLSA under the seasonal amusement or recreational establishment exemption. The District Court dismissed the action, and on Plaintiff's appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed. The Second Circuit remarked that the appeal centered principally on the meaning of the word "establishment," as used in § 13(a)(3) of the FLSA, which exempts seasons amusement and recreational establishments from the FLSA's minimum wage requirement. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiff contended that because the District Court held that "establishment" meant a distinct, physical place of business, it erroneously concluded that FanFest was the relevant establishment and was covered by the exemption. Id. at *7. Plaintiff argued instead that FanFest and Major League Baseball, which Defendants conceded was not covered by the exemption, were a single establishment for purposes of the FLSA. Id. The Second Circuit observed that legislative history, regulations of the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL"), and case law authorities all indicated that an "establishment" is a "distinct physical place of business," as opposed to "an entire business or enterprise," which may include several separate places of business. Id. at *13. The Second Circuit, therefore, concluded that Congress used the term "establishment" to mean a distinct place of business as opposed to an integrated multi-unit business or enterprise. Id. at *15. While Plaintiff acknowledged that the definition of establishment applied generally to FLSA exemptions, he argued that this meaning was intended for retail establishments only and the DOL applied an alternative fact-intensive, multi-factor test for seasonal exemption. Plaintiff argued that he physically worked at FanFest, and that he was an employee of Defendants Major League Baseball and the Office of the Commissioner of Baseball, who planned and controlled all aspects of FanFest's operations. Id. at *21. The Second Circuit observed that the complaint clearly stated that the FanFest took place at the Jacob. J. Javit Center in New York and not at t Defendants' Park Avenue office or any other All-Star Week event. This physical separation was determinative in deciding whether those business units constituted a single establishment or multiple one. Id. Accordingly, the Second Circuit agreed with the District Court that for the purposes of § 13(a)(3) exemption, FanFest constituted a separate establishment. The Second Circuit noted that to prevail in a motion to dismiss, Defendants must establish that FanFest was plainly and unmistakably a seasonal, and/or a recreational or amusement establishment under the FLSA. Id. at *22. The Second Circuit found that FanFest clearly met the seasonality requirement of § 13(a)(3), as the complaint alleged that the FanFest ran for four days, and did not operate for more than seven months in any calendar year. Accordingly, the Second Circuit concluded the FanFest fell within the terms and spirit of the FLSA's seasonal amusement or recreational establishment, and affirmed the District Court's order dismissing the complaint.

Doyle, et al. v. The City Of New York,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26440 (S.D.N.Y Mar. 4, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of minor offenders who performed community service for Defendant, brought an action seeking unpaid wages under the FLSA. While Plaintiffs were facing prosecution, the Court had granted an adjournment in contemplation of dismissal ("ACD"), to which they agreed at least in part because doing so allowed them to avoid criminal convictions. Under the New York State Criminal Procedure Law ("NYCPL") a state trial court, prior to a guilty plea or commencement of trial, and with the consent of both parties, may grant an ACD for actions involving minor criminal offenses. Id. at *2. Pursuant to the ACDs, Plaintiffs performed community service, for which they did not receive payment from the City of New York. The City moved to dismiss, which the Court granted. The City argued that Plaintiffs were not covered by the FLSA when they performed their community service as a condition of their ACDs because they qualified as public service volunteers within the meaning of the Act and U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") regulations. The Court noted that the DOL requires that a public service volunteer must have a civic, charitable, or humanitarian purpose, and although such a motivation need not be singular to support the volunteer exception to the FLSA, the individual must be motivated by civic, charitable, or humanitarian reasons, at least in part. Id. at *8. The Court opined that Plaintiffs did not qualify as exempt public service volunteers when they performed their community service, as the complaint alleged that Plaintiffs had no civic, humanitarian, or charitable reasons for performing the work that they did on behalf of the City. Further, the Court observed while the DOL interpreted that people who were ordered to perform community service do not qualify as volunteers for purposes of the FLSA, it also concluded that, depending on all the facts and circumstances, such individuals would not be considered "employees" under the FLSA, and thus would not be entitled to minimum wage or overtime compensation. Id. at *10. The Court opined that the determination of whether an employer-employee relationship exists for purposes of the FLSA depends on its economic reality, and that the economic realities must be assessed by reference to the particular situation with some factors more important than others depending on the FLSA question at issue and the context in which it arises. Id. at *11-13. The Court noted that previous case law had held that people who perform community service as a condition of an ACD do not do so for the purpose of enabling them to earn a living, or indeed to receive financial compensation of any kind. Id. at *15. Plaintiffs did not allege that monetary compensation or the hope thereof played any role in their decision to accept ACDs. Rather, the Court observed that the obvious purpose of New York's ACD program is to enable the parties to resolve cases involving minor offenses in a way that provides more substantial consequences than outright dismissal of the charges, but allows individuals to avoid further prosecution and the criminal stigma that attaches to convictions. Id. Additionally, the Court remarked that extending the FLSA to cover those whom a state trial court orders to perform community service in lieu of criminal prosecution would not advance the FLSA's purpose, and would instead undermine the efficacy of programs like the ACD, because judges and prosecutors might be less inclined to agree to ACDs if doing so would require City agencies to pay for labor that they might not otherwise have even wanted. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs were not employees within the meaning of the FLSA when they performed the community service to which they consented pursuant to their ACDs, and granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Garcia-Celestino, et al. v. Consolidated Citrus Limited Partnership*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 69251 (M.D. Fla. May 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of temporary H-2A Mexican guest-workers, brought an action alleging that Defendants violated employment contracts and minimum wage requirements of the FLSA. Plaintiffs picked citrus fruit on groves owned by Defendant Consolidated Citrus Limited Partnership ("CCLP"). Former Defendant Ruiz Harvesting, Inc. ("RHI") was a farm labor contractor that hired and furnished Plaintiffs to pick fruit for CCLP during the 2007-2008 and 2008-2009 harvest seasons. After a six-day bench trial addressing CCLP's liability as an alleged joint employer during the two harvest seasons, the Court found in Plaintiffs' favor on their H-2A contract claims. At the outset, the Court noted that Aimable v. Long & Scott Farms, 20 F.3d 434 (11th Cir. 1994), set out an eight-factor test to analyze joint employer claims under the FLSA. Id. at *56. With respect to the first factor – nature and degree of control of harvesters – the Court opined that a grower may play an overly active role if it makes decisions such as: (i) for whom and how many employees to hire; (ii) how to design the employees' management structure; (iii) when the workday begins; (iv) when the laborers start and stop working; and (v) whether a laborer should be disciplined or retained. Id. at *59. The Court reasoned that here, although CCLP required RHI to participate in the H-2A program, it did not demand that RHI hire specific individuals and did not direct RHI's hiring process. Id. The Court ruled that this factor weighed against finding that CCLP was Plaintiffs' joint employer. As to the second factor – degree of supervision – the Court observed that supervision can be present regardless of whether orders were communicated directly to the alleged employee or indirectly thorough the contractor. In this context, CCLP supervisors checked for shiners, garbage, and debris and also ensured that RHI personnel and harvesters complied with CCLP's citrus canker procedures. Id. at *61. Based on the facts, the Court concluded that the second factor favored Plaintiffs' joint employment theory. Id. at *62. As to the third factor – the right to hire, fire, or modify employment conditions – the Court ruled that, because CCLP required contractors to obtain H-2A labor and assigned work at a high level, but it did not help make human resources decisions as to specific workers, the third factor slightly favored Plaintiffs' joint employment theory. Id. at *63-64. The Court held that the remaining factors all weighed in favor of Plaintiffs' joint employment theory. Plaintiffs provided an integral service for CCLP by harvesting the fruit grown on CCLP property. As Plaintiffs completed the harvest, CCLP indirectly but extensively supervised them on a daily basis. CCLP also owned and operated the time-keeping equipment and was directly involved in payroll practices. Bearing in mind the totality of the circumstances, the Court readily concluded that Plaintiffs were economically dependent on CCLP. Accordingly, the Court found that CCLP was Plaintiffs' joint employer and was liable to them for wage violations.

Hebron, et al. v. DirecTV, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 142077 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of technicians, brought an action alleging that Defendants denied them minimum wage and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and Illinois state law. Defendant DirecTV, LLC, controlled and managed its service technicians by either employing them directly or through an employment network of service providers consisting of Home Services Providers, including Defendant DirectSat USA, LLC. Id. at *3. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss, and the Court granted the motion in part. Defendants first sought dismissal of Plaintiffs' FLSA claims on the basis that Plaintiffs did not show that an employer-employee relationship existed for the purposes of the FLSA. The Court acknowledged the test for joint employment, including whether the alleged employer: (i) had the power to hire and fire employees; (ii) supervised and controlled employee work schedules or conditions of payments; (iii) determined the rate and method of payment; and (iv) maintained employment records. Id. at *9. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs did not sufficiently allege that Defendants had the power to hire or fire them, determine the rate or method of their pay, and that they did not maintain records pertaining to their alleged employment. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs alleged that DirecTV supervised and controlled employee work schedules by issuing work orders through a database program known as SIEBEL. Id. Plaintiffs further contended that DirecTV determined the policies, procedures, practices, and performance standards for installing its service. Id. The Court observed that, whereas DirecTV determined what tasks were compensable and what tasks were not, Plaintiffs did not allege that Defendants determined their compensation. Id. In addition, the Court noted that Plaintiffs did not allege that DirecSat determined what tasks were compensable, or the rate of compensation. Id. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed sufficiently to allege that DirecTV and DirecSat were joint-employers for the purposes of the FLSA. Id. at *11. Similarly, the Court found that Plaintiffs relied on mere assertions without making any specific allegations as to their minimum wage and overtime claims, and granted Defendants' motion to dismiss those causes of action. The Court, however, denied Defendants' motion to dismiss based on the argument that Plaintiffs failed to state a claim under the FLSA for recovery beyond two-year period, finding that Plaintiffs had sufficiently alleged willfulness to extend the period to three years. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court granted in part Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Mejia, et al. v. Brothers Petroleum, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74339 (E.D. La. June 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a collective action seeking overtime and minimum wages under the FLSA. Plaintiffs moved to conditionally certify a collective action consisting of all current and former non-exempt, hourly employees who were denied overtime and minimum wages. The Court granted the motion. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs filed an amended complaint to add 44 additional Defendants, including Lenny Motwani, LKM Convenience, and LKM Enterprises ("LKM Defendants"). Id. at *7. In this motion, Plaintiffs alleged that all Defendants worked together to operate and run a business that served a single common goal, and that Defendants were joint employers of Plaintiffs. Id. After the Court granted the motion, the LKM Defendants moved to dismiss the claims against them, which the Court granted. The LKM

Defendants contended that the complaint failed to adequately plead that they qualified as Plaintiffs' employers under the FLSA. Id. at *10. The complaint alleged that all Defendants worked in concert to operate and run businesses that served a single common goal, allowed Plaintiffs to work interchangeably between all stores operated by Defendants, and utilized the same method for paying all of Defendants' employees. Id. at *13. The LKM Defendants contended that those allegations were vague and conclusory. The Court remarked that based on the facts alleged in the complaint, Plaintiffs had adequately demonstrated that the LKM Defendants were Plaintiffs' employers under the FLSA. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs had sufficiently pleaded that the LKM Defendants were their employers. The Court reasoned that FLSA was applicable to employees who were: (i) engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce ("individual coverage"); or (ii) employed in an enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce ("enterprise coverage"). Id. at *15. The Court noted that to sufficiently plead individual coverage, a Plaintiff must allege facts giving rise to a reasonable inference that he or she was engaged in commerce or in the production of commerce. Id. The Court observed that the complaint was devoid of facts or allegations regarding Plaintiffs' relationship to instrumentalities or facilities of interstate commerce. Id. at *16. The Court remarked that the only allegations in the complaint regarding Plaintiffs' work duties were that Plaintiffs worked as hourly cashiers, cooks, and store operators at Defendants' convenience stores. Id. The Court found that while these allegations provided a generic description of Plaintiffs' work, they did not show how the work was in interstate commerce. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to plead individual coverage under the FLSA. Similarly, the Court noted that to plead enterprise coverage, Plaintiffs must allege facts giving rise to an inference that Defendants constituted enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce. Id. at *17. The Court opined that Plaintiffs' merely made conclusory allegation that Defendants were and continued to engage in interstate commerce. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to allege that Defendants engaged in enterprise commerce. The Court, therefore, granted the LKM Defendants' motion to dismiss without prejudice.

Ochoa, et al. v. McDonald's Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 129539 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 25, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a putative class action against Defendants, franchisees of McDonald's USA (the "Franchisee Defendants") and three McDonald's entities – McDonald's USA, McDonald's Corporation, and McDonald's California (the "McDonald's Defendants") – alleging that Defendants violated the California Labor Code by failing to pay Plaintiffs overtime and minimum wage, by failing to provide meal and rest breaks, by failing to provide legally adequate earnings statements, and by failing by reimburse employees for time required to maintain their uniforms. Id. at *2-4. The McDonald's Defendants moved for summary judgment, arguing that they were not joint employers of Plaintiffs and, therefore, could not be held liable for any of the various violations Plaintiffs allegedly suffered at the hands of the Franchisee Defendants. The Court applied the joint employer test from the California Supreme Court's decision in Martinez v. Combs, 49 Cal. 4th 35 (2010), and granted in part the McDonald's Defendants' motion for summary judgment. Plaintiffs submitted evidence that the McDonald's Defendants controlled their franchisees through their power to terminate franchise agreements, provided recommendations on crew scheduling and staffing, monitored customer service metrics, owned or leased all locations, furnished franchisees with employee time-keeping software, and sent business consultants to counsel franchisees and their employees. Id. at *17-25. The Court found that Plaintiffs' evidence did not establish a genuine issue of disputed material fact as to whether the McDonald's Defendants, as franchisors, had the authority to make hiring, firing, wage, and staffing decisions at the Franchisee Defendants' restaurants. Id. at *26. The Court, however, found that the McDonald's Defendants could be held liable as joint employers under an alternative ostensible agency theory. An ostensible agency exists where: (i) the person dealing with the agent does so with reasonable belief in the agent's authority; (ii) that belief is generated by some act or neglect of the principal sought to be charged; and (iii) the relying party is not negligent. Id. at *29. Plaintiffs submitted declarations stating that they believed that the McDonald's Defendants were their employers, in part because they wore McDonald's uniforms, served McDonald's food in McDonald's packaging, received pay stubs and orientation materials marked with the McDonald's name and logo, and applied for jobs through McDonald's website. Id. Because there was evidence from which a jury reasonably could conclude that the McDonald's Defendants and the Franchisee Defendants shared an ostensible agency relationship, the Court concluded that the McDonald's Defendants' potential liability as joint employers under an ostensible agency theory should be resolved at trial. Id. at *30. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part the McDonald's Defendants' motion for summary judgment.

(xxi) Litigation Of Tip Pooling And Tip Credit Claims Under The FLSA

Allision, et al. v. Dolich,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 163553 (D. Ore. Dec. 7, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a collective action under the FLSA alleging that Defendants violated the FLSA by requiring Plaintiffs and the collective action members to participate in a mandatory invalid tip pool and failed to pay them the federal minimum wage. Id. at *7. Defendants moved for summary judgment and asserted that current case law from the Ninth Circuit and the U.S. District Court for the District of Oregon prohibited Plaintiffs' tip pool claims and that Plaintiffs failed to support their minimum wage claim based on late paychecks. The Court granted Defendants' motion and found that Defendants did not take a tip credit, and therefore were not subject to the tip pooling restrictions under the FLSA, and that Defendants had paid Plaintiffs the federal minimum wage in a timely manner. Id. at *2. Defendants required Plaintiffs to contribute their tips to a tip pool that included employees not customarily tipped, including managers. Plaintiffs did not dispute that Defendants did not take a tip credit, and the arrangement clearly supported that Defendants paid Plaintiffs an hourly wage that exceeded the federal minimum wage. Id. at *23. The Court concluded that the inclusion of manager in a tip pool did not violate the FLSA when Defendants paid Plaintiffs more than the minimum wage. Id. at *32. The Court therefore granted summary judgment to Defendants to the extent Plaintiffs' claim relied on a tip pool. Because Plaintiffs failed to present any evidence to support their claim that Defendants violated the FLSA by failing to pay them in timely manner, the Court also granted summary judgment to Defendants on this claim. Id. at *36. The Court also denied Plaintiffs' motion for additional discovery, finding that additional discovery was not warranted because Plaintiffs had access to evidence establishing their wage rate well before filing this action, and could have offered such evidence through pay stubs, declarations, or deposition testimony. Id. at *38-39. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion for summary judgment and denied Plaintiffs' request for additional discovery.

Conners, et al. v. Catfish Pies, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18422 (E.D. Ark. Feb. 13, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action challenging Defendants' tip pooling policy that paid waiters less than the minimum wage. Prior to 2013, Ben Biesenthal and Tim Chappell each individually owned an interest in Catfish Pies, Inc., Pizza Profits, Show Me Pies, Three Buddies, Inc., and Gusano's Pizzeria n/k/a Hendrix Brand, Inc. Id. at *2. Biesenthal is now the president of Crazy Pies, Pizza Profits, and Show me Pies, and in 2013, Chappell became sole owner and president of Hendrix, and conveyed his interests in the other entities. Id. Defendants used similar employee handbooks, which included a tip pooling policy under which the wait staff had to tip-out a percentage of their sales to kitchen, hostess, and bar staff. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs moved for summary judgment, which the Court granted in part. First, regarding Plaintiffs' claim that cooks were not tipped employees, the Court noted that an employee is a tipped employee only if she is engaged in an occupation in which she regularly and customarily receives at least $30 in tips per month. Id. at *5. Although the cooks occasionally assisted with orders, bussed tables, and sometimes received tips from customers, the Court remarked that this was insufficient to make them employees who customarily and regularly received tips. Further, because Defendants' description of cooks' duties did not indicate that they were required to interact with customers more than occasionally, the Court ruled that the cooks were not tipped employees, and granted summary judgment on this claim. Id. at *6. Second, regarding the mandatory tip pooling policy, the Court noted that the employee's handbook stated that the wait staff was required to tip-out a percentage of its sales to kitchen, hostess, and bar staff personnel. However, some employees who said they were required to tip-out testified that they never read the handbook and some testified that they were told they were not required to tip-out. Given the conflicting evidence as to whether tipped employees were actually required to share tips with non-tipped employees, the Court denied summary judgment on this claim. Further, the Court denied summary judgment on Plaintiffs' claim that tip pool was invalid because managers participated in it. The Court observed that participation in a tip pool by management-level employees who qualify as employers under the FLSA renders a tip pool agreement invalid. Id. at *7-8. Here, because it was unclear whether the kitchen managers were employers, the Court left that issue for the jury to determine. Regarding employer status, the Court noted that Biesenthal did not hire the hourly employees, but he hired and fired the managers, and advised them occasionally regarding termination of hourly employees. Although Biesenthal controlled the manner in which work was performed, the Court found this insufficient to support a grant of summary judgment on Plaintiffs' claim that Biesenthal was their employer. Id. at *11. Similarly, the Court also denied summary judgment on Plaintiffs' claim that Chappell was their employer. Besides Hobbs, no other Plaintiff worked at Hendrix and although Hobbs alleged that Chappell hired and fired her and he had control over the daily operations at Hendrix because he was an owner, Chappell denied these allegations. Id. at *12. Finally, the Court noted that Three Buddies created and supplied the employee's handbooks for all establishments, supplied the tip-out agreement in question, and did the payroll of all the employees. Although Defendants contended that Three Buddies had no control over the restaurants employees, and only provided them with administrative services, Plaintiffs alleged that Three Buddies controlled the rates and methods of payment and indirectly controlled the hiring and firing of employees. Thus, because of a genuine dispute of facts on these issues, the Court denied summary judgment on Plaintiffs' claim that Three Buddies' was their employer.

Inclan, et al. v. New York Hospitality Group, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39342 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 26, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former waiters at a restaurant operated by Defendants, brought an action under the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL") alleging Defendants paid them an hourly wage below the minimum wage without fulfilling the federal and state law requirements to take a tip credit allowance. Id. at *2. Throughout their employment at the restaurant, Defendants paid Plaintiffs a "tip credit minimum wage rate" of $5 per hour. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs alleged that they did not receive notice of the restaurant's intent to take a tip credit or a wage notice form from the restaurant. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendants failed to pay them the proper minimum wage for their overtime hours. Following conditional certification of an FLSA collective action, Plaintiffs moved for summary judgment. The Court granted the motion in part. Defendants provided no evidence that they complied with the tip credit notice requirements, and therefore the Court found that Defendants were liable under the FLSA and the NYLL for Plaintiffs' unpaid minimum wages without a tip credit allowance. Id. at *12-13. The Court also determined that Defendants were liable to the extent that they failed to pay the minimum overtime wage, without a tip credit allowance, to Plaintiffs for their hours worked in excess of 40 per week, as the evidence demonstrated that on some occasions, Defendants paid an unlawfully low wage for overtime hours. Id. at *15-16. Plaintiffs contended that they were entitled to statutory damages for Defendants' failure to provide them, at the time of their hiring and annually thereafter, with notice of Defendants' intent to take a tip credit, and to furnish them with regular wage statements that met the requirements of New York's Wage Theft Prevention Act ("WTPA"). Although Plaintiffs only referred generally to the NYLL rather than specifically to the WTPA, the Court found that Plaintiffs had adequately described the substance of Plaintiffs' WTPA claims, and their failure to cite a statute in no way affected the merits of their claim. Id. at *18-19. The Court, nonetheless, denied summary judgment to Plaintiffs on WTPA wage notice claim at the time of hiring on the basis that Defendant hired all Plaintiffs before the WTPA took effect on April 9, 2011, and the WTPA does not apply retroactively. Id. at *21-22. Because the WTPA required Defendants to provide annual notice of the tip credit to its employees on or before February 2012, and because two of the named Plaintiffs remained employed with Defendants after that date, the Court held that those Plaintiffs could recover applicable statutory damages. Id. at *22. The Court further ruled that Plaintiffs also could recover the applicable statutory damages for Defendants' failure to state the amount of tip credit allowance in pay statements. Id. Defendants also admitted that they failed to pay Plaintiffs a spread-of-hours premium when Plaintiffs' workday exceeded ten hours per day, and therefore the Court found Defendants liable for unpaid spread-of-hours premiums where applicable. Id. at *25. The Court, however, declined to find that Plaintiffs were entitled to cumulative liquidated damages under the FLSA and the NYLL, since "the distinction between compensatory and punitive for characterizing liquidated damages under the FLSA and the NYLL [is] semantic, exalting form over substance." Id. at *32-33. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment in part.

Kim, et al. v. Kum Guang, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39095 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 19, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former restaurant workers, brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them minimum wage and overtime compensation, unlawfully shared in their tip pools, and required them to distribute some of their tips to non-tipped kitchen staff employees in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). As to their minimum wage and overtime claims, Plaintiffs contended that, at least until 2011, Defendants required them to work overtime regularly but paid them daily rather than hourly at rates ranging from $25 to $65 depending on the job assignment and length of service per day. Id. at *15. After a bench trial, the Court entered judgment in Plaintiffs' favor. First, the Court concluded that Defendants were not entitled to take a tip credit. The Court observed that, to be eligible to take a tip credit, an employer must inform its employees of the statutory requirements governing tip credits. The Court found that Defendants never advised any Plaintiffs that Defendants were applying a tip credit in the calculation of Plaintiffs' wages or that Plaintiffs had the right to undiminished wages if the restaurant diverted some of the tip pool. Id. at *81. Second, as to Defendants' failure to pay minimum wage and overtime compensation, the Court credited Plaintiffs' account of the number of hours that they worked during the relevant time period. Plaintiffs testified in detail about their history of hours worked and their rates of overtime pay. Defendants did not retain records of Plaintiffs' work hours other than a handful of timecards that pertained to a few weeks of work by four Plaintiffs and, in part, reflected only the employees' starting times. The Court noted that credible evidence demonstrated that Defendants had created a large volume of fraudulent timecards for use in connection with an investigation conducted by the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL"), and Defendants apparently hid those timecards after their return by the DOL. Id. at *85. Third, the Court ruled that restaurant managers improperly diverted portions of the various tip pools from the waiters and bussers to the restaurant itself and to the kitchen employees. The Court observed that, in calculating the amount improperly taken from the credit card tip pool, an employer is entitled to deduct a sum reasonably calculated to cover credit card processing fees. Id. at *89. The Court held that a 3% withholding of credit card tips was reasonable and, accordingly, ruled that Plaintiffs were entitled to recover the amount of tips diverted from the credit card tip pool less 3%. Fourth, the Court concluded that equitable tolling saved Plaintiffs' claims that otherwise would have been barred by the FLSA and NYLL statute of limitations. Id. at *121. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants acted willfully, triggering the three-year limitations period under the FLSA, and that in any event all of Plaintiffs' claims, which arose as early as 1997, should be deemed viable by application of equitable tolling. Id. at *103. The Court concluded that Defendants not only persisted in paying the workers grossly substandard wages and diverting some of their tip income, but also – in violation of statutes and regulations – they made sure to deny the workers any information that would disclose the violations of their rights, whether through provision of a date-of-hire notice of pay, the distribution of wage statements on payday, or any other written or oral disclosure of minimum wage and overtime requirements. The Court opined that it had no reason to believe that Plaintiffs knew of the violation of their rights until sometime after 2011, about a year before they filed the action. Accordingly, the Court entered judgment in favor of Plaintiffs.

Richardson, et al. v. Mountain Range Restaurants LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35008 (D. Ariz. Mar. 20, 2015). Plaintiff, a tipped employee, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay her federal minimum wages in violation of the FLSA. Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant required her to work and spend a substantial amount of time performing related non-tipped duties, including working as a hostess, cashier, stocking ice, and non-related duties such as taking out trash, scrubbing walls, cleaning the back of the house, and vacuuming. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiff asserted that, because her related non-tipped work exceeded 20% of her server duties and her non-related duties constituted a different job classification, she was entitled to the federal minimum wage, and not the tip credit hourly wage rate Defendant used. Id. at *9-10. Defendant moved to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiff failed to state a minimum wage claim under the FLSA. Defendant contended that Plaintiff had not provided any degree of specificity as to any date she worked at the alleged related and non-related non-tipped duties, how long each took, or how often Plaintiff did such work. Id. at *10. Defendant also maintained that § 531.56(e) of the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") regulation specifically provides that servers may perform incidental duties in addition to their normal duties as a server without forfeiting the top credit, and that it always paid Plaintiff the federal minimum wage for all of her workweeks as a tipped employee. Id. The Court granted Defendant's motion. The Court found that no minimum wage violation occurs so long as the employer's total wage paid to an employee in any given workweek divided by the total hours worked in the workweek equals or exceeds the minimum wage rate. Id. at *14. Although Plaintiff alleged that Defendant paid her less than the minimum wage and her complaint pertained to examples of tasks that Defendant asked her to perform that allegedly were both related to and unrelated to her occupation as a server, the Court found that such allegations did not state a minimum wage claim because the pleading never alleged that during any particular week the average of her hourly wages was less than the federal minimum wage. Id. The Court therefore held that Plaintiff failed to state a minimum wage claim under the FLSA. The Court also found that DOL regulation entitling employers to utilize tipped food service personnel to perform related and incidental task was not ambiguous. Although Plaintiff asked the Court to defer to § 30d00(e) of the DOL regulations – that allegedly limits the amount of related duties tipped employees can perform, and that if tipped employee spend a substantial amount of time, or more than 20% of their workweek engaged in non-tipping duties, they must be paid the full minimum wage for their time spent performing the non-tipped work – the Court noted that neither Congress, the U.S. Supreme Court, nor the Ninth Circuit has recognized a purported cause of action based on the DOL regulation. Id. at *16-17. Further, because the controlling regulation was not ambiguous, the Court declined to consider the proposed DOL's informal commentary found in the notes to the regulation. The Court opined that the informal commentary was not persuasive because it did not interpret the regulation, but purported to add additional requirements, and it was meant only to provide guidance for employees of the DOL's Wage & Hour Division charged with enforcing the FLSA. Id. at *18-21. Because the server occupation inherently includes side work, and the regulation does not identify the "duties" dichotomy or cap incidental duties at 20%, the Court found that Plaintiff's complaint lacked both a cognizable legal theory and sufficient facts to support a cognizable legal claim. Id. at *20-26. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Trejo, et al. v. Ryman Hospitality Properties, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13204 (4th Cir. July 29, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of hotel and restaurant servers, brought an action alleging violations of the tip credit provision of the FLSA, a collective bargaining agreement with Defendant, and Maryland's Wage Payment and Collection Law. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs contended that Defendant improperly took a portion of their tips – roughly 4% of their total daily food and drink sales – and redistributed those tips to bartenders, server assistants, bus boys, and food runners. Id. Defendants moved to dismiss, and the District Court granted the motion. The District Court concluded that the FLSA's tip credit provision, 29 U.S.C. § 203(m), had no bearing on the case because Plaintiffs did not allege that Defendants paid them below the minimum wage, or that Defendants forced them to work overtime without proper pay, and conceded that their base salary always remained above the minimum wage even absent tips. The District Court dismissed Plaintiffs' count based on an alleged breach of the collective bargaining agreement, finding that they failed to exhaust their administrative remedies. Finally, the District Court dismissed Plaintiffs' Maryland state law count because Plaintiffs agreed that a "tip" was not a "wage" under the Maryland statute. Id. Plaintiffs appealed, and the Fourth Circuit affirmed. Plaintiffs argued that Defendants violated the FLSA by requiring them to join the tip pooling arrangement and that the tip credit provision created a freestanding right to bring a claim for lost tip wages. Id. at *7-9. The Fourth Circuit disagreed. The Fourth Circuit held that the inclusion of improper employees within a tip pool and/or the failure to notify employees of a tip pooling policy does not give rise to a private cause of action under the FLSA when employees seek only the recovery of the tips, unrelated to a minimum wage or overtime claim. Id. at *10. The Fourth Circuit explained that § 203(m), when read in context of the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the FLSA as a whole, gives rise to a cause of action "only if the employer was using tips to satisfy the minimum wage requirements." Id. The Fourth Circuit, therefore, affirmed the District Court's order dismissing the complaint.

(xxii) Sanctions In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Hernandez, et al. v. Best Buy Stores, L.P.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 154103 (S.D. Cal. Nov. 13, 2015). Plaintiff, a salaried store manager, brought a class action alleging that Defendant misclassified him as an exempt employee, and thereby denied him overtime pay and meal and rest periods. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's managers did not meet the requirements for "exempt" employees under California law because they regularly spent more than 50% of their time performing non-exempt tasks and because their work did not regularly involve discretion or independent judgment. Id. at *2. Prior to moving for class certification, Plaintiff requested an order compelling Defendant to disclose contact information for putative class members. Id. at *3. Finding that Plaintiff was entitled to test his class allegations to determine whether certification was feasible, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion and ordered Defendant to provide Plaintiff with contact information for members of the putative class subject to a stipulated protective order governing exchange of confidential information. Id. at *4. Plaintiff did not file a motion for class certification by the scheduled deadline, and instead filed a motion for permissive joinder seeking to join "identical claims" on behalf of 30 individuals who were members of the putative class and to dismiss the class allegations without prejudice as to absent class members. Id. at *5. Defendant opposed the motion, and filed a motion for contempt sanctions and disqualification. Defendant contended that Plaintiff's counsel did not use the contact information for putative class members to allow Plaintiff to gather information in support of a motion for class certification, but contacted them to improperly solicit new clients to join the action as additional Plaintiffs. Id. at *6. The Court denied Defendant's motion. Although the Court did not anticipate that Plaintiff's counsel would decide not to pursue class certification and instead seek dismissal of the class allegations and the joinder of additional Plaintiffs, the Court also noted that it did not specifically prohibit Plaintiff from following this course. Id. at *14. Contrary to Defendant's view, the Court explained that it did not intend to limit the options available to Plaintiff's counsel if he determined, based on the information discovered from members of the putative class, that moving for class certification was not "feasible" for whatever reason. Id. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiff did not violate its previous order simply because he decided not to pursue class certification but instead requested permissive joinder of additional Plaintiffs and dismissal of the class allegations. The Court also found that Defendant's separate contention that Plaintiff's counsel had engaged in unethical and abusive conduct when contacting potential class members – by aggressively soliciting representation in the suit and harassing other potential Plaintiffs – was supported by weak evidence and only showed a "mere possibility of abuse." Id. at *25-30. In addition, the Court noted that the communications between potential Plaintiffs and attorneys for both parties that resulted from making contact information available achieved some favorable results for both sides, as certain class members identified themselves as either wanting to participate in the action or opting-out. Id. at *41-42. The Court therefore held that the parties' requests in the moving and opposing papers for additional discovery to resolve whether there was any improper solicitation or unethical conduct during communications with putative class members would further delay the litigation, and thus were not warranted. Id. at *43. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for sanctions and disqualification.

Zurita, et al. v. High Definition Fitness Center, Inc.,* Case No. 13-CV-4394 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action against Defendants asserting claims under the FLSA and the New York Labor Law. Defendants failed to respond to the complaint or participate in discovery, and the Court issued a default. Id. at *1. Subsequently, an attorney, Ganet Getachew, filed a notice of appearance on behalf of Defendants, and Plaintiffs moved for a default judgment. Another attorney, Rita Dave, appeared in the Court explaining that she was "of counsel" to Getachew. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs then agreed to withdraw their default motion and proceed with discovery. The parties meanwhile began negotiating a settlement; however, Defendants stopped participating in discovery, and failed to participate in the mediation process. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs then moved to compel Defendants to answer the amended complaint and provide discovery. When the Court ordered Defendants to show cause why default sanctions should not be entered against them, Defendants again failed to respond. Plaintiffs then renewed their motion for sanctions against Defendants and their counsel. Dave then represented to the Court that although she was an "of-counsel," she was primarily responsible for the case, and that she did not appear before the Court because she was ill. Id. at *2. Dave filed a motion to withdraw even though she had never filed her appearance in the case. Id. at *3. Meanwhile, Defendants appeared before the Court and explained that no one represented them anymore and that the previous counsel had not served them with a copy of the Court's order to show cause for default sanctions. The Court granted Defendants time to find a new attorney, while Plaintiffs filed another motion for sanctions against Getachew and Dave requesting $3,500 in attorneys' fees incurred as a result of counsel's non-compliance with discovery. Id. Meanwhile, the parties entered into a settlement, wherein Defendants agreed to make three monthly payments to Plaintiffs. Defendant made only one of the required payments. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs renewed their motions for a default judgment and sanction. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for sanctions. The Court observed that in deciding a whether a sanction is merited, the Court need not find that a party acted in bad faith; rather, it is sufficient if a pre-trial order is violated, which thereby would support a sanction. Id. at *5. The Court, accordingly, granted Plaintiffs' request for attorneys' fees resulting from defense counsel's failure to comply with discovery. Id. The Court also granted Dave's motion to withdraw, but it was contingent upon full payment of sanction. Id. at *4.

(xxiii) Issues With Opt-In Rights In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Adkins, et al. v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40246 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, 82 individuals employed as cable splicers, brought an action against Defendant, one of the largest providers of local telephone services, alleging claims for unpaid overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and the Illinois Minimum Wage Law. Defendant required its cable splicers to record their daily time in an electronic system called job administration management ("JAM"). Id. at *16. Defendant gave cable splicers an "efficiency rating" based on how well they performed their tasks within the time increments set and calculated this using a system called management systems operations control ("MSOC"). Id. Plaintiffs asserted that they uniformly under-reported the time taken to complete their daily tasks in order to avoid being disciplined for failing to meet "efficiency goals." Id. at *21. Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint for misjoinder and to require individual suits. Defendant argued that the decertification order in a related decision entitled Blakes v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co., Case No. 11-CV-336 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 17, 2011), barred joinder of Plaintiffs' claims in this action. In Blakes, seven named Plaintiffs brought an FLSA collective action seeking unpaid overtime wages. Although the Court initially granted conditional certification under the lenient first-stage standard, after extensive discovery, including depositions of 18 opt-in Plaintiffs, the Court decertified the collective action on all but Plaintiffs' post-shift timesheet entry claim. Id. The Court had determined that the differences in the opt-in Plaintiffs' testimony demonstrated that it would be impossible to resolve the question of whether the combination of the MSOC and JAM rating systems compelled cable splicers to work off-the-clock on a class-wide basis. Id. at *22. The Court had, however, found sufficient parallels among Plaintiffs' experience of working post-shift to support a finding of similarity with respect to their claim that Defendant required to complete timesheet post-shift without pay. Id. at *24. While Plaintiffs in Blakes were currently before the Court with a collective action for their post-shift timesheet entry claim and with individual actions joined together for their off-the-clock work claims, Plaintiffs brought this action on behalf of opt-ins in Blakes asserting those claims that the Court in Blakes denied in rejecting collective action certification. Id. at *25. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs were estopped from proceeding jointly because a Court had already found that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated and that their claims were not suitable for collective action treatment. Id. at *28-29. The Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss and found that Plaintiffs could not satisfy the similarly-situated standard under the FLSA. Id. at *31. The Court noted that the parties substantially litigated the similarity issue, conducting extensive discovery, hiring multiple experts and filing hundreds of pages of briefing, before the Court in Blakes and thus, Plaintiffs were collaterally estopped from joining all 82 individual Plaintiffs into one action based on their efficiency theory. Id. at *32. Although Plaintiffs here alleged additional different reasons for under-reporting their time, including that their supervisors told them not to report the time they worked pre-shift and post-shift or during lunch, the Court found that it would still need to engage in numerous individual inquiries to determine the extent of each supervisor's knowledge and assess each supervisor's decision to require off-the-clock work. Id. at *42. Thus, because Plaintiffs' claims did not arise out of the same transaction or occurrence, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' claims were misjoined and must be severed. Id. at *45. Accordingly, the Court ordered severance of the claims of all Plaintiffs.

Arocho, et al. v. Crystal Clear Building Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38493 (N.D. Ohio Mar. 26, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them overtime wages and/or minimum wages in violation of the FLSA. After the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification, 114 individuals opted-in to the collective action. Id. at *2. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment, and the Court denied Defendants' motion. According to Defendants, the named Plaintiffs were subject to the same requirement as putative collective action opt-ins in that the named Plaintiffs must opt-in via a written consent form. Id. at *3. Defendants argued that the named Plaintiffs never submitted a written consent, and therefore, under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), their claims must be dismissed. Plaintiffs contended that they submitted their written consent, and attached the motion for conditional certification, where each named Plaintiff declared their consent to bring this action for themselves and for other similarly-situated employees. Id. Defendants responded that Plaintiffs' consents were filed before the action was conditionally certified, and hence they were entitled to summary judgment. The Court determined that Plaintiffs produced unrefuted evidence that they consented in writing to opt-in the collective action. Id. at *5. The Court found that nothing in the 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) requires a named Plaintiff to file a written consent after conditional certification, as the statute indicates that a consent may be filed with the complaint. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion for summary judgment.

Kimbrel, et al. v. D.E.A. Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38364 (E.D. Tenn. Mar. 26, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a collective action alleging that Defendants violated the FLSA. The Court allowed the parties' joint motion for conditional certification, and set October 20, 2014 as the deadline for the individuals who wished to opt-in. Three individuals; Keyshia Burns, Sara Hassan, and Brandy Hill, sought to join the collective action weeks after the deadline lapsed. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs moved to add the three as opt-ins, or in the alternative sought permissive joinder pursuant to Rule 20, which the Court granted in part. Id. at *3. At the outset, the Court noted that in Hurt v. Commerce Energy, Inc., 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14842 (N.D. Ohio Feb 6, 2014), the Court set the following factors to determine when individuals wished to opt-in after the deadline passed: (i) whether good cause exists; (ii) prejudice to Defendant; (iii) how long after the deadline passed the consents were filed; (iv) judicial economy; and (v) the remedial purposes of the FLSA. Id. at *5. The Court noted that despite Plaintiffs offering no good cause for the untimeliness, Hurt found that the late opt-ins should be permitted to join the collective action because less than a month had passed since the opt-in deadline, judicial economy would be served by permitting one action, and that the other factors also favored joinder. Id. at *7. Here, the Court noted that Defendants' failure to disclose Burns, Hill, and Hassan's up-to-date address supported a finding for good cause for the delay. Id. Second, the Court remarked that there was little danger of prejudice to Defendants, because adding the opt-ins to the action would have virtually no effect on their potential liability. Id. Moreover, the Court noted that Defendants pointed to no evidence that supported their argument that other potential Plaintiffs would continue to present themselves and attempt to opt-in to this action. Id. at *8. To ensure that no other individuals opted-in, the Court ruled that that it would not accept any additional requests absent showing of extraordinary good cause. Id. The Court also found that the brief delay and the other two factors also weighed in favor of the joinder. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' request to allow the three individuals to opt-in, and denied Plaintiffs' alternative prayer as moot.

Lassen, et al. v. Hoyt Livery, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63823 (D. Conn. May 15, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and the Connecticut Minimum Wage Act ("CMWA"). The Court conditionally certified the collective action, and certified the CMWA claims under Rule 23. Fifteen individuals opted-in to the collective action, and 41 individuals opted-out of the CMWA class. Id. at *1-2. Defendants served document requests and interrogatories on each of the 15 opt-in Plaintiffs, and after several extensions to respond, only eight opt-in Plaintiffs responded to the request. Defendants then moved to dismiss all seven opt-in Plaintiffs with prejudice under Rule 41(b), which the Court granted in part. Of the seven opt-ins, five failed to respond to Defendants' requests ("unresponsive Plaintiffs"), and the remaining two opt-ins responded to the requests, but produced the responsive documents a month after the deadline passed. Plaintiffs conceded that the unresponsive Plaintiffs' FLSA claims were subject to dismissal, but their CMWA claims survived. Id. at *4. Defendants argued that the doctrine of res judicata dictated that the CMWA claims must be dismissed if the FLSA claims were dismissed under Rule 41(b), as a Rule 41(b) dismissal operates as an adjudication on the merits. Id. at *5. The Court rejected Defendants' position, and reasoned that claim and issue preclusion did not operate in such a manner. The Court remarked that Plaintiffs did not seek to initiate a new action on their FLSA claim; rather, they sought to continue an existing action on their CMWA claim. Id. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the unresponsive Plaintiffs' FLSA claims. The Court, however, refused to dismiss the claims of two Plaintiffs who responded to the request. The Court explained that Defendants were not prejudiced because although Plaintiffs produced the documents a month after the deadline to produce the documents had passed, the deadline for the completion of discovery was not until June 1, 2015, which was a month after the opt-ins produced the documents. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion in part.

Randolph, et al. v. Centene Management, Co., LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135740 (W.D. Wash. Oct. 5, 2015). Plaintiff brought an FLSA collective action alleging that Defendant uniformly misclassified her and other case managers as exempt from the FLSA's overtime protections and also violated Washington's wage & hour laws. Plaintiff moved for leave to file an amend complaint and to file opt-informs, which the Court granted. Previously, the Court had granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action and set July 31, 2015 as the deadline for opting-in the suit. Plaintiff received four additional consent forms seeking to join the case after the July 31 deadline. Id. at *2. Subsequently, Plaintiff moved to amend her complaint to: (i) include individual opt-in Plaintiffs as additional named Plaintiffs in the case caption; and (ii) add Rule 23 state law overtime claims under California, Ohio, Missouri, and Illinois wage laws. Id. at *3. Defendant opposed Plaintiffs' motion on the ground that Plaintiff failed to satisfy Rule 23's numerosity requirement. The Court remarked that this argument was premature and better suited for an opposition to class certification, and, even though Plaintiff bore the burden of demonstrating that Rule 23's requirements were actually satisfied in this case, it declined to make that determination on this motion. Id. at *4-5. Defendant contended also that Plaintiff's proposed state law claims would substantially predominate over her FLSA claim and, as such the exercise of supplemental jurisdiction would be improper in this case. The Court, however, concluded that it was too early to decide that Plaintiff's state law claims would substantially predominate over her FLSA claim. Id. at *5. Consequently, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for leave to amend the complaint. Id. at *6-7. Furthermore, regarding Plaintiff's motion to file four late consent forms, Defendant argued that Plaintiff had not shown good cause for the filing of late opt-ins. The Court remarked that in deciding whether late opt-in consent forms should be accepted, the case law authorities have generally considered five factors, including: (i) whether good cause exists for the late submissions; (ii) prejudice to Defendant; (iii) how long after the deadline were the consent forms filed; (iv) judicial economy; and (v) the remedial purposes of the FLSA. Id. at *8. Considering these factors, the Court found that Plaintiff failed to show good cause for the late submissions. Id. The Court, however, determined that all the other factors weighed in favor of allowing the late opt-in Plaintiffs to join this case. Accordingly, the Court nonetheless granted Plaintiff's motion to file the four consent forms, and the motion for leave to amend complaint and to file the late opt-in-forms.

Regan, et al. v. City Of Charleston,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35524 (D.S.C. Mar. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former firefighters, brought an FLSA collective action against the City seeking unpaid overtime compensation. Following the conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), the Court permitted potential Plaintiffs to opt-in to the collective action by September 15, 2014. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs filed over 200 consent forms by that deadline. Shortly after the deadline, Plaintiffs' counsel sought the City's consent to file six untimely opt-in consent forms. Because the City did not give its consent to the joinder of the opt-ins, Plaintiffs filed a motion seeking the Court's leave to file the untimely opt-in consent forms. Id. at *6. The Court entered a text order directing Plaintiffs' counsel to procure from each of the potential Plaintiffs a detailed affidavit addressing the reasons for not timely filing a consent form. Id. at *7. Accordingly, Plaintiffs filed affidavits of the potential Plaintiffs and their consent forms within the time fixed in the text order. The Court observed that although the affidavits filed by Plaintiffs' counsel did not support a finding of "good cause" for each potential Plaintiff's failure to timely return and file a consent form, the other relevant factors weighed in favor of allowing the late submissions. Id. at *10. The Court noted that Plaintiffs filed the consent forms within one month of the September 15, 2014 deadline and immediately informed the City's counsel that those individuals, who represented less than two percent of the current collective action, wished to join the action. Id. Therefore, the Court found that as the one-month delay did not prejudice the City, the addition of those individuals would not disrupt the discovery process. Furthermore, the Court found that judicial economy would be best served by allowing the potential Plaintiffs to join the pending action because, even if the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion, the potential Plaintiffs might still be able to institute separate actions against the City and thus, the consequences of denying joinder would likely be the same. Id. at *12. Finally, the Court concluded that allowing the potential Plaintiffs to opt-in to the pending collective action was consistent with the FLSA's remedial statutory scheme. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court accepted the untimely opt-in consent forms.

Rivet, et al. v. Office Depot, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171175 (D.N.J. Dec. 22, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former assistant store managers, brought a putative class and collective action under the FLSA and state wage & hour laws seeking overtime wages. After a number of individuals opted-in to the FLSA action, Defendant moved to dismiss claims of nine opt-ins under the doctrine of judicial estoppel on the grounds that they failed to disclose their claims against Defendant during the course of their bankruptcy proceedings ("the Bankruptcy Opt-Ins"), and claims of the 13 opt-ins who failed to prosecute and to comply with an order to provide discovery ("Discovery Opt-Ins"). Id. at *2-3. The Court granted the motion. Considering the three elements laid down in Krystal Cadillac-Oldsmobile GMC Truck, Inc. v. General Motors Corp., 337 F.3d 314, 319 (3d Cir. 2003), the Court found that application of judicial estoppel was appropriate against the Bankruptcy Opt-Ins. Id. at *7. First, the Court found that the Bankruptcy Opt-Ins had taken two positions that are irreconcilably inconsistent. Notwithstanding their affirmative decision to opt-in, none of the Bankruptcy Opt-Ins disclosed their contingent claims against Defendant during their bankruptcy proceedings. Id. at *9. Second, the Court found that the Bankruptcy Opt-Ins took their inconsistent positions in bad faith. The Bankruptcy Opt-Ins' knowledge of their claims was beyond dispute because they affirmatively agreed to join the FLSA litigation. Although they asserted that they were unaware of a duty to include their claims against Defendant in their bankruptcy disclosures, the Court remarked that the Bankruptcy Opt-Ins stood to gain from failing to disclose their claims in bankruptcy; this was because had their lack of disclosure gone unnoticed, they would have been able to pursue their claims against Defendant without having to make any future recovery available to their creditors. Id. at *11. Finally, the Court concluded that any lesser sanction would be inadequate. Although the Bankruptcy Opt-Ins proposed that their claims be stayed for 60 days so that they could re-open and/or amend their bankruptcy proceedings, the Court declined their request as it was not an adequate substitute for the application of judicial estoppel. The Court remarked that adopting the Bankruptcy Opt-Ins' proposal would encourage future debtors to take a "wait and see approach" in which they can conceal assets, hope no one notices, and if they do get caught, ask the Court to forgive their failure to disclose. Id. at *12. In analyzing whether the Discovery Opt-Ins' case should be dismissed pursuant to Rule 41(b) and Rule 37(b), the Court considered the six factors discussed in Poulis v. State Farm Fire and Casualty Co., 747 F.2d 863, 868 (3d Cir. 1984). Id. First, the Court found that the Discovery Opt-Ins were personally responsible as they did not respond to the discovery requests due in 2014. Second, by withholding discovery, the Discovery Opt-Ins had potentially frustrated Defendant's ability to receive information relevant to its defense in this litigation. Third, the Discovery Opt-Ins engaged in a continual pattern of non-responsiveness despite multiple reminders. Fourth, the Discovery Opt-Ins' non-responsiveness was willful, as the Magistrate Judge had explicitly warned them that a failure to engage in discovery might result in dismissal. Id. at *15. Fifth, the Court found that no alternative sanction would be appropriate because the Discovery Opt-Ins had already ignored the Court's order. Finally, although the sixth factor of Poulis (the meritoriousness of the claim or defense) could not be determined at that early stage of the litigation, the Court concluded that all other five factors weighed in favor of dismissal. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motions.

Stevenson, et al. v. The Great American Dream, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 75915 (N.D. Ga. June 11, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former adult entertainers at a nightclub, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants misclassified them as "independent contractors" and denied them minimum and overtime wages under the FLSA. Id. at *2. The Court conditionally certified the collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). After the discovery period ended, Defendants moved to decertify the collective action or to amend the conditional class, which the Court denied. Defendants argued that multiple opt-in Plaintiffs had either failed to provide verified discovery responses, or had failed to respond to discovery altogether. Id. at *3. Defendants requested the Court to either dismiss the claims of those opt-ins, or to set a firm deadline by which they must provide adequate responses to Defendants' discovery requests. Id. Although Defendants framed their motion as one for decertification or an amendment to the collective action, the Court stated that in reality it was simply a motion to impose sanctions against certain Plaintiffs and seeking dismissal of their claims for failure to comply with discovery requests. Id. While Defendants initially offered a less extreme alternative to dismissal, they later argued that dismissal with prejudice was necessary. Id. at *4-5. Defendants asserted that the non-responsive opt-in Plaintiffs willfully disregarded the discovery requests, and that a lesser sanction would be futile. Id. at *5. In support, Defendants referred to the fact that those opt-in Plaintiffs had thus far failed to respond, but did not submit any other evidence indicating that this failure was willful, or that a firm deadline would be futile. Id. Given that dismissal is the most severe Rule 37 sanction and is not favored, the Court concluded that it would not dismiss the opt-in Plaintiffs from this action. Id. The Court ruled that the non-responsive opt-in Plaintiffs would be given 30 days to respond to Defendants' discovery requests, and any opt-in Plaintiff who failed to respond within the timeframe would be dismissed from the action. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to decertify or to amend the conditionally certified collective action.

White, et al. v. Integrated Electric Technologies, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 90529 (E.D. La. July 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of technicians, brought an action alleging that Defendants classified them as independent contractors and denied them overtime in violation of the FLSA and the labor laws of Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. Subsequently, 98 Plaintiffs opted-in, including the six named Plaintiffs. Id. at *4. Defendants moved for summary judgment and argued that 54 of the 98 opt-in Plaintiffs' claims were time-barred. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs asked the Court to apply an additional year of equitable tolling because of procedural complexities in this case and several delays. Defendants argued that there was no basis to apply equitable tolling because Plaintiffs failed to cite any evidence supporting their contention that opt-in Plaintiffs diligently pursued their claims. Id. at *6. The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to point to any evidence showing the opt-in Plaintiffs were unaware of their rights, barred from asserting their rights, or diligently pursued their rights but were prevented from joining the action due to reasons beyond their control. Id. at *11. Further, the Court remarked that Plaintiffs failed to offer any explanation for why those 54 opt-in Plaintiffs were unaware of their rights and deserved equitable tolling while the named Plaintiffs and 38 other opt-in Plaintiffs were able to discover their claims and diligently file within the allocated statute of limitations. Id. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs had failed to meet their burden of showing that there were extraordinary circumstances justifying tolling of the statute of limitations for the 54 opt-in Plaintiffs at issue and, therefore, granted Defendants' motion for summary judgment.

(xxiv) Trial Issues In FLSA Collective Actions

Chen, et al. v. Chan,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 9271 (2d Cir. June 4, 2015). Plaintiffs brought suit against their former employer seeking unpaid minimum wage and overtime wages under the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The District Court awarded damages to Plaintiffs on their claims under the NYLL. Defendant appealed, and the Second Circuit affirmed in part. Defendant argued that the District Court erred in excluding evidence of a purported settlement agreement with Plaintiffs. Defendant claimed that the District Court excluded the settlement agreement as a discovery sanction, based solely on Plaintiffs' representation that Defendant's former lawyer failed to produce a copy of the agreement during discovery. Id. at *3. The Second Circuit noted that Defendant was left to proceed pro se on the eve of the trial, insisted that he had provided a copy of the agreement from his former attorney, and requested an opportunity to call his attorney to check whether the document had been produced. Id. at *4. The District Court denied those requests and prevented Defendant from utilizing potentially compelling evidence to refute Plaintiffs' representation. Id. The Second Circuit found the District Court's ruling erroneous and remanded with instructions to the District Court to conduct a further inquiry into whether Defendant produced the contested evidence. The Second Circuit ordered that, if the District Court found that Defendant produced the settlement agreement, it should order a new trial, and in the event the District Court determined that Defendant never provided the settlement agreement, it should reinstate the judgment as corrected on appeal. Defendant further argued that the District Court's damages calculation was erroneous because it relied on the full minimum wage rate without crediting a portion of Plaintiffs' tips. The Second Circuit held that Defendant failed to comply with the notice requirements under the NYLL, which applies to employers intending to claim a tip allowance, and as such, the District Court did not err by failing to apply a tip allowance. Defendant also claimed that there was evidence in the record that Plaintiffs received several meals a day while working, thereby entitling Defendant to a meal allowance under the NYLL. The Second Circuit, however, concluded that the District Court did not err by failing to apply a meal allowance because Defendant failed to notify Plaintiffs that he intended to count their meals against the minimum wage and Defendant did not keep records of the claimed allowances. Id. at *7. Defendant further argued that the District Court erred by calculating damages for Plaintiffs' periods of employment based on the federal minimum wage of $7.25, rather than New York's prevailing minimum wage of $7.15. The Second Circuit noted that, because New York's minimum wage rate increased to $7.25, the District Court did not err by using the higher amount. Finally, Defendant claimed that the District Court should have off-set its damages calculation by $8,000 because the named Plaintiffs Zu Guang Zhu, Shui Bing Zhu, You Huang Zhu, and Guo Ren Huang each received a payment of $2,000 from Defendant. The Second Circuit opined that the District Court's failure to credit those payments in its damages calculation was error. Id. Accordingly, the Second Circuit vacated the judgment of the District Court in part and remanded for further proceedings.

Olibas, et al. v. Native Oilfield Services, LLC,* Case No. 11-CV-2388 (N.D. Tex. Aug. 27, 2015). In this consolidated action, Plaintiffs, a group of dispatchers and truck drivers, alleged that Defendants failed to pay them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. After a trial, the jury found in favor of Plaintiffs. Defendants moved for judgment as a matter of law and for a new trial ("Defendants' post-judgment motions"), which the Court denied. Defendants first moved for judgment as a matter of law or a new trial based on the Motor Carrier Act exemption. Based on the minimal documentation offered by Defendants and the credibility of the witnesses offered by both sides at trial, the Court found that the Motor Carrier Act Exemption did not apply to Defendants or Plaintiffs, and thus denied Defendants' post-trial motions on this ground. Id. at 2. Defendants also moved for a new trial based on the jury's finding regarding the average number of unpaid overtime hours worked by Plaintiffs. Since Defendants failed to live up to their legal obligations to maintain adequate payroll records, the Court opined that the jury's reasonable approximation of Plaintiffs' average unpaid hours was not "against the great weight of the evidence," such that a new trial was warranted. Id. at 3. The Court also rejected Defendant's request for a new trial based on the argument that the Court erred in charging the jury with regards to the Motor Carrier Act exemption's "reasonable expectation" analysis. Id. Defendants took issue with a single sentence in the Court's two-page instruction to the jury on the Motor Carrier Act exemption, which stated that one way drivers can be considered to be "reasonably expected" to drive in interstate commerce was if interstate trips were indiscriminately distributed by the employer to the drivers as part of their continuing job duties. Id. The Court noted that although Defendants did not deny that indiscriminate distribution of interstate trips was a permissible factor to consider in determining whether drivers could be reasonably expected to drive in interstate commerce, they argued that the Court erred in including this factor to the exclusion of all other factors that go into the "reasonable expectation" analysis. The Court, however, ruled that Defendants had not shown sufficient prejudice from this single line of instruction to warrant a new trial, and therefore rejected Defendant's request for a new trial on this ground. Furthermore, the Court similarly rejected Defendants contention that a new trial was warranted in light of the Court's refusal to instruct the jury to determine Plaintiffs' hours worked and total compensation, as it had addressed similar contentions made by Defendants in its post-trial memorandum opinion and order. Id. at 4. Finally, the last two grounds asserted in Defendants' post-judgment motions – objections to Plaintiffs' post-trial declarations and the amount of attorneys' fees awarded to Plaintiffs – were also discussed and rejected by the Court in its post-trial memorandum opinion and order. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's renewed motion for judgment as a matter of law and motion for a new trial.

(xxv) Issues With Interns, Volunteers, And Students Under The FLSA

Benjamin, et al. v. B & H Education, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144351 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of students, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them minimum wage and overtime pay for their work in violation of the FLSA and the wage & hour laws of California and Nevada. Plaintiffs contended that they were cosmetology and hair design students at the Marinello Schools of Beauty, which Defendant owned and operated. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs stated that to become licensed cosmetologists in California or hair designers in Nevada, students received hundreds of hours of clinical training. As such, the Marinell schools had clinics where the students did hair styling and provided other services to customers. Id. Plaintiffs claimed that the money the customers paid for the services went to the school and they did not get paid for their clinical work. Id. Plaintiffs contended that they were employees during their time in the clinics and therefore should have received minimum wage and overtime pay for their work. Plaintiffs proposed a class action on behalf of all students who worked in Marinello's clinics. Before proceeding with discovery on class certification, the parties cross-moved for summary judgment on the named Plaintiffs' individual claims. The trial court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, and denied Plaintiffs' motion. The parties disagreed about the legal test that should apply when assessing whether the students were "employees" when they did their clinical work. The Court determined that the primary beneficiary test applied with respect to California law. Id. at *4. In connection with the cross-motions for summary judgment, Plaintiffs had submitted declarations from other former Marinello students that provided details about efforts the schools made to subordinate the educational function of the clinics to the goal of making money. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs, however, failed to identify those third-party witnesses with names and addresses as required by Rule 26. Id. at *7. The Court, accordingly, found that Plaintiffs failed to comply with the Rule 26 requirement, and struck the declarations, leaving them with their own deposition testimony and some documentary evidence. Id. at *8. The Court found that Plaintiffs' evidence was too vague and sparse to overcome Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Plaintiffs also alleged that they performed some non-cosmetological work, which the Court found to be too vague to support a conclusion that the schools required them to do an excessive amount of this work. Id. Likewise, the Court reasoned that the mere fact that the clinics charge customers for services rather than offering them for free could not, on its own, support a jury finding that Marinello's clinics subordinated their educational purpose to their business function. Id. at *10. The Court, therefore, held that the evidence Plaintiffs provided would not allow a reasonable jury to conclude that the schools subordinated the educational function of the clinics in favor of making money. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Guy, et al. v. Casal Institute Of Nevada, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1191 (D. Nev. Jan. 5, 2015). Plaintiff, a student, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay minimum and overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Defendants operated a for-profit cosmetology and esthetics services school, the Aveda Institute Las Vegas ("Aveda"), which trained paying students to learn and practice the trades of cosmetology and esthetic services. Id. at *3. Plaintiff contended that Defendants required their students to perform cosmetology and esthetic services for their "for-profit" business without compensation, thereby violating the FLSA and Nevada law. Id. Defendants moved to dismiss, which the Court granted in part. Defendants first sought dismissal of the individual Defendants. The Court noted that the only theory by which the individual Defendants could be held liable in this action was by piercing the corporate veil, i.e., the unity of interest and ownership between the corporation and the individual Defendants was so close that they no longer existed as separate entities. Id. at *7. The Court found that although Plaintiff alleged that the individual Defendants signed contracts on behalf of the LLC and not in their individual capacities, a mere signing of a contract the corporation's behalf was insufficient to show that the corporation was the alter ego of the individual Defendants. Id. In addition, the Court observed that individual corporate managers are not personally liable, as employers, for unpaid wages. Id. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the individual Defendants in their personal capacity. Defendants also sought dismissal, arguing that Aveda was barred as a matter of law from compensating its students. The Court observed that § 644.190(2) of the Nevada Revised Statutes ("NRS") provides that it is unlawful to engage in the practice of cosmetology, whether for compensation or otherwise, unless the person is licensed in accordance with the provisions of that chapter. Id. at *8. The Court, however, noted that this chapter does not prohibit any student in any school of cosmetology established pursuant to the provisions of the chapter from engaging, in the school and as a student, in work connected with any branch or any combination of branches of cosmetology in the school. Id. Thus, the Court opined that the statute does not bar the compensation of students, and that § 644.190 or § 644.145 of the NRS did not bar Aveda from compensating Plaintiff or those similarly-situated. Id. Finally, Aveda contended that Plaintiff was a student, and not an employee within the meaning of the FLSA. Plaintiff countered arguing that Aveda was evading wage & hour laws by classifying her and others similarly-situated as students rather than employees. Plaintiff also alleged that Aveda was able to charge far less than its competitors for salon services because it does not compensate its student-workers, thereby immediately profiting from the student-workers' services. Id. at *11. The Court opined that these allegations satisfied the pleading requirement of the FLSA, and that Plaintiff had stated a plausible claim under the FLSA. Accordingly, the Court denied Aveda's motion in this regard.

Hollins, et al. v. Regency Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 145813 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 27, 2015). Plaintiff, a cosmetology student, brought an action under the FLSA and Illinois and Indiana wage & hour laws seeking to recover unpaid wages for performing various cosmetology services for paying customers. Id. at *1. Defendant operated state-licensed and accredited cosmetology schools throughout the country, and Plaintiff enrolled as a full-time cosmetology student at Defendant's Indiana location. Defendant divided its 1,500-hour curriculum into three periods, including: (i) the workshop phase; (ii) the rehearsal phase; and (iii) the performance phase. Id. at *3. The performance floor was designed to replicate a salon where students performed cosmetology services for paying customers, described and recommended products and services, and booked appointments. Id. Plaintiff alleged that her performance services made her an employee, which entitled her to wages under the FLSA. Id. at *7. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that its students did not fall within the purview of the FLSA and related state laws. The Court granted Defendant's motion. The Court employed a balancing test that weighed the benefits to both Defendant and the student, and found that the students were the primary beneficiaries of Defendant's clinical program, and any benefits Defendant received was not obtained in a way that "takes unfair advantage of or is otherwise abusive toward the student." Id. at *23. The Court noted that the clinical work performed by the students was not only consistent with what was statutorily required to be performed at a cosmetologist school, but also Defendant was the sort of vocational school where the students were required by law to be trained. Id. at *23. Plaintiff argued that some of the tasks the students performed lacked educational value because they were not closely related to the practice of cosmetology. The Court, however, pointed out that Defendant's students received academic credit for every minute of work they performed, and this illustrated that the economic reality of the relationship between Defendant and the students was that of a student-trainer, not an employee-employer. Id. at *28-31. Although the Court acknowledged that the for-fee services were a major part of the student's training program, it also found that the for-profit work was primarily performed for the benefit of the students to prepare them to pass the exam to become a licensed cosmetologist. Id. at *37-38. Thus, according to the Court, the fact that Defendant made some profits from Plaintiff's service alone did not alter her status as a student or made the FLSA applicable because the fundamental reality remained that the work performed by students was mandated by law if they wished to obtain a license to work as a cosmetologist, and they were therefore the primary beneficiaries of the arrangement that allowed them to complete that legal requirement. Id. at *48. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Jeung, et al. v. Yelp, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 107427 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of individuals who wrote reviews on Defendant's website, brought an action seeking to establish that Defendant had a legal duty under the FLSA to treat them as employees and provide compensation. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss the complaint and a motion to strike under California's "Anti-SLAPP" statute, which the Court granted. At the outset, the Court noted that Rule 8 provides that to state a claim, a pleading must contain a short and plain statement of the claim showing that Plaintiff is entitled to relief. Id. at *2. Here, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant hired them as writers, were directed how to write reviews, and were given other such employee type direction from Defendant. The Court observed that a reasonable inference drawn from the complaint was that Plaintiffs used the term "hired" to refer to the process by which any member of the public can sign up for an account on Defendant's website and submit reviews, and used the term "fired" to refer to having their accounts involuntarily closed. Id. at *4-5. The Court remarked that a further reasonable inference was that Plaintiffs and the class may contribute under circumstances that either could not reasonably be characterized as performing a service to Defendant at all, or that at most would constitute acts of volunteerism. Id. at *5. The Court concluded that although the statutory definition of "employee" is exceedingly broad, it did not include volunteers such as Plaintiffs and members of the putative class. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' conclusory allegations that they were hired and fired by Defendant were insufficient to state an FLSA claim and dismissed the complaint. Defendant next argued that Plaintiffs' state law claim represented a Strategic Lawsuit Against Public Participation ("SLAPP"), which was designed to allow dismissal of meritless and harassing claims seeking to chill protected expression. Id. at *8. The Court concluded that the requirement of the anti-SLAPP statute were met and granted Defendant's motion to strike. Id. at *9-10.

Marshall, et al. v. UBS Financial Services, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88048 (S.D.N.Y. July 7, 2015). Plaintiff, an unpaid intern, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay him minimum wages, and wages due to him under the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiff claimed that he interned with Defendant for four months in 2012, and worked between four to five hours per day, two days per week. Id. at *3. Plaintiff claimed that he performed tasks necessary to the operation and maintenance of Defendant's business, and that Defendant would have hired additional employees or required existing staff to work additional hours absent his contribution. Id. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint, which the Court granted in part. Defendant contended that Plaintiff had failed to allege the existence of an employment relationship between the parties. Id. at *4. The Court found that although Plaintiff did not allege that he expected compensation from his internship, he did state the place he worked and provided his dates of his employment. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the complaint sufficiently stated the existence of employment relationship under the FLSA and the NYLL. Defendant also argued that complaint did not allege willful violations of the FLSA and the NYLL. The Court noted that the statute of limitations for wage claims under the FLSA extends from two to three years for willful violations, and six years for under the NYLL. Id. at *9. The Court reasoned that Plaintiff would have stated a claim for willful violation if the complaint alleged a willful violation and the existence of a policy or practice consistent with willful conduct. Id. Here, because Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's unlawful conduct was pursuant to a corporate policy of minimizing labor costs by denying wages in violation of the FLSA and the NYLL, the Court ruled that the allegations met the threshold for pleading of a willful violation. Id. at *10. Finally, because Plaintiff sought to withdraw his overtime and failure to make timely payment claims, the Court dismissed them with prejudice.

(xxvi) Tolling Issues In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Atkinson, et al. v. TeleTech Holdings, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23630 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 26, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay their customer service agents ("CSAs") overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. On December 4, 2014, Plaintiffs filed a pre-discovery motion for conditional certification of a collective action. Id. at *3. During a conference held on December 8, 2014, Defendants indicated a desire to take several depositions before responding to the motion for conditional certification, and agreed to voluntarily toll the limitations period for potential opt-ins during the period of delay resulting from that limited discovery. Id. at *3-4. The Court suggested that the parties draft a tolling agreement to that effect. During the conference on December 16, 2014, the parties failed to reach an agreement. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs wanted to take a Rule 30(b)(6) deposition, and then file an amended motion for conditional certification; however, Defendants were no longer willing to toll the limitations period as originally agreed, since that would cause additional delay that was attributable to Plaintiffs. Id. Plaintiffs then moved for equitable tolling, asking the Court to toll the statute of limitations governing the FLSA claims of the potential opt-in Plaintiffs from the date when they filed the motion for conditional certification until the end of the opt-in period, in order to prevent the claims of those potential opt-in Plaintiffs from eroding in scope or being extinguished altogether. The Court denied the motion without prejudice. Id. at *18-19. First, the Court observed that in contrast to a class action brought under Rule 23, the named Plaintiffs in a FLSA collective action do not represent anyone other than themselves; accordingly, the named Plaintiffs have no authority to move to equitably toll the claims of the potential opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. at *20. Moreover, the Court maintained that because the potential opt-in Plaintiffs do not become parties to the lawsuit until they filed their consent forms with the Court, it lacked jurisdiction to grant them equitable relief. Id. at *21. The Court found that Plaintiffs also had not established that equitable tolling of the claims of the potential opt-in Plaintiffs was warranted at that juncture. The Court noted that in equitably tolling the statute of limitations, case law precedents generally reasoned that: (i) until notice of the collective action is given, potential opt-in Plaintiffs lack actual notice of the filing requirement; (ii) although the FLSA itself provides constructive notice of the filing deadlines, that factor should be given little weight since it applies in every case; (iii) failure to file an earlier claim does not demonstrate a lack of diligence, because diligence is measured by whether potential Plaintiffs opted-in once given notice and the opportunity to do so; (iv) because the lawsuit is filed as a collective action, Defendant is not prejudiced by equitable tolling; and (v) potential opt-in Plaintiffs reasonably remained ignorant of the filing deadline, given their lack of notice of the collective action. Id. at *24-25. The Court disagreed with that analysis because it ignored the fact that, regardless of whether the potential opt-in Plaintiffs had notice of the collective action, they also had the option of filing their own lawsuit alleging violations of the FLSA. Id. at *25. Thus, it could not necessarily be said that the opt-in Plaintiffs lacked actual or constructive knowledge of their claims, that they diligently pursued their rights, or that they remained reasonably ignorant of the filing deadlines. Id. The Court reiterated that Congress chose not to automatically toll the statute of limitations upon the filing of a collective action and although equitable tolling may be justified in rare instances, it is an extraordinary remedy to be applied sparingly. Id. at *25-26. The Court concluded that to equitably toll the claims of all potential Plaintiffs from the date the collective action was filed (or even from the date Plaintiffs seek approval of the proposed notice) until the end of the opt-in period would transform that extraordinary remedy into a routine, automatic one. For these reasons, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion without prejudice. Id. at *26.

Bacon, et al. v. Subway Sandwiches & Salads, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31477 (E.D. Tenn. Mar. 13, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to compensate them and other similarly-situated employees for all hours worked in violation of the FLSA. After the Court granted in part Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification, Plaintiffs moved for equitable tolling of the statute of limitations for potential opt-in Plaintiffs starting from either June 11, 2014, the date Defendants filed their first motion to dismiss, or on June 19, 2014, the date Plaintiffs filed their motion for conditional certification of a collective action. The Magistrate Judge granted the motion in part. Plaintiffs argued that Defendants' voluminous filings and periodic delays in the case had contributed to the probability that notice to potential opt-in Plaintiffs would not occur until six months or more after the initial filing of the complaint in this matter, through no fault of the named Plaintiffs or the potential opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs thus asserted that equitable tolling should be provided because extraordinary circumstances existed to warrant the requested relief. Id. The Magistrate Judge found that the request for equitable tolling was well-taken. Id. at *4-6. First, the Magistrate Judge found that the potential opt-in Plaintiffs almost certainly lacked notice or constructive knowledge of the filing requirement and also lacked knowledge of their potential FLSA claims. Id. at *6. Second, the Magistrate Judge concluded that the named Plaintiffs had been diligent in pursuing their rights. Id. The Magistrate Judge, however, determined that the tolling of the statute of limitations should begin on the date when Defendants filed the motion to dismiss the amended complaint. The Magistrate Judge observed that the delay in the case became exceptional when Defendants moved to dismiss the amended complaint on July 16, 2014, and at that point, the case deviated from the usual timeline for a collective action. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge allowed equitable tolling from July 16, 2014.

Barkley, et al. v. Pizza Hut Of America, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111021 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of pizza delivery drivers, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to reimburse them for driving-related expenses in violation of the Florida Minimum Wage Act ("FMWA"). Defendant moved to dismiss all claims that fell outside of the FMWA's five year statute of limitations, thus limiting the action to claims dated five years before the date the initial complaint was filed. Plaintiffs conceded that the FMWA had a five year statute of limitations, but argued that they were entitled to equitable tolling of the statute of limitations based on the fact that putative class members in this case were class members in other cases with similar overtime identical to FMWA claims, including: (i) Smith, et al. v. Pizza Hut, Inc., Case No. 09-1632 (D. Colo.); (ii) Hanna, et al. v. CFL Pizza, LLC, Case No. 05-2011-CA-52949 (Fla. Cir. Ct.); and (iii) Hanna, et al. v. Pizza Hut Of America, Inc., Case No. 12-CV-1863 (M.D. Fla.). Id. at *3. The Court noted that the "no piggy-back rule" for class actions mandates that the pendency of a previously filed class action did not toll the limitations period for additional class actions by putative class members of the original asserted class. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs were not entitled to tolling of the statute of limitations for the putative class claims against Defendant. The Court, however, noted that the statute of limitations is tolled for the duration of a previously filed putative class action for Plaintiffs who chose to intervene in the action to pursue their individual claims. Id. at *8. Based on the each of Plaintiffs' date of the employment and their terminations, the Court found that their claims were within the five year statute of limitations under the FMWA, and that their claims were timely. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion in part.

Gorskie, et al. v. Transcend Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 164294 (M.D. Fla. Dec. 8, 2015). Plaintiff, a former employee, brought a putative collective action against Defendant alleging violations of the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Earlier, Plaintiff and twelve others had filed a putative collective action in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois. After decertification, the Northern District of Illinois severed Plaintiff's claim. Plaintiff then voluntarily dismissed her individual case and filed this action. Id. at *2-3. Defendant moved to dismiss, which the Court granted by converting the motion as a motion for summary judgment. Defendant argued that the complaint was time-barred and Plaintiff's voluntary dismissal of her case in the Illinois action forfeited any tolling of the relevant limitations period. Id. at *4. Plaintiff argued that she was entitled to equitable tolling due to extraordinary circumstances beyond her control, i.e., her claim being severed from the Illinois collective action and reassigned to a Court that could not exercise personal jurisdiction. Id. at *6. The Court found that Plaintiff ceased working for Defendant in April 2012 and because she filed the complaint in June 2015, i.e., after the three years statute of limitations ran, it was time-barred. Id. at *8. Further, the Court reasoned that although Plaintiff's participation in the Illinois collective action temporarily tolled the limitations period, her subsequent voluntary dismissal had the effect as if she never filed the suit. Id. The Court therefore ruled that Plaintiff's claims might only withstand Defendant's converted motion for summary judgment if she could show that she was entitled to equitable tolling. Id. The Court determined that Plaintiff's argument that she was forced to voluntarily dismiss her individual case in the Northern District of Illinois for lack of personal jurisdiction was without merit and did not warrant equitable tolling. The Court noted that Plaintiff had the procedural alternative of moving for transfer. Plaintiff's decision to voluntarily dismiss her case was not unavoidable or beyond her control, and moreover, Defendant had waived any objection to personal jurisdiction in the Northern District of Illinois. Id. at *9. Finally, the Court held that Plaintiff had not shown that she exercised diligence in pursuing her claims, as she filed the instant case more than three months after her case was voluntarily dismissed in the Northern District of Illinois. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's construed motion for summary judgment and rejected Plaintiff's request for equitable tolling.

Lopez, et al. v. Liberty Mutual Insurance Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 77723 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of claims adjusters, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants misclassified them as exempt employees and thus denied them overtime pay and compensation for unused meal and rest periods in violation of the California Labor Code and other provisions of California law. Id. at *1-2. In 2001, employees of Defendants Liberty Mutual Insurance Co. and Golden Eagle Insurance Co. filed four lawsuits in seeking overtime pay. The cases, consolidated as the Harris class action, encompassed all non-management California employees classified as exempt by Liberty Mutual and Golden Eagle and employed as claims handlers and/or performed claims-handling activities. Id. at *3. The Harris action was eventually settled. In 2001, claims adjusters employed by Defendant, Safeco Insurance Co. of America, filed a class action seeking overtime pay and compensation for missed meal and rest periods ("the Braun" action). Liberty Mutual subsequently acquired Safeco and re-classified the claims adjusters as exempt employees, which led to denial of overtime, meal breaks, and rest break pay. Id. at *4. In 2014, Plaintiffs filed this similar action in California state court. Defendants removed it to the District Court pursuant to the CAFA and filed a joint motion to consolidate the two actions. Following consolidation, Defendants filed a motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims. It was undisputed that portions of Plaintiffs' claims were outside of the statute of limitations. As a result, absent any tolling of the statute of limitations, Plaintiffs' California Labor Code claims could extend back only to events that occurred on or after April 24, 2011, and their other statutory claim could only reach to April 2010. Id. at *11. Defendants sought to dismiss any claims based on events that occurred before these dates. Id. Plaintiffs argued that they should be considered as members of the Harris class for purposes of tolling the statute of limitations. Plaintiffs also argued that Defendants should be judicially estopped from claiming that Plaintiffs were not Harris class members because of the previous statements they made in the Braun proceedings. Specifically, Plaintiffs pointed out that Defendants, in support of their motions to stay in Braun, had argued that the Braun Plaintiffs fell within the definition of the Harris class and therefore the Harris case had subsumed their claims. Id. at *14. Even though the Braun Plaintiffs filed their claims four years after the termination of class period in Harris, Defendants had repeatedly argued that they were members of the Harris class. In this case, Defendants argued that the Harris class only encompassed employees who worked for Defendants between March 1997 and December 2004, and Plaintiffs were therefore not members of the class. Id. at *15. The Court granted Defendants' motion. The Court noted that Defendants' statements in Braun concerned only the Braun Plaintiffs, and when they made those statements, the Harris case had not been resolved. Id. at *16-17. The Court found that Defendants' assertion based on the class definition adopted in the Harris settlement was not clearly inconsistent as the two positions arose out of two distinct factual backgrounds and sets of circumstances, because the Court granted final approval to the settlement of Harris in 2014 with a defined class period. Id. The Court therefore rejected Plaintiffs' argument of judicial estoppel. Because Plaintiffs were never members of the Harris class, and in this action Plaintiffs asserted their first claims against Defendants, the Court opined that Plaintiffs could not assert equitable tolling to bring their claims within the applicable statute of limitations relying on Harris action. Id. at *29-31. The Court further found that, even if Plaintiffs were asserted members of the Harris class because they fell within the class definition, any tolling ended when the state court decertified the class in 2006 and when it accepted the settlement limiting the scope of the class to the period from March 1997 to December 2004. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims and rejected Plaintiffs' position on tolling.

Wiggins, et al. v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144445 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 22, 2015). Plaintiff, a technician, brought an action under the FLSA and the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL") alleging that Defendant did not pay him overtime compensation for the time that he worked before his shift started each day and for the time that he worked during his lunch breaks. Id. at *1. Plaintiff sought damages going back to September 6, 2008, arguing that a prior case – Blakes v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co., Case No. 11-CV-336 ("Blakes") – litigated initially as an FLSA collective action and as a proposed IMWL class action, tolled the statute of limitations on his claims. Id. at *4. Defendant moved to dismiss all claims before February 28, 2011, contending that tolling did not apply as claims in the lawsuit exceeded the scope of the claims in the prior action. The Court denied Defendant's motion in part and granted it in part. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's current claims were never part of the original Blakes action. Id. at *6. At the outset, the Court observed that tolling in an FLSA collective action begins when Plaintiffs file a written consent and ends when certification has been denied. Id. at *10. Further, the Court found that tolling is applied when Plaintiff possesses a claim asserted in the prior class action and the prior claims are substantially similar to the ones brought individually. Id. at *12. The Court noted that the allegations in Blakes were substantially similar to Plaintiff's current lunch break claims and thus concluded that the statute of limitations was tolled for those claims. Id. at *16. Defendant argued that tolling was only appropriate for the lunch claims that were conditionally certified in Blakes, thereby excluding Plaintiff's allegations about completing on-the-job training during lunch. The Court, however, held that the statute of limitations was tolled for all of Plaintiff's lunch break claims regardless of the type of worked allegedly performed. Id. at *17. To determine Plaintiff's pre-shift claims, the Court found that the Blakes complaint did not contain pre-shift work allegations. Id. at *19. Plaintiff argued that the Court should nevertheless toll the statute of limitations because Plaintiffs in Blakes could have amended their complaint to include additional claims. The Court held that because Plaintiffs knew about the pre-shift claims before discovery, yet neglected to include them in the complaint, the statute of limitations was not tolled for Plaintiff's current pre-shift claims. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss in part as to Plaintiff's pre-shift claims and denied it as to Plaintiff's lunch claims.

(xxvii) Interlocutory Appeals In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Garcia, et al. v. E.J. Amusements Of New Hampshire, Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-8008 (1st Cir. April 22, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendants paid them a flat rate based on a 40-hour workweek even though they regularly worked up to 14 hours per day, seven days a week, and sometimes longer, and also failed to reimburse them the immigration related expenses in violation of Massachusetts law and New Hampshire law. Non-party Centro de los Derechos del Migrante, Inc. ("CDM"), which described itself as a non-profit legal services organization, moved for permission to appeal, challenging the District Court's ruling requiring CDM to provide a privilege log responsive to a document request from Defendants. CDM also moved for stay pending appeal. The First Circuit dismissed the appeal, and denied the motion for stay pending appeal. At the outset, the First Circuit stated that discovery rulings are generally not immediately reviewable because they are not final decisions and orders of the District Court. Id. at 2. The First Circuit noted that this general rule applies even in cases where a District Court's ruling has the effect of compelling an individual or entity to produce documents or information that are subject to a privilege or are otherwise shielded from discovery. Further, the First Circuit opined that in such cases, one may be able to obtain appellate review before entry of a final judgment if the party disobeys a ruling to the point of being held in contempt and then appeals from the contempt order. The First Circuit stated that there is an exception for cases in which one asserts a privilege but is incapable of disobeying to the point of contempt because the party does not have control over the targeted documents. Id. Here, the First Circuit however, found that CDM retained control over the targeted documents and information. Id. Accordingly, the First Circuit dismissed the appeal pursuant to Local Rule 27.0(c), for lack of finality.

(xxviii) Amendments In FLSA Collective Actions

In Re AutoZone, Inc. Wage & Hour Employment Practices Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80693 (N.D. Cal. June 19, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to provide meal breaks and off-the-clock compensation in violation of the California Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). Earlier, the Court had denied without prejudice Plaintiffs' motion to compel Defendant to designate a Rule 30(b)(6) witness on topics relating to changes in Defendant's policies and practices regarding meal breaks and off-the-clock work. The Court found it unclear whether a representative PAGA claim was alleged. In seeking to resolve the discovery dispute, the Court noted that Plaintiffs labeled the second amended complaint (the operative complaint) a class action complaint and brought allegations pursuant to Rule 23. Further, the Court observed that the complaint specifically alleged a PAGA class, but did not include a separate PAGA cause of action brought in a representative capacity; the only other reference to PAGA was Plaintiffs' request for civil penalties under that law. Subsequently, Plaintiffs moved for leave to amend the complaint to add a representative PAGA claim, an action they characterized as clarifying the current operative complaint. The Court denied the motion. While Plaintiffs argued that there had been no undue delay because they brought this motion shortly after the Court's discovery order, the Court found that Plaintiffs' request to add a representative PAGA claim came more than eight years after filing the original complaint, and after two amendments to that complaint, one of which removed this very claim. Id. at *4-6. The Court thus found that this constituted an undue delay. Id. at *6. Further, the Court determined that Defendant would be unduly prejudiced by the amendment. Id. Although Plaintiffs asserted that this cause of action would be based on the exact California Labor Code violations already alleged and the allegations already asserted in the operative complaint, they could not pretend to be proposing a mere cosmetic change. Id. The Court observed that in addition to requiring the designation of the Rule 30(b)(6) witness that gave rise to this discovery dispute, a new representative PAGA claim would result in the re-opening of discovery as to claims on which the Court denied class certification (like meal breaks and overtime) and as to which Plaintiffs never sought class certification (like split shifts). Id. Moreover, Defendant and the Court had operated on the understanding that the second amended complaint was the operative complaint in this case, and that, following the Court's order on class certification, this case was primarily about rest breaks. Id. at *6-7. The Court thus concluded that Plaintiffs' proposed amendment would defy that understanding and prejudice Defendant, and accordingly, denied Plaintiffs' motion. Id. at *7.

Schaefer, et al. v. P.F. Chang China Bistro, Inc.,* Case No. 14-CV-185 (D. Ariz. Mar. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendant required them to perform non-tipped work unrelated to their tipped occupation at a sub-minimum wage, tipped rate of pay in violation of the FLSA. Id. at 3. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant labeled servers tipped employees, allowed them to receive enough tips to qualify as tipped employees, and then forced them to engage in maintenance work for a substantial portion of their workweeks without paying them minimum wage. Id. at 4. Plaintiffs also claimed that they performed non-tipped work related their tipped occupation during more than 20% of their regular 40-hour workweek. Id. Defendant moved to dismiss, contending that Plaintiffs failed to state viable claims under the FLSA. The Court dismissed the action without prejudice. Plaintiffs then moved to amend their complaint asserting that, in their dual jobs claim, they alleged a violation of minimum wage requirements of the FLSA. Plaintiffs relied on a regulation of the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") defining dual jobs and asserted that the Court owed deference to DOL's regulation providing that an employee is engaged in dual jobs when he or she spends a substantial part of his or her time, in excess of 20%, on non-tipped duties. Id. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion, finding that Plaintiffs' dual jobs allegations did not state a claim for minimum wage violations under the FLSA. Id. at 8. The Court noted that Plaintiffs did not claim or allege that, as tipped employees, they received less than the minimum wage for any particular workweek. Id. at 5. Rather, Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant violated the FLSA's minimum wage provision by requiring them to perform related non-tipped duties and unrelated non-tipped duties while being paid at the tip credit rate of pay. Id. The Court held that it previously had considered and rejected similar arguments and that Plaintiffs' dual jobs theory – based on deference to the DOL's regulation – did not state an FLSA claim. Id. at 6-8. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for leave to amend their complaint.

(xxix) Foreign Worker Issues In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Cuellar-Aguilar, et al. v. Deggeller Attractions, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 21646 (8th Cir. Dec. 15, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of H-2B temporary foreign workers, brought a class action alleging that Defendant breached its employment contracts, violated the Arkansas Minimum Wage Act, and fraudulently under-reported their income to the Internal Revenue Service ("IRS"). Id. at *2. The District Court dismissed the breach of contract and tax fraud claims, declined to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the minimum wage claim, and denied Plaintiffs' motion to file a second amended complaint. Id. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit reversed and vacated the District Court's order. First, Plaintiffs argued that the District Court erred in dismissing their breach of contract claim based on its finding that no contract existed between the parties. Id. at *6. The Eighth Circuit noted that in order to state a claim under the Arkansas law, Plaintiffs needed to allege that they had employment contracts, which Defendant breached and caused them to incur damages. Id. at *7. Further, the Eighth Circuit opined that under Arkansas law, an employment relationship may be created by conduct, which showed that the parties recognized that one was the employer and that the other was the employee. Id. at *8. Here, the complaint's allegations demonstrated that Plaintiffs received offers to work for Defendant, which they accepted by traveling to the United States to perform the offered work; thus, it was sufficiently established that a contractual relationship existed between the parties. Id. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant breached the terms governing their relationship by failing to pay them the prevailing wage. The Eighth Circuit found that the U.S. Department of Labor regulations imposed upon Defendant a legal obligation to pay its H-2B employees no less than the prevailing wage. Id. at *10. Consequently, the Eighth Circuit held that the terms of the labor certification applications, including the agreement to pay the prevailing wage, represented the law in effect at the time contracts were made; therefore, under Arkansas law, these terms formed a part of Plaintiffs' contracts. Id. at *11. Thus, Plaintiffs' allegation that Defendant failed to pay the prevailing wage stated a valid claim for breach of their employment contracts. Plaintiffs further contended that the District Court erred in dismissing their claim for statutory damages under 26 U.S.C. § 7434, relative to their allegation that Defendant fraudulently under-reported their earnings to the IRS to reduce the business' tax obligations. Id. at *12. The Eighth Circuit found that the District Court's dismissal was based on its finding that Plaintiffs had failed to allege that any actual damages had resulted from Defendant's fraudulent filing. Id. The Eighth Circuit noted that in Hammer v. Sam's E., Inc., 754 F.3d 492 (8th Cir. 2014), it had held that where a federal statute provided for either statutory damages or actual damages, Plaintiffs who failed to allege actual damages nonetheless satisfied both the injury-in-fact and redressability requirements of Article III standing by suing for statutory damages. Id. at *13. The Eighth Circuit further held that the availability of statutory damages showed that Plaintiffs' injury was redressable. Id. The Eighth Circuit remarked that because Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant intentionally filed fraudulent tax documents on their behalf, their complaint stated a claim for statutory damages under 26 U.S.C. § 7434(b). Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit reversed the District Court's dismissal and vacated its decision not to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the state law minimum wage claim.

Ruiz, et al. v. Mercer Canyons, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11511 (E.D. Wash. Jan. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of vineyard workers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to inform them about the availability of higher-paying H-2 visa vineyard jobs in violation of Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Worker Protection Act ("AWPA"), the Washington Consumer Protection Act ("CPA"), and Washington state wage laws. Defendant had obtained approval to employ foreign workers under the H-2A program for vineyard labor from March 24, 2013 through September 1, 2013, and the clearance order authorized Defendant to hire up to 44 H-2A workers at $12 an hour. The order required Defendant to notify vineyard workers who had worked in 2012 about employment availability. Plaintiffs alleged that, in March 2013, Defendant incorrectly told Plaintiff Amador and two family members that no work was available, that Defendant paid Plaintiff Ruiz $9.88 per hour for work identified by the H-2A order as $12 per hour work, and that Defendant failed to inform Plaintiff Ruiz and others about available employment opportunities until September 2013. Id. at *2. Defendant moved for summary judgment. The Court denied the motion. First, the Court denied summary judgment as to Plaintiff Amador's claim. The Court found that, under § 1831(e) of AWPA, when a non-day-haul seasonal agricultural worker merely inquires about a job, the employer is not obligated to provide him written information, but when an employer provides false or misleading information concerning a job, including false or misleading information about the existence of a job, it violates § 1831(e), regardless of whether it provided the information in writing or by other means. Id. at *9. The Court found a genuine dispute of material fact as to exactly what information Defendant provided and as to whether the information was "false or misleading." Id. at *10. Second, the Court denied summary judgment as to Plaintiff Ruiz's claim that Defendant violated § 1832(a) of AWPA by paying him $9.88 per hour rather than $12 per hour for over 600 hours of corresponding work. Id. at *11. The Court found that, because a seasonal agricultural worker can sue under the AWPA if an employer pays less than a statutorily defined minimum wage, Ruiz could use the AWPA to enforce other legal obligations regarding the wage rate, including provisions of the H-2A clearance order. Id. at *12. Third, the Court denied summary judgment on Plaintiffs' CPA claims that Defendant deceived employees and potential employees regarding the availability of $12 per hour jobs. The Court found that: (i) a putative class of people had been injured in the same fashion; (ii) it was undisputed that the allegedly deceptive acts occurred in Defendant's course of business; (iii) Defendant advertised to the general public, thereby affecting the public interest; and (iv) Plaintiffs had presented facts that raised a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether a causal link existed between any deceptive practices and injury suffered. Id. at *13-16. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Torres, et al. v. Mercer Canyons, Inc.,* Case No. 14-CV-3032 (E.D. Wash. Mar. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of vineyard workers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to inform local workers about the availability of higher-paying H-2 visa vineyard jobs. Defendant had obtained approval to employ foreign workers under the H-2A program for vineyard labor from March 24, 2013 through September 1, 2013, and the order provided permission for Defendant to hire up to 44 H-2A workers at $12 an hour. The order also required Defendant to notify previous 2012 vineyard workers about employment availability. In March 2013, Plaintiff Amador and two family members, inquired about employment opportunities, but Defendant told them that no work was available. Defendant never informed Plaintiff Ruiz, who worked as a vineyard laborer for Defendant until September 2013, of available positions and Defendant paid him $9.88 per hour for work identified by the H-2A order as $12 per hour work. Plaintiffs thus alleged that Defendants violated the Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Worker Protection Act ("AWPA"), the Washington Consumer Protection Act ("CPA"), and Washington state wage laws. Previously, the Court had denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Defendant then moved for partial reconsideration or in the alternative for interlocutory appeal and a stay of proceedings, which the Court denied. Defendant contended that Plaintiff Ruiz did not offer evidence that Defendant had actually provided him false or misleading information regarding the existence or terms of available jobs. Id. at 2. The Court, however, found that there was a dispute over the information Defendant had provided, and whether the information provided was false or misleading was a factual question to be determined by a jury. Id. While Defendant argued that the Court had committed clear error in failing to dismiss the migrant worker claims, the Court found that neither Plaintiff asserted individual migrant worker claims. The Court noted that the question of whether Amador or Ruiz could represent a class of migrant agricultural workers asserting such claims was best suited for a motion for class certification. Id. Although Defendant disagreed with the Court's interpretation of "seasonal agricultural worker," the Court noted that it had found that the text of the statute itself created an internal conflict. Id. at 3. The Court looked to the entire statute in determining the ambiguity and internal conflict of the definition of "seasonal agricultural worker" and found that it did not err in interpreting the law. Id. Further, Defendant reasserted its arguments regarding the CPA, and the Court found that there was at least a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether a causal link existed between an alleged deceptive practice and any injury to Amador. Id. at 4. The Court reiterated that the disputed facts indicated that Amador suffered injury from the allegedly deceptive practices. Id. Finally, Defendant argued that the Court's order created an intra-district split regarding the proper interpretation of the AWPA. The Court disagreed and found no such split. Id. Because no intra-district split existed and because there was no extraordinary reason compelling an immediate appeal, the Court declined to certify the issue for an interlocutory appeal, and accordingly denied Defendant's motion.

Vallejo, et al. v. Azteca Electrical Construction Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11780 (D. Ariz. Feb. 2, 2015). In this FLSA action for recovering unpaid wages and overtime, the Court, after findings on liability and before the bench trial on damages, found that unauthorized workers with claims for unpaid wages and overtime were not precluded from recovering liquidated damages under the FLSA. The Court noted that most case law authorities have addressed the issue have concluded that an employer who violates § 206 or § 207 of the FLSA is liable to an unauthorized worker in the amount of unpaid minimum wages and/or unpaid overtime compensation for work actually and already performed. Id. at *2. The Court observed that Hoffman Plastic Compounds, Inc. v. NLRB, 535 U.S. 137 (2002), did not preclude an unauthorized worker's recovery under the FLSA. Id. In Hoffman, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Immigration Reform and Control Act ("IRCA") made battling the employment of unauthorized aliens central to the policy of immigration law. Id. at *2-3. The Court reasoned that the question in Hoffman was not whether the National Labor Relations Act's definition of "employee" excluded unauthorized aliens, but whether the National Labor Relations Board's remedial power extended to awarding back pay to an unauthorized alien for work not performed. Id. at *3-4. The Court noted that case law authorities have found Hoffman "limited to precluding relief for work not yet performed, as opposed to work already performed." Id. at *4. The Court observed that although the purposes of FLSA and IRCA clash, and no statutory text tells which would prevail, several considerations tipped in favor of § 216(b) of the FLSA. Id. at *6. The Court found that enforcing § 216(b) would undercut the purpose of the IRCA by compensating work that is illegal and often gotten by criminal means. However, it would also serve the purpose of IRCA by removing the wage advantage of unauthorized workers who would work for less than the legal minimum wage. Id. The Court found that there was no unfairness to an employer in paying a legal wage for all work, and that the employer may not rely on the worker's deception to pay less than he should have paid to whomever he hired. Thus, the Court concluded that unauthorized workers were not precluded from recovering unpaid and underpaid wages under § 216(b). Id. The Court noted that liquidated damages are compensation for work actually and already performed and do not implicate Hoffman or the policy reasons for opposition to compensating unauthorized workers for work not performed. Id. at *8. Moreover, the Congress has mandated award of liquidated damages for violations of the FLSA except where an employer establishes both subjective and objective good faith. Thus, the Court concluded that at trial, Defendants could be excused from additional statutory liquidated damages by showing subjective and objective good faith. Id. Finally, the Court found that the doctrine of in pari delicto, which prevents a participant in wrong-doing from recovering damages has limited application to FLSA claims. Id. at *9. The Court explained that this doctrine is a defense to liability, not to the amount of damages, and that the Court had already granted Plaintiff summary judgment on liability and reserved the determination of damages for trial. Id. at *11-12. Because Defendants had no legal representation at the time of summary judgment, the Court allowed an in pari delicto defense as evidence at trial. Id. at *12. The Court, however, remarked that the circumstance alone that Plaintiff was an unauthorized worker did not establish that defense to the statutory damages. Id. The Court concluded that the trial on damages should consider the quantification of Plaintiff's damages and any defense of in pari delicto.

(xxx) Travel Time Issues In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Jones, et al. v. Hoffberger Moving Services LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36622 (D. Md. Mar. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of "helpers" responsible for loading and unloading trucks, brought a putative class action and collective action alleging that Defendant, a commercial moving and storage company, violated the FLSA and the Maryland Wage & Hour Law by failing to compensate them for: (i) wait time at the warehouse each morning before travelling to jobsites; (ii) travel time from the warehouse to jobsites; (iii) wait time at jobsites before moving trucks and moving equipment arrived; and (iv) travel time after completing work at jobsites to pick up paychecks at the warehouse. Id. at *11. Defendant moved for summary judgment. The Court granted the motion in part and denied it in part. First, the Court found that Plaintiffs were not entitled to compensation for time spent waiting at the warehouse before travelling to jobsites. Id. at *13. The Court noted that Defendant employed Plaintiffs to load and unload trucks for Defendant's clients, and no reasonable jury could find that Plaintiffs' time spent waiting at the warehouse each morning was integral and indispensable to loading and unloading moving trucks for Defendant's clients. Id. at *12-14. Second, the Court held that Plaintiffs were not entitled to compensation for travel time to and from the warehouse, unless Plaintiffs performed a principal activity prior to the travel. The Court noted that Defendant never required Plaintiffs to meet at the warehouse to receive any instructions or to perform any work; rather, Defendant gave Plaintiffs job assignments before each workday and allowed Plaintiffs to go directly to jobsites. Id. at *18. Third, the Court determined that Plaintiffs were not entitled to compensation for time spent collecting paychecks. Id. at *21. The Court noted that no reasonable jury could find that the time spent picking up paychecks was integral and indispensable to the work Plaintiffs performed for Defendant. Id. Fourth, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs were entitled to be paid for time spent at the jobsite each morning, waiting for Defendant's moving truck and equipment to arrive. Id. at *19. The Court observed that, after employees arrived at the day's jobsite, Plaintiffs' wait time became a principal activity, integral and indispensable to the performance of the work, and, therefore, Defendant owed them compensation for such time. Id. Finally, the Court opined that a genuine issue of material fact remained as to whether Defendant should pay Plaintiffs for work performed in the warehouse without completing a warehouse work timesheet. Id. at *15-16. Although both parties agreed that some employees occasionally worked at the warehouse lifting equipment into the moving trucks, and Defendant compensated them so long as they filled out warehouse work timesheets, an issue remained as to whether Defendant should compensate Plaintiffs if they worked but failed to complete timesheets. The Court noted that Plaintiffs should be compensated for time spent lifting and carrying moving equipment onto trucks regardless of whether Plaintiffs followed Defendant's time-keeping protocol, and Plaintiffs would be entitled to compensation for travel time if they performed work at the warehouse before traveling to jobsites. Id. at *16. The Court, therefore, held that Plaintiffs' claim for pre-travel warehouse work time would be subject to further fact-finding at trial. Id. The Court, therefore, granted summary judgment in part for Defendant and denied summary judgment in part.

Local 589, Amalgamated Transit Union, et al. v. Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42178 (D. Mass. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiffs, Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority employees and their union, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant improperly failed to compensate them for travel time in violation of the FLSA and Massachusetts state law. Plaintiffs asserted that, because their shifts began in one location and ended in another, Defendant should have paid them for travel time from the ends of their assigned routes back to the beginnings of those routes. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs contended that the time spent traveling back to the beginnings of their routes could not be considered work-to-home travel because employees often returned to their starting points to retrieve their cars before heading home and were not able to rely entirely on public transportation. Id. Defendant moved for summary judgment, and the Court granted the motion in part. The Court found that to the extent Plaintiffs sought start-end travel time, traditional commuting time is plainly excluded from the FLSA by the Portal-to-Portal Act, and Defendant never required Plaintiffs to return to their starting locations. Id. at *8. The Court further noted that Plaintiffs did not engage in any principal activity after completing their final routes of the day, and inconvenience or difficulty of a commute did not provide an exception to the Portal-to-Portal Act. Id. at *11-12. The Court, however, denied summary judgement to Defendant on Plaintiffs' claim that Defendant should compensate them for split shift travel time. Under the split shift travel schedules, Defendant assigned each employee a first route, followed by a break, and then a second route. Plaintiffs defined the split shift travel time as the time taken to travel from the end location of a first route to the starting point of a second route during a mid-day break. Id. at *17. Defendant compensated full-time employees who traveled during split shift breaks for 20 minutes of the travel as "swing-on time," but not for time spent traveling in excess of 20 minutes. Id. at *18. Defendant did not pay anything to part-time employees for travel that occurred during these breaks. Id. Because Plaintiffs did not seek compensation for the entire break period, but rather solely for the time spent traveling, and the lengths of the breaks were significantly larger than half-hour meal breaks, the Court found that a more helpful analogy to address the issue would be the compensable and non-compensable parameters of employee waiting time. Id. at *23. Although the Court noted two case law authorities that found travel time during split shifts compensable, significant gaps about the individual travel time and break schedules of Plaintiffs, as well as lack of information related to Defendant's custom and practice, prevented it from determining whether Plaintiffs' travel time during their split shift breaks was compensable or non-compensable. Id. at *29-30. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to start-end travel time and denied it as to split shift travel time.

Margulies, et al. v. Tri-County Metropolitan Transportation District Of Oregon,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84672 (D. Ore. June 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of bus and train operators, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of failing to pay them for all hours worked in violation of the FLSA and Oregon state law. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant failed to pay them for: (i) non-commuted travel time between disparate start and end points of operators' scheduled runs; (ii) the differential between scheduled run times and actual run times; (iii) pre-departure time; (iv) mandatory medical examinations; and (v) any applicable overtime due for such compensable time. Id. at *4. Defendant moved for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' state law claims contending that, because the parties operated under a working and wage agreement ("WMA") and because public policy of the State of Oregon favored such agreements for public employees, the Court should conclude that the WMA defined the circumstances under which Defendant must pay wages and overtime. Id. at *16. Defendant also moved for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' FLSA claims, contending that they fully compensated Plaintiffs for their working hours consistent with the requirement of the FLSA, the Portal to Portal Act, and the terms of the WMA. Id. at *17. The Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion. First, the Court granted Defendant's motion as it applied to the time that operators spent returning to a relief location from the end of their scheduled run. Id. at *29-30. Second, the Court granted Defendant's motion as it applied to "routinely late time," the difference between scheduled and actual run time. Id. at *35. The Court found Defendant accounted for this time under its time slip program and provided operators with due compensation as described in the WMA. Id. at *42. Third, the Court granted Defendant's motion as it applied to the licensing and certification aspect of medical examination time. The Court found that the parties had negotiated the existence of such examinations as reflected in the WMA, and found no basis under the FLSA for declaring that an employer must necessarily compensate its workers for medical examinations associated with common licensing requirements imposed upon employees. Id. at *54-55. The Court, however, denied Defendant's motion as it applied to the medical examination time related to compulsory examinations during the workday. The Court found evidence in the record establishing how frequently Defendant required operators to attend medical examinations during normal shifts, the duration of such examinations, the circumstances under which Defendant required medical examinations or the ordinary reasoning for the examinations. Id. at *53. The Court therefore found a question of fact as to whether the required medical examinations could constitute compensable work subject to overtime. Id. The Court also denied Defendant's motion as it applied to split shift travel time or the time spent by operators between two consecutive shifts travelling to geographically disparate start locations. Id. at *33-34. The Court found no evidence in the WMA to discern whether the parties did or did not intend to define this time as compensable work. Id. The split shift travel time did not amount to commute time under the Portal to Portal Act, therefore the Court also found that it could not be inherently excluded from compensable hours under the FLSA. Id. at *38. The Court further denied Defendant's motion as it applied to pre-departure time or the time operators spent at a relief location prior to making a relief finding that Defendant failed to provide any relevant provision of WMA that intended to define the compensability of this time. Id. at *49-50. The Court found a disputed factual question as to whether Defendant made operators wait at a location for excessive amounts of time, resulting in pre-departure time that should be compensated pursuant to the FLSA. Id. at *42. Finally, the Court denied Defendant's motion as it applied to meeting time, the time traveled from a relief location to a meeting, including meeting for payroll corrections. The Court found that WMA was silent as to the compensability of meeting time and there remained an unresolved question of material fact as to whether Defendant obligated such meetings due to which it could be compensable work under the FLSA. Id. at *49-51. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion for partial summary judgment.

Naylor, et al. v. Securiguard, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 16421 (5th Cir. Sept. 15, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former security guards, brought a collective action seeking alleged unpaid overtime wages and liquidated damages under the FLSA. The U.S. Navy contracted with Defendants to provide guards at the Meridian Naval Air Station. The guards worked eight hour shifts, with two scheduled 30-minute meal breaks. Id. at *2. During the breaks, a relief officer relieved the guards, and the guards were then required to leave their post in Defendants' security vehicle to six locations where they could eat. During this time, the guards were also required to remain armed and in uniform, which included a bulletproof vest. Id. Treating the 30-minute break as a bona fide meal period under the FLSA, Defendants did not compensate the guards. Id. at *4-5. The U.S. Department of Labor investigated Defendants' determination, and assessed a civil penalty concluding that one meal break was compensable because it took place outside a regular meal time. Id. at *5. When the agency investigation did not result in back wages, 30 guards brought this action under the FLSA seeking damages. Defendants filed a motion for summary judgment, which the District Court granted. On appeal, the Fifth Circuit affirmed in part. At the outset, the Fifth Circuit noted that a meal break often does not allow for eating during the entire break, and some time may be needed to move to another area of the workplace or to leave the workplace. Id. at *8. The Fifth Circuit explained that although office workers could eat at their desks and take full advantage of the 30-minute break, employees on the factory floor usually move to a break room before eating due to safety concerns. Id. The Fifth Circuit remarked that it had never addressed the legal effect of employer-mandated travel time that significantly eats into an otherwise non-compensable 30-minute meal period. The Fifth Circuit noted that typical meal break cases involved a situation where the employee is generally allowed to eat during the entire break period, but continued on "on call" or incurred work responsibilities during the period. Id. at *11. In those cases, the Fifth Circuit reasoned that the critical question in these situations was whether the meal period is used predominantly or primarily for the benefit of the employer or for the benefit of the employee. Id. at *11-12. Here, the District Court applied the predominant benefit test and concluded that the guards benefited from the meal breaks. Id. at *12. The Fifth Circuit remarked that the principle question here was how much time was available to employees during the break. Id. at *14. The Fifth Circuit found that a requirement that deprives the employee of the opportunity to eat during 40% of a 30-minute break struck at the heart of an employee's ability to use the time for his or her own purposes. Id. The Fifth Circuit thus concluded that the travel obligation was not a mere inconvenience as a matter of law. Id. at *15. The Fifth Circuit, however, affirmed summary judgment on Plaintiffs' claims to the extent the mandatory commute time to and from the gates was de minimis. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit partially affirmed the summary judgment, and remanded the action.

(xxxi) Retaliation Issues In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Arnaudov, et al. v. California Delta Mechanical, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1644 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought a wage & hour action alleging failure to pay minimum and overtime wages, and failure to pay wages upon termination. Defendant moved for partial summary judgment on Plaintiffs' wrongful termination and retaliation claims, and the Court denied the motion. Defendant contended that Plaintiffs were unable to point to any specific facts of complaints they made to Defendant regarding their compensation. Further, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs could not provide evidence of pre-text to refute its contention that it had a legitimate, non-discriminatory reason to discharge Plaintiffs because they boycotted their job responsibilities without any prior notice. The Court, however, noted that Plaintiffs had presented evidence that they made complaints to Defendant prior to their discharge. Plaintiffs had sent e-mails to Defendant describing certain payroll concerns, including the fact that certain employees did not receive wages on time and did not receive pay stubs. Id. at *3. One of the named Plaintiffs had also sent a prior e-mail to his supervisor and to Defendant's dispatchers stating that Defendant illegally withheld his pay. Id. Defendant maintained that it never terminated the employees, and that the employees quit even after the regional manager, Gary Kolov, asked them to come back to work and committed to addressing their pay concerns. Plaintiffs asserted that after they reiterated to Kolov their refusal to go to work until the payment issues were fixed, Kolov made no reassurances to resolve their concerns, and he stated that those who refused to work would be fired and that Defendant would collect keys to Plaintiffs' work vehicles. Id. at *4. Considering the factual disputes and resolving all doubts in favor of the non-moving party, the Court opined that a reasonable jury could conclude that Defendant terminated Plaintiffs for raising concerns about compensation, and for engaging in a job action to protest violations of wage & hour laws. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for partial summary judgment.

Marlo, et al. v. United Parcel Service, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 6745 (9th Cir. April 23, 2015). Plaintiff, a former employee, brought an action alleging that Defendant retaliated against him and wrongfully terminated him from his employment. Defendant challenged the jury verdict awarding Plaintiff $15.9 million (later reduced to $6.6 million) in punitive damages arising out of his wrongful termination, but the Ninth Circuit affirmed the verdict. Defendant first argued that evidence was insufficient to support jury's determination that Vice President and District Manager Tim Robinson was a "managing agent" under California law. Id. at *2. The Ninth Circuit noted that Robinson qualified as a managing agent under California law if he exercised substantial independent authority and judgment in his corporate decision-making so that his decisions ultimately determined the corporate policy. Id. Here, the evidence showed that Robinson was the highest-ranking supervisor in a 7,000-employee district that covered a vast geographic area from downtown Los Angeles to the inland deserts to California's central coast, and managed supervisors and employees in charge of the various departments in his territory. Id. Further, Robinson viewed part of his role as maintaining a company policy of supervisors acting as owners subject to a salary, rather than the overtime pay sought by Plaintiff. Id. at *3. Plaintiff's lawsuit, which initially sought $400 million in class-wide damages, threatened to upend that culture, and Robinson discussed the potential impact of lawsuit with his senior staff and expressed his displeasure that other supervisors were filing similar lawsuits. Id. The Ninth Circuit noted that he viewed the lawsuit as a distraction that had a negative effect on employee morale. The Ninth Circuit concluded that the jury could reasonably conclude that Robinson's decision to terminate Plaintiff was a policy-making decision aimed at protecting the company culture. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the jury verdict.

Editor's Note: Though not a class action decision, the ruling in Marlo illustrates the damages that can impact employers when class members allege retaliation for filing or participating in class actions.

(xxxii) The First To File Doctrine In FLSA Collective Actions

Henry, et al. v. JP Morgan Chase & Co.*, Case No. 14-CV-7176 (S.D.N.Y. May 11, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought an action alleging that Defendants misclassified them as exempt and denied them overtime pay in violation of the FLSA. Three years before this action, in March 2011, eligible non-exempt employees brought an FLSA action in the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California in Hightower v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A., Case No. 11-CV-1802 (C.D. Cal.). Id. at *1. Since that action was filed, at least two other similar actions outside of California were filed and subsequently transferred to the Central District of California. The first transferred action was filed on July 20, 2011 in Khutoretsky v. J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., No. 11-CV-4986 (S.D.N.Y.); and the second transferred action was filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois on February 2, 2012 in Gunn v. JP Morgan Chase & Co., No. 12-CV-743 (N.D. Ill.). Id. at *2. Following the transfers, Plaintiffs in Hightower filed a third amended consolidated class action complaint on October 3, 2013, incorporating the transferred cases. This action was filed on September 5, 2014, and Plaintiffs sought to proceed as a collective action representing five sub-classes, and a Rule 23 class action asserting New Jersey wage & hour claims on behalf of individuals who worked for Defendants in New Jersey. On a motion to dismiss, the Court concluded that this action substantially overlapped with the previously filed action in the Central District of California because both actions involved sub-classes of non-exempt employees who performed similar roles. Therefore, under the first-filed rule, the Court held this action should be transferred to Central District of California. Plaintiffs argued that this action was not identical to the Hightower action because the settlement in Hightower did not include any employees with the job positions that were included in this case such as assistant branch managers, relationship managers, loan officers, private client bankers, or lead tellers. Id. at *4. Moreover, Plaintiffs contended that the settlement did not include any exempt workers nor did it settle a New Jersey class. The Court observed that the term "teller" in this action, and the term "personal banker" were defined very similar to one another. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to convincingly explain how the two classes were entirely distinct. The Court found that because there was substantial overlap between the classes at issues in this putative FLSA collective and New Jersey wage & hour class action and the Hightower action, the two actions were substantially similar for the purposes of the first-filed rule. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court transferred this action to the Central District of California.

Thomas, et al. v. Apple-Metro, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14574 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 5, 2015). Plaintiff, a former restaurant employee, brought a putative collective action alleging violations of the FLSA. Defendants moved to dismiss Plaintiff's collective action claims pursuant to the "first-filed" rule, based on the prior filing of two substantially similar lawsuits – Marin v. Apple Metro, Inc. and Dove v. Apple-Metro, Inc. – which were pending as related cases in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York. Id. at *2. The Court granted Defendants' motion, and dismissed Plaintiff's collective actions claims. Plaintiff asserted that the first-filed rule was inapplicable because her case was not identical to the Dove or Marin actions. The Court found Plaintiffs' argument unpersuasive because case law authority in the Second Circuit frequently apply the first-filed rule to lawsuits that are similar, but not identical. Id. at *8. Further, the Court found that the lawsuits at issue sought identical relief, asserted nearly identical claims for minimum wage, overtime, and tipping violations under federal law, and had been filed in a sister jurisdiction with respect to the same class of Plaintiffs as against the same group of Defendants. Id. at *9-10. The Court opined that the first-filed rule was well-suited to such circumstances. Id. at *10. Plaintiff also argued that the Court should use its discretion to preserve her suit because her unique assertion that Defendants violated the so-called "20% rule" made her case a more comprehensive and superior vehicle for litigating the FLSA claims at issue. Id. at *10-12. The Court noted that the U.S. Department of Labor's regulatory guidance has clarified that employers may not take advantage of the tip credit with respect to hours worked by employees performing non-tipped tasks to the extent that such employees spend more than 20% of their working time performing non-tipped work. Id. at *10-11. The Court, however, found that the fact that the Marin and Dove actions did not include Plaintiff's 20% rule claim did not justify departure from the first-filed rule. Id. at *12. The Court pointed out that Plaintiff was not required to opt-in to the Marin and Dove FLSA collective actions and she had the right to opt-out of any Rule 23 settlement class if she wished to preserve her 20% rule claim from being barred under the doctrine of res judicata. Id. The Court ruled that it had no reason to decide nearly identical questions of law and fact as those now being adjudicated in the Marin and Dove actions, with regard to the same requested relief, the same Defendants, and the same class of Plaintiffs. Id. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's collective action claims.

Woodards, et al. v. Chipotle Mexican Grill, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 69606 (D. Minn. April 3, 2015). Plaintiff, an hourly restaurant employee, brought an action seeking unpaid overtime compensation and other unpaid wages under the FLSA and the Minnesota Fair Labor Standards Act. The complaint in another action – Harris v. Chipotle Mexican Grill, Inc., No. 13-CV-1719 – and the complaint in this action were identical with the exception of a few paragraphs that identified Plaintiff-specific information. Id. at *3. Counsel for Plaintiffs in Harris also represented Plaintiff in this action. After the Magistrate Judge recommended conditional certification of a nationwide collective action in the Harris case, Plaintiff filed an opt-in consent to join the proposed collective action in Harris. The Court in Harris declined to adopt the Magistrate Judge's recommendation, and limited the collective action to current and former employees at a single Minnesota store. Defendant then moved to dismiss this action, and the Magistrate Judge recommended denying the motion. Defendant contended that Plaintiff's class action and collective action claims should be dismissed based on the first-to-file rule. The Magistrate Judge noted that to conserve judicial resources and avoid conflicting rulings, the first-filed rule gives priority, for purposes of choosing among possible venues when parallel litigation has been instituted in separate Courts, to the party who first establishes jurisdiction. Id. at *13. Further, in cases of concurrent jurisdiction, the first Court in which jurisdiction attaches has priority to consider the case as a matter of federal comity. Id. The parties filed this matter and the Harris action in the same venue and they were assigned to the same Judge and Magistrate Judge. For this reason, the Magistrate Judge opined that the first-to-file rule was not applicable here. Additionally, the Magistrate Judge noted that the first-to-file rule is a venue or forum selection mechanism encouraging dismissal of a later filed suit in a different district, and is not intended to govern the resolution of two lawsuits filed in the same district and assigned to the same judge. Id. at *14. The Magistrate Judge found that the concerns about conserving judicial resources, avoiding conflicting rulings, and judicial comity are greatly minimized when two cases are pending in the same district and before the same judge. Id. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended denial of Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' complaint.

(xxxiii) The Motor Carrier Act Exemption In FLSA Collective Actions

Aikins, et al. v. Warrior Energy Services Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32870 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 17, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of 66 truck drivers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant, an oilfield services company, failed to pay them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs operated heavy vehicles weighing more than 10,000 pounds, including coil tubing trucks, fluid pump trucks, and cranes to service oil wells. Id. at *2. As part of their work, they also regularly drove lighter Ford F-250 pickup trucks without a trailer to perform various duties. Id. at *2-3. Defendant moved for summary judgment on the ground that Plaintiffs, as operators of heavy vehicles weighing more than 10,000 pounds, fell within the Motor Carrier Act ("MCA") exemption to the FLSA's overtime pay requirements. Plaintiffs contended that under the Technical Corrections Act of 2008 ("TCA"), they qualified for overtime as long as their work "in part" involved lighter vehicles weighing 10,000 pounds or less. Id. Thus, the crux of the issue concerned the applicability of the TCA's definition of "covered employee" to Plaintiffs. Id. at *11. In particular, the Court focused on the second and third elements of that definition, and whether the type and amount of work on "motor vehicles weighing 10,000 pounds or less" was sufficient to trigger FLSA coverage for drivers who would otherwise be exempted from the law by the MCA, and whether that work constituted Plaintiffs' "duties." Id. at *11-12. The Court declined to adopt a reading of the TCA that any significant use of vehicles weighing more than 10,000 pounds excluded an employee from FLSA coverage. Id. at *15. The Court held that because the TCA extends FLSA coverage to motor carrier employees whose work, even "in part" affects the safety of operation of motor vehicles weighing 10,000 pounds or less, the law did not exclude a motor carrier employee from FLSA coverage merely because his or her work also involved operating heavier vehicles. Id. at *16. The Court noted that was not the end of the statutory dispute, however, because there was a minimum threshold of the type or amount of work that employees must perform on vehicles weighing 10,000 pounds or less before the TCA afforded them FLSA overtime coverage. Id. The Court found that it need not resolve that question, however, because the "meaningful work" standard required no more than that covered employees' work on vehicles weighing 10,000 pounds or less be more than de minimis, and Plaintiffs' summary judgment evidence was sufficient to raise a fact issue even under that slightly more exacting standard. Id. at *18. The Court also examined another element of the TCA's covered employee definition in terms of whether Plaintiffs performed duties on motor vehicles weighing 10,000 pounds or less. Id. at *20-21. Although Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs' job descriptions did not include the operation of pickup trucks, the Court pointed out that it was the actual day-to-day job activities of the employee, not job descriptions, that were relevant in assessing an employee's entitlement to FLSA coverage. The Court held that because each of the Plaintiffs' declarations described their use of the pickup trucks as a duty, Plaintiffs' evidence was sufficient to raise a fact issue on the "duties" element of the TCA definition of covered employee. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant summary judgment on the MCA exemption.

Resch, et al. v. Krapf's Coaches, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 7810 (3d Cir. May 12, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of transit division drivers, brought an action seeking unpaid overtime under the FLSA and the Pennsylvania Minimum Wage Act ("PMWA"). Defendant, a motor coach company based in Pennsylvania, had a transit division that provides bus and shuttle services on set routes. Since 2009, Defendant operated 32 such routes, four of which cross state lines. Id. at *1-2. After the District Court conditionally certified the FLSA action, Defendant moved for summary judgment on the grounds that Plaintiffs were ineligible for overtime under the Motor Carrier Act ("MCA") exemption to the FLSA and the PMWA. Id. at *3-4. Under the MCA exemption, the FLSA's overtime requirement does not apply to any employee with respect to whom the U.S. Secretary of Transportation has power to establish qualifications and maximum hours of service under the MCA. Id at *5. The District Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Plaintiffs appealed, and the Third Circuit affirmed. Although Defendant was a motor carrier subject to the DOT's jurisdiction, the issue involved was whether Plaintiffs, many of whom rarely or never crossed state lines, were members of a class of employees engaging "in activities of a character directly affecting the safety of operation of motor vehicles in the transportation of passengers or property in interstate commerce" pursuant to 29 C.F.R. § 782.2(a). Id. at *7. Based on the Supreme Court decision in Morris v. McComb, 332 U.S. 422 (1947), the Third Circuit observed that the relevant inquiry was whether Plaintiffs reasonably could have expected to drive interstate. Id. at *10-11. The Third Circuit answered that question by looking at, among other things, whether Defendant did any interstate work, assigned drivers randomly to that driving, and maintained a company policy and activity of interstate driving. Id. at *11. The Third Circuit found that during the relevant time period, 6.9% of all trips taken were interstate, as much as 9.7% of the transit division's annual revenues derived from interstate routes, and Defendant always operated at least one interstate route per month. Id. at *11-12. The Third Circuit noted that Defendant had a company policy of training drivers on as many routes as possible, retaining discretion to assign drivers to drive either interstate or intrastate routes, at any time, and disciplining drivers who refused. Accordingly, the Third Circuit held that there were no genuine dispute of material fact regarding whether Plaintiffs reasonably could have expected to drive interstate. Id. at *12. The Third Circuit concluded that the MCA exemption applied because Plaintiffs were members of a class of employees who could reasonably be expected to drive interstate routes as part of their duties. Id. at *13-14. Finally, the Third Circuit rejected Plaintiffs' attempted reliance on the de minimis exception given the undisputed facts concerning Defendant's interstate operations, which accounted for 1% to 9.7% of its transit division's revenue, and Plaintiffs' occupation. Id. at *15-16.

(xxxiv) Davis-Bacon Act Issues In Wage & Hour Class Action Litigation

In The Matter Of Barco Enterprises, Inc.,* 2015 DOL Ad. Rev. Bd. LEXIS 36 (DOL July 31, 2015). The U.S. Department of Labor Wage & Hour Division ("WHD") brought an action alleging that Defendant, Barco Enterprises Inc., ("Barco"), violated the Davis-Bacon Act ("DBA") by improperly classifying its lead paint abatement employees as common/general laborers while performing lead paint abatement at the General Services Administration ("GSA") building. Id. at *3. The GSA, on Barco's behalf, filed a Standard Form (SF) 1444 – the form used to initiate a conformance request – requesting that Barco's lead abatement employees be paid at the common/general laborer wage and fringe benefits rates established under the DC4 Wage Determination applicable to the District of Columbia. Id. The WHD denied the application on the grounds that one of the existing job classifications, painters, already covered the workers at issue. Id. at *4. The WHD Administrator upheld the denial of Barco's request, treating it as a conformance request under 29 C.F.R. § 5.5(a)(1)(ii)(A). The WHD Administrator reasoned that Barco's request for the addition of a lead paint abatement classification to DC4 failed to satisfy the first criterion for conformance approval, i.e., "that a classification cannot be conformed if the work is performed by a classification already on the wage determination." Id. at *5. Barco petitioned for review, and the Administrative Review Board ("ARB") vacated the WHD Administrator's decision. The ARB noted that, notwithstanding the fact that the GSA initiated Barco's request by filing the (SF) 1444, the WHD Administrator appeared to agree that Barco's conformance request did not seek to add a new classification to the DC4 Wage Determination, but to have its employees performing lead paint abatement work be paid at the common/general laborer rate already existing in the DC4 Wage Determination. Id. at *16. Barco repeatedly asserted in its request for review and reconsideration that common/general laborers performed the lead paid abatement. Barco did not argue for a new classification for lead paint abatement employees, but asserted that the common/general laborer classification already existing in the DC4 Wage Determination was the correct classification for its employees as opposed to the painter classification. Id. at *17. The ARB remanded the case to the WHD Administrator for a determination of whether Barco's request should be treated as a conformance request under 29 C.F.R. § 5.5, or as a request pursuant to 29 C.F.R. § 5.13, seeking clarification of which classification within the existing classifications of the DC4 Wage Determination its employees belonged. Id. at *19-20. The ARB also instructed that, regardless of whether the WHD Administrator treated Barco's request as a conformance request or a request seeking clarification, a local area practice survey would be necessary to establish which classification of workers listed in the DC4 Wage Determination predominantly performed work in the area similar to the work in dispute and to establish whether the work in question was performed by workers within the existing DC4 Wage Determination classification. Id. at *23-24. Accordingly, the ARB remanded the action to the WHD Administrator.

Smith, et al. v. Clark/Smoot/Russel*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13961 (4th Cir. Aug. 10, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay him the required Davis-Bacon Act wages for work he performed on Defendants' projects. In support of his allegations, Plaintiff cited to the investigation of the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") where the investigator concluded that Defendants had not been paying Plaintiff appropriate wages under the Davis-Bacon Act. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiff contended that Defendants temporarily reassigned him to a residential contract that was not subject to the David-Bacon Act, which resulted in decreased wages, increased commuting costs, and a substantially longer commute. Accordingly, Plaintiff brought this False Claims Act complaint alleging that Defendants' certification of Davis-Bacon Act compliance on payrolls they submitted for payment constituted false claims because he had not received appropriate wages on Defendants' projects, and Defendants reassigned him in retaliation. As required by § 3730(b)(2) of the False Claims Act, Plaintiff's attorney filed the complaint under seal in camera. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiff's counsel, however, called Defendants' in-house counsel the next day to inform him that he had filed a False Claims Act case against Defendants, but did not provide him with a copy of the complaint because it had to remain under seal for 60 days. Id. at *6. When Plaintiff served the Government with a copy of the complaint, Defendants' attorney contacted the Government regarding the communications that his client had received from Plaintiff's attorney. Recognizing that there was little point in maintaining the fiction of the seal when Defendants were aware of the filing, the Government moved for a partial lifting of the seal on the filing. The Government ultimately elected not to intervene in the case, and Defendants moved to dismiss all the 10 causes of action, which the District Court granted. Plaintiff appealed the dismissals of Count I (knowingly presenting false claims to Government); Count II (knowingly making false statements or records to the Government); and Count IV (violation of False Claims Act anti-retaliation provision), which the Fourth Circuit granted in part. Plaintiff argued that the District Court erred in dismissing Counts I and II based upon the "very serious matter" of the "violation of the statutory seal." Id. at *7. At the outset, the Fourth Circuit noted that the procedural requirements of violations of the False Claims Act does not per se require dismissal. The Fourth Circuit observed that the seal violation did not incurably frustrate the purposes of the False Claims Act, i.e., to permit the government to determine whether it was already investigating the allegations, or to permit the government to investigate the allegation to decide to intervene etc. Id. at *9. Moreover, as the seal violation involved disclosures between the parties rather than the public, Defendants' reputations suffered no harm. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit concluded that the False Claims Act did not support dismissal. The District Court had offered two additional rationales for dismissing the case, based on the doctrine of primary jurisdiction, and Rule 9(b) pleadings deficiencies. The Fourth Circuit noted that the doctrine of primary jurisdiction is designed to coordinate administrative and judicial decision-making by taking advantage of agency expertise and referring issues of fact not within the conventional experience of judges or cases that require the exercise of administrative discretion. Id. at *11. The Fourth Circuit opined that such a referral of an issue to an administrative agency does not deprive the District Court of jurisdiction, it has discretion either to retain it, if the parties were not unfairly prejudiced, or to dismiss the case without prejudice. Id. The Fourth Circuit observed that based on the allegations in the complaint, it may appear proper for a District Court to invoke the doctrine of primary jurisdiction, and could either stay or dismiss the matter without prejudice pending an agency determination. Id. at *13. Since the District Court here dismissed the suit with prejudice, the Fourth Circuit found this to be an abuse of discretion, and reversed the District Court's order. Id. Similarly, the Fourth Circuit found that the District Court erred in dismissing Counts I and II for inadequate pleading under Rule 9(b). Finally, the Fourth Circuit found that the allegations of retaliation in Count IV more than satisfied the pleading requirements under the False Claims Act.

(xxxv) Stays In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Bowerman, et al. v. Field Asset Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 126058 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendants misclassified them as independent contractors and failed to pay them overtime pay and wages due in violation of the California Labor Code. After the Court certified the class, Defendants moved for a stay pending the U.S. Supreme Court's judgment in Bouaphakeo v. Tyson Foods Inc., 765 F.3d 791 (8th Cir. 2014), which the Court denied. Defendants first contended that a decision in Tyson Foods would provide guidance regarding Plaintiffs' plan to demonstrate liability and damages through representative testimony as well as statistical analysis. The Court observed that other than Plaintiffs' briefing on class certification, Defendants cited to no other evidence indicating that Plaintiffs' trial plan depended on the sort of statistical techniques at issue in Tyson Foods. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Defendants failed to demonstrate that this was a case where liability and damages would be determined with statistical techniques that presumed all class members were identical to the average observed in a sample, as in Tyson Foods. Id. at *7. Defendants next argued that the class in this case included members who were not injured and had no legal right as in Tyson Foods. The Court noted that in Tyson Foods, the Eighth Circuit upheld a jury verdict for the class despite Defendants' argument that the class should have been decertified when evidence at trial showed that some class members did not work overtime and would receive no damages, even if the defendant under-compensated their donning and doffing. Id. at *8. Here, in contrast, the Court observed that Defendants did not identify any class members who would not be entitled to damages even if the class were to prevail on its misclassification claims. Id. at *8-9. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Tyson Foods would have little effect on this action, and denied the motion to stay.

(xxxvi) Settlement Bar And Estoppel Issues In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Beauford , et al. v. ActionLink, LLC*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 4539 (8th Cir. Mar. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of "brand advocates," brought suit alleging that Defendant, a marketing agency, misclassified them as exempt and denied them overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Id. at *2. Defendant hired the brand advocates to visit retail stores, to train the retail stores' employees on how LG electronics worked, and to convince those employees to recommend LG products to customers. Id. at *3. In 2011, the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") investigated a complaint that Defendant had misclassified some of its employees as exempt under the FLSA. Subsequently, Defendant re-classified those employees as non-exempt and paid them back wages. Plaintiffs sued Defendant claiming that they were entitled to additional pay under the FLSA. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment. The District Court granted the Plaintiffs' motion and declared them non-exempt. Id. at *3. Defendant then moved for summary judgment against all employees who had cashed the back wages checks, arguing that they had waived their rights for additional remuneration under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The District Court granted the motion, and both parties appealed. The Eighth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling that the employees did not fall within the outside sales exemption because they merely promoted products so that employees of retail stores could make sales, and they did not fall within the administrative exemption because they merely followed set scripts and well-established techniques, procedures, or other standards described in manuals or other sources. The Eighth Circuit also reversed the District Court's ruling that employees waived their rights to pursue additional claims by cashing their settlement checks. The Eighth Circuit noted that, although the issue of what constitutes a valid settlement was not before it, other case law authorities have held that the plain language of 29 U.S.C. § 216(c) requires an agreement by the employee to accept a certain amount of back wages and requires the employer to pay those wages. Id. at *22. This process also must be supervised. Id. In this case, however, when Defendant distributed the checks, the DOL investigator was on vacation, so he failed to approve the amounts of the checks until a month after the checks were distributed. Id. at *23. The Eighth Circuit also rejected Defendant's contention that the fine print on the checks constituted a waiver. Id. The language did not mention the FLSA, waiving legal claims, or any additional damages to which employees might be entitled. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit reversed the District Court's ruling in part and remanded for further proceedings.

Bodle, et al. v. TXL Mortgage Corporation,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 9091 (5th Cir. June 1, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought an FLSA action seeking unpaid overtime compensation. In a state court action between the same parties, Defendants had claimed that Plaintiffs, who had resigned from the company about a year previously, had begun to work for a direct competitor and had violated their non-competition covenants. Id. at *3. Subsequently, the parties settled the state court action, and the settlement agreement contained a clause which completely released Defendants from any and all actual or potential claims arising from Plaintiffs' employment with Defendant. Id. at *4. Defendants thus moved for summary judgment in the FLSA action, arguing that Plaintiffs' waiver in the prior state court action released all claims against them arising from the parties' employment relationship. Relying on Martin v. Spring Break '83 Productions, LLC, 688 F.3d 247 (5th Cir. 2012), the District Court granted the motion. It held that the release from the state court settlement was binding on Plaintiffs and thus barred their subsequent FLSA claims. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Fifth Circuit reversed. The Fifth Circuit noted that in light of the FLSA's recognition of the unequal bargaining power between employers and employees, the FLSA forbids waivers of the right to statutory wages or to liquidated damages. Id. at *6. In D.A. Schulte, Inc. v. Gangi, 328 U.S. 108 (1946), the U.S. Supreme Court had held that even when there is a bona fide dispute as to whether certain employees are covered by the FLSA, and when that dispute has been settled in favor of paying the employees FLSA-required wages, the employees' right to recover liquidated damages cannot be waived. Id. The Supreme Court, however, left open the possibility that a settlement reached for a bona fide dispute over the number of hours worked or the applicable wage may be permissible. The Fifth Circuit had considered this question in Martin and found that a private settlement reached over a bona fide dispute regarding the FLSA claims was enforceable despite the general prohibition against the waiver of FLSA claims. Id. In reaching that conclusion, the Fifth Circuit had adopted reasoning from Martinez v. Bohls Bearing Equipment Co., 361 F. Supp. 2d 608 (W.D. Tex. 2005), which held that parties may reach private compromises as to FLSA claims where there is a bona fide dispute as to the amount of hours worked or compensation due, and that a release of a party's rights under the FLSA is enforceable under such circumstances. Id. at *7. Although a settlement of an FLSA claim is prohibited in the absence of supervision by the U.S. Department of Labor or scrutiny from a District Court, the Fifth Circuit in Martin drew an exception to that general rule for unsupervised settlements that are reached due to a bona fide dispute over hours worked or compensation owed. Id. at *10-11. In doing so, the Fifth Circuit reasoned that such an exception would not undermine the purpose of the FLSA because Plaintiffs did not waive their claims through some sort of bargain but instead received compensation for the disputed hours. Id. at *11. The Fifth Circuit opined that the Martin exception was inapplicable here because not only did the prior state court action not involve the FLSA, but also the parties never discussed overtime compensation or the FLSA in their settlement negotiations, and thus there was no factual development of the number of unpaid overtime hours or of compensation due for unpaid overtime. Id. Further, the Fifth Circuit reasoned that to deem that Plaintiffs had fairly bargained away unmentioned overtime pay based on a settlement that involved a compromise over wages due for commissions and salary would subvert the purpose of the FLSA, i.e., the protection of the right to overtime pay. Id. at *12. Therefore, the Fifth Circuit ruled that the absence of any mention or factual development of any claim of unpaid overtime compensation in the state court settlement negotiations precluded a finding that the release resulted from a bona fide dispute under Martin, and thus the general prohibition against FLSA waivers applied here. For these reasons, the Fifth Circuit concluded that the releases did not serve as a settlement bar to Plaintiffs' FLSA claims.

Brunet, et al. v. Senior Home Care, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14018 (E.D. La. Feb. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of FLSA collective action members in a similar action – Beckworth, et al. v. Senior Home Care, Inc., Case No. 12-351 (N.D. Fla.) – brought this action after decertification of the collective action in Beckworth. Id. at *2. Defendant moved to dismiss and argued that judicial estoppel precluded the claims of named Plaintiffs Brunet and Wall. The Court granted the motion. Brunet opted-in to Beckworth before she filed for Chapter 13 bankruptcy, and did not disclose her FLSA claim in Beckworth in bankruptcy. Id. at *6. The Bankruptcy Court confirmed Brunet's bankruptcy plan after which it dismissed her Chapter 13 bankruptcy. Plaintiffs filed this action subsequent to the bankruptcy proceedings. Similarly, prior to this action, Plaintiff Wall filed a Chapter 13 petition for bankruptcy, which was confirmed, and subsequently she opted-in to Beckworth. Id. at *7. The Court noted three elements of judicial estoppel, including: (i) the party's position must be clearly inconsistent with its previous one; (ii) the Court must have accepted the party's earlier position; and (iii) the non-disclosure must not have been inadvertent. Id. at *11. First, the Court noted that a debtor in a bankruptcy proceeding is under a continuing duty to promptly disclose the existence of all pending and potential legal claims to the Bankruptcy Court even after a bankruptcy plan has been confirmed. Id. at *12. Here, because Brunet opted-in to Beckworth before she filed for bankruptcy, the Court remarked that she knew of the claim when she filed her bankruptcy petition, and that similarly, Wall also had knowledge of her claim, which she had the duty to disclose to the Bankruptcy Court. In this context, the Court observed that Plaintiff had knowledge of a claim when she is aware of the facts giving rise to the claim, even if she is unaware of the duty to disclose it. Id. at *13. Plaintiff Wall knew the facts giving rise to her FLSA claim before opting-in to Beckworth because this occurred after the Bankruptcy Court confirmed her Chapter 13 plan. The Court opined that Plaintiffs would not be judicially estopped from asserting their claims herein unless the Bankruptcy Court had accepted their previous inconsistent statements. Further, the Court observed that the "acceptance" element requires that the Court has adopted the position urged by the party, either as a preliminary matter or as part of a final disposition, which requirement is satisfied where a Bankruptcy Court has confirmed a debtor's bankruptcy plan in reliance on the veracity of his asset schedules. Id. at *14-15. Because in both Plaintiffs' cases, the Bankruptcy Court confirmed the bankruptcy plans of Plaintiffs, the Court remarked that this confirmation satisfied the second element of judicial estoppel. Finally, the Court noted that the final element of judicial estoppel requires that the party's non-disclosure was not inadvertent, and that a debtor's failure to satisfy his statutory duty of disclosure is only "inadvertent" where the debtor either lacks knowledge of the undisclosed claims or has no motive for their concealment. Id. at *17. The Court opined that both Plaintiffs did not act inadvertently in failing to disclose their FLSA claims to the Bankruptcy Court, and that Plaintiff Brunet had knowledge of the undisclosed claim when she filed her bankruptcy petition and throughout the pendency of her first and second petitions. Likewise, the Court remarked that Plaintiff Wall knew of her claim while her duty to disclose was on-going, and that a debtor has knowledge for the purposes of this analysis if she knew of the facts giving rise to her claim whether or not she knew of the duty to disclose. Id. at *18. Plaintiff Wall knew of the facts giving rise to her claim before opting-in to Beckworth and before the discharge of her debts in bankruptcy, and she would not have opted-in if she had not worked unpaid overtime and been aware of that fact. Further, the Court remarked that both Plaintiffs had the requisite motive to conceal the claim because their repayment obligations could be substantially alleviated if the Bankruptcy Court and their creditors were kept unaware of a potentially valuable asset. Thus, because Defendant satisfied all three elements of judicial estoppel, the Court granted Defendant's motion.

Korenblum, et al. v. Citigroup, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 140211 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 14, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current or former information technology employees, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint, arguing that a previous settlement between Plaintiffs and another party barred this suit. Id. at *2. The Court denied the motion in light of binding Second Circuit precedent. The Court observed that Plaintiffs were opt-in Plaintiffs in a prior, related FLSA suit against the Judge Group ("Judge"), a staffing agency that coordinated Plaintiffs' employment and paid their wages with Defendant. The Court, however, noted that in Jones v. The Judge Technical Services, Inc., Defendant was not a party and was not mentioned in the settlement agreement. Four months after their suit was settled and Plaintiffs released all claims in the Jones litigation, Plaintiffs filed this instant case against Defendant seeking to recover unpaid overtime wages that were not included in the Jones settlement. Id. at *3. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' suit was barred by res judicata in light of the Jones settlement. Id. at *4. The Court noted that res judicata is applicable in cases involving same parties or their privies. Id. The Court remarked that in cases such as this action where a party seeks to invoke claim preclusion on the basis of its privity with a party to a consent judgment, principles of contractual privity and res judicata should be applied only if the parties to the settlement agreement in the first suit intended to release the non-party. Id. at *5. The Court thereby denied Defendant's motion, and held that the principles of res judicata were not applicable in this action because Defendant was not a party in the previous action.

In Re Wells Fargo Wage & Hour Employment Practices Litigation (No. III)*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 149715 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 4, 2015). In this multi-district litigation, a group of home mortgage consultants ("HMCs") alleged that Defendants failed to pay them overtime compensation under the FLSA. A majority of Plaintiffs settled their claims, and the remaining 1,516 plaintiffs were previously part of a class action settlement in the case of Lofton v. Wells Fargo Home Mortgage, Case No. CGC-11-509502 (Cal. Super. Ct.) ("California Plaintiffs"). Id. at *3-4. After settlement of the Lofton claim, and of the 1,516 Plaintiffs here, 233 received no compensation for failure to file proofs of claim, and none opted-out. Id. at *5. David Maxon, a client of Initiative Legal Group ("ILG"), which was pursuing claims on behalf of more than 600 California HMCs in 13 different cases, moved to intervene in the Lofton lawsuit. Id. ILG and counsel in the Lofton case mediated the Lofton settlement together, and they had agreed on a common fund to resolve the class action and a separate common fund to resolve the individual actions filed on behalf of ILG's clients. Id. Further, although ILG informed the judge in the Lofton action that ILG's clients would opt-out of the class action settlement, ILG's clients participated in the class action settlement. Maxon also moved for a temporary restraining order ("TRO") in the Lofton case, which was granted and affirmed on appeal because ILG misinformed the trial judge that 600 ILG clients were opting-out of the settlement, and their failure to opt-out diluted the anticipated recovery of other class members, and as the trial judge had not considered the reasonableness of the separate $6 million settlement fund being used as attorneys' fees for ILG. Id. at *7. Subsequently, the trial judge held that the funds in the separate ILG fund should be distributed to the Lofton class because if the payment was for class action attorneys' fees as ILG claimed, it should have been disclosed and approved. Id. at *8-9. Further, the trial judge declined to vacate the judgment. Defendants moved for summary judgment with regard to the California Plaintiffs' claims, prior to the appellate ruling that the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in entering a TRO relating to the ILG funds. Defendant argued that the final judgment approving the settlement, which included a release of all FLSA claims, prohibited Plaintiffs who were Lofton class members from pursuing their FLSA claims here. The Court granted the motion. The Court opined that so long as there were no due process issues with the Lofton judgment as it related to Plaintiffs here, then the release in the California settlement was binding. Id. Further, the Court noted that the class would be bound unless the party attacking the judgment showed that the class was inadequately represented. Id. at *17. Although in the Lofton settlement fund was diluted because the ILG Plaintiffs did not opt-out as originally expected, the Court remarked that this dilution impacted all class members, and that it was rectified when the trial judge required the ILG funds to be distributed to the class. Id. at *21. Finally, although Plaintiffs contended that the Lofton judgment was not final for res judicata purposes because several issues were on appeal, the Court remarked that the appeal had no impact on the finality of the judgment. Id. at *23. Accordingly, the Court granted summary judgment motion in favor of Defendants.

(xxxvii) Intervention Issues In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Bui, et al. v. Sprint Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80126 (E.D. Cal. June 19, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action on behalf of current and former employees alleging violations of the California Labor Code. A group of Interveners previously filed two other actions alleging similar claims, including Guilbaud, et al. v. Sprint Nextel Corp., Case No. 13-CV-04357, and Smith, et al. v. Sprint/United Management Company, Case No. 14-CV-02642. Id. at *2-3. The Interveners filed a motion to intervene and dismiss, stay, or transfer. The Court denied the motion. The Interveners claimed that they had a significant protectable interest because Plaintiff in this action asserted the same California Labor Code violations and sought the same relief that they sought in the Guilbaud case and because Plaintiff sought certification of a class action that was entirely subsumed by the proposed class in Guilbaud. Id. at *4. The Court, however, noted that a class had not been certified either in this case or in the Guilbaud case, and therefore, the interest that the Interveners claimed to have was speculative. Id. Because the Interveners did not have a significant interest that would be impaired or impeded by the action, the Court denied the motion to intervene. The Court noted that under Rule 24(b), it may permit anyone to intervene who has a claim or defense that shares a common question with the main action. Id. at *6. Defendants argued that the Interveners' interest was to put an end to this action, and hence, they should not be permitted to intervene. Given the nature of the Interveners' interest, as well as the reasons the Court provided for denying intervention by right, the Court ruled that it would not permit intervention in this action. Id. at *7-8. Finally, the Interveners argued that this action must be transferred to the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California because Guilbaud was the first-filed action. Id. at *8. The Court found that the interests in the case were ultimately those of Plaintiff and the putative class members, which were best served by the present case and the recent settlement. Id. Further, the Court held that a transfer of venue would cause delay as well as unnecessarily complicate the matter. Therefore, it declined to transfer the case. Id. at *9. The Interveners argued that the instant case should be transferred and the settlement denied because the instant case and Guilbaud were duplicative. Id. The Court found that the settlement expressly excluded any individual who had opted-in to the FLSA action conditionally certified in Guilbaud, and therefore it would not affect the Interveners' rights or raise the risk of conflicting judgments. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied the Interveners' motion to intervene.

(xxxviii) Portal-To-Portal Act Issues In FLSA Collective Actions

Busk, et al. v. Integrity Staffing Solutions, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 11640 (9th Cir. July 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought an action alleging that Defendant made them pass through a security clearance at the end of each shift, and that they were not compensated for the time spent going through security in violation of the FLSA and state labor laws. Plaintiffs sought compensation under the FLSA and state labor laws for their entire 30-minute unpaid lunch periods as they spent up to 10 minutes of the meal period undergoing security clearances. The District Court had dismissed Plaintiffs' claims that they were entitled to compensation for time spent passing through security screening at the end of the workday. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed, and awarded costs to Defendant in the amount of $1,077.25.

(xxxix) Liquidated Damages In FLSA Collective Actions

McFeeley, et al. v. Jackson Street Entertainment*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15661 (D. Md. Feb. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of exotic dancers, brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them minimum and overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and the Maryland Wage & Hour Law ("MWHL"). After the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for partial summary judgment, finding that Plaintiffs were Defendants' employees, Plaintiffs' claims proceeded to trial for resolution of the compensation issue. Id. at *3. Although Plaintiffs established Defendants' violation of the both statutes, they could not recover twice for one injury. Accordingly, Plaintiffs sought compensatory damages under the MWHL because its statute of limitations is three years, whereas the FLSA statute of limitations is two years unless Plaintiffs proved that Defendants' violation of the FLSA was willful. Plaintiffs also sought liquidated damages under the FLSA. Id. at *3-4. The jury returned verdicts regarding the amount of damages to which each Plaintiff was entitled under the MWHL based on a three year statute of limitation. The jury also determined the amount of unpaid wages that were due to Plaintiffs for work performed within the two-year look-back period for the FLSA in order to award liquidated damages, which Plaintiffs had sought under the FLSA. Although the Court had reserved for trial the issue of whether Plaintiffs were entitled to liquidated damages in an amount equal to their unpaid wages, the Court pointed out that such issues should be determined by the Court rather than by the jury. Id. at *4. The Court thus determined Plaintiffs' entitlement to liquidated damages and found that although Defendants did not act in good faith prior to September 2011, their actions following September 2011 were taken in good faith and Defendants had reasonable grounds for believing that they were not violating the FLSA. Id. at *5. The Court held that Defendants had acted in good faith by consulting an attorney in or around September 2011 regarding their relationship with the dancers, and made each Plaintiff sign a "space/lease rental agreement ("Agreement") in mid-September 2011. The Court opined that based on their attorney's advice, Defendants had a reasonable basis for treating Plaintiffs as independent contractors and entering into these agreements. Id. Accordingly, the Court awarded Plaintiffs liquidated damages ranging from $529 to $35,000, based on the jury's determination of damages that accrued as of and after the FLSA's two year look-back-date, and which were reduced to account for Defendants' good faith following September 2011. The liquidated damages amounts were based on an assessment of what weeks each Plaintiff worked for Defendants between the beginning date of the FLSA look-back period and mid-September 2011. Id. at *6.

VI. Significant Class Action Rulings Under The Employee Retirement Income Security Act Of 1974

Class action settlements and decisions in 2015 under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act, 29 U.S.C. § 1001, et seq. ("ERISA"), significantly impacted the direction of ERISA litigation. Among the more closely watched ERISA class actions, courts confronted class certification issues in cases involving challenges to continued employer stock investments in 401(k) defined contribution pension plans and employee stock ownership plans ("ESOP's"). Courts also continued to split on whether Plaintiffs who have received lump-sum distributions have standing to sue under ERISA, whether cash balance plans are inherently age-discriminatory, and whether employers may modify retiree health benefits. Plaintiffs also have filed repeated class actions challenging the reasonableness of investment management and other fees against some of the nation's largest 401(k) retirement savings plans.

In terms of geographic distribution, the ERISA certification rulings were as follows:

Douglin, et al. v. GreatBanc Trust Co., Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 75279 (S.D.N.Y. May 21, 2015). In this action brought by home health aides employed by People Care Holdings against the trustee of their Employee Stock Ownership Plan ("ESOP"), Defendant GreatBanc Trust Co., Plaintiffs alleged that it breached its fiduciary duty under the ERISA and sought class certification. The Magistrate Judge recommended granting Plaintiffs' unopposed motion for class certification. Plaintiffs contended that the ESOP purchased 100% of People Care from the company's owners in 2008, and that the Plan suffered losses when the company's value diminished significantly thereafter from the purchase price of $80 million. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs moved to certify a class consisting of People Care ESOP participants, excluding the selling shareholders, officers, and directors of Defendant. Id. at *3. First, the Magistrate Judge found that the numerosity requirement was satisfied with the proposed class of more than 5,000 ESOP participants. Id. at *5. Second, the Magistrate Judge determined that the commonality requirement was met as Plaintiffs' claims arose from one common set of operative facts involving the ESOP's 2008 purchase of People Care's stock. Id. at *6. Third, the Court held that the typicality requirement was satisfied because Plaintiffs' claims were identical to those of each proposed class member. Id. at *7. Fourth, the Magistrate Judge noted that Plaintiffs met the adequacy requirement, as their motion included ample documentation of their attorneys' experience and success in comparable ERISA litigation and as their interests aligned with the class members. Id. at *7-8. Further, the Magistrate Judge found that certification was appropriate under Rule 23(b)(1) as actions for breach of fiduciary duties are "classic examples" of Rule 23(b)(1) cases, and as many case precedents have held that claims for breach of fiduciary duty brought under 29 U.S.C. § 1132(a)(2) are well suited to Rule 23(b)(1). Id. at *10-11. Further, the Magistrate Judge opined that certification under Rule 23(b)(2) was also permissible. Id. at *12. The Magistrate Judge noted that Plaintiffs sought a declaratory judgment to the effect that Defendant breached its fiduciary obligations to the ESOP and to its participants and beneficiaries and an injunction that would, in substance, prohibit Defendant from engaging in similar conduct in the future. Id. at *14-15. The Magistrate Judge recommended that Plaintiffs' motion for class certification be granted under Rule 23(b)(1) and that Plaintiffs' counsel be appointed as class counsel. Id. at *17-18.

International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace & Agricultural Implement Workers Of America, et al. v. Kelsey-Hayes Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 55057 (E.D. Mich. April 28, 2015). In this putative class action alleging that Defendants breached a collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") in violation of Labor-Management Relations Act ("LMRA") and violated the ERISA in terminating Plaintiffs' health benefit plan, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Plaintiffs asserted that the CBA and the ERISA plan entitled the retirees to a lifetime health benefits, and that Defendants replaced this benefit with less valuable health reimbursement arrangements ("HRAs") and unilaterally asserted their right to reduce or terminate the retiree healthcare benefits in the future. Id. at *10. In moving for certification, Plaintiffs proposed a class of employees who retired under the 1998 CBA from the UAW-represented unit at the now-closed Kelsey-Hayes/TRW Detroit, Michigan plant and the retirees' surviving spouses and other dependents eligible for company-paid retiree health benefits. Id. at *3. The Court granted class certification, finding that Plaintiffs met all Rule 23 requirements. First, the Court ruled that the proposed class fulfilled the numerosity requirement, as it consisted of approximately 100 retirees, surviving spouses, and other eligible dependents. Id. Second, Plaintiffs met the commonality requirement as the proposed class members were all retirees subject to 1998 and 2001 CBAs promising company-paid retirement healthcare benefits and raised their claims under these CBAs. Id. at *6. Third, Plaintiffs met the typicality requirement as all Plaintiffs presented LMRA and ERISA claims seeking to enforce the 1998 and 2001 CBAs and challenged the imposed 2012 HRAs and Defendants' assertion of the unilateral right to reduce or terminate retiree healthcare in the future. Id. at 7. Fourth, Plaintiffs' counsel demonstrated their qualifications and experience by their work and successful prosecution of the arbitration in this action; Plaintiffs easily fulfilled the adequacy requirement of Rule 23(a)(4). Id. at *8-9. The Court also found that certification was proper under Rule 23(b)(2) as Plaintiffs sought to enforce the CBAs and the ERISA plan terms. Id. at *10. The Court further opined that individual adjudication could substantially impair or impede the interest of other retirees. Id. at 11. For these reasons, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion.

(vii) Seventh Circuit

Louisiana Firefighters' Retirement System, et al. v. Northern Trust Investments, N.A.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170281 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 21, 2015). In this putative class action, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants breached contracts with and their fiduciary duties to Plaintiffs by improperly investing Plaintiffs' assets. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification and the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs were direct participants in Defendants' securities lending program ("SLP"). Id. Plaintiffs participated in the SLPs by entering into securities lending authorization agreements ("SLAAs") with Defendants, giving Defendants the authority to lend out Plaintiffs' securities and invest the collateral received in one or more of four collateral pools. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants invested the collateral in highly leveraged and risky securities, including mortgage-backed securities of Lehman Brothers and CIT Group, and continued to hold those investments even after the sub-prime mortgage market, major hedge funds, and other financial institutions collapsed in 2007 and 2008. Id. at *8. In determining if Plaintiffs had established the elements necessary to certify the class, the Court noted that Defendants did not challenge the proposed class' numerosity, since the class size was estimated at 300 members. Id. at *16. However, Defendants argued that the Plaintiffs had not established the typicality or commonality requirements. Id. Specifically, Defendants claimed that Plaintiffs allegations of imprudent investments could not be resolved on a class-wide basis because prudence cannot be assessed with reference to the risk/reward profiles of individual clients in the SLP. Id. at *17-18. The Court disagreed, opining that Plaintiffs alleged Defendants made investments for the collateral pools based on the guidelines for each pool, not the risk/reward profiles of individual securities lenders. Id. at *18. Defendants also argued that commonality and typicality were lacking because Plaintiffs' SLAAs, unlike most of the proposed class members, were governed by Michigan, not Illinois, law and that 28 members of the SLAAs were governed by laws of eleven states other than Michigan and Illinois and an additional fourteen were governed by the laws of five other countries. Id. at *20, *22. However, the Court noted that Michigan contract law does not materially differ from Illinois contract law, and thus the proposed class could survive commonality problems by limiting class members to those with SLAAs governed by Michigan or Illinois law. Id. at *21-22. Further, Defendants argued that Plaintiffs could not meet the typicality requirement because the different collateral pools varied in risks, purposes, and guidelines. Id. at *23. The Court rejected this argument because Plaintiffs' allegations stated that Lehman, CIT, and mortgage-backed securities were not appropriate investments for any pool because they were not conservative, high-quality, or low-risk investments. Id. at *26. The Court also ruled that Plaintiffs had met the adequacy requirement despite Defendants' contention that some absent class members may be deprived of damages relating to mortgage-backed securities. Id. at *28. Finally, the Court held that Plaintiffs had established that common issues predominated because even though damages may have to be determined individually, the overarching questions in the case involved common questions, including whether Defendants imprudently purchased and retained the contested securities in the collateral pools. Id. Thus, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to the certify the proposed class.

(viii) Eighth Circuit

Lanigan, et al. v. Express Scripts, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1854 (E.D. Mo. Jan. 8, 2015). In this ERISA class action alleging that Express Scripts Inc. ("ESI") retained undisclosed rebates from drug manufacturers, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification for failure to establish commonality, typicality, adequacy, and predominance. Plaintiff, a trustee of a multi-employer health fund, brought the action on behalf of his fund and all other similarly-situated self-funded prescription drug plans that utilized ESI as a pharmacy benefits manager ("PBM"). Plaintiff alleged that the fund contracted with National Prescription Administrators, Inc. ("NPA") for prescription benefit management services, and that ESI purchased NPA and took over NPA's contractual obligations to fund and acted as its PBM. Id. at *12. Plaintiff's proposed class was comprised of all self-funded ERISA employee benefit plans ("ERISA Plans") for which NPA, at least initially, served as the ERISA Plans' PBM, and which utilized the NPA Select Formulary. Id. Although Plaintiff contended that standardized contracts were used with all plans, he failed to provide any proof of a standardized contract for all class members The Court noted that while some contracts were executed, some were not, and there were variations regarding how the contracts addressed rebates. Further, the Court reasoned that the issue of how rebates were received, disbursed, and retained by NPA could not be answered on a class-wide basis. Id. at *22. Further, the Court observed that Plaintiff's action was against ESI, not NPA, and while Plaintiff's plan had terminated the relationship with ESI, other proposed class members continued to be serviced by ESI. In the Court's view, this defeated the typicality requirement and raised conflict issues. Id. at *23. Moreover, because Plaintiff's plan no longer utilized the services of ESI, while others in the proposed class were still affiliated with ESI, the Court opined that in seeking recovery, Plaintiff's interests would conflict with those class members, thereby defeating their adequacy. The Court also concluded that predominance was lacking because of the individualized negotiations and relationships with each plan, and remarked that whether a fiduciary relationship existed had to be ascertained by analyzing the contracts and the contractual relationships between NPA and the plans. The Court also observed that it would have to examine each relationship, the manner of dealing between the parties, and the results thereof on a case-by-case basis to ascertain whether a breach of a fiduciary duty had occurred, which in turn precluded class certification. Finally, the Court ruled that the collective presentation of individual liability evidence would not advance the parties' interests, nor would judicial economy of administration result from certification. Id. at *28. The Court asserted that fiduciary duty and breach issues would have to be proven on an individual Plaintiff basis. Id. Because of the numerous individualized factual and legal issues, the Court remarked that it would be faced with a lengthy series of mini-trials for each claim and for virtually every element of those claims, which meant that class action was not the superior method for handling this litigation. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Bryant, et al. v. Arizona Pipe Trades Pension Trust Fund,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7291 (D. Ariz. Jan. 22, 2015). In this putative class action brought by a plan participant in the pipe trade profession, the Court partially granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification. Under the terms of the United Association Reciprocity Program for Pension Funds ("Program") and the subject Pension Plans, the full value of the out-of-state contributions made by participants who worked outside their local jurisdiction would be reciprocal, and therefore prorated between the Plans at the current contribution rates to protect employees from losing benefits. Id. at *5. Defendants amended the Plans twice, changing the way benefits were to be paid and Plaintiff alleged that the changes diminished his, and others, future benefits in violation of the Plans and the ERISA. Plaintiff sought class certification, proposing two classes and one sub-class, accounting for the timeframes during which the amendments were made. Id. at *9. The Court found that the classes were sufficiently tailored to common questions in the litigation, including whether Defendants breached their fiduciary duties owed to the classes and whether they miscalculated participants' individual account balances by not including employer contributions at the mid-year valuation date. The Court determined that common questions of law – such as whether class members accrued rights and benefits under the first amendment, whether Defendants violated the terms of the Plans and the ERISA by failing to provide adequate notice prior to adoption of second amendment, and whether Defendants' implementation of the second amendment amounted to a breach of fiduciary duty – predominated over individual issues that could arise in the calculation of damages. Id. at *13. The Court reasoned that the issues of whether Defendants breached their duties and whether they miscalculated participants' individual account balances by not including employer contributions at the mid-year valuation date also would facilitate disposition of all class members' claims. Id. at *17. The Court therefore granted certification on all of Plaintiff's class claims. The Court, however, denied certification with regard to Plaintiff's claim that Defendants provided him with inconsistent and differing information concerning the amount of benefits paid, finding that it amounted to an individual claim for relief, and thus was not suitable to class resolution. Id. at *19-20.

Reyes, et al. v. Bakery & Confectionery Union & Industry International Pension Fund,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 126972 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 22, 2015). In this class action brought by the participants in the Bakery and Confectionery Union and Industry International Pension Fund (the "Fund") alleging that Defendants failed to comply with the Pension Protection Act ("PPA") in adopting an amendment to a pension plan, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. The Fund was a multi-employer defined benefit pension plan that covered tens of thousands of participants and beneficiaries. Under the Fund, employers offered participants subsidized early retirement plans known as "Plan G" (the "Golden 80 Plan") and "Plan C" (the "Golden 90 Plan"). Id. at *3. Under the Plans, when a participant's age and service, in years and months, equaled 80 years under the Golden 80 Plan, and 90 years under the Golden 90 Plan, a participant would be entitled to retire at the full benefit level, except that participants who commenced participation after December 3, 1998, must have a minimum number of years of service. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs contended that in July 2010, the Fund's trustees amended the fund to eliminate the option to age into those benefits, and instead required that a participant be employed with a participating employer when they qualified for the Golden 80 or 90 benefits. Id. at *4. While the litigation was on-going, Defendants distributed a "Notice of Critical Status," which announced that subsidized early retirement benefits might be reduced or eliminated as a part of a rehabilitation plan. Id. at *4-5. In the rehabilitation plan, the trustees adopted an amendment identical to the July 2010 amendment, as a contingent measure because of a pending legal challenge to the earlier amendment. Id. In May 2014, the 2012 contingent amendment went into effect. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that the contingent amendment was void because it had neither been enacted nor effectuated in compliance with the ERISA's provisions. Id. Plaintiffs moved to certify a class of all participants in the Golden 80 or 90 Plans in the Funds. Id. at *6. The Court found that the Rule 23(a) requirements were satisfied because the parties agreed that there are thousands of affected pension plan participants who fell within the class definition. Id. at *9. The Court determined that the class met the commonality requirement because the challenge to the contingent amendment was applicable to all class members and did not require an inquiry into the circumstances of individual plan participants. Id. at *10. The Court also opined that the class met the typicality requirement because the class representatives' claims arose from the same practice and their claims were based on the same legal theory as the class they sought to represent. Id. *10-11. Further, the Court ruled that the class representatives met the adequacy requirement because there were no apparent conflicts with the proposed class and there was no reason to believe that they would not prosecute the actions vigorously or adequately protect the absent class members' interests. Id. at *12. Finally, as there were thousands of potential Plaintiffs affected by the challenged contingent amendment, and if each one filed a suit individually it ran a risk of inconsistent and varying adjudications, the Court concluded that Rule 23(b)(3) was satisfied. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court certified the class.

Santomenno, et al. v. TransAmerica Life Insurance Co.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6889 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 16, 2015). In this action alleging that Defendants charged an excessive investment fee (the "investment management/administration" or "IM/Admin" fee), the Court deferred its decision on Plaintiffs' motion for class certification and required additional briefing. Plaintiffs alleged that the imposition of excessive fees violated the ERISA's fiduciary duty to act solely in the interest of the participants and beneficiaries and for the exclusive purpose of providing benefits to participants and their beneficiaries, and defraying reasonable expenses of administering the plan. Id. at *3. Because Plaintiffs failed to allege that the total fees the plans paid to Defendants were unreasonable, the Court remarked that the theory of fiduciary breach under which they sued was unclear. The Court noted that even if Defendants were under a legal obligation to distinguish investment-level expenses from plan-level expenses, it was unclear that such an obligation translated to a fiduciary duty under the ERISA. The Court also reasoned that it was unclear what the ratio of the IM/Admin fee to other fees was for purposes of Plaintiffs' case theory. Accordingly, the Court ruled that additional briefing was required on the primary theory by which Plaintiff wished to recover for Defendants' alleged breach of fiduciary duty as to fees. The Court concluded that this would assist it in determining whether common questions were likely to predominate over individual questions, and whether a class action was superior mode of adjudication. The Court accordingly deferred its ruling on Plaintiffs' class certification motion.

B. Other Federal Rulings Affecting The Defense Of ERISA Class Actions

Throughout 2015, federal courts issued a wide variety of rulings on procedural and substantive matters in ERISA class action litigation. These rulings included breach of fiduciary duty issues in ERISA class actions; ERISA class action litigation over retiree/employee benefits; attorneys' fees and costs in ERISA class actions; settlement approval issues in ERISA class actions; release issues in ERISA class actions; standing issues in ERISA class actions; cash balance plan issues in ERISA class actions; statute of limitations issues in ERISA class actions; ERISA stock drop class actions; equitable defenses in ERISA class actions; arbitration issues in ERISA class actions; vesting issues in ERISA class actions; preemption issues in ERISA class actions; damages issues in ERISA class actions; DOL and PBGC ERISA enforcement litigation; standing issues in ERISA class actions; and intervention issues in ERISA class actions.

(i) Breach Of Fiduciary Duty Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Harris, et al. v. Amgen, Inc.*, 2015 WL 3372373 (9th Cir. May 26, 2015). In this class action brought by a group of current and former employees who participated in two Amgen pension plans, alleging breaches of fiduciary duties under the ERISA, the Ninth Circuit denied rehearing en banc. This case was previously on remand from the U.S. Supreme Court for reconsideration in light of Fifth Third Bancorp. v. Dudenhoeffer, 134 S. Ct. 2459 (2014), as the Ninth Circuit had earlier reversed the District Court's dismissal of the class action. Id. In Fifth Third, the Supreme Court held that there is no presumption of prudence for investments in employer stock. Id. The Ninth Circuit previously held that Plaintiffs sufficiently alleged that Defendants violated their duty of loyalty and care by failing to provide material information to plan participants about investment of the Amgen Common Stock Fund. Id. The Ninth Circuit panel issued this order to address criticisms contained in the dissenting opinion. The Ninth Circuit panel remarked that the dissent characterized its opinion as holding that withdrawing a fund as an investment option is appropriate because as a general matter, when the previously concealed material information about a company is eventually revealed, the stock price will invariably decline. Id. at *1. Based on that characterization, the dissent asserted that the majority ignored the Fifth Third's instruction to consider whether there will be a net harm to plan participants. The Ninth Circuit clarified that its opinion contained no such general holding. The Ninth Circuit explained that in a separate class action pending before the same judge, the non-plan investors in Amgen stock asserted securities law violations and the District Court concluded that these investors had sufficiently alleged misrepresentations and omissions, and resulting economic loss sufficient to state claims under §§ 10(b) and 20(a) of the 1934 Exchange Act. Id. The Ninth Circuit remarked that this appeared to satisfy the Rule 8(a) requirement to state a plausible claim based upon the withholding of material information. The dissent contended that the majority imposed on fiduciaries an obligation to stop Plan investments in employer stock or force the sale of that stock based upon a mere suspicion of a violation of federal securities laws. Id. The majority clarified that this was not its intention, and that its opinion did not require a fiduciary to act based on a mere suspicion or arguable violation of federal securities laws; instead, it stated that a fiduciary's obligation to act is triggered only when he or she knew or should have known of a violation of the securities laws. Id. Finally, the majority noted that according to the dissent, its opinion imposed on the ERISA fiduciaries greater disclosure obligations than those imposed under federal securities laws. Id. at *3. The majority explained that compliance with the ERISA would not have required Defendants to violate federal securities laws. In other words, if Defendants had revealed material information in a timely fashion to the general public (including to plan participants), thereby allowing informed plan participants to decide whether to invest in Amgen Common Stock Fund, they would have simultaneously satisfied their duties under both securities laws and the ERISA. Id. Alternatively, if Defendants had made no disclosures but had simply not allowed additional investments in the Fund with the price of Amgen stock artificially inflated, they would not have violated the prohibition against insider trading, for there was no violation absent purchase or sale of stock. Id.

In Re Lehman Brothers Securities And ERISA Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 90109 (S.D.N.Y. July 10, 2015). In this class action brought on behalf of beneficiaries of the Lehman Brothers Savings Plan (the "Plan"), an ESOP that held stock of Lehman Brothers Holdings, Inc. ("Lehman"), Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant fiduciaries – including Lehman's former directors and members of Lehman's Employee Benefit Plans Committee – violated their duty under the ERISA to manage the Plan prudently. Defendants moved to dismiss the third consolidated amended complaint ("TCAC") on the basis that Plaintiffs failed to adequately allege that the Plan managers – many of whom were officers and directors – disloyally put Lehman's interests ahead of the Plan participants. In their TCAC, Plaintiffs alleged that the Plan Committee Defendants knew or should have known, based on public information, that investment in Lehman had become increasingly risky throughout 2008 and that these Defendants breached their fiduciary duty by continuing to invest in Lehman during this period. Id. at *10-11. Plaintiffs also alleged that there were "special circumstances affecting the reliability of the market price of Lehman stock as an unbiased assessment of Lehman's value," including orders issued by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission ("SEC") in July 2008 that prohibited short selling the securities of certain large financial services firms, including Lehman. Id. at *11. Plaintiffs further asserted that the Plan Committee Defendants breached their fiduciary duties by failing to investigate non-public information regarding the risks facing Lehman. Id. at *12. Finally, Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant Richard S. Fuld, Lehman's former chairman and chief executive officer, inadequately monitored the Plan Committee Defendants and possessed non-public information about the risks facing Lehman and breached an alleged duty to share it with the Plan Committee Defendants. Id. As in previous rulings, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to plausibly allege that the Plan Committee Defendants breached their duty of prudence based on public information. Id. at *16. While the Court acknowledged that "changed circumstances" – like the collapse of Bear Stearns in 2008 – could trigger a fiduciary's obligation to review the prudence of an investment, it also noted that Plaintiffs failed to sufficiently allege the circumstances that actually changed and that the failure to make such a review injured the Plan. Id. at *22-23. Thus, notwithstanding the July 2008 SEC orders, the Court found that the TCAC did not allege facts or circumstances sufficient to have alerted the Plan Committee Defendants that Lehman was an imprudent investment. Id. at *25. As to the alleged duty to investigate Lehman's deteriorating financial condition, the Court opined that the TCAC still did not explain how Plaintiffs' hypothetical investigation would have uncovered the alleged inside information so that the fiduciaries could have warned the Plan participants. Id. at *35-36. The Court further questioned how it should evaluate claims about whether an ESOP fiduciary's actions would have caused "more harm than good" to ESOP participants, noting that this question ought to be a matter for expert proof and thus inappropriate for disposition on a motion to dismiss. Id. at *38. The Court was also highly skeptical that terminating the Plan as an investment option or disclosing the alleged inside information would have helped the Plan more than hurt it, but concluded that it need not resolve the question given that Plaintiffs' basis for a duty to investigate claims was insufficient. Id. at *39. Finally, the Court found that the duty to monitor claims against Lehman's directors failed because the TCAC failed to plausibly allege any primary breach of fiduciary duty on the part of the Plan Committee Defendants. Id. at *40-42. Plaintiffs' separate claim that Defendant Fuld violated a fiduciary duty to provide the Plan Committee Defendants with non-public information therefore failed as a matter of law. Id. at *44. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss all of Plaintiffs' claims.

Kruger, et al. v. Novant Health, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124171 (M.D.N.C. Sept. 17, 2015). Plaintiffs, current and former participants of two 401(k) Plans sponsored by a major hospital system, brought a putative class action alleging that the Plans' fiduciaries breached their fiduciary duties of loyalty and prudence by making excessive payments to service providers and brokers and by failing to monitor the Plans to rectify such overpayments. Id. at *6-7. Defendants moved to dismiss, and the Court denied the motion. First, Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to allege facts regarding the services provided, why the fees were excessive, or how the fees charged to the Plans were excessive in light of the services provided. The Court found that Plaintiffs' allegations that Plan fiduciaries were utilizing imprudently expensive investment options to the detriment of the Plans were sufficient to state a claim for breach of fiduciary duty. Id. at *20. The Court further determined that the facts that Defendants contested were the types of facts that warranted discovery, and therefore dismissal at the pleading stage was not appropriate. Id. at *25. Second, as to the broker, the Court found that it would be impossible to deduce whether the broker's compensation was reasonable without discovery into facts about the broker, including what exactly it did, how exactly Defendants paid it, and whether Defendants evaluated its compensation prudently. Id. at *26. Third, Defendants sought dismissal of Plaintiffs' claim that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties by retaining higher fee share class investment options in the Plans when far lower cost funds with the identical managers, investment styles, and stocks were available. Id. at *9-10. Under the prudence standard, the Court found it difficult to conclude that Plaintiffs' allegations were not sufficient to state a claim. Plaintiffs did not argue that Defendants had a duty to scour the market to find and offer any cheaper investment; rather, they alleged that lower cost funds with the identical managers, investments styles, and stocks should have been considered by the Plans. Plaintiffs alleged that the Plans, comprised of very large pools of assets, had the ability to obtain institutional class shares of mutual funds but offered only retail class shares, which charged significantly higher fees than institutional shares for the same returns on investment. According to the Court, Plaintiffs stated enough of a claim for breach of fiduciary duty based on the imprudent retention of retail class funds. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Pfeil, et al. v. State St. Bank & Trust Co.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 19536 (6th Cir. Nov. 10, 2015). In this action alleging that Defendant State Street Bank & Trust Co., the independent fiduciary for the company stock fund in General Motor's ("GM") 401(k) plan, breached its duty of prudence when it failed to halt purchases of GM stock, and delayed divesting the GM common stock fund of GM stock, as the company headed toward bankruptcy, the Sixth Circuit held that Defendant's continuous and extensive monitoring and review of the plan's investment in GM stock constituted a "prudent process," and therefore, Defendant satisfied its duty of prudence as a matter of law. Defendant served as a fiduciary of certain pension plans for employees of GM, including the Common Stock Plan (the "Plan"), which held GM common stock. The Plan lost money in 2008, as GM faced severe business problems that culminated in the company filing for bankruptcy. Defendant continued to buy GM stock until November 8, 2008, and did not divest the Plan of the GM stock until March 31, 2009. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs, a group of GM employees who elected to invest in the Plan, claimed that Defendant's decision to continue to buy and to hold GM stock was imprudent under the ERISA. Id. at *3. The District Court originally dismissed Plaintiffs' action under the Moench presumption (from Moench v. Robertson, 62 F.3d 553 (3d Cir. 1995)). Id. Plaintiffs appealed, and the Sixth Circuit reversed and remanded, holding that the presumption of prudence did not apply earlier than the summary judgment stage. Id. On remand, the District Court certified the class, but then granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment based on the presumption of prudence. Id. Plaintiffs again appealed, and the Sixth Circuit affirmed the grant of summary judgment. The Sixth Circuit acknowledged that, even though it no longer presume that ESOP fiduciaries were prudent, in Fifth Third Bancorp v. Dudenhoeffer, 134 S. Ct. 2459 (2014), the U.S. Supreme Court had suggested that the correct "understanding of the prudence of relying on market prices" would lead to a similar result. Id. at *14. The Sixth Circuit noted that Dudenhoeffer made clear that "where a stock is publicly traded, allegations that a fiduciary should have recognized from publicly available information alone that the market was overvaluing or undervaluing the stock are implausible as a general rule, at least in the absence of special circumstances," because fiduciaries do not act imprudently by failing to outsmart a presumptively efficient market. Id. at *15-16. The Sixth Circuit explained that a Plaintiff claiming that an ESOP's investment in a publicly traded security was imprudent must show special circumstances to survive a motion to dismiss. Id. at *16. The Sixth Circuit found that, during the class period, Defendant "repeatedly discussed at length whether to continue the investments in GM," and Defendant's employees continuously discussed the performance of GM, both its stock and its business, and factors that might have affected the performance of the stock. Id. at *22. Defendant had an Independent Fiduciary Committee that held more than 40 meetings during the nine months at issue to discuss whether to retain GM stock. Id. Defendant's experts presented evidence to the District Court to support the finding that its process for monitoring GM's stock was prudent. Id. Moreover, other experts, i.e., fiduciaries of other pension plans and of non-pension plan investment funds, also decided to hold GM stock during the same time that Plaintiffs claimed it was imprudent for Defendant to do so. Id. Thus, in light of the prudent process in which Defendant engaged and Plaintiffs' failure to establish any special circumstances affecting the reliability of the market price of GM stock, the Sixth Circuit concluded that Plaintiffs could not demonstrate a genuine issue regarding whether Defendant satisfied its duty of prudence under the ERISA. Id. at *23. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's order granting summary judgment to Defendant.

Smith, et al. v. Delta Airlines Inc.*, 619 Fed. Appx. 874 (11th Cir. 2015). In this ERISA class action, a plan participant alleged that plan fiduciaries breached their duty to prudently manage the plan's assets through their decision to maintain employer stock as a plan investment. On remand from the Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit dismissed the action for failure to state a claim in light of Fifth Third Bancorp v. Dudenhoeffer, 134 S. Ct. 2459 (2014). The Eleventh Circuit had previously rejected the claim prior to Dudenhoeffer. In Dudenhoeffer, the Supreme Court held allegations based on over-valuing or under-valuing stock are "implausible as a general rule, at least in the absence of special circumstances." Id. at 876. The Supreme Court concluded that a fiduciary usually is not imprudent to assume that a major stock market provides the best estimate of the value of the stocks traded on it that is available to him. Id. In holding that Dudenhoeffer did not save Plaintiff's claim, the Eleventh Circuit found that Plaintiff's prudence claim fell squarely within the class of claims the Supreme Court deemed "implausible as a general rule." Id. Plaintiff alleged that the Delta fiduciaries should have foreseen that Delta stock would continue to decline. There was no allegation, however, that the fiduciaries had material inside information about Delta's financial condition that was not disclosed to the market, nor was there any allegation of a special circumstance that rendered reliance on the market price imprudent, such as fraud, improper accounting, illegal conduct or other actions that would have caused Delta stock to trade at an artificially inflated price. Absent such circumstances, the Eleventh Circuit found that the Delta fiduciaries could not be held liable for failing to predict the future performance of the airline's stock.

(ii) ERISA Class Action Litigation Over Retiree/Employee Benefits

Barnes, et al. v. AT&T Pension Benefit Plan,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 19776 (9th Cir. Nov. 13, 2015). In this class action brought by a participant in the AT&T Pension Benefit Plan (the "Plan") alleging that the Plan violated his rights and the rights of others similarly-situated by failing to pay full pension benefits in violation of the ERISA, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision granting summary judgment to Defendant. Plaintiff asserted that the Plan owed the class members additional benefits pursuant to § 3.4(a) of the Plan document. Id. at *2. The Ninth Circuit remarked that it would review the Plan's decision denying Plaintiff and other "lump sum" class members' additional retirement benefits for an abuse of discretion with skepticism. Id. at *1-2. The Ninth Circuit opined that Plaintiff's arguments as to why it should review the Plan's decision de novo were unpersuasive. Id. at *2. The Ninth Circuit explained that contrary to Plaintiff's assertion, the Plan did interpret § 3.4(a) of the Plan Document, when it initially evaluated Plaintiff's claim, and in its denial letter, paraphrased § 3.4(a) in explaining why the benefits were being denied. Id. at *2-3. Even if the Plan waited to first interpret § 3.4(a) until after Plaintiff sued, no case law authority supported Plaintiff's argument that a plan fiduciary was foreclosed from issuing subsequent interpretations of the Plan once a beneficiary commences litigation. Id. at *3. Third, the Ninth Circuit found that any variation in the Plan's interpretation of § 3.4(d)(3) did not require a de novo review. Id. The Ninth Circuit determined that the plain language of the Plan did not entitle Plaintiff to benefits since the lump sum payees like Plaintiff were eligible to receive only cash balance benefits upon their second retirement pursuant to § 3.4(a). Id. at *3-4. The Ninth Circuit held that because the Plan's language was ambiguous and the Plan issued a reasonable, good faith, interpretation of the Plan's terms, it did not abuse its discretion and, as such, Plaintiff's alternative interpretations of these provisions did not prevail over the Plan's interpretation. Id. at *4-5. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the judgment of the District Court.

Carter, et al. v. General Motors Hourly-Rate Pension Plan,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 81037 (S.D. Ind. June 23, 2015). In this class action brought by former employees of Allison Transmission, Inc. ("Allison"), and participants of the General Motors Hourly-Rate Pension Plan (the "GM Plan"), alleging that Defendants denied them benefits, the Court granted summary judgment to Defendants. Prior to 2007, Allison was a division of GM and participated in the GM Plan which provided pension benefits for employees who reached age 65, ceased employment with GM, and met certain other requirements. Id. at *4-5. In 2007, GM sold Allison to Clutch Operating Co., Inc. ("Clutch"). Id. at *5. In 2009, GM, Clutch, and Plaintiffs' representative union entered into a Memorandum of Understanding ("MOU") relating to the transition of workers from GM-Allison to Clutch-Allison. Id. The MOU also provided for the transition of pension benefits to Clutch-Allison. Id. at *7-8. The parties did not dispute that in 2007, Plaintiffs were qualified for either normal or early retirement from GM, but they continued to work for Clutch-Allison. Id. at *10-11. In late 2013 or early 2014, however, Plaintiffs requested to retire from GM and to begin receiving GM Plan benefits, but to continue their employment with Clutch-Allison. Id. at *11. GM denied their request, stating that in order to commence their GM Pension benefits, they must terminate their employment with Clutch-Allison. Id. at *11-14. Plaintiffs filed suit for benefits under § 502(a)(1)(B) of the ERISA; and for equitable relief under § 502(a)(3)(A) of the ERISA. Id. at *14-15. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. Id. at *15. Plaintiffs argued that the MOU did not amend the GM Plan because there was never an amended plan document, and that the GM Plan and the MOU did not specify how the GM Plan was amended. Id. at *19. Defendants responded that the GM Plan contemplated that GM and the union would execute additional MOUs from time to time to deal with secondary pension issues, and that such memoranda were automatically incorporated into the GM Plan by reference. Id. The Court, however, found that the MOU was part of the GM Plan based on the terms of the GM Plan itself. Id. at *21. The Court explained that the Plan stated that GM and the union may enter into the MOU and that the provisions set forth in such a memorandum were made part of the GM Plan. Id. at *21-22. Plaintiffs also argued that a provision in the GM Plan requiring an employee to terminate employment with a successor company did not bar their claim for benefits because Clutch-Allison was not a successor to GM (in its entirety). Id. at *24. The Court noted that the successor provision specifically referred to an employee accepting employment with a successor company through a sale, divestiture, or joint venture transaction. Id. at *28. The Court also observed that divestiture was defined as the loss or surrender of an asset or interest. Id. Under the circumstances, the Court concluded that Clutch-Allison was a successor company, and that Plaintiffs must terminate their employment with Clutch-Allison in order to receive benefits under the GM Plan. Id. at *29. Plaintiffs further argued that the MOU did not bar them from receiving GM Plan benefits because they were not retiring from Clutch-Allison. Id. In other words, Plaintiffs argued that the MOU's language kicked in upon termination from Clutch-Allison. Id. at *29-30. The Court rejected this argument and found that the MOU's purpose was to resolve those GM-union, and Clutch-union issues concerning the transition of hourly transferred employees. Id. at *30. The Court remarked that Plaintiffs were the transferred employees referenced in the MOU, and the language of the MOU must be read in tandem with the GM Plan language. Id. The Court observed that the language in the MOU showed that GM, Clutch, and the union intended to provide Allison employees with a seamless transition from GM to Clutch, while continuing their same positions at Allison with the same benefits. Id. at *31. The Court found that the MOU also indicated the intent of GM and Clutch for Allison employees to receive benefits seamlessly, paid for by both GM and Clutch according to how many years the employee worked for GM-Allison and Clutch-Allison. Id. at *32. Additionally, the MOU provided that all GM Pension Plan benefit rates would be those in effect as of the date of retirement from Clutch-Allison. Id. at *33. This meant that GM would not know how Plaintiffs' benefits should be calculated under the GM Plan if they were allowed to receive those benefits immediately, because they were not ceasing employment with Clutch-Allison. Id. at *33-34. Accordingly, the Court granted summary judgment to Defendants.

Knowlton, et al. v. Anheuser-Busch Co., LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88234 (E.D. Mo. July 8, 2015). In this ERISA class action seeking enhanced benefits under a pension plan, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for partial judgment on the pleadings. Plaintiffs were former employees of Busch Entertainment Corp. ("BEC"), which was a member of the "Controlled Group" of Anheuser-Busch Companies, LLC ("ABC"). Under the Pension Plan, a salaried participant whose employment with the Controlled Group was involuntarily terminated within three years after a "change in control" was entitled to an enhanced pension benefit that added an additional five years of credited service and five years of age to the benefit calculation (resulting in at least a 15% benefit increase). Id. at *3. Anheuser-Busch InBev, N.V. ("InBev") acquired ABC in November of 2008, leading Plaintiffs to allege that the transaction was a change in control under the Plan. Id. Before November 2009, InBev announced that it was selling BEC to the Blackstone Group and that the transaction would be finalized on December 1, 2009. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs asserted that the BEC sale involuntarily terminated their employment with the Controlled Group within three years of the change of control. Id. However, in November 2009, ABC informed BEC employees that they would not be eligible for the +5/+5 enhancement upon termination of employment with BEC after the sale was finalized. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs alleged that when they filed a claim for the enhanced benefits, the Plan Administrator denied the claim. Id. The Court noted that Adams v. Anheuser-Busch Companies, Inc., 758 F.3d 743 (6th Cir. 2014), which presented the identical issue, reversed the Plan Administrator's decision denying Plaintiffs' claims. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiffs urged the Court to follow the Sixth Circuit's reasoning, and, based solely on the pleadings, to grant partial judgment leaving only the matter of benefit calculations. Id. Plaintiffs asserted that the Court could apply the doctrine of non-mutual collateral estoppel to prevent Defendants from further defending this matter in light of the Adams decision. Id. Defendants' primary objection to making a determination on the pleadings was that they insisted on a full review of the administrative record. Id. at *7. The Court, however, found that this was unnecessary. Id. at *6-7. The Court observed that the Plan Administrator believed that "involuntarily terminated" required a loss of employment. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs argued that "involuntarily terminated" must be read in the context of their employment with the Controlled Group and did not require an actual loss of employment. Id. The Court agreed with the Sixth Circuit's analysis, and accordingly, granted Plaintiffs' motion for partial judgment on the pleadings. Id. at *10.

Lehman, et al. v. Warner Nelson,* Case No. 13-CV-1835 (W.D. Wash. April 24, 2015). The Court granted Plaintiff's motion for damages in this putative class action brought to recover reciprocal contributions to a pension plan that Plaintiff alleged were improperly withheld by the multi-employer plan trustees. Plaintiff, an electrician, was a participant in the Puget Sound Electrical Workers Pension Trust (the "Puget Sound Trust" or the "Home Fund"). Plaintiff's profession frequently required him to perform work for employers outside of the jurisdiction of his Home Fund, including in a region for which the typical fund was the IBEW Pacific Coast Pension Fund (the "Pacific Coast Fund"). In prior proceedings, the Court had granted summary judgment to Plaintiff, in part, finding that the class members were entitled to a transfer to their Home Fund of reciprocity contributions wrongfully withheld by Defendants, as well as earnings thereon. Id. at 1. Plaintiff subsequently sought an award of damages consisting of $1,911,116.49 in wrongfully withheld funds and $562,016.28 in the Pacific Coast Fund's earnings on those amounts. At the outset, the Court found the method of calculating damages appropriate. Id. at 2. The Court stated that damages for the class would equal $2,473,132.77 as of February 28, 2015, which would represent $1,911,116.49 in pension contributions made on Plaintiffs' behalf that Defendants had wrongfully withheld, and $562,016.28 in earnings thereon. Id. Further, the Court ruled that earnings would continue to accrue on the damages award at the actual rate of earnings by the Pacific Coast Fund through the date that Defendants made payment on the damages awarded by this order. Id. Finally, the Court clarified the future rights of the class and concluded that if Defendants or the Pacific Coast Fund continued to withhold contributions inconsistent with the Court's orders, along with all earnings as determined by the actual rate of return, this would constitute further damages owed to Plaintiffs. Id.

M&G Plymers USA, LLC v. Tackett, et al.*, 135 S. Ct. 926 (2015). Plaintiffs, a group of retires, brought a class action alleging that Defendant's decision to require retirees to contribute to the cost of their health care benefits breached both their collective bargaining agreement and other agreements in violation of the Labor-Management Relations Act ("LMRA") and the ERISA. M&G Polymers USA, LLC, entered a master collective bargaining agreement and a Pension, Insurance, and Service Award Agreement ("P & I agreement") with Plaintiffs' Union, which stated that for the duration of this agreement thereafter, the employer will provide the following program of hospital benefits, hospital-medical benefits, surgical benefits, and prescription drug benefits for eligible employees and their dependents. Id. at 931. Following the expiry of those agreements, Defendant announced that it would require retirees to contribute to the cost of living of their health care benefits. Id. Plaintiffs brought this action alleging that the P & I agreement created a vested right to lifetime contribution-free health care benefits. The District Court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim. Based on International Union, United Auto, Aerospace, & Agricultural Implement Workers of America v. Yard-Man, Inc., 561 F.3d 478 (6th Cir. 2009), the Sixth Circuit reversed. Id. at 932. Yard-Man inferred that parties to collective bargaining would intend retiree benefits to vest for life because such benefits are not mandatory or required to be included in collective bargaining agreements, are typically understood as a form of delayed compensation or reward for past services, and are keyed to the acquisition of retirement status. Id. Yard-Man held that these inferences outweighed any contrary implications about the termination of retiree benefits derived from general termination clauses. Id. On further appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed. The Supreme Court stated that collective bargaining agreements, including those establishing ERISA plans, are interpreted according to ordinary principles of contract law, at least when those principles are not inconsistent with federal labor policy. Id. at 933-34. The Supreme Court reasoned that Yard-Man's assessment of likely behavior in collective bargaining was speculative and far removed from the context of any particular contract to be useful in discerning the parties' intention. Yard-Man, however, relied on no record evidence indicating that employers and unions in that industry customarily vested retiree benefits, and relied in part on the premise that retiree health care benefits are not subjects of mandatory collective bargaining. Id. at 935. The Supreme Court observed that parties can and do voluntarily agree to make retiree benefits a subject of mandatory collective bargaining. The Supreme Court opined that application of the Yard-Man presumption distorted the text of the agreement and was in conflict with the principle of contract law that the written agreement is presumed to encompass the whole agreement of the parties. Id. at 936. Additionally, the Supreme Court observed that the Sixth Circuit misapplied other traditional principles of contract law, including the illusory promises doctrine, so as to avoid constructions of contracts that would render promises illusory because such promises cannot serve as consideration for a contract. Id. at 937. The Supreme Court thus rejected the Yard-Man inference as inconsistent with ordinary principles of contract law, and vacated the judgment of the Sixth Circuit. Id. at 938.

Severstal Wheeling, Inc., et al. v. WPN Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 104645 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs brought suit alleging that Defendants failed to prudently and loyally manage and diversify the assets of Defendants' retirement security plan and salaried employees' pension plan and breached their contract with the plans by failing to obtain fiduciary insurance covering claims for breach of fiduciary duty under the ERISA. The Court entered judgment in Plaintiffs' favor and ordered disgorgement of $9,710,438, plus $5,305,889.74 as pre-judgment interest for the period from July 16, 2009, to August 10, 2015, for a total judgment of $15,016,327.74. Id. at *80. The action arose from the transfer of certain employee benefit plan assets from a pooled employee benefit plan trust to a separate trust for the plans. Id. at *3. Defendants only transferred a single account to the new trust rather than transferring a diversified portfolio of combined assets. Id. at *22. Eventually Defendants liquidated the transferred assets to reallocate them, by which time, Plaintiffs alleged, the assets had lost value as a result of Defendants' failure to diversify. Id. at *53-54. Plaintiffs further alleged that, if Defendants had invested the plans' assets in a manner consistent with the strategy of the original trust, the resultant trust would have experienced a net gain of $9.6 million rather than a loss in value of approximately $4.7 million. Id. at *56. The Court held that, although the mere transfer of an undiversified portfolio might not be a breach of fiduciary duty, creating such a transfer under circumstances in which the transferee plan would have to hold the assets indefinitely absent the creation of new trading arrangements or the prompt and decisive use of Defendants' investment management authority was imprudent because Defendants subsequently failed to take any effective action to liquidate and diversify the portfolio to minimize the risk of large losses. Id. at *65. The Court, therefore, found that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties by failing to structure the division of trust assets in a manner that was prudent under the circumstances and by failing to manage the assets of the trust in a manner consistent with their contractual and fiduciary duties. Id. at *66-68. The Court further ruled that the investment manager should have taken pro-active steps to overcome the logistical obstacles faced in this case. Id. at *71-72. The Court, therefore, concluded that the losses suffered by the plans were properly chargeable to Defendants. Id. at *74. The Court held Defendants liable for the trust's loss of approximately $4.7 million, as well as for the net gain of $9.6 million that the plan could have achieved if invested consistently with the original trust. Id. at *76. The Court also found Defendants liable for the disgorgement of $110,438 in investment management fees paid to them during the relevant period as well as pre-judgment interest due to their "near-total dereliction of their duties." Id. at *78. Accordingly, the Court entered judgment against Defendants for total damages of $15,016,327.74. Id. at *80.

Slack, et al. v. International Union Of Operating Engineers*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32151 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, five members of Operating Engineers Local 3, brought a class action against the Trustees of three different Trusts alleging that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties and engaged in prohibited transactions under the ERISA. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants engaged in misconduct by: (i) deciding that the Pension Fund should invest in the Longview Ultra Construction Loan Investment Fund, which resulted in a $50 million loss; (ii) allowing employers who were signatories to collective bargaining agreements ("CBAs") to engage in improper double-breasted operations; and (iii) allowing employers to write off millions of dollars in contributions owed to the Trusts without any legitimate basis. Id. at *2. The Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss in part. The Court noted that Plaintiffs' claims for improper double-breasting were actually based on two different theories, including: (i) that certain non-signatory employers should have been making contributions to the Trusts because the non-signatory employers were alter egos of signatory employers; and (ii) that certain signatory employers should have been making contributions to the Trusts based on the work of non-union employees because, although non-union, the employees performed covered work as defined by the CBAs. Id. at *8. The Court noted that a double-breasting operation occurs when owners of one company that is a party to a labor agreement own a second non-signatory company that is non-union. Id. at *8-9. The Court observed that, although Plaintiffs indicated that some work was diverted from a signatory employer to a non-signatory employer, it could not be said that this was a sham effort to avoid collective bargaining obligations because the signatory company made contributions for its employees who worked on non-signatory company projects. Id. at *18-19. Accordingly, the Court dismissed with prejudice Plaintiffs' improper double breasting claims. Id. at *19. As to their CBA circumvention theory, Plaintiffs focused only on the signatory employer and argued that the employer should have been making contributions to the Trusts based on the work of non-union employees. Id. at *19-20. The Court refused to dismiss the CBA circumvention claim, finding that Plaintiffs had alleged that they were covered employees for whom the signatory employer was not making contributions. Id. at *22. Defendants also sought dismissal of Plaintiffs' claims for improper write-offs. The Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss on this ground finding that Plaintiffs sufficiently had alleged a gross disparity in write-offs. Id. at *24. Defendants also contended that Plaintiffs' claims for double-breasting and write-offs should be dismissed because Plaintiffs named multiple Defendants and failed to identify with any factual support what each Trustee allegedly knew or did. Id. at *24. The Court found that Plaintiffs made sufficient allegations to hold the Union Trustee Defendants liable but did not make sufficient allegations against the Management Trustee Defendants. Id. at *26-27. The Court, therefore, dismissed Plaintiffs' claims based on CBA circumvention theory as to Management Trustee Defendants. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Teamsters Local Union No. 340, et al. v. Eaton,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10778 (D. Me. Jan. 30, 2015). Plaintiff, a labor union, brought a class seeking a declaratory judgment that it could modify the retiree health insurance benefits of certain former employees under the ERISA. The Magistrate Judge issued a recommendation to grant Plaintiff's motion for judgment on the administrative record, and the Court adopted the recommendation. Id. at *1-2. Defendants argued that the Magistrate Judge failed to address their detrimental reliance arguments and pointed to an excerpt in their motion in which they argued that they relied on representations regarding their retiree health insurance coverage. Id. at *2. The Court noted that, to properly raise an argument, a party must do more than seed the record with references to key arguments and that it must spell out arguments squarely and distinctly. The Court reasoned that Defendants' single sentence reference that failed to cite authority did not suffice. Id. at *3. Here, the Court found that the passing reference in Defendants' motion to their reliance on representations regarding their benefits, made as part of their argument that they had vested contractual rights, did not squarely and distinctly raise the quasi-contractual theory of detrimental reliance or promissory estoppel as a basis for relief. Id. at *3. Further, because detrimental reliance was not presented to the Magistrate Judge for consideration, the Court found that Defendants failed to preserve their right to raise the issue as part of the Court's de novo review. Id. at *3-4. Accordingly, the Court adopted the recommendation of the Magistrate Judge and granted Plaintiff's motion for judgment on the administrative record. Id. at *4.

(iii) Attorneys' Fees And Costs In ERISA Class Actions

Abbott, et al. v. Lockheed Martin Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93206 (S.D. Ill. July 17, 2015). In a class action alleging that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties in managing two retirement savings plans, the District Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees and awarded $20,666,666 to class counsel. The parties had settled the class action for $62 million for the benefit of about 181,000 participants in two 401(k) plans, as well as affirmative relief designed to reduce plan fees and improve investment offerings. Id. at *3. Class counsel sought a fee award of one-third of the monetary settlement obtained. Id. The Court noted that under the common fund doctrine, class counsel is entitled to a reasonable fee drawn from the commonly held fund created by a settlement for the benefit of the class and that attorneys' fees based on the common fund doctrine are appropriate in ERISA cases. Id. at *5. Here, class counsel did not agree to a settlement after the agreement was reached on monetary terms, but instead sought substantial non-monetary relief as a condition of the settlement. Id. at *6. The Court opined that such insistence on widespread affirmative relief added tremendous material value to the 401(k) plans. Id. Further, the Court observed that in common fund cases, the measure of what is reasonable is what an attorney would receive from a paying client in a similar case. Id. The Court also noted that the Seventh Circuit uses the percentage basis rather than a lodestar or other basis, and that a one-third fee is consistent with the market rate in settlements concerning this particularly complex area of law. Id. at *7. The Court reasoned that the fee application was reasonable insofar as it comprised 33.3% of the monetary recovery, and only 20.4% of the settlement's value when non-monetary relief was considered. Further, the requested fee was actually far less than the market rate in national ERISA litigation. Id. Moreover, the Court noted the risk undertaken by class counsel who brought this case when no one else had, and aside from demonstrating willingness to pursue this action over more than eight and a half years of intense, adversarial litigation, had ensured enormous value of the plan improvements and future relief. Id. at *8. Additionally, class counsel performed substantial work for over a year before filing the lawsuit, including investing hundreds of hours of attorney time in a pre-suit investigation. Id. at *9. Moreover, class counsel spent 20,124 attorney hours and 4,960 hours of non-attorney professional time on the litigation, and that by handling the matter without separately-appointed local counsel, they were able to provide additional value to the class without extra expense. Id. at *11. The Court also noted that class counsel would spend substantial time over the next three years because they were committed to monitor compliance by Defendants, and would bring an enforcement action if needed without cost to the class. Id. Finally, the Court determined that class counsel's hourly rate was reasonable, noting that the lodestar value for their services with no enhancement for risk would be $15,541,544, and that the fee request for $20,666,666 represented a risk multiplier of less than 1.33. Id. at *12. Guided by the mean multiplier of 1.85 used in analogous class actions, the Court concluded that class counsel's request was reasonable. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees and awarded $20,666,666, or one-third of the monetary settlement.

Lawrence E. Jaffe Pension Plan, et al. v. Household International, Inc.,* Case No. 02-CV-5893 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 5, 2015). In this class action brought by Plaintiffs under the ERISA, the Court awarded Defendants over $13 million in costs and fees following a reversal of judgement in favor of Plaintiffs and appellate remand. Id. at *1. Defendants moved the Court for fees and costs pursuant to Rule 39, which states that if a judgement is reversed, costs are taxed against the appellee, including supersedeas bonds and the fees for filling the notice of appeal. Id. Plaintiffs argued that the costs were unreasonable. Id. Specifically, Plaintiffs stated that the supersedeas bond premiums were unreasonable costs because a less-costly alternative, an escrow account with a guaranty by Defendant's parent corporation, was available to Defendant. Id. at *1-2. The Court rejected Plaintiffs argument because it found no previous case stating that an appellant must forego recovery of bond costs if it could have obtained a less expensive form of security. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs argued that the case was so close and difficult and they litigated in good faith that it should factor against an award of costs. Id. at *3. The Court noted that good faith and difficult cases do not justify denying costs to Defendants. Id. Finally, Plaintiffs argued that a cost award would chill future litigation and inequitably burden lead Plaintiffs, who, if they succeed, will recover only a fraction of the total judgement. Id. Despite the fact that such a ruling may put representative Plaintiffs in a financially risky position, the Court disagreed since even if such Plaintiffs are burdened by a costs award, it does not follow that a prevailing Defendant must bear the costs. Id. at *4. Moreover, the Court noted that Plaintiffs had carefully considered and rejected the bond alternative offered by Defendant, an escrow account without a third-party guaranty, though the Plaintiffs knew they could be held liable for the bond premiums if they lost on appeal. Id. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs must now live with the decision of opting for a bond with full awareness of the potential consequences. Id. Thus, the Court granted Defendant's motion for costs and ordered Plaintiffs to pay Defendant a total of $13,281,282.00 in appellate costs. Id. at *5.

Pierce, et al. v. Visteon Corp.*, 791 F.3d 782 (7th Cir. 2015). In this action alleging that Defendant failed to provide timely notice under COBRA, which requires employers to offer discharged workers an opportunity to continue health insurance at their own expense within 44 days, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's award of attorneys' fees. Id. at 783-84. After the bench trial, the District Court found for Plaintiffs, awarded them compensation, and ordered Defendant to pay class counsel $302,780 in attorneys' fees under 29 U.S.C. § 1132(g), plus costs of about $11,000. Id. at 784. Class counsel, Ronald Weldy, appealed on the basis that the fee was too modest, and that he was additionally entitled to a supplemental award from the class. Id. at 786. Although Weldy asserted that the District Court should have treated this as a common fund case, the Seventh Circuit observed that this case was litigated under a fee-shifting statute. Id. The Seventh Circuit remarked that there was no good reason why, in the absence of a contract, counsel should be entitled to money from the class on top of or in lieu of payment by the losing litigant. Id. Further, the Seventh Circuit noted three reasons why the common-fund approach should be limited to cases outside the fee-shifting context. Id. First, the Seventh Circuit observed that the common-fund doctrine is part of the common law, devised as a matter of necessity when there was no other way to compensate the lawyers for work that bestowed a substantial benefit on the class. Id. Because common law doctrines yield to statutes, the Seventh Circuit remarked that the fee-shifting provision in the ERISA is a statutory replacement for the common law. Id. Second, because the fee-shifting statutes are designed to ensure that the victims of wrong-doing retain full compensation, while the wrongdoer pays the lawyers, the Seventh Circuit reasoned that such an interest would be disserved by transferring some of the class' money to its lawyer in lieu of, or on top of, the award under the fee-shifting statute. Id. Finally, the Seventh Circuit observed that § 1132(g)(1), like most other fee-shifting statutes, provides for the award of a reasonable fee, which the District Court here had fixed at $303,000. Id. The Seventh Circuit remarked that if Weldy were to pocket substantially more than that, his compensation would by definition be unreasonably high, which would in turn be a misuse of the judicial power to award a lawyer an unreasonably high fee just because funds were available to be tapped. Id. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's fee award.

Tussey, et al. v. ABB, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 164818 (W.D. Mo. Dec. 9, 2015). Following a trial in 2010, the Court found that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties under the ERISA, and awarded Plaintiffs $35.2 million damages, including $13.4 million on Plaintiffs' record-keeping claims, $21.8 million in losses due to Defendants' mapping the Vanguard Wellington Fund to the Fidelity Freedom Funds, and $1.76 million for float income retained by Fidelity. Id. at *4. The District Court also awarded Plaintiffs attorneys' fees in the amount of $12,947,747.68, calculated as based on 25,160 hours of work at a blended rate of $514.60 per hour. Id. at *4. On Defendants' appeal, the Eighth Circuit affirmed as to the record-keeping claims, but remanded as to the other claims. On remand, the District Court found that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties, but did not award any actual damages to Plaintiffs. Id. at *5. On Defendants' further appeal, the Eighth Circuit found that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in awarding the rate used in calculating attorneys' fee, but remanded the action and directed the District Court to recalculate the fee award and apply the generous attorney rate to only attorneys' work, and not to administrative, clerical, or paralegal work. Id. at *5. Subsequently, Plaintiffs sought an award of $10.9 million for pre-appeal work, and $1.3 million for time spent on the appeal, which the District Court granted in part. At the outset, the District Court noted that it had the discretion to award attorney fees under the ERISA's fee-shifting provision, i.e., an ERISA claimant need only show some degree of success on the
