merits to receive fees. Id. at *6. The District Court remarked that Plaintiffs were prevailing parties on their record-keeping claims, Defendants' conduct was particularly reprehensible because Defendant was a fiduciary to the Plan, and Defendants were not merely negligent but rather motivated by their self-interest. Id. at *7. In addition, many of the questions involved were novel and most were complex, both factually and legally. Id. at *8. Moreover, the District Court observed that Plaintiffs' counsel undertook significant risks in pursuing the case and that Defendants had the ability to pay a substantial award. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the District Court concluded that Plaintiffs were entitled to a substantial attorneys' fee award under these circumstances. In its lodestar calculation, the District Court noted that Plaintiffs used the same blended rate of $514.60, but reduced their hours worked to 23,484. Id. at *9-10. The District Court also noted that in addition to re-classifying 1,577.1 hours of administrative work, Plaintiffs excluded 1,600 hours related to float claim and other issues on which Plaintiffs were not successful, as well as entries that arguably contained insufficient detail. Id. at *13. The District Court reasoned that Plaintiffs achieved complete success on their record-keeping claim, which resulted in a $13.4 million judgment. Id. at *14. As for the mapping claim, the District Court opined that while Plaintiffs were not the prevailing party, the evidence relevant to the mapping claim was largely relevant to the record-keeping claim. Id. at *15. The District Court noted that this evidence ultimately helped explain why Defendants failed to actively monitor record-keeping fees and used the size of the Plan to achieve rebates for the participants. Id. However, while Plaintiffs' global damage theory applied equally to the mapping claim and the record-keeping claim, Plaintiffs presented some evidence applicable only to their mapping claim. Id. at *16. The District Court, therefore, reduced the lodestar by $200,000 to reflect the difference. The District Court further found that any hours to be reduced to the dismissed float claim were included by class counsel in their reduced hours, and were properly excluded. Id. at *17-18. Accordingly, the District Court concluded that an award of $10,768,474 was appropriate. Id. at *18. The District Court also reaffirmed its earlier award of costs and incentive fees contained in the previous award, $489,985.65 in taxable costs, $1,712,834.85 for non-taxable costs to be paid out to the class damages, and $25,000 to each of the three named Plaintiffs as an incentive award. Id. at *22. The District Court likewise, awarded $900,000 as an appropriate appellate fee to the class counsel.

(iv) Settlement Approval Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Amos, et al. v. PPG Industries, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106944 (S.D. Ohio Aug. 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, retirees of PPG Industries, brought a putative class action challenging Defendants' unilateral modifications to collectively-bargained retiree health benefits. The parties reached a settlement, and the Court granted final approval of the settlement agreement and release. Id. at *4. The settlement agreement provided Plaintiffs and their spouses and dependents with post-retirement health benefits through December 31, 2025, the amount and form of which differed based on the Medicare eligibility of the settlement class members. Id. at *9-10. The Court found that the amount and form of the relief, balanced against Plaintiffs' questionable likelihood of success on the merits, weighed in favor of approving the settlement agreement because the agreement provided immediate certainty to Plaintiffs by securing their medical and prescription drug benefits for a ten-year period. Id. at *10. The Court also noted that the parties had been litigating for over ten years and that further delay due to continued litigation could impose a substantial detriment to the settlement class, which consisted primarily of elderly and/or disabled members. Id. at *11-12. The record further reflected that the parties had been afforded an adequate opportunity to conduct sufficient discovery to be fully apprised about the legal and factual issues presented as well as the strengths and weaknesses of their cases. Id. at *12. Additionally, the Court determined that class counsel had evaluated the strength of Plaintiffs' claims and Defendants' defenses before reaching the agreement, and that the agreement was non-collusive and reached in good faith. Id. at *14. Further, the Court opined that the settlement agreement provided the same relief to the class representatives and the unnamed class members, and it affected similarly-situated class members in the same fashion. Id. at *15-16. The Court also observed that the class members had been afforded adequate opportunity to file objections and that none had been filed. Id. at *16. The Court, therefore, concluded that the settlement agreement was fair, reasonable, and adequate. The Court also certified the settlement class, holding that the class of more than 1,600 individuals met the Rule 23(a)(1) numerosity requirement. Id. at *18. The Court ruled that the common question of unilaterally reducing or eliminating retiree medical benefits met the Rule 23(a)(2) commonality requirement. Id. at *19. The Court also held that the class representatives' claims were typical of the class' claims and arose from the same course of conduct sufficient to meet the Rule 23(a)(3) typicality requirement. Id. at *21. Finally, the Court determined that there was no antagonism between the class members and class representatives and that class counsel was qualified to represent the class, thus fulfilling the Rule 23(a)(4) adequacy requirement. Id. at *22-23. Additionally, the Court held that certification of the class was appropriate under Rules 23(b)(1) and 23(b)(2). Id. at *24-25. Having certified the class, the Court also granted Plaintiffs' motion for an award of attorneys' fees in the amount of $200,000 pursuant to the settlement agreement. Id. at *33. Plaintiffs argued that their actual fees amounted to to $257,942.75 and that their costs totaled $8,584.54, but they sought only $200,000 in fees and costs. Id. at *25-26. Plaintiffs further submitted that their attorneys expended 570.18 total hours litigating the case, excluding the additional time expended completing their brief in support of the motion for final approval of the settlement agreement. The Court found that the amount sought, the hourly rate, and the hours expended were reasonable, given counsel's detailed timesheets and a lodestar of $257,942.750. Id. at *31. Accordingly, the Court granted final approval of the settlement agreement.

Johnson, et al. v. Meriter Health Services Employee Retirement Plan,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 158859 (W.D. Wis. Jan. 5, 2015). In this ERISA class action brought by a group of participants in a cash balance plan sponsored by Defendant, Plaintiffs alleged that they had not been credited with all pension benefits to which the plan entitled them. The parties subsequently settled, and Plaintiffs moved for approval of the class action settlement. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for final approval of the settlement, plan of allocation, and an award of attorneys' fees and costs. The settlement agreement created a settlement fund of $82 million for approximately 5,800 members of 11 classes or sub-classes, which were each defined in an order certifying the class and further modified by the order preliminarily approving the class settlement. Id. at *2. The plan of allocation divided the net settlement proceeds on an individualized basis through a formula that took into account the relative value of each claim in light of litigation risks and distributed the net settlement on a pro rata basis in proportion to each individual's determined value of his or her claim. Id. The Court granted approval to the settlement, finding that it was fair, reasonable, and adequate. Id. at *4. The Court determined that settlement approval was proper based on the strength of Plaintiffs' case compared to the amount of Defendants' settlement offer, an assessment of the likely complexity, length, and expense of the litigation, an evaluation of the amount of opposition to the settlement among affected parties, the opinion of competent counsel, and the stage of the proceedings and the amount of discovery completed at the time of settlement. Id. at *4. Particularly, the Court noted that Defendants' statute of limitations defense could have created a complete bar to recovery for all or a significant portion of the class members, and that Plaintiffs' counsel and Defendants' counsel did a remarkable job of arriving at a fair and reasonable settlement of highly contentious and uncertain claims. Id. at *4-6. The Court also found that the fact that the action involved seven different causes of action spanning a 25-year period of administration of the plan at issue supported its conclusion that the settlement was fair and reasonable. Id. at *7. The Court also ruled that Plaintiffs' motion for payment of incentive awards of $5,000 each to the named Plaintiffs was reasonable and fair, as the named Plaintiffs were consulted throughout the years the action was pending, generally stayed abreast of the litigation, and approved the settlement. Id. at *9. Finally, the Court granted attorneys' fees of $22.55 million. Id. at *14. The Court noted that the class counsel had faced a fairly significant risk of non-payment given the statute of limitations defense, especially in light of the fact that the case covered a 25-year period, and that the $82 million settlement represented a significant victory for the class on the eve of trial in the face of a difficult hurdle relative to Defendants' statute of limitations defense. Id. at *11-12. Moreover, class counsel submitted detailed time records, which reflected 37,000 hours of work over the four and a half years and represented a lodestar value of more than $12 million using counsel's actual billing rates. Id. at *13. Thus, in light of the risk of non-payment, the significant amount of time and resources necessarily committed by class counsel over four and a half years, and the quality of representation, the Court concluded that an award in range of 27.5% or $22.55 million was fair and reasonable. Id. at *14. Because the expenses were adequately documented, and reasonably incurred in connection with the prosecution of the action, the Court also approved the reimbursement of costs in the total amount of $1,774,629.36. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted final approval of the settlement agreement. Id. at *14-15.

Vu, et al. v. The Fashion Institute Of Design & Merchandising,* Case No. 14-CV-8822 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 14, 2015). Plaintiff, a participant and beneficiary of Fashion Institute of Design & Merchandizing 401(k) Plan (the "Plan"), brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated duties imposed under the ERISA by failing to provide an accurate statement of her vested interest in the Plan and by refusing her the benefits owed under the terms of the Plan. The parties subsequently settled, and Plaintiff brought a motion seeking preliminary approval of the class settlement. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion for preliminary approval of the class action settlement. The settlement required Defendant to make a payment of $135,000 to class counsel, out of which $100 would be paid to all class members before withdrawing further funds. Id. at 4. The settlement further provided an enhancement fee payment to Plaintiff not to exceed $15,000, and attorneys' fees and costs not to exceed the remainder of the funds. Id. The parties reached a settlement agreement after a considerable amount of documents were produced in discovery, through arms' length negotiations between Plaintiff and Defendant, with the assistance of counsel experienced in class actions. Thus, the Court found that the settlement appeared reasonable in that it accounted for the uncertainty surrounding Plaintiff's ability to prevail on each of claims at trial. The Court, however, raised concerns about the attorneys' fees provided to class counsel, Plaintiff's enhancement payment, the settlement amount provided to each member of the class, and the absence of an opt-out clause in the settlement agreement. Id. at 6. The Court found it problematic that Plaintiff did not provide any documentation to make a determination regarding the reasonableness of attorneys' rates. The Court noted that, assuming that each of the 80 class members received a $100 payment and Plaintiff received a $15,000 enhancement fee, a full $112,00 or 83% of the settlement fund would remain available to cover administration costs and attorneys' fees, which could potentially be paid to class counsel. Id. at 7. The Court noted that the settlement amount available to compensate class counsel, which approximated 83%, was double or triple the benchmark under applicable case law, and the Court found no exceptional circumstances that could justify such an amount. Id. The Court further noted that, because each class member would only receive $100, there was an explicit disparity between the proposed incentive payment to Plaintiff and the average recovery available to class members. Id. at 8. The Court thus concluded that the attorneys' fees and enhancement payment were excessive. Id. The Court also raised concern as to "one-size-fits-all approach" where the settlement did not take into account that the benefits in the retirement account vested at differing levels depended upon the duration of the employees' service, which caused a potential disparity of harm. Id. The Court explained that while a class member with two years of service would only have acquired vested rights to 20% of the amount in his or her account, a class member with six years of service would have acquired vested rights to the full amount, and the settlement agreement did not account for the potential disparity of harm under this system. Id. The Court therefore ruled that the settlement agreement was not fair, adequate, and reasonable, and accordingly, denied Plaintiff's motion for preliminary approval of class action settlement.

(v) Release Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Colaco, et al. v. The ASIC Advantage Simplified Employee Pension Plan,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 129502 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action under the ERISA seeking benefits under a Simplified Employee Pension Plan ("SEP"). Although Plaintiffs had signed separation agreements releasing their claims against Defendants, Plaintiffs asserted that the agreements did not bar their claims for SEP contributions because Defendants did not rely on Plaintiffs' separation agreements as a basis for their initial denials or their decisions on appeal. Defendants raised Plaintiffs' releases as an affirmative defense as to all claims. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs moved for partial summary judgment, arguing that Defendants waived the affirmative defense by failing to wield it during the administrative process. Plaintiffs alternatively contended that Plaintiffs did not knowingly and voluntarily waive their claims under the ERISA and that Plaintiffs could not release their SEP benefits because the benefits had vested and Plaintiffs' rights to the benefits had accrued before Defendants notified Plaintiffs of their lay-offs. Id. at *7. The Court granted in part Plaintiffs' motion for partial summary judgment, finding that Defendants waived their ability to claim Plaintiffs' release of claims in a separation agreement as a basis for denying the SEP benefits, but that Defendants could raise the separation agreements as an affirmative defense to the suit. Id. at *2-3. The Court agreed with Plaintiffs that Defendants could not raise the releases at trial as a reason for denying benefits because Defendants did not rely on the separation agreements as a reason for denying the ERISA claims during the administrative process. Id. at *16. The Court, however, also held that Defendants' failure to assert the releases during the administrative process did not bar Defendants from arguing that the releases applied to Plaintiffs' action as a whole. Id. at *16. Because triable issues of fact remained as to whether Plaintiffs knowingly and voluntarily released their ERISA claims, the Court found summary judgment inappropriate on that issue. Id. at *18-19. Similarly, because genuine issues of material fact remained as to whether Plaintiffs' SEP benefits vested before they signed separation agreements, and as to whether the scope of the separation agreements encompassed the SEP benefits, the Court denied summary judgment on those issues as well. Id. at *28-29. Accordingly, the Court granted in part Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment.

(vi) Standing Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Cox, et al. v. Blue Cross Blue Shield Of Michigan*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120436 (E.D. Mich. Sept. 10, 2015). In this class action brought by beneficiaries of plans administered by Defendant, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant breached its fiduciary duty under the ERISA by charging Plaintiffs' respective ERISA plans "hidden fees." Defendant was a non-profit healthcare corporation that administered and processed claims for various welfare benefit plans, including self-insured (or "self-funded") health benefit plans. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs were either employees of Genesys Regional Medical Center ("Genesys"), or members of Operating Engineers Local 324 ("Operating Engineers"). Id. Both Genesys and Operation Engineers entered into Administrative Service Contracts ("ASCs") with Defendant to provide healthcare coverage. Id. Plaintiffs contended that Defendant began secretly misappropriating funds under the ASCs, and took higher fees, by disguising the overcharges as hospital-claims costs. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs sought restitution and disgorgement of the hidden fees that their plans paid Defendant. Id. at *8. Defendant moved to dismiss and challenged Plaintiffs' ability to pursue these claims. First, the Court examined whether Plaintiffs' claim for restitution was a claim for equitable restitution, as opposed to legal restitution. In doing so, the Court relied on Central States, Southeast & Southwest Areas Health & Welfare Fund v. First Agency, Inc., 756 F.3d 954 (6th Cir. 2014), which held that equitable restitution is awarded when a constructive trust or lien is imposed on particular funds or property in Defendant's possession but legal restitution is awarded when it holds Defendant liable for a sum of money. Id. at *9. Here, Plaintiffs sought to impose a constructive trust; however, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to allege any specifically identifiable fund in Defendant's possession over which a constructive trust or equitable lien could be imposed. Id. at *11. Because Plaintiffs failed to sufficiently allege a specifically identifiable fund in Defendant's possession, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs could not sue for equitable restitution. Id. Similarly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' request for disgorgement must be dismissed for the same reason as their restitution claim. Id. Plaintiffs attempted to cure this deficiency by identifying specific funds that were siphoned off from the Plans because Defendant took assets directly from the Plans and disguised the excess payments as hospital costs without actually paying the hospitals. Id. at *13. The Court rejected this argument, finding that trying to cure a deficiency by offering allegations in briefing as opposed to making allegations in the complaint was not an acceptable way to oppose a motion to dismiss. Id. at *13-14. The Court also dismissed Plaintiffs' claims for injunctive relief, after they acknowledged that the only relief sought pertained to enforcing a favorable judgment, so as to ensure the recovery of monies that the plans paid to Defendant as a result of the misappropriation. Id. at *19-20. Because the Court found that Plaintiffs could not pursue their restitution claims, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs lacked constitutional standing to assert claims for injunctive relief. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' complaint.

Pender, et al. v. Bank Of America Corp.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 9512 (4th Cir. June 8, 2015). In this ERISA class action arising out of a transfer of $3 billion in assets from a pension plan that enjoyed a separate account feature to a pension plan that lacked one, allegedly resulting in decreased accrued benefits, the Fourth Circuit reversed the District Court's grant of summary judgment to Defendant on the basis that Plaintiffs did have standing to sue. Defendant amended its defined-contribution plan (the "Plan") to give eligible participants a one-time opportunity to transfer their account balances to its defined benefit plan (the "Pension Plan") and guaranteed that participants who elected to transfer would receive, at a minimum, the value of the original balance of their accounts. Id. at *2-3. While Plan participants' accounts reflected the actual gains and losses of their investment elections, the Pension Plan participants' accounts reflected only the hypothetical gains and losses of their investment options. Id. at *3. By design, the Pension Plan participants' selected investment options had no bearing on how Defendant actually invested the Pension Plan's assets because Defendant chose how the assets were invested, periodically crediting each Pension Plan participant's account with the greater of the hypothetical performance of the participant's selected investment option or the value of the original balance of their Plan accounts. Id. An IRS audit in 2005 determined that these transfers impermissibly eliminated the Plan participants' separate account feature, meaning that participants were no longer being credited with the actual gains and losses generated by funds contributed on the participants' behalf. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs sued and sought disgorgement of any gains that Defendant obtained by these arrangements. The District Court ruled for Bank of America on this claim, finding that the bank's closing agreement with the Internal Revenue Service and subsequent action to restore the separate account feature deprived the workers of standing to assert this claim. Plaintiffs argued that § 502(a)(1)(B) of the ERISA allowed recovery, and in the alternative, argued that §§ 502(a)(2) and 502(a)(3) also entitled them to relief. Because Plaintiffs' requested remedy would require the District Court to do more than simply enforce a contract that was written, the Fourth Circuit found that § 502(a)(1)(b) provided no avenue for relief. The Fourth Circuit further determined that § 502(a)(2) also provided no avenue for relief because Defendant did not exercise discretion regarding the transfers, and the transfers occurred only for those plan participants who affirmatively and voluntarily directed Defendant to take such action. Id. at *14. The Fourth Circuit, however, ruled that Plaintiffs could proceed with their claim under § 502(a)(3). Because the transfers at issue resulted in a loss of the separate account feature, thereby violating § 204(g)(1), and because Plaintiffs sought profits generated using assets that belonged to them, and the other sub-sections of § 502(a) did not afford Plaintiffs any relief, the Fourth Circuit reasoned that Plaintiffs had standing to sue. Id. at *19.

Taveras, et al. v. UBS AG,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 7300 (2d Cir. April 30, 2015). In this putative class action brought by a participant in Defendants' UBS Savings and Investment Plan (the "SIP") alleging violations of fiduciary duties under the ERISA, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's order granting Defendants' motion to dismiss, finding that Plaintiff lacked standing to sue. Under the terms of the SIP, participants voluntarily contributed and directed the SIP to purchase investments with those contributions from options pre-selected by the SIP Committee, including investments in the UBS Stock Fund. From late 2007 through the end of 2008, UBS sustained substantial losses and as a result the price of UBS Stock declined sharply. Plaintiff, a former UBS employee and a participant in the SIP, alleged that Defendants breached their duties to the SIP when they failed to eliminate the UBS Stock Fund at the time of financial crisis after a 69% drop. The Second Circuit found that while Plaintiff attempted to demonstrate injury-in-fact by showing diminution in the value of SIP's assets generally, it was possible that the SIP lost value while Plaintiff's individual account did not. Id. The Second Circuit concluded that even if Plaintiff's account lost value after she purchased shares of the UBS Stock Fund, Plaintiff's amended complaint did not allege any facts connecting her purported losses to the fiduciaries' alleged breaches. Id. at *3-4. Thus, the Second Circuit ruled that Plaintiff's failure to allege individualized harm went directly to constitutional standing and was fatal to Plaintiff's amended complaint. Id. at *4. Accordingly, the Second Circuit affirmed the judgment of the District Court.

(vii) Cash Balance Plan Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Osberg, et al. v. Foot Locker, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 132054 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 29, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the ERISA by hiding aspects of a pension plan change that resulted in an unexpected decrease in retirement benefits. Plaintiffs sought reformation of their pension plan to conform to the benefits that they understood that Defendant had promised them, including benefits that continued to grow with additional service to the company. Id. at *2. The Court ruled in Plaintiffs' favor, finding that numerous aspects of Defendant's cash balance plan conversion violated the ERISA and that Defendant failed adequately to tell employees about a freeze in benefits. The Court found that Plaintiffs showed by a preponderance of the evidence that Defendant, acting as the plan administrator, violated § 404(a) and § 102 by providing participants materially false, misleading, and incomplete descriptions of the amended plan and that Plaintiffs were entitled to reformation. Id. at *94. The Court further noted that Defendant knew that virtually every participant's pension earnings effectively would be frozen for a period of time as a result of the wear-away effect inherent to the plan, which was not the result of an unexpected change in economic conditions. Having knowingly created a pension plan that mathematically locked in a wear-away of the benefits, Defendant had a duty to disclose and explain the effect in a manner calculated to be understood by the average plan participant. Id. at *95. Numerous plan participants testified that they did not understand or realize what was actually occurring when the plan converted from a defined benefit plan to a cash balance plan; hence, they did not understand that their retirement benefits would not grow despite providing additional service to the company, and in fact they believed that their accrued benefits under the prior plan was the foundation for an ever-growing retirement pay-out. Id. at *98. The Court determined that the commonly available documents created a class-wide misrepresentation and that individualized communications with participants did nothing to disabuse participants of the idea that their benefits were growing with their time of service. The Court, therefore, had no doubt that Defendant engaged in equitable fraud because it sought and obtained cost savings by altering Plaintiffs' plan without disclosing the full extent or impact of those changes. Id. at *102. The Court further held that Plaintiffs proved by clear and convincing evidence that Defendant engaged in inequitable conduct regarding the amendment and conversion of its cash balance plan. Id. at *105. Accordingly, the Court found in favor of the class on all claims and ordered reformation of the plan.

(viii) Statute Of Limitations Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Defazio, et al. v. Hollister Employee Share Ownership Trust,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 8048 (9th Cir. May 15, 2015). In this class action brought by a group of former participants in the Hollister Employee Share Ownership Trust (the "Plan"), alleging that the Plan, Hollister, Inc., Hollister's parent company (John Dickinson Schneider, Inc. ("JDS"), and various Plan fiduciaries violated their rights under the ERISA, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's judgment for the Defendants. Plaintiffs appealed the District Court's judgment in Defendants' favor following multiple pre-trial motions and a bench trial. The Ninth Circuit found that Plaintiffs lacked standing to pursue relief related to a 1999 transaction in which JDS' preferred shares were transferred to a trust rather than distributed to Hollister employees. Id. at *3. The Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's grant of summary judgment, finding that Plaintiffs' claim was speculative and lacked evidentiary support to satisfy traceability and redressability. Id. The Ninth Circuit also noted that the District Court had dismissed Plaintiffs' pre-1993 share repurchase claims on the basis of the ERISA statute of limitations under 29 U.S.C. § 1113. Id. at *4. The Ninth Circuit remarked that it need not parse the active/passive distinction for the "fraud or concealment" exception to the statute of limitations because: (i) Plaintiffs had abandoned their claim for monetary damages; and (ii) the District Court determined that if the finding that Plaintiffs' claims – based on Defendants' conduct from 1982 to 1992 – was reversed for any reason, the remainder of the District Court's analysis of Plaintiffs' post-1992 claims would apply equally to their time-barred claims. Id. at *4-5. To the extent that Plaintiffs argued that passive concealment had tolled the ERISA's statute of limitations with respect to the 1978, 1980, and 1984 amendments to the JDS articles of incorporation, the Ninth Circuit rejected that argument because, as the District Court noted, all the amendments to the articles of incorporation were duly filed with the Illinois Secretary of State. Id. at *6. Thus, the Ninth Circuit held that even if passive concealment might toll the ERISA's statute of limitations, the record would not support a claim of passive concealment here. Id. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's judgment for Defendants. Id. at *7-8.

Gordon, et al. v. Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Co.,* Case No. 13-CV-30184 (D. Mass. Mar. 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, current and former MassMutual Thrift Plan ("Plan") participants, brought a class action alleging that the fiduciaries of the Plan breached their duty of prudence. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss based on the statute of limitations. Just before the motion was heard, the Supreme Court granted certiorari in Tibble v. Edison International, 729 F.3d 1110 (9th Cir. 2013), a case in which the Ninth Circuit had found similar claims barred by the ERISA's six-year statute of limitations for breach of fiduciary duty. Id. at *2. The Supreme Court granted certiorari on the issue of whether a claim that the ERISA plan fiduciaries breached their duty of prudence by offering higher cost retail class mutual funds to plan participants, even though identical lower-cost institutional-class mutual funds were available, was barred by the ERISA's statute of limitations in 29 U.S.C. § 1113(1) given that the fiduciaries initially chose the higher-cost mutual funds as plan investments more than six years before the claim was filed. Id. The District Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss and ordered the case stayed pending the issuance of the Supreme Court's decision. Id. at *3. The District Court noted that the Supreme Court's decision in Tibble undoubtedly would affect its analysis of the parties' core arguments. Id. Accordingly, the District Court denied Defendants' motion without prejudice and directed Defendants to renew their motion after issuance of the Tibble ruling. Id. at *3.

In Re Citigroup ERISA Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63460 (S.D.N.Y. May 13, 2015). In this class action brought by the participants of the Citigroup 401(k) Plan (the "Citigroup Plan") and the Citibuilder 401(k) Plan for Puerto Rico (the "Citibuilder Plan") alleging breaches of fiduciary duties under the ERISA to recover from Defendants for losses suffered due to the drop in price of Citigroup stock during the sub-prime mortgage crisis of 2008, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss. The Plans, which were defined contribution or individual account plans, offered participants a variety of investment options, including the Citigroup Common Stock Fund. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants violated their fiduciary duties of prudence and loyalty under the ERISA by allowing the Plans to continue to hold and purchase Citigroup stock despite abundant public information regarding Citigroup's allegedly precarious condition and the riskiness of the Citigroup stock. The Court dismissed the claims as untimely, as they were barred by the ERISA statute of limitations, which is either: (i) six years after the breach or violation; or (ii) three years after Plaintiff had actual knowledge of the breach. Id. at *24. The Court noted that the vast majority of events that Plaintiffs described in the complaint occurred well before December 8, 2008, and on December 8, 2011, the first complaint alleging a class period beginning January 16, 2008 was filed in this action, and on July 30, 2014, the current complaint was filed alleging five counts of breach of fiduciary duty. The Court concluded that Plaintiff's claims were untimely, because Plaintiffs had actual knowledge, and reasoned that the events leading to Citigroup's position in January 2008 were "very public red flags" and "widely publicized," as were events that caused Citigroup's stock price to decline further in 2008. Id. at *26. To the extent Plaintiffs claimed that they were not aware of all of the publicized information alleged in the complaint regarding Citigroup's decline prior to December 2008, the Court remarked that the Congress did not intend the actual knowledge requirement to excuse "willful blindness" by a Plaintiff. Id. at *27. The Court noted that Plaintiffs sought to bring claims under the Plans, but no named Plaintiff in this action had standing under the Citibuilder Plan because no named Plaintiff was a participant in the Citibuilder Plan. The Court observed that § 502(a)(3) of the ERISA provides that a civil action may be brought by a participant, beneficiary, or fiduciary. Id. at *32. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs could not assert claims for breach of fiduciary duties related to the Citibuilder Plan. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant fiduciaries knew or should have known that Citigroup was heavily invested in sub-prime mortgages and that Citigroup stock was an imprudent investment as a result. However, because Plaintiffs failed to identify any special circumstances rendering reliance on the market price of the stock imprudent, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' duty of prudence claim based on publicly available information must be dismissed. Id. at *42. Similarly, Defendants sought dismissal of Plaintiffs' claims that Defendant fiduciaries failed to act prudently in response to non-public information, and argued that Plaintiffs did not sufficiently allege that there was any material, non-public information available to the Defendants. In arguing that Defendants could have disclosed the non-public information without harming the Plan participants, Plaintiffs alleged that it was hard to fathom that disclosure of the adverse non-public information alleged would have caused Citigroup stock to move palpably, especially in light of all of the negative public information about Citigroup. Id. at *44. The Court found that this allegation highlighted the immateriality of any purported non-public information that the Defendants could have disclosed. As a result, the Court also dismissed the non-disclosure claim.

Jammal, et al. v. American Family Insurance Group,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52200 (N.D. Ohio April 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of insurance sales agents, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors and thereby denied them benefits under an ERISA-governed plan. In count one, Plaintiffs sought a declaratory judgment that Plaintiffs were employees for all purposes. In count two, Plaintiffs sought injunctive relief prohibiting Defendant from continuing to misclassify its agents and independent contractors. Id. at *4. In counts three and four, Plaintiffs sought payments under the Termination Benefit Plan in accordance with the ERISA requirements, and restitution, contract reformation, and actual damages for Defendant's alleged breach of fiduciary duty. Id. at *5. In counts five and six, Plaintiffs sought damages and injunctive relief based on Defendant's failure to provide Plaintiffs with health and welfare benefits offered to other employees. Id. Defendant moved for summary judgment. The Court granted it in part and denied it in part. Defendant argued that the statute of limitations barred Plaintiffs' claims because the limitations period for all counts began to run on the date each agent signed his or her agency agreement. Id. at *11. Plaintiffs argued that the triggering event was when it became clear that Defendant would be permanently treating them as employees rather than independent contractors and that the statute of limitations should be indefinitely tolled because Defendant represented to the IRS that its sales agents were independent contractors. Id. at *12. Because the ERISA benefit claims arguably accrue only when an employee becomes eligible for but fails to receive benefits, the Court concluded that signing the agency agreement did not start the running of the statute of limitations. Id. at *14-17. According to the Court, Plaintiffs were not entitled to benefits unless and until Defendant treated them as employees, and, therefore, their claims did not accrue until sometime after Defendant treated them as employees. Id. at *17. Because the Court lacked sufficient information to determine the exact triggering date for the running of the applicable statute of limitations, the Court determined that the applicable statute of limitations on all counts, except count four, was six years after the termination date of each individual agent, and that Plaintiffs, having separated from Defendant within six years of filing suit, survived summary judgment. Id. at *21-22. As to count four, the Court noted that the statute of limitations was three years from the time each agent was terminated because Plaintiffs had knowledge of actual level of control being exerted over them and knowledge that they did not receive termination benefits under the ERISA. Id. at *22. All Plaintiffs except Plaintiff Tuersley separated from Defendant within the three-year limitations period. Id. at *22-23. The Court, therefore, concluded that Plaintiff Tuersley's claim was barred by the statute of limitations. Id. at *23. Further, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgement on the issue of whether Plaintiffs were employees or independent contractors and noted that there remained a question of material fact as to the amount of control Defendant exerted over Plaintiffs as well as the degree to which Plaintiffs economically depended upon Defendant's business. Id. at *36. According to Plaintiffs, Defendant reserved the right to exercise complete control over every important aspect of Plaintiffs' business, despite classifying them as independent contractors, and evidence of control included maintaining ownership over their books of business, requiring them to sell only Defendant's insurance, requiring them to follow Defendant's policies and procedures, controlling their day-to-day operations, and controlling their hiring and firing. Id. at *34-35. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment in part and denied it in part.

Tibble, et al. v. Edison International,* 135 S. Ct. 1823 (2015). In this class action brought by several beneficiaries of the Edison 401(k) Savings Plan (the "Plan") seeking to recover damages for alleged losses suffered by the Plan due to Defendants' breaches of fiduciary duties with respect to three mutual funds added to the Plan in 1999 and 2002, the U.S. Supreme Court found that the Ninth Circuit erred by applying the ERISA's six-year statute of limitations to bar the claim. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded to the Ninth Circuit to consider the beneficiaries' claims that the plan fiduciaries breached their duties within the relevant 6-year period under 29 U.S.C. § 1113, recognizing the importance of analogous trust law. The Plan was a defined contribution plan, and Plaintiffs filed this action in 2007 contending that Defendants acted imprudently by offering six higher priced retail-class mutual funds as Plan investments when materially identical lower priced institutional-class mutual funds were available. Id. at 1825. Specifically, Plaintiffs claimed that a large institutional investor with billions of dollars, like the Plan, could have obtained materially identical, lower priced institutional-class mutual funds that were not available to retail investors. Id. As to the three funds added to the Plan in 2002, the District Court agreed, and ruled that Defendants failed to offer any credible explanation for offering higher priced mutual funds, and as to the 1999 funds, it found that Plaintiffs' claim was untimely. Id. The Ninth Circuit affirmed. As to the 1999 funds, it relied on 29 U.S.C. § 1113 in holding that Plaintiffs' claims were untimely because the funds were added more than six years before the complaint was filed in 2007, and Plaintiff had not established a change in circumstances that might trigger an obligation to review and change investments within the 6-year statutory period. On further appeal, the Supreme Court noted that § 1113 provides that no action may be brought as to breach of any fiduciary duty after six years after the (i) the last breach or violation; and (ii) in the case of an omission, the latest date on which the fiduciary could have cured the breach. Id. at 1826. The Supreme Court found that the Ninth Circuit erred by applying a statutory bar without considering the nature of the fiduciary duty. Id. at 1827. The Supreme Court remarked that the Ninth Circuit failed to recognize that under trust law, a fiduciary is required to conduct a regular review of its investments, with the nature and timing of the review contingent on the circumstances. Id. at 1827-28. The Supreme Court opined that an ERISA fiduciary must discharge his responsibility with the case, skill, prudence, and diligence that a prudent person acting in a like capacity and familiar with such matters would use. Id. at 1828. The Supreme Court further remarked that under trust law, a trustee has a continuing duty to monitor trust investments and remove imprudent ones, and that the continuing duty exists separate and apart from the trustee's duty to exercise prudence in selecting investments at the outset. Id. In addition, the Supreme Court noted that the Uniform Prudent Investor Act confirms that "managing embraces monitoring," and that a trustee has a "continuing responsibility for oversight of the suitability of the investments already made." Id. Accordingly, the Supreme Court concluded that the Ninth Circuit erred in applying the statute of limitations in 29 U.S.C. § 1113, and it reversed and remanded the action.

(ix) ERISA Stock Drop Class Actions

Murray, et al. v. Invacare Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114657 (N.D. Ohio Aug. 28, 2015). Plaintiff, a participant and beneficiary of Defendant Invacare Corp.'s Retirement Savings Plan (the "Plan") brought suit alleging that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties of prudence and loyalty under the ERISA by allowing Plan participants to acquire more shares of Defendants' company stock at a time when Defendants knew that the company stock was an imprudent investment. Id. at *2. Plaintiff alleged that, although Defendants had a long history of non-compliance with regulations of the U.S. Food and Drug Administration ("FDA"), various FDA warning forms and letters caused company stock to drop significantly, and Defendants allowed their employees to continue investing in Defendants' own stock under its Plan. Defendants moved to dismiss, contending that Plaintiff failed to meet the pleading requirements established by the U.S. Supreme Court in Fifth Third Bancorp v. Dudenhoeffer, 134 S. Ct. 2459 (2014), that Plaintiff failed to adequately plead loss causation, and that Plaintiff's monitoring and co-fiduciary breach claims were derivative of her defective prudence and loyalty claims. Id. at *12-13. The Court denied Defendants' motion. The Court noted that to state a claim for breach of the duty of prudence on the basis of inside information under Dudenhoeffer, Plaintiff plausibly must allege an alternative action that Defendant could have taken that a prudent fiduciary in the same circumstances would not have viewed as more likely to harm the fund than to help it. Id. at *14. The Court recognized that ERISA fiduciaries often face legitimate competing interests that force them to make difficult decisions in situations of uncertainty regarding their legal authority to act on inside information under federal securities laws. The Court observed that, in this case, Plaintiff alleged facts that, if true, showed that Defendants knew that they were not complying with FDA safety and compliance standards applicable to the company's most important products. Plaintiff alleged that the continued deficiencies likely would result in harsh penalties to the company, including cessation of production, all of which materially would impact the financial performance of the company and harm all shareholders, including participants of Defendants' Plan who held shares of the company. The Court found that Plaintiffs' allegations showed that a prudent fiduciary armed with such inside information would have known that Defendants' stock artificially was inflated during the time that the market was unaware of the true nature and extent of the FDA compliance problems and that a significant fall was inevitable. The Court recognized that "closing the stock fund" was a fairly extreme action with significant consequences but that Plaintiff sufficiently had pled facts alleging that a prudent fiduciary could have concluded that closing the stock would not cause more harm than good. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff met her pleading burden by sufficiently supporting her claim that Defendants breached their duties of prudence and loyalty with respect to their management of the Plan's investment in Defendants' stock. Id. The Court also held that Plaintiff sufficiently alleged loss causation under Dura Pharmaceuticals, Inc. v. Broudo, 554 U.S. 336 (2005), to sustain the imprudent investment claim. Id. at *24. Finally, the Court declined to dismiss the failure to monitor and knowing participation claims because those claims were not derivative of defective breach of duty of prudence and loyalty claims. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

(x) Equitable Defenses In ERISA Class Actions

Operating Engineers Local 324 Health Care Plan, et al. v. G&W Construction Co.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 6420 (6th Cir. April 20, 2015). In this action brought by nine multi-employer pension and welfare fringe benefit trust funds (the "Funds") seeking to recover delinquent fringe-benefit payments from Defendants G&W Construction Co. ("G&W") and its president, the Sixth Circuit, on interlocutory appeal, affirmed in part and reversed in part the District Court's denial of the Funds' motion to strike Defendants' affirmative defenses and remanded the case. Defendants raised the affirmative defenses of laches, estoppel, and waiver, which the Funds moved to strike on the basis that § 515 of the ERISA bars equitable defenses. The Sixth Circuit noted that collective bargaining agreements that establish ERISA plans are interpreted using ordinary contract principles to the extent they are not inconsistent with federal labor policy. The Sixth Circuit reasoned that § 515 protects and streamlines the procedure for collecting delinquent contributions owed to ERISA plans by limiting "unrelated" and "extraneous" defenses. Id. at *8. The Sixth Circuit observed that once the employer knowingly signs an agreement that requires it to contribute to an employee benefit plan, it may not escape its obligation by raising defenses that call into question the Funds' ability to enforce the agreement. Id. at *12. The Sixth Circuit opined that few affirmative defenses were permitted, such as illegality of contributions, the contract requiring the contributions was void at its inception, and fraud. The Sixth Circuit observed that the affirmative defense of laches has two elements, including: (i) unreasonable delay in asserting one's rights, and (ii) a resulting prejudice to the defending party. Id. at *13. In Petrella v. MGM, Inc., 134 S. Ct. 1962 (2014), the U.S. Supreme Court held that where the Congress has established a statute of limitations, laches may not be invoked to bar damages if the action was brought within the limitations period. Id. Although the ERISA does not provide a statute of limitations for delinquent contribution actions, the Sixth Circuit noted that the limitations period for the state cause of action that is most analogous to the ERISA claim should be applied. Id. In this case, the Sixth Circuit applied Michigan's six-year statute of limitations for contract actions. Id. The Sixth Circuit noted that the Funds brought suit within the six-year statute of limitations. Id. The Sixth Circuit ruled that the reasoning in Petrella and other such cases counseled that laches is not a valid defense in suits brought under § 515 of the ERISA within the applicable statute of limitations, and therefore the motion to strike the affirmative defense should have been granted. Id. at *17. As to equitable estoppel, the Sixth Circuit noted that it requires a representation, to a party without knowledge of the facts and without the means to ascertain them, upon which the party asserting estoppel justifiably relies in good faith to his detriment. Id. at *19. From the facts alleged, the Sixth Circuit found that equitable estoppel would not constitute a valid defense to the Funds' collection action, whether based on conduct of the union or the Funds. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit concluded that the District Court should have granted the Funds' motion to strike the equitable estoppel defense. Id. The Sixth Circuit, however, refused to rule on the waiver defense because the Funds failed to offer a developed argument on that theory.

(xi) Arbitration Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Aetna Health Of California, Inc. v. Ortiz, et al.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171624 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 22. 2015). In this class action, Plaintiff, a plan participant, claimed that the welfare plan's cap on autism treatment violated the ERISA and the California Mental Health Parity Act. Defendant moved to compel arbitration, citing an arbitration agreement previously signed by Plaintiff. The Court held that the claim was arbitrable under the Federal Arbitration Act, and thus granted the motion to compel arbitration. The Court reasoned that arbitration was proper as Plaintiff was not challenging the denial of benefits under the plan, but rather the permissibility of the plan's inclusion of a benefits cap which allegedly violated the ERISA and California law. The Court reasoned that "the duty to enforce arbitration agreements is not diminished when a party bound by an agreement raises a claim found on statutory rights." Id. at *11. As a result, the Court granted Defendant's motion.

Mercadante, et al. v. Xe Services, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4845 (D.D.C. Jan. 15, 2015). In this ERISA action alleging that Plaintiffs were misclassified as independent contractors and denied various employment benefits, the District Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs served as security contractors in Iraq or Afghanistan and each signed an Independent Contractor Service Agreement ("ICSA") with Blackwater Security Consulting, LLC, and BlackwaterWorldwide Trust, Health and Welfare Plan and Trustees (collectively "Blackwater"), which included an arbitration clause. Id. at *4-5. The arbitration provision in each Plaintiff's ICSA stated that any dispute regarding interpretation or enforcement of any of the parties' rights or obligations under the agreement would be resolved by binding arbitration according to the rules of the American Arbitration Association. Id. at *15. The Court noted that the AAA Employment Arbitration Rules and Mediation Procedures, in turn, provide for the arbitrator to rule on questions of arbitrability, and observed that numerous other federal circuits had concluded that incorporation of the AAA rules constitutes clear and unmistakable evidence that the parties intended the question of arbitrability be adjudicated by an arbitrator. Id. at *15. Thus, the Court opined that the parties had clearly and unmistakably submitted questions of arbitrability to an arbitrator. Id. at *17. The Court also observed that if a party challenges the validity of a delegation agreement, the Court must consider the challenge before ordering compliance, and that the challenge must be directed specifically at the delegation agreement and not at another provision of the contract, or to the contract as a whole. Id. at *18-19. Plaintiffs argued they were misled to believe that the ICSA concerned only security matters, and they were not given an opportunity to read the agreements. Id. at *21. However, in their fraud argument, Plaintiffs only mentioned the arbitration agreement once and never referenced the delegation provision. Id. at *23. Because Plaintiffs' arguments as to fraud did not go to the validity of the delegation provision, the Court opined that it was valid and must be enforced, leaving any challenge to the validity of the agreement as a whole to be decided by the arbitrator. Id. Plaintiffs also argued that the detrimental economic impact of refusing to sign the agreement caused them to sign under duress. Id. Once again, the Court noted that this argument did not target the delegation agreement, and was directed at the signing of the ICSA overall, thereby making the delegation provision valid. Id. at *25. Further, Plaintiffs asserted that they mistakenly believed that the agreement was not an arbitration document, but instead had to do with general matters related to Blackwater not being liable due to sending workers into a war zone. Id. at *25-26. The Court observed that to afford relief, the mistake must be of a certain nature, and the fact about which the parties are mistaken must be an existing or past fact, and that the mistaken fact also must be material. Id. at *26. The Court opined that the mistake on which Plaintiffs relied (regarding the nature of the contract and its contents) was not a mistake about an existing or past fact that could satisfy this standard. Id. at *27. Finally, Plaintiffs argued that the shifting of attorneys' fees and expenses from Defendants to Plaintiffs made the agreement substantially unconscionable. Id. at *30. Citing Torrence v. Nationwide Budget Finance, 753 S.E.2d 812 (N.C. App. 2014), which held that high arbitration costs could no longer be a basis for substantive unconscionability, the Court determined that the shifting of arbitration costs to Plaintiffs did not constitute substantive unconscionability. Id. at *36. Thus, because none of the contract defenses that Plaintiffs presented invalidated the arbitration delegation agreements in their respective ICSAs, the arbitration delegation provision was valid, and all questions of arbitrability had to be decided by an arbitrator in the first instance, including any challenge to the validity of the Agreement as a whole, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration. Id. at *37.

Shy, et al. v. Navistar International Corp.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 4974 (6th Cir. Mar. 27, 2015).
Plaintiffs, a group of retirees, brought an action seeking retirement benefits from Defendant. The parties reached a settlement and, pursuant to a formula set forth in the consent decree, Defendant made annual contributions to a Supplemental Benefit Trust managed by a Supplemental Benefits Committee ("SBC"). Id. at *2. In the event that the SBC disputed the information or calculations, the agreement provided for arbitration before an accounting firm to evaluate whether Defendant applied the formula correctly. Id. In 2009, the SBC sent Defendant letters requesting additional information and disputing Defendant's classification of Medicare Part D subsidies in its calculations of its profits sharing obligations. Id. at *5. When SBC was not satisfied with the responses, it intervened in the litigation and filed a motion to enforce the settlement agreement. Id. at *6. Defendant moved to dismiss on the ground that the questions SBC raised were subject to arbitration. The District Court denied the motion. The District Court found that the claims in SBC's amended complaint were subject to arbitration, but that Defendant had waived its right to demand arbitration through its behavior, including waiting until the District Court granted the SBC's motion to intervene before demanding arbitration. Id. at *9. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit reversed. The Sixth Circuit explained that the SBC's claim, at its core, was that Defendant misclassified various aspects of its business, resulting in incorrect information being provided to the SBC, and, therefore, the claim fell within the scope of the arbitration agreement. Id. at *10. The Sixth Circuit found that the arbitration agreement applied when the SBC disputed information or calculations provided by Defendant and was not limited by its terms to disputes over the calculations. Id. at *17. Thus, the Sixth Circuit concluded that, if the SBC disputed Defendant's classification, it was disputing the information Defendant provided, and its dispute was subject to arbitration. Id. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit concluded that SBC's claims should be arbitrated. Id. at *17-18. In addition, the Sixth Circuit found that Defendant's pre-litigation conduct and failure to raise arbitration in its response to the SBC's motion to arbitrate did not constitute a waiver of its right to arbitrate. Id. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit vacated the District Court's order, remanded the action, and directed the District Court to order arbitration. Id. at *27.

(xii) Vesting Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Fulghum, et al. v. Embarq Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 76141 (D. Kan. June 10, 2015). In this class action alleging that Defendants eliminated retirees' medical and life insurance in violation of the ERISA, the District Court granted Defendants' motions for summary judgment, finding that the language in the relevant documents did not give them a vested right to lifetime benefits. Id. at *144. Seventeen named Plaintiffs asserted that the summary plan descriptions ("SPDs") in effect when they retired gave them vested health and life insurance benefits and Defendants' modification or elimination of those benefits violated the ERISA. Id. at *145. In February 2013, the District Court granted Defendants' motion for summary judgment with regard to 15 of 17 Plaintiffs and as to all of the class members as to whom Defendants sought summary judgment. As to the claims of the remaining two named Plaintiffs, James Britt and Donald Clark, the District Court found that issues of fact precluded summary judgment. Upon appeal, the Tenth Circuit reversed in part, by reviving contractual vesting claims. The Tenth Circuit found that it was error to grant summary judgment in full as to the class members who potentially had a claim for vested benefits based on SPDs that were not before the District Court. Id. While Defendants contended that none of the class members could establish a contractual vesting claim, Plaintiffs asserted that language in the relevant documents promised lifetime benefits to the retiree class members. Id. at *149-50. On remand, the District Court reviewed the relevant documents at issue, particularly 70 SPDs, and ruled that none of them contained language promising lifetime benefits. Id. at *156-162. The District Court noted that several SPDs contained broad reservations of rights ("ROR") clauses allowing Defendants to terminate the plan for any reason, and none of the SPDs clearly and expressly stated that health benefits were vested. Id. at *159. Further, all of the SPDs contained termination provisions, which indicated that Defendants did not promise lifetime benefits. The District Court thus held that language of the SPDs and the inclusion of the broad ROR provision could not reasonably be interpreted as a promise of lifetime benefits. Id. at *159-60. Plaintiffs contended that certain collective bargaining agreements ("CBAs") defined their benefits, and the CBAs were the controlling documents. The District Court, however, noted that the CBAs were only relevant if a particular SPD specifically referenced a CBA, and Plaintiffs failed to direct the Court to any particular CBA linked to a particular SPD. Id. at *164. In Clark's case, the SPD referenced a CBA, which the District Court considered, and found that the CBA expressly stated that insurance benefits would be provided through the term of the agreement, which expired in 1977. Agreeing with several other case law authorities that addressed the effect of CBA language specifying the duration of medical or life insurance benefits, the District Court held that CBA language providing durational limits was not indicative of lifetime benefits. Id. at *198. The District Court thus concluded that Plaintiffs' interpretation of the plan language in both the SPDs and the CBA would override explicit terms establishing that the benefits were durational and could be terminated. Id. at *207. Accordingly, the District Court granted Defendants' motion for summary judgment and denied Plaintiffs' cross-motion for summary judgment.

(xiii) Preemption Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Calop Business Systems, Inc., et al. v. City Of Los Angeles*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 9168 (9th Cir. June 2, 2015). Plaintiff Calop Business Systems ("Calop") brought suit against the City of Los Angeles alleging that its Living Wage Ordinance ("LWO") was preempted by the ERISA, the Airline Deregulation Act, and the Railway Labor Act. The LWO requires contractors who operate at the City's airports to pay their employees $14.80 per hour, or $10.30 per hour if the contractor provides health benefits. Id. The City's Office of Contract Compliance found that Calop had violated the LWO when it paid its employees only $11.55 per hour with no health benefits. Id. at *1. Defendant moved for summary judgment. The District Court granted Defendant's motion. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed. First, Plaintiff's claims that the LWO was unconstitutionally vague were dismissed for lack of standing, as the Ninth Circuit concluded that Calop had not shown that the City ever attempted to enforce the supersession provision against it, and therefore could not show that it suffered an injury as a result. In addition, the Ninth Circuit opined that the higher overtime rate that the LWO imposes on employers who do not pay health benefits did not confer standing on Calop because it was "fairly traceable" to the City's interpretation of the LWO's minimum wage term, not to any ambiguity in the minimum wage and supersession provisions. Id. at *2-3. The Ninth Circuit therefore concluded that Plaintiff had no standing to argue that the minimum wage and supersession terms were unconstitutionally vague. Second, the Ninth Circuit observed that the ERISA preempts any state law that has a connection with or a reference to an employee benefits plan. Id. at *3. In these circumstances, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the LWO does not have a "reference to" the ERISA plans merely because it takes into account what health benefits employers offer in calculating the cash wage that must be paid. Id. Further, the LWO's provisions requiring reports on employee compensation from employers did not create a "connection with" the ERISA plans because the provision imposes no obligations on plans themselves. Id. The Ninth Circuit reasoned that the LWO does not give rise to a "connection with" benefits plans merely by creating economic incentives to offer certain kinds of benefits, because it imposes no affirmative obligation on the plans. Id. at *4. Thus, the Ninth Circuit found that the LWO was not preempted by the ERISA.

Concerned Home Care Providers, Inc., et al. v. Cuomo*, 783 F.3d 77 (2d Cir. 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of licensed home care services agencies ("LHCSAs"), brought an action alleging that the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") and the ERISA preempted New York's Wage Parity Law and seeking to prevent Defendants from enforcing the law. Id. at 83. The LHCSAs employed two categories of home care providers, including: (i) home health aides ("HHAs"); and (ii) personal care aides ("PCAs"). The HHAs received a lower starting hourly wage than PCAs. Id. at 81. In 2011, New York enacted the Wage Parity Law, among other things, to bring parity in wages among the two types of aides. Id. Sub-division four of the Wage Parity Law allows unequal pay to the extent that compensation includes health benefits through payments to jointly administered labor-management funds (also known as a "Taft-Hartley" plan). Id. at 82-83. The District Court dismissed the action. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed, holding that the Wage Parity Law was not preempted. Id. at 81. The Second Circuit explained that, unlike the NLRA, the ERISA contains an express provision that preempts any and all state laws insofar as they relate to any employee benefit plan. Id. at 84. Plaintiffs contended that the Wage Parity Law has a connection with plans under the ERISA because employers would have to re-evaluate, and possibly enhance, their benefits packages in order to pay employees the applicable minimum rate of home care aides' total compensation. Id. 88-89. The Second Circuit noted that such an indirect effect on ERISA-based plans does not trigger preemption; instead, only statutes that mandate employee benefit structures or their administration have the necessary connection with ERISA-based plans to result in preemption. Id. at 89. The Second Circuit found that the Wage Parity Law gives employers freedom to select the manner in which they pay the minimum rate of home care aide total compensation. Id. Under the law, total compensation may consist of wages and other direct compensation paid on behalf of the employee, including health, education, or pension benefits, supplements in lieu of benefits, and compensated time off. Id. The Second Circuit reasoned that the statute is agnostic as to the mix of wages and benefits that employers provide, so long as the total amount equals or exceeds the applicable minimum rate. Id. The Second Circuit further noted that, in order to trigger preemption under the ERISA, a statute must not merely mention or allude to an ERISA-based plan, it also must have some relationship to an ERISA plan or affect an ERISA-based plan in some manner. Id. at 90. The Second Circuit found that the creation of ERISA plans by SEIU 1199's collective bargaining agreement had no more than a remote bearing on the Wage Parity Law's operation and that the employers were not required to match the benefits in SEIU 1199's collective bargaining agreement or to provide benefits at all. Id. Employers need not even calculate the benefits in SEIU 1199's plan; instead, the Wage Parity Law requires the Commissioner of the New York State Department of Health to calculate an hourly amount of total compensation and promulgate that rate to employers. Id. This calculation converts all of the benefits from SEIU 1199's collective bargaining agreement, including those contained in its ERISA plans, into a single hourly figure. Id. The Second Circuit held that the Wage Parity Law, therefore, functions irrespective of the existence of an ERISA plan and, accordingly, ruled that the ERISA does not preempt the Wage Parity Law. Id.

(xiv) Damages Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Tussey, et al. v. ABB, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 89068 (W.D. Mo. July 9, 2015). In this ERISA class action alleging breach of fiduciary duties in mapping plan investments from one mutual fund to another, the Court ruled in favor of Defendants. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs participated in the PRISM Plan, which was sponsored by Defendant ABB Inc. ("ABB") and managed by Defendant Pension Review Committee of ABB, Inc. ("PRC"). Id. at *7-8. The Plan paid Fidelity Trust, the trustee and record-keeper of the PRISM plan, through a combination of revenue sharing and hard dollar fees. Id. at *8. Pursuant to an investment policy statement ("IPS"), the PRISM Plan included one income fund and eight mutual funds as investment options, including the Vanguard Wellington Fund. Id. at *12. In 2000, ABB considered adding three lifestyle funds to the PRISM Plan, including Fidelity Freedom Funds. Id. at *14. Fidelity proposed that it would reduce record-keeping fees for both PRISM plans to zero if ABB mapped the assets in the Wellington fund to Fidelity's Freedom Funds. Id. at *15-16. At that time, the Wellington Fund had invested in both stocks and bonds, and its annual performance exceeded Morningstar's benchmark by 4%. Id. at *15. Nonetheless, the PRC removed the Wellington Fund, added Fidelity Freedom Funds, and "mapped" Wellington assets into the Freedom Funds. Id. at *16. The PRISM Plan subsequently sustained a loss because the Wellington Fund consistently outperformed the Freedom Funds after mapping. Id. at *25. The Court found that the Plan fiduciaries breached their duties in removing the Wellington Fund and mapping assets into the Fidelity Freedom Funds. Id. at *35. The Court further found that the fiduciaries knew this would result in increased revenues to Fidelity, which ultimately would benefit ABB. Id. at *20-21. Although the evidence was circumstantial, considering the circumstances as a whole, the Court determined that ABB's conflict of interest made the removal of the Wellington Fund and the mapping of its assets to the Fidelity Freedom Funds an abuse of discretion. Id. at *33. Nonetheless, the Court ruled for ABB, finding that Plaintiffs "failed to satisfy their burden of proof on the issue of damages." Id. at *38.

(xv) DOL And PBGC ERISA Enforcement Litigation

Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. v. The Renco Group, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27807 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 5, 2015). The Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation ("PBGC"), a U.S. government agency, brought suit against the Renco Group ("Renco") alleging reachback liability under the ERISA and New York common law. Id. at *1-2. The PBGC collects premiums from pension plan administrators and provides certain guarantees with respect to the benefits provided. Id. at *2. Renco, a subsidiary of RG Steel LLC, acquired a steel mill company, Severstel Sparrows Point LLC ("Sparrows"), which in turn owned steel mill companies, Severstal Warren LLC and Severstal Wheeling LLC. Id. at *5. RG Steel assumed responsibility for two pensions plan known as the Warren Pension Plan and the Wheeling Pension Plan. Id. at *6. RG Steel soon faced financial difficulties and, to overcome this, it reached an agreement with Cerberus Capital Partners, L.P. ("Cerberus"), wherein Cerberus provided two term loans to RG Steel totaling $125 million. In return, Cerberus received 24.5% equity and warrants to purchase another 24.5%. Id. at *6-8, 17. This influx of capital was insufficient, and RG Steel declared bankruptcy four months later in May 2012. Id. at *18. Throughout this period, PBGC was in contact regarding the status of financing efforts, and even before Cerberus agreed to provide financing, the PBGC had begun preparations to terminate the pension plans in order to mitigate its potential exposure. Id. at *13. The Court denied the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment. The Court noted that 29 U.S.C. § 1369(a) assigns reachback liability to companies or persons who evade pension obligations by selling ownership interests in order to reduce their ownership below 80% within five years before the termination date. Id. at *21. Here, it was undisputed that the two pension plans were terminated less than five years after the effective date of the Renco-Cerberus transaction, as the transaction closed on January 17, 2012, and the plans were terminated in November 2012, with an effective date of August 31, 2012. Id. at *21-22. Accordingly, the Court found that the question was whether Renco entered into the Cerberus transaction with a principal purpose to evade liability by removing itself from RG Steel's controlled group by reducing its ownership. Id. at *22. The Court noted that the plan language of § 1329, which imposes liability if evasion was a principal purpose of a transaction, allows for the fact that a transaction may have more than one principal purpose, such that reachback liability applies if any of the purposes of a party entering a transaction was to evade its pension obligations. Id. at *22-23. The Court concluded that disputed issues of fact precluded summary judgment for either of the parties. Id. at *24. The Court explained that it was undisputed that RG Steel was in dire need of capital, so one of the key purposes of Renco seeking financing was to improve its financial position. Id. Plaintiff introduced facts from which a reasonable fact-finder could conclude that Renco structured the transaction specifically to reduce its ownership stake below 80% to avoid pension liability. Id. The Court, however, was unable to conclude as a matter of law at the summary judgment stage that evasion was a principal purpose of the deal. Id. at *26. Accordingly, the Court denied summary judgment on the PBGC's reachback liability claim. Id. at *27. Regarding the common law claims, the Court also found that disputed facts precluded summary judgment in favor of either party. Specifically, the Court noted that the disputed facts made it impossible to decide whether Renco made a material misrepresentation with scienter, whether PBGC justifiably relied on the material misrepresentation, and whether PBGC's reliance actually caused its injury. Id. at *28. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment. Id. at *33.

Perez, et al. v. California Pacific Bank*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 94180 (N.D. Cal. July 20, 2015). In this ERISA enforcement action brought by the Secretary of Labor ("DOL") alleging that the fiduciaries of the California Pacific Bank Employee Stock Ownership Plan (the "Plan") mismanaged the Plan's assets, the Court denied Defendants' motion for summary judgment and granted summary judgment in part to the DOL. Id. at *2. The Plan was terminated three years before the action was initiated while the California Pacific Bank (the "Bank") was under investigation by the DOL. Id. The Bank was both a named fiduciary and the Plan Sponsor, but the "real targets" were four individual fiduciaries of the Plan who were also members of the Bank's Board of Directors. Id. at *2. The DOL alleged four ways in which the fiduciaries mismanaged the Plan assets causing over $1.39 million in harm, including: (i) after deciding to terminate the Plan, the fiduciaries failed to liquidate and distribute Plan shares as cash in accordance with the Plan document; (ii) upon receiving payment on a $132,506 account receivable owned to the Plan, the fiduciaries diverted a significant portion to the Bank, which had no claim to this Plan asset; (iii) in 2012, the fiduciaries transferred approximately $69,746 of Plan assets to the Bank despite the fact that the Bank had no claim to such assets; and (iv) between 2007 and 2011, the fiduciaries held Plan assets in cash in various non-interest bearing accounts owned by the Bank. Id. at *3. Defendants sought summary judgment on Count I, arguing that the Plan did not require distributions to be made only in cash upon termination. Id. at *11. Defendants pointed to other parts of the Plan that permitted distributions to be made in cash or stock. Id. The Court, however, observed that the express provision entitled "Termination of Plan" stated that payment to each affected participant would be made in cash. Id. The Court thus held that Defendants violated § 404(a)(1)(D) of the ERISA by failing to act in accordance with the documents and instruments governing the Plan, and granted judgment as a matter of law for the DOL on that issue. Id. On Count II, the Court noted that although the parties agreed that the Plan had a $132,506 receivable at some point and that the Bank ultimately received $81,407.18 of this amount, they disagreed on whether this $81,407.18 was a Plan asset. Id. at *16-17. Three individual Defendants passed a resolution to demand payment of book value interest. Id. at *17. The resolution stated that the undersigned Trustees had a right to demand payment of the $132,506 book value of the Plan's membership interest in Seclusion Alcalde, LLC from Seclusion Alcalde Management, LLC ("SAM") pursuant to that certain Asset Purchase and Sale Agreement entered into between the Plan and SAM (the "Agreement") and resolved that, prior to the termination of the Plan, the Plan exercised its right under the Agreement to receive payment of the $132,506 from SAM. Id. at *17-18. The Defendants submitted no evidence relating to the purported repurchase by the Bank of the unallocated stock collateralizing the loans, or any agreement between the Bank and the Plan relating to whether that repurchase would encompass any dividends associated with that stock. Id. at *19-20. Further, Defendants' resolution failed to mention that part of the $132,506 might in fact properly belong to the Bank and not the Plan because of repurchases by the Bank of unallocated stock held by the Plan. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court opined that Defendants diverted to the Bank $81,407.18 of the $132,506 accounts receivable that belonged to the Plan, and thus violated §§ 403, 404 and 406 of the ERISA. Id. Finally, although the DOL alleged that Defendant held Plan cash assets in 11 separate non-interest bearing accounts at the Bank, thereby making the cash available for use by the Bank without charge, the Court found that Plaintiff failed to establish that holding Plan cash assets in non-interest bearing accounts violated the ERISA. Id. at *25.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Bruister,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5774 (S.D. Miss. Jan. 16, 2015). The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") brought suit alleging that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties and engaged in prohibited transactions under the ERISA. On October 16, 2014, the Court granted judgment in favor of the DOL and awarded damages in excess of $6.4 million. Id. at *5. Subsequently, the DOL attempted to execute the judgment and claimed that Defendants intentionally frustrated those efforts. Id. Whereas Defendants stated that they were unable to pay any part of the judgment, Plaintiffs believed that Defendants had an interest in certain life insurance portfolios (or "viaticals") worth several million dollars. Id. As to some of those viaticals, Premium Funding, LLC ("PFLLC"), an entity that Defendants' business associate Nathan Prager controlled, entered into a financing arrangement with Defendant Bruister Family LLC, whereby PFLLC agreed to pay the premiums and administrative costs of the viaticals in exchange for certain payments and a security interest in the viaticals. Id. at *5-6. Defendants contended that the agreement was executed on October 15, 2014, one day before the Court entered its judgment. Id. at *6. The DOL contended that Defendants back-dated the document in an effort to frustrate execution of the judgment because PFLLC was not created until October 22, 2014. Id. The Court granted the DOL's ex parte motion for a temporary restraining order ("TRO"). First, the Court found that, because Defendants had exhibited a willingness to frustrate the Court's judgment, allowing the DOL to seek a TRO without notice would avoid the irreparable injury that might occur. Id. at *8. Further, the Court found that the balance of harms favored the DOL's motion. Id. at *9. Specifically, the Court observed that the DOL faced the threatened dissipation of the viatical policies, thereby leaving no means to satisfy the judgment. Id. The Court found that the harm to the DOL was significantly greater than the harm to Defendants and others in maintaining the status quo. To the extent the TRO would result in some portion of the judgments being satisfied, the Court concluded that it served the public interest. Id. In addition, the Court noted that Rule 65(d)(2)(C) states that, in addition to the parties, a TRO binds other persons who are in active concert or participation with anyone described in Rule 65(d)(2)(A) or (B). Id. Based on the record evidence, the Court found that Prager was in active concert or participation with Defendants. Id. Accordingly, the Court entered the TRO restraining Defendants from transferring, encumbering, otherwise disposing of, or otherwise limiting its interest in any asset or property in which they owned any interest or that they controlled. Id. at *10-11.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Koresko*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14873 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 6, 2015). The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") brought an enforcement action against Defendants John J. Koresko, PennMont Benefit Services, Inc., Koresko & Associates, P.C., Koresko Law Firm P.C., and Penn Public Trust ("PPT") (collectively, the "Koresko Defendants"), Jeanne Bonney, and others for violating various provisions of the ERISA. Id. at *4. Defendants were fiduciaries and/or managed hundreds of employee benefit plans (the "Plans"). Id. at *5. The DOL requested a permanent injunction against the Koresko Defendants and Bonney barring each of them from serving as a trustee or fiduciary or as a representative in any capacity to any employee benefit plan or from serving in any capacity that required them to control the assets of any benefit plan. Id. at *4-5. After a bench trial, the Court found in favor of the DOL on all claims. Id. at *5. The DOL contended that the Koresko Defendants had diverted death benefit proceeds totaling approximately $2.5 million for their own use and benefit, and had diverted $35 million in loans on insurance policies owned by the Trusts for the benefit of the Plans and employer arrangements participating in the Trusts to accounts for entities other than the Plans' trustee. Id. at *18. The Court found that the Plans at issue were employee welfare benefit plans as defined by the ERISA and that the Plans had assets in the form of employee contributions and insurance policy proceeds. Id. at *5. The Court noted that, under § 404(a)(1) of the ERISA, plan fiduciaries must act for the exclusive purpose and solely in the interest of a plan's participants and beneficiaries. Id. at *217. The Court observed that, in deciding the DOL's motion for partial summary judgment, it earlier had held that certain of the Koresko Defendants violated § 404(a)(1)(A) by diverting death benefits from the Trust to accounts the Koresko Defendants personally controlled. Id. at *218. The Court observed that, under the authority of the Koresko Defendants, Plan assets were routinely transferred to accounts held out of the reach of the Trustee and owned solely by Koresko and, in some instances, owned in conjunction with Bonney. Id. The Court noted that, under § 404(a)'s "prudent man" test, it was imprudent for the Koresko Defendants to divert almost $40 million in Trust assets out of the trust to three different accounts in Koresko's name or in the law firms' names or to the operating accounts of the law firms, Trusts, and PennMont. Id. at *222. The Court ruled that these and other transactions violated § 406(b)(1) prohibition on fiduciaries dealing with plan assets in their own interest or for their own account. Id. at *224. Based upon these findings, the Court concluded that the participants and beneficiaries of the Plans at issue, and of other employee benefit plans throughout the United States, must be protected from the type of fiduciary misconduct in which Defendants had engaged. Id. at *242. Accordingly, the Court barred Defendants from serving as fiduciaries, and found the Koresko Defendants liable for $19,852,114.88 in restitution for losses and disgorgement of profits.

(xvi) Standing Issues In ERISA Class Actions

N.Y. State Psychiatric Association, Inc., et al. v. UnitedHealth Corp.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 14641 (2d Cir. Aug. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs brought suit alleging that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties under the ERISA, the terms of ERISA-governed health insurance plans, and the Mental Health Parity Act. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants unlawfully imposed financial requirements and treatment limitations on mental health benefits for patients of Plaintiff New York State Psychiatric Association ("NYSPA") members, that Defendants treated medical claims more fairly than mental health claims, and that Defendants denied or reduced benefits for psychiatric evaluation services. The District Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss, holding principally that NYSPA lacked associational standing to sue on behalf of its members. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs appealed. The Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's order in part, vacated the order in part, and remanded the action. Id. First, the Second Circuit reversed and remanded as to NYSPA's standing. The Second Circuit held that NYSPA plausibly had alleged that its claims did not require individualized proof and that if, at summary judgment or at trial, NYSPA's claims required significant individual participation or proof, the District Court could dismiss NYSPA for lack of standing at that juncture. Id. at *9-10. Second, the District Court dismissed the complaint on the grounds that, as claims administrators, Defendants could not be sued under § 502(a)(3) or § 502(a)(1)(B) and that relief under § 502(a)(3) was inappropriate because Plaintiffs' injuries could be remedied under § 502(a)(1)(B). The Second Circuit rejected this argument, finding that, as claims administrators, Defendants exercised total control over the plans' claims process, and therefore Defendants were properly named under § 502(a)(1)(B). Id. at *14. Further, the Second Circuit held that § 502(a)(3) imposed a fiduciary duty arising indirectly from the Parity Act, even though the Parity Act itself did not impose such a duty, that Defendants were proper Defendants under § 502(a)(3), and that the dismissal of such claims was premature. Id. at *18. Finally, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's dismissal of an individual named Plaintiff's claims, finding that the allegations relating to her claim that Defendants' treatment of "evaluation and management" services violated the Parity Act failed to satisfy applicable pleading standards. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Second Circuit affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded the action.

(xvii) Intervention Issues In ERISA Class Actions

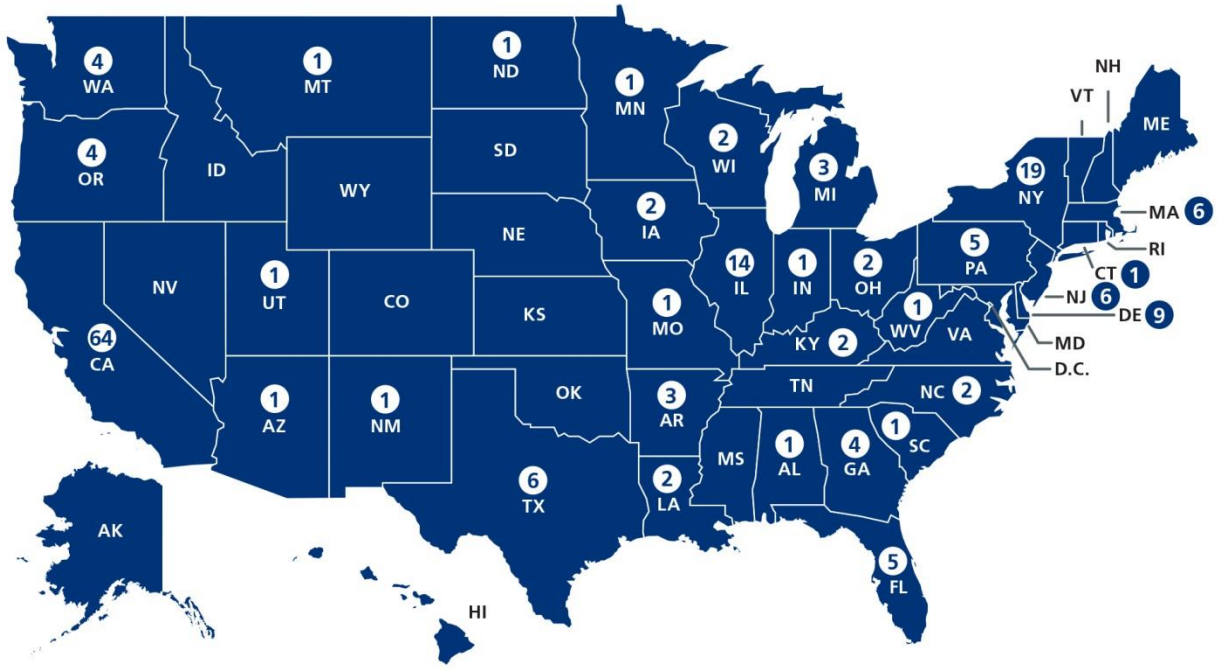
I.A.M. National Pension Fund, et al. v. Listerhill Total Maintenance Center*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102909 (N.D. Ala. Aug. 6, 2015). Plaintiff, a Fund and its trustees, brought a class action on behalf of the participants and beneficiaries of the Fund alleging that Defendant failed to make required contributions in violation of § 515 of the ERISA. Id. at *3. A group of Defendant's employees (the "Interveners") who were covered by a collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") with Defendant filed a motion to intervene to obtain declaratory relief. Id. at *4. The Court denied the Interveners' motion. The Interveners requested that the Court declare their rights as to the contribution rate that Defendant was obliged to pay on their behalf. Id. at *5. Defendant argued that the CBA required the Interveners to submit their claim to arbitration through the grievance process outlined in the CBA. Id. The Interveners disputed that their proposed declaratory judgment complaint raised a grievable issue under the CBA. Id. at *7. Based on the CBA's language, the Interveners contended that the agreement's "general purpose" included recording the terms of agreement between the parties arrived at through collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, and hours of employment. Id. The Court rejected the Interveners' argument. The Court found that the CBA required Defendant to make certain contributions to the Fund on its employees' behalf. Id. at *10. The Court noted that, whereas Plaintiffs were pursing their claims under a Trust Agreement because Plaintiffs were parties to such agreement, the Interveners were pursuing their claims under the CBA. Id. Because the CBA required all covered employees first to submit their claims to arbitration through the grievance procedure, the Interveners could not file a claim in Court without first pursing arbitration. Id. Moreover, the Court noted that, when stating that all claims should be pursued through the grievance procedure, the CBA did not distinguish between damages claims and declaratory claims. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the Interveners were parties to the CBA and, therefore, required to pursue arbitration before filing a claim in Court. Accordingly, the Court denied the motion to intervene.

VII. Significant State Law Class Action Rulings

Over the last decade, plaintiffs' lawyers have resorted to state court forums on an ever increasing basis to pursue employment-related class action litigation. The civil justice system in each state is obviously different, and the resulting impact on businesses often varies from county to county within certain jurisdictions. Some states and certain counties within those states are viewed by litigants as safe havens for opportunistic class action lawsuits, which position those jurisdictions as launching platforms for dubious claims or novel theories of recovery. Through a variety of factors – including forum shopping, discovery abuse, consolidation and joinder practices, lax evidentiary standards for experts, the absence of limitations on damages, and plaintiff-friendly class certification precedents – those jurisdictions tend to spawn more class action litigation. As reflected by the volume of rulings on class action issues, those jurisdictions in 2015 were clustered in California, Delaware, Illinois, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Texas, and Washington. Rulings from California alone resulted in 64 class action decisions.

In terms of class action rulings at the state level, the following map shows those rulings:

State Court Class Certification Decisions By State



Wage & hour claims, in particular, have been filed in state courts at a precipitous rate. The most dominant trend has been a steep rise in the number of class action lawsuits filed in state courts alleging violations of California's overtime laws or the California Labor Code and wage & hour regulations. This trend continued unabated in 2015. The rate of new case filings has continued to grow to the point where multiple class actions are filed in California every day.

The reasons for this trend are varied. First, California's wage & hour laws differ from federal law in subtle yet important ways. This means that an employer might be compliant with federal law, but not California law. Second, California's procedural rules make it easier to file a class action or collective action. In contrast, the Fair Labor Standards Act requires an "opt-in" procedure that is generally less lucrative to plaintiffs than a traditional "opt-out" class action. Third, California's unfair competition law allows claimants to borrow violations of other laws but extend the statute of limitations to four years, which tends to make class actions more lucrative. Fourth, many California Labor Code provisions allow for the recovery of attorneys' fees, creating additional incentives for plaintiff's counsel to pursue class actions.

This Chapter analyzes reported class action rulings from all state jurisdictions, with an emphasis on the leading California, Delaware, Illinois, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Texas, and Washington precedents.

A. Employment Discrimination Rulings

(i) California

Javorsky, et al. v. Western Athletic Clubs, Inc*., 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 1111 (Cal. App. 1st Dist. Dec. 11, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of health club members, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the California Unruh Civil Rights Act and the Unfair Competition Law ("UCL") by charging a lower membership fee to people ages 18 to 29 than to people age 30 and over. Defendant launched a young professional program in 2003, which offered a reduced-cost membership for individuals ages 18-29, and Defendant maintained that the discount reflected the reduced financial resources of the under-30 age group. Id. at *3-4. In moving for summary judgment, Defendant argued that its age-based pricing practice promoted access to its clubs for those who might not otherwise be able to afford to join them and that California law permits reasonable discounts for this purpose. Id. at *5-6. The trial court granted Defendant's motion, finding that the young professional discount was reasonable and not arbitrary. Id. at *10. The California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's judgment. The Court of Appeal noted that a policy treating age groups differently under a price differential might be upheld if the pricing policy ostensibly provides a social benefit to the recipient group who was disadvantaged economically when compared to other groups paying full prices and if there was no invidious discrimination. Id. at *22. The Court of Appeal found that Defendant's evidence supported a finding that people in the under-30 age group were less able to afford a membership than people of 30 and over, and that the discount increased access for 18-29 year old individuals to facilities and activities promoting physical fitness and did not perpetuate irrational stereotypes. Id. at *26. Defendant presented evidence from its expert witness that individuals under age 30 tend to have substantially less disposable income than individuals over 30, and that they had some economic disadvantage when compared to those over 30. Id. at *28-32. Plaintiff nonetheless contended that the discount perpetuated "ageism" and the harmful stereotype that "younger is better," and its invidious nature was demonstrated by the fact that Defendant received some complaints from its older members. Id. at *35. The Court of Appeal, however, found that Plaintiff's argument lacked merit. According to the Court of Appeal, offering a reasonable discount to a particular age group did not suggest that the group was better than another, and even if it did, Defendant's program did not communicate malice, hostility, or damage to persons over 30. Id. at *36. The Court of Appeal opined that Defendant met his burden of demonstrating that its pricing program did not constitute arbitrary, unreasonable, or invidious discrimination. Id. at *36. Further, because Plaintiff failed to establish a triable issue of material facts, including whether Defendant's pricing scheme was really designed to address the income levels of 18 to 29 year olds and promote Defendant's legitimate business interest, the Court of Appeal concluded that the trial court did not err in granting summary judgment to Defendant. Id. at *37-42. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's judgment.

(ii) New Jersey

Schiavo, et al. v. Marina District Development Co.*, N.J. Super LEXIS 156 (N.J. Super. App. Div. Sept. 17, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former women casino employees, brought an action alleging that Defendant adopted and applied personal appearance standards ("PAS"), and subjected them to illegal gender stereotyping, sexual harassment, disparate impact, and disparate treatment in violation of the New Jersey Law Against Discrimination ("LAD"). The trial court found that the provisions of the challenged PAS were reasonable in light of casino industry standards and customer expectations, and also because Plaintiffs consented to abide by Defendant' program known as "the BorgataBabes" when they accepted their employment. Id. at *2. The trial court granted summary judgment to Defendant, finding that the PAS requirements were permitted by N.J.S.A. 10:5-12(p), a provision allowing an employer to establish reasonable employee appearance standards. Id. at *2. On appeal, the New Jersey Appellate Division affirmed in part. Plaintiffs alleged that: (i) the PAS on its face was discriminatory, in violation of the LAD, and outside the bounds of reasonable appearance standards provided in N.J.S.A. 10:5-12(p); (ii) the PAS weight standard imposed unlawful gender stereotyping; and (iii) the disparate enforcement of PAS resulted in sexual harassment and created a hostile work environment. Id. at *26. The Appellate Division noted that in Bellissimo v. Westinghouse Electric Corp., 764 F.2d 175 (3d Cir. 2015), the Third Circuit held that dress codes were permissible under Title VII as long as, like other work rules, they were enforced even-handedly between men and women, even though the specific requirements may differ. Id. at *32. The Appellate Division noted that a similar Title VII challenge was presented in Frank v. United Airlines, Inc., 216 F.3d 845 (9th Cir. 2015), where employees challenged the employer's use of maximum weight requirements as imposing different standards upon female flight attendants and their male counterparts. Id. at *34. The difference in treatment was facially discriminatory as it applied less favorable treatment to one gender over the other. Id. The Appellate Division observed that a general principle gleaned from the cited authorities was that when an employer's reasonable workplace appearance, grooming, and dress standards complied with state or federal law prohibiting discrimination, even if they contained sex-specific language, did not violate Title VII, and by extension the LAD. Id. at *36. The Appellate Division observed that no expert evidence explained how the PAS weight standard posed an unequal burden on one gender over the other, or that adversely affected female over male applicants for positions or advancement. Id. at *38. The record showed that the BorgataBabes position, from its inception, included an element of performance and a public appearance component. Id. at *41. Accordingly, the Appellate Division concluded that the evidence failed to present a cognizable claim of discrimination based on Defendant's weight policy. Id. at *43. The Appellate Division similarly found that Plaintiffs failed to show that Plaintiffs failed to assert a colorable claim for discrimination or hostile work environment. However, the Appellate Division noted that Plaintiffs had alleged sufficient facts to demonstrate that the PAS weight standards were enforced in a harassing manner against women because of their gender, thereby alleging a viable hostile work environment. Id. at *57. Accordingly, the Appellate Division reversed the trial court's finding on the hostile work environment claim, but affirmed as to the remaining claims.

(iii) New York

Margerum, et al. v. City Of Buffalo,* 2015 N.Y. LEXIS 250 (N.Y. Feb. 17, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of 12 white firefighters, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant engaged in reverse, disparate treatment racial discrimination by permitting the promotion eligibility lists to expire before their maximum legal duration, thereby violating the New York Human Rights Law, the Civil Service Law, and the New York Constitution. The promotion eligibility lists were based on a controversial examination used to select firefighters for promotions. A separate putative class action had earlier been filed alleging an illegal disparate impact against African-American firefighters. Id. at *2-3. Defendant moved to dismiss the compliant, asserting Plaintiffs' undisputed failure to file a notice of claim under General Municipal Law. Defendant argued that the statutory provision required Plaintiffs, as a pre-condition to commencing suit, to provide prior notice of their claims in order to permit timely investigation and opportunity for early resolution. Id. at *4. After several appeals and then a trial, Defendant appealed a judgment for Plaintiffs, which the New York Appellate Division affirmed in part. On further appeal, the New York Court of Appeal rejected Defendant's motion, finding no notice of claim requirement. Id. at *7. While § 50-e(1)(a) of the General Municipal Law requires service of a notice of claim within 90 days after the claim arises "[i]n any case founded upon tort where a notice of claim is required by law as a condition precedent to the commencement of an action or special proceeding against a public corporation," § 50-i(1) precludes commencement of an action against a city "for personal injury, wrongful death or damage to real or personal property alleged to have been sustained by reason of the negligence or wrongful act of such city," unless a notice of claim has been served. Id. at *6-7. The Court of Appeal noted that the Appellate Division cases addressing the issue had determined that the General Municipal Law does not encompass a cause of action based on the Human Rights Law and "[s]ervice of a notice of claim is therefore not a condition precedent to commencement of an action based on the Human Rights Law in a jurisdiction where §§ 50-e and 50-i provide the only notice of claim criteria." Id. at *7. Because human rights claims are not tort actions under 50-e and are not personal injury, wrongful death, or damage to personal property claims under 50-i, the Court of Appeal concluded that Plaintiffs were not subject to the notice of claim requirement. Id. The Court of Appeal therefore affirmed the denial of Defendant's motion to dismiss. The Court of Appeal further modified an earlier judgment granting Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment as to the liability involving discrimination by remitting to the trial court for further proceedings because Defendant's liability turned on issue "whether it had a strong basis in evidence to believe it [would] be subject to disparate impact liability at the time that it terminated the promotion eligibility lists while discrimination litigation was still pending against it," that could not be determined on motion for summary judgment. Id. at *10-11.

B. Wage & Hour Rulings

(i) California

Alberts, et al. v. Aurora Behavioral Health Care,* 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 913 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Oct. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of nurses at a hospital, brought a class action alleging that Defendant denied them meal and rest periods and forced them to work off-the-clock in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant regularly and intentionally understaffed its hospitals and forced them to remain on-duty in lieu of taking of meal and rest periods. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant regularly required nurses to perform tasks off-the-clock and without adequate overtime compensation. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs proposed multiple sub-classes for certification, including: (i) the meal break sub-class, (ii) the rest break sub-class, (iii) the overtime sub-class, and (iv) two derivative sub-classes for waiting time penalties and allegedly inaccurate wage statements. Id. The trial court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, holding that the proposed sub-classes lacked commonality. Id. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed. The Court of Appeal found that the trial court relied on improper criteria, erroneous legal assumptions, and insubstantial evidence in denying certification. Id. The Court of Appeal noted that the trial court had deemed legally acceptable Defendant's policy that employees be provided with "an unpaid 30-minute break for a meal period approximately halfway between the beginning and end of the employee's shift" in concluding that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate the existence of a universal practice of denying staff the benefits of that policy. Id. at *25-26. The Court of Appeal found that trial court erred because the mere existence of a lawful policy would not defeat class certification in the face of actual contravening policies and practices that, as a practical matter, undermined the written policy, and when Plaintiffs in fact disputed the "facial" legality of Defendant's break policies. Id. Moreover, Plaintiffs submitted evidence to demonstrate that Plaintiffs regularly failed to receive their meal period until far later in their shifts, and produced statistical evidence showing many workers missed breaks or had them cut short. Id. at *32-38. The statistical evidence reflected a common practice by which Defendant's management modified time-keeping records, and substantiated declarants' testimony that Defendant undertook active efforts to hide its wage & hour violations. The Court of Appeal thus found that the evidence of widespread violation of Defendant's policies would be sufficient to warrant consideration for class certification, and the trial court's conclusion regarding the legality and application of applicable policies was improper. Id. at *47. The Court of Appeal also held that even if Plaintiffs articulated a common issue for purposes of class certification, it was unclear whether the case would be manageable as a class action and whether individual issues, such as damages, or other common issues would predominate. Id. at *47. The Court of Appeal therefore remanded the action for further proceedings, and directed the trial court to determine whether the handling of individual issues might have an effect on the ultimate manageability of the case as a class action.

Ayon, et al. v. Camino Real Foods,* Case No. BC541415 (Cal. Super. Ct. July 6, 2015). Plaintiff, a former employee, brought a class action alleging that Defendants violated the California Labor Code and wage orders by failing to provide them rest breaks, meal breaks, and vacation time, and failed to compensate them for all hours worked. Id. at 2. Plaintiff had an arbitration agreement with Defendant Real Time Staffing Services. Defendant Camino Real Foods staffed its workforce from Real Time. Camino Real, Plaintiff's employer and a non-signatory to the agreement, sought to invoke the arbitration agreement pursuant to the doctrine of equitable estoppel, which the Court granted. The arbitration agreement was in English, and Plaintiff contended that he spoke and wrote Spanish and had very limited understanding of English. Id. at 4. Defendant Real Time contended that it offered Plaintiff and all other applicants an option of completing paperwork (including arbitration agreement) in Spanish and English, but Plaintiff chose to complete it in English. Id. The Court observed that although Plaintiff had a limited understanding of English, his correct answer to a word problem demonstrated some ability to read and understand English. Id. at 5. The Court concluded that his signature and initials on the arbitration clause were sufficient to establish that he signed a facially valid arbitration agreement. Id. The Court also noted that the FAA establishes a federal policy favoring arbitration, and requires rigorous enforcement of agreements to arbitrate. Id. at 6. It also reasoned that an arbitration clause is subject to the defense of unconscionability. The Court observed that it can refuse to enforce a contract if both procedural as well as substantive unconscionability is present. Id. at 7. The Court further determined that a contract term is not substantively unconscionable when it merely gives one side a greater benefit. Id. The Court noted that the agreement exhibited at least a "modicum of bilaterality," and contained no terms that shocked the conscience. Id. at 8. The Court explained that the agreement was titled "Mutual Agreement to Arbitrate," and did not contain oppressive terms that shocked the conscience, and was consistent with the requirements of the Federal Arbitration Act and the California Arbitration Act. Id. at 8-9. The Court observed further that, unlike those cases where an arbitration agreement was unsconscionable, the agreement here was significantly shorter, and its arbitration provision was flagged by a bolded, capitalized title, and separately initialed by Plaintiff. Id. at 9. The Court found that these factors indicated procedural validity in the formation of an agreement. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the arbitration agreement was valid. As to the class arbitration waiver, the Court noted that the parties' mutual assent at the time of contracting guided the interpretation of the contract. The Court remarked that the language of the arbitration agreement between the parties indicated that it was merely a bilateral agreement, and none of the evidence offered indicated that the parties intended the agreement to cover class arbitration. Id. at 11. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the class claims based on the agreement. Finally, the Court observed that Defendant Camino Real pointed out that Plaintiff's claims against Defendant Real Time and Camino Real were identical. Id. at 12. Defendant Camino Real clarified that it did not rely on any judicial admission of an agency relationship in support of its motion to compel arbitration, but rather believed this evidenced how Plaintiff's claims against Defendant Camino Real were intimately found in and intertwined with the claims against Defendant Real Time. The Court agreed with this argument and concluded the doctrine of equitable estoppel was applicable and Defendant Camino Real also+ could compel Plaintiff to arbitration.

Augustus, et al. v. ABM Security Services, Inc*., 2014 Cal. App. LEXIS 1209 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Jan. 29, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of security guards, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant required them to remain on-call during breaks, and failed to relieve them of all duties during rest breaks as required by § 226.7 of the California Labor Code. In the course of discovery, Defendant admitted that it required security guards to "keep their radios and pagers on during rest breaks, to remain vigilant, and to respond when needs arise, such as when a tenant wishes to be escorted to the parking lot, a building manager must be notified of a mechanical problem, or an emergency situation occurs." Id. at *6. Plaintiffs filed a motion for summary judgment based on Defendant's admission, and based on a California Division of Labor Standards Enforcement Opinion Letter stating that rest periods must be duty-free. The trial court agreed with Plaintiffs certified class of 15,000 California-based security guards, granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment, and then entered a judgment in favor of the class, awarding $90 million in rest break premium pay, interest, and waiting time penalties. Id. at *12. Defendant appealed. The California Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's judgment and held that the trial court erred in ruling that Defendant's on-call rest break policy violated California law. The Court of Appeal held that California law only requires that employees be relieved of "working" during rest breaks, but does not require that they be relieved of being "on duty" or be relieved of all employer control. Id. at *17. The Court of Appeal drew a clear distinction between being available for work (on-call) versus actually working (on-duty) and determined that the Legislature, when drafting § 226, intended only to prohibit actual work during rest breaks and not being available to work. Id. The Court of Appeal explained that the requirement that employees be free of employer control and relieved of all duty applies only to meal breaks, as the Legislature specifically required in the Wage Orders that an employer completely relieve its employees of all duty for a 30-minute meal period. Because nothing in the applicable Labor Code provisions or Wage Orders suggest that an employee must be free of all employer control during rest breaks, the Court of Appeal concluded that the Legislature did not intend the same prohibition to apply. Id. at *27. In addition, while employers need not pay for uninterrupted meal breaks, they must pay for rest breaks. This difference provided further basis for the Court of Appeal's decision that a policy requiring Plaintiffs to remain on-call during a rest breaks was not unlawful so long as Defendant did not require Plaintiffs to perform work during a rest break. Plaintiffs did not produce any evidence of any rest break actually being interrupted due to the on-call policy. To the contrary, the evidence showed that they engaged in various non-work activities, including smoking, reading, making personal telephone calls, attending to personal business, and surfing the internet. Id. at *17. Thus, the Court of Appeal concluded that remaining on call did not itself constitute performing work. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's orders granting summary judgment, and vacated the judgment against Defendant.

Behaein, et al. v. Pizza Hut, Inc.*, Case No. BC541415 (Cal. Super. Ct. July 15, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, brought an action alleging that Defendants' vehicle reimbursement policy violated § 2802 of the California Labor Code. Defendants paid their California-based drivers a set amount per order delivered, regardless of the distance driven. Id. at 2. Defendants paid drivers at 90 cents per order, but after January 2007, Defendants determined the rate by multiplying cost-per-mile and average miles per trip, then dividing that number by the average orders per trip. Id. Defendants modelled its vehicle costs on those of a new Toyota Camry, and contended that since the Camry was more expensive, this overestimated the costs. Id. Plaintiffs asserted that using Camry underestimated those costs. Plaintiffs moved to certify a reimbursement class, which the Court granted. The Court observed that the only question contested was whether Plaintiffs' mileage reimbursement claim was susceptible to common proof. The Court noted that § 2802(a) requires an employer to indemnify its employees for expenses they incurred in the discharge of their duties. Id. at 6. The Court noted that in Gattuso v. Harte-Hanks Shoppers, Inc., 42 Cal. 4th 554 (2007), the California Supreme Court laid out three possible ways of reimbursing employees, including: (i) the actual expense method; (ii) mileage reimbursement method; and (iii) lump-sum payment method. Id. at 6-7. Plaintiffs put forth two theories of establishing that Defendants under-reimbursed Plaintiffs on a class-wide basis. First, Plaintiffs submitted common proof that Defendants' method of compensation was not based on a reasonable assessment of miles driven and expenses incurred. Id. at 8. Plaintiffs' evidence showed that Defendants compensated drivers based on the assumption that employees drove approximately 2.68 miles per order, and in reality employees actually drove an average of 3.79 miles per order. Id. Plaintiffs also submitted evidence that in calculating the lump sum rate, Defendants used a mileage rate over 60% lower than the IRS rate that under-compensated Plaintiffs. Id. Based on the evidence presented, the Court determined that it was persuaded that Plaintiffs' claim was susceptible to common proof on a class-wide basis. Id. As an alternative basis for establishing liability, Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants' own electronic delivery records showed that their method of compensation under-compensated drivers in comparison to the mileage reimbursement method. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs contended that Defendants' method was a lump-sum method because Plaintiffs were compensated on the same amount per order regardless of how many miles they drove. Id. at 9-10. The Court remarked that while it was true that Defendants' method was not a true lump-sum payment method because Defendants paid drivers per order delivered, it nevertheless found that Defendants' method was closer to lump-sum method that it was to a mileage reimbursement method. Id. at 10. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' established that they could show Defendants' liability through common proof, and granted their motion for class certification.

Contos, et al. v. Kokkari, Ltd.,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 1623 (Cal. App. 1st Dist. Mar. 6, 2015). Plaintiff, a restaurant employee, brought a putative class action under the California Labor Code alleging that Defendant maintained a uniform policy of changing employee time records and failed to provide meal and rest breaks. Id. at *3. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant failed to compensate employees for purchasing and maintaining uniforms, withheld tips from servers, and failed to provide accurate wage statements. Id. Plaintiff sought to represent 232 current and former employees. Pursuant to Defendant's subsequent settlement offer, 182 of the 232 potential class members signed a settlement agreement releasing all claims asserted in this action. Plaintiff moved for class certification seeking to represent all employees, including those who settled their claims. The trial court denied Plaintiff's motion, finding that common issues of fact and law did not predominate because resolving the enforceability of the settlement agreements required an individualized inquiry into each agreement. Id. at *6. The trial court also found that the class was not ascertainable until it determined the enforceability of the settlement agreements, and Plaintiff's claims were not typical of the putative class because he did not sign a settlement agreement. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiff appealed, and the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order. The Court of Appeal found that substantial evidence supported the finding that Plaintiff's claims were not typical of the proposed class. The Court of Appeal noted that numerous case law precedents "have held [that] a proposed class representative cannot establish typicality where members of the proposed class have signed settlement agreements but the proposed representative has not." Id. at *9. According to the Court of Appeal, unlike the majority of the proposed class, Plaintiff did not sign a settlement agreement, and thus his legal position was different from most of the proposed class. Id. at *12. The Court of Appeal further noted that Plaintiff's claims and the defenses to those claims were not typical for the additional reason that the threshold questions of whether particular class members who signed settlement agreements wished to challenge the validity of the agreements, and whether the settlement agreements were valid and covered the subject matter of the litigation would have to be decided before the merits. Id. at *16-17. The Court of Appeal therefore concluded that the trial court did not err in ruling that Plaintiff failed to establish typicality, and accordingly affirmed the trial court's order denying Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

CH. 7, Sec. B

Cruz, et al. v. Sun World International, LLC,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 1158 (Cal. App. 5th Dist. Nov. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of agricultural workers, brought a class action alleging that Defendant failed to provide them their full rest and meal breaks, did not compensate them for breaks that were not provided, required them to provide their own tools without reimbursement, required them to wash their grape harvest trays without compensation, failed to provide employees with accurate itemized wage statements, and declined to timely pay all wages due at the time of termination of employment. Plaintiffs sought to certify a class of individuals employed by Defendant as non-exempt agricultural employees, either directly or through the use of farm labor contractors ("FLC"). The trial court denied the motion for class certification, finding that the FLC class was not a sufficiently ascertainable group for class treatment, and further, could not be members of the proposed class because Plaintiffs failed to establish they were joint employees of Defendant. Id. at *6. Thus, by limiting the proposed class to employees that Defendant hired directly, the trial court concluded that common issues did not predominate over individual issues, Plaintiffs' claims were not typical of those of the class, Plaintiffs were not adequate representatives of the class, and a class action was not a superior means of adjudicating the claims because of the lack of commonality. Plaintiffs appealed the denial of the motion for class certification, and the California Court of Appeal affirmed the order denying class certification. Id. at *56. The Court of Appeal noted that the motion for class certification indicated that the only claims asserted on behalf of the entire class were the claims that Defendant's workers were not provided their full meal and rest breaks or properly compensated for the failure to provide them. Id. at *12. Agreeing with the trial court that the FLC class was not ascertainable, the Court of Appeal noted that Plaintiffs could not wait until the merits of the class claims were adjudicated to establish a basis for finding that the proposed class was ascertainable. Id. at *16. Further, the Court of Appeal held that Plaintiffs' evidence did not demonstrate a class-wide uniform practice. Id. at *49. Finally, because the Court found that a lack of predominant common issues of law or fact was a sufficient basis for denial of certification of the direct employee portion of the class, the Court of Appeal declined to address the trial court's findings that Plaintiffs did not have claims typical of the class, that Plaintiffs could not adequately represent the members of the proposed class, and that a class action would not be a superior means of adjudicating Plaintiffs' claims. Id. at *56. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order denying class certification. Id.

Flowers, et al. v. Los Angeles County Metropolitan Transportation Authority,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 8544 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Nov. 25, 2015). Plaintiff, a bus and train operator, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them minimum wage and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Id. at *2. Defendant demurred to all causes of action and filed a petition to compel arbitration of some of Plaintiff's claims. The trial court sustained the demurrer as to the causes of action for violation of state minimum wage and rest period requirements imposed by the Labor Code and Wage Order 9, as well as for civil penalties under the Private Attorney General Act

("PAGA"), and overruled the demurrer with respect to the FLSA claim and denied the petition to compel arbitration. Id. at *3. Plaintiff voluntarily dismissed the FLSA claim without prejudice and the trial court entered a judgment of dismissal in Defendant's favor. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed the order sustaining the demurrer as to violation of state minimum wage requirements, Wage Order 9, and to the cause of action for civil penalties under the PAGA. Id. at *30-31. Defendant contended that §§ 30257 and 30750 of Public Utilities Code ("PUC") exempted it from the minimum wage and rest period requirements imposed by the Labor Code and Wage Order 9. Id. at *16. The Court of Appeal, however, found that the plain language of the PUC sections did not support Defendant's position, as it simply described Defendant's obligation to bargain in good faith with a duly designated labor organization, to execute a collective bargaining agreement, and to comply with the terms of such an agreement that shall not be limited or restricted by any other provision of law. Id. at *17. Defendant failed to explain how complying with the state minimum wage law would limit or restrict its obligation to perform any of the tasks specified under the PUC. Id. Further, the absence of an express exemption from the applicable minimum wage requirements in the PUC sections on which Defendant relied might be contrasted with express exemptions accorded to public employee in other statutes. Id. at *18. The Court of Appeal therefore held that the PUC did not exempt the minimum wage provisions of Wage Order 9. Id. at *19. The Court of Appeal further ruled that Defendant's interpretation of the PUC conflicted with the express terms of Wage Order 9 which, subject to certain exceptions, applies to all individuals employed in the transportation industry. Id. at *22. The Court of Appeal explained that, under the applicable principles of statutory interpretation, Defendant could not only comply with the minimum wage law, but also meet its obligations to bargain in good faith with a duly designated labor organization, execute a collective bargaining agreement, and comply with its terms. Id. at *22-23. The Court of Appeal therefore opined that the trial court erred by sustaining the demurrer to Plaintiff's cause of action for violation of the state minimum wage law based on the PUC. For the same reason, the Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's order sustaining the demurrer to Plaintiff's PAGA claim. The Court of Appeal also held that the trial court did not err by sustaining the demurrer to Plaintiff's cause of action for rest period violations, finding that the rest period requirements set forth in Wage Order 9 did not apply to Plaintiff because Defendant was only required to pay a premium for overtime worked as defined in the parties' collective bargaining agreement. Id. at *29. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed in part the trial court's order sustaining Defendant's demurrer.

Fowler, et al. v. Carmax, Inc.,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 559 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Jan. 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of sales consultants, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to provide them meal and rest periods in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant failed to comply with wage statement requirements, failed to timely pay wages due at termination, and violated the California Unfair Competition Law. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to a dispute resolution agreement that Plaintiffs signed as a condition of employment. Plaintiffs opposed the motion, arguing that Defendant waived its right to compel arbitration and the agreement was procedurally and substantively unconscionable. The trial court granted Defendant's motion. Upon Plaintiffs' appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order. Although Defendant had filed two successful motions for summary judgement and obtained substantial discovery from Plaintiffs before they moved to compel arbitration, the Court of Appeal found that Defendant had not waived its right to compel arbitration. Id. at *10-11. The Court of Appeal noted that Defendant did not take any significant action inconsistent with the right to arbitrate. Id. at *14. Although three years have passed since Plaintiffs filed their complaints, the Court of Appeal found that Defendant's delay in filing the motion to compel was not unreasonable because during the year after the filing of Plaintiffs' complaint and before the parties stipulated to a stay pending the California Supreme Court's decision of Brinker Restaurant Corp. v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. App. 4th 25 (2008), the decision of Gentry v. Superior Court, 42 Cal. 4th 443 (2007), had made a motion to compel a highly risky proposition. Id. at *14-15. Moreover, the action was stayed for the two of those three years pending the resolution of the legal questions in Brinker. When Defendant first requested arbitration with the stay still in effect, it acted only slightly more than a month after AT&T Mobility LLC v. Concepcion, 131 S. Ct. 1740 (2011), cast Gentry into doubt, and Defendant filed its motion within two weeks later. Id. In these circumstances, the Court of Appeal determined that the parties actively litigated the case only during the year preceding the stay, and Plaintiffs did not suffer any prejudice due to the delay in initiating arbitration. Id. at *15. Further, the Court of Appeal found that the arbitration agreement was not unconscionable. Although there was some evidence of procedural unconscionability, the Court of Appeal held that the provision allowing Defendant to unilaterally alter or terminate the agreement by posting advance notice did not constitute sufficient evidence of substantive unconscionability to counterbalance the relatively low level of procedural unconscionability. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order granting Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Garrido, et al. v. Air Liquide Industrial U.S. L.P.,* 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 946 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Oct. 26, 2015). Plaintiff, a truck driver, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, his former employer, violated the California Labor Code and Unfair Competition Law by failing to provide him timely meal periods and accurate wage statement, and by failing to pay compensation due upon separation of employment. Id. at *3-4. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to an arbitration agreement governing Plaintiff's employment. The arbitration agreement precluded Plaintiff from pursuing class or representative claims and expressly provided that the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") would govern the agreement and any arbitration proceedings. Id. at *3. The trial court denied the motion to compel arbitration, determining that the arbitration agreement posed an obstacle to the employee's ability to vindicate statutory rights under the Labor Code. Id. at *4. On Defendant's appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. The Court of Appeal found that the FAA did not apply to Plaintiff's dispute because the statute expressly exempts transportation workers from its scope. Id. at *5-6. Because Plaintiff worked as a truck driver who transported Defendant's products across state lines, the Court of Appeal determined that he was a transportation worker within the meaning of the FAA. Id. The Court of Appeal thus held that, despite the arbitration agreement's express invocation of the FAA, the plain terms of the statute superseded the terms of the agreement. The Court of Appeal also found that the arbitration agreement was enforceable under the California Arbitration Agreement ("CAA") and the factors set forth in Gentry v. Superior Court, 42 Cal. 4th 443 (2007), still remained valid. According to Court of Appeal, the Gentry rule was not completely undone by AT&T Mobility LLC v. Concepcion, 563 U.S. 333 (2011), and Iskanian v. CLS Transportation Los Angeles, LLC, 59 Cal. 4th 348 (2014), as both Concepcion and Iskanian explicitly addressed the enforceability of class waivers in cases where the FAA applies, and neither considered the continued viability of Gentry in cases not governed by the FAA. Id. at *12-14. In the absence of such authority, the Court of Appeal concluded that Gentry sets forth valid grounds for refusing to enforce an arbitration agreement as long as the FAA does not apply to the dispute. Id. at *16. Thus, applying the Gentry rule to the facts of this case, the Court of Appeal reasoned that class proceedings would be a significantly more effective way of allowing employees to vindicate their statutory rights, and therefore, the arbitration agreement's prohibition of class proceedings was unenforceable. Id. at *18-20. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order denying Defendant's motion to compel individual arbitration.

Gentile, et al. v. Keenan & Associates,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 5256 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. July 27, 2015). Plaintiff, a claims examiner, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, an insurance brokerage and consulting firm, misclassified her and other claims examiners as exempt employees to avoid paying overtime in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiff moved to certify a class defined as individuals employed by Defendant as claims examiners or senior claims examiners in California who worked in the workers' compensation department, schools division, between October 2007 and July 2013. Id. at *4. Plaintiff asserted that the proposed class was made up of 92 members who performed the same job of processing workers' compensation claims in accordance with Defendant's "master binder," which routinized and circumscribed the class members' tasks by requiring strict adherence to the procedures, rules, and preformatted templates and provided detailed instructions as to how files must be documented and processed. Id. The trial court denied class certification, finding that common issues did not predominate based on Defendant's declarations indicating that many claims examiners understood the master binder to be a resource and rarely referred to it when performing their duties. Id. at *5-7. On Plaintiff's appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. The Court of Appeal found that substantial evidence supported the trial court's conclusion. Although it was undisputed that all the proposed class members performed the same duty of processing indemnity claims, the Court of Appeal noted that the evidence demonstrated variations among them as some claims examiners performed predominantly non-discretionary, data-tabulating tasks and others performed work directly related to management policies or general business operations. Id. at *25-28. Plaintiff argued that, even conceding some differences among potential class members, common issues predominated because all witness and documentary evidence resoundingly confirmed that Defendant limited the class members' work to the day-to-day processing of individual workers' compensation files, as opposed to formulating managerial or operating policies. Id. at *29. The Court of Appeal found significant the variations in the tasks for which class members were responsible and in the discretion they exercised. The record supported the trial court's finding that some claims examiners performed their duties in accordance with the master binder and some used their own judgment and training. Id. at *39. The declarations submitted by Defendant reflected that many claims examiners performed a variety of discretionary tasks, including litigating and settling workers' compensation claims, and that they did not perform their duties by merely plugging claimant data into formulas provided by Defendant. Id. at *36-37. The declarations further reflected that unique managerial styles of the supervisors and the individual relationship between supervisor and claims examiner impacted individual work experiences, and thus the level of supervision also varied among the class members. Id. at *40. The Court of Appeal therefore affirmed the trial court's order denying Plaintiff's motion for class certification on the basis that substantial evidence supported each of the trial court's findings with regard to predominance.

Gerard, et al. v. Orange Coast Memorial Medical Center,* 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 132 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. Feb. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of healthcare workers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant's meal break policy authorizing waivers of second meal periods on shifts longer than 12 hours violated § 512 (a) of the California Labor Code. While § 512 (a) requires two meal periods for shifts longer than 12 hours, Industrial Wage Commission ("IWC") Wage Order No. 5 authorizes employees in the healthcare industry to waive one of those two required meal periods on shifts longer than 8 hours. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs occasionally worked shifts longer than 12 hours without being provided a second meal period. Although Plaintiffs signed second meal period waivers pursuant to Wage Order No. 5, they contended that the second meal period waiver violated § 512 and that Wage Order No. 5 was invalid to the extent it authorized employees to waive second meal periods for shifts longer than 12 hours. Defendant moved for summary judgment relying upon the Wage Order exception. The trial court granted summary judgment in Defendant's favor. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's judgment. The Court of Appeal found that Wage Order No. 5 was partially invalid to the extent it authorized healthcare workers to waive their second meal periods on shifts longer than 12 hours because it conflicted with section 512(a). Id. at *6. The Court of Appeal extensively reviewed the legislative history underlying §§ 512 and 516, which authorize the IWC to promulgate wage orders, and concluded that the legislative history "evidences the intent to prohibit the IWC from [adopting] wage orders in ways that conflict with meal period requirements in § 512, including the proviso [that a] second meal period may be waived only if the total hours worked is less than 12 hours." Id. at *14. The Court of Appeal therefore found that the IWC exceeded its authority in enacting § 11(D) of Wage Order No. 5 and declared Wage Order 5 to be invalid to the extent it created an "unauthorized additional exception … beyond the express exception for waivers on shifts of no more than 12 hours." Id. at *16-17. The Court of Appeal also held that its decision had at least some retroactive effect in that the authorization for waiver of a second meal period in the Wage Order was partially invalid from the moment it was promulgated because § 516 states that the IWC's authority to issue wage orders is limited by the specific terms of California Labor Code. Id. at *24. The Court of Appeal found no compelling reason that warranted an exception to the general rule of retroactivity of its decision partially invalidating Wage Order 5. Id. The Court of Appeal therefore held that Plaintiffs were entitled to seek premium pay under § 226.7 of the Labor Code for any failure by Defendant to provide mandatory second meal periods pre-dating its decision and within the three-year statute of limitations period. Id. at *24-25. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's grant of summary judgment.

Johnson, et al. v. Contemporary Services Corp.,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 1885 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Mar. 18, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a class action for Defendants' violations of the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA") and several provisions of the California Labor Code. Defendants' standard employment agreement contained an arbitration provision, which was silent on the issue of representative actions. When Plaintiffs filed their complaint, the law was in flux concerning the extent to which certain class action claims could be litigated in the trial court when the parties had an arbitration agreement that was either silent on, or expressly barred, representative claims. Id. at *2. After the trial court granted Defendants' motion to compel arbitration, the arbitrator issued an intermediate award finding that the arbitration agreement was not substantively unconscionable, and that the employer could not be compelled to arbitrate representative actions, including the PAGA claims, specifically as the agreement was silent on the issue. Id. at *3. The trial court confirmed the intermediate arbitration award, and Plaintiffs appealed. Two years later, the California Supreme Court decided Iskanian v. CLS Transportation Los Angeles, LLC, 59 Cal. 4th 348 (2014), holding that class action waivers of employees' unwaivable statutory rights were not enforceable, except in regard to claims under the PAGA, which were actions by the state being prosecuted by individuals. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs, meanwhile, withdrew their appeal as to their non-PAGA claims, and as for the PAGA claims, they contended that they not only should proceed as representative claims, but also they should do so in the trial court, and not in arbitration. Id. at *6. The Court of Appeal of California reversed the order confirming the arbitration award as to the PAGA claims. The Court of Appeal noted that the only issue unresolved in Iskanian was the proper forum for adjudicating Plaintiffs' representative PAGA claims, i.e., either in the trial court or in arbitration along with Plaintiffs' individual claims. Id. at *5. Because the arbitration agreement gave no clue how to the parties intended to address that issue, the Supreme Court left it to the parties and the trial court to sort it out on remand. Id. As to Iskanian, the Court of Appeal posed several issues, including whether the parties would "agree on a single forum for resolving the PAGA claim and the other claims? If not, should the PAGA claim be bifurcated, with it proceeding in litigation while the Plaintiffs' individual claims go to arbitration? If bifurcation occurs, should the arbitration or the [trial] court action be stayed?" Id. at *7. The Court of Appeal noted that Garden Fresh Restaurant Corp. v. Superior Court, 231 Cal. App. 4th 678 (2014), left it to the trial court to determine whether under the arbitration agreement, the PAGA claim should be litigated or arbitrated. Id. at *8. The Court of Appeal remarked that as in Garden Fresh, the appropriate resolution of this case would be to leave it to the trial court to determine whether the parties' agreement contemplated arbitration of the representative PAGA claims.

Kizer, et al. v. Tristar Risk Management,* Case No. 30-2014-707394 (Cal. Super. Ct. July 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of claims examiners, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt from the overtime requirements of the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs also asserted derivative claims under California's Unfair Competition Law based on Defendant's misclassification for failure to timely pay wages and to provide accurate wage statements. Id. at 2. Seeking class certification, Plaintiffs proposed a class of individuals employed by Defendant as claims examiners in its worker's compensation division for a defined period and who did not work as return to work coordinators, backup supervisors, or hearing representatives. Id. at 5. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, finding that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the typicality requirement of Rule 23. The Court reasoned that there was no basis to infer from the job descriptions and other admissible evidence that Plaintiffs required overtime to accomplish their work. Id. at 6. Further, Plaintiffs offered no declarations, either from current or former employees or management, suggesting a company-wide de facto policy requiring overtime. Id. Although Plaintiffs suggested that employee computer log-in and log-out records would provide evidence of overtime, the Court found that Plaintiffs had neither sought any log-in records nor submitted any declarations from an expert suggesting that a statistical or extrapolation analysis would demonstrate that class members commonly worked overtime. Id. According to the Court, the sworn evidence that two former employees worked overtime to complete their assigned caseload was anecdotal and inadequate to demonstrate that Plaintiffs' overtime claims were typical for the proposed class. Id. In addition, without credible evidence that more than two of the more than 450 claims examiners worked overtime, the Court also declined to find that Plaintiffs established the commonality and superiority requirements. Id. at 7. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Kohsuwan, et al. v. Dynamex, Inc.,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 3865 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. June 1, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, brought a wage & hour action alleging that Defendants misclassified them as independent contractors pursuant to the independent contractor operating agreement, which they signed with Defendants. Id. at *2. Defendants moved to compel arbitration pursuant to an arbitration clause in the agreement. Plaintiffs argued that the arbitration paragraph was unconscionable and that the clause delegating the question of arbitrability to the arbitrator was also unconscionable. The trial court denied the motion, holding that the agreement was procedurally and substantively unconscionable. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed. At issue was whether it was for the trial court or the arbitrator to decide whether the arbitration paragraph was unconscionable. The Court of Appeal observed that under the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"), the trial court determines the enforceability of an arbitration agreement unless the parties agree otherwise pursuant to a delegation clause, which requires issues of interpretation and enforceability of an arbitration agreement to be resolved by the arbitrator. Id. at *4-5. Further, the Court of Appeal noted that who decides the enforceability of a delegation clause depends on whether a party is challenging the enforceability of the delegation clause itself or is attacking the entire arbitration paragraph. Id. at *5. If the challenge is to the arbitration paragraph as a whole, the delegation clause is severed and under that authority the arbitrator decides whether the entire arbitration paragraph is enforceable, and if a party challenges the delegation clause itself, the trial court determines whether it is enforceable. Id. Since Plaintiffs contended that both the delegation clause and the entire arbitration paragraph were unconscionable and thus unenforceable, the Court of Appeal reasoned that it was the trial court's responsibility to decide the enforceability of the delegation clause. Id. The trial court did not rule on the enforceability of the delegation clause, but instead decided the question of the validity of the entire arbitration paragraph. The Court of Appeal opined that in order to be enforceable, a delegation clause must be clear and unmistakable. Id. at *6. The language of the delegation clause specifically stated that the arbitrability of disputes between the parties shall be fully resolved by arbitration, and thus the provision was clear. Further, the Court of Appeal noted that a delegation clause must not be unconscionable. Id. Although Plaintiffs argued that the delegation clause was unconscionable because it gave the arbitrator a financial incentive to decide he or she has jurisdiction, the Court of Appeal observed that Malone v. Superior Court, 226 Cal. App. 4th 1551, 1559 (2014), analyzed and rejected this argument and held the opposition based on the arbitrator's alleged self-interest is preempted by the FAA. Id. at *7. Further, although Plaintiffs argued the delegation clause was unconscionable because it required them to arbitrate the question of arbitrability in Texas to determine whether an arbitration would proceed, the Court of Appeal remarked that venue did not apply solely to the delegation clause, and thus could be considered in analyzing the unconscionability of the delegation clause. Additionally, the Court of Appeal noted that contentions that the entire arbitration paragraph is unconscionable are not sufficient to challenge the delegation clause itself, and any claim of unconscionability must be specific to the delegation clause. Id. at *8. Thus, the Court of Appeal held that the delegation clause was not unconscionable and that the arbitrator should decide the arbitrability of the claims. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's order denying Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Laborers Pacific Southwest Regional Organizing Coalition v. Gomez, et al.*, 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 1971 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. Mar. 20, 2015). Plaintiff, a former employee, filed a complaint with the California Labor Commissioner seeking to recover unpaid overtime pay. The parties had entered into an arbitration agreement, which required arbitration of any employment dispute. The Commissioner initiated a Berman hearing (based on § 98 of the California Labor Code and named after its legislative sponsor), and denied Defendant's request to stay the matter and defer to arbitration because Defendant had not filed a petition to compel arbitration. Id. at *5. Thereafter, Defendant unsuccessfully filed a petition to compel arbitration and stay the Berman hearing. Defendant then filed a first amended petition to compel arbitration and added the Commissioner as a respondent, and subsequently moved to compel arbitration and stay proceedings. The Commissioner agreed to stay the Berman proceeding, filed a response to the amended petition, and also filed opposition points and authorities to the petition to compel arbitration. Id. at *8. The trial court denied Defendant's petition and motion to compel arbitration. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed. The Court of Appeal opined that the arbitration agreement was procedurally unconscionable because Plaintiff declared that Defendant presented the agreement in a meeting and told him to sign it to continue working, and that he had to turn in the signed agreement before he left the meeting. Id. at *13. The Court of Appeal found that Plaintiff did not meet his burden of showing substantive unconscionability. The Court of Appeal observed that although it may not refuse to enforce an arbitration agreement imposed on an employee as a condition of employment simply because it requires the employee to bypass a Berman hearing, such an agreement may be unconscionable if it is otherwise unreasonably one-sided in favor of the employer. Id. at *14. The Court of Appeal reasoned that there were no provisions in the agreement that gave Defendant an unfair advantage over Plaintiff or created any lack of mutuality. The arbitration agreement contemplated providing a final and binding method to use in the event a question, dispute, or disagreement of any kind or character arose regarding the employment relationship that Defendant and employees were unable to resolve themselves. Thus, a significant feature of the agreement was that the arbitration decision would be final and not subject to challenge by appeal, as an administrative decision in a Berman proceeding would be. Id. at *18. Further, pursuant to the arbitration agreement Defendant would pay for case processing fees, the fees and costs of the arbitrator and any hearing-associated room rental charges, which proved beneficial to the employees. The Court of Appeal thus determined that this provision brought the agreement within the requirement that an adhesive arbitration agreement that compels the surrender of Berman protections as a condition of employment must provide for accessible, affordable resolution of wage disputes. Id. Additionally, the Court of Appeal remarked that the fact that the agreement did not require Defendant to bear the cost of legal counsel to represent Plaintiff in the arbitration did not support a finding that the arbitral scheme contemplated by the agreement was substantively unconscionable. Id. at *19. The Court of Appeal observed that an arbitration agreement that does not require the employer to provide the employee with counsel in the arbitration of a wage dispute but otherwise provides the employee with an accessible and affordable arbitral forum for resolving wage disputes cannot be deemed substantively unconscionable. Id. at *20. The Court of Appeal opined that the unconscionability doctrine is instead concerned with whether the agreement is unreasonably favorable to one party, considering in context its commercial setting, purpose, and effect. Id. at *23. Further, the Court of Appeal found that the agreement satisfied the requirement of providing employees with an accessible and affordable process for resolving wage disputes, and the fact that arbitration supplants an administrative hearing cannot be a basis for finding the arbitration agreement unconscionable. Id. at *23-24. Accordingly the Court of Appeal reversed the order denying Defendant's petition to compel arbitration.

Lewings, et al. v. Chipotle Mexican Grill, Inc.*, 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 4673 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. July 1, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of non-exempt workers, brought a class action alleging violations of §§ 3751 and 3752 of the California Labor Code for requiring them to bear the cost of workers' compensation expenses, and violations of §§ 201 and 202 for failing to reimburse a terminated employee for the cost of shoes for crews ("SFC") shoes. Plaintiffs also alleged a violation of § 226(a) for providing deficient wage statements. SFC marketed its non-slip shoes to employers by offering to reimburse them in workers' compensation-related medical expenses if an employee injured was involved in a slip and fall while on the job. Id. at *2. Defendant implemented a SFC program and permitted employees to buy the shoes directly or through a payroll deduction, and based on its employees wearing the shoes, it obtained a reduction in its workers' compensation premiums. Id. Defendant demurred to Plaintiffs' third amended complaint ("TAC") and argued that §§ 3751 and 3752 do not prohibit safe workplace programs that are voluntary, nor do they prohibit third-party warranty reimbursements. Id. at *4. The trial court sustained the demurrer, and dismissed the action. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed. Under § 3751 (a), no employer shall exact or receive from any employee any contribution, or make or take any deduction from the employee's earnings, either directly or indirectly, to cover the whole or any part of the cost of compensation under this division. Id. at *5. The Court of Appeal opined that the warranties covered part of "compensation," and that "compensation" in § 3751(a) means compensation under Division 4 of the Labor Code, and includes every benefit or payment conferred by that division upon an injured employee. Id. at *7. Further, § 4600 provides that an employer must provide an injured worker with medical treatment that is reasonably required to cure or relieve the injured worker from the effects of his or her injury. Id. Here, any time Defendant was self-insured, the warranties directly covered the cost of compensation by paying medical expenses, and any time it had workers' compensation insurance, the warranties indirectly covered the cost of compensation by defraying increases in insurance premiums and replacing lost dividends. Id. The Court of Appeal observed that the warranties were designed to cover, to the extent specified, the cost of compensation, and because employee purchases of the shoes funded the warranties, the warranties extended by SFC for the sole benefit of Defendant were contributions by the employees. Id. at *7-8. Further, the Court of Appeal noted that under § 3751 the employer must bear the entire cost of securing compensation. Id. at *9. Thus, when the employees purchased the shoes, they secured at least part of the cost of compensation, and because Defendant received contractual protection against medical expenses and rising premiums, the Court of Appeal reasoned that it was immaterial whether any employees suffered slip and fall accidents triggering the warranties. Although Defendant argued that the statute does not create a private right of action, the Court of Appeal noted that Ralphs Grocery Company v. Superior Court, 112 Cal. App. 4th 1090, 1102-03 (2003), recognized a private right action under § 3751. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal held that the § 3751 claim survived Defendant's demurrer. Finally, Defendant asserted a special demurrer for uncertainty regarding § 226 claim. Because Plaintiffs properly stated the claim under § 3751, the Court of Appeal ruled that the claim under § 226 should not have been dismissed on the ground that it was derivative of § 3751. Further, Defendant asserted that violations of § 3751 did not support a cause of action under § 226 (a) because § 226 (a) is not violated if an employer reports an unlawful deduction on a pay stub. Id. at *14. The Court of Appeal held that Defendant waived its argument for not raising it earlier. Plaintiffs had alleged that Defendant issued pay stubs that failed to set forth the information required by § 226. Defendant, however, offered no explanation why these alleged deficiencies failed to support the claim under § 226. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed the order of the trial court dismissing the action.

Mendiola, et al. v. CPS Security Solutions, Inc.,* 2015 Cal. LEXIS 3 (Cal. Jan. 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of security guards, brought a class action alleging that Defendant's on-call compensation policy violated minimum wage and overtime obligations imposed by the applicable California Industrial Welfare Commission ("IWC") wage order and the California Labor Code. Defendant employed on-call security guards to provide 24-hour security at construction worksites. Each evening, guards were required to be on-call on-site and respond to disturbances or alarms, and were required to reside in a trailer provided by Defendant. While guards generally could use their on-call time as they chose, they were not allowed children, pets, alcohol, or unapproved visitors, and if they wished to leave the worksite, they were required to notify a dispatcher and wait until a relief guard arrived. If no relief guard was available, the guard had to remain on-site, even in the case of a personal emergency, and if relieved, they had to be accessible by pager or radiophone and able to return to the site within 30 minutes. Id. at *3-4. The guards were paid for all patrol hours, but they received no compensation for on-call time unless an alarm or other circumstance required that the guard conduct an investigation or the guard requested to leave the site and waited for, or was denied, a relief guard. Id. at *4. Concluding that on-call hours constituted compensable "hours worked," the trial court had granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment, and the California Court of Appeal partly affirmed the trial court's judgment. Upon parties' petition for further appellate review, the Supreme Court of California affirmed the Court of Appeal's conclusion that Plaintiffs' on-call time constituted "hours worked" and was thus compensable, including any "sleeping" time. Id. at *9-10. In considering whether on-call time constituted hours worked and the extent of the employer's control, the Supreme Court determined that Plaintiffs' on-call time constituted "hours worked." Id. at *10-11. The Supreme Court noted that Plaintiffs were required to stay on the worksite unless Defendant gave them permission to leave, and if they were allowed to leave, they could be no more than 30 minutes away from the site, and would remain subject to recall. In addition, they were required to respond immediately to any alarms or issues that arose during their on-call time while on-site. The Supreme Court thus found that Defendant exerted control over Plaintiffs in a variety of ways, and their on-call time was spent primarily for the benefit of Defendant because even when not actively responding to disturbances, the guards' "mere presence" was integral to Defendant's business. Id. at *12-13. The Supreme Court rejected Defendant's argument that because the guards could engage in some personal activities – such as sleeping, showering, eating, reading, watching television, and browsing the internet during the on-call time – this was not compensable time, as it did not lessen Defendant's control over Plaintiffs. Id. at *14. The Supreme Court further declined to hold that a sleep period during on-call could be excluded from hours worked by agreement, finding that Wage Order 4 does not permit such an exclusion. The Supreme Court also held that California's wage & hour laws did not "implicitly incorporate" the federal regulations, 29 C.F.R. 785.23, which allows an employer who requires an employee reside on its property to exclude from hours worked time the employee is not carrying out his/her duties, and 29 C.F.R. 785.22, which allows an employer and employee to agree that a sleep period of no more than eight hours may be excluded from hours worked when the employee is scheduled to work a 24 hour shift. Id. at *14-20. The Supreme Court explained that the relevant issue in deciding whether the federal standard had been implicitly incorporated was whether state law and the wage order contained an express exemption similar to that found in federal law. Because Wage Order 4 does not contain any such exemption, and because "courts should not incorporate a federal standard concerning what time is compensable '[a]bsent convincing evidence of the IWC's intent," the Supreme Court concluded that the Wage Order did not implicitly incorporate these exemptions. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Supreme Court held that Plaintiffs' on-call time constituted compensable hours worked within the meaning of Wage Order 4, and that state and federal regulations did not permit Defendant to exclude sleep time from Plaintiffs' "hours worked" by agreement. Id.

Mies, et al. v. Sephora U.S.A., Inc.,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 789 (Cal. App. 1st Dist. Feb. 2, 2015). Plaintiff, a specialist in Defendant's retail store, brought a class action alleging that Defendant misclassified her and 98 other specialists in its various stores as exempt from overtime pay and meal breaks in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification and claimed that the proper classification of specialists could be determined by common proof of the job's general duties and descriptions, without a highly individualized inquiry for each employee. Plaintiff also asserted that statistical evidence would show that specialists spend more than 50% of their time doing non-exempt work and that a statistical sampling of evidence would give proof of class-wide liability. Id. at *5-6. The trial court denied certification, finding that Plaintiff failed to prove class-wide liability. While both Plaintiff and Defendant submitted declarations from specialists who reported doing exempt and non-exempt work in varying degrees during an average workweek, the trial court opined that it could not determine, on a class-wide basis, how they spent their time, and whether Defendant collectively exempted or non-exempted them. Id. at *11. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order. The Court of Appeal determined that the trial court reasonably credited the declarations of specialists from both sides, which, read together, suggested that specialists' exempt duties varied significantly from store to store and specialist to specialist, despite their job description and company-wide operational policies. Id. at *26. Because the central issue was how specialists spent their work time, the Court of Appeal found that Defendant's general operational policies offered little insight into class-wide liability, especially in light of the declarations showing that specialists handled work time very differently, varying as to the nature and level of the tasks and the time spent on those task. Id. at *29. The Court of Appeal further opined that Plaintiff's proposed statistical evidence was undeveloped and unsubstantiated, and thus not adequate for demonstrating the requisite commonality. Id. at *34-35. The Court of Appeal therefore concluded that the trial court rightfully denied class certification.

Miranda, et al. v. Pacer Cartage, Inc.,* Case No. 37-2014-00008552 (Cal. Super. Ct. Jan. 28, 2015). In this action alleging that Defendant misclassified its port truck drivers as independent contractors, the Court upheld the Labor Commissioner's $2 million award to Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs provided services to Defendant out of an agreement with the ports, and Defendant required them to utilize trucks that meet with new regulations of Clean Air Act. In April of 2012, seven Plaintiffs filed a claim with the Labor Commissioner alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors, and that Defendant made improper deductions from their pay. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant did not pay them certain expenses as compelled by the California Labor Code. The Labor Commissioner found for Plaintiffs and awarded them in excess of $2 million. Id. at 2. Upholding the Commissioner's award, the Court found that Defendant exercised sufficient control over Plaintiffs demonstrating an employment relationship. Defendant required Plaintiffs to follow numerous procedures beyond those required under federal safety standards, and other matters that indicated control. Defendant required Plaintiffs to use the trucks only for its business, and to report by radio their job status. Id. at 6. Plaintiffs did not register the vehicles used by them in their own name, and Defendant required them to enter into a complex leasing arrangement for the use of vehicles. Defendant also provided various safety handbooks and safety programs for Plaintiffs, and they faced disciplinary actions for traffic and inspection violations. Id. at 8. Defendant further required Plaintiffs to obtain insurance through it and required them to strictly follow their "procedures." Id. at 8. Moreover, most of the drivers spoke virtually no English and lacked even a high school education to understand the complex leasing and hauling documents. The evidence showed that Defendant ultimately determined whether or not a person could work as a driver and operate its truck, on which it had a substantial economic interest. Id. at 9. On this record, the Court thus concluded that Defendant exercised sufficient control over Plaintiffs. Id. at 10. Additionally, the Court found that Plaintiffs' work formed an essential part of Defendant's business; Defendant supplied the tool and place of work; Plaintiffs maintained long-term relationships with Defendant; Defendant paid Plaintiffs on a weekly basis with a printout showing salary, deductions, and year-to-date earnings; and Plaintiffs did not have the ability to generate profit or loss. Id. at 11-12. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs were Defendant's employees and not independent contractors.

Montano, et al. v. The Wet Seal Retail, Inc.*, 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 8 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Jan. 7, 2015). Plaintiff, a non-exempt retail employee, brought a wage & hour action against Defendant alleging failure to offer all required meal and rest periods, and failure to provide all regular and overtime pay. Plaintiff also asserted a representative claim under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). When Plaintiff moved to compel discovery responses, Defendant moved to compel arbitration of Plaintiff's individual claims and to stay the action pending completion of arbitration. Plaintiff argued that the arbitration agreement was unconscionable because the arbitration agreement waived the right to bring class actions and representative PAGA actions. Id. at *3. The trial court denied the motion to compel arbitration and granted the motion to compel discovery. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. The Court of Appeal noted that Iskanian v. CLS Transportation Los Angeles, LLC 59 Cal. 4th 348 (2014), held that because the PAGA augments the limited enforcement capability of the Labor and Workforce Development Agency ("Agency") by empowering employees to enforce the Labor Code as representatives of the Agency, an agreement by employees to waive their right to bring a PAGA action disables one of the primary mechanisms for enforcing the Labor Code. Id. at *12. Further, the Court of Appeal noted that Iskanian held that because such an agreement indirectly exempts the employer from responsibility for its own violation of law, it is against public policy and may not be enforced, and that whether or not an individual claim is permissible under the PAGA, a prohibition of representative claims frustrates the PAGA's objectives. Id. at *13. Additionally, Iskanian determined that the rule against PAGA waivers does not frustrate the objectives of the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") because the FAA aims to ensure an efficient forum for the resolution of private disputes, whereas a PAGA action is a dispute between an employer and the state Agency. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal opined that under Iskanian, Plaintiff's purported waiver of her right to bring a representative action under the PAGA cannot be enforced. Because the PAGA waiver was invalid, the trial court had applied the arbitration agreement's non-severability provision, and stated that the entire arbitration agreement was void and unenforceable. The Court of Appeal opined that the trial court properly denied the motion to compel arbitration. Defendant also argued that the trial court should not have reached the merits of the discovery motion while its motion to compel arbitration was undetermined. Defendant relied on § 1281.4 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that while a motion to compel arbitration is undetermined, the court in which such action or proceeding is pending shall, upon motion of a party to such action or proceeding, stay the action or proceeding until the application for an order to arbitrate is determined and, if arbitration of such controversy is ordered, until an arbitration is had in accordance with the order to arbitrate. Id. at *16. The Court of Appeal, however, noted that the motion to compel arbitration was denied and the motion to compel further discovery responses was granted on the same date. Thus, when the trial court ruled on the discovery motion, the motion to compel arbitration was no longer pending, and the request for arbitration had been denied. The Court of Appeal thus opined that the Superior Court had no obligation to stay the action under § 1281.4, and accordingly, dismissed this portion of the appeal.

Oregel, et al. v. Pacpizza, LLC,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 3110 (Cal. App. 1st Dist. May 1, 2015). Plaintiff, a pizza delivery driver, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to fully reimburse delivery drivers for necessary expenses associated with using their personal vehicles to deliver pizza on Defendant's behalf in violation of the California Labor Code and Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"). After Defendant's initial denial of Plaintiff's allegations, discovery commenced and continued for 12 months. On September 30, 2013, Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification and the parties stipulated to a modification of the briefing schedule on Plaintiff's motion to allow Defendant time to depose the putative class members who had submitted declarations. Id. at *8. Defendant then deposed 25 putative class members and Plaintiff's counsel spent more than 100 hours of attorney time on these putative class members' depositions alone. Seventeen months after Plaintiff's initial complaint, Defendant demanded arbitration of Plaintiff's claims. Plaintiff opposed the demand for arbitration, arguing that Defendant waived any right to arbitration. The trial court denied Defendant's petition to compel arbitration and entered orders granting Plaintiff's motion for class certification. Defendant appealed. The California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order finding that Plaintiff satisfied his burden of establishing waiver. The Court of Appeal noted that, in the 17 months between Plaintiff's initiation of the class action and Defendant's assertion of the arbitration agreement, Defendant had engaged in substantial conduct inconsistent with its claimed right to arbitrate. Id. at *24. Early in the litigation, Defendant paid jury fees and demanded a jury trial, and acted to preserve its jury rights. Id. at *25. Defendant also attended two case management conferences, and at both conferences, it remained silent about its intent to arbitrate Plaintiff's claims. Further, Defendant not only actively participated in discovery pertaining to Plaintiff's claims, but also propounded its own discovery requests, many of which sought information regarding Plaintiff's class allegations. Id. at *25-26. Moreover, Defendant did not seek enforcement of arbitration agreement even after it represented about the existence of a valid arbitration agreement in its November 2012 responses to Plaintiff's special interrogatories. Id. at *26. The Court of Appeal thus found that Defendant acted inconsistently with its purported right to arbitrate. Defendant argued that it delayed the motion because it believed that it would have been futile to seek enforcement of the arbitration agreement given the state of the law at the time. Particularly, Defendant pointed out that AT&T Mobility v. Concepcion, 131 S. Ct. 1740 (2011), did not provide the desired clarity to California employers with respect to employment arbitration agreements, and that it waited for the California Supreme Court's ruling in Iskanian v. CLS Transportation Los Angeles, LLC, 59 Cal. 4th 348 (2014), for clarification, which held that a party has not acted inconsistently with its right to arbitrate if the party delayed seeking to enforce an arbitration agreement during a time when that agreement would have been considered unenforceable under existing law. Id. at *26-27. The Court of Appeal, however, found that Defendant's theory was fatally flawed because the line of cases on which it relied all involved the enforceability of arbitration agreements containing express class action waivers, unlike the arbitration provision at issue. Id. at *28-29. Defendant did not identify any authority decided in the period just prior to its petition that changed the governing law and suggested that the arbitration agreement at issue would suddenly be enforceable. Id. at *30. Further, Defendant did not petition for arbitration before the filing of any briefing on class certification, and the record suggested that Defendant kept open the option of arbitrating while it conducted discovery and asserted its purported right to arbitrate when it appeared that a class would be certified. Id. at *30-31. According to the Court of Appeal, Defendant took advantage of judicial discovery procedures, and Plaintiff suffered prejudice far beyond merely incurring legal fees and costs. Id. at *33-34. The Court of Appeal therefore concluded that Defendant waived any claimed right to arbitrate, and accordingly, affirmed the trial court's order.

Palacio, et al. v. Jan & Gail's Care Homes, Inc.,* 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 1093 (Cal. App. 5th Dist. Dec. 7, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action alleging that Defendant, a residential care facility for developmentally disabled individuals, violated the California Labor Code and Wage Order 5 by depriving her of uninterrupted meal periods. Id. at *3. Defendant operated six 24-hour facilities, and employees worked varied shifts, including full-time, part-time, day, overnight, afternoon split, and weekend-only shifts. Id. at *2. Under Wage Order 5, a residential care facility's on-duty direct care staff must provide 24-hour care to clients to protect them from illness, injury, fire, and other emergencies. Under § 11(E) of Wage Order 5, a residential care facility's employees may be required to work on-duty meal periods without penalty, provided: (i) it is necessary to meet regulatory or approved program standards; (ii) the employee eats with residents during residents' meals; and (iii) the employer provides the same meal to the employee at no charge. Id. at *5. Consequently, Defendant required Plaintiff and other direct care employees to work on-duty meal periods and required them to sign an agreement waiving their right to an uninterrupted meal period in accordance with § 11(E) of Wage Order 5. Id. Defendant terminated Plaintiff in late 2013, and she brought this action contending that Defendant's policy of requiring employees to waive their right to an uninterrupted meal period violated the Labor Code and Wage Order 5 because it failed to inform employees that they also had the right to revoke their waiver at any time in accordance with § 11(A). Plaintiff also sought certification of a class of all former and current employees and contended that by failing to inform about the right to revoke, Defendant had a general policy that violated wage & hour laws that was common among class members. Id. The trial court denied Plaintiff's motion, finding that that Plaintiff failed to prove predominant questions of law or fact. Plaintiff appealed and argued that the trial court erred by not holding that, in addition to § 11(E), Defendant was also obligated to comply with § 11(A). Id. at *6. The California Court of Appeal rejected Plaintiff's argument and affirmed the trial court. Applying principles of statutory construction, the Court of Appeal found that nothing in § 11(E) suggested that it was meant to be read in conjunction with § 11(A). Id. at *8. To the contrary, the Court of Appeal reasoned that the two provisions were irreconcilable, and it would be inconsistent to allow an employer to require an employee to work on-duty meal periods under § 11(E), yet permit the employee to revoke that requirement at any time under § 11(A), which would render the word "require" in § 11(E) meaningless. Id. at *8-9. In addition, the Court of Appeal noted that Plaintiff's interpretation of Wage Order 5 would place Defendant and other residential care facilities in a "precarious state," because if employees were permitted to revoke the on-duty meal period requirement at any time, employers would need to alter scheduling practices to allow the employee to do so, while ensuring continuous care for the residents. Id. at *9. According to the Court of Appeal, even if such an arrangement were feasible, it could not have been what the IWC intended because § 11(E) permits employees to take off-duty meal periods upon 30 days' notice to the employer, without revoking the on-duty meal period requirement. Id. at *9-10. The Court of Appeal therefore concluded that Defendant was not obligated to comply with § 11(A). Thus, the trial court's finding that predominant questions of law or fact did not exist was not based on erroneous legal assumptions. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's denial of class certification.

Paprock, et al. v. First Transit,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 3430 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. May 18, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former non-exempt bus drivers, filed a wage & hour class action in 2010 asserting violations of the California Labor Code for failure to provide required meal and rest breaks and to pay wages (the "Paprock class action"). In 2008, another employee, Eric P. Clarke, had filed an action under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA") to recover civil penalties (the "Clarke PAGA action"). Id. at *12. The Clarke PAGA action was stayed in February 2009, and remained stayed. Id. In March 2010, another employee, Angel Alonzo, filed a class action (the "Alonzo class action") alleging many of the same violations of the California Labor Code asserted by Plaintiffs in the Paprock class action. Clarke was a member of the certified class in the Alonzo class action. Id. at *14. In the Paprock class action, Clarke filed a motion to intervene, and to have his attorneys appointed as lead counsel in the Paprock class action, which the trial court denied. Id. at *4. The parties subsequently settled the action, and the trial court preliminarily approved the settlement. Three months after the preliminary approval, and seven weeks before the final fairness hearing, Clarke filed a second motion to intervene, which the trial court once again denied. Clarke appealed, and meanwhile, the parties filed a motion to approve the settlement, which the trial court granted, and thereafter issued a final judgment. Id. at *8. Clarke appealed the judgment. Clarke then filed a motion to vacate judgment, which was also denied by the trial court, and Clarke appealed. In these appeals, Clarke challenged two orders and the trial court's judgment, which the California Court of Appeals granted in part. Clarke first argued that the trial court erred in dismissing his motion to intervene because he met the requirements for both mandatory and permissive intervention under § 387 of the California Code of Civil Procedure. The Court of Appeals noted that under mandatory intervention, a prospective intervener must demonstrate both adequate interest in the outcome, and inadequate representation of its interest by either party. Id. at *18. Under permissive intervention, the trial court has discretion to permit a non-party to intervene where: (i) proper procedures have been followed; (ii) the non-party has a direct and immediate interest in the action; (iii) the intervention will not enlarge the issues in the litigation; and (iv) the reasons for the intervention outweigh any opposition. Id. at *21. As to Clarke's mandatory intervention theory, the Court of Appeals noted that he presented no evidence regarding his purported status as a Paprock class action member, and therefore, he forfeited appellate review of the finding that he was not a class members. Id. at *26. As to permissive intervention, Clarke argued that even if he was not a class member, the trial court erred because he had an interest in the Paprock class action. According to Clarke, since the settlement of the Paprock class action included payment for, and a release of, the class' potential PAGA claims, his claim for PAGA penalties in the Clarke PAGA action would be adversely affected. Id. at *29. The Court of Appeals disagreed, finding that only the aggrieved employees of Defendant who were represented in the Paprock class action were bound by the settlement and related judgment. Id. at *30. The Court of Appeals concluded that the judgment would have no preclusive effect on the claims in Clarke PAGA action. Id. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's order denying his motion to intervene. The Court of Appeals further concluded that because Clarke was denied his right to intervene on the basis that he was not a member of the Paprock class action, he lacked standing to appeal judgment. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals dismissed Clarke's appeal challenging the judgment. Id. at *33. In his third appeal, Clarke argued that the trial court erred in denying his motion to vacate judgment. The Court of Appeals noted that the judgment was filed on September 13, Plaintiffs gave notice of its filing on September 16, and Clarke timely filed a motion to vacate the judgment 15 days later. The Court of Appeals observed that 80 days after Clarke filed his motion to vacate judgment, Plaintiffs prepared an ex parte application to dismiss his motion for lack of jurisdiction on two independent grounds, including: (i) § 663a sets a 60-day limit on the trial court's power to vacate a judgment, and more than 60 days had passed since Clarke filed the motion; and (ii) Clarke's appeal from the judgment had divested the trial court of jurisdiction. Id. at *34-35. The Court of Appeals held that pursuant to § 663, a motion must be decided within 60 days of its filing, or the effect shall be denial of the motion without further order of the trial court. Id. at *36. The Court of Appeals, accordingly, ruled that because Clarke had appealed the judgment, the trial court was without jurisdiction to hear his motion to vacate. Finding that the trial court erred in denying Clarke's motion to vacate, the Court of Appeals reversed and remanded.

Phillips et al. v. So-Cal Dominoids, Inc.*, 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 4678 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. July 1, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought an action against Defendants alleging several wage & hour violations under the California Labor Code and the Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). Defendants moved to compel arbitration and to dismiss Plaintiffs' class and representative claims based on alternative dispute resolution agreements (the "ADR agreements") that Plaintiffs signed in connection with their employment. The trial court denied the motion, finding that the parties carved out class actions and representative actions in the ADR agreements from binding arbitration and permitted Plaintiffs to proceed in the trial court. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed and remanded. Defendants contended that a proper analysis of the ADR agreements showed that Plaintiffs expressly agreed to submit all of their employment and wage-related claims to binding arbitration. Id. at *9. Defendants maintained that any interpretation of the ADR agreements as "carving-out" class claims contravened fundamental rules of contract interpretation that required contracts to be construed as a whole. Id. According to their terms, the ADR agreements applied to any claim or dispute arising out of or related to the employment relationship or its termination, including claims of wrongful termination, harassment, discrimination, breach of contract, and tort claims. Id. at *5. The ADR agreements excluded the claims of non-parties by stating that: "[t]he parties wish to resolve any disputes between them in an individualized, informal, timely, and inexpensive manner . . . Consequently, the Arbitrator shall not consolidate or combine the resolution of any claim or dispute between the two parties to this ADR agreement with the resolution of any claim by any other party." Id. The Court of Appeal noted that the plain language of the ADR agreement, particularly the provision that required the parties to resolve any dispute between them in an individualized manner in arbitration, supported its conclusion that the agreements barred class and representative claims. Id. at *12. In view of the scope of the covered disputes clause, the Court of Appeal did not agree that the prohibition on class or representative actions showed that the parties intended to carve out such class claims from arbitration. The Court of Appeal found that the ADR agreements constituted the parties' unequivocal waiver of their right to bring any employment related claim in the trial court and that the language appearing in the agreements, when construed in its ordinary and popular sense, constituted a class action waiver. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's order denying Defendants' motion to compel arbitration. The Court of Appeal, however, found that the ADR agreements were unenforceable to the extent that the parties sought to waive Plaintiffs' PAGA claim. The Court of Appeal noted that in Iskanian v. CLS Transportation Los Angeles, LLC, 59 Cal. 4th 348 (2014), the California Supreme Court held that parties cannot waive a Plaintiff's right to bring a representative PAGA claim in an arbitration agreement. Id. at *15. Plaintiffs contended that arbitration must be stayed pending the outcome of their PAGA claims pursuant to § 1281.3 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which states that if a trial court determines that there are other issues between the parties to an arbitration, which are part of the pending action but not subject to arbitration, the trial court may delay its order to arbitrate until determination of such other issues. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal stayed the arbitration pending resolution of Plaintiffs' PAGA claims.

Rosas, et al. v. Capital Grille Holdings, Inc.,* Case No. BC507869 (Cal. Super. Ct. Oct. 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of food service employees, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants failed to provide them rest breaks and failed to compensate them for the time worked during rest breaks in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs moved for class certification, and the Court denied the motion. Based on the evidence both the parties' submitted, the Court remarked that Plaintiffs failed to provide sufficient evidence that Defendants maintained a uniform policy or practice denying rest breaks or denying compensation to employees for each day they were not provided with a rest break in compliance with California law. Id. at 2. The Court found that Plaintiffs also failed to show that common questions of law and fact would predominate this litigation, that their claims were typical of the class, or that a class action would be superior to individualized litigation of their claims. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Salazar, et al. v. Avis Budget Group, Inc.,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 1366 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. Feb. 27, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of mechanics, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to provide various classifications of auto mechanics with meal periods or premium wages for missed meal periods in accordance with the California Labor Code. Id. at *1. After the case was removed, Plaintiffs moved to certify a state-wide class of auto mechanics who performed work for Defendant since November 2002. Id. at *2. After denial of class certification because individual issues predominated, the case was remanded. Subsequently, Plaintiffs then filed a renewed motion for class certification requesting certification of a class of all auto mechanics who worked for Defendant for a period of more than six hours on one or more days on and after November 2002 until December 2011. Id. In support, Plaintiffs produced evidence that they did not always receive meal breaks of at least 30 minutes on days when they worked more than six hours and a second 30-minute meal break on days when they worked more than ten hours. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs further claimed that Defendant's policies and practices encouraged employees to delay, skip, or interrupt meal periods. Id. at *3-4. The trial court denied Plaintiffs' renewed motion, concluding that Plaintiffs failed to establish the existence of predominant common questions of law or fact. Id. at *5. Specifically, the trial court found that the evidence showed a significant variance in whether, when, and how putative class members received meal breaks. Id. On appeal, Plaintiffs argued that the trial court relied on improper criteria to deny class certification. Plaintiffs asserted that the trial court did not give proper weight to Defendant's failure to keep proper time records of meal breaks, which, according to Plaintiffs, created a presumption that Defendant was not providing meal periods. Id. at *10. The California Court of Appeal rejected Plaintiffs' argument and affirmed the trial court's ruling. The Court of Appeal found that the trial court's conclusion – that Plaintiffs failed to present evidence establishing a uniform policy on the part of Defendant to deprive putative class members of the ability to take meals breaks – was supported by the record. Id. at *13. Defendant submitted declarations from numerous auto mechanics stating that they could take meal breaks, while some chose to take shorter breaks or skip them altogether on occasion. Id. Further, the records showed numerous variances in when and how putative class members received meal breaks. The Court of Appeal noted that while some clocked-out for their meal periods and others did not, some took at a specified time and some had flexibility to decide when to take their meal break, and yet some decided on their own when to take a meal break. Id. at *14. The Court of Appeal thus agreed with the trial court that the putative class members could not meet the commonality requirement. Regarding Plaintiffs' argument on Defendant's alleged failure to keep proper time records, the Court of Appeal held that Plaintiffs failed to establish common issues of law or fact despite the time records, and thus the trial court acted within in its discretion in denying certification. Id. at *16-17. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order denying class certification.

Valdovinos, et al. v. American Logistics Co., LLC*, 2015 Cal. Unpub. LEXIS 7266 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. Oct. 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former drivers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors. Plaintiffs filed a motion to certify a class of drivers who entered into written agreement purporting to provide services to Defendant as an independent contractor, and who were required to have and maintain a California Public Utilities Commission License as an owner-operator. Id. at *7. The trial court denied their motion, finding that Plaintiffs failed to establish the requirements of typicality, predominance, and superiority. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. At the outset, the Court of Appeal noted that the test of typicality was whether class members have the same or similar injury, whether the action is based on the conduct which is not unique to the named Plaintiffs, and whether other class members have been injured by the same course of conduct. Id. at *12. In its order denying certification, the trial court noted the absence of any substantive declarations on class certification issues, except for two brief declarations submitted by the named Plaintiffs concerning their understanding and acceptance of the role of a class representative. Id. at *13. The Court of Appeal noted that the only substantive evidence presented were excerpts from Plaintiffs' deposition. Id. at *14. The Court of Appeal found that this did not provide the necessary evidence to establish typicality. The Court of Appeal remarked that there was no evidence that any putative class member had a similar experience, nor did Plaintiffs offer any evidence to contradict the declaration of Defendant's president establishing that administrators were separate entities from Defendant. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order denying class certification.

Williams, et al. v. Superior Court Of Los Angeles County*, 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 421 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. May 15, 2015). Plaintiff, a retail employee, brought a representative action alleging that Defendant failed to provide its employees with meal and rest breaks or premium pay in lieu thereof, and failed to provide accurate wage statements in violation of the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). Plaintiff served special interrogatories and requested Defendant to produce names and contact information of all of its non-exempt employees. Defendant objected to the discovery, contending that it was irrelevant, overbroad, and unduly burdensome, and implicated the privacy rights of its employees. Id. at *2. Plaintiff then moved to compel discovery. The trial court granted the motion and directed Defendant to produce contact information for the employees only at its Costa Mesa store, and denied production of discovery relative to Defendant's other 128 stores state-wide. Id. Plaintiff sought a writ of mandate compelling the trial court to vacate its discovery order, which the California Court of Appeal denied. Plaintiff argued that the immediate discovery of state-wide employees was necessary for progress in his PAGA action. The Court of Appeal found that in this action, discovery was not completed, even Plaintiff had not been deposed. Id. at *5. The Court of Appeal remarked that the litigation therefore was based only on allegations in the complaint, where Plaintiff alleged that he and perhaps other employees at the store were subjected to violations of the Labor Code at the Costa Mesa Store. Id. at *6. The Court of Appeal remarked that nowhere did Plaintiff evince knowledge of Defendant's practices at other stores, nor any fact that would lead a reasonable person to believe that he knew whether Defendant had a uniform state-wide policy. Id. Plaintiff argued that in a PAGA action such as this, he stood in as a proxy for the California Division of Labor Standards Enforcement ("DLSE"), and should thus be entitled to all discovery to which DLSE would be entitled. The Court of Appeal disagreed, finding that nothing in the PAGA suggested that a private litigant standing in as a proxy to the DLSE was entitled to the same access. Id. at *8. The Court of Appeal also concluded that Defendant's employees' privacy interests guaranteed under the California Constitution outweighed Plaintiff's need to discover their identity at this time. Id. at *10. The Court of Appeals explained that Plaintiff would be entitled to a state-wide discovery after he established that he was himself subjected to violations of the California Labor Code, and showed that Defendants employment practices were uniform. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's order.

(ii) Georgia

Anderson, et al. v. Southern Home Care Services, Inc.,* 2015 Ga. LEXIS 906 (Ga. Nov. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought an action in the state court alleging that Defendant denied them minimum wages under the Georgia Minimum Wage Law ("GMWL"). Id. at *1. Plaintiffs provided in-home personal support services to Defendant' medically home-bound clients. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs alleged that the GMWL requires Defendant to pay at least $5.15 per hour for the employees' unpaid workday travel time. Id. at *2-3. Defendant removed the case to federal court and moved for judgment, arguing first that they were subject to the FLSA and Plaintiffs were not covered by § 34-4-3(a) of the OCGA, and second that the GMWL did not apply to Plaintiffs because they were "domestic employees" exempted under § 34-4-3(b)(3). Id. at *4. The federal court certified two issues to the Georgia Supreme Court. Plaintiffs relied on § 34-4-3(a) for their $5.15/hour claim, and Defendant relied on § 34-4-3(c), which provides that GMWL is not applicable to an employer who is subject to the minimum wage provisions of any act of Congress as to employees covered if such law provides minimum wages more than the GMWL. Id. at *5. Defendant argued that they were covered by the FLSA, because the FLSA provides greater minimum wage than the GMWL. The Supreme Court remarked that it was undisputed that Defendant, as companies with employees and clients in multiple states, were enterprises in commerce, and were subject to the FLSA's minimum wage provisions. Id. at *6. The parties agreed for the purposes of answering the certified questions that from November 21, 2004 until at least January 1, 2015, the employees fell under the companionship services exemption, which exempts the FLSA's minimum wage and maximum hour protections. Id. at *7. The Supreme Court observed that during this period, the federal regulation defined companionship services as including meal preparation, bed making, washing clothes, and other similar services. Id. at *8. Defendant argued that even though Plaintiffs fell under the FLSA exemption, they were still covered by the FLSA because Plaintiffs were exempt only from the minimum wage and maximum hour requirements, meaning that they were covered by other FLSA provisions. Id. at *10. The Supreme Court noted that § 34-4-3(c) does not speak in terms of employees' coverage by the FLSA, as it removed from the GMWL's protection employees who were covered by the minimum wage provisions of a federal statute like the FLSA. Id. Accordingly, the Supreme Court answered the first certified question in the negative. Defendant argued that even if Plaintiffs were not exempt under § 34-4-3(c), they were exempt as "domestic employees" under § 34-4-3(b)(2), which provides that the GMWL shall not apply with respect to any employer of domestic employees. Id. at *13. The Supreme Court noted that the Georgia Department of Labor has interpreted "domestic services" as those services performed in or about the private home of the person employing the individual. Id. at *15. The Supreme Court likewise observed that the FLSA also defines domestic services as those services performed around a private home. Id. at *16. The Supreme Court observed that here, the employees were not providing domestic services. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that the "domestic employees" term as used in § 34-4-3(b)(2) provided employee must work in or about homes of their employers, and Defendant was therefore not exempt from the GMWL under that provision. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Supreme Court answered the second certified question in the negative as well.

Fulton County, Georgia v. Andrews, et al.*, 2015 Ga. App. LEXIS 332 (Ga. App. June 11, 2015). A group of current and former attorneys employed with the Office of the Public Defender ("the Public Defenders") brought an action against Fulton County, Georgia, alleging breach of contract and violation of county laws. Id. at *1. The issue arose when the County increased the salary of the County Attorneys, creating an allegedly unlawful pay disparity between the two attorney groups. Following discovery, the trial court granted the Public Defenders' motion for summary judgment, which the Georgia Court of Appeals affirmed. The County asserted that the trial court erred by concluding that the County's Personnel Regulations constituted the entire employment agreement between the parties, and instead argued that only the offer letters set forth the terms of employment should be enforced. Id. at *8. The Court of Appeals, however, found that under the Civil Service Act of 1982, the Personnel Regulations, including the requirement that the same schedule of pay be equitably applied to all positions in the same class, have the full force and effect of law. Id. Further, the Court of Appeals ruled that the County was without authority to override the Personnel Regulations by creating its own terms in an offer letter. Id. at *9. The Court of Appeals also noted that PR 300-1 expressly mandated that no employee shall be paid at a salary rate lower than the minimum or higher than the maximum of the salary range approved and established. Id. at *10. The Court of Appeals thus opined that the County had no authority to unilaterally create a pay disparity between the County Attorneys and the Public Defenders. Id. The County also contended that the Public Defenders could not establish a breach of contract claim because they were relying on the County Attorneys' contracts to which they were neither parties nor intended beneficiaries. Id. at *11. The Court of Appeals, however, reasoned that the Personnel Regulations clearly established a minimum and maximum salary rate for all employees and provided that no employee shall be paid outside his or her designated salary range. Id. Thus, the Court of Appeals concluded that by awarding a higher percentage of premium pay to the County Attorneys, who were members of the same classification as the Public Defenders, the County breached its contractual obligations to the Public Defenders under the Personnel Regulations. Id. at *12. The County further asserted that the trial court erred in concluding that the County violated the Personnel Regulations, because OCGA § 36-1-21 vested the County with authority to compensate the Public Defenders and the County Attorneys as it sees fit under home rule. The Court of Appeals rejected this argument on the basis that OCGA § 36-1-21 was inapplicable where a civil service system was created by the General Assembly, as was the County's system. Id. Further, the County asserted that requiring it to pay the Public Defenders in the same range as the County Attorneys would violate the Gratuities Clause of the Georgia Constitution, which prevented the General Assembly from granting extra compensation to any public officer after the service has been rendered. Id. at *13. The Court of Appeals, however, remarked that the Public Defenders were not seeking extra compensation, but the compensation they were legally entitled to under the Personnel Regulations in force at the time they performed their services. Id. Finally, the County argued that its personnel decision to compensate the Public Defenders differently was not unusual as it paid different salaries to judges in Georgia. Id. at *14. The Court of Appeals stated that the statute expressly determines the varying salaries for different judicial offices. The Public Defenders and County Attorneys, however, are within the same employment classification. Thus, the Court of Appeals concluded that the County was obligated to compensate the Public Defenders and County Attorneys within the same salary range, and affirmed the judgment of the trial court.

(i) Kentucky

Hisle, et al. v. Correctcare-Integrated Health, Inc.,* 2015 Ky. App. LEXIS 89 (Ky. App. June 12, 2015). Plaintiffs, a certified medication aide and two nurses, brought an action under the Kentucky Wages & Hours Act alleging that Defendant denied them their statutory rest and meal breaks over the course of their respective tenures of employment. Plaintiffs worked at a Kentucky Department of Corrections ("KDOC") penal facility located in Fayette County. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs based their claims on KDOC's requirement that nurses carry and/or otherwise monitor a handheld two-way radio while working inside the prison facilities, including during their 30-minute lunch breaks for which Defendant automatically deducted pay. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs alleged that they performed compensable work during lunch breaks each and every day they worked at KDOC without compensation. Id. at *3. The trial court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, finding that merely monitoring radio communications during meal breaks did not amount to a denial of a bona fide meal break. Id. at *4. In doing so, the trial court also found that the record demonstrated that such a requirement did not impair the employees' ability to comfortably and adequately pass their meal time. Id. Defendant then moved for separate trials on each claim against its stressing the variance of anticipated proof with respect to the location, times, supervisory practices and other circumstances of each of Plaintiffs' shifts over the years. Id. The trial court, however, found that the claims could be managed in a single trial, and ordered Plaintiffs to provide information with specifics and particulars for calculating the amount claimed for each Plaintiff. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiffs could not submit the required evidence, and therefore the trial court instructed the jury to determine whether Defendant provided Plaintiffs with bona fide meal breaks in accordance with the "predominance benefit" test and the rule articulated in White v. Baptist Memorial Health Care Corp., 699 F.3d 869 (6th Cir. 2012). Id. at *5. The predominant benefit test is applied by nearly all federal circuits, including the Sixth Circuit, and states that a specific period of an employee's time is "work time," and thus compensable, but only if the employee spends that time predominantly performing the duties for the employer's benefit. Id. at *13. The jury found that Defendant met its duty, and in cases where Plaintiffs did not receive the breaks, they had failed to follow Defendant's procedure for reporting uncompensated work time to get reimbursed. Id. at *7-8. Plaintiffs appealed, arguing that the trial court erred by denying their motion for a directed verdict as to liability and issued improper instructions to the jury. Plaintiffs asserted that, because the evidence at trial established without challenge that Plaintiffs performed work duties at all times during their shifts, the trial court should have granted their motion for a directed verdict as to liability. Id. at *10. The Kentucky Court of Appeals disagreed, and affirmed the trial court's verdict. Because Plaintiffs had initially conceded that the predominant benefit standard was the appropriate standard to be applied and the Sixth Circuit and other federal circuits have adopted the predominant benefit standard, the Court of Appeals found that a directed verdict was not appropriate and the trial court appropriately instructed the jury to adopt the predominant benefit test. Id. at *15. The Court of Appeals further found that the trial court appropriately informed the jury of Plaintiffs' burden to prove that they missed specific meal breaks and acted reasonably to be compensated for them. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's obligation to pay them arose from its knowledge that they had performed compensable work, not from any duty of the employees to affirmatively demand payment for the work they performed. Id. at *16. The Court of Appeals, however, noted that the U.S. Supreme Court and the Sixth Circuit have made it clear that the employees bear the burden of proving that he or she performed substantial duties and spend his or her meal time predominantly for the employer's benefits, and Plaintiffs' claim that they missed lunch practically every day due to the fact that they carried around a radio did not establish with specificity a claim for compensable time. Id. at *17-20. The Court of Appeals thus found no error in trial court's jury instructions, and accordingly, affirmed its verdict.

McCann, et al. v. The Sullivan University System, Inc.,* 2015 Ky. App. LEXIS 31 (Ky. App. Feb. 27, 2015). Plaintiff, an Admissions Officer at Defendant's school, brought a putative class and collective action in state court alleging that Defendant violated Kentucky's wage & hour laws by misclassifying Admissions Officers as exempt employees and by failing to pay them overtime compensation. The trial court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification, finding that KRS § 337.385 prohibits class certification. Upon appeal, the Kentucky Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's order. The Court of Appeals held that KRS § 337.385 does not permit individuals to pursue claims for unpaid wages and overtime in Kentucky in a representative capacity. Id. at *8-9. The Court of Appeals relied on the language in KRS § 337.385(2) stating that actions for unpaid wages and overtime may be maintained only by one or more employees "for and in behalf of himself, herself, or themselves." Id. The Court of Appeals also agreed with Defendant that the language in KRS § 337.385 contrasted sharply with the FLSA's language, which expressly permits workers to bring claims for wage & hour violations on behalf of themselves or other employees similarly-situated. Id. at *9. The Court of Appeals pointed out that when Kentucky's General Assembly enacted KRS § 337.385, it did not include any language allowing representative or collective actions; instead, it plainly expressed that an action may be brought only by one or more employees on behalf of themselves. Id. The Court of Appeals therefore concluded that KRS § 337.385 "does not permit actions to be brought on behalf of employees who are similarly-situated." Id. Plaintiff argued that Rules 1 and 23 of the Kentucky Rules of Civil Procedure make class actions available in all civil actions. The Court of Appeals, however, pointed out that KRS § 337.385's language specifying who "may bring an action for unpaid wages is contained in a substantive statute and is intertwined with the statute's rights and remedies," and thus the class action provisions in Rule 23 of the Kentucky Rules of Civil Procedure "cannot override KRS § 337.385's limitation on who may bring claims for unpaid wages." Id. at *13. The Court of Appeals therefore concluded that the plain language of KRS § 337.385 does not permit representative actions, and accordingly, affirmed the trial court's denial of Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

(ii) Massachusetts

Clark, et al. v. Legal Sea Foods, LLC*, Case No. 2014-01206 (Mass. Super. Ct. April 14, 2015). Plaintiffs, four former wait staff employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendant had a practice of requiring them to share tips with employees who performed silverware rolling duties, in violation of Massachusetts Tips Act ("Tips Act"). The Tips Act protects the wages and tips of employees such as wait staff employees, service employees, and service bartenders, and provides that if an employer or person submits a bill that imposes a charge or tip, the total proceeds should go to such employees. Id. at *3. Defendant had a policy or practice under which servers often gave 10% of their tips to bus persons, and 5% each to food runners and bartenders. Id. When bus persons began rolling silverware, servers added $2.00 per shift to the 10% share of their tips. Plaintiffs moved for class certification, which the Court denied. At the outset, the Court found that the class did not satisfy the typicality requirement. Plaintiffs' case hinged on a job description titled "silverware roller," which was initially understood by the Court to mean that wait staff employees were sharing their tips with employees whose sole job was to roll silverware into napkins, and who did not wait on customers or clear their tables. Id. at *5. In fact, all silverware rollers were hired as bus persons, and appear to have spent most of their time over the course of each pay period clearing tables. Id. The Court observed that the purpose of the Tips Act is to protect the wages and tips of certain employees, and bus persons clearly fell within the ambit of the statute. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs' claim would survive only if it ruled that silverware rolling by bus persons disqualified the bus persons from receiving tips. Id. For this reason, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy typicality requirement. The Court also found that Plaintiffs' claims would require that individual questions predominate as it would have to determine based on each shift worked by each server, whether that server shared tips, the amount of tips that was shared, and which bus persons spent rolling silverware. Id. at *7. Because of these individual questions, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy predominance requirement. Finally, the Court ruled that class action was not a superior method of adjudication under the circumstances, and denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Machado, et al. v. System4LLC*, 2015 Mass. LEXIS 163 (Mass. April 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of franchiseed janitorial workers, brought an action alleging that Defendants System4 LLC (the master franchisor) and NECCS, Inc. (the regional sub-franchisor) misclassified them as exempt employees.

Plaintiffs signed franchise agreements only with Defendant NECCS, Inc.; however, the complaint did not differentiate between the two Defendants, and alleged that NECCS was an agent of System4, and existed solely to conduct the business with the latter. Id. at *2. System4 filed a motion to compel arbitration based on the arbitration clause that Plaintiffs signed in their franchise agreements with NECCS. The trial court found the arbitration agreement to be unconscionable, and because System4 was not a signatory to the franchise agreements, Plaintiffs could proceed to litigate their claims. Id. at *8. On appeal, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts reversed in part. At the outset, the Supreme Judicial Court noted that case law precedents have recognized six theories for binding non-signatories to arbitration agreements, including: (i) incorporation by reference; (ii) assumption; (iii) agency; (iv) veil piercing/alter ego; (v) equitable estoppel; and (vi) third-party beneficiary. Id. at *11. The Supreme Judicial Court opined that the theory of equitable estoppel governed by state contract law applied to this case. Equitable estoppel allows a non-signatory to compel arbitration in circumstances when a signatory must rely on the terms of the written agreement in asserting its claims against non-signatory, or when a signatory raises allegations of substantially interdependent and concerted misconduct by both the non-signatory and one or more of the signatories. Id. at *13. Here, Supreme Judicial Court observed that Plaintiffs asserted multiple claims that were inextricably intertwined with and related directly to the franchise agreements containing the arbitration provision. Id. at *17. The agreement was replete with references to Plaintiffs' duties and responsibilities as franchisee, and System4's liability, if any, could not be determined without reference to the agreement. Id. at *20. The Supreme Judicial Court remarked that Plaintiffs could not avoid arbitration with System4 when the issues System4 was seeking to resolve in arbitration were intertwined with the agreements that Plaintiffs signed. Id. at *21. The Supreme Judicial Court observed that not only did Plaintiffs consistently allege concerted misconduct by Defendants, but also they lumped the two of them together, asserting each claim in their complaint against System4 and NECCS collectively. Id. at *22. Because a decision-maker must analyse the franchise agreements in assessing the merits of Plaintiffs' claims relating to misconduct between System4 and NECCS, the Supreme Judicial Court concluded that System4 could compel arbitration. Id. at *24. Plaintiffs argued that, even though System4 could compel arbitration, their Wage Act claims were not arbitrable. Plaintiffs relied on Crocker v. Townsend Oil Co., 464 Mass. 1 (2012), holding that a release of claims must specifically reference the Wage Act in order to apply to Wage Act claims. Id. The Supreme Judicial Court noted that that arbitration agreements were not equivalent to claim releases, since one releases the claim completely, the arbitration agreements only dictates the forum in which Plaintiffs' right can be determined. Id. at *26. Because the arbitration clause did not mention the Wage Act claims specifically, as it classified Plaintiffs as independent contractors, the Supreme Judicial Court affirmed the trial court's order to proceed with those claims in the trial court. Accordingly, the Supreme Judicial Court reversed the trial court's order in part.

Meshna, et al. v. Constantine Scrivanos*, 2015 Mass. LEXIS 161 (Mass. April 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former food franchise employees, brought a class action challenging Defendants' no-tipping policy in violation of the Massachusetts Tips Act, and Massachusetts General Laws, G.L. ch. 149, § 152A. The trial court granted summary judgment to Defendants, concluding that the no-tipping policy was not a violation of the Tips Act; however, the trial court denied the motion on the claims challenging Defendants' policy of placing money left as tips in the cash register, as well as a policy of placing money left as tips in abandoned change. At Plaintiffs' request, two questions were certified to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts Court, including: (i) does G.L. ch. § 149, § 152A allow an employer to maintain a no-tipping policy; and (ii) if a no-tipping policy is permitted, can an employer be liable if the employer fails to communicate to the customers, and even after communication of the policy the customers still leave tips that are retained by the employer. Id. at *3. The Supreme Judicial Court answered the first question in the affirmative, and the second one in the negative. The Supreme Judicial Court noted that Defendants had instituted various mechanisms for enforcing the no-tipping policy, including placing signs in the stores stating "no tipping" or "thank you for not tipping." Id. at *5. At the outset, the Supreme Judicial Court noted that the Tips Act protects the wages and tips of employees. Id. at *7. Relying on G.L. ch. 149, § 152A, Plaintiffs contended that the Tips Act prohibits employer from instituting a no-tipping policy. The Supreme Judicial Court noted G.L. ch. 149, § 152A states that an employer is prohibited from demanding, requesting, or accepting a "deduction" from a tip "given to a covered employee." Id. at *9. The Supreme Judicial Court found that based on the plain and unambiguous language of the statute, an employer may not take away from a service charge, tip, or gratuity that was given to a wait staff employee. The Supreme Judicial Court reasoned that a tip that was given to an employee would include a tip that was handed directly to the employee or left on the counter for the employee, or a sum designated as a tip or gratuity on a customer's credit card slip. Id. at *10. The Supreme Judicial Court further held that the Tip Act also contemplated that tips intended for employees may be given directly to an employer, and prohibits an employer from retaining a service charge or tip that was paid to the employer rather than to the wait staff employee. Id. at *11. The Supreme Judicial Court however, noted that no language in G.L. ch. 149, § 152A or elsewhere in the Tips Act prohibits an employer from imposing a no-tipping policy; instead, the Tip Act addressed circumstances in which tipping is permitted, and what the employer is required to do with such tips. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Supreme Judicial Court concluded that G.L. ch. 149, § 152A does not prohibit employers from implementing a no-tipping policy. In response to the second question, the Supreme Judicial Court concluded that if an employer had not clearly communicated its no-tipping policy to customers, tips left by customers where service is provided by wait staff belong to those employees, and may not be retained by the employer. Id. at *15. On the other hand, where the employer has clearly communicated to customers that a no-tipping policy is in effect, money left by customers in establishments where service is provided by wait staff is not a tip that was given to wait staff employees, regardless of the customers' intent. Id.

Monell, et al. v. Boston Pads, LLC*, 2015 Mass. LEXIS 318 (Mass. June 3, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of real estate salespersons, brought an action alleging that Defendants violated the Massachusetts independent contractor statute by misclassifying them as independent contractors. Defendant compensated their salespersons on a commission-only basis, and Plaintiffs paid their own taxes. The trial court granted partial summary judgment to Defendants, which the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court affirmed on appeal. At issue was the conflict between the independent contractor statute and the real estate licensing statute, which respectively supported Plaintiffs' claim that they were employees and Defendants' claim that Plaintiffs were independent contractors. Id. at *17. General Laws ch. 112, §§ 87PP through 87DDD½, and G. L. ch. 112, §§ 65A through 65E, set forth the licensing and registration provisions governing real estate brokers and salespersons. Id. at *12. The Supreme Judicial Court remarked that the real estate licensing statute made it impossible for a real estate salesperson to satisfy the three factors required to achieve independent contractor status, all of which must be satisfied to defeat the presumption of employee status. Id. at *18. Under the second factor of the independent contractor statute, the employer must prove that the service of the worker is performed outside the usual course of the business of the employer. Id. The Supreme Judicial Court, however, noted that because under G. L. ch. 112, § 87RR, no salesperson may conduct or operate his or her own real estate business nor act except as the representative of a real estate broker, an employer can never prove that the service is performed outside the usual course of the employer's business. Id. Further, § 87RR prohibits a salesperson from performing any services other than as the broker's representative and as part of the broker's business. Id. at *19. Although the third factor of the independent contractor statute requires the employer to prove that the worker is customarily engaged in an independently established business in the real estate industry, the Supreme Judicial Court opined that § 87RR prohibits a real estate salesperson from operating his or her own real estate business. Id. Thus, the Supreme Judicial Court ruled that compliance with this third factor also was not possible. Further, the Supreme Judicial Court noted that while § 87RR expressly authorizes a real estate salesperson to affiliate with a broker as an employee, it also expressly authorizes an association as an independent contractor. Id. Additionally, the 2010 amendment to § 87RR added language authorizing brokers and salespersons to enter into agreements whereby a real estate salesperson could be paid on a commission-only basis. Id. at *20. The Supreme Judicial Court reasoned that the amendment reflects an affirmation that the salesperson may be an independent contractor, but he or she also may be an employee, and that the amendment simply was intended to address how a real estate salesperson, whether an employee or an independent contractor, could be paid by authorizing payment in the form of commissions only. Id. at *20-21. Moreover, because in spite of the level of supervision and control mandated by law, § 87RR expressly preserves a salesperson's ability to be affiliated with a broker as either an employee or an independent contractor, the Supreme Judicial Court determined that § 87RR controlled in this instance, not the more general independent contractor statute. Id. at *22. The Supreme Judicial Court thus agreed with the trial court that the independent contractor statute does not apply to real estate salespersons and that Plaintiffs could not prevail on a claim based on a statute that did not apply to them. The Supreme Judicial Court, however, refrained from determining whether Plaintiffs were employees or independent contractors, or how, in the absence of the framework established by the independent contractor statute, it could be determined whether a real estate salesperson is properly classified as an independent contractor or employee. Accordingly, the Supreme Judicial Court affirmed the grant of partial summary judgement to Defendants.

Rotatori, et al. v. TGI Fridays, Inc.,* Case. No. 2014-81B (Mass. Super. Ct. Aug. 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendant, a casual dining restaurant, violated the Massachusetts Tips Act and Minimum Wage Act by requiring them to pool tips and share tips with employees not eligible to receive them. Id. at 2. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant required them to work off-the-clock without compensation in violation of Massachusetts Weekly Payment of Wages Act. Id. In moving for class certification, Plaintiffs proposed a class of Defendant's hourly employees who worked anywhere in Massachusetts since January 2008 for the off-the-clock claims, and servers who worked at Defendant's locations in Millbury, Massachusetts between January 2011 and March 2014 for the improper tip pooling and minimum wage claims. Id. at 7. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion, finding that Plaintiffs satisfied the certification requirements. First, the Court held that Plaintiffs met the numerosity requirement as Plaintiffs provided the statements of 20 employees who worked at fifteen different Massachusetts locations, attesting that off-the-clock work occurred regularly throughout the restaurant chain. Id. at 8. Second, the Court found that Plaintiffs met the commonality requirement as the issue of whether Defendant required the wait staff at the Millbury locations to pay over a portion of their tips to individuals who did not meet the definition of "wait staff" employees in violation of the Tips Law and the Minimum Wage Act was common to all putative members of the class on the improper tip sharing practices. Id. at 9. The Court similarly determined that the issue of whether Defendant's management violated overtime policies was also a question of fact that was common to the class on the off-the-clock claims. Id. Third, the Court found that Plaintiffs met the typicality requirement as Plaintiffs showed that Defendant acted consistently toward the class representative and members of the putative class. Id. Fourth, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs met the adequacy requirement, since Plaintiffs demonstrated that their interests did not conflict with the interests of the putative class, and Plaintiffs' counsel had substantial class action litigation experience and had prosecuted the action vigorously on behalf of the class. Id. at 10. The Court also held that Plaintiffs satisfied the predominance requirement as the common issue of whether Defendant's allegedly improper tipping and off-the-clock overtime practices could be largely resolved for all class members, and it predominated over any individualized questions, such as proof of damages. Id. at 11. Finally, the Court found that Plaintiffs met the superiority requirement as fear of employer retaliation might have a chilling effect on employees bringing claims on an individual basis, thereby making a class action a superior method for litigating Plaintiffs' claims. Id. at 12. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Sebago, et al. v. Boston Cab Dispatch, Inc.,* 2015 Mass. LEXIS 171 (Mass. April 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of taxicab drivers, brought a class action alleging that Defendants – taxicab owners, radio associations, and a taxicab garage – misclassified them as independent contractors, thereby depriving them of minimum wages, overtime pay, tips, and the protections afforded by § 148 of the Massachusetts Wage Act. Defendants filed a motion for summary judgment and argued that their relationships with Plaintiffs must be considered in the context of Boston Police Department Rule 403, which explicitly permits drivers to operate as independent contractors. Plaintiffs argued that a municipal regulation could not override the State's independent contractor statute. The Massachusetts Superior Court denied summary judgment to Defendants. On appeal, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts vacated the denial and held that Defendants properly classified Plaintiffs as independent contractors. The Supreme Judicial Court noted that Rule 403 neither precludes owners from entering into employer-employees relationship with drivers nor recasts drivers as independent contracts where they would otherwise be considered employees. Id. at *3. Because Rule 403 created a regulatory regime over an industry in which taxicab owners, radio associations, and drivers might operate as separate business, the Supreme Judicial Court declined to find that Rule 403 was contrary to the policies undergirding the independent contractor statute. Id. Before determining whether Plaintiffs were employees, the Supreme Judicial Court assessed the threshold question of whether Plaintiffs provided services to Defendants. The Supreme Judicial Court found that Defendants could not be considered "as a single employer exercising monolithic control over the taxicab industry" because Plaintiffs limited their allegations to common ownership and control, and "[t]he mere fact of common management and shareholders among related corporate entities has repeatedly been held not to establish, as a matter of law, a partnership, agency or joint venture relationship that renders the corporations a 'single employer.'" Id. at *13-15. The Supreme Judicial Court therefore considered each Defendant's relationship with Plaintiffs separately and found that Plaintiffs provided no services to Defendants, but only to taxicab owners and radio associations. The Supreme Judicial Court noted that, although Plaintiffs were free to use leased taxicabs for purpose unrelated to the transportation of passengers, their use of the taxicabs constituted a service to the owners insofar as it increased the value and facilitated the sale of advertising space. Id. at *19. The Supreme Judicial Court further noted that Plaintiffs provided services to radio associations, as they maintained voucher accounts with corporate clients who submitted vouchers to the taxicab drivers as payment for fares and tips. Id. at *20. Because the garage neither owned a taxicab nor a medallion, but only operated a garage that catered to the taxicab industry as a whole, the Supreme Judicial Court determined that Plaintiffs provided no service to the garage. Id. The Supreme Judicial Court also analyzed whether the owners and radio associations lawfully classified Plaintiffs as independent contractors. Under Massachusetts law, a worker is an employee unless: (i) the individual is free from control and direction in connection with the performance of the service; (ii) the service is performed outside the usual course of the business of the employer; and (iii) the individual is customarily engaged in an independently established trade, or business. Id. at *11-12. Plaintiffs were mostly independent as they selected their own shifts and received minimal direction from owners or radio associations. Id. at *22. Plaintiffs' services were also outside the usual course of Defendants' businesses as owners' leasing businesses were not dependent on the success of Plaintiffs' operations. Plaintiffs paid a daily flat-rate to lease a taxicab, and the owners retained this fee regardless of how much money Plaintiffs earned on a given day. Id. at *25. Similarly, the radio association were not in the business of giving rides; instead, they provided dispatch services to owners, and only incidentally dependent on drivers. Id. at *28. Further, Plaintiffs engaged in an independent trade or business as they had the freedom to lease from whomever they wanted on whatever days they wanted, and were free to advertise their services as they wished. Id. at *30-31. The Supreme Judicial Court therefore concluded that Defendants properly classified Plaintiffs as independent contractors.

(iii) Minnesota

J.D. Donovan, et al. v. Minnesota Department Of Transportation,* 2015 Minn. App. Unpub. LEXIS 124 (Minn. App. Feb. 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of contractors and sub-contractors, brought an action seeking declaratory judgment and injunctive relief against the Minnesota Department of Transportation's ("MDOT") demand for payroll records for work performed by J.D. Donovan, Inc. and Wayne Transports, Inc., and its determination that hauling work undertaken by subcontractors was not exempt under Minnesota Statute § 177.43, sub-division 2 (2014). MDOT contracted with general contractor Hardrives, Inc. for work along trunk highways 10 and 23 in Minnesota, and contracted with general contractor OMG Midwest, Inc. for work along trunk highway 30 in Minnesota. Id. at *1-2. While OMG Midwest contracted with Donovan to purchase asphalt cement material, Hardrives contracted with Donovan to purchase asphalt cement materials and arrange for transport of the material, and contracted with Wayne Transports, Inc. for service on the project. Id. at *3-4. At issue was whether it was erroneous to determine that Donovan and Wayne performed "work under the contract." Id. at *7-8. Minnesota Rule 5200.1106, sub-part 2(A) (2013) defines "work under the contract" as all construction activities associated with a public works project, including any required hauling activities on the site of or to or from a public works project and work conducted pursuant to a contract as defined by item B, regardless of whether the construction activity or work is performed by the prime contractor, sub-contractor, trucking broker, trucking firms, independent contractor, or employee or agent of any of the foregoing entities, and regardless of which entity or person hires or contracts with another. Id. at *8-9. Further, the prevailing wage provision applies to "laborers" who are "employed by a contractor, sub-contractor, agent, or other person" performing work on a contract to which the state is a party. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs argued that hauling loads of asphalt cement from a refinery to the general contractor did not qualify as "work under the contract," and that the term "construction activity" was ambiguous because it was unclear whether it included the act of hauling materials from a refinery to a commercial establishment. Id. at *10-11. Defendants moved for summary judgment. The trial court granted the motion, and Plaintiffs appealed. Affirming the grant of summary judgment to Defendants, the Minnesota Court of Appeals noted that under Rule 5200.1106, sub-part 2(D) a "contractor" means an individual or business entity that is engaged in construction or construction service-related activities including trucking activities either directly or indirectly through a contract as defined by item B, or by sub-contract with the prime contractor, or by a further sub-contract with any other person or business entity performing work under the contract. Id. at *11. Because Donovan and Wayne hauled asphalt cement materials from the commercial refineries to the prime contractor's facility, the Court of Appeals opined that under Rule 5200.1106, these trucking activities qualified as construction service-related activities. Plaintiffs also argued the hauling activities did not meet the definition of "work under the contract" because they did not physically take place at a construction site. Rule 5200.1106 provides that construction activities include "any required hauling activities on the site of or to or from a public works project." Id. at *12. Plaintiffs asserted that by ignoring the phrase "to or from a public works project," the trial court rendered the language superfluous. The Court of Appeals, however, noted that sub-part 2 of the rule defines "work under the contract" broadly enough to encompass construction activities, including any required hauling activities on the site of or to or from a public works project and work conducted pursuant to a contract as defined by item B. Id. Item B enumerates six examples of hauling activities that are considered "work under the contract" for purposes of the MPWA, including the delivery of materials or products by trucks hired by a contractor, sub-contractor, or agent thereof, from a commercial establishment. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals opined that Plaintiffs' hauling activities qualified as work conducted pursuant to a contract, and thus MDOT had a right to demand Plaintiffs' employees' payroll records.

(iv) Montana

Morrow, et al. v. Monfric, Inc.*, 2015 Mont. LEXIS 330 (Mont. July 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of laborers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them prevailing wages. Plaintiffs moved to certify a proposed class consisting of all laborers, skilled tradesmen, and craftsmen who worked for Defendant or its subcontractors and who were not paid prevailing wages during the construction and rehabilitation of two of its multi-family housing projects. Id. at *2. The district court issued an order denying the motion for class certification. Id. at *3. On appeal, the Supreme Court of Montana affirmed the district court's decision. Plaintiffs argued that the district court erred by finding that the class was not sufficiently numerous. Id. at *4. The Supreme Court noted the proposed class included 24 to 28 individuals, seven of whom were named Plaintiffs and class representatives, and that was near the number below which class certification was likely to be considered inappropriate. Id. at *7. The Supreme Court observed, however, that the relatively small number of the proposed class was not dispositive, and in such circumstances the district court had broad discretion in determining whether a class action was the most fair and efficient procedure for conducting the litigation. Id. Thus, the Supreme Court concluded that the district court did not abuse its discretion. Id. The Supreme Court also observed that when a class is relatively small, it must also examine other factors and circumstances that may make joinder impracticable. Id. at *8. First, Plaintiffs argued that there was no evidence the proposed class members still resided in the relevant area. Id. at *10. The Supreme Court found, however, that Plaintiffs had offered no evidence suggesting that the laborers who worked on Defendant's projects had left that area. Id. at *10. In particular, Plaintiff's counsel had not attempted to locate the remaining proposed class members, and the idea that they may have left for North Dakota was based entirely on an off-the-cuff suggestion by the district court. Id. Accordingly, the Supreme Court rejected that argument. Id. Plaintiffs further asserted that the proposed class members were laborers of limited financial means, and therefore unable to prosecute their individual claims. Id. at *13. The Supreme Court noted the only evidence in the record pertaining to the financial means of the proposed class members was outdated and incomplete, and there was no evidence establishing the current income or financial resources of the proposed class members. Id. Thus, the Supreme Court held that the district court did not abuse its discretion when it determined class certification was not appropriate. Id.

(v) New Mexico

Segura, et al. v. J.W. Drilling, Inc.,* 2015 N.M. App. LEXIS 72 (N.M. App. June 25, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of workers, brought a class action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them overtime wages for the time spent travelling from their homes to Defendant's jobsites, in violation of the New Mexico Minimum Wage Act ("MWA"). The district court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, which, on appeal, the Court of Appeals of New Mexico affirmed. The Court of Appeals noted that the essential legal question posed in the complaint was whether travel time is compensable under the MWA. Plaintiffs argued that the district court erred by engrafting on to MWA the concepts underlying the federal Portal-to-Portal Act, making all travel non-compensable, even round trips nearly equal to a day of work. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs contended that the MWA was enacted after the Portal-to-Portal Act and had no similar express exclusion, and therefore the district court erred in relying on federal case law interpreting the Portal-to-Portal Act. The Court of Appeals noted that Plaintiffs' claims were based entirely on the MWA, and the language of the MWA and the FLSA differed. Id. at *6. In addition, the Court of Appeals noted that the exclusions in the Portal-to-Portal Act were completely absent from the MWA. Id. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals concluded the district court erred in relying on federal case law interpreting the Portal-to-Portal Act. Plaintiffs also argued that under the MWA their travel time to the jobsites is compensable when it exceeds the normal commute time. Plaintiffs contended that employees were entitled to compensation for their travel time because they were "traveling employees." Id. at *10. The Court of Appeals observed that the traveling employee concept is derived from workers' compensation law, which guarantees compensation to workers when the travel is an integral part of the employee's duties. Id. at *6-7. The Court of Appeals declined to apply the traveling employee concept in this case, however, explaining that workers compensation law was sui generis, and New Mexico case law has repeatedly declined to mingle its principles with those in other areas of law. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals affirmed the district court's judgment.

(vi) New Jersey

Hargrove, et al. v. Sleepy's, LLC*, 2015 N.J. LEXIS 38 (N.J. Jan. 14, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of delivery drivers, brought an action in federal court alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors in violation of New Jersey law. The parties filed cross motions for summary judgment. The federal court, applying the factors to be considered in defining an employee under the Employment Retirement Income Security Act ("ERISA"), held that Plaintiffs were independent contractors. Plaintiffs filed a notice of appeal. Following oral argument, the Third Circuit certified the following question of law to the New Jersey Supreme Court: [u]nder New Jersey law, which test should a court apply to determine a Plaintiff's employment status for purposes of the New Jersey Wage Payment Law ("WPL") and the New Jersey Wage & Hour Law ("WHL"). Id. at *2. With respect to the WPL, the New Jersey Supreme Court noted that neither the text of the WPL nor its implementing regulations offered any guidance to distinguish between an employee and an independent contractor. Id. at *23. The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") filed an amicus brief, and advised the Supreme Court that the DOL has applied the "ABC" test for independent contractor determinations under the WPL. Id. The "ABC" test presumes that an individual is an employee unless the employer can show that: (i) the individual has been and will continue to be free from control or direction over the performance of his service, both under his contract of service and in fact; and (ii) such service is either outside the usual course of the business for which such service is performed, or such service is performed outside of all the places of business of the enterprise; and (iii) such individual is customarily engaged in an independently established trade, occupation, profession or business. Id. at *25-26. With respect to the WHL, the Supreme Court noted that the regulation adopted to implement the WHL provided that the criteria identified in the New Jersey Unemployment Compensation Act and case law would be used to determine whether an individual was an employee or independent contractor. Id. at *25. The Supreme Court noted that both the WPL and WHL incorporated the terms "suffer or permit" in the definition of "employee" or "employ." Id. at *37. Because of the similarity of language, the Supreme Court opined that any interpretation or implementation issues should be treated similarly. In addition, the Supreme Court observed that statutes addressing similar concerns should resolve similar issues, such as the employment status of those seeking the protection of one or both statutes. Id. The Supreme Court concluded that, by requiring each identified factor to be satisfied to permit classification as an independent contractor, the "ABC" test fostered greater income security for workers, which is the express purpose of both the WPL and WHL. Id. at *41. The Supreme Court held that, because the issue of employment status under the WPL and WHL should utilize a single test, the agency charged with implementation and enforcement of these statutes has declared that the "ABC" should govern employment-status disputes under the WHL, the rule has been applied without challenge since 1995, and the DOL has applied the same test to employment-status issues under the WPL because of its similar purpose of furthering income security, it was not persuaded that this long-standing approach to resolving employment status issues needed any alteration. Id. at *43. Accordingly, the Supreme Court concluded that the "ABC" test governed an individual's status as an independent contractor or employee under the WPL and WHL.

KhiSharpe, et al. v. New Meadowlands Racetrack, LLC,* Case No. 15-L-5665 (N.J. Super. App. Div. Oct. 23, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay him and other similarly-situated workers the prevailing wage in accordance with the New Jersey State Building Service Contract Act ("SBSCA"). Plaintiff argued that the SBSCA applied to Defendant because it operated the Meadowland Racetrack on land owned by the New Jersey Sports and Exposition Authority ("NJSEA") through an agreement with that public agency. Id. at 1. Defendant argued that the prevailing wage requirements of the SBSCA were not applicable because it was not a contractor or sub-contractor that provided building services on property that the State owned or leased. Id. at 2. Defendant asserted that it entered into the lease with the NJSEA to privatize the Racetrack and to divest the State of the financial burden associated with the Racetrack's operation while preserving jobs in the racing industry, and therefore it was not a contractor or sub-contractor who entered into an agreement with the State to furnish building services, as required for application of the SBSCA. Id. at 3. The Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss. The Court found that, even affording Plaintiff every reasonable inference, Plaintiff had not stated a cause of action against Defendant under the plain language of the SBSCA. Id. at 11. The Court noted that the SBSCA clearly states that the wage requirements are limited to employees of contractors or sub-contractors. Under the SBSCA, a "contractor" is defined as a business entity that enters into a contract for the furnishing of building services for any property or premises owned or leased by the State, and a "sub-contractor" is defined as any sub-contractor or lower-tier sub-contractor of a contractor. Id. at 10. The Court noted that Defendant directly hired employees who furnished building services at the racetrack and paid its employees with its own funds, the State did not reimburse Defendant the costs, and Defendant did not provide building services pursuant to any contract or sub-contract with the State or anyone else. Id. at 3. Thus, according to the Court, the fact that Defendant's employees performed building services on a state-owned or state-leased property was insufficient to trigger the prevailing wage requirements. The Court, therefore, concluded that Plaintiff failed to establish that Defendant was subject to wage requirements of the SBSCA. Id. at 11. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

(vii) New York

Ackerman, et al. v. New York Hospital Medical Center Of Queens,* 2015 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 2888 (N.Y. App. Div. 2d Dep't April 8, 2015). Plaintiff, a paramedic, brought a class action alleging that Defendant incorrectly determined Plaintiff's wages and also improperly withheld the wages and overtime compensation that he had earned in violation of the New York Labor Law. Plaintiff alleged that the time-keeping system that Defendant utilized rounded down to the nearest quarter-hour when employees worked past their scheduled shift, and never rounded up. The trial court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss the class action allegations of the complaint for failure to state a cause of action. Id. at *2. Upon Defendant's appeal, the New York Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order. The Court of Appeal found that the trial court properly denied Defendant's motion to dismiss because the causes of action were sufficiently particular to give the trial court and parties notice of the transactions, occurrences, or series of transactions or occurrences intended to be proved and the material elements of each cause of action. Specifically, the complaint alleged that Plaintiff was Defendant's employee, Defendant determined his wages on the basis of time, and that Defendant improperly withheld Plaintiff's wages and overtime. Id. at *3. Further, the Court of Appeal opined that the trial court properly found that the complaint adequately pleaded the class action allegations with sufficient particularity, and included factual allegations addressing each of the five prerequisites to class certification. Id. at *3-4. Finally, the Court of Appeal found that Defendant's contention was without merit in asserting that the class action allegations should be dismissed on the ground that Plaintiff failed to actually demonstrate the prerequisites for class certification. The Court of Appeal noted that pursuant to CPLR § 902, a motion to determine whether a class action may be maintained is to be made within 60 days after the time to serve the responsive pleading has expired. Id. at *4. However, Defendant filed the motion pursuant to CPLR § 3211(a)(7) prior to the service of the answer and, thus, the Court of Appeal concluded that the issue of whether class certification should or should not be granted was not properly raised in the context of such a motion. Id. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order.

Ch. 7, Sec. B

Ansah, et al. v. A.W.I. Securities & Investigation, Inc.,* 129 A.D. 538 (N.Y. App. Div. 1st Dep't 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action on behalf of themselves and others who worked as security guards and fire safety workers for Defendants seeking to recover prevailing wages, supplemental benefits, and overtime pay in connection with work they performed on various public construction projects. The trial court denied Defendants' motion for summary judgment, and granted Plaintiffs' motion for an extension of time to file a motion for class certification. The New York Appellate Division affirmed the trial court's order. The Appellate Division found that the trial court properly denied Defendants' motion for summary judgment as premature because the merits of Plaintiffs' claims could not be determined prior to production of the relevant public work contracts. Moreover, the conflicting affidavits the parties produced concerning the nature of the work performed by Plaintiffs precluded summary judgment. Id. at 540. Defendants also argued, for the first time on appeal, that the contracts required arbitration. The Appellate Division found that Defendants did not preserve their argument, and even if they had preserved it, the argument would fail since Plaintiffs never agreed to arbitrate. Id. at 2. Accordingly, the Appellate Division affirmed the trial court's order.

Kent, et al. v. Cuomo,* 2015 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 690 (N.Y. App. Div. Jan. 29, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of state workers, brought an action seeking overtime compensation for all hours worked more than 40 per week during Hurricane Sandy. Under the New York Civil Service Law, the State Budget Director has discretionary authority to grant overtime compensation to such employees when they work beyond a normal workweek during an extreme emergency. Id. at *2. Pursuant to that authority, the Budget Director issued Bulletin G-1034, declaring Hurricane Sandy to be an extreme emergency and authorized overtime compensation for otherwise ineligible employees who worked more than 47.5 hours in a week as a result of the storm. Id. Although Plaintiffs worked more than 40 hours per week as a result of Hurricane Sandy, Defendant did not compensated them for weekly hours greater than 40 and less than 47.5. The trial court partially dismissed Plaintiffs' application to the extent that it sought to require this 40-hour threshold. On appeal, the New York Appellate Division affirmed. Although the Civil Service Law provides that the workweek for basic annual salary for employees eligible for overtime shall not exceed 40 hours, overtime-ineligible employees are expressly excluded from the coverage of that section, and nothing in the legislation defines the phrase "normal workweek" as used in Civil Service Law § 134 (6) for such employees or prescribes the number of hours contained in such a workweek. Id. at *3. The Appellate Division thus found that the number of hours in the "normal workweek" of an overtime-ineligible state employee necessarily implicates the Budget Director's specialized knowledge of state employment practices and involves knowledge and understanding of underlying operational practices or entails an evaluation of factual data and inferences to be drawn therefrom. Id. at *3-4. Further, the Appellate Division noted that the Division of the Budget ("DOB") issued a bulletin stating that employees normally ineligible to be compensated for work in excess of 40 hours per week may, under special emergency circumstances, be made eligible for compensation for such hours of work and, in order to receive such compensation, must work a number of hours clearly in excess of the hours his or her position should reasonably require. Id. at *4. Although the 47.5-hour threshold is not referenced in this bulletin, a DOB official affirmed that it had been in place for many years and noted that overtime-ineligible state employees routinely might be called upon in non-emergency situations to work more than 40 hours in a week without additional compensation. The Appellate Division observed that the 47.5-hour threshold took this factual assessment into account by adding an additional full workday of 7.5 hours to the 40-hour workweek, and applied the 47.5-hour threshold in other emergency circumstances. Id. at *5. The Appellate Division thus disagreed that the threshold was arbitrary on the ground that it departed unreasonably from the DOB's approach in other emergency situations, and upheld the Budget Director's imposition of the 47.5-hour threshold for work related to Hurricane Sandy. Additionally, the Appellate Division noted that the statutory provisions pertaining to overtime-ineligible employees make no reference to a 40-hour workweek, while those pertaining to overtime-eligible employees do not use the phrase "normal workweek" that appears in the provisions pertaining to ineligible employees. Id. Thus, the Appellate Division opined that the Legislature acted intentionally in using different language for the two classes of employees, in failing to define a "normal workweek" for overtime ineligible employees in terms of a specified number of hours, and in according discretion to the Budget Director with regard to the payment of emergency overtime compensation for employees who are ordinarily ineligible for overtime. Id. at *6-7. Accordingly, the Appellate Division affirmed the trial court's order.

Papantoniou, et al. v. Barile Electrical Contracting, Inc.,* 2015 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 4236 (N.Y. Sup. Nov. 18, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them prevailing wages and supplemental benefits for work performed on public projects pursuant to contracts by Barile Inc., Barile Electrical Contracting, Inc., and their affiliates with various governmental entities pursuant to the New York Labor Law, including the New York City Housing Authority ("NYCHA"), as mandated by §§ 191 and 220. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant Fidelity and Deposit Co. of Maryland was liable for payment of the prevailing wages and supplemental benefits not paid to Plaintiffs pursuant to the terms of the Fidelity bonds. Id. at *3. Proposing a class of all individuals employed by Defendants who performed construction work from January 2006 through the present, and excluding any clerical, administrative, professional, or supervisory employees, Plaintiffs moved to join Denis Ramos as a named Plaintiff and class representative, to amend the complaint to add claims by him as a class representative, and for class certification. Id. Fidelity and Deposit Co. cross-moved for summary judgment, maintaining that neither the original named Plaintiff Papantoniou, nor Ramos demonstrated a viable claim against Fidelity and Deposit Co., and Plaintiffs' delay in seeking to add Ramos would cause additional legal expenses. Id. at *3. The Court disagreed and granted Plaintiffs' motion. The Court noted that the allegations of both Papantoniou and Ramos specifically identified Barile Inc. and thus their claims were against the entity at minimum to which Fidelity and Deposit Co. issued bonds for public works projects. Id. at *5-6. Since Fidelity and Deposit Co. articulated no further reason to deny joinder and amendment other than Plaintiffs' delay, which alone was an insufficient reason to deny the relief, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to amend the complaint. Fidelity and Deposit Co. also argued that the Davis Bacon Act barred Plaintiffs' claims under state law as the payroll records Plaintiffs presented to support their motion showed that Defendants paid Papantoniou the prevailing wages and supplemental benefits according to the schedule set under the Davis Bacon Act. Id. at *8. The Court found that the payroll records did not support Fidelity and Deposit Co. because they only related to NYCHA projects in 2007, and Plaintiffs' claimed under-payment on public works projects throughout their employment with Defendants from 2001 to 2011. Id. at *8-9. The Court therefore denied Fidelity and Deposit Co.'s cross-motion for summary judgment. Further, the Court then granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, finding that Plaintiffs met all the prerequisites of C.P.L.R. § 901(a). The Court held that the proposed class of at least 40 workers met the numerosity requirement for certification, and the predominant legal claims for all class members were Defendants' failure to pay the prevailing wage rates, supplemental benefits, and overtime compensation timely as mandated by New York Labor Law and in breach of contracts for public works projects. Id. at *12-14. The Court determined that nothing in the record suggested that the named Plaintiffs or the attorneys for the putative class would not act in the class' best interests, and thereby individual actions outweighed any anticipated difficulties in managing a class action. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, and the motion to amend the complaint to join Ramos as named Plaintiff.

Vasquez, et al. v. National Securities Corp.,* 2015 NY Slip Op 25143 (N.Y. Sup. May 1, 2015). Plaintiff, a broker, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants failed to pay the legally required minimum wage and overtime in violation of the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Defendants moved to dismiss the putative class action for lack of standing on the ground that Plaintiff had been paid the entire amount of his individual claim. Plaintiff did not oppose the dismissal, but contended that the notice to the putative class must be given pursuant to CPLR § 908, and sought approval of his proposed class notice. The Court granted the motions in part. At the outset, the Court noted that CPLR § 908 provides that a class action shall not be dismissed, discontinued, or compromised without the approval of the Court, and that notice must be given to the class members. Id. at *2. The Court further observed that in Avena v. Ford Motor Co., 447 N.Y.S.2d 278 (1st Dept. 1982), the Appellate Division held that New York law requires notice to the class, where, as here, an individual settlement is reached prior to a decision on the merits of a motion to dismiss or a motion for class certification. Id. Avena likened a class representative and his counsel to a fiduciary and spoke in terms of a fiduciary's obligation of undivided loyalty to the party he represented. Defendants urged the Court to follow modern federal case law, which differs from the rule set forth in Avena and its progeny. The Court however, found that this case was brought under Article 9, and therefore, it must follow the Appellate Division's clear precedent to allow notice. Id. at *5-6. The Court did not rule on the sufficiency of notice because Defendants did not state their objections to the notice; instead, they merely requested an opportunity to do so if the Court held that notice under CPLR § 908 was required. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss, and Plaintiff's motion to compel notice to the class, but reserved judgment on the manner and substance of such notice. Id. at *7.

(viii) Ohio

Sheet Metal Workers International Association Local Union No. 33, et al. v. Courtad, Inc.,* 2015 Ohio App. LEXIS 1478 (Ohio. App. 5th Dist. April 13, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant intentionally violated Ohio's prevailing wage laws by failing to properly classify and pay its employees the correct prevailing wage rate on a project involving the construction of the Stark State College Business & Entrepreneur Center. Finding that Defendant intentionally violated the prevailing wage laws, the trial court levied payments and penalties against Defendant regarding five employees and awarded Plaintiff $33,732.84 for attorneys' fees. Upon Defendant's appeal, the Ohio Court of Appeals affirmed. Although Defendant argued that the trial court erred in not identifying a proper work classification that made up the "not less than" prevailing wage rate, the Court of Appeals found that the trial court was not required to discuss or enumerate the lowest trade applicable to the work performed in order to determine compliance with prevailing wage law. Id. at *6. Defendant further argued that the trial court erred in finding that Defendant could not take credit for vacation days, bonuses, lump sum wage payments, and personal vehicle and gasoline benefits as part of its payment of the prevailing wage rate. The Court of Appeals, however, confirmed the trial court's analysis that the vacation policy, bonus payment, and personal vehicle and gasoline benefits did not constitute enforceable commitments. It was undisputed that Defendant paid the five employees throughout the project an hourly rate from $12.00 to $30.00 per hour and a prevailing wage rate of $35.64 per hour. Id. at *9. Pursuant to R.C. § 4115.03(E)(3)(h), vacation pay may be included in the prevailing wage if it is an "enforceable commitment" that is a "legally binding contractual obligation of an employer." Id. Defendant argued that its employee handbook included a vacation policy to establish an enforceable commitment. The trial court, however, found it unenforceable as Defendant's policies required vacation days to be taken within a particular year or the vacation days and were forfeited. Id. at *9-10. Agreeing with the trial court, the Court of Appeals found that the lack of uniformity coupled with the lack of ability to cash out unused vacation time negated Defendant's argument that its vacation policy was an enforceable commitment. Id. at *11. Because there was no set schedule for the award of bonuses, and there was no proof of a written agreement between Defendant and the employees for the use of a company vehicle and gasoline to be included in the prevailing wage, the Court of Appeals also found that the trial court rightly excluded these in the calculation of the prevailing wage rate. Id. at *12-13. Defendant justified paying a less than prevailing wage hourly rate on the fact that prior to commencement of work, the employees agreed that Defendant could make up the difference with a differential lump sum payment. The Court of Appeals, however, determined that the trial court correctly held that no agreement by an employee to waive his right to prevailing wages was valid, as employees under a collective bargaining process in the private construction sector were guaranteed a daily hourly prevailing wage, and thus Defendant's differential lump sum payment was contrary to law and public policy. Id. at *13-17. Finally, Defendant argued that it was not an intentional violator. The Court of Appeals, however, found sufficient substantive proof of Defendant's intentional acts including false and misleading certified payroll reports. Id. at *18. Because the statute authorized attorneys' fees to the prevailing party and Plaintiff prevailed on the prevailing wage issue, the Court of Appeals concluded that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in the amount of the attorneys' fees award. Id. at *19-22. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's findings.

(ix) Oregon

Maza, et al. v. Waterford Operations, LLC*, Case No. 14-CV-3147 (Ore. Cir. Ct. April 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former non-exempt hourly employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them all wages due to them. Defendants, a group of health services providers, had a uniform non-exempt employee time-keeping procedure and practice through the implementation of an electronic time-keeping system called Kronos, which recorded the employees' worktime. Id. at *2. The data from Kronos was transmitted to the payroll system, "Ultipro," that calculated hours and pay rates and disseminated wage payments to employees at uniform times of the month. Id. Defendants also established a uniform electronic health record and charting system called Point Click Care ("PCC"). Id. In 2011, Defendants established a policy that all non-exempt employee wages following voluntary and involuntary separations would be paid by a pay card called the Money Network System pay card. Id. at *3. Separated employees were not allowed to elect to receive their final payment by check or any other method, and in using pay cards at ATM's a fee would be charged, unless it was used at a Wal-Mart store. Id. All three named Plaintiffs encountered circumstances where they were performing patient charting on PCC, but were not logged-on to Kronos and, thus, were not being paid for charting work they were performing. Id. Plaintiffs also encountered incidents where their lunch break period was less than 30 minutes and for which they were not paid for a full 30 minute lunch break as required by law. Id. Plaintiffs sought class certification, which the Court granted by certifying three sub-classes, including: (i) the PCC class; (ii) the meal period class; and (iii) the pay card class. At the outset, the Court found that the adequacy and fairness requirements were satisfied as there was no challenge based upon potential conflicts or antagonism between the class representatives and class members. Id. at *5. The Court also determined that the commonality requirement was satisfied because of common questions, such as: (i) did Defendants use Kronos as a means to record and track all work hours performed by their non-exempt hourly employees; and (ii) did Defendants require their hourly employees to use PCC to perform all patient charting. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court concluded that commonality requirement was satisfied as to the PCC class. As to the meal period class, the Court noted that common questions included: (i) if Defendants used Kronos as a means to record and track all work hours performed by their non-exempt hourly employees; (ii) were all employees required to clock-off for lunch and clock-back in following their 30 minute lunch break. Id. at *7. Similarly, as to the pay card class, the Court found questions of law and fact were common across the class, and accordingly, found that commonality was satisfied. Defendants argued that several factual and legal determinations were specific to individuals and could not be resolved through a class-wide inquiry. As to the PCC class, Defendants pointed out that to be found liable for failure to pay wages while employees were logged-on to the PCC, but while they were not logged-on to Kronos at the same time, Plaintiffs must prove that Defendants either knew or should have known that the practice was occurring. Id. at *10. The Court, however, noted that Pearson v. Phillip Morris, Inc., 257 Or. 106 (2013), determined that the issue of reliance and knowledge could be litigated and resolved on a class-wide basis. Id. The Court explained that this was ultimately a jury question and it was for the jury to determine whether the information Defendants had available was sufficient to put them on notice to justify a finding that Defendants knew or should have known this practice was occurring. Id. Likewise, the Court found that individual issues did not predominate as to the meal period and pay card class, and certified those claims too.

(x) Pennsylvania

Ford, et al. v. Lehigh Valley Restaurant Group, Inc.,* 2015 Pa. Dist. & Cnty. Dec. LEXIS 11 (Pa. Common Pleas Ct. April 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, two former servers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Pennsylvania Minimum Wage Act of 1968 ("MWA") by including kitchen workers in servers' tip pools. Defendant owned and operated 20 Red Robin restaurants in central and eastern Pennsylvania. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant subsidized the sub-standard wages it paid to back-of-the-house kitchen staff, such as cooks, dishwashers and janitors, by improperly splitting with them the pooled tips meant only for front-of-the-house staff, such as servers, hosts, bartenders and bus boys. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs asserted that the "customarily and regularly receive tips" test limited tip pool sharing to servers, bartenders, hosts, and bus boys who directly interact with customers, and does not permit back-of-the-house staff to participate as they do not typically interact with customers and regularly receive tips. Id. Defendant filed preliminary objections seeking to dismiss the MWA claim on the ground that customer interaction was irrelevant in determining whether particular employees customarily and regularly receive tips so as to be entitled to share in tip pool funds. Id. at *2-3. Particularly, Defendant asserted that because the FLSA does not require that an employee have direct customer interaction to "customarily and regularly receive tips," then the MWA, which features identical language, likewise does not require that employees have direct customer interaction to receive tip pool funds. Id. at *8. The Court of Common Pleas overruled Defendant's preliminary objections, finding that direct customer interaction remains a relevant factor in determining the eligibility to share in tip pool under § 3(d) of the MWA. Id. at *3. While neither the FLSA nor the MWS provides any guidance as to the specific types of employees who customarily and regularly receive tips, the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") has listed waiters, waitresses, bellhops, countermen, bus boys, and service bartenders as employees who customarily and regularly receive tips, with janitors, dishwashers, chefs, and laundry room attendants as employees not eligible to participate in a valid tip pool. Id. at *15-16. In a series of opinion letters, the DOL has also indicated that waiters, bellhops, waitresses, countermen, bus boys, and service bartenders were among those who might participate in a tip pool, and that an employer might lose the benefit of the exception from the tip-retention requirement if tipped employees were required to share their tips with employees who do not customarily and regularly receive tips, such as janitors, dishwashers, chefs, or laundry room attendants. Id. at *15-17. The Court of Common Pleas noted that although no Pennsylvania case law authority has had occasion to interpret the phrase "customarily and regularly receive tips," in light of the clear majority of the federal case law rulings and the DOL's opinion letter, it concluded that direct customer interaction remain a relevant factor in determining whether employees customarily and regularly receive tips for purposes of tip pool eligibility under MWA. Id. at *30-31.

Sciliano, et al. v. Albert/Carol Mueller T-A McDonalds*, Case No. 2013-7010-619 (Pa. Common Pleas Ct. May 14, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former hourly employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendants violated § 260.3 of the Pennsylvania Wage Payment and Collection Law by mandating that their employees receive payment of their wages via a JP Morgan Chase payroll card ("payroll card"). Section 260.3 provides that wages must be paid in lawful money of the United States or check. Since a payroll card is neither lawful money of the United States or a check, Plaintiffs asserted that they were entitled to damages set forth in § 260.9a and § 260.10 of the Pennsylvania Wage Payment and Collection Law. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs moved to certify a class of current and former employees who worked at one of the 16 McDonald's restaurants owned and operated by Defendants who received payments exclusively via a payroll card and made use of the debit card. Id. at *2-3. The Court of Common Pleas granted the motion and certified the class. In its certification analysis, the Court of Common Pleas determined that the class satisfied the numerosity requirement, as the class consisted over 2,380 members. Id. at 4. The Court of Common Pleas observed that Plaintiffs' legal theory essentially revolved around the issue that Defendants' payment by way of the payroll cards was a per se violation of the Pennsylvania Wage Payment and Collection Law, and therefore, the proof would be identical as among all Plaintiffs, i.e., that they received wage payments via the payroll card and used it. Id. at 5. The Court of Common Pleas similarly found that the claims of the representative parties were typical of the claims of the class, and that the representative parties would fairly and adequately assert and protect the interests of the class. Id. The Court of Common Pleas also ruled that a class action was an efficient method of adjudication, as it satisfied the requirements specified in Pennsylvania Rule of Civil Procedure 1708. Id. at 7. Accordingly, the Court of Common Pleas certified the class.

Siciliano, et al. v. Albert/Carol Mueller T-A McDonalds,* Case No 13-CV-7010 (Pa. Common Pleas Ct. May 29, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendants required them to receive their wages through a payroll card in violation of § 260 of the Pennsylvania Wage Payment and Collection Law ("WPCL"), which requires that wages be paid United States currency or by check. Id. at 2. Defendants moved for summary judgement, which the Court denied. Defendants contended that the payroll card was in the broad sense "money" and that it was also "check" or at the least the "functional equivalent" of a check. Id. Further, Defendants argued that because the funds loaded on to the payroll card could readily be converted to cash at a bank or an ATM, they constituted money for the purposes of the statute. The Court, however, remarked that the § 260.3 did not merely use the term "money," but that it used the term "lawful money of the United States," which had a more specific legal definition than the more general term "money." Id. at 2-3. Further, the Black's Law Dictionary defines the term "lawful money" as "money that is the legal tender for the debts." Id. at 3. The Court also observed that "legal tender" is the money approved in a country for the payment of debts, the purchase of goods, and other exchanges for value. Id. Further, § 260.2 a defines "check" as "a draft drawn on a bank and payable on demand," and the Court observed that a "draft" is "an unconditional written order signed by one person directing another person to pay a certain sum of money on demand or at a definite time to a third person or to the bearer. Id. Although Defendants asserted that the payroll cards were issued by a bank and were capable of being withdrawn on demand, the Court remarked that the payroll cards were not "unconditional written orders." Id. Thus, because the payroll cards constituted neither lawful money nor checks, the Court denied Defendants' motion for summary judgment.

(xi) South Carolina

Zinn, et al. v. CFT Sales & Marketing, Ltd.,* 2015 S.C. App. LEXIS 244 (S.C. Ct. App. Nov. 25, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of sales representatives, brought an action alleging that Defendant, a timeshare developer of several resorts, violated the South Carolina Payment of Wage Act ("Wages Act") by failing to pay them appropriate wages. Plaintiffs' employment contracts with Defendant addressed their compensation both during their employment and after their respective discharges from Defendant. Id. at *3. Defendant paid its sales representatives on a commission basis for each sale of a timeshare interest, allocated to a "reserve account," and each sales representative contractually agreed to fund the reserve account with 10% of the commissions earned. Id. at *3-4. The amount of the commission already paid to the sales representative was charged against the balance of the reserve, commonly referred to as a "charge back," whenever a timeshare purchaser defaulted. Id. at *5. Each such defaulted sale resulted in a charge back until the reserve balance was exhausted, and this allowed Defendant to recover a portion of the commissions paid to sales representatives for sales on which Defendant did not receive payment of the purchase price. Id. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant owed them thousands of dollars in unpaid commissions. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that the doctrine of res judicata barred Plaintiffs' action. Id. at *9. In September 2007, Judith Parker brought an action alleging that Defendant's practices regarding payment of wages was inconsistent with statutory laws (the "Parker action"). Id. Plaintiffs in Parker also claimed that the reserved account and charge back provisions of Defendant's employment contracts violated the Wages Act in several respects, including the timing for final payments made after a sales representative had been discharged from employment. Id. On January 11, 2010, the Parker action settled for $650,000. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs alleged that they were entitled to unpaid wages far in excess of the amounts in the reserved accounts maintained by Defendant and claimed in the Parker action. Id. The trial court ruled that the doctrine of res judicata expressly barred Plaintiffs from any claims that they either raised or could have raised in the Parker action, including the validity of the reserve and chargeback clauses under the Wages Act. Id. at *10. After a trial, the jury entered a verdict as to the breach of contract claims, finding that Defendant's employment contracts with Plaintiffs violated the Wages Act, and the contract was void as against public policy. Id. at *13. On appeal, Defendant asserted that the trial court erred in finding that the reserve and charge back components of Defendant's employment contracts with Plaintiffs violated that Wages Act. Defendant argued that the doctrine of res judicata barred the trial court's post-trial review of the legality of Defendant's reserve and charge back systems under the Wages Act, and the language of the order contradicted its oral ruling at trial as well as the jury's verdicts against all Plaintiffs. Id. at *16. Defendant further contended that because the identical parties previously litigated the legality of Defendant's reserve and/or charge back systems under the Wages Act in the Parker action, the trial court properly ruled that the doctrine of res judicata precluded any subsequent re-litigation. Id. The South Carolina Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's verdict. The Court of Appeals found that Defendant established the identical nature of the subject matter in the Parker action and this action. Id. at *19. Plaintiffs argued that Parker did not specifically rule on whether Defendant's contractually implemented reserve and/or charge back procedure violated the Wage Act. The Court of Appeals, however, agreed with Defendant that the issue had been adjudicated because the Parker action addressed the validity of the reserve and charge back procedure under the Wages Act. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals concluded that the doctrine of res judicata barred the trial court's post-trial review of the legality of Defendant's reserve and charge back systems under the Wages Act.

(xii) Utah

Heaps, et al. v. Nuriche, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Utah LEXIS 47 (Utah Jan. 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees and founding members of Nuriche, LLC, brought a class action alleging that other founding members of Nuriche promised them compensation and benefits of $150,000 and that Defendants refused to provide the promised compensation after their terminations in violation of the Utah Payment of Wages Act ("UPWA"). The individual Defendants moved for summary judgment, arguing that Nevada limited liability company law controlled Plaintiffs' claim for unpaid wages and that, under Nevada law, managers could not be held personally liable for unpaid wages. Id. at *2. The trial court granted Defendants' motion for summary judgment, and Plaintiffs appealed. The Utah Supreme Court affirmed. Plaintiffs first argued that the trial court erred because the UPWA imposes personal liability on managers of limited liability corporations for unpaid wages. Defendants asserted that Nevada law, rather than Utah law, applied because under the Utah Revised Uniform Limited Liability Company Act ("URULLCA"), the law of the jurisdiction of formation of a foreign limited liability company governs the liability of members and managers for debts, obligations, or other liabilities of the company. Id. at *5. The Supreme Court held that, while Nevada law might govern the managers' liability for the obligations of Nuriche, Plaintiffs were not seeking to hold the individual Defendants liable for an obligation of Nuriche; rather, Plaintiffs sought to hold the individual Defendants directly liable under the UPWA. Therefore, unlike claims that rely on derivative liability to render individual officers responsible for obligations of a company, Plaintiffs premised their claims on a theory of direct liability, and the URULLCA's governing law provision, which limited its applicability to those cases implicating officer liability for the obligations of the company, did not apply. Id. at *5-6. Further, the Supreme Court held that the individual Defendants did not employ Plaintiffs within the meaning of the UPWA. The statutory definition of employer includes every person, firm, partnership, association, corporation, or receiver "employing any person in this state." Id. at *8. The Supreme Court found that the phrase "employing any person in this state" modified each of the terms in the preceding list and, therefore, limited the definition of employer to "one who employs." Id. Here, Plaintiffs conceded they were employed by Nuriche, not by the individual Defendants in their individual capacities. Although the individual Defendants might have exercised supervisory power over Plaintiffs, any supervisory power arose from their positions as officers and agents of Nuriche and not from any direct employment. Id. The Supreme Court, therefore, concluded that the individual Defendants were not personally liable for unpaid wages under the UPWA. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's order granting summary judgment to the individual Defendants.

(xiii) Washington

Cruz, et al. v. Chavez,* 2015 Wash. App. LEXIS 757 (Wash. App. April 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendant withheld and underpaid wages owed to them. Plaintiffs, who were Mexicans and spoke no English, claimed that Defendant took advantage of them throughout their employment. The case proceeded through arbitration, and the trial court entered an arbitration award in Plaintiffs' favor. Id. at *2. Subsequently, Defendant's counsel Michael Jacobson contacted the former place of employment of named Plaintiff Epifano Rios, and falsely stated that he represented Rios and sought confidential records regarding Rios employment. Id. at *3. Meanwhile the Defendant settled with another named Plaintiff, Giberto Ramirez, and Ramirez agreed not to sue Defendant in exchange for $4,000. The other Plaintiffs were unaware of the settlement. The remaining Plaintiffs settled in mediation, and Defendant moved to enforce the agreement with Ramirez. The trial court denied enforcement of the Ramirez agreement, finding that the manner in which it was obtained was inappropriate and it imposed sanctions in the amount of $5,000. Id. at *6. On appeal, the Washington Court of Appeals affirmed. At the outset, the Court of Appeals remarked that it would apply the general principles of contract law to settlement agreements, and an essential element of the valid formation of a contract is the parties' objective manifestation of mutual assent. Id. at *8. Here, Plaintiff Manuel Cruz stated that Defendant had contacted him directly, and encouraged him to settle his claims without the assistance of counsel. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs also submitted evidence that through Jacobson's advice, Defendant urged Ramirez to sign a contract without the assistance of counsel. The Court of Appeals noted that the evidence showed that Jacobson's acts were contrary to Professional Conduct Rule 4.2, which prohibits an attorney from communicating directly with a represented party. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals held that the trial court did not err in declining to enforce the agreement. The Court of Appeal also awarded costs to Plaintiffs.

Demetrio, et al. v. Sakuma Brothers Farms, Inc.*, 2015 Wash. LEXIS 807 (Wash. July 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, two seasonal and migrant agricultural workers, brought a class action against Defendant for unpaid wages, specifically their rest breaks, and asserted several state and federal claims. Defendant, berry farm operator, hires hundreds of migrant and seasonal workers to hand-pick its crop each year. Id. at *3. Defendant paid a "piece-rate" wage based on the workers' productivity, i.e., an amount per pound or per box of fruit harvested. Id. The piece-rate is the only compensation workers received. Id. While the case was pending in federal court and after some discovery, Defendant agreed to settle each of the workers' retroactive claims, but denied liability and expressly preserved its challenge to the workers' prospective claim that Defendant must pay for the time piece-rate workers spend in rest breaks under WAC § 296-131-020(2). Id. at *4. Thus, the settlement did not affect the workers' claim for declaratory relief requiring pay separate and apart from the piece-rate for those brief rest periods going forward. Id. The federal court granted Plaintiffs' motion to certify two questions to the Washington Supreme Court related to that claim. Id. The first certified question was whether a Washington agricultural employer had an obligation under WAC § 296-131-020(2) and/or the Washington Minimum Wage Act ('MWA'), ch. 49.46 RCW, to separately pay piece-rate workers for the rest breaks to which they were entitled. Id. at *4-5. The Supreme Court noted the regulation provides each employee at least ten minutes rest period in each four-hour period of employment on the employer's time. For purposes of computing the minimum wage on a piece-work basis, the time allotted an employee for rest periods shall be included in the number of hours for which the minimum wage must be paid. Id. at *6. The Supreme Court focused on the meaning of the phrase "on the employer's time," finding that the only reasonable interpretation was that it required pay separate from the piece-rate for rest breaks. Id. at *6-7. The Supreme Court also emphasized its function in furthering the intended purpose of the regulation. Id. at *7. The Supreme Court rejected Defendant's argument that WAC § 296-131-020(2) permits an all-inclusive piece-rate because "the system incentivizes employees by awarding harder-working and more productive workers with greater earnings," on the grounds that it incentivized missed rest breaks at the expense of the employee's health. Id. at *10-11. The Supreme Court remarked that Defendant's interpretation was inconsistent with the plain language of the regulation and contrary to its basic purpose in protecting employees' health. Id. at *11. Further, the Supreme Court considered the second question regarding the rate of pay required for the employees' rest break time. Id. at *12. Defendant argued that Washington law requires only the minimum wage per hour for piece-workers, although the Supreme Court noted it admitted paying rest breaks for its hourly employees at the employees' hourly rate. Id. at *12. The Supreme Court cited case law interpreting the MWA and WAC § 296-131-020(2) that treated rest periods as hours worked and rejected that argument, stating that because all hours worked "on the employer's time" were treated equally, WAC § 296-131-020(2) entitles piece-workers to their regular rate of pay for rest break time. Id. at *16-17. The Supreme Court clarified that to calculate a piece-worker's regular rate, employers must tally the total piece-rate earnings and divide those earnings by the hours the piece-worker works, excluding the time spent resting. Id. at *17. Finally, the Supreme Court concluded that in the absence of a separate agreement, pay separate from the piece-rate must equal at least the applicable minimum wage or the piece-worker's regular rate of pay, whichever is greater. Id. at *19.

Romney, et al. v. Franciscan Medical Group,* 2015 Wash. App. LEXIS 322 (Wash. App. Feb. 17, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of medical professionals, brought a putative class action against their employer for damages, statutory penalties, and equitable relief for wage violations. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to the employment contract Plaintiffs entered into that included agreements to arbitrate all employment-related disputes between the parties. The trial court denied the motion, finding the arbitration agreement unconscionable. Id. at *2-3. Upon appeal, the Washington Court of Appeals reversed and remanded. Plaintiffs argued that the agreement was procedurally unconscionable because they had no meaningful choice in negotiating and signing the contract. The Court of Appeals pointed out that "[t]he fact that a contract is an adhesion contract is relevant but not determinative," and "[a]n adhesion contract is not necessarily procedurally unconscionable." Id. at *6. According to the Court of Appeals, "the key inquiry is whether the party lacked meaningful choice." Id. The Court of Appeals found that Plaintiffs had a meaningful choice in entering the employment agreement, since Plaintiffs could choose employment elsewhere. Id. at *10. Further, the arbitration clause, printed in the same size font as the rest of the agreement under a bolded heading, appeared understandable. Id. The Court of Appeals rejected Plaintiffs' contention that they had no time to consider the contract, finding that they all signed multiple employment agreements which contained the arbitration addendum. The Court of Appeals therefore concluded that arbitration agreement was not procedurally unconscionable. Id. The Court of Appeals further found that the agreement was not substantially unconscionable, as the terms of the agreement were not one-sided. Id. at *11. Plaintiffs contended that the agreement was overly harsh because it required them to arbitrate all claims, but allowed Defendant to seek limited relief in the court system. Plaintiffs cited two exhibits in the agreement that permitted Defendant to seek injunctive relief and other remedies. The Court of Appeals, however, pointed out that "substantive unconscionability does not concern whether the parties have mirror obligations under the agreement, but rather whether the effect of the provision is so "'one-sided' as to render it patently overly harsh." Id. at *13. Since neither of the exhibits was at issue here, the Court of Appeals declined to decide the issue of their unconscionability. The Court of Appeals reasoned that even if they were unconscionable, they easily could be severed from the agreement and give effect to the provisions of the arbitration agreement as the agreement itself provided that if any "portion of this Addendum is adjudged by any Court to be void or unenforceable in whole or in part, such adjudication shall not affect the validity and enforceability of the remainder of the Addendum." Id. at *14. Because Defendant indicated its consent to release confidentiality, if required, the Court of Appeals further declined to find the confidentially provision in the agreement to be substantially unconscionable. Id. at *17. The Court of Appeals therefore concluded that the arbitration agreement was not procedurally or substantively unconscionable, and accordingly, remanded the action to trial court to enter an order compelling arbitration.

(xiv) Wisconsin

Aguilar, et al. v. Husco International, Inc.*, 2015 Wis. LEXIS 165 (Wis. 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a wage & hour class action against Defendant seeking wages due to them under Wis. Stat. § 109.03(5). In 1983, the union had negotiated a collective bargaining agreement ("CBA"), which made workers have a short work shift than they would have if the schedule complied with the regulations on unpaid meal breaks. Id. at *2. This provision was in conflict with Wis. Admin. Code § 274.02, which requires employers to pay employees for meal breaks that were shorter than 30 minutes. Id. Plaintiffs' action began when a union-initiated complaint was filed with the Wisconsin Department of Workforce Development ("DWD") alleging that Defendant owed wages for 20-minute unpaid meal breaks to the employees. The DWD investigated and rendered a decision that it would not seek collection of back wages on the ground that the factors favoring a waiver were present in this case. Id. at *3. On appeal, the Wisconsin Labor Standards Bureau affirmed the decision, and Plaintiffs then filed their suit. The trial court denied summary judgment to Plaintiffs, but the Wisconsin Court of Appeals reversed, reasoning that the CBA could not trump the DWD meal break regulation. On further appeal, the Wisconsin Supreme Court reversed and remanded. At the outset, the Supreme Court noted that § 301 of the Labor Management Act governed suits for violation of contracts between an employer and a labor organization representing employees, and controls over state law. Id. at *5. The Supreme Court observed that preemption does not apply where its application would not accomplish those purposes, and in this case the preemption depended on whether the state law claim required the interpretation of a CBA. Here, there was no assertion that the CBA's terms were violated or that the CBA itself required that Defendant pay employees for the meal break time. Id. at *15. The only question was whether the DWD's interpretation of its own rule was reasonable. The Supreme Court concluded that federal law did not govern the analysis, because answering that question did not require the construction of any of the terms of the CBA. Id. at *17-18. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court asked the parties for their positions on the significance of the DWD decision, and both parties agreed with the characterization that what the DWD did was not binding on the trial court. Id. at *21. The Supreme Court remarked that the correct question was not whether the DWD decision was binding, but whether there is an agency interpretation of its own regulations, and if so, whether that interpretation was reasonable and consistent with the purposes of the regulation. Id. at *22. Here, there was no dispute that the regulation was promulgated by DWD and no question that it was the agency charged with administering and resolving employment disputes. Id. at *24. Therefore, the Supreme Court treated the DWD decision as one by an agency interpreting its own rules. The Supreme Court noted that the DWD decision rested in part on the investigator's determination that the failure to obtain the waiver that would have satisfied the regulation was a technical violation that did not warrant awarding back pay because the factors required to approve a waiver or modification of § 272.02 were present in this case. Id. at *25. The Supreme Court held that where the regulation contained an exemption that applied under specific circumstances and the exemption may be granted in the Department's discretion, the regulation's purpose is served where the Department has made such a determination. Id. at *26. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed the Court of Appeals' decision and remanded for entry of summary judgment in Defendant's favor.

C. Rulings In Breach Of Employment Contract/Miscellaneous Workplace Claims

(i) California

In Re Google Inc. Shareholder Derivate Litigation,* Case No. 14-CV-261485 (Cal. Super. Ct. Nov. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, the Police Retirement System of St. Louis, Marilyn Clark, and Pradeep Shah, brought a consolidated shareholder derivative action against Defendants, Google and various officers and directors of Google, alleging that Defendants entered into illegal "gentleman's agreements" with numerous other companies to prevent each company from actively recruiting each other's employees in order to eliminate hiring competition and drive down employee wages. Id. at 4. Defendants moved for summary judgment, arguing that Plaintiffs' derivative claims were barred by the applicable three-year statute of limitations. The Court agreed and granted Defendants' motion. The Court noted that Plaintiffs had admitted that the operative consolidated complaint was based on the anti-competitive agreements uncovered by the Antitrust Division of the U.S. Department of Justice ("DOJ") in 2009, which resulted in a September 2010 settlement that required Defendants and five other companies to end their anti-competitive agreements. Id. at 8. Thus, the Court noted that all derivative action stemming from the agreements disclosed in September 2010 became time-barred in September 2013 unless Plaintiffs, who filed the action on February 28, 2014, could establish equitable tolling. Id. Plaintiffs argued that the statute of limitations was tolled during the concealment by Defendants of their wrongful acts. Id. at 5. Plaintiffs also asserted that they did not and could not have discovered Defendants' liability until Plaintiffs in In Re High-Tech Employee Antitrust Litigation filed an unredacted case management conference statement that quoted the contents of certain internal documents and when the public learned for the first time of Plaintiffs' allegations of anti-competitive practices. Id. at 4-5. The Court, however, found that the September 2010 DOJ complaint, settlement, and press release on their own, and particularly when combined with the evidence of the subsequent media attention given to the DOJ's action, were sufficient evidence to establish inquiry notice under an objective reasonable investor standard. Id. at 9. According to the Court, the 2010 DOJ complaint and press release were evidence that Defendants had already suffered harm because each company's ability to attract talented high-level employees had been artificially stifled by the illegal agreements. Id. Plaintiffs thus failed to show that an investigation begun at this time could not have discovered facts that would support allegations as to who was responsible for the injury. Id. Because both a cognizable harm to the corporation and list of potentially responsible individuals had been identified after the DOJ's September 2010 announcement, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs failed to show that an investigation commenced after September 2010 would not have obtained information necessary to file a "viable" complaint. Id. at 10. The Court therefore held that the three-year statute of limitations provided Defendants a complete defense, and accordingly, granted Defendants' motion for summary judgment.

Mallano, et al. v. Chiang,* Case No. BC 533770 (Cal. Super. Ct. Dec. 16, 2015). Plaintiff, a retired justice of the California Court of Appeal, brought a class action alleging that the State of California refused to pay the full amount of constitutionally and statutorily mandated judicial salaries and benefits to California justices, judges, and judicial retirees and their survivors. Plaintiff sought a declaration as to the active judicial salaries during each of the fiscal years from 2008-2009 through 2014-2015. Id. at 2. Defendants, the Controller of the State of California, the Judges' Retirement System, and the Judges' Retirement System II, denied the allegations of the complaint and asserted that § 68203 of the California Government Code did not warrant automatic and mandatory judicial salary increases. Id. at 3. At trial, Defendants contended that the Controller could not pay increased judicial salaries without a specific appropriation by the Legislature. Id. at 6. The Court disagreed with Defendants and noted that "the California Constitution provides that a specific appropriation is not necessary, since statutes that set judicial salaries, by themselves, constitute self-executing appropriations." Id. Defendants also contended that § 68203(a) should be interpreted to include not only state employee salary increases, but also decreases as well. Disagreeing again, the Court noted that § 68203(a) uses the exclusive term "average percentage salary increase," and not "average percentage salary increase or decrease" or "average percentage salary net increase" or "average percentage salary change." Id. at 9. The Court therefore held that salary decreases were not considered a part of the definition of "salary increase" in § 68203(a). Id. Because § 68203, by itself, constituted a self-executing appropriation by the Legislature of the funds necessary to pay judicial salary increases, the Court reasoned that the Controller of the State of California has the ministerial duty to draw warrants to pay the judicial salary increases mandated by § 68203, and the Boards of Administration for the Judges' Retirement Systems I and II have the ministerial duty to recalculate benefits payable to judicial retirees and their survivors so as to reflect the judicial salary increases mandated by § 88203. Hence, the Court concluded that Plaintiff had established the entitlement to declaratory relief as to the appropriate increases in the judicial salaries and benefits. Id. at 15-16. The Court further determined the mandated increased judicial salaries and judicial retiree benefits vested on particular certain dates, and held that Plaintiff and the putative class members were entitled to interest, at 10% per year, on the unpaid salaries and benefits from the dates on which the sums vested until the increases and benefits were paid. Id. at 16-17. Accordingly, the Court entered judgment in Plaintiff's favor at the conclusion of the trial.

(ii) Connecticut

Kiewlen, et al. v. City Of Meriden*, 2015 Conn. LEXIS 157 (Conn. June 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of widows of deceased police officers or firefighters, and retired police officers or firefighters who were divorced or widowed since they retired, brought a class action challenging the health insurance emoluments, which they received as part of their pension. The City assigned insureds to one of the three plans, including: (i) the City placed an insured who claimed no dependents in the "single" plan; (ii) an insured who claimed one dependent in the "member plus one" plan; and (iii) an insured who claimed more than one dependent in the "family" plan. Id. at *9. The City reduced Plaintiffs' health insurance emoluments after the number of dependents that they could claim decreased. Plaintiffs sought a writ of mandamus compelling the City to pay them the health insurance emoluments that they received at the time of the retiree's retirement or, in the case of Plaintiff widows, at the time of the death of their respective spouses, without any change in their status to reflect the death of, or their divorce from, their spouses. Id. at *14. The trial court ruled in favor of Defendant. On appeal, the Connecticut Supreme Court reversed in part. The Supreme Court examined the city charter provisions at issue and noted that the § 85G of the charter established that the surviving spouse of a police officer or firefighter was entitled to receive one half of the compensation that his or her deceased spouse was collecting at the time of his or her death. Id. at *20. Absent from either §§ 85D or 85G was any reference to the precise amount to which a retiree or surviving spouse is entitled for his or her health insurance emolument, or how the health insurance emolument is to be administered. Rather §§ 85D and 85G only set forth in relative terms the pension benefits to which retirees and surviving spouses are entitled. Id. Further, the Supreme Court observed that under § 85G, widows were entitled to collect a pension that was one half of what their spouses were collecting at the time of their deaths, and at the time of their deaths, two of those spouses were collecting a pension that included the member plus one health insurance emolument, one was collecting the family health insurance emolument, and one was an active employee. Id. at *21. Thus, the Supreme Court opined that according to § 85G, two of the widows were entitled to collect one half of the member plus one health insurance emolument for retirees, which was equal to the member plus one health insurance emolument for widows, one was entitled to collect one half of the family emolument for retirees, which was equal to the family emolument for widows, and one was entitled to collect one half of the health insurance emolument that her husband received as an active employee at the time of his death. Id. Since the City transferred the widows to the single plan and reduced their health insurance emoluments, the Supreme Court opined that the City violated § 85G. The Supreme Court also observed that § 85D controlled the retirees' pension benefits, and unlike § 85G, § 85D did not require retirees' benefits to be determined as of a particular point in time. Id. at *27-28. Rather, § 85D expressly made retirees' pension benefits dependent on the compensation of active police officers and firefighters, as fixed from time to time by the state board of public safety. Id. Thus, because § 85D tied a retiree's health insurance emolument to that of an active employee, the Supreme Court reasoned that the determinative factor for purposes of § 85D was how the city treated active employees when there was a change in the number of dependents they could claim for health insurance purposes. Id. As Plaintiffs failed to present any evidence to establish that the City did not change the status of active police officers and firefighters for health insurance purposes when the number of dependents they could claim changed, the Supreme Court remarked that the retirees failed on their claim that the City improperly reduced their health insurance emoluments under § 85D. Thus, the Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's order rejecting their claim. Accordingly, the Supreme Court found that the City improperly reduced the health insurance emoluments of the widows in violation of § 85G, but not those of the retirees.

(iii) Florida

Celebrity Cruises, Inc. v. Rankin, et al.,* 2015 Fla. App. LEXIS 13778 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 3d Dist. Sept. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of doctors who worked under contract with Defendant, brought an action alleging that Defendant refused to pay them the commissions that they were entitled to under their contracts. According to the complaint, Defendant contracted with the doctors to pay them a commission on "total medical revenues;" however when paying those commissions, Defendant excluded revenues generated by the sale of the medications. Id. at *1. The trial court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification, and rejected Defendant's argument that individual issues predominated over common issues. Id. at *2. On appeal, the Florida District Court of Appeal affirmed. The District Court of Appeal remarked that this was not a case where the class members sought commissions or bonuses based upon unwritten contracts with potentially different terms for different class members. Id. at *5. The District Court of Appeal further opined that this was also not a case where the class members failed to allege the existence of a common contract under which the company employed all class members. Id. at *6. Instead, the District Court of Appeal noted that the breach of contract claim was based on Defendant's refusal to pay the class members who were the beneficiaries of identical written contractual provisions. Id. The District Court of Appeal remarked that this case posed the same basic legal question for all class members, i.e., whether, according to signed contracts, Plaintiffs' commissions should be based on total medical revenue, or whether the revenue from the sale of medications should be excluded. Id. Although the damage calculation would be different for each class member, the District Court of Appeal concluded that a mechanical method can be used to calculate the class members' damages. Id. Accordingly, the District Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's order certifying the class.

(iv) Georgia

Borders, et al. v. City Of Atlanta,* 2015 Ga. LEXIS 786 (Ga. Nov. 2, 2015). In a class action challenging a 2011 City of Atlanta Ordinance (the "Ordinance") and the consequent amendment of three defined pension plans, the Supreme Court of Georgia ruled in favor of the City in concluding that the City did not violate the Georgia Constitution or breach the employment contract of its employees when it amended the plans to increase the required employee contributions. On June 29, 2011, in an effort to address the City's unfunded pension liabilities, the City enacted the Ordinance, which increased prospective annual employee contributions for the City's defined benefit pension plans, including the General Employees' Pension Plan, the Police Officers' Pension Plan, and the Firefighters' Pension Plan (collectively, the "Plans"). Id. at *1-2. The amendments to the Plans took effect on November 1, 2011. Prior to that date, the Plans required the participants to contribute 7% of their annual salary to their pension plan if they did not have a designated eligible beneficiary, and 8% of their annual salary if they did have a designated eligible beneficiary. Id. at *2. After November 1, 2011, the amendments increased the mandatory employee contributions by an additional 5%, such that participants were required to contribute 12% of their annual salary, or 13% with a beneficiary. Id. at *3-4. The Ordinance also provided that mandatory employee contributions might be increased by an additional 5%, up to 17% or 18% of annual compensation, if the City's required contributions to the Plans exceed 35% of the City's total payroll. Id. The Ordinance did not change a participant's benefit formula or the actual benefit amount payable at the time of the participant's retirement. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs, a group of City employees who participated in the Plans prior to November 1, 2011, and who had not retired before that date, alleged that the City breached their employment contracts and violated the impairment clause of the Georgia Constitution by increasing the amounts that Plaintiffs were required to contribute to the Plans, but providing Plaintiffs with the same retirement benefits to which they were already entitled prior to the passage of the Ordinance. Id. at *4. The trial court granted summary judgment to the City, holding that "government employees and their beneficiaries have no vested rights in an unchanged benefit plan where the pension or retirement plan at issue unambiguously provides for subsequent modification or amendment." Id. at *5-6. The trial court thus found no ambiguity in the City's enrolment provisions at issue and determined that the provisions clearly authorized the City to amend the Plans without breaching Plaintiffs' employment contracts or violating the impairment clause. Id. at *6. On review, the Georgia Supreme Court agreed with the trial court. The Supreme Court found that "the language of the enrolment provisions was plain, unambiguous, and capable of only one reasonable construction in regard to the two points critical to the resolution of the challenge in this case: that the receipt of an applicant's executed enrolment or application card evidenced the applicant's irrevocable consent to participate in the applicable retirement plan, and that the applicant would do so under the plan's governing laws as then amended, or as might be amended in the future. Thus, Plaintiffs did not acquire a vested contractual right in a retirement plan unaltered in the manner at issue." Id. at *18. Thus, according to the Supreme Court, the Ordinance did not alter Plaintiffs' pension benefits, but rather modified their pension obligations, and in no manner divested Plaintiffs of their earned pension benefits so as to implicate constitutional concerns. Id. at *23. The Supreme Court therefore concluded that the trial court properly granted summary judgment in favor of the City.

(v) Illinois

American Federation Of State, Country & Municipal Employees, Council 31, et al. v. State Of Illinois,* 2015 Ill. App. LEXIS 389 (Ill. App. Ct. 1st Dist. May 19, 2015). In this class action involving the reduction of collective bargaining unit membership among management-level state employees pursuant to the Illinois Public Labor Relations Act (the "Act"), the Illinois Appellate Court affirmed the Illinois Labor Relations Board's ("ILRB") approval of the excluded positions. In 2013, the Illinois General Assembly passed the Act. The Act narrowed the class of individuals who could be considered "public employees," set up a process by which the Governor could designate up to 3,580 positions as excluded from collective bargaining units, and exempted certain specific state employment positions from designation. Id. at *3. Consistent with the Act, the Illinois Department of Central Management Services, on behalf of the Governor, filed petitions with the ILRB seeking to exclude positions from collective bargaining units. Plaintiff, on behalf of the employees, filed objections to the petitions. The ILRB approved the Governor's decision, relying exclusively on the positions' titles for its determination that the Governor's action was appropriate. Id. at *3-4. Affirming the ILRB, the Appellate Court found no violation. Id. at *10. Plaintiff challenged the ILRB's refusal to grant an evidentiary hearing, contending that the individuals did not perform managerial duties and, therefore, Plaintiff should have had an opportunity to prove that assertion. The Appellate Court found that, based on the Act's plain language, the designated employees were not entitled to an evidentiary hearing when their positions clearly were among those subject to designation under the Act. Id. at *10. Plaintiff argued that the delegation was improper because the Act gave the Governor legislative authority by authorizing him to determine classifications of employees without sufficient guiding principles. The Appellate Court determined that the Act provided a detailed framework to guide the Governor in his exercise of discretion to expedite removing from collective bargaining units those employees whose duties were incompatible with collective bargaining unit membership and to address the problem of excessive union membership of management-level public sector employees of Illinois. Id. at *12-13. Further, the General Assembly set up the framework in such a way that the ILRB could review the Governor's action. The Appellate Court, therefore, concluded that the Governor was not given a blank check, and that the Act did not delegate any authority to the Governor that he did not already possess. Id. at *13-14. The Appellate Court also rejected Plaintiff's constitutional argument, based on alleged violation of the individuals' equal protection rights, finding that the Act does, in fact, permit certain employees to be treated differently than other employees but not in an unconstitutional manner. Id. at *19. The Appellate Court explained that, if the individuals were managerial employees, then they had no right to collectively bargain in the first place. Removing them from collective bargaining units did not violate their constitutional rights because they had neither fundamental rights nor property rights at stake. Id. Even assuming the presence of equal protection concerns, the Appellate Court found that a reasonable set of facts supported treating the individuals differently from other public workers who might be classified as managerial-type employees because, even if the positions had the same working title or same pay grade, there was a tremendous variance in the duties performed by different high-level positions in different state agencies. Id. at *20. The Appellate Court stated that, "[u]nder the circumstances, separating certain managerial employees from other managerial-type employees is a permissible classification where the State's needs demand that the Governor has undivided loyalty from some chosen top-level managers." Id. at *20-21. The Appellate Court further held that the established procedures for adding or removing positions from the collective bargaining unit had long been in place, and a re-classification of employees did not constitute a breach or an impairment of an existing collective bargaining agreement. Id. at *28. Accordingly, the Appellate Court affirmed the decision of the ILRB.

American Federation Of State, County And Municipal Employees, Council 31, et al. v. State Of Illinois*, Case No. 15-CH-475 (Ill. Cir. Ct. Nov. 25, 2015). Plaintiffs, several unions representing Illinois workers, brought this action to compel Illinois officials to issue paychecks to state employees following the state's failure to enact appropriations statutes for the 2016 fiscal year. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant should pay union members in a timely manner, and Defendant's failure to appropriate funds for the payment of employees constituted an impairment of Defendant's contractual obligation to pay the union members. Plaintiffs moved for a temporary restraining order ("TRO") and alleged that failure to pay union members their full salaries constituted an unconstitutional impairment of contract. Plaintiffs asserted that the executive and legislative branches of state government failed to reach an agreement on the budget and froze appropriations beginning July 1, 2015. Id. at 2. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion finding that Plaintiffs had demonstrated a clearly ascertainable right in need of protection. Id. The Court held that, "[w]hile the employees have complied with the CBA in all respects, the fiddle while burning posture of the other branches of State government provokes the judicial branch to act to preserve the status quo because it is necessary for the State to secure the financial stability of SEIU Health Fund for 2015 and 2016." Id. The Court further noted the consequences that could flow from out-of-pocket payment of medical and pharmaceutical costs, including non-monetary issues like the worsened health. Id. at 3. The Court therefore concluded that the failure to supplement Plaintiffs' Health Fund violated the prohibition of impairment of contracts as guaranteed by Article 1 of the Illinois Constitution. Id. Accordingly, the Court ordered Defendant to take all necessary steps to see that Plaintiffs were made whole, for all contributions owed, within 10 days and to continue monthly payments to Plaintiffs on an on-going basis. Id. at 4.

In Re Pension Reform Litigation,* 2015 Ill. LEXIS 499 (Ill. May 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of individual members of four retirement systems, challenged the constitutionality of the adoption of Public Act 98-599 (the "Act") in these consolidated class actions. Effective June 1, 2014, the Act amended the Illinois Pension Code by reducing retirement annuity benefits for individuals who first became members of four of Illinois' five state-funded pension systems prior to January 1, 2011, including the General Assembly Retirement System, the State Employees' Retirement System of Illinois, the State Universities Retirement System, and the Teachers' Retirement System of the State of Illinois. Id. *1. The "centerpiece" of the Act is a comprehensive set of provisions designed to reduce annuity benefits for members entitled to Tier 1 benefits by: (i) delaying when members become eligible to begin receiving retirement annuities; (ii) capping the maximum salary that might be considered when calculating a member's retirement annuity; (iii) changing the system under which annual increases were determined; (iv) eliminating one to five annual annuity increases depending on the age of the member at the time the Act become effective; and (v) altering how the base annuity amount would be determined for purposes of the "money purchase" formula. Id. at *22-23. Additionally, the Act created a new payment schedule, a mechanism by which pension boards could initiate mandamus proceedings if Defendant failed to make required contributions to their respective systems, and special directives with respect to certain payments to the pension systems. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that the "centerpiece" provisions of the Act violated numerous provisions of the Illinois Constitution of 1970. Particularly, Plaintiffs alleged that the reduction in retirement annuity benefits for Tier

1 employees violated: (i) Article XIII, Section, 5, the pension clause of Illinois Constitution, (ii) Article I, Section 16, which provides that no law impairing the obligation of contracts shall be passed, (iii) Article I, Section 15, the takings clause, and (iv) Article I, Section 2, the equal protection clause. Id. at *30-31. The trial court declared the Act unconstitutional in its entirety and permanently enjoined its enforcement. In doing so, the trial court found that the Act would diminish benefits of membership in the four affected State-funded retirement systems and that the pension protection clause of the Illinois Constitution did not support Defendant's argument that the legislature possessed implied or reserved power to diminish or impair the pensions. Id. at *33-34. Upon appeal, the Illinois Supreme Court affirmed. The Supreme Court found that the Act would clearly diminish the retirement annuities to which Tier 1 members of the affected systems became entitled when they joined those systems. Id. at *38. Defendant argued that, because membership in public retirement systems was an enforceable contractual relationship, it should be subject to the same limitations as all other contractual rights, and it remained subject to modification, even invalidation, by the General Assembly through the exercise of State's police power. Id. at *46. The Supreme Court, however, pointed out that the law was clear that the promised benefits would have to be paid and that the responsibility for providing Defendant's share of the necessary funding fell squarely on the legislature's shoulders. Id. at *50. The Supreme Court noted that Defendant made no showing that it had no less drastic measures available to meet the financial crisis. Id. at *51. According to the Supreme Court, the General Assembly might find the State's fiscal condition in crisis, but it was a crisis that other public pension systems managed to avoid and it was a crisis for which the General Assembly itself was largely responsible, and thus, not an excuse to abandon the rule of law. Id. at *51-68. Accordingly, the Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's order declaring the Act unconstitutional.

Vugmayster, et al. v. Grossinger Motorcorp.*, 2015 Ill. App. Unpub. LEXIS 804 (Ill. App. Ct. 1st Dist. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiff, a car salesperson, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants unilaterally changed the terms of his contract and as a result, he was shorted compensation due under his commission-based sales position. Plaintiff alleged that Defendants improperly deducted a bank fee from his compensation when a customer had marginal credit. Id. at *3. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant paid a $300 bank fee that was calculated in determining Defendant's profit and loss, and Plaintiff received $25, which was half of his mini-commission. Id. at *5. Defendants moved to dismiss. The trial court granted Defendant's motion. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Illinois Appellate Court noted that in a class action, a Defendant's tender of relief may create mootness where the class representatives had not filed a motion for class certification before Defendant made its tender. Id. at *21. Defendants had tendered a check sufficient to cover the maximum recovery potentially available to Plaintiff before he had moved for class certification. Id. Thus, the Appellate Court observed that no other class members' interests were before the trial court, and it concluded that Defendants' tender rendered this action moot. Accordingly, the Appellate Court affirmed the trial court's order.

(vi) Michigan

AFT Michigan, et al. v. State Of Michigan,* Case No. 148748 (Mich. April 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, various unions representing public school employees, brought an action in the Michigan Court of Claims asserting various constitutional challenges to 2012 PA 300, which amended the Public School Employees Retirement Act (the "Act"). In 2010, the Act required all current school employees to pay 3% of their salaries to fund health benefits for both current and future retirees. The Court of Claims found this unconstitutional as it violated both the takings clauses and due process clauses of the Michigan and U.S. Constitutions respectively. Id. at 3. Upon appeal, the Michigan Court of Appeals affirmed. Id. at 4. Defendant appealed further and the Michigan Supreme Court held the case in abeyance. In the meantime, the Legislature enacted 2012 PA 300, which further amended the Act. Under this amendment, PA 300 enabled current public school employees to opt-out of retiree healthcare and avoid paying 3% retiree health contribution. As an alternative, employees could participate in a 401(k) type retirement account. PA 300 also provided a separate retirement allowance for public school employees who elect to pay 3% contributions but who subsequently fail to qualify for retiree healthcare benefits. Id. at 6. Plaintiffs challenged the amendment claiming that PA 300 was also unconstitutional like PA 75. The Court of Claims, however, refused to find PA 300 unconstitutional, finding that the provisions of the earlier statute had been sufficiently ameliorated by the amendment, in particular by the choice given to employees. Id. at

8. In affirming, the Court of Appeals concluded that because contributions to the retiree healthcare program would be made voluntarily, it was free of constitutional infirmity, and that the Act did not affect any obligation of contracts between Defendant and Plaintiffs regarding pension modification because Defendant had no obligation to provide future pension benefits to public school employees. Id. at 8-9. Upon Plaintiffs' further appeal, the Michigan Supreme Court affirmed, holding that PA 300 did not violate the U.S. or Michigan Constitutions in any respect. The Supreme Court noted that, unlike PA 75, PA 300 did not give rise to an uncompensated taking because the retiree healthcare contributions were completely voluntary, and voluntary healthcare contributions did not violate the Constitutions. Id. at 21. Plaintiffs alleged that PA 300 was invalid because by requiring them to make contributions in order to qualify for retiree healthcare, Defendant had attached an unconstitutional condition to the receipt of a government benefit. Id. at 25. The Supreme Court found Plaintiffs' argument unavailing. The Supreme Court explained that Defendant did not coerce Plaintiffs into giving up their constitutional rights but merely sought, as a condition for receiving access to retiree healthcare benefits, the assistance of Plaintiffs in paying for these benefits. Because the retiree healthcare contribution was inextricably and directly linked to the governmental benefits being offered, and Defendant did not coerce any Plaintiff into participating in the program, the Supreme Court concluded that PA 300 did not infringe Plaintiffs' constitutional rights. Id. at 33. The Supreme Court further ruled that, because Defendant was not obligated to provide future pension benefits to Plaintiffs, PA 300 did not affect any obligation of contracts between Plaintiffs and Defendant. Id. at 40. Finally, the Supreme Court held that Defendant might reasonably request Plaintiffs to assist in funding a retiree healthcare benefit system to which they belonged, and it was entirely proper for Defendant to seek the continuation of an important retirement benefits for Plaintiffs while simultaneously balancing and limiting a strained public budget. Id. at 47-48. Accordingly, the Supreme Court affirmed the Court of Appeals' judgment.

Baumgartner, et al. v. Perry Public Schools*, 2015 Mich. App. LEXIS 519 (Mich. Ct. App. Mar. 12, 2015). Plaintiffs, hundreds of laid-off teachers, brought suits challenging their dismissal from employment before the Michigan Department of Education. After the State Tenure Commission ("STC") instructed Administrative Law Judges ("ALJs") to hear Plaintiffs' suits, the ALJs rejected Plaintiffs' claims and granted Defendants summary judgment. The ALJs ruled that the 2011 Amendments to the Teacher Tenure Act ("TTA") and School Code made clear that the STC lacked jurisdiction and that Plaintiffs only could pursue their claims through the court system. Plaintiffs appealed the ALJs' decisions to the STC, and the STC rejected the holdings, concluding that Michigan case law, which pre-dated the 2011 Amendments, gave it jurisdiction over lay-off claims that asserted "subterfuge." Id. at *9. Defendants appealed the STC's orders to the Michigan Court of Appeals. The Court of Appeals held that it had jurisdiction to review interlocutory orders of the STC, and the STC lacked jurisdiction to hear Plaintiffs' cases. First, the Court of Appeals recognized that it cannot review an interlocutory order of an administrative agency unless the agency's final decision or order will not provide an adequate remedy. Id. at *11. In rare circumstances, the Court of Appeals has taken jurisdiction over appeals from interlocutory administrative orders where, among other things, the appeals rested entirely on jurisdictional grounds. Id. at *13. The Court of Appeals held that, in this case, because the STC clearly lacks jurisdiction over teacher lay-offs, hearing the cases would make the administrative process more efficient by eliminating any need for further ALJ proceedings and expediting the appeal of hypothetical ALJ holdings that inevitably would follow. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals ruled that these appeals presented a textbook illustration of the rare circumstances in which the Court of Appeals may accept an interlocutory administrative appeal. Second, the Court of Appeals determined that the STC's jurisdiction and administrative expertise was limited to questions traditionally arising under the TTA, and it does not possess jurisdiction over disputes arising under separate legislative acts. Id. at *16. Although the TTA mentions "discharge" and "demotion" as matters that fall within the ambit of the STC, the TTA is silent about "lay-offs" and does not provide the STC with jurisdiction over such matters. Id. at *16-17. The Court of Appeals noted that although one case law precedent asserted that the STC had jurisdiction over a small number of lay-off cases under the judicially-created "subterfuge" doctrine, that case was no longer binding and was rendered null and void by the 2011 Amendments. Id. at *20. In 2011, the Michigan Legislature enacted a package of amendments to the TTA, the School Code, and the Public Employee Relations Act that, among other things, made clear that the courts – not any administrative agency, including the STC – have jurisdiction over lay-off claims. Id. at *21. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals concluded that STC improperly exercised jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' lawsuits. For this reason, the Court of Appeals reversed the orders of the STC and dismissed Plaintiffs' actions.

Michigan Coalition Of State Employee Unions, et al. v. State Of Michigan,* 2015 Mich. LEXIS 1773 (Mich. July 29, 2015). Plaintiffs, the Michigan Coalition of State Employee Unions and others, brought a class action in the Court of Claims against the State of Michigan and various state agencies alleging that portions of 2011 PA 264, which amended the State Employees' Retirement Act ("SERA"), MCL 38.1 et seq., were unconstitutional because the resulting changes to retirement benefits altered "rates of compensation" or "conditions of employment," which were within the exclusive authority of the Civil Service Commission (the "Commission") to regulate. Id. at *1. Particularly, Plaintiffs challenged changes that required employees, who had maintained membership in the State-defined benefit pension plan to choose either to contribute 4% of their income to that plan or to switch to the 401(k) defined contribution plan applicable for state employees, without a required contribution. Id. at *7-9. Plaintiffs also challenged the change in overtime applied to the calculation of "final average compensation." Id. The Michigan Court of Claims granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment, finding PA 264 unconstitutional. On Defendant's appeal, the Michigan Court of Appeals affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding that the State properly classified SERA retirement benefits as both "rates of compensation" and "conditions of employment," neither of which was subject to legislative alteration. Id. at *10. On further appeal, the Michigan Supreme Court reversed. The Supreme Court held that the amendment of PA 264 did not infringe the Commission's authority to fix "rates of compensation" because the ratifiers of Michigan's 1963 Constitution did not understand that phrase to include pensions or other fringe benefits. Id. at *11. The Supreme Court noted that textual indicators in the Constitution uniformly indicate that "rates of compensation" was commonly understood to include only salaries and wages, and this understanding was confirmed in various parts of the Constitution, the Address to the People, and the transcript of the Constitutional Conventions debates. Id. at *12. Because PA 264 did nothing to change an employees' salary or wages, the Supreme Court found that it did not implicate the Commission's constitutional authority over classified civil servants' rates of compensation. Id. at *17-18. Further, the Supreme Court held that the Commission did not have the authority to require the Legislature to exercise its lawmaking power regarding conditions of employment. Assuming for the limited purpose of the case that a pension was a condition of employment and that the Commission's authority to regulate all conditions of employment included the authority to establish, maintain, and amend a pension, the Supreme Court found that the Commission had no authority to prevent the Legislature from enacting PA 264 any more than it had authority to compel the enactment of the SERA because either act would have constituted an unconstitutional exercise of legislative authority under the Constitution of 1963, Art. 3, § 2. Id. at *18-19. The Supreme Court explained that the Commission's authority was part of the executive branch's power, which could not be used to enact or amend statutes, and it could not mandate appropriations relating to conditions of employment as it was resided in the Legislature. Id. at *21-22. Because no provision in the Constitution of 1963, Art. 11, § 5 granted the Commission any legislative or appropriation authority when regulating conditions of employment, the Supreme Court also held that the Commission had no explicit authority to require the Legislature to exercise its lawmaking power regarding conditions of employment, and when the Commission wish to regulate conditions of employment, it could proceed within its own sphere, using its own constitutionally provided tools. Id. at *23-24. Finally, the Supreme Court ruled that the Legislature did not violate the Commission's constitutional authority by enacting PA 264. Because the Commission itself had acquiesced in the application of the SERA to the employees of the civil service system and that it never rescinded its acquiescence, the Supreme Court reasoned that the presumed infringement of PA 264 presented no constitutional problem, and thus, Plaintiffs' objections failed to establish a basis for relief. Id. at *26-28. The Supreme Court therefore reversed and remanded the action to the Court of Claims for further proceedings.

(vii) New Jersey

Burgos, et al. v. State Of New Jersey,* 2015 N.J. LEXIS 566 (N.J. June 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of individuals and unions acting on behalf of New Jersey State public employees, brought a class action alleging that the State's failure to appropriate funds to reduce the unfunded liability of State pensions' impaired their contract rights. The State's public pension systems guaranteed participants a calculable amount of benefits payable upon retirement based on the participant's salary and time spent in the pension system. Id. at *1. In 2011, the Legislature added language in Chapter 78 explicitly declaring that each member of the State's pension systems shall have a contractual right to the annual required contribution amount and the failure of the State to make the required contribution shall be deemed to be an impairment of the contractual right. Id. at *2. On May 20, 2014, the Governor issued an Executive Order reducing the State's payments into the pension systems because of a severe and unanticipated revenue shortfall. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs argued that Chapter 78 created an enforceable contract that was entitled to constitutional protection against impairment, and that the budgetary and debt limiting clauses of the State Constitution conflicted with any binding agreement created by Chapter 78. Id. at *20. Accepting Plaintiffs' argument that Chapter 78 created a contract and that the State's failure to appropriate the full value of annually required contribution ("ARC") substantially impaired Plaintiffs' right under the contract, the trial court granted summary judgment to Plaintiffs. Id. at *34-35. The trial court rejected the State's argument that Chapter 78 was unenforceable as violative of the debt limitation clause, the appropriations clause, and the gubernatorial line-item veto power. Id. at *35. Upon appeal and direct certification, the Supreme Court of New Jersey reversed. While the Supreme Court acknowledged that the Legislature and Governor had clearly expressed an intent that Chapter 78 create a "contract right" to timely and recurring ARC payments to reduce the unfunded liability of the pension funds to safe levels, it noted that the essential question was whether legislative authority could be exercised through Chapter 78 to create a legally binding, enforceable contract compelling future appropriations to pay down the unfunded liability. Id. at *42. The Supreme Court found no legally enforceable financial obligation imposed on the State by virtue of Chapter 78's enactment. Id. at *68. While the debt limitations clause of the New Jersey Constitution provided that the Legislature might not create a debt or liabilities that exceed one percent of the amount appropriated in a given fiscal year, the appropriations clause vested the power and authority to appropriate funds in the Legislature. Id. at *45-58. The Supreme Court noted that, through these clauses, the Legislature retained its constitutionally enshrined power to annually appropriate funds as necessary for the fiscal health of the State. Id. at *64. According to the Supreme Court, Chapter 78's purported creation of an enforceable long-term financial contractual obligation fell squarely within the debt limitation clause. Id. The amount of monies that Chapter 78 purported to contractually require the State annually to dedicate to pay down the unfunded liability of the various pension substantially exceeded the limits annually allowed under the debt limitation clause. Id. at *66. Further, voter approval was required to render this a legally enforceable contractual agreement compelling appropriations of this size covering succeeding fiscal years; otherwise, this agreement was enforceable only as an agreement that was subject to appropriation, which under the appropriations clause rendered it subject to the annual budgetary appropriations process. Id. The Supreme Court therefore concluded that contract rights set forth in Chapter 78 did not create a legally binding financial contract enforceable against the State. The Supreme Court further held that the budget process remained squarely with the Legislature and Executive branches, and the Judiciary was ill-suited to enter into the political decision-making that accompanies the balancing of competing spending priorities. Id. at *83-84. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed the trial court's order.

(viii) New York

Bransten, et al. v. State Of New York,* Case No. 159160/12 (N.Y. Super. Ct. Mar. 25, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of justices and retired members of the New York State Judiciary, brought a class action alleging that Defendant's decision to reduce its contribution to the Justices' health insurance benefits violated the Compensation Clause of the New York State Constitution. In 2011, the Legislature negotiated agreements with certain public sector unions under which Defendant agreed to refrain from laying-off thousands of state workers if workers paid a larger share of the contributions to their health insurance premiums. Id. at 2. The Legislature then amended § 167.8 of the Civil Service Law to allow the Civil Service Department to extend the terms of the union agreement to cover unrepresented state employees and retirees. This resulted in an increase of judges' contribution to the cost of their health insurance by 6%, retired judges' contributions by 2%, and contributions for any judges retiring on or after January 1, 2012 by 6%. Id. at 2-3. Plaintiffs then initiated this action and argued that, because "compensation" included health benefits, Defendant's action diminished the value of their compensation in violation of Compensation Clause, which guarantees that Plaintiffs' compensation shall not diminish during their term in office. Id. at 3. Plaintiffs moved for summary judgment, which the Court granted. The Court found that Defendant failed to raise an issue of fact or to establish that § 167(8) did not violate the Compensation Clause. Id. at 13. The undisputed facts demonstrated that Defendant's reduction in its contributions resulted in an increase of judges' contributions to their health insurance benefits, which directly diminished their compensation. Id. The Court had earlier denied Defendant's motion to dismiss, agreeing with Plaintiffs that judges' compensation included health benefits. Defendant had then appealed, arguing that changes in law only indirectly reduced judges' pay and were non-discriminatory, and thus did not violate the Compensation Clause. Id. at 4. Defendant had also argued that a pay raise for judges enacted six months after the increase in contributions cured any violation, and that the express language of the Compensation Clause rendered it inapplicable to "retired" justices and judges. Id. The New York Appellate Division, however, had affirmed that ruling on the basis that judicial compensation under the Compensation Clause included both the wages and benefits, and that § 167(8) uniquely discriminated against judges because it imposed a financial burden on them for which they received no compensatory benefit. Id. at 5. Plaintiffs reiterated their previous arguments against dismissal, and sought a declaration that the reductions were void ab initio and an injunction enjoining further enforcement as to judges both active and retired. In granting Plaintiffs' motion, the Court found that Plaintiffs established their entitlement to judgment as matter of law. Id. The Court noted that the Compensation Clause protects judges from overly broad laws that have the direct effect of diminishing their compensation. Id. at 13-14. The evidence indicated that judges comprised the only category of state employees who received no benefits from the negotiated union agreement, and who were unrepresented and not eligible for collective bargaining. Id. at 14-16. The Court therefore granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment declaring that § 167(8), including the regulations adopted thereunder, were unconstitutional as applied to Plaintiffs.

(ix) Oregon

Moro, et al. v. State Of Oregon*, 2015 Ore. LEXIS 277 (Ore. April 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of active and retired members of the Public Employee Retirement System ("PERS"), brought a class action challenging two legislative amendments aimed at reducing the cost of retirement benefits. The amendments involved Senate Bill ("SB") 822 (2013), which eliminated income tax off-set benefits for non-resident retirees and modified the cost-of-living adjustment ("COLA") applied to PERS benefits, and SB 861 (2013), which further modified the COLA entitlements for PERS. There were more than 330,000 PERS system members, and about 900 participating public employers. Id. at *9. PERS was a defined benefit plan, and had two post-retirement calculations that could increase the benefits to the members: COLA, and an income tax off-set. Both the benefits were based on a percentage of the service retirement allowance and were funded through employer contributions. Id. at *16. During the 2008 recession, PERS investments lost 27% of the fund's value, and left the fund substantially under-funded. Id. at *22. By December 2008, one year after determining that PERS was 98% funded, the Public Employee Retirement Board determined that PERS was only 71% funded and had about $16.1 billion in unfunded actuarial liability. Id. at *23. To balance those losses, the Board was required to increase employer contribution rates, but based on the schedule for setting and implementing employer contribution rates, the next rate increase would not go into effect until July 2011. Id. Accordingly, in 2012, the Board set the employer contribution rates; at that time, the fund's recent investment performance had been mixed, and left the funded status of PERS similar to what it has been in December 2008. Id. Whereas PERS was 71% funded in December 2008 with $16.1 billion in unfunded actuarial liabilities, PERS was only 73% funded in December 2011, and maintained about $16.3 billion in unfunded actuarial liabilities. Id. The 2013-2015 collared rate was 21.4%, and without the statutory amendments at issue in this case, the Board projected that the rate would rise to about 25% and would remain at that rate through 2029. Id. Plaintiffs contended that SB 822 and SB 861 unconstitutionally impaired their employment contracts in violation of the contract clause of the Oregon Constitution, as well as the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court of Oregon granted the petition in part. At the outset, the Supreme Court noted that the State contract clause states that no law impairing the obligation of contracts shall be passed. Id. at *39. The Supreme Court observed that because PERS offered promised remunerative pension benefits as compensation for employment, the offered may include provisions that defined the eligibility for benefits or the scope of benefits. Id. at *61. Plaintiffs contended that the 1991 and 1995 tax off-sets were terms of the PERS contract. The Supreme Court observed that the 1991 off-set included mandatory wording without the same expressly non-contractual wording as the 1995 off-set, but the legislative history indicated that the 1991 off-set was not a part of the PERS contract, but included it as a type of preemptive damage payment to mitigate a claim for breach of the PERS contract. Id. at *65. The Supreme Court found that the 1991 and 1995 off-sets were not terms of the statutory PERS contract, and therefore, were not obligations under that contract that could be impaired for purposes of applying the contract clause. Id. at *71. The Supreme Court ruled that the 1991 and 1995 off-sets were, however, covered by the terms of a 1997 class action settlement agreement, and the amendments contained in SB 822, which reduced the benefits provided to non-resident retirees under that settlement agreement, neither impaired nor breached the terms of that agreement. The Supreme Court explained that this was so because the agreement expressly contemplated, and provided a means for, seeking relief for such benefit reductions. Id. Plaintiffs also argued that in Strunk v. PERB, 338 Ore. 145 (2005), it had already ruled that the pre-amendment COLA provision was contractual, and had temporarily prevented the Board from making COLA adjustments to the service retirement allowances of certain retirees. Id. at *72. The Supreme Court remarked that the legislature intended the COLA requirement to be read with the pre-amendment COLA cap, and the COLA bank as determining the overall value of the COLA benefit. The Supreme Court observed that before the amendments at issue in this case, the COLA provisions had been in place and unchanged for 40 years, and a substantial number of PERS retirees worked their careers while the pre-amendment COLA provisions were in effect and then retired. The Supreme Court concluded that Plaintiffs had a contractual right to receive the pre-amendment COLA benefits that they earned before the effective dates of the amendment. Insofar as they applied retrospectively, the Supreme Court concluded the COLA amendments impaired the PERS contract and violated the state contract clause.

(x) Pennsylvania

Pennsylvania Restaurant & Lodging Association, et al. v. City Of Pittsburgh*, Case No. 15-GD-16442 (Pa. Common Pleas Ct. Dec. 21, 2015). In this action, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment, finding that the City of Pittsburgh had no authority to pass and enforce the "Paid Sick Leave Ordinance." Id. at 1. The Ordinance applied to almost all employers doing business in the City, and it required employers to provide a minimum of one hour of paid sick leave for employees for every 35 hours they work. Employers of fifteen or more employees must permit the accrual of up to 40 hours of paid sick time per calendar year. Employers of fewer than fifteen employees are required to permit the accrual of up to 24 hours of paid sick time per calendar year. Id. at. 2. The Court noted that the City is a home rule charter municipality created pursuant to the Pennsylvania Home Rule Charter and Optional Plans Law, 53 Pa. C.S. § 2901. Section 2962(f) forbids a municipality which adopts a home rule charter from determining duties upon businesses, occupations, and employers. Id. Further, the City has neither a board nor a department of health; therefore, it is not empowered to enact an ordinance or issue rules and regulations relating to disease prevention and control under the Disease Prevention and Control Law. Id. at 3. The Ordinance also cited to provisions of the Second Class City Code, 53 P.S. §§ 23101 and 23145. The Court, however, found that this Code did not apply to the City, because it is a home rule municipality. The Court noted that the Pennsylvania Supreme Court had addressed a similar issue in Building Owners & Managers Association of Pittsburgh v. City of Pittsburgh, 985 A.2d 711 (Pa. 2009). The Supreme Court had held that the City exceeded its authority and violated the Home Rule Charter when it passed the "Protection of Displaced Contract Workers Ordinance" imposing affirmative duty upon employers with new service contracts to keep the employees of the prior contractor for at least 180 days. Id. at 4. In this case, the Court reasoned that a municipality has no power to enact the ordinance except as authorized by the legislature. The Court found that the Ordinance that placed affirmative duties on businesses, occupations, and employers fell within the limitations on the City's authority to enact any ordinance determining any duty, responsibility, or requirement of a business or private employer. Id. at 5. Accordingly, the Court found that the Ordinance was invalid and unenforceable.

(xi) Texas

Klumb, et al. v. Houston Municipal Employees Pension System*, 2015 Tex. LEXIS (Tex. Mar. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees near retirement, brought an action alleging violations of the Texas Constitution and breach of contract. The Houston Municipal Employees Pension System ("HMEPS"), was established under Article 6243(h) of the Texas Revised Civil Statutes, and required cities with a population of more than 1.5 million to make contributions to an employee pension fund. Id. at *3. The City of Houston attempted to reduce it pension fund contributions, and outsourced part of its workforce. Id. at *5. To keep abreast with the changing plans of the city, the Pension Board announced that the definition of employee would include full-time employees who would be under the control of a Texas local government controlled by the city, but left the discretion to determine the status of an employee to its External Affairs Committee. Id. at *6. The city then formed a non-profit corporation called Convention and Cultural Services, Inc. ("CCSI"), and expressly disavowed any right or ability of the City to control CCSI. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs sought monetary damages and a declaration that they were no longer city employees as defined in Article 6243(h). The trial court dismissed the action for want of jurisdiction, which was upheld by the Texas Court of Appeals. On further appeal, the Texas Supreme Court affirmed. At the outset, the Supreme Court noted that Article 6243(h) defined employee as an eligible person who held a municipal position, and whose name appeared on a regular full-time payroll of the city. Id. at *19. The statute expressly authorized the Pension Board to construe the statute, add language it deemed necessary for administration of the pension fund, and determine all eligibility questions. Id. at *21. Plaintiffs contended that the Pension Board acted ultra vires by delegating the decision-making authority to the External Affairs Committee. The Supreme Court, however, noted that Article 6243(h) generally permits delegation. Id. at *26. Plaintiffs also contended that the Pension Board treated them differently than former city employees who now worked for separate legal entities due to municipal outsourcing. For example, Plaintiffs argued that the employees working at the Houston Zoo became employees of Houston Zoo, Inc., and that the pension fund determined a separation of service occurred as a result. The Supreme Court remarked that even assuming that the Pension Board did treat similarly-situated employees differently, Plaintiffs failed to plead a viable equal protection claim because the Board's actions were rationally related to at least two legitimate government objectives that were promoted by the challenged classification. Id. at *30. First, the Supreme Court noted that the Pension Board had a legitimate interest in preserving sources of pension funding that were adequate to meet the demands on the fund. Id. at *31. Second, the Supreme Court noted that the Pension Board had a legitimate interest in policies that lessened the risk of over-paying pensioners or allowing them to double dip. Id. at *32. Accordingly, the Supreme Court concluded that the equal protection claims failed as a matter of law. Finally, Plaintiffs contended that they were deprived of vested property rights without due process. Plaintiffs alleged that HMEPS unconstitutionally denied them retirement benefits they would otherwise have been eligible to collect after a separation of service from the city. The Supreme Court noted that City of Dallas v. Trammell, 129 Tex. 150 (1937), considered the constitutionality of a statutory amendment that effected a substantial reduction in the monthly pension benefits payable to a police department retiree, and held that the right of a pensioner to receive monthly payments from the pension fund was predicated upon the anticipated continuance of existing laws, and was subordinate to the right of the legislature to abolish the pension system. Id. at *35. Based on this rule, the Supreme Court held that Plaintiffs had no vested rights in the retirement benefits and pension plan contributions. Accordingly, the Supreme Court affirmed the Court of Appeals judgment.

(xii) Wisconsin

Black, et al. v. City Of Milwaukee*, 2015 Wis. App. LEXIS 536 (WiS. Ct. App. July 21, 2015). Plaintiff, a police association, brought a class action seeking a judgment declaring that the City's residency ordinance and resolution were enforceable. Milwaukee City Ordinance 5-02 requires all city employees to live in the City of Milwaukee, and the competing state statute, Wis. Stat. § 66.0502, abolished local residency requirements. The City of Milwaukee Common Council adopted Milwaukee City Ordinance 5-02 and concluded that the new statute violated Article XI, § 3(1) of the Wisconsin Constitution, which allows cities and villages to determine their local affairs government. Id. at 527. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment, and the trial court issued an order declaring that the Ordinance 5-02 and the Common Council's Resolution were void and unenforceable to the extent that they violated terms of § 66.052. On appeal, the Wisconsin Court of Appeals affirmed in part. At the outset, the Court of Appeals noted that the City of Milwaukee derived its authority to govern its affairs from the state constitution and the statute. Id. at *12. The Court of Appeals remarked that there was no dispute that the authority for Milwaukee City Ordinance 5-02 derived from constitutional "home rule" power. Id. The Court of Appeals disagreed with Plaintiff that § 66.0502's residency requirements were a matter of state-wide concern simply because the legislature said so was not persuasive. Plaintiff merely argued that the legislature can do what it wants. The Court of Appeals found that the argument that – § 66.0502 concerned a state-wide matter because it involved the legislature's authority to regulate employment, where it related to matters of public safety and welfare – was also unpersuasive. The Court of Appeals explained that the argument failed because there was no evidence in the record to conclude that § 66.0502 was drafted with the public's health, safety, or welfare in mind. Id. at *20. The Court of Appeals noted that the parties pointed to no such proof either in their briefs or at oral argument, and therefore, it could not conclude that such a measure involved the health, safety, or welfare of the people of Wisconsin in any demonstrable way. The Court of Appeals also opined that the residency requirements such as Milwaukee City Ordinance 5-02 have been consistently found to be constitutional; therefore, it could not be held that prohibiting residency requirements protects employees against unfairly restrictive conditions. Id. at *21. In addition, the Court of Appeals remarked that § 66.0502 undoubtedly interfered with the ability of many municipalities to promptly respond to emergencies. The Court of Appeals found that by abolishing the local residency requirements, § 66.0502 directly affected the City's strong interest in having employees who are genuinely invested in the City's welfare and progress. The Court of Appeals cited the explanation of Milwaukee's Common Council that having police, fire department, health, water utilities, neighborhood services and City development personnel, among other employees, live in the City provides then with better knowledge of the challenges facing the City, increased understanding of the neighborhoods, and enhanced relationships with residents. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals concluded that § 66.0502 did not involve a matter of state-wide concern, nor did it affect every city or village uniformly; therefore, it did not, pursuant to the home rule amendment, trump the City of Milwaukee's residency requirement. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals reversed the trial court's decision that Milwaukee Ordinance 5-02 was unenforceable. The Court of Appeals, however, concluded that § 66.0502 did not create a protectable liberty interest, and therefore, reversed the trial court's decision to the contrary and affirmed the trial court's decision declaring that the City's did not deprive any Police Association members of their constitutional rights.

D. Other State Law Rulings Affecting The Defense Of Workplace Class Action Litigation

(i) Alabama

Baldwin Mutual Insurance Co. v. McCain, et al.*, 2015 Ala. LEXIS 22 (Ala. Feb. 20, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant wrongfully reduced the amount paid on claims made on actual cash value policies by deducting some amount for depreciation not only of the damaged materials and the labor costs of initially installing those damaged materials (based on their condition prior to the covered damage and their expected life span), but also of the labor costs associated with the removal of the damaged materials. Plaintiff owned a house on which she held a homeowner's insurance policy issued by Defendant. Id. at *1. That policy provided that any covered property losses would be settled "at actual cash value at the time of loss but not exceeding the amount necessary to repair or replace the damaged property." Id. In July 2005, after a windstorm damaged Plaintiff's house, she filed a claim with Defendant, and Defendant thereafter retained an independent adjuster to examine Plaintiff's damaged property and to prepare an estimate to repair the damage. Defendant paid Plaintiff's claim in accordance with the estimate prepared by the adjuster. Id. at *2. In June 2006, Plaintiff filed another claim after her house suffered damage as a result of a lightning strike. After the same adjuster prepared an estimate, Defendant paid the new claim in accordance with the adjuster's estimate. Id. Plaintiff argued that it was improper and impossible to depreciate the labor costs, because they had not previously been incurred at some defined time in the past; rather, they were being incurred at the time of the current repair. Id. at *3. Noting that hundreds or thousands of Defendant's policyholders were likely affected by its practices in that regard, Plaintiff sought class certification of her claims. Id. at *5. Plaintiff originally sought certification on behalf of all Alabama policyholders, who had suffered a loss within the last six years for which Defendant reduced the actual cash value of the same by reduction for the loss of value of undepreciable loss elements. Id. After the certification hearing, however, Plaintiff filed a brief in support of class certification proposing a new class definition to include Defendant's customers with replacement cost policies, in addition to those with actual cash value policies. Id. at *5-6. After the certification hearing and after supplemental briefing, and over objections from Defendant, the trial court certified the class in accordance with that subsequent, broader definition. Id. at *6. Defendant appealed, and argued that the trial court exceeded its discretion in certifying the requested class because Plaintiff failed to meet her evidentiary burden under Rule 23 and the trial court failed to comply with § 6-5-641 Alabama Code. Id. at *8. The Alabama Supreme Court agreed and reversed the trial court's order. Id. The Supreme Court cited the almost identical case of Baldwin Mutual Insurance Co. v. Edwards, 63 So. 3d 1268 (Ala. 2010), and pointed out that the class definition proposed by Plaintiff in her brief submitted after the class certification hearing was materially different from the class definition offered by Plaintiff in her original complaint. Id. at *11. The Supreme Court noted that both Plaintiff's proposed class and the initially proposed classes in Edwards were limited to those of Defendant's customers who held actual cash value policies, but the class definitions proposed following the class certification hearing, which were accepted by the trial court, also included those of Defendant's customers who held replacement cost policies. Id. at *11-12. Accordingly, because the trial court exceeded its discretion in certifying the class in accordance with a definition proposed by Plaintiff without giving Defendant the opportunity to oppose the certification of the proposed class at a hearing conducted for that purpose pursuant to § 6-5-641, the Supreme Court reversed that certification order.

(ii) Arizona

Rader, et al. v. Greenberg Traurig, LLP,* 2015 Ariz. App. LEXIS 98 (Ariz. App. June 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of investors, brought a class action against Defendant asserting five claims, including: (i) primary statutory liability under Arizona Revised Statutes ("ARS") § 44-2003(A); (ii) aiding and abetting common law securities fraud; (iii) aiding and abetting breach of fiduciary duty; (iv) intentional misrepresentation and (v) negligent misrepresentation and nondisclosure. In 2006, Mortgages Ltd., a now-bankrupt Arizona real estate investment company, had retained Greenberg Traurig LLP, a law firm, to review and draft private offering memoranda to solicit investors. Plaintiffs relied on the offering memoranda to invest in securities offered by Mortgages Ltd. between March 2006 and June 2008. On May 11, 2010, Mortgages Ltd. investors filed a putative class action against Greenberg Traurig and others in the District Court of Arizona entitled Facciola v. Greenberg Traurig LLP, No. 10-CV-1025 (the "Facciola action"). After the putative class in the Facciola action was certified and a settlement agreement was preliminarily approved, Plaintiffs filed a notice of intent to opt-out of that settlement. On August 31, 2012, the same day the court in the Facciola action confirmed that Plaintiffs had properly excluded themselves from the class and the settlement, they filed this action. Previously, the trial court granted Greenberg Traurig's motion to dismiss, finding Plaintiffs' claims time-barred. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Arizona Court of Appeals affirmed the dismissal. At issue on appeal was whether Arizona should adopt cross-jurisdictional tolling, whereby the filing of a class action in one jurisdiction tolls the limitations period for claims by class members in a different jurisdiction during the pendency of the class action. Intra-jurisdictional tolling, whereby the filing of a class action may toll the limitations period for claims by class members in the same jurisdiction during the pendency of the class action, was first recognized in American Pipe & Constr. Co. v. Utah, 414 U.S. 538 (1974), where the U.S. Supreme Court held that the commencement of a class action suspends the applicable statute of limitations as to all asserted members of the class who would have been parties had the suit been permitted to continue as a class action. Id. at *5-7. Although binding precedent in federal court, state courts have taken different positions when addressing American Pipe tolling. Plaintiffs asked the Court of Appeals to adopt cross-jurisdictional tolling, which they conceded Arizona had never done. Three Arizona appellate court decisions had considered American Pipe tolling and the third decision considering American Pipe tolling was Albano v. Shea Homes Ltd. Partnership, 254 P.3d 360 (2011), which did not address or resolve the issue presented here. Id. at *9-13. Contrary to Plaintiffs' argument, Albano did not adopt intra-jurisdictional tolling in Arizona. Id. at *13. Moreover, the trial court observed that even if Albano could be construed as adopting intra-jurisdictional tolling, it would not apply to Plaintiffs' state court claims here, given the Facciola action was a federal case, which the court certified as a class action. Id. As Albano noted, however, whether class certification was granted could be an important consideration in addressing subsequent tolling requests. Id. at *13-14. Further, although Plaintiffs cited federal cases applying American Pipe tolling after a class action was certified, those cases, however, were distinguishable because unlike Arizona after the enactment of ARS § 12-504, there is no general savings statute in federal civil actions. Id. at *15. Arizona's saving statute applies to an action timely filed in another jurisdiction and later re-filed in Arizona. The Court of Appeals found that Plaintiffs had not shown that Arizona should adopt broader cross-jurisdictional tolling by case law. Id. at *18. Thus, the Court of Appeals concluded that the trial court properly dismissed Plaintiffs' claims as time-barred, and accordingly, affirmed the judgment. Id.

(iii) Arkansas

Diamante, LLC v. Dye, et al.*, 2015 Ark. LEXIS 392 (Ark. May 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of lot owners at Defendant's golf club, brought an action seeking a declaratory judgment that certain obligations and restrictions known as tie-in rights associated with the land were unenforceable. After the trial court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss, Plaintiffs moved for class certification. Defendant moved to compel arbitration. The trial court denied Defendant's motion, finding that Defendant had waived its right to demand arbitration through unnecessary delay that prejudiced Plaintiffs. Id. at *4. On appeal, the Arkansas Court of Appeals affirmed. Thereafter, on remand, Plaintiffs amended their motion for class certification. The trial court granted Plaintiffs' motion and certified the class. Defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the trial court abused its discretion by including members of the class who signed documents agreeing to arbitrate controversies and, therefore, the claims and defenses of Plaintiffs could not be "typical" of the claims and defenses of the class members. The Supreme Court affirmed. Id. at *5. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court found the differences in the by-laws and club membership agreements with regard to arbitration to have no effect on the pending litigation, and Defendant did not appeal that finding. Id. at *6. The Supreme Court also noted that, when the trial court granted class certification, it already had heard and rejected Defendant's motion to compel arbitration with Plaintiffs. Id. Plaintiffs, acting as class representatives, then filed a second amended motion for a declaratory judgment. Defendant responded and listed "arbitration" as an affirmative defense. Defendant then moved to compel arbitration a second time, arguing that the Court of Appeals had determined that the arbitration agreement was valid. Id. at *6-7. The trial court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded. The Supreme Court observed that the law-of-the-case doctrine prohibited a trial court from reconsidering issues of law and fact that already had been decided on appeal. Id. at *8. The Supreme Court, however, found that the Court of Appeals only had addressed the issue of whether Defendant had waived the right to compel arbitration as to Plaintiffs as individuals, not as class representatives in a class action. The Supreme Court, therefore, held that the Court of Appeals' decision was not conclusive on the issue of whether Defendant had waived arbitration as to the class members who subsequently were added to the lawsuit upon class certification. Id. at *9. The Supreme Court held that, although the Court of Appeals found a valid arbitration agreement between the parties, that ruling did not apply to the subsequent motion to compel arbitration as to the unnamed class members. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the action to the trial court to determine whether there was a valid agreement to arbitrate between Defendant and the unnamed class members.

GGNSC Arkadelphia, LLC v. Lamb, et al.,* 2015 Ark. LEXIS 409 (Ark. June 4, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of nursing home residents, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants, a group of nursing home facilities, breached their statutory and contractual obligations by failing to properly staff the facilities and by failing to meet minimum staffing requirements. Specifically, Plaintiffs asserted that the alleged practice of chronically understaffing the nursing homes breached the facilities' standard admission agreement and violated the Arkansas Long-Term Care Residents' Rights Act. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs moved for class certification. After conducting two hearings, the trial court entered an order granting certification to a class of all residents and estates of residents who resided at the Golden Living nursing homes from December 2006 onward. The trial court found that Plaintiffs established commonality by asserting the central issue of whether Defendants' alleged business practice breached the standard admission agreement and violated the Residents' Rights Act. Id. at *7. Upon Defendant's appeal, the Arkansas Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's order. Although Defendants argued that the experiences and injuries of the residents varied and that individualized proceedings would be necessary to determine if any alleged injury was proximately caused by the alleged understaffing, the Supreme Court found core issues common to each class member on the issues of liability. Id. at *9-14. According to the Supreme Court, the questions of whether Defendants had a duty to provide appropriate staffing pursuant to the admission agreement and the Residents' Rights Act, and whether Defendants failed to meet the statutory and contractual obligations by chronically understaffing the facilities, had the capacity to reveal the possibility for a claim against Defendants or wipe out the possibility of a claim for every class member. Id. at *14-15.

The Supreme Court reasoned that the common, overarching issues concerned whether Defendants were liable for chronic understaffing under the admission agreement and the asserted statues, and these central issues could be decided on a class-wide basis and it manifestly predominated over individual issues concerning a class member's right to recovery, which could be determined in bifurcated proceedings. Id. at *16. The Supreme Court therefore concluded that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in ruling that Plaintiffs met the predominance requirement based on the common issues of establishing liability. Defendants also argued that the existence of arbitration agreements with a substantial number of class members provided another individual issue that predominated over common issues. Id. at *17. Since the current record did not reflect that a significant number of class members had agreed to arbitration so as to override the certification of the class, the Supreme Court rejected Defendants' argument. Id. Defendants also failed to demonstrate that the admissions agreement were materially different for each class member and if the trial court would have to determine whether the contracts were standard, identical, or substantially similar before determining any breach. Id. The Supreme Court therefore concluded that a class action was the superior method for resolving the question of Defendants' liability, and accordingly, affirmed the trial court's grant of class certification.

Philip Morris Cos., Inc. v. Miner, et al.*, 2015 Ark. LEXIS 83 (Ark. Feb. 26, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants violated the Arkansas Deceptive Trade Practices Act ("ADTPA") by falsely representing that its Marlboro Lights cigarettes were healthier and contained less tar and nicotine than regular cigarettes. Plaintiffs moved for class certification. The trial court certified the class, and on appeal, the Arkansas Supreme Court affirmed. Defendants argued that each element of Plaintiffs' ADTPA claim – misrepresentation, causation, and damages – contained issues that defeated the predominance requirement. Defendants asserted that misrepresentation was an inherently individualized issue because whether the representation for Lights cigarettes was false depended on each class member's smoking habit. Id. at *8. The Supreme Court noted that the question was whether Defendants made false representation or engaged in a deceptive practice. The Supreme Court noted that Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants falsely represented Lights cigarettes as having lower tar and nicotine, and that they employed deceptive techniques to reduce machine-measured levels of tar. The Supreme Court found that these allegations went beyond whether each consumer who bought Lights actually received less tar or nicotine, and individual issues regarding smoking behavior were not dispositive. Id. at *11. Defendants further argued that proof of causation required proof of reliance, and since each buyer bought Lights for different reasons, those individual reasons destroyed predominance. Id. at *13. The Supreme Court rejected Defendants' position. It noted that in Asbury Automobile Group v. Palasack, 366 Ark. 601 (2006), Plaintiffs brought a class action against a car dealership, alleging that Defendants violated two ADTPA by charging a $100 document preparation fee. Id. Defendants argued that questions such as how each class member paid for a vehicle destroyed predominance. Asbury rejected this argument, reasoning that questions concerning the fee and the reason the dealership charged it were overarching issues that could be resolved before the trial court reached any individual issues, such as the degree of reliance of each class member on the misrepresentation. Id. at *13. Likewise, in this case, the Supreme Court reasoned that the misrepresentation element of Plaintiffs' ADTPA claim could be proved by class adjudication, and then to the extent that causation and reliance required individual inquiries, the trial court could decertify the class in a bifurcated proceeding. Id. at *11. Finally, Defendants argued that each individual's damage claim depended on his or her smoking habits, which also destroyed predominance. Id. The Supreme Court found that as with the issue of causation, bifurcation would solve the damages issue as well. Accordingly, the Supreme Court found that the predominance requirement was satisfied. Defendants also argued that the class was not ascertainable because each class member would have to present receipts in order to opt-in to the class. Id. at *16. The Supreme Court remarked that there was no receipt requirement in order to join a class action, and one of the rationales for the class action mechanism was to provide individual consumers with an effective way to pool resources and collectively bring a claim that would otherwise be unremunerative if brought individually. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Supreme Court affirmed the class certification order.

(iv) California

Adjamian, et al. v. L'Oreal USA SD, Inc.*, 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 5072 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. July 20, 2015). Plaintiff, a customer, brought an action alleging that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of knowingly requesting and recording customers' personal identification information ("PII") at its California retail stores during credit card transactions in violation of the Song-Beverly Credit Card Act. Plaintiff sought certification of a class consisting of all California citizens who shopped at Kiehl's, a store operated by Defendant, who were requested to provide and who provided PII. The trial court denied the motion because it found that Plaintiff failed to present substantial evidence of a policy or practice by Kiehl's, specific to credit card transactions, of requiring PII or causing a reasonable customer to perceive such a requirement. Id. at *16. On Plaintiff's appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. Plaintiff asserted that the Act prohibits any and all requests for PII of any customer who ends up paying with a credit card, regardless of the circumstances of the request. Id. at *22. The Court of Appeal disagreed, holding that the Act forbids businesses from requesting or requiring cardholders to provide PII as a condition of accepting the credit cards. Id. at *23. The Act does not forbid merchants from requesting that consumers voluntarily provide their e-mail addresses or other identifying information for use in e-mail marketing programs, and it does not prohibit a retailer from soliciting a consumer's address and telephone number for a store's mailing list, if the consumer provides such information voluntarily. Id. at *24. Kiehl's trained its salesclerks to ask customers for their contact information, starting at the point the customers walked into the store, until the time that the customers left. Kiehl's asked customers for their contact information when the clerk first greeted the customers upon arrival, when the customers sat down for skin consultations, and when Kiehl's provided product samples. Id. at *25. Thus, the Court of Appeal found that Kiehl's sought to obtain contact information from customers at various times, and through various efforts, before customers presented credit cards for payment and, in at least some instances, requested PII before customers even thought about purchasing merchandise with a credit card. Id. Thus, because a retailer is liable for a violation of § 1747.08(a)(2) only if a consumer would perceive the store's "request" for information as a condition of the use of a credit card, the Court of Appeal opined that the varied circumstances in which Kiehl's requested PII from its customers presented individualized factual issues that could not be tried in a class action. Id. at *26. The circumstances of each customer interaction would have to be evaluated to determine what a reasonable customer would have perceived about the request for PII vis-à-vis the subsequent credit card transaction and, therefore, whether the request constituted a violation of the Act. Id. at *26-27. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal agreed with the trial court that individualized issues predominated and affirmed the denial of class certification.

Aguirre, et al. v. Amscan Holdings, Inc.,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 933 (Cal. App. 3d Dist. Feb. 11, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Song-Beverly Credit Card Act by routinely requesting and recording personal identification information, namely ZIP Codes, from customers using credit cards in its retail stores in California. Plaintiff sought to represent a proposed class of all persons in California from whom Defendant requested and recorded a ZIP code in conjunction with a credit card purchase for a defined period. The proposed definition also included a list of those excluded from the class. Id. at *7. Defendant moved to strike and dismiss Plaintiff's class allegations, and to deny class certification. The trial court granted the motion, finding that Plaintiff failed to establish the existence of an ascertainable class. The trial court relied on Plaintiff's inability to clearly "identify, locate, and notify" class members through a reasonable expenditure of time and money to conclude that the proposed class was not ascertainable. Id. at *15. Upon Plaintiff's appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's decision. The Court of Appeal found that the trial court applied an erroneous legal standard in determining that the proposed class was not ascertainable. Id. at *2. The Court of Appeal held that, contrary to the trial court's order, the representative Plaintiff need not identify, much less locate, individual class members to establish the existence of an ascertainable class. Id. at *17. The Court of Appeal determined that Plaintiff's proposed class definition described a set of common characteristics sufficient to allow a member of that group to identify himself or herself as having a right to recover based on the class description. Id. Moreover, in response to Defendant's claim that the parties lacked an adequate means for identifying class members, Plaintiff pointed to sales receipts and credit card statements, noting that potential class members have the ability to present a receipt or credit card statement showing that a credit card transaction was entered into on a specific date, at a specific store location, and the specific amount of purchase, and that such receipt or credit card statement could be cross-referenced with Defendant's records to show that a ZIP Code that Defendant had requested associated with that specific purchase. Id. at *19-20. The Court of Appeal concluded that there was no need to identify the individual members in order to bind all class members by the judgment, because Plaintiff showed the existence of an ascertainable class and as Plaintiff's claims and those of the unnamed class members were not separate and distinct. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's order striking and dismissing Plaintiff's class allegations, and remanded the action for further proceedings.

Ambers, et al. v. Beverages & More, Inc.*, 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 370 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. May 4, 2015). Plaintiff, a purchaser, brought a class action seeking penalties for violation of § 1747.08 of the Song-Beverly Credit Card Act which prohibits merchants from requesting or requiring and recording a consumer's personal identifying information ("PII") during a credit card purchase transaction. Id. at *1. Plaintiff alleged that he purchased alcohol on-line through Defendant's website and elected to pick up his order at Defendant's store. Further, Plaintiff alleged that he provided his PII, which was a condition to completing the on-line purchase, and that he completed the transaction and paid for the merchandise with his credit card. Id. at *2. Defendant demurred to the complaint, which the trial court sustained. Thereafter, Plaintiff filed a first amended complaint wherein he alleged that the on-line request for his PII violated § 1747.08 because that information was unnecessary to the completion of his store pick up transaction or to prevent fraud because Defendant required him to show the store employee his photo identification and credit card before receiving his merchandise. Id. at *3. Plaintiff also alleged the transaction was not completed until he went to the store, showed the clerk both his photo identification and credit card, and physically received his merchandise. Defendant again demurred, which the trial court sustained. It held that Plaintiff had failed to explain why he was not bound by his previous allegation that the transaction was completed during the on-line purchase. Id. at *4. The trial court also held that Plaintiff owned the merchandise after he made his on-line payment. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. The Court of Appeal noted that § 1747.08 (c)(4) allows PII to be collected if it is required for a special purpose incidental but related to the individual credit card transaction, including information relating to shipping, delivery, servicing, or installation of the purchased merchandise, or for special orders. Id. at *7. Further, the Court of Appeal observed that Apple Inc. v. Superior Court, 56 Cal. 4th 140 (2013), concluded that § 1747.08 (d) demonstrated the Legislature's intent to permit retailers to use and even record PII when necessary to combat fraud and identity theft. Id. at *11. Additionally, Apple held that the safeguards against fraud that are provided in § 1747.08(d) are not available to an on-line retailer selling an electronically downloadable product. Id. The Court of Appeal remarked that Defendant had no means, without obtaining Plaintiff's PII, of verifying that he was an authorized user of the credit card number entered on its website before the purchase transaction was completed, and that such verification was also necessary because ownership of the merchandise purchased on passed immediately to Plaintiff upon completion of the on-line transaction, when Plaintiff's credit card was charged. Although Plaintiff contended that his purchase transaction was not completed on-line, and that the transaction was completed only upon his taking physical possession of the merchandise, the Court of Appeal opined that Plaintiff was bound by the allegation in his initial complaint that the transaction was completed on-line when he paid for the merchandise with his credit card. Id. at *13. The Court of Appeal noted that the California Commercial Code states in relevant part that unless otherwise explicitly agreed, "title passes to the buyer at the time and place at which the seller completes his performance with respect to the physical delivery of the goods." Id. at *14. When Plaintiff made his on-line purchase through Defendant's website, he agreed to the website terms and conditions of use, which stated that the title to purchased merchandise was transferred to the buyer at the time his or her credit card was charged. Thus, Plaintiff became the owner of the purchased items when his credit card was charged upon completion of the on-line transaction. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal held that that portion of the Commercial Code did not apply to Plaintiff's on-line purchase of merchandise that he subsequently retrieved at a retail store, and affirmed the dismissal of the action.

Animal Protection And Rescue League, et al. v. The City Of San Diego,* 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 459 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. May 27, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a petition for writ of mandate against the City of San Diego and its Planning Commission ("the City"), seeking to vacate the city planning commission's denial of their application to install a guard rope at the La Jolla Children's Pool to protect harbor seals from humans. About three months after Plaintiffs filed the petition, the City conceded that the commission erred when it denied the permit for an annual rope barrier. Thereafter, Plaintiffs moved for an entry of judgment on its writ petition and the City filed a non-opposition to the motion. The trial court then granted Plaintiffs' petition for writ of mandate and issued a corresponding peremptory writ of mandate. Plaintiffs then sought an award of private attorney general fees amounting to $123,243.75, and sought fees for work performed during and prior to the filing of the litigation in this case, as well as for work performed in services rendered in a related case, where they had sought a preliminary injunction requiring installation of the guideline rope at issue in this case. Id. at *5-6. The City opposed the motion, arguing that they were never the opposing party because they had confessed error at the inception of the action. The trial court awarded $82,717.50 to Plaintiffs, including $82,162.50 in attorneys' fees and $555 in costs. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. The Court of Appeal noted the reasoning in Connerly v. State Personnel Board, 37 Cal. 4th 1169, (2006), which held that the opposing party liable for attorneys' fees is the person or agency sued, which is responsible for initiating and maintaining actions or policies that are deemed harmful to the public interest and that gave rise to the litigation. Id. at *11. Here, the City was the named respondent to Plaintiffs' writ petition, and the City via its planning commission was the entity responsible for initiating and maintaining actions or policies that gave rise to the litigation. Id. Thus, the Court of Appeal opined that the City fit squarely within the definition of "opposing party" provided in Connerly. Id. at *12. Although the City contended that it was not an opposing party because it had never taken a position adverse to Plaintiffs, the Court of Appeal stated that under Connerly, it is generally the entity responsible for the actions that gave rise to the litigation that is an opposing party. Id. Here, Plaintiffs sought and obtained a peremptory writ of mandate requiring the City to vacate and set aside the planning commission's denial of a permit for the year-round guideline rope. The Court of Appeal remarked that fact that the City confessed its error and agreed to have a judgment entered against it did not provide a reasonable basis for concluding that the City may not be subject to an attorneys' fee award. Id. at *12-13. Additionally, the Court of Appeal observed that under the catalyst theory, a trial court may award attorneys' fees even when litigation does not result in a judicial resolution if Defendant changes its behavior substantially because of, and in the manner sought by, the litigation. Id. at *14. The Court of Appeal explained that there was no reason why § 1021.5 of the California Code of Civil Procedure should be interpreted to permit an award of attorneys' fees pursuant to a catalyst theory of recovery where Defendant changes its behavior without judicial resolution, but to deny recovery where an entity confesses error in response to ligation. Id. Thus, the Court of Appeals held that the City was an opposing party, and affirmed the award of attorneys' fees

Audio Visual Services Group, Inc., et al. v. Superior Court,* 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 50 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Jan. 21, 2015). Plaintiff, an audio-visual technician, brought a class action on behalf of audio-visual workers employed by PSAV Presentations Services ("PSAV") under the California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL") for violation of the Los Angeles Hotel Service Charge Reform Ordinance. PSAV provided audio-visual services to hotels within the Century Corridor Property Business Improvement District ("Corridor") adjacent to the Los Angeles International Airport ("LAX"), and the Ordinance required hotels within the Corridor, with 50 or more guest rooms, and no collective bargaining agreement, to pass along the entire service charge to the hotel workers who actually performed the services for which the charges were collected. Id. at *4. Plaintiff alleged that PSAV violated the Ordinance, and thus the UCL. PSAV demurred to the complaint arguing that the first claim for violation of the Ordinance was barred by the statute of limitations, and that Plaintiff's second cause of action failed to state a claim because the Ordinance was intended to protect the wages of "traditionally tipped hotel workers," which did not apply to Plaintiff and the class members. Id. at *8. Plaintiff conceded that his first claim was time-barred, but argued that the Ordinance did not limit its reach only to those hotel workers who traditionally received gratuities for their services. Agreeing with Plaintiff, the trial court had overruled the demurrer to the UCL claim. The trial court had found that PSAV might be a "hotel worker" within the meaning of the Ordinance because Plaintiff performed his work inside a hotel routinely and the hotel incorporated PSAV's bill including the "service charge" element into its master bill for meeting functions held at the hotel. Id. at *9. The trial court thus held that "hotels and hotel sub-contractors who choose to 'un-bundle' their bills with line items described as 'service charges'" within the Corridor were required to pay service charges to audio-visual workers. Id. at *10. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed, finding that audio-visual workers do not fall within the class of employees protected by the Ordinance because they were not the type of employees who traditionally relied on gratuities as part of their wages. Id. at *3. The Court of Appeal utilized a traditional statutory construction analysis focusing on the list of examples following the general definition of "hotel worker" provided in the Ordinance. The examples included hotel workers "who work banquets or catered meetings, deliver food and beverages, and carry baggage," whose wages typically included gratuities. Id. at *16. According to the Court of Appeal, if the city council had intended the term "hotel worker" to be used in its broadest sense – to include workers such as plumbers or audio-visual workers such as Plaintiff – then the examples provided in the Ordinance would have been unnecessary and surplusage. Id. at *17. The Court of Appeal found nothing in the stated purpose of the Ordinance to support Plaintiff's argument that the city council intended to address all "services charges" that were separate line items on hotel bills, and thus held that Plaintiff was not among the class of hotel workers the city intended to protect when enacting the Ordinance. Id. at *20-23. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's order denying PSAV's demurrer.

Branning, et al. v. Apple, Inc.,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 576 (Cal. App. 6th Dist. Jan. 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant calculated warranty and AppleCare contract periods using estimated purchase dates as opposed to actual purchase dates, and thus caused their warranty and AppleCare coverage to expire prematurely. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiffs also claimed that Defendant wrongfully refused repair service as a result of the alleged shorting, and asserted claims under the California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), Consumers Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA") and False Advertising Law ("FAL"). In October 2009, the trial court certified a class with respect to Plaintiffs' causes of action for violation of the UCL, FAL, and the CLRA. In a separate ruling, the trial court found that Plaintiffs failed to produce any evidence that Defendant denied valid warranty of AppleCare coverage claims, and thus, the named Plaintiffs lacked standing to pursue their shorting claims. Id. at *12. Defendant then filed a motion to decertify the class, asserting that individual issues predominated over a common one given the trial court's ruling on Plaintiffs' lack of standing. Id. at *13. The trial court granted Defendant's motion and allowed the parties to address the standing issues in a summary adjudication motion. Plaintiffs then filed a motion for new trial asserting a new claim based on misenrollment or non-enrollment of AppleCare plan. The trial court modified its order on standing to reflect that the order did not apply to Plaintiffs' new "enrollment claims." Id. at *14. The trial court later distinguished Plaintiffs' "shorting claims" from their "enrollment claims," and ruled that none of the class representatives had standing to assert a shorting claim but only the enrollment claims. Id. at *15. Because individual issues related to enrollment claims predominated as to both liability and damages, the trial court concluded that class action would not be a superior method for resolving these claims. Id. at *18. Plaintiffs moved for reconsideration of the decertification order, but the trial court denied the motion in December 2010. Upon appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's orders. First, the Court of Appeal found that the trial court's determinations – that none of the named Plaintiffs had standing and Plaintiffs' assertion of new enrollment claims – was a "change of circumstance" that justified revisiting the order granting certification. Id. at *26-28. Further, the Court of Appeal determined that the trial court did not conflate typicality and standing because the trial court summarily adjudicated Plaintiffs' shorting claims against them, and thus their class claims failed for a lack of a proper class representative. Id. at *33. The Court of Appeal rejected Plaintiffs' contention that the shorting claims and enrollment claims were related to each other and summary adjudication was not permitted on any aspect of a cause of action that were related to each other. The Court of Appeal opined that Plaintiffs' claims involved two different primary rights, i.e., the right to be free from shorting of the one-year limited warranty and the right to be free from misenrollment or nonenrollment in AppleCare and thus, they were separate and distinct, so that did not preclude the trial court from summarily adjudicating it separately. Id. at *37. Because the summary judgment rulings established that none of the Plaintiffs in fact lost money or property as a result of Defendant's use of estimate purchase dates, the Court of Appeal held that the trial court properly dismissed the assertions as speculative. Id. at *42. Finally, the Court of Appeal ruled that the trial court properly considered and determined that individualized issues of liability and fact of damages made class certification inappropriate here. Defendant's evidence, including different contracts for different products and the issue of plan confirmation only with a validated warranty start date, supported the trial court's conclusion that establishing a class member's right to recover for misenrollment or non-enrollment would require individualized inquiries. Id. at *56-57. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's orders.

Brinkley, et al. v. Monterey Financial Services, Inc.*, 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 1029 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. Nov. 19, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action asserting causes of action for invasion of privacy and unlawful recording of telephone calls. Plaintiff contended that she signed up to receive real estate coaching classes from Real Estate Investor Education ("REIE"), one of Defendant's customers, and she financed for the classes through REIE's Retail Installment Contract ("RIC"). Id. at *3. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant called her requesting payments for the classes and the conversations were recorded without her knowledge. Id. at *8. The RIC had an arbitration clause, and Defendant therefore moved to compel arbitration, which the trial court granted. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed in part. Plaintiff argued that the Federal Arbitration Act did not govern the arbitration agreement, as the parties agreed to the application of state rules for any arbitration under their contract. Id. at *12. The Court of Appeal noted that the relevant language in the RIC contemplated an existence of an interstate transaction. Id. at *13. The choice-of-law provision indicated that the law to be applied was the law of the consumer's state. Because Plaintiff was a Washington resident, and REIE was a Utah entity, the Court of Appeal concluded that the RIC clearly evidenced an interstate transaction. Id. at *14. Plaintiff further asserted that Washington law governed the interpretation of the contract. The parties agreed that Washington and California law were substantially similar with respect to the issues raised in the appeal, and Defendant did not object to applying Washington law. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal concluded that Washington law governed the interpretation of the contract. Plaintiff contended that she asserted that claims of invasion of privacy, unlawful recording of telephone calls, and unlawful and unfair business practices, which were not covered under the terms of the RIC. Plaintiff asserted that her telephone conversations were recorded by Defendant, and all her claims arose from that alleged conduct. Defendant relied on a specific term in the RIC that specified that a default by the consumer will trigger a demand for immediate payment of the total amount owing and granted REIE permission to use all legal rights of enforcement to collect the monies due. Id. at *28. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal concluded that a dispute regarding the legality of any conduct that Defendant undertook in its collections efforts was a dispute related to the RIC. Id. The Court of Appeal also found that the arbitration agreement was not procedurally unconscionable. The Court of Appeal explained that the RIC specifically informed consumers that the REIE may assign the agreement to any third-party without prior notice, and that such third-party would become the holder of the agreement with the creditor. Id. at *44. Plaintiff further asserted that the arbitration agreement was substantively unconscionable due to the prohibitive costs of arbitration that she would have to incur. Defendant asserted that the AAA's Consumer-Related Disputes Supplementary Procedures would limit Plaintiff's costs to a $200 filing fee, and that all other costs would be borne by Defendant, including the arbitrator's fee and the arbitrator's travel and other expenses. Id. at *52. The Court of Appeal remarked that because Defendant made a judicial admission that the Consumer Supplementary Procedures, including the fee provisions, applied to any arbitration dispute with Plaintiff, it followed that Plaintiff would not incur prohibitive costs of arbitration. Id. at *54. The Court of Appeal, however, concluded that the availability of class arbitration was a matter for the arbitrator to decide. Id. at *75. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed the portion of the trial court's order compelling Plaintiff to arbitrate her individual, but not class, claims. The Court of Appeals also reversed the order dismissing the complaint, and directed the trial court to send the matter to arbitration. Id.

Connor, et al. v. First Student, Inc.*, 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 695 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Aug. 12, 2015). Plaintiff, a school bus driver, brought a class action alleging that Defendants failed to get her written consent before conducting background checks on her, in violation of California's Investigative Consumer Reporting Agencies Act ("ICRAA"). Plaintiff worked for Laidlaw Education Services, which was acquired by Defendants in 2007. Id. at *4. Following the acquisition, Defendants hired HireRight Solutions, Inc., to conduct background checks on Plaintiff and all other former Laidlaw bus drivers, which included information from criminal record checks and searches of sex offender registries. Id. Before conducting the background checks, Defendants sent each employee a notice stating that HireRight may request an "investigative consumer report" that would include details of previous employers, reasons for termination of employment, work experience, accidents, academic history, or any other information that may reflect on the employee's potential for employment. Id. at *4-5. The notice informed the employee that they may view or obtain a copy of their file, and included a box the employee could check if they wanted to obtain a copy of the report, and included the requisite disclosures. Id. at *5. Defendants moved for summary judgment, which the trial court granted based upon the holding of Ortiz v. Lyon Management Group, Inc., 157 Cal. App. 4th 604 (Cal. App. 2007). Id. at *6. Ortiz held that the ICRAA was unconstitutionally vague as applied to tenant screening reports containing unlawful detainer information because unlawful detainer information related to both creditworthiness and character. Id. at *2. According to Ortiz, the ICRAA and the Consumer Credit Reporting Agencies Act ("CCRAA") presented a statutory scheme that required information in consumer reports to be categorized as either character information (governed by the ICRAA) or creditworthiness information (governed by the CCRAA); when the information could be categorized as both, the statutory scheme could not be enforced constitutionally because it did not give adequate notice of which Act governed that information. Id. Plaintiff appealed, and contended that the ICRAA applied to the background checks at issue in this case, and the fact that the CCRAA might also apply to those same background checks did not render the ICRAA void for vagueness. Id. at *7. The California Court of Appeal reversed, holding that the trial court's reliance on Ortiz was erroneous. Id. The Court of Appeal found the background checks included information on the employees' (or prospective employees') character, general reputation, personal characteristics, or mode of living, and thus were investigative consumer reports used for employment purposes that required compliance with the requirements of the ICRAA. Id. at *10-11. Defendants argued that the ICRAA was unconstitutionally vague because the CCRAA also applied to the background checks at issue, and an employer could not determine whether the CCRAA or the ICRAA applied. Id. at *11. The Court of Appeal held the CCRAA did not apply to the background checks in this case, as there was no evidence the background checks sought any information regarding the employees' creditworthiness. Id. at *12-13. Further, nothing in the language of the ICRAA or the CCRAA precluded the application of both to the same consumer report. Id. at *15. The Court of Appeal noted the statutes' legislative history also showed the CCRAA always governed consumer reports that included character information on creditworthiness, as long as that information was not obtained through personal interviews. Id. at *18. Similarly, the Court of Appeal observed that consumer reports that included any character information, regardless of how it was obtained, were governed by the ICRAA. Id. at *19. Thus, the Court of Appeal concluded the fact that the two Acts overlapped in their coverage of some consumer reports did not render them unconstitutionally vague to the extent of that overlap. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed summary judgment in Defendants' favor. Id. at *23.

Elijahjuan, et al. v. Mike Campbell & Associates, Ltd.,* 2015 Unpub. LEXIS 7904 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Nov. 4, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of truck owners, brought a class action alleging that Defendants misclassified them as independent contractors. Plaintiffs operated under the U.S. Department Transportation Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration and were permitted by the California Department of Motor Vehicles. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs paid their own operating expenses, including insurance, repair, and maintenance, and some Plaintiffs even formed corporations and hired employees. Id. Plaintiffs entered into agreements with Defendants to provide motor carrier services. Plaintiffs alleged causes of action for failure to reimburse business expenses, unlawful deduction of wages, and unlawful coerced purchases. The trial court entered summary judgment for Defendants, finding that if Plaintiffs were employees, Defendants would need to hire additional drivers, would need to reimburse operating expenses, and purchase trucks at a cost of over $90 million. The trial court also found that Defendants would have to obtain its own motor carrier authorization from the U.S. Department of Transportation, and that these changes would affect prices, routes, and services defined by the Federal Aviation Administration Authorization Act ("FAAAA"). On appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed and remanded. The Court of Appeal noted that after the trial court entered summary judgment, several courts, including the California Supreme Court, had held that similar lawsuits were not preempted by the FAAA. The Court of Appeal noted that in People ex rel. Harris v. Pac Anchor Transportation, Inc., 59 Cal. 4th 771 (2014), the California Supreme Court found that preemption applies when claims derive from the enactment or enforcement of state law, and relates to a motor carrier's prices, routes, or services with respect to the transportation of property. Id. at *8. The Supreme Court held that FAAA does preempt generally applicable employment laws. Id. The Court of Appeal noted that in Pac Anchor, the Supreme Court relied on Californians for Safe & Competitive Dump Truck Transp. v. Mendonca, 152 F.3d. 1184 (9th Cir. 1998), where the Ninth Circuit held that the FAAA did not preempt California's prevailing wage law. Id. at *10. The Ninth Circuit concluded that state regulation in an area of traditional state power and having no more than an indirect or tenuous effect on motor carriers' prices and routes were not exempted. Id. Defendants conceded that the claims brought in this case were not facially preempted, but emphasized that in contrast to Pac Anchor, here, Defendants did not own the drivers' trucks and did not have the authority to engage in cargo transport. Id. at *17. Additionally some Plaintiffs had corporations themselves, which had employees, and they would have to reimburse $90 million, which was so exorbitant it would necessarily affect prices. Id. The Court of Appeal, however, noted that the ultimate determination of whether Plaintiffs were independent contractors had no bearing on FAAAA preemption. The Court of Appeal opined that the FAAAA was not contingent on motor carriers owning their own trucks, using their own equipment, or having operational control. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed and remanded.

Falk, et al. v. Children's Hospital L.A.,* 237 Cal. App. 4th 1454 (2d Dist. 2015). In this series of class actions filed against Defendant alleging various wage and labor violations, the California Court of Appeal held that filing of a class action tolled the statute of limitations for claims subsequently brought by other class members. Plaintiff worked as a licensed vocational nurse at Defendant's Hospital from March 2006 to August 2006. During May 2007, Thomas Palazzolo, an hourly paid patient care service aide employed by Defendant, brought a class action complaint alleging that Defendant failed to pay all non-exempt or hourly paid employees overtime, denied them meal and rest breaks, failed to reimburse for business expenses and failed to provide proper wage statements ("the Palazzolo class action"). Id. at 1455-58. During January 2012, another registered nurse, Denise Mays, brought a class action complaint against Defendant alleging similar causes of action ("the Mays class action"). Id. at 1459. In December 2012, Plaintiff Falk filed this third class action alleging claims for failure to reimburse for business expenses, failure to pay all wages earned, failure to provide proper wage statements, failure to provide meal and rest breaks, and waiting time penalties. Id. at 1460-61. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that Plaintiff's claims were not timely and that the Palazzolo class action and the Mays class action did not toll the statute of limitations. The trial court agreed and entered judgment against Plaintiff. The trial court rejected Plaintiff's claim that the action was timely under the American Pipe & Construction Co. v. Utah, 414 U.S. 538 (1974), which established that the statute of limitations on putative class members' claims might be tolled during the pendency of a class action raising a related claim on behalf of the same class. Id. at 1457. The trial court found that the Palazzolo class action did not have tolling effect because the ruling in Palazzolo, while granting summary judgment to Defendant, found none of the claims substantively viable, and American Pipe does not permit "piggy-backing" of successive class actions. Id. at 1461-62. The trial court also found that the earlier actions did not put Defendant on notice of Plaintiff's "esoteric dual rate" claim. Id. at 1462. The Court of Appeal disagreed and held that Plaintiff's class claims were tolled by the filing of the earlier class actions. The Court of Appeal cited to a case in which the Seventh Circuit – Sawyer v. Atlas Heating, 642 F.3d 560 (7th Cir. 2011) – applied American Pipe to an action in which Plaintiff dismissed the action before class certification was ruled on, leaving the other class members "in the lurch." Id. at 1465. In ruling that a subsequent action by another class member was tolled during the pendency of the first action, the Seventh Circuit had rejected the argument that the first action was "never a class action" and noted that the class certification question was never ruled on in American Pipe either. Id. The Court of Appeal reasoned that the class members in the Palazzolo class action were similar to Plaintiffs in two Seventh Circuit cases because the trial court never addressed the merits of class claims in the Palazzolo class action, and granted the motion for summary judgment because the named Plaintiff, not the class, failed to state viable causes of action. Id. at 1465. The Court of Appeal thus found that the putative class members in the Palazzolo class action were, through no fault of their own, left without an action to pursue their claims. Id. Because no certification decision was made before the dismissal of the action, the Court of Appeal concluded that American Pipe tolling should apply here. Although Plaintiffs' claims were more specific, the Court of Appeal also noted that her claims were substantially similar to those alleged in the Palazzolo class action, and that her claims were tolled from the date the Palazzolo action commenced until the date of remand of the case to the trial court. Id. at 1469. The Court of Appeal therefore held that Plaintiff's claims with a one-year statute of limitations were time-barred, but with three-year and four-year limitation were still viable. Id. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed in part and reversed in part the trial court's order granting summary judgment to Defendant.

Fischer, et al. v. Time Warner Cable, Inc.,* 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 163 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Feb. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of cable subscribers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants, a cable provider ("cable provider Defendant") and two professional sports teams ("sports teams Defendants"), violated the California Unfair Competition Law ("CUCL") by entering into exclusive rights deals to broadcast Lakers and Dodgers games over cable, the costs of which were passed on to all customers, including those who did not watch the games, in the form of higher charges. Plaintiffs claimed that each subscriber paid an extra $9 per month for the channels, even though surveys showed that 60% of the population did not watch sports on television. Id. at *3. The cable provider Defendant demurred on the ground that the Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act of 1992 (the "Cable Act") expressly permitted bundling of channels, thereby providing a "safe harbor" against UCL claims. Id. at *4-5. The sports team Defendants demurred on the ground that they did not engage in unfair completion by entering into the agreements. The trial court sustained the demurrers based on both the "safe harbor" argument and express preemption based on 47 C.F.R. § 76.981(c), which creates an exception to the Cable Act prohibition against "negative option billing." Id. at *5. While § 543 of the Cable Act prohibits cable operators from engaging in negative option billing, such that subscribers might not be charged "for any service or equipment that the subscriber had not affirmatively requested by name," 47 C.F.R. § 76.981(c), promulgated by Federal Communications Commission ("FCC"), provides that "the addition or deletion of a specific program from a service offering, the addition or deletion of specific channels from an existing tier or service, the restructuring or division of existing tiers of service, or the adjustment of rates as a result of the addition, deletion or substitution of channels" does not constitute negative option billing. Id. at *9-12. The FCC regulations also provided that state and local governments cannot enforce consumer protection laws that conflict with this negative option billing prohibition so long as the changes proposed by the cable operator "do not constitute a fundamental change in the nature of an existing service…" Id. at *12. The trial court concluded that § 76.981(c) expressly preempted Plaintiffs' UCL claim, and found that Defendant's act of adding three sports channels to its enhanced basic service tier and adjust subscribers' rates accordingly did not fundamentally alter the nature of the existing tier. Id. at *15. The trial court therefore dismissed Plaintiffs' complaint. Plaintiffs appealed, and the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's finding. The Court of Appeal rejected Plaintiffs' contention that the addition of the three sports channels constituted a "fundamental change" to the basic service tier that brought it outside the preemptive effect of § 76.981(c). The Court of Appeal cited Time Warner Cable v. Doyle, 66 F.3d 867 (7th Cir. 1995), in which the Seventh Circuit overturned a ruling against a cable provider for changing its rate structure by removing channels from its basic and standard tier, the price of which was then reduced, with the removed channels being offered a la carte. The Seventh Circuit observed that 47 U.S.C. § 552 permits the enforcement of state consumer protection laws absent their express preemption by the Cable Act. The Seventh Circuit held that FCC had reasonably interpreted § 543(8)(f) to preempt state challenges to negative option billing practices that did not fundamentally alter a service tier, as expressly permitted by 47 C.F.R. § 76.981(c). Id. at *18-19. The Court of Appeal found that the same reasoning would apply to Plaintiffs' challenge to the addition of the three sports channels. An FCC order, interpreting § 76.981, had found such types of changes as minor, even if coupled with a price adjustment. Id. at *22. The Court of Appeal therefore concluded that the trial court had properly held that § 76.981(c) preempted Plaintiffs' UCL claim, and accordingly affirmed the trial court's order.

Franco, et al. v. Arakelian Enterprises, Inc.,* 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 186 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Feb. 26, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Athens Disposal Co., Inc. d/b/a Athens Services, engaged in systematic and illegal California Labor Code and wage-order violations. Athens Services filed a motion to compel arbitration pursuant to Plaintiff's employment agreement, which contained a mutual arbitration policy ("MAP"). The MAP provided that it would govern all disputes arising out of Plaintiff's employment. The trial court granted Athens Services' petition to compel arbitration. Upon Plaintiff's appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed, concluding that the MAP's provisions requiring arbitration and waiving class actions were unenforceable. Id. at *6-7. On remand to trial court, counsel for Athens Services argued that Plaintiff's employer was not Athens Services but Arakelian, doing business as Athens Services. Subsequent discovery confirmed that Athens Disposal Co., Inc. had never employed Plaintiff. Plaintiff then amended the complaint to add Arakelian, doing business as Athens Services, as a John Doe Defendant. Arakelian filed a second petition to compel arbitration, relying on the MAP again. In April 2011, the trial court denied the petition, reasoning that: (i) the law of the case doctrine required enforcement of the first decision denying arbitration; and (ii) Arakelian waived its right to compel arbitration by failing to identify itself as Plaintiff's true employer until after its lawyers had prosecuted the original petition to compel arbitration and exhausted the appellate process. Id. at *8-9. Arakelian appealed, and the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's denial of second petition to compel arbitration. The California Supreme Court, however, granted review of the denial, deferring action until disposition of a related issue in Iskanian v. CLS Transportation Los Angeles, LLC, 59 Cal. 4th 348 (2014). In June 2014, the California Supreme Court ruled in Iskanian that recent U.S. Supreme Court precedents had abrogated California case law that had provided that arbitration agreements containing class action waivers limiting employees' ability to pursue statutory protections are unenforceable, and that the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") preempts state law rules against such waivers if they interfere with fundamental attributes of arbitration. Id. at *11. Bound by Iskanian, the Court of Appeal then vacated, reversed, and remanded its second ruling in which it had affirmed the denial of Arakelian's motion to compel arbitration of Plaintiff's class claims. The Court of Appeal found that arbitration agreement between Plaintiff and Arakelian was "enforceable unless it is found to be unconscionable on grounds that exist 'for the revocation of any contract,' within the meaning of the FAA." Id. at *12. The Court of Appeal held that the law of the case doctrine could not be applied here because it would lead to unjust results, particularly, where there has been an intervening change in the law on which the earlier decision was based. Id. at *14. The Court of Appeal also ruled that Arakelian's delay in identifying itself as Plaintiff's employer did not waive its right to compel arbitration as the belated identification did not prejudice Plaintiff's ability to obtain the legitimate benefits of arbitration. Id. at *18-19. The Court of Appeal, however, held that MAP's waiver of Plaintiff's claim under California Private Attorneys General Act was unenforceable because it was contrary to the public policy and the laws of the state. Id. at *25. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's order denying arbitration of Plaintiff's claims in part.

Gutierrez, et al. v. Girardi,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 169 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Jan. 12, 2015). Plaintiff brought class action against Defendants, attorneys who represented him in a civil action against Lockheed Corporation alleging that Defendants mishandled settlement funds in the Lockheed Litigation. Plaintiff alleged that Defendants breached their fiduciary duty by failing to disburse to their clients their rightful shares of the settlements, and disbursing settlement funds to third-parties without the clients' knowledge and consent. Plaintiff moved for certification of a class comprised of individuals who were represented by Defendants in connection with the Lockheed Litigation whose claims had been adjudicated or settled as to all Defendants in the Lockheed Litigation, except for those class members who settled their claims against Defendants or who are currently represented by Defendants. The trial court denied the motion, holding that superiority was lacking. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. First, Plaintiff contended that the trial court improperly precluded him from pursuing this action on behalf of Defendants' existing clients and this error prejudicially tainted the superiority determination. The Court of Appeal, however, remarked that the trial court's order did not make a final determination as to the size or scope of a certified class, nor did it prohibit Plaintiff from seeking to certify a broader class in a subsequent class certification motion. Id. at *11. The Court of Appeal also noted that the order did not address class certification requirements or preclude Plaintiff from establishing those requirements for a more broadly defined class. Although Plaintiff asserted that the proposed class consisted of approximately 25 putative class members, Defendant's evidence showed that seven class members were deceased, which left a class with only 17 members. The trial court opined that trying a dozen or 24 cases of individual Plaintiffs was not an impossible burden for the trial court, especially since it was unclear that most of such persons would initiate their own suits if class certification was denied. Id. at *15-16. Thus, the Court of Appeal opined that the benefits of litigating the case as a class action were minimal. The trial court had remarked that certification would effectively empower Plaintiff to waive the attorney-client privilege on behalf of absent class members to the extent necessary for Defendants to defend the action. Id. at *16-17. Further, because there was no supporting declaration to show that absent class members would have affirmatively and voluntarily waived the privilege on their own behalf, the trial court found Plaintiff failed to establish superiority. The Court of Appeal observed that ordinarily a client may not sue for breach of the attorney's duties and also simultaneously prevent the attorney from defending himself by invoking the privilege, and that the holder of the privilege, the client, implicitly waives the privilege by filing such a suit. Id. at *17. Here, however, the absent class members had not filed suit against Defendant nor taken any affirmative action upon which to premise an implied waiver. Under Plaintiff's proposed methodology, these absent class members would be presumed to have waived the privilege simply by failing to opt-out of the class. Considering the important interests advanced by the attorney-client privilege, the Court of Appeal noted that the shortcomings of this passive waiver proposition did not make class action a superior method for adjudicating the small number of individual claims at issue. For these reasons, the Court of Appeal affirmed the denial of class certification.

Harrold, et al v. Levi Strauss & Co.,* 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 427 (Cal. App. 1st Dist. May 19, 2015). Plaintiff, a customer, brought a class action alleging that Defendants violated the Song Beverly Credit Card Act (the "Act") by requesting and recording e-mail addresses while making purchases with a credit card. Plaintiff did not recall whether Defendants requested her e-mail address before or after she had signed for the purchase, but testified that it was before they bagged and handed to her the purchased merchandise. Id. at *4-5. The trial court held that § 1747.08 of the Act prohibits requests for personal identification information only as a condition to accepting the credit card as payment and that, therefore, such a request made after the credit card transaction has been completed does not violate the statute. Id. at *6. Consequently, the trial court opined that class certification was inappropriate, which on appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. The Court of Appeal observed that § 1747.08 prohibits businesses from requesting that cardholders provide personal identification information during credit card transactions, and then recording that information. Id. at *8. Although the Court of Appeal agreed with Plaintiff that the prohibition applies at all times during and prior to the completion of a credit card transaction, it opined that the prohibition does not continue beyond that point. Id. Defendants' policy did not permit the sales clerk to ask the customer about joining its e-mail program or to request the customer's e-mail address prior to conclusion of a credit card purchase. The Court of Appeal stated that the transaction having been concluded, such a request cannot reasonably be considered as a condition of acceptance of the credit card as a form of payment. Id. Further, the Court of Appeal noted that in 1991, § 1747.8 was broadened to § 1747.08, forbidding businesses from requesting or requiring as a condition to accepting the credit card, the cardholder to provide personal identification information. Id. at *10. The stated purpose of the amendment was to clarify that merchants may neither require nor request, as a condition to accepting the credit card, the taking or recording of personal identification information from the cardholder. Additionally, the Court of Appeal opined that the Act is not intended to forbid merchants from obtaining such information voluntarily, if the customer understands that the information need not be disclosed in order to use a credit card. The Court of Appeal determined that the legislative intent suggested that the 1991 amendment clarified that a request for personal identification information was prohibited if it immediately preceded the credit card transaction, even if the consumer's response was voluntary and made only for marketing purposes. Id. at *12. Thus, because the merchants violate the Act only if they make a request for e-mail addresses under circumstances in which the customer could reasonably understand that the e-mail address was required to process the credit card transaction, and because such an understanding could not reasonably be conveyed by a request made after the transaction has been concluded, the Court of Appeal affirmed the denial of class certification on the basis that Plaintiff's claims did not meet those requirements. Id. at *16.

Heller, et al. v. Carmel Partners, Inc.*, 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 801 (Cal. App. 2d. Feb. 4, 2015). Plaintiff, a property manager, brought an action alleging that Defendant misclassified him as exempt from overtime compensation. After the trial court denied class certification, a jury tried Plaintiff's individual claims, and awarded Plaintiff for his unpaid overtime wages and rest period claims, and also for unreimbursed business expenses. Plaintiff then sought attorneys' fees of $387,750 as the prevailing party, claiming that he incurred this sum trying his individual claims. The trial court denied Plaintiff's motion. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed. At issue was whether the trial court may deny all attorneys' fees if the demand is so overinflated that it shocks the conscience, overriding a statute mandating an award of fees. Id. at *5. The Court of Appeal observed that under § 1194 (a) of the California Labor Code, in a civil action an employee is entitled to recover the unpaid balance of the full amount of overtime compensation, including interest and reasonable attorneys' fees and costs. Id. Further, the Court of Appeal noted that Serrano v. Unruh, 32 Cal. 3d 621 (1982), held that a fee request that appears unreasonably inflated is a special circumstance permitting the trial court to reduce the award or deny one altogether. Id. at *6. Although the trial court relied upon Serrano in denying any attorneys' fees to Plaintiff, the Court of Appeal observed that the attorneys' fee statute applied in Serrano was discretionary, and that in contrast, the attorneys' fee provision in § 1194 is mandatory. Id. at *7. The Court of Appeal noted that § 1194 embodies a clear public policy specifically directed at the enforcement of California's minimum wage and overtime laws for the benefit of workers; the one-way attorneys' fees clause encourages employees to seek redress in situations where it would otherwise not be economical to sue. Id. at *8. Thus, considering the statutory mandate to award reasonable attorneys' fees, the Court of Appeal opined that it was an abuse of discretion for the trial court to deny fees altogether. Further, the Court of Appeal observed that reasonable attorneys' fees must be awarded under § 1194 even if the trial court assesses a reasonable amount to be far less than what is requested. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed the order of the trial court denying Plaintiff's request for attorneys' fees, and remanded the action to the trial court to exercise its discretion and determine a reasonable fee for Plaintiff's attorneys pursuant to § 1194.

In Re Tobacco Cases II,* 240 Cal. App. 4th 779 (4th Dist. Sept. 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of cigarette consumers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant knowingly used deceptive advertising terms such as "Lights" and "Lowered Tar and Nicotine" in advertising Marlboro Lights, in violation of California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL") and the False Advertising Law ("FAL"). Id. at 784. In 2001, the trial court certified a class of California residents who smoked cigarettes between 1993 and 2001 who were exposed to Defendant's advertising. Id. at 785. After extensive litigation and appeals, the trial court conducted a bench trial in 2013 and held that Defendant's advertising of the light cigarettes was deceptive within the meaning of the UCL. Id. at 786-87. The trial court found that Defendant knew that "lights" were no less dangerous than any other cigarettes and that their labeling was likely to deceive consumers. The trial court, however, refused Plaintiffs' request for restitution for lack of competent evidence of any loss attributable to the deceptive advertising. Id. at 787. Relying on the ruling in In Re Vioxx Class Cases, 180 Cal. App. 4th 116 (2009), the trial court found that the Plaintiffs had received value form Marlboro Lights apart from the deceptive advertising. Id. The trial court held that the proper theory of restitution under the UCL is "the difference between the price paid and the value actually received" and that a full refund would not be available where Plaintiffs obtained any value apart from the unlawful conduct. Id. On appeal, Plaintiffs argued that the trial court erred in finding that the only restitution available in a UCL products case was the measure established in Vioxx. Id. at 791. Plaintiffs argued that they did not have to show any loss attributable to the deceptive advertising and that the trial court had the discretion to order Defendant to pay a full refund of consumer expenditures for the purpose of deterrence. Id. Finding that Plaintiffs' arguments lacked merit, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's judgment in full. Citing Vioxx, the Court of Appeal held that full refund would be completely unavailable under the UCL if the product had conferred at least some value to consumers, notwithstanding the allegedly deceptive advertising. Id. at 796. Although the Court of Appeal did not completely foreclose a situation where a full refund might be available in a UCL case, it opined that such a case would only be in the extremely rare instance where a Plaintiff could prove that he received no value from the product, and even in that case, the Vioxx measure would still apply because "the price paid minus the value actually received [i.e., zero] equals the price paid." Id. Plaintiffs did not dispute the finding that they obtained value from Marlboro Lights apart from the deceptive advertising, and it appeared inherently implausible to show a class of smokers received "no" value from a particular type of cigarette. Id. at 802. The trial court had rejected Plaintiffs' "conjoint survey" which asked survey participants to choose between hypothetical cigarette products based on certain factors, including health risks, because "[t]he survey did not measure the difference between the price paid and the actual value received, but rather measured 'benefit of the bargain' damages not available in a UCL action." Id. at 788. Under the circumstances, the Court of Appeal concluded that the trial court's measure of restitution based on Vioxx was proper. Id. at 802. The Court of Appeal further rejected Plaintiffs' alternate theory that Defendant could be required under the UCL to make a full refund solely for the purpose of deterrence, regardless of whether Plaintiffs received value from the product apart from the deceptive advertising, concluding that restitution under the UCL could not be awarded exclusively for the purpose of deterrence. Id. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's judgment.

Kempler, et al. v. CLS Transportation Los Angeles,* 2015 Cal. Unpub. LEXIS 7855 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Nov. 2, 2015). In an action challenging the award of attorneys' fees and costs by eight arbitrators, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order granting the arbitral awards. Plaintiffs' action derived from an earlier lawsuit brought a former employee seeking unpaid meal, rest, and overtime pay, entitled Iskanian v. CLS Transportation Los Angeles, LLC, 59 Cal. 4th 348 (2014). Id. at *1. In Isknaian, the California Supreme Court eventually granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration. Id. at *3. Subsequently, 61 former class members in Iskanian opted-out of the class action and the appeal by filing individual demands for arbitration with the American Arbitration Association. After the arbitration commenced, all claims were settled for amounts ranging from $2,000 to $6,000. Id. at *4. Pursuant to the arbitration agreement and settlement agreements, the employees filed separate motions to recover attorneys' fees and costs with each of the eight arbitrators. Each of the arbitrators awarded different amounts. Id. at *5. Defendant petitioned the trial court to vacate the awards rendered by three arbitrators who awarded $249,468, $442,448, and $174,832 respectively, which the trial court denied. On Defendant's appeal, the Court of Appeal noted that each employee signed identical arbitration agreements, which stated that the parties would pay their own attorneys' fees and costs, and the arbitrator would not have authority to award attorneys' fees and costs unless a statute or contract at issue in dispute authorized an award of attorneys' fees and costs to the prevailing party. Id. at *6. Here, the arbitrators found that the fee awards were compelled by statute. Defendant primarily argued that the arbitrators exceeded their powers by awarding the fees for work not only in the arbitration, but also in the Iskanian and Kempler matters. The Court of Appeal observed that in Moore v. First Bank of San Luis Obispo, 22 Cal. 4th 782 (2000), the California Supreme Court confronted the issue of whether an arbitration panel exceeded its powers by declining to award fees to Plaintiffs who, if the matter were determined in the trial court, would have likely been entitled to an award of fees. Id. at *8. The Court of Appeal found that since the fees issue was within the scope of issues submitted to arbitration, the panel did not exceed its authority. Id. Similarly, Moshonov v. Walsh, 22 Cal. 4th 771 (2000), found that an arbitrator acted within the scope of his authority in denying fees to the prevailing party despite a provision in the contract allowing fees to the prevailing party. Id. at *9. The Court of Appeal reasoned that arbitrator's choice of relief did not exceed the arbitrator's powers as long as the relief had a rational relationship to the underlying contract as interpreted, expressly or impliedly, by the arbitrator and to the breach of the contract found, expressly or impliedly, by the arbitrator. Id. Based on the reasoning of those cases, the Court of Appeal remarked that it need not determine whether the three arbitrators actually awarded fees for work on Iskanian or Kempler, or, if they did, whether such awards would be legally or factually erroneous if made by a trial court. Id. at *11. The Court of Appeal noted that each of the three arbitrators found that recovery of fees was compelled by statute, and each found that the employees were the prevailing parties. Id. at *12. In addition, the arbitration agreement did not contain any express limitation on the attorneys' work that could be considered by an arbitrator in fashioning a fee award. Id. The Court of Appeal found that it also did not explicitly prohibit awarding fees for work that preceded the arbitration proceedings. Id. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order.

Khalatian, et al. v. Prime Time Shuttle, Inc.*, 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 3369 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. May 15, 2015). In this wage & hour class action, Defendants moved to compel arbitration, based on an owner-operator sub-carrier agreement that Plaintiff entered into with one Defendant. The trial court denied the motion, holding that Defendants waived the right to arbitrate and that Plaintiff had not agreed to arbitrate his statutory labor law claims. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed. The Court of Appeal noted that the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") applies when the contract evidences a transaction involving interstate commerce. Further, the Court of Appeal noted that the purely intrastate transport of passengers to and from an airport may, under certain circumstances, constitute interstate commerce. Id. at *7. Defendants provided shuttle service to and from major airports and harbors throughout California, contracted with web vendors to advertise on their websites, and permitted passengers to make a shuttle reservation and pay for their reservation on-line. Plaintiff was a shuttle driver who picked up and dropped off passengers primarily at Los Angeles International Airport. Thus, the Court of Appeal opined that the agreement between the parties involved interstate commerce. Further, the agreement stated that the parties did not have the relationship of employer/employee, either express or implied, and that the sub-carrier would not be treated as an employee for any purpose. Id. at *10. The agreement also provided that any controversy or claim between the parties arising out of or relating to the agreement or any alleged breach thereof would be submitted to binding arbitration. Id. Plaintiff alleged that Defendants misclassified him as an independent contractor, and thus he was entitled to protections conferred upon employees by the California Labor Code, notwithstanding the representations made in the agreement. The Court of Appeal opined that this dispute concerned a controversy or claim between the parties arising out of or relating to their agreement, including Plaintiff's claim that the compensation provisions of the agreement were invalid, illegal, voidable, or void. Further, the Court of Appeal observed that broad arbitration clauses such as the one here are consistently interpreted as applying to extra-contractual disputes between the contracting parties. Id. at *11. The Court of Appeal noted that statutory claims are arbitrable when the parties' contract involves interstate commerce and is therefore governed by the FAA. Id. Thus, considering the preference for arbitration, and the broad language of the agreement, the Court of Appeal opined that Plaintiff's claims that the Labor Code governed his compensation and not the compensation terms of his agreement fell within the ambit of the arbitration clause. Regarding waiver, the trial court found that the 14-month delay between the filing of the complaint and the filing of the motion to compel was unreasonable. The Court of Appeal, however, noted that only one Defendant had propounded discovery, and Defendants had not taken depositions, nor filed any discovery motions. The Court of Appeal observed that Defendants had not stretched out the litigation process, gained information about Plaintiff's case which they could not have learned in an arbitration, or waited until the eve of trial to move to compel arbitration. Thus, the Court of Appeal ruled that Defendants had not waived their right to compel arbitration, and reversed the order denying Defendants' motion to compel arbitration.

Lewis, et al. v. Safeway, Inc.,* 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 250 (Cal. App. 1st Dist. Mar. 20, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant recorded Plaintiff's date of birth ("DOB") in its cash register system when Plaintiff purchased an alcoholic beverage with a credit card in violation of the Song-Beverly Credit Card Act (the "Act"). Defendant demurred that the Act obligated it to verify the DOB of customers purchasing alcohol and to keep records of the sales, and its conduct therefore fell within an exception to the Act for an obligation imposed by law. Id. at *4. The trial court agreed with Defendant that the exception for an obligation imposed by law under the California Civil Code barred Plaintiff's cause of action. Id. at *6-9. While Plaintiff argued that the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act ("ABCA") does not explicitly require that the written records of sales include the DOB, the trial court found that Plaintiff's statement did not follow that the inclusion of the DOB in the record of sale takes the sales transaction out of the legal obligation exception to the Act. Id. at *6-7. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. First, the Court of Appeal noted that to satisfy its obligations under the ABCA, a licensee is obligated to verify the age of a customer purchasing an alcoholic beverage to ensure that he or she is 21 years of age or older, keep records of its sales of alcoholic beverages, and to make those records available to the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control ("ABC"). Id. at *11-12. The Court of Appeal found that a purchaser's DOB is clearly fundamental to the transaction, and the more detailed the records maintained by a licensee, the more able it is to confirm its compliance with the laws prohibiting the sale of alcoholic beverages to minors. Id. at *13. Despite the trial court's ruling that the obligation-imposed-by-law exception exempted Defendant's conduct, the Court of Appeal found that Plaintiff's argument as to why that exception did not apply was unpersuasive. Id. at *13-14. Further, the Court of Appeal remarked that Plaintiff sought to read into the ABCA a limitation that the Legislature itself, in enacting the ABCA, chose not to impose. Id. at *14. The Court of Appeal observed that Plaintiff's interpretation would interfere with the ABC's authority to regulate its licensees by imposing limitations on the manner in which they must comply with the ABCA. Further, doing so would contravene the mandate that the ABC has the exclusive authority to regulate businesses selling alcohol. Id.

Lofton, et al. v. Wells Fargo Home Mortgage,* Case No. 11-CGC-509502 (Cal. Super. Ct. July 16, 2015). Following a judgment in a class action filed on behalf of Defendant's consultants alleging misclassification of their positions as exempt from overtime, the Court denied the consultants' attorneys' fees, finding that Plaintiffs' counsel attempted to appropriate to itself $5.4 million in fees without approval.

The law firm, the Initiative Law Group ("ILG"), brought a wage & hour class action on behalf of Plaintiffs against Defendant asserting claims for unpaid overtime, meal and rest break violations, and waiting-time penalties. After decertification of the class, ILG filed multiple lawsuits representing more than 600 Plaintiffs against Defendant. The parties eventually reached a class settlement which called for Defendant to pay $19 million, inclusive of attorneys' fees and costs. Id. at 4. The parties then filed the instant action for the sole purpose of seeking the Court's approval of the settlement agreement (the "Lofton settlement). The settlement agreement defined the Lofton settlement class as "all persons who, at any time from February 10, 2001 up to and including March 26, 2011, are or were employed by Wells Fargo Bank, N.A." as home mortgage consultants in the State of California and "classified by Wells as exempt from overtime." Id. at 5. Therefore, all of ILG's clients became members of the proposed Lofton class and nearly all of ILG's clients submitted claims in Lofton. The Lofton settlement paid a total of $1,522,881.05 to the ILG clients, and this extinguished all claims in the ILG actions. Id. at 7. The Court granted final approval to the Lofton settlement, awarding class counsel $6,333,333 in attorneys' fees and $249,278.73 in litigation costs. Id. at 8. Despite final approval, ILG and Defendant continued to negotiate for over a year without the ILG clients' knowledge, consent, or authorization, and ILG sent its clients a letter explaining that ILG would receive more than $5.5 million in attorneys' fees and costs, and that the ILG clients would receive $750 each. The letter justified the $750 award by stating that the Lofton settlement did not release the claims that Defendant failed to produce employment records under § 216(b) of the California Labor Code as alleged in Mather et al. v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. ("Mather action"). Id. at 9. The letter also mentioned that in order to receive the $750, the client must sign a release and agree to the allocation of attorneys' fees. After the majority of the ILG clients signed the releases, Defendant deposited the amounts and ILG received $5,425,500 toward attorneys' fees and costs. Id. at 11. ILG never disclosed these payments to the Court. An ILG client, David Maxon, moved to intervene, accusing ILG of striking a secret deal with Defendant, and sought a temporary restraining order ("TRO") to freeze the unapproved attorneys' fees. ILG then agreed to pay $1,750 to each of its clients from the $6 million common fund, leaving a total of $4.95 million to be distributed to ILG. Id. at 13. Upon learning of the situation, the Court issued a TRO requiring ILG to deposit the funds in a secure escrow account. Id. at 14. Following a series of case management conferences, the Court determined that ILG was not entitled to any of the claimed fees. The Court found that the $5,425,500, which ILG claimed it was entitled to as attorneys' fees, belonged to the Lofton class members. Id. at 16. The Court rejected the argument that ILG was entitled to the attorneys' fees because some ILG clients "agreed" to the fee allocation, stating that approval of the ILG's class action attorneys' fees was the exclusive province of the Court, not of ILG's clients. Id. ILG argued that the Court could not order the distribution of funds without a trial on the issue and that, due to attorney-client and mediation privileges, ILG could not "defend" itself. Id. at 18. The Court rejected both arguments on the basis that no trial was necessary because Courts routinely determine the entitlement to class action attorneys' fees through motions, and ILG could have defended itself in ways that protected its confidential information. Id. The Court thus held that, in the absence of an offer of evidence to support ILG's claim to attorneys' fees, it could only conclude that none existed. Accordingly, the Court ordered ILG to distribute the fees to class members in a manner to be decided.

Editor's Note: The decision in Lofton represents a remedy in what is perhaps the most glaring example of abuses by class action lawyers in 2015.

Marenco, et al. v. DirecTV, LLC*, 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 106 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Feb. 5, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated California state wage and unfair competition laws. Defendant DirecTV LLC acquired 180 Connect. Defendant retained all 180 Connect's employees and issued debit cards in payment of their wages. Defendant required Plaintiff to pay an activation fee of either $.50 or $3.50 and a cash withdrawal fee in order to use the debit card at an ATM machine. Id. at *5. Plaintiff alleged that the fees resulted in Defendant's failure to pay full wages in violation of the California Unfair Competition Law and the California Labor Code. Plaintiff had entered into an employment arbitration agreement with 180 Connect before Defendant's acquisition. The agreement required both parties to submit all claims arising from and related to the employment relationship to binding arbitration. Defendant moved to compel arbitration as the successor to the arbitration agreement. The trial court entered an order staying the class claims and compelling arbitration of Plaintiff's individual claims.

On Plaintiff's appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order. Defendant contended that it assumed all of 180 Connect's assets, debts, rights, responsibilities, liabilities, and obligations, including "all the rights and obligations arising from 180 Connect's employee relationships." Id. at *6. Plaintiff argued that Defendant, as a non-signatory, lacked standing to enforce the arbitration agreement. Affirming the trial court's order, the Court of Appeal found that, although Defendant was not a signatory to the employment arbitration agreement between Plaintiff and 180 Connect, there was no doubt that the agreement formed one of the terms of Plaintiff's employment, and Defendant was entitled to invoke the arbitration clause to compel Plaintiff to arbitrate his claims pursuant to the employment agreement. Id. at *16. The undisputed evidence established that Defendant acquired all of 180 Connect's assets, employees, rights, and liabilities, and there was no indication that the original terms of Plaintiff's employment were modified, superseded, revoked, cancelled, or nullified in any manner. Id. at *17. The record supported a reasonable inference that the 180 Connect employees who continued working after the acquisition implicitly accepted Defendant's decision to maintain their existing terms of employment, including the arbitration agreement. Id. The Court of Appeal, therefore, found the absence of a new arbitration agreement with Defendant an insufficient basis upon which to invalidate his original agreement, which constituted one of the established terms of his employment that was never extinguished, rescinded, altered, or revised. Id. at *18. The Court of Appeal further found that the agreement's class action waiver was enforceable under AT&T Mobility LLC v. Concepcion, 131 S. Ct. 1740 (2011). Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order compelling arbitration of Plaintiff's individual claims.

Natalini, et al. v. Import Motors, Inc.,* Case No. A133236 (Cal. App. 1st Dist. Dec. 14, 2015). Plaintiff, a car buyer, brought an action alleging negligent misrepresentation and violation of the California Consumer Legal Remedies Act and Rees-Levering Motor Vehicle Sales and Finance Act, against Defendant, a car dealer, arising out of his purchase of a car. Id. at 1-2. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant sold new cars and tires that were actually used. Id. at 2. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to a provision in the car sales contract that Plaintiff had signed when he purchased the car. The trial court denied Defendant's petition to compel arbitration, finding no admissible evidence of establishing that Plaintiff agreed to arbitrate his claim. Id. at 3. The trial court also concluded that Defendant waived any right to arbitration and the purported arbitration provision was unconscionable. Id. On appeal, Defendant contended that the trial court erred in concluding that it failed to demonstrate the existence of an arbitration agreement, and that it satisfied its burden by attaching the arbitration provision to its counsel's declaration and by setting forth the language of the provision in its petition to compel arbitration. Id. at 3-5. The California Court of Appeal disagreed with Defendant. The Court noted that Defendant was not only obligated to allege the existence of an agreement, but also was required to prove the existence of the agreement to arbitrate by a preponderance of the evidence. Id. at 5. The Court of Appeal noted that, although Plaintiff attached a contract with an arbitration provision to the complaint, Defendant denied the allegations of the complaint in its answer and did not argue that Plaintiff was estopped from disputing the existence of an arbitration agreement. Id. The Court of Appeal therefore concluded that Defendant failed to show that the trial court erred in denying Defendant's petition on the basis that Defendant failed to prove the existence of an agreement to arbitrate. Id. at 6. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order.

Rubenstein, et al. v. Gap, Inc.,* Case No. BC555010 (Cal. Super. Ct. Mar. 19, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, the owner of Gap Factory Stores and Banana Republic Factory Stores, deceptively marketed its clothing in a manner that misled consumers. According to the complaint, Defendant labelled its factory store clothing with a tag hidden on the inside of the garment with three squares. The label indicated that Defendant made the clothing specifically for the factory stores at a lesser quality, and nothing in the store or garment suggested that the clothing was not actually sold at the traditional Banana Republic or Gap Stores. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's strategy exploited the expectations of outlet mall shoppers because Defendant positioned itself to capture consumers looking for the exact clothing Defendant sold at its traditional Banana Republic and Gap stores, at a discount, but instead offered clothing that Defendant never sold at its retail stores. Id. at 1. Plaintiff alleged violations of the California False Advertising Law, and other statutory claims. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to an arbitration clause in cardholder agreements signed by Plaintiff prior to receiving the Gap

Visa Card, GapCard, and BananaCard. The Court denied Defendant's motion, finding no agreement to arbitrate. Id. at 2. First, the Court found that Defendant was not a party to either the Gap Visa Card agreement or to the GapCard and BananaCard agreements. The agreements specifically defined the parties as GE Money Bank and all of its respective parents, subsidiaries, and affiliates, and nothing in the agreements indicated that the terms applied to Defendant. Id. Next, the Court found that, even assuming that Defendant was a third-party beneficiary of the credit agreements, the arbitration provision did not cover the dispute at issue. The agreements provided that they were contracts for the extension of credit and that any disputes or claims relating to the accounts should be resolved by arbitration. Id. at 4. Because Plaintiff brought a consumer fraud case, dealing with the manner in which Defendant presented and sold clothing at its outlets, the Court concluded that the agreements did not have anything to do with the dispute here. Id. at 5. The Court, therefore, found no "agreement to arbitrate," and accordingly, denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration. Id.

Rutledge, et al. v. Hewlett-Packard Co.,* 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 645 (Cal. App. 6th Dist. July 22, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of purchasers of notebook computers manufactured by Defendant brought a putative class action alleging that certain notebook computers contained inverters that Defendant knew would likely fail and cause display screens to dim and darken at some point before the end of the notebook's useful life. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs alleged claims for unjust enrichment, breach of express warranty, and for violation of California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL") and Consumer Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA"). The trial court made a "no merits" determination as to the CLRA claim, and granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' remaining claims. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs appealed, and the California Court of Appeal affirmed in part and reversed in part the trial court's award of summary judgment. First, the Court of Appeal reinstated Plaintiffs' claim under the fraudulent prong of the UCL as well as Plaintiffs' CLRA claim, premised on the allegations that Defendant failed to disclose material information about the faulty inverters. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs did not have a claim for fraudulent concealment because they received notebooks with inverters that functioned for the one-year warranty period and the alleged failure to disclose did not damage the consumers. Id. at *15. The Court of Appeal, however, reasoned that a claim for fraudulent business practices reflect the UCL's focus on Defendant's conduct, rather than Plaintiffs' damages, in service of the statute's larger purpose of protecting the general public against unscrupulous business practices. Id. at *15-16. Thus, the Court of Appeal concluded that the question under the UCL was as to Defendant's conduct, not as to whether the computer functioned for the warranty period, and therefore Defendant's argument that the expiration of the warranty period precluded a claim for fraudulent concealment under the UCL was incorrect. Id. at *16. Further, the call center data and service data demonstrating an increase in inverter failure over time, coupled with Plaintiffs' engineering expert's analysis of the data, created a triable issue of fact as to whether Defendant knew about the defects and if so, when. Id. at *23. The Court of Appeal therefore held that Defendant was not entitled to judgment as a matter of law on the UCL claims and was not entitled to a no merits determination as to the CLRA claims. Id. at *24. Further, the Court of Appeal found that Defendant was entitled to judgment as a matter of law as to a named Plaintiffs' breach of warranty claim because they had not notified Defendant of the defect within the warranty period. Id. at *30-35. Moreover, the Court of Appeal held that the trial court's order denying nationwide class certification must be reversed. Id. at *40-44. Because the record supported a finding that California had sufficient contacts with the claims such that California had an interest in applying its laws to non-resident Plaintiffs, the Court of Appeal ruled that the trial court should have granted nationwide class certification, and the trial court had improperly used the possibility of differing warranty laws as reasons to deny class certification. Id. at *45. Finally, the Court of Appeal found that the trial court properly denied Plaintiffs' request to certify the CLRA claims, finding that at the time of certification request, the trial court had already ruled on the merits of action, which could create a "classic no-win option" for Defendant. Id. at *46-47. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed in part and reversed in part the trial court's order.

Safeway, Inc., et al. v. Superior Court*, 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 640 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. July 22, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to provide and compensate them for meal and rest breaks, and failed to provide itemized pay statements in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs sought to certify classes for their meal and rest break claims. The trial court certified the meal break class, but refused to certify the rest break class. On appeal, the California Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's ruling. Plaintiffs sought class certification for the meal break class, which encompassed over 200,000 store-level hourly employees who worked for Defendants. Plaintiffs contended that Defendants' policy of not paying meal breaks to employees during specified breaks constituted both an unlawful and an unfair business practice under the California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"). Id. at *12. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs submitted excerpts from the depositions of some managers, together with declarations and deposition testimony, and a declaration from Eric R. Lietzow, their accounting expert. Id. at *13. According to Plaintiffs, Defendants used time-keeping systems to monitor when employees began and ended work, as well when they took meal breaks. Id. Lietzow also stated that he had examined time punch data, and payroll records for the pertinent break from a random sample of Defendants' stores, and estimated that Defendants' records revealed 27,095,925 violations during the class period. Id. at *14. The Court of Appeals remarked that determining whether Plaintiffs' theory was suitable for class treatment necessitated an inquiry into the factual issues relevant to showing that the circumstances under which an employer's failure to pay meal break premium wages may constitute an unlawful or unfair business practice under the UCL. The Court of Appeals observed that, as explained in Brinker Restaurant Corp. v. Superior Court, 53 Cal. 4th 1004 (2012), an employer discharges its duty to provide an off-duty break if it relieves its employees of all duty, relinquishes control over their activities, and permits them a reasonable opportunity to take an uninterrupted 30-minute break, and does not impede or discourage them from doing so. Id. at *22. Defendants maintained that Plaintiffs did not identify any unlawful or unfair practice, and invoked two restrictions on liability under the UCL traceable to Cel-Tech Communications, Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Telephone Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163 (1999). In Cel-Tech, the California Supreme Court stated that no UCL claim may be predicated on a practice for which there was a safe harbor, i.e., a specific legislation that clearly permits the practice. Id. at *26. The Court of Appeals remarked that Plaintiffs' evidence showed that Plaintiffs were often directed or pressured by supervisors not to take meal breaks, and that Defendants had no mechanism by which the premium pay related to meal break was calculated or determined when due. Id. at *30. The Court of Appeals concluded that Plaintiffs had demonstrated that the existence of the practice made the action suitable for class treatment. Id. at *31. Moreover, the Court of Appeals found that whether a significant number of employees accrued unpaid meal break premium wages was a question capable of common proof. Id. at *34. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's order certifying the meal break class.

Salazar, et al. v. Apple American Group, LLC,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 584 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. Jan. 26, 2015). Plaintiff, on behalf of himself and others similarly-situated, brought a class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay wages and/or overtime pay in violation of the California Labor Code, and sought penalties under the Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). The trial court denied Defendant's petition to compel arbitration on Plaintiff's representative PAGA claim. Id. at *7. On Defendant's appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order. Defendant argued that the trial court erred because the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") preempted California's public policy against the enforcement of class action waivers in arbitration agreements. Id. at *1. After briefing was completed in this appeal, the California Supreme Court rendered its decision in Iskanian v. CLS Transportation Los Angeles, LLC, 59 Cal. 4th 348 (2014). Id. In Iskanian, the Supreme Court held that an arbitration agreement requiring an employee as a condition of employment to give up the right to bring representative PAGA actions in any forum is contrary to public policy, that the FAA's goal of promoting arbitration as a means of private dispute resolution does not preclude the Legislature from deputizing employees to prosecute Labor Code violations on the state's behalf, and that the FAA does not preempt a state law that prohibits waiver of PAGA representative actions in an employment contract. Id. at *1-2. The Court of Appeal subsequently directed the parties to file supplemental briefs addressing the effect of Iskanian on this appeal. Id. at *2. The Court of Appeal found that Iskanian was directly relevant to this case, and Defendant did not contend otherwise. Id. at *10. Instead, Defendant argued that Iskanian was wrongly decided and was in direct conflict with Concepcion, and that the order denying its petition to compel arbitration should be overturned, despite the ruling in Iskanian. Id. The Court of Appeal, however, held that under settled principles of stare decisis, it did not have the luxury to question whether Iskanian was correctly decided and that it was duty bound to apply it in this appeal. Id. at *2-3. Alternatively, Defendant requested the Court of Appeal to hold the appeal in abeyance while the U.S. Supreme Court considered the petition for writ of certiorari filed in Iskanian. Id. at *11. Since the U.S. Supreme Court subsequently had denied the petition for writ of certiorari filed in Iskanian, the Court of Appeal declined to hold this appeal in abeyance. Id. at *12. Thus, because the enforcement of waivers of representative PAGA claims in employment contracts violates California public policy, and the Supreme Court has held that the FAA does not preempt that public policy, the Court of Appeal concluded that the trial court correctly denied Defendant's petition to compel Plaintiff to arbitrate his PAGA claim. Id. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order, and awarded Plaintiff his costs on appeal.

Sanchez, et al. v. Valencia Holding Co., LLC,* 2015 Cal. LEXIS 5292 (Cal. Aug. 3, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the California Consumer Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA") by making false representations about the condition of the Mercedes-Benz S500V that he purchased in 2008. Id. at *5. Defendant moved to compel arbitration on an individual basis pursuant to an arbitration clause in the sales contract signed by Plaintiff. The arbitration agreement included a class action waiver and provided that any arbitration decision could be appealed only if the award was exactly $0 or over $100,000. Id. at *7-8. The trial court denied the motion, finding that class arbitration could not be waived under the CLRA. Id. at *11. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal declined to decide whether the class waiver was enforceable in light of AT&T Mobility LLC v. Concepcion, 131 S. Ct. 1740 (2011), but nonetheless affirmed the trial court's order on the grounds that the arbitration agreement was procedurally and substantively unconscionable. Id. at *11-12. The California Supreme Court subsequently granted review and reversed. The Supreme Court held that the Court of Appeal erred as a matter of law in finding the agreement unconscionable. The Supreme Court discussed the general provisions of unconscionability and noted that the doctrine of unconscionability has both procedural and substantive elements. The former focuses on oppression or surprise due to unequal bargaining power, and the latter on overly harsh or one-sided results. Id. at *13. The Supreme Court emphasized that both procedural and substantive unconscionability must be present in order for a trial court to exercise its discretion to refuse to enforce a contract or arbitration clause under the doctrine of unconscionability. Although Defendant's contract had some degree of procedural unconscionability (as Defendant did not offer Plaintiff an opportunity to negotiate its terms), the Supreme Court held that a finding of procedural unconscionability does not mean that a contract should not be enforced, but rather that trial courts should scrutinize the substantive terms of the contract to ensure that they are not manifestly unfair or one-sided. Id. at *23. The Supreme Court, therefore, rejected Plaintiff's contention that adhesion contracts – which are presented on a "take it or leave it" basis – were per se procedurally unconscionable. Regarding the arbitration provision's substantive terms, the Supreme Court explained that the central idea in substantive unconscionability analysis "is…not [whether the parties made] a simple old-fashioned bad bargain, but [whether there are] terms that are unreasonably unfavorable to the more powerful party." Id. at *14. Thus, in assessing the arbitration provisions at issue, the Supreme Court found that none of its requirements was substantively unconscionable. Because the underlying contract was for the purchase of a car and not an employment contract, the Supreme Court found the $100,000 minimum threshold for appeals reasonable, especially because Plaintiff could also appeal if he lost and was awarded nothing. Id. at *26-27. The Supreme Court also found that the right to appeal an injunction award was not unconscionable given the "potentially far-reaching nature of an injunctive relief remedy." Id. at *27-28. The Supreme Court ruled and found that the requirement that the appealing party must advance the costs of the appeal was not unconscionable given that the case concerned a high-end luxury item, and no evidence suggested that Plaintiff could not afford the cost of appellate arbitration filing fees. Id. at *36-37. The Supreme Court similarly dismissed the claim that the reservation of self-help remedies was too unfair, noting that it was undisputed that the remedy of repossession of collateral remain an integral part of the business of selling automobiles on credit and fulfils a legitimate commercial need. Id. at *39-40. Finally, the Supreme Court confirmed that the Federal Arbitration Act preempted the CLRA's bar on class action waivers, and as such, the arbitration provision's class action waiver had no effect on the unconscionability analysis. Id. at *42-43. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed the Court of Appeal's judgment.

Scranton, et al. v. E*TRADE Securities LLC,* Case No. 13-CV-245579 (Cal. Super. Ct. Mar. 18, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative consumer class action alleging that Defendant made misrepresentations regarding options. Defendant served as a broker for consumers seeking to trade options – contracts giving a buyer the right to buy or sell an asset, often a share of stock in a particular company – at a specific price on or before a certain date. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant represented that it automatically would exercise consumers' options if those options would result in the consumer getting at least a $.01 profit. Plaintiff contended that those representations provided consumers with a false sense of security that their options automatically would be exercised, causing them to fail manually to exercise their options. Defendant filed a demurrer to Plaintiff's third amended class action complaint ("TAC") on count I (breach of fiduciary duty) and count II (breach of covenant of good faith and fair dealing). The Court sustained Defendant's demurrer without leave to amend. Earlier, in connection with Defendant's demurrer to the second amended complaint, the Court found that a disclaimer of liability in the customer agreement barred Plaintiff's breach of fiduciary duty claim absent facts showing that the disclaimer of liability provision was not enforceable. Id. at 2. In the TAC, Plaintiff alleged that the disclaimer of liability did not bar his claims because it must be construed strictly against Defendant. Id. The Court noted that Defendant's customer agreement stated that Defendant would have no liability for "any losses arising out of or relating to a cause over which Defendant or its affiliates do not have direct control, including . . . suspension of trading." Id. The Court found that the disclaimer in the customer agreement was not ambiguous. Id. As stated in its prior order, the Court also noted that the disclaimer was sufficiently clear, explicit, and comprehensible in each of its essential details. Id. Although Plaintiff argued that the disclaimer in the customer agreement should be restricted to an immediate cause of loss, and not to a "but-for" cause of loss, the Court found nothing in the customer agreement to support Plaintiff's interpretation. Id. at 3. The Court concluded that Plaintiff failed to allege facts showing that the disclaimer in the customer agreement was unenforceable. Id. Accordingly, the Court held that the disclaimer of liability barred Plaintiff's causes of action for breach of fiduciary duty and breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and sustained Defendant's demurrer without leave to amend.

Siechert & Synn, et al. v. Apple Inc.,* 2015 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 859 (Cal. App. 6th Dist. Feb. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of retailers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the California Unfair Competition Law, breached its contract, committed fraud, and caused misappropriation of trade secrets by opening its own retail stores and driving Plaintiffs out of business. Whereas Defendant previously sold its products to consumers mainly through independent resellers, in 1997 it began developing plans to open its own retail stores. Defendant allegedly preserved its relationships with its independent resellers until it opened its own chain in 2001. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's decision to open its own retail stores was part of a fraudulent scheme and plan to drive its independent resellers out of business. Although Defendant sent out bulletins assuring store owners that Defendant's stores would be stocked the same as other resellers and would not have better pricing, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant favored its own stores to Plaintiff's detriment by "deliberately" withholding new products from resellers and by "siphoning off" the resellers' customers. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant gave "secret rebates" to favored resellers such as CompUSA and Fry's, but not to Plaintiffs. Id. at *8. In November 2009, Plaintiffs moved to certify a class of resellers of Defendant's products. After a lengthy hearing, the trial court denied the motion on the basis that Plaintiffs failed to show that common question of law or fact predominated over the individual questions. Id. at *19. In particular, the trial court found that a three-year statute of limitations would apply to the fraud claims initially filed in 2005, and Plaintiffs would have to show how their discovery was delayed. Id. at *20. The trial court also found that highly individualized issues regarding Defendant's representations, Plaintiffs' reliance upon those representations, and proximate causation, all of which defeated Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Id. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's decision. The Court of Appeal found that substantial evidence supported the trial court's finding that Plaintiffs' claims would require an inherently individualized inquiry. Id. at *27. The substantial evidence showed that each of the named Plaintiffs had a different story as to when and how they discovered the alleged fraud and why they could not have discovered it sooner. Id. The substantial evidence also showed that the alleged misrepresentation regarding Defendant's reassurances to resellers was not susceptible to class-wide proof. Not all Plaintiffs heard the alleged misrepresentations, and each class member would need to present individualized evidence about how he or she relied on the alleged misrepresentations. Id. at *36. Moreover, the evidence showed that some resellers who claimed to have heard and relied on Defendant's alleged misrepresentations faltered for reasons that had nothing to do with Defendant's alleged wrong-doing. Id. at *42. In addition, Defendant submitted evidence that many resellers enjoyed remarkable success after Defendant's retail stores opened in 2001, and some attributed much of their success to the "halo effect" of Defendant's stores. Id. at *43. Further, Plaintiffs' claims of wrongfully withheld products varied substantially such that each member of the class would have to present highly individualized evidence regarding which products were withheld or delayed and why. Id. at *47. Finally, the evidence showed that individualized inquiries would be required to determine whether Defendant's alleged discounting to favored resellers adversely impacted Plaintiffs because Plaintiffs' claim depended on the extent to which Plaintiffs' stores competed with the favored resellers' stores for sales. Id. at *55. The Court of Appeal, therefore, concluded that the trial court properly denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification based on Plaintiffs' failure to satisfy the predominance requirement.

UFCW & Employers Benefit Trust, et al. v. Sutter Health,* 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 957 (Cal. App. 1st Dist. Oct. 27, 2015). Plaintiff, on behalf of a putative class of all California self-funded payors, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant's various written and oral contracts with network vendors contained anti-competitive terms that insulated Defendant from competition and drove up the cost of healthcare in violation of California law. Id. at *2. Plaintiff paid healthcare providers directly from its own funds for the services provided to enrollees in its health plans and contracted with a network vendor, Blue Shield, to obtain access to Blue Shield's provider network as well as certain administrative services. Id. at *6. Plaintiff reimbursed Blue Shield for all covered healthcare charges paid on behalf of its members. Id. Blue Shield entered into another agreement (the "Provider Contract") with Defendant that provided reduced service rates to Blue Shield and third-parties that contract with Blue Shield to pay those rates. The Provider Contract contained an arbitration clause. Id. at *3-4. Pursuant to the contract between Plaintiff and Blue Shield, Plaintiff's beneficiaries began presenting Blue Shield cards to Defendant to obtain medical services at the agreed rate. Id. at *7. In April 2014, Plaintiff brought this action alleging that terms of the written or oral contracts Defendant entered with network vendors – such as Blue Shield – violated the Cartwright Act and the Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), causing the class members to overpay for Defendant's services. Id. at *9. Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant demanded inclusion of anti-competitive terms, including prohibiting disclosure of hospital pricing information, prohibiting efforts to encourage patient to select the most cost-effective providers, and requiring network vendors to include all of Defendant's hospitals and facilities in their networks. Id. Defendant moved to compel arbitration of Plaintiff's claims relying on an arbitration clause in the Provider Contract signed by Defendant and Blue Shield. The trial court denied the motion, finding that Plaintiff was not bound to arbitrate his claims because Plaintiff was not a signatory to the Provider Contract. Id. at *10-11. The California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order and held that the trial court did not err in determining the scope of arbitration agreement. Id. at *44. While it was undisputed that Plaintiff never signed or saw the Provider Contract, which contained the arbitration clause at issue, Defendant argued that Blue Shield served as Plaintiff's agent and agreed to arbitration on Plaintiff's behalf. Id. at *11-12. Defendant also argued that Plaintiff was seeking to retain the benefits it received under the Provider Contract while disavowing its obligations under that same contract. Id. at *36. The Court of Appeal, however, disagreed with Defendant's arguments. The Court of Appeal noted that Plaintiff challenged the legitimacy of the terms of all "arrangements" negotiated by Defendant with Blue Shield and other network vendors, and therefore was only seeking to enforce the UCL and the Cartwright Act and not to enforce or otherwise take advantage of any portion of the Provider Contract. Id. Although Plaintiff made repeated reference to the Provider Contract, the Court of Appeal noted that such reference to an agreement was not enough to require arbitration. Id. at *39. The Court of Appeal further found that Plaintiff did not accept the benefits of the Provider Contract because Plaintiff entered into a separate contract with Blue Shield under which it paid Blue Shield consideration in exchange for access to Blue Shield's discounted provider rates and encouraged its members to use providers within the preferred network. Id. at *40. The Court of Appeal, therefore, failed to see how Plaintiff's members' use of Blue Shield cards to obtain services from Defendant reasonably suggested that Plaintiff had authorized Blue Shield to bind it to all terms of the Provider Contract. Id. at *40-43. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order denying Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Universal Protection Service, LP, et al. v. Superior Court,* 2015 Cal. App. LEXIS 708 (Cal. App. 3d Dist. Aug. 18, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of armed security guards, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, Universal Protection Service, L.P., failed to reimburse them for the costs of guns, handcuffs, radios, and other equipment they used for their job. Plaintiffs also alleged that when they filed an administrative complaint under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"), Defendant terminated four of the five named Plaintiffs, and failed to pay final wages. Id. at *2. Defendant moved to compel individual arbitration of the claims, arguing that the arbitration agreement entered into by Plaintiffs barred class actions. Id. at *4. Defendant also filed a cross-complaint seeking a declaration that the trial court, not the arbitrator, should decide whether the arbitration agreement barred class action relief. Id. The trial court denied the motion to compel individual arbitration, ruling that the agreement, by incorporating the American Arbitration Association's ("AAA") rules, granted the power to determine whether or not the arbitration could proceed as a class action to the arbitrator. Id. Defendant filed a petition for a writ of mandamus. The California Court of Appeal denied the petition. The Court of Appeal noted that the arbitration agreement incorporated by reference the rules of the AAA, and the AAA Supplementary rules for Class Arbitration apply "to any dispute arising out of an agreement that provides for arbitration pursuant to any of the rules of the [AAA] where a party submits a dispute to arbitration on behalf of or against a class or purported class, and shall supplement any other applicable AAA rules." Id. at *9. The Rules further delegate to the arbitrator the task of deciding whether a class arbitration could proceed. Id. The Court of Appeal thus found that the parties' agreement to conduct their arbitration under the AAA rules constituted clear and unmistakable evidence of their shared intent that the arbitrator decide whether it permits arbitration of class claims. Id. at *15. The Court of Appeal rejected Defendant's argument that, because the agreement did not use the term "class action," it did not permit class arbitration, noting that when an employee signed the agreement drafted by Defendant, he or she – if interested – would have been directed to the AAA rules referenced by the agreement, including the rule that the arbitrator would decide the gateway issue of whether class arbitration was appropriate, and thus the fact that the agreement did not use the term class action was not dispositive on the issue. Id. at *6-10. The Court of Appeal therefore denied Defendant's writ and held that the trial court did not err in staying Plaintiffs' action pending arbitration proceedings, including submission to the arbitrator of the gateway issue of whether a class arbitration could proceed.

(v) Delaware

Asbestos Workers Local 42 Pension Fund, et al. v. JPMorgan Chase & Co.,* 2015 Del. Ch. LEXIS 142 (Del. Ch. May 21, 2015). Plaintiff, a stockholder of Defendant JPMorgan, brought an action asserting derivative claims arising out of the losses suffered by JPMorgan due to the "London Whale." Id. at *2. By the end of 2012, Bruno Iksil, nicknamed the London Whale, lost more than $6 billion while serving as head trader of JPMorgan's Synthetic Credit Portfolio Group. In connection with this loss and aftermath, Plaintiff alleged that JPMorgan, members of its board, and certain officers, breached the duty of loyalty by failing to monitor the company's risks in its investments. Id. at *6. Plaintiff asserted that it was permitted to sue derivatively on behalf of the corporation as the Board was not in a position to exercise its independent business judgment with respect to the ligation, and was thus a demand excused under Delaware Chancery Court Rule 23.1. Id. Defendant moved to dismiss, arguing that collateral estoppel precluded Plaintiff's action. The Court of Chancery granted Defendant's motion. After giving a detailed summary of the allegations contained in the complaint, the Court of Chancery concluded that Plaintiff had pleaded issues identical to the issues presented in two New York actions brought against certain directors and officers of the losses caused by the London Whale trading episode, and thus the case was subject to collateral estoppel. Id. at *3-4. The Court of Chancery noted that in 2012, Plaintiff brought a consolidated derivative action in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York against the officers and directors of JPMorgan for failing to manage the company's risks in its investments. The Court in that case granted a motion to dismiss for failure to plead demand futility as required by Rule 23.1, which is identical to Chancery Court Rule 23.1. Id. at *36-37. Further, in 2012, Plaintiff brought a consolidated derivative action in New York against the directors and officers of JPMorgan alleging that they ignored red flags and concealed the increased risk in the company's investments. The judge also dismissed that case for failure to plead demand futility, but this time without prejudice to Plaintiffs' right to make a demand on the board and proceed with a wrongful refusal action. Id. at *37-39. Plaintiff here argued that collateral estoppel was not applicable as the "controlling facts" of this action were different and contained additional facts supporting the demand excusal argument. Id. at *49-50. The Court of Chancery rejected Plaintiff's argument and held that "the underlying conduct is what is at issue, not whether the complaint raises additional facts, or a more compelling characterization of those facts, regarding the same conduct previously at issue." Id. at *53. Nonetheless, the Court of Chancery analyzed the additional facts and found them to be cumulative of those pleaded in the New York actions or not truly additional. Id. at *56-58. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Corwin, et al. v. KKR Financial Holdings LLC,* 2015 Del. LEXIS 473 (Del. Oct. 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of stockholders of KKR Financial Holdings LLC ("Financial Holdings"), brought an action challenging a stock-for-stock merger between KKR & Co. L.P. ("KKR") and Financial Holdings, alleging that the fairness standard of review applied to the transaction. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs argued that KKR was a controlling stockholder of Financial Holdings because, even though KKR owned less than 1% of Financial Holdings, KKR managed Financial Holdings through an affiliate under a contractual management agreement that could be terminated by Financial Holdings only if it paid a termination fee. Id. at *3. The Delaware Chancery Court found that KKR was not the controlling stockholder because there were no well-pled facts that KKR could prevent the Financial Holdings Board from freely exercising its independent judgment in considering the proposed merger, and therefore dismissed the action under the business judgment rule. Id. at *7. The Court of Chancery noted the "unusual existential circumstances," but observed that Financial Holding had real assets its independent Board controlled and had the option of pursuing any path its directors chose. Id. at *4. On appeal, the Delaware Supreme Court affirmed the Chancery Court. The Supreme Court held that the Chancery Court properly applied the business judgment standard of review because the transaction had been approved by a "fully informed, uncoerced vote of the disinterested stockholders." Id. at *10. The Supreme Court further emphasized that the business judgment rule would not apply if material, troubling facts regarding director behavior existed and were not disclosed to stockholders prior to their vote. Id. Finally, the Supreme Court noted that, in cases in which disinterested stockholders have had an informed opportunity to decide on the merits of a transaction, the costs to stockholders, in the form of litigation and inhibitions on risk-taking, of judicial second-guessing would outweigh the benefits to stockholders. Id. at *22-23. Accordingly, the Supreme Court concluded that the business judgment rule standard of review was the presumptively appropriate standard for a post-closing damages action when a merger that was not subject to the entire fairness standard of review has been approved by a fully informed, uncoerced majority of the disinterested stockholders.

Fox, et al. v. CDX Holdings, Inc.,* 2015 Del. Ch. LEXIS 194 (Del. Ch. July 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of stock option holders, brought an action alleging that Defendant breached a stock incentive plan in relation to a merger. David Halbert founded the target company in the merger, Caris Life Sciences, Inc. ("Caris"), and owned 70.4% of Caris' equity. JH Whitney VI, L.P., a private equity fund, owned another 26.7% of Caris' equity. Caris operated three subsidiary businesses, including: (i) Caris Diagnostics, a profitable company; (ii) TargetNow, a revenue-positive but not yet profitable business; and (iii) Carisome, a business in the developmental stage. Id. at *1. Halbert believed that the Carisome business held enormous promise and sought ways to secure financing for Carisome and TargetNow. On the advice of its financial advisors Citigroup Global Markets ("Citi"), Caris settled on a deal structure in which it could spin off the TargetNow and Carisome businesses to its existing stockholder and then, with only the Caris Diagnostics remaining, merge with a third-party buyer. Id. Thus, in October 2011, Caris, as the parent of the Caris Diagnostics business alone, agreed to a merger with Miraca Holdings, Inc. for total consideration of $725 million. Through the merger, Caris changed its name to CDX Holdings, Inc. After the closing of the merger, management sent the option holders an e-mail identifying the fair market value per share as $5.07. Id. at *65-66. The e-mail also stated that the option holders would receive 92% of the total pay-out within ten days, but that 8% would be withheld and placed in escrow. The balance would then be paid out following the 18-month escrow period. Id. at *66. Plaintiffs claimed that Caris breached its stock incentive plan because its board of directors, as required by the plan, did not make the fair market value determination of the value of TargetNow and Carisome. Id. at *68. Plaintiffs also alleged that the board failed to adjust the options to account for the spin-off, and, even if the board had made the determination, the valuation was not made in good faith, and the process was arbitrary and capricious. Id. Plaintiffs also alleged that Caris breached its stock option plan by placing a portion of the option consideration into escrow and not paying out the full fair market value, minus the exercise price, on closing. Id. The Court of Chancery found for Plaintiffs and awarded damages of $16,260,332.77 plus pre-judgment and post-judgment interest. Id. at *118. The Court of Chancery found that the company's stock incentive plan required an "Administrator" to determine the fair market value of the company's common stock, and the evidence indicated that the board never appointed an Administrator, and Caris never presented the figures that went into determining fair market value to the board. Id. at *71-72. The Court of Chancery, therefore, held that Caris failed to act under the stock incentive plan. The Court of Chancery also held that Caris failed to determine the fair market value and adjustment in good faith. Applying the good faith analysis, the Court of Chancery found that TargetNow and Carisome were not worth $47 million and $18 million respectively, as asserted by Caris, because the evidence showed that Citi had estimated TargetNow's value between $195 and $300 million and that Carisome was valued at least as high as TargetNow. Id. at *80-82. The Court of Chancery also held that Caris breached the incentive plan when it withheld a portion of the option holders' merger consideration in escrow. Id. at *108. The Court of Chancery held that Defendant owed Plaintiffs the full consideration. Id. at *100-112. Accordingly, the Court of Chancery entered judgment in favor of Plaintiffs and awarded damages of $16,260,332.77.

In Re Dole Food Co., Inc. Stockholder Litigation*, 2015 Del. Ch. LEXIS 47 (Del. Ch. Feb. 27, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of shareholders, brought an action alleging that the directors of Dole Food Co. breached their fiduciary duties in connection with the proposed sale of the company. Defendants identified Stifel, Nicolaus & Company, Inc. ("Stifel") as their expert witness on the subject of the Dole's value at the time of the transaction, and Stifel produced Seth Ferguson, its managing director, as the person most knowledgeable about the expert reports it had created. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs objected, arguing that an expert witness must be a biological person and cannot be a corporation. The Court agreed. Delaware Rule of Evidence 602 requires that a witness testify from personal knowledge, and Rule 603 requires that a witness take an oath or make an affirmation. Id. at *5-6. Further, Rule 612 contemplates that a witness have a memory that can be refreshed, and Rule 615 assumes that a witness can hear the testimony of other witnesses, such that the witness might need to be sequestered. Id. at *6. The Court found that a corporation could do none of these things. The Court reasoned that being a purely metaphysical creature, having no mind with which to think, and no will with which to determine and no voice with which to speak, a corporation must depend upon the faculties of natural persons to determine for it its policies and direct the agencies through which they are to be effectuated. Id. at *6-7. Moreover, Rule 703 contemplates that an expert can perceive facts or data, and Rule 702 requires that the expert be qualified as such by knowledge, skill, experience, training or education. Id. at *7. The Court found that a corporation could not meet these requirements and, therefore, Stifel could not testify at trial. To avoid the prejudice that Defendants would suffer if forced to proceed without an expert, however, the Court allowed Defendants to substitute Ferguson. It ruled that, so long as Ferguson confirmed that he had adopted Stifel's expert reports, he could testify about their contents. Accordingly, the Court held that a corporation could not serve as an expert witness but allowed Defendants to substitute the corporation's managing director.

In Re Jefferies Group, Inc. Shareholders Litigation*, 2015 Del. Ch. LEXIS 158 (Del. Ch. June 5, 2015). In this consolidated class action, Plaintiffs challenged the proposed share transaction following the stock-for-stock merger of Jefferies Group, Inc. and Leucadia National Corp. Prior to consolidation, the first of seven actions was filed in New York state court. After initial litigation activity in New York, the case proceeded to Delaware. Under a consolidation order, the Court named Delaware counsel as co-lead counsel. Id. at *1. Thereafter, the parties structured a settlement to guarantee that the class would receive $70 million plus any award of attorneys' fees. Id. at *5. Delaware counsel moved for award of attorneys' fees and expenses, and New York Plaintiffs' counsel moved for a share of the fee award. The Delaware Chancery Court granted in part Delaware counsel's motion and denied the motion of New York Plaintiffs' counsel. Delaware counsel sought an attorneys' fees award of $27.5 million and expenses of $1,002,603.28, and contended that the requested fee amount equated to approximately 27.5% of the gross value of settlement. Although structuring a settlement based on a net recovery may have the salutary effect of subjecting more fee applications to an adversarial process, the Chancery Court remarked that it had traditionally granted fee awards in common fund settlements based on a percentage of the gross settlement value. Id. at *6. Regarding the appropriate fee amount, the Chancery Court noted that in In Re Activision Blizzard, Inc. Shareholder Litigation, 2015 Del. Ch. LEXIS 140 (Del. Ch. May 20, 2015), a case involving a $275 million derivative recovery that also settled about one month before trial, it had stated that a typical fee award for a case settling at that stage of the proceeding ranged from 22.5% to 25% of the benefit conferred. Id. at *10. The Chancery Court opined that this range was reasonable as a general matter, and reasoned that there should be an appreciable difference between the fee award percentage for a pre-trial recovery and a recovery after trial, where fee awards usually max out at one-third of a fund, because of the significant additional risk and investment of resources involved in going to trial and the further exposure of appellate review. Id. at *10-11. Further, the Chancery Court noted that Delaware counsel handled this case on an entirely contingent basis, and expended meaningful efforts litigating this case on a non-expedited basis, and that the factual issues in the case were not overly complex and the core legal issues were fairly straightforward for professionals who handle cases of this nature. Accordingly, the Chancery Court granted an award of $21.5 million, inclusive of expenses, which equated to about 23.5% of the gross value. The New York Plaintiffs sought an award of 20% of the amount of any fees to be awarded to Delaware counsel. The Chancery Court remarked that to be entitled to a percentage of the fee, counsel for the New York Plaintiffs must substantiate their contribution to the result achieved. Id. at *15. Counsel for the New York Plaintiffs contended that the Delaware Plaintiffs' prosecution of their claims relied heavily upon the expedited New York discovery, which would not have otherwise been available in drafting the amended complaint. The expedited discovery obtained by the New York Plaintiffs consisted of certain core documents concerning the proposed transaction, including board and transaction committee presentation materials and minutes, and depositions of chair of Jefferies' transaction committee and the senior member of the team at Citigroup. The Chancery Court observed that the reason Delaware counsel was able to incorporate the contents of documents previously produced in the New York action into an amended pleading was because Defendants, who did not seek to stay discovery in the Delaware action pending the resolution of a motion to dismiss, produced them to Delaware counsel. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Chancery Court denied the New York Plaintiffs' motion for a share of the fee award.

In Re Riverbed Technology Inc., Stockholders Litigation,* 2015 Del. Ch. LEXIS 241 (Del. Ch. Sept. 17, 2015). In this class action arising out of a merger transaction challenging the purchase price, the sale process, and the disclosures in the proxy statement, the Delaware Chancery Court approved a disclosure-only settlement finding it appropriate given the unique circumstances. The class action arose out of the acquisition of network equipment manufacturer Riverbed Technology, Inc. for $3.6 billion (at $21 per share). Id. at *3. Subsequent to the announcement of the transaction, Plaintiffs, a group of shareholders, filed the class action alleging that the sales process undervalued Riverbed and that the preliminary and definitive proxy documents failed to disclose all material information related to alleged financial advisor conflicts. Id. at *3-4. Later, the parties agreed to a settlement of Plaintiffs' claims in which Riverbed made additional disclosures in exchange for a broad release of all federal and state claims in connection with the transaction. The parties also agreed that Defendants would not oppose a fee request of $500,000 by Plaintiffs' counsel. The parties moved for settlement approval, and a Riverbed shareholder objected on the basis that the supplemental disclosures were essentially valueless, and that there might be valuable unknown claims extinguished by the broad release of claims. Id. at *19. After finding that the objector had standing to object, the Chancery Court approved the settlement. The Chancery Court focused on the "agency problem" that exists in class action settlements of this type, noting that the interest of the individual shareholder is often so small "that it serves as scant check on the perverse incentive" of Plaintiff's counsel, and while the adversarial system would usually help ameliorate this agency problem, in class litigation Defendants' primary goal is to consummate the transaction, which requires terminating the litigation. Id. at *10-11. The Chancery Court stated that, where the interests of Defendant and Plaintiff are aligned, it is incumbent upon the Court to determine whether the proposed settlement is actually fair to the class. Id. at *13. The Chancery Court then examined the facts presented and concluded that the supplemental disclosures showed that Riverbed's financial adviser for the transaction, Goldman Sachs, had engagements and relationships with the purchasers that created potential conflicts of interest, and thus, although the supplemental disclosures were "not of great importance," they had "tangible, although minor, value to the class." Id. at *17-19. According to the Chancery Court, this relatively insignificant benefit could only support the settlement under the unique facts of this litigation. Id. The Chancery Court found that where the parties negotiated a remedy in good faith with the reasonable expectation that the broad release negotiated in return would be approved by the Court, the settlement was fair to the class. The Chancery Court reasoned the parties had relied on its past practice of approving settlements in which the remedy comprised additional disclosures, and stated that, if it were not for this reasonable reliance, the interest of the class might merit rejection of a settlement encompassing a release that went far beyond the claims asserted and the results achieved. Id. at *19-22. The Chancery Court therefore reluctantly approved the settlement but cautioned that litigants could no longer expert approval of similar settlements where the release extends far beyond the claims asserted and the results achieved. Id. The Chancery Court also rejected the request of Plaintiffs' counsel fees, finding that the benefits achieved – the supplemental disclosures – were "too modest" to justify an award of $500,000. Id. at *22. The Chancery Court noted that the disclosure in connection with potential conflicts of interests of Goldman Sachs merited a fee of $200,000 and the supplemental disclosures merited a fee of $100,000, totaling a fee of $300,000. Id. at *28. Accordingly, the Chancery Court approved the disclosure only settlement and awarded attorneys' fees and costs of $329,881.61 to Plaintiffs' counsel.

In Re Riverbed Technology, Inc. Stockholders Litigation,* 2015 Del. Ch. LEXIS 296 (Del. Ch. Dec. 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of shareholders, brought a class action alleging that Defendant undervalued itself and failed to make adequate disclosures in the proxy materials relating to its acquisition. Subsequently, the parties agreed to a settlement of Plaintiffs' claims in which Defendant made disclosures in exchange for the broadest possible release of all federal and state claims in connections with the transaction. Id. at *5. The Delaware Court of Chancery approved the settlement, although reluctantly, on the basis of the parties' reasonable expectation of approval. An objector, an academic who bought shares specifically with the aim of presenting his objection, sought an award of attorneys' fees in connection with his opposition to the settlement, which was unsuccessful. Id. at *2-3. The Court awarded the objector $10,000 for his counsel's fee, and costs in the amount of $837. Id. at *9. The Court noted that the objector's presentation not only pointed out the general problem inherent in the settlement, but also advocated against the settlement based upon the specific terms proposed and the investigation undertaken; the Court explicitly found the objector's argument persuasive, as well as helpful in analyzing the propriety of the settlement. Id. at *6. In light of the nature of the proposed settlement, and the re-examination of the utility to the class of disclosure-only settlements in return for broad releases of liability, the Court found the objector's elucidation of issues helpful in reaching a decision. Id. The Court observed that the objector's counsel necessarily had reviewed the record closely, and advocated the objector's positions based on the proposed settlement and the case law. Hence, the Court concluded that some fee award was therefore appropriate. Id. at *7-8. Accordingly, the Court awarded the objector $10,000 toward his counsel's fee, and costs in the amount of $837.

In Re Zalicus, Inc. Stockholders Litigation*, 2015 Del. Ch. LEXIS 15 (Del. Ch. Jan. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of stockholders, brought an action alleging that the directors of Zalicus, Inc. breached their fiduciary duties in connection with their approval of a stock-for-stock merger with Epirus Biopharmaceuticals, Inc. The parties settled the litigation. Subsequently, the Court entered a stipulated order dismissing the action without prejudice as to all Plaintiffs and retaining jurisdiction solely for the purpose of determining Plaintiffs' forthcoming fee and expense application. Id. at *1-2. Thereafter, the parties agreed that Zalicus would pay a combined global fee amounting to $400,000 to Plaintiffs' counsel in this action and counsel for other Zalicus stockholders who commenced similar litigation in Massachusetts in full satisfaction of all claims for attorneys' fees and expenses (the "Fee Stipulation"). Id. at *2. Thereafter, parties asked the Court to enter a stipulated order closing the action for all purposes. The Court denied the motion because the parties had not provided adequate notice of the fee stipulation to the putative class. Plaintiffs contended that the Court could enter the closure order without notice to the class because the Court did not need to approve or take any action with respect to the fee stipulation. The Court disagreed. Id. at *3. The Court noted that in In Re Advanced Mammography Systems, Inc. Shareholders Litigation, 1996 Del. Ch. LEXIS 132 (Del. Ch. Oct. 30, 1996), it had held that parties were required to provide notice of a joint application to the putative class because of the risk of a buy-off presented by the proposed fee payment. Id. Although the Court had not certified a class in this action, the Court found that class certification was not dispositive of whether notice was required. In particular, the Court reasoned that it was hard pressed to understand the relevance of a certification order in this context because no class members had released any claims and the class members' claims were dismissed without prejudice. Id. at *5. The Court concluded that notice was appropriate because it provided the information necessary for an interested person to object to the use of corporate funds, if the circumstances warranted. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' motion to close the case.

RBC Capital Markets, LLC v. Jervis, et al.,* 2015 Del. LEXIS 629 (Del. Nov. 30, 2015). In this class action alleging that Defendants aided and abetted breaches of fiduciary duty by former directors of Rural/Metro Corp ("Rural") in connection with the sale of Rural to an affiliate of Warburg Pincus, LLC, the Delaware Supreme Court affirmed all of the principal holdings of the Court of Chancery's series of decisions in In Re Rural/Metro Corporation Shareholder Litigation. On March 7, 2014, the Court of Chancery found that the directors of Rural/Metro Corp. breached their duty of care by failing to act within a range of reasonableness in overseeing the sale of Rural, and ruled that Defendants was liable to the class of Rural stockholders for aiding and abetting breaches of fiduciary duty. Id. at *3. On appeal, Defendants argued that the trial court erred by holding that the Board of Directors breached its duty of care under the enhanced scrutiny standard enunciated in Revlon, Inc. v. MacAndrews & Forbes Holdings, Inc., 506 A.2d 173 (Del. 1986). Id. at *74. Defendants argued that intermediate scrutiny under Revlon exists to determine whether stockholders should receive pre-closing injunctive relief, but not to establish a breach of fiduciary duty that warrants post-closing damages, and that the Court of Chancery erred by finding a due care violation without finding gross negligence. Id. at *98. The Supreme Court disagreed, and affirmed the Court of Chancery's ruling that the directors breached their fiduciary duties under a Revlon standard of review by engaging in conduct that fell outside the range of reasonableness, and that this was a sufficient predicate for its finding of post-closing aiding and abetting liability against Defendants. Id. at *99-100. While the Supreme Court acknowledged that gross negligence was required to sustain monetary damages against disinterested directors, it also opined that a Board might nonetheless still be in breach of its fiduciary duties under Revlon's reasonableness standard of review, and as such Revlon might continue to apply in the context of post-closing aiding and abetting claims. Id. The Court of Chancery had found that, under the specific circumstances of the case, the Board's initiation of a sale process in late 2010 fell outside the range of reasonableness, and thus was a breach of its fiduciary duties under Revlon. Id. at *78. Defendants argued that during such period Rural was merely exploring strategic alternatives and that the business judgment rule – not the rule in Revlon – applied. Id. The Supreme Court, however, disagreed and found that the record showed that Rural was for sale from the outset. The Supreme Court noted that there was no exploration of other strategic alternatives, the financial advisors understood that they were being hired for a sell-side engagement, the special committee had authorized the negotiation of the sale of Rural at an early stage in the process, and, although the Board was not initially aware of the special committee's authorization of the sale, the Board ultimately purported to ratify the special committee's actions. Id. at *79-85. The Supreme Court thus agreed with the Court of Chancery's principal conclusion that the Board's overall course of conduct failed scrutiny under Revlon. Id. at *86-89. Defendants argued that Rural's exculpatory provision barred the recovery of monetary damages from directors for a successful shareholder claim based upon establishing a violation of the duty of care. Id. at *142-144. The Supreme Court, however, ruled that the provision did not vitiate the Board's obligation to adhere to its fiduciary obligation to proceed with due care, and thus Defendants' knowing and intentional inducement of the fiduciary breach justified the award of damages. Id. at *146. The Supreme Court further opined that allowing the provision to safeguard third-parties would create a "perverse incentive system" that would allow advisers to mislead the Board and then hide behind their victim's liability shield. Id. at *147. Accordingly, the Supreme Court affirmed the Court of Chancery's final order and judgment finding Defendants liable.

(vi) Florida

Asseff, et al. v. Citizens Property Insurance,* 2015 Fla. App. LEXIS 3362 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. Mar. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of insurance policyholders, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the policyholder's contracts through a re-inspection program that deprived them of legitimate wind mitigation credits. Florida law requires insurers to provide premium discounts to policyholders who install or implement windstorm damage mitigation techniques, alterations, or solutions to their properties to prevent windstorm losses. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs submitted uniform mitigation verification inspection forms to Defendant after a professional inspector reviewed their property. Defendant allegedly accepted the forms without conducting any separate inspections of the properties and routinely provided insureds premium credits based on the loss mitigation features and inspection results. Id. Before the five-year expiration date of the forms, Defendant implemented a re-inspection program, which led to widespread removal of loss mitigation benefits afforded under the policy in the form of credits. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant was obligated to honor the loss mitigation discounts and sought a declaration that the insurance policies incorporated the mitigation form and its terms, that Defendant must honor the mitigation form and inspection results on an insured's property for five years unless there has been a material change to the property, and that the trial court was the proper forum for issuing this relief notwithstanding that damages would be in the form of overpaid premiums. Id. at *3-4. Defendant moved to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiffs failed to exhaust the administrative remedies available under § 627.371 of the Florida Statutes. That Section provides that any person aggrieved by any rate charged or rating plan adopted by an insurer may make written request of the insurer or rating organization to review the manner in which the rate has been applied. Id. at *6-7. The trial court granted Defendant's motion. On appeal, the Florida District Court of Appeal affirmed. The District Court of Appeal agreed with the trial court that because Plaintiffs complained of the reduction or elimination of wind mitigation credits and the corresponding increase in premiums, they essentially claimed to have been aggrieved by the rate Defendant charged. Id. at *13. Although Plaintiffs claimed that they only challenged Defendant's re-inspection rights and not their rates, the District Court of Appeal noted that, by virtue of the fact that Plaintiffs alleged a loss of premium discounts and credits, they had been "aggrieved by any rate charged" pursuant to § 627.371(1). The District Court of Appeal therefore concluded that Plaintiffs should have pursued administrative relief under § 627.371(1), and the trial court did not err in dismissing the action for failure to exhaust administrative remedies.

Bay Area Injury Rehab Specialists Holdings, Inc., et al. v. United Services Automobile Association,* 2015 Fla. App. LEXIS 8772 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2d Dist. June 10, 2015). Plaintiff, a health care provider, brought a class action alleging that Defendants routinely rejected valid claims for personal injury protection ("PIP") benefits based on an unlawful requirement that a separate "disclosure and acknowledgement form" be submitted every time an insured patient received health care services. Id. at *2. Plaintiff sought declaratory relief (Count I), injunctive relief to compel PIP payments (Count II), and damages (Count III). Plaintiff also sought to proceed for itself and as representative of opt-out class members from a prior class action settlement involving similar issues. Previously, Steven E. Goodwiller had filed a putative class action Defendants for unpaid PIP benefits in an action entitled Steven E. Goodwiller, M.D., P.A. v. USAA, No. 08-15594 (Fla. 17th Cir. 2009). The previous action did not assert claims for declaratory or injunctive relief, but sought monetary relief comparable to what Plaintiff sought in Count III of its complaint. Because of the similarity of issues, Plaintiff's lawsuit was stayed pending resolution of Goodwiller. Subsequently, the court in Goodwiller approved a class action settlement, but Plaintiff and 292 class members opted-out of that settlement. With Goodwiller resolved, Plaintiff's lawsuit proceeded. Defendants then filed motions directed to the sufficiency of Plaintiff's complaint. The trial court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification and dismissed claims for declaratory and injunctive relief. The trial court ruled that Plaintiff could not represent a class of Goodwiller opt-outs seeking the same form of monetary relief adjudicated in the Goodwiller class settlement. In dismissing Counts I and II, the trial court held that class action status was inappropriate for the declaratory and injunctive relief claims, even if they had not been raised in Goodwiller. On appeal, the Florida District Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order, with one exception; it dismissed the appeal of the order dismissing the declaratory judgment count. The District Court of Appeal found instructive In Re Bridgestone/Firestone, Inc., Tires Products, Liability Litigation, 333 F.3d 763 (7th Cir. 2003), where the Seventh Circuit held that a party who opts out of a class action retains the right to proceed individually, but not to launch a competing class action of opt-outs seeking the same relief resolved on a class basis in a prior lawsuit. Id. at *7-8. The District Court of Appeal found that the trial court acutely observed that serial class actions would promote a marketplace for competing class actions and erode the benefits of proceeding in a single class action. Id. at *9. The District Court of Appeal remarked that a need for a class action of opt-outs was not legally impossible, but required exceptional circumstances, which was absent here. Id. at *10. The District Court of Appeal held that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that serial class actions do not promote the purpose behind class actions. Id. Accordingly, Plaintiff could not proceed on a class action basis with any claims adjudicated in Goodwiller, especially on those monetary claims that were the subject of its claims in Count III. Id. at *11.

The District Court of Appeal also ruled that Plaintiff could pursue its monetary claims on an individual basis. Id. Further, the District Court of Appeal found that the trial court did not err in dismissing the declaratory judgment claim, but the portion of the non-final order that dismissed Count I was not appealable. Id. Accordingly, the District Court of Appeal dismissed that portion of the appeal involving Count I. Id. Finally, the District Court of Appeal found that the trial court did not err in characterizing the class claims in Count II as predominantly seeking monetary relief, thus precluding certification of an injunction class. Id. at *12. Moreover, dismissal of Count II was adequately supported by the trial court's conclusion that Plaintiff failed to state a cause of action for injunctive relief. Id. Accordingly, the District Court of Appeal affirmed in part and dismissed in part.

Damianakis, et al. v. Philip Morris USA, Inc.,* 2015 Fla. App. LEXIS 197 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2d Dist. Jan. 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, Nikitas Damianakis and his wife, brought a personal injury action against Defendants, several tobacco companies and other entities, including Defendant Philip Morris, seeking damages for diseases and medical conditions brought on by Nikitas Damianakis' alleged addiction to nicotine. The action was a progeny of R.J. Reynolds Co. v. Engle ("Engle I"), 672 So.2d 39 (Fla. 3d Dist. Ct. App. 1996), a class action which was divided into three phases, and which awarded $12.7 million in compensatory damages, and $145 billion in punitive damages Engle II to a class of Florida citizens and residents who suffered or died from diseases and medical conditions caused by their addiction to cigarettes that contained nicotine. Although the Engle class had been eventually decertified in Engle v. Liggett Group, Inc. ("Engle III"), 945 So.2d 1246 (Fla. 2006), the Florida Supreme Court had provided Plaintiffs who qualified as class members as of November 21, 1996 to proceed individually for damages within one year with a res judicata effect on the phase I common core findings. Nikitas Damianakis, after being diagnosed with emphysema and chronic obstructive pulmonary disease ("COPD"), moved to Florida in April 1994, and brought his action on November 29, 2007. While the litigation was running its course, Nikitas Damianakis died. Defendants filed a motion for summary judgment, arguing that Nikitas Damianakis was not a member of the Engle class because his COPD and emphysema had been diagnosed before he moved to Florida. Defendants argued that because Nikitas Damianakis was diagnosed with COPD before he moved to Florida, he could not take advantage of the window provided for by the Florida Supreme Court in Engle III, and he could not file an independent lawsuit because the statute of limitations had expired. Id. at *21. The trial court granted Defendants' motion. The Florida District Court of Appeal, however, reversed the trial court's order. The District Court of Appeal held that as long as an individual was a citizen or resident of Florida as of the cut-off date of November 21, 1996, and his or her smoking-related illness "manifested" on or before that date, then he or she satisfied the residency and citizenship requirement of Engle class membership, and thus, it was an error to hold that Damianakis was not a class member on the ground that his smoking-related illness had been diagnosed before he moved to Florida. Id. at *39. The District Court of Appeal explained that the only requirements for membership in the Engle class were that: (i) the individual's smoking-related illness manifested before the cut-off date; (ii) he or she was a resident or citizen of Florida on or before the cut-off date; and (iii) the individual's smoking-related illness resulted from the individual's addiction to cigarettes containing nicotine. Hence, even though a person's smoking-related illness first manifested before that person became a Florida resident, he or she was not necessarily excluded from the class. Id. at *22-23. Defendants argued that the qualification for membership in the Engle class required Plaintiffs to show that the decedent was a resident of the state of Florida at the time of a "medical diagnosis" of a smoking-related disease or at the time evidence of the causal relationship of the cause of action had otherwise manifested itself. Id. at *23. The District Court of Appeal, however, found no statement in Engle III that supported such a requirement. Rather, the District Court of Appeal found that the Florida Supreme Court had repeated at least twice that the class included all persons who were Florida residents as of the class cut-off date of November 21, 1996, and the phrase "who have suffered, presently suffer, or have died" supported the view that the class should include only those people who were affected in the past or who were presently suffering at the time the class was re-certified by the trial court. Id. at 23-26. According to the District Court of Appeal, Damianakis, like many other members of the class, spent most of his adult, "smoking" life in another state or country, and the possibility that some of them, including Damianakis, might have had symptoms that "manifested" before they move to Florida, did not necessarily exclude them from the class. Id. at *38-39. The District Court of Appeal therefore concluded that Damianakis satisfied the residency and citizenship requirement of the Engle class and he was entitled to take advantage of the one-year filing window created in Engle III, and accordingly, reversed the order granting summary judgment to Defendants.

R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. v. Ballard, et al.,* 2015 Fla. App. LEXIS (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 3d Dist. Mar. 18, 2015). Plaintiffs, several living and pre-deceased smokers, brought actions alleging personal injury or wrongful death due to smoking Defendant's tobacco products. In Engle v. Liggett Group, Inc., 945 So.2d 1246 (Fla. 2006), the Florida Supreme Court decertified a class of smokers and their survivors but gave res judicata effect to certain liability determinations made by the jury so long as individual class members filed individual damages actions within one year. After a jury returned a verdict in favor of Plaintiffs, Defendant appealed. Defendant claimed that the trial court erred by failing to direct a verdict in its favor as to Plaintiffs' membership in the Engle class; by not granting a new trial based on improper comments made by Plaintiffs' counsel; and by admitting certain evidence of Defendant's misconduct. Id. at *1. The Florida District Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's judgment. Defendant first argued that the evidence used to prove Plaintiff Ralph Ballard's addiction to cigarettes was insufficient because the only individualized testimony on addiction came from Ballard himself, who was not qualified to offer expert testimony in this matter. Defendant also argued that Plaintiff's expert merely offered generalized testimony because he was unfamiliar with Ballard and merely identified generic criteria relevant to the question of addiction. Id. at *9. The District Court of Appeal adopted the reasoning and holding in R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. v. Brown, 70 So. 3d 707 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2011), wherein it rejected Defendant's argument that lay testimony was insufficient to prove the decedent's addiction or that addiction was the legal cause of his death. Id. at *10. Defendant further argued that it was entitled to a new trial because, in closing and rebuttal arguments, Plaintiffs' counsel impermissibly attacked Defendant for defending this case. The Engle rulings included common liability findings that the Engle Defendants concealed or omitted, and agreed to conceal or omit, material information not otherwise known or available concerning the health effects and/or addictive nature of smoking cigarettes with the intention that the public would detrimentally rely on the information. Id. Moreover, in Phillip Morris USA, Inc. v. Douglas, 110 So. 3d 419 (2013), the Florida Supreme Court precluded Engle Defendants from arguing in individual actions that they did not engage in conduct sufficient to subject them to liability. Id. at *16. In this case, although Defendant informed the jury during opening and closing arguments that it did not dispute any of the Engle findings, it shortly afterward denied the existence of any conspiracy to conceal. Id. Accordingly, the District Court of Appeal concluded that, because Defendant challenged the Engle findings, it was not reversible error for Plaintiffs' counsel to rebut such arguments in closing and rebuttal arguments. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the District Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's judgment.

(vii) Illinois

Ballard RN Center, Inc. et al. v. Kohll's Pharmacy And Homecare, Inc.,* 2015 Ill. LEXIS 1248 (Ill. Oct. 22, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action against Defendant alleging that it sent unsolicited fax advertisements to Plaintiff in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Plaintiff alleged that it did not have a prior business relationship with Defendant and that it did not authorize Defendant to send fax advertisements to Plaintiff. Id. at *2. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant's fax advertisement did not provide the requisite "opt out notice." Id. at *3. Along with filing the action, Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification proposing three separate classes, and asserting that it would file a supporting memorandum of law in due course. Id. at *5. Defendant subsequently filed a motion for summary judgment. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's TCPA claim was moot because Defendant had tendered an unconditional offer of payment to Plaintiff exceeding the total recoverable amount of possible TCPA damages, but Plaintiff rejected all of the tenders. Id. Defendant cited to Barber v. American Airlines, Inc., 241 Ill. 2d 450 (2011), contending that a class action becomes moot when a Defendant offers such tenders before Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification. Id. at *6. Although Plaintiff had filed for class certification at the time of the filing of the action, Defendant argued that the motion did not contain enough detail or information on the proposed classes. The trial court denied Defendant's motion, reasoning that Defendant did not make its tender on the TCPA claim before Plaintiff filed its motion for class certification. Id. at *9. Disagreeing with Defendant's argument that Plaintiff's motion for class certification was merely a shell motion, the trial court concluded that Barber required only that a motion for class certification be filed, and not that it must meet any certain standards. Id. On Defendant's appeal, the Illinois Appellate Court reversed the trial court's decision. While acknowledging that Barber did not expressly set forth requirements for a valid motion for class certification, the Appellate Court determined that Barber implicitly required that a motion contain sufficient factual allegations so that it implicates the interests of the other class members. Id. at *11. The Appellate Court therefore concluded that the motion for class certification had not yet been filed within the meaning of Barber to avoid a finding of mootness. On further appeal, the Illinois Supreme Court reversed. While agreeing in principle that a contentless shell motion, or otherwise frivolous pleading, would be insufficient to preclude a mootness finding under Barber, the Supreme Court held that Plaintiff's motion was sufficient because it contained a general outline of Plaintiff's class members and class action allegations, and it effectively communicated the fundamental nature of the putative class action. Id. at *19-20. The Supreme Court further found that even if the motion for class certification was not sufficient to support class certification, the focus of Barber was on the timing of Plaintiff's filing a motion, and thus, Plaintiff's motion was sufficient for purposes of Barber. Id. at *24. Accordingly, the Supreme Court concluded that Defendant's tender after Plaintiff filed its class certification could not render moot any part of Plaintiff's pending action.

Hawkins, et al. v. Commonwealth Edison Co.*, 2015 Ill. App. LEXIS 96 (Ill. App. Ct. 1st Dist. Feb. 17, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendant's non-compliance with the Illinois Commerce Commission's order, which required Defendant to begin its smart meter deployment within a certain timeframe, was a violation of the Illinois Public Utilities Act (the "Act"). The Illinois Energy Infrastructure Modernization Act ("EIMA") sets forth investment plans for participating utilities requiring them to invest in electric system upgrades, modernization projects, and training facilities, and the modernization of their transmission and distribution infrastructures. Id. at *2. Defendant elected to participate and invest to modernize its transmission and distribution infrastructure, including the installation of smart meter technology. The Commission approved Defendant's plan with modifications, and ordered Defendant to begin its smart meter deployment within three months. The trial court dismissed the complaint for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, and the Illinois Appellate Court affirmed the dismissal. The Appellate Court noted that the Commission is the body most capable of determining whether a utility's rates are reasonable and its services adequate, given its expertise in the complex data inherent in rate and service issues. Id. at *5. Further, Sheffler v. Commonwealth Edison Co., 955 N.E. 2d 1110 (Ill. 2011), determined that the Act provides that a claim for reparations is within the jurisdiction of the Commission, while a claim for civil damages lies within the civil court's jurisdiction. Id. at *6. The Appellate Court noted that generally, a claim is for reparations when the essence of the claim is that a utility has charged too much for a service, while a claim is for civil damages when the essence of the complaint is that the utility has done something else to wrong Plaintiff. Id. at *7. Sheffler reasoned that in determining whether the Commission has jurisdiction, the proper focus should be on the nature of the relief sought rather than the basis for seeking relief. Id. at *8. Further, Sheffler held that rates and service are inextricably tied together and therefore, complaints concerning the adequacy of Defendant's services are reparations falling within the jurisdiction of the Commission. Id. at *9. Here, Plaintiffs filed a breach of contract complaint seeking damages for Defendant's violation of the Commission's order requiring it to deploy smart meters within a timeframe, and they alleged that Defendant's smart meter deployment would be delayed more than two years because of the violation. Plaintiffs sought damages of at least $182 million, which represented the reduced amount of net present benefit to customers caused by the delay. The Appellate Court noted that under the EIMA, the deployment of smart meters is an improvement of infrastructure, and utilities making such improvements may recover expenditures through the rate-making process. Id. at *10. Because the nature of relief sought by Plaintiffs went directly to Defendant's infrastructure and service, the Appellate Court found that Plaintiffs' complaint was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Commission. Accordingly, the Appellate Court affirmed dismissal of the complaint.

Mabry, et al. v. Village Of Glenwood,* 2015 Ill. App. LEXIS 691 (Ill. App. Ct. 1st Dist. Sept. 14, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that they suffered property damages after a heavy rainstorm cause sewage and sewage water to back-up into their residences in 2006. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs alleged common law trespass and negligent operation of the sewer system. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs later withdrew their class action allegations, and added 32 individuals as intervening Plaintiffs into the action. Id. at *5. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss arguing that the intervening Plaintiffs' claims were time-barred, and because the named Plaintiffs did not move to certify the class as soon as practicable after filing the proposed class action, the Illinois class action tolling rule did not preserve the claims of the intervening Plaintiffs. Id. at *5-6. The trial court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss. On appeal, the Illinois Appellate Court reversed and found that Plaintiffs' timely filing of the proposed class action served to toll the limitation period for the intervening Plaintiffs. The Appellate Court noted that Plaintiffs' cause of action accrued on April 16, 2006, when allegedly a heavy rainstorm cause sewage and sewer water to back-up into Plaintiffs' homes, causing property damage. Plaintiffs filed their original proposed class action complaint on April 16, 2007, exactly one year later, but before the expiration of the Tort Immunity's Act's limitations period. Id. at *18. The Appellate Court explained that, from that date, the statute of limitations was tolled as to all members of the putative class until the point at which class certification was denied or abandoned, and the limitations period started running again when Plaintiffs abandoned the class allegations on March 28, 2013. Id. Since Plaintiffs' original proposed class action was filed with one day remaining in the limitations period, the intervening Plaintiffs had one day within which to file their intervening claims, and Plaintiffs filed a second amended complaint adding the intervening Plaintiffs on the same day that Plaintiffs abandoned their class action allegations. Id. The Appellate Court thus found that the intervening Plaintiffs' claims against Defendant were timely filed pursuant to the class action tolling rule. Id. at *18-19. Defendant argued that, because Plaintiffs did not pursue class certification during the pendency of their proposed class action, they did not meet the requirement of moving for certification "as soon as practicable" and this equated to a failure to act with "due diligence" which nullified the application of the class action tolling rule. Id. at *19. The Appellate Court, however, found that Defendant's argument was not supported by case law, but also was inconsistent with the principles of underlying the class action tolling rule. Id. at *21. The Appellate Court pointed out that the specific purpose of the class action tolling rule is to preserve the claims of potential class Plaintiffs in the event that the class is not certified, and thus, it appeared reasonable that Plaintiffs did not move for certification during the discovery because the trial court never ordered Plaintiffs to move for class certification. Id. According to the Appellate Court, a reversal was consistent with the principles of class action tolling rule because imposing a somewhat arbitrary deadline as to when members of a purported class must either intervene or file their own protective claims, based on nothing more than the statute's ambiguous requirement that representative Plaintiffs in a proposed class action must move for certification "as soon as practicable," would encourage the duplicative filing and judicial inefficiency. Id. at *22-24. Accordingly, the Appellate Court reversed the trial court's order granting Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Maglio v. Advocate Health And Hospitals Corp.*, 2015 Ill. App. Unpub. LEXIS 1190 (Ill. App. Ct. 2d Dist. June 2, 2015). Defendant, a network of hospitals and doctors, experienced a data breach. On July 15, 2013, burglars stole four computers from Defendant's administrative building that contained the personal information of about four million of Defendant's patients. Id at *2. Defendant notified the patients of the theft on August 23, 2013. Id. Two sets of Plaintiffs filed class actions against Defendant, claiming that Defendant violated two state consumer data protection laws by failing to maintain adequate procedures to protect the personal information of Plaintiffs and putative class members and by failing to notify Plaintiffs and putative class about the breach in a timely matter. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs also sued Defendant on theories of negligence and invasion of privacy. Id. Defendant moved to dismiss both class actions, arguing that Plaintiffs lacked standing because they had not suffered any injury as a result of their data being stolen. Id. at *5. Both trial courts dismissed the class actions. Id. at *5, 7. The trial courts found that "[t]he increased risk that Plaintiffs will be identity theft victims at some indeterminate point in the future . . . did not constitute an injury sufficient to confer standing," and that Plaintiffs' "allegations concerning anxiety and emotional distress . . . were insufficient to establish standing, where they were not based on an imminent threat." Id. at *6. Plaintiffs appealed. The Illinois Appellate Court pointed out that, under Illinois law, a Plaintiff only has standing if he or she has suffered "some injury-in-fact to a legally cognizable interest." Id. at *9. "[T]he claimed injury may be actual or threatened and it must be: (i) distinct and palpable; (ii) fairly traceable to the defendant's actions; and (iii) substantially likely to be prevented or redressed by the grant of the requested relief." Id. at 10. The Appellate Court analyzed whether Plaintiffs had suffered a "distinct and palpable" injury under Illinois law. Based on Chicago Teachers Union, Local 1 v. Board of Education, 189 Ill. 2d 200 (2000) – a case in which the Illinois Supreme Court held that physical education teachers did not have standing to challenge a statute allowing school districts to waive mandatory physical education requirements because the teachers were not "in immediate danger of sustaining a direct injury as a result of enforcement of the challenged statute that is distinct and palpable" – the Appellate Court concluded that Plaintiffs allegations of injury were speculative and that Plaintiffs thus did not have standing to bring suit. Id. at 10. The Appellate Court reasoned that this result was supported by federal case law on standing. It observed that, "[i]n federal courts, to show standing under Article III of the Constitution, a Plaintiff must establish the existence of an injury that is: (i) concrete, particularized, and actual or imminent; (ii) fairly traceable to the challenged action; and (iii) redressable by a favorable ruling." Id. at *11. To meet the first requirement, "an 'allegation of future injury may suffice if the threatened injury is 'certainly impending,' or there is a 'substantial risk' that the harm will occur." Id. "Allegations of possible future injury are not sufficient," nor is an "objectively-reasonable-likelihood" that the future injury will occur. Id. The Appellate Court opined an increased risk of harm is not sufficient to confer standing. Finally, the Appellate Court reasoned that alleged "appreciable emotional injury" did not confer standing on Plaintiffs. Id. at *14. Specifically, the Appellate Court found that, because the purported emotional injury did not flow from an "imminent, certainly impending, or substantial risk of harm," it could not, on its own, confer standing. Id.

Pierscionek, et al. v. Illinois High School Association,* Case No. 14-CH-19131 (Ill. Cir. Ct. Oct. 27, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to minimize the risk of concussions for student athletes. Plaintiff sought: (i) injunctive relief to correct the deficiencies with Defendant's policies and procedures; and (ii) to establish a medical monitoring program for high school athletes. Id. at 1. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint, and the Court granted the motion. Id. Defendant argued that Plaintiff improperly asked the Court to impose policies, which were within the province of the Illinois legislature and various local school boards. Id. at 2. The Court agreed with Defendant that Plaintiffs asked to impose policy and, in effect, enact legislation when determining policy and enacting legislation already existed within the distinct province of the legislature. Id. The Court found that Plaintiff had specifically alleged in his complaint that the legislature had charged Defendant with addressing concussions in student athletes and as such, despite recognizing that the legislature dictated in this regard, Plaintiff asked for an injunction and medical monitoring. Id. The Court held that it was clear that Defendant had acted to protect student athletes, and the measures alleged to be necessary by Plaintiff were simply conclusions and not factual allegations capable of being proven. Id. at 3. The Court recognized that Defendant's arguments were sufficient for dismissal of the complaint, but it addressed other bases for dismissal for the edification of the parties and in the event of an appeal. Id. First, the Court held that Plaintiffs' "negligent rule-making" allegation was not a viable cause of action. Id. Plaintiffs' case theory – that Defendant was careless and negligent by breaching its duty of care by failing to enact specific procedures – was not a recognized cause of action for negligence by an individual against a governmental entity. Id. at 4. Second, the Court held that Plaintiff's action failed under the "contact sports exception," first recognized in Karas v. Strevell, 227 Ill. 440 (2008) Id. at 5. The Court found that the contact sports exception was applicable to Defendant as it was a governmental entity charged with safeguarding student athletes and had no direct relationship to the sport or Plaintiff. Id. at 6. Third, the Court held that Plaintiff failed to state a claim for injunctive relief. Id. at 7. The Court observed that by bringing a legal claim of negligence, Plaintiff was not entitled to injunctive relief as a remedy because one of the elements necessary for injunctive relief was the absence of an adequate remedy at law. Id. Fourth, the Court held that Illinois law did not recognize a medical-monitoring-only cause of action. Id. The Court observed that to recover damages for an increased risk of future harm in a tort action, Plaintiff must establish that Defendant's breach of duty caused a present injury which resulted in that increased risk. Id. at 8. However, the Court reasoned that Plaintiff's complaint sought on-going medical monitoring as opposed to screening for a medical condition, but the pleading failed to establish a causal link between Defendant and the damages Plaintiff sought. Id. Lastly, Defendant argued that Plaintiff expressly assumed the risk of injury when he signed an athletic permit. Id. at 9. Plaintiff argued that he was a minor at the time he signed the document relied upon by Defendant and therefore he did not know of the risks involved. Id. The Court rejected Plaintiff's argument and held that he had ratified the contract failing to disaffirm it within a reasonable time after attaining majority. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Price, et al. v. Philip Morris, Inc.,* 2015 Ill. LEXIS 117687 (Ill. Nov. 4, 2015). Plaintiffs filed a class action against Defendant, a cigarette manufacturer, alleging that Defendant's use of the terms "lights" and "lowered tar and nicotine" on the packaging and in the marketing of various cigarettes violated the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act ("Consumer Fraud Act") and the Uniform Deceptive Trade Practices Act. Defendant raised numerous defenses in response to the complaint, including that it was barred by § 10b(1) of the Consumer Fraud Act. Id. at *3. The trial court rejected this defense and certified a class consisting of all purchasers of "Lights" from 1971-2001. Following a bench trial, the trial court rendered judgment in favor of Plaintiffs and awarded $10.1 billion in damages. Id. at *3-4. After several reversals on various appeals, the Illinois Supreme Court granted Defendant's petition for leave to appeal, specifically to address whether the Illinois Appellate Court correctly reversed the judgment of the trial court denying Plaintiffs' petition brought pursuant to § 2-1401 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Id. at *6. The Illinois Supreme Court vacated the judgments of the Appellate Court and held that cause was dismissed without prejudice to Plaintiffs' right to file a motion to recall the mandate in the Supreme Court. Id. at *17. Defendant argued that both the trial court and the Appellate Court, on review of the trial court's judgment, erred in considering the merits of Plaintiffs' § 2-1401 petition. Id. at *7. The Supreme Court agreed, holding that § 2-1401 did not authorize the trial court to grant collateral relief from the judgment, and that such relief must be sought by filing a motion to recall the mandate at the appellate level. Id. Accordingly, the Illinois Supreme Court vacated the judgment and dismissed the cause of action without prejudice to Plaintiffs to file a motion to recall the mandate in the Illinois Supreme Court. Id. at *17.

S37 Management, Inc., et al. v. Advance Refrigeration Co*., Case No. 06-CH-20999 (Ill. Cir. Ct. Jan. 8, 2015). The Court denied Defendant's motion to certify a question for interlocutory appeal regarding the application of the crime-fraud exception to the attorney-client and work-product privilege as it applies to communications between a Defendant, its counsel, and putative class members during the opt-out period. The Court previously had granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification. The class notice described the nature of the claims, and directed putative class members to contact class counsel in writing regarding any question on the notice. Plaintiff subsequently filed a motion requesting a protective order and sanctions, asserting that Defendant had impermissibly engaged in a campaign to urge its customers to opt-out of the class during the opt-out period. The Court subsequently issued an order barring Defendant from communications with any class members. Plaintiff then filed an amended motion for a protective order and sanctions, providing additional evidence of Defendant's alleged improper communications during the opt-out period. Plaintiff also sought discovery from Defendant's counsel about their role in Defendant's communications. Specifically, Plaintiff moved to compel all documents "relating to communications between Defendant and defense counsel regarding Defendant's communications to members of the class regarding opting out of the class." Id. at 2. Defendant objected to Plaintiff's request based on the attorney-client and work-product privileges. In response, Plaintiff argued that the crime-fraud exception applied to its request, and therefore, the privilege did not bar the discovery request. Plaintiff attached evidence to the motion illustrating that there was reason to believe that defense counsel had assisted Defendant in unilaterally reaching out to class members and urging them to opt-out of the case. Plaintiff alleged that this was accomplished using misleading information about the litigation, which constituted illegal or fraudulent activity. The Court found that this evidence gave it a reasonable basis to suspect Defendant's counsel may have assisted or advised in the communication asserted to be an illegal or fraudulent opt-out campaign. On this basis, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion to compel discovery regarding defense counsel's communications with the class. Defendant then filed a motion under Rule 308(a) of the Illinois Supreme Court Rules to certify a question for interlocutory appeal. The question was, "[w]hether the crime-fraud exception to the attorney-client and work-product privilege applies to communications between a Defendant and its counsel that relate to Defendant's communications with putative class members during the opt-out period." Id. at 6-7. The Court denied Defendant's motion. The Court reasoned that as worded, the question would require appellate review to determine whether the crime-fraud exception could ever apply, as a matter of law, to attorney/Defendant communications that relate to a Defendant's communications with putative class members during the opt-out period. The Court reasoned that there was no substantial ground to dispute that the crime-fraud exception could apply to such communications, if a sufficient showing was made. Additionally, the Court found that the question did not accurately address the specific issue on which it had ruled. The ruling was explicitly premised on evidence which raised the possibility that defense counsel conferred with Defendant about soliciting class members to fill out opt-out forms and affidavits during the opt-out period. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to certify a question for interlocutory appeal and granted Plaintiff's motion to compel discovery.

Spadoni, et al. v. United Airlines, Inc.*, 2015 Ill. App. LEXIS 150458 (Ill. App. Ct. 1st Dist. Dec. 31, 2015). Plaintiff filed a class action against Defendant for breach of contract, alleging that Defendant, an airline that also transports cargo, removed passengers' checked baggage while permitting the cargo to remain on the aircraft, or loaded the cargo in lieu of the passenger baggage, in order to meet aircraft weight restrictions established by the Federal Aviation Administration. The trial court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint with prejudice, and Plaintiff appealed. The Illinois Appellate Court affirmed the trial court's order of dismissal. Id. at *2. Plaintiff, who had paid a non-refundable fee of $25 to check a bag on a domestic flight, argued that Defendant had a duty, based on the terms and conditions set forth in the Contract of Carriage, to transport each passenger's checked baggage on the same aircraft as the passenger "unless such carriage is deemed impractical." Id. While Plaintiff admitted that Defendant was vested with broad discretion in determining whether carriage of a passenger's checked baggage on the same aircraft as the passenger was practical, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant had a duty to exercise this discretion in accordance with an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. Id. at *4-5. Rejecting these arguments, the trial court dismissed the complaint pursuant to § 2-615 of the Illinois Code of Civil Procedure, holding that Plaintiff failed to allege – and, indeed, could not allege – that, absent application of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, Defendant violated the express terms of the Contract of Carriage where those terms gave Defendant sole discretion over whether to transport passengers with their checked baggage on the same aircraft. Id. at *7. Plaintiff contended the trial court erred in ruling that her claim, based on Defendant's alleged breach of the implied covenant, was preempted by the Airline Deregulation Act of 1978. The Appellate Court rejected this argument, holding that under Northwest, Inc. v. Ginsberg, 134 S. Ct. 1422 (2014), an implied covenant claim will always be preempted if the covenant imposed by state common law cannot be expressly disavowed; even if the implied covenant could be disavowed, the claim would still be preempted if application of the covenant was based on a state policy. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Appellate Court held that the trial court did not err in dismissing the complaint, and affirmed its dismissal order. Id. at *13-14.

Stefanski, et al. v. The City Of Chicago,* 2015 Ill. App. LEXIS 133 (Ill. App. Ct. 1st Dist. Feb. 27, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action seeking declaratory relief and damages for unjust enrichment on behalf of herself and a putative class of beneficiaries of Defendant's medical insurance plan who had: (i) received medical services paid by Defendant's self-funded insurance plan for personal injuries caused by third-party tortfeasers; (ii) employed the services of an attorney to collect damages from such tortfeasers; and (iii) received recoveries from such tortfeasers that were reduced due to Defendant's improper refusal to reduce its subrogation claim to account for its share of the attorney fees, in violation of a "common fund doctrine." Id. at *1. Defendant's Chicago Medical Care Plan (the "Plan") paid for medical services Plaintiff received in connection with an automobile collision caused by a third-party tortfeasor. Plaintiff obtained an $18,000 settlement from the tortfeasor, and paid one-third of the amount toward his attorneys' fees. Defendant then asserted a claim against Plaintiff's recovery pursuant to a subrogation and reimbursement provision contained in the Plan. Although Defendant initially claimed a $3,824 lien on Plaintiff's recovery, representing the full amount it paid for Plaintiff's medical services, it ultimately reduced its claim to $2,900, in order to settle the dispute over the common fund issue. Id. at *3. Plaintiff paid the amount "under protest," and later brought this action alleging that Defendant's refusal to reduce its subrogation and reimbursement claim to account for its share of Plaintiff's attorneys' fees violated the common fund doctrine and caused her damages. Id. at *4. Plaintiff also sought class certification. The trial court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification. The Illinois Appellate Court reversed, finding that Plaintiff failed to state an actionable claim. The Appellate Court rejected Plaintiff's reliance upon the common fund doctrine, which is an equitable, quasi-contractual right to attorneys' fees recognized when no other relevant or express contract is in place. Id. at *9. The Appellate Court noted that the express language contained in the Plan documentation provided that Defendant would not be responsible for any attorneys' fees incurred by or on behalf of Plaintiff with respect to her lawsuit, and a remedy based on a quasi-contract is not available when an express contract exists concerning the same subject matter. Id. at *9-10. The Appellate Court concluded that Defendant was entitled to assert a subrogation claim on Plaintiff's recovery based on the Plan, and Plaintiff could not rely upon the common fund doctrine to support her claims. Id. at *11. Not persuaded by the cases cited by Plaintiff, the Appellate Court noted that "none of [the] decisions involved the situation presented here, i.e., an insured attempting to recover directly from their insurer in a separate lawsuit asserting a violation of the common fund doctrine in the context of a contractual subrogation claim." Id. at *20. The Appellate Court observed that none of the cases recognized a litigant's individual right to claim application of the common fund doctrine to reduce a contractual subrogation lien claimed by the litigant's insurer; instead, the case law recognized the right of such a litigant's attorney to rely upon the common fund doctrine in the context of such subrogation claims, and only when the exercise of such a right could accurately be described as an independent action by and on behalf of such an attorney. Id. The Appellate Court rejected Plaintiff's contention that by paying her attorney's full one-third fee, she has essentially been assigned her attorney's common fund claim. The Appellate Court found that a claim under the common fund doctrine is not a claim at law, but one in equity, and equity did not support Plaintiff's attempt to recover under that doctrine. Id. at *29. The Appellate Court therefore concluded that Plaintiff has not stated an actionable claim, and thus, class certification was improper. Id. at *29-30. Accordingly, the Appellate Court vacated the trial court's class certification order.

Stonecrafters, Inc., et al. v. Wholesale Life Insurance Brokerage, Inc.*, 2015 Ill. App. Unpub. LEXIS 1390 (Ill. App. Ct. 2d Dist. June 23, 2009). Plaintiff, a corporation, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant sent unsolicited faxes in violation of the federal Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") and the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act. The parties settled the case and a $5,999,999.98 judgment was entered against Defendant for the benefit of the putative class. Plaintiff agreed not to collect damages from Defendant and sought recovery from Defendant's insurers, Milwaukee Insurance Company ("MIC") and Unitrin, Inc. Plaintiff brought supplementary third-party citations against MIC and Unitrin. The trial court granted Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, finding that the settlement was reasonable and limited the accrual of interest on the settlement to the period from the date of the entry of summary judgment. Id. at *1. MIC appealed the judgment against it, and Plaintiff cross-appealed, which the Illinois Appellate Court reversed. The Appellate Court noted that the trial court concluded that the parties' settlement for $5.99 million was reasonable and based its finding on evidence from the Defendant's fax broadcast summary that there were 16,674 successful faxes sent and 4,188 failures. The trial court relied heavily on those numbers in calculating Defendant's total exposure under the TCPA and determined that Defendant's decision to settle for nearly $6 million conformed to the standard of a prudent business and that the amount was what a reasonably prudent person in the position of Defendant would have settled for on the merits of Plaintiff's claim. Id. at *19. The Appellate Court noted that the trial court did address the fact that Defendant had two insurance policies at the time the faxes were transmitted, and the total coverage under the policies was $6 million, and the settlement was coincidentally for an amount two cents short of the total coverage. Id. at *21-22. The trial court did not, however, address how any unclaimed money would be distributed through cy pres. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Appellate Court reversed the trial court's order granting summary judgment in Plaintiff's favor and remanded the case to determine the reasonableness of the class action settlement.

(viii) Indiana

LHO Indianapolis One Lessee, LLC v. Bowman, et al.*, 2015 Ind. App. LEXIS 561 (Ind. Ct. App. Aug. 11, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that she and 61 others suffered a personal injury and an sustained economic loss as a result of consuming tainted food at Defendant's Indianapolis Marriott Downtown. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs and others attended the Annual Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority, Inc.'s Central Regional Conference held at the Marriott in Indianapolis, and became violently ill several hours after eating food prepared at the event. Id. at *2. In October 2014, the trial court certified a class finding that Plaintiff satisfied the requirement of Indiana Rule 23(B)(3). On appeal, Defendant disputed that Plaintiff met the requirements of Indiana Rule 23(B)(3). Defendant contended that even if a jury found that food served at the Marriott was contaminated or defective, each claimant would still need to prove that his or her injuries were proximately caused by consumption of that food. Id. at *24. The trial court had concluded that Plaintiff satisfied the predominance requirement as Plaintiff and the class members' claims all derived from a "common nucleus." Id. at *22-23. The Indiana Court of Appeals agreed with Defendant and reversed the trial court's order certifying the class. The Court of Appeals reasoned that, to prevail on Plaintiff's claim, she would not only have to show that Defendant served tainted food, but also that the food was the cause-in-fact of each class member's symptoms and their injuries. Id. at *24-25. Because Plaintiff's list of attendees who fell ill during the conference had included those who had eaten either the lunch or the dinner, and some who had eaten both, and had not specified which dishes the guests chose, the Court of Appeals found that, while Defendant's generic liability could be easily established, the case would become inevitably dominated by the individual issues of the extent and nature of the injuries and the degrees of exposure not suitable for class treatment. Id .at *27-29. The Court of Appeals distinguished between Plaintiff's case and a previous case where it ruled that class action treatment was well suited to cases of food poisoning on a cruise ship or at a nursing home. The Court of Appeals explained that, in those cases, proximate cause was present in a controlled and limited environment and could be determined on a class-wide basis because the cause and consequences of the common disaster were identical for all the members; in contrast, in Plaintiff's case, there was no consistency among the individual class member's dining options and locations. Id. at *27. The Court of Appeals concluded that the questions of law and fact common to the class members did not predominate over the issues affecting the individual members. Id. at *29. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals reversed the trial court's order of class certification, and suggested Plaintiff modify her class definition and the trial court to certify a general liability-only class on remand.

(ix) Iowa

Kragnes, et al. v. City Of Des Moines, Iowa*, 2015 Iowa App. LEXIS 15 (Iowa App. Jan. 14, 2015). In this class action brought against the City of Des Moines alleging that it charged excessive franchise fees that amounted to illegal taxes, the Iowa Court of Appeal upheld the trial court's order to reduce the fees of Plaintiffs' counsel from the request of $15 million to $7 million. In 1960, the City had entered into franchise agreements with its electricity and natural gas providers agreeing that each provider would pay the City a percentage of its gross receipts for their sales to the City. These agreements were then made into ordinances. On May 6, 2004, the then Iowa Governor signed a law phasing out sales and use tax for the sale of gas and electricity for residential use. Facing budget shortfalls, the City updated franchise agreements with its electric and gas providers by increasing franchise fees. Plaintiff then brought a class action on behalf of herself and those similarly-situated arguing that the increased franchise fees were illegal taxes. Ultimately, the trial court – and additional appellate rulings – had determined that the increased fees were illegal taxes, and that the City had to refund approximately $40 million to its taxpayers. Id. at *2. The $40 million was placed into a fund so that it could be remitted to taxpayers after class counsel's fees were removed. Class counsel requested $15 million in fees, or approximately 37% of the fund. Analyzing the factors set forth in Iowa Rule of Civil Procedure 1.275(5) and Iowa Rule of Professional Conduct 32:1.5(a), the trial court had determined that the amount was "not fair to the class members" and that an award of $7 million in fees, or approximately 18% of the fund, was appropriate. Id. at *3. Class counsel appealed the award, claiming that it was unreasonably low. The Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's award. The Court of Appeal first considered whether the trial court erred in considering criteria other than those laid out in the Iowa Rules of Civil Procedure and Rules of Professional Conduct in deciding to reduce class counsel's fee award. Particularly, the Court of Appeal considered whether the trial court's decision to consider the fact that the money used to pay the attorneys' fees and expenses would come from the very residents who had already been wronged in the illegal extraction of franchise fees was an abuse of discretion. Id. at *7. The Court of Appeal found that the trial court had properly considered the factor because the applicable rules did not preclude consideration of additional factors in fixing a fee award. Id. Class counsel argued that he was entitled to the 37% fee because that was the amount stated in contingency fee agreement with the class representative and published to the class. The Court of Appeal, however, rejected the argument, and pointed out that a trial court is not bound by the fee agreements between class counsel and the class representative. Id. at *10. The Court of Appeal noted that "the fact that class counsel and the named parties agreed that attorneys' fees would be calculated on a percentage basis cannot control what approach the [trial] court should use in exercising its inherent power to determine reasonable attorneys' fees to be paid from the common fund." Id. at *11. The Court of Appeal thus upheld the trial court's finding that the attorneys' fees award could be reduced in spite of the agreed upon and published fee arrangement. The Court of Appeal further held that an award of 18% of the $40 million fund was not unreasonable. Given the uniqueness of the litigation, its complexity, magnitude, and the contingent nature of the case, and the results achieved and benefits conferred upon the class, the Court of Appeal concluded that an appropriate and fair attorneys' fee for class counsel would be 18% of the $40 million fund. Id. at *15-17. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's award of reduced attorney fees of $7 million to class counsel.

Mueller, et al. v. Wellmark, Inc.*, 2015 Iowa LEXIS 21 (Iowa Feb. 27, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of chiropractors, brought a class action against Defendant Wellmark Inc. and its affiliates, challenging Wellmark's reimbursement rates and practices for chiropractic services, and sought relief under variety of Iowa insurance statutes. Id. at *2. Wellmark, an Iowa-based health insurer that belonged to the national Blue Cross and Blue Shield ("BCBS") network, had contracted with healthcare providers in Iowa to provide services at certain reimbursement rates. Id. at *1. The trial court had dismissed Plaintiffs' insurance claims, finding no private cause of action was available under those statutes, and granted summary judgment on the antitrust claims based on the state action exemption in the Iowa Competition Law. Id. at *3. The Iowa Supreme Court had previously remanded the case on the basis that the state action exemption did not insulate Defendants' reimbursement rates from antitrust review. Id. at *4. On remand, Plaintiffs stipulated that their antitrust claims rested on the conspiracies between Wellmark and out of state affiliates of BCBS, and between Wellmark and self-funding employers that hired Wellmark to administer their plans, and were being asserted on a per se theory. Id. at *5. Defendants moved for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' per se theory, and the trial court granted the motion. On appeal, the Iowa Supreme Court affirmed. The Supreme Court agreed with the trial court that Wellmark's arrangements with self-insured employers and out-of-state BCBS affiliates were governed by the rule of reason for various reasons. First, the Supreme Court concluded that the arrangements in this case were not naked price fixing-arrangements but were more akin to joint ventures, as the self-insureds were not entering into bare agreements to refrain from competing on price with Wellmark, and were buying administration services from Wellmark. Id. at *14-15. Furthermore, the Supreme Court found that neither of those types of Wellmark arrangements truly represented a horizontal agreement between competitors. Id. at *18. The Supreme Court also determined that the reasoning in North Jackson Pharmacy, Inc. v. Caremark Rx, Inc., 385 F. Supp. 2d 740 (N.D. Ill. 2005), was persuasive, which provided that by negotiating prescription drug reimbursement rates on behalf of 1,200 plan sponsors that Defendant represented, it acted on behalf of what was essentially a cooperative purchasing group; it rejected the pre se categorization, and held that the arrangement was not a naked restraint, but one which was ancillary to a broader venture with precompetitive potential. Id. at *20. The Supreme Court clarified that it was not foreclosing a rule of reason claim against Wellmark if it were shown that anti-competitive consequences of its practices exceeded their pro-competitive benefits; instead, it was merely upholding the trial court's ruling that Wellmark's arrangements with self-insureds and the out-of-state BCBS licensees were not subject to the per se rule. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Supreme Court affirmed the trial court grant's of summary judgment.

(x) Louisiana

Baker, et al. v. PHC-Minden, L.P.,* 2015 La. LEXIS 699 (La. May 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of insured patients, brought putative class actions across Louisiana against Defendants, challenging the legality of Defendants' policy of collecting or attempting to collect the undiscounted rate from the insured if a liability insurer might be liable, and implemented through the filing of medical liens against Plaintiffs' lawsuits and settlements pursuant to the health care provider lien statute. Id. at *1. The trial court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. On appeal, the Louisiana Court of Appeal reversed. Subsequently, the Supreme Court of Louisiana granted certiorari to resolve the issue of whether a class action was the superior method for adjudicating actions brought pursuant to the Health Care Consumer Billing and Disclosure Protection Act ("Balance Billing Act"). After reviewing the record and the applicable law, the Supreme Court found that a class action was superior to any other available method for a fair and efficient adjudication of the common controversy over the disputed billing and lien practices. The Supreme Court pointed out that a "class action certification is purely procedural," and "[w]hat is of primary concern in the certification proceeding is simply whether the Plaintiffs have met the statutory requirements to become a class action, not the merits of the underlying litigation." Id. at *26-27. The Supreme Court noted that, in reversing the class certification order, the Court of Appeal focused upon the merits of the common issue, rather focusing on the procedural device proposed to establish liability and causation. Id. at *27. The Supreme Court explained that the eventual question of the fact-finder was whether or not Defendants' actions violated the Balance Billing Act, and only after the determination of the issues of liability and causation would the trial court have to determine what damages could be awarded under the Balance Billing Act. Id. at *27-28. Thus, according to the Supreme Court, at the center of the case was Defendants' collection policy, and not the individual damages Plaintiffs suffered as a result of the policy. Id. at *34. Therefore, since Plaintiffs met all other requirements for class certification, the Supreme Court concluded that a class action was the superior method for adjudicating the legality of Defendants' collection policy under the Balance Billing Act. Id. at *35. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed the ruling of the Court of Appeal.

(xi) Missouri

Elsea, et al. v. U.S. Engineering Co.*, 2015 Mo. App. LEXIS (Mo. Ct. App. Mar. 17, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action on behalf of individuals exposed to asbestos and sought recovery of compensatory damages for the expense of prospective medical monitoring allegedly necessitated by a defined amount of minimum exposure. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants contracted to perform a retrofit project at the Jackson County Courthouse. Id. at *5. According to Plaintiffs, Defendants disturbed the insulation around the fittings and pipes and caused asbestos dust to blow throughout the courthouse. Id. The trial court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. The trial court reasoned that issues such as actual asbestos exposure – varying and depending upon date, location, and duration of each class member's presence in the courthouse – were individualized issues, making a class action for medical monitoring inordinately difficult and necessitating individual hearings to categorize class members and to address individual issues of exposure, dose, causation, and monitoring protocol. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs sought and received the trial court's permission to file an interlocutory appeal. On appeal, the Missouri Court of Appeals reversed. Plaintiffs principally asserted that the trial court failed to appreciate the uniqueness of a medical monitoring claim for damages as described in Meyer ex rel. Coplin v. Fluor Corp., 220 S.W.3d 712 (Mo. 2007). Id. at *10. In Meyer, the Missouri Supreme Court recognized that a Plaintiff can obtain damages for medical monitoring upon a showing that Plaintiff has a significantly increased risk of contracting a particular disease relative to what would be the case in the absence of exposure. Id. at *13. As to commonality, the Court of Appeals found that the common fact of exposure to a set of toxins from a single source was a common and overriding issue, and the significance and extent of toxic exposure was primarily an issue of common proof. Under Plaintiffs' theory of liability, the individual factors identified by the trial court were not particularly relevant because the need for monitoring was based on a common threshold of exposure. Id. at *19. Similarly, regarding predominance, the Court of Appeals similarly observed that the medical monitoring issue affecting the entire putative class was based upon the common and overriding fact of a threshold level of asbestos exposure caused by a single source, i.e., Defendants' air-handler retrofit project. Id. at *27. Finally, as to superiority, the Court of Appeals noted that the class management concerns identified by the trial court ignored the distinction between a medical monitoring claim and a personal injury claim. Because testing, not treatment, lies at the core of a medical monitoring claim, Plaintiffs need not establish a present physical injury and the concerns identified by the trial court about individualized factors were not relevant. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals reversed the trial court's order denying class certification and remanded the case.

(xii) New Jersey

Barbarino, et al. v. Paramus Ford, Inc.,* 2015 N.J. Super. Unpub. LEXIS 2197 (N.J. Super. App. Div. Sept. 11, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of customers, brought a class action alleging that Defendant entered into automobile lease agreements that violated the New Jersey Truth-in-Consumer Contract, Warranty and Notice Act (the "TCCWNA"). Plaintiffs signed Motor Vehicle Retail Orders ("Orders") that required Plaintiffs to pay sales tax. Plaintiffs paid enumerated sales taxes as required by the Orders and then filed suit alleging violation of the TCCWNA. Defendant moved to dismiss, and the Court granted the motion. At the outset, the Court noted that Plaintiffs' claims concerned the sales and use taxes imposed on vehicle lease transactions. The Court found that the language in Plaintiffs' Orders did not violate the TCCWNA and, therefore, Plaintiffs failed to state a claim. Id. at *7. The Court explained that, at the time Plaintiffs executed the Orders, Plaintiffs were obligated to pay the sales tax on the leased motor vehicles. Id. at *7-8. Plaintiffs did not allege that they suffered any injury as a result of this provision or that it was illegal for Defendant to obligate customers to pay sales, use, or occupational taxes. Id. at *8. Further, the Court noted that Plaintiffs did not assert that they paid taxes that they should not have paid pursuant to New Jersey law governing automobile sales and leases. Id. New Jersey's Sales and Use Tax Act imposed an obligation on customers to pay sales tax applicable to their vehicle lease transactions, and Plaintiffs did not identify the existence of any statute in any jurisdiction that altered this basic obligation. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to state a claim under the TCCWNA and granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Daniels, et al. v. Hollister Co.*, 2015 N.J. Super. LEXIS 77 (N.J. Super. App. Div. May 13, 2015). Plaintiff, a purchaser, brought a class action alleging that one of Defendant's stores refused to honor a gift card although the card contained no expiration date. Customers purchasing at least $75 of merchandise received a $25 gift card for use in Defendant's stores and on its website. Id. at *3. The trial court certified a class comprised of consumers who possessed Defendant's promotional gift cards in hard copy that contained no expiration date and which Defendant issued them as part of the 2009 promotion and voided on or after January 30, 2010; and consumers who discarded such cards because Defendant's store had informed them that the cards expired or had been voided. On Defendant's appeal, the New Jersey Appellate Division affirmed. The class consisted of numerous individuals who allegedly suffered small injuries, and Defendant voided over $3 million worth of $25 gift cards. Id. at *5. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs did not meet the ascertainability requirement and the class certification order violated due process because Defendant would have no ability to test class membership because absent class members would have no opportunity to opt-out, and because the preclusive effect of any judgment would be unknown and unenforceable. Id. at *7. The Appellate Division, however, remarked that Rule 4:32-1 does not require that a class be ascertainable as a condition for certification. Id. Further, the Appellate Division noted that federal case law precedents that found the ascertainability requirement silently residing within Rule 23 so held because they believed this judge-made doctrine eliminates administrative burdens that are incongruous with the efficiencies expected in a class action by insisting on the easy identification of class members; protection of absent class members by facilitating the best notice practicable required by the federal rules; and protection of Defendants by ensuring that those persons who will be bound by the final judgment are clearly identifiable. Id. at *8. The Appellate Division, however, also observed that Shelton v. Bledsoe, 775 F.3d 554, 560 (3d Cir. 2015), held that the ascertainability doctrine is different from the requirement that a class be properly defined, as the Third Circuit recognized held that the question of ascertainability was analyzed separately from the question of whether the class was properly defined. Id. at *8-9. Additionally, the Appellate Division reasoned that the policy at the very core of the class action mechanism was the desire to overcome the problem that small recoveries do not provide the incentive for any individual to bring an individual action prosecuting his or her rights and the mechanism solves this problem by aggregating the relatively paltry potential recoveries into something worth someone's labor. Id. at *11. The Appellate Division remarked that ascertainability, as defined by Defendant, was particularly misguided when applied to a case where any difficulties encountered in identifying class members are a consequence of a Defendant's own acts or omissions. Id. at *13-14. Here, if Defendant had obtained the identities of consumers when giving out the gift cards, it would not have been faced with the problems it now offered as grounds for blocking class certification. Finally, the Appellate Division noted that consumers could have purchased more than $75 of Defendant's merchandise because of the lure of a $25 gift card, and Defendant took away this bargain by unilateral cancellation of the gift card at a later date. The Appellate Division opined that the class action device was created to allow compensation for such small wrongs and also to deter future wrong-doing in the marketplace. Accordingly, the Appellate Division affirmed the grant of class certification.

(xiii) New York

Abbo-Bradley, et al. v. City Of Niagara Falls,* 2015 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 7072 (N.Y. App. Div. Oct. 2, 2015). In this class action filed by Plaintiffs, as parents and natural guardians of their children, the New York Appellate Division affirmed in the trial court's dismissal of the complaint. Plaintiffs brought an action to recover damages for personal injuries and property damage allegedly caused by Defendants' failure to properly remediate toxic contamination at the Love Canal Site ("landfill remediation") and the sewers in the Love Canal corridor ("sewer project") and release of toxins. Id. at *3. Several Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint, and the trial court granted the motions as to claims seeking damages resulting from the landfill remediation and sewer project, but denied them as to release of toxins. Id. at *3-4. On the parties' cross-appeal, the Appellate Division allowed both the appeals and affirmed in part and reversed in part. The Appellate Division agreed with Defendants that the trial court erred in denying the motions because Plaintiffs' children lacked an ownership or possessory interest in the respective properties. Id. at *5. The Appellate Division therefore modified the order accordingly. The Appellate Division also agreed with Plaintiffs that the trial court erred in dismissing claims of negligence, abnormally dangerous activity, private nuisance, and trespass, insofar as they sought damages related to the landfill remediation and sewer project, on the ground that those claims were barred by judicial estoppel. Id. The Appellate Division therefore modified the orders as to those claims too.

City Trading Fund, et al. v. Howard,* Case No. 651668/2014 (N.Y. Super. Ct. Jan. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of investors, brought a putative class action alleging inadequacies in the disclosures provided by Defendant Martin Marietta Materials, Inc. ("MMM") to its shareholders in connection with its proposed acquisition of Defendant Texas Industries, Inc. ("TXI"). Id. at 2. On March 3, 2014, MMM filed a preliminary proxy with the U.S. Securities Exchange Commission that contained disclosures about the merger, and the definitive proxy, filed on May 30, 2014, included a copy of the notice sent to the shareholders of MMM and TXI notifying them that meetings to vote on the merger would be held on June 30, 2014. Id. at 5. Plaintiffs commenced this action the same day the definitive proxy was filed, and averred that the definitive proxy suffered from ten categories of inadequate disclosures, including that MMM's advisors did not show the work behind their analysis of their EBITDA projections. Id. at 5-9. Plaintiffs also sought details of the substance of the board's discussions leading up to the merger, and wanted specific information concerning MMM's three financial advisors, including the exact amount of fees JP Morgan charged one of TXI's institutional shareholders for providing banking services not related to the merger and the value of each financial advisor's postions in TXI securities. Id. Before the Court could rule on the issues, however, the parties entered into settlement, and moved for preliminary approval of the settlement. Under the terms of the settlement, Defendants agreed to make certain supplemental disclosures to the shareholders in exchange for a limited release pertaining to claims regarding inadequate disclosures. Id. at 16. The Court denied approval to the settlement, finding that Plaintiffs and their counsel, the Brualdi Law Firm PC, engaged in "pernicious" litigation simply to extract legal fees. Id. The Court examined each of the ten categories of allegedly inadequate disclosures set forth in the complaint, and found that none of them were material. The Court noted that Plaintiffs had not explained why or how the requested information would be used by a shareholder to decide the reasonableness of the merger, and the requested disclosures were even less material than the backup for the banks' analysis, as they pertained to pre-merger agreement discussions. Id. at 10-14. The Court further found that nothing in the supplemental disclosures explained to the shareholders why the information was material, or significantly altered the information made available earlier. Id. at 18-21. The Court ruled that the merger-related disclosures demanded by Plaintiffs to affect settlement were trivial and a proposed $500,000 legal fees for the Brualdi firm appeared to the true reason for the lawsuit. The Court found it significant that the two individual Plaintiffs, Lawrence Bass and Anthony Carulla, who owned only 10 shares of MMM prior to the merger agreement, had filed at least 13 lawsuits for the sole purpose of bringing stockholder lawsuits. Id. at 14-15. In sum, the Court did not believe that Plaintiffs filed this class action because they had genuine concern for the company's corporate governance. Id. at 35. Under the given circumstances, the Court opined that approving the settlement would both undermine the public interest and the interests of MMM's shareholders, and it would incentivize Plaintiffs to file frivolous disclosures lawsuits. Id. at 33. The Court therefore denied settlement approval and ordered Defendants to file a motion to dismiss or to answer the suit within 30 days.

Grunewald, et al. v. The Metropolitan Museum Of Art,* 2015 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 987 (N.Y. App. Div. Feb. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, members of the public, brought two separate class actions to challenge a policy by Defendant the Metropolitan Museum of Art ("MMA"), in place since 1970, to have all visitors at all times pay an entrance fee. Prior to 1970, MMA entry was free to all visitors, at least on certain days and times. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs alleged that they had to pay for tickets to enter the museum on days and at times that admission should have been free. Plaintiffs alleged that MMA's policy of charging an entry fee violated certain legislation and the lease by which MMA occupied its location in Central Park. Defendants moved to dismiss, asserting that Plaintiffs lacked standing to pursue their claims. The trial court granted Defendants' motions to dismiss. Id. On appeal, the New York Appellate Division affirmed. The Appellate Division found that Plaintiffs lacked standing to sue under the 1893 statute. The statute authorized the Department of Public Parks in the City of New York to apply for up to an additional $70,000 of funds to keep, preserve, and exhibit the collections in the MMA. Id. at *2. As an express condition of the authorization, the statute required MMA to be free of charge five days a week, including Sunday and two evenings per week. Id. The Appellate Division found, however, that the statute provided no express or implied private right of action. Id. Although the Parks Department's authority to apply for the additional appropriations for MMA was expressly conditioned upon free admission, Plaintiffs did not request revocation of the Parks Department's authorization to seek additional funds, but only to enforce the condition for that authority. The Appellate Division held that no private remedy to enforce only the conditional portion of the statute was fairly implied, nor would a private right of action to enforce only the condition be consistent with the mechanism of the statute. Id. at *3. Second, the Appellate Division held that Plaintiffs lacked standing to sue under the MMA's lease with the City as third-party beneficiaries because the benefit to them was incidental and not direct. It noted that, although government contracts often confer benefits to the public at large, that is not a sufficient basis in itself to infer the government's intention to make any particular member of the public a third-party beneficiary entitled to sue on such contract. Id. at *3-4. The Appellate Division found that, for the benefit to be direct, it must be primary and immediate in such a sense and to such a degree as to demonstrate the assumption of a duty to provide a direct remedy to the individual members of the public if the benefit is lost. Id. at *4. Here, neither the language of the lease nor any other circumstances indicated that the parties intended to give Plaintiffs individually enforceable rights. Accordingly, the Appellate Division affirmed the dismissal.

In Re Matter Of Medical Action Industries, Inc. Shareholders Litigation*, 2015 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 699 (N.Y. Super. Ct. Feb. 25, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of shareholders, brought an action alleging breaches of fiduciary duty as well as aiding and abetting thereof in connection with Owens & Minor, Inc.'s buyout of Medical Action Industries, Inc. After parties entered into a settlement stipulation, Plaintiffs' counsel moved for attorneys' fees in connection with the asserted substantial benefit they achieved for the Medical Action public shareholders because of their actions in causing valuable supplemental disclosures in connection with Defendant's issuance of a Form 8-K, following their application for injunctive relief but prior to the requisite shareholder vote on the merger. Id. at 2. The Court granted the motion. The Court noted that in New York, attorneys' fees are merely an incident of litigation and are not recoverable absent a specific contractual provision or statutory authority. Id. at 4. Here, the stipulation set forth a process whereby the parties decided to avoid the expense of continued litigation and at the same time permit Plaintiffs' counsel to make a request for attorneys' fees. Further, Defendant had reserved their right to challenge the reasonableness of the request and, in that context, whether or not Plaintiffs' counsel had achieved any benefit, substantial or otherwise, in being a causative factor in Medical Action's filing of the 8-K Form with the SEC. The next issue was whether the actions taken by Plaintiffs achieved a substantial benefit for the stockholders or the corporation. The Court observed that a shareholder whose acts result in a substantial benefit to the corporate entity is entitled to recovery of his costs and expenses, and that the term "substantial benefit" requires demonstration, and must actually accomplish a result that corrects a wrong that would interfere with the protection of essential rights of the shareholders. Id. at 7. The Court agreed with Defendant that there was no disclosure of assurances of future employment; rather, the supplemental disclosure set forth that each prospective bidder was asked to provide information regarding its intentions to retain the company's management and employees. Id. at 17-18. Further, while Defendant averred that disclosure of the relative antitrust risk of the three bidders was irrelevant as no monetary value was assigned to the same, the Court agreed with Plaintiffs that this was a marginally material disclosure as it set forth that the Board had in fact determined that it considered that Owens & Minors offer was indeed less risky and less likely to involve the need for divestiture and/or delay than the competing offers. Id. at 19. Further, the supplemental disclosure that the competing bidders were entitled to seek and that the company was entitled to grant a waiver of the standstill agreement and, if granted, would allow the competitive bidders to make a superior offer coupled with the fact that neither had done so as of the date of the disclosure was significant. Id. at 20. The Court opined that such disclosure permitted the shareholders to consider in the relative mix of whether the offer to be voted on maximized the value of their shares, and that the initial disclosures were not clear on this particular point. Accordingly, the Court opined that while only some of the additional disclosures that the parties stipulated were due to the commencement of this litigation, they were somewhat material and conferred a benefit upon the stockholders by providing a heightened level of corporate disclosure. Further, the Court remarked that the material disclosed was settled both at an early stage of the litigation and before class certification. Id. at 24. Considering the contingent nature of the case and the time limitations imposed, and because Plaintiffs' counsel pursued this litigation in a diligent and competent manner, the Court awarded attorneys' fees and expenses in the amount of $250,000 to Plaintiffs' counsel.

Jiannaras, et al. v. Alfant,* 2015 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 311 (N.Y. App. Div. Jan. 14, 2015). Plaintiff, on behalf of himself and other shareholders of Defendant On2 Technologies, Inc., brought a class action alleging that On2's board of directors breached its fiduciary duties to the shareholders by failing to ensure that the shareholders receive maximum value for their shares when it merged with Google and Oxide, Inc. Pursuant to the merger, Google had agreed to acquire each share of On2 common stock in exchange for 60 cents worth of Google Class A common stock, and at that time, the proposed transaction was valued at approximately $106.5 million. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants made materially misleading disclosures about the merger negotiations and merger terms in the initially preliminary proxy statement/prospectus. In 2009, other shareholders of On2 commenced similar actions in the Delaware Court of Chancery, and in 2010, the parties, including the Delaware Plaintiffs, proposed a settlement pursuant to which they agreed that the instant action could be maintained as a non-opt out class action. Id. at *2-3. The settlement also provided for dismissal of the actions in their entirety and a release of "any and all" merger-related claims. Id. at *3. Upon notice of the proposed settlement, 226 of the shareholders filed objections. The objectors contended that the proposed settlement contained "an astonishingly broad" release that would "unlawfully restrict" and "unduly burden" the rights of shareholders to pursue their own individual claims for damages. Id. After a fairness hearing, the trial court denied approval of the settlement, reasoning that it did not afford non-resident class members the opportunity to opt-out of the settlement in order to preserve their right to assert claims for damages. Id. The Delaware Appellate Court affirmed the trial court's order. The Appellate Court found that the trial court had providently exercised its discretion in declining to approve the subject proposed settlement that would have extinguished the right of out-of-state class members to litigate damage claims without giving them the opportunity to opt-out of the class. Id. at *8. The Appellate Court cited to and discussed Matter of Colt Industries Shareholder Litigation, 77 N.Y.2d 185 (1991), which considered whether a class action complaint demanding predominantly equitable relief required class members to be given an opportunity to opt-out. Matter of Colt had stated that, while the settlement at issue there afforded class members relief that was essentially equitable in nature, it "exacted as a price" for that relief a concession that the class members could not pursue damage claims based on the corporate merger that was the subject of that proceeding, and had thus held that the trial court erred in approving a settlement that purported to extinguish the rights of out-of-state class members to litigate damages claims, without giving them a chance to opt-out of the class. Id. at *6-7. Matter of Colt also had emphasized that the mere fact that the relief initially demanded was largely equitable should not permit a trial court to bind litigants to a settlement that eliminated constitutionally protected property interests without due process. Id. at *7. The Appellate Division found Matter of Colt analogous to the instant case and controlling. The settlement agreement at issue here impinged upon a distinct right, namely the right to pursue a claim for damages. The Appellate Division therefore affirmed the trial court's order rejecting the proposed settlement.

Osarczuk, et al. v. Associated Universities, Inc.,* 2015 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 5511 (N.Y. App. Div. July 1, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action to recover damages for personal injuries and injury to property allegedly resulting from Brookhaven National Laboratory's ("BNL") emission of hazardous and toxic substances into the air, soil, and groundwater over decades. The trial court granted Plaintiffs' renewed motion for certification and certified two sub-classes. On Defendant's appeal, the New York Appellate Division reversed a portion of the certification order and denied Plaintiffs' renewed motion for class action certification. Thereafter, Plaintiffs and 167 proposed class members (collectively "Appellants") moved for leave to allow those 167 proposed class members to intervene in the action as Plaintiffs, arguing that when a class action is decertified, putative members of the decertified class are given the opportunity to intervene into the case because of their allegations of common questions of law and fact. Id. at 4. Appellants alleged that the proposed interveners owned property in the vicinity of BNL, and presented common questions of law and fact with respect to loss of property values, and the cost of using municipal water instead of well water. Id. The trial court denied the motion, holding that the intervention of 167 Plaintiffs would further delay this matter, unduly complicate the litigation, and prejudice Defendant in having to defend against a plethora of new claims. On further appeal, the Appellate Division reversed. The Appellate Division noted that the causes of action of the proposed interveners were all based upon common theories of liability, and thus satisfied the requirement of CPLR § 1013 that their causes of action involved common questions of law or fact. Contrary to the trial court's conclusion, the Appellate Division remarked that BNL would not be faced with a plethora of new claims, and that BNL did not demonstrate that intervention would substantially prejudice any party or cause undue delay. The Appellate Division also determined that the claims of the proposed interveners were not time-barred as under CPLR § 214-c, the statute of limitations applicable to the toxic tort action, which is the three-year that runs from the date of discovery or the date when the injury should have been discovered through the exercise of due diligence. Id. at 6-7. Further, the Appellate Division observed that New York case law had adopted the federal class action rule, under which commencement of a class action suit tolls the running of the statute of limitations for all purported members of the class who make timely motions to intervene after the trial court has found the suit inappropriate for class action status. Id. at 7. Thus, the Appellate Division opined that the claims of the proposed interveners were not time-barred at the time the motion for leave to intervene was made. Accordingly, the Appellate Division reversed the trial court's order denying the motion to intervene.

Robinson, et al. v. City Of New York*, Case No. 151679/2014 (N.Y. Super. Ct. April 20, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendants' property tax classification system favored residential owners over its primarily African-American and Hispanic renters, in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, the Fair Housing Act ("FHA"), and 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Defendants divided residential properties into two classes: class one consisted of one, two, and three family homes, and class two was all other residential properties. Defendants further sub-divided class two into condominiums and cooperatives, rental buildings with fewer than 11 units, and rental buildings with 11 or more units. Id. at 1-2. Plaintiffs sought to represent a class of Hispanic and African-American residents of New York rental properties consisting of eleven or more units. Plaintiffs alleged that although class one properties had nearly twice the market values of class two properties, in 2013 class one properties paid only 15.5% of Defendants' real property tax, while class two properties paid 37%. Id. at 2. Further, Plaintiffs alleged that the favorable tax treatment given to class one properties was off-set by imposing exceedingly harsh treatment to the residential properties in class two. In addition, Plaintiffs alleged that Hispanic and African-American renters absorbed a higher tax burden through their rent payments than Whites and Asians because they were more likely to live in rental buildings that received unfavorable tax treatment. Thus, Plaintiffs alleged approximately 30% of a tenant's rental payment was attributable to the landlord's property tax. Id. Defendants moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' complaint, which the Court granted. First, the Court found that Plaintiffs had no standing to bring the action because they had failed to show that they were suffering any actual harm; Plaintiffs could only speculate that a portion of their rent was for their landlords' taxes, but they alleged no facts showing that their rents would be lower under a different tax scheme. Id. Moreover, there was no allegation showing that the tax plan in effect had a disparate or disproportionate impact on Plaintiffs based on race or ethnicity. Id. Significantly, the Court pointed out that in arguing that 30% of their rent went to taxes, Plaintiffs demonstrated that they had no standing because there was no allegation that they had a contractual obligation to pay their respective landlord's tax bill, or that they paid the entire bill. Id. The Court remarked that even if Plaintiffs had standing to maintain the action, the complaint must be dismissed for failure to state a cause of action because the complaint did not allege that the owners denied housing to Plaintiffs or any member of the purported class, or the tax plan compelled them to live in a racially or ethnically segregated neighborhood. Id. at 3. Finally, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' claim failed to state a cause of action under the FHA because Defendants were not involved in the sale or rental of a dwelling or in the provision of services or facilities in connection with one. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Sachs, et al. v. Matano*, 2015 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 3846 (N.Y. Super. Ct. Oct. 28, 2015). Plaintiff, a patient, brought a medical malpractice action alleging that Dr. Richard Matano negligently treated his diabetic foot ulcer at St. Francis Hospital. Plaintiff established a website on GoDaddy.com entitled "Matano Kills?" whereby he sought other patients for a class action malpractice suit by comparing Matano to the notorious Nazi doctor, Joseph Mengele, and asserted that he was anti-sematic. Id. at *1. Plaintiff also claimed that Matano was stubborn, would act like a mule, and discriminate if a person was "not Italian with a Mercedes Benz." Id. Further, Plaintiff also posted pictures of Matano's family on the website. Defendant moved for a preliminary injunction compelling GoDaddy.com and Plaintiff to remove the website and to enjoin Plaintiff from posting any further defamatory content concerning Defendant. The Court granted the motion. The Court agreed with Defendant that the statements published by Plaintiff were defamatory and designed to injure Defendant's reputation and business. The Court noted that many statements that might otherwise be considered defamatory may be protected by a qualified privilege, and that a privileged statement is one, which, but for the occasion on which it is uttered, would be defamatory and actionable. Id. at *3. Further, the Court observed that a qualified privilege is conditioned on its proper exercise and cannot shelter statements published with malice or with knowledge of their falsity or reckless disregard as to their truth or falsity. Id. Here, the website at issue was not one through which Plaintiff sought other individuals similarly-situated that could have been injured by an alleged malpractice in order to establish a class action. Rather, the website was couched in terms designed to irreparably damage the reputation and business of Defendant. The Court opined that the comparison of Matano to the Nazi doctor, Josef Mengele, and bald conclusory claims of anti-semitism and "Matano-Kills" was not a protected by a qualified privilege, but rather bald reckless assertions in disregard of the truth. Id. at *4. Because the tone of Plaintiff's statements and the statements themselves were designed to injure Defendant's reputation and business, the Court held that Plaintiff did not have a qualified privilege to make those statements.

Spence, et al. v. Miller, As Director Of The NY State Office Of Information Technology Services,* Case No. 3901-15 (N.Y. Super. Ct. Aug. 13, 2015). The Professional Employees Federation ("PEF") filed an improper practice charge with the Public Employment Relations Board ("PERB") challenging the Office of Information Technology Services' ("ITS") implementation of fingerprinting and background checks of existing ITS employees as a violation of the New York Civil Service Law. Id. at 2. The PERB issued a notice of sufficient showing, in which it agreed that an injunction was required to prevent irreparable harm. The PEF, therefore, petitioned for a preliminary injunction asserting that ITS engaged in an improper practice by failing to bargain in good faith over the fingerprinting and background issue. Id. at 2-3. The Court granted the preliminary injunction. The Court rejected ITS' argument that the statutes required employees with access to the computer servers maintained by ITS to undergo background checks. The Court found no public policy pronouncement, in the statute or otherwise, that required all ITS employees to be subjected to fingerprinting and background checks. Id. at 4. ITS argued that fingerprinting and background checks of all employees was mission-related and should be subjected to a balancing test in which the competing interest of the employer in managing its affairs was weighed against the bargaining unit members' right to negotiate the terms and conditions of employment. Id. The Court found that given the strong presumption in favor of collective bargaining and the fact that ITS operated for a number of years without fingerprinting all employees, there was at least reasonable cause to believe that ITS' failure to bargain over the issue was a violation of the Civil Service Law. Id. at 5. Because the employer would be able to obtain and use sensitive personal information regarding certain employees unless the practice was enjoined pending a final determination by PERB, the Court enjoined ITS from the implementation of fingerprinting and background checks of its employees, excluding new employees and those who consented. Id. at 6. Accordingly, the Court granted the preliminary injunction.

Weinstein, et al. v. Jenny Craig Operations, Inc.*, 2015 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 7287 (N.Y. App. Div. Oct. 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of non-managerial employees at Defendant's weight loss centers, brought an action alleging that center directors changed their timecards to reflect a 30 minute lunch break during their shift when they had worked through the break. The trial court denied Defendant's motion to exclude all employees who had signed arbitration agreements containing class action waivers after this litigation was commenced. Id. at *1. On appeal, the New York Appellate Division reversed the order in part. Defendant asserted that it initiated a change in its arbitration agreements to include class action waivers on the same day Plaintiffs filed this action because it was responding to the decision in AT&T Mobility LLC v. Concepcion, 563 U.S. 333 (2011), which held that the FAA preempts all state laws that hold that class action waivers with employees are unconscionable. Id. at *2. Further, Defendant argued that it was unaware of the litigation, which was filed with the New York Secretary of State and was not served on Defendant until 17 days after commencement of the action. Id. Defendant implemented the new arbitration agreement on the very day Plaintiff commenced the litigation, and then it started execution of these agreements the next day. Defendant continued having putative class member employees sign the arbitration agreements, without informing them of the existence of this class action or of their right to join this class action. The Appellate Division opined that the trial court properly exercised its discretion by drawing the inference that Defendant had implemented the agreements in response to this action and to preclude putative class members. Therefore, the Appellate Division found that the trial court properly declined to enforce those agreements signed after commencement of this litigation. Id. The Appellate Division, however, remarked that the trial court improperly refused to enforce the arbitration agreements signed by those employees whom Defendant hired after Plaintiffs commenced this litigation. Because these employees were not part of the putative class, as they had not yet worked for Defendant, the Appellate Division concluded that preclusion of the enforcement of the arbitration agreements should not have applied to these employees. Id. at *3.

Westfall, et al. v. Olean General Hospital*, 2015 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 7439 (N.Y. App. Div. Oct. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of patients who received insulin injections while at Olean General Hospital, brought a class action for negligence, malpractice, and loss of consortium after Defendant informed them of the possibility that insulin pens were shared by more than one patient. Id. at *1. When Defendant notified Plaintiffs of the lapse, it also offered free and confidential testing for hepatitis B, hepatitis C and HIV. The trial court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, and on Plaintiffs' appeal, the New York Appellate Division affirmed. The Appellate Division observed that a prerequisite for recovery is proof of actual exposure to the blood-borne disease. Here, however, no Plaintiff had tested positive for the blood-borne disease to which he or she allegedly was exposed as a result of Defendant's negligence. Id. at *2. Further, the Appellate Division noted that the issue of actual exposure would require individualized determinations with respect to each Plaintiff. It reasoned that even if the proposed class members could establish such actual exposure, the extent of the damages resulting therefrom was a question requiring individual investigation and separate proof as to each individual claim. Thus, because common issues did not predominate over individual issues, the Appellate Division affirmed the denial of class certification.

Zeitlin, et al. v. New York Islanders Hockey Club, L.P.,* Case No. 2484/15 (N.Y. Super. Ct. July 1, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant engaged in false and deceptive business practices by failing to disclose to Plaintiffs and other class members that hockey playoff ticket purchasers would be charged a playoff premium. Of the 449 fans who purchased the ticket package, 119 purchasers overpaid for the package based upon the value of the tickets they ultimately received. Defendant offered refunds, and all but eight of the 119 overpaying customers, excluding the two named Plaintiffs, had accepted the refund offer. Id. at 1. Defendants then served Plaintiffs an offer of compromise pursuant to § 3221 of the New York CPLR. Plaintiffs did not accept the offer within the 10-day statutory acceptance period. Id. Defendant moved to compel Plaintiffs to accept its compromise offer and for dismissal of the complaint pursuant to § 3221(a) of the CPLR. The Court granted the motion in part. The Court found that although § 3221 encourages settlement, it does not permit a judge to affirmatively compel a Plaintiff to accept a statutory offer of compromise. Id. at 2. To the contrary, § 3221 only authorizes a Court to impose costs of litigation on the non-accepting party in the absence of obtaining a more favorable judgment. Second, the Court found that an unaccepted offer did not moot Plaintiffs' action, since Defendant's contention that a separate dismissal remedy existed based on mootness concepts arguably conflicted with the remedy provisions of § 3221 (a statute that deals directly with settlement offers and which expressly limits the consequences of rejecting a compromise offer to the imposition of costs). Id.

The Court remarked that although New York case law precedents have applied the mootness doctrine in a variety of contexts, albeit with contexts factually dissimilar from that involved in this action, Defendant failed to cite to any New York state appellate authorities holding that a judge can dismiss an action because a Plaintiff has rejected a proposed § 3221 compromise offer. Id. Moreover, the Court noted that Plaintiffs raised statutory claims that could potentially authorize a damage award in excess of Defendant's offer. Thus, the Court found that at that early stage of the litigation, it could not definitively assess the merits of Plaintiffs claims. Id. The Court, however, held that since fewer than ten claimants remained in the proposed class, Plaintiffs could not meet the class action numerosity requirements. Id. at 3. Because the potential class members were less than 40, the threshold number for impracticability of joinder, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' class claims.

(xiv) North Carolina

In Re Pike Corp. Shareholder Litigation*, 2015 NCBC 90 (N.C. Super. Ct. Oct. 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former shareholders of Defendant, brought a class action alleging that Defendant breached and aided and abetted breaches of fiduciary duties in connection with its merger agreement with Pioneer Parent, Inc. ("Pioneer Parent"), an affiliate of Court Square Capital Partners. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that members of Defendant's Board of Directors omitted substantial, material information from the preliminary proxy statement and made misleading disclosures, which led to an inadequate merger consideration. Id. at 3. The parties eventually reached an agreement in principle to resolve all claims and executed a stipulation and agreement of compromise. Consistent with the agreement, Defendant made supplemental disclosures by filing forms with the U.S. Securities & Exchange Commission, and the shareholders approved a merger by vote. Id. After considering evidence and factors regarding the fairness and adequacy of relief obtained on behalf of the settlement class, the form of the release and the preservation of any appraisal remedy, the Court concluded that the settlement was in the best interest of the class, and was fair, reasonable, and adequate. Id. at 4. Plaintiffs' counsel then requested an aggregate award of $550,000 in attorneys' fees, which included reimbursement for expenses. Id. Because Defendants agreed not to contest an award of up to $275,000, they claimed that the Court should not award any greater amount. Id. The Court, however, reviewed the fairness and reasonableness of Plaintiffs' requested fee and determined that the requested aggregate award of $550,000 was reasonable and not clearly excessive. The Court determined that the aggregate requested award equated to roughly $550 per hour for partner hours of lead counsel, $375 per hour for partner hours of other counsel, and $250 per hour for associate time, and these hourly fees were within the range that the Court had found to be reasonable for complex business litigation in North Carolina. Id. at 9. Further, the Court noted that Plaintiffs' counsel had devoted 1394.60 hours to prosecuting the claims, not including appearances at the fairness hearing, and adequately established that the hours were spent efficiently, at the direction of lead counsel, without unnecessary duplication of effort. Id. at 12. Defendant argued that the fee award should be discounted because the relief obtained for the class included only disclosures without monetary relief. The Court rejected Defendant's argument, pointing out that it was granting no incentive over normal rates to reflect extraordinary success or to account for the contingent nature of the engagement, and reasoning that the particular supplemental disclosures that the class obtained were sufficiently material and substantial to justify the recovery of fees calculated at normal hourly billing rates. Id. at 13. According to the Court, a significant fee award was justified in this action in light of the particular supplemental disclosures obtained, together with the fact that the release did not preclude the appraisal remedy that North Carolina favors when a shareholder challenges the prices of a transaction. Id. at 14. Accordingly, the Court granted final approval to the settlement and awarded attorneys' fees to Plaintiffs' counsel in the amount of $550,000.

Raul, et al. v. Burke,* 2015 NCBC LEXIS 93 (N.C. Super. Ct. Oct. 8, 2015). Plaintiff, a stock holder, filed a derivative and class action complaint against Defendant Swisher Hygiene Inc.'s ("Swisher") Board of Directors for breaches of fiduciary duty arising out of Defendants' decision to sell all of the asstes of Swisher's U.S. operations to Defendant Ecolab Inc. for $40 million, which Plaintiff claimed was at an unfair price. Plaintiff filed a motion for expedited proceedings, which the Court denied. At the outset, the Court noted that to evaluate the request for expedited proceedings, it must balance the potential need for supplemental shareholder disclosures versus the potential shareholder loss if the underlying transaction was adversely affected. Id. at *7. The Court also observed that it must analyze whether the timeliness and manner by which Plaintiff had pursued the litigation was consistent with the exigencies offered in support of expedition. Id. Swisher issued a press release annoucning the intended transaction on August 13, 2015, and filed its Schedule 14A Definitive Proxy ("Proxy") on September 3, 2015, which reflected that Swisher would hold a shareholder vote to approve the transaction at its annual meeting on October 15, 2015. Id. at *4. Plaintiff did not file a motion for preliminary injunction. The complaint included allegations that were typical to those made during challenges to mergers and acquisitions, but also included specific allegations of failure to disclosure information that Plaintiff contended was both material and omitted from the Proxy. Id. at *5. Defendants countered that they could not be required to disclose what they did not or could not know relative to statements in the Proxy that Defendants were not capable of quantifying those liabilities and expenses or providing a reliable estimate of any distribution that might be made to shareholders. Id. at *6. Defendants further contended that Swisher's shareholders would suffer potential harm if the shareholder vote was not allowed to proceed as scheduled. Id. at *7. The Court opined that the Proxy made it clear that Swisher's directors were recommending the transaction because of its continuing recurring losses. Id. at *8. The Proxy advised shareholders clearly that they were being asked to approve a transaction that provided no assurance of a cash benefit to shareholders in return. Id. They were also clearly advised that Swisher may not be able to maintain any of its value if the transaction is not completed. Id. The Court remarked that with this awareness of the obvious uncertainty surrounding the results of the transaction, the shareholders were free to vote for or against it. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that it was not persuaded that imposing the burden of expedited proceedings or forcing a delay of the shareholder meeting to complete discovery and allow for a possible injunction hearing would be appropriate under the particular circumstances of this case. Id.

(xv) North Dakota

Baker, et al. v. Autos, Inc.*, 2015 N.Dak. LEXIS (N.Dak. Mar. 24, 2015). Plaintiff, borrower, brought a class action alleging that Defendants unlawfully failed to include a loan fee and document administration fee in their finance charges, and that when added the rate of interest exceeded the maximum rate allowed by North Dakota law. Plaintiff purchased an automobile from Defendants, and financed the purchase by trading in her old vehicle. Id. at *2. When Plaintiff failed to make monthly payments, her vehicle was repossessed, and she filed an action challenging the lending practices. Id. Defendants removed the action to federal court, and it was remanded to the state trial court. Plaintiff then moved for class certification, which the trial court denied. On appeal, the North Dakota Supreme Court reversed and remanded. The Supreme Court observed that although Plaintiffs' putative class of vehicle purchasers included numerous contracts containing various prices and conditions, the overarching and unifying attribute common to the contract concerned the "loan fee," the "document administration fee," the "late fee," and whether the amount or nature of each fee violated state usury law or the Retail Installment Sales Act ("RISA"). Id. at *16-17. The Supreme Court explained that each putative Plaintiff signed the same standard form contract, albeit with varying price terms for each respective vehicle. Id. at *17. Given the common characteristics in the "loan fee," the "document administration fee," the "late fee," and whether the amount or nature of each fee violated state usury or the RISA, the Supreme Court concluded that there was a common nucleus of operative legal issues common to Plaintiff and the putative class. Id. at *17-18. The Supreme Court remarked that although there was evidence indicating that not all purchasers were charged a "loan fee," the "document administration fee," or the "late fee," it did not defeat commonality. Id. The Supreme Court found that the proposed class were all charged loan fees, were subject to unlawful late fee provisions, and endured incomplete or inaccurate disclosures. Id. Accordingly, the Supreme Court held that the common issues predominated over individual ones, and reversed and remanded the case.

(xvi) Ohio

Felix, et al. v. Ganley Chevrolet, Inc.,* 2015 Ohio LEXIS 2113 (Ohio Aug. 27, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of customers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, a car dealership, violated the Ohio Consumer Sales Practices Act ("OCSPA") by requiring customers to agree to an unenforceable arbitration provision. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant offered financing at 0% interest to encourage them to purchase a vehicle. The purchase contract stated that it was "not binding unless accepted by seller and credit is approved, if applicable, by [a] financial institution," and included a clause requiring resolution of any dispute through binding arbitration. Id. at *2-3. A few days after their purchases, Defendant informed Plaintiffs that the financial institution would only approve a higher 1.9% interest rate for the loan. Id. at *3. When Plaintiffs reluctantly accepted that rate, Defendants, however, later informed them that they could get a 9% interest loan from a bank. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs rejected the offer, and filed this action alleging that Defendant's practices related to the arbitration clause violated the OCSPA and that Defendant committed unfair and deceptive consumer sales practices. Id. Proposing a class of all consumers of vehicles from any of Defendant's companies, within the two year period preceding commencement of action and who signed a purchase agreement containing the arbitration clause or anything substantially similar to it, Plaintiffs sought declaratory judgment that the clause was unconscionable. Id. at *6-8. The trial court certified the class, determining that Defendant's arbitration provision violated the OCSPA, and awarded $200 to each class member. Id. at *8. Upon Defendant's appeal, the Ohio Court of Appeals for the Eighth District upheld the class certification order, rejecting Defendant's argument that the class definition and timeframe were overbroad. Id. at *10. The Court of Appeals also concluded that the damages award was beyond its scope of review. Id. Defendant then appealed to the Ohio Supreme Court, arguing that the class should not have been certified because, by definition, it included individuals who had not sustained any actual damages as a result of the inclusion of the arbitration clause. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed. The Supreme Court noted that the OCSPA provides for statutory and treble damages only in individual actions but not in class actions, and that proof of actual damages is required before a trial court may properly certify a class action. Id. at *13-14. According to the Supreme Court, this requirement of the OCSPA was consistent with various other state consumer protection statutes, which require aggrieved consumers to plead and prove actual damages, and consistent with the requirement that trial courts give more careful consideration in the class certification process. Id. at *14-15. Although Plaintiffs at the class certification stage do not need to demonstrate through common evidence the precise amount of damages incurred by each class member, the Supreme Court held that they must adduce common evidence that shows that all class members suffered some injury. Id. at *17. Plaintiffs' class, as certified, failed this requirement because there was no showing that all class members suffered an injury-in-fact. The Supreme Court noted that the broadly defined class encompassed consumers who purchased a vehicle from Defendant through a purchase contract that contained the unconscionable arbitration provision, but there was no showing that all of the consumers who purchased vehicles through a contract with the offensive arbitration provision were injured by it or suffered any damages. Id. at *19. The Supreme Court therefore reversed the Court of Appeal's order and remanded the action to the trial court for proceedings consistent with the determination that actual damages must be shown in class action litigation based on the OCSPA.

(xvii) Oregon

Pearson, et al. v. Philip Morris, Inc.,* 2015 Ore. LEXIS 752 (Ore. Oct. 22, 2015). Plaintiffs, two individuals, brought an action alleging that Defendant deceived consumers through representations that "Marlboro Lights" cigarettes contained less tar and nicotine than regular Marlboros. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant purposefully chose an "elastic" tar and nicotine delivery design to give Marlboro Lights smokers the illusion of lowered tar and nicotine while allowing them to obtain the higher levels of nicotine that they potentially craved. Id. at *11. Plaintiff sought economic damages for themselves and an estimated class of 100,000 individuals who purchased Marlboro Lights in Oregon over a 30-year period in violation of the Oregon's Unfair Trade Practices Act ("UTPA"). Id. at *13. The trial court denied Plaintiffs' motion for certification, finding that individual issues predominated. Id. at *21. The trial court had determined that because Plaintiffs' class claim depended on proof that they suffered an ascertainable loss or money or property and that the loss was the result of the alleged unlawful trade practice – lower tar and nicotine representation – individualized inquiries would be required. Id. at 22. In addition, the trial court had also found that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that they could prove through common evidence that the alleged representation that Marlboro Lights were inherently lower in tar and nicotine was a substantial or motivating factor in every class member's purchasing decision, as Defendant produced extensive evidence that many individuals bought it for reasons other than their perceived health benefits. Id. at *25. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Oregon Court of Appeal reversed, finding that the elements of an UTPA claim could be proved through common evidence. The Court of Appeal agreed that Plaintiffs would have to prove that the class members relied on Defendant's lowered tar and nicotine representation in purchasing Marlboro Lights, and reasoned that an inference of class-wide reliance could be drawn from the uniform nature of Defendant's representations, Defendant's design and marketing of Marlboro Lights, and the fact that many persons who smoked light cigarettes believed that they were safer than regular cigarettes. Id. at *29. On further review, the Supreme Court of Oregon agreed with the trial court that Plaintiffs failed to show that the reliance required to prove their economic loss could be litigated through common evidence, rather than requiring individual inquiries of the class members. The Supreme Court found that the records contained ample evidence that, among the putative class of 100,000 who purchased Marlboro Lights in Oregon over a 30-year period, the purchasers had varying beliefs as to whether lower tar and nicotine cigarettes were "healthier" to smoke. Id. at *92. The records showed that the putative class members were motivated to buy Marlboro Lights for a variety of reasons, some irrational, and others unrelated to whether Lights were "inherently" lower in tar and nicotine than regular cigarettes, and thus, the representations of inherent lightness on which Plaintiffs relied depended significantly on interpretation and what purchasers understood the "lowered tar and nicotine" label to imply. Id. The Supreme Court concluded that the trial court correctly determined that Plaintiffs did not carry their burden to show that common issues predominated over individual ones on the element or reliance. Id. at *93. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed the Court of Appeal's decision on class certification and affirmed the trial court's order.

(xviii) Pennsylvania

Dittman, et al. v. UPMC,* Case No. 14-GD-3285 (Pa. Common Pleas Ct. May 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendant failed in their duty to protect their private, highly sensitive, confidential and personal information such as names, birthdays, social security numbers, and confidential tax information. ("Confidential Personal Information"). Id. at 2. Plaintiffs contended that their Confidential Personal Information was stolen from Defendant's computer systems, and that a duty of care should be imposed on Defendant to protect the confidential information of its employees. Id. at 5. Plaintiffs relied on Pennsylvania Supreme Court's decision in Seebold v. Prison Health Services, Inc., 57 A.3d 1232 (Pa. 2012), discussing the factors for consideration in determining whether to impose a duty of care, including: (i) the relationship between the parties; (ii) the social utility of the actor's conduct; (iii) the nature of the risk imposed and foreseeability of the harm incurred; (iv) the consequences of imposing a duty of harm incurred; and (v) the overall public interest in the proposed solution. Id. The Court sustained Defendant's objections, and dismissed the class action complaint. The Court observed that Plaintiffs' proposed solution was the creation of a private negligence cause of action to recover actual damages, including damages for increased risks, upon a showing that Plaintiffs' Confidential Personal Information was made available to third persons through a data breach. Id. at *6. The Court explained that the public interest was not furthered by this proposed solution, as data breaches were widespread, and they frequently occurred because of sophisticated criminal activity of third persons. Id. The Court remarked that creating a private cause of action could result in possible filings of hundreds and thousands of such lawsuits within Pennsylvania alone by people whose confidential information may be in the hands of third persons. Id. The Court further explained that under Plaintiffs' proposed cause of action, in Pennsylvania alone, perhaps hundreds of profit and non-profit entities would be required to expend substantial resources responding to the resulting lawsuits. Id. The Court remarked that these entities were victims of the same criminal activity as Plaintiffs, and without guidance from the Legislature, the judicial system should not create a body of law that does not allow entitles that were victims of criminal activity to get on with their business. Id. at 7. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss the data breach claims. The Court also dismissed Plaintiffs' breach of contract claim, finding no factual allegations supporting a finding of an agreement between the parties which Defendant agreed to be liable for criminal acts of third-parties. Id. at 12. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the class action complaint.

(xix) Texas

Entergy Corp. v. Jenkins, et al.*, 2015 Tex. App. LEXIS 7756 (Tex. App. 1st Dist. July 28, 2015). Plaintiff, on behalf of the utility's customers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants, Entergy Corp. and its six electric utility operating companies, violated the terms of the Texas Theft Liability Act by selling both residential and commercial customers expensive power from its own generating plants rather than cheaper power available from other retail suppliers. Defendants first removed the action alleging federal question jurisdiction, but the case was remanded because the action did not invoke federal law. Id. at *4. Defendants then filed a motion to dismiss, contending that Federal Energy Regulatory Commission ("FERC") and the Texas Public Utilities Commission ("PUC") preempted Plaintiffs' claims because the Entergy Systems Agreement ("ESA"), a federal tariff, provided for centralized control of power purchases, operations, and use of available resources throughout the participating Defendant companies. Id. at *2-3. Finding lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, the trial court granted Defendants' motion. Id. at *4. The Texas Court of Appeals reversed the trial court's order. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs then filed a motion to certify a class consisting of Texas retail customers, and Defendants filed a second motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction and three motions for summary judgment. Id. The trial court denied Defendants' motions and granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Upon Defendants' interlocutory appeal, the Texas Court of Appeal reversed the trial court. Defendants contended that the trial court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' claims. Reviewing de novo the issue of subject-matter jurisdiction, the Court of Appeal found that the FERC has the exclusive jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' claims. Id. at *11. The Court of Appeal noted that the FERC regulates wholesale power transactions, and Defendants subjected its fuel and purchased-power costs to the scrutiny by the FERC under the Federal Power Act ("FPA") and by the PUC. Because the FERC's exclusive jurisdiction of the wholesale sale or transmission of electricity in interstate commerce encompassed the determination of just and reasonable rates, including all classifications, practices, regulations, and contracts affecting rates, as well as the authority to hear complaints about the reasonableness of an existing rate, and because the FPA gives states, municipalities, and retail ratepayers the right to participate in the FERC proceedings and to file complaints, the Court of Appeal concluded that Plaintiffs' claims fell within the FERC's jurisdiction. Id. at *15-17. Although Plaintiffs did not allege breach of the FERC-approved ESA as a cause of action, the Court of Appeal noted that he had challenged Defendants' purchasing decisions – whether to use allegedly available third-party electricity or system-generated electricity – which Defendants undertook pursuant to the ESA. The Court of Appeal thus found that determining whether Defendants permissibly exercised their discretion in making their purchasing decisions necessarily required consideration of the ESA, a FERC-approved tariff. Id. at *24. The Court of Appeal therefore concluded that the dispute fell within the FERC's exclusive jurisdiction. The Court of Appeal held that the trial court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction, as Plaintiffs did not exhaust the administrative remedies by first bringing the dispute before the FERC. Id. at *32. The Court of Appeal further held that the trial court erroneously denied Defendants' motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction and that the trial court's class certification order was therefore void. Id. at *32-33. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's order denying Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Fleming, et al. v. Kirklin Law Firm, P.C.,* 2015 Tex. App. LEXIS 11767 (Tex. App. Nov. 17, 2015). In this class action related to the filing of suits by thousands of users of a weight-loss drug known as Fen-Phen against Wyeth and the subsequent settlement of the litigation, the Texas Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order that law firm Fleming & Associates LLP breached a contract for referral fees tied to the $339 million Fen-Phen settlement when it deducted litigation expenses from fees owned to another firm. Soon after the second phase of Fen-Phen litigation, the Fleming firm sought additional Fen-Phen clients through referrals from other attorneys, including the Kirklin law firm. Id. at *3. After signing a referral agreement, the Kirklin law firm referred about 500 Fen-Phen clients to the Fleming firm, and the Fleming firm prosecuted its Fen-Phen cases for five years until Wyeth agreed to pay an aggregate of $339 million to settle all of the Fleming firm's 8,000 cases. Id. at *5. The Fleming firm paid the Kirklin firm over $2 million as its net share of attorneys' fees, and the Kirklin firm alleged that the Fleming firm calculated the payments incorrectly. When efforts to resolve the dispute failed, the Kirklin firm filed an action alleging breach of contract and fraud against the Fleming firm. Finding that the Fleming firm failed to comply with the referral agreement, the jury awarded the Kirklin firm damages and attorneys' fees of $150,000. Later, the trial court modified final judgment and vacated the award of attorneys' fees, as precedent did not allow for attorneys' fees to be awarded against a limited liability partnership. Id. at *10. The parties cross-appealed, and the Kirklin firm asserted that the trial court erred in not holding Fleming individually liable and also that the Fleming firm had not kept up with Texas Revised Partnership Act ("TRPA") requirements to maintain its LLP status. Id. at *16. The Court of Appeal rejected the Kirklin firm's arguments, finding that the Fleming firm presented evidence conclusively demonstrating compliance with TRPA's financial responsibility provision, and the Kirklin firm failed to establish that the Fleming firm did not meet the statutory requirements to qualify as a limited liability partnership. Id. at *19-24. The Court of Appeal held that the trial court did not err when it refused to hold Fleming individually liable based on the Fleming firm's non-compliance with the TRPA. The Court of Appeal also ruled that the trial court did not err in holding the referral agreement ambiguous and admitting parol evidence to prove the parties' intent. Id. at *13. In holding so, the Court of Appeal rejected the claim of the Fleming firm that the agreements created a joint venture, which would have entitled Fleming to shift some of the litigation expenses to Kirklin. Id. at *15. Because the referral agreements were susceptible of more than one reasonable interpretation and thus ambiguous, the Court of Appeal held that the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it admitted parol evidence to prove the parties' intent. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's judgment.

In Re National Lloyds Insurance Co.*, 2015 Tex. App. LEXIS 5509 (Tex. App. May 29, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of property owners, brought a class action for property damage claims alleging that Defendant violated the Texas Insurance Code by refusing to pay their claims without conducting reasonable investigations and by failing to affirm or deny coverage of the claims or submit a reservation of rights within a reasonable period of time. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs served Defendants with requests for production, and Defendants objected on the basis that the burden of the proposed discovery outweighed its likely benefit; Defendants also asserted privilege as to others. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiffs served two separate motions to compel against Defendants, which the trial court granted. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs then filed a motion to enforce and requirement Defendants to supplement its discovery responses. Id. Plaintiffs' motion to enforce related to testimony of Defendants' corporate representative, Paul Boswell, where he testified that Defendants ran several different reports which were generated in real time, and which were sent to the employee generating the request in PDF format by e-mail. Id. at *8. These reports could be used to see if a claims examiner was being efficient or handling their claims timely. Id. Boswell testified that the reports were historical in nature and were not retained so there was no ability to print past reports. Id. Based on Boswell's testimony, Plaintiffs requested the trial court to enforce its prior orders requiring Defendants to produce relevant documentation in response to their requests for production. Id. at *9. The trial court granted that motion, and Defendants sought to appeal through a writ of mandamus. On appeal, the Texas Court of Appeals found that issuing mandamus was inappropriate. Defendants asserted that the trial court abused its discretion in ordering it to produce all management reports and accompanying e-mails used to manage its internal financial and personnel information when those reports were irrelevant to an insured's claim that their claims were underpaid. Id. at *18. Plaintiffs argued that Defendants waived their right to these objections and arguments because they failed to assert them in a timely manner. The Court of Appeals noted that a responding party must include any objections to written discovery within 30 days after the service of request for production. Id. at *20. Defendants contended that they never waived their claim to contest the requests, but continually protested the discovery at every stage. Id. at *21. The Court of Appeals opined that Defendants had the duty to make complete responses to the requests for production based upon all information reasonably available, subject to objections and asserted privileges. Id. at *22. Based on the evidence, the Court of Appeals concluded that the trial court acted within its discretion in concluding the existence of those documents, given Boswell's extensive testimony regarding their existence and usage. Id. at *22. In addition, the Court of Appeals found that the records did not show that Defendants had in fact raised the issue of the discovery requests being overbroad. Id. at *23. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals overruled Defendants' objections, and denied the writ of mandamus.

In Re Valerus Compression Services, LP,* 2015 Tex. App. LEXIS 4647 (Tex. App. May 7, 2015). In this consolidated petition for mandamus and interlocutory appeal, Defendants contended that the trial court abused its discretion by failing to rule on their motion to compel arbitration. On Defendants' appeal, the Texas Court of Appeals dismissed the interlocutory appeal and conditionally granted the writ of mandamus. Plaintiffs had sent a letter to Defendants stating that they believed that Defendants manipulated tax allocations, assigned unwarranted phantom income, and failed to make requisite tax distributions, and Plaintiffs requested certain records to investigate those claims. Id. at *1-2. Defendants responded to the letter by addressing the concerns, and provided some of the information requested. Plaintiffs then filed a Rule 202 petition, and sought to depose various representatives of Defendants to investigate potential claims of breach of contract, breach of fiduciary duty, minority shareholder oppression, and civil conspiracy. Id. at *2. Defendants objected to the Rule 202 petition and filed a motion to compel arbitration pursuant to a dispute resolution clause in a partnership agreement among the parties. The trial court granted the Rule 202 petition, but did not expressly rule on the motion to compel arbitration. Id. at *3. Defendants then filed an interlocutory appeal as well as a writ for mandamus. The Court of Appeals remarked that it first had to determine which mechanism among the two was appropriate. Id. At the outset, the Court of Appeals noted that mandamus lies when there was no adequate remedy by appeal, and an appeal lies only from final order and those interlocutory orders that statutes make appealable. Id. Here, Defendants filed an interlocutory appeal pursuant to § 51.016 of the Texas Civil Practice and Remedies Code and the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"), along with the mandamus proceeding. The Court of Appeals noted that the parties' arbitration clause stated that it was subject to the FAA, which allows interlocutory appeals from an order denying an application to compel arbitration. Id. at *4-5. Because the trial court did not deny the motion to compel arbitration, the Court of Appeals ruled that the writ of mandamus of appropriate in this case, and accordingly, dismissed the interlocutory appeal. Id. at *6. Defendants next contended that the trial court abused its discretion by failing to stay the Rule 202 depositions and compel arbitration relying on In Re Bill Heard Chevrolet, 2005 Tex. App. Lexis 8838 (Tex. App. Oct. 27, 2005), where the trial court had deferred ruling on the issue of arbitrability until after the Rule 202 deposition had been taken. Id. at *7. In that case, the Court of Appeals held that the trial court had abused its discretion by ordering the Rule 202 deposition before ruling on the motion to compel arbitration, and had conditionally granted the writ of mandamus. Id. For similar reasons, the Court of Appeals granted Defendants' writ of mandamus and directed the trial court to rule on the issue of arbitrability first.

Weinstein & Riley, P.S. v. Blankenship, et al.,* 2015 Tex. App. LEXIS 7497 (Tex. App. July 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of debtors, brought a class action alleging that they received demand letters from Defendant, a law firm, in violation of the federal Fair Debt Collection Practices Act and the Texas Debt Collection Act ("TDCA"), as well as for the unauthorized practice of law. The trial court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, and on appeal, the Texas Court of Appeals reversed. Defendant argued that the trial court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' claim for injunctive relief because there was no live controversy. The Court observed that in 2003, when Defendant was known as Weinstein, Treiger, & Riley, P.S., it obtained a third-party debt collector surety bond, and in 2005 it changed its name to Weinstein & Riley, P.S. Id. at *4. Defendant filed a name change rider with the Secretary of State on November 17, 2009. Id. Plaintiffs filed their action in July 2010 and instead of seeking any actual damages in connection with Defendant's delayed filing of the name-change rider including seeking damages under § 392.403(e) of the TDCA, they generally sought to prevent and restrain Defendant from engaging in debt collection in Texas. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiffs argued that they were entitled to injunctive relief based on: (i) § 392.101(a) of the TDCA, which requires third-party debt collectors to obtain a surety bond and file a copy of that bond with the Secretary of State; (ii) § 392.304(a)(1)(A) of the TDCA, which prohibits debt collectors from using a name other than true business or professional name; (iii) § 392.403(a)(1) of the TDCA, which allows a party to seek injunctive relief; and (iv) § 392.403(e) of the TDCA, which entitles a party who maintains a successful injunctive relief to not less than $100 for each violation of the TDCA. Id. The Court of Appeals found that as Plaintiffs did not seek statutory damages, they could not successfully maintain an action because there was no continuing injury that injunctive relief could redress. Id. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals reversed the class certification order and remanded the case to the trial court.

(xx) Washington

Filo Foods, LLC, et al. v. The City Of SeaTac,* 2015 Wash. LEXIS 890 (Wash. Aug. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employers, brought an action against Defendants – the City of SeaTac and the City clerk – challenging a voter initiative that established a $15 per hour minimum wage and other benefits and rights for employees in the hospitality and transportation industries. In June 2013, a group supporting an increase in the minimum wage for hospitality and transportation workers at SeaTac Airport circulated a petition among the voters in the City of SeaTac to put "Proposition 1" on the ballot. Id. at *2. Proposition 1 was approved by voters and raised the minimum wage of hospitality and transportation workers to $15 per hour. Plaintiffs challenged the validity of Proposition 1 on the basis that: (i) it violated the single-subject rule; (ii) violated the Port of Seattle's jurisdiction over Seattle-Tacoma International Airport; (iii) federal labor and aviation laws preempted Proposition 1; and (iv) it violated the dormant commerce clause. Id. at *3-4. Although, the trial court upheld Proposition 1 generally, it ruled that the ordinance could not be enforced at the airport because, under state law, the City could not exercise jurisdiction or control over the airport. Id. at *4. The trial court also found that federal labor laws, particularly, National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"), preempted Proposition 1. Id. On appeal, the Washington Supreme Court reversed the trial court holding that Proposition 1 could be applied at the airport and concluded that NLRA did not preempt Proposition 1 in whole or in part. Id. at *6. The Supreme Court held that Proposition 1 could be applied at the airport and it was not in conflict with state law concerning the Port of Seattle's jurisdiction over the airport because the Port had not shown that Proposition 1 would interfere with airport operations. Id. at *11. The Supreme Court based its analysis on the statutory language, prior case law, and the functional differences between cities and special purpose districts. Id. The Supreme Court noted that unlike cities, which are granted the broadest powers of local self-government, a port district is a special purpose district, which "is limited in its powers to those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted, and also those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation." Id. at *16. These aspects of the statutory scheme led the Supreme Court to conclude that legislature intended to vest authority for the operation of the airport exclusively with the Port of Seattle, but not to prohibit a local municipality like the City from regulating the general welfare in a manner unrelated to airport operations. Id. The Supreme Court held that, absent a factual showing that Proposition 1 would interfere with airport operations, it did not conflict with the Port of Seattle's jurisdiction or ability to operate the Seattle-Tacoma International Airport, and thus it could be validly enforced at the airport. Id. at *24. The Supreme Court also rejected the argument that NLRA preempted Proposition 1 because it did not impermissibly intrude upon the collective bargaining process. Id. at *28-29. The Supreme Court reasoned that the Proposition 1's worker-retention provision protected employees, fitting comfortably within the category of minimum labor standards held to be valid. Id. at *36-38. The Supreme Court also rejected the argument that the Airline Deregulation Act preempted Proposition 1, finding that Proposition 1 was a "generally applicable" law rather than one directly targeted at the airline industry. Id. at *43. The Supreme Court further held that the Proposition 1 did not violate the single-subject rule or the dormant commerce clause because the Proposition 1 generally concerned labor standards for certain employers, and it did not facially discriminate against interstate commerce. Accordingly, the Supreme Court upheld Proposition 1 in its entirety.

(xxi) West Virgina

Rich, et al. v. Simoni*, 2015 W. Va. LEXIS 257 (W. Va. April 10, 2015). Plaintiff, an attorney, brought an action in the federal court seeking declaratory judgment on the issue of whether Defendant was entitled to compensation for his services, and sought a ruling as to whether sharing of legal fees relative to various class actions would violate Rule 5.4 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct. Defendant was a professor at West Virginia University ("WVU") and also held a juris doctorate degree but was never admitted to practice law in any jurisdiction. Id. at *3. Defendant contended that through his collaboration with Plaintiff, they learned of potential environmental and toxic tort mass cases, including two class actions known as the Fairmont litigation and the Spelter litigation. Plaintiff and his associate counsel earned a total fee of $14.6 million in the Fairmont litigation and $22.8 million in the Spelter litigation. Id. at *5. This litigation arose from an agreement between the Parties to compensate Defendant for his efforts in connection with various class action suits, including the Fairmont Spelter litigations. Id. According to Defendant, the initial understanding was that he would share the benefits on a 50/50 basis; however, Defendant purportedly informed Plaintiff that his share would be reduced from 50% to 20%. Id. at *6. When the parties cross-moved for summary judgment, the trial court certified the following question to the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals: "Are the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct statements of public policy with the force of law to that given to statutes enacted by the West Virginia?" Id. at *12. The Supreme Court of Appeals modified the question and answered affirmatively. Defendant acknowledged that a licensed lawyer is ethically prohibited from sharing legal fees with a non-lawyer under Rule 5.4 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct. Id. at *13. Defendant argued that Rules of Professional Conduct were nothing more than rules of reason, and could not stand as a bar to the enforcement of a fee-sharing agreement that was predicated on the reasonable value of services provided. Id. at *13-14. Plaintiff stated that he had no issue in paying Defendant, provided that such payment could be accomplished within the boundaries of both ethical and legal constraints. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Supreme Court of Appeals amended the certified question to "[w]hether a fee-sharing agreement between a lawyer and a non-lawyer is unenforceable as contrary to the public policy of this state." Id. at *13. The Supreme Court of Appeals noted that in Gaddy Engineering Co. v. Bowles Rice McDavid, 231 W. Va. 577 (2013), it had determined that the rules of professional conduct contained explicit declarations of the state's public policy. Id. at *16. In Martello v. Santana, 713 F.3d 309 (6th Cir. 2013), in affirming the trial court's ruling that a fee-sharing agreement between an attorney and a physician was unenforceable as violating public policy, the Sixth Circuit wholly rejected the argument that the public policy can be created by the Kentucky Legislature. Id. The Sixth Circuit reasoned that the Kentucky Rules of Professional Conduct were public policy set by the Kentucky Supreme Court. Id. In view of the highly persuasive authority throughout the country on this issue, the Supreme Court of Appeals determined that it had no difficulty in recognizing that the Rules of Professional Conduct may constitute statements of public policy, which in turn may carry the equivalent force and effect as statutes enacted by the State's Legislature. Id. at *23. The Supreme Court of Appeals explained that this determination would need to be made on a rule by rule basis, given that some of the rules are stated in mandatory terms while others are expressed in hortatory terms only. Id. at *24. Accordingly, the Supreme Court of Appeals modified the certified question, and answered that it in the affirmative.

VIII. Rulings On The Class Action Fairness Act

President Bush signed the Class Action Fairness Act ("CAFA") into law on February 18, 2005. The law facilitates removal of class actions from state court to federal court. In addition, it regulates the selection of class counsel, tightens control of attorneys' fees awarded to class counsel, toughens pleading standards, reduces the ability of class counsel to dictate the choice of forum, facilitates interlocutory appeals of class certification rulings, and regulates settlements of class actions. In large part, the CAFA has significantly altered forum-selection and claim-selection strategies of plaintiffs' lawyers in litigating class actions.

The CAFA continues to play a large role in many class actions filed against employers. The CAFA responded to the abuses of state court judges in certifying class action lawsuits involving plaintiffs who filed their claims in states with a reputation for a lack of fairness toward out-of-state defendants. The CAFA modifies the rules for federal court jurisdiction over class actions based on the diversity of citizenship test. Before the CAFA, all named plaintiffs in a class action had to be citizens of states differing from those of all defendants, a situation that typically would not be met in class actions seeking nationwide classes. In addition, there was a minimum monetary threshold of $75,000 to be met by every plaintiff in the case.

With the advent of the CAFA, the rules for diversity jurisdiction have eased, though for class actions only, so that diversity of the parties can be achieved if any class member is a citizen of a different state from any defendant and if the aggregated, not individual, amount-in-controversy for all class members is at least $5 million, and the class involves more than 100 people. As a result, the CAFA relaxes the historic strict standard for diversity jurisdiction to allow defendants to remove what were formerly "non-diverse" state law-based class actions.

The CAFA also has prompted plaintiffs' class action lawyers to file "single-state" class actions in state court to avoid removal under the CAFA. For example, it is increasingly more common for plaintiffs to sue on behalf of "all employees in California" in an effort to plead around the CAFA's provisions triggering federal jurisdiction. Likewise, plaintiffs' class action lawyers are also filing multiple single-state class actions in a staggered fashion to avoid the CAFA.

The CAFA's impact in 2015 was significant. More class actions are being filed in federal courts, and more intrastate class actions are being heard in federal courts through the removal mechanisms under the CAFA. Because the law's provisions are designed to prevent plaintiffs' counsel from keeping class actions in state court that are more appropriately litigated in federal court, the CAFA forecloses the pleading tactic of requesting damages of less than $75,000 per class member (the jurisdictional limit for a federal court to hear a claim involving plaintiffs and defendants of different states) to stymie a defendant from removing the lawsuit to federal court. Over the last year, employers repeatedly invoked the statute to remove class actions filed in state court to federal court. In turn, federal courts addressed several novel issues arising under the CAFA.

The CAFA has had profound effects on considerations underlying case strategy and the structuring of class actions. In this context, the CAFA's impact on workplace class actions is both varied and evolving. Class actions and collective actions under Title VII, the ADEA, the FLSA, and ERISA typically are brought in federal court. The CAFA may have limited impact on strategic decisions in those cases relative to choice of venue in a federal court or state court. Class actions in state law-based wage & hour litigation are another matter. The plaintiffs' bar and defense bar alike continue to confront novel CAFA issues in these types of cases, for the fight over venue is often a key driver of exposure and risk. On the one hand, employers sued in state law wage & hour class actions are increasingly confronted by plaintiffs' lawyers seeking to avoid removal to federal court by various stratagems, including prayers for relief of less than $5 million, the filing of multiple "baby" class claims on behalf of less than 100 plaintiffs, and limiting the scope of the class to residents of one state. On the other hand, defense counsel seeking (often successfully) to dismiss state law claims pursued by plaintiffs with FLSA claims in "hybrid" wage & hour class actions in federal court also argue that judges should not exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the state law claims; in turn, federal courts are increasingly confronted with questions of whether original jurisdiction exists under the CAFA over such hybrid state law claims, and employers also may face a two-front litigation war – one in federal court and the other in state court – depending on resolution of those CAFA issues. These litigation issues are likely to shape class action practice and defense strategy for the foreseeable future.

More than any other jurisdiction, the Ninth Circuit has confronted – and ruled on – more issues under the CAFA than any other federal circuit. This is primarily the result of the high volume of class action litigation in California state courts, and the corresponding removal of those lawsuits to federal courts in California. In this respect, the Ninth Circuit's CAFA jurisprudence has had a significant impact on other circuits, as issues already decided in the Ninth Circuit are confronted by courts in other areas of the country.

In 2015, federal courts decided many CAFA-related cases. This Chapter does not canvas them all, but instead focuses on major appellate cases and a number of noteworthy district court rulings – in both employment and non-employment cases – that interpreted the CAFA.

(i) First Circuit

Addison Automatics, Inc., et al. v. The Netherlands Insurance Co.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13211 (D. Mass. Feb. 4, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action in state court seeking a declaratory judgment that Defendant Netherlands Insurance Co. ("Netherlands") had a duty to defend and indemnify Defendant Precision Electronic Glass Co. ("Precision") in an action pending in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois. Defendants removed the action under the CAFA. Plaintiff moved to remand the action on the ground that Defendants did not timely remove and as Plaintiff did not bring a class action. The Court granted the motion. Id. at *1-2. In 2010, Plaintiff brought an action against Precision for alleged violations of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") and obtained a $15 million settlement. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff brought this action on November 7, 2011, in state court and on December 23, 2011, Defendants filed a motion to dismiss, which the state court denied. Id. at *4. On December 7, 2012, Defendants filed a motion for judgment on pleadings, which the state court also denied in January 2013. Id. On April 30, 2014, Defendants filed another motion to dismiss, which was denied on August 26, 2014. Id. On September 25, 2014, Defendants removed the action. Id. at *6. Defendants contended that the filing of the complaint did not start the removal clock. The Court disagreed. It found that Plaintiff specifically requested relief individually and as a class representative and, although Plaintiff did not specifically mention Rule 23 or file a class complaint, the initial filing provided Defendants with information from which they could ascertain the basis for removal. Id. at *8-9. The Court observed that the only element for removal missing from the initial complaint was the amount-in-controversy because, in the case cover sheet lodge with the clerk's office, Plaintiff stated the amount exceeded "$60,000.00." Id. at *10. The Court found that, even if the clock for removal did not start with the initial pleading, the clock started in January 2013 when the underlying judgment was included in briefing filed before the trial court. The underlying judgment made clear that the amount-in-controversy was more than $15 million and confirmed that the members of the class that were owed that amount. Id. at *10. The Court noted that as Defendants' motion to dismiss had been denied, Defendants removed the action, contending that the August 2014 order was the first paper that identified the case as a class action that could be removed. Id. at *12. The Court, however, noted that Plaintiff still continued to insist that it was not asserting class claims, so, in that respect, nothing had changed. Id. The Court, therefore, remanded the action, finding that Defendants failed to remove the action within 30 days. Id. at *13.

Clee, et al. v. MVM, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29387 (D. Mass. Mar. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action in state court alleging that Defendant, a federal contractor of security services, failed to pay its security guards for the 10 to 15 minutes it required guards to be at work before and after each shift in violation of the Massachusetts Wage Act. Plaintiffs also asserted a claim for unjust enrichment because Defendant required its guards to relinquish a portion of their wages. Id. at *3. Because a collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") governed the parties' employment relationship, Defendant removed the case based on complete preemption under § 301 of the Labor-Management Relations Act, as well as under the Federal Officer Removal Statute. While Defendant moved to dismiss on the grounds of complete preemption, Plaintiffs moved to remand. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to remand and granted Defendant's motion to dismiss. The Court found that removal was proper because § 301 completely preempted Plaintiffs' claims as an interpretation of the CBA was required to resolve them. Specifically, the Court found that Plaintiffs' claims were intertwined with the CBA because Plaintiffs' claim for wages for uncompensated work depended on the interpretation of at least three provisions of the CBA. Id. at *18. First, the Court noted that the CBA provided that a regular workweek of 36 hours of work, including lunch periods, would constitute a normal full-time workweek for full-time employees, and shifts were eight or 12 hours. The Court stated that it was necessary to determine whether that time included time to prepare for work and prepare to leave work, and thus it was necessary to determine the definition of "work" in the CBA. Id. Second, the CBA required employees to report in and out before and after a shift. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' allegations regarding pre-shift and post-shift requirements were contrary to that language. Id. at *18-19. The Court reasoned that it was necessary to construe the term "report" as it was used in the CBA. Id. at *19. Third, the CBA provided that the Government could supersede any understanding of the parties regarding assignments, hours, shifts, credentials, qualifications, and any other operational issue, and there would be no recourse against Defendant regarding such actions or their compliance with such directives. While Plaintiffs contended that the provision meant that only the provisions of the CBA, and not the requirements of the Wage Act, could be superseded by Government action, the Court opined that it was necessary to construe the parties' intentions as expressed in the CBA to decide the merit of this contention. Id. Moreover, the Court observed that the Government's requirements with respect to matters such as uniforms and firearms might justify Defendant's requirement that its employees spend time on certain actions before and after their shifts. Id. The Court therefore held that it was necessary to determine whether the Government supremacy provision of the CBA foreclosed Plaintiffs' actions against Defendant. Id. at *19-20. Thus, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' motion to remand was not meritorious. Because § 301 preempted Plaintiffs' claims, the Court dismissed the complaint and observed that the parties could utilize the grievance procedure established in the CBA. Id. at *22-26.

(ii) Second Circuit

In Touch Concepts, Inc. v. Cellco Partnership*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 9293 (2d Cir. June 4, 2015). Plaintiff, a former retail sales agent, brought a putative class action in New York state court alleging that Defendants terminated the agents' sales-agent relationship and he asserted multiple state and common law violations. After Defendants removed the case under the CAFA, Plaintiff filed amended complaint and dropped all class action allegations. Id. at *4. Despite the lack of any federal claims, the lack of complete diversity, and the lack of any class allegations, the District Court maintained subject-matter jurisdiction, and ultimately dismissed several claims on the merits. Id at *2. Plaintiff voluntarily dismissed the remaining claims and appealed, but the Second Circuit found that the District Court properly maintained subject-matter jurisdiction. Id. at *5. At the outset, the Second Circuit noted that when a Plaintiff files a case in federal court and voluntarily amends the complaint, the amended complaint determines jurisdiction. Id. The Second Circuit remarked that if this case was filed originally in federal court, the District Court would have to dismiss it as soon as Plaintiff amended the complaint dropping all class action allegations, which destroyed the only basis for federal jurisdiction. Id. at *6. In removal cases, however, the Second Circuit reasoned that a post-removal amended complaint that reduces the amount-in-controversy below the statutory threshold does not impair diversity jurisdiction. Id. Since Plaintiff's post-removal amendment did not defeat federal jurisdiction premised on a federal question or on diversity, the Second Circuit concluded that the District Court properly maintained subject-matter jurisdiction over the first amended complaint. Id. at *7. The Second Circuit thereby affirmed the dismissal of complaint in its entirety.

Weisblum, et al. v. Prophase Labs, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20634 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendants made false representations that their cold remedy product, Cold-EEZE, reduced the duration and severity of the common cold. Id. at *2. Defendants moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims under the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act ("MMWA"). The Court declined to dismiss the MMWA claims. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs' MMWA claims must be dismissed because the complaint neither named 100 Plaintiffs nor stated that any individual Plaintiff was seeking more than $25, as required under 15 U.S.C. § 2310(d)(3). Id. at *17. Plaintiffs instead relied on the CAFA for the Court's jurisdiction. At issue was whether the CAFA presented an alternative basis for jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' MMWA claims. The Court noted that the CAFA's grant of jurisdiction over qualifying class actions is quite broad. Specifically, the CAFA provides original jurisdiction over any civil action that both satisfies the amount-in-controversy requirement and is a class action, as long as certain specified other criteria are met; in turn, a "class action" is expansively defined as any civil action filed under Rule 23 or similar state statute or rule of judicial procedure authorizing an action to be brought by one or more representative persons as a class action. Id. at *19. Thus, the Court found that the plain text of the CAFA authorized actions like Plaintiffs' lawsuit, and that there was no basis to read an MMWA exception into the CAFA that Congress itself chose not to include. Id. at *20. The Court reasoned that treating the CAFA as an alternative basis for jurisdiction is consistent with the goal of expanding federal jurisdiction over class actions. Id. at *21. The Court concluded that because Plaintiffs met the jurisdictional prerequisites of the CAFA, it could exercise subject-matter jurisdiction over the claim under the MMWA without regard for whether the jurisdictional prerequisites of that statute were also met. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims under the MMWA.

(iii) Third Circuit

Echavarria, et al. v. William Sonoma, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14231 (D.N.J. Feb. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action in the state court alleging that Defendants misclassified their truck drivers and helpers as independent contractors and denied them overtime pay under the New Jersey Wage & Hour Law. Defendants removed the action asserting jurisdiction under the CAFA. Plaintiffs moved for remand on the basis that Defendants failed to establish the CAFA's $5 million amount-in-controversy requirements. The Court granted the motion. Defendants arrived at an amount-in-controversy of $7,328,271 by taking the total amount they paid to Cruz Delivery, the delivery company owned by Plaintiff Jose Cruz, and calculating a per hour rate from that figure. Id. at *4-5. Defendants claimed that they used this technique because they only had information regarding how much they paid to Cruz Delivery, not the hourly rate other members of the class received. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs contended that this calculation overstated the amount-in-controversy because Defendants included amounts paid to Cruz Delivery for the costs of diesel, tolls, insurance, and the expense of paying any other drivers and helpers. Plaintiffs also asserted that the average pay for a class member was $130 per day, and that the average class member worked 10 hours per day, so that the average rate was $10 per hour. Id. Using Defendants' same equation, this rate provided an amount-in-controversy of $650,000. Plaintiffs' complaint explicitly sought only overtime wages owed to the class members in the capacity of truck drivers and helpers. The Court observed that the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that, as of May 2013, the mean hourly wage for light truck or delivery services drivers was $16.10, which was much closer to Plaintiffs' $10 per hour figure than Defendants' $77.01 per hour figure. Id. at *6. Further, the Court remarked that Defendants provided no persuasive reason to use the entire amount paid to Cruz Delivery to calculate an overtime rate for the class members when this amount contained certain non-payroll costs, such as fuel, insurance, and tolls. The Court remarked that even if those cost components were in controversy, they would not be used to calculate an overtime rate. Id. at *7. Thus, because the amount-in-controversy was below the threshold requirement of $5 million, the Court remanded the action.

Grace, et al. v. TGI Fridays, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97408 (D.N.J. July 27, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action in the state court alleging that TGI Fridays, Inc. ("TGIF") had a practice of knowingly or intentionally failing to disclose the price of beverages, thereby inducing consumers to pay higher than reasonable prices for those beverages. Defendants removed this action pursuant to the CAFA. Plaintiffs moved for remand, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs argued that Defendant failed to establish that the amount-in-controversy exceeded the $5 million jurisdictional threshold. At the outset, the Court observed that a Defendant's notice of removal need include only a plausible allegation that the amount-in-controversy exceeds the jurisdictional threshold, and that no evidentiary support is required. Id. at *8-9. Here, the notice of removal stated that: (i) there were 34 TGIF locations in New Jersey; (ii) the class consisted of all customers who purchased items that did not have a disclosed price; (iii) all customers who purchased a beverage without a posted price could be entitled to a minimum $100 civil penalty under the New Jersey Truth in Consumer Contract Warranty and Notice Act ("TCCWNA") for each purchase made after July 14, 2014; (iv) all customers could be entitled to actual damages, treble damages, attorneys' fees, and a refund under the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act ("CFA"); and (v) all customers could be entitled to punitive damages under the breach of contract claim. Id. at *9-10. Defendants asserted that it would take only 50,000 customer transactions subject to the $100 TCCWNA fine to reach the $5 million threshold. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the notice of removal contained a short and plain statement that the amount-in-controversy requirement was satisfied. The Court next applied the preponderance of the evidence test to determine whether the matter-in-controversy exceeded the $5 million jurisdictional threshold by aggregating the claims of individual class members. Id. at *20-21. Because Plaintiffs' complaint had no expiration date, sought damages for all items sold to customers without clearly disclosed prices since July 14, 2014, and the parties did not indicate that TGIF had ceased the alleged offending practice, the Court opined that the claims in the complaint covered damages over the course of at least one year. Further, the Court noted that even a conservative estimate of the items sold at the TGIF locations yielded a significant number of transactions. The CFA permits customers to recover a full refund for all offending transactions, and the Court remarked that assuming that the illustrative $10.39 transaction price cited by Plaintiffs in his complaint was above average, and chose instead a $7.00 average mixed drink price for offending transactions, the refund provision alone brought the damages to over $800,000. Id. at *23. Further, pursuant to the TCCWNA, Plaintiffs sought actual damages, a refund for all transactions, attorneys' fees, and a civil penalty of not less than $100 for each Plaintiff. The Court noted that the refund and actual damages totaled approximately $1,030,000 when combined, and even if there were only 100 class members, the civil penalty could be at least $10,000. Id. at *24. Thus, Defendants could be liable for at least $1,040,000 under the TCCWNA. Further, because punitive damages were estimated at five times the compensatory damages, the Court opined that the punitive damages for the breach of contract claim alone would equal $1,150,000, leading to a liability of as much as $1,380,000 for breach of contract. The Court noted that attorneys' fees could amount to $1,173,000, and the overall damages amount could be as much as $5,083,000. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to remand.

Johnson, et al. v. Organo Gold International,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 156912 (D. Del. Nov. 20, 2015). Plaintiff, a consumer, brought a class action in the state court alleging that he suffered serious complications after undergoing gastric bypass surgery due to his consumption of Organo coffee containing Ganoderma Lucidum. Plaintiff claimed that Defendants failed to warn him of the dangerous side effects of Ganoderma Lucidum, and further failed to label the amount of Ganoderma Lucidum in its product. Id. at *2. Defendants removed the action based on diversity of citizenship under the CAFA. Id. Plaintiff moved to remand, and the Court denied the motion. Id. at *3. The Court found that complete diversity of citizenship existed because Plaintiff was a resident of Florida and Defendants were Nevada business entities. Id. at *5. The Court found that although Plaintiff prayed for an indeterminate amount of compensatory and punitive damages and attorneys' fees, he alleged that he suffered serious medical injuries, requiring him to be resuscitated with multiple blood and platelet transfusions and subsequently undergo an emergency surgery. Id. The Court further found that Plaintiff did not dispute that the value of his own personal injury claim exceeded $75,000 and thus, with respect to Plaintiff's individual personal injury claim, the Court held that it had original jurisdiction. Id. Plaintiff argued that his own personal injury could not be used to impart subject-matter jurisdiction over the absent class members, whose injuries were unknown. Id. at *6. Defendants cited ExxonMobil Corp. v. Allapattah Services., Inc., 545 U.S. 546 (2005), and argued that 28 U.S.C. § 1367 authorized supplemental jurisdiction over class actions where some, but not all, Plaintiffs allege a sufficient amount-in-controversy. Id. The Court observed that claims are part of the same case or controversy when they derive from a common nucleus of operative facts. Id. at *7. Although Plaintiff conceded that his personal injury claim shared common operative facts with the claims of the absent class members, he maintained that they did not form the nucleus of the case. Id. The Court, however, found that Plaintiff's personal injury claims as well as the claims of the absent class members were based on a common nucleus of operative facts, i.e., Defendants' failure to adequately label its product and warn class members about the risks of consuming Ganoderma Lucidum. Id. at *8. Further, the Court reasoned that nothing in Plaintiff's complaint distinguished Plaintiff's injuries from those of the absent class members, and paragraph 18 of the complaint expressly provided that "[t]he harm that Defendants have caused or could cause is substantially uniform with respect to class members." Id. Consequently, the Court agreed with Defendants that the factual basis for all of the claims was that Defendants' products did not warn about the purported health risks of Ganoderma Lucidum or disclose how much Ganoderma Lucidum was in each product, and thus the claims shared a common nucleus of operative fact. Id. at *11. Further, the Court ruled that since original jurisdiction based on diversity existed over all of the claims in the case, it had been properly removed, and therefore the Court need not decide whether jurisdiction existed based on the CAFA. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to remand.

(iv) Fourth Circuit

Estate Of Hanna, et al. v. Agape Senior, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5901 (D.S.C. Jan. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a state court class action on behalf of all patients of Agape Senior, LLC, and its entities who received care from Ernest Addo, an unlicensed physician who had assumed the identity of a duly licensed physician. Plaintiffs alleged negligent referral against Jackson & Coker Locum Tenens, LLC, and negligent hiring, retention, supervision and entrustment; unjust enrichment; and strict tort liability against Agape. Id. at *2. Defendants removed the action, asserting jurisdiction under the CAFA. Thereafter, Plaintiffs moved for remand, arguing that the local controversy exception applied, and the Court granted the motion. At issue was whether Plaintiffs sought "significant relief" from Agape – the local Defendants – and whether Agape's conduct formed a "significant basis" for the claims made, so that the local controversy exception could apply. Id. at *8. The Court noted that a class seeks "significant relief" against a Defendant when the relief sought against the Defendant forms a significant portion of the entire relief sought. Id. at *9-10. Here, Plaintiffs exclusively sought from Agape disgorgement of all improper collections from Plaintiffs' class or their families and a declaratory judgment regarding strict liability for unreasonably dangerous activities. Plaintiffs alleged that Agape received payments from the patients that were unjustified because Agape did not actually provide any physician services. Further, out of the nine separate causes of action, Plaintiffs asserted only one against Jackson, while they asserted numerous causes of action against Agape, including unjust enrichment. Further, to the extent "significant relief" also included an assessment of how many class members were harmed, Plaintiffs alleged that all class members were allegedly harmed by Agape's actions. Id. at *13. Because the relief sought from Agape was significant in comparison to that sought from Jackson, the Court found that the Plaintiffs satisfied the significant relief prong of the inquiry. Further, the Court observed that in relating the local Defendant's alleged conduct to all the claims asserted, the "significant basis" provision effectively calls for comparing the local Defendant's alleged conduct to the alleged conduct of all Defendants. Id. at *15. The Court noted that the local Defendant's alleged conduct must be an important ground for the asserted claims in view of the alleged conduct of all Defendants. Id. While Plaintiffs alleged that Jackson negligently referred Addo to Agape, the claims asserted against Agape were more expansive and related to direct contact Agape made with Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs contended that Agape actually allowed Addo to treat patients, which resulted in harm to those individuals. Thus, the Court determined that even without the cause of action asserted against Jackson, substantial claims against Agape would still remain, and that Plaintiffs sued Agape based on its own alleged negligent conduct. Id. at *17. Finally, because all of the Agape Defendants constituted Agape entities, their subsidiary, sister concerns, affiliated corporations, and their officials, the Court found that all of the local Defendants were related to one another, and comprised the vast majority of all Defendants. Accordingly, the Court applied the local controversy exception and granted Plaintiffs' motion to remand.

(v) Fifth Circuit

Hood, et al. v. Gilster-Mary Lee Corp.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 7241 (8th Cir. May 1, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former and current employees, brought a class action in state court alleging lung impairment from exposure to butter-flavoring products, including diacetyl, used in Defendant's microwave popcorn packaging plant in Jasper, Missouri. The proposed class included those who worked for over one year at Defendant's plant before January 1, 2008, the date when Defendant stopped using diacetyl. After Defendant removed the case under the CAFA, the District Court remanded the action to state court based on the CAFA's local-controversy exception. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit reversed the remand order. During the course of discovery on state citizenship issues, employees initially provided only last known addresses, some 27 years old, and did not identify state citizenship. Id. at *2. After Plaintiffs identified 40 current employees and 246 former employees, they wrote the potential class members seeking affidavits of citizenship, but most did not respond. Based on the affidavits of few potential class members, the District Court had found that about 150, or 41%, of the potential class members were clearly Missouri citizens. Id. at *3. Based on the last known address of former employees obtained from staffing companies and from other modes, the District Court concluded that over two-thirds of the potential class members were Missouri citizens. Id. at *4. At the outset, the Eighth Circuit reasoned that it was not proper to draw conclusions about the citizenship of class members based on things like their phone numbers and mailing addresses. Id. The Eighth Circuit found that the District Court extrapolated the citizenship of the Missouri citizens who responded to the citizenship for those potential class members who did not respond. Id. at *6. The Eighth Circuit remarked that those still at the last known address were more likely to respond, and those not at the last known address were less likely to respond (and more likely not to be Missouri citizens, or even had a valid address). Id. Thus, the Eighth Circuit held that the last known address evidence in the case would not bridge the gap between 41% and 67%. Id. Because Plaintiffs did not meet their burden of proof that the CAFA exception under 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(4) applied, the Eighth Circuit concluded that the District Court erred when it resolved doubts in favor of the party seeking the remand. Id. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit reversed the District Court's remand order.

(vi) Sixth Circuit

Aldrich, et al. v. University Of Phoenix, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 137916 (W.D. Ky. Oct. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action against Defendant, the nation's largest for-profit university, on behalf of all current and former employees of Defendant who performed a substantial part of their job duties within Kentucky, alleging wage & hour violations under various sections of § 337 of the Kentucky Revised Statutes. Defendant removed the action on the basis of diversity jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a). Plaintiffs moved to remand, arguing that the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction and that the case did not meet the jurisdictional requirements under the CAFA , which requires that the amount-in-controversy exceed $5,000,000 and the class have more than 100 members. Id. at *2. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to remand. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs argued that the only jurisdictional basis for a class action was pursuant to the CAFA, as traditional diversity jurisdiction was now unavailable for class actions. Id. at *5-6. The Court rejected this argument, noting that it is widely accepted that both jurisdiction under the CAFA and traditional diversity jurisdiction are available to class action litigants. Id. at *6. Quoting Newberg on Class Actions § 6:14 (5th ed. 2011), the Court noted that the "CAFA does not displace conventional diversity class action rules; it augments them. Therefore, federal subject-matter jurisdiction over a class action may be premised on either the conventional diversity rules (including utilization of supplemental jurisdiction) or on the CAFA." Id. The Court further found that amount-in-controversy requirement of $75,000 per class member was satisfied since one of the named Plaintiffs alleged damages of at least $92,713 due to loss of salary. Id. at *9-10. Further, supplemental jurisdiction was properly invoked since at least one class member was diverse from Defendant. Id. at *17-18. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to remand. Id. at *19.

(vii) Seventh Circuit

Drake, et al. v. Aerotek, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 129923 (W.D. Wis. Sept. 28, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action under Wisconsin state law on behalf of himself and similarly-situated individuals to recover overtime pay for his work as a recruiter trainee and a recruiter for Defendant. Plaintiff originally asserted subject-matter jurisdiction under the CAFA. Id. at *3. Because Plaintiff's later filed second amended complaint and motion to certify two state-wide classes presented questions concerning subject-matter jurisdiction, the Court entered an order requiring Plaintiff to show cause why the case should not be dismissed for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. Id. at *1. The Court thereafter held that it had jurisdiction over Plaintiff's claims under the CAFA, and denied Plaintiff's motion to voluntarily dismiss his claims without prejudice. Id. at *2. In response to the Court's show cause order, Plaintiff stated that he could not meet the CAFA's $5 million amount-in-controversy requirement because even using Defendant's numbers for class size and eight hours of overtime per workweek owed to each individual class member, damages (with the one-and-a-half times damages multiplier allowed under Wisconsin law) totaled approximately $2.5 million. Id. at *6. Plaintiff also contended he could not individually meet the $75,000 amount-in-controversy threshold under the general diversity statute. Id. The Court noted that although Plaintiff did not cite any legal authority for doing so, he appeared to base his jurisdictional analysis on the newly revised class allegations in his motion for class certification that included claims brought on behalf of 147 trainees and 173 recruiters. Id. at *6-7. Defendant argued that even considering the more narrow class definitions proposed in Plaintiff's motion for class certification, the Court had jurisdiction under the CAFA. Id. at *7.

The Court agreed with Defendant, noting that dismissal was not justified because it was not "legally certain" that Plaintiff could not meet the amount-in-controversy requirement of the CAFA, even considering the more narrow class definitions. Id. Accordingly, the Court held that it retained subject-matter jurisdiction over Plaintiff's state law claims under the CAFA, and denied Plaintiff's motion for voluntary dismissal without prejudice for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. Id. at *13-14.

(viii) Eighth Circuit

Hood, et al. v. Gilster-Mary Lee Corp.*, 785 F.3d 263 (8th Cir. 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former and current employees of Defendant, filed a class action against Defendant and six other Defendants alleging lung impairment or potential lung impairment from exposure to butter-flavoring products, including diacetyl, used in Defendant's microwave popcorn packaging plant in Jasper, Missouri. The parties did not dispute jurisdiction under the CAFA. Id. at 264. Upon the dismissal of the six other Defendants, the District Court ordered a remand to state court based on the CAFA's local-controversy exception. Id. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit reversed and remanded. Id. The CAFA's local controversy exception requires a District Court to decline jurisdiction when greater than two-thirds of the members of all proposed Plaintiff classes in the aggregate are citizens of the state in which the action was originally filed. Id. at 246-65. The two-thirds figure is determined as of the date of the filing of the complaint or amended complaint. Id. at 265. The District Court permitted discovery on state citizenship; while Plaintiffs wrote to the potential class members seeking affidavits of citizenship, most did not respond. Id. Citing other case law authority, the District Court relied on last known addresses to conclude that over two-thirds of the potential class members were Missouri citizens. Id. While the District Court used the terms "sampling" and "representative sample" to justify its determination of citizenship, the record did not include any sample, sampling methodology, or other indication of a disciplined approach. Id. at 266. The Eighth Circuit noted that the District Court extrapolated the citizenship of the Missouri citizens who responded to the citizenship for those potential class members who did not respond; it found such reasoning to be in error. Id. Thus, because Plaintiffs did not meet their burden of proof that the CAFA exception under 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(4) applied, the Eighth Circuit held that the District Court erred by resolving doubt in favor of the party seeking remand. Id. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit reversed and remanded the District Court's order of a remand to state court. Id.

(ix) Ninth Circuit

Adams, et al. v. Toys "R" US – Delaware, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11338 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 29, 2015). Plaintiff, a former assistant store manager, brought a state court class action alleging that Defendant failed to reimburse its employees for mileage expenses in violation of California labor laws. Plaintiff contended that as a member of management, Plaintiff used her personal vehicle to perform interstore inventory transfers ("ISITs"), on behalf of Defendant without reimbursement for the expense of mileage and wear and tear on the vehicle. Id. at *2. Plaintiff sought to represent a class of at least 2,000 class members. Id. at *3. Defendant removed the case under the CAFA. Plaintiff moved to remand, which the Court denied. In her motion, Plaintiff noted that she had not alleged a specific amount-in-controversy because Defendant alone had access to the information necessary to make a damages calculation. Plaintiff maintained that Defendant knew which employees performed ISITs with their personal vehicles, the distance traveled, and which ISITs were not reimbursed, yet failed to perform this calculation in the notice of removal. Id. at *8. Plaintiff argued that even if each putative class member drove five miles per week, every week during the class period, the amount of mileage expenses would only be $1.16 million. Id. Defendant noted that Plaintiff alleged that the amount-in-controversy for her individual claim was less than $30,000 but greater than the unlimited jurisdictional amount of $25,000, and she further alleged that there were at least 2,000 class members whose claims were typical of her claims. Id. at *9. Defendant therefore argued that it was reasonable to assume that the damages sought exceeded $5 million. The Court found that it was more likely than not that Plaintiff had put over $5 million in controversy. Id. at *9-10. The Court remarked that in Harris v. Bankers Life and Casualty Co., 425 F.3d. 689 (9th Cir. 2005), the Ninth Circuit held that the basis of a notice of removal under § 1446(b) was determined through examination of four corners of the applicable pleadings, not through subjective knowledge or a duty to make further inquiry. Id. at *10. Thus, the Court concluded that Defendant was under no duty to investigate the facts or to make calculations as suggested by Plaintiff. The Court found that although Plaintiff challenged Defendant's calculation of the amount-in-controversy of $60,000,000 as a mere assertion, she failed to show that Defendant's calculation was false. Id. at *10. The Court reasoned that for the purposes of a motion to remand, it only needed to determine whether the amount-in-controversy suggested by the allegations in the complaint exceeded $5 million. The Court held that the allegations in the complaint did suggest that the amount-in-controversy exceeded the jurisdictional minimum, and denied Plaintiff's motion to remand.

Allen, et al. v. The Boeing Co.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 6868 (9th Cir. April 27, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a state court action in Washington alleging that for more than 40 years Defendant released toxic chemicals into the groundwater causing damages to Plaintiffs' properties. Plaintiffs asserted state law claims of negligence, nuisance, and trespass. Defendant removed the action based on diversity jurisdiction and the CAFA. Defendant contended that Plaintiffs' action was a "mass action" under the CAFA, § 1332(d)(11)(B), which defines mass action as "any civil action… in which monetary relief claims of 100 or more persons are proposed to be tried jointly on the ground that the Plaintiffs' claims involve common questions of law or fact, except that jurisdiction shall exist only over those Plaintiffs whose claims in a mass action satisfy the jurisdictional amount requirements under section (a)." Id. at *5. The District Court remanded the case, holding that Plaintiffs' claims fell within the local event exception to the CAFA in § 1332(d)(11)(B)(ii)(I), which provides that the term mass action "shall not include any civil action in which all of the claims arise from an event or occurrence in the State in which the action was filed, and that allegedly resulted in injuries in that State or in States contiguous to that State." Id. On Defendant's appeal, the Ninth Circuit vacated the order, finding that Plaintiffs' action did not come within the local single event exception to the CAFA. The Ninth Circuit noted its prior analysis of the local event exception in Nevada v. Bank of America Corp., 672 F.3d 661 (9th Cir. 2013), where it held that the "event or occurrence" exclusion applies "only where all claims arise from a single event or occurrence." Id. at *5-6. The District Court had relied on Abraham v. St. Croix Renaissance Group LLLP, 719 F.3d 270 (3d Cir. 2013), which stated that "the words event and occurrence do not commonly or necessarily refer in every instance to what transpired at an isolated moment in time," and that "treating a continuing set of circumstances collectively as an 'event or occurrence' for purposes of the mass action exclusion is consistent with the ordinary usage of these words, which do not necessarily have a temporal limitation." Id. at *8-9. The Ninth Circuit disagreed with the Third Circuit's construction, and found that such a broad definition would cause the local single event exception to be redundant with the local controversy exception to the CAFA. Id. at *10. The Ninth Circuit explained that there would be no need to consider the local controversy exception's criteria, such as whether at least two-thirds of the members of a class were citizens of the State or at least one significant Defendant was a citizen of the State, if the local single event exception applied to all "circumstances that share some commonality and persist over a period of time." Id. at *12-13. The Ninth Circuit further relied on legislative history to support its conclusion that "event or occurrence" referred to a singular happening. The Ninth Circuit quoted the language of the Senate Committee report that "[t]he purpose of this exception was to allow cases involving environmental torts such as a chemical spill to remain in state court if both the event and the injuries were truly local…" The Ninth Circuit pointed out that by referring to "chemical spill," the legislative history drew the line between a one-time chemical spill and a continuing course of pollution or conduct that occurs over a period of years. Id. at *15-16. The Ninth Circuit thus read the exception as referring to a single happening, stating that it reflected the most common understanding of the terms, consistent with the purposes of the CAFA. Id. at *17-18. The Ninth Circuit therefore held that the District Court had federal jurisdiction over the matter. The Ninth Court also noted that, even if it read the local event exception as covering allegations of a continuing nature, Plaintiffs' action still would not qualify because Plaintiffs challenged several distinct actions on the part of two Defendant. Id. at *20. The Ninth Circuit therefore remanded the action to the District Court for further proceedings.

Anderson, et al. v. Seaworld Parks And Entertainment, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 128786 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a state court class action alleging that Defendant, a theme park, misled consumers about its alleged mistreatment of whales. Id. at *2. Specifically, Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant deceived consumers into paying higher prices than consumers would pay for admission to the theme parks if they knew about Defendant's mistreatment of killer whales. Defendant successfully removed the action based on the theory that the case involved at least $5 million and had a class of at least 100 people, giving it jurisdiction under the CAFA. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs argued that the calculations underlying the notice of removal were improper and that they fell below the $5 million threshold required by the CAFA, as Plaintiffs intentionally did not seek any class damages. Id. Plaintiffs sought remand, which the Court denied. The Court found that the basis of Plaintiffs' motion for remand was wrong as a matter of law. Id. at *31-32. The Court noted that the value of the injunction-only case might be measured by the value of the injunction, and because such a valuation exceeded $5 million, it created jurisdiction under the CAFA. Id. at *11. The Court found that even absent any showing of monetary value of an injunction to Plaintiffs, the facts readily suggested by a preponderance of the evidence that Defendant would place an enormous negative value on the injunctive relief, if awarded. Id. at *15. Considering the damage done by the accusations currently being lobbied against Defendant, including its reputation, its ability to secure third-party vendors to market ticket sales, and its ability to retain sponsors, the Court found that the cost would be far greater than the simple cost of changing words on a webpage. Id. at *16-17. The Court therefore concluded that the amount-in-controversy was sufficiently high based on the value of the injunction to Defendant to merit federal jurisdiction. Id. at *18. Because Plaintiffs had also filed other cases pending elsewhere in the country alleging similar claims against Defendant, and the Judicial Panel for Multi-District Litigation denied consolidation of the actions, the parties argued at length whether preclusion would apply to prevent the filing of individual damages claims were this injunctive-only suit permitted to continue in state court. Id. The Court held that, where a case requesting only injunctive relief relied on the same facts as another, already-pending case that requested damages, and the injunctive case was comprised of a sub-set of members to the earlier case requesting damages, the Court's concern might be reasonably heightened that the effects of issue preclusion from hearing the injunctive case might effectuate claim preclusion. Id. at *25. The Court, however, determined that such an analysis conflicted with intent of the CAFA.

Bailey, et al. v. Redfin Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7446 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of real estate field agents, brought state court action on behalf of themselves and all other aggrieved employees under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA") and the California Labor Code alleging that Defendant willfully misclassified Plaintiffs as independent contractors, and thereby denied them minimum wages, overtime compensation, and wages for missed meal and rest periods. Defendant removed the action under the CAFA's diversity jurisdiction provision, alleging that there was a diversity of citizenship among the parties and that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Plaintiffs moved to remand, arguing that their claims did not trigger jurisdiction under the CAFA. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion and remanded the action. The Court noted that Plaintiffs alleged numerous claims pursuant to the Labor Code, the Business and Professional Code. and a single PAGA claim. Id. at *6-7. The Court found that Plaintiffs' complaint contained neither class allegations, nor did it assert any claims on behalf of a class; instead, Plaintiffs sought civil penalties in their alleged PAGA claim. Id. at *7. The Court relied on the Ninth Circuit's ruling in Baumann v. Chase Investment Services Corp., 747 F.3d 1117, 1122 (9th Cir. 2014), for the proposition that PAGA actions are not sufficiently similar to Rule 23 class actions to trigger jurisdiction under the CAFA. Id. The Court reasoned that a PAGA action is essentially a civil enforcement action filed on behalf of and for the benefit of the state, not a claim for class-wide relief. Id. at *8. Thus, the Court found that Plaintiffs' PAGA claims were not subject to removal under the CAFA. Id. at *8. In addition, Plaintiffs alleged that even if Defendant argued that the case was removable under the non-CAFA diversity provisions of 28 U.S.C. § 1332, removal was improper because it was untimely as Defendant exceeded the one-year limit on removal. Plaintiffs also argued that Defendant misrepresented the amount-in-controversy in its notice of removal, and that Defendants could not aggregate PAGA penalties for purposes of establishing diversity jurisdiction. Id. at *11. The Court agreed and accordingly remanded the case.

Benko, et al. v. Quality Loan Service Corp.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 10253 (9th Cir. June 18, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action in state court alleging that Defendants engaged in illegal debt collection practices in the course of carrying out non-judicial foreclosures. Plaintiffs took loans against Nevada real properties. When Plaintiffs defaulted on the loans, Defendants, as trustees on the foreclosed deeds, engaged in claim collection under § 649 of the Nevada Revised Statutes ("NRS"). Plaintiffs argued that Nevada law required the trustees be licensed, and Defendants' failure to register as "collection agencies" constituted deceptive trade practice. Id. at *5. Defendants removed the action to the District Court under the CAFA. Plaintiffs then attempted to amend their complaint by adding information concerning the claims asserted against Meridian Foreclosure Services ("Meridian"), a Nevada corporation. Id. at *6. Although the District Court found jurisdiction, it dismissed Plaintiffs' claim for failure to state a claim. Id. The District Court also denied Plaintiffs' leave to amend, holding that the amendments were futile. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit vacated the District Court's judgment and remanded with instructions to remand the case to state court for further proceedings. The Ninth Circuit noted that because Meridian was a significant Defendant for purposes of the CAFA's local controversy exception, it lacked jurisdiction over this action. The Ninth Circuit cited Coleman v. Estes Express Line, Inc., 631 F.3d 1010 (9th Cir. 2011), and held that it must analyze only the allegations in the complaint to determine whether Plaintiffs sought significant relief from an in-state Defendant and whether the in-state Defendant's alleged conduct formed a significant basis for the claims asserted. Id. at *11. The Ninth Circuit therefore compared the allegations against Meridian to the allegations made against other Defendants, and found that Plaintiffs had shown that a significant number or percentage of putative class members might have claims against Meridian. Id. at *14. In terms of the overall class, Plaintiffs alleged that Meridian conducted illegal debt collection agency activities with respect to thousands of files each year, and that Meridian's activities constituted between 15% to 20% of the total debt collection activities of all Defendants. Id. Further, Plaintiffs claimed general damages of $10,000 from Meridian, and punitive damages as a result of deceptive trade practices and fraud. Plaintiffs estimated that the total damages recovery from Meridian would be between $5 million and $8 million. Id. at *14-15. The Ninth Circuit therefore concluded that Meridian's conduct constituted a significant basis for Plaintiffs' claims, Plaintiffs sought significant relief from Meridian, and thus Plaintiffs met their burden of showing that the action qualified for the local controversy exception. Id. at *16. The Ninth Circuit further ruled that the District Court abused its discretion in denying Plaintiffs' leave to amend. According to the Ninth Circuit, Plaintiffs did not attempt to amend their complaint to eliminate a federal question so as to avoid federal jurisdiction; rather, they attempted to elaborate on estimates of the percentage of total claims asserted against Meridian, an in-state Defendant, and the dollar value of those claims. Id. at *10. The Ninth Circuit thus held that, by amending the complaint, Plaintiffs provided the information required to determine whether the action was within the District Court's jurisdiction under the CAFA. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit reversed the District Court's order, and instructed it to remand the action to the state court for further proceedings.

Bridewell-Sledge, et al. v. Blue Cross Of California,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4500 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 14, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action in San Francisco Superior Court alleging claims for employment discrimination and unfair business practices against Defendants. Defendants transferred the action to the Los Angeles Superior Court, which later consolidated the lawsuit with a related class action entitled Jermaine Crowder v. Blue Cross. Defendants then removed this action, and separately removed the Crowder action, invoking jurisdiction under the CAFA, and the actions were consolidated again. Plaintiffs' filed a motion to remand. Plaintiffs' asserted that the action had been filed "exactly 13 minutes and 50 seconds" before the Crowder action, and thus, applying local controversy exception, the action should be remanded. Id. at *6. Agreeing with Plaintiffs, the Court remanded the case to Los Angeles Superior Court. The Court found that the local controversy exception mandated that it decline to exercise jurisdiction. Defendants had conceded that more than two-thirds of Plaintiffs were citizens of California, at least one Defendant from whom significant relief was sought and whose alleged conduct formed a significant basis for the claims was a California citizen, and the principal injuries about which Plaintiffs complained were suffered in California. Id. at *14. The issue, therefore, was whether "during the 3-year period preceding the filing of [this] class action, no other class action has been filed asserting the same or similar factual allegations against any of the Defendants on behalf of the same or other persons." Id. at *14-15. While Defendants did not contend that Plaintiffs' action was filed before the Crowder action or that there were similar actions filed within the preceding three-year period, they asserted that the action should not be remanded because to do so would circumvent the purpose of the local controversy exception. Id. at *21-22. Specifically, Defendants contended that the legislative history of the CAFA show that Congress enacted the local controversy exception to ensure that class actions "with a truly local focus" would not be removed. Id. at *22. Defendants cited the U.S. Senate report as support for their assertion that this action did not involve a controversy that uniquely affected a particular locality to the exclusion of all others. Id. at *24. The Court found Defendants' arguments unpersuasive. There was no dispute that all members of the putative class were employed by Defendants solely in California. Thus, according to the Court, the controversy did uniquely affect a particular locality, i.e., California, to the exclusion of all others. Id. Further, there was no dispute that two-third of the class were citizens of California, the principal injuries were suffered in California, and Defendants, except for one, were all California citizens. The Court, therefore, found that Plaintiffs satisfied the local controversy exception requirements. The Court rejected Defendants' argument that because the Court retained jurisdiction over Crowder, it could exercise supplemental jurisdiction over this action. The Court found that the fact that this action and Crowder action were consolidated following their removal does not allow a party to remove an otherwise unremovable action for consolidation with a related federal claim, and to conclude otherwise would run contrary to the long-standing rule that "[o]nly state court actions that originally could have been filed in federal court may be removed to federal court by the Defendant." Id. at *32. Because the local controversy exception mandates that a Court decline jurisdiction if the requisite showing was made, the Court concluded that it lacked subject-matter jurisdiction to hear the action. Accordingly, the Court remanded the action to Los Angeles Superior Court.

Bridewell-Sledge, et al. v. Blue Cross Of California,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 14624 (9th Cir. Aug. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs brought two separate class actions in San Francisco Superior Court alleging that Defendants failed to properly pay African-American and female employees at a wage rate equate to white and/or male employees working in the same establishment and performing equal work. Plaintiffs alleged gender employment discrimination in violation of California's Fair Employment and Housing Act and violation of California's Equal Pay Act and Unfair Competition Law. Id. at *5. Following transfer of both actions to the Los Angeles Superior Court, Plaintiffs moved to consolidate the actions. The state court granted the motion and ordered that the actions be consolidated "for all purposes." Id. at *7. After Plaintiffs amended the complaints to add additional Defendants, including one non-California citizen, Defendants removed the actions under the CAFA by filing two notices of removal. The District Court consolidated the cases for all purposes, including trial, and later ordered Defendants to show cause as to why the cases should not be remanded to state court for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction based on the CAFA's local controversy exception, especially based on the fourth prong (i.e., no similar class action has been filed against any Defendants in the preceding three years). Id. at *8. Then, after learning which complaint had been filed first, the District Court remanded the earlier-filed class action to state court, concluding that the CAFA's local controversy exception applied only to that case. Id. at *9-10. The District Court retained jurisdiction over the other action, finding that the local controversy exception did not apply. Id. On appeal, Plaintiffs argued that, because the two actions had been consolidated into a single action, no "other class action" had been filed within the three-year period before the consolidated action. Id. at *16. The Ninth Circuit agreed, finding that California law required the two cases to be treated as a single consolidated class action that was united originally, rather than as two separate class actions filed at different times. Id. at *18. The Ninth Circuit noted that state court-ordered consolidation might affect jurisdiction and removability because it could destroy the identity of each suit and merge them into one. Id. at *16. Here, the state court consolidated the two actions "for all purposes," and according to the Ninth Circuit, under California law, actions consolidated for all purposes are merged into a single proceeding with one case number, resulting in only one verdict and judgment, and therefore are to be treated as if they had been united originally. Id. at *17. The Ninth Circuit rejected Defendants' argument that the actions should be treated separately because they were separate actions at the time they were filed, since that it contravened California law regarding consolidation. Although the Ninth Circuit agreed that the relevant date under the fourth prong of the CAFA's local controversy exception was the date when the actions were originally filed, it explained that when two actions were consolidated "for all purposes" under California law, the cases were to be treated as if one single complaint had been filed. Id. at *20. Moreover, because most Plaintiffs and at least one significant Defendant were citizens of California, and the action involved injuries suffered in California, the Ninth Circuit held that the state had a strong interest in deciding the dispute, and allowing the state court to continue to adjudicate the consolidated class action was entirely in accordance with the purpose of the local controversy exception, as well as the CAFA's primary policy objectives. Id. at *22-25. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit ruled that the District Court erred in exercising jurisdiction over one class action and remanding the other, and ordered it to treat the cases as a single consolidated action and remand it in its entirety to state court.

Briggs, et al. v. Marck Sharp & Dohme,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13731 (9th Cir. Aug. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs brought five separate tort cases in California state court alleging that Defendants, pharmaceutical manufacturers, failed to warn users of diabetes drugs about its harmful side effects, including causing cancers. Id. at *4. While each of the five cases had fewer than 100 Plaintiffs, a second set of cases involving the same drug was already pending in the Superior Court for the County of Los Angeles as a Judicial Council Coordinated Proceeding ("JCCP"). Id. at *4-5. When Defendants removed three cases based on an assertion of diversity jurisdiction, Plaintiffs' counsel represented to the District Court that the cases, if remanded, would be assigned to JCCP "for all purposes." Id. at *8-9. Plaintiffs' counsel made a similar representation to the District Court when Defendant removed another of the cases, also based on diversity jurisdiction, stating that the remand would "result in these cases joining JCCP." Id. at *10-11. Following remand, Defendant again moved for removal, asserting mass action jurisdiction under the CAFA. Id. at *11. This time, the District Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to remand on the basis that assertions by Plaintiffs' counsel made the actions a mass action within the federal jurisdiction under the CAFA. Id. at *12. The District Court further denied Plaintiffs' motion to reconsider the removal order. Plaintiffs appealed. The Ninth Circuit reversed the District Court and ordered remand to state court. First, the Ninth Circuit agreed with Plaintiffs on a threshold jurisdictional question, holding that a petition for leave to appeal filed within 10 days of the denial of a motion for reconsideration was timely. Id. at *14. Turning to the merits, the Ninth Circuit held that the remand should have been granted because none of the five suits was a mass action under the CAFA as there had been no "proposal" by Plaintiffs that the claims of more than 100 persons be tried jointly. Id. at *18-19. The Ninth Circuit explained that a "proposal" for joint trial under the CAFA must be made to a trial court with the authority to effect the relief requested, and therefore, statements made in the District Court could not constitute such a proposal. Id. at *19-20. According to the Ninth Circuit and its understanding of the meaning of "proposal," nothing that Plaintiffs represented to the District Court about what might happen to their cases, if they were remanded to state court, qualified as a proposal for a joint trial. Id. at *20. The Ninth Circuit explained that Plaintiffs' counsel had, at most, cited the prospect of consolidation, and even if counsel expressed an intent to join the JCCP, such statements could not have been proposals given that the District Court lacked any authority to join Plaintiffs' cases to a proceeding in state court. Id. at *21. The Ninth Circuit also held that a set of Plaintiffs' declaration that they "do not seek join trial of any cases or Plaintiffs, but rather, all claims shall be tried individuals," did not trigger the CAFA as they did not explain that they sought to join the JCCP in order to avoid inconsistent judgments. Id. at *26. Finally, the Ninth Circuit ruled that a proposal for bellwether trials in a state mass tort proceeding did not constitute a proposal for joint trials within the meaning of the CAFA. Id. at *27. The Ninth Circuit therefore ordered the District Court to remand the five cases to state court.

Dittmar, et al. v. Costco Wholesale Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 154809 (S.D. Cal. Nov. 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a putative class action in state court alleging that Defendant failed to pay them overtime wages, denied them meal breaks, and failed to provide accurate wage statements in violation of California labor laws. Id. at *2. Defendant removed the case under the CAFA. Id. Plaintiffs moved to remand, and the Court denied the motion. Id. To quantify the amount-in-controversy, Defendant submitted that during the class period, it employed over 500 non-exempt pharmacists and 800 managers, who received hourly pay in lieu of overtime pay. Id. at *3. During this period, 181 pharmacists and 35 managers left their employment. Id. Defendant contended that non-exempt pharmacists made at least $58.75 per hour, and pharmacy managers made at least $63.22 per hour for overtime purposes, and salaried non-exempt department managers made $22.67 per hour for overtime purposes. Id. at *4. Defendant contended that on average at least 30,000 employees worked each week. Payroll records revealed that there were an average of 1,279 employees per pay period whose time records were inconsistent with taking a 30-minute meal break. Id. The Court noted that Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant willfully failed to timely pay all wages owed on separation of employees from the company. Id. at *6. Because Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's violations were regular and pursuant to a uniform policy, it was reasonable to assume that each former employee was underpaid at least one time during their employment. Id. at *7. As the records suggested that Defendant did not pay the class for 30-days after separation, the Court calculated the waiting time claims at $2.4 million. Id. at *8. As to overtime claims, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' allegations established that each class member worked without overtime pay at least one 12 hour day and at least one 8 hour day on the seventh day of a workweek. Id. at *9. The Court agreed and estimated Plaintiffs' unpaid overtime claim at $822,504. Id. at *9. The Court further pegged Plaintiffs' meal break claims at $168,014.40, and rest break claims at $91,382 in controversy. Id. In addition, the Court reasoned that Plaintiffs' failure to provide wage statements claims placed $684,000 in controversy. Id. at *13. Finally, Defendant calculated attorneys' fees equal to 25% of the total amount-in-controversy and stated that attorneys' fees placed over $1 million in controversy. Id. at *14. Consequently, the Court found that Defendant had demonstrated by a preponderance of evidence that the aggregate amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to remand.

Eminence Investors, LLP, et al. v. Bank Of New York Mellon*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 5300 (9th Cir. April 2, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action in the state court seeking to recover for Defendant's alleged breaches of duties that it owed as the indenture trustee of bonds issues to fund the development of real property. Almost two years later, Plaintiffs amended the complaint by adding class allegations on behalf of more than 100 class members and requesting compensatory damages expected to exceed $10 million for each of the alleged four causes of action. Within 30 days after filing the complaint, Defendant removed the action. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs moved to remand, arguing that removal was untimely and that the CAFA securities exception applied. The District Court ultimately agreed with Plaintiffs regarding the untimeliness of the removal notice under 28 U.S.C. § 1446(b), and remanded the case without reaching the securities exception. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed. At the outset, the Ninth Circuit noted that cases falling under the CAFA's securities exemption, i.e., claims relating to the rights, duties, and obligations relating to or created to any security under the Securities Act, were expressly exempted from removal. Id. at *4. The Ninth Circuit observed that Plaintiffs' first three causes of action were for breach of fiduciary duty, based respectively on non-disclosure, loyalty and due care. Id. at *5. The fourth cause of action was for gross negligence. Therefore, the Ninth Circuit concluded that all causes of action related to the rights, duties, and obligations related to or created by or pursuant to the bonds, and thus the securities exception must apply. Id. at *8. Defendant relied on Estate of Pew v. Cardarelli, 527 F.3d. 25 (2d Cir. 2008), where purchasers of certain money market certificates brought suit against the issuers of the certificates and their auditors under a state consumer fraud statute. The Second Circuit held that because Plaintiffs sought to enforce their rights as purchasers of the securities rather than as holders of the securities under a state fraud statute that focused on the transaction in which they acquired the notes, the CAFA exception did not apply. Id. at *10. Defendant cited Cardarelli for the proposition that in order to apply the securities exception, the case must be grounded in the terms of the security itself. The Ninth Circuit, however, noted that Cardarelli clarified that the key distinction was whether Plaintiffs were seeking to enforce their rights as holders of the certificates or purchasers of the certificates. Id. at *11. Here, the Ninth Circuit found that Plaintiffs asserted their rights as a holder of the bonds rather than as a purchaser of the bonds. Id. Defendant also pointed to BlackRock Financial Management, Inc. v. Segregated Account of Ambac Assurance Corp., 673 F.3d. 169 (2d Cir. 2012), where the Second Circuit agreed with the District Court that the securities exception did not apply if the trustee's conduct in approving the settlement also must be evaluated under some source of law other than laws such as New York's common law of trusts. Id. at *14. Defendant cited to BlackRock for the principle that the securities exception should not be applied to causes of action seeking solely to enforce the terms of the indenture. The Ninth Circuit, however, observed that Defendant did not discuss BlackRock's preceding phrase stating that the securities exception applies to cases based on the duties imposed on persons who administered securities. Id. at *15. The Ninth Circuit held that an indenture trustee is the one responsible for administering bonds, so under the reasoning of this passage in BlackRock, the securities exception should apply because all of Plaintiffs' causes of action were based on the Defendant's alleged duties in administering the bonds. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit concluded that causes of action in this case were covered by the CAFA securities exception.

Garnett, et al. v. ADT, LLC*, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16204 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 10, 2015). Plaintiff brought a state court class action for wage & hour violations, asserting claims for failure to reimburse her and others for work-related expenses and for failure to provide wage statements required by California law. Defendant removed the action under the CAFA. Plaintiff moved to remand, which the Court denied. Defendant removed the action solely on the statutory penalties available for failing to furnish wage statements under § 226 of the California Labor Code, contending that the amount-in-controversy was approximately $6.7 million. Id. at *2. Defendant submitted a declaration of the HR Workforce Analyst Lori Pencis in support of its amount-in-controversy calculation. At the outset, the Court noted that § 226(e) provides for an employee to recover greater of all actual damages or $50 for initial pay period, and $100 per employee for each violation, up to a limit of $4,000. Id. at *4. Section 226(e) entitles an employee for costs and reasonable attorneys' fees as well. Id. at *4-5. Defendant interpreted subsequent event to mean a pay period that occurred chronologically after the first pay period in which an employer failed to comply with § 226(a). Defendant calculated the amount-in-controversy using three different penalty rates, including: (i) a set of 1,040 employee wage statements at a maximum penalty of $4,000; (ii) an additional 1,751 initial wage statements of those were not included in 1,040 putative class members; and (iii) an additional 25,465 subsequent wage statements for the individuals included in category (2). Id. at *5. Plaintiff disagreed, and contended that "subsequent" has a special meaning in the Labor Code that triggered heightened statutory penalties only after an employer has learned that its conduct violated the Labor Code. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiff estimated the amount-in-controversy to be at $4 million. Plaintiff relied on Amaral v. Cintas Corp., 163 Cal. App. 4th 1157 (1st Dist. 2008), which rejected a purely temporal understanding of the term subsequent and interpreted its use in §§ 210 and 222.5 of the Labor Code to require that the employer has been notified that it violated the provision before higher penalties were triggered. Id. at *6. The Court disagreed with this interpretation, finding that the §§ 210, 222.5, and 2699 used the term subsequent in a different way than § 226(e). Id. at *7. The Court explained that the term subsequent in those sections modified the word "violation," so that a Defendant faced enhanced penalties for each subsequent violation. Id. In contrast, the Court found that § 226(e) used the term "subsequent" to modify the noun "pay period," so that enhanced penalties apply "per employee for each violation in a subsequent pay period." Id. at *7-8. Accordingly, the Court concluded that under § 226(e), Defendant faced a $50 penalty for an initial pay period, and a $100 penalty per employee for each subsequent violation. The Court, therefore, accepted Defendant's estimate of the amount-in-controversy of $6.7 million, and ruled that the $5 million jurisdictional minimum of the CAFA was satisfied. Id. at *9.

Harris, et al. v. CVS Pharmacy, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 104101 (C.D. Cal. Aug. 6, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated various California and Rhode Island consumer protection statutes and breached express and implied warranties in connection with the marketing and sale of the CVS-branded Ultra CoQ10 softgel dietary supplements. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction, which the Court granted. Plaintiff sought to invoke jurisdiction under the CAFA. Plaintiff's complaint alleged that the Court had original diversity jurisdiction under the CAFA because the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Id. at *7. Defendant disputed Plaintiff's amount-in-controversy and provided evidence that when Plaintiff filed suit, its total sales for CVS UltraCoQ10 was $1,192,234 from its stores nationwide. Id. Plaintiff did not dispute that he was unable to satisfy the CAFA's jurisdictional threshold using his full refund model of restitution or compensatory damages; instead, he argued that the amount-in-controversy was premised on his claims under the Rhode Island Deceptive Trade Practices Act ("RIDTPA"), which provides for statutory damages, punitive damages, and attorneys' fees. Id. at *8. The Court reasoned that as the party advocating for the application of Rhode Island law, Plaintiff must make at least a prima facie showing that the RIDTPA applied to him such that he would have standing to bring that claim. Id. at *10. The Court remarked that was a particularly difficult burden for Plaintiff to bear because he (as the only named Plaintiff in this uncertified class action) alleged that he was a resident of California who purchased Defendant's CoQ10 supplement in California. Id. at *10-11. The Court found Plaintiff did not show any plausible basis for invoking Rhode Island law, which clearly states that, absent some indication to the contrary, extraterritorial force cannot be given to a Rhode Island statute. Id. at *12. Moreover, Plaintiff failed to identify any basis to conclude that the law of Rhode Island would apply to him under standard choice-of-law principles; the fact that Defendant was incorporated in Rhode Island was not sufficient to overcome California's interest in applying its consumer protection laws to Plaintiff's transaction, which occurred entirely within California. Id. at *13. The Court also rejected Plaintiff's argument that he had satisfied the threshold amount-in-controversy requirement because he had claimed for punitive damages and attorneys' fees under the RIDTPA. Id. at *18. The Court pointed out that because Plaintiff had no standing to invoke

Rhode Island law, he could not rely on those provisions. Id. Finally the Court rejected Plaintiff's claim that the value of injunctive relief should be considered in calculating the amount-in-controversy, because Plaintiff failed to offer any substantial, plausible evidence indicating the value of the injunctive relief he sought, let alone that the value of that injunctive relief exceeded the CAFA's jurisdictional threshold. Id. at *18-19. Separately, the Court held that it did not have subject-matter jurisdiction under the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act ("MMWA"), which provides federal subject-matter jurisdiction over state law express and implied warranty claims. Id. at *22. The Court noted Plaintiff brought this case as a class action, and he was the only named Plaintiff; in addition, Plaintiff failed to respond to that argument in its opposition, effectively conceding that his claim under the MMWA hinged on jurisdiction under the CAFA. Id. at *23. Thus, the Court found that absent jurisdiction under the CAFA, Plaintiff could not pursue a claim under the MMWA. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss the action without prejudice. Id. at *25.

Ibarra, et al. v. Manheim Investments, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 334 (9th Cir. Jan. 8, 2015). Plaintiff, a former employee, brought a state court action alleging a failure to pay minimum and overtime wages, and failure to provide meal and rest periods. Plaintiff alleged that the aggregate claims of the individual class members did not exceed the $5 million threshold for jurisdiction under the CAFA. Defendant removed the action. The District Court, relying on Lowdermilk v. U.S. Bank National Association, 479 F.3d 994 (9th Cir. 2007), held that Defendant did not prove to a legal certainty that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million and thus, remanded the action. Id. at *6. Subsequently, Standard Fire Insurance Co. v. Knowles, 133 S. Ct. 1345, 1350 (2013), held that a Plaintiff's pre-certification stipulation that Plaintiff and the class will not seek damages over $5 million does not preclude a Defendant's ability to remove the case under the CAFA. Id. Thus, Defendant again removed the action; however, the District Court remanded the case, holding that Standard Fire was not irreconcilable with Lowdermilk. Id. While Defendant's appeal was pending, the Ninth Circuit decided Rodriguez v. AT&T Mobility Services, LLC, 728 F.3d 975, 977 (9th Cir. 2013), which held that Lowdermilk had been overruled by Standard Fire and that the proper burden of proof imposed upon a Defendant to establish the amount-in-controversy is the preponderance of the evidence standard. Id. at *6. The Ninth Circuit thus remanded the action to the District Court. On Plaintiff's renewed motion for remand, the District Court opined that Defendant did not prove that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million, because Defendant did not provide a basis for its assumption that Plaintiffs were never provided breaks, and again remanded the action. Id. at *7. On further appeal, the Ninth Circuit vacated that order. The Ninth Circuit observed that where, as here, Defendant's assertion of the amount-in-controversy is contested by Plaintiffs, evidence establishing the amount is required, and both sides must submit proof by a preponderance of the evidence whether the amount-in-controversy requirement has been satisfied. Id. at *8. Further, the Ninth Circuit noted that in light of Standard Fire, this rule is not altered even if Plaintiffs affirmatively contend in their complaint that damages do not exceed $5 million, and that a Defendant cannot establish removal jurisdiction by mere speculation and conjecture, or with unreasonable assumptions. Id. at *9. To prove the amount-in-controversy, Defendant relied on a declaration of its senior director of employee services and administration, which had a table listing all of its non-exempt employees and their corresponding number of shifts worked in excess of 5 hours and 3.5 hours during the relevant class period. Defendant's method of calculation assumed that each class member was denied one meal break in each of their 5-hour shifts and one rest break in each of their 3.5-hour shifts. Further, Defendant based its violation-rate assumption on the allegations in the complaint that Defendant had a pattern or practice of failing to pay its non-exempt employees for working off-the-clock, and that it hid behind written policies that purported to forbid these unlawful labor practices while at the same time maintaining an institutionalized unwritten policy that mandated these unlawful practices. Id. at *13. The Ninth Circuit, however, stated that a pattern or practice of doing something does not necessarily mean always doing something. Id. Here, the complaint alleged a pattern or practice of labor law violations, but did not allege that this pattern or practice was universally followed every time the wage & hour violation could arise. While Defendant relied on an assumption about the rate of its alleged labor law violations that was not grounded in real evidence, Plaintiff contested the assumption, but did not assert an alternative violation rate grounded in real evidence. Thus, the Ninth Circuit remanded the action to the District Court to enable the parties to submit proof related to the disputed amount-in-controversy, and directed the District Court to determine if a preponderance of the evidence showed that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million.

Jordan, et al. v. Tor Nationstar Mortgage, LLC,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 5221 (9th Cir. April 1, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action against Defendant in Washington state court in 2012, alleging violations of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA"). Plaintiff did not specify an amount-in-controversy in the complaint, but requested damages in an amount to be proven at trial, including treble damages. Id. at *5. On June 3, 2014, Plaintiff submitted responses to Defendant's interrogatories stating that "the total amount of monetary damages is expected to exceed $25,000,000." Id. Defendant then filed a notice of removal pursuant to the CAFA. Plaintiff moved to remand the case, arguing that Defendant's notice of removal was untimely because Defendant filed it more than two years after Plaintiff's initial complaint triggered federal jurisdiction under the FDCPA. Id. at *6. Defendant countered by claiming that the interrogatory answer provided the first occasion to ascertain an amount-in-controversy exceeding $5 million, an essential element of jurisdiction under the CAFA. Id. Not persuaded by Defendant's argument, the District Court remanded the case. The District Court adhered to the traditional strict construction afforded to removal statutes generally, and ruled that "the general principles of removal jurisdiction apply in CAFA cases" and "the relevant removal date is the date on which the case itself becomes removable." Id. at *7. Upon Defendant's appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed the District Court's decision. Relying on the recent U.S. Supreme Court decision in Dart Cherokee Basin Operating Co., LLC v. Owens, 135 S. Ct. 547 (2014), the Ninth Circuit adopted a much broader interpretation of the term "removal" under the CAFA. In doing so, the Ninth Circuit reiterated the logic of its opinion in Durham v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 445 F.3d 1247 (9th Cir. 2006), a federal officer removal case, in which the Ninth Circuit recognized that a "second and separate ground for removal, even if the initial complaint provided some other ground for removal" re-opened the 30 days removal window. Id. at *10. The Ninth Circuit noted that Durham identified "two plausible ways to construe" the term "removable:" one "binary – either there is a basis for the removal or there is not," and the other looks at each ground for removal separately. Id. Under this reading, "a case does not become removable until the particular basis on which the removal is sought becomes apparent for the record." Id. Based on the Supreme Court's command to liberally construe the "federal officer" removal statute, Durham applied the second broad construction to the removal. Citing Dart Cherokee, the Ninth Circuit pointed out that the policies underlying removal under the CAFA were similarly broad, and evince a strong preference that interstate class actions be heard in the federal judicial system if properly removed. Id. at *12-13. The Ninth Circuit therefore extended the rationale of Durham for a broad interpretation of federal officer removal to a removal under the CAFA, and explained that, even though Dart Cherokee focused on how specifically the amount-in-controversy requirement must be asserted in a Defendant's removal notice under the CAFA, the Supreme Court left no doubt that "no anti-removal presumption attends cases involving [the] CAFA." Id. at *14. The Ninth Circuit therefore concluded that Defendant's removal under the CAFA was timely, and accordingly reversed the District Court's remand order.

LaCross, et al. v. Knight Transportation, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 335 (9th Cir. Jan. 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of truck drivers, brought a state court action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors. Defendant removed the action to the District Court, and estimated that the amount-in-controversy for reimbursing the drivers' lease-related and fuel costs was at least $44 million. Subsequently, the District Court remanded the action, holding that Defendant did not meet its burden of proof to establish the amount-in-controversy because Defendant's calculations relied on a flawed assumption that all drivers worked 50 weeks a year. Id. at *4. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed. In Ibarra v. Manheim Investments, Inc., 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 334 (9th Cir. Jan. 8, 2015), the Ninth Circuit had held that a Defendant seeking removal bears the burden of proof to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the amount-in-controversy requirement is satisfied. Id. at *5. Further, Ibarra also opined that when a Defendant relies on a chain of reasoning that includes assumptions to satisfy its burden of proof, the chain of reasoning and its underlying assumptions must be reasonable ones. Id. at *6. Here, the complaint defined the class to include only the truck drivers, all of whom allegedly should have been classified as employees rather than as independent contractors. If Plaintiffs succeeded on their claim that they were employees, Defendant would have to reimburse them for expenditures related to the ownership and operation of their trucks, including lease-related costs and fuel costs. Defendant provided its drivers with fuel cards to pay for fuel at a discount, and the total fuel costs invoiced on these cards in the first quarter of 2014 were $2,369,628. Id. at *7. Defendant contended that if the quarterly fuel costs of $2.3 million were multiplied by 16 quarters in the four-year class period, the amount-in-controversy would be $36.8 million. Id. Defendant further extrapolated a more conservative estimate of total fuel costs by taking into account that the number of drivers varied each year. The number of drivers was the lowest in 2010, and even using the lowest number of drivers in 2010 for all 16 quarters during the relevant class period, the total estimated fuel costs would be $21 million. Id. at *8. The Ninth Circuit noted that the foregoing method of calculation extrapolated fuel costs based on the actual invoiced fuel costs in the first quarter of 2014 and the actual number of drivers who signed the independent contractor agreements with Defendant during the relevant class period, without relying on the assumption that each driver worked the entire year. The Ninth Circuit thus held that Defendant produced sufficient evidence to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. The Ninth Circuit determined that the chain of reasoning and its underlying assumption to extrapolate fuel costs for the entire class period using the actual invoiced fuel costs of one quarter were sound. Id. at *9. Because the complaint alleged that the class included only truck drivers, the fuel costs were necessary expenses in the discharge of the drivers' duties, and nothing in the record indicated that the drivers worked for another company while working for Defendant. Further, while the number of drivers varied during the class period, even using the lowest number of drivers in 2010 for all 16 quarters during the class period, the fuel costs would still exceed $5 million. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit reversed the District Court's remand order.

Levanoff, et al. v. SoCal Wings, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6287 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a state court class action alleging that Defendants failed to provide them with meal and rest periods and pay overtime wages in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs later filed a statement of damages estimating that the proposed class sustained damages of $8,160,000. Id. at *3. Subsequently, Plaintiffs filed their second amended complaint to include Dragas Homes, Inc. as a named Defendant. Id. at *4. After the state court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, Dragas Homes removed the action under the CAFA in November 2014, three years after the case was initiated and almost one year after it was named as a Defendant. Id. Plaintiffs moved to remand the case, arguing that the removal was untimely. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to remand. At the outset, the Court found that the basis for removal was not apparent from the face of the complaint. Id. at *6. The Court noted that under 28 U.S.C. § 1446(b)(3), a notice of removal may be filed within 30 days after receipt by Defendant, through service or otherwise, of a copy of an amended pleading, motion, order or other paper from which it may first be ascertained that the case is one which is or has become removable. Id. Defendant Dragas Homes argued that, prior to October 2014, it could not determine that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million until its own recent investigation into the damages Plaintiffs were seeking. Id. at *6-7. The Court, however, found that the facts and circumstances strongly suggested that Defendant Dragas Homes could have reasonably and intelligently ascertained the amount-in-controversy well before October 2014. Id. at *7. The Court maintained that the removal statute requires a Defendant to apply a reasonable amount of intelligence in ascertaining removability. Id. The Court remarked that Defendant Dragas Homes waited close to a year before removing the case. Although Plaintiffs filed their statement of damages prior to amending their complaint to properly add Dragas Homes, the Court opined that Dragas Homes should not be able to ignore pleadings or other documents from which removability could be ascertained and sought removal only when it became strategically advantageous for it to do so. Id. at *7-8. Thus, the Court concluded that the removal was untimely, and accordingly, granted Plaintiffs' motion to remand. Id. at *9.

Lucas, et al. v. Breg, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53085 (S.D. Cal. April 22, 2015). Plaintiff brought a state court class action on behalf of thousands of consumers in the United States and/or their insurers who purchased and/or rented BREG Polar Care products pursuant to a physician's prescription during the class period. Defendants filed a notice of a related case entitled Engler v. Chao, Oasis, Breg, Inc., et al., where Defendants admitted millions of BREG Polar Care products had been sold and generated close to $100 million in revenue, and where the jury reached a verdict of $5.196 million and $7 million in punitive damages against Defendant Breg, Inc. Id. at *7. The parties stipulated to transfer the case to the trial judge in Engler, who then scheduled discovery and class certification. After Plaintiffs served a response to admissions on Defendants confirming that they were seeking in excess of $5 million, Defendants removed the case. Plaintiffs moved to remand, which the Court denied. At the outset, the Court remarked that a Defendant must remove a case within 30 days after receiving the initial pleading, or after receiving an amended pleading, motion, order or other paper from which it can be ascertained that a case has become removable. Id. at *8. The Court noted that the initial complaint was limited to California consumers, and therefore, was not removable as it failed to establish diversity citizenship. The second and the third amended complaints expanded the class to include thousands of consumers throughout the United States, but it was still not clear if the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Id. at *11. Since none of the documents put Defendants on notice that the amount-in-controversy was $5 million, the Court remarked that Defendants were not required to extrapolate or engage in guesswork to determine the size of the class or the amount-in-controversy. Id. at *12-13. Since Plaintiffs' response to interrogatories was first fact that put Defendants on notice of the amount-in-controversy, the Court ruled that removal was timely, and denied Plaintiffs' motion to remand. Id. at *14-15.

Marentes, et al. v. Key Energy Services California, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21377 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 23, 2015). Plaintiff, on behalf of himself and other current and former hourly-paid or non-exempt California-based employees of Defendant, brought a state court class action alleging that Defendant failed to compensate the class members for all hours worked and for missed meal and rest breaks in violation of the California Labor Code. Defendant removed the action pursuant to the CAFA, contending that the complaint put the amount-in-controversy in excess of $5 million. Defendant submitted a report of its Senior Director of Employee Services, Marla Hill, stating that at least 1,700 individuals were employed in non-exempt positions during the class period. Id. at *5. Hill stated that those employees collectively worked more than 150,000 workweeks at an average hourly rate of at least $16 per hour. Id. Based on Hill's report, Defendant asserted that the total amount-in-controversy was at least $10.96 million. Hill also reported that 460 of the class members lost their employment in the class period. Defendant pegged the waiting time penalties of the 460 employees at $1.76 million. Id. at *8. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, and the Magistrate Judge recommended that it be granted. Plaintiff argued that Defendant's calculation relied solely on speculation and unsubstantiated assumptions, and that Hill's report was not competent evidence of the number of class members or workweeks. Id. at *8. Plaintiff contended that Defendant's waiting time calculation must be disregarded because Defendant calculated the amount-in-controversy with a 100% violation rate. Id. at *9. Plaintiff also asserted that Defendant made the unsubstantiated assumption that there were 460 putative class members who would make a claim for wage statement penalties. As to the meal and rest break claims, the Magistrate Judge noted that Defendant relied only on Hill's declaration to identify the number of putative class members, the number of weeks worked, and the average hourly rate. Id. at *16. The Magistrate Judge observed that Hill did not explain why she chose to use the average of the hourly rate of all 1,700 class members, and there was not demonstration that using an average made sense in this case. The Magistrate Judge reasoned that she could not presume that each of 1,700 putative class suffered rest and meal break violations. The Magistrate Judge ruled that Defendant failed to provide any evidence regarding why the assumption that each employee missed two rest periods per week was more appropriate than one missed rest period per paycheck or one missed rest period per month. Id. at *18. According to Defendant, Plaintiff's off-the-clock claims placed the amount-in-controversy at $2 million. Defendant noted that Plaintiff testified that he and the class members worked at least 15 minutes off-the-clock each day putting on their work clothes for which they were not compensated. The Magistrate Judge remarked that Plaintiff's testimony supported Defendant's calculations that each class member worked five days per week at an average of $16 per hour, and therefore, putting the amount-in-controversy at $2 million. Id. at *20. Finally, as to waiting time penalties, the Magistrate Judge noted that it was not clear whether Plaintiff had standing to bring this claim because he failed to make any allegations that Defendant failed to pay his final wages within 72 hours of the end of his employment. The Magistrate Judge concluded that assuming Plaintiff had a standing to bring the waiting time claims because Plaintiff claimed that those wages were alleged to have been unpaid for full 30 days for each class member, it appeared that there was only $1.68 million in controversy. Id. at *23. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the motion to remand be granted.

Oda, et al. v. Gucci America, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1672 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought two lawsuits against Defendant, including a putative class action alleging California Labor Code violations and another action seeking penalties under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). Id. at *1. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant failed to pay its non-exempt retail employees all wages owed by improperly rounding their hours, failing to pay overtime and vacation time wages, and failing to provide mandated rest, meal, and recovery periods. Id. at *2. Defendant removed both actions under the CAFA, and Plaintiffs moved to remand. The Court retained jurisdiction over the putative class action, but granted Plaintiffs' motion to remand the PAGA action. Plaintiffs argued that, in calculating the amount-in-controversy, Defendant improperly assumed the frequency with which Labor Code violations occurred rather than submitting evidence regarding the actual frequency of violations. Defendant calculated the amount-in-controversy by assuming that each of the over 300 class members suffered at least one violation per week and, accordingly, calculated the amount-in-controversy at $471,469 for Plaintiffs' unpaid wages claim and $707,357 for Plaintiffs' unpaid overtime claim. Id. at *9. In calculating the amount-in-controversy for Plaintiffs' minimum wage claim, Defendant applied the $8 minimum hourly wage and estimated the amount-in-controversy to be $244,760. Id. For the Plaintiffs' waiting time claim, Defendant assumed that each terminated putative class member was entitled to 30 days of continuation wages at 8 hours of standard pay per day and, therefore, calculated the claim as worth $588,046. Id. at *10. Defendant assumed that each class member experienced 2.5 meal period violations in a 5-day workweek and 2.5 rest period violations in the same time period and, on that basis, calculated the amount-in-controversy for Plaintiffs' meal and rest period claim as $2,357,346. Id. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant sometimes failed to provide accurate and complete itemized wage statements and, assuming that each putative class member was entitled to receive $4,000, calculated the amount-in-controversy for this claim as $948,000. Id. at *11. Because Plaintiffs also sought attorneys' fees, Defendant assumed that Plaintiffs would recover another 25%. Based on the foregoing, Defendant asserted that the amount-in-controversy before attorneys' fees was $5,316,978, and with the 25% fee award, the amount-in-controversy would total $6,646,223. Id. at *12. The Court found that, in light of Plaintiffs' allegations that Defendant maintained a policy or practice of not paying additional compensation for missed meal and/or rest periods, Defendant's assumption of a 50% violation was reasonable. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Defendant met the amount-in-controversy requirement and denied Plaintiffs' motion to remand. As to the PAGA claims, Defendant asserted that both the class action and the PAGA action should be treated as one case for jurisdictional purposes. Id. at *14. The Court noted that Plaintiffs filed their claims as separate actions, and Defendant never moved to consolidate the cases. Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs' PAGA action did not raise a federal question, and Defendant neither proved that diversity jurisdiction existed nor offered any allegations of the amount that would be recoverable solely by Plaintiffs. Id. Because the CAFA did not confer subject-matter jurisdiction over the PAGA claims, the Court remanded the PAGA action. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to remand the class action and remanded the PAGA action.

Olson, et al. v. USPLabs, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97096 (C.D. Cal. July 23, 2015). In this action, Plaintiffs' claims were coordinated in sixteen cases in Los Angeles County Superior Court in In Re JCCP 4808, USPLabs Dietary Supplement Cases (the "JCCP"). Defendants removed the action pursuant to the "mass action" provisions of the CAFA. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs then moved to remand the action, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs argued that since they sought to coordinate the various actions solely for pre-trial proceedings, and not for "joint trial," the proceeding did not meet the mass action requirements. Id. at *2-3. After carefully assessing the language of Plaintiffs' petition for coordination to see whether, in language or substance, they proposed a joint trial, the Court found that Plaintiffs proposed coordination was for pre-trial purposes only. Id. at *5-6. First, the Court noted that in their petition, Plaintiffs requested assignment of one judge to determine whether "coordination for discovery" into one proceeding was appropriate. Id. at *6. The Court pointed out that unlike the petition in the similar case of Corber v. Xanodyne Pharm., Inc., 771 F.3d 1218 (9th Cir. 2014), which proposed coordination "for all purposes," Plaintiffs' petition in this case specifically sought coordination "for discovery," and did not contain the phrase "for all purposes." Id. Plaintiffs had also stated that the cases would involve numerous pre-trial motions, and numerous corporate depositions, and that coordination would save counsel from filing duplicative motions in multiple courts. Moreover, Plaintiffs stated that one pre-trial judge would foster judicial economy and preserve valuable judicial resources, and that coordination would avoid the potential for inconsistent rulings on nearly identical motions and avoid wasteful, duplicative motion practice. Id. The Court thus concluded that unlike the reasons for coordination given in Corber, the reasons given in this case focused on pre-trial issues and not on trial. Id. In particular, the Court found Plaintiffs' motion did not mention "inconsistent judgments," or "conflicting determinations of liability" anywhere in it, key phrases that were critical to the analysis in Corber, since each of those phrases was determined to be an implicit request for joint trial. Id. at *6-7. Accordingly, the Court concluded that because Plaintiffs sought coordination for "pre-trial purposes" only, and not for "joint trial," they had not met the jurisdictional requirements under the CAFA. Id. at *7.

Reyes, et al. v. Dollar Tree Stores, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 5222 (9th Cir. April 1, 2015). Plaintiff, an employee, brought a state court putative class action alleging that Defendant denied its employees proper rest breaks in violation § 226.7 of the California Labor Code. Plaintiff subsequently amended his complaint by asserting a second cause of action for unlawful business conduct in violation of § 17200 of the California Business and Professions Code. Defendant then removed the action on the basis of jurisdiction under the CAFA, and placed the amount-in-controversy at $5,25,950. Id. at *4. Plaintiff moved to remand, arguing that Defendant's amount-in-controversy assumption factored an inaccurate 65% violation rate. Plaintiff claimed that only one-third of the shifts were worked alone, and that the amount-in-controversy was therefore only $2,866,722. Id. at *5. The District Court agreed and remanded the action. After the remand, Plaintiff sought certification of a class consisting of current and former non-exempt assistant store managers who worked alone. The state trial court issued a tentative ruling, concluding that a class of assistant managers who worked alone would not be ascertainable. Id. at *6. Noting that California law permitted the judge to depart from Plaintiff's proposed definition and redefine the class, the tentative ruling instead proposed certifying a class consisting of all assistant managers who did not receive proper breaks, regardless of whether they worked alone. Id. Defendant again removed the action, arguing that the expanded class placed at least $5 million in controversy. The District Court subsequently remanded the action on the basis that the second removal was untimely. Id. at *7. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded. At the outset, the Ninth Circuit noted a successive removal petition is permitted only upon a relevant change of circumstance, i.e., when subsequent pleadings or events revealed a "new and different ground for removal." Id. at *8. In this instance, the Ninth Circuit reasoned that on the first motion for remand, the District Court construed the amended complaint to cover only rest breaks during shifts in which class members worked alone and found that it did not meet the CAFA's amount-in-controversy threshold. Id. When the state trial court certified a class of employees who worked shifts without proper rest breaks, it did so regardless of whether they worked alone. The state trial court expressly acknowledged that it had diverged from the narrower definition of the class that the District Court had ruled in the first motion. Because the class certification order altered the circumstances, the Ninth Circuit opined that the second remand was permissible. Id. at *10. The Ninth Circuit also opined that the second notice of removal was timely because an action can be removed during the first 30 days after a Defendant receives an amended pleading, motion, "order," or other paper from which it may first be ascertained that the case becomes removable. Id. Because Defendant filed its second notice of removal within 30 days after the state trial court passed the class certification order, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the removal was timely. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit remanded the action, directing the District Court to exercise jurisdiction.

Roa, et al. v. TS Staffing Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7442 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 22, 2015). Plaintiff, a former employee, brought a state court class action against Defendants alleging numerous wage & hour violations. Defendants removed the case pursuant to the CAFA. Plaintiff moved to remand, which the Court denied. Plaintiff objected to a declaration filed in support of Defendants' notice of removal on several evidentiary grounds and requested that the Court strike most portions of the declaration. Id. at *3. At the outset, the Court noted that the U.S. Supreme Court in Dart Cherokee Basin Operating Co. v. Owens, 135 S. Ct. 547 (2014), relying on the parallel language in § 1446(a) and Rule 8(a), held that when a Defendant seeks federal court adjudication, Defendant's allegation should be accepted when not contested by Plaintiff or questioned by the Court. Id. at *3-4. The Supreme Court explained that when a Plaintiff contests an allegation in the notice of removal, both sides submit proof, and then the Court decides, by a preponderance of the evidence, whether the amount-in-controversy requirement has been satisfied. Id. at *4. The Supreme Court instructed that no anti-removal presumption attends cases invoking the CAFA. Id. Here, Defendants specifically alleged that they satisfied each element of the CAFA, and that under Dart

Cherokee, the Court must accept these allegations as true unless contested by Plaintiff or questioned by the Court. The Court noted that Plaintiff did not contest the allegations themselves, but instead contested Defendants' evidence in support of the allegations. Id. The Court reasoned that if Defendants were not required to submit evidence in support of their allegations, Plaintiff's attack on the evidence was fallacious. Id. at *4-5. In light of the "no anti-removal presumption" established by Dart Cherokee, the Court determined that it had no reason to question Defendants' allegations. Id. at *5. Furthermore, the Court remarked that Plaintiff submitted no independent evidence for the Court to consider. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to remand.

Yocupicio, et al. v. Page Group, LLC*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13273 (9th Cir. July 30, 2015). Plaintiff, an employee, brought a class action in state court, alleging violations of the California Labor Code relative to meal and rest periods and failure to pay minimum wages. Plaintiff alleged ten causes of action, nine of which were brought as class claims; the tenth cause of action was brought as a representative claim under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). Id. at *3. Plaintiff sought $1,654,874 in class claims and $3,247,950 for the PAGA claim, totaling $4,902,824. Id. Defendants contended that addition of reasonable attorneys' fees would cause the total recovery for the class claims and the PAGA claim to surpass the $5 million threshold of the CAFA. Id. On this basis, Defendant removed the action under the CAFA. The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion to remand, and on appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed. Although causes of action one through nine were class claims, and they would satisfy the CAFA's numerosity and minimal diversity requirement, the Ninth Circuit noted that those claims, taken singly or aggregated, did not meet the $5 million requirement. Further, because the PAGA cause of action was not brought as a class claim and instead was brought as a representative claim, the Ninth Circuit ruled that it could not be deemed to be a class claim governed by Rule 23. Id. at *5. The District Court, however, had considered both the amounts asked for in the class claims and in the PAGA claim when it decided that the $5 million threshold was exceeded. The Ninth Circuit reasoned that when a Plaintiff files an action that contains both class claims as well as non-class claims, and when the class claims do not meet the jurisdictional threshold for the amount-in-controversy, the CAFA's diversity jurisdiction cannot be invoked to give the District Court jurisdiction over the non-class claims. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded.

(x) Tenth Circuit

Gibson, et al. v. Continental Resources, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 137292 (W.D. Okla. Oct. 8, 2015). Plaintiff brought a state court class action alleging that Plaintiff and putative class members, owners of overriding royalty interests ("ORRI") in wells operated by Defendant, were entitled to payments from Defendant equal to their proportionate share of the proceeds from hydrocarbon sales. Defendant removed the case on the basis of jurisdiction under the CAFA pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 1332(d) and 1453. Id. at *2-3. Subsequently, Plaintiff moved to remand and sought leave to conduct additional jurisdictional discovery. Id. at *3. The Court granted Plaintiff leave to conduct additional jurisdictional discovery before ruling on her motion to remand. Id. at *8. Plaintiff contended that Defendant's removal notice was insufficient to meet the minimal diversity requirement pursuant to § 1332(d)(2) since Defendant's reliance on out-of-state addresses was not sufficient to establish citizenship pursuant to the CAFA. Id. at *5-6. The Court noted that in Defendant's notice of removal, Defendant alleged that many of the persons who owned ORRI were citizens of states other than Oklahoma. Id. at *7. Further, Defendant contended that the number of class members exceeded 100 and damages were in an amount in excess of $10 million. Id. Based on Defendant's notice of removal, the Court found that Defendant satisfied the minimal diversity requirement. Id. Plaintiff further contended that the Court should decline jurisdiction under one of the exceptions to the CAFA. Id. However, Plaintiff requested that the Court stay its ruling on the motion to remand until after Plaintiff conducted limited discovery into jurisdictional matters regarding the citizenship of the class members. Id. The Court held that Plaintiff should be allowed to conduct limited jurisdictional discovery to determine the citizenship of the class members, specifically noting that Defendant acknowledged that the percentage of putative class members with an Oklahoma address implicates the statutory threshold material to the "interest of justice" exception in § 1332(d)(3). Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff leave to conduct additional jurisdictional discovery regarding the citizenship of the class members, and thus stayed its ruling on the motion to remand. Id. at *8.

(xi) Eleventh Circuit

Faust, et al. v. Maxum Casualty Insurance Co.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48897 (M.D. Fla. April 14, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative state court class action alleging that Defendant breached the terms of insurance policies by refusing to pay submitted mileage expenses. Defendant removed the action, asserting subject-matter jurisdiction under the CAFA. Plaintiff moved to remand the case on the grounds that Defendant failed to satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement for removal pursuant to the CAFA. Id. at *2. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion to remand. Id. at *7. Plaintiff argued that the case should be remanded because the amount-in-controversy was less than $5 million. Id. at *3. Defendant's notice of removal asserted that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million because the purported class sought "twice the service charge paid," the policy at issue provided for $5,000 of benefits, and there were "thousands" of class members; thus, if only 2,000 class members were considered, the amount-in-controversy would be $20 million. Id. at *4-5. The sole evidence provided in support of Defendant's notice of removal was a copy of the insurance policy at issue. Id. at *5. Plaintiff contended that the matter should be remanded because claims for mileage reimbursement were generally less than $400. Id. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that it should consider the policy limit set forth in the insurance policy, and not consider the speculative amount of each claim when determining if the amount-in-controversy requirement was satisfied. Id. The Court noted that Defendant's argument was contrary to case law precedent in the Eleventh Circuit, where many decisions have held that it is the value of the claim at issue, not the value of the policy limit, that is considered for purposes of determining the amount-in-controversy. Id. Since Defendant offered no evidence other than a copy of the insurance policy at issue to show that the amount-in-controversy requirement of an aggregate of $5 million in claims was satisfied, the Court held it would be impermissible speculation for the Court to hazard a guess on the jurisdictional amount-in-controversy without the benefit of any evidence on the value of individual claims. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion to remand. Id.

(xii) District Of Columbia Circuit

McMullen, et al. v. Synchrony Bank*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17955 (D.D.C. Feb. 13, 2015). Plaintiff, a customer, brought a class action in the state court alleging that Defendants fraudulently took out lines of credit against customers and billed against those lines of credit without the customers' knowledge or authorization in violation of the District of Columbia Consumer Protection Procedures Act. Defendants removed the action, and Plaintiff moved to remand, which the Court denied. At the outset, the Court noted that it was undisputed that Plaintiff had alleged a class action and that the parties were minimally diverse. Plaintiff contended that the CAFA's local controversy exception warranted remand. For the local controversy exception to apply, there must be: (i) over two-thirds of the class members should be from the District of Columbia; (ii) at least one Defendant from whom the significant relief was sought was from the District of Columbia; and (iii) the injuries occurred in the District of Columbia. Id. at *12-13. The parties agreed that the principal injuries occurred in the District of Columbia, and that no other class action was filed on the same allegations. Id. at *14. As to the citizenship of Defendants, Plaintiff asserted three Defendants – One World Fitness, Bullen Wellness, and Washington Chiropractic – were citizens of the District of Columbia because they were limited liability companies formed under the laws of the District of Columbia. Defendant JP Morgan Chase & Co. ("Chase") did not dispute Plaintiff's factual allegations about the companies' formations or their primary place of businesses; instead, it contended that those companies carried the citizenship of their members for diversity purposes, and Plaintiff failed to produce any evidence identifying the companies' members or their members' citizenship. Id. at *15. The Court disagreed, finding that the CAFA specifically provides that an unincorporated association shall be deemed to be a citizen of the State where it has its principal place of business. Accordingly, the Court ruled that those businesses were citizens of the District of Columbia under the CAFA. Further, Chase did not dispute that the local Defendants formed a significant basis for the claims asserted by the proposed class, as the local Defendants were allegedly responsible for setting in motion the actions that subsequently harmed Plaintiff. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff established that there was at least one local Defendant from whom significant relief was sought who was a citizen of the District of Columbia. Finally, as to the citizenship of the proposed class, the Court found that Plaintiff had not clearly limited the class to the District of Columbia citizens and had failed to provide any evidence concerning the citizenship of the putative class members. Id. at *23. As a result, Plaintiff then sought for expedited discovery on the issue of class citizenship. The Court, accordingly, denied the motion to remand, and ordered expedited limited discovery regarding the citizenship of the putative class members.

IX. Other Federal Rulings Affecting The Defense Of Workplace Class Action Litigation

Throughout 2015, federal courts issued key rulings in class action lawsuits and on Rule 23 issues that significantly impact the defense of workplace class actions. Those rulings included class certification procedural issues and proof requirements; preemptive motions to strike or dismiss class allegations; the numerosity requirement for class certification; the commonality requirement for class certification; the typicality requirement for class certification; the adequacy of representation requirement for class certification; the predominance requirement for class certification; the superiority requirement for class certification; workplace class action arbitration issues; non-workplace class action arbitration issues; litigation over class action settlement agreements and consent decrees; ascertainability under Rule 23; class actions involving unions; attorneys' fee awards in class actions; intervention rights in class actions; collateral estoppel, res judicata, and settlement bar concepts under Rule 23; notice issues in class actions; multi-party litigation over modification of employee/retirement benefits; civil rights class actions; class action discovery issues; class-wide proof and class-wide damages in class actions; multi-party litigation under the Warn Act; class definition issues; settlement approval issues in class actions; mootness issues in class action litigation; experts in class action litigation; sanctions in class action litigation; issues with the judicial panel on multi-district litigation in class actions; standing issues in class actions; application of tolling principles in class actions; exhaustion principles in class actions; appointment and selection of counsel in class actions; workplace RICO class actions; public employee class actions; injunctions in class actions; FACTA and FDCPA class actions; TCPA class actions; the cy pres doctrine in class actions; impact of unethical conduct in class actions; objectors in class actions; privacy class actions; choice-of-law issues in class actions; insurance-related class actions; disparate impact issues in class actions; ADA class actions; government enforcement litigation; alien tort statute and trafficking victims class actions; workplace antitrust class actions; stays in class action litigation; FCRA class actions; appeals in class action litigation; certification of defendant classes; venue issues in class actions; bifurcation issues in class actions; joinder and severance issues in class actions; comity principles in class actions; breach of contract class actions; amendments in class action litigation; foreign worker class actions; juries in class actions; disqualification of counsel in class actions; statute of limitations issues in class actions; medical monitoring class actions; pseudonyms and confidential witnesses in class action litigation; consumer fraud class actions; recusal issues in class actions; settlement administration issues in class actions; removal issues in class actions; employee testing issues in class actions; consolidation issues in class actions; settlement enforcement issues in class action litigation; case management issues of class actions; trial issues in class action litigation; immigration class actions; class actions under 42 U.S.C. § 1981; costs in class actions; media privilege issues in class actions; issue certification under Rule 23(c); special masters in class actions; and incentive awards in class actions.

These rulings of 2015 added to the evolving case law interpreting Rule 23, and significantly impact the defense of workplace class actions.

(i) Class Certification Procedural Issues And Proof Requirements

Artis, et al. v. Yellen*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80329 (D.D.C. June 22, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging class-wide discrimination against African-American secretarial and clerical employees. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification, and directed the parties to confer and submit a proposed schedule for the next phase of the litigation. Id. at *4. Defendant then asserted that Plaintiffs' complaint did not set forth sufficient factual description of their individual claims of discrimination and requested that the Court order Plaintiffs to file an amended complaint setting forth such facts. Id. at *5. The Court held that if Plaintiffs intend to file an amended complaint, it must be filed before Phase II discovery began. Id. at *6. Because Plaintiffs did not file an amended complaint, Defendant moved to strike the class allegations in Plaintiffs' fourth amended complaint and for an order directing them to amend their complaint to state their individual claims of discrimination only. Thereafter, Plaintiffs moved for an immediate jury trial on issues involving the Court's resolution of various class-discovery disputes and the merits of their class-wide pattern or practice claim. Further, Plaintiffs moved to reiterate their request for a jury trial, requested a status hearing to discuss the scope of merits discovery, and indicated that if the Court granted Defendant's motion to strike, Plaintiffs would refuse to amend their complaint. The Court granted Defendant's motion and denied Plaintiffs' motion. The amended complaint focused almost entirely on class-wide claims. Because the extent to which class allegations were interspersed throughout the complaint rendered it impossible to discern what individual claims remained after the denial of class certification, the Court remarked that the pleadings should be amended to eliminate class allegations, so that the action could proceed as an individual action. Id. at *11. Thus, the Court granted Defendant's request to strike the class allegations. The Court also noted that the pattern or practice method of proof is not available to private, non-class Plaintiffs who ordinarily must show that an employer took an adverse employment action against him or her because of his or her race. Id. at *13. Further, the Court observed that a pattern or practice theory alone cannot support Plaintiffs' claims which, after the denial of class certification, must proceed as individual claims. Id. at *14. Thus, the Court held that Plaintiffs' complaint must contain a short and plain statement of each Plaintiff's claim for having suffered individual disparate treatment on the basis of race. Id. at *16. The Court remarked that if Plaintiffs refused to file an amended complaint, or if they filed one that did not comply with this order, their history of refusal to follow the rules of procedure and the Court's orders would justify the severe sanction of a dismissal on the merits. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to strike the class allegations and directed Plaintiffs to file a fifth amended complaint setting forth with sufficient particularity their individual claims of discrimination.

Belfiore, et al. v. The Procter & Gamble Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 137034 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant misrepresented that its bath tissues and bath wipes were flushable when they were not flushable, causing clogging of their sewage disposal facilities, in violation of consumer protection laws. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's product did not break down sufficiently to pass through pipes and caused a clogged toilet and a sewer backup. The named Plaintiff sought a fixed statutory amount of $50 for each purchase by each class member, individual damages for harm to his home's waste pipes, and an injunction prohibiting Defendant from calling its product "flushable" or "safe for sewer and septic systems." Id. at *4. Plaintiffs sought certification of a statutory damages class of consumers in New York who purchased Defendant's wipes marked "flushable." Id. Defendant moved to deny class certification. The Court stayed both motions, however, and referred the appropriate definition of "flushable" and related issues to the U.S. Federal Trade Commission ("FTC"). The Court noted that the FTC was engaged in an on-going inquiry into Defendant's use of the term "flushable." The FTC recently negotiated a consent agreement with one of Defendant's competitors that limited the manufacturer's description of its products as "flushable." Id. at *19-20. According to the definition used in the consent order, "flushable" products must move through household and municipal pipes quickly enough to avoid clogging. Id. at *23. The FTC also informally had questioned Defendant about its activities, and significant media attention, domestically and internationally, had been devoted to questioning the flushability of "flushable" wipes. Id. at *25-28. The Court found that certification of a statutory damage class would pit New York State's consumer protection law, which explicitly prohibits statutory damages in class actions, against the federal class action rule, which contains no such prohibition, and undermine the state's policy to prevent catastrophic and unfair judgments against Defendants. Further, certification of a damages or an injunctive relief class might thwart the development of an integrated and transparent national market. With multiple cases pending before the Court and others across the nation, the FTC's engagement in an on-going inquiry of Defendant, and the agency's pending agreement with another manufacturer, the Court found a substantial risk of inconsistent judgments regarding the meaning of "flushable." Id. at *5. The Court reasoned that a robust management of the term by the FTC, rather than by the court system, could avoid unnecessary inconsistencies and controversies, helping manufacturers, retail vendors, and consumers alike. Id. at *5-6. The Court, therefore, stayed Plaintiffs' motion for class certification and Defendant's motion to deny class certification and referred the issue of an appropriate definition of "flushable" and related issues to the FTC. Id. The Court ordered that, when circumstances change, the parties could move to lift the stay, and based on the information before it, it likely would deny certification of a damages class but grant certification of an injunctive relief class.

Cin-Q Automobiles, Inc., et al. v. Buccaneers Limited Partnership,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58665 (M.D. Fla. May 5, 2015). Plaintiff, individually and on behalf of those similarly-situated, brought a class action seeking to recover damages for purported unsolicited facsimiles that Defendant transmitted in violation of the Junk Fax Prevention Act of 2005. Plaintiff also sought to recover for common law conversion claims. Earlier, the Court had granted Defendant's motion to bifurcate liability and class certification issues, determining that the appropriate standard of liability should be addressed prior to any consideration of class certification. Subsequently, the Court had denied the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment. While Defendant moved to bifurcate and proceed directly to trial on liability, Plaintiff moved for reconsideration of the Court's order denying summary judgment or, in the alternative, to certify questions for interlocutory review. The Court denied both the motions. First, regarding Defendant's motion to bifurcate and proceed directly to trial on liability, Defendant argued that an immediate trial on liability could obviate the need for eight to twelve additional months of proceedings and expenses related to class certification. Id. at *3. The Court cited the U.S. Supreme Court's holding in Amgen Inc. v. Connecticut Retirement Plans & Trust Funds, 133 S. Ct. 1184 (2013), for the proposition that Rule 23 grants no license to engage in free-ranging merits inquiries at the certification stage. Id. at *3-4. The Court noted that the purpose of a Rule 23(b)(3) certification ruling is to select the "method" best suited to adjudication of the controversy "fairly and efficiently." Id. at *4. The Court observed that to proceed to a trial on liability prior to class certification would, procedurally, "put the cart before the horse." Id. In addition, the Court reasoned continuing the bifurcated procedure would risk an unnecessary trial and multiple intervening appeals that would pose an even greater threat to the speedy and inexpensive disposition of this case. Id. at *4-5. Regarding Plaintiff's motion for reconsideration, the Court found that no change in law or the need to correct clear error or manifest injustice existed. Id. at *6. While Plaintiff attempted to buttress its position by submitting that a "but-for causation" element would solve one of the Court's interpretive concerns relating to "sabotage liability," the Court did not agree that Plaintiff's proposal would necessarily solve the analytical dilemma. Id. Finally, regarding Plaintiff's requests to certify questions for interlocutory review, the Court found that the interpretive issue at hand involved a controlling question of law to which there was substantial ground for difference of opinion. Id. at *9. In light of the procedural posture of this case, however, the Court observed that an interlocutory appeal would not materially advance the ultimate termination of this litigation. The Court opined that the case would not proceed directly to trial on liability, but rather would proceed directly to class discovery and Plaintiff's anticipated motion for class certification, and upon disposition of that motion, the parties would be able to petition for interlocutory review. Id. at *9-10. For these reasons, the Court concluded that granting interlocutory appeal at this juncture would not avoid a trial, nor would it substantially shorten the life of the action. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' motions.

Douglas, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171494 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 22, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, brought a class action against Defendant alleging unjust enrichment, tortious interference with contractual and/or advantageous relations, and violation of the California Labor Code and other state laws by misclassifying Plaintiffs as independent contractors. Previously, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for a class certification, including a sub-class of drivers who had signed arbitration contracts (which specified that the drivers had to arbitrate any employment-related claims on an individual basis). In certifying the sub-class, the Court found the arbitration agreements unenforceable, and also denied Defendants' motion to compel arbitration of Plaintiffs' claims. Defendant filed an interlocutory appeal of the orders certifying the class and denying the motion to compel arbitration. Because the Court had set a trial date for June 20, 2016, Defendant filed a motion to stay all proceedings pending its appeal. The Court denied the motion in part and granted it in part. The Court rejected Defendant's arguments that it would face irreparable harm absent a stay. While acknowledging that the appeal raised significant legal questions, the Court opined that Defendant did not present an "all or nothing" situation where it would be forced to "endure the time and expense of a trial" should the arbitration clause ultimately be enforced. Id. at *12. Rather, even though it found that Defendant's appeal was apt to be unsuccessful, the Court reasoned that the effect of the class certification order will be to affect the size of the class going to trial, and not the fact or temporal scope of the trial. Accordingly, the Court determined that a stay was unnecessary, but granted Defendant's motion in part by indicating that if the appeal was still pending at the time of the trial, the Court would stay entry of any final judgment subject to the appeal.

Folks, et al. v. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 7061 (10th Cir. April 28, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay her personal injury protection ("PIP") benefits under the Colorado Auto Accident Reparations Act ("CAARA"). Plaintiff's action stemmed from injuries she received in 1998 when she was hit by a vehicle insured by Defendant. Under the CAARA, automobile insurers must include a basic level of PIP, as well as optional enhanced PIP benefits in exchange for higher premiums. Id. at *3. Notwithstanding the CAARA, Defendant failed to offer or pay enhanced PIP benefits for injured pedestrians, even if the policyholders had selected enhanced PIP benefits for the policy generally. Before the statute of limitations expired on her claim, Plaintiff became part of the putative class in a related class action suit entitled Clark v. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co., 590 F.3d 1134 (10th Cir. 2009), which tolled her statute of limitations. Id. at *4-5. The District Court denied Clark's motion for class certification on multiple grounds, including that, because Defendant undertook a voluntary payment program ("VPP") to pay extended PIP benefits to individuals who potentially were entitled to reformation, Clark's individual claims were moot and he was neither typical nor adequate as a class representative. Id. at *6. In 2004, Plaintiff joined as a named Plaintiff a lawsuit that Kim Nguyen brought against Defendant asserting claims for declaratory relief and reformation. Id. at *8. The District Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, finding that Nguyen was not entitled to reformation because she was injured as a passenger, not as a pedestrian, and Plaintiff's claims were time-barred because she filed her lawsuit after expiration of the three-year statute of limitations. The Tenth Circuit, however, reversed, finding that Plaintiff's claims were timely because she belonged to the putative class in Clark and joined Nguyen's lawsuit before the denial of class certification in Clark. Id. at *9. Following remand, Plaintiff moved for class certification. The District Court denied her motion on the basis that Plaintiff's individual claims predominated over her class claims. Id. at *12. Plaintiff then proceeded to trial on her individual claims and obtained a jury award for $40,000 in actual damages, $96,000 for willful and wanton conduct, and pre-judgment interest. Pursuant to parties' motions, the District Court trebled the $40,000 for a total of $120,000, took away the additional $96,000, and awarded more than $23,000 in pre-judgment interest. Id. at *14. Plaintiff appealed, challenging the District Court's denial of class certification and calculation of treble damages and pre-judgment interest. The Tenth Circuit affirmed the District Court's denial of class certification finding that Plaintiff had forfeited her class certification arguments raised for the first time on appeal. The Tenth Circuit noted that, because Plaintiff did not challenge the District Court's determination that class certification was not warranted on the issues of reformation and damages, she intentionally had relinquished or abandoned her arguments regarding reformation and damages. Id. at *17. Although Plaintiff argued that she sought a class-wide declaration that Defendant's policy limitation was invalid and a notice to class members that would correct Defendant's misleading statement and enable them to protect their rights, the Tenth Circuit concluded that Plaintiff had forfeited any argument that the District Court erred in failing to consider whether notice would provide a basis to certify a class because in her motion she sought only class-wide contract reformation, a class-wide date of reformation and damages, and she did not argue for notice with sufficient specificity. Id. at *19-20. The Tenth Circuit explained that Plaintiff's demand for reformation and damages did not provide cover for her to extrapolate a new, specific demand for corrective notice on appeal, especially when she expressly indicated to the District Court that reformation was required to provide relief to the class. Id. at *27-28. Accordingly, the Tenth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling.

Friedman, et al. v. Dollar Thrifty Automotive Group, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 85698 (D. Colo. July 1, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendant rental car companies tricked consumers into buying loss damage waiver ("LDW"), supplemental liability insurance, and roadside assistance, without proper consent or disclosure. The Court granted Plaintiffs' revised motion for class certification as to Plaintiffs' Colorado Consumer Protection Act ("CCPA") claim and ordered Plaintiffs to file a fourth amended complaint. Id. at *2. Defendants subsequently moved for reconsideration of the Court's order and for judgment on the pleadings. The Court granted Defendants' motion for reconsideration. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs could not pursue a class action for damages under the CCPA. The Court observed that § 6-1-113(2) of the Colorado Revised Statute provides that, "[e]xcept in a class action . . . any person who . . . engage[s] in any deceptive trade practice . . . shall be liable in an amount equal to the sum of: . . . (i) [t]he amount of actual damages sustained; or (ii) [f]ive hundred dollars; or (iii) [t]hree times the amount of actual damages sustained, if it is established by clear and convincing evidence that such person engaged in bad faith conduct; plus . . . the costs of the action together with reasonable attorney fees as determined by the court." Id. at *7. The Court noted that previous case law held that the plain and unambiguous language of the statute compelled the conclusion that the remedies provided, including actual damages, were not available in class actions. Id. at *9. Because Plaintiffs relied solely on monetary relief under Rule 23(b)(3) as a basis for class certification, and Plaintiffs could not recover monetary damages in a class action, the Court opined that a class action was not a superior method of adjudication. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion for reconsideration and held that Plaintiffs' motion for class certification should be denied. In addition, the Court granted Defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings to the extent that Plaintiffs could not pursue a class action seeking monetary damages under the CCPA, but denied the motion to the extent that Defendants sought judgment as to the claims of individual Plaintiffs. Id. at *19. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to allege that a deceptive trade practice listed in the statute caused an injury-in-fact consistent with CCPA. The Court disagreed. The Court noted that § 203 of the CCPA requires rental car companies to provide advance written disclosures and states that "the failure by a lessor to comply with any provision of the section is a deceptive trade practice." Id. at *21. The Court, therefore, found that Defendants' alleged failure to make advance written disclosures was a material act that gave rise to Plaintiffs' claims, irrespective of whether Plaintiffs alleged that they were misled by the disclosures or the lack thereof. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion for reconsideration, denied class certification, and granted in part and denied in part Defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings.

Garcia, et al. v. Concentra Health Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7476 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 22, 2015). In this action asserting claims under state law, the Court struck the class allegations from the complaint for Plaintiff's failure to timely file a motion for class certification in compliance with Local Rule 23-3. Local Rule 23-3 provides that within 90 days of service of a pleading to commence a class action, other than an action subject to the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995, the proponent of the class shall file a motion for certification that the action is maintainable as a class action, unless otherwise ordered by the Court. Id. at *1. Plaintiff filed her complaint on February 5, 2014 in California state court, and after conducting discovery concerning her citizenship, Defendant filed a second notice of removal on August 28, 2014. The Court remarked that even assuming that Local Rule 23-3's 90-day requirement began running on August 28, 2014, the motion for class certification should have been filed no later than November 26, 2014. Plaintiff, however, failed to move for class certification by that date. Plaintiff contended that good cause existed to vacate the 90-day deadline because of the complexity of the case and the amount of discovery needed to establish the class certification requirements of Rule 23. The Court noted that although the California state court had issued a stay of discovery on March 11, 2014, the stay was lifted on May 12, 2014. Even if Defendant filed the second notice of removal on August 28, 2014, Plaintiff had not started conducting discovery when she e-mailed Defendant on November 3, 2014 to discuss relief from Local Rule 23-3. Since Plaintiff failed to explain why she did not engage in any discovery more than two months after the case was removed, the Court opined that Plaintiff did not show good cause for her failure to file a motion for class certification within the time permitted by Local Rule 23-3. Id. at *3. Additionally, the Court noted that while Rule 23(c)(1) provides that the Court must determine by order whether to certify the action as a class action at an early practicable time, Local Rule 23-3 provides for 90 days' time to file a motion for class certification, and permits the Court to set a different deadline that is both "early" and "practicable" in a manner that is consistent with Rule 23(c)(1). Id. at *4. Accordingly, the Court rejected Plaintiff's argument that Local Rule 23-3 was inconsistent with Rule 23(c)(1), and struck the class allegations in her complaint.

Gbarabe, et al. v. Chevron Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 98552 (N.D. Cal. July 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of residents in the Niger Delta region of Southern Nigeria, brought a class action alleging that they were affected when the explosion in one of Defendant's drilling rigs caused a fire that burned for 46 days and resulted in environmental damage. Plaintiffs sought to represent 65,000 people who were affected by the explosion. The Court had previously dismissed Plaintiffs' complaint in part because the named Plaintiffs purported to represent some 65,000 other members of the Nigerian communities affected by the explosion and fire through a power of attorney. Id. at *2. The Court had reasoned that the federal rules require that an action be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. Id. at *3. The Court then dismissed the second amended complaint because it failed to allege that the named Plaintiffs had suffered an injury-in-fact. Id. Plaintiffs then filed a third amended complaint ("TAC") without Defendant's consent or leave of the Court, removing five and adding 11 named Plaintiffs. Defendant moved to strike or dismiss the TAC, which the Court granted. Defendant argued that Plaintiff should have sought leave to amend the complaint, and Plaintiffs responded that the TAC named no new Plaintiffs and was filed within the time stipulated in the order permitting Plaintiffs to file appropriate pleadings. The Court remarked that Plaintiffs seemed to suggest that the 11 new Plaintiffs who were added were not new because they were among the 65,000 putative class members that the original named Plaintiffs claimed to represent through a power of attorney. Id. at *5. The Court noted that this argument was rejected by the Court on two prior occasions, and it again rejected Plaintiffs' argument. Id. The Court opined that Rule 15 essentially provides two methods for pre-trial amendment of a pleading, including: (i) within 21 days after serving of the pleading or after serving of response; or (ii) after obtaining the consent of the opposing party or the court's leave. Id. at *6. Since the TAC did not fall in either category, the Court granted Defendant's motion to strike.

Griswold, et al. v. Coventry First LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19455 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 18, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging fraud in connection with the sale of a life insurance policy. Plaintiff established a trust to purchase a large life insurance policy. The trust sold the policy to Defendant using broker Kevin McGarrey. Plaintiff filed suit alleging that Defendant committed fraud when, unknown to the trust or to Plaintiff, Defendant entered into a written agreement with McGarrey that required McGarrey to refrain from seeking any other bids or reporting any competing offers in exchange for a $145,000 commission. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiff also asserted, on behalf of a putative class, that Defendant implemented various fraudulent and pervasive business schemes to acquire life insurance policies through rigged bids by entering into "secret" agreements with life settlement professionals to manipulate the bidding process of life insurance policies, eliminate competition, induce others to breach fiduciary duties to elderly clients, and reduce the net amount received by elderly clients in the life settlement process. Id. at *6. Defendant moved to compel arbitration and contended that the claims were subject to arbitration under the terms of the policy purchase agreement. The District Court denied arbitration, finding that Plaintiff was not a signatory to the purchase agreement. Id. at *7. On Defendant's appeal, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling that Defendant could not compel arbitration because Plaintiff did not consent to the policy purchase agreement. Id. at *17. Because the Third Circuit did not compel arbitration, it did not reach the question of whether Plaintiff would be required to arbitrate on an individual rather than a class basis. However, the Third Circuit noted that, "because the parties request that we specify the answer to that question in this appeal, we will note that [Plaintiff] waived his class action claim on appeal, having neglected to properly brief the issue." Id. at *18. Following remand to the District Court, Defendant moved to strike Plaintiff's class action allegations. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff waived his class action claim by failing to address Defendant's contention that Plaintiff lacked the authority to seek class-wide relief. Id. at *21-22. Plaintiff responded that the Third Circuit made no such ruling as to the propriety of class-wide litigation, but merely opined, on an advisory basis, that in the event that arbitration was ordered, Plaintiff had waived his right to seek class-wide arbitration. Id. at *22. The District Court agreed. Reading the plain language of the Third Circuit's decision, the District Court found no mandate that the case proceed only as an individual action. Id. The Third Circuit expressly indicated in its holding that it could not grant Defendant's request to compel arbitration, and therefore, it need not reach the question of whether Plaintiff would be required to arbitrate the claims on an individual rather than a class basis. Id. at *25. However, for purpose of answering the question directly posed by Defendant, the Third Circuit noted in a footnote that Plaintiff had waived his class action claim on appeal, having neglected to properly brief the issue. As the footnote was simply a gratuitous statement that did not implicate the adjudicative facts of the case's specific holding, the District Court reasoned that it did not require the District Court to strike Plaintiff's class allegations. Id. at *26. The District Court also noted that, even if the footnote was entitled to any precedential weight, it clearly dealt only with Plaintiff's waiver of class-wide arbitration, as opposed to class-wide litigation. The District Court found that the class issue that Defendant briefed and presented on appeal was the question of whether Plaintiff would be entitled to arbitrate on a class-wide basis if arbitration was ordered, and nothing suggested that Defendant raised any issue of Plaintiff's waiver of the right to seek class litigation. Id. at *31-36. The District Court, therefore, concluded that the only reasonable interpretation of Third Circuit's footnote was that it addressed only the viability of class arbitration and not class litigation. Because nothing in Third Circuit's ruling addressed Defendant's claim that Plaintiff did not have standing to represent a class, the District Court allowed Plaintiff to proceed with his class claims. Id. at *46. Accordingly, the District Court denied Defendant's motion to strike Plaintiff's class allegations.

Harnish, et al. v. Widener University School Of Law*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102383 (D.N.J. Aug. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former students, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated consumer fraud statutes by misrepresenting the employment success of its graduates. Plaintiffs moved for reconsideration of the Court's previous order denying class certification. The Court remarked that Plaintiff's proposed class did not satisfy Rule 23. Although the Court had recognized Plaintiffs' theory that they paid inflated tuition due to Defendant's misrepresentations about its graduates' employment rates, it concluded that individual questions predominated over common questions regarding the loss that each proposed class member sustained by paying Defendant's allegedly inflated tuition. Id. at *3. The Court remarked that all proposed class members obtained full-time legal jobs for which they paid tuition, whether it was inflated or not, and their loss was different from that of students who paid the allegedly inflated tuition and did not obtain full-time legal employment. Id. Thus, the Court opined that individual questions predominated as to class members' ascertainable losses, and therefore Plaintiffs did not meet the requirements of Rule 23(b)(3). Further, the Court also found that there had been no intervening change in the law and Plaintiffs also failed to present any new evidence in the motion for reconsideration. Id. at *4. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration.

Horner, et al. v. Warrior Sports, Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-10716 (E.D. Mich. July 2, 2015). Plaintiff brought a products liability class action alleging that Defendants sold unsafe lacrosse helmets, which were later deemed unsafe by the National Operating Committee on Standards for Athletic Equipment. Id. at 1. The Court found that Plaintiff failed to serve the complaint on Defendants, as the permitted period of 120 days to serve the complaint had lapsed. The Court noted that under Rule 4(c)(1), Plaintiff must serve the summons and complaint within the time allowed by Rule 4(m). Rule 4(m) provides that if Plaintiff had not served Defendant within 120 days after the complaint is filed, the Court, after notice to Plaintiff, must dismiss the action without prejudice. Id. The Court, however, noted that if Plaintiff showed good cause for the failure, the Court could extend the time for service for an appropriate period. Id. Accordingly, the Court ordered Plaintiff to show cause why the action should not be dismissed against Defendants for failure to serve.

Lisk, et al. v. Lumber One Wood Preserving, LLC,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 11891 (11th Cir. July 10, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action against Defendant for violation of the Alabama Deceptive Trade Practices Act ("ADTPA") and for breach of express warranty. Plaintiff alleged that the wood he bought for a fence at his home from Defendant was not properly pressure-treated and that it prematurely rotted. Id. at *3. Plaintiff sought to represent a nationwide class of all purchasers of defectively treated wood from Defendant. Defendant moved to dismiss, asserting that the ADTPA did not authorize a private class action and that Plaintiff did not expressly state claims for breach of express warranty under the ADTPA. The District Court granted the motion. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit reversed and remanded. The first issue arose from a conflict between the ADTPA and Rule 23. Id. at *6. The Eleventh Circuit noted that, although the ADTPA authorizes damages of the greater of $100 or actual damages, or up to three times the actual damages together with attorneys' fees, it provided that only the Alabama Attorney General, not a private individual, could bring a class action. Id. at *5. If Plaintiff had filed the case in an Alabama state court, therefore, the statute would have precluded a private class action; however, the Plaintiff filed the case in federal court, and Rule 23 contained no exception for cases of this kind. Id. at *5-6. The Eleventh Circuit observed that the U.S. Supreme Court addressed a nearly identical issue in Shady Grove Orthopedic Associates, P.A. v. Allstate Insurance Co., 559 U.S. 393 (2010), and held that Rule 23 prevailed. Id. at *6. The Eleventh Circuit, accordingly, concluded that the Alabama statute restricting class actions did not apply to proceedings in federal court and that Rule 23 was controlling. Id. at *12. The second issue addressed whether Plaintiff could recover for breach of express warranty without establishing privity with Defendant. The Eleventh Circuit held that, to recover on third-party beneficiary claims, buyers must show three elements, including: (i) that Defendant bestowed a direct benefit upon them; (ii) that they were the intended beneficiaries of the contract; and (iii) that the contract was breached. The Eleventh Circuit found that Plaintiff alleged that Defendant breached its warranty by selling wood that was not pressure-treated or was treated improperly, the warranty was intended to benefit remote buyers like Plaintiff, and that Defendant intended to protect future customers of the fence company like Plaintiff, when it warranted the quality of its wood. Id. at *16-18. Accordingly, the Eleventh Circuit found that Plaintiff met all three elements of a third-party beneficiary claim and, therefore, it reversed the District Court's judgment and remanded the case.

Little, et al. v. Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53367 (D.D.C. April 23, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action against Defendant Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority ("WMATA") and three of its contractors ("the Contractor Defendants") alleging that WMATA's background check policy, which disqualified from employment individuals with a criminal history, violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, the Fair Credit Reporting Act, and the District of Columbia Human Rights Act. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs sought to certify a class consisting of all terminated employees, employees deterred from applying for internal job openings, employees deterred from taking medical or personal leave, and applicants denied employment based on WMATA's criminal background check policy. Id. Defendants moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' class allegations on the grounds that Plaintiffs failed to file a timely motion for class certification, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs filed their complaint on July 30, 2014, and did not ask to extend the time period for filing a motion for class certification until March 9, 2015, when they filed their opposition to Defendants' motion to strike. Id. at *10. The Court recognized, however, that its orders may have confused Plaintiffs' counsel because: (i) upon receiving the Contractor Defendants' motion to dismiss, it stayed all discovery pending a decision on those motions; (ii) that order cited to Local Rule 16(3)(c), thereby requiring the parties to meet and confer prior to an initial scheduling conference to discuss, among other matters, dates for filing a Rule 23 motion; and (iii) as a result of that scheduling conference, both WMATA and Plaintiffs submitted a joint report agreeing that pre-certification discovery would be necessary prior to any class certification motion. Thus, the Court found the explanation of Plaintiffs' counsel – that their obligations to file a class certification motion were suspended until such discovery was allowed – was not unreasonable. Id. at *11. The Court pointed out, however, that Plaintiffs never asked for, or received, an extension of time to file a timely class certification motion under Local Rule 23(1)(b). Id. at *12. Notwithstanding that fact, the Court determined that Plaintiffs' failure to request an extension of time to file a motion for class certification constituted excusable neglect. Id. at *13. First, the Court stated that Defendants had suffered no prejudice as a result of the delay because while WMATA reserved the right to raise a timeliness objection, it clearly still contemplated the future filing of a class certification motion. Id. Further, although the parties disagreed on its exact scope, they concurred that some discovery was warranted before a class certification motion should be filed. Id. at *13-14. Second, the scope of the case had shifted. The case began against WMATA and three small contractors, but at an initial conference, Plaintiffs' counsel agreed to proceed against WMATA only and to treat the contractors as third-parties. Id. at *14-15. Third, the Court sidetracked the normal orderly proceeding of this case because when it received a pro se Plaintiff's complaint against WMATA for the same alleged disparate treatment, it asked Plaintiffs' counsel, who were appearing pro bono, to consider representation of the pro se Plaintiff. Id. at *15. The Court noted Plaintiffs' counsel acceded to that request and devoted time and energy to the question, postponing progress on their own complaint. Id. Thus, the Court concluded that the delays in this case were not due to Plaintiffs' failure to file a timely class certification motion, but were all out of their control. Id. at *15-16. Moreover, Plaintiffs' counsel had acted in good faith. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motions to strike finding that the equities tipped in favor of Plaintiffs.

McCormick, et al. v. Halliburton Energy Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62422 (W.D. Okla. April 21, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging contamination of the groundwater at and around Defendant's facility on Osage Road in Duncan, Oklahoma (the "site"). Defendant performed a variety of tasks on the site, including work for the U.S. Department of Defense cleaning out missile motor casings. The work involved removing solid rocket propellant, consisting primarily of ammonium perchlorate, from the missile casings. Over time, perchlorate that had collected in the pits on the site reached the groundwater under the site and migrated off-site. Plaintiffs alleged violations of the Resources Conservation and Recovery Act and the Oklahoma Department of Environmental Quality directives. Plaintiffs also asserted causes of action for private nuisance, public nuisance, negligence, trespass, strict liability, and unjust enrichment. Plaintiffs sought class certification with respect to Defendant's liability to a class of landowners whose real property rights had been injured by Defendant's wrongful practices, which resulted in the migration of perchlorate contaminated groundwater from the site. Plaintiffs further sought the division of the class into two sub-classes, including: (i) the "plume class," consisting of owners that were currently suffering from perchlorate contaminated groundwater from Defendant's site operations; and (ii) the "threatened class," consisting of owners of properties that were not currently suffering from perchlorate groundwater contamination, but due to their proximity to such contamination, their properties were threatened and they had suffered diminished property value. On March 3, 2015, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Plaintiffs moved the Court to reconsider that order, asserting that recent decisions had determined that individualized injury questions should not defeat class certification. Id. at *23. The Court found that none of the cases cited by Plaintiffs supported their contention, and even if those cases were considered controlling law, they would not alter its prior ruling denying class certification. Id. at *24. The Court observed that in the March 3, 2015 order, it denied class certification because Defendant's liability as to any of Plaintiffs' causes of action could not be determined on a class-wide basis because certain elements of Plaintiffs' causes of action required significant individualized evidence. Plaintiffs requested the Court to reconsider, under recent "issue class" authority, whether the resolution of the proposed issues on a class-wide basis was proper and the best way to proceed. Id. The Court remarked that it had thoroughly considered that issue and had found that even though there may be common questions of law or fact regarding certain elements of Plaintiffs' causes of action, the vast number of important individualized issues relating to Defendant's ultimate liability as to all of Plaintiffs' causes of action were overwhelmed by any common questions. Id. at *25. The Court had found that a trial on whether Defendant released perchlorate into the groundwater, as well as the current and future scope and extent of that groundwater contamination, was unlikely to substantially aid the resolution of the ultimate determination of Defendant's liability. Id. The Court also opined that proof of those class-wide facts would neither establish Defendant's liability to any class member nor fix the level of damages awarded to any Plaintiff; further, the common facts would not establish a single Plaintiff's entitlement to recover on any theory of liability, or even show that a single Plaintiff was aggrieved. Id. Additionally, the Court had found a class action in relation to Defendant's liability was not superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating the controversy because even if it were to certify common issues, the subsequent separate proceedings necessary for each Plaintiff would undo whatever efficiencies such a class proceeding would have been intended to promote. Id. The Court therefore denied Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration.

Milburn, et al. v. Humana Pharmacy Solutions, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106353 (N.D. Ind. Aug. 13, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant placed a non-emergency telephone call using a pre-recorded message without their consent in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). After Defendant made an offer of judgment, Plaintiff filed a placeholder motion for class certification, and a motion to stay a ruling on the class certification motion, which the Court denied. The Court noted that the law in the Seventh Circuit until recently – as held in Damasco v. Clearwire Corp., 662 F.3d 891 (7th Cir. 2011) – was that when a Plaintiff received an offer of judgment for full relief, the claim became moot. Because of Damasco, Plaintiffs sought deferral of a ruling on class certification until the parties completed discovery. Id. at *2. The Court noted that Damasco was overruled by Chapman v. First Index, Inc., 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13767 (7th Cir. Aug. 6, 2015), which held that the premature filing of a motion for class certification is no longer necessary to avoid mootness because a Defendant's offer of compensation did not moot the litigation or otherwise end the Article III case or controversy. Id. The Court further found that filing a motion that the parties are not yet ready to support or defend, and the Court being not yet ready to rule upon, did not promote the efficient administration of justice. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to stay and denied the motion for class certification as premature.

Paternostro, et al. v. Choice Hotel International Services Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 113828 (E.D. La. Aug. 27, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of guests at the Clarion Inn and Suites Hotel ("the Hotel"), brought a class action alleging that they suffered injury because of negligence of Defendants due to the presence of legionella and pseudomonas aeruginosa in the hotels. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendants' negligence caused or substantially contributed to the death of Russell Paternostro, whose legal heir was a

Plaintiff in this action. Defendants removed the case on the basis of diversity jurisdiction. Defendants moved to dismiss and/or strike Plaintiffs' class action allegations, arguing that Plaintiffs failed to meet the requirements of Rule 23 in order to plead a certifiable class and so their class action allegations must be dismissed. At the outset, the Court noted that Rule 23(b)(2) permits class actions for declaratory or injunctive relief when the party opposing the class has acted or refused to act on the grounds generally applicable to the class. Id. at *17. The Court also observed that monetary relief may be obtained in a Rule 23(b)(2) class action as long as the predominant relief sought is injunctive or declaratory. Id. at *18. Further, the Court observed that in Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. 2541 (2011), the U.S. Supreme Court held that the key to a Rule 23(b)(2) class was the indivisible nature of the injunctive or declaratory remedy and the notion that the conduct is such that it can be enjoined or declared unlawful only as to all of the class members or as to none of them. Id. Here, Plaintiffs admitted that their ultimate goal was the recovery of individual monetary damages, and that the Fifth Circuit standard for determining whether Rule 23(b)(2) certification is proper requires that the injunctive relief sought must predominant over the monetary relief sought. Id. at *20-21. Plaintiffs, however, argued that although individual Plaintiffs would ultimately seek monetary relief, such relief was not being sought on a class-wide basis and was therefore incidental to the declaratory and injunctive relief sought. Id. at *21. The Court held that given that the declaratory judgment and injunctive relief sought would not provide relief to any member of the class, Plaintiffs' claims could only be redressed through individual damage awards, which were not available in Rule 23(b)(2). Id. at *21. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Rule 23(b)(2) certification was inappropriate. The Court noted that Rule 23(b)(1)(A) provides that an action may be maintained as a class action when the prosecution of separate actions by or against individual members of the class would create a risk of inconsistent or varying judgements with respect to individual members of the class, which would establish incompatible standards of conduct for the party opposing the class. Id. at *22. Here, the Court observed that there was no continuing course of conduct that must be stopped or otherwise enjoined, and found Defendants' argument plausible that Plaintiffs were attempting to use Rule 23 as a vehicle to identify potential new Plaintiffs and not to redress a public health risk. Id. at *24. Accordingly, the Court found that certification under Rule 23(b)(1)(A) was also inappropriate, and granted Defendants' motion to strike the class allegations.

Puricelli, et al. v. Republic Of Argentina,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13944 (2d Cir. Aug. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of bond holders of the Republic of Argentina's bonds after the country defaulted on $80 to $100 billion of sovereign debt, brought a putative class action asserting their right to repayment against the Republic of Argentina. In 2004, the District Court certified eight classes of Plaintiffs who continuously held bonds from the date of the class filing through the entry of judgment. Id. at *2. The District Court then granted summary judgment to Plaintiffs and entered aggregate judgments for the classes. Upon Defendant's appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed the class certification order, but vacated the aggregate judgment on the basis that the District Court's inflated estimations were improper. Id. at *3-4. On remand, the District Court entered revised aggregate damage awards that deducted amounts for bonds tendered in Defendant's two debt exchange offers, but did not otherwise account for bonds purchased in the secondary market after the state of the class periods, i.e., the bonds that had not been held continuously. Id. at *4-5. Upon Defendant's second appeal, the Second Circuit again vacated the aggregate judgment, concluding that the judgments remained insufficiently tied to Defendant's liability to the classes. Id. at *5. The Second Circuit also remanded the action with specific instructions to the District Court, including to consider evidence with respect to the volume of bonds purchased in the secondary market, to make findings as to a reasonably accurate, non-speculative estimate, and to determine how to proceed with awarding damages on an individual basis if no reasonably accurate non-speculative estimate could be made. Id. at *6. On further remand, the District Court did not hold an evidentiary hearing and did not adopt an individualized approach for awarding damages. Rather than pursuing discovery necessary for the evidentiary hearing, Plaintiffs moved to modify the classes by "returning the class definitions originally requested by the Plaintiffs – classes of all 'holders' of still outstanding bonds." Id. at *7. The District Court granted Plaintiffs' request and entered judgment modifying the classes. Defendant appealed for the third time. The Second Circuit vacated the order because that the District Court erred in not following its earlier instructions. The Second Circuit noted that, despite providing explicit instructions to address the issue with identifying class members, the District Court not only failed to hold an evidentiary hearing as instructed, but also expanded the classes for which the Second Circuit had already prescribed a specific response. Id. at *9-10. The Second Circuit reasoned that typically a District Court has discretion under Rule 23 to amend a class certification order; however, here the District Court erred because that discretion under Rule 23 "cannot be exercised in conflict with an appellate ruling." Id. at *8. The Second Circuit held that the mandate it gave the District Court earlier did not permit such expansions. Id. The Second Circuit therefore vacated the District Court's orders and remanded the action with specific instructions to follow the mandate.

Reyes, et al. v. NetDeposit, LLC,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 15577 (3d Cir. Sept. 2, 2015). Plaintiff, a consumer, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants, a bank and its payment processors, violated the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO") by engaging in a fraudulent telemarketing scheme that caused unauthorized debits from consumer bank accounts. Id. at *2. According to the complaint, telemarketers obtained bank account information from consumers that was used to make unauthorized debits from consumers' bank accounts, and conveyed it to the payment processing entities. The payment processors then caused the Bank to initiate an automated clearing house ("ACH") debit of the consumers' bank accounts. Id. Plaintiff alleged that Defendants operated a RICO enterprise that was a total sham lacking any legitimate business substance. Id. at *7. At the class certification stage, Plaintiff supported his claim referring to the inordinately high "return rates" of the telemarketers who engaged in the alleged scheme. Id. at *7-8. The "return rates" referred to how often the ACH debit could not be completed. Plaintiff demonstrated return rates in excess of 25 to 50 times the national average of 1.25%. Id. at *8. Plaintiff produced three experts who testified as to the banking practices and fraudulent marketing practices, and relied on internal e-mails between the Bank and its payment processors in which Defendants discussed "staggering" return rates. Id. at *8-9. Plaintiff claimed that the evidence established that each of the frauds operated in the same way, luring consumers with some kind of "card" or "benefit" to obtain their bank account information. Id. at *9. Two of Plaintiff's experts testified that return rates in excess of 10% were prima facie evidence of fraud, and here the return rates ranged from 30% to almost 90%. Id. at *14-16. The District Court, however, denied class certification, finding that there were no issues common to the class and Plaintiff could not satisfy either the commonality requirement of Rule 23(a) or the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3). Although the high return rates were common to the telemarketers, the District Court ruled that it was insufficient to prove fraud. Id. at *24. The District Court found no commonality and predominance because the bank and payment processors contracted with different marketing firms in different ways to obtain consumers' bank account information. Id. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Third Circuit found that the District Court erred in denying certification. The Third Circuit held that the District Court placed an incorrect burden of "absolute proof" on Plaintiff at the class certification stage rather than the appropriate "preponderance of the evidence" standard. Id. at *30. The Third Circuit explained that, in a RICO class action, commonality and predominance are satisfied if each element of the alleged RICO violation involves common questions of law and fact capable of proof by evidence common to the class. Id. at *42. The Third Circuit noted that the sham theory advanced by Plaintiff relied on a common mode of behavior by Defendants as to all members of the class and a general policy of fraud, and thus Plaintiff presented evidence that demonstrated commonality. Id. at *39-40. Although slight variations in the telemarketers' conduct and Defendants' conduct existed, the Third Circuit found that none involved exercises of discretion that affected the class members' damages. Id. at *38. Further, according to the Third Circuit, Plaintiff's sham theory, if supported by an appropriate record, could satisfy Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement by focusing on the overarching material and defining aspect of Defendants' conduct, since predominance does not require the absence of variations in Defendant's conduct, but rather whether Defendants' conduct was common to all of the class members. Id. at *41-50. The Third Circuit distinguished telemarketing cases relied on by the District Court from this action because those cases involved legitimate business activities. The Third Circuit agreed with Plaintiff that any variations in the manner in which various individuals were defrauded was irrelevant and not sufficient to preclude a common issue of law from predominating. Id. at *44. Accordingly, the Third Circuit vacated the District Court's order denying class certification and remanded the matter for further proceedings consistent with its opinion.

Senne, et al. v. Kansas City Royals Baseball Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 91147 (N.D. Cal. July 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former minor league baseball players, brought an action asserting claims under the FLSA and various state wage & hour laws against Bud Selig (the former Commissioner of Baseball), the office of the Commissioner of Baseball doing business as Major League Baseball ("MLB"), and MLB's member franchises. Plaintiffs alleged that MLB and the Franchise Defendants failed to pay players minimum wages, failed to pay required overtime pay, and sometimes failed to pay wages at all. The Franchise Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim. The Franchise Defendants contended that standing was the threshold jurisdictional question, and that the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction over the action. The Franchise Defendants argued that in the wage & hour context, a Plaintiff has standing only if Plaintiff has an employment relationship with Defendant, and pleads that he was injured during and as a result of his employment with Defendant. Id. at *67. The Franchise Defendants also invoked Rule 12(b)(6), arguing that Plaintiffs failed to allege an employment relationship with all of the franchises in all of the states whose laws were invoked, and thus they did not state claims that were plausible on their face. At the outset, the Court noted that Article III requires that, in order for a party to have standing to raise a claim: (i) the party must have suffered an actual or threatened injury; (ii) because of Defendant's challenged conduct; and (iii) the injury is redressable. Id. at *86. The Court observed that the cases cited by the parties did not shed light on the issue presented here, i.e., standing of a named Plaintiff who was employed by one Franchise Defendant and performed work in a particular state is seeking to represent class members who performed work in the same state for a different Franchise Defendant. Id. at *89. The Court remarked that case law authorities were split on the question of whether the standing inquiry can be deferred until after class certification. The Court, nevertheless, agreed with the reasoning of In Re Carrier IQ, Inc., Case No. 12-CV-2330 (N.D. Cal. Jan 21, 2015), which found that class certification was logically antecedent to the question of standing in a putative class action that involved not only the laws of multiple states, but also multiple Defendants. Id. at *100, 103. The Court found that like Plaintiffs in In Re Carrier IQ, Inc., Plaintiffs here asserted claims under the laws of multiple states against multiple Defendants. As in In Re Carrier IQ, Inc., as to some states' laws, there were named Plaintiffs who alleged that they were injured by some of the Franchise Defendants but there was not a named Plaintiff who alleged injury in that state for each and every Franchise Defendant. Rather, the named Plaintiffs who were proposed as class representatives of the various state-based classes sought to represent unnamed Plaintiffs who were employed by the other Franchise Defendants on the basis that they suffered a similar injury. Id. at *105. As to these claims, the Court found that it was appropriate to defer addressing the question of standing until after class certification. Id. at *106. The Court similarly rejected the Franchise Defendants' arguments that Plaintiffs failed to state a claim. Accordingly, the Court denied the motion without prejudice to raising the issues of class standing and/or sufficiency of the class claims after class certification, or where applicable, in the context of the class certification determination.

Stinson, et al. v. City Of New York,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 166618 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 11, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of New York city residents, brought a class action alleging that Defendants implemented and sanctioned a policy, practice, and custom of issuing unconstitutional summonses in violation of 42 U.S.C. § 1983, and the First, Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. Defendants filed a motion to remove the statutory seal imposed on records of individuals who received a criminal court summons during the class period. The City initially stated that it sought the unsealing in order to identify those persons who were presumptively class members and to begin noticing their depositions. Id. at *3. The City, however, later clarified that it sought the criminal records to obtain information relevant to claims common to the class, and that it was not seeking discovery of individual class members. Id. The City represented that there were more than 850,000 summonses at issue. Id. The City argued that the eligibility of individual class members could be determined once common issues of fact and law had been resolved. Id. at *5. The Court denied the City's motion. It observed that any inquiry into individual circumstances of absent class members would be improper at this stage of the litigation because discovery that relates to individual issues should be postponed until after the common questions have been determined. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the City failed to make a showing sufficient to unseal the records, and denied the motion.

Toler, et al. v. Global College Of Natural Medicine, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 46907 (E.D. Mich. April 10, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant collected at least $5 million in advance tuition from her and other individuals who enrolled in distance education programs and failed to refund the money after the school abruptly closed in November 2012. Defendant marketed and sold distance education programs such as Bachelor of Science, Master of Science, and Ph. D. in natural health to students throughout the United States. Defendant required tuition that ranged from approximately $1,000 to more than $10,000 to be prepaid either mostly or entirely before starting coursework. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiff paid Defendant approximately $3,120 in tuition for her self-paced Bachelor of Science program in holistic health. Id. at *4. After Defendant failed to respond to Plaintiff's complaint, the clerk entered default against Defendant. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiff then moved to certify a class consisting of all individuals who entrusted tuition in advance to Defendant and were active students in their distance education programs as of November 2012. The Court granted the motion. First, the Court held that the clerk's entry of default against Defendant did not alter its class certification analysis because certification remained a necessary procedural requirement in order for the class to recover damages. Id. at *7-8. Second, considering the requirements of Rule 23, the Court found that Plaintiff's proposed class consisted of more than 1,000 similarly-situated individuals (based on the figure of 1,359 students enrolled with Defendant as of September 11, 2012) and, therefore, was too numerous to accommodate the joinder of all members. Id. at *9. Third, the Court found that Plaintiff demonstrated commonality because the essential claim of all class members was the same, i.e., each member enrolled in and paid for a self-paced distance education program with Defendant, but Defendant failed to provide the education program and failed to refund the prepaid tuition when they closed the school. Id. at *10. Fourth, the Court found that Plaintiff had asserted claims that were typical of the class because Plaintiff's claims arose from the same course of standardized conduct as the claims of class members, including enrollment in self-paced programs, payment of advance tuition, the school's failure to provide the education, and the school's failure to reimburse unearned tuition after closing. Id. at *11. Fourth, the Court found that Plaintiff met the adequacy of representation requirement because Plaintiff had been diligently litigating the case since 2013. Plaintiff successfully opposed Defendant's attempt to discharge her debt in bankruptcy and was the only creditor who filed an adversary proceeding. Id. at *12. Fifth, the Court found that Plaintiff met Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement because she demonstrated that each potential class member was affected by the same course of standardized conduct regarding enrollment, payment of advance tuition, the school's closure, and the school's failure to reimburse unearned tuition. The Court noted that the overriding question affecting the class was what damages Defendant caused through the events surrounding the closing of the school, and the Court found no indication of any question of law or fact affecting only individual members of the class that would rival the predominance of the question common to the class. Id. at *13-14. Finally, the Court found that Plaintiff also satisfied the superiority requirement because it was unlikely that any potential class member would have any interest in pursuing his or her claim individually in any other manner or forum. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Villa, et al. v. San Francisco Forty-Niners, Ltd.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63568 (N.D. Cal. May 13, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants – the NFL, NFL Properties ("NFLP"), 30 of the NFL's member teams, and Reebok International, Ltd. – engaged in anti-competitive behavior and entered into exclusive licensing agreements in violation of California and federal antitrust laws. The alleged unlawful conduct was based on agreements related to the licensing of the NFL's and its teams' intellectual property for use in apparel instead for the consumer retail market. Plaintiff moved for partial summary judgment as to liability, which the Court denied. Defendants argued that the motion was procedurally improper prior to class certification under the "one-way intervention" rule. Id. at *7. The Court observed that while motions for class certification are typically ruled on first, Rule 23 and its sub-rules are flexible and do not preclude summary judgment prior to class certification. Id. The Court also noted that Rule 23(c)(1) requires a ruling on class certification as soon as practicable. As a companion to Rule 23(c)(1), the Court observed that Rule 23(c)(2) prescribes the distribution of notice to all Rule 23(b)(3) class members who are identifiable through reasonable effort. This rule exists in part to protect Defendants from unfair one-way intervention, where the members of a class not yet certified can wait for the Court's ruling on summary judgment and either opt-in to a favorable ruling or avoid being bound by an unfavorable one. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for partial summary judgment because it had not yet ruled on Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Notwithstanding the one-way intervention rule, Plaintiffs argued that Defendants waived the right to invoke the doctrine by twice having moved themselves to resolve the case on the merits prior to class certification. Plaintiffs referred to Defendants' motion to dismiss, and motion for partial summary judgment on pleadings, which were both denied. Plaintiffs argued that Rule 12 motions were judgments on merits, and therefore, Defendants waived their procedural protections by filing motions under that rule. The Court noted that in Schwarzschild v. Tse, 69 F.3d 293 (9th Cir. 1995), the rationale for a one-way intervention rule disappeared when Defendant moved for summary judgement before a decision on class clarification. Id. at *13.

(ii) Preemptive Motions To Strike Or Dismiss Class Allegations

Bell, et al. v. Cheswick Generating Station,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9791 (W.D. Pa. Jan. 28, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that particulates, chemicals, and gases released from Defendant's coal-fired electrical generation facility (the "Facility") caused damage to their property. Defendant moved to strike Plaintiffs' class allegations before Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification. The Court granted Defendant's motion. The Court noted that it had the authority to strike class allegations, even before Plaintiffs move for class certification, if no amount of discovery will demonstrate that a class action can be maintained. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs proposed a class consisting of residents or homeowners who lived or owned real estate within one mile of the Facility who suffered similar damages to their property by the invasion of particulates, chemicals, and gases from the Facility. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs impermissibly had alleged a "fail-safe" class, defining the class members as including all, and only, those who satisfied the elements of Plaintiffs' causes of action. Id. at *8-9. The Court noted that, in order to be ascertainable, the class must be precisely defined with reference to objective criteria, and there must be a reliable and administratively feasible mechanism for determining whether putative class members fall within the class definition. Id. at *9. Further, the Court opined that, when a class is a fail-safe class, i.e., it requires the Court to address the central issue of liability in the case to ascertain class membership, it is impermissibly vague and may be untenable. Id. Thus, when a class definition involves an ultimate issue of liability, the Court would have to conduct mini-hearings in order to determine who belongs to the class, rendering the process administratively infeasible. Id. at *10. Here, to determine class membership, the Court reasoned that it would have to determine whether: (i) an individual lived within one mile of the Facility; (ii) he or she suffered similar damage to his or her property; (iii) those damages resulted from the invasion of the property by particulates, chemicals, and gases; and (iv) the particulates, chemicals, and gases originated from Defendant's Facility. Because these determinations would require mini-hearings into the particular facts of each purported class member's situation in order to determine ultimate issues of liability, the Court concluded that the proposed class was an impermissible fail-safe class and unascertainable. Id. at *11. Additionally, the Court noted that determining the degree of similarity would require an individualized analysis of each proposed class member's situation, making the class not readily ascertainable. Id. at *13. If Plaintiffs were to move forward with the class as constructed, the Court ruled that it would be forced first to determine the ultimate issue of damages suffered by Plaintiffs and then to compare all potential class members to that subjective standard, which made the class unascertainable and unworkable. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to strike the class allegations.

Campbell, et al. v. American International Group, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6241 (E.D. Va. Jan. 20, 2015). Plaintiff, an investor, brought a class action alleging that Defendant American International Group, Inc. ("AIG") deliberately devalued her investment to enrich itself and its directors. Plaintiff contended that in 2008, AIG issued equity units along with a prospectus detailing how the equity units operated. The prospectus explained that the number of shares that a purchaser would receive was subject to anti-dilution adjustments, and also warned that there could be no assurance that market value of AIG's common stock on three stock purchase dates would not be less than the price paid by investors. Id. at *6. Plaintiff sought a declaratory judgment against AIG and its directors that AIG's prospectus violated SEC regulations, and Plaintiff sought monetary damages under various state law claims. Defendants moved to dismiss, and the Court granted the motion. Plaintiff sought a declaration that the prospectus issued did not comply with the SEC's "plain English" requirements. Id. at *11. Defendants argued that Plaintiff could receive a declaration because there is no private right of action for a violation of those regulations. Id. at *12. Plaintiff asserted that because the Declaratory Judgment Act itself does not require an independent cause of action, and she met the requirements of the Declaratory Judgment Act, the Court did not need to determine whether there is a private right of action. The Court observed that it must have a properly pled claim over which it has an independent basis for exercising original jurisdiction before it may act pursuant to the Declaratory

Judgment Act. Id. at *13. The Court also noted that because a suit arises under the law that creates the cause of action, if the Declaratory Judgment Act created an independent cause of action, any claim for declaratory relief would "arise under" the laws of the United States, which would result in a vast expansion of federal jurisdiction in flat contradiction of the Supreme Court's direction. Id. at *14. Accordingly, to be eligible for a declaratory judgment, the Court opined that Plaintiff must first identify an underlying right for which she sought a declaration. In order to determine whether Plaintiff could sue for a violation of the "plain English" regulation, the Court noted that Plaintiff must show that Congress has displayed an intent to create not just a private right but also a private remedy. Id. at *15. Here, however, Plaintiff failed to identify language in any statute which would authorize a private right of action for a violation of the SEC's "plain English" regulations. The Court remarked that because the SEC has the power to enforce its rules and regulations, it creates a strong presumption that Congress did not intend for private individuals to have that power. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court determined that the securities statutes provide no support for finding that Congress intended to create a private right of action for a violation of the SEC's "plain English" regulations, and that under the statutory scheme constructed by Congress, such power resides solely with the SEC. Id. Thus, the Court dismissed the claim for a declaratory judgment. Plaintiff also asserted breach of New York's implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing because Defendants adjusted the settlement rate for the shares that she was to receive, by making the language of the prospectus confusing. The Court observed, however, that Plaintiff failed to plead any facts plausibly establishing that any Defendant acted in bad faith. The Court remarked that the fact that Defendants exercised the anti-dilution provisions laid out in the prospectus and that Plaintiff received less money than she expected or hoped for from her investment did not establish that Defendants acted in bad faith or breached the implied covenant. Thus, the Court also dismissed this claim.

Geary, et al. v. Green Tree Servicing*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS (S.D. Ohio Mar. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of borrowers, brought an action against Defendant for alleged violations of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA"). Plaintiffs had jointly filed a voluntary petition for Chapter 7 bankruptcy, received Chapter 7 discharges, and in their bankruptcy cases were closed. Id. at *1-2. At the time Plaintiffs filed their Chapter 7 bankruptcy petition, they were behind on payments for an automobile loan serviced by CitiFinancial Servicing LLC, which was also a secured creditor and received notice of Plaintiffs' bankruptcy case. Plaintiffs entered into a reaffirmation agreement with CitiFinancial in the bankruptcy action, which reaffirmed the loan debt in the amount of $2,350 with a 6% annual interest rate. Id. at *2. The reaffirmation agreement also included a repayment schedule requiring Plaintiffs to make 24 monthly payments of $140.15 each for a total payment of $3,363. Id. Plaintiffs timely made 20 monthly payments to CitiFinancial, each of $174 for a total payment of $3,480 in hopes of paying off the loan 4 months early. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that although Plaintiffs fully paid the reaffirmed debt, CitiFinancial continued sending statements, placed phone calls to them, and attempted to collect additional amounts. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs claimed that they made several attempts to resolve the matter, but CitiFinancial refused to properly adjust the account. Plaintiffs contended that CitiFinancial assigned their loans to Defendant, which continued to collect the additional amounts. Id. at *3-5. Plaintiffs' complaint asserted four distinct FDCPA claims, including: (i) Count I – violation of 15 U.S.C. § 1692e(2)(A) for making deceptive representations in debt collection; (ii) Count II – violation of § 1692g(a) for failing to send a follow-up written notice; (iii) Count III – violation of § 1692g(b) for failing to provide verification of debt; and (iv) Count IV – violation of § 1692e(14) for using CitiFinancial's name as opposed to using Defendant's name in communications. Plaintiffs also asserted class claims for Counts III and IV. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss Counts II, III, and IV, and sought to strike Counts I and II, which the Court granted in part. Defendant sought to strike the class claims on the basis that Plaintiffs' proposed class was an impermissible "fail-safe" class. Id. at *36. Plaintiffs sought to represent a putative class that consisted of every consumer who was sent an initial communication from Defendant regarding a consumer debt. Id. at *38. According to Defendant, for the Court to ascertain who is in the putative class based on the characteristics Plaintiffs alleged, the Court not only would be deciding that a class existed, but also would be deciding the merits of the claim. The Court remarked that it must exercise caution when striking class action allegations based solely on the pleadings, because class determinations generally involve considerations that are enmeshed in the factual and legal issues comprising a Plaintiff's cause of action. Id. at *42. The Court also observed that a motion to strike class claims is disfavored because it requires a reviewing Court to preemptively terminate the class aspects of litigation solely on the basis of what is alleged in the complaint, and before Plaintiffs are permitted to complete discovery to which they would otherwise be entitled on questions relevant to class certification. Id. The Court reasoned that while it may strike class allegations prior to a motion for class certification, it would not do here at a very early stage in the litigation before the discovery was completed. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to strike the class claims.

Heinzl, et al. v. Cracker Barrel Old Country Store, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58847 (W.D. Pa. April 24, 2015). Plaintiff, individually and on behalf of all others similarly-situated, brought a class action against Defendant alleging violations of Title III of the ADA. Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's facilities were not fully accessible to individuals who used wheelchairs for mobility, because of various barriers in Defendant's parking lot and along the route to the building entrance. Defendant filed a partial motion to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiff lacked standing to raise claims as to locations she was unlikely to visit under "the intent to return theory" and that her class allegations did not give her standing. Id. at *1. The Magistrate Judge issued a report and recommendation denying Defendant's partial motion to dismiss. Id. at *2. Defendant served Rule 72 objections and also contended for the first time that the Court should decide the issue of class certification at this juncture of the litigation, prior to addressing the issue of standing. Id. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's class action allegations should be dismissed (although Plaintiff had not filed a motion for class certification). The Court adopted the Magistrate Judge's report and recommendation, and denied Defendant's motion to dismiss. At the outset, the Court agreed with Plaintiff that it would be improper for the Court to decide the issue of class certification without the benefit of discovery and briefing. Id. at *3. Plaintiff contended that, by asking the Court to forego this "rigorous analysis," in favor of striking the class allegations from the complaint without any evidentiary record, Defendant was seeking extraordinary relief that was not justified. Id. at *4. Moreover, the Court found that as a procedural matter, Defendant had not filed a motion to strike the class allegations, and Plaintiff had not filed a motion for class certification. Id. at *5. Further, as cited in the Magistrate Judge's report and recommendation, the Court observed that numerous case law authorities, including precedent in the Tenth Circuit, have held that in an ADA class action situation, the Court should first evaluate the named Plaintiff's standing regarding the location she has visited and then determine the issue of class certification as to other locations under Rule 23. Id. at *8. The Court thus declined Defendant's invitation to strike Plaintiff's class allegations without discovery, particularly when it had not filed a motion to dismiss the class allegations. Id. at *9. The Court concluded that it would be appropriate to follow the prevailing approach of Third Circuit precedent, and strike all class allegations at the preemptive stage in only the rare case. Id. Accordingly, the Court adopted the Magistrate Judge's report and recommendation and denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Herrera, et al. v. JFK Medical Center Limited Partnership*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20545 (M.D. Fla. Feb. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of emergency radiological services recipients, brought a putative class action alleging that several hospitals ("Defendant hospitals") charged unreasonable amounts for emergency radiological services in violation of the Florida Deceptive Unfair Trade Practices ("FDUTPA"). Plaintiffs were patients at Defendant HCA Holdings, Inc.'s ("HCA") hospitals, were covered by their own personal Injury protection ("PIP") insurance, and signed conditions of admission contracts ("contracts") with the hospitals. Id. at *4. In the contracts, Plaintiffs agreed to pay the rates stated in the hospital's price list known as the "charge master." Id. Plaintiffs alleged that the charges for the emergency radiological services at the hospitals were 65 times higher than the charges for the same services billed to other patients covered under private or government-sponsored insurance programs. Defendants moved to dismiss and to strike Plaintiffs' class allegations. The Court granted the motion in part. HCA argued that, because it was the ultimate parent company of the hospitals, it had no direct liability for their actions. Id. at *8-9. The hospitals argued that Plaintiffs failed to state a claim under the FDUTPA because Plaintiffs did not allege any deceptive or unfair conduct as required under the statute. At the outset, the Court noted that, in In Re Manager Care Litigation, 298 F. Supp. 1259 (S.D. Fla. 2003), it held that Plaintiffs sufficiently pled a cause of action for direct liability of the parent corporation because they alleged that all of the substantive practices, policies, and procedures of the health plans were established, implemented, monitored, and ratified by Defendants themselves. Id. at *10. The Court, accordingly, concluded that whether the parent company could be responsible for its subsidiary's breach of contract was a fact of intensive inquiry, and hence permitted Plaintiffs to proceed against HCA. Id. at *11. The Court noted that, to state a FDUTPA claim, a Plaintiff must allege: (i) a deceptive act or unfair practice; (ii) causation; and (iii) actual damages. Id. at *12. Defendants argued that the contracts expressly incorporated the charge master as the contractual price terms; therefore, it negated Plaintiffs' contention that Defendants materially deceived them about the charges. The Court seriously doubted that the hospitals' practice of incorporating the charges of the emergency radiological services into the contracts by reference rose to the level of unfairness and deception contemplated by the FDUTPA but, nevertheless, in line with other case law authorities that had held these types of allegations sufficient to support an FDUTPA claim, the Court concluded that it would give Plaintiffs an opportunity to prove their case and revisit the issue on summary judgment. Id. at *13. Finally, the Court struck Plaintiffs' class allegations because it found that individual issues would predominate. The threshold inquiry was whether Plaintiffs were charged unreasonable rates for their specific medical services, which impacted the portions of their PIP benefits prematurely depleted and the portions of the charges for which they were individually responsible. The Court noted that, if this case were to proceed, the most important issues to settle – the reasonableness of the charge for the specific radiological service and the damages incurred by each putative Plaintiff – would be highly individualized in nature. Id. at *23. The Court explained that a reasonable charge for radiological services in one geographical area might not be reasonable for another. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss in part and struck Plaintiffs' class allegations. Id. at *24.

Li, et al. v. EFT Holdings, Inc.,* Case No. 13-CV-8832 (C.D. Cal. July 28, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendants fraudulently induced them to purchase substandard products in order to take part in the endless chain schemes. Based on the purported inadequacy of the two firms proposed as class counsel, Locke Lord LLP and Howarth & Smith, as well as the previous failure by other class representatives to file a motion for class certification within the time given by Local Rule 23-3, Defendants moved to strike the class allegations. Id. at 1. The Court granted the motion in part. First, the Court remarked that Locke Lord's predecessor in interest, Edwards Wildman Palmer, was the firm that failed to file for class certification in the time provided by the Local Rules, and this failure resulted in the class allegations being stricken in the original case. Id. The Court found that Locke Lord was sued in a state court action over the prior conduct of Edwards Wildman Palmer in this case. Further, the Court also stated that Locke Lord's incentives in this case and the class' interests were not completely aligned. Id. at 2. The Court, however, could not find any reason that Howarth & Smith was inadequate class counsel. The Court remarked that the arguments related to Howarth & Smith's actual conduct of the case were not so compelling as to demonstrate inadequacy of counsel. Id. Furthermore, the Court also declined to bar the current proposed class representatives from seeking class certification as this action now involved class representatives and class counsel entirely different from those in the original action where Plaintiffs and Locke Lord failed to seek class certification within the time limits of the Local Rules. Id. at 3. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to strike with respect to Locke Lord's adequacy.

(iii) The Numerosity Requirement For Class Certification

Mielo, et al. v. Bob Evans Farms, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36905 (W.D. Pa. Mar. 23, 2015). Plaintiff brought an ADA action alleging that Defendant failed to provide full and independent access to individuals who use wheelchairs in the parking areas of Defendant's various properties. Id. at *2. Plaintiff asserted that excessive slopes in accessible parking spaces and access aisles to the building entrances caused unnecessary difficulty and risk. Plaintiff moved for certification of a nationwide class, which the Court denied. First, the Court found that Plaintiff failed to meet the numerosity requirement. The Court noted that the number of individuals who might be similarly-situated was too speculative because Plaintiff failed to establish that similar non-compliance issues existed in all of Defendant's parking lots and that others similarly-situated have suffered from the same alleged problems. Id. at *14. Further, Plaintiff identified only himself with a mobility impairment who encountered an ADA accessibility issue at a single restaurant, and he did not provide any specific census data concerning the number of qualified individuals with mobility disabilities nationwide who were likely to patronize Defendant's business. Id. The Court therefore found that Plaintiff failed to establish numerosity. Second, the Court determined that Plaintiff failed to meet the commonality requirement because he failed to demonstrate that Defendant practiced any common offending policies or design characteristics that called for common accessibility barriers at its restaurants.

Id. at *19. According to the Court, proving the existence and cause of accessibility barriers at each of Defendant's restaurants would be too fact-intensive and individualized as the threshold question of whether any store in particular was out of compliance and if so, in what manner. In essence, this inquiry would have to be answered on a store-by-store basis. Id. at *19-20. Third, because Plaintiff's individual circumstances were markedly different from that of other putative class members, the Court further found that Plaintiff was atypical of other putative class members. Plaintiff was named in approximately 27 separate cases, all of which alleged that Defendants violated the ADA due to excessive parking lot sloping. Id. at *25. Based on this evidence, the Court stated that Plaintiff might not be a typical customer at any of the locations, but instead might be a "tester" to check for ADA compliance, and this would stand him apart for other putative class members, making him an inadequate representative. Id. at *25-27. Finding that disparate factual circumstances predominated, the Court concluded that an injunctive relief could not be granted. The Court noted that the differences and unique designs of each parking lot, and this lack of commonality, made it impossible to craft one injunction that could remedy all injuries to the class in one stroke. Id. at *34. The Court explained that "[a]n injunction cannot simply order Defendant to obey the law," but that "[a]an injunction must specify the particular action Defendant must do or refrain from doing and overbroad language that merely order a Defendant to obey the law must be stricken." Id. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiff's proposed class could not be certified, and accordingly, denied the motion for class certification.

(iv) The Commonality Requirement For Class Certification

Laumann, et al. v. National Hockey League,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63745 (S.D.N.Y. May 14, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of Comcast and DIRECTV customers and purchasers of the National Hockey League's ("NHL") streaming service, GameCenter Live, brought a putative class action alleging that the territorial allocation of broadcast rights within the NHL assigned to its member clubs – and thereafter sold to regional sporting networks – violated federal antitrust laws, provided out of market consumers with fewer choices, and inflated prices charged to view broadcasts of live professional hockey games. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiffs moved for certification of two classes of consumers, including: (i) those who purchased out-of-market packages on-line (the "Internet Class"); and (ii) those who purchased broadcasts through their television provider (the "TV Class"). Id. at *4. Plaintiffs alleged that every consumer in both classes faced, and continued to face, a market for baseball and hockey broadcasting with limited options and that the prices of options increased as a consequence of Defendants' coordinated maintenance of territorial exclusivity. Id. at *21. Defendants argued that, because the putative class consisted of both winners and losers, some purchasers actually benefitted from the restraints in dispute, which defeated the commonality of injury and the ability of Plaintiffs adequately to represent the interests of all class members. Id. at *34. Defendants further argued that, because some class members no longer subscribed to the packages, they had no legal interest in the prospective relief sought by Plaintiffs and, therefore, they lacked standing to seek injunctive or declaratory relief. Id. The Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. The Court granted certification to the proposed classes for purposes of seeking injunctive relief but not for purposes of seeking damages. The Court noted that every class member suffered an injury because every member, as a consumer in the market for baseball or hockey broadcasting, had been deprived of an option, i.e., a la carte channels that would have been available absent the territorial injury. Id. at *41. The Court further noted that certain class members also suffered an additional injury of having to pay too much for the content they wanted. Id. The Court explained that class certification should be determined by a common injury shared by class members, not by an agreement by class members about the best way to address the injury. The Court concluded that a common injury existed in the form of diminished consumer choice and, therefore, concluded that certification was appropriate for Plaintiffs' injunctive relief claim. Id. at *38. The Court, however, rejected the damages model put forth by Plaintiffs' expert to calculate damages for the class, finding that it relied on insufficient data and, therefore, held that Plaintiffs' class could not be certified for damages claims. Id. at *34. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Leonard, et al. v. Sears, Roebuck & Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 94134 (N.D. Ill. July 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of Illinois consumers, brought a class action asserting design defects in front-loading, high-efficiency washing machines manufactured by Whirlpool and sold by Defendant. Plaintiffs alleged that the machines developed serious internal mold problems that produced odor on the clothes washed in the machines. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiffs alleged breach of express and implied warranty in violation of the Magnuson-Moss Act and Illinois law. Plaintiffs initially sought certification of a six-state class of owners of Defendant's machines that suffered from the mold problem. The District Court denied class certification. Plaintiffs appealed. The Seventh Circuit reversed on the basis that there was a single, central, common issue of liability, i.e., whether Sears washing machine was defective, and any complications caused by differences in various washing models could be handled by the creation of sub-classes, if necessary. Id. at *18. The Seventh Circuit noted that Defendant roughly sold 200,000 of the Kenmore brand Whirlpool washers each year, and the basic question of whether the machines were defective in permitting mold to accumulate and generate noxious order was common to the entire class. Id. On remand, Plaintiffs filed an amended motion for class certification seeking to certify a class made up of Illinois-based Plaintiffs, rather than Plaintiffs from six different states. Id. at *22. The District Court granted class certification. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs could not prove a common, class-wide injury because not all washers build up such an excessive amount of mold that it prevented adequate cleaning of clothes. Id. at *31. The District Court, however, pointed to the Seventh Circuit's observation that the possibility that a class would include persons who have not been injured by Defendant's conduct did not preclude class certification. Id. at *32. Since the basic question remained common to the entire mold class, although damages would likely vary, the District Court concluded that the proposed class could be certified. The District Court accepted Plaintiffs' proposed limitation that the class definition would not include machines built on the Sierra platform, and defined the class to include all of those washer models with the alleged design defect and without the steam feature, regardless of when Defendant manufactured each model. Id. at *35-36. The District Court found that the class included a total of 29 different models manufactured during the span of almost ten years. Plaintiffs consistently asserted that the defect causing the mold problem was the same across all washer models, and therefore the District Court did not find it necessary to create sub-classes for different washer models, as the Seventh Circuit had suggested. Id. at *37. Accordingly, the District Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

(v) The Typicality Requirement For Class Certification

Cox, et al. v. Teletech@home, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14000 (N.D. Ohio Feb. 5, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") by rescinding a job offer because of information contained in a consumer report before providing him a copy of the consumer report and a summary of his rights. Plaintiff applied for a customer service representative position with Defendant and received a conditional offer of employment contingent on passing a pre-employment screening. Defendant used Sterling Infosystems ("Sterling"), a consumer reporting agency, to perform the pre-employment screening. Subsequently, on September 17, 2013, Plaintiff received an e-mail from Defendant with the subject "Urgent | Rescinded offer," stating that the results of the pre-employment screening made him ineligible for hire. Id. at *4. Whereas Plaintiff did not know who exactly wrote the e-mail, he later learned through a Google search that Defendant used Sterling to conduct background checks. Plaintiff then contacted Sterling by telephone to contest the information. Id. at *7. Two days later, Plaintiff received by e-mail a pre-adverse action notice about revocation of his conditional offer, subject to a successful challenge to the accuracy of the consumer report. A few days later, he received a paper copy of the notice, along with the consumer report confirming his suspicions about a conviction and a summary of FCRA rights. Plaintiff also received separate paperwork, which he filled out and returned to contest the report. Id. at *7-8. After an exchange of e-mails with Defendant, Plaintiff received a corrected consumer report, and Defendant re-offered Plaintiff the job, but reversed the offer soon thereafter because Plaintiff failed to submit an I-9 form. Id. at *10. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's conduct demonstrated reckless disregard of the FCRA's requirements. Plaintiff moved to certify a class of all applicants for employment with Defendant who had been affected by the alleged violations. Defendant opposed class certification and simultaneously moved for summary judgment. The Court denied both motions. In denying certification, the Court found that Plaintiff could not satisfy Rule 23's typicality requirement. Although the general nature of Plaintiff's claim that Defendant violated the FCRA by taking adverse action before making the required disclosure was typical of the class, the Court found that some of the unique factual circumstances of the case suggested that Plaintiff was atypical in other respects. Id. at *21. Particularly, the Court noted: (i) Plaintiff contacted Sterling before receiving the standard dispute forms; (ii) Plaintiff claimed that his girlfriend e-mailed Defendant on his behalf after he received the September 17 e-mail; (iii) Defendant re-offered the job to Plaintiff; and (iii) Plaintiff arguably failed to submit an I-9 form, a requirement unrelated to the FCRA. Id. According to the Court, these facts gave Defendant a unique personal defense to Plaintiff's claims and therefore destroyed typicality. Id. In addition, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment, finding a triable issue on whether the September 17 form e-mail reflected an adverse action or merely a pre-adverse action notice. Id. at *12. Whereas one reading of the e-mail, including the subject line, suggested that a final decision already had been made on Plaintiff's job offer, and Defendant took an adverse action by locking Plaintiff's prospective employee on-line account, another reading suggested that Defendant simply kept Plaintiff's application "on hold" pending his challenge to the consumer report. Id. at *13. Moreover, hundreds of applicants received the form e-mail without Defendant's knowledge, and Defendant apparently did not have any systematic policy or procedure to ensure compliance with the FCRA. Id. at *15. Given the factual disputes, the Court found summary judgment inappropriate. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification and denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Steginsky, et al. v. Xcelera, Inc., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28733 (D. Conn. Mar. 10, 2015). Plaintiff, a minority shareholder in Xcelera Inc., brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants engaged in a multi-year scheme to deflate Xcelera's stock price so that the company's controlling shareholders could buy-out minority shareholders at a bargain-basement price. According to the compliant, Xcelera's common stock traded for as high as $110 per share on the American Stock Exchange in 2000, but by 2004, it was down to $1. Around that time, Xcelera insiders stopped making required filings with the SEC and withheld information about the company's financial situation, which caused the company to be delisted. In April 2011, Plaintiff sold over 100,000 shares at $.25 per share after a tender offer by OFC Ltd. Plaintiff alleged that OFC was a shell company created by insiders and that the sale was part of a greater scheme to manipulate the price of Xcelera stock. Id. at *4. Plaintiff alleged breach of fiduciary duty and violations of the Securities Exchange Act, and moved to certify a class of those who sold to OFC in the tender offer on or after February 6, 2007. Id. at *6-7. The Court denied class certification. The Court found that the presence of unique defenses rendered Plaintiff's claims atypical of those of the rest of the proposed class. Id. at *19. The records showed that Plaintiff did not rely on Defendants' alleged omissions in deciding to tender her shares. Plaintiff testified during her deposition that, although she did not read the tender offer materials in their entirety, she believed that Xcelera stock was more than the offered rate of $.25. Id. at *15. Plaintiff raised the issue with her lawyer but eventually decided to sell her shares, despite suspecting fraud, because she needed the money. Id. Plaintiff also testified that she had decided to file this action before tendering her shares, and tendered her shares knowing that she would file this action in the future. Id. The Court noted that no other investors in the proposed class suspected fraud, contacted counsel, and/or decided to file a lawsuit before tendering their shares to OFC. Thus, according to the Court, Plaintiff's apparent lack of reliance would subject her to unique defenses that would "unacceptably detract from the focus of the litigation to the detriment of absent class members." Id. at *18. The Court thereof concluded that Plaintiff failed to meet the typicality requirement of Rule 23(a)(3), and accordingly, denied class certification.

(vi) The Adequacy Of Representation Requirement For Class Certification

Gordon, et al. v. Sonar Capital Management LLC, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34443 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 19, 2015). Plaintiffs, investors in Sigma Designs, Inc. ("Sigma"), brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants engaged in an extensive insider-trading scheme that allowed them to obtain millions of dollars in profits and avoid losses in violation of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. According to Plaintiffs, a former employee of Sigma regularly provided Defendants with material, non-public information consisting primarily of advance quarterly revenue figures, on which Defendants traded. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs moved for certification of two classes, including: (i) a seller class consisting of all persons and entities who sold shares of Sigma on any day between July 13, 2007 and November 28, 2007, and (ii) a buyer class consisting of all persons and entities who bought shares of Sigma on any day between December 20, 2007 and March 12, 2008. Id. at *6. The Court denied class certification. Whereas both Plaintiffs – Sidney Gordon and Jeffrey Tauber – sought to represent the seller class, Tauber additionally sought to represent the buyer class. Defendants opposed class certification primarily on the ground that neither of the proposed class representatives satisfied the adequacy requirement of Rule 23(a)(4). According to Defendants, Gordon's relationship with his attorneys created an actual conflict of interest with the class, and Tauber's claims were subject to a potential unique defense regarding economic loss. First, the Court noted that Gordon had revealed in his deposition that he had from the outset consulted with his long-time family attorney and cousin, David Spirt, regarding this action, and Spirt had reached an arrangement with co-lead counsel to receive 5% of any fees awarded to such counsel. Id. at *10. Neither Gordon nor the co-lead counsel had revealed the existence of such arrangement at the hearing on appointment of lead Plaintiff and lead counsel, even though the Court inquired into the issue, nor did they disclose these facts in response to Defendants' interrogatories. Id. at *11. Subsequent testimony from Gordon and Spirt and review of their e-mail communications revealed troubling inconsistencies about their relation and arrangement. In sum, the Court noted that the close association between Gordon and Spirt, consisting of family, personal, and professional ties, might compromise Gordon's ability to exercise independent judgment in situations like settlement negotiations, in which the interests of the class and counsel might diverge. Id. at *13. The Court, therefore, found Gordon inadequate to serve as a class representative. Second, the Court found that Tauber would be subject to the potentially meritorious defense that he suffered no economic loss attributable to Defendants' alleged wronging. Id. at *27. The records showed that, taking account of all his purchases and sales of Sigma stock during the class periods, Tauber suffered no economic loss. Although Plaintiffs argued that it was inappropriate to net out a Plaintiff's losses and gain in an insider trading case, the Court found that it would be appropriate to reserve this difficult decision until the time of trial. To the extent Plaintiffs argued, based on § 20A of the Exchange Act, that netting was inappropriate and that Tauber's damages must be calculated on the basis of his sales during the seller class periods and purchases during the buyer class periods, irrespective of his other trading activity, the Court pointed out that § 20A, on its face, says nothing about the netting of Plaintiffs' gains and losses in calculating damages. Id. at *21-22. According to the Court, the limitations on damages found in § 20A are just limitations on damages, and they do not abrogate existing case law granting the Court substantial discretion regarding the calculation of damages in securities fraud cases generally. Id. at *23-24. Because Plaintiffs retained the burden to prove the economic loss element of their claim, and because Tauber would be subject to a unique defense regarding economic loss, the Court concluded that Tauber was not an appropriate class representative. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification without prejudice.

In Re Community Bank Of Northern Virginia Mortgage Lending Practices Litigation,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13186 (3d Cir. July 29, 2015). Plaintiffs, a nationwide class of residential mortgagees, brought a class action alleging that Defendant, PNC Bank, N.A. ("PNC") facilitated an illegal home equity lending scheme. The action, first filed in the early 2000, alleged that the North Virginia mortgage lender Shumway Organization associated itself with several banks in the 1990s in order to circumvent fee caps and interest ceilings imposed by various state mortgage lending laws and in order to charge higher fees to mortgage borrowers. Id. at *4. Particularly, Plaintiffs alleged that Shumway formed relationships with area banks, including the Community Bank of Northern Virginia ("CBNV"), in order to disguise the sources of its loan origination services so that fees for those services would appear to be paid solely to the banks. Id. Plaintiffs claimed that CBNV, EquityPlus Financial Inc., and various title companies misrepresented home loan settlements to home buyers and provided Shumway with kickbacks for bringing in borrowers. Id. at *4-5. Six putative class actions, made up of 44,000 class members, were filed in response to the alleged scheme and consolidated in Pennsylvania in 2003, and alleged violations of Racketeer Influences and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO") and the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act ("RESPA"). Id. at *6. Plaintiffs and Defendants eventually agreed on a settlement and the District Court certified classes for the purposes of settlement. A group of objectors appealed the decision and argued that Plaintiffs should have asserted claims under the Truth in Lending Act ("TILA") and the Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act ("HOEPA") on behalf of the putative class. Id. at *8. The Third Circuit overturned the settlement approval on two separate occasions, finding that the District Court erred in several ways, including by failing to make an independent inquiry as to whether Plaintiffs satisfied the Rule 23 class actions requirements, and by incorrectly evaluating the adequacy of the named Plaintiffs and class counsel. Id. at *11-15. The Third Circuit questioned whether the putative class representatives – whose claims were untimely under the TILA/HOEPA without the benefit of equitable tolling – could adequately represent putative class members who had timely TILA/HOEPA claims. Id. at *11. The Third Circuit suggested that the "most obvious remedy" for the conflict "would be to create sub-classes." Id. at *15. In 2011, the original Plaintiffs abandoned settlement negotiations and joined with the objectors to litigate their claims as a newly consolidated class with sub-classes, bringing new claims for violations of the HOEPA and TILA. Id. at *16-17. Plaintiffs then moved for certification of a general class and of five sub-classes. Finding no conflict between the sub-classes because the original Plaintiffs and the objectors each asserted TILA/HOEPA claims in the complaint, the District Court granted class certification. On further appeal, the Third Circuit affirmed. The Third Circuit rejected PNC's challenges to class certification, particularly its argument that intra-class conflicts defeated adequacy of representation because the same counsel represented the different sub-classes. Id. at *24. The Third Circuit explained that a conflict existed when the settlement class was facing a fixed pool of resources to resolve all claims, and it no longer existed because the sub-classes here were not competing for limited settlement funds, but were pursuing damages under the same statutes and the same theories of liability, and the differences among them would not, at least as things presently stood, pit one group's interests against another. Id. at *29-30. Thus, according to the Third Circuit, there was no fundamental intra-class conflict to prevent class certification, and no derivative conflict of interest that could prevent class counsel from fairly and adequately representing the interests of the entire class. Id. at *30. The Third Circuit therefore concluded that appointing separate counsel was not a necessary prerequisite for certification of the sub-classes and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in deciding that Plaintiffs satisfied the adequacy requirement. Id. at *31. Accordingly, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's grant of class certification.

McCarter, et al. v. Kovitz Shifrin Nesbit,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 94 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 5, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant sent her two debt collection letters demanding past-due assessments owed to her condo association in violation of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA"). Plaintiff moved for partial class certification of all individuals: (i) who, within 12 months prior to the date of filing of this action, resided in Illinois and received a form collection letter similar to Plaintiff's collection letter dated December 3, 2012; and (ii) whose collection letters were not returned by the postal service as undelivered or undeliverable. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion and rejected Defendant's argument that Plaintiff and Plaintiff's counsel could not adequately represent the class. First, the Court rejected Defendant's argument that Plaintiff could not adequately represent the class because she had a poor memory during her deposition. Id. at *9-10. Although Plaintiff was reluctant to divulge information that she deemed personal during her deposition, the Court found that the transcript did not support the inference that she was evasive, and such trivial admissions did not undermine Plaintiff's adequacy as a class representative. Id. Further, the Court rejected Defendant's contention that Plaintiff failed to disclose that one of her attorneys, Kenneth DucDuong, represented her in another lawsuit against the condo association. Id. at *9-11. Although Plaintiff did not disclose her lawsuit against the condo association, she stated that Kenneth DucDuong represented her in the condo association's lawsuit against her. Id. at *11. Thus, the Court concluded that Plaintiff sufficiently had disclosed the information and adequately would serve the class' interests. Id. at *12. Further, Defendant argued that Plaintiff's attorneys were inadequate because Mark Lavery's law firm was related to a law firm that the Illinois Attorney General sued for taking advantage of consumers, and neither Lavery nor DucDuong had malpractice insurance. Id. Defendant asserted that Lavery's law firm, Hyslip & Taylor, LLC, might have future legal troubles because one of its attorneys was affiliated with a law firm that had legal troubles in the past. Id. at *12-14. Defendant argued that, if Hyslip & Taylor had to pay a judgment or settlement on hypothetical claims, it could impact counsel's ability to represent and protect the class' interests. Id. at *14. The Court, however, found this speculation insufficient to deny class certification under Rule 23(a)(4). Id. The Court noted that, with respect to Defendant's broader point about maintaining malpractice insurance, Defendant failed to cite any case law supporting its argument that insurance was an important consideration in class certification. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that DucDuong and Lavery adequately would represent the class, and granted Plaintiff's motion for partial class certification.

Real, et al. v. Rescue Mission,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 108814 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 18, 2015). Plaintiff, an individual, brought an action against Defendant, Rescue Mission, and a group of individuals, who worked or volunteered at Rescue Mission, alleging that their prayer policy violated his right to religious freedom under the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. Plaintiff contended that Defendants required individuals to partake in Christian prayers as a condition of receiving free housing and/or meals. Id. at *2. Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint, which the Court granted. Plaintiff subsequently filed an amended complaint, where, in addition to his allegation against Defendants' prayer policy, he also sought to certify the case as a class action, sought a preliminary injunction, and also asserted a violation of the Civil Rights Action of 1964. Id. at *3. The Court found that Plaintiff did not allege sufficient facts to state a claim for relief and also failed to state any actionable claims against the individual Defendants. Id. at *5. The Court noted that Plaintiff's constitutional claims also failed because there was no state action. The Court further opined that the amended complaint did not allege any facts that plausibly suggested that Defendant or its employees were engaged in a joint action with the state or its agents. Thus, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's constitutional claims. In addition, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's civil rights claims as the complaint did not plead facts that asserted a viable Civil Rights Act violation. Id. at *9. Plaintiff sought certification of a class of all homeless and poor people of different beliefs residing in Lee County, Florida, who sought access to hot meals or food at the Rescue Mission, and sought to do so without the imposition of a prayer by invoking a belief that they do not believe or disagree. Id. at *9-10. The Court, however, found that Plaintiff had failed to establish any of the conditions required under Rule 23(a) or (b) and concluded that Plaintiff, being a pro se litigant, could not serve as an adequate class representative and thereby, could not proceed with the class. Id. at *10-11. Finally, Plaintiff's request for a preliminary injunction against Defendants was also denied because the Court found that Plaintiff failed to show that he was likely to succeed on the merits and Plaintiff had not alleged any actionable claims. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's amended complaint.

(vii) The Predominance Requirement For Class Certification

Adkins, et al. v. Morgan Stanley,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63333 (S.D.N.Y. May 14, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of Detroit homeowners, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, an investment bank, followed practices that caused a disparate impact on African-American borrowers in violation of the Fair Housing Act and the Equal Credit Opportunity Act. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant actively ensured the proliferation of high-cost mortgage loans through New Century Mortgage Corp. ("New Century") with specific risk factors in order to bundle and sell mortgage-backed securities to investors. New Century ranked among the leaders in originating sub-prime loans and selling its loans to investment banks such as Defendant, which then securitized the loans. Id. at *8. Although the parties contested Defendant's influence on New Century's practices, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant controlled New Century's lending practices and that New Century wrote loans based on Defendant's preferred terms. Thus, Plaintiffs argued that Defendant should bear responsibility for the disparate impact of New Century's lending practices. Plaintiffs sought to certify a class comprised of all African-Americans in the Detroit area who allegedly received what they described as "combined-risk" loans. Id. at *18. Plaintiffs defined a combined-risk loan as a loan that both met the definition of a high-cost loan under the Home Mortgage Disclosure Act and also contained two or more high-risk features, including: (i) that it was based on stated income rather than verified income; (ii) that it had a high loan-to-value ratio; (iii) that it had an adjustable interest rate; (iv) that it had interest-only features; (v) that it had balloon-payment features; (vi) that it had pre-payment penalties; or (vii) that it had other defined high-risk features. Id. at *18-19. Plaintiffs' expert found that, in the Detroit region, the likelihood that an African-American would receive a combined-risk loan was 1.347 times greater than that of a non-Hispanic white borrower with similar characteristics. Id. at *35. Denying Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, the Court concluded that the named Plaintiffs' claims were not typical of those of the putative class and that common questions did not predominate over individual ones. The Court noted that Plaintiffs' definition of "combined-risk loan" yielded hundreds of combinations of risk factors, 33 of which actually existed in at least one loan made by New Century to a putative class member. Id. at *39. The named Plaintiffs reflected only a small sub-set of risk factors. The Court thus agreed with Defendant that Plaintiffs with loans that Defendant affirmatively sought, such as loans with adjustable interest rates and pre-payment penalties, would face drastically different proof challenges than Plaintiffs with loans with features that were less desirable, such as state income loans with high loan-to-value ratio. Id. at *46-47. The Court found that these differences among the class members would result in arguments available to some on the issue of causation that were not available to others, and the need to conduct separate analyses for the different risk-factor combinations that would cause individual issues to predominate over common issues. Id. at *60-66. Additionally, the Court determined that, because the connection between Defendant's practices and the disparate impact on the African-American community in Detroit could be explained by brokers' exercise of discretion in writing loans, and because mid-level New Century employees and a myriad of independent brokers exercised discretion in the loan-origination process, questions of discretion would also defeat commonality. Id. at *68-72. The Court further refused to consider certifying a different class, explaining that Plaintiffs' theory of the case had been consistent for three years, and to change the theory would unfairly prejudice Defendant. Id. at *77. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Edwards, et al. v. Ford Motor Co.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 3073 (9th Cir. Feb. 27, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated California's Consumers Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA") and Unfair Competition Law when it sold and serviced 2005-07 Freestyle vehicles without informing customers of a known defect in the electronic throttle control ("ETC") system that caused the Freestyles to accelerate unexpectedly. The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded. Defendant contended that the appeal was moot because after Plaintiff filed her petition for permission to appeal, Defendant implemented a repair and reimbursement program concerning the alleged problem. Id. at *1-2. In its program, Defendant extended the warranty for repairs, offered a refund for owner-paid repairs made before the program was announced, and gave notice to vehicle owners and the dealers. Id. at *2. The Ninth Circuit also determined that the appeal was not moot because Plaintiff sought relief beyond that provided by the program, including reimbursement of the money consumers spent on the Freestyles or on extended warranties. Id. The Ninth Circuit found that the District Court's commonality and predominance holdings were irreconcilable. Id. at *3. The Ninth Circuit observed that although the District Court correctly concluded that whether a defect existed and whether Defendant had a duty to disclose the defect were both questions common to the class, the District Court characterized those same questions as "individualized" in the predominance analysis. Id. Defendant argued that the District Court's error was harmless because individualized issues precluded class certification. Id. The Ninth Circuit, however, opined that the argument was unpersuasive because the District Court erred in concluding that individualized proof was required as to the existence of a defect, as factors such as driving conditions did not affect whether Defendant sold the Freestyle with an ETC system defect. Id. at *3-4. Moreover, the Ninth Circuit observed that by providing class-wide relief through its notice and repair program, Defendant had acknowledged that a single class defect existed. Id. at *4. The Ninth Circuit ruled that the District Court also erred in holding that materiality under the CLRA would require individualized proof. Id. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded the matter for further proceedings.

Johnson, et al. v. Nextel Communications, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 3470 (2d Cir. Mar. 4, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees from 27 different states, brought a class action against Defendants, Nextel Communications, Inc. and Plaintiffs' former law firm, alleging that Defendants engaged in various illegal acts against them by entering into a Dispute Resolution Settlement Agreement ("DRSA") to resolve their employment discrimination claims. In or around 2000, Defendant Leeds, Morelli & Brown ("LMB"), a law firm which represented Plaintiffs, had entered into the DRSA with Nextel to resolve various discrimination claims. Id. at *4. Following the execution of the DRSA, LMB obtained individual agreements from most of its clients to resolve their claims against Nextel through the dispute resolution process. As a result, LMB received $5.5 million in attorneys' fees as well as an additional $2 million to act as consultants to Nextel on its employment practices. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiffs received less than half of the amount that their law firm received. Id. Later, in 2002, two employees filed two separate state court actions in Colorado alleging that LMB breached its retainer agreement and its fiduciary duty to its clients. Id. at *6. While one action resulted in a class-wide settlement, with 41 employees opting-out, the other action resulted in a verdict for LMB finding that Plaintiffs had knowingly waived any conflict of interest relative to the DRSA by signing the individuals agreements. Id. at *7-8. Eventually, six opt-out Plaintiffs brought the instant action asserting state law claims against both Defendants, and sought to certify a class, which the District Court granted. Although Defendants argued that the District Court had to apply a choice-of-law analysis to the claims of each individual class member hailing from 27 different states, and that various differences in applicable state laws rendered individuals issues predominant, the District Court determined that New York law should be applied to all because it was the state with the "more significant relationship" to parties, and there was no substantive conflicts between the laws of New York and those of the other states. Id. at *14-15. The District Court also rejected the argument that individual calculation of damages made individual issues predominant because Plaintiffs sought class certification only as to liability. Id. at *15. Upon appeal, the Second Circuit reversed the District Court's ruling on the basis that individual issues substantially outweighed the common issues. Id. at *27. Although the Second Circuit agreed that the common issues identified by Plaintiffs were susceptible to generalized proof, it found that the District Court erred in its determination that New York law should be applied to all Plaintiffs. The Second Circuit explained that majority of the alleged wrong-doing took place outside of New York, and therefore the state with the most significant relationship to Plaintiffs' claims would be each individual state in which a class member resided and where he or she were promised legal representation. Id. at *42-43. The Second Circuit therefore held that resolution of the common issues would require the application of the substantive laws of 27 different states, and because of this, "the case for finding predominance of common issues and the superiority of trying this case as a class action diminishes to the vanishing point." Id. at *43-44. The Second Circuit further reasoned that the individualized inquiries associated with looking at the substantive law of each class member's state were not collateral issues that could be determined in individual hearings after resolution of common questions because they went to the heart of Defendants' liability. According to the Second Circuit, the trier of fact would have to determine whether each class member knowingly waived the conflict of interest, which would require individualized inquiries, and class members whose states allowed such waivers could not be "sensibly segregated from the larger class" by means of a sub-class. Id. at *44. The Second Circuit thus concluded that the application of different jurisdictions' laws rendered individuals issues predominant and undercut the superiority of trying the common issues on a class-wide basis. Accordingly, the Second Circuit reversed the District Court's class certification order.

McCormick, et al. v. Halliburton Energy Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26682 (W.D. Okla. Mar. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging contamination of the groundwater at and around Defendant's operations at a facility on Osage Road in Duncan, Oklahoma (the "site"). Defendant performed a variety of tasks on the site, including work for the U.S. Department of Defense cleaning out missile motor casings. The work involved removing solid rocket propellant, consisting primarily of ammonium perchlorate, from the missile casings. Over time, perchlorate collected in the pits on the site reached the groundwater under the site and migrated off-site. Plaintiffs alleged violations of the Resources Conservation and Recovery Act, as well as directives of the Oklahoma Department of Environmental Quality. Plaintiffs also asserted causes of action for private nuisance, public nuisance, negligence, trespass, strict liability, and unjust enrichment. Plaintiffs sought class certification with respect to Defendant's liability to a class of landowners whose real property rights had been injured by Defendant's wrongful practices, which resulted in the migration of perchlorate contaminated groundwater from the site. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs further sought the division of the class into two sub-classes, including: (i) the "plume class," consisting of owners that were currently suffering from perchlorate contaminated groundwater from Defendant's site operations; and (ii) the "threatened class," consisting of owners of properties that were not currently suffering from perchlorate groundwater contamination, but due to their proximity to such contamination, their properties were threatened and they had suffered diminished property value. Id. at *5-6. The Court denied certification on the basis that liability could not be determined on a class-wide basis because elements of Plaintiffs' causes of action required significant individualized evidence. Id. at *9. The Court found that Plaintiffs nuisance claim would involve questions to each individual Plaintiff, such as if a Plaintiff had a well on his or her property and if so, whether or not the well was used for drinking water. Id. at *11. Plaintiffs' negligence, trespass and strict liability claims also required Plaintiffs to show that his or her property contained perchlorate and that the perchlorate came from the site and not from some other source. Id. at *12. Therefore, the Court determined that although there might be common questions of law or fact regarding certain elements of Plaintiffs' causes of action, the vast number of important individualized issues relating to Defendant's ultimate liability as to all of Plaintiffs' causes of action overwhelmed any common questions. Id. at *13. The Court reasoned a trial on whether Defendant released perchlorate into the groundwater, as well as the current and future scope and extent of that groundwater contamination, was unlikely to substantially aid in the resolution of the ultimate determination of Defendant's liability. Id. Thus, the Court concluded that individual issues would predominate over common issues. Id. at *14. Even if the Court were to certify common issues, the subsequent separate proceedings necessary for each Plaintiff would undo whatever efficiencies such a class proceeding would have been intended to promote. Id. Thus, the Court concluded that class certification was inappropriate because Plaintiffs could not establish predominance under Rule 23(b)(3).

Rikos, et al. v. The Procter & Gamble Co.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 14613 (6th Cir. Aug. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of purchasers of Defendant's probiotic nutritional supplement, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant's product did not promote their digestive health as advertised. Plaintiffs asserted violations of various state unfair competition and deceptive trade practices statutes. Id. at *2. The District Court certified five single-state classes of California, Illinois, Florida, New Hampshire, and North Carolina consumers who purchased the product during the defined class period. Id. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed, finding that Plaintiffs demonstrated commonality as well as predominance. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to present evidence that class members suffered a common injury. The Sixth Circuit disagreed, holding that Defendant misconstrued Plaintiffs' burden of proof at the class certification stage. Plaintiffs need not prove at the class certification stage that all or most class members were in fact injured; rather, they must show that their claims depend upon a common contention that is capable of class-wide resolution. Id. at *10. The Sixth Circuit found that Plaintiffs identified a common question – whether the product yielded benefits to anyone – was a common question with a common answer for the entire class that, if true, would make Defendant liable to the entire class. Id. at *12. Defendant argued that the District Court erred in finding predominance in four separate but related ways. First, Defendant alleged that significant numbers of consumers became aware of and purchased its product based on sources of information unrelated to the advertising at issue, and, therefore, individual proof that class members purchased the product because of its advertising would be necessary, thereby defeating predominance. Id. at *22. The Sixth Circuit found that, regardless of how customers first heard of Defendant's product, they decided to purchase the product only for its purported health benefits, and, therefore, the District Court did not err in rejecting Defendant's contention that certain class members did not rely on Defendant's advertising in making their decisions to buy the product. Id. at *27-28. Second, Defendant claimed that, under the state laws at issue, individual issues of causation and reliance predominated over the common questions that allegedly affected all members of the class. The Sixth Circuit held that Plaintiffs could prove causation and reliance on a class-wide basis provided that the alleged misrepresentation that the product promoted digestive health was material or likely to deceive a reasonable consumer and Defendant made its misrepresentations in a generally uniform way to the entire class. Id. at *28-29. The Sixth Circuit found that Plaintiffs met both factors because consumers had only one reason to buy the product – to promote digestive health – and Defendant undertook a comprehensive marketing strategy with a generally uniform core message such that all class members likely were exposed to the alleged misrepresentations. Id. at *43-44. Third, Defendant argued that its product actually worked, at least for some consumers, and, therefore, Plaintiffs would not be able to prove injury on a class-wide basis. The Sixth Circuit held that Defendant's claim went solely to the merits and had no relevance at the class certification stage. Id. at *48-50. Finally, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to provide any viable method to determine or award class-wide damages. The Sixth Circuit, however, found that Plaintiffs' damages model – a full refund of the purchase price for each class member – was appropriate because there was no reason to buy the product at issue except for its purported digestive benefits, and Plaintiffs' damages model measured only damages attributable to its theory of liability. Id. at *32. The Sixth Circuit, therefore, concluded that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in determining that common issues predominated over individual issues. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's order granting class certification.

Village Of Bedford Park, et al. v. Expedia, Inc. (WA),* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1012 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of fourteen Illinois municipalities, brought an action against Defendants, several on-line travel companies, alleging that Defendants failed to remit taxes owed under their municipal hotel tax ordinances. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants, who contracted with individual hotels paying wholesale rates for rooms, had rented the rooms directly to the public for a higher retail price, and remitted the taxes at the reduced wholesale rate. According to Plaintiffs, their hotel tax ordinances applied to the retail rate charged to customers, not just the wholesale rate, and thus Defendants had failed to remit taxes owed under the ordinances. Id. at *5. After the dismissal of seven of the ten claims in Plaintiffs' complaint for failure to state a claim, Plaintiffs moved for class certification. Plaintiffs grouped the hotel tax ordinances into four categories, which they proposed as possible sub-classes, including ordinances that impose a tax upon: (i) the use and privilege of a hotel room; (ii) the rental of hotel accommodations; (iii) persons engaged in the business of renting hotel rooms; and (iv) consideration received for renting a hotel room. Id. at *4. The Court denied class certification. The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3). Although Plaintiffs contended that each of the Defendants had failed to remit taxes on its markup or fees to any Plaintiff or class member, regardless of ordinance language, the Court found that predominance could not be satisfied because the language of the hotel tax ordinances varied widely within the proposed sub-classes. The Court noted that the ordinances have differed widely as to "who" was responsible for collecting the tax, and even when the ordinances used the same language to identify who was responsible for collecting the tax, their definitions of the terms varied, particularly, on phrases used to describe "what" was taxed. Id. at *12-14. In fact, the ordinances used different phrases to describe "what" was taxed, including "gross rental receipts," "rental or lease payment," "room rental rate," and "one night room charge." Id. at *16. Although Plaintiffs asserted that each of these phrases imposed a tax upon the retail room rate, they did not provide a legal argument for why this was so. Id. The Court determined that given the variations between the ordinances, it would need to perform an ordinance-by-ordinance analysis to determine whether there were material differences among the language of the ordinances. Id. at *20. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs have failed to establish predominance, and accordingly, denied their motion for class certification.

(viii) The Superiority Requirement For Class Certification

Coleman, et al. v. District Of Columbia*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48116 (D.D.C. April 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of homeowners, brought a putative class action challenging a District of Columbia law that directed the sale of liens on their properties after they failed to pay their property tax bills. The law permitted the private purchasers of the liens to add interest, costs, and fees to Plaintiffs' bills and, when Plaintiffs failed to pay, to institute foreclosure proceedings. Id. at *1. After the foreclosure proceedings, the private purchasers obtained the titles to Plaintiffs' homes, and Plaintiffs received nothing even though the amount of equity they had in their homes far surpassed the amounts that they owed. Because the loss of the surplus equity was dictated by District of Columbia law, Plaintiffs sued to challenge the law. Plaintiffs moved to certify two classes. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. At the outset, the Court noted that the class consisted of approximately 34 potential class members. Although Defendant argued that only seven out of the 34 individuals were potential class members, the Court found that Defendant sought an adjudication on the merits of the claims of potential class members in an attempt to exclude them from the numerosity analysis. Id. at *18. The Court found that Plaintiffs offered a valuation method that rendered at least 34 putative class members in a position with excess equity, and such method was sufficient at this stage to show numerosity. Id. at *26. The Court also found that Plaintiffs raised common legal questions as to their liability claims, including whether the law created a property interest in equity, whether the District of Columbia's tax-sale statutes effected a "taking" of that property, whether any such taking was done without public purpose, and whether the Plaintiffs were granted just compensation. Id. at *28-30. The Court ruled that these legal questions were susceptible to class-wide answers because their resolution did not depend upon the particular circumstances of any individual's loss. Id. at *37-38. The Court similarly concluded that the common questions, which comprised nearly the entirety of the class' liability claim, were themselves sufficient to support a finding that common issues predominated over individualized ones. Although Defendant argued that the individualized nature of each class member's property value at the time the tax deed was issued would require individualized treatment, the Court held that a number of other factors rendered that issue a minor part of the otherwise striking common class claims. Id. at *47-48. Finally, the Court noted that the superiority requirement was intended to ensure that resolution by the class would achieve economies of time, effort, and expense and promote uniformity of decision as to persons similarly-situated, without sacrificing procedural fairness or bringing about other undesirable consequences. Id. at *53. The Court found that every liability issue in this case was common, with the exception of the valuation of individual properties. Id. at *55. The 34 class members in this case, by definition, had less financial resources, a lesser ability to manage their legal affairs, or both, than the average citizen. Id. In the absence of a class action, then, class members were less likely to be able to prosecute separate actions. For these reasons, the Court opined that Plaintiffs established the superiority requirement. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Downing, et al. v. Riceland Foods, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34154 (E.D. Mo. Mar. 19, 2015). After Bayer introduced genetically modified rice into the United States rice supply, rice farmers and others involved in the rice business brought more than 200 suits against Bayer and other entities, including Riceland Foods, in state and federal courts. Id. at *3. Riceland Foods filed cross-claims against Bayer and filed two other suits – one in state court and one in federal court – against Bayer. Id. The federal cases were consolidated in an MDL. To make the MDL manageable, the MDL Court appointed lead counsel and set up a trust from which attorneys' fees and costs would be paid to all the MDL Plaintiffs' counsel in the event of a recovery against Bayer. Id. at *5. The order did not apply to recoveries in state court cases absent consent or an order by a state court. Id. Under the order, Riceland Foods was to pay 10% of any recovery against Bayer to the trust. Id. Over the course of five years, the MDL Plaintiffs' counsel drafted a consolidated complaint, opposed Bayer's dispositive motions, reviewed more than 2.8 million pages of documents, and took and defended a total of 167 depositions. Id. at *5-6. They conducted three bellwether trials, all of which resulted in Plaintiffs' verdicts. Id. at *6. In separate state court litigation, Defendant received $92 million from Bayer in a settlement. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs in Downing sued Riceland Foods to recover 10% of that recovery on unjust enrichment and quantum meruit theories, claiming that Defendant used the work performed by the MDL Plaintiffs' counsel to achieve that settlement. Id. at *8. They sought to certify, as a class, all persons and entities that provided or paid for services in the MDL action. Id. The Court certified the proposed class action, stating that "[t]his action is uniquely suitable for class certification." Id. at *3. The Court found that the proposed class satisfied the numerosity requirement because it consisted of more than 30 law firms and more than 5,000 MDL Plaintiffs. Id. at *10. The Court determined that the proposed class satisfied the commonality requirement. Id. at *11. Specifically, the Court reasoned that the class' claims would face the common legal question of whether an unjust enrichment and quantum meruit action could be "based upon the use of an attorney's work-product by a non-client." Id. at *11. The Court ruled that typicality was established because "each of the proposed class members would have essentially the same grievances as the named Plaintiffs – that Riceland had unjustly benefitted from work for which they had paid or provided." Id. at *12-13. The Court also found that the class representatives and counsel were adequate. Id. The Court then turned to the issue of whether Rule 23(b)(3)'s requirements – that common questions predominate over individual questions and that class resolution is superior to other available resolution methods – were met. The Court held that common questions would predominate as to both the unjust enrichment and quantum meruit claims because the class members jointly incurred expenses that conferred benefits on Defendant. Id. at *22. While agreeing that there would need to be "a great number of factual determinations related to [Riceland Foods'] use of work-product and value received," the Court pointed out that those inquiries would "focus on what Riceland did and what benefit it received" that would be "issues that are common to the class." Id. at *24. Further, the Court determined that class litigation was superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy. Id. at *25. As a result, the Court concluded that the class members did not have an interest in individually pursuing separate actions and that "any difficulties in managing th[e] class action pale in comparison to the alternative." Id.

Imber-Gluck, et al. v. Google, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44839 (N.D. Cal. April 3, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant charged users for unauthorized purchases made by minor children who played games downloaded from Defendant's Google Play Store. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant allowed parents to purchase apps for their children through the Google Play Store but failed adequately to disclose that users automatically could purchase in-game currency for a period of 30 minutes without re-entering their password. Id. at *3. Prior to the filing of the complaint, the U.S. Federal Trade Commission ("FTC") initiated an industry-wide investigation into the conduct alleged by Plaintiffs and reached a settlement with Defendant that, among other things, required Defendant to provide full refunds to account holders who Defendant had billed for unauthorized in-app charges incurred by minors. Id. Defendant filed a motion to deny class certification on the grounds that, in light of the FTC settlement, Plaintiffs could not meet the superiority or adequacy requirements of Rule 23. Specifically, Defendant maintained that Plaintiffs could not demonstrate superiority because the FTC settlement already provided the relief that Plaintiffs sought, and a class action would result in reduced recovery due to administrative costs and attorneys' fees. Id. at *5. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs also could not demonstrate adequacy because they sought to maintain a costly class action when the FTC settlement better served the class members. Id. The Court granted Defendant's motion to deny class certification. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs could not meet the superiority requirement of Rule 23(b)(3) because the litigation would require a substantial expenditure of judicial time and largely would duplicate the work of the 18-month FTC investigation. Id. at *6. The FTC settlement provided significant relief in the form of a complete refund and an injunction, and defending the class action would prove costly to Defendants and duplicate in part the work expended over a considerable period of time by the FTC. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiffs argued that the FTC settlement did not provide punitive damages, to which class members might be entitled. The Court expressed doubt that punitive damages would be available in the case and found that, even if punitive damages were available, because the FTC settlement provided nearly all of the possible relief sought by Plaintiffs, maintaining a class action for those class members who opted-out of the FTC refunds in order to pursue the possibility of punitive damages was not a superior method of adjudication. Id. at *10. Finally, Plaintiffs argued that the FTC settlement did not provide adequate notice to the class because it only required Defendant to send one e-mail to class members, and consumers had to submit a refund request to Defendant. Plaintiffs argued that there inevitably would be thousands, if not millions, of consumers who still had valid claims against Defendant. The Court noted, however, that Plaintiffs' argument was unfounded because Defendant already had refunded over $30 million to class members, and the settlement period continued through December 2015. Id. at *11. Further, the Court found it unlikely that a class notice and claims process achieved through the litigation would be much different than the notice and claims process under the FTC settlement. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted the motion to deny class certification.

In Re Actiq Sales And Marketing Practices Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36466 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 23, 2015). In this class action brought by the Pennsylvania Turnpike Commission and Indiana Carpenters Welfare Fund alleging that the off-label prescription payments made to Defendants were excessive and constituted unjust enrichment, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Plaintiffs were third-party payors ("TPPs"), who were responsible for paying all or part of the costs of prescriptions for their members, employees, plan participants, beneficiaries, or insureds. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant engaged in unlawful off-label marketing of Actiq, a drug approved by the FDA to manage breakthrough cancer pain in patients. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant's conduct caused them to make excessive off-label prescription payments for Actiq to treat conditions not approved by the FDA and for whom less excessive pain management drugs were appropriate and less dangerous. Plaintiffs sought certification of a nationwide class of all TPPs who reimbursed Actiq's cost, and also sought certification of two multi-state alternative classes that Plaintiffs defined as an unjust enrichment restatement class and an unjust enrichment appreciation class. At the outset, the Court noted that the elements of Plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claim could not be succinctly identified because of the multi-state nature of the claim and as the law of each TPP's home state would govern. Id. at *53. For example, some states require five elements, including: (i) enrichment; (ii) an impoverishment; (iii) a connection between the two; (iv) absence of justification for the enrichment and the impoverishment; and (v) absence of legal remedy. Id. at *53-54. Some states required three or four elements to establish unjust enrichment. In addition, the Court noted that whether the TPPs' payments for Actiq prescriptions resulted in unjust enrichment was a question resolved by examination into the actions not only of Defendant, but also of the individual TPPs and prescribing doctors. Id. at *65. Therefore, the Court ruled that the unjust enrichment claim essentially demanded an individualized inquiry, as what may be unjust for one TPP may not be unjust for another depending on individual facts. Accordingly, the Court concluded that common issues did not predominate. As to the Rule 23(b)(3) requirement of superiority, the Court observed that the largest impediment was the difficulty in managing a class action in which the laws of the TPPs' various home states applied and individual questions of fact predominated. Id. at *70. Further, the Court noted that the TPPs were sophisticated institutional entities with an interest in controlling litigation where relatively large amounts of money were at stake. Moreover, the Court reasoned that some TPPs had already filed suit based on Defendant's distribution of Actiq, and the Court's analysis revealed that the TPPs had brought and lost individual suits alleging RICO violations and state law claims such as consumer fraud and misrepresentation. Id. Accordingly, the Court found that adjudication of these issues in a class action was not the superior method of adjudication, and denied class certification.

Parker, et al. v. Asbestos Processing, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS (D.S.C. Jan. 8, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that they sustained injuries from exposure to asbestos during their employment at various South Carolina manufacturing plants. According to the complaint, two attorneys, Richard Bishoff (of Georgia) and John Deakle (of Mississippi) solicited a large number of South Carolina residents as asbestos tort Plaintiffs. Id. at *4. Although all of the 15,896 Plaintiffs were South Carolina residents, the tort claims were filed in Mississippi state court to take advantage of Mississippi's liberal venue and joinder statutes. Id. Over the years, Plaintiffs amended the complaint several times, and importantly, added numerous Mississippi attorneys as Defendants because of on-going relationships they had with insurance adjusters representing companies that manufactured asbestos during the relevant time period. At least some of the potential class members were represented by some of the attorney Defendants. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants failed to advise Plaintiffs to take steps to protect their potential workers' compensation claims against their employers and failed to advise them of the consequences under South Carolina law of proceeding only with asbestos tort claims. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification. The Court denied the motion. The Court opined that although Plaintiffs met the predominance requirement, they could not show that a class action was a superior method of adjudication. With respect to commonality, Defendants argued that myriad individual questions existed that did not generate common answers because of dissimilarities among class members and Defendants. For example, Defendants suggested that the question of whether Defendants had attorney-client relationships with class members was not a common issue with regard to certain Defendants. The Court noted that this argument overlooked that the commonality requirement referred to questions of law or fact common to the class and that differences among Defendants should not be a major concern in the Rule 23(a)(2) analysis. Defendants also argued that Plaintiffs could not satisfy predominance because the threshold consideration under the predominance requirement was the law to be applied to the common issues. Plaintiffs maintained that, in accordance with South Carolina choice-of-law rules as to torts, the applicable law was the law of the place where Plaintiffs sustained their damages, and not the place where Defendants were located when they allegedly failed to provide the necessary legal advice. Id. at *35. On the other hand, Defendants asserted that Georgia or Mississippi laws were applicable because the allegedly deficient legal advice occurred in different states. Further, Defendants contended that, because the class members originally filed claims in Mississippi state court, the ethical rules of Mississippi, not South Carolina, should apply because Mississippi was the location of the tribunal. The Court found that, because Plaintiffs showed that only South Carolina law applied, the choice-of-law issue was no impediment to a finding of predominance. Citing Comcast v. Behrend, 133 S. Ct. 1426 (2013), Defendants also argued that class certification was not appropriate because Plaintiffs' damages were not capable of measurement on a class-wide basis. Id. at *38. Plaintiffs sought two types of damages in this case. First, Plaintiffs contended that they should be compensated in an amount equivalent to the workers' compensation benefits to which they would have been entitled, and, second, they sought a disgorgement remedy under their breach of fiduciary duty claim. The Court remarked that Defendants read too much into the Comcast decision because it does not stand for the proposition that all of the Plaintiffs' damages must be calculated on a class-wide basis. Id. It merely indicates that the "methodology" for measuring and quantifying damages should be the same for all class members. Id. at *39. The Court found that the methodology for both actual damages and disgorgement (assuming the fiduciary duty claim was viable) was the same for all class members. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied the predominance requirement. Id. The Court, however, found that the superiority requirement was not satisfied in this case, and denied the motion for class certification.

(ix) Workplace Class Action Arbitration Issues

Brooks, et al. v. AT&T Mobility Services*, Case No. 22-CA-127746 (NLRB July 3, 2015). A group of employees brought unfair labor practice charges alleging that Defendant promulgated, maintained, and enforced individual management arbitration agreements (the "agreement") with collective action and class action litigation waivers that interfered with their rights to engage in collective legal activity in violation of § 8 of the National Labor Relations Act (the "NLRA"). Id. at *1. In early 2011, Defendant sent notice of the agreement via e-mail to 24,000 non-bargaining-unit employees, including its National Retail Account Executives ("NRAE"). The agreement provided employees the option to have employment-related disputes resolved through arbitration, and also provided employees the option to opt-out and not participate in the agreement. Id. at *1-2. Defendant stated in the e-mail that it would not impose any adverse consequences on employees who opted-out. Id. at *2. The employees who brought the NLRA charges did not opt-out of the agreement. Id. at *2. They and others filed a collective action asserting violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA"), and then voluntarily dismissed their claims in favor of arbitration. The Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") noted that a work rule that does not explicitly restrict concerted activities will be found unlawful where the evidence establishes one of the following: (i) employees construed the rule to prohibit concerted activities; (ii) the rule was promulgated in response to union or protected concerted activities; or (iii) the rule was applied to restrict employees' rights to engage in concerted activities. Id. at *3. The ALJ noted that the NLRB in D.R. Horton, Inc., 357 NLRB No. 184 (2012), and Murphy Oil USA, Inc. v. Hobson, 2014 NLRB LEXIS 820 (NLRB Oct. 28, 2014), held that mandatory arbitration agreements that barred employees from bringing joint, class, or collective workplace actions in any forum restricted the exercise of their rights under § 7 of the NLRA to act concertedly for mutual aid or protection. Id. at *4. Defendant contended that the decision of whether to agree to the agreement was entirely voluntary, rendering it lawful under the NLRA. The ALJ found that the voluntary nature of the decision was questionable considering the difficulties of determining whether Defendant fully apprised employees of the consequences of their decisions in a manner that they could appreciate, and whether the burden of having to decide whether irrevocably to relinquish their rights under the NLRA was a reasonable one. Id. The ALJ observed that, although D.R. Horton and Murphy Oil did not consider the issue of individual agreements containing opt-out provisions, the NLRB in several other cases had found an employer's offer to allow an employee to waive core § 7 rights to be unlawful. Id. Second, relying on American Express Co. v. Italian Colors Restaurant, 133 S. Ct. 2304 (2013), CompuCredit Corp. v. Greenwood, 132 S. Ct. 665 (2012), and AT&T Mobility v. Concepcion, 131 S. Ct. 24 (2001), Defendant argued that the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") proclaims a strong policy in favor of arbitration and, accordingly, the statute requires the enforcement of arbitration agreements. Id. at *5. The ALJ found that, in Chesapeake Energy Corp., 362 No. 80 (2015), the NLRB rejected this argument, finding that § 2 of the FAA provides that arbitration agreements may be invalidated for the same reasons that other contracts may be invalidated, including because they are unlawful or contrary to public policy. Id. at *5. The ALJ ultimately concluded that D.R. Horton and its progeny were binding, and that Defendant violated § 8(1) of the NLRA by maintaining an arbitration policy that waived the rights of its employees to file and maintain class actions and collective actions in all forums, arbitral and judicial. Accordingly, the ALJ ordered Defendant to cease and desist enforcement of the agreement, and to take affirmative action designated to effectuate the policies of the NLRA.

Chesapeake Energy Corp., et al. v. Escovedo, et al.,* 2015 NLRB LEXIS 324 (NLRB April 30, 2015). Plaintiffs alleged that their employer violated § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the "NLRA") by promulgating and maintaining an arbitration agreement and dispute resolution policy (the "Agreement") that required employees to submit all employment-related disputes and claims, including claims under the NLRA, to binding arbitration and precluded class and collective actions. In response to Plaintiffs' unfair labor practice charge, the Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") held that the Agreement violated the NRLA because it prohibited employees from filing unfair labor practice charges with the Board, but dismissed the allegation that Agreement separately violated § 8(a)(1) by requiring employees to waive their § 7 rights to engage in class or collective employment actions in all forums. Id. at *2. The NLRB adopted the ALJ's decision in part. Since 2011, the employer and its related entities maintained the Agreement and required all employees to sign it as a condition of employment. The charging party, a supervisory employee, signed the Agreement on July 19, 2011, and filed his initial unfair labor practice charge in March 2013. Although the employer argued that the complaint was time-barred because the charging party did not allege that the employer attempted to enforce the Agreement during the 6-month period before the charging party filed his initial charge, the NLRB agreed with the ALJ that the employer's arguments lacked merit. Because the charging party alleged that the employer unlawfully "maintained," not enforced, the Agreement, the NLRB found a continuing violation. Id. at *5. The NLRB then applied the principles of D.R. Horton, Inc., 357 NLRB No. 184 (2012), and Murphy Oil USA, 361 NLRB No. 72 (2014), and found that, although the Agreement did not explicitly prohibit employees from filing charges with the Board, the employees reasonably would construe the Agreement's language to prohibit them from doing so. Id. at *7. Paragraphs 2 and 9 of the Agreement together required employees to agree to pursue any claims or disputes against the employer solely through individual arbitration, and paragraph 5 explicitly stated that any such claims or disputes, including those involving discrimination, harassment, or retaliation arising under the NLRA, were covered by the individual arbitration requirement. Id. at *7-8. According to the NLRB, read as whole, the Agreement was sweeping in its scope and encompassed all employment claims, including those within the Board's jurisdiction, and the employees could reasonably construe it to prohibit them from filing Board charges. Id. at *8. The NLRB, therefore, determined that the employer's maintenance of the Agreement violated § 8(a)(1) of the NLRA. Because the agreement explicitly prohibited employees from pursuing employment-related claims on a collective or class action basis in all forums, the NLRB also determined that the employer separately violated § 8(a)(1) by maintaining the Agreement. The NLRB noted that, as explained in D.R. Horton, such a total proscription of class or collective actions violated § 8(a)(1) because "the right to engage in collective action – including collective legal action – is the core substantive right protected by the NLRA and is the foundation on which the Act and Federal labor policy rest." Id. at *9. Accordingly, the NLRB ordered the employer to cease and desist from maintaining the Agreement.

Citigroup Technology, Inc., et al. v. Smith,* 2015 NLRB LEXIS 882 (NLRB Dec. 1, 2015). An employee filed a complaint alleging that Defendants violated § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") by maintaining and enforcing an employment arbitration policy (the "EAP"). Id. at *18-19. The NLRB adopted the Administrative Law Judge's ("ALJ") recommendation that the EAP violated § 8(a)(1) of the NLRA and ordered Defendants to cease and desist from maintaining the EAP. Id. at *3. Since December 26, 2012, Defendants required all newly hired employees to accept the EAP as a condition of employment, and based on this agreement, precluded their employees from filing any group, class, collective, or other representative claims in arbitration or otherwise in connection with disputes identified in the EAP concerning wages, hours, or other terms and conditions of employment. Id. at *14. While Defendants admitted that they precluded employees from filing any group, class, collective, or other representative action claims under the EPA, Defendants presented a litany of recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions, which "have established the broad preemptive sweep of the FAA" by mandating "that arbitration agreements must be enforced according to their terms," and argued that the NLRB's holding in D.R. Horton, 357 NLRB No. 184 (2012), was incorrect based on its rejection by the Fifth Circuit. Id. at *25-26. The ALJ, however, declined to deviate from NLRB precedent and rejected Defendants' argument that the FAA always must override the NLRA in cases involving mandatory arbitration agreements. Id. at *31. Defendants argued that the NLRB had no authority to order them to take action regarding litigation initiated by an employee in another forum involving another federal statute. The ALJ, however, noted that, in D.R. Horton, the NLRB explained how the NLRB and case law precedents recognized this authority in cases, such as this one, where mandatory arbitration agreements "restrict the exercise of the substantive right to act concertedly for mutual aid or protection, that is central to the [NLRA]." Id. at *37. The ALJ, therefore, concluded that Defendants' EAP was unlawful. The ALJ also found that Defendants violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act by enforcing the EAP, finding that Defendants' efforts to enforce their unlawful EAP by petitioning the American Arbitration Association ("AAA") to reject nationwide class action claims pursuant to the EAP had an illegal basis. Id. at *42-43. The NLRB adopted the ALJ's order that Defendants violated the NLRA by maintaining the EAP, but reversed the ALJ's order that Defendants violated the NLRA by enforcing the EAP. Id. at *3.

Employers Resource v. Torres, et al.*, 2015 NLRB LEXIS 359 (NLRB May 18, 2015). Petitioner, a former server at Beth's Kitchen, Inc. ("BK"), filed an unfair labor practice charge alleging that Respondent unlawfully maintained and enforced a mandatory arbitration provision to restrict the right of employees under the National Labor Relations Act (the "Act") to engage in concerted legal action. Subsequent to her lay-off, Petitioner had brought a wage & hour action in state court against BK and Respondent, and in that action, Respondent had moved to compel individual arbitration of Petitioners' claims. Respondent provided payroll and other personnel services to BK, and its standard employment agreement ("Agreement") contained a mandatory arbitration clause. Id. at *2. The Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") opined that Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices by compelling individual arbitration of Petitioner's state court wage & hour action. In Murphy Oil USA, Inc., 361 NLRB No. 72 (2014), the Board had reaffirmed its prior decision in D.R. Horton, Inc., 357 NLRB No. 184 (2012), and held that an employer violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act by requiring its employees to sign an agreement, as a condition of employment, that expressly barred them from pursuing collective or class claims either in court or in arbitration, and by seeking to enforce that agreement in court by moving to compel individual arbitration of the employees' pending collective and class action claims for wage & hour violations. Id. at *4. First, because an employer may properly be held accountable for restricting or interfering with the protected rights of employees regardless of whether it is an employer of those employees, the ALJ opined that Petitioner properly named Employers Resource as a Respondent in the complaint. Id. at *7-8. Respondent argued that Petitioner was not an employee covered by the Act because BK did not terminate her as a consequence of, or in connection with, any current labor dispute or because of any unfair labor practice, as provided in § 2(3) of the Act. The ALJ, however, noted that the Act is not restricted to former employees of an employer and that § 2(3) provides that the term "employee" shall "include" any employee, and shall not be limited to the employees of a particular employer, unless the Act explicitly states otherwise. Id. at *8. Thus, the ALJ stated that Petitioner was an employee under the Act. Further, Respondent's client service agreement with BK specifically stated that no employee would be covered by the Agreement, or become a co-employee of Respondent, until BK completed and delivered an enrollment packet for that individual to Respondent. The client service agreement also prohibited BK from altering the terms of the employment agreement without Respondent's written authorization. Respondent included the agreement in the new employee hiring information packet that Respondent provided to BK. The cover page of new-hire packet instructed the employee to sign the agreement and W-4 tax withholding form and I-9 employment eligibility verification form prior to starting work, failing which the company would not process payroll. Id. at *11. Additionally, Petitioner testified that a BK manager told her she had to sign the documents, including the agreement, in order to get paid, and that she signed the agreement before she started working. Thus, the ALJ opined that both Respondent and BK required Petitioner to sign the agreement containing the mandatory arbitration provision as a condition of employment. Id. Next, although the mandatory arbitration provision did not expressly bar class or collective arbitrations, Respondent in its motion filed in the state court had argued that the provision implicitly or effectively did so. Following Murphy Oil and D.R. Horton, the ALJ concluded that the mandatory arbitration provision here violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act. Id. at *12. Finally, the ALJ observed that D.R. Horton also held that an individual who files a class or collective action regarding wages, hours, or working conditions, whether in court or before an arbitrator, seeks to initiate or induce group action and is engaged in conduct protected by § 7. Id. at *13. Thus, the ALJ ruled that Petitioner's wage & hour suit constituted protected concerted activity, and that Respondent's motion in the state court sought to restrict that activity in violation of § 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Flyte Tyme Worldwide v. Miller, et al.,* 2015 NLRB LEXIS 223 (NLRB Mar. 30, 2015). In this unfair labor practice charge ("ULP"), the Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") had found in June 2014 that Respondent violated § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by maintaining and enforcing its arbitration agreement policy ("AAP"), which required employees to individually arbitrate all employment-related claims or disputes, and to waive their right to maintain collective or class actions in all forums, both arbitral and judicial. Id. at *12. Relying on D. R. Horton, Inc., 357 NLRB No. 184 (2012), the ALJ had also found that Respondent violated § 8(a)(1) when it moved to dismiss a class action wage & hour lawsuit filed by its employees and to compel arbitration under the AAP. Id. at *2. To remedy these violations, the ALJ ordered Respondent to rescind or revise its handbook provisions regarding the AAP, and clarify that the AAP does not constitute a waiver in all forums of employees' right. Id. While Respondent filed exceptions to the June 2014 decision of ALJ, the employee who filed the ULP moved to withdraw the charge because the employees that he represented had reached a class-wide agreement with Respondent to settle the related class and collective action wage & hour suit, and the parties had agreed to resolve the ULP charge as part of the settlement agreement. Id. at *3. The Board denied the employee's motion. The settlement agreement provided for the payment of $900,000 to the eight named Plaintiffs and other class members. As part of the settlement, the individuals for whom the charge was filed had agreed that the charging party would request withdrawal of the ULP charge in this case, and relinquished and revoked any right they may have had to receive any monetary recovery as a result of the charge. Id. at *3-4. The Board noted that in Murphy Oil USA, Inc., 361 NLRB No. 72 (2014), the Board had reaffirmed the decision in D.R. Horton, Inc., and found that an employer violated § 8(a)(1) by requiring its employees to agree to resolve all employment-related claims through individual arbitration, and forgo their rights to pursue a collective or class action to resolve employment-related disputes. Id. at *4. The Board remarked that its power to prevent unfair labor practices is exclusive, and that its function is to be performed in the public interest and not in vindication of private rights. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Board found that while the settlement agreement at issue addressed the employees' private rights under federal and state wage & hour laws, it did not address the public interest in protecting employees' statutory right to engage in a collective action regarding terms and conditions of employment. Id. at *5-6. Specifically, the Board ruled that the settlement left in place the AAP's requirement that employees waive their right of filing class and collective action claims as a condition of employment. Id. at *6. Because the parties' settlement did not address the continued maintenance of a policy mandating arbitration on an individual basis, the Board concluded that approval of the agreement would not effectuate the purposes of the Act, and rejected it.

Jock, et al. v. Sterling Jewelers, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 154209 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 15, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging sex discrimination in Defendant's promotion and compensation policies and practices. Previously, the Court had granted Plaintiffs' motion to refer the matter to arbitration pursuant to the "RESOLVE" dispute resolution agreement signed by Defendant's employees. Id. at *3. Subsequently, an Arbitrator issued a class certification award that certified Plaintiffs' Title VII disparate impact claims with respect to declaratory and injunctive relief, but declined to certify Plaintiffs' Title VII disparate impact claims or Plaintiffs' Title VII disparate treatment claims with respect to monetary damages. Id. at *4. Further, the Arbitrator permitted class members to opt-out of the certified class for declaratory and injunctive relief. Id. Defendant moved to vacate the Arbitrator's class determination award, and the Court granted the motion in part. The Court agreed with Defendant that the Arbitrator acted outside her authority in certifying an opt-out class for injunctive and declaratory relief in the class determination award. The Arbitrator purported to certify the class under Rule 23(b)(2), but the Court noted that Wal-Mart Stores. Inc. v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. 2541, 2558 (2011), held that Rule 23 provides no opportunity for Rule 23(b)(1) or (b)(2) class members to opt-out. Id. at *9. The Arbitrator also relied on AAA Supplementary Rule 4, stating that AAA Supplementary Rule 4 essentially tracks the requirements of Rule 23 and that here, Plaintiffs sought certification of their claims for declaratory and injunctive relief pursuant to Rule 23(b)(2) and certification of their claims for monetary damages pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3). Id. at *10. The Court reasoned that the 23(b)(2) class was the one certified. Further, because the Arbitrator also directed counsel to submit a proposed form of opt-out notice, the Court stated that the Arbitrator thus purported to permit opt-outs from a Rule 23(b)(2) class. The Court, however, ruled that the Arbitrator had no power to do so, as the relief sought in the certification of a Rule 23(b)(2) class must affect the entire class at once. Id. at *12. Plaintiffs tried to draw a distinction between the types of equitable relief that would be pursued by class members and individuals who opted-out. Plaintiffs argued that while the class would seek to validate and modify criteria used in making pay and promotion decisions, individuals who opted-out would be eligible to seek a promotion they would have received in the absence of discrimination or an adjustment to their pay rate to eliminate a disparity with a similarly-situated male that could not be justified. Further, Plaintiffs asserted that the remainder of the class could seek broad injunctive relief, but those who remained in the class would not be eligible to seek the kind of individualized injunctive relief that those who opted-out could pursue. The Court, however, observed that Plaintiffs failed to explain how individuals who opted-out would not be bound by the broad injunctive relief sought by the remainder of the class. Id. at *16. The Court remarked that if, for example, the Arbitrator decided that Defendant must change its criteria for making promotion decisions, it was unclear how some employees would not be subject to such a determination, even if certain employees who opted-out were also able to pursue individualized equitable remedies. Further, Plaintiffs cited no cases which permitted individuals to opt-out of a class certified to seek injunctive or declaratory relief that would necessarily affect the class as a whole, and the Court remarked that changes to Defendant's criteria for making pay and promotion decisions, among other forms of relief that Plaintiffs sought, would do precisely that. Thus, the Court also ruled that because the Arbitrator found that some employees could opt-out of a class certified to seek class-wide injunctive or declaratory relief, she failed to present a barely colorable justification for the outcome reached. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to vacate the Arbitrator's class determination award to the extent that it permitted individuals to opt-out of a class certified for the purposes of seeking class-wide injunctive and declaratory relief.

Leslies Poolmart, Inc. v. NLRB,* 2015 NLRB LEXIS 643 (NLRB Aug. 25, 2015). In this action, the NLRB affirmed the decision of an Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") that the employer's mutual agreement to arbitrate claims that required its employees to resolve certain employment-related disputes exclusively through binding arbitration and to waive, as a condition of employment, their right to file class, collective, or representative claims in any arbitral or judicial forum, violated § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"). The employer, a corporation operating and selling pool and spa chemicals, allegedly required employees to enter into individual arbitration agreements that did not expressly require employees to waive their right to pursue class, collective, or representative actions. Id. at *9-10. The charging employee, a retail assistant store manager, filed a complaint in California state court alleging that the employer incorrectly and unlawfully calculated and paid overtime to class members. Id. at *15. The employer sought an order to dismiss the complaint, compel arbitration of the charging employee's individual claims, and to dismiss his class and collection actions pursuant to the arbitration agreement. Id. at *16. Counsel for the employee contended that, because employer moved to compel the employee to resolve his individual claims through arbitration and sought to dismiss his class and collective claims, those very actions in enforcing the agreement had the effect of leading employees to reasonably believe that they cannot engage in concerted activity protections by § 7 of the NLRA. The ALJ concluded that, even though the agreement was silent regarding the filing of collective actions, the employer violated § 8(a)(1) of the NLRA because, by its own contentions and actions, it essentially mandated that employees waive, as a condition of employment, their right to file class, collective, or representative claims in any arbitral or judicial forum. Id. at *18. According to the ALJ, while the agreement was silent as to collective or class actions, in practice, the employer closed the avenue to pursue collective and/or class-wide litigation when it sought to limit the charging employee and other similarly-situated employees to arbitration of their individual claims. Id. at *28-29. The ALJ therefore concluded that the employer's arbitration agreement violated the NLRA. The ALJ rejected the employer's contention that the charging employee's charge was time-barred by § 10(b) of the NLRA because it was filed more than 6 months after the date he signed the agreement; in these circumstances, the NLRB found a continuing violation. Id. at *20. Here, the agreement mandated that the charging employee arbitrate certain employment-related claims, including wages and compensation, with the employer even after his termination, and the evidence showed that the employer continued to require all new hires to execute the agreement. Id. at *20-21. Because the U.S. Supreme Court has not expressly overruled D.R. Horton, 357 NLRB No. 184 (2012), the ALJ determined that D.R. Horton continues to be controlling law applicable in NLRB matters, and the ALJ found nothing meaningfully distinguishable between the employer's arbitration agreement and the one in D.R. Horton, which the NLRB found violation of the NLRA. Id. at *27-29. The ALJ thus issued an order that the employer cease and desist and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the NLRA. Id. at *34-36. Affirming the ALJ's order, the NLRB ordered the employer to reimburse the charging employee for all reasonable expenses and legal fees, with interest, incurred in opposing the employer's unlawful motion to compel individual arbitration of his class or collective claims and to notify the court that it had rescinded or revised the agreement. Id. at *2-6.

Nitsch, et al. v. DreamWorks Animation SKG, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 54986 (N.D. Cal. April 24, 2015). In this consolidated class action alleging workplace antitrust claims against Defendants, various animation studios, the Court granted in part Defendants' motion to compel arbitration. Plaintiffs, a group of artists and engineers employed by four of the named Defendants, alleged that Defendants entered into a scheme not to actively solicit each other's employees, and that they engaged in collusive discussions concerning competitively sensitive compensation information and agreed upon compensation ranges that artificially limited the compensation offered to Defendants' current and prospective employees. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendants directly communicated and met regularly to discuss and agree upon compensation ranges and that they met at least once a year in California at meetings organized by a third-party that apparently collected industry-specific salary information. Id. at *17. Defendants moved to compel arbitration, contending that Plaintiff Nitsch was bound by an arbitration agreement with Defendant DreamWorks Animation SKG, Inc., and therefore was equitably estopped from refusing to arbitrate his claims against other Defendants, and that his claims should be stayed pending the outcome of the arbitration. The Court granted Defendants' motion for the purpose of allowing an arbitrator to decide, in the first instance, whether the arbitrator should exercise jurisdiction over Plaintiff Nitsch's claims against DreamWorks arising out of Nitsch's employment at DreamWorks. The parties did not dispute that Nitsch had entered into a written employment agreement with DreamWorks, that the employment agreements' explicit incorporation of AAA rules served as clear and unmistakable evidence of the parties' intent to delegate the power to decide arbitrability to an arbitrator, and that Nitsch's claims relating to his payment or compensation arose out of his employment agreement. Id. at *30-32. The Court, however, denied Defendants' motion as to Nitsch's claims against Defendant DreamWorks arising out of his employment at Defendant Sony Picture Imageworks, Inc. because the plain language of arbitration clauses did not encompass any claims that arose out of Nitsch's employment with Sony Pictures Imageworks. The Court noted that some of Nitsch's claims against DreamWorks arose not out of his employment or compensation by DreamWorks, but by DreamWorks' alleged participation in an anti-competitive conspiracy that depressed Nitsch's compensation from Sony Picture Imageworks. Id. at *33-34. The Court therefore granted Defendants' motion to compel arbitration as to Nitsch's claims against DreamWorks arising out of his employment at DreamWorks and denied it to Nitsch's claims against DreamWorks arising out of his employment at Sony Pictures Imageworks. Further, the Court declined to find that Nitsch was equitably estopped from refusing to arbitrate his claims against the remaining Defendants. The Court pointed out that, although Nitsch's claims might refer to the employment agreements, his claims arose independently of his employment agreements because his claims for relief would be cognizable even if he had worked for DreamWorks without a written employment agreement. Id. at *38-41. Defendants offered no explanation for why "efficiency" would justify compelling Nitsch to arbitrate claims that plainly and concededly fell outside the scope of the arbitration clause, and the Court ruled that this action would proceed regardless of whether Nitsch was compelled to arbitrate certain claims against any or all Defendants, as none of the other Plaintiffs executed any arbitration agreement with Defendants. Id. at *47-48. Because a limited stay as to Nitsch's claims against DreamWorks based on his employment at DreamWorks would be appropriate, the Court granted Defendants' request to stay the prosecution of Nitsch's claims against DreamWorks arising out of his employment at DreamWorks alone, and denied it to Nitsch's claims against the remaining Defendants. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to compel arbitration in part.

Solar City Corp. v. Irving, et al.,* Case No. 32-CA-128085 (NLRB Dec. 22, 2015). Amy Beth Irving ("Irving"), an employee of Solar City Corp. ("employer"), brought a class action alleging wage & hour violations under the California Labor Code. Id. at 1. The employer moved to compel arbitration of Irving's wage & hour claims on an individual basis. Thereafter, Irving filed a charge with the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB") alleging that her employer violated § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by maintaining and enforcing the agreements. The administrative law judge ("ALJ") found that the employer violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act, which the NLRB affirmed. Id. At the outset, the NLRB noted that the agreements required all employment-related disputes to be resolved by arbitration and included a class action waiver. Thus, pursuant to D. R. Horton, Inc., 357 NLRB No. 184 (2012), and Murphy Oil USA, Inc., 361 NLRB No. 72 (2014), the agreements were unlawful. Id. The employer argued that the agreements were lawful because the agreements permitted employees to file employment claims or charges with federal administrative agencies, such as the EEOC, which could seek a remedy on behalf of all affected employees. The NLRB, however, found that there was a wide range of employment-related claims that were not within the purview of any administrative agency and even if it were, the agency had the discretion to decline it or to do so only on their terms. Id. at 2. Finally, the NLRB held that the administrative agency was not a judicial forum in the sense contemplated by D. R. Horton, and thus, agencies like the EEOC and DOL could not adjudicate employment-related claims. Id. The NLRB also found that the agreements stated explicitly that all or any disputes must be individually arbitrated, thereby conveying to employees that the agreements prohibited the filing of charges with the NLRB. Id. The employer contended that the later provisions in the agreements that permit filing charges with federal agencies such as the NLRB nullified this explicit unlawful restriction. The NLRB, however, noted that the ambiguity, coupled with the added effort necessarily involved in resolving the ambiguity, would dissuade employees from collectively seeking redress for grievances, and thus would inhibit them from pursuing collective action. Id. at 3. Accordingly, the NLRB affirmed the judgement of the ALJ.

Tarlton & Son, Inc. v. Munoz*, et al., 2015 NLRB LEXIS 42 (NLRB Jan. 27, 2015). An employee filed an unfair labor practices charge alleging that Defendant improperly required its employees to sign agreements that compelled them to participate in mandatory binding arbitration. The charging party and two other employees ("Plaintiffs") filed a collective action alleging that Defendant engaged in unfair business practices and violations of the California Labor Code. Id. at *5. Subsequently, Defendant presented the mutual arbitration policy along with an employee agreement to arbitrate (collectively, the "MAP") to all of its employees and required them to sign the MAP as a condition of their employment. Id. at *8. The MAP required employees to submit most employment claims to binding arbitration on an individual basis. As to the ULP, the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB") ruled that Defendant violated § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the "NLRA"). The NLRB noted that § 8(a)(1) of the NLRA provides that it is an unfair labor practice for an employer to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in § 7 of the NLRA, which includes the right to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection. Id. at *15-16. Further, the NLRB noted that Murphy Oil USA, Inc., 361 NLRB No. 72 (2014), reaffirmed the ruling in D.R. Horton, Inc., 357 NLRB No. 184 (2012), which held that mandatory arbitration agreements that preclude the filing of joint, class, or collective claims addressing wages, hours, or other working conditions in any forum, arbitral or judicial, unlawfully restricts employees' § 7 rights, which violates § 8(a)(1). Id. at *16. Further, the NLRB observed that, when evaluating whether a rule, including a mandatory arbitration policy, violates § 8(a)(1), the NLRB applies the test set forth in Lutheran Heritage Village-Livonia, 343 NLRB 646 (2004), under which the first inquiry is whether the rule explicitly restricts activities protected by § 7. Id. at *18. The NLRB opined that, although the NLRA does not create a right to class certification or the equivalent, it does create a right to pursue joint, class, or collective claims, if and as available, without the interference of an employer-imposed restraint. Id. at *22. The NLRB found that the MAP, as a condition of employment, precluded employees from pursuing claims concertedly and, therefore, amounted to a prospective waiver of rights guaranteed by the NLRA. Further, the NLRB noted that Defendant implemented the MAP only after the employees filed a collective action in state court, and, in doing so, Defendant prevented the employees from banding together and had an illegal objective. The NLRB remarked that Defendant's action to force employees covered under the NLRA to waive their rights to file class-wide actions in any arbitral or judicial forum interfered with and restrained them from exercising their § 7 rights. Under the second element of the Lutheran Heritage test, the NLRB considered whether the MAP was promulgated in response to protected concerted activity. Id. at *30. Defendant argued that the employees involved in the state court action were not employed at the time the MAP was implemented and, therefore, the § 7 rights of those employees were not affected. The NLRB, however, found that it was irrelevant whether Plaintiffs were actually employed by Defendant at the time the MAP was implemented because, under the NLRA, "employees" includes former employees of a particular employer. Id. at *32. Additionally, the MAP stated that it applied to all employees, regardless of length of service or status, and covered all employment disputes, whether those disputes already exist or arise in the future. Id. at *36. Reviewing the entire chain of events, the NLRB held that Defendant implemented the MAP in response to the employees' protected concerted activity and sought to crush the employees' pursuit of class action lawsuits in forums other than individual arbitration or the negotiated grievance process. Thus, the NLRB concluded that Defendant violated § 8(a)(1) by promulgating the new rule in response to the employees' § 7 activity.

The Rose Group d/b/a Applebee's Restaurant v. Armstrong, et al.,* Case No. 05-CA-135360 (NLRB April 22, 2015). The General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB") issued a complaint against Defendant alleging that it violated the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") by maintaining a dispute resolution program (the "Program") with a mandatory arbitration provision that prohibited class actions and collective actions. Since April 2013, Defendant required all of its employees to sign an agreement and receipt for the Program as a condition of employment. An employee (the "Charging Party") filed a charge with the NLRB alleging that Defendant discriminated against him due to his protected concerted activities when it terminated his employment and gave him negative employment references, and alleging that Defendant maintained an unlawful mandatory arbitration policy. Id. The NLRB's Regional Director dismissed the first and second allegations, finding that the Charging Party did not engage in protected concerted activity, that Defendant did not formally terminate him, and that the Charging Party did not file a legal claim against Defendant in court or in arbitration. The matter proceeded to trial before an Administrative Law Judge (the "ALJ"). Relying primarily on the Board's decisions in D.R. Horton, Inc., 357 NLRB No. 184 (2012), and Murphy Oil USA, Inc., 361 NLRB No. 72 (2014), the NLRB contended that Defendant violated the NLRA by maintaining the Program. Defendant argued that the NLRB had no jurisdiction over the complaint because the Charging Party never exercised his § 7 rights under the NLRA, he did not engage in any protected concerted activity, he raised only individual allegations in his charge, his complaint involved the FLSA and not the NLRA, and Defendant never attempted to enforce the terms of the Program against the Charging Party. Id. at 5. The ALJ found Defendant's arguments to be without merit. The ALJ noted that, the fact that there was no underlying unfair labor practice and the allegation only pertained to maintenance, rather enforcement, of a policy was of no relevance. Id. at 6. According to the ALJ, "[m]aintenance of a rule that violates employees' Section 7 rights is in itself a violation of Section 8(a)(1)." Id. The ALJ, therefore, determined that the NLRB had jurisdiction over the complaint. Defendant also asserted that the case must be decided under the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") and that the NLRA did not fall within the statutory exceptions to the FAA. Id. at 7. The ALJ, however, held that Defendant's arguments merely rehashed those addressed by the Board in Murphy Oil and that Defendant's challenges to the validity of D.R. Horton were made in vain because the ALJ was required to apply established Board precedent that had not been reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court. Id. Because Defendant's Program precluded employees from pursuing any class or collective claim in any forum, the ALJ concluded that Defendant's maintenance of the Program violated § 8(a)(1) of the NLRA. Id. Although the Program did not explicitly prohibit filing a charge with the NLRB, the ALJ found that the language reasonably could be interpreted to prohibit the filing of unfair labor practices charges and, therefore, would tend to chill employees' exercise of their § 7 rights constituting a separate violation of § 8(a)(1) of the NLRA. Id. at 8-9. Accordingly, the ALJ ordered Defendant to cease and desist from maintaining an arbitration agreement that waived class actions and collective actions and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the NLRA.

(x) Non-Workplace Class Action Arbitration Issues

Bassett, et al. v. Electronic Arts, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35895 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 23, 2015). Plaintiff, a video game player, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant misled consumers as to the ability to use Defendant's on-line platform to play certain games with other consumers via the Internet. Plaintiff alleged violations of California's Consumer Legal Remedies Act, False Advertising Law, and Unfair Competition Law. Plaintiff also asserted breach of express warranty, breach of implied warranty merchantability, and breach of implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose. Defendant moved to compel arbitration, arguing that an arbitration provision in the "terms of service" covered Plaintiff's claims. Id. at *9. The Court granted Defendant's motion adopting the Magistrate Judge's report and recommendation in its entirety. The Magistrate Judge had determined that Plaintiff entered into a valid arbitration agreement with Defendant when he accepted Defendant's terms of service in an attempt to access Defendant's on-line platform. Id. at *11. Specifically, the Magistrate Judge found that Plaintiff and Defendant entered into a "clickwrap" type agreement when Defendant presented Plaintiff with the terms of service and privacy policy and Plaintiff clicked "I Accept" in order to create an account and register on-line. Id. The Court agreed with the Magistrate Judge and found that Plaintiff manifested assent to the agreement to arbitrate when he clicked "I Accept" during both the registration process and when later confronted with updated terms of service, and when he did not opt-out of the arbitration agreement using the process described in the arbitration clause. Id. at *17. Although Plaintiff presented a number of general challenges to the terms of service, attacking both its validity and formation, the Court agreed with the Magistrate Judge that challenges to the validity of the terms of service, as a whole, were subject to arbitration. Id. at *13. To the extent Plaintiff challenged the arbitration clause itself, the Court found that the Magistrate Judge had correctly determined that Plaintiff agreed to the arbitration clause at the time he registered for an on-line account. Id. at *18. The Court also determined that Defendant's mutual obligation to submit to arbitration, and to be bound by arbitration, constituted consideration sufficient to support the arbitration agreement. Id. at *19. The Court further agreed with the Magistrate Judge's conclusion that the arbitration provision was not invalid as illusory simply because Defendant had the unilateral right to modify the agreement. Id. at *24-25. The Court noted that the terms of service obligated Defendant to provide Plaintiff with indirect notice of any changes by posting such changes on its website, and to provide updated terms of service, which terms become effective after 30 days from the date of posting. Id. at *27. The terms of service also allowed Plaintiff to opt-out changes to the arbitration agreement by sending Defendant written notice within 30 days of the change, and Defendant required its on-line registrants to affirmatively accept new versions of the terms of service by going through a process similar to initial registration. Id. The records further showed that Defendant in fact gave Plaintiff actual notice of at least one modification, and he accepted the same. Id. The Court thus concluded that a reasonably prudent user in Plaintiff's position would have had notice that he was being bound by the terms of service, including the arbitration provision, and that the agreement to arbitrate was not illusory. Id. at *28-30. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

DirecTV, Inc. v. Imburgia, et al.*, 2015 U.S. LEXIS 7999 (U.S. Dec. 14, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of customers, brought a class action in state court seeking damages from Defendant for early termination fees it charged them in violation of California law. Defendant had entered into a service agreement with its customers that required arbitration for resolution of disputes. Id. at *5. Defendant moved to compel arbitration, and the state court denied the motion. On Defendant's appeal, the California Court of Appeal analyzed the contractual phrase "law of your state" to determine whether California law made the contract's class arbitration waiver unenforceable; in doing so, it analyzed the "Discover Bank" rule. Id. at *6. The California Supreme Court had held in Discover Bank v. Superior Court, 36 Cal. 4th 148 (2005), that a waiver of class arbitration in a consumer contract of adhesion was unconscionable, and should not be enforced. Id. Subsequently, the U.S. Supreme Court held in AT&T Mobility LLC v. Concepcion, 563 U.S. 222 (2011), that the Discover Bank rule was invalid, as it stood as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes of the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"). The California Court of Appeal, despite Concepcion, held that under California law, Defendant's class action waiver was unenforceable. Id. at *7. In reaching this conclusion, the Court of Appeal referred to two sections of the California Consumers Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA") – §§ 1751 and 1781(a) – rather than the Discover Bank rule itself. The Court of Appeal opined that applying state statutory law alone would render unenforceable the class action waiver in paragraph 9 of Defendant's contract. Id. at *8. The Court of Appeal reasoned that as paragraph 10 of the contract stated that the FAA governed paragraph 9 (the arbitration provision) and was a general provision, that provision voided the arbitration agreement if the "law of your state" would find the class arbitration waiver unenforceable. Id. at *9. After the California Supreme Court denied discretionary review, Defendant petitioned the U.S. Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the California Court of Appeal's order. At the outset, the U.S. Supreme Court remarked that lower courts must follow Concepcion, and the supremacy clause forbids state courts to dissociate themselves from federal law because of disagreement with its content or a refusal to recognize the superior authority of its source. Id. at *10. Here, the California Court of Appeal, in effect, interpreted the contract's "law of your state" provision to invalidate Concepcion. Id. at *11. The U.S. Supreme Court noted that the relevant language in the contract was not ambiguous. The Supreme Court observed that the contract stated that if "the law of your state" would find the agreement (to dispense with the class arbitration procedure) unenforceable, then paragraph 9 of the contract was unenforceable itself. Id. at *13. The U.S. Supreme Court opined that the California Court of Appeal did not explain why parties might generally intend the words "law of your state" to encompass even the "invalid law of your state." Id. at *14. The Supreme Court remarked that to the contrary, the contract referred to state law that makes the waiver of class arbitration unenforceable, while an invalid state law would not make a contractual provision unenforceable. Id. The Court of Appeal had reasoned that invalid state arbitration law, namely the Discover Bank rule, maintained its legal force despite the holding in Concepcion, because if only the state law was applied to the class action waiver, the waiver was unenforceable. Id. at *16. The U.S. Supreme Court concluded that California's interpretation of the phrase "law of your state" did not place arbitration contracts on equal footing with all other contracts. Id. at *17. The U.S. Supreme Court rejected this approach. It reasoned that California Court of Appeal's interpretation did not give due regard to the federal policy favoring arbitration. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the U.S. Supreme Court concluded that the Court of Appeal's interpretation was preempted by the FAA, and it reversed the judgment. Id.

Healy, et al. v. Cox Communications, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 10710 (10th Cir. June 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of cable service subscribers, brought a class action alleging that Defendant illegally tied its premium cable service to rental of a set-top box. During the pendency of Defendant's motion to dismiss, it began inserting mandatory arbitration clauses into the contracts of some customers, including putative class members. Id. at *3. After the District Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, Defendant moved unsuccessfully to dismiss but did not mention the arbitration agreements in its motion. Subsequent to pre-trial discovery, Plaintiffs again moved to certify a class. Defendant again did not inform the District Court of its arbitration agreements. Subsequently, the District Court granted class certification, and although Defendant moved for reconsideration, it again failed to mention the arbitration clauses. After two years into the litigation, Defendant moved to compel arbitration, which the District Court denied on the basis that Defendant waived its right to arbitration. Id. at *6. On appeal, the Tenth Circuit applied a six-factor test in Peterson v. Shearson/American Express, Inc., 849 F.2d 467-67 (10th Cir. 1988), on waiver, and affirmed the District Court's order. Id. at *7-8. Defendant had withheld information about the arbitration agreements until after the District Court had completed its numerosity analysis, and the Tenth Circuit remarked that Defendant's complete failure to mention the presence of its arbitration contracts, despite the obvious impact that they would have on the Rule 23 analysis, was clearly inconsistent with an intent to arbitrate. Further, rather than requesting that the District Court stay its motion for summary judgment until the District Court decided its motion to compel, Defendant moved to compel arbitration on the same day it moved for summary judgment, even though it was aware that arbitration could have been raised earlier. Id. at *10. The Tenth Circuit observed that this was only one of Defendant's many attempts to manipulate the litigation and omit known material facts about the absent class members from its briefing. Further, Defendant had delayed in mentioning its intent to arbitrate for a substantial period of time, and only moved to compel arbitration close to trial. Moreover, the District Court had noted that the parties had made ample use of every discovery device available and Defendant's actions in this regard were incompatible with the use of arbitration, where discovery was more limited. Id. at *12-13. The Tenth Circuit observed that prejudice can be substantive, such as when a party loses a motion on the merits and then attempts, in effect, to re-litigate the issue by invoking arbitration. Id. at *13. Here, the District Court had engaged in extensive Rule 23 analysis, resolved numerous motions, and adjudicated discovery disputes, and also invested a significant amount of judicial resources in this analysis at great expense to the public. Defendant asserted that Peterson was inapposite because a party does not invariably waive its right to compel arbitration against absent class members by filing its motion to compel after the District Court certified the class. Id. at *15. The Tenth Circuit remarked that the District Court may not have been able to compel arbitration of absent class members at that time, but Defendant's assertion or mention of its right at that point would have fundamentally changed the course of the litigation, ensured a more expedient and efficient resolution of the trial, and prevented improper gamesmanship. The Tenth Circuit reasoned that whether or not the District Court could have compelled a non-class member to arbitrate, the failure to raise the issue can result in waiver, and that Defendant's inconsistent conduct and extreme delay warranted waiver in these circumstances. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Tenth Circuit affirmed the denial of Defendant's motion to arbitrate.

In Re Checking Account Overdraft Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13570 (S.D. Fla. Feb. 3, 2015). In this consolidated action, Plaintiff, a bank customer, alleged that Defendant improperly changed the order of debit card transactions to increase the overdraft fees it charged on Plaintiff's account in violation of Washington law. In June 2010, the Court had denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration, finding that the arbitration provision at issue was substantively unconscionable and therefore unenforceable. Id. at *18. The Court's order was vacated on appeal and remanded for reconsideration. Id. at *19. On remand, the Court granted Defendant's renewed motion and compelled arbitration, finding that the delegation clause contained within the arbitration agreement delegated to the arbitrator threshold questions of arbitrability, that such clause was enforceable after the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Rent-A-Center, West, Inc. v. Jackson, 561 U.S. 63 (2010). Id. at *19-20. On Plaintiff's appeal, that order was vacated on the basis that Defendant had waived its right to have an arbitrator decide the threshold question of arbitrability. Id. at *20-21. Upon another remand, Defendant filed its second renewed motion to compel arbitration and dismiss the complaint, which the Court denied. At the outset, the Court found that its conclusion in its original June 2010 order denying Defendant's first motion to compel arbitration remained correct, and that the subject arbitration provision remained unconscionable. Id. at *18. Defendant argued that after the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in AT&T Mobility, LLC v. Concepcion, 131 S. Ct. 1740 (2011) – holding that the Federal Arbitration Act preempts state laws that classify collective or class action waivers in consumer contracts as unconscionable – the basis for the Court's findings in its original order both that Washington law would apply and that the subject arbitration agreement was substantively unconscionable was no longer valid. Id. at *19-21. Plaintiff urged the Court to find again that Washington law would apply, and that the class action waiver was just one factor of several that the Court considered in finding the arbitration provision to be substantively unconscionable. Id. at *22. The Court observed that applying Ohio law would violate the fundamental public policy of allowing consumers of banking services to be protected by its consumer protection laws, and thus found that the parties' choice-of-law provision selecting Ohio law was unenforceable, and that Washington law would apply. Id. at *25-26. Further, the Court opined that it had already found substantive unconscionability in its original order, and even removing the class action waiver from the analysis as instructed by Concepcion, the Court's decision would remain unchanged. Id. at *26. Significantly, the Court found that several additional factors rendered the arbitration provision substantively unconscionable, including: (i) the confidentiality provision in the arbitration agreement was one-sided and only benefitted Defendant; and (ii) the agreement did not adequately ameliorate the burdens to access to an arbitral forum posed by the costs of arbitration, including the filing fees and attorneys' fees provisions. Id. at *26-27. Thus, the Court adopted and incorporated those parts of its analysis that remained undisturbed by Concepcion and again ruled that the arbitration provision was substantively unconscionable and therefore unenforceable. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's second renewed motion to compel arbitration and dismiss the complaint.

Katz, et al. v. Cellco Partnership*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13055 (2d Cir. July 28, 2015). Plaintiff, a telephone subscriber, brought a putative class action asserting breach of contract and consumer fraud claims under New York state law on the basis of a monthly administrative charge assessed by Defendant. Defendant's wireless customer agreement contained an arbitration clause that invoked the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") and required that any dispute be submitted to arbitration. Id. at *3. Plaintiff moved for partial summary judgment and Defendant moved to compel arbitration and to stay the proceedings. The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion and allowed Defendant's motion to compel arbitration, but denied its motion to stay. Id. at *4. On appeal, the Second Circuit held that the FAA neither violates Article III of the Constitution nor imposes an unconstitutional rule of decision and affirmed the denial of Plaintiff's motion and grant of Defendant's motion. Id. at *5. The Second Circuit, however, vacated the dismissal of the action. The Second Circuit noted that § 3 of the FAA mandates that District Courts refer an action to arbitration if the parties have an arbitration agreement. Id. at *7-8. Further, the Second Circuit observed that a mandatory stay comports with the FAA's statutory scheme and pro-arbitration policy, and that the statute's appellate structure permits immediate appeal of orders hostile to arbitration but bars appeal of interlocutory orders favorable to arbitration. Id. at *9. The Second Circuit noted that the FAA authorizes immediate interlocutory review of an order refusing to compel arbitration or denying a stay of proceedings, and that by contrast, the FAA explicitly denies the right to an immediate appeal from an interlocutory order that compels arbitration or stays proceedings. Id. The Second Circuit remarked that the dismissal of an arbitrable matter that properly should have been stayed effectively converts an otherwise-unappealable interlocutory stay order into an appealable final dismissal order, and that affording judges such discretion would empower them to confer appellate rights expressly proscribed by Congress. Id. at *9-10. Additionally, the Second Circuit opined that a mandatory stay is consistent with the FAA's underlying policy to move the parties to an arbitrable dispute out of the judicial system and into arbitration as quickly and easily as possible, and that a stay enables parties to proceed to arbitration directly, unencumbered by the uncertainty and expense of additional litigation, and generally precludes judicial interference until there is a final award. Id. at *10. Because the FAA mandates a stay of proceedings when all of the claims in an action have been referred to arbitration and a stay was requested, the Second Circuit vacated the dismissal of the action.

Nicosia, et al. v. Amazon.com, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13560 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 4, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant sold weight loss supplements containing sibutramine – a controlled substance that has never been available for sale without a prescription and that is associated with a serious risk of cardiovascular events and strokes – in violation of various federal and state consumer protection laws and in breach of various implied warranties. Defendant moved to dismiss on the basis of a mandatory arbitration clause included in its standard purchase agreement and in its "Terms and Conditions" that governed Plaintiff's claims. The Court granted the motion. The Court noted that Plaintiff agreed to be bound by the Terms and Conditions, which included the arbitration provision, each time he purchased the weight loss supplement known as "1 Day Diet." Id. at *4. Every time Plaintiff purchased the supplement, Defendant's website required him to navigate past a final checkout page that included the warning, "[b]y placing your order, you agree to Amazon.com's privacy notice and conditions of use." Id. at *6. The website displayed the phrase "conditions of use" in a blue font and contained a hyperlink to the Terms and Conditions in effect at the time of the purchases. Id. A purchaser using Defendant's website could only place his or her order after viewing the hyperlink to the conditions of use, and he or she could make a purchase only by creating an account and agreeing to be bound by the Terms and Conditions. Id. at *22-23. The Court, therefore, found that Plaintiff, at minimum, was on notice of the current terms of the conditions of use when making his purchases. Id. Plaintiff argued that he was not bound by those terms because Defendant reserved the right to change its terms at any time and that any contract relating to the sale of 1 Day Diet was void as an illegal contract because Defendant could not lawfully sell any product containing sibutramine without a prescription. Id. at *24. The Court, however, held that its role was limited to determining the threshold question of whether a valid arbitration agreement existed. Id. at *27. The Court found a valid arbitration agreement and concluded that any challenge to the validity of the contract as a whole or the binding effect of the arbitration clause should be considered by the arbitrator and not the Court. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint in favor of arbitration.

Pearson, et al. v. United Debt Holdings, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109152 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 19, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant attempted to collect void and unenforceable debts in violation of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA"). In 2014, Plaintiff began receiving calls from Defendant attempting to collect a debt that Plaintiff allegedly owed on a loan; the loan, however, did not originate from Defendant, but with a company called Plain Green. Id. at *2. The complaint was sparse on specifics with respect to the loan itself, but it was clear that the interest rate on the loan exceeded 200% and Plain Green was not licensed by the Illinois Department of Financial and Professional Regulations to loans whose interest rates exceeded 20%. Id. Defendant filed a motion to compel individual arbitration, which the Court denied. Defendant based its motion on a loan agreement, stating that Plain Green was a lender organized under the laws of the Chippewa Cree Tribe, and that the loan was subject to the laws and courts of the Chippewa Cree Tribe, and also provided an arbitration clause. Id. at *3. The Court noted that the loan agreement was not attached to the complaint, and the complaint itself made no mention of an arbitration provision in the loan agreement. The Court remarked that support for the existence of an arbitration provision was found exclusively in the document attached to Defendant's motion. Id. at *6. The Court opined that it could consider agreements containing arbitration provisions referred to within, but not attached to the complaint, and only if the proponent of the arbitration properly authenticated the document containing an arbitration provision. Id. Here, the Court determined that the document was not properly signed, nor had Plaintiff indicated that he agreed to the document. Id. at *7-8. Because Defendant failed to establish that the document it produced was a document that Plaintiff had signed, the Court concluded that Defendant's arguments based on the purported class action waiver and choice-of-law provisions contained within the document also failed.

Ross, et al. v. Citigroup, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 20025 (2d Cir. Nov. 19, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of credit card holders, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants collusively adopted arbitration clauses barring class actions in violation of the Sherman Act, so as to prevent cardholders from redressing their injuries collectively through the legal process. Id. at *2. After a bench trial, the District Court entered judgment in Defendants' favor. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed on appeal. At the outset, the Second Circuit noted that an antitrust conspiracy in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act requires proof of joint or concerted action as opposed to unilateral action. Id. at *4. Because Plaintiffs conceded that they had no direct evidence of a conspiracy, the Second Circuit concluded that they must prove a conspiracy through inferences that may be drawn from the behavior of the alleged conspirators.

Id. The District Court had found that an agreement among competitors may be inferred on the basis of conscious parallelism, when such interdependent conduct was accompanied by circumstantial evidence. Id. These factors included a common motive to conspire, evidence that showed that the parallel acts were against the apparent individual economic self-interest of the alleged conspirators, and evidence of a high level of inter-firm communications. Id. The District Court analyzed these factors, including: (i) whether Defendants had a motive to collude; (ii) the quantity and nature of inter-firm communications between Defendants and other issuing banks; and (iii) whether the acts were contrary to the self-interest of Defendant. The District Court concluded that the final decision to adopt clauses barring class actions was something that the issuing banks decided individually and internally. Id. at *5. The Second Circuit remarked that when the record was viewed in its entirety, it was evident that the District Court had not erred. Accordingly, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's order entering judgment in Defendants' favor.

Sgouros, et al. v. TransUnion Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13691 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 5, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant sold lower credit scores to consumers than the credit scores it provided to lenders. Plaintiff alleged violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"), Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act ("ICFA"), and the Missouri Merchandizing Practices Act ("MMPA"). Defendant moved to compel arbitration. Defendant argued that Plaintiff affirmatively assented to the terms of a service agreement by clicking on a button on Defendant's website while purchasing the credit score. The agreement contained an arbitration clause. Plaintiff alleged that he did not assent to the terms of the agreement by clicking the button, and that it merely constituted his assent to the terms in the "authorization" paragraph. Id. at *5-6. The Court denied Defendants' motion. The Court found that the agreement failed to meet the thresholds for a valid clickwrap or browsewrap agreement. Id. at *20. The Court noted that Defendant's website placed the authorization paragraph in between the window and the button instructing that users clicking the button agreed to authorize Defendant to obtain their personal information, and the literal text of the authorization paragraph was so explicit that it was reasonable for users to assume that their click merely constituted their assent to the authorization, not to the terms displayed in the window. Id. at *16. The Court acknowledged that the layout of the window, the button, and the paragraph did not provide reasonable notice that a users' click would constitute assent to the terms in the window. Id. The Court therefore found that the agreement was not a valid clickwrap agreement. The Court also ruled that the agreement was not a valid browsewrap agreement. The Court noted that the location of the window and the button, as well as the visible scroll bar might have provided sufficient notice of terms to users, were insufficient to inform users that their clicks would constitute assent to the terms in the window. Id. at *19. The Court also determined that Defendant failed to provide constructive notice to users because there was no explicit reference indicating that users should read the terms in the window. Id. at *20. The Court explained that it would be unreasonable to expect users to scroll down the window when they were not aware of a possibility of being bound by the terms in the window. Id. The Court therefore concluded that the agreement was not valid and enforceable. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to compel arbitration.

Torres, et al. v. Simpatico, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 4830 (8th Cir. Mar. 25, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former unit franchisees, brought a putative class action against their respective master franchisers alleging violations of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO"). Plaintiffs entered into standard unit-franchise agreements (the "Agreements") that included broad, standard-form arbitration provisions. Defendants moved to compel individual arbitration under the terms of the Agreements. Id. at *5. The District Court granted the motion. In doing so, the District Court rejected Plaintiffs' argument that the arbitration provisions were unenforceable as unconscionable and that those Defendants who were not signatories (the "non-signatory parties") could not invoke or enforce the arbitration provisions. Id. at *5. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Eighth Circuit affirmed. Plaintiffs contended that the arbitration provisions were unconscionable and should not be enforced because the prohibitively high costs associated with individual arbitration proceedings would prevent them from pursuing their claims. Id. at *9. In support, Plaintiffs pointed to terms in the arbitration provisions requiring them to pre-pay filing and other fees and to reimburse Defendants' costs and expenses if Defendants prevailed. Id. Among other things, Plaintiffs' counsel submitted a general schedule of filing fees, an American Arbitration Association study of average daily rates charged by commercial arbitrators in four locations, and an affidavit estimating that an individual hearing would take three days to complete; in addition, this submission showed that the average loss among all putative class members was approximately $6,100, that the cost of arbitration would exceed the amount of any class member's claim, and that no members of the putative class could afford the costs of individual arbitration. Id. at *10. The District Court found that the average daily arbitrator fees that Plaintiffs quoted did not necessarily reflect the likely cost to arbitrate because, by definition, some arbitrator fees were below average. Id. at *11. The Eighth Circuit agreed with the District Court. The Eighth Circuit found the rates irrelevant because none of Plaintiffs resided in the four geographic areas for which Plaintiffs provided average daily arbitrator rates, and Plaintiffs did not provide fee data for the states in which they resided. Id. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit concluded that Plaintiffs failed to carry their burden to show that the costs of individual arbitration were so high as to prevent them from effectively vindicating their rights in the arbitral forum. Id. Plaintiffs also argued that, even if the arbitration provisions were enforceable, they could be invoked and enforced only by the master franchisers who actually signed the respective Agreements and not by the non-signatory parties. Id. at *13. The Eighth Circuit disagreed, finding that the Defendants and the non-signatories to the respective Agreements were nevertheless the named beneficiaries of the Agreements. Id. at *14-15. The Eighth Circuit ruled the language of the Agreements was sufficiently broad and inclusive to express an intent to benefit not only the actual signatories and named beneficiaries, but also the other non-signatory parties. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit affirmed the District Court's judgment.

(xi) Litigation Over Class Action Settlement Agreements And Consent Decrees

Coffee, et al. v. Brady*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18424 (M.D. Fla. Feb. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs filed a class action in 1971 against the Chief of Jacksonville's Fire Department and various other City officials. Plaintiffs were African-American residents of Jacksonville who were seeking to integrate the City's fire department, which at the time, had only two African-American firefighters in a department of nearly 700. In 1982, the Court entered a consent decree requiring the City to hire an equal number of African-American and white firefighters until the ratio of African-American firefighters to white firefighters reflected the ratio of African-American citizens to white citizens in the City of Jacksonville. Id. at *3. Since then the number of African-American recruits increased in the Fire Department. In 2007, new counsel for Plaintiffs filed a motion for an order to show cause as to why the City should not be held in contempt for failing to follow the terms of the 1982 decree. The City filed a motion to dissolve the decree and dismiss the case. The Court granted the motion. Plaintiffs claimed that the City unilaterally stopped obeying the consent decree in 1992 without seeking the Court's approval and that, therefore, the City had been in contempt for 15 years. Id. at *12. Plaintiffs claimed that between 1992 and 1997, the City hired 126 firefighters, yet only one was African-American, and that after 1997 the number of African-American firefighters hired continued to be far below the number of white firefighters hired, in violation of the decree. In response, the City moved to dissolve the decree and dismiss the case with prejudice because it fully had complied with the self-executing terms of the decree that permitted the City to stop hiring one-to-one as soon as the African-American to white ratio of the firefighters matched the African-American to white ratio of the City's population and because Plaintiffs' effort to resurrect the case was barred by laches. Id. The Court noted that, in 1971, the City agreed to an order requiring the fire department to hire 50% African-American and 50% white until the ratio in the department equaled the ratio in the City's population. Id. at *36. The Court observed that 10 years later, still under the decree to hire one-to-one, the City had hired 251 new firefighters, only 66 of whom were African-American. Id. The 1982 consent decree was entered only because the City had been unable to achieve desegregation in the Fire Department under less onerous terms. Id. at *37. The Court opined that, based on the record, it appeared that at the time the City stopped complying in 1992, it gave no notice to the Court, the lawyers for the Plaintiffs, or the public. The Court noted that the City should have asked the Court to modify or dissolve the decree if it thought that it had achieved compliance. The City argued that, even if it was in violation by waiting 15 years to raise the issue, the gaps in the record were such that the City could not defend itself, and Plaintiffs therefore were barred by laches from obtaining any relief. The Court noted that, even if it found that laches did not apply, and even if it had further found the City in contempt, it could not have simply reinstated the 1982 decree because changes in the law dating back to the early 1990's had rendered problematic the one-to-one hiring scheme under the 1982 decree, even to remedy past discrimination. Id. at *46. Finding that the 1982 consent decree could not be enforced because of laches, the Court formally dissolved it. Id. at *50. Accordingly, the Court granted the City's motion to dissolve the decree and dismissed the case.

International Union, et al. v. Hydro Automotive Structures North American, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16992 (W.D. Mich. Feb. 12, 2015). Plaintiffs, a union and its retirees, brought two separate class actions alleging that Defendants violated collective bargaining agreements by curtailing retiree health benefits. Subsequently, the parties settled the action and the Court granted preliminarily approval to the proposed settlement agreement. Thereafter, the parties notified the Court of a disagreement concerning the tax consequences of settlement payments to certain class members. At issue was whether some or all of the settlement payments were subject to the Federal Insurance Contributions Act ("FICA") tax, and if so, whether Defendants could withhold the required employee contributions from settlement payments to certain class members, or whether Defendants must gross up the settlement payment amounts to ensure that the cash-in-hand for each class member equaled the stated amount of the settlement payments recited in the agreement. Id. at *5-6. The Court declined to address whether FICA taxes applied to some or all of the settlement payments, holding that it was not the appropriate forum to resolve the issue. The Court remarked that although the federal government was an interested party in such a matter, it was not a party to the case, and that the scope, collection, and operational details of the FICA tax was subject to special administrative and other procedural requirements. Id. at *7. Further, the Court opined that the parties were free to litigate the underlying tax issue with the appropriate federal authority under the appropriate procedure. The Court found that the agreement did not require payment and receipt by class members of a particular dollar amount of cash-in-hand regardless of third-party issues, and that the agreement instead required that the particular settlement payment amounts be fully applied to the benefit of each class member. Id. at *8. The actual net cash amount to the class member could vary depending on any number of things, including tax issues, garnishments, or other third-party issues, and the contract did not guarantee any class member a particular amount of cash-in-hand regardless of all potentially legitimate third-party claims. Id. at *9. The Court determined that if the third-party followed proper procedures, Defendants would be obligated to honor such legal process, and a particular class member would receive less cash-in-hand, but would still receive the full value of the settlement because a portion of the payment would be applied to a third-party obligation on the class member's behalf. Id. Hence, the withholding of tax could result in less cash on hand for particular class members, but each class member would still be receiving the full value of the settlement by having the FICA tax withheld and applied for that class member's benefit. Id. at *10. The Court opined that to rule otherwise would require Defendants to pay more than they agreed to pay in settlement, and would allow the class members to receive economic value beyond that promised in the agreement. Thus, the Court concluded that Defendants would need to withhold from payments to retirees' FICA taxes Defendants believed were due, and also pay the employer portion of any FICA tax they believed due over and above the settlement payments to the class members. Id. Finally, finding that the agreement was fair and reasonable, the Court approved the settlement.

(xii) Ascertainability Under Rule 23

Allen, et al. v. Conagra Foods, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2653 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 8, 2015). Plaintiff, a consumer, brought a class action alleging that the label on Defendant's "Parkay Spray" was misleading regarding the fat and calorie contents. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff moved for certification of a multi-state class, divided into several sub-classes, which the Court denied. The Court observed that to demonstrate ascertainability, Plaintiff should present a plan for how the class members would be identified. Id. at *2. Plaintiff had failed to do so, and therefore the Court remarked that ascertainability was lacking. Additionally, at the beginning of the class period, the label of the product at issue stated that the product contained zero grams of fat and zero calories; however, later in the class period the label stated that the product contained zero grams of fat and zero calories "per serving." Id. at *3. Plaintiff had only purchased the product with the revised label. The Court noted the possibility of a jury finding the original label misleading while finding that the revised label was not. If that were so, the Court opined that Plaintiff's claim would fail, and there would be no one to represent the absent class members who did have a claim based on their purchase of Parkay Spray with the earlier label. Additionally, Plaintiff sought to certify a class of people from different states, including sub-classes for claims of breach of express warranty and for violation of the consumer protection laws of many of those states. The Court determined that Plaintiff failed to show how common questions would predominate in a case involving so many states, and did not demonstrate how the proposed multi-state class action would be manageable. Accordingly, the Court denied certification to Plaintiff's proposed class.

Ault, et al. v. J.M. Smucker Co.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103328 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 6, 2015). Plaintiff, a consumer, brought an action alleging that Defendants' labelling of certain Crisco cooking oils as "All Natural" was misleading. Plaintiff contended that the oils were made using genetically modified organism ("GMO") crops, and were so heavily processed that they were man-made. While Crisco's Vegetable and Com Oils bore an "All Natural" label from 2002, and the label was added to the Canola and Natural Blend Oils in late 2009, the labels of the five remaining varieties never contained the label at issue. Id. at *3. Defendants removed the label from the Natural Label Oils prior to February 2013, and in 2014 began shipping Vegetable Oil, Com Oil, and Canola Oil that did not contain the labels. Id. Defendant was also finalizing label artwork without the "All Natural" label for Crisco Natural Blend Oil. Id. Plaintiff moved for certification of a class comprised of consumers who purchased Crisco Pure Vegetable Oil and/or Crisco Pure Corn Oil between February 15, 2009 and June 1, 2014; and/or Crisco Pure Canola Oil and/or Crisco Natural Blend Oil between June 1, 2010 and June 1, 2014 in New York. The Court denied the motion for lack of ascertainability. Plaintiff argued that the class was ascertainable because it was defined by objective criteria, i.e., those who purchased one or more of the Natural Label Oils during the class period. Plaintiff contended that to the extent retailer records were needed, many class members could be individually identified. The Court remarked that even if the criteria was objective, Plaintiff did not show that it was administratively feasible, and opined that her mere assertion that records existed to identify many class members was insufficient. Id. at *9. Moreover, the Court observed that Defendant sold to retailers and distributors, not to consumers; therefore, it had no records regarding the ultimate purchasers of the Natural Label Oils. Further, Plaintiff claimed to have obtained identifying information for 4.5 million sales from California retailers, but she offered no evidence concerning what percentage of sales this number represented, whether she could obtain similar information from New York retailers, and whether such data would identify more than a small percentage of class members. Id. at *10. Additionally, the Court observed that taking the variations in Crisco products in conjunction with the fact that the challenged product was a low-priced consumer item (of which the normal consumer likely does not retain significant memory about), the likelihood was slim that a potential class member would be able to accurately identify themselves as a purchaser of the allegedly deceptive product. Id. at *12-13. Defendant sold nine different brands of cooking oil, only four of which ever bore the label at issue. The Court determined that permitting potential class members to self-identify would require them to specifically recall each variety of Crisco cooking oil they purchased during the class period. It observed that because the label appeared on the four brands at different times, and the class period was defined differently for the Vegetable and Corn Oils than the Canola and Natural Blend Oils, this would complicate the matter. Because the number of Crisco cooking oil brands, plus the differing class periods, rendered accurate self-identification infeasible, and also as Plaintiff herself could not recall the number of bottles of cooking oil she had purchased during the class period, the Court determined that the class was not ascertainable and denied class certification.

Breecher, et al. v. Republic Of Argentina*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 20018 (2d Cir. Sept. 16, 2015). Plaintiff, a bond holder, brought a class action after Defendant defaulted on between $80 and $100 billion of sovereign debt in 2001, and imposed a moratorium on payment of all principal and interest with respect to its external debt, including bonds. The Second Circuit, in related matters, had found that Plaintiffs' proposed method of calculating damages was inflated, and remanded the matters to the District Court with instructions to conduct an evidentiary hearing. Id. at *3. In those cases the District Court had granted summary judgment to Argentina, and had ordered evidentiary hearing as to damages. Id. Plaintiff, however, offered the District Court an alternative solution to these difficulties by simply modifying the class definition to remove the continuous holder requirement and to expand the class to all holders of beneficial interests in the relevant bond series. Id. The District Court subsequently certified the class. Defendant appealed, arguing that the class was not ascertainable. The Second Circuit agreed, and vacated and remanded. At the outset, the Second Circuit opined that a class is ascertainable if it is sufficiently definite so that it is administratively feasible for the District Court to determine whether a particular individual is a class member. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiff argued that a class defined by reference to objective criteria is sufficient to satisfy ascertainability. Id. at *5. The Second Circuit disagreed, finding that while objective criteria may be necessary to define an ascertainable class, it cannot be the case that any objective criterion would do. Id. The Second Circuit explained that, for example, while a class defined by those wearing blue shirts was objective, it could not be identifiable because it had no limitation or context, and the composition of the class makeup would be ever-changing. Id. at *5-6. The Second Circuit observed that this case presented such a circumstance where an objective standard – such as owning a beneficial interest in a bond series without reference to time owned – was insufficiently definite to allow ready identification of the class or the persons who would be bound by the judgment. Id. at *7. The Second Circuit found that without a defined class period or temporal limitation, such as the continuous holder requirement, the nature of the beneficial interest itself and the difficulty of establishing a particular interest's provenance in the particular circumstances of this case made the objective criterion used here inadequate. Id. The Second Circuit also reasoned that the lack of a confined class period, taken in light of the unique features of the bonds case, made the modified class insufficiently definite as a matter of law. Id. at *9-10. The Second Circuit explained that although the class as originally defined may have presented difficult questions of calculating damages, it did not suffer from a lack of ascertainability. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Second Circuit concluded the District Court's class certification order violated the ascertainability requirement, and vacated the order.

Bryd, et al. v. Aaron's Inc., 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 6190 (3d Cir. April 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of individuals who leased and then purchased computers from Defendants, brought a putative class action alleging that the Defendants secretly installed software called "PC Rental Agent" and collected thousands of webcam photos, screen shots, and keystroke logs in violation of the Electronic Communications Privacy Act ("ECPA"). Plaintiffs moved to certify two classes of people who leased and/or purchased computers on which the spyware was installed without their consent. The District Court denied the motion because it found that the classes were not ascertainable. On appeal, the Third Circuit reversed and remanded. At the outset, the Third Circuit noted that the ascertainability inquiry is two-fold and requires a Plaintiff to show that: (i) the class is defined with reference to objective criteria; and (ii) there is a reliable and administratively feasible mechanism for determining whether putative class members fall within the class definition. Id. at *15. The Third Circuit noted that, in Marcus v. BMW of North America, LLC, 687 F.3d 583 (3d Cir. 2012), it found that, if class members are impossible to identify without extensive and individualized fact-finding or mini-trials, a class action is inappropriate. Id. at *16. Similarly, in Hayes v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 725 F.3d 349 (3d Cir. 2013), the Third Circuit applied the ascertainability rule established by Marcus and required Plaintiffs to offer some reliable and administratively feasible alternative that would permit the District Court to determine whether the class was ascertainable. Id. at *16-17. Applying these principles here, the Third Circuit noted that the District Court misstated the law governing ascertainability by conflating the standards to include whether the class is precisely defined, and whether the named Plaintiffs are members of the class. Id. at *22. The Third Circuit found that the District Court erred by blending ascertainability with the class definition issue, which is a separate preliminary inquiry that precedes the Rule 23 analysis. Id. at *23. Further, the Third Circuit noted that the question of whether Plaintiffs are members of the class has nothing to do with either the requirements of a viable class definition or the ascertainability standard. Id. Further, the Third Circuit found that the District Court abused its discretion by finding that the proposed classes were not ascertainable because they were under-inclusive. The District Court reasoned that, although the records provided that Defendants might reveal the computers on which the spyware was activated and the owner/lessee of that computer, Plaintiffs did not provide an administratively feasible way to determine whose information was surreptitiously gathered. Id. at *24. The Third Circuit declined to engraft under-inclusivity on to the ascertainability requirement, finding that individuals who are injured by a Defendant but are excluded from a class are simply not bound by the outcome of that particular action. Id. at *26. Finally, the Third Circuit ruled that the District Court erred in determining that the proposed classes were not ascertainable because they were overbroad. The Third Circuit explained that the classes consisting of owners and lessees were ascertainable because there were objective records that could readily identify those class members. Id. at *31. Accordingly, the Third Circuit reversed the denial of class certification and remanded the action.

Karhu, et al. v. Vital Pharmaceuticals, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 9576 (11th Cir. June 9, 2015). Plaintiff, a purchaser of VPX meltdown fat incinerator ("Meltdown"), brought a class action alleging that Meltdown did not help in burning fat and achieving rapid fat loss, as Defendant advertised. Plaintiff asserted claims for breach of express warranty under the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act, breach of express warranty, unjust enrichment, and violation of the Florida Deceptive and Unfair Trade Practices Act. Previously, the District Court denied Plaintiff's motion to certify a nationwide class of Meltdown purchasers as well as a sub-class of New York purchasers, finding that the proposed classes did not satisfy Rule 23's implicit ascertainability requirement. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed. At the outset, the Eleventh Circuit noted that Plaintiff's proposal to identify class members using VPX's sales data was incomplete, insofar as Plaintiff did not explain how the data would aid in class member identification. Id. at *10. The Eleventh Circuit also found that any potential identification procedure was not obvious because VPX's sales data identified mostly third-party retailers, and not class members. Id. Thus, the Eleventh Circuit held that the District Court acted within its discretion when it rejected Plaintiff's proposal to identify class members via VPX's sales data. Id. at *10-11. Similarly, the Eleventh Circuit ruled that the District Court acted within its discretion when it rejected identification via affidavit. Id. at *11. As Plaintiff had not himself proposed an affidavit-based method, he necessarily had not established how the potential problems with such a method would be avoided. Id. at *11-12. The Eleventh Circuit observed that without a specific proposal as to how identification via affidavit would successfully operate, the District Court had no basis to accept the method. Id. at *12. The Eleventh Circuit therefore upheld the District Court's ascertainability holding. Further, the Eleventh Circuit opined that Plaintiff's argument that the Eleventh Circuit construed the ascertainability requirement too strictly was not convincing. Id. For example, the Eleventh Circuit found that Plaintiff was incorrect that a strict ascertainability requirement conflicted with Klay v. Humana, Inc., 382 F.3d 1241 (11th Cir. 2004). Id. Plaintiff argued that a strict ascertainability requirement violated the holding in Klay that any concerns over case manageability should not stand in the way of certification. Id. The Eleventh Circuit, however, reasoned that the manageability concern was at the heart of the ascertainability requirement and was more fundamental than the manageability concern addressed in Klay. Id. at *13. Furthermore, the Eleventh Circuit observed that in the motion to alter or amend the order denying class certification, Plaintiff explained that VPX sold Meltdown primarily to third-party retailers, and proposed identifying class members by subpoenaing the retailers for their records. Id. at *14. While the District Court took no issue with the abstract principle that a Plaintiff could satisfy the ascertainability requirement by proposing a subpoena-based method for identifying class members, it held that Plaintiff should have proposed the method in his class certification papers, instead of only upon moving to alter or amend. Id. The Eleventh Circuit opined that had Plaintiff done so, he might well have satisfied the ascertainability requirement before the District Court. Id. The Eleventh Circuit concluded that Plaintiff's bare-bones proposal that the District Court ascertain class members through VPX's sales data was insufficient to satisfy the ascertainability requirement. Id. at *15. As a result, the Eleventh Circuit upheld the District Court's ascertainability decision, and thus affirmed without reaching the District Court's Rule 23(b)(3) decision. Id.

LeBlanc, et al. v. ExxonMobil Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32533 (M.D. La. Mar. 17, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant knowingly distributed defective fuel that damaged the engines of their vehicles. According to the complaint, the fuel distributed from Defendant's Baton Rouge terminal contained elevated unwashed gum that caused engine damage and decreased its efficiency and performance. Following consumer complaints, Defendant shut down the terminal, and paid approximately $4.6 million in claims. Id. at *3. Seeking to represent a class of purchasers of the defective fuel created, sold, or distributed by Defendant for the twelve months preceding April 3, 2014, as well as owners of property damaged by the fuel during this period, Plaintiffs moved for class certification. Plaintiffs argued that every purchaser of a defective fuel was entitled to a refund of the purchase price under Louisiana redhibition law. Id. at *8. The Court denied certification, finding that the class was not ascertainable because determination of class membership was entangled with the underlying merits of the claim. Id. at *12. Under Louisiana law, only redhibitory defects are actionable, and for the subject fuel to be redhibitory or defective, it requires proof that the fuel purchased was either "absolutely useless" or "its use is so inconvenient" that it was presumed that the buyer would not have purchased the gas for the price paid. Id. at *7. Thus, according to the Court, determining whether a particular purchaser of the defective fuel had a redhibition claim would require inquiry into the nature and degree of uselessness or inconvenience, if any, the purchaser or user experienced, and it was not amenable to uniform or formulaic class-wide proof. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs' proposed class definition included both purchasers of the defective fuel and owners of the property damages by such fuel. According to the Court, not all owners were necessarily "purchasers," and thus not every claimant meeting the class definition had a claim in redhibition. Id. at *6. The Court explained that in ascertaining class members, "all purchasers of defective fuel" was not only a matter of identifying purchasers of defective fuel during a determined time period, but also identifying individuals who experienced uselessness or a degree of inconvenience that gave rise to a presumption that he or she would not have purchased the fuel. Id. at *12. Because such inquiries into the merits of each potential class member's claim would be necessary to determine whether an individual fell under the defined class, the Court concluded that the class was not ascertainable. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Mullins, et al. v. Direct Digital LLC,* 795 F.3d 654 (7th Cir. 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action under the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act against Defendant for fraudulently representing that its product, Instaflex Joint Support, relieves joint discomfort. The District Court certified a class of consumers "who purchased Instaflex within the applicable statute of limitation of the respective [c]lass [s]tates for personal use until the date notice is disseminated." Id. at 658. Defendant filed a petition for a leave to appeal under Rule 23(f), arguing that the District Court abused its discretion in certifying the class without first finding that the class was ascertainable. Id. The Seventh Circuit accepted the petition, and affirmed the District Court's order granting class certification. Id. at 674. The Seventh Circuit noted that it has long recognized an implicit requirement under Rule 23 that a class must be defined by objective criteria. Id. at 657. The Seventh Circuit further observed that other circuits – most notably the Third Circuit in Carrera v. Bayer Corp., 727 F.3d 300 (3d Cir. 2013) – have imposed a new requirement that Plaintiffs prove at the certification stage that there is a reliable and administratively feasible way to identify all who fit within the class definition; this heightened requirement has often prevented certification in consumer class actions in those circuits. Id. The Seventh Circuit declined to follow this new approach, noting that nothing in Rule 23 mentions or implies this heightened requirement under Rule 23(b)(3). Id. at 658. The Seventh Circuit reasoned that the policy concerns motivating the heightened ascertainability requirement are better addressed by applying the carefully explicit requirements of Rule 23(a) and Rule 23(b)(3). Id. Applied here, the Seventh Circuit ruled that Plaintiff's class definition was not vague, since it identified a particular group of individuals (purchasers of Instaflex) harmed in a particular way (defrauded by labels and marketing materials) during a specific time period in particular areas. Id. at 660-61. Further, the Seventh Circuit found that the class definition was not based on subjective criteria. Id. at 661. Thus, the Seventh Circuit held that Defendant did not demonstrate that the District Court abused its discretion in certifying the class. Id. at 674. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's order granting class certification. Id.

Editor's Note: Ascertainability is becoming one of the primary battlegrounds in class certification battles. The Seventh Circuit's ruling in Mullins is one of the first counter-attacks to the Third Circuit's holdings on ascertainability, which stemmed from Carrera. In so ruling, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the certification of a food labeling class, holding that ascertainability does not require an administratively feasible method of identifying a proposed class, just an objective one.

Shelton, et al. v. Bledsoe, Warden Of USP,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 253 (3d Cir. Jan. 7, 2015). Plaintiff, a federal inmate, brought a class action for alleged violations of the Eighth Amendment and the Federal Tort Claims Act. Plaintiff alleged that Defendants engaged in a pattern, practice, or policy of improperly placing inmates who were known to be hostile to each other in the same cell and that the prison guards failed to intervene in the resulting inmate-on-inmate violence. Plaintiff proposed a class consisting of all persons who were currently or would be imprisoned and sought injunctive and declarative relief on behalf of the class. The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion for certification, finding that the class was not "objectively, reasonably ascertainable." Id. at *7. Plaintiff appealed. The Third Circuit reversed and remanded. Relying on precedent in other circuits and an Advisory Committee Note to Rule 23, the Third Circuit held that "a judicially-created implied requirement of ascertainability – that the members of the class be capable of specific enumeration" was inappropriate for Rule 23(b)(2) classes seeking only injunctive and declaratory relief. Id. at *12. Distinguishing between class actions filed under Rule 23(b)(2) and Rule 23(b)(3), the Third Circuit explained that because the focus of Rule 23(b)(2) was more heavily placed on the nature of the remedy sought and because a remedy obtained by one class member naturally affects all members of the class (as they do not have a right to opt-out of the class), it was not critical to ascertain the identities of individual class members in a Rule 23(b)(2) class. Id. at *11. Conversely, in class actions under Rule 23(b)(3), ascertaining the individual members of the class is critical because questions of law or fact common to all class members must predominate and the class members have the right to opt-out of the class. Id. at *10. Thus, according to the Third Circuit, "the requirement that the class be defined in a manner that allows ready identification of class members, serves several important objectives that do not exist or are not compelling in Rule 23(2) classes." Id. at *13. The Third Circuit therefore concluded that the District Court erred in denying class certification based on its ascertainability analysis, and remanded the action to consider whether Plaintiff's properly-defined putative class meet the remaining Rule 23 requirements for class certification.

Sherman, et al. v. YAHOO!, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 127809 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 23, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant sent unsolicited text messages using an automatic telephone dialing system in violation of the provisions of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Id. at *4-5. Plaintiff allegedly received a text message from an individual via Defendant's Mobile SMS Messenger Service ("PC2SMS Service") that allowed registered Yahoo users to send instant messages to mobile devices from their computers through the Yahoo messenger platform. Whenever a Yahoo user sends a message using the PC2SMS Service, Defendant automatically checks a database called the Optin DB to see whether anyone has previously sent a message to that mobile number using the PC2SMS Service, and if that recipient's mobile number has never before received a text message via the PC2SMS Service, then Defendant automatically appends a "welcome message" to the user's message. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiff alleged that this welcome message violated the TCPA, and moved for certification of a class of individuals to whom Defendant sent substantially similar or identical text messages on a telephone number assigned to cellular telephone provider AT&T and/or Cingular during a defined period and whose cellular telephone number was associated with a Yahoo account. Id. at *2. Plaintiff proposed to ascertain the putative class by: (i) obtaining Defendant's records from the Optin DB showing the time and date that it sent each welcome message to the corresponding mobile number during the proposed class period; (ii) limiting the unique mobile numbers to those assigned to AT&T and/or Cingular; and (iii) comparing the mobile numbers listed in the Optin DB with information obtained from Defendant's UDB database in order to obtain names, e-mail addresses, and mailing address information for account holders to whom Defendant sent the welcome message. Id. at *14-15. Plaintiff also intended to subpoena AT&T for the complete information, and as an alternative, proposed sending class notice to members' Yahoo e-mail accounts. Id. at *15. The Court denied class certification, finding that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate ascertainability. While the Court acknowledged that Plaintiff appeared to have obtained a complete list of mobile numbers that received the welcome message during the defined period, it also noted that the Optin DB from which Plaintiff obtained the numbers did not contain the names, e-mail addresses, or postal addresses of the individuals who owned those mobile numbers. Id. at *19-20. Plaintiff failed to show that cross-referencing the phone numbers with information contained in Defendant's UDB would provide complete or even accurate contact information for class members, and even if it did, that information might not be current and individualized inquiry would be needed to determine which account holder owned the number during the class period. Id. at *20. Further, Plaintiff offered no explanation as to why AT&T would turn over its subscriber records, and the Court found no reason to believe that AT&T would, in fact, turn over the user information Plaintiff required. Id. at *22. The Court similarly found Plaintiff's proposal to send notices unworkable, reasoning that even if the notice were to reach the right individuals, those people would have to recall whether or not they received a single, non-personal e-mail during a one month period over two years ago, and this was highly improbable. Id. at *23. Thus, as Plaintiff failed to provide an objective, reliable, and administratively feasible method of ascertaining the class, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Stewart, et al. v. Beam Global Spirits & Wine, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74116 (D.N.J. June 9, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants violated the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act ("NJCFA") when they marketed and sold "Skinnygirl Margarita" beverages as "all natural" even though they contained sodium benzoate. Id. at *3. Following denial of class certification for failing to satisfy the ascertainability requirement, Plaintiffs renewed their motion for class certification. Plaintiffs submitted a declaration from Steven Weisbrot, executive vice president of a class action notice and claims administration firm, in which Weisbrot detailed a claim submission process to identify class members. Id. at *16. Weisbrot represented that he reviewed the proposed class definition, the pleadings, and relevant documents, and opined that the parties could implement a reliable and administratively feasible method to ascertain individual class members. Id. at *17. According to the declaration, the proposed class members would be asked to provide a claim form and receipt for purchase of Skinnygirl Margarita, and the claims of those with a receipt of purchase within the class period would be accepted as valid. In the absence of a receipt, prospective class members would be afforded the opportunity to submit a sworn affidavit setting forth the dates on which they purchased the product, the state of purchase, the retailer, the amount paid, and a description of the product. Id. at *17. Weisbrot then would apply a sophisticated state-of-the-art data matching technology to review all claims and identify patterns of duplication. Id. at *18. Plaintiffs argued that Defendants' liability could be determined from objectively quantifiable sales data without depending on the number of claims submitted. Id. at *19. The Court denied Plaintiffs' renewed motion for class certification. The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to propose an objective way of identifying class members, suggesting only the submission of claim forms by putative class members without any verifiable records or documents to corroborate the claims. Id. at *26. Further, Plaintiffs had difficulty remembering the details of their purchases, and it was unlikely that any class members retained receipts for their purchases approximately four to six years ago or would be able to provide the details necessary to substantiate their claims. The Court opined that a process requiring reliance on affidavits of putative class members as the primary method of ascertaining the class members would leave Defendants without a suitable and fair method for challenging the individuals' purported membership in the class. Id. at *29-30. The Court, therefore, concluded that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate a reliable and administratively feasible mechanism for ascertaining class members. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' renewed motion for class certification.

Vista Healthplan, Inc., et al. v. Cephalon, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74846 (E.D. Pa. June 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers and Third-Party Payors ("TPPs") who purchased the brand-name pharmaceutical Provigil or its generic equivalent, brought a putative class action alleging violations of antitrust and consumer protection laws of 23 states and the District of Columbia. According to the complaint, Cephalon patented a specific formulation of a wakefulness-promoting drug named Provigil. On December 24, 2002, four general pharmaceutical companies (the "Generic Defendants") filed Abbreviated New Drug Applications for generic Provigil, each certifying that Cephalon's patent was either invalid or would not be infringed by their generic product. Cephalon sued the Generic Defendants for patent infringement, but later settled. The settlements permitted the Generic Defendants to launch their generic Provigil on a "date certain" prior to the expiration of Cephalon's patent, and Cephalon paid approximately $300 million to the Generic Defendants. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs alleged that, but for these payments, the Generic Defendants would have launched generic Provigil at risk, and lower-cost generic competition would have been available to the prospective class members by 2006. Id. at *10. In moving for class certification, Plaintiffs proposed two classes, including: (i) a class of end payors asserting claims under state antitrust and consumer protection laws; and (ii) a class of end payors asserting claims for unjust enrichment under state laws. Id. at *16. Plaintiffs excluded numerous categories of uninjured class members. In support of the motion, Plaintiffs presented the expert testimony of Dr. Raymond S. Hartman and asserted that Dr. Hartman's methodology of measuring antitrust impact and aggregate damages demonstrated that the elements of Plaintiffs' claims could be satisfied through proof at trial that was common to the class. Id. at *11-12. The Court denied class certification, finding that Plaintiffs failed to establish ascertainability. The Court found that the records before the Court were insufficient to ascertain the identities of the class members, and Dr. Hartman was unaware of any available records from which the identities of class members could be derived. Id. at *34-35. The Court noted that, aside from two exhibits – one that listed the prescriptions of one consumer and one that identified consumers by number as opposed to including their identifies – Plaintiffs presented no evidence that the records could be utilized to identify class members. Id. at *34. Further, Plaintiffs failed to establish that any methodology for identifying class members would be administratively feasible. Dr. Hartman, in fact, acknowledged that, in order to identify consumers and TPPs that fall within the class, he would need to conduct a detailed analysis of the contracts between various entities and also examine each individuals' purchase history. Id. at *40. The Court reasoned that this multi-step process would entail extensive and individualized fact-finding that made class certification inappropriate. The Court further found that Plaintiffs failed to identify and remove a significant number of uninjured class members that remained within the class definition. Id. at *58. Despite Plaintiffs' assurances, Defendants identified several categories of consumers and TPPs that had not been excluded from the class definition, but would be uninjured, and showed that identifying and removing them would require extensive individualized inquiry. Id. at *61-66. The Court, therefore, concluded that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the ascertainability requirement. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

(xiii) Class Actions Involving Unions

Addington, et al. v. US Airline Pilots Association*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 10858 (9th Cir. June 26, 2015). Following the merger of US Airways and American Airlines, Plaintiffs, a group of pilots, sued the US Airline Pilots Association ("USAPA") alleging that it breached its duty of fair representation. The dispute arose in 2005 when US Airways merged with America West Airlines, setting their respective pilots on a collision over a single, integrated seniority list. Id. at *1. At the time of the merger, the US Airways pilots ("East Pilots") and the America West Pilots ("West Pilots") were both represented by the Air Line Pilots Association ("ALPA") as they attempted to negotiate a seniority list. Id. The East Pilots advocated a list based on date of hire, while the West Pilots advocated a list based on the strength of their pre-merger airline. Id. at *2. When the negotiations failed, the issue was decided by an arbitration panel, which did not fully accede to the wishes of either group. Id. Subsequently, US Airways, American Airlines, US Airways, the USAPA, and the Allied Pilots Association ("APA") negotiated a multi-party Memorandum Of Understanding ("MOU") setting forth procedures for a merger transition between APA and New American Airlines. The USAPA advisory committee then made tailored presentations to its divided audiences. When presenting the MOU to the West Pilots, the USAPA representative stated that the MOU was neutral with respect to seniority, and, while speaking to East Pilots, the representative stated that the MOU was beneficial because, in effect, it confirmed that the arbitration award was dead. Id. at *17. This lawsuit followed. The District Court entered judgment in USAPA's favor. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed in part and vacated in part. At the outset, the Ninth Circuit noted that, to establish that the union's exercise of judgment was discriminatory, Plaintiffs must adduce substantial evidence of discrimination that was intentional, severe, and unrelated to legitimate union objectives. Id. at *39. The Ninth Circuit found that, under the Transition Agreement's seniority-integration process, the groups of pilots were committed to working out a single, integrated seniority list through ALPA's Merger Policy. When the East Pilots repudiated their promise to be bound by the agreed-upon process, they dumped the ALPA rules and found a new rule-maker (the USAPA) that they could control and that was irreconcilably opposed to the negotiating position of the West Pilots. Id. at *46. The Ninth Circuit reasoned that, since USAPA's initial act of proposing a revised seniority list in 2008, it continued to oppose any efforts to reach a single agreement, which would have triggered the implementation of the arbitration award under the terms of the Transition Agreement. Id. at *47. The Ninth Circuit held that the District Court erred in deferring to paragraph 10(h) of the MOU, which maintained in-place the separate seniority lists for East and West Pilots that persisted as US Airways. The District Court had identified three possible reasons why USAPA included paragraph 10(h), including: (i) to obtain the benefits of the MOU while remaining neutral as to seniority; (ii) to avoid conflict; and (iii) to advantage the East Pilots by promoting date-of-hire seniority over the arbitration award. Id. at *57. The Ninth Circuit disagreed with the District Court and concluded that, once USAPA assumed the duty to act as statutory representative for all of the pilots, it could not rightly refuse to represent all of the pilots' interests fairly and impartially. Id. at *58. The Ninth Circuit ruled that USAPA violated the most elementary principle of the duty of fair representation. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit reversed the District Court's judgment in part, vacated in part, and remanded.

Association Of Administrative Law Judges, et al. v. Colvin*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 1063 (7th Cir. Jan. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a union representing the Social Security Administration's administrative law judges ("judges"), brought an action alleging that the Administration interfered with the judges' decisional independence by requiring judges to decide at least 500 social security disability cases a year, in violation of the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA"). The APA provides that when conducting a hearing, an administrative law judge is not subject to direction or supervision by other employees of the agency that he is employed by, and may not be assigned duties inconsistent with his duties and responsibilities as an administrative law judge. Id. at *3. In 2007, the Administration issued a directive setting a goal for judges such that they would be able to issue 500 to 700 legally sufficient decisions each year. Id. The District Court dismissed the complaint for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, holding that the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978 ("Act") precluded Plaintiffs' resort to the APA. Id. at *3-4. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed. It noted that the Act creates remedies for prohibited personnel practices taken against federal employees, and defines "personnel practices" to include significant change in duties, responsibilities, or working conditions. Id. at *4. The Seventh Circuit found that Plaintiffs were alleging a significant change in duties, responsibilities, or working conditions, and if this were so, their exclusive remedy was under the Act. The Seventh Circuit, however, remarked that Plaintiffs had no remedy under the Act either, even if the challenged directive was a quota rather than a goal, because the Act does not prohibit an increase in a production quota unless the increase violates a prohibition listed in 5 U.S.C. § 2302(b), and the increase challenged here did not. Id. Plaintiffs argued that the quota altered the judges' preferred ratio of grants to denials of benefits and by doing so infringed their decision-making independence. The Seventh Circuit observed that if the result of the quota was that the percentage of such awards had risen, that was not contended to be an aim of the quota, but an unintended and presumably unwanted by-product. Id. at *5-6. Further, the Seventh Circuit noted that because the social security disability insurance trust fund was on the verge of being exhausted, the Administration was under pressure to reduce the aggregate disability benefits that its judges awarded. Id. at *6. Thus, the Seventh Circuit opined that the aim of the quota was to speed up decision-making rather than to prod the judges to grant more applications for disability benefits. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiffs also alleged that because of the quota, they granted benefits in cases in which, had they more time, they would have denied benefits, and thus the quota affected their decision-making. The Seventh Circuit remarked that increasing a workforce is not an actionable interference with the workers' decisional independence. Id. at *8. Further, the Seventh Circuit held that the government would not be interfering with judges' decisional independence by failing to increase the number of judges in proportion to the increase in case load otherwise the system would be flooded with cases brought by civil servants complaining that, as an incidental and unintended effect of a change in their working conditions, they had decided to reduce the amount of effort they devoted to each task they were assigned. Id. at *8-9. Thus, the Seventh Circuit ruled that an incidental and unintentional effect of a change in working conditions is not actionable under the APA.

Barnes, et al. v. Air Line Pilots Association International,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 133182 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of United Airlines pilots, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant discriminated against them when allocating $225 million of retroactive pay ("retro pay") that United provided to its pilots after Defendant and United entered into a collective bargaining agreement in late 2012. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs took issue with three features of Defendant's retro pay calculation, including: (i) off-setting their retroactive pay by the amount they received from United in annual bonuses; (ii) using the average number of pay credit hours flown by the management pilot's bid category as opposed to their actual hours worked; and (iii) excluding certain credit hours from the calculation. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs sought to represent two putative classes of United pilots, including management pilots and pilot instructors. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant breached its duty of fair representation ("DFR") to both classes, and, as to the management pilots only, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant unjustly enriched itself in violation of Illinois law by accepting the payment of dues and contract maintenance fees. Plaintiffs moved for class certification. The Court granted the motion as to the management pilot class on both the DFR and unjust enrichment claims. Id. at *2. As to the management pilot class, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs met the numerosity requirement because the class contained more than 120 members. Id. at *8. The Court found that Plaintiffs met the commonality requirement because each putative class member's claim presented a common question of whether Defendant breached its DFR to management pilots in allocating the retro pay or whether Defendant unjustly enriched itself by accepting dues and contract maintenance fees from management pilots even though it did not represent them. Id. at *14. The Court determined that Plaintiffs met the typicality requirement because Plaintiffs alleged that they were deprived of their proper share of the retro pay like all management pilots. Id. at *13. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs were not adequate representatives of the larger group of management pilots because one Plaintiff had been in management for eight of the relevant months and therefore his interests more closely aligned with the non-management "line pilots," and two other Plaintiffs were part of senior management and therefore had opposing interests from the common class members. Id. at *9-11. The Court rejected Defendant's argument on the basis that, despite the management pilots' claims that they should have received a larger share of the $225 million payment and the line pilots should have received less, they now were seeking payment directly from Defendant – out of funds Defendant specifically set aside in the event of legal challenge to the allocation – and not a claw back from line pilots. Id. at *10. Thus, according to the Court, "because victory for management pilots would result in Defendant's disbursement of additional funds to compensate them appropriately, the fact that a sub-group of management pilots may or may not be included does not necessarily harm the other management pilots." Id. at *11-12. The Court, therefore, found that Plaintiffs met the adequacy requirement. The Court also held that Plaintiffs met the predominance requirement. Whereas Defendant contended that an individualized fact-specific inquiry would be necessary because the putative class members worked for different lengths of time as management pilots during the relevant period, the Court held that, if Defendant ultimately was found liable, the need to calculate damages for each putative class member did not defeat predominance. Id. at *20. The Court further ruled that the issue of whether Defendant unjustly enriched itself by accepting fees and dues predominated over any conceivably individual issue pertinent to that claim. Id. at *21. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for certification of a management pilot class to pursue DFR and unjust enrichment claims against Defendant.

Centeno, et al. v. Jay Inslee, Governor Of The State Of Washington,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125142 (W.D. Wash. Sept. 17, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of individual healthcare providers, brought a class action alleging that Defendant's automatic deduction of union dues/agency fees from their paychecks violated their First Amendment rights. The action arose following the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Harris v. Quinn, 134 S. Ct. 2618 (2014), which held that the imposition of involuntary "agency fee" payments to unions in lieu of equivalent union membership dues violates First Amendment rights. Id. at *2. In response to Harris, the State of Washington changed its practice and imposed an opt-out system for union membership and/or dues deduction. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs, a group of individuals who care for disabled relatives and did not wish to join the union or have had dues deductions from their paychecks, sought certification of a class of all individual providers who provided written notification to the union or the State of Washington that they objected to paying dues or fees to the union and were subjected to automatic deductions of union dues or agency fees without their affirmative consent. Id. at *3-4. Defendant opposed certification and sought a stay on the action in light of the Supreme Court's grant of certiorari in Friedrichs v. California Teachers Association, 135 S. Ct. 2933 (2015). In Friedrichs, the Supreme Court agreed to hear the questions of whether Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 97 S. Ct. 1782 (1977), should be overruled and public-sector "agency shop" arrangements invalidated under the First Amendment, and whether it violates the First Amendment to require that public employees affirmatively object to subsidizing non-chargeable speech by public-sector unions, rather than requiring that employees affirmatively consent to subsidizing such speech. Id. at *21. The Court denied class certification and granted Defendant's motion to stay. In denying class certification, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to meet typicality and predominance requirements. The Court noted that the named Plaintiffs would be subjected to defenses unique to them because they were allegedly full-fledged employees, while the rest of the class were quasi-public employees, and thus Plaintiffs' claims were atypical to the class. Id. at *12-13. Since individualized hearings would be required to determine whether any class member suffered a First Amendment injury under the current or prior system of dues deductions or whether the union was unjustly enriched by their dues, even if the First Amendment required the imposition of an opt-in system for dues discussion, the Court found that common questions did not predominate over individual issues. Id. at *18-19. Further, because of the personal nature of the First Amendment injuries at issue, the Court found no way to avoid individualized damages based on the deductions made during specific periods where the individual provider subjectively did not wish to "join or support" the union. Id. at *20. The Court, therefore, denied class certification. In addition, the Court granted Defendant's motion to stay the action, finding it appropriate under the given circumstances. Although Friedrichs concerned full-fledged public sector employees and the Supreme Court had held that the rule established in Abood does not apply to quasi-public employees, and an answer in the affirmative to the first question would affect the outcome of this case only if Court ultimately agreed with the union that the named Plaintiffs were full-fledged public employees, the Court found that, to some degree, judicial economy would be served by avoiding the need to consider the union's fact-intensive arguments about Plaintiffs' employment status. Id. at *21-22. According to the Court, the reasoning that the Supreme Court might use in discussing the constitutionality of opting-out would likely influence its understanding of the issue even if the Supreme Court answered the questions in negative. Hence, a stay would facilitate guidance by the ultimate arbiter of the First Amendment and assist in resolving the central open legal question. Id. at *22-23. Further, because the stay would last no longer than the year, and any Plaintiffs with a strong objection to due deductions could effectively enjoin Defendant's future deductions on an individual basis by opting-out any time, the Court determined that a stay would be appropriate. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to stay the action.

Hamidi, et al. v. Service Employees International Union Local 1000,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 67419 (E.D. Cal. May 22, 2015). Plaintiffs, employees of the State of California, brought a putative class action challenging Defendant's practice of deducting money for political activities from employees' wages unless they opt-out of the procedure. Although Plaintiffs were not members of the union, the union required them to pay a "fair share fee" for compensation for their employment relations with the state. Id. at *2. The State Controller deducted fair share fees directly from a public employee's wages and remitted them to Defendant on a monthly basis. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's opt-out system, which required non-members to notify Defendant of their objection to paying for non-chargeable expenses and to renew their objection annually, violated the First Amendment. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant improperly included litigation expenses incurred in an earlier fair share fee case in its June 2013 Notice's allocation of chargeable expenses in violation of the First Amendment. Id. Seeking to represent a class consisting of all former, current, and future State of California employees represented by the union, Plaintiffs moved for class certification. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs proposed three sub-classes to determine the amount of damages and asserted that all members of the general class shared the asserted claims. Id. at *4-5. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion in part, certifying only Plaintiffs' first claim to the extent it asserted a facial First Amendment challenge. Id. at *25. The Court found that only Plaintiffs' first claim satisfied Rule 23's requirements. Id. at *10. The Court determined that the proposed class of at least 40 unconscionabilty 40 members satisfied the numerosity requirement. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs' first claim raised two core common questions of law, including: (i) whether the opt-out procedure served a compelling state interest; and (ii) whether that interest could not be achieved through significantly less restrictive means. Id. at *10-11. The finding of commonality further supported the conclusion that Plaintiffs' first claim was typical of absent class members. Id. at *12. To the extent Defendant argued Plaintiffs differed from many absent class members in their reasons for refraining from union membership and in their opposition to Defendant's political activities and thus had conflicts of interest, the Court opined that a mere preference did not properly "conflict" with Plaintiffs' constitutional interests such that it rendered the representative parties inadequate. Id. at *14-17. Plaintiffs demonstrated knowledge of the fair share fee, the opt-out procedure, and other facts relevant to their claims, and the Court concluded that Plaintiffs would vigorously prosecute the action on the class' behalf. Id. at *19-22. Since a refund would come directly from the injunctive and declaratory relief Plaintiffs sought, the Court further determined that the order would not prompt individualized damages inquiries and class certification pursuant to Rule 23(b)(2) would be appropriate for Plaintiffs' first claim. Id. at *24. The Court, however, ruled that Plaintiffs' second claim lacked commonality as there was no evidence that the proposed class as a whole opposed Defendant's political activities, and lacked typicality to the extent Plaintiffs asserted an "as applied" challenge to the opt-out procedure in addition to their facial First Amendment challenge with no evidence. Id. at *11-12. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification as to Plaintiffs' First Amendment claim only to the extent that it claimed Defendant's opt-out practice as a "facial challenge," in which they challenged the application of the opt-out system as unconstitutional.

Rauner, et al. v. American Federation Of State, County And Municipal Employees, Council 31, AFL-CIO,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65085 (N.D. Ill. May 19, 2015). Plaintiff, the Governor of the State of Illinois, brought an action seeking a declaration that the "fair share contract provisions" of the Illinois Public Labor Relations Act ("IPLRA") were unconstitutional. Under the IPLRA, a labor organization that represents the interests of all public employees in the unit may include in its collective bargaining agreement a provision requiring employees covered by the agreement who are not members of the organization to pay their proportionate share of the costs of the collective bargaining process. Id. at *7-8. Three non-union member public employees (the "employees") moved to intervene. Thereafter, the Governor filed a first amended complaint ("FAC") adding the employees as Plaintiffs, and moved to confirm the amended complaint and to dismiss as moot Defendants' motions to dismiss the original complaint. The Court granted the employees' motion and dismissed the original complaint and the FAC for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction and standing. The Court opined that, because issues raised in the suit were based on state law, it did not have subject-matter jurisdiction over the case, because the existence of a federal defense was inadequate to confer jurisdiction, even if the constitutional defense was the only real issue in the case. Id. at *11. With respect to standing, the Court noted that state officials generally lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of state law in federal court where their interests were official as opposed to where their interests were personally adversely impacted. Id. at *12. Here, the Governor had no personal interest at stake because he was not subject to the fair share fee requirements. The Governor merely claimed to have a duty to protect the First Amendment rights of all public employees in the state, which were official rather than personal interests. Thus, because the Governor brought the action in his official capacity, seeking to represent the non-member employees subject to the fair share provisions of the collective bargaining agreements, the Court concluded that the Governor had no standing. The Court rejected the Governor's argument that his FAC governed the Court's jurisdictional inquiry. Although the Court agreed that leave to add or drop parties under Rule 21 should be freely granted, it reiterated that, because the original Plaintiff, the Governor, lacked standing, the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction over the case, and it had no power to enter an order allowing the addition of the employees as Plaintiffs. Id. at *14. Further, even if the Court allowed the employees to join as additional Plaintiffs, the Court found that it could not assert supplemental jurisdiction over the Governor's claims because it already had determined that he lacked standing to bring them. Finally, because a party cannot intervene if the Court has no jurisdiction over the original action, the Court found that the employees' motion to intervene could not save the Governor's original complaint. Id. at *15. Nevertheless, the Court noted that, where the intervening party brings separate claims, and the Court has an independent basis to exercise jurisdiction over those claims, the Court could dismiss the original claims in the action for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction while retaining jurisdiction over the intervener's claims. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court granted the employees leave to file their complaint in intervention as the operative pleading, and dismissed the Governor's complaint.

Schlaud, et al. v. Snyder,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 7786 (6th Cir. May 12, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of childcare providers who received subsidies for offering services to low-income families, brought a putative class action seeking equitable relief and monetary damages alleging that the union dues deduction requirement in their collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") violated their First Amendment rights. Id. at *4-5. The State of Michigan's Child Development and Care Program ("CDC") provided childcare services for low-income families. Beginning in 2006, Michigan's Department of Human Services ("DHS") worked with a variety of local agencies to improve standards for child care providers, culminating with the approval of a CBA between the Child Care Providers Together Michigan (the "Union") and the Michigan Home Based Child Care Council, the entity charged with the authority to bargain collectively on behalf of the Michigan DHS. The CBA required all home childcare providers receiving subsidies from the CDC to either become members of the union or to pay the union an agency fee through a subsidy deduction. Id. at *4. In January 2009, DHS began deducting 1.15% from subsidy payment made to home childcare providers and forwarded them to the union. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that the deduction violated their First Amendment Rights. Plaintiffs sought class certification under Rule 23 on behalf of similarly-situated child care providers. The District Court denied class certification. It reasoned that Plaintiffs' proposed class would include 4,806 providers who had reviewed the proposed CBA and had voted in favor of the provisions requiring the payment of union dues or agency fees, which would create a conflict of interest between Plaintiffs and a substantial part of the proposed class. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs asked for an amended judgment, changing the class to encompass providers who paid union dues but who did not "sign authorization cards for the union or vote in elections that regarded union representation or ratification of the union's collective bargaining agreement." Id. at *7. The District Court denied certification again and determined that short of deposing each proposed class member, it would be impossible to ascertain the motivations of each class member. Id. Plaintiffs appealed to the Sixth Circuit. The Sixth Circuit upheld the dismissal. Thereafter, in August 2013, Plaintiffs sought further review and a year later, the Supreme Court granted the petition for a writ of certiorari in light of its decision in Harris v. Quinn, 134 S. Ct. 2618 (2014), a case that involved a similar compulsory agency-fee regime in Illinois. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs argued that Harris supported their claim because Harris had made clear that it was unconstitutional for the union to seize fees from home child care providers without their prior consent. The Sixth Circuit, however, distinguished Harris because that case addressed the merits of the claims at issue and did not discuss class certification principles. Id. at *15. Thus, according to the Sixth Circuit, nothing in Harris changed its earlier analysis. Focusing on Rule 23(a)(4), the Sixth Circuit reaffirmed its ruling that the divergent interests of Plaintiffs and the members of the proposed class defeated class certification. Id. The Sixth Circuit further reiterated its finding that the high rate of turnover among child care providers was a problem because elections were held years before deductions for fees took place. Id. The Sixth Circuit thus held that the conflict between the named Plaintiffs, who opposed paying union fees and many members of the proposed class, who favored paying fees to the union, meant that the named Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the requirement that the representative parties would fairly and adequately protect the interest of the class. Id. at *15-16. The Sixth Circuit thereby affirmed the denial of class certification.

Spirit Airlines, Inc. v. Association Of Flights Attendants, et al.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 78241 (E.D. Mich. June 17, 2015). In this action challenging the domestic partner health care benefits available to flight attendants, Plaintiffs sought to vacate an arbitration award issued by a three-member Board that resolved in favor of Defendant. Id. at *1. An issue arose during the arbitration proceedings as to whether one of the Board members, Carmen Linn, could continue her service on the Board, in light of her retirement as a flight attendant, which occurred during the arbitration proceedings, before the Board issued its final award. Id. at *2. Interpreting a provision of the parties' collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") requiring that the two partisan Board members be full-time company employees, the neutral arbitrator, Susan Brown, unilaterally determined that Linn's continued service on the Board after her retirement was appropriate because the composition of the Board was proper when initially constituted and a Board member's status does not change during the life of a case even though that member may become ineligible to serve on future Boards. Id. at *3. The Court, however, denied Defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings, which sought enforcement of the arbitration award, holding that the Board's award resulted from a violation of the majority-vote provisions of the Railway Labor Act ("RLA") and CBA. Id. The parties then cross-moved for summary judgment, and the Court granted Defendant's motion to enforce the award. The Court observed that the RLA mandates only that final system Board decisions, i.e., decisions that conclude the grievance proceedings, be by majority vote, and does not require a majority vote for preliminary decisions leading to a final decision, such as Brown's decision on the Board composition issue. Id. at *7. Because Brown's decision resolving the Board composition issue was not a final judgment or decision, or one that ended the proceeding leaving nothing further to be done, the Court found that it did not require a majority vote, and thus, Brown's failure to decide the issue by majority vote did not constitute a violation of the RLA's majority-vote provision. Id. at *8. The Court also opined that Brown's decision on the Board composition issue did not clearly violate any provision of the parties' CBA because the CBA did not contain any explicit guidance on how disputes arising during the course of the grievance proceedings should be decided, and it was unclear whether all system Board decisions, as opposed to only final decisions resolving the grievance, were subject to the CBA's majority-vote requirement. Id. at *9. Thus, because the CBA arguably did not prohibit Brown from issuing a unilateral decision resolving a procedural issue growing out of the grievance proceedings, the Court refrained from concluding that Brown ignored or misread the plain language of the CBA by issuing a unilateral ruling on the Board composition issue. The Court's previous decision declining to enforce the award was based entirely on the finding that Brown's unilateral decision on the Board composition issue violated the RLA and CBA. Subsequently, the Court opined that because the decision did not, in fact, violate the RLA and drew its essence from the CBA, the unilateral nature of the ruling was not an appropriate basis on which to decline to enforce the Board's ultimate award in favor of Defendant. Id. at *11. Additionally, the Court remarked that its earlier ruling about Linn's post-retirement eligibility to serve on the Board was in no way meant to preclude an arbitral finding that Linn remained eligible despite her retirement or otherwise limit the options available to the parties going forward with regard to any avenues available under the CBA for completing the arbitration. Id. at *14. Finally, Plaintiff argued that the award was wholly baseless and reflected the arbitrator's own notions of industrial justice. The Board had held that the airline's policy of treating married flight attendants and their spouses more favorably than partnered flight attendants and their partners by affording the former group more healthcare options than the latter violated the CBA's prohibition on marital status discrimination. Id. at *17. Because the Board had construed and applied the CBA, the Court enforced the arbitration award.

(xiv) Attorneys' Fee Awards In Class Actions

Andrews, et al. v. City Of New York,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101115 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of female Safety Agents ("SSAs") employed by the City of New York, brought a class action alleging that Defendant paid them less than Special Officers ("SOs"), a predominantly male group of employees who performed similar work, in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs agreed to settle all claims against Defendant in exchange for back pay awards ranging from $250 to $7,000 per Plaintiff, totaling around $32 million, depending upon factors such as their dates and lengths of employment. Id. The parties also agreed that the rates of pay for SSAs and SOs will be equalized, and that each named Plaintiff would receive service awards of $18,000. Id. On March 26, 2015, the Court approved the settlement, finding the agreement fair and reasonable. Plaintiffs' counsel then moved for an award of attorneys' fees as well as reimbursement of their costs. Class counsel requested the Court to order Defendant to pay statutory fees in the amount of $3,830,466 and statutory costs in the amount of $872,082 pursuant to the fee-shifting provision of the FLSA, and a percentage of the common settlement fund. Id. at *4-5. The Court held that the class counsel was entitled to a reduced award of statutory fees and costs, but not to a percentage of Plaintiffs' recovery. Id. at *5. Because there was nothing in the action to preclude the operation of the fee-shifting statute and class counsel had no contractual right to a percentage of Plaintiffs' recovery, the Court determined that the use of common fund doctrine was not appropriate. Id. at *13. The Court explained that awarding the class counsel a percentage of Plaintiffs' recovery in addition to reasonable statutory fees would provide an unwarranted windfall to class counsel to be taken from money that would otherwise go to members of the collective action. Id. The Court then reviewed class counsel's billing records and determined that an amount of $1,831,032 would constitute reasonable attorneys' fees in this action. Id. at *14. The Court inflated the hourly rates of each attorney and made an overall reduction of 20% for the billing deficiencies to reach a lodestar figure of $1,831,032 toward total fees. Id. at *33. The Court also reviewed the costs records and found that clerical overtime and computer research costs charged were unrecoverable. Id. at *34. Accordingly, the Court awarded Plaintiffs' counsel $1,831,032 in attorneys' fees and $80,664 in costs, for a total award of $1,911,696.

Evangeline Red, et al. v. Kraft Foods, Inc.,* Case No. 10-CV-1028 (C.D. Cal. April 29, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant mislabeled their food products and thus violated California's Unfair Competition Law, False Advertising Law, and the Consumer Legal Remedies Act. On three separate occasions, the Court rejected Plaintiffs' attempts to certify a class, but allowed them to amend their motion to seek class certification of their injunctive relief claims under Rule 23(b)(2). In response, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' claims were effectively moot because it was no longer using the challenged health and wellness labels. Rejecting Defendant's argument, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' claims would be moot only if Defendant agreed to stipulate to an order preventing it from reintroducing the challenged labels. Defendant voluntarily agreed and in October 2012, the Court entered an order prohibiting Defendant from using certain labels on the packaging for a number of challenged products. Id. at 2. Plaintiffs then filed a motion seeking attorneys' fees of $3.3 million for enjoining Defendant from using certain packaging labels and causing a change in Defendant's business practices. Id. Plaintiffs arrived at the $3.3 million figure by increasing their $1.43 million lodestar calculation by a 2.3 multiplier for "exceptional results." Id. Finding that Plaintiffs' fee request was grossly inflated, the Court awarded Plaintiffs $101,702.38 in fees and costs based on Plaintiffs' limited success in prohibiting Defendant from re-introducing food labels it had largely stopped using before the filing of this action. Id. Plaintiffs then settled their individual claims with Defendant and preserved their right to appeal the class certification rulings, and then filed a second fee award motion seeking $1.9 million based on a lodestar calculation of $1,587,025.50. Id. at 3. Plaintiffs contended that they were the "prevailing" and "successful" parties for purposes of a fee award, as they achieved a permanent injunction against Defendant, caused changes in Defendant's business practices, and received an amount of money to settle their individual claims. Id. at 5. The Court granted Plaintiffs' renewed motion, but awarded them only $11,368.25 in attorneys' fees. While the Court agreed that Plaintiffs were prevailing or successful parties to the extent they succeeded in securing an injunction against Defendant, it noted that they were not prevailing or successful parties in achieving changes in Defendant's business practices, food formulas, or anything else not covered by the permanent injunction or the settlement of individual claims. Id. at 6. The Court raised doubts as to how the action could be considered a practical success as it had dismissed many of Plaintiffs' claims, denied class certification multiple times, found no liability, and Plaintiffs' cash settlement could be considered only an achievement of one of Plaintiffs' primary objectives as individual litigants. Id. The Court further found that Plaintiffs increased their total lodestar from the initial $1.43 million to $1.59 million despite no significant development of case after the first fee motion, obtaining limited results, and receiving nothing they set out to obtain through this action. Id. at 7. Although the Court found Plaintiffs' "excessive" fee demand sufficient to warrant outright denial, it granted attorneys' fees in an amount of $11,368.25 for work done to settle Plaintiffs' individual claims. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' renewed motion for attorneys' fees awarding them only $11,368.25.

Gutierrez, et al. v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 67298 (N.D. Cal. May 21, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action against Defendant for engaging in unfair business practices by imposing overdraft fees and for engaging in fraudulent practices by misleading clients. Following a bench trial, the Court found Defendant's conduct fraudulent under the California Unfair Competition Law and awarded full restitution of $203 million and injunctive relief. Class counsel thereafter filed a fee petition seeking $50.7 million in fees. Id. at *5-7. The Court granted the fee petition in part. The two law firms – McCune Wright and Lieff Cabraser – represented that they informally had agreed to a sliding scale ranging from 50/50 to 70/30, giving Lieff Cabraser a greater share of the fee award. The Court refused to enforce the private agreement and awarded Lieff Cabraser $16,262,985.75 and McCune Wright $2,263,471.50 in fees. The Court employed the lodestar method with a percentage cross-check. The Court reasoned that justice would be better served by tying the fee award to the actual hours that class counsel reasonably expended on the action because the large size of the recovery was due to the large size of the class rather than class counsel's specialized skill and efforts. Id. at *13-14. The Court therefore rejected McCune Wright's claimed lodestar of $1.9 million. Id. at *16-17. The Court reviewed McCune Wright's timesheets and found that many of its claimed fees were massively overstated, inadequately detailed, unrelated to productive effort, and/or not compensable. Id. at *17. The Court also found that McCune Wright had exaggerated its contributions, especially in tasks such as discovery, closing argument, and appeal, and had padded its timesheets with projects reflecting overstaffing, duplication, inefficiency, lack of billing judgment, and an abundance of inter-office teleconferences. Id. The Court, therefore, held that McCune Wright's lodestar under historical rates was $1,131,735.75. Id. at *18. At the same time, the Court fully credited Lieff Cabraser's calculated lodestar under historical rates of $2,956,906.50. The Court recognized the full $203 million in restitution that it obtained for the class at trial, the incidental benefits from the injunction it obtained for the class, and its superior efforts on appeal. Id. The Court then considered other factors, including the novelty and difficulty of the questions involved, the results obtained, and the customary fees in such cases, and determined that McCune Wright deserved a multiplier of 2 because it took on a seven-year risk of non-payment and delay in fees by commencing the action, and Lieff Cabraser deserved a multiplier of 5.5 because it confronted several obstacles and secured a full recovery of $203 million in restitution plus injunctive relief. Id. at *23-24. The Court, therefore, concluded that class counsel was entitled to an award of $18,526,457.25 in attorneys' fees. Id. at *25. Accordingly, the Court granted in part class counsel's fee petition.

In Re Bank Of New York Mellon Corp. Forex Transaction Litigation,* No. 12-CV-3066 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of bank customers and investor clients, sued Defendants in multiple class actions for breach of their fiduciary duties, unjust enrichment, and corporate waste. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants told customers it provided the "best execution" on their foreign exchange transactions, but instead charged the most expensive price of the trading day to buy currencies, and then paid the least expensive price when Defendants sold them, and kept the difference. After substantial litigation, the parties agreed to a settlement of $335 million, which the Court approved. Subsequently, the Court awarded a total of $83.75 million in attorneys' fees to a consortium of law firms who prosecuted the class actions.

Editor's Note: The fee award $83.75 million in this ruling is the largest fee award in 2015.

In Re Dairy Farmers Of America, Inc., Cheese Antitrust Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20408 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of purchasers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants combined, conspired, and agreed to fix or manipulate the prices of milk futures and other contracts in violation of the Commodity Exchange Act ("CEA"), the Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO"), the Sherman Act, and the Cartwright Act. The parties subsequently settled, and Defendants agreed to pay $46 million as consideration. After final approval of the settlement, the class counsel moved for an award of attorneys' fees and reimbursement of expenses. The Court granted class counsel's fee petition and awarded one-third of the settlement fund plus costs and expenses. While the Court acknowledged that there was no shortage of cases supporting the reasonableness of class counsel's fee request, it also pointed out the specific complexities inherent in this six-year MDL antitrust matter, and the sizable legal and expert fees amassed in litigating these claims. Id. at *18-19. Particularly, the Court cited the long and arduous litigation, compounded by the intricacies of the particular commodities markets, the parsing of actions on a day-by-day basis over a long time period, and the inclusion of both traders and purchasers in the settlement class to conclude that there was no justification for any reduction of the requested fee. Id. at *19. Although class counsel benefitted from a large volume of documents and multiple deposition transcripts collected via a price-manipulation investigation by the U.S. Commodity Futures Trading Commission, the Court noted that class counsel had nonetheless engaged in enough proprietary legal services that distinguished their efforts in the current litigation. Id. at *21-22. Further, the absence of objections, except from Schreiber Foods, Inc., convinced the Court that the requested award was reasonable. Id. at *24. Schreiber argued that class counsel's fees should be measured by the lodestar method. Id. at *27. Because the Court adopted the percentage-of-the-fund approach, Schreiber's lodestar-based objections did not significantly impact the Court's analysis. Id. at *29. To the extent Schreiber's objections called into question the reasonableness of fee request, the Court found no unique argument that required further discussion. Id. at *36. Accordingly, the Court granted the class counsel's fee petition awarding $15,333,333.33 in fees, plus $488,491.24 in costs and expenses.

In Re Hyundai And Kia Fuel Economy Litigation,* Case No. 13-ML-2424 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 19, 2015). In this multi-district litigation involving 12 putative consumer class actions alleging that Defendants misrepresented the fuel efficiency of Hyundai and Kia cars, the Court partly granted Plaintiffs' six separate motions for an award of attorneys' fees. Because this was not strictly a common fund settlement, and Defendants agreed to pay attorneys' fees separately from the amount allocated to the class, the Court applied the lodestar method. Id. at 1. First, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees and costs in the Wilson case in the amount $78,964, finding it presumptively reasonable. The Court noted the requested fees billed at $300 per hour and $250 hour were lower than the comparable legal services rates and comparable lodestar rates that other counsel in this action requested. The Court also found that the detailed billing sheets that showed the number of hours and type of work by counsel supported the reasonableness of the requested fees. Id. Second, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees in the amount of $2,700,000 in the Hunter and Brady cases based on a total lodestar of $1,909,995, representing 5,512 hours of work. The Court found the lodestar amount reasonable given the complexity and volume of work. Furthermore, the estimated multiplier of 1.22 fell within the acceptable range for class counsel in this complex and multi-year action. Id. Third, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees in the amount of 1,257,000 in the Liaison case, with the exception of Bonsignore, PLLC's motion for attorneys' fees in amounts ranging from $5,000 to $346,000. Id. at 6. The Court found that the requested fees, with the exception of the request of Bonsignore, PLLC, were presumptively reasonable, as they were discounted from the lodestar amounts in percentages that accounted for the fact that the non-settling Plaintiffs had a more minor role in this action and did not participate in negotiating the primary settlement.

Id. The Court additionally noted that counsel in the Liaison case efficiently managed the requests from well over 20 different law firms and effectively represented the interests of non-settling Plaintiffs, including actively participating in revisions to the proposed settlement in a manner that addressed many weaknesses in the original proposed settlement. Id. Because Bonsignore, PLLC did not make a compelling argument for how the firm's efforts benefitted the class as a whole, the Court denied its request of fees of $357,485. Fourth, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees in the amount of $2,789,522.50 in the Birth, Krauth, and Hasper cases. The Court found the listed rate of $925 per hour for one of three attorneys was especially exorbitant in the context of the actual work performed. Id. Furthermore, counsel did not submit detailed billing records with its request or any numerical comparison of the rates, and thus the Court could not justify the type and complexity of legal work. Id. at 2-3. The Court therefore requested counsel in the Bird, Krauth, and Hasper actions to submit additional documentation and new briefing on a more reasonable request for attorneys' fees. Id. at 4. Fifth, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees and costs of $6 million in the Espinosa case. Although the requested fees were within the amount acceptable under a common fund method of calculating fees, the Court noted that it represented a multiplier under the lodestar method that was far higher than the 1.22 multiplier requested by other counsel. Although Espinosa was an earlier action compared to the Hunter and Brady actions, the Court pointed out that the legal theories in the Hunter and Brady cases were the primary ones that gave rise to the class settlement. Id. The Court therefore requested counsel in Espinosa to further explain why it should be awarded a 3.0 multiplier when counsel in Hunter/Brady only sought a 1.22 multiplier. Id. at 5. Finally, the Court denied Plaintiffs' request for attorneys' fees of $800,172.79, including the costs in the Virginia case, finding that counsel's work was largely duplicitous or without merit, and it did not meaningfully contribute to the class settlement. Id. at 7.

In Re IndyMac Mortgage-Backed Securities Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 37052 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 24, 2015). In this class action, the lead plaintiffs, the Wyoming State Treasurer and the Wyoming Retirement System, alleged that Defendants, JPMorgan Chase and other financial institutions, mislead investors about the inherent risk of IndyMac Bank's mortgage-backed securities. After the parties settled the litigation for $346 million, Plaintiffs moved for attorneys' fees and reimbursement of expenses. Eight law firms that served as Plaintiffs' counsel requested an aggregate fee award of $44.89 million or about 13% of the $346 million settlement fund. Id. at *3. The aggregate lodestar of $24.57 million reflected 55,372 hours worked multiplied by hourly rates between $210 and $420 per hour for associates and $410 to $835 per hour for partners. Id. The total requested fee thus reflected a blended multiplier of 1.83, with proposed multipliers varying by firm. Id. Finding the requested fee of $44.89 million unreasonably high, the Court instead approved an aggregate fee award of approximately $28.48 million, a figure it arrived at by cutting the portion of the aggregate lodestar attributable to discovery costs by 25% and by adopting reduced multipliers. Id. at *8. Although Plaintiffs' counsel argued that the proposed 13% of the $346 million settlement fund would be modest and on the low end of percentage fee awards by other judges in similar securities fraud litigation, the Court held that, in light of its own experience as well as its knowledge of the case, a fee of 8% to 10% of the settlement fund would be more appropriate. Id. at *8-11. The Court noted that, taking into account the 55,372 lawyer and professional staff hours reflected in counsel's billing records, the proposed fee of $44.89 million would result in a blended hourly rate for all attorneys and other time-keeping staff of $810.71 per hour, which was excessive. Id. at *13. According to the Court, its adopted range would remunerate Plaintiffs' counsel beyond their lodestar of $24.57 million and would reflect a more reasonable proportion of the total recovery. Id. The Court further found that the lodestar cross-check also confirmed that the proposed fee was too high. Although the hourly rates appeared reasonable, the Court raised concern on the hours expended on discovery. Plaintiffs' counsel had reported that they devoted 32,658 hours to discovery, a figure amounting to nearly 60% of all hours spent on the action. Id. at *20. The Court conducted a detailed inquiry into the hours expended on discovery, and exercised its discretion to cut "surplusage" on a percentage basis by reducing the portion of each firm's lodestar attributable to discovery by 25%. Id. at *21. This resulted in a revised aggregate lodestar of $21.42 million. Id. at *22. The Court then reduced the portion of any multiplier greater than 1 by 60% across the board, which yielded a new blended multiplier of 1.33 (instead of the proposed blended multiplier of 1.83) and a total fee award of 28.48 million. Id. Thus, the revised award reflected 116% of counsel's original lodestar, 133% of counsel's adjusted lodestar, 8.2% of the total recovery, and a blended hourly rate of $514.29. Id. The Court opined that the revised fee award more reasonably balanced the interests of the class with the goal of adequately compensating Plaintiffs' counsel for their work on this litigation. The Court further considered all the factors, including counsel's time and labor, the litigation's magnitude and complexity, the risk of the litigation, the quality of representation, the requested fee in relation to the settlement, and public policy consideration, and concluded that these factors also supported an award between 8% and 10% of the settlement fund. Id. at *16-19. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees and reimbursement of expenses in the aggregate amount of $31,469,489.61.

In Re Platinum And Palladium Commodities Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 98691 (S.D.N.Y. July 7, 2015). In this class action, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants engaged in a manipulative scheme to create artificially high prices of platinum and palladium futures contracts traded on the New York Mercantile Exchange ("NYMEX"). Plaintiffs' action consisted of two classes, including: (i) a physical class comprised of all persons and/or entities who purchased, invested in, or otherwise acquired an interest in platinum and/or palladium bullion in the physical market, and (ii) a futures class comprised of all persons that purchased or sold a NYMEX platinum futures contract or a NYMEX palladium futures contract. Subsequently the futures and physical classes settled the action with the Moore Defendants and with the MF Global Defendants, and the Court granted final approval to the settlements. Id. at *6. The final settlement fund for the futures class was $72.5 million, and $12.1 million for the physical class. Counsel for both classes moved for award of attorneys' fees and costs, and the Court granted the physical class counsels' motion, and granted in part the futures class counsels' motion. The Court noted that both sets of class counsel faced significant risks in this complex litigation, as claims for manipulations in violation of the Commodity Exchange Act were notoriously difficult to prove and more difficult and risky than securities fraud cases. Id. at *8. Further, the futures class counsel spent about 13,300 hours on the litigation, and the physical class counsel spent 5,260 hours of professional time, and it was undisputed that the negotiations leading to the settlements were the exceptionally challenging even for highly experienced counsel. Id at *9-10. The Court remarked that the fact that class counsel had obtained a recovery for both classes higher than the average class recovery demonstrated the quality of class counsel. The Court noted that the billing rates of the physical class counsel, that ranged from $300 to $750 per hour, were reasonable and comported with the rates approved in Manhattan and that the lodestar multiplier of 1.4 fell within the range approved in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York. Id. at *11-12. The futures class counsel's billing rates ranged from $250 to $950 per hour, generating a lodestar of $8,249,144 that yielded a multiplier of 2.6. Id. at *13. The futures class counsel's allocation of time was heavily weighted toward partners. The Court observed that at most firms, partners with the highest billing rates play a supervisory role, while attorneys who bill at lower rates perform more basic role, and here, the lodestar value reflected an over allocation of work to more experienced partners. Id. at *14. The Court also remarked that the futures class counsels' multiplier of 2.6 was higher than that awarded in other commodities and securities cases. Id. Thus, the Court opined that the percentage of the common fund awarded to the futures class counsel should be reduced, considering the large percentage of hours attributable to attorneys with the highest billing rates and the relatively early stage of the litigation in which the settlement was reached. The Court ruled that a 22.5% award of the common fund to futures class counsel was appropriate, which represented a multiplier of about 1.9. Accordingly, the Court awarded $16,312,500 in attorneys' fees to futures class counsel and $4,029,300 to the physical class counsel. Finally, the Court awarded $704,294 and $229,230.82 toward expenses to the futures and physical class counsel respectively.

In Re Polyurethane Foam Antitrust Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23482 (N.D. Ohio Feb. 26, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of direct purchasers of flexible polyurethane foam, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants conspired to fix, raise, stabilize, or maintain the prices and allocate territories or customers of the foam, in violation of antitrust laws. The parties reached a settlement under which two Defendants agreed to pay a total of $147.8 million to Plaintiffs. Following preliminary settlement approval and dissemination of class notice, Plaintiffs' counsel moved for an award of attorneys' fees of $44.34 million or 30% of the total settlement amount. Id. at *9. The Court granted the fee request. The Court acknowledged that the case was complex and that the value of class counsel's work to the class was apparent from the outcome of the settlement. The Court noted that the settlement terms were the product of hard-fought, arms' length negotiation between experienced class action antitrust lawyers. Id. at *14. Even deducting fees from the settlement fund, Plaintiffs recovered more than $100 million from the settling Defendants. Id. at *22. Further, class counsel emphasized that they pursued this case on their own, and that the work in the case had caused them to turn away billable hours from other clients, who would have paid their full hourly rates on a rolling basis. Id. Defense counsel also agreed that the settlement result was impressive, given the substantial risk Plaintiffs faced in further litigation. Id. at *18. Although class counsel had received a 30% share toward attorneys' fees from an earlier settlement fund of another settling Defendant, the Court noted that the class counsel would still be substantially "under water" relative to their estimated lodestar. Id. at *22. The Court, however, cautioned that a 30% fee award for a second time was not "an indicator of future fee awards" and that it "may adjust fee awards downward to achieve a reasonable benchmark and prevent windfall." Id. at *24. Accordingly, the Court granted class counsel's fee request of $44.34 million.

In Re Volkswagen & Audi Warranty Extension Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16646 (D. Mass. Feb. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought several class actions alleging that Defendants defectively designed engines in certain Audi and Volkswagen automobiles that were unusually prone to the formation of oil sludge and coking deposits, even when maintained according to Defendants' recommendation. The cases were consolidated and later settled. Defendants did not admit of any liability or wrong-doing, but agreed to pay for engine repair and replacement costs, and among other things, created an "oil sludge settlement administrator" to oversee the claims process for class members. Id. at *15-16. Plaintiffs moved for an award of attorneys' fees and expenses pursuant to the settlement agreement, and the Court awarded $30 million in fees to lead counsel. On appeal, however, the award was reversed on the grounds that it was error to use the percentage of fund method for calculating fees, and that Massachusetts law must govern the appropriate attorneys' fee. Id. at *20. On remand, the Court awarded attorneys' fees based on Massachusetts law. At the outset, the Court noted that the previous presiding judge had awarded $7.7 million in fees and $1.1 million in costs in this case. Id. at *26. The Court remarked that it was required to determine whether, and by how much, class counsel's pre-award base lodestar figure ought to be enhanced. Class counsel requested a multiplier of 2.5 to 3.5, translating to a fee award of $19 to $27 million. Defendants countered that the base lodestar ought to be reduced, in effect applying a negative multiplier, to yield an amount that was proportionate to the value of the benefits that had actually been collected by class members. Id. at *27. The Court observed that the first factor for determining the reasonableness of attorneys' fees – the nature of the litigation favored class counsel – as Defendants had vigorously advocated their interests in this complicated lawsuit. Id. at *28. As to the value of benefits collected by class member, the Court observed that the settlement agreement provided four types of benefits, including (i) reimbursement of unpaid claims that were covered under warranty; (ii) a free 10 year warranty extension; (iii) revised literature on oil maintenance recommendations; and (iv) one-time oil change discount of $25. Id. at *30. Defendants valued the benefits at $12.7 million, whereas Plaintiffs' experts valued the benefits at $73.9 million. Id. at *32. Plaintiffs' expert pegged the cost of educating the class members alone at $56.2 million. Id. at *32-33. Plaintiffs also asserted that the oil sludge settlement administrator received $3 million in fees. Id. at *33. The Court made an independent evaluation and valued all four forms of relief at $101 million. The Court found that a multiplier of 2 was appropriate enhancement to the class counsel's pre-award base lodestar of $7.7 million. Id. at *41. The Court ordered Defendants to pay class counsel $15.4 million in fees and $1.19 million in costs and expenses. As to post award fees and expenses, the Court evaluated the class counsel's uncompensable pre-award time, and the time spent on internal disputes and agreements, travel time, appellate fees and costs, and found them to be excessive and ordered them to be deducted from the award. Id. at *58-60.

In Re Weatherford International Securities Litigation,* Case No. 11-CV-1646 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 5, 2015). In this securities class action, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant Weatherford International Limited and certain officers, as well as its auditor, Ernst & Young LLP, issued materially false statements regarding Weatherford's tax accounting and ignored facts necessary to make the statements not misleading, in violation of § 10(b) and 20(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. Plaintiffs alleged that Weatherford had understated its tax expenses from 2007 through 2010 by over $500 million. After the parties settled the litigation, Plaintiffs moved for final approval of a $52.5 million class action settlement and plan of allocation, and for an award of attorneys' fees and reimbursement of litigation expenses. The Court approved the settlement, but reduced the attorneys' fee award. Plaintiffs sought awards of attorneys' fees and expenses in the aggregate amounts of $14,001,660.28 in favor of lead counsel, the Kessler Topaz firm, which was 24% of the total settlement amount, and $193,685.75 in favor of the Law Offices of Curtis V. Trinko. Id. at 1. First, the Court found misgivings about the lodestar and, both independent and in consideration of the lodestar, the size of the requested fee. Id. While the Court assumed that over 30,000 hours of time had been recorded, it had serious doubts whether this case, handled efficiently and especially for a paying client, would justify an expenditure of hours that great. Id. Second, the Court observed that Kessler Topaz unreasonably billed out its staff attorneys at rates ranging from $375 to $395 per hour, which were more than 600% of their direct cost to the firm. Id. at 2. The Court remarked that award of attorneys' fees based on the percentage-of-recovery model has the drawbacks of encouraging premature settlements, as well as settlements that serve the lawyers' interest and not the class members. The Court expressed its concern that the lodestar check does little to control excessive fee awards when there is no Defendant or objector participation. Thus, the Court adjusted the numbers based on the considerations such as the amount of time that should have been devoted to this case, the rates charged for the staff attorneys, and the average fee award in class action settlement of this size. Id. at 2-3. Accordingly, the Court reduced the compensable hours and the staff attorney hourly rates to the extent necessary to yield a lodestar for the Kessler Topaz firm of $9,450,000, and awarded it a fee in that amount plus expenses of $1,381,724.59. Id. at 3. The Court, however, granted the Trinko firm's application in its entirety. Id. The Court concluded that the overall fee award was between 18% and 19% of the settlement.

Keller, et al. v. National Collegiate Athletic Association,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 166546 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of student-athletes who played on men's football or basketball teams at Division I member schools and conferences, brought three related class actions alleging that Defendant, National Collegiate Athletic Association ("NCAA"), violated the Sherman Act by conspiring with licensing companies, Electronic Arts, Inc. ("EA") and Collegiate Licensing Co. ("CLC"), to restrain competition for the commercial use of their names, images, and likenesses in television broadcasts and Defendant's brand video games. Id. at *19. The Court earlier granted final approval of a class action settlement and allocated 29% of the NCAA settlement fund, or $5.8 million, and 30% of the EA settlement fund, or $13.2 million, for attorneys' fees. Id. at *29. While Plaintiffs in this action (the "Keller Plaintiffs") sought $8.58 million in fees from EA and $5.8 million in fees from the NCAA, counsel for the O'Bannon Plaintiffs in Case No. 09-3329 sought $8 million in fees from EA, and the current counsel for Plaintiff in Hart v. EA, Case No. 09-59990 (D.N.J. 2011) and their former counsel sought $883,177 and $4.62 million, respectively, in fees from EA. Id. at *30-31. The Court granted the Keller Plaintiffs' motion for fees of $5.8 million, finding that an allocation of the requested 29% of the common fund for attorneys' fees in the NCAA settlement was fair and reasonable, and they were the only law firm seeking fees under the NCAA settlement. Id. at *31. Further, the Court determined how to allocate fees between the O'Bannon Plaintiffs' counsel and counsel for the Keller Plaintiffs alleging right of publicity claims. Considering several factors in weighing the contribution of each set of Plaintiffs' counsel to the settlement, the Court concluded that $4 million in fees should be set aside for the O'Bannon Plaintiffs' counsel and that $2 million should be placed in escrow. Id. at *44. The Court opined that if the NCAA paid the fee award related to the O'Bannon trial, $2 million would be paid to the Keller Plaintiffs' counsel; otherwise, it would be paid to the O'Bannon Plaintiffs' counsel. Id. In reaching this conclusion, the Court considered: (i) the work that the O'Bannon Plaintiffs' counsel contributed to advance the O'Bannon case, while the Keller and Hart cases were stayed; (ii) the undisputed fact that the O'Bannon Plaintiffs' counsel spent many more hours prosecuting O'Bannon through the date of settlement than the Keller Plaintiffs' counsel spent in the other cases; and (iii) the Keller Plaintiffs' exposure to additional risk due to the mandatory fee-shifting under California's right of publicity and anti-SLAPP statutes. Id. at *37-42. Of the remaining $6 million in fees from the EA fund, the Court held that $5.721 million would be awarded to the Keller Plaintiffs' counsel because the right of publicity claims raised in this action exposed EA to the greatest liability and the substance and timing of the appeal in the case as it affected the settlement weighed in favor of finding that the Keller Plaintiffs' claims produced the greatest benefit to the settling class. Id. at *45-46. The Court reduced the lodestar claimed by the Hart plaintiffs' counsel by 60%, finding that the records were replete with excessive and vague entries, including the use of block billing. Id. at *48-49. The Court further found that the Hart Plaintiffs' former counsel's time records were also replete with entries that were not reasonably related to the litigation or settlement of the case. Consequently, the Court granted the Hart Plaintiffs' current counsel $260,000, and adjusted the Hart former counsel's lodestar by 70%, granting $696,700 in fees. Id. at *53-73. Finally, the Court granted the Keller Plaintiffs' counsel $224,434.20 in costs from the NCAA fund and $224,434.20 in costs from the EA fund; the O'Bannon Plaintiffs' counsel over $1.8 million in costs from the EA fund; the Hart Plaintiffs' current counsel over $12,000 in costs from the EA fund; and former counsel for the Hart Plaintiffs nearly $23,000 in costs from the EA fund. Id. at *77.

Levitt, et al. v. Southwest Airlines Co.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 14601 (7th Cir. Aug. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of customers who bought "Business Select" tickets on Southwest Airlines, brought a class action alleging that Defendant breached a contract in August 2010 when it stopped honoring certain in-flight drink vouchers without a printed expiration date and announced that each voucher was good only on the flight covered by the accompanying ticket. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs brought the action on behalf of a putative class of customers holding unredeemed Business Select drink vouchers that became worthless. The parties subsequently agreed to settle the claim. As part of the settlement, Defendant agreed to issue replacement coupons to each class member valid for one year on any Southwest flight, to pay incentive awards to the two lead Plaintiffs of $15,000 each, and to pay attorneys' fees up to $3 million plus expenses up to $30,000. Id. at *5. The District Court approved the class settlement as fair and reasonable, focusing primarily on the fact that the settlement provided essentially complete relief to the class. Id. at *6. The District Court used the lodestar method, with a multiplier of 1.5 for good results, to calculate attorneys' fees of $1,332,206.25 plus $18,522.32 in expenses. Id. at *7. Following an evidentiary hearing, the District Court used higher hourly rates and increased the fee award to $1,649,118. Id. Class counsel appealed, arguing that they deserved the full $3 million in attorneys' fees. A group of objectors argued that class counsel was entitled to only a portion of the coupons actually redeemed. The Seventh Circuit rejected both arguments. First, the Seventh Circuit found that the settlement was subject to § 1712 of the Class Action Fairness Act ("CAFA"), which applies to class action settlements that provide for "a recovery of coupons." Id. at *9. The Seventh Circuit determined that § 1712 allowed the District Court to use the lodestar method to calculate the fee award for class counsel. The Seventh Circuit noted that a broader view of the text and structure of § 1712, along with its legislative history, showed that a District Court has discretion to use the lodestar method to calculate attorneys' fees even if it intended to compensate class counsel for the coupon relief obtained for the class. Id. at *10-11. The Seventh Circuit explained that § 1712 restricts attorneys' fees to a percentage of coupons redeemed when the settlement proposes attorneys' fees as a percentage of the recovery and that it allows for lodestar fees as an alternative. Id. at *16-20. The Seventh Circuit reviewed the District Court's order granting approval of the settlement for abuse of discretion and found that the District Court rightfully found the settlement to be fair and reasonable. According to the Seventh Circuit, the fact that the class members would receive essentially everything they could have hoped for made the settlement distinctive, and class counsel should be compensated accordingly for an exceptional settlement that actually made the class whole. Id. at *24. The Seventh Circuit, however, rejected class counsel's argument that the District Court abused its discretion by awarding the lower amount of $1.65 million rather than deferring to the amount agreed in the negotiations. The Seventh Circuit found that the District Court accommodated the most reasonable points raised by class counsel, and judicial deference to the results of private negotiations was not appropriate for class action settlements. Id. at *26-27. The Seventh Circuit also modified the settlement to remove one of the class representative's $15,000 incentive awards and to reduce the class counsel's share of the attorneys' fees by the same amount on the basis that the pair failed to disclose their relationship as co-counsel on another case. Id. at *33-35. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's order approving the settlement.

MacDonald, et al. v. Ford Motor Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 151277 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers who purchased or leased 2005-2008 Ford Escape Hybrid vehicles and/or 2006-2008 Mercury Mariner Hybrid vehicles, brought a putative class action alleging that the vehicles equipped with the Motor Electronic Cooling System contained defective coolant pumps, and that Defendant knowingly failed to inform the consumers about the defect. Id. at *2. On June 23, 2013, Plaintiffs served Defendant with a pre-litigation demand letter pursuant to the California Legal Remedies Act, and after filing of the complaint, served a formal demand latter requesting that Defendant remedy the alleged defect. Id. While the parties exchanged initial disclosures and interrogatories, Defendant informed the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration ("NHTSA") of its intent to perform a voluntary safety recall of the vehicles. Id. at *6. Defendant also offered to replace all of the defective Motor Electronic Cooling Pumps free of charge and reimburse any out-of-pocket repairs for the same prior to the date of the safety recall notification. Id. Defendant's voluntary recall took place over fourteen months after Plaintiffs filed this action requesting the relief offered by the recall. Id. Because most of Plaintiffs' claims became moot due to Defendant's recall, Plaintiffs filed a motion seeking attorneys' fees under a catalyst theory. Plaintiffs argued that the chronology of events supported an inference that this action was a substantial factor in Defendant's decision to recall the vehicles. Id. at *9. Defendant responded that an internal Ford team monitoring the defect independently decided to recall the affected vehicles without considering this action. Defendant argued that Kenneth Lilly, the employee tasked with handling inquiries about vehicles problems, had been overwhelmed with work, and thus did not get around to the question of whether the class vehicles had defective cooling pumps until 2014. Id. Defendant also argued that the Plaintiffs' action did not provide any information about the defect that it did not already know based on its own investigation in 2009, and that an e-mail from Transport Canada about a stalled car prompted Lilly to re-analyze some data and uncover a larger problem, ultimately resulting in Defendant recalling the cars. The Court rejected Ford's position. It did not find enough convincing contemporaneous evidence to rebut the inference from the chronology of events to show that Plaintiffs' action did not serve as the catalyst for Defendant's recall decision. Id. at *21. The Court was not convinced with Defendant's argument that an e-mail inquiry about one car stalling in a parking lot triggered the recall actions despite several complaints to NHTSA and Plaintiffs' class action complaint. Id. at *13. Defendant offered nothing to explain why it took the Transport Canada inquiry more seriously than the several complaints to the NHTSA that described similar events and why, even if the industry view was "changing," Defendant waited until the Transport Canada incident to delve more deeply into the matter. Id. at *14. The Court thus found significant holes in Defendant's evidence as it pertained to the decision-making process behind the recall or to the complaint in this action. Id. at *15. Because the action had merit, Plaintiffs' claims were not frivolous, unreasonable, or groundless, and the action resulted in enforcement of an important right affecting the public interest, the Court determined that an award of attorneys' fees would be appropriate. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for entitlement to attorneys' fees.

McGee, et al. v. Cole,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92315 (S.D. W. Va. July 16, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a declaratory action alleging that West Virginia Code §§ 48-2-104, 48-2-401, and 48-2-603, and all other sources of West Virginia law prohibiting same-sex marriage were unconstitutional. After the Fourth Circuit, in Bostic v. Schaefer, 760 F.3d 352 (4th Cir. 2014), held that Virginia's ban was unconstitutional, the District Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment and declared § 48-2-104 and 48-2-401 unconstitutional insofar as they prohibited same-sex marriage. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs then moved for an award of attorneys' fees, which the District Court granted in part. Although Plaintiffs filed this action when same-sex marriage was a changing area of law, and Plaintiffs' counsel sought out Plaintiffs in West Virginia to file this action, the District Court noted that this action was a proper suit under § 1983 to vindicate Plaintiffs' civil rights and overturn unconstitutional legislation. Id. at *14. Because the fees requested were not so extreme to warrant the denial of attorneys' fees, the District Court opined that Plaintiffs were entitled to an award of fees and costs. Although each attorney provided some support for the hourly rates each sought, the District Court remarked that those rates were well above the relevant local market rates. Id. at *15. The Court recognized that while the law firms that initiated this civil rights litigation and brought to it a level of expertise and stature that may not have been available from in-state firms, it remarked that they sought out West Virginia Plaintiffs and a West Virginia forum. Id. Further, the Court reasoned that they should not expect hourly rates to be based upon rates from large metropolitan markets, such as their home cities. Id. at *15-16. The Court thus adjusted the hourly rate according to the local market rates, keeping in mind their length of experience and specific expertise, and the nature of their responsibilities in this action. Id. at *17. To justify their higher hourly rates, Plaintiffs' attorneys pointed out their experience with similar cases. The Court, however, noted that several of these lawyers worked on the same issues in parallel cases, and remarked that their prior knowledge should have helped them avoid inefficient or unnecessary work. Id. at *20. The Court thereby reduced the lodestar amounts for each attorney by two-thirds. Id. at *21. Additionally, the Court subtracted 31 hours from Plaintiffs' total fee petition to account for Plaintiffs' unsuccessful non-recognition claim. Plaintiffs' counsel had sought $342,576 in attorneys' fees. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court awarded Plaintiffs $92,125 in attorneys' fees.

Montgomery, et al. v. Kraft Foods Global, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24533 (W.D. Mich. Mar. 2, 2015). Plaintiff brought a consumer fraud class action alleging that Defendant violated the Michigan Consumer Protection Act ("MCPA") and breached warranties and contracts by deceiving customers about its products' compatibility. Plaintiff purchased a Kraft-Tassimo single serving coffee brewing system for the purpose of brewing Starbucks coffee using special cups called "T-discs." Id. at *2. Starbucks subsequently pulled its brands from Defendant's Tassimo, and it became increasingly difficult to find Starbucks T-discs. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant and Starbucks disseminated false and misleading information designed to lead consumers to believe that Starbucks T-discs would be available for a reasonable amount of time into the future, although Defendant knew that its business relationship with Starbucks soon would end. Id. at *2. Pursuant to Defendant's motions, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's claims for breach of express and implied warranties and breach of contract, leaving Plaintiff's individual claim under the MCPA. In light of the certainty that the amount of attorneys' fees that would be incurred to further litigate the case would dwarf any damages that Plaintiff might recover, the Court issued a show cause order as to why it should not order Defendant to submit an offer of judgment to Plaintiff in the amount of $250 plus costs and reasonable attorneys' fees. Id. at *4. In response, Defendant made an offer, and Plaintiff accepted. Plaintiff then filed a motion for attorneys' fees. Plaintiff sought an award of attorneys' fees in the amount of $174,786 based on 499.39 hours of work performed at an hourly rate of $350. Id. at *14. Plaintiff also submitted a supplemental fee request in the amount of $8,382.50 for 23.95 hours of work performed after accepting the offer of judgment. Id. The Court partly granted Plaintiff's motion, awarding her $6,417 in attorneys' fees. Based on the review of the pertinent information submitted by the parties, the Court found that $155 per hour would be the reasonable rate for the work performed by Plaintiff's attorney, a sole practitioner. The Court found that the attorney's proposed rate was significantly more than the mean rates for first-year sole practitioners, and the attorney showed no reason for such a significant departure. Id. at *19. Moreover, Plaintiff's claim was relatively straightforward and did not require any particular specialized experience. The Court, therefore, found that $155 per hour was the reasonable rate for Plaintiff's attorney. The Court opined that Plaintiff's request for 499.39 hours was unreasonable on its face because it included 330.83 hours for work spent on class discovery and class certification, which the Court had rejected. Accordingly, the Court excluded the 330.83 hours incurred during class discovery through the denial of class certification from the reasonable hour calculation. Id. at *23. The Court further excluded 59.80 hours that Plaintiff's attorney allegedly spent following the denial of class certification because such work did not contribute materially to the resolution of Plaintiff's claims; instead, the Court reasoned that one hour would have been more than reasonable to resolve the case. Id. at *25-26. The Court then deducted four hours from the 9.90 hours that the attorney spent on pre-complaint research to reflect the simplicity of the case as an individual claim under the MCPA and limited the hours spent by the attorney responding to motions to dismiss to 10 hours. Id .at *23-25. The Court, therefore, concluded that the number of hours reasonably spent by Plaintiff's attorney was 41.4, and multiplying that number by a rate of $155 resulted in a fee award of $6,417. Accordingly, the Court awarded Plaintiff $6,417 in attorneys' fees.

Editor's Note: The ruling in Montgomery is rare and decidedly favorable to the defense. It rejects wholesale the notion that fees can be recovered after a settlement where Plaintiffs' counsel loses a motion for class certification.

O'Bannon, et al. v. National Collegiate Athletic Association,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 91514 (N.D. Cal. July 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former college student-athletes, alleged that Defendants violated federal antitrust laws by conspiring to prevent former collegiate athletes from receiving compensation for the use of their images. Before the Court ruled on class certification, Plaintiffs settled with two Defendants, Electronic Arts, Inc. ("EA") and Collegiate Licensing Company ("CLC"). As to Plaintiffs' antitrust claims against the remaining Defendant, National Collegiate Athletic Association ("NCAA"), the Court held a non-jury trial and found the NCAA liable for violating § 1 of the Sherman Act. The NCAA appealed to the Ninth Circuit. With the appeal pending, Plaintiffs filed a fee petition seeking in excess of $4.5 million in attorneys' fees and over $5.2 million in costs and expenses under the Clayton Act. The Court referred the matter to a Magistrate Judge who granted Plaintiffs' motion with a reduction. The NCAA served Rule 72 objections to the fee award, and argued that Plaintiffs could not recover fees for time spent on ultimately unsuccessful claims, whether or not they were related or unrelated to Plaintiffs' successful claims. The Court found that a common core of facts underlay all of the claims Plaintiffs brought against the NCAA because all claims were premised on Defendants' exploitative use of Plaintiffs' names, images, and likenesses to generate revenue for Defendants. Id. at *20. Because all of Plaintiffs' unsuccessful claims were related to the successful claims, and contributed to the litigation of the successful antitrust claims, the Court found the NCAA's arguments unpersuasive. Id. at *24. The NCAA also claimed that Plaintiffs' counsel failed to submit adequate time records that featured block billing, vague entries, redactions, and improper time increments. The Court, however, found that Plaintiffs' counsel sufficiently had documented their hours and, therefore, no reduction was necessary because of block billing, vague entries, or redactions. Id. at *27-29. As to improper time increments, the NCAA requested the Court to reduce by 20% the fees for work identified in 5,191 of Plaintiffs' time entries because Plaintiffs' counsel recorded times in quarter-hour increments, as opposed to six-minute increments, for a total of $1.3 million. Id. at *29. After reviewing the disputed entries, the Court found that a small number of entries described tasks that likely took a fraction of the time recorded. The Court, nevertheless, remarked that it did not find the practice widespread and excessive and, therefore, imposed only a 5% reduction. Id. at *31. The NCAA further contended that the Court should not award fees to Plaintiffs based on work related to claims not subject to fee shifting, which included: (i) work against Defendants EA and CLC; (ii) work related to state law claims; (iii) work soliciting clients and competing to be lead counsel; and (iv) certain clerical work. The Court rejected the NCAA's request because Plaintiffs properly excluded work related to the EA/CLC settlement from the fee petition. Id. at *36. Likewise, the Court rejected the NCAA's other challenges against attorneys' fees. The Court noted that, although Plaintiffs were technically entitled to a $40 per day in expert witness fees, Plaintiffs failed to ask for this relief in their fee petition. Because Plaintiffs did not satisfy their burden, and because the Clayton Act does not provide explicit statutory authority for expert fee awards, the Court denied Plaintiffs' request of $3.6 million for expert fees. Id. at *48. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees, directed the NCAA to pay $4.4 million as opposed to the $4.5 million sought by Plaintiffs, and ordered NCAA to pay Plaintiffs $1.5 million as opposed to the $5.2 million in costs sought by Plaintiffs under the Clayton Act.

Reid, et al. v. Unilever United States, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 75383 (N.D. Ill. June 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant marketed and sold a hair care product that caused them hair loss and other injuries, in violation of the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act ("MMA"), the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act (the "ICFA"), and substantively similar laws of Alabama, Wisconsin, and Nevada. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs also alleged state common law claims for breach of warranty, negligence, strict liability, and unjust enrichment. The parties subsequently agreed to a settlement in which Defendant would provide $10,250,000 to the settlement administrator for the establishment of two settlement funds, including: (i) a reimbursement fund of $250,000; and (ii) an injury fund of $10 million. Id. at *5. Following final settlement approval, Plaintiffs filed a motion for an award of attorneys' fees in the amount of $3,416,632.50, which was roughly the equivalent one-third of the settlement fund. Id. at *7. In granting Plaintiffs' motion in part, the Court awarded attorneys' fees to Plaintiffs in the amount of $1,503,285.41. While Plaintiffs argued that the $10.25 million settlement amount created a common fund and that the Court should apply the percentage-of-the-fund method in determining an appropriate fee award, Defendants argued that the Court should apply the lodestar method because the settlement fund did not constitute a common fund. Id. at *12-13. The Court determined that it would apply the lodestar method to determine the reasonableness of the fees, since the settlement agreement and the subsequent briefs indicated that the parties agreed that the statutory fee-shifting provision contained in the MMA would control, and because common fund principles do not apply in a statutory fee-shifting case. Id. at *18. The Court analyzed the hours Plaintiffs' attorneys reasonably expended litigating the case, and struck certain disputed time entries on the basis that they were non-compensable, clerical in nature, excessive, redundant, unnecessary, or otherwise unrecoverable. Id. at *25-42. Further, the Court analyzed the reasonableness of the hourly rates that Plaintiffs' attorneys sought and determined a reasonable rate, ranging from $520 to $650 per hour, for each attorney based on their experience, credentials, and contribution to the action. Id. at *50-74. The Court thus reached a lodestar figure of $1,503,285.41. Id. at *76. Because the MMA fee-shifting provision governed the analysis of fees, the Court declined to increase Plaintiffs' lodestar on the basis of the risk of non-payment involved in the case. Id. at *79. Accordingly, the Court awarded attorneys' fees to Plaintiffs in the amount of $1,503,285.41.

Tait, et al. v. BSH Home Appliances Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 98546 (C.D. Cal. July 27, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant designed, manufactured, marketed, and sold front-loading washing machines that had a propensity to develop bacteria, mold, and fungus, which produced foul odors. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiffs asserted violations of state consumer protection statutes, common law fraudulent concealment and non-disclosure breach of express and implied warranties, and unjust enrichment. Following extensive discovery, the parties agreed to a settlement. The settlement class consisted of all residents of the United States who purchased one or more Defendant's specified front-loading washers. Id. at *10. The settlement allowed each class member to be eligible for a $55 cash payment provided they submitted proof of ownership. Id. Defendant agreed not to oppose a request by class counsel for attorneys' fees and costs of $6.5 million, including expert fees and costs. Id. at *11. The Court granted final settlement approval. Considering the strength of Plaintiffs' case, risk, expense, complexity, the Court found that the settlement was fair, adequate, and reasonable. Although only about 19,500 people out of a class of up to 650,000 filed claims and it could not be considered to be an "excellent result" as class counsel described, the Court found that the settlement was reasonable in light of the risks Plaintiffs could face going forward in the case. Id. at *29. The risks included defending Defendant's appeal following certification of Plaintiffs' proposed class, as well its subsequent motion for reconsideration and an attempt to join Whirlpool Corp.'s appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court in a similar action. Id. at *4-5. Defendant had also filed a motion for summary judgment that remained pending prior to the settlement, which the Court identified as one of the serious obstacles to the victory Plaintiffs faced. Id. at *20. The Court found that the class counsel's requested amount of attorneys' fees was also reasonable in light of the circumstances of the case. Based on the class counsel's billing records, the Court calculated class counsel's lodestar to be $8,498,409.02. Id. at *41. While class counsel's lodestar with no multiplier would be 7.8 times the maximum amount that would be going to class members (i.e., $1,090,795 or approximately $1.65 per class member), the Court remarked that the class counsel was wise to request a fee amounting to a significant reduction of their lodestar. Id. at *43-44. Class counsel requested a fee of $4,188,981.61, or a negative multiplier of approximately 0.5 of the unadjusted lodestar, or 3.8 times of the amount going to the class. Id. at *44. The Court found that this fee adequately took into account the results achieved for the class. Some of the objectors argued that the reasonableness of the fees should be determined by comparison to the actual amount that would be paid to class members, i.e., $1,070,795 based on a 3% claims rate, and not to the "fictional" figure of $35,750,000 that assumed a 100% claims rate. Id. at *45. The Court, however, held that comparing the requested fee to the actual pay-out does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that the requested fee was unreasonable, and it found it appropriate to calculate fees using the lodestar method with a percentage of recovery cross-check. Id. The Court further reimbursed class counsel costs amounting to $2,311,018.39, finding the costs were reasonably incurred. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for final approval of the settlement, the motion as to attorneys' fees of $4,188,981.61, and reimbursement of costs totaling $2,311,018.39.

(xv) Intervention Rights In Class Actions

CE Design Ltd., et al. v. King Supply Co., LLC,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 11117 (7th Cir. June 29, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendant sent unsolicited faxes to them and to other persons in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Defendant issued commercial general liability and commercial umbrella policies by three insurance companies, but upon its request for coverage they disclaimed any obligation to defend or indemnify their insured against Plaintiffs' lawsuit. The insurers based their disclaimer primarily on provisions in the insurance policies that appeared to exempt liability under the TCPA from the policies' coverage. The District Court certified a class consisting of recipients of advertising faxes from Defendant, and the Seventh Circuit reversed the order on the basis of various irregularities. On remand, the parties settled for $20 million, the limit of the insurance policies with only 1% of the judgment ($200,000) executable against Defendant. When the insurers learned of the proposed settlement, they filed a declaratory judgment action in Texas, disclaiming coverage. While that suit was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction, a similar suit was filed in an Illinois state court where the trial court ruled that the insurance policies did not cover Defendant's liability under the TCPA. Plaintiffs appealed that decision. Before the District Court approved the settlement agreement, the insurers moved to intervene in the case to persuade the District Court to delay approval of the settlement until there was a determination by the state court of whether they owed Defendant coverage, and also, if they failed to obtain a favorable determination in state court, that the settlement was collusive and unreasonable. The District Court denied the motion to intervene as untimely. On the insurers' appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed. The District Court ruled that the insurers should have moved to intervene in 2009, when they had disclaimed coverage of the claims that Defendant, their insured, had violated the TCPA. Id. at *4. The insurers argued that Defendant betrayed them by failing to defend against class counsel's $20 million settlement proposal. Id. at *5. The Seventh Circuit reasoned that although the insurers in this case were right to worry that class counsel in the TCPA class action and Defendant might collude for an excessive recovery, favorable to the class and to class counsel and harmless to Defendant, they should have taken action when the suit was filed rather than almost three years later. Id. at *7. The Seventh Circuit noted that almost all class actions settle, and those settlements might be the product of tacit collusion between class counsel and Defendant. Id. The Seventh Circuit held that the insurers' motion to intervene in the federal litigation was untimely and therefore denied because the insurers should have foreseen the danger of such a settlement from the outset, and had they wished to challenge it on the ground that class counsel and Defendant were conspiring to over-compensate the class, they should have moved to intervene at the outset of the litigation, not nearly three years later, when the settlement had been negotiated and was about to be presented to the District Court for approval. Id. at *9-10. Further, the Seventh Circuit opined that rather than intervene belatedly, the insurers could have exercised their right under the insurance policies from the outset of the class action to control and conduct Defendant's defense. Id. at *10. The insurers then could have refused to agree to a settlement that cost them $20 million (minus $200,000). Id. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's judgment.

In Re 650 Fifth Avenue And Related Properties*, Case No. 08-CV-10934 (S.D.N.Y. April 17, 2015). Three movants sought to intervene individually and on behalf of a "limited fund" class under Rule 23(b)(1)(B) in order to have the assets at issue in the actions – In Re 650 Fifth Avenue And Related Properties and Peterson v. Islamic Republic of Iran – distributed pro rata among all victims of Iran-sponsored terrorism. Id. at 1-2. The District Court denied the motion. First, the Court found that it lacked jurisdiction because its summary judgment orders in 650 Fifth Avenue were on appeal before the Second Circuit, and a petition for certiorari was pending before the U.S. Supreme Court in the Peterson action. Id. at 2. Because the movants sought to intervene in order to seek substantially the same relief that was the subject of the pending appeals, the District Court remarked that if it were to grant the motion, it would disrupt the on-going proceedings in the Second Circuit and the Supreme Court. Id. Second, the District Court found that even if it had jurisdiction, it must deny the motion as untimely because the movants knew or should have known for many years of their interest in the assets at issue in 650 Fifth Avenue and Peterson. The District Court noted that those actions were filed in 2008 (650 Fifth Avenue) and 2010 (Peterson), yet the movants did not seek to intervene until March 2015, one day before the appeal in 650 Fifth Avenue became fully briefed and two months after the filing of the certiorari petition in Peterson. Id. at 3-4. Moreover, the District Court pointed out that while other terrorism victims had been pursuing recoveries against Iran for over a decade, the movants filed a liability action against Iran only six months ago. Id. at 4. The District Court maintained that the movants' intervention would prejudice Plaintiffs in the 650 Fifth Avenue and Peterson actions by interfering with multiple settlement agreements that were entered into in these two actions. The Court found that intervention also would undermine the extensive efforts that Plaintiffs had undertaken in the 650 Fifth Avenue and Peterson actions. The District Court noted that unlike the movants, the judgment creditors in both actions had diligently pursued their claims and the enforcement of their judgments over many years, and they would be substantially prejudiced by intervention at that advanced stage of the proceedings. Id. at 4-5. Further, the District Court found that the motion should be denied because the movants had failed to show a direct, substantial, and legally protectable interest in the assets at issue in the 650 Fifth Avenue and Peterson actions. The District Court pointed out that the movants had not obtained a liability judgment against Iran, much less demonstrated any cognizable interest in the specific assets at issue in those actions. Id. at 6. Notwithstanding those issues, the District Court found that a limited fund class action was inappropriate because the fund for satisfying judgments against Iran was not limited to the assets at issue in 650 Fifth Avenue and Peterson. Id. at 6-7. Finally, the District Court rejected the argument that any victim had the right to claim compensation from a government forfeiture action at any time until the funds at issue had been distributed, because the Government has discretion in deciding whether and how to remit forfeited assets. Id. at 7. Accordingly, the District Court denied the motion to intervene.

Love, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.,* Case No. 12-CV-61959 (S.D. Fla. Nov. 18, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of female employees, brought a putative class action against Defendant alleging nationwide sex discrimination under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. In 2015, the parties settled and dismissed the action, and several other employees subsequently asked the Court to allow them to intervene to appeal the order dismissing Plaintiffs' class claims as time-barred. Id. at 1. The Interveners argued that because Plaintiffs settled their case, they could no longer appeal the Court's order and therefore, they must be permitted to intervene to protect their interests and appeal. Id. At the outset, the Court noted that the case was voluntarily dismissed with prejudice consistent with Rule 41(a)(1)(A)(ii) before the Interveners sought to intervene. Id. The Court noted that pursuant to Rule 41(a)(1)(A)(ii), a Plaintiff may voluntarily dismiss an action without a Court's order by filing a stipulation of dismissal signed by all parties who have appeared; in that instance, the stipulation dismisses the case and divests the Court of jurisdiction. Id. at 1-2. Consequently, the Court held that given the jurisdictional effect of a Rule 41(a)(1)(A)(ii) dismissal, the parties' stipulation of dismissal meant that the Court could not make legal determinations on the merits. Id. The Court further noted that case law authorities routinely find that once the parties filed a stipulation of dismissal, there was no longer a pending case or controversy into which a non-party may intervene. Id. The Court, therefore, concluded that because the stipulation of dismissal divested the Court of jurisdiction, there was no live case or controversy into which the Interveners might intervene. Accordingly, the Court denied the motion to intervene.

Melendres, et al. v. Arpaio,* Case No. 07-CV-2513 (D. Ariz. Aug. 13, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendants maintained a custom, policy, and practice of racially profiling Latino drivers and passengers, and of stopping them pre-textually under the auspices of enforcing federal immigration laws and/or Arizona state immigration-related laws. The U.S. Department of Justice moved to intervene under Rule 24(a)(1) and Title IX of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which the Court granted. As a rule, the U.S. Attorney General has an unconditional right to intervene in cases that are of general public importance, and the United States also has an unconditional statutory right to intervene in actions seeking relief from the denial of equal protection of the laws under the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution on account of race, color, religion, or national origin. Id. at *2. The Court remarked that this case involved Defendants' alleged denial of equal protection of the laws under the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution on account of individuals' race or national origin. Further, the Attorney General had certified that this case was of general public importance. Id. In addition, no parties raised objections to the intervention. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted the United States' motion to intervene.

(xvi) Collateral Estoppel, Res Judicata, And Settlement Bar Concepts Under Rule 23

Amalfitano, et al. v. Google Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12096 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 2, 2015). Plaintiff, a Gmail user, brought a putative class action under the Stored Communications Act ("SCA") seeking to represent a class of individuals who attempted to but were unable to opt-out of a 2010 class action lawsuit concerning Defendant's Google Buzz application. In 2010, when Google launched the Google Buzz program, it automatically enrolled Gmail users into the program. Plaintiff alleged that the automatic enrollment in Buzz caused the public disclosure of Gmail users' information, such as contact lists, profile information, and Picasa and YouTube postings. Id. at *1-2. Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint, arguing that res judicata barred Plaintiff's claim because he was a member of the class action settlement in In Re Google Buzz Privacy Litigation, Case No. 10-CV-672 (N.D. Cal. 2010) (the "Buzz Class Action"), which involved the same SCA claim concerning Buzz. The Court granted Google's motion. The Court found that Plaintiff's SCA claim was identical to the claim raised in the Buzz Class Action, which concluded with a Court-approved class settlement that constituted a final judgment on the merits. Id. at *7. Although Plaintiff attempted to opt-out of the Buzz Class Action, his opt-out notice was deemed untimely. Plaintiff challenged the legal effect of the facts surrounding the timeliness of his opt-out notice on the basis that the "key element" of whether he was a party to the Buzz Class Action was "in dispute." Id. The Court perceived no such dispute because the final approval and judgment was binding "upon all Class Members who had not timely opted-out." Id. The Court held that, as a class member who did not timely opt-out, Plaintiff was bound by the class settlement and his action was barred by res judicata. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's complaint.

ATD Group, et al. v. Citigroup, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 16289 (2d Cir. Sept. 14, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of stockholders, brought a class action alleging that Defendant and several of its directors, officers, and agents fraudulently misled investors by materially understating the value of collateralized debt obligations backed by sub-prime mortgages. The parties reached a settlement, and the District Court granted preliminary approval. After the District Court approved the class settlement and dismissed the action, Burgess and Icon ("Appellants"), former employees of Defendant who acquired and held Defendant's common stock, commenced an arbitration before the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority ("FINRA"). On Defendant's motion, the District Court permanently enjoined the Appellants from pursuing arbitration. On appeal, the Appellants contended that the District Court abused its discretion in enjoining the FINRA proceeding. The Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's order. Id. at *2. First, the Second Circuit found that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the Appellants failed to exclude themselves from the prior securities class action settlement because Icon did not file any request for exclusion but rather participated in the settlement, and Burgess failed to timely opt-out. Id. at *3-4. Second, the Second Circuit found that the District Court correctly determined that the claims asserted in the FINRA proceeding arose out of the identical facts as the claims asserted in the settled securities class action. Id. at *5. Third, the Second Circuit found that the interests of Plaintiffs and the Appellants were aligned because both were interested in recovery from losses due to Defendant's investments. Further, the Second Circuit found it insignificant that the Appellants' acquisition of stock resulted from equity compensation for employment, whereas Plaintiffs acquired their shares independently from an employment relationship, because such variation between their interests did not render Plaintiffs inadequate class representatives. Id. at *6-7. Fourth, the Appellants contended that the class notice failed to comport with due process because it failed adequately to inform class members that pre-class period claims would be released. The Second Circuit found that the language of the class notice clearly stated that the scope of the release related to investments in Citigroup common stock through April 18, 2008, inclusive. Id. at *7. Fifth, the Second Circuit found that the securities class action settlement superseded any prior existing agreement to arbitrate claims because, if a party initially consented to arbitrate claims, but later entered into a settlement agreement, the claims that had been released would no longer be subject to arbitration. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Second Circuit found that the Appellants were bound by the class settlement and release, and it affirmed the order of the District Court.

Covert, et al. v. LVNV Funding LLC,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 3278 (4th Cir. Mar. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of bankruptcy debtors, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants violated the FDCPA and various Maryland laws by filing proofs of claim without a Maryland debt collection license. In 2008, each Plaintiff filed an individual petition for Chapter 13 bankruptcy in the U.S. District Court for the District of Maryland. Defendants acquired defaulted debt against each Plaintiff and filed proofs of claim in each bankruptcy proceeding. The Bankruptcy Court approved each Chapter 13 plan, allowed Defendants' claims, and each Plaintiff made payments on the claims. Plaintiffs subsequently brought this action alleging that Defendants were not legally entitled to collect those debts because Defendants did not have a debt collection license at the time they filed proofs of claim in the Bankruptcy Court. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs requested injunctive relief and an instruction requiring Defendants to return to Plaintiffs all the money paid pursuant to the proofs of claim. Id. at *4. Defendants moved to dismiss, and the District Court granted the motion finding that the doctrine of res judicata barred Plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claim. The District Court also dismissed Plaintiffs' FDCPA claims and Maryland consumer protection law claims, finding that a proof of claim was not a "collection action" under these statutes. Id. at *5. On appeal, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the dismissal on res judicata grounds. The Fourth Circuit reasoned that in bankruptcy cases, prior bankruptcy judgments have res judicata effect when three conditions are met, including: "(i) the prior judgment was final and on the merits, and rendered by a Court of competent jurisdiction in accordance with the requirements of due process; (ii) the parties are identical, or in privity, in the two actions; and (iii) the claims in the second matter are based upon the same cause of action involved in the earlier proceeding." Id. at *6. The Fourth Circuit found that the bankruptcy judgment met the first and second elements because the confirmation of a bankruptcy plan was a final judgment on the merits, and both Plaintiffs and Defendants were parties to the proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court. Id. at *6-7. The judgment met the third element because Plaintiffs' claims were based on the same cause of action as Defendants' claims in the confirmed bankruptcy plan. Id. According to the Fourth Circuit, even claims that do not directly contradict confirmed orders but merely assert rights inconsistent with those orders are sufficient to meet the third res judicata requirement. Id. at *8. Because all of Plaintiffs' claims implicitly required reconsideration of the provisions of the confirmed plans, the Fourth Circuit concluded that they were based on the same cause of action as the plan confirmation orders and, accordingly, barred by res judicata. Id. at *10. The Fourth Circuit also clarified that res judicata bars not only the claims actually raised during prior litigation, but also those claims that could have been raised, provided that the information needed to raise those claims was available to Plaintiffs. Id. Plaintiffs could have objected to Defendants' proofs of claim at the time Defendants filed them during the bankruptcy proceedings, and they "were not free to raise statutory objections after the Court had entered its confirmation order when those objections were known or should have known to them." Id. Thus, because Plaintiffs did not assert that information necessary to make out their claims was unavailable to them at the time their plans were confirmed, the Fourth Circuit concluded that res judicata barred all of their claims, including the statutory claims. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the dismissal of Plaintiffs' action.

(xvii) Notice Issues In Class Actions

Brown, et al. v. Sega Amusements, USA, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28442 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 9, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants' marketing and sale of the Key Master amusement game were false, deceptive, and likely to mislead consumers because Defendants pre-programmed the machines to prevent players from winning a prize. Subsequently, the parties settled the action for $650,000 to be distributed to the class members, and moved for preliminary approval of class action settlement, and approval of class notices. The Court denied the motion without prejudice. The parties proposed a lengthy notice of settlement to class members describing the proposed settlement agreement. In order to distribute this notice to potential class members, the parties proposed a notice-by-publication plan consisting of advertisements which would be published in sources specifically targeting settlement class members, including internet and mobile phone banner ads and press releases. Id. at *5-6. Those on-line and mobile phone advertisements would provide digital links to an administration website which, in turn, would contain information about the nature of the action and the settlement agreement. Id. at *6. The Court, however, found problematic the notification of prospective class members at video game arcades or other amusement centers throughout the United States between November 1, 2010 and the present. Id. at *5-6. Further, the Court determined that the notice-by-publication plan was unclear because Plaintiff provided no factual basis for his assertion that any Key Master players would likely view the proposed banner ads and, even if they did so, how likely they would subsequently follow the links to the administration website, view the notice of settlement, understand it, and file a claim form. Id. at *8. In addition, the settlement agreement also required Defendants to send a proposed "Player Notice" to all distributors and owners of a Key Master machine to be prominently displayed on each of the machine's front pane of glass so they would be easily visible to the player and which described elements of the game and the circumstances in which a player may obtain a prize. Id. at *4. The parties informed the Court that: (i) the difficulty level to win the game may vary within a single machine; (ii) an operator can change the difficulty level at any time; and (iii) the likelihood of winning also depends on the skill of each individual player, and there is no way of specifying the likelihood of winning or specific difficulty level on the Player Notice. Id. at *5. The Court found that the Player Notice was confusing because it stated that "if you get the key into the hole, the Key Master will vend a prize," but, at the same time, it stated that the game "may currently be set in a mode where prizes may be more difficult to win for a certain number of plays." Id. at *14. The Player Notice also was unrealistic, insofar as it suggested to players to contact the operator if they had questions regarding how frequently the difficulty changed for each row. Thus, Court concluded that because the Player Notice was not providing useful information to players, they were likely to ignore it. Id. at *14-15. Accordingly, the Court denied settlement approval without prejudice.

Nieberding, et al. v. Barrette Outdoor Living, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121447 (D. Kan. Sept. 11, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action on behalf of himself and others alleging that Defendant violated the Kansas Consumer Protection Act by supplying defective plastic bracket used to connect vinyl guardrails on residential decks and porches. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff also asserted claims for breach of warranty and unjust enrichment. On September 8, 2014, the Court certified a liability-only class of individuals, corporations, and other entities who purchased the plastic brackets supplied by Defendant during a defined period. Id. at *2. On March 25, 2015, the parties advised the Court that they reached a settlement and sought certification of a slightly different class for settlement purposes. Id. at *4. The Court granted the motion and the class action administrator mailed a long form notice and claim form to 223 individuals identified as potential class members. The class action administrator also published notice, as directed by the Court-approved notice plan, in the newspapers, and received no opt-out requests or objections to the settlement. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiff subsequently moved for final approval of the class action settlement and application for award of attorneys' fees and expenses. The settlement agreement required Defendant to pay $350,000 into a common fund, which would be used to pay all costs of notice and administration, any fees and costs awarded to Plaintiff's counsel, any incentive award to Plaintiff, and all claims by class members. Id. at *16. Plaintiff requested the Court to approve deductions of: (i) $73,899.25 to pay the claims administrator for the administrative costs of the settlement; (ii) $125,829.42 in attorneys' fees and $35,426.26 in expenses; and (iii) $7,000 as an incentive award payable to Plaintiff. Id. at *17. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion in part. The Court approved the amounts requested by Plaintiff to pay the claims administrator and to reimburse class counsel for expenses, but reduced the amount requested for attorneys' fees to $118,587.24 and the incentive award to $3,500, leaving $118,587.25 remaining in the settlement fund for distribution to the class. Id. at *18. While the Court acknowledged that the parties fairly and honestly negotiated the settlement, it raised a concern that the $125,829.42 sought by class counsel actually exceeded the $107,845.07 that remained in the settlement fund for distribution to the class. Id. at *31. The Court determined that its duty to award a reasonable fee required it to equalize the amount of the fee award with the amount left for distribution to class members, and therefore, approved an attorneys' fee award of $118,587.24, leaving $118,587.25 remaining in the settlement fund for distribution to the class. Id. at *31-32. The Court also found that an award of $3,500, or 1% of the common fund was a more appropriate measure of Plaintiff's effort for the class, and a reduction was appropriate because it made available additional funds to the class members and provided a greater level of benefit to the class as a whole. Id. at *34-35. The Court, otherwise, found the settlement fair, reasonable and adequate, and held that a typographical error in the long form notice's description of the location for settlement approval hearing did not render the notice insufficient. Id. at *21-23. The Court explained that, to the extent any class member was confused by the incorrect address, that person could have called the toll-free number listed on the notice or contacted the claims administrator, any of the counsel listed in the notice, or even the Court to confirm the location of the final approval hearing, and thus, the error did not materially reduce the quality of the notice received by the class members or warranted the cost of an additional round of notice to the class members. Id. at *25-26. Accordingly, the Court granted in part Plaintiff's motion for final approval of class action settlement and application for award of attorneys' fees and expenses.

(xviii) Multi-Party Litigation Over Modification Of Employee/Retirement Benefits

Buchanan, et al. v. General Motors, LLC*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 405 (6th Cir. Jan. 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of retired autoworkers, brought an action challenging the reduction in their pension benefits. Plaintiffs were initially employed by General Motors ("GM") and when GM sold part of its business to Bosch LLC, they worked at Bosch till 2003. From 2003 to 2006, Plaintiffs worked for Delphi Corp. and participated in a special attrition program ("SAP") under which participants would receive wages and accumulate credited service toward their pensions when they received 30 years of credited service under the Delphi Hourly-Rate Employees' Pension Plan. Id. at *2. In 2008, Delphi wrote to Plaintiffs stating that they would receive a portion of their "30 and out" pension from both Delphi and GM, but that Bosch would likely consider Plaintiffs eligible for a deferred vested benefit rather than a portion of a "30 and out" pension. Id. at *4. In 2009, GM sent a letter to Plaintiffs explaining that pension benefits would be paid entirely from the GM Pension Plan. Id. In 2010 Plaintiffs again received letters from GM indicating that the amount of their pension benefits would be reduced to reflect the years worked at Delphi and GM but not at Bosch, and that the assets and liabilities from the Delphi Pension Plan were transferred to the GM Pension Plan, but that the transfer did not include the additional monies that Delphi was paying to cover Bosch's portion of Plaintiffs' benefits. Id. at *5. GM determined that it would count Plaintiffs' time employed at Bosch toward their eligibility for pension benefits, but it would not count that time in calculating the amount of the benefits due, and that it had revised Plaintiffs' pension benefits downward. Plaintiffs alleged that this reduction violated the SAP. The District Court granted GM's motion for judgment on the pleadings. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed. At the outset, the Sixth Circuit noted that Plaintiffs were not making any claim against GM under the GM Pension Plan. Plaintiffs claimed that the reduction of their pension benefits violated the plan terms under the SAP, and that as a fiduciary, GM had a duty to discharge its duties with respect to the SAP solely in the interest of the participants and beneficiaries. Further, the Sixth Circuit observed that when Plaintiffs mentioned the Plan, they always referred to the SAP. Throughout the operative complaint, Plaintiffs alleged various ways in which GM violated provisions of the SAP, but they did not allege that GM violated any provision of its own pension plan. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit opined that Plaintiffs' claims were rooted in the SAP, which they asserted was a free-standing pension plan subject to the ERISA. At issue was whether the SAP was an ERISA plan. To determine whether a plan, fund, or program qualifies as an ERISA employee benefit plan, the Sixth Circuit determined whether a reasonable person could ascertain the intended benefits, a class of beneficiaries, the source of financing, and procedures for receiving benefits. Id. at *10. The SAP was a self-described pre-retirement program that incentivized retirement by providing certain monthly wages for participating employees with at least 27 but less than 30 years of service. Participants in the SAP had to retire when they first accrued 30 years of service, and the SAP payments ended upon retirement, and the former employee received pension benefits pursuant to the Delphi or GM Pension Plan. Id. The Sixth Circuit agreed with the District Court that the SAP did not provide for pension benefits separate from or in addition to those provided by Delphi or GM. Additionally, the 2008 letter referred to the SAP as a pre-retirement program, did not indicate that the SAP itself provided for any pension benefits, and delineated between the monthly wage payments made under the SAP and pension benefits paid upon retirement. Further, the 2008 letter did not mention pension benefits being due or available under the SAP. Thus, the Sixth Circuit opined that because the SAP did not provide retirement income, it was not an ERISA pension benefits plan. For this reason, Plaintiffs' various claims alleging ERISA violations with respect to the SAP failed. Id. at *12.

Bunn Enterprises, Inc., et al. v. Ohio Operating Engineers Fringe Benefit Programs,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 5425 (6th Cir. April 1, 2015). Plaintiff, an employer, brought a declaratory judgment suit claiming that a collective bargaining agreement (the "CBA") required Plaintiff to contribute to a benefits fund only for hours during which employees performed work "covered" under its terms, rather than for all hours worked. Id. at *2-3. In 2012, Defendant conducted an audit of Plaintiff's payroll records and found that Plaintiff had not contributed to the Fund for a significant number of hours worked by certain employees. Plaintiff refused to make payment, stating that employees had not performed "covered" work under the CBA during the disputed hours. Id. at *3. Consequently, Defendant implemented its outstanding balance policy, applied all of Plaintiff's contributions to the alleged deficiency, and sent letters to Defendant's employees stating that their benefits would be discontinued due to insufficient employer contributions. Id. at *4. Plaintiff then brought this action seeking a declaratory judgment that the CBA did not require contributions for all hours worked and that Defendant could not withhold coverage by crediting its contributions to a deficiency. Id. at *4-5. Defendant moved for summary judgment on the grounds that the CBA required Plaintiff to make benefit contributions for all hours worked, regardless of whether the CBA covered such work. The District Court granted Defendant's motion. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed. The Sixth Circuit held that the CBA unambiguously required employer signatories to contribute the appropriate benefits contributions for all hours worked by their employees, regardless of whether the contract "covered" those hours. Id. at *15. Specifically, the Sixth Circuit noted that the language of the CBA was not ambiguous because the provision at issue explicitly required employers to make contributions for all hours paid to each employee. According to the Sixth Circuit, had the drafters wanted to limit benefits contributions solely to "covered" work hours, they could have stated so, either plainly or through reference. Id. at *9. Moreover, the concept of "covered" work appeared nowhere in the CBA provisions, and Plaintiff offered no arguments to support a different interpretation of the explicit, unambiguous CBA provisions. Id. at *10-15. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit concluded that the District Court did not err and affirmed the District Court's order granting summary judgment.

Di Biase, et al. v. SPX Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 131262 (W.D.N.C. Sept. 29, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action for declaratory relief against Defendant alleging violation of the settlement agreements regarding health benefits. As a result of two class action lawsuits filed by the union alleging that Defendant violated its members' right to lifetime health benefits, Defendant and the union executed two settlement agreements. Id. at *2. Pursuant to the settlement agreements, Defendant agreed to provide health care benefits to retirees and surviving spouses for life. Id. Subsequently, Defendant changed the structure of the benefits, and decided to fund a Health Retirement Account ("HRA") for each member, in which Defendant would place $5,000 each year to pay for that individual's health and prescribing drug coverage. Id. at *5. Each individual would then use his or her HRA to buy their own insurance policy in the individual Medicare market. Id. In this action, Plaintiffs sought a preliminary injunction restraining Defendant from terminating the group plan and instituting the HRA structure, which the Court denied. The Court observed that here, the changeover to the HRA structure took effect on January 1, 2015; therefore, the change that Plaintiffs sought to prohibit had already occurred. Id. at *9. The Court remarked that any injunction would have to order Defendant to revert to the group plan in order to return to the last uncontested status between the parties. Id. at *10. Therefore, the Court concluded that the preliminary injunction was moot. Moreover, the Court remarked that Plaintiffs did not show a likelihood of success on the merits because they failed to address Defendant's challenge on threshold issues of jurisdiction under the Labor-Management Relations Act, and the ERISA, as well as the appropriateness of class certification in this case. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction failed because they did not show that they could succeed on merits.

International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace & Agricultural Implement Workers Of America, et al. v. General Motors, LLC,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 8074 (6th Cir. May 14, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action asserting that Defendant General Motors ("GM") assumed a $450 million obligation for retiree benefits from its pre-bankruptcy predecessor General Motors Co. ("Old GM"), when it agreed to purchase Old GM's assets out of bankruptcy. The $450 million obligation originated from a deal that Plaintiffs and Old GM made in 2007 as part of the restructuring of GM's former auto parts subsidiary Delphi Corp. Id. at *4-5. In response to an earlier litigation between Plaintiffs against Old GM to recover retiree health benefits, Old GM established a trust to fund retiree health benefits and agreed to make a one-time $450 million payment to the trust. Id. at *5-6. Thereafter, Old GM filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy and sold all of its assets and liabilities to GM. Days after the sale, GM and Plaintiffs entered into a new settlement that failed to mention the $450 million payment and established a new benefits agreement. Id. at *8. When Plaintiffs sought the $450 million payment, GM refused to pay, arguing, among other things, that the settlement agreement did not require such a contribution. Id. at *9. The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of GM, finding that the $450 million contribution obligation did not survive GM's reorganization. Id. at *11. The District Court also ruled that Plaintiffs had waived and released all claims against GM concerning retiree medical benefits in the settlement agreement. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court on different grounds. Id. at *13. Disagreeing with the District Court, the Sixth Circuit found that Old GM's obligation survived because, in the purchase agreement, Old GM passed on all liabilities arising under the union collective bargaining agreement, which included the obligation to make the $450 million contribution. Id. at *11-12. The Sixth Circuit, however, agreed that GM was not obligated to pay because the District Court properly construed the subsequent settlement agreement as having extinguished GM's obligation. Id. at *13. The Sixth Circuit reasoned that the settlement agreement did not mention the obligation and made clear that it superseded, extinguished, and released GM from all obligations concerning retiree health benefits arising from the prior litigation, settlement, and all GM bankruptcy proceedings. Id. at *13-14. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit held that GM was not bound to make the $450 million contribution and affirmed the District Court's order granting summary judgment.

International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace & Agricultural Implement Workers Of America, et al. v. Kelsey-Hayes Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124411 (E.D. Mich. Sept. 17, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of retirees, brought a putative class action alleging breach of a collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") under § 301 of the Labor-Management Relations Act ("LMRA"), violation of an ERISA-covered benefit plan, and breach of fiduciary duty in violation of the ERISA. In 1998, Defendant Kelsey-Hayes entered into a CBA with unions that represented the employees of its Detroit manufacturing plant. The CBA provided comprehensive healthcare coverage to retirees and their surviving spouses. Id. at *2. Kelsey-Hayes closed its Detroit plant in 2001, negotiated a plant closing agreement with the Unions, and continued to provide healthcare benefits under the 1998 CBA for ten years after the closure. Id. In September 2011, Kelsey-Hayes announced plans to terminate retiree participation in the retiree healthcare plan and required retirees to purchase individual plans for Medicare Supplemental insurance paid for out of company-funded Health Reimbursement Accounts ("HRA"). Id. Plaintiffs then brought this action alleging that the 1998 CBA provided them with a vested, lifetime right to unalterable retiree health insurance. Plaintiffs sought to hold Northrop Grumman liable for damages as the successor to TRW, Inc., who was party to the plant closing agreement, as Kelsey-Hayes' parent company. Id. at *3. Kelsey-Hayes and TRW moved for an order to compel arbitration, relying on a general arbitration clause in the plant closing agreement. The Court initially granted the motion, but later reversed itself finding that a sub-set of Plaintiffs – those who had retired prior to the plant closing in 2001 – could not be bound by the terms of the plant closing agreement because their rights already had vested under the 1998 CBA. Id. at *3. Defendants then moved to stay the action pending the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in M&G Polymers USA, LLC v. Tackett, 135 S. Ct. 926 (2015), wherein the Supreme Court took up the issue of how to interpret silence concerning the duration of retiree healthcare benefits when construing CBAs. Id. Following the stay and the subsequent Supreme Court ruling, the parties re-filed their motions for summary judgment. The Court entered judgment for Plaintiffs. The Court noted that, whereas the plant closing agreement terminated the 1998 CBA as of the plant closing, it also provided that employees eligible to retire as of the closing would participate in and be eligible to receive retiree medical benefits. Id. at *21. According to the Court, it would be illogical to interpret the plant closing agreement as ending the obligation to provide retirees healthcare benefits because some employees only became eligible for such benefits by retiring at the plant closing, and this negotiated promise of future retiree healthcare was contractual proof that the parties specifically intended that retiree healthcare benefits would survive the 1998 CBA expiration and the plant closing. Id. at *21-22. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment and entered a permanent injunction ordering Defendants to comply with their 1998 and 2001 CBA retiree healthcare obligations.

Kauffman, et al. v. General Electric Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73156 (E.D. Wis. June 5, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action under ERISA challenging Defendant's actions relating to its retiree health insurance plans (the "Plans"). The Summary Plan Description ("SPD") provided that Defendant "expects and intends" to continue the Plans indefinitely, but reserved the right to terminate, amend, or replace the programs or plans, in whole or in part, at any time and for any reason. Id. at *1-2. Defendant terminated the Plans. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant breached its obligations to Plaintiffs because the SPD obliged Defendant to provide benefits in the absence of a compelling reason to reduce or terminate them. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant misrepresented its intent and breached its fiduciary duty because, in July 2012 when Defendant re-issued the "expects and intends" language, it planned to modify benefits. Id. Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint. The Court granted the motion with respect to Plaintiffs' breach of obligation claim, but denied the motion with respect to Plaintiffs' breach of fiduciary duty claim. First, the Court found that Plaintiffs did not sufficiently allege that Defendant violated any statutory provision or Plan term when Defendant terminated or modified the Plans because the "expects and intends" language on which Plaintiffs relied was not a term of the Plan. Id. at *4-5. Second, the Court found that Plaintiffs sufficiently alleged that Defendant breached its fiduciary duty because Plaintiffs alleged that, when it re-issued the SPD, Defendant knew or should have known that alleged misrepresentations in the SPD would confuse or mislead the average participant as to when his or her coverage would terminate. Id. at *5-6. Defendant argued that the SPD was not misleading because it contained a clear reservation of rights. The Court, however, noted that the "expects and intends" language, coupled with a paragraph that listed reasons why Defendant might modify benefits under the Plans, such as changes in federal law or state laws governing qualified retirement or welfare benefits, could be regarded as misleading to the average participant. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss in part and denied it in part.

Merrill, et al. v. Briggs & Stratton Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 117677 (E.D. Wis. Sept. 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of retired employees, brought a putative class action under the Labor-Management Relations Act ("LMRA") and the ERISA alleging that Defendants violated their collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") by reducing health benefits of employees who retired before August 1, 2006. Id. at *2. Before August 1, 2006, the CBAs provided certain retirees with fully-paid health benefits for a certain time. However, when the parties started negotiating a renewed CBA to take effect in 2006, Defendants proposed language changing all retiree coverage to be "the same coverages offered active employees." Id. at *3. Then, in 2010, Defendants notified all retirees that it had made unilateral changes to their health benefits, including the introduction of a $12,000 cap on company contributions for individual coverage and a $24,000 cap for family coverage, the elimination of some retiree plans, and switching employees exclusively to PPO plans. Id. Subsequent changes in 2011, 2012, and 2013 further reduced the number of plan options, increased deductibles, and increased out-of-pocket maximums. Id. In moving for summary judgment, Plaintiffs argued that these changes violated the parties' CBAs' promise of long-term benefits, and that Defendants' unilateral changes to retiree benefits violated the ERISA. Id. at *17. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion, finding that the analysis of extrinsic evidence led to fact issues that precluded summary judgment. The Court noted that the language of § 8 of the 1998 and 2002 CBAs regarding duration of benefits defeated the presumption against vesting of health benefits because it promised that company-paid coverage would continue and the employees would be eligible for benefits for a period that outlived the 4-year term of the CBAs. Id. at *21-22. The Court found that the CBAs appeared to unambiguously limit the duration of retiree benefits to the terms of the CBA. Plaintiffs submitted declarations, affidavits, and deposition testimony to claim that a change in the language of CBAs created a latent ambiguity as to vesting. The Court declined to consider Plaintiffs' evidence, but relied on § 8(e) of the 2006-2010 CBA to conclude that the parties intended pre-2006 retiree benefits to vest despite the seemingly clear language of the 1998 and 2002 CBA language that created a latent ambiguity in the 1998 and 2002 CBAs. Id. at *24-25. The Court explained that § 8(e) of the 2006 CBA distinguished between retirees who retired before the 2006 CBA and those who retired after it went into effect in 2006, and such a provision, which did not exist in previous CBAs, provided that retiree benefits for those retiring under the 2006 CBA were subject to change and thus not vested; further, this implied that at least some retiree benefits under previous CBAs were vested. Id. The Court rejected Defendants' argument that its inclusion of reservation of rights language in several documents sent to retirees defeated the conclusion that the CBA was latently ambiguous as to vesting, as there was no evidence that the CBA incorporated the "wrap" plan document upon which Defendants relied to assert the reservation-of-rights language. Id. at *25-26. The Court thus found ambiguity in whether or not Plaintiffs' health benefits vested under the 1998 and 2002s CBAs. Although both the parties submitted extrinsic evidences to conclusively prove their interpretation of the CBAs, the Court opined that much of the evidence revolved around the past bargaining history and changes to retiree benefits, and the resulting types of factual disputes precluded summary judgment. Id. at *27-28. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs were entitled to a trial on the question of whether or not their benefits vested under the CBAs. Id. at *28. Because the 1998 and 2002 CBAs were vague as to exactly what benefits were vested, and because the Court denied both sides' motions to exclude the other's expert evidence relating to whether or not the current benefits were reasonable commensurate with the benefits they received before the 2010 changes, the Court also concluded that Plaintiffs were entitled to a trial on the issue of whether the 2010 and subsequent changes were reasonably commensurate with the pre-2006 benefits. Id. at *29-30. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment.

Reese, et al. v. CNH Industrial N.V.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 129932 (E.D. Mich. Sept. 28, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action claiming that they were entitled to irreducible retiree healthcare benefits from Defendants that survived the expiration of the collective bargaining agreement (the "CBA") in effect at the time of their retirement. In August 2007, the District Court granted summary judgment in Plaintiffs' favor. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed summary judgment, holding that Plaintiffs were entitled to lifetime healthcare benefits under the CBA. Id. at *5. The Sixth Circuit found nothing in the CBA that prevented Defendants from altering benefits, so long as Defendants did not entirely eliminate them, and it remanded the matter to the District Court to decide how and under what circumstances Defendants might alter such benefits and whether Defendants satisfied the reasonable criteria for the proposed changes. Thereafter, on remand, the District Court held that Defendants could not unilaterally reduce the healthcare benefits conferred to Plaintiffs under the CBA. Id. at *12. Defendants appealed again, and following a second remand, the parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment on the reasonableness of Defendants' proposed changes. Before the District Court could rule on the motions, the Supreme Court held in M&G Polymers USA, LLC v. Tackett, 135 S. Ct. 926 (2015), that District Courts must apply ordinary contract principles to determine whether retiree healthcare benefits survive the expiration of a collective bargaining agreement. Id. at *16. Defendants then filed a second motion for summary judgment arguing that the reasons underlying the conclusion that Plaintiffs were entitled to lifetime healthcare benefits were no longer viable after Tackett. Id. Specifically, Defendants argued that Tackett mandated the conclusion that retiree healthcare benefits did not survive the expiration of the CBA because the District Court's contrary conclusion rested on the legal principles grounded in International Union v. Yard-Man, Inc., 716 F.2d 1476 (6th Cir. 1983), that Tackett abrogated. Id. at *18. Although Plaintiffs contended that the District Court relied only on the aspects of the Yard-Man framework that remained viable after Tackett, the District Court found Defendants' argument more persuasive and granted Defendants' second motion for summary judgment. Under the Yard-Man framework, if a CBA was silent regarding the duration of benefits, the reasonable inference is that the parties intended the benefits to last for life based on the context of labor-management negotiations. Id. at *19-20. In Tackett, however, the Supreme Court concluded that such an inference conflicted with ordinary principles of contract interpretation and it criticized Yard-Man for ignoring the traditional principle that, in the ordinary course, contractual obligations ceased upon termination of the collective bargaining agreement. Id. at *20-21. In concluding that the parties intended to confer lifetime benefits to the retirees, the District Court had relied heavily on contract language tying eligibility for contribution-free healthcare benefits to eligibility for pension benefits. Id. at *26. Because pension benefits were presumed to last for life, and because eligibility for healthcare benefits was linked to eligibility for pension benefits, the District Court had concluded that healthcare benefits, like pension benefits, were intended to last for life. Id. The District Court, however, found that Tackett now foreclosed reliance on such a rationale. The pertinent contract language tied eligibility for contribution-free healthcare benefits to the receipt of pension benefits. In light of Tackett, the District Court re-interpreted the provisions addressing how retirees and their spouses become eligible to start receiving free healthcare benefits, not the amount of time that retirees and their spouses remained entitled to those benefits. The District Court, therefore, concluded that the tying language no longer supported its determination that the parties intended to confer lifetime benefits. Id. at *30. Accordingly, the District Court held that its prior determination that the parties intended to confer lifetime healthcare benefits was not viable in light of Tackett and granted Defendants' motion for summary judgment.

Zanghi, et al. v. FreightCar America, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41810 (W.D. Pa. Mar. 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of retirees, brought an action alleging that Defendant's unilateral termination of retirees' health and life insurance benefits violated the Labor-Management Relations Act and the ERISA. Plaintiffs worked at a facility producing railroad freight cars owned by Bethlehem Steel Corp. In 1991, Bethlehem sold the assets of its freight car division to Defendant's predecessor, Johnstown American Corp. Under the purchase agreement, Bethlehem agreed to reimburse Defendant for retirees' insurance costs. In mid-October 1991, Defendant and the union representing Plaintiffs reached an agreement that covered the benefit plans and memorialized their understanding in a collective bargaining agreement (the "1991 CBA") and 27 "side letters." Id. at *6. One of the side letters, entitled the "Mirroring Agreement," required Defendant to create bargaining unit employee benefit plans identical to the Bethlehem plans. Defendant and the union entered into another collective bargaining agreement in 1997 (the "1997 CBA") and removed the side letters that dealt with issues related to the 1991 sale. Id. at *12. In 2001, Bethlehem fell behind in its reimbursements to Defendant for the cost of retiree benefits, and Defendant announced that it would cease paying for retirees' medical coverage. Defendant also eliminated the monthly pension supplement and the health and life insurance benefits that it previously had provided to retired employees. Id. at *18. In April 2002, the union and a putative class consisting of reimbursable retirees and their dependents filed an action challenging Defendant's decision to terminate their welfare benefits (the "Deemer action"). In August 2003, another putative class of pension employees brought an action challenging the unilateral elimination of the health and life insurance (the "Britt action"). The parties eventually settled the Deemer and Britt actions. In 2005, Defendant and the union entered into a collective bargaining agreement incorporating the Deemer and Britt settlements (the "2005 CBA"). In addition to addressing retirees' medical benefits, the 2005 CBA provided that, if Defendant ceased its contributions at any point thereafter, retirees could re-file their lawsuits and reassert that the CBAs required the continuation of the negotiated levels of benefits provided under the 1997 CBA. Id. at *19-20. In 2013, Defendant filed suit seeking a declaratory judgment that it had the legal right to terminate retiree welfare benefits. Defendant also sent the union a letter stating that, effective October 1, 2013, it would cease all company contributions provided under the 2005 CBA for retiree medical coverage. Id. at *22. Plaintiffs thereafter initiated this action. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that the undisputed material facts demonstrated a lack of any clear and express agreement to provide vested medical and life insurance benefits to the retirees. Id. at *3. The Court denied Defendant's motion. At the outset, the Court found that the Mirroring Agreement was incorporated in and made a part of the 1991 CBA and that Defendant had agreed to create benefit plans that continued health and life insurance benefits because, in the side letter, Defendant had agreed to create benefits plans "identical in all material respects" to the Bethlehem plans they replaced. Id. at *38-39. Defendant argued that the continuation of coverage language did not provide Plaintiffs vested benefits. Plaintiffs responded that the retiree benefits were "vested" in the sense that Defendant could not eliminate them unless the union expressly agreed to reduce or terminate them. Id. at *42. The Court agreed. Although the continuation of coverage language in the Bethlehem plan was not sufficiently clear to create vested benefits in the sense of being forever unalterable, the Court found that the plan that Defendant had agreed to mirror required agreement between the union and the company before such benefits could be terminated or altered. Id. at *48. The Court found no evidence that the union explicitly had agreed to give up such rights. Id. at *52. The issue then remained as to whether the parties had agreed that Defendant satisfied its obligations under the Mirroring Agreement when going into the 1997 CBA negotiations. Although Defendant asserted that the parties had agreed in 1994 to discontinue its mirror obligations, the Court noted that, in its preliminary injunction brief, Defendant recognized "the undisputed fact that before its abrogation in 1997, [Defendant] had continuing obligations." Id. at *55. The Court, therefore, found genuine issues of disputed fact for resolution at trial. Id. at *57-58. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Zino, Jr., et al. v. Whirlpool Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 147614 (N.D. Ohio. Oct. 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of retirees, brought a putative class action under the Labor-Management Relations Act ("LMRA") and the ERISA alleging that the collective bargaining agreements ("CBAs") negotiated between Defendants and the employees' union entitled them to retiree health benefits for life. Plaintiffs, a group of hourly employees of the Hoover Co. and its successor entities, Maytag Corp. and Whirlpool Corp., received notices that Whirlpool planned to reduce their health benefits effective January 1, 2013. Plaintiffs alleged that the applicable CBAs entitled them to receive specified retiree health benefits that were not subject to unilateral reduction of termination during retirement. Plaintiffs also alleged that the reductions violated the relevant CBAs and welfare benefits plans and, as a result, were actionable under § 301 of the LMRA and § 502(a)(1) of the ERISA. Following class certification, the Court ordered the creation of four sub-classes distinguished by time periods under which the employees retired, i.e., sub-classes A, B, C, and D. Each sub-class shared the same core characteristic in that they comprised of former employees of Hoover, Maytag, and Whirlpool represented by the union in collective bargaining and who received health care benefits for themselves and their spouses after retirement. After the phase one of the trial, the Court found that members of sub-class C were promised lifetime, company-paid health benefits under the 1992-1995, 1995-2000 and 2000-2003 CBAs. Id. at *5. As to sub-class D, the Court found that groups one and two were promised lifetime, company-paid health benefits under the same rules that applied to the members of sub-class C. Id. As to some members of group three and all members of group four, the Court found that they were promised lifetime health benefits but they were entitled to company-paid health benefits up to age 65. Id. Regarding group three members who were not entitled to company-paid health benefits, the Court ruled that they were entitled to participate in the "retiree healthcare" program until age 65 but responsible for paying the full costs of the premiums. Id. The Court also determined that the members of groups five and six were neither entitled to lifetime retiree health benefits nor were guaranteed "access" to them beyond the expiration of the 2003-2007 CBA. Id. at *6. In addition, the Court found that the ambiguity regarding the duration for which the company agreed to fund retiree health benefits was resolved by the evidence presented at trial proving that the company and union intended for the members of sub-class A to receive retiree health benefits for life, and that the applicable sub-agreement provisions carried the 1980 contract settlement through to the 1983-1986, 1986-1988 and 1988-1992 CBAs, entitling the members of sub-class B to retiree health benefits for life. Id. Defendants subsequently moved for reconsideration following the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Polymers USA, LLC v. Tackett, 135 S. Ct. 626 (2015), which ordered use of ordinary principles of contract law and to first look to the language of CBAs to ascertain the intention of the parties and to consider general durational clauses when construing CBAs. Id. at *7. The Court granted the motion in part and denied it in part. The Court maintained its ruling as to sub-classes A, C, and D, but reversed as to sub-class B. Id. at *13. As to sub-class B, the Court had determined that the 1980 contract settlement was a sub-agreement that was carried forward and relied on testimony of strong extrinsic evidence of the parties' understanding of the term. Id. at *17. The Court reasoned that, unlike with sub-class A, there was ambiguity on the face of any of the welfare plans that could permit the use of extrinsic evidence. Id. at *17-18. Thus, given the lack of ambiguity on the face of the relevant welfare plans, the Court concluded that its bench trial ruling in favor of Plaintiffs became untenable. Id. at *18. The Court therefore returned to its initial finding and granted summary judgment to Defendants with respect to sub-class B, and maintained its earlier rulings as to other sub-classes. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to reconsider in part, and denied it in part.

(xix) Civil Rights Class Actions

Betances, et al. v. Fischer,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9976 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of prison inmates, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants, the New York State Department of Correctional Services ("DOCS") and the Department of Parole ("DOP"), violated their constitutional rights to due process by subjecting them to various unlawful conditions and custody by continuing to impose the terms of post-release supervision ("PRS") that had been declared unlawful in Earley v. Murray, 451 F.3d 71 (2d Cir. 2006). Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint on the grounds that Plaintiffs' constitutional rights were not "clearly established" at the time that Defendants allegedly violated those rights, and state officials were entitled to qualified immunity for their actions. Id. at *2. The Court rejected those arguments in 2012, stating that New York courts might disagree over the scope of Earley, but "there was never any disagreement or confusion about the core constitutional holding announced by Earley." Id. Plaintiffs subsequently moved to certify a class consisting of "all individuals who were convicted of various crimes in New York State Courts on or after September 1, 1998; were sentenced to terms of incarceration but not to terms of PRS; but were nonetheless subjected to enforcement by Defendants of PRS terms after the maximum expiration dates of their determinate sentences after June 9, 2006." Id. at *3. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. First, the Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied the numerosity requirement, as the proposed class consisted of thousands of individuals, thereby making joinder impracticable. Second, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs satisfied the commonality requirement as a single common question united all purported class members. Id. at *19. Third, the Court determined that Plaintiffs satisfied the typicality requirement as the named Plaintiffs all suffered injuries based on Defendants' policy of imposing and enforcing PRS on individuals whose sentences did not include a term of PRS. Id. at *20. Fourth, the Court held that Plaintiffs satisfied the adequacy requirement as the three named Plaintiffs suffered injuries from the same course of conduct as all other class members, and had no conflict with other members of the class. Id. at *22. Finally, the Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied the predominance requirement as the common question of Defendants' liability for the enforcement of administratively-imposed PRS predominated over individual issues. Because Earley established that the practice of imposing PRS administratively where it was not part of a judicially-imposed sentence is unconstitutional, and because Defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity, the Court found that the common question was whether the individual Defendants should be liable for the alleged violations. Id. at *24-25. Defendants argued that the question of liability would turn on each Plaintiff's individualized facts and circumstances. The Court disagreed, and found that Earley clearly established that administratively-imposed PRS terms were "a nullity" and Defendants knew of this in 2006. Id. at *25. Because Plaintiffs alleged a single, uniform unconstitutional policy, the Court concluded that a common question predominated even though the action would require individual determination of damages. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Faith Action For Community Equity, et al. v. State Of Hawaii,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51736 (D. Haw. April 20, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of equal protection and Title VII's prohibition against national origin discrimination in federally funded programs by failing to offer Hawaii's driver's license examination in languages other than English. According to the complaint, over ten years ago, Plaintiffs successfully advocated to get translations in place for nine different languages. However, approximately two to three years ago, Defendant ceased the use of the translations and added three new questions to the exams. Although Defendant later offered translated versions, Plaintiffs contended that the risk remained that Defendant might once again limit the exam to English. Id. at *1. Seeking certification of a class for injunctive relief, Plaintiffs moved for class certification. The Court denied certification on the basis that Plaintiffs' class definition was overly broad. Particularly, the Court noted that the class definition included claims that were not included in the complaint, and did not limit to the timeframe applicable as it included persons who fell outside the scope of the assertions in the complaint. Id. at *4. Although the Court acknowledged that it could suggest an administratively feasible definition of the class, it did not do so because Plaintiffs also failed to meet other Rule 23 requirements. Notwithstanding the general assertion that Defendant intentionally discriminated against limited English proficiency individuals based on their national origin by failing to provide translated driver's license exams, the Court ruled that the named Plaintiffs' claims were not sufficiently similar to the claims of other purported class members. Id. at *11-12. The Court noted that any claim of discrimination by the named Plaintiffs relating to a delay of more than five years would require an examination of whether the exam should have been translated to his or her language even before the adding of the questions. According to the Court, the named Plaintiffs' need to demonstrate entitlement to a translated exam concerned a matter not applicable to numerous other purported class members because they spoke a language that the exam was not originally translated into. Id. at *12. Further, to the extent the complaint purported to encompass a claim that Defendant intentionally discriminated against individuals taking the practical driver's license exam by failing to allow them to have a translator present during the road test, Plaintiffs lacked standing because they never attempted to take the practical portion or road test. Id. at *13. Thus, Plaintiffs' unique backgrounds and factual situations made them atypical and inadequate class representatives. Under these circumstances, the Court determined that class-wide injunctive relief would not be appropriate. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Jacoby & Meyers, LLP, et al. v. Presiding Justices Of The First, Second, Third, & Fourth Departments, Appellate Division Of The Supreme Court Of The State Of New York*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92041 (S.D.N.Y. July 15, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of law offices, brought a class action against the presiding justices of the four appellate divisions of the New York Supreme Court, and sought a declaration that New York Rule of Professional Conduct 5.4 ("New York Rule 5.4") violated the First and Fourteenth Amendments and the commerce clause of the U.S. Constitution. Plaintiff Jacoby & Meyers, LLP formed a limited liability company Jacoby & Meyers USA, LLC ("J&M LLC"), allegedly to receive non-lawyer equity investment and to conduct J&M's practice following a proposed transfer to it of J&M's assets. Id. at *3. New York Rule 5.4 and comparable provisions in effect across the country prohibit lawyers to obtain equity investments in their practices from non-lawyers, which precludes them from, among other things, selling stock in their practices to the public. Id. at *2. The Court dismissed the complaint for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, and on appeal, the case was remanded, granting Plaintiffs leave to amend their complaint. After Plaintiffs amended the complaint, Defendants once again moved to dismiss, and the Court granted the motion At the outset, the Court noted that the judicial power extends only to cases and controversies. Id. at *12. The remand was based on a conclusion that J&M's amended complaint would contain allegations, that, if proved, would establish J&M's standing to bring constitutional claims under New York Rule 5.4, § 495 of the Judiciary Law, and the additional state statutes. Id. As to the constitutional claims, J&M argued that New York laws it challenged violated the First and Fourteenth Amendments and the commerce clause by prohibiting it, and other firms like it, from practicing law if they accept non-lawyer equity investment. The Court remarked that it is true that First amendment protection extends to corporations, that "speech that otherwise would be within protection of First Amendment" does not "lose that protection simply because its source is a corporation." Id. at *21. The Court, however, observed that whatever reach those principles may be, J&M's argument that lawyers had a constitutional right to

associate with non-lawyers in the practice of law was not within it. Id. The Court explained that this case had nothing to do with speech, i.e., the transaction that J&M proposed to undertake was neither an advertisement, nor a solicitation of money or business, but it was a conduct. Id. at *21-22. The Court further explained that the First Amendment protects, among other things, freedom of "speech;" it says nothing about the "conduct." Id. at *25. The Court remarked that the First Amendment rights were not confined to verbal expressions, and the U.S. Supreme Court had extended constitutional protections to some forms of particularly expressive conduct and to conduct that is sufficiently imbued with elements of communication to fall within the scope of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The proposed conduct here, the Court observed, lacked the expressive, over political nature of flag burning or the moral gravitas of a peaceable and orderly sit-in to protest the unconstitutional segregation of public facilities. Rather, J&M sought non-lawyer equity investors as a means to commercial end, without which J&M claimed that it would not be able to expand its operations, and hire additional attorneys and staff. The Court opined that the New York laws that prevented J&M from accomplishing its commercial goals thus merely restricted its commercial practices, and such laws fell outside the purview of the First Amendment even if they imposed incidental burdens on speech. Id. at *27. The Court observed that the First Amendment also protects a right to expressive association, and protects, among other things, the freedom of individuals to associate for the purpose of engaging in protected speech. Id. at *30. J&M contended that its primary purpose to accept non-lawyer equity investors was to expand operations and to improve its physical offices and infrastructure to increase its ability to serve its existing clients and to attract and retain new clients and qualified attorneys. Id. at *32. The Court, however, ruled that the demographic and socio-economic characteristics of J&M's clientele were not constitutionally relevant to the question of whether the New York laws abridged law firms' expressive associational rights. Id. at *33. The Court reasoned that New York passed the laws to serve its extremely important interest in maintaining and assuring the professional conduct of attorneys it licensed, and the laws in question were not aimed at suppressing speech. Id. at *36. The Court, accordingly, found that J&M failed to sufficiently allege that the laws actually imposed any serious burdens on it constitutionally protected associational freedoms. Id. at *37. J&M also argued that the New York laws violated the commerce clause because they substantially dampened the flow of capital, goods, services, lawyers, and employees across state lines, thereby burdening interstate commerce in a way that it was clearly excessive relative to any putative local benefit that laws might otherwise advance. The Court remarked that J&M's commerce clause claim relied on the misguided premise that the laws were facially discriminatory. The Court ruled that they were not, as they provided no special or beneficial treatment to New York lawyers or law firms; instead, they treated both in-and-out-of-state interests identically. Id. at *42. The Court therefore ruled that the amended complaint failed to state sufficient facts that the laws violated the commerce clause. Similarly, the Court therefore dismissed the amended complaint.

Lacy, et al. v. Sheriff Of Cook County,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 56625 (N.D. Ill. April 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, five detainees at the Cook County Jail who required wheelchairs, brought a putative class action against Defendants alleging violations of the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that the courthouse ramps, holding cells, and transport vans did not comply with the ADA or the Rehabilitation Act and that Defendants did not provide adequate accommodations to overcome this non-compliance. Plaintiffs sought preliminary injunctive relief to prevent Defendants from continuing to deprive Plaintiffs of their rights and moved to certify a class comprised of all individuals who received a wheelchair upon entry to the jail. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. Defendants argued that class certification was not appropriate because the putative class was not clearly ascertainable. Id. at *6. According to Defendants, the proposed class definition improperly would include individuals who did not medically require a wheelchair, along with individuals who were not qualified individuals under the ADA. Id. at *7. The Court disagreed and found that Plaintiffs' proposed class was ascertainable and definite. The Court found that class members were easily identifiable through Defendants' "CCOMS" computer system, which kept track of each detainee to whom the jail had assigned a wheelchair. Id. at *8. Further, the Court found that the proposed class satisfied all of the requirements of Rule 23(a). The putative class consisted of 60 detainees and involved common questions of law and fact such as whether the ramps and holding cells at six county courthouses were compliant with the ADA and Rehabilitation Act's structural requirements and whether Defendants' policies and actions provided adequate accommodation to sufficiently overcome structural barriers. Id. at *10-11. In addition, the Court found that Plaintiffs were adequate representatives of the putative class because they used wheelchairs during court appearances and faced the same structural barriers as other wheelchair-using detainees. Id. at *16-17. Contrary to Defendants' arguments, the Court determined that the instant action did not require a factual inquiry into each potential class member's individual need for or receipt of accommodation. Id. at *18. The Court observed that the injunctive relief that Plaintiffs sought as a class would resolve their alleged injuries at one time, regardless of the level of accommodation individual class members required. For example, toilet facilities that comply with the ADA's structural requirements would be accessible for all wheelchair-using detainees (and non-wheelchair-using detainees), even if a particular class member could transfer to a commode chair. Id. Thus, the Court held that, consistent with Rule 23(b)(2), a single injunction would provide relief to each member of the class. Id. at *18-19. The Court, therefore, concluded that the proposed class satisfied the requirements of Rule 23(b)(2). Id. Finally, although Defendants argued that class treatment was inappropriate because it would deprive them of their statutory right to assert an exhaustion defense, the Court disagreed and found that each member of the class need not have exhausted administrative remedies for the case to proceed as a class action. Id. Accordingly, the Court certified a redefined class of "all Cook County Jail detainees who had been assigned and currently use a wheelchair." Id. at *20.

Moss, et al. v. U.S. Department Of Homeland Security,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 131260 (D. Ore. Aug. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of demonstrators, brought a class action alleging that Defendants used force to disrupt their lawful assembly and protest demonstration in Jacksonville, Oregon in violation of the Fourth and the Fourteenth Amendments and Oregon common law. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants and law enforcement officers forcefully moved them from their location. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs sought to certify a class consisting of protestors who assembled on the evening of October 14, 2004 in Jacksonville, Oregon, which the Court granted in part. At the outset, the Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied Rule 23(a)'s numerosity and commonality requirements. Defendants argued that the typicality requirement was not satisfied because the different types of force each individual Plaintiff experienced during the events in question made them unsuitable as class representatives. The Court found this argument unpersuasive, holding that while claims of the named Plaintiffs were not identical, each was typical to the class as a whole as they were part of the same course of events, and were stating the same legal claims, and made the same legal arguments as the rest of the class. Further, the Court observed that only Plaintiffs' claims of unlawful arrest met the Rule 23(b)(3)'s requirement, while claims as to excessive force and assault fell short of the predominance requirement. The Court opined that Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants encircled demonstrators and restricted their movement in violation of their right to be free from unlawful arrest under the U.S. Constitution and Oregon law. Id. at *14. The Court observed that both claims met the predominance requirement, as such claims were certified as class actions in various case law precedents. Id. In contrast, the Court observed that Plaintiffs' claims of excessive force and assault were not appropriate for certification because individual questions predominated over the questions of law and fact common to the class. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' claims for use of excessive force fell short of the predominance requirement. The Court, likewise, found that Plaintiffs' claims for unlawful arrest met the superiority requirement. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification in part.

Secreti, et al. v. PTS Of America, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71752 (M.D. Tenn. June 3, 2015). Plaintiff, an inmate, brought a civil rights class action alleging that Defendant used excessive force in transporting him and other inmates in full restraints for more than 48 continuous hours. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant failed to provide him adequate access to toilet facilities and personal hygiene items, deprived him access to prescribed medication and medical staff, and deprived him of adequate sleep and exercise while being transported. Plaintiff asserted violations of his Fourth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights. Plaintiff moved for class certification, and the Court denied the motion. Plaintiff sought to certify a class of all inmates – including without limitation, adults and juveniles, males and females, pre-trial detainees, sentenced prisoners, state mental hospital inmates, and immigration detainees – who were transported by Defendant on behalf of local or state governments or the federal government in full restraints, including handcuffs, leg irons, and/or waist chains, for more than 48 continuous hours. Id. at *1. At the outset, the Court noted that it would have to exclude from any potential class inmates who were transported by Defendant but not subject to the alleged misconduct, and inmates who were transported by Defendant but suffered no injury. Excluding such inmates from the class would require individual determinations. Further, to determine whether individuals fit the class definition, the Court would have to determine whether inmates were in full restraints as opposed to some lesser type of restraints and whether the inmates' restraints were continuous for 48 hours, which again required looking at each individual's circumstances. Id. at *5. Additionally, the Court observed that the length of transport and also the type and frequency of food and drink provided, the number and nature of bathroom breaks provided, and the specific type of restraints used would vary among putative class members. Because the class definition proposed by Plaintiff covered different classifications of inmates, different circumstances, and different interests, the Court opined that ascertaining the class members would require making individual factual inquiries about the circumstances surrounding each potential class member's transportation and would result in numerous mini-trials. Id. at *6. Further, the Court noted that it must uphold any policy, practice, or custom that is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests. Therefore, before determining whether a class member's constitutional rights had been violated by any policy, practice, or custom, it would have to determine if there was a legitimate penological justification for the policy. Id. at *7. The Court found that the required balance of interests undoubtedly would differ between an adult and a juvenile, between a pre-trial detainee and a convicted and sentenced prisoner, or between a state mental hospital inmate and an immigration detainee, such that it would have to balance the interests as to each individual, not as to the class as a whole. Id. at *7-8. Moreover, although Plaintiff claimed that Defendant did not show a legitimate penological interest for its allegedly unconstitutional misconduct or that an administrative remedy was available, the Court stated that it was Plaintiff – and not Defendant – who had the burden of proof on this class certification issue. Id. at *8. The Court found that whether Defendant's alleged policy, practice, or custom served a legitimate penological purpose would depend on individualized factors and that such issues – that were central to the validity of each one of the claims – could not be resolved in one stroke. The Court, therefore, found that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate commonality. The Court also found typicality lacking because Plaintiff's claims depended upon his unique interactions with Defendant. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

(xx) Class Action Discovery Issues

Barreras, et al. v. Michaels Stores, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 54166 (N.D. Cal. April 24, 2015). Plaintiff, a former part-time sales associate, brought a putative class action for disability discrimination under various California employment laws. Plaintiff claimed that in 2010 when she requested a medical leave of absence, Defendant sent her a letter explaining that because she was unable to return to work, Defendant terminated her employment. Id. at *2. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant enforced a policy of wrongfully terminating the class members' employment due to their actual and perceived disabilities, and failing to offer reasonable accommodations or to engage in a good faith interactive process to determine what reasonable accommodations could be provided. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff sought to certify a class consisting of all California employees to whom Defendant sent a letter similar to that received by Plaintiff regarding termination of employment during the proposed class period. Id. at *3. During pre-certification discovery, Defendant objected to an interrogatory from Plaintiff seeking the names, addresses, and telephone numbers of the proposed class members, and contended that pre-certification discovery was prohibited until Plaintiff had presented evidence showing that she had satisfied the class action requirements or that the discovery was likely to produce substantiation of the class allegations. Id. at *7-8. In rejecting Defendant's argument, the Magistrate Judge opined that pre-certification discovery was largely within the discretion of the Court. Further, the Magistrate Judge noted that numerous case law precedents had reiterated that the disclosure of class members' contact information was a common practice in the pre-certification context. Id. at *8. Additionally, the Magistrate Judge found that Plaintiff in fact had made a prima facie showing that she met the class action requirements of Rule 23, at least for the purposes of pre-certification discovery. Id. at *9. Defendant further argued that the requested discovery would reveal confidential medical information about those individuals, i.e., namely that they requested statutory leaves of absence for personal reasons. The Magistrate Judge remarked that Defendant's argument was unpersuasive because all that would be revealed in this case was that the individuals sought a medical leave of absence and not the underlying condition that prompted the request. Id. at *10-11. Additionally, the Magistrate Judge reasoned that denying the requested discovery would essentially conclude Plaintiff's class claims before she had had any real chance to pursue them and would be tantamount to a merits determination. Id. at *11. The Magistrate Judge pointed out that the opt-out method that would be used would allow individuals to refuse to have their contact information disclosed, should any of them be particularly concerned about the revelation that they requested a medical leave of absence. Id. Finally, Defendant argued that Plaintiff's request was vague and ambiguous. The Magistrate Judge, however, found that disclosing the requested contact information was the only way of determining class members, and that the proposed class list of 253 individuals was not so substantial that it posed a burden. Id. at *11-12. To avoid discovery from being overbroad, the Magistrate Judge limited the requested discovery to those individuals who received a letter similar to that received by Plaintiff where the letter related to their own serious health conditions only. Id. at *13-14. The Magistrate Judge also directed the parties to discuss the option of a protective order regarding any privacy concerns about the contact information.

Campbell, et al. v. Facebook, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71961 (N.D. Cal. June 3, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendant scanned the content of their messages and putative class members' messages without their consent for use in connection with its "social plugin" functionality. Id. at *3. Defendant identified several deficiencies in Plaintiffs' responses to interrogatories, and moved to compel full and complete responses. The Court denied the motion. Defendant's interrogatories had asked Plaintiffs to identify all facts regarding the exact practices by Defendant that allegedly violated California and/or federal law, and whether Plaintiffs contended that the scanning of messages violated federal law and/or California law. Id. at *5-6. The Court observed that a party who seeks answers to contention interrogatories before substantial documentary or testimonial discovery has been completed must be able to show that there is good reason to believe that answers to its well-tailored questions will contribute meaningfully to clarifying the issues in the case, narrowing the scope of the dispute, or setting up early settlement discussions, or that such answers are likely to expose a substantial basis for a motion under Rule 11 or Rule 56. Id. at *10. The Court remarked that Defendant failed to demonstrate that its contention interrogatories were appropriate at this stage of the litigation. Defendant asserted that its interrogatories asked Plaintiffs to explain the precise conduct Plaintiffs contended was unlawful, and the factual basis for specific allegations in the consolidated amended complaint ("CAC"), contending that the conduct Plaintiffs challenged had been a moving target and that these interrogatories were necessary to determine the precise scope of the conduct at issue in this case. Id. at *11. Defendant, however, did not show how or why it remained unclear what precise conduct Plaintiffs intended to challenge. Although Defendant contended that Plaintiffs recently suggested that they could be challenging conduct much broader than that framed by the CAC, it did not explain or cite anything that indicated that Plaintiffs were changing theories or fundamentally altering their position in some way such that Defendant's interrogatories would contribute meaningfully to clarifying the issues in the case or narrowing the scope of the dispute. Id. at *13. The Court noted that the CAC contained detailed factual allegations about the conduct Plaintiffs challenged as unlawful, and contained allegations that addressed Defendant's concerns. Specifically, one interrogatory asked whether Plaintiffs were contending that the scanning of messages for any purpose violated federal law and/or California law, and Plaintiffs responded that as alleged in the operative complaint, Defendant's conduct of scanning their messages was a violation of federal and California law. The Court remarked that Defendant failed to show that this response was insufficient or how a response to its next interrogatory, which asked Plaintiff to identify all facts that support this response, was needed to clarify the issues in the case. Id. at *14. Finally, Defendant asserted that if the Court compelled Plaintiffs to respond now, Plaintiffs would have the opportunity to update their responses later and that they need not provide responses listing trivial or non-material matters. The Court, however, observed that if Plaintiffs were to respond now, their answers likely would be materially incomplete as soon as Defendant began its document production, and that the tentative nature of any responses generated at this stage would be of questionable value to the goal of efficiently advancing the litigation. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion.

Campbell, et al. v. Facebook, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 149931 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant improperly scanned the content of users' private messages in violation of the Federal Electronic Communications Privacy Act ("Wiretap Act") and California's Invasion of Privacy Act ("CIPA"). Earlier, the Magistrate Judge entered a discovery order.

Defendant now moved for relief from the Magistrate Judge's non-dispositive pre-trial order, which the Court denied. Defendant challenged two aspects of Magistrate Judge's discovery order. First, Defendant challenged the order to the extent it granted Plaintiffs' motion to compel a response to produce documents related to assigning a monetary value to Facebook users or related to revenue and profits generated from users' data and content. Second, Defendant challenged the order to the extent it granted Plaintiffs' motion to compel a response to produce documents related to Defendant's efforts to increase or maximize the presence of its "Like" social plug-in. Id. at *2-3. Defendant argued that the order was contrary to law for two primary reasons, as it addressed the requests for production en masse, rather than conducting an individualized relevance analysis of each request, and it improperly expanded the scope of discovery on the basis that no discovery supported or proved Plaintiffs' underlying theory. Id. at *3. The Court found no basis in Defendant's objection that the order improperly treated the RFP's en masse. The Court remarked that the order grouped together eight RFPs because they sought related categories of information and as such, it found no reason to conclude that the order's grouping together of eight RFPs related to damages was contrary to law. Id. at *4. Further, the Court found that the order properly discussed the discoverability of damages-related documents. The Court stated that the order properly concluded that Plaintiffs were entitled to discovery related to the scanning of putative class members' private messages and the potential benefit Defendant received as a result of obtaining information from those messages. Id. The Court noted that although, the order correctly held that Plaintiffs were entitled to discover how Defendant generated profit, it did not hold that Plaintiffs were entitled to information about hypothetical methods of generating profits that Defendant may have contemplated but not undertaken. Id. at *6. The Court concluded that it would enforce Plaintiffs' request only to the extent that they sought all documents and ESI relating to the assignment of monetary value to Defendant users or to the revenue and profits made from data received or content Defendant collected from the users. Similarly, as to the second contested request, the Court ruled that it would enforce it only to the extent that Plaintiffs sought all documents and ESI relating to efforts to increase and/or maximize the presence of the "Like" social plug-in on third-party websites. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion, finding that the reasoning set forth in the order was not contrary to law.

Chiquita Brands International, Inc., et al. v. U.S. Securities & Exchange Commission*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 12348 (D.C. Cir. July 17, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action against the U.S. Securities & Exchange Commission ("SEC") seeking to prevent disclosure of documents from a probe of payments it made to Autodefensas Unidas de Colombia ("AUC"), a global terrorist organization. Plaintiff pled guilty to engaging in unauthorized transactions with the AUC, produced thousands of documents related to the payments, and requested that the SEC treat the records it received confidentially and not release them under the Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA"). Id. at *2-3. The National Security Archive (the "Archive") issued two FOIA requests seeking documents related to the federal investigation of the AUC matter and any documents in the SEC's possession relating to Plaintiff's finances. Id. at *4. Plaintiff invoked FOIA Exemption 7(B), asserting that the release would deprive it of a fair trial particularly with respect to a Florida litigation because the Florida Plaintiffs would gain premature access to documents relevant to their claims and enjoy an unfair advantage. Id. at *6-7. The SEC rejected Plaintiff's argument, and Plaintiff brought this action alleging that the SEC arbitrarily failed to apply Exemption 7(B). The District Court granted summary judgment to the SEC. On Plaintiff's appeal, the D.C. Circuit affirmed. Plaintiff asserted that Exemption 7(B) should bar the release of all documents relevant to the Florida litigation until discovery in that case began. Exemption 7(B) protects against the release of records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes the disclosure of which would deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or an impartial adjudication. Id. at *11. The D.C. Circuit observed that "trial" is the ultimate determination of factual and legal claims by judge or jury in a judicial proceeding, and that Exemption 7(B) comes into play only when it is probable that the release of law enforcement records will interfere with the fairness of that final step. Id. at *12-13. Plaintiff argued that the phrase "fair trial" should be disregarded and the focus should be on Exemption 7(B)'s protection of an "impartial adjudication" and reasoned that the term "adjudication" applies to a decision made at any point during a judicial proceeding. Id. at *13-14. The D.C. Circuit noted that, under the Administrative Procedure Act, "adjudication" is the agency process for the formulation of an order, and "adjudication" as used in Exemption 7(B) refers to quasi-judicial decision-making by federal and state administrative agencies. Id. at *14. Thus, the D.C. Circuit opined that the phrase "impartial adjudication" as it appears in the statute refers to determinations made by administrative agencies, not to pre-trial decisions issued by a judge. Id. at *14-15. Further, the D.C. Circuit noted that a party invoking Exemption 7(B) must show that disclosure would impair his right to a fair trial, not merely that disclosure temporarily would disadvantage him during a single stage of a judicial proceeding. Id. at *19. The D.C. Circuit agreed with the SEC that Plaintiff had not met its burden of showing how releasing the law enforcement records to the Archive would deprive Plaintiff of a fair trial. Id. at *23-24. Plaintiff further contended that the SEC failed to consider adequately its argument that releasing the documents through FOIA would preclude it from seeking an appropriate protective order. Plaintiff argued that, if the documents were obtained through discovery, it could obtain a protective order prior to releasing the records to the Florida Plaintiffs. The D.C. Circuit found that Exemption 7(B) was not a tool to protect reputation and privacy interests unless the damage from disclosure was likely to impact the ultimate fairness of a trial. Id. at *26. Plaintiff did not claim that release of the documents would impair judicial fairness or bias potential jurors, nor did it explain how a trial in the Florida litigation would be rendered unfair because the Archive and the public had access to the documents at issue. Accordingly, the D.C. Circuit concluded that Exception 7(B) was inapplicable and affirmed the District Court's order granting summary judgment to the SEC.

In Re Bank Of New York Mellon Corp. Forex Transactions Litigation,* Case No. 11-CV-9175 (S.D.N.Y April 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of customers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants assigned fictitious foreign currency exchange rates to Plaintiffs' purchases and sales of foreign securities in violation of contractual guarantees. The U.S. Department of Justice and several other groups of private Plaintiffs also sued Defendants for civil penalties or alleged damages stemming from its foreign exchange practices. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants' standing instruction foreign exchange ("FX") service was marketed as providing its customers with best execution for FX transactions when, in truth and in fact, it did not and provided Defendants with exceptional profits at their customers' expense. Id. at *1. Defendants settled the government and customer cases, subject in some cases to Court approval, for more than $700 million and admitted in substance Plaintiffs' assertion regarding the standing instruction service and best execution allegations. This case, in which Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants misled its common stock purchasers, remained. Plaintiffs moved to eliminate the confidentiality protection for a handful of the millions of documents that Defendants designated as confidential, and the Court granted the motion. The documents included e-mails between and among Defendants' personnel concerning a variety of matters relating to the standing instruction program and the pricing of FX services. Id. The Court reviewed the documents and remarked that most documents were old, and parts of two e-mails had already been made public. All the documents appeared to relate to the fraud alleged in this case and, in some respects, fraud that Defendants admitted in cases that were pending for settlement approval. Under the circumstances, the Court ruled that Defendants failed to demonstrate good cause for maintaining the confidentiality of the documents. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to remove the confidentiality designations.

In Re Chiquita Brands International, Inc. Alien Tort Statute & Shareholder Derivative Litigation,* Case No. 08-MD-1916 (S.D. Fla. April 7, 2015). Plaintiffs brought putative class actions alleging that Defendants violated Columbian law, the Alien Tort Claims Act ("ATCA"), and the Torture Victims Protection Act ("TVPA") by funding, arming, and otherwise supporting the Autodefensas Unidas de Columbia ("AUC") paramilitary organization with knowledge that the AUC was a violent terrorist organization. The District Court suspended all discovery until resolution of Defendants' motions to dismiss Plaintiffs' initial complaints and entered a general stay of all proceedings until conclusion of an interlocutory appeal. The general stay remained in effect until January 6, 2015, when the Eleventh Circuit issued its mandate dismissing all of the ATCA and TVPA claims against Defendants. Plaintiffs then filed discovery motions seeking to perpetuate the discovery of Cyrus Freidheim – a former executive of Defendants who allegedly made or participated in Defendants' decision to make secret payments to the AUC – and the testimony of three high-level commanders in the AUC who allegedly had direct knowledge of Defendants' financial support of the AUC. Id. at 5. The District Court granted Plaintiffs' emergency request for the depositions of these paramilitary witnesses. The District Court found that Plaintiffs sufficiently had shown that the three witnesses likely would disappear and not cooperate after their release from Colombian prison, which could occur at any time. Id. at 9-10. The District Court, therefore, found a legitimate urgency to Plaintiffs' request to serve compulsory process and immediately depose the witnesses while they remained in the custody of the Columbian government and prison authorities. Id. Defendants argued that allowing the depositions to proceed during the pleading stage of the litigation would place an undue financial burden on them, theorizing that the cost of preparing for and taking the depositions would be wasted if the District Court ultimately granted Defendants' motions to dismiss. Id. at 10. Defendants also argued that it would be unfair to allow the taking of potential trial testimony from the paramilitary witnesses before Defendants had an opportunity to conduct general discovery on Plaintiffs' claims or to investigate the possibility that the witnesses might have been recipients of a witness-payment scheme in light of allegations that surfaced in another ATCA litigation pending in Alabama against Terrence Collingsworth, lead counsel for one of the ATCA groups in this action. Id. Although the District Court did not find any undue financial burden on Defendants posed by the proposed discovery, it found that, given Collingsworth's participation as ATCA counsel in both cases, and in light of uncontested evidence that the issue was discussed at a meeting of ATCA counsel in this proceeding, Defendants should be allowed an opportunity to conduct discovery on the witness-payment issue, under an accelerated schedule, before the parties deposed the paramilitary witnesses. Id. at 12. The District Court, therefore, allowed Defendants an opportunity to issue limited written discovery requests addressing the issue of witness-payments, gifts, or benefits of any kind or nature in this case. Id. Accordingly, the District Court granted Plaintiffs' motions for expedited discovery in part.

In Re Facebook Privacy Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 75962 (N.D. Cal. June 11, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant sent data to advertising companies that they could use to find consumer names and other personal details, without user consent, in violation of privacy laws. Id. at *2. Defendant moved to compel Plaintiff to produce documents concerning the creation of her Facebook account, her access to and review of Facebook's terms and conditions, the information publicly available on her Facebook page during the relevant time period, documents related to Plaintiff's non-privileged communications concerning the action, any documents relied upon by Plaintiff in responding to Defendant's interrogatories, and documents relating to Plaintiff's assertion that Defendant disclosed her personal and/or sensitive information. Id. at *3. Plaintiff argued that she had produced all responsive information in her custody or control. The Court denied Defendant's motion to compel, but ordered Plaintiff to submit a declaration explaining her search in detail. The Count found it "less than clear" that Plaintiff had conducted a diligent search because, among other things, she testified that she used two personal e-mail accounts from which she failed to produce any e-mail. Id. at *4. The Court directed Plaintiff to submit a declaration explaining her search in detail, including all sources searched and all search parameters used. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiff moved to compel production of names and contact information of putative class members, information regarding Defendant's advertising revenue and profit, and information about the value to Facebook users of their personally-identifiable information. Id. at *6. While the Court acknowledged that Plaintiff was entitled to contact information of putative class members before filing a motion for class certification, it noted the overwhelming burden associated with producing contact information and ad-click data for the entire putative class. Id. at *7-11. Therefore, to balance the burden of production with the benefits that might flow therefrom, the Court ordered Defendant to produce contact information and ad-click data for a sample of 5,000 individuals. Id. at *11. The Court, however, rejected Plaintiff's request for information about Defendant's advertising revenue and profit and Plaintiff's request for information regarding the value to Facebook users of their personally-identifiable information, finding that Plaintiff failed to substantiate how such information was relevant to class certification. Id. at *12-13. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part the parties' motions to compel.

In Re General Motors LLC Ignition Switch Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5199 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 15, 2015). In this multi-district class action litigation, Plaintiffs alleged that a defect in certain vehicles caused the vehicle's ignition switch to move unintentionally from the run position to the off position. Following the announcement of vehicle recalls, Defendant retained a law firm, Jenner & Block LLP ("Jenner") and its chairperson, Anton Valukas, to investigate the circumstances that led up to the recall. Id. at *222. Over 350 interviews with 230 witnesses were conducted, including with over 200 current and former employees. The Jenner lawyers produced attorney notes taken during the interviews; summaries created after each interview; and formal attorney memoranda created after the interviews (collectively, the "Interview Materials"). Id. at *223. Subsequently, Valukas presented a document ("Valukas Report"), which included citations to many of the witness interviews. Plaintiffs in Melton, et al. v. General Motors, LLC, Case No. 14-

A-1197-4 ("Melton II"), a related state court action in Georgia, moved to compel Defendant to produce various documents relating to the Valukas Report, and Defendants refused to produce the Interview Materials. Id. at *224-225. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion. The Court noted that the attorney-client privilege applies to communications between corporate counsel and a corporation's employees, made at the direction of corporate superiors in order to secure legal advice from counsel, and also extends to conversations between corporate counsel and former employees of the corporation, so long as the discussion related to the former employee's conduct and knowledge gained during employment. Id. at *230. The internal investigation and accompanying interviews were conducted by Jenner as part of the company's request for legal advice in light of possible misconduct and accompanying governmental investigations and civil litigation. Moreover, the employees interviewed were aware that the purpose of the interviews was to collect information to assist in providing legal advice to the company, and that the matters discussed were confidential. Further, although the investigation was conducted by outside counsel rather than in-house counsel, the Court thus opined that the attorney-client privilege applied to the portions of the Interview Materials reflecting communications between current and former employees, agents, and outside counsel of Defendant. Regarding the attorney work-product doctrine, the Court observed that Rule 26(b)(3) provides that ordinarily, a party may not discover documents and tangible things that are prepared in anticipation of litigation or for trial by or for another party or its representative. Id. at *244. To demonstrate that material is protected by the attorney work-product doctrine, a party need only show that, in light of the nature of the document and the factual situation in the particular case, the document can fairly be said to have been prepared or obtained because of the prospect of litigation. Id. at *245. Here, the interviews were conducted and the Interview Materials were prepared in light of the pending investigation of the U.S. Department of Justice and in anticipation of civil litigation. Further, the Court remarked that considering the nature of the documents at issue and the factual situation, it could fairly be said that the Interview Materials would not have been created in a similar form if Defendant had not been faced with the inevitability of such litigation. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' request for discovery of the Interview Materials on the independent ground that they constituted attorney work-product.

In Re JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 14721 (1st Cir. Aug. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of investors, brought a class action alleging that Defendant aided and abetted fraud in relation to a $150 million Ponzi scheme. According to the complaint, a customer used his accounts with Defendant and a predecessor bank to operate a Ponzi scheme that Defendant failed to detect and stop. Id. at *2. After the commencement of the action, a dispute arose as to whether Defendant shielded its records from discovery and litigation use under the Bank Secrecy Act (the "Act") and related regulations. Id. Plaintiffs filed the documents with the District Court, under seal, for a determination of whether the investigative file was privileged under the Act, which prohibits disclosure of suspicious activity reports ("SARs"). After extensive litigation, a Magistrate Judge presiding over the case issued a decision, holding that, with the exception of several pages from the investigative file, the documents were not privileged under the Act. Id. at *3. Defendant then filed a petition for a writ of mandamus with the First Circuit, arguing that the Act shielded 55 pages of records from evidentiary or other uses in the putative class action. Id. Defendant characterized them as "evaluative documents" and claimed that the documents were protected because they were prepared for purposes of determining Defendant's obligation under the Act and related regulations to report certain transactions to Financial Crimes Enforcement Network ("FinCEN"). Id. at *3-4. Conducting a de novo review of the files in camera, the First Circuit affirmed the Magistrate Judge's decision. The First Circuit determined that the documents at issue were not protected under the Act because none of the documents constituted a SAR or revealed the existence of a SAR. The First Circuit noted that the vast majority of the allegedly privileged documents featured only lists and descriptions of transactions, which were not encompassed by the Act or the regulations, but instead, constituted the underlying facts, transactions, and documents upon which a SAR was based, which are expressly declared exempt from the confidentiality obligation. Id. at *17-18. The First Circuit also opined that a careful de novo in camera review of the documents revealed that none of the documents at issue constituted a draft SAR, and none of the documents reflected the decision-making process as to whether a SAR should be filed, the process of preparing a SAR, or an attempt to explain the content of a SAR post filing. Id. at *18. The First Circuit rejected Defendant's invitation to view the "privilege" as extending to any document that might speak to the investigative methods of financial institutions, reasoning that it would be inconsistent with the portions of the regulations specifically exempting from protection the underlying facts, transactions, and documents upon which a SAR could be based. Id. at *21. The First Circuit therefore denied Defendant's petition for writ of mandamus.

In Re General Motors LLC Ignition Switch Litigation*, Case No. 14-CV-4798 (S.D.N.Y. April 17, 2015). In this multi-district product liability litigation, Plaintiffs sued an automobile manufacturer for a defect in certain vehicles that caused the vehicle's ignition switch to move unintentionally from the run position to the off position. Plaintiffs had sought production of certain documents in discovery, which Defendant believed were protected from discovery by attorney-client privilege, work-product protection, or other privileges and protections ("disputed documents"). Defendant, however, agreed to produce certain disputed documents ("produced documents") on the condition that, among other things, the production would not waive the attorney-client privilege or work-product protection or other privileges and protections with respect to any undisclosed communications or information, including work-product that Defendant may redact ("undisclosed information"). Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs agreed to not assert that the production of the produced documents would waive the attorney-client privilege or work-product protection or other privileges and protections with respect to any undisclosed information, provided that Defendant did not offensively use or make a selective or misleading presentation concerning the produced documents. Accordingly, the Court entered an order directing Defendant to produce the produced documents. In its order, the Court directed to inform Plaintiffs which of the documents were protected by discovery within seven days of production. Id. at *3. The Court permitted Defendant to redact portions of the produced documents that contained opinion work-product or highly sensitive non-responsive information. Id. at *4. The Court specifically ordered that disclosure of the produced documents did not constitute a waiver of attorney-client work-product, or of any other privileges or protections by Defendant. Id. at *5. The Court also ordered that if Defendant disclosed communications or information that Defendant thereafter claimed to be privileged or protected or beyond the scope of the order ("inadvertently disclosed information"), it shall not be considered a waiver of work-product protection. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court directed Defendant to produce the documents that Plaintiffs requested.

In Re Monitronics International, Inc. Telephone Consumer Protection Act Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51913 (N.D. W. Va. April 21, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by making telemarketing calls to numbers on the national "Do Not Call" Registry or to persons from whom they did not have consent. Plaintiffs sought to enforce the TCPA's limits on telemarketing calls placed through automated telephone dialing systems and artificial or pre-recorded voice messages and calls placed to numbers listed on the Do Not Call Registry. Id. at *4. In August of 2014, Plaintiffs served a request for inspection to Defendant, ISI Alarms NC, Inc. ("ISI"), requesting ISI to permit Plaintiffs to inspect the computers in ISI's office. ISI moved for a protective order. Following a hearing, the Court found that ISI had ceased its business operations in March of 2013, and Power Home Technologies ("PHT") had leased the building that ISI previously held and used the computers ISI owned. Because Plaintiffs were entitled to access information on the computers relevant to ISI, the Court directed ISI to disclose the images taken from 27 computers it owned, and to image a specific computer and two randomly selected units. Id. at *5-6. The Court also allowed PHT to seek protection from disclosure of information relating solely to PHT. The parties then entered into an agreement under which ISI agreed to produce a privilege log to Plaintiffs, the training computer, the two randomly selected units and Office 365 accounts. Id. at *9. ISI, however, failed to comply with several parts of the agreement, including failure to review the initially pulled back potential privileged documents, failure to produce non-privileged documents, and to provide a privilege log. Id. at *9-10. Plaintiffs therefore sought to enforce the Court's order by contending that, despite numerous compromises and genuine efforts to proceed without further intervention from the Court, ISI repeatedly failed to adhere to the deadlines agreed to by the parties. Specifically, Plaintiffs requested the Court to compel ISI to produce all documents from all of the imaged computers and 365 accounts, regardless of whether those documents had been pulled for reasons of potential privilege. Id. at *10. Although ISI did not respond to Plaintiffs' motion, before the Court could issue an appropriate order for Plaintiffs, the counsel for ISI informed the Court that the parties had reached a proposed resolution to this issue. Id. at *16. The Court ordered the parties to provide in writing the specifics of their proposed resolution within 24 hours. Id. The Court warned that if the parties failed to provide the specifics within the required time period, it would issue an appropriate order disposing of Plaintiffs' motion.

In Re Morning Song Bird Food Litigation,* Case No. 12-CV-1592 (S.D. Cal. Feb. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a nationwide class action alleging that Defendants, Scotts Miracle-Gro Company and Scotts Company LLC, marketed and sold toxic bird food throughout the country. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants continued to sell toxic bird food even after receiving warnings about the application of pesticides to the bird food products. Defendants pled guilty in January 2012 to a federal misdemeanor violation related to using unapproved pesticides. Id. at 2. During discovery, a dispute arose out of Plaintiffs' request to interview Defendants' former employees and contractors who might have information relevant to the use of pesticides in Defendants' bird food product. Asserting that the interviews might implicate subjects protected by the attorney-client privilege or work-product doctrine that were protected under confidentiality agreements, Defendants suggested that Plaintiffs "either depose the employee or interview the employee with a Defendants' attorney on the telephone for the limited purpose of protecting Defendants' interests." Id. at 4. Unable to agree on the terms of the interview, Plaintiffs filed an ex parte motion to limit confidentiality and to allow them to obtain informal discovery from those employees. Plaintiffs argued that Defendants used the confidentiality agreements with the former employees "to silence witnesses regarding Defendants' admittedly criminal acts, in violation of public policy." Id. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion. Although Plaintiffs intended to limit the scope of any confidentiality agreement on public policy grounds where employees might wish to assist in investigations of wrong-doing, the Court found no cases in support that allowed Plaintiffs to "be the sole arbiters of the confidentiality agreements." Id. at 7. The Court noted that Plaintiffs did not refer any provision of the agreements they sought to limit or describe any part of the agreement that they alleged to be overbroad or unenforceable. Id. at 8. Plaintiffs also failed to inform the Court of the exact language of the agreements they challenged, or the identities of the former employees and contractors they sought to interview, their job titles and a description of their roles, or the circumstances of their departures. Id. at 8. Plaintiffs neither offered any specific questions they proposed to ask the employees nor showed that Defendants' former employees and contractors declined to speak with them because of confidentiality agreements. Although Plaintiffs described the subject matter of the interviews as "limited to the issue of the use of pesticide on bird feed, including customer complaints," the Court found that the topic was not "limited" as it could be broadly construed, and did not restrict Plaintiffs' counsel from asking questions that would violate the terms of confidentiality agreements. Id. The Court therefore denied Plaintiffs' ex parte motion to limit confidentiality.

In Re NHL Players' Concussion Injury Litigation*, No. 13-CV-2551 (D. Minn. May 5, 2015). In this multi-district class action litigation brought by former NHL players seeking to hold Defendant responsible for the pathological debilitating effects of brain injuries caused by concussive and sub-concussive impacts sustained during their careers, the Court granted in part Defendant's motion for protective order concerning NHL Commissioner Gary Bettman's deposition. Citing the "apex doctrine," the Court noted that the doctrine protects high-level corporate officials from depositions unless: (i) the executive has unique or special knowledge of the facts at issue; and (ii) other less burdensome avenues for obtaining the information have been exhausted. Id. at 3. The Court observed that before a CEO or a similar high-level officer may be deposed, the party seeking the deposition must make a good faith effort to first pursue less burdensome sources for obtaining the requested information. Id. at 4. Plaintiffs argued that in their Rule 26 initial disclosures, Defendant identified Commissioner Bettman as one of the two most knowledgeable persons about all aspects of the game and business of NHL hockey specifically in response to Plaintiffs' master administrative long-form and class action complaint. Id. at 4. In support of their argument that Commissioner Bettman possessed unique knowledge concerning concussion injuries, Plaintiffs submitted Commissioner Bettman's public statements to Yahoo Sports on March 18, 2015 where he stated that the concussions had declined by moderate to low double-digits as a percentage, and a April 7, 2001 San Jose Mercury News article where he stated that the NHL analyzed tapes of all concussions and determined that two-thirds occurred on open ice. Id. at 4-5. Given that Defendant identified Commissioner Bettman as a person with knowledge about the matters at issue and in light of his two statements, the Court found that Commissioner Bettman possessed unique or special knowledge relevant to this lawsuit Id. at 6. The Court, noted Defendant's position that Commissioner Bettman be deposed last, and its objection to him being deposed first. Defendant contended that the Court should instead adopt a "wait and see" approach, requiring Plaintiffs to first seek information about Commissioner Bettman's knowledge via written discovery, or seek similar information from lower-level NHL employees. Id. The Court remarked that Defendant's point was valid that in order to adequately prepare Commissioner Bettman for his testimony, and it should first produce the relevant documents in the Commissioner's custody. Id. at 7. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Commissioner Bettman could be deposed after the written discovery was produced and after other priority fact witnesses are deposed. Id. The Court reasoned that this would not cause any hardship to Plaintiffs, and accordingly, granted Defendant's motion in part.

In Re NHL Players' Concussion Injury Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 33230 (D. Minn. Mar. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former professional hockey players, brought various actions throughout the country alleging that Defendant failed to warn players of the short and long-term effects of repeated concussions and head trauma. Plaintiffs contended that Defendant's actions and inactions resulted in players' increased incidence of, or risk of incidence of, serious brain diseases, and increased the speed and severity of players' mental decline following retirement. Id. at *3. Defendant asserted that it had a strong record of player safety and that the risks associated with playing in the NHL were known to Plaintiffs. Id. After consolidation of similar cases for pre-trial proceedings, Plaintiffs filed a master class action complaint on behalf of six named Plaintiffs, asserting various claims against Defendant including negligence, fraudulent concealment, failure to warn, and medical monitoring. Id. at *3-4. As part of fact discovery related to class certification as well as merit-based discovery, Defendant served interrogatories on all Plaintiffs named in any complaint that was transferred to, or filed in, this proceeding. Id. at *4. Defendant thereafter moved to compel Plaintiffs to produce a full list of healthcare professionals who had provided medical care to them for any condition since they began playing hockey at a competitive level, and attached a medical records disclosure authorization form. Id. The Court granted Defendant's motion in part and denied it in part. First, Plaintiffs argued that Defendant was only entitled to discovery concerning the six named Plaintiffs identified in the master complaint, noting that the master complaint served as the operative complaint in this matter. Id. at *9-10. The Court agreed with Defendant's argument that a master complaint operates in the place of individual complaints for pre-trial purposes, but pointed out that it does not supersede them. Id. at *10. Moreover, the Court observed that, consistent with that understanding, Defendant had moved to dismiss the master complaint aimed at the individual claims asserted by the six proposed class representatives. Id. Thus, the Court found the master complaint served as the operative complaint in this case. Id. As a result, the Court limited initial discovery to the six named Plaintiffs, consistent with other cases involving putative class actions. Id. at *12. The Court opined, however, that if Plaintiffs sought discovery of the NHL regarding a broader class of Plaintiffs who had filed suit, in the interests of parity, it would require the remaining 24 Plaintiffs who had brought suit but were absent putative class members to comply with Defendant's discovery requests. Id. at *12-13. Plaintiffs also objected to the apparently unlimited temporal scope of the requested information. Defendant agreed to Plaintiffs' proposed limit of the discovery of player's medical information to a period from age 15 to the present. The Court found that that was a reasonable limitation. Id. at *13. Finally, regarding the range of medical information encompassed by Defendant's interrogatories, Plaintiffs objected to the discovery as impermissibly broad. Plaintiffs contended that the discovery should be limited to medical providers, including general practitioners, who provided services related to the head or brain. Id. at *13. Plaintiffs also specifically objected to language in the medical records authorization form that included records regarding HIV, AIDS, and sexually transmitted diseases. Id. The Court held that while the most relevant medical information in this case would concern treatment of the head or brain, other medical conditions or treatment may also be relevant. Id. at *14-15. The Court concluded, however, that highly-sensitive information was not relevant unless individual discovery later warranted the production of such information. Id. at *15.

In Re Target Corp. Customer Data Security Breach Litigation,* Case No. 14-CV-2522 (D. Minn. May 5, 2015). In this action relating to the 2013 massive data breach which compromised as many as 40 million credit and debit card accounts and personal information of Target Corp.'s customers, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for relief from or modification to the protective order to compel the production of improperly clawed back documents to the extent the motion sought an order concluding that Defendant had waived the attorney-client privilege and work-product protection for the documents at issue. Id. at 23. The Court also denied the motion to the extent Plaintiffs requested to be relieved from any obligation to return or destroy any copies of the 3,095 documents at issue and ordered Plaintiffs to return or destroy the documents within fourteen days of the order. Id. at 23-24. Defendant produced the 3,095 documents at issue shortly after the 2013 data breach incident occurred that precipitated this action and after receiving a subpoena from the U.S. Security Exchange Commission ("SEC"). Defendant collected over 1.7 million documents by March 2014 in response to the subpoena and set up a process for reviewing its documents to determine their relevance and to protect the privileged documents. Id. at 5-6. After Defendant completed the review process and produced documents to the SEC, Defendant also produced a number of documents to the Federal Trade Commission and to the attorney generals of several states (collectively "government entities"), each of which had requested documents from Defendant about the data security breach. Id. at 8. Before Defendant's counsel became aware that Defendant's production to the SEC and government entities contained a large number of allegedly privileged materials, Defendant produced approximately 39,000 documents to Plaintiffs on October 20, 2014. When Defendant re-reviewed the documents it produced to the SEC and the government entities, it discovered that it included numerous privileged documents, and because Defendant produced the same material to Plaintiffs that it had previously given to the SEC in the production, Plaintiffs also received a large number of privileged or protected documents from Defendant. Id. at *10-11. Defendant then demanded Plaintiffs return or destroy those documents. Plaintiffs contended that Defendant had intentionally waived the attorney-client privilege and work-product protection for all documents at issue because it had intentionally produced the documents to the government entities, and when it realized those documents might hurt its position in this action, it changed its mind. Id. at 12-13. Defendant sought guidance from the Court. The Court found that Defendant had not waived protection for its privileged and work-product protected documents. The Court noted that Defendant had employed reasonable methods for reviewing electronically-stored documents and had taken reasonable precautions to protect attorney-client privileged communications and confidential work-product. Id. at 14-15. The Court opined that there was no basis to conclude that Defendant acted unreasonably in developing its approach to conducting a privilege review or that Defendant intentionally disclosed the information to government entities and then changed its mind later. Id. at 15. The Court pointed out that the production was of larger magnitude, and reviewing 230,000 documents was no small undertaking. Defendant had hired several contract attorneys, staffed the review project with attorneys employed by a large law firm with senior attorneys overseeing the entire process, and provided a reasonable explanation for why the review did not identify certain privileged documents. Id. at 18. Thus, even though the number of documents Defendant sought to claw-back appeared quite high, the Court ruled that Defendant did not waive its privilege and work-product protections. Id. at 19. The Court therefore ordered Plaintiffs to comply with Defendant's claw-back request.

In Re Target Corp. Customer Data Security Breach Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 151974 (D. Minn. Oct. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought multi-district litigation alleging that they suffered economic damage from Defendant's 2013 data breach that allegedly compromised their personal information. The Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' motion to compel Defendant to produce certain documents that Defendant withheld from production and identified on its privilege log. Id. at *3. First, Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant improperly raised claims of attorney-client privilege and work-product protection for items relating to the Data Breach Task Force, a group that Defendant established in response to the data breach that precipitated this action. Id. at *4. The Court disagreed. Defendant asserted that it established the Data Breach Task Force at the request of Defendant's in-house lawyers and its outside counsel to educate the attorneys about aspects of the breach and to enable the attorneys to give legal advice. Id. at *5. Second, Plaintiffs contended that Defendant improperly asserted privilege for communications prepared by Verizon, a company that Defendant retained to investigate the data breach. The Court disagreed. Defendant explained that, as to Verizon, it only claimed privilege and work-product protection for documents involving one team from the Verizon Business Network Services, which Defendant's outside counsel engaged to enable counsel to provide legal advice. Id. at *6. Third, Plaintiffs sought the production of redacted information in e-mail communications that reflected updates to Defendant's Board of Directors in the aftermath of the data breach. The Court ordered Defendant to produce the documents. It noted that the redacted communications from Defendant's Chief Executive Officer merely provided updates to the Board of Directors on what Defendant's business-related interests were in response to the breach and did not involve any confidential communications between an attorney and a client, contain requests for discussion necessary to obtain legal advice, or include the provision of legal advice. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion regarding the redacted communications from Defendant's CEO updating the Board of Directors, but denied the motion as to the other privilege log entries. Id. at *10.

Johnson, et al. v. Ford Motor Co.,* Case No. 13-CV-6529 (S.D. W. Va. Oct. 26, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that some of Defendant's vehicles produced between 2002 and 2010 were prone to sudden, unintended acceleration and that the company failed to install fail-safe systems that would allow the drivers to physically prevent or mitigate the problem. The Magistrate Judge ordered Defendant to engage in additional discovery relating to its engineering of the electronic throttle control ("ETC") system and the receipt and investigation of unintended acceleration incidents. Id. at 1. Defendant filed Rule 72 objections to the Magistrate's Order, which the Court denied. Defendant argued that the discovery order was unduly burdensome, would require it to produce documents and witnesses concerning matters already covered by previous discovery, and would impose substantial expenses. The Court noted that pursuant to Rule 72(a), it may reverse the Magistrate Judge's determination of a non-dispositive motion only if it is clearly erroneous or contrary to law. The Court found that after reading the parties' papers and hearing arguments, the Magistrate Judge narrowed down the permitted discovery and precisely listed what discovery would go forward and under what conditions. Id. at 2. The Court determined that the Magistrate Judge considered Rule 26 and appropriately balanced the burden of additional discovery with its benefits. The Court further found that the Magistrate Judge considered and appreciated the complexity and cost of the discovery that had already taken place. The Court acknowledged that Defendant had expended substantial time and resources to comply with discovery to this point; however, it was satisfied that overall discovery ordered by the Magistrate Judge was reasonable and proportional. Id. at 3. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's objections.

Payton, et al. v. Kale Realty, LLC,* Case No. 13-CV-8002 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 20, 2015). Plaintiff, an Illinois citizen, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by sending him unsolicited text message advertisements. According to the complaint, Defendant Kale Realty, LLC directed Defendant VoiceShot, LLC, a web-based communications common carrier, to send Plaintiff and other putative class members unsolicited commercial text messages on their cellular telephones using an automatic telephone dialing system. Id. at 1. VoiceShot moved for summary judgment arguing, in part, that it could not be liable under the TCPA because it was merely a conduit used to transmit text messages allegedly sent by Kale Realty. Id. In order to respond to this argument, Plaintiff filed a motion to compel VoiceShot to produce documents related to the stated defense, as well as an appropriate Rule 30(b)(6) deponent who could explain the working mechanism of VoiceShot's telecommunications system. Id. at 1-2. After the Court granted the motion, Plaintiff served a deposition notice identifying six topics on which the deponent should testify. Although VoiceShot unduly delayed the production of requested documents, it ultimately produced the documents and identified Mark Schwartz, the President of Covatron, Inc., a 50% member of Voice Shot, as its deponent. Id. at 3. Plaintiff took Schwartz's deposition on October 30, 2014. Plaintiff filed a motion to hold VoiceShot in contempt, alleging that Schwartz was deliberately evasive during questioning on even basic issues. Id. The Magistrate Judge recommended granting Plaintiff's motion. The Magistrate Judge noted that, although VoiceShot designated Schwartz as the person most knowledgeable about the mechanics of its telecommunications system and the technology used to send the text messages at issue, he spent most of his October 2014 deposition essentially refusing to answer even basic questions in any meaningful way. Id. According to the Magistrate Judge, Schwartz's lack of cooperation was likely an effort to avoid discussing VoiceShot's use of an automatic dialing system to place commercial text messages, which violated the TCPA. Id. at 10. VoiceShot argued that Schwartz was merely being "careful with his language" because it was his first deposition and blamed the mutual difficulty the parties had communicating on the fact that the examination was conducted telephonically. Id. The Magistrate Judge, however, disagreed, pointing out Schwartz's obstructionist testimony as well as the absence of evidence that VoiceShot's counsel made any effort during a break or otherwise to admonish Schwartz about his evasive responses. Id. at 11. The Magistrate Judge found that VoiceShot and its designated witness did not engage in a good faith effort to answer completely reasonable questions, but instead purposefully sought to avoid answering or providing any useful information. On this basis, the Magistrate Judge determined that a finding of contempt was appropriate, and recommended granting Plaintiff's motion to hold VoiceShot in contempt. Id. at 12. The Magistrate Judge also recommended that the Court order VoiceShot to pay a total of $6,051 in attorneys' fees and $245.05 in costs, for a total sanction of $6,296.05. Id. at 19.

Texas Roadhouse, Inc. v. EEOC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 25468 (W.D. Ky. Mar. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a declaratory judgment action alleging that the EEOC failed to issue a determination on Plaintiffs' three initial Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA") requests and failed to produce documents responsive to those requests within the required statutory timeframe. Following the EEOC's age discrimination investigation, Plaintiffs had filed the three separate FOIA requests with the EEOC. Subsequent to filing of this suit, the EEOC issued determinations as to FOIA requests 1 through 3 and produced some of the requested records, thereby making Plaintiffs' claim moot. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs then submitted a fourth FOIA request, for which the EEOC sent a letter to Plaintiffs estimating the cost associated with searching for responsive documents at over $24,500 and advised Plaintiffs that the EEOC would not process the request further until Plaintiffs notified it that they were willing to pay the fees incurred. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs represented that they still had not received the EEOC's determination about the fourth request and, thus, amended their complaint to assert that claim against the EEOC. The EEOC moved to dismiss the amended complaint, primarily arguing that Plaintiffs failed to exhaust their administrative remedies. The Court granted the motion. The Court found that Plaintiffs did not challenge the adequacy of the EEOC's belated production of documents in their amended complaint. Id. at *8. Instead, Plaintiffs alleged in both the complaint and amended complaint that the EEOC failed to provide either a determination regarding, or the documents responsive, to Plaintiffs' funds request. Id. Plaintiffs argued that they constructively exhausted their administrative remedies by filing suit before the EEOC made any determination or produced any documents. The Court remarked that while the constructive exhaustion provision allows a person making a FOIA request to break out of the administrative process and proceed directly to federal court in the face of an unresponsive agency, a difficulty arises when the agency responds after the lawsuit is initiated. Id. at *11. Because Plaintiffs had not challenged the adequacy of the response in their amended complaint, the Court found that Plaintiffs must first exhaust their administrative remedies before seeking judicial review of those matters. Id. at *11-13. Finally, regarding the fourth FOIA request, although Plaintiffs submitted that they did not receive the reasonable fee requirement letter and therefore had not failed to exhaust administrative remedies, the EEOC argued that Plaintiffs did receive a copy of the letter because it had attached the letter to the motion to dismiss. Id. at *14-15. The EEOC maintained that Plaintiffs failed to provide any assurance to the EEOC of their willingness to pay the assessed fee. Id. at *15. Thus, given the current status of the fourth FOIA request, as well as the remaining FOIA claims, the Court dismissed without prejudice Plaintiffs' fourth FOIA request claim so that Plaintiffs first could respond to the reasonable fee request letter and then administratively exhaust the claim.

Troice, et al. v. Proskauer Rose LLP,* Case No. 09-CV-1600 (N.D. Tex. Mar. 9, 2015). In this action brought by Plaintiffs, a group of investors in Stanford Investment Bank ("SIB"), alleged that Defendants, Proskauer Rose LLP and Chadbourne & Parke LLP, violated the provisions of the Texas Securities Act and/or aided and abetted in the violation of the provisions of the Texas Securities Act by misrepresenting the investment quality of SIB's certificates of deposit. Defendants brought a motion to compel the receiver, Ralph S. Janvey, to produce documents related to class certification. Defendants subpoenaed the receiver in November 2014, requesting him to produce documents they claimed were critical to its analysis of Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. The Court, however, found that the requests for a list of names, addresses, telephone numbers, and other contact information for each claimant in the putative class were "not reasonably related to proof of class certification issues." Id. at *4. Further, the receiver had already provided a spreadsheet identifying claims-related information for more than 13,000 claim groups, and according to the Court, the specific names and contact information of putative class members was not necessary to determine issues such as numerosity, common questions, and adequacy of representation under Rule 23. Id. The Court also denied several other requests for information, including requests for any notices of deficiency distributed by the receivership estate to potential claimants, on the grounds that Defendants failed to establish how such information bore relation to any class certification issues. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to compel.

(xxi) Class-Wide Proof And Class-Wide Damages In Class Actions

Astrazeneca AB, et al. v. UFCW Union And Employers Midwest Health Benefits Fund,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 968 (1st Cir. Jan. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of union health and welfare funds that reimburse plan members for prescription drugs, brought an action against Defendant AstraZeneca, alleging anti-competitive conduct in the sale of a heartburn drug called Nexium. Defendant, who owned several patents related to the Nexium compound, had sued three generic drug companies who sought to market a generic form of Nexium, alleging infringement of some of the Nexium patents. Defendant eventually settled with each generic manufacturer by paying significant sums in exchange for not challenging the validity of the Nexium patents and for delaying the launch of its respective generic products until the two main patents covering the drug product itself expired on May 27, 2014. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs contended that, but for Defendant's anti-competitive conduct, a generic version of Nexium would have been available as early as April 2008, and that Defendant had overcharged for Nexium from April 14, 2008 to at least May 27, 2014. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs also alleged that the Nexium patents were invalid because they would have been obvious in light of Defendant's earlier patents and other references, and that the settlement agreements between Defendant and the generic companies constituted unlawful agreement not to compete because of the likely invalidity of the Nexium patents, the size of Defendant's payments to the generic companies, and the fact that generic companies provided nothing to Defendant other than an agreement not to compete. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs claimed damages under the antitrust and consumer protection laws of 24 states and the District of Columbia, and sought certification for a class of third-party payors ("TPPs"), such as Plaintiffs and individual consumers. The District Court granted certification. Defendant appealed and contended that class certification was improper because the class included individuals who were not injured by general foreclosure, i.e., individual consumers who would have continued to purchase branded Nexium for the same price after generic entry. According to Defendant, the existence of these more than a de minimis uninjured class members precluded the use of common proof at trial, and thus defeated the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3). The First Circuit disagreed and affirmed the District Court's class certification order . The First Circuit found that class certification was permissible even if the class included a de minimis number of uninjured parties, and it had not been shown at this stage that future proceedings would not be manageable. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs' theory of liability here was appropriately limited as they only required that Defendant pay aggregate damages equivalent to the injury that they caused. Id. at *17. While it was true that the pay-out of the amount for which Defendant would be liable must be limited to the injured parties and Plaintiffs have not yet proposed a proper mechanism for exclusion of uninjured class members, the First Circuit noted that there was nothing which showed that such a mechanism could not be developed in future. Id. at *20-21. The First Circuit explained that there appeared at least two ways that the consumer could establish injury: (i) either through a presumption that economically rational consumers faced with two identical products would purchase the less expensive alternative, or (ii) through testimony that, given the choice, the consumer would have purchased the generic. Id. at *21-22. Thus, according to the First Circuit, a mechanism would exist for establishing injury at the liability stage of the case, and Defendant's speculation that a mechanism for exclusion of uninjured members could not be developed later did not defeat the class certification requirements. Defendant argued that more than a de minimis number of class members were uninjured, thereby barring class certification. The First Circuit, however, noted that Plaintiffs had shown that the vast majority of the class members were probably injured, and a "rigorous analysis" of Plaintiffs' expert testimony did not show that the number of uninjured was more than de minimis. The First Circuit further opined that a certified class might include a de minimis number of potentially uninjured parties as numerous case law precedents had certified classes even though Plaintiffs have not been able to use common evidence to show harm to all class members. The First Circuit reasoned that Defendant's objections to certifying a class including uninjured members ran counter to fundamental class action policies. Id. at *27-36. Accordingly, the First Circuit affirmed the District Court's grant of class certification.

Grodzitsky, et al. v. American Honda Motor Co., Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64683 (C.D. Cal. April 22, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant sold cars with defective window regulators. According to the complaint, the glass of the side window affixed to a carrier bracket that was pulled upwards or downwards by cables anchored to the carrier. The cables had metal balls or ferrules at each end that were anchored into ferrule inserts on the polymer component of the carrier. The vehicles used polymer ferrule insert made from either polyoxymethylene ("POM") or polybutylene terephthalate ("PBT"). Id. at *4. Plaintiffs asserted that this polymer carrier ferrule insert was defective because it was insufficiently strong to bear the load of the window and therefore the window regulators were prone to premature and repeated failure. Id. at *5. Seeking to represent a nationwide class of similarly-situated consumers, Plaintiffs asserted claims under California's Consumer Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA") and Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"). Following the initial denial of class certification, Plaintiffs proposed alternative classes for certification. The proposed alternatives included: (i) a class of only California purchasers/lessees of the class vehicles; (ii) a class of only California purchasers/lessees of those class vehicles with window regulators using POM in the ferrule insert; or (iii) three California sub-classes corresponding to the three vehicle platforms owned by the proposed class representatives. Id. at *28. For each of these alternatives, Plaintiffs sought to certify an "owner class" for the purposes of seeking prospective declaratory relief and a "damages class" for all who have already experienced failures. Id. The Court denied the motion, finding that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate commonality. Although Plaintiffs submitted numerous common questions, the Court found that each question turned on proof of a common defect. Id. at *32. The Court held that Plaintiffs adduced no evidence, beyond an expert's testimony, that a common defect existed across all class vehicles or even across all class vehicles with POM carrier ferrule inserts. Id. The Court determined that the expert's opinion – that the class vehicles suffered from a common defect, that the POM carrier ferrule inserts were uniform and common, and that the POM carrier ferrule inserts were more defective than the PBT ferrule inserts – was inadmissible. Id. at *33. In describing his methodologies, Plaintiffs' expert admitted that he examined ten window regulator assemblies, but performed no tests upon them. Id. Plaintiff's expert further admitted that he was not aware of or relying on any other experts' durability or performance testing of the carrier ferrule insets, and did not propose performing any experiments in the future to show the existence of a common defect. Id. Even assuming the testimony's admissible, the Court found that Plaintiffs' expert failed to show that either the proposed California class members or the POM class members all suffered the same injury. Further, the three proposed sub-classes included no less than four model years, and Defendant submitted evidence that, even though the platform remained the same, design revisions existed within that platform. Id. at *35. Plaintiffs failed to address whether the window regulators were the same in all relevant ways through the proposed sub-class platform's run, and thus failed to establish that each of the proposed sub-classes' members suffered a common injury. Id. at *36. Because each of the asserted common questions relied on existence of a common injury, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to carry their burden of showing the existence of common questions of law or fact. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' renewed motion for class certification.

Gulino, et al. v. Board Of Education Of The City School District Of The City Of New York,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125979 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of African-American and Latino individuals, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant's LAST-1 exam violated Title VII as it had a disparate impact on African-American and Latino test-takers. Id. at *2. After sixteen years of litigation, the Court certified a remedy-phase class pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3), and appointed a Special Master to oversee the phase, which included resolution of both class-wide and individual issues. Id. On July 17, 2015, the Special Master issued an Interim Report and Recommendation (the "Report") which recommended denying Defendant's motions to permit class-wide calculation of attrition and to cut-off damages for claimants who failed to obtain a teaching position after ultimately passing the LAST-1. Id. at *3. The Court conducted a careful de novo review of the Report and adopted it in full. Id. at *5. Although Defendant claimed that a class-wide 25% reduction was warranted because only 75% of applicants who passed the LAST-1 and fulfilled all other requirements were hired as full-time teachers, the Court denied any such reduction pointing out that class members, who failed the LAST-1 but were otherwise qualified, would have received a full teaching license and been hired as a full-time teacher, given the large number of vacancies during the time period at issue. Id. at *19-20. To the extent Defendant believed that a specific class member would not have been hired for some non-discriminatory reason, the Court noted that Defendant would have the opportunity to raise its argument at the class member's individual hearing. Id. at *20. Defendant also argued that any damage award should be reduced to reflect the reality that not all teachers remain in their position until retirement, and thus damages should be adjusted on a class-wide basis to account for the statistical outcomes of non-class comparators. Id. at *20-21. The Court, however, agreed with the Special Master that a class-wide reduction of based on attrition was inappropriate as class-wide calculations would under-compensate some class members and over-compensate others, and thus individualized determinations would best recreate what would have occurred absent discrimination. Id. at *21. Finally, Defendant argued that individual hearings would result in a windfall to Plaintiffs and a punitive back pay award. The Court recognized the possibility that Defendant might over-compensate some claimants, but held that Title VII's goal of restoring Plaintiffs to the position they would have achieved absent discrimination could be reached here only by examining each claimant's circumstances and estimating damages. Id. at *22. According to the Court, individual hearings would best ensure that the requirements of Title VII were met and that claimants were properly compensated, and to the extent that individual hearings might result in the overcompensation of some individuals, it must be tolerated as an inevitable consequence of a process that was designed to tailor awards as closely as possible to the damage suffered by the claimant. Id. at *22-23. The Court therefore agreed with the Special Master that disputes concerning a hearing decision and attrition should be resolved through individual hearings rather than class-wide reductions. Id. at *24. Because the mere fact that a claimant eventually passed the LAST-1 did not necessarily warrant the conclusion that his or her inability to gain employment was unrelated to the discriminatory effects of the test, the Court held that a claimant who passed the LAST-1 but did ultimately secure a permanent teaching position was not categorically barred from a back pay award, and such an issue could be resolved on a case-by-case basis at individual hearings. Id. at *24-25. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to adjust damages for attrition on a class-wide basis and to cut-off damages for claimants who failed to obtain permanent teaching positions after passing the LAST-1.

In Re Wilmington Trust Securities Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 117423 (D. Del. Sept. 3, 2015). In this consolidated securities fraud class action, Plaintiffs, a group of investors, alleged that Defendants engaged in an overarching bank fraud conspiracy that was designed to fraudulently conceal Defendant Wilmington Trust Corporation's ("WTC") true financial condition, causing WTC to misrepresent its reporting of past due and non-performing loans. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs moved for class certification. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the predominance requirement as they did not present a proposed class-wide damages methodology and did not provide proof of damages. Id. at *5-6. Defendants argued that pursuant to Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, U.S. 133 S. Ct. 1426 (2013), Plaintiffs must show that damages can be calculated on a class-wide rather than individual basis. Id. The Court, however, noted that in Neale v. Volvo Cars of North America, LLC, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 12629 (3d Cir. July 22, 2015), the Third Circuit found that whatever ramifications for antitrust damages models or proving antitrust impact are established by Comcast, it must consider carefully all relevant evidence and make a definitive determination that the requirements of Rule 23 have been met before certifying a class. Id. at *6. Consistent with the Third Circuit's analysis, the Court concluded that class certification is not defeated when there are individual issues with respect to the calculation of damages. Id. The Court further reasoned that Plaintiff's theory that there is a common, class-wide methodology to calculate damages based on its expert's event study methodology was adequate to establish predominance. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for certification.

Kamakahi, et al. v. American Society For Reproductive Medicine,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12677 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of egg donors, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants' guidelines regarding appropriate compensation for egg donors constituted a horizontal price fixing agreement in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. Plaintiffs sought certification of a nationwide class of women who donated eggs between April 2007 and the present to any clinic that was a member of Defendants' organization and followed price rules set by them, or to an agency that, at the time of the donation, had agreed to follow those rules. Id. at *10. The Court granted the motion on the question whether Defendants violated the Sherman Act and reserved the issue of damages until after adjudication of the antitrust violation. In granting Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, the Court found that Plaintiffs established the numerosity requirement as the proposed class consisted of thousands of women dispersed throughout the country. Plaintiffs established the commonality requirement by raising the common question of whether Defendants' guidelines violated the antitrust laws. Id. at *47. Plaintiffs also satisfied the typicality requirement as the guidelines limiting appropriate compensation applied to the class as a whole. Plaintiffs, however, satisfied the predominance requirement only with regard to whether Defendants' guidelines violated the Sherman Act, but not with regard to damages and antitrust impact. Although Plaintiffs argued that documentary evidence and a regression analysis by their expert witness, Dr. Hal Singer, could show the extent of each class member's damages, the Court excluded Dr. Singer's report based on Defendants' motion to strike. The Court found that Dr. Singer's analysis did not reliably support his conclusion that antitrust impact or damages could be shown through class-wide proof. Plaintiffs identified only three agencies that signed an agreement to adhere to Defendants' price rules and the regression analysis relative to these agencies produced significantly different conclusions concerning the impact on the guidelines. Id. at *36-38. Further, neither Plaintiffs nor Dr. Singer explained the variations between the agencies, or how the disparate results could be applied to other agencies or clinics. Id. The Court therefore found that Dr. Singer's analysis did not reliably support class-wide proof of impact or damages, and thus irrelevant to the issue of class certification. Id. at *44. The Court held that failure to demonstrate class-wide damage did not bar certification to determine whether a violation occurred, and resolving the violation issue on a class-wide basis would be far more efficient for both the parties. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification in part for the purpose of determining whether Defendants' compensation guidelines violated the Sherman Act.

Lambert, et al. v. Nutraceutical Corporation.,* Case No. 13-CV-5942 (C.D. Cal. Feb. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of dietary supplement purchasers, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), False Advertising Law ("FAL"), and Consumer Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA"). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant falsely marketed its product as having beneficial health and aphrodisiac properties and being scientifically formulated to improve virility even though none of the ingredients in it provided such benefits. Id. at 2. The Court certified a class in April 2014 based on Plaintiffs' proposal of calculating damages using a full-refund damages model theory that relied on Defendant's sales numbers and an average retail price for the supplement. Under the model, each class member would be entitled to receive a full refund because none of them benefitted from the product. Id. at 6. Plaintiffs relied on Defendant's sales data at the certification stage. While the Court anticipated calculating damages using Defendant's sales data and an average retail price, after discovery Plaintiffs sought to establish monetary relief on a class-wide basis through Defendant's sales data alone. Defendant argued that its sales data by itself could not be used to calculate damages under Plaintiffs' full refund model, and therefore moved for decertification of the class. Id. at 7. The Court agreed and granted Defendant's motion. The Court found that the average retail price was essential in this action because it was the average retail price that could reflect the price class members actually paid. Id. at 7-8. The Court pointed out that "[a]lthough the average retail price does not have to be exact, it is nevertheless critical at this stage of the litigation." Id. at 8. According to the Court, missing this calculation was a defect in Plaintiffs' evidence that was fatal to their class claims because restitution serves to provide what the class members lost, not what Defendant gained. Id. Although Plaintiffs contended that damages could be calculated based solely on Defendant's sales data, they did not explain how to do so without the average retail price. Id. at 9. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to provide the key evidence necessary to apply a class-wide model of damages. Id. at 11. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for decertification of the class.

(xxii) Multi-Party Litigation Under The WARN Act

Calloway, et al. v. Caraco,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 15058 (6th Cir. Aug. 26, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, a pharmaceutical manufacturer, violated the WARN Act when it engaged in a 2009 mass lay-off of employees without providing 60 days' notice. Beginning several years before the mass lay-off, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration ("FDA") issued numerous notifications to Defendant outlining regulatory violations related to its products and processes and warning that failure to correct the violations could result in an enforcement action. Id. at *3-4. Defendant hired two outside consultants to conduct an independent audit of its facilities, and the consultants opined that Defendant likely would face some form of enforcement action from the FDA, including a seizure action. Id. at *5. In 2008, the FDA issued Defendant a new and more strident warning letter stating that Defendant's response to its earlier letters had been inadequate and that many failures remained uncorrected. Id. at *8. In the letter, the FDA also noted its "serious concerns" regarding Defendant's compliance history, as well as the serious nature of the violations, and warned of the potential for legal action without further notice. Id. As a result of Defendant's continued failure to correct the violations, on June 24, 2009, the FDA filed a complaint for forfeiture of adulterated articles of drugs. Id. at *14-15. The following day, the FDA served Defendant with a complaint and warrant for arrest and seized various products manufactured by Defendant at its Detroit and Farmington Hills facilities. Id. at *15. On June 26, 2009, Defendant initiated a mass lay-off of hourly and salaried workers at the affected facilities, and on July 6, 2009, it issued WARN Act notices stating that it did not reasonably foresee that the FDA would take action. Id. In response, Plaintiff initiated this class action claiming that Defendant violated the WARN Act by failing to provide affected employees 60 days' notice before the mass lay-off. Id. at *18. Defendant argued that the full 60-day notice requirement did not apply because the closing was caused by business circumstances that were not reasonably foreseeable at the time the notice would have been required. Id. The District Court certified the putative class of former employees and, following a bench trial, granted judgment for Plaintiff, finding that it was reasonably foreseeable on April 27, 2009 – 60 days before the lay-off – that the FDA would execute a large-scale enforcement action against Defendant, necessitating the mass lay-off. Id. at *16. The Sixth Circuit affirmed and held that Defendant's actions in the months leading up to April 27, 2009, demonstrated that Defendant was aware of the serious deficiencies at its facilities that likely would result in an imminent enforcement action, and this rendered the ensuing mass lay-off foreseeable. Id. at *29-30. The Sixth Circuit specifically noted that Defendant was aware of the continuing and escalating violations, knew that enforcement action could result from the continuing violations based on the information provided by its consultants, and had publicly acknowledged the warning letter it received in 2008. Id. On Defendant's appeal, the Sixth Circuit rejected Defendant's contention that the District Court engaged in "analysis by hindsight." Id. Although Defendant asserted that it would not have been reasonable for it to issue notice at the 60-day mark because the FDA had not yet finished its inspection, the Sixth Circuit noted that the consultant's audit had been completed by that time and had indicated outstanding problems. Id. at *31-32. Thus, according to the Sixth Circuit, it was not an "analysis by hindsight" for the District Court to conclude that a reasonable employer – based on the tenor of the 2008 warning letter, the multiple outstanding violations dating back several years, and the advice of the consultants – would have realized that an enforcement action was imminent. Id. at *32. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's judgment that Defendant violated the WARN Act.

Droste, et al., v. Vert Capital Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43849 (E.D. Va. April 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of workers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants improperly terminated employees without notice and adequate compensation in violation of the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification ("WARN") Act. Plaintiffs contended that, on June 10, 2014, Defendants terminated Plaintiffs without notice and that, although Defendants provided paychecks, many of the paychecks bounced because of insufficient funds. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiffs further alleged that, on June 23, 2014, Defendants terminated most of the remaining employees without providing any paychecks. Id. Plaintiffs moved to certify two classes: (i) a June 10 sub-class; and (ii) a June 23 sub-class. The Court granted the motion. The Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied the Rule 23(a) commonality requirement for both sub-classes because they identified a common set of facts concerning Defendants' actions and a common core of legal issues with respect to putative sub-class members. The Court explained that, in order to prevail under the WARN Act, each putative class member had to establish that Defendants were subject to the WARN Act; that Defendants employed the class member; and that Defendants terminated the class member on June 10, 2014, or June 23, 2014, with proper notice. Id. at *13-14. The Court found these questions central to each claim and susceptible to common proof. The Court also concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied the Rule 23(b)(3) predominance requirement. The Court recognized that some individualized inquiry would be necessary to determine the proper amount of damages. Id. at *19-20. In particular, under the WARN Act, a damages inquiry would entail an individualized analysis of each employee's salary level immediately before termination and the average of the three preceding years. Id. at *20. Nevertheless, the Court found that differences in damages among putative class members did not generally defeat predominance if liability was common to the class. Id. Although the case involved individualized damages issues, the Court ruled that Defendants' liability to class members was a common issue that could be resolved by an overarching inquiry into Defendants' behavior with respect to the two sub-classes. Id. at *20-21. The Court, therefore, concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied the predominance requirement. Id. at *21. Finally, the Court found that the class action mechanism was superior over individualized adjudication of disputes because the potential class members' claims were small, forcing each potential class member to bring and prove his or her case would waste judicial resources and each individual's time and money, and the similarity of legal and factual issues indicated that a class action would be manageable. Id. at *23-24. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification and certified two sub-classes.

Likes, et al. v. DHL Express (USA), Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 8954 (11th Cir. May 29, 2015). Plaintiff, a former driver, brought a putative WARN Act class action alleging that DHL Express (USA) Inc., failed to provide 60 days' notice of impending lay-offs at its Birmingham delivery facility. Until 2009, DHL had maintained a delivery network in the U.S. consisting of approximately 300 contractors that employed drivers who delivered packages for DHL. In 2008, DHL began to phase out its U.S. domestic delivery program and entered into termination and transition agreements ("TTA") with each of its contractors. In the TTA with Plaintiff's employer, contractor Wood Airfreight, Inc., DHL agreed to provide retention payments to the contractor's employees who worked until the TTA's termination date or until the contractor no longer needed the employee's services as delivery volume dropped. Subsequently, Wood Airfreight laid-off Plaintiff. The District Court granted summary judgment to DHL, finding that Plaintiff failed to establish that he was the subject of a mass lay-off under the WARN Act. Id. at *3. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed. At the outset, the Eleventh Circuit agreed with the District Court that, even assuming DHL qualified as his employer, Plaintiff could not show that he was the subject of a mass lay-off under the WARN Act. Id. at *7. The Eleventh Circuit noted that the WARN Act defines a mass lay-off as a reduction-in-force that results in an employment loss at the single site of employment during any 30-day period for at least 33% of the employees and at least 50 employees. Id. The Eleventh Circuit found it undisputed that Wood Airfreight laid-off fewer than 50 employees, so its reduction-in-force alone could not result in WARN Act liability. Plaintiff argued that the DHL Birmingham facility was a single site of employment such that the lay-offs from three contractors that used the facility should be aggregated; together, the three companies laid-off more than 50 employees. The Eleventh Circuit, however, agreed with the District Court that the Birmingham facility constituted multiple sites of employment. Id. at *8. Although DHL's contractors worked out of the same Birmingham facility, each had distinct day-to-day management and employee structures. Id. at *8-9. The Eleventh Circuit observed that the record showed that each contractor had its own administrative staff and payroll, made personnel decisions individually, and delivered packages to a distinct geographic area of Birmingham. Id. Thus, because Plaintiff had presented no evidence from which a reasonable jury could conclude that the Birmingham facility constituted a single site of employment, an element necessary for a WARN Act violation, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's grant of summary judgment to DHL. Id. at *10.

Murphy, et al. v. Lenderlive Network, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71184 (D. Colo. June 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of underwriters, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant terminated 120 similarly-situated employees without giving them the required 60 days advance written notice of their terminations or 60 days' pay and benefits in lieu of notice under the WARN Act. After the Court certified a WARN Act class and denied Defendant summary judgment, the parties settled the action. The Court preliminarily approved the settlement. The Court found that the settlement amount, which provided each class member an average payment of approximately $3,000 – approximately 20% of the total value of class members' WARN Act claims – was fair and reasonable. Id. at *5-6. Further, the Court determined that the settlement agreement was the result of extensive, arms' length negotiations by counsel well-versed in the prosecution of class actions and collective actions. Further, the Court concluded that serious questions of law and fact existed, which put the outcome of the WARN litigation in doubt, and the presence of such doubt weighed in favor of settlement because settlement created a certainty of some recovery. Id. at *4. In addition, the Court noted that the value of an immediate recovery in the settlement outweighed the mere possibility of future relief after protracted and expensive litigation. Id. at *4-5. The parties believed that, if litigation continued and Plaintiffs prevailed, it could be years before class members obtained any recovery. By reaching a settlement prior to dispositive motions or trial, Plaintiffs would avoid significant expense and delay and ensure recovery for the class in a prompt and efficient manner. Id. at *5. Regarding certification of the settlement class, the Court opined that the class it already certified would remain appropriate for settlement purposes. Id. at *6. Finally, the Court approved the proposed WARN settlement notice and ordered delivery of the proposed notice to the settlement class. The Court also approved a modified class notice attached to the addendum to the settlement agreement for distribution to a group of class members that the parties inadvertently excluded from the previous opt-out notice in the litigation. Id. at *7-8. The Court held that the proposed notice and modified notice adequately put class members on notice of the proposed settlement because they described the terms of the settlement, informed the class about the allocation of attorneys' fees, and provided specific information regarding the date, time, and place of the final approval hearing. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court preliminarily approved the settlement.

Ramcharan, et al. v. A.F.L.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 91695 (D.N.J. April 14, 2015). Plaintiff, a former employee, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants terminated him and approximately 250 similarly-situated employees without notice and as part of mass lay-offs or plant closings, in violation of the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Action ("WARN") Act. The Court had previously the certified a class, and had stayed notification of the class pending resolution of the issue of whether Defendant Westbury Investment Partners may be held liable as joint employer under the WARN Act. Plaintiff then requested the Court to reconsider its stay of notification or, alternatively, grant the class counsel permission to communicate with class members prior to notification, and to advise them during the litigation, which the Court granted. Plaintiff contended that the Court overlooked case law establishing that Rule 23 does not permit the Court to delay notification of the class pending the outcome of the summary judgment motion, and the lack of evidence in the record demonstrating any cost, burden, or prejudice to Defendant in the event the class received notification. Id. at *3. The Court held that although Rule 23 mandates notification to the class in Rule 23(b)(3) class, it does not specify when that notice must be issued; rather, the timing of the notice is left to the discretion of the Court, which may decide to postpone notice where circumstances permit. Id. at *5. Plaintiff pointed to case law recognizing that notice should be given promptly and, in any event, before the merits of the matter are sufficiently adjudicated. Id. at *5-6. The Court reasoned that this case law authority was not brought to its attention when it considered Plaintiff's class certification motion. Accordingly, the Court remarked that it was persuaded that the class should be notified in advance of summary judgment motion that may determine Westbury's liability and, in all likelihood, resolve the matter. Moreover, the Court remarked that as Plaintiff's counsel was bearing the expenses and burden associated with the class notice and certification, Westbury would suffer no loss. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for partial reconsideration and ordered issuance of notice.

(xxiii) Class Definition Issues

Durocher, et al. v. National Collegiate Athletic Association,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41110 (S.D. Ind. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former college football players, brought a putative class action alleging that Riddell Inc. sold football helmets to colleges and universities that failed to protect them from head injuries. Plaintiffs claimed that they suffered concussions and repeated head impacts while wearing Riddell helmets and that Riddell and the National Collegiate Athletic Association ("NCAA") failed to warn players that a concussion could lead to brain disorders. Plaintiffs sought to represent a nationwide class consisting of hundreds of players who developed or would develop mental or physical problems as a result of sustaining traumatic brain injuries, concussions, or concussion-like symptoms while playing in college football games or practices. Id. at *6-7. Defendants moved to strike Plaintiffs' class allegations, arguing that personal injury product liability claims were inherently individualized and state law specific and that class members could be ascertained only through individualized inquiries based on subjective criteria. Id. at *22-23. The Court granted Defendants' motion on the basis that medical causation and personal injury allegations raised significant hurdles that made class treatment questionable. Id. at *33. The Court noted that the "individualized inquiries related to medical causation described by Defendants weigh heavily in favor of striking Plaintiffs' class action allegations and foreshadow a tremendous uphill battle for Plaintiffs to certify a class action based on personal injuries of individual class members." Id. at *34. Although Plaintiffs claimed that discovery might shape the class definition, the Court found that Plaintiffs had not explained what discovery they would seek or how such discovery could enlighten the pursuit of class treatment. Id. at *25. The Court further noted that, even after considering the segregation of states into two proposed sub-classes, the claims involved too many individualized questions relating to differing state laws with differing treatment of products liability that might impede common treatment across the class. Id. at *35. According to the Court, creating sub-classes based on the locations of the college football teams for which class members played would not eliminate the obstacles to class treatment because the differences among the potentially 55 different jurisdictions posed a major impediment to class treatment. Id. at *38. The Court, however, found that identifying the putative class members would not be impossible based on the proposed class definition. The Court noted that discovery could enlighten the facts pertaining to the sale and distribution of Riddell helmets to college football teams, and at least some of the symptoms described in the class definition such as headache, dizziness, double vision, or fuzzy vision would not require verification by a healthcare professional. Id. at *40-42. Because Defendants did not definitively establish that Plaintiffs could not maintain a class action in any form, the Court held that Plaintiffs were entitled to an opportunity to narrow and more specifically define their proposed class in light of and consistent with the law and facts. Id. at *42. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to strike Plaintiffs' class allegations and gave Plaintiffs 20 days to file an amended complaint to narrow the proposed class definition.

Friedman, et al. v. Dollar Thrifty Automotive Group, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9661 (D. Colo. Jan. 27, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendants tricked consumers into buying add-on products such as loss damage waiver, supplemental liability insurance, and roadside assistance (collectively "add-on products"), which they declined or were charged for without proper consent or contrary to disclosure requirements, and/or that Defendants misled customers into signing up for the services contrary to their initial agreements. Plaintiff alleged that this was a nationwide systematic pattern of conduct and asserted violations of the Colorado Consumer Protection Act and the Florida Deceptive and Unfair Trade Practices Act. Plaintiffs moved for certification of a class comprised of all individuals who rented cars from Defendants in Colorado and Florida and were charged for the add-on products other than as part of a prepaid tour reservation. The Court denied the motion, finding that the class definition, which covered approximately 2.5 million putative class members, was overly broad. The Court found that the class definition was overbroad because it included all persons who rented the pertinent add-on products in Colorado and Florida, even if they purposely chose to purchase the add-on products, were not deceived in connection with the purchase of the products, received a benefit from purchasing the products, or were otherwise not injured by them. Id. at *11-12. The class also included people, like named Plaintiff Friedman, who received a full refund of his purchase of the add-on products. Additionally, because Plaintiffs did not propose any objective criteria by which such individuals could be identified and excluded from the class, the Court concluded that individualized fact finding would be required to identify a class member. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court denied certification to Plaintiffs' proposed class due to deficiencies with the proposed class definition.

McKinnon, et al. v. Dollar Thrifty Automotive Group, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97815 (N.D. Cal. July 27, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of customers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant misled consumers into purchasing add-on insurance products, including loss damage waiver ("LDW"), supplemental liability insurance ("SLI"), and roadside assistance service ("Roadsafe"), in violation of the California Unfair Competition Law, the Consumers Legal Remedies Act, and the Oklahoma Consumer Protection Act. Id. at *9-10. Plaintiffs requested certification of a California class and an Oklahoma class of persons residing in or who rented cars in California and Oklahoma from Defendant since January 2009 and who Defendant charged for LDW, SLI, and Roadsafe as part of a prepaid tour reservation. Id. at *10. The Court denied class certification. The Court found that the proposed class definition was overbroad because it included people who were not exposed to allegedly deceptive practices and people who received a benefit from buying the add-on insurance. Id. at *16. The Court also found that Plaintiffs included transactions in their class definition that had no connection to California or Oklahoma and that Plaintiffs failed sufficiently to identify the deceptive practices in which Defendant allegedly engaged, including training employees on how to persuade customers to purchase add-on products, paying employees commissions based on sales of add-on products, and failing adequately to respond to customer complaints regarding add-on products. Id. at *17-19. The Court determined that Plaintiffs neither alleged facts nor presented evidence establishing that Defendant exposed all members of the class to a deceptive practice. Id. at *20-21. Further, the Court opined that Plaintiffs failed to provide common proof but, instead, alleged facts that applied only to some customers, at some locations, some of the time. Id. at *29. The evidence showed that what Defendant told class members, what class members understood regarding the products, and class members' reasons for purchasing the products could have varied greatly depending on their individualized communications with Defendant's agents. The Court, therefore, ruled that individualized inquiries defeated commonality. Id. at *29-31. Finally, the Court found that Plaintiffs had conflicts with other class members due to their unique factual circumstances and the unique defenses Defendant likely would assert against them that were not applicable to the class as a whole. Id. at *36. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to meet class certification requirements, but agreed to let Plaintiffs try again, instructing them to submit a revised class definition identifying common issues of fact and law. Id. at *39. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification without prejudice.

Moore, et al. v. Apple, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102849 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 4, 2015). Plaintiff, a former Apple device user, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant's messaging system interfered with text delivery after Plaintiff switched to an Android-based smartphone. According to Plaintiff, Apple's iMessage retained text messages sent from other users of Apple devices and failed to deliver them to Plaintiff's Samsung phone running on an Android operating system. Plaintiff moved for certification of a class consisting of all individuals who switched their wireless telephone accounts by porting their cellular telephone numbers from an Apple iPhone device to a non-Apple cellular telephone during the time period from October 12, 2011, to the present. Id. at *12. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion on the basis that Plaintiff's proposed class was overbroad because it included individuals who might not have suffered any injury due to Defendant's allegedly wrongful conduct. Id. at *25. Plaintiff contended that Defendant had injured all putative class members because they paid for a wireless service agreement with a text messaging feature, and all were subject to having their text messaging disrupted due to Defendant's iMessage flaw. Id. at *24. The Court found that, whereas many wireless service agreements might have included the contractual right to send and receive text messages, Plaintiff did not and could not contend that every putative class member's wireless service agreement included the right to receive text messages. Id. at *23. Plaintiff's own evidence indicated material variations in wireless service agreements. Plaintiff's expert conceded that some wireless service agreements involved a fixed price for unlimited services, others provided service up to an agreed maximum of service consumed, and still others provided for separate billing with respect to each incoming or outgoing text message. Id. at *31. Restrictions in the contracts could mean that individuals did not receive text messages because they exceeded their maximum number of text messages or because they affirmatively opted not to receive text messages. Id. at *32. The Court, therefore, found that putative class members could have experienced disruptions in text messages because of the particular terms of their wireless service agreements, and, accordingly, the Court would have to evaluate each individual's wireless service agreement in order to determine the facts of their injury. Id. The documents also showed that, whereas some putative class members might have included unlimited text messages in their wireless service agreements, an unknown number of others might not have included any text messaging in their plans or might have included only a limited text messaging option. Id. at *34. The Court, therefore, concluded that it could not determine on a class-wide or even carrier-wide basis whether individual class members were entitled to receive text messages. Id. Defendant argued that myriad reasons entirely unrelated to iMessage, including network error, user action, or operating system issues, could have resulted in the disruption of text message services for each individual putative class member. The Court agreed and found that individualized inquiries into the circumstances under which the individual class members failed to receive particular messages would be required to determine whether iMessage caused any putative class member's injury. Id. at *37. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Otto, et al. v. Abbott Laboratories, Inc.*, Case No. 12-CV-1411 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 28, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative consumer class action alleging that the label on Defendant's Muscle Health shake was materially misleading because Revigor, one of the ingredients in the drink, did not rebuild strength as suggested by the label, and Revigor's effectiveness hinged on consumers' vitamin-D levels. Plaintiff asserted claims under California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), False Advertising Law, and Consumers

Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA") on behalf of a state-wide class, and pursued his negligent misrepresentation claim on behalf of a nationwide class. Defendants moved to deny class certification, and the Court granted the motion. Plaintiff's theory of liability focused on Defendant's failure to disclose that Revigor did not work for people with less than 30 ng/ml of vitamin-D. Although this omission could mislead those with deficient vitamin-D levels, those with a history of low vitamin-D levels, or those who did not know their vitamin-D levels, Plaintiff sought to certify classes of all purchasers of Muscle Health. The Court remarked that 60% of elderly adults are vitamin-D deficient, and that it was implausible that all purchasers of the product at issue were elderly adults, and even if they were, 40% of the class would not be vitamin-D deficient. Because it was also implausible to assume that a significant share of this 40% had a history of vitamin-D deficiency or had significant concern about their vitamin-D levels, the Court stated that the omission of Revigor's inefficacy among vitamin-D deficient consumers would be immaterial for a significant portion of the proposed class. Thus, because the proposed class included a substantial number of people who had no viable claim under the theory advanced by the named Plaintiff, the Court opined that the proposed class was overbroad. Id. at 5. The Court also noted that a putative class lacked cohesion if its UCL claims would involve factual questions associated with class members' reliance on Defendant's alleged false representations. Id. Plaintiff alleged that the omission would deceive a consumer with vitamin-D levels less than 30 ng/ml or who was concerned that his or her vitamin-D levels might be less than 30 ng/ml. The class, however, encompassed a group of consumers who might rely on the omission and another group who would not rely on it. Therefore, the Court found that the class was overbroad as it contained many Plaintiffs without a claim under the theory of liability. Id. at 6. Finally, although Plaintiff asserted that Illinois law should be applied to the negligent misrepresentation claims, the Court found that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate that the application of Illinois law complied with California's choice-of-law rules. Id. at 8. Because Plaintiff failed to do so, the Court was unable to determine that Illinois law should be applied instead of the laws of the other 48 states that could be represented in this nationwide class. Further, Plaintiff did not demonstrate that the nationwide class could be further divided into manageable sub-classes accounting for conflicts in state laws, that a representative Plaintiff could be obtained for each of these classes, or that each sub-class met the Rule 23 requirements. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to deny class certification.

(xxiv) Settlement Approval Issues In Class Actions

Allen, et al. v. Dairy Farmers Of America, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42436 (D. Vt. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants engaged in a wide-ranging conspiracy to fix milk prices in violation of the Sherman Act. The parties settled and sought settlement approval. The Court denied without prejudice Plaintiffs' motion for final settlement approval. The proposed settlement required Defendants to make a payment of $50 million to class members in two installments. Based on the number of claims filed, a class member could receive approximately $4,000. Id. at *2. The settlement also authorized injunctive relief and provided incentive payments to sub-class representatives and proposed attorneys' fees of approximately $16.6 million plus expenses. Id. A total of 35 dairy farmers representing 28 farms objected to the proposed settlement and challenged both its procedural and substantive fairness. Id. at *9-10. The Court held that the reaction of the class to the proposed settlement raised an issue with regard to substantive fairness. Id. at *28. Although the Court acknowledged that the proposed settlement's monetary relief of $50 million was not inadequate or unreasonable on its face, the Court also noted that, when this amount was considered from the class' perspective, in light of the broad proposed release and the absence of meaningful injunctive relief, the receipt of approximately $4,000 per dairy farm reasonably could be perceived as a modest recovery. Id. at *33. Whereas class counsel contended that the objectors represented a very small fraction of the 9,000 farmers notified of the proposed settlement, the Court pointed out that the class' silence did not necessarily indicate approval or establish the fairness of the proposed settlement. Id. at *28-29. Thus, primarily based on the reaction of the class, the Court concluded that the proposed settlement was not substantively in the class' best interests. Id. at *33-34. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for final approval of the proposed settlement without prejudice.

Allen, et al. v. Labor Ready Southwest, Inc.,* 787 F.3d 1218 (9th Cir. 2015). Plaintiff filed a putative class action in state court alleging that Defendant, a temporary staffing agency, violated the FLSA and California wage & hour laws by failing to pay employees for their wait and travel times as well as taking unlawful paycheck deductions. The parties subsequently reached a settlement that included a gross settlement fund of $4.5 million as well as injunctive relief. Id. at 1221. A group of objectors, who were litigants in other uncertified class actions against Defendant that included some similar claims, moved to intervene permissively in Plaintiff's action. Id. at 1220-21. The District Court denied the objectors' motion, but granted them leave to object to the settlement at the preliminary approval stage. At that hearing, the District Court found that the settlement terms were fair and reasonable. Id. at 1221-22. After the District Court approved the settlement, the objectors appealed. The Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision to deny the objectors' motion to intervene. Id. at 1221. The Ninth Circuit noted that while the District Court did not explain its decision to deny the motion, it could affirm on any basis supported by the record. Id. Finding the motion untimely, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the objectors knew of Plaintiff's litigation for at least a year before they moved to intervene and had regularly asked Defendant about the status of settlement talks. Id. However, the Ninth Circuit agreed with the objectors' contention that the District Court's settlement approval ruling was improper since the deadline for filing class member objections was before Plaintiff's counsel submitted its final fee request. Id. at 1225. Finally, the Ninth Circuit declined to address the objectors' substantive challenges to the settlement, noting they may raise those issues on appeal if the District Court exercised its discretion to re-approve the settlement. Id. at 1226. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's order denying the objectors' motion to intervene, vacated the District Court's order granting final approval of the settlement and an award of attorneys' fees, and remanded to the District Court for further proceedings. Id.

Editor's Note: The Ninth Circuit's ruling in Allen manifests a trend of its "high procedural standard for review of class action settlements negotiated without a certified class." Id. at 1220. The Ninth Circuit appeared particularly concerned about the possibility of collusion in the negotiation of the settlement. Its analysis of the factors that district court judges must analyze is particularly important for employers entering into class-wide settlements.

Brady, et al. v. Air Line Pilots Association,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 16867 (3d Cir. Sept. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former pilots, brought an action alleging that Defendant breached its duty of fair representation during an asset acquisition in violation of the Railway Labor Act. In 2002, Cureton Clark, P.C. ("Cureton") represented Leroy Bensel as class representative and obtained certification of an injunctive relief class. In 2005, Cureton moved to withdraw its representation, and the District Court granted the motion. Subsequently, Trujillo Rodriguez & Richards, LLC and Green Jacobson, P.C. (collectively, "class counsel") represented the class. In 2011, Class Counsel conducted a five-week liability trial that resulted in a jury verdict in favor of the class. Subsequently, the District Court approved a $53 million settlement and a 30% fee award from the settlement fund to class counsel. At the same time, the District Court denied Cureton's application for additional attorneys' fees holding that, based on the record, the Cureton firm already had been fully compensated for its work on the case before it abandoned the class. The District Court also authorized incentive awards to twelve current and former class representatives, including an award to Theodore Case ("Case"), totaling $640,000. Case and Cureton appealed the District Court's order, and the Third Circuit affirmed. Case appealed the amount of the District Court's award of attorneys' fees to class counsel and his incentive award, and Cureton appealed the District Court's denial of its motion for additional attorneys' fees. As to class counsel's fees, the Third Circuit found that the District Court correctly applied the factors set forth in Gunter v. Ridgewood Energy Corp., 223 F.3d 190 (3d Cir. 2000), and applied a lodestar cross-check. The Third Circuit, therefore, found that the District Court employed the correct standards and procedures and did not abuse its discretion in awarding a 30% fee. Id. at *6. Case argued that he was entitled to an incentive award higher than the $81,702.13 awarded by the District Court because of the lengthy duration of the case and the personal sacrifices made by the class representatives. The Third Circuit found that the District Court considered those factors at the fairness hearing and did not abuse its discretion in declining to allocate additional funds for incentive payments. Id. at *7. Finally, Cureton appealed the denial of its motion for additional attorneys' fees. The Third Circuit found that the District Court appropriately heard testimony regarding Cureton's work on the case, the fees already paid to Cureton, and its withdrawal prior to certification of the ultimately successful Rule 23(b)(3) class. The Third Circuit held that the District Court made reasonable factual findings and did not abuse its discretion in denying Cureton's motion. Id. at *7-8. Accordingly, the Third Circuit affirmed the judgment of the District Court.

Godfrey, et al. v. City Of Chicago,* Case No. 12-CV-8601 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of African-American female firefighter applicants, brought a class action alleging that the City of Chicago discriminated against them again because of their gender when they went through the remedial hiring process, and failed the department's physical abilities test ("PAT"). Subsequently, the parties settled the action, and moved for preliminary approval of the proposed stipulation and settlement agreement. The Court granted the motion. First, the Court conditionally certified a settlement class pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3) consisting of all women who took and failed the firefighter PAT in November 2011. Id. at 2. The Court preliminarily approved the settlement as set forth in the parties' stipulation as it appeared to be within the range of fairness, reasonableness, and adequacy. Id. at 3. The Court noted that the stipulation was subject to the Chicago City Council's approval of the settlement, which was obtained in December 2014. The Court directed and authorized the City to retain Class Action Administration, Inc. as the claims administrator to administer the settlement in accordance with the terms and conditions of the stipulation. Id. at 4. The Court also approved the class notice and summary class notice attached to the stipulation, and directed and authorized the claims administrator to provide class notice to the last known address or updated address of all settlement class members, and to publish a summary class notice in the form the parties had suggested. Id. at 5. Further, the Court ordered that any settlement class member who would wish to be considered for hire pursuant to the terms of the settlement must submit an interest card to the Chicago Fire Department Academy. Id. at 6. In addition, the Court ruled that any settlement class member who would wish to receive a back pay award must submit a proof of claim to the claims administrator. Id. at 7. The Court remarked that unless a settlement class member submitted a valid and timely request for exclusion, the final judgment would bind a settlement class member who took no action, and would not receive any payment, or opportunity to be considered for hire. Id. Accordingly, the Court preliminarily approved the settlement and set a hearing on final approval.

In Re Comcast Corporation Set-Top Cable Television Box Antitrust Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 150160 (E.D. Pa. Nov. 5, 2015). In this multi-district class action litigation, Plaintiffs, a group of cable television subscribers, alleged that Defendant unlawfully tied the sale of premium cable to the rental of a specific cable box. After extensive litigation, the Parties settled the action and the proposed settlement class comprised of all subscribers who: (i) resided in and subscribed to premium cable in California, Washington, or West Virginia; or (ii) subscribed to premium cable in any state in the United States and elected to opt-out of Defendant's arbitration clause as reflected in the records; and paid a rental fee for a cable box. Id. at *4. Defendant agreed to pay all claims not exceeding $15.5 million in value. Id. at *5. The type of relief class members would receive depended upon whether they were former or current subscribers, and the length of time they rented the cable box. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs sought certification of a Rule 23(b)(3) settlement class. The Court denied the motion. Defendant lacked records for most former subscribers, and the critical question was whether a reliable and administratively feasible method existed to determine if former subscribers fell within the class definition. Plaintiffs argued that with respect to former customers, Defendant had represented that it may have records by which it could verify class membership back to 2011, depending on location, and that in the absence of such records membership could be demonstrated by a customer's account number, old bills and invoices, geographic information coupled with other identifying variables, communications to or from Defendant during the relevant period, and other indicia from which Defendant could determine or challenge a claimant's status as a Former Subscriber. Id. at *15. Further, Plaintiffs asserted that the parties had proposed a claim form requiring settlement class members to affirm, under penalty of perjury, that the information provided in the claim form was true and correct. The Court observed that Plaintiffs failed to submit any methodology for screening out unreliable sworn statements, and they did not submit a screening model specific to this case or prove how the model would be reliable. Id. at *19. Further, the Court found that while Plaintiffs listed possible types of evidence that former subscribers could submit to prove membership in the settlement class, none of them were actually required. The Court opined that the sworn statements that Plaintiffs alone relied upon to establish membership in the settlement class were an inadequate method of determining ascertainability. Id. Accordingly, because the settlement class was not ascertainable due to a lack of a reliable and administratively feasible mechanism for determining whether putative class members fell within the class definition, the Court denied certification of the proposed settlement class.

In Re High-Tech Employee Antitrust Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26635 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of technical employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendants engaged in conspiracy to fix and suppress employee compensation and to restrict employee mobility though anti-solicitation agreements. Plaintiffs and a group of Defendants agreed to settle. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for preliminary approval of settlement. Under the proposed settlement, Defendants would pay a combined total of $415 million into a settlement fund, which would be distributed to each class member based on a formula using the class member's base salary during the class period. Id. at *9-10. The Court found the settlement's consideration substantial, particularly in light of the risk that the jury could find no liability or award no damages. Id. The Court determined the plan of allocation was sufficient, fair, reasonable, and adequate, as it provided a neutral and fair way to compensate class members based on their salaries and alleged injuries. Id. at *10. Because the proposed settlement included a previously certified class, the Court also found that Plaintiffs met the requirements of Rule 23 for settlement purposes. Id. at *11. The Court held that the notice procedures set forth in the settlement agreement were the best practicable means of providing notice, and the proposed notice satisfied the requirement of due process. The Court also approved the appointed notice administrator and the notice for dissemination to the class. The Court further approved establishment of the escrow account under the settlement agreement as a qualified settlement fund ("QSF"), and retained continuing jurisdiction as to any issue that might arise in connection with the formation and/or administration of the QSF. Id. at *14. The Court scheduled deadlines for class members to opt-out of the class and for the class counsel to file motions for payment of attorneys' fees and costs. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for preliminary settlement approval.

In Re High-Tech Employee Antitrust Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 118052 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 2, 2015). In this antitrust class action filed against Defendants, a number of Silicon Valley technology employers including Apple Inc. and Google, Plaintiffs asserted claims that Defendants conspired to repress Plaintiffs' wages and job opportunities by sharing salary and benefit information, agreeing to pay caps among themselves, and agreeing not to hire employees from competitors. The parties entered into a settlement after a period of litigating the case. The Court approved a $415 million settlement and partly granted Plaintiffs' motions for attorneys' fees, reimbursement of expenses, and service awards. The original complaints alleged that Defendants violated antitrust laws by agreeing to fix and suppress employee compensation and to restrict employee mobility. The case followed an investigation in 2009-2010 by the U.S. Department of Justice into Silicon Valley hiring and recruitment practices and led to the DOJ filing a complaint in September 2010 that ultimately resulted in a stipulated final judgment. Id. at *8-9. Plaintiffs then filed a class action in May 2011 and sought class certification for all salaried employees or all technical employees. The Court later certified a narrower class of technical employees. In 2013, Plaintiffs settled with some of the companies for $20 million and the Court entered a judgment as to those Defendants in June 2014. Id. at *10-11. After discussion among the remaining parties, the Court rejected an initial settlement of $324.5 million. Plaintiffs then filed a motion in January 2015 to approve a new settlement the parties negotiated for $415 million. Id. at *14. The Court granted preliminary approval in March 2015. Id. at *15. The settlement included a request for an attorneys' fee award of $81,125,000 or 19.5% of the settlement fund, unreimbursed expenses of $1,184,810.98, and services awards of up to $160,000 to each of the individual class representatives. Id. at *16. While the Court granted final approval of the $415 million settlement, it awarded only $40 million toward attorneys' fees, finding that the requested $81 million would yield "windfall" profits for the class counsel in light of the hours spent on the case. Id. at *28. Although class counsel pointed to some "mega-fund" cases allowing large multipliers that were far from the norm, the Court found that allowing a multiplier of 4.46 would be unusual for a $415 million settlement, and accepting the counsel's request for more than $85 million in total fees – which did not even take into account the $5 million in fees already awarded for the $20 million settlement – would be unreasonable. Id. at *31-32. The Court therefore determined to use the lodestar method with a percentage-of-recovery cross-check to achieve the fairest and most reasonable result. The Court then reviewed the billing rates and records for the attorneys, paralegals, and litigation support staff at each of the firms representing Plaintiffs, and adjusted the lodestar figures by an appropriate positive or negative multiplier reflecting a host of reasonableness factors, including the quality of representation, the benefit obtained for the class, the complexity and novelty of the issues presented, and the risk of non-payment. As a result, it reached a figure of $40,822,311.75 for attorneys' fees. Id. at *34-45. The Court then cross-checked the amount with the percentage-of-recovery method and held that a percentage recovery of 9.8% was far from unreasonable for a $415 settlement. Id. at *48. According to the Court, the percentage was more reasonable, given that class counsel had already received the 25% benchmark in attorneys' fees for the earlier $20 million settlement with some Defendants. Id. at *51. The Court therefore awarded class counsel a total fee of $40,822,311.75 or 9.8% of the $415 million settlement fund. Finding the request for unreimbursed expenses reasonable, the Court also awarded class counsel $1,200,000 in unreimbursed expenses. Id. at *59. Finally, factoring in the $20,000 service awards each class representative received as part of the earlier settlement, and taking into account the hundreds of hours each class representative spent on this high-profile litigation, the Court awarded $80,000 to each of the class representatives. Id. at *62-67.

Editor's Note: The $415 million settlement is the largest for any workplace class action in 2015.

In Re National Football League Players' Concussion Injury Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52565 (E.D. Pa. April 22, 2015). In this consolidated class action involving over 5,000 former football players in over 300 substantially similar lawsuits, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants failed to take reasonable actions to protect players from chronic risks created by concussive and sub-concussive head injuries and fraudulently concealed those risks from players. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants had a duty to provide players with rules and information that protected players as much as possible from short-term and long-term health risks, including from the risks of repetitive mild traumatic brain injury ("TBI"). Id. at *16. The parties reached a settlement, and the Court granted final approval of the settlement agreement. The Court observed that the class consisted of all living former NFL football players and representative claimants of either deceased, legally incapacitated, or incompetent retired players. Id. at *27. The settlement had three primary components. First, the settlement had an uncapped monetary award fund ("MAF"), overseen by a claims administrator, providing compensation for retired players who submitted sufficient proof of qualifying diagnoses. Id. at *28. Second, the settlement had a $75 million baseline assessment program ("BAP") providing eligible retired players with free baseline assessment examinations of their objective neurological functioning. Id. Third, the settlement had an education fund to educate the class members regarding Defendants' existing medical and disability benefits programs and to promote safety and injury prevention for football players of all ages, including youth football players. Id. The Court appointed a special master, who would be responsible for overseeing, implementing, and administering the entire settlement. The Court noted that the MAF was an uncapped, inflation-adjusted fund that provided cash awards for retired players who received qualifying diagnoses. Id. at *30. To collect from the MAF or participate in the BAP, the settlement required the class members to register with the claims administrator within 180 days of receiving notice that the settlement had been approved and was in effect. Id. at *35. According to the settlement, the BAP was a $75 million fund that provided retired players with an opportunity to be tested for cognitive decline, and any retired player who had played at least half an eligible season could receive a baseline assessment examination, even if he had not yet developed any adverse symptoms nor received a qualifying diagnosis. Id. at *37. The settlement required the class members to release and dismiss with prejudice all claims and actions against Defendants in exchange for the benefits. Defendants agreed not to contest any award of attorneys' fees and costs equal to or below $112.5 million. Id. at *40-41. The Court found that the class satisfied the requirements of Rule 23. As to the predominance factor, the Court noted that the central issues in the case were factual questions regarding the Defendants' knowledge and conduct. The Court noted that Defendants' alleged conduct injured the class members in the same way, i.e., the retired players all returned to play prematurely after head injuries and continued to experience concussive and sub-concussive hits. Id. at *74. The Court noted that resolution of these and other such common questions were predominant in the action. The Court next applied the nine factors enumerated in Girsh v. Jepson, 521 F.2d. 153 (3d Cir. 1975), and found that all factors favored settlement. Id. at *99-123. The Court also applied the additional factors identified by the Third Circuit in In Re Prudential Insurance Co. of America Sales Practices Litigation, 148 F.3d. 283 (3d Cir. 1998), and determined that the settlement was fair and adequate. Accordingly, the Court granted the final approval of the settlement.

In Re Target Corp. Customer Data Security Breach Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 155137 (D. Minn. Nov. 17, 2015). In this multi-district class action litigation brought by consumers alleging that they suffered economic damage over Defendant's 2013 data breach that allegedly compromised their personal information, the Court preliminarily approved the class action settlement of the consumer actions. Id. at *1. The settlement provided that Defendant would pay $10 million to settle class members' claims and to pay service awards to class representatives. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs' moved for final approval of class action settlement and for payment of class representative service awards and attorneys' fees and expenses, which the Court granted. At the outset, the Court found that although it had earlier denied in part Defendant's motion to dismiss the consumer cases, the hurdles to succeed in the litigation were multitude. Id. at *3. The Court opined that Plaintiffs had sufficiently alleged injury for purposes of Rule 12(b)(6), but the injury question loomed over the litigation as it progressed, since some consumers undoubtedly suffered but many more consumers suffered no concrete injury. Id. at *4. The Court also noted that proving causation for any established losses would be difficult, given the other large-scale retailer data breaches that occurred at approximately the same time as Defendants' breach. Id. Finally, the Court observed that the vast majority of the class suffered very small losses, because the losses for those consumers whose identities were stolen were limited by the card company's reimbursement policies and the identity-theft protection Defendant offered to all consumers in the wake of the breach. Id. Consequently, the Court found that the legal and factual issues would make ultimate success in the consumer track tenuous, and therefore favored the settlement. Id. The Court also noted that Defendant's financial condition was sound and had the ability to pay the amounts involved in the settlement. Id. at *5. The Court found that further litigation in the case would be expensive and complex as it would result in separate state law classes and voluminous discovery; thus, an early settlement would benefit the Plaintiff class immensely. Id. The Court noted that 386 people timely requested exclusion from the class and 11 objected to the settlement, making for a small amount of opposition. Id. Similarly, the Court found that the attorneys' fee request was not excessive. Based on these factors, the Court granted the motion for settlement approval.

In Re World Trade Center Lower Manhattan Disaster Site Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34447 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 19, 2015). In this consolidated action, Plaintiffs were thousands of remediation workers who, following the September 11 attacks, worked in the World Trade Center ("WTC") site or buildings surrounding the WTC site and alleged claims for various respiratory and gastrointestinal illnesses as a result of their work. The WTC site workers brought claims against New York City and its contractors, and the workers of the surrounding buildings brought claims against 345 building owners, managing agents, tenants, environmental consultants, general contractors, and sub-contractors that owned, leased, and performed work in the buildings. Id. at *39. After the Court denied class certification because each individual claim involved materially different facts related to exposure, causation, and damages, and given the complexity involved, the Special Master developed a set of 360 narrowly-tailored questions seeking case-crucial information. Based upon the information collected, the parties and the Court selected test cases to proceed to intensive discovery and trial. Id. at *37. The WTC site workers then settled the action for $810 million, which the Court approved ("2010 settlement"). Id. at *39. Given the variety of worksites and Defendants, the claims of the workers of the surrounding building ("Plaintiffs") involved a greater complexity. To manage this complexity, the parties first conducted discovery in response to the 360 questions, and then with respect to 33 representative Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs also served document requests to all 345 Defendants and deposed their representatives. Plaintiffs exchanged thousands of documents, and deposed their treating physicians and experts. Id. at *40-41. In order to facilitate the settlements, Plaintiffs' counsel applied a methodology where each Plaintiff had to submit, under oath, discovery responses that provided relevant information including the buildings in which they worked, their alleged injuries, and any pre-existing medical conditions. Id. at *41. Plaintiffs' counsel used the information to categorize each Plaintiff according to a tiered ranking system and engaged in settlement negotiations with each Defendant. Id. at *41-42. Subsequently, 78 Plaintiffs agreed to settle their claims against most, but not all, Defendants, and moved for approval of the settlements. The Court granted the motion. First, regarding the issue of procedural fairness, the Court found that the law firm that represented Plaintiffs was a competent law firm with considerable experience in mass tort litigation, including other September 11 litigation from almost its inception in 2002. Id. at *46. Further, the firm's negotiations with Defendants were adversarial, there was no evidence of collusion, and resolution came at a time when discovery was sufficiently advanced to permit the parties to fairly evaluate the value of the lawsuits they filed. Id. at *46-47. In addition, the Court observed that the parties had conducted nearly 600 depositions of fact and expert witnesses; reviewed documents from approximately 350 Defendants as well as numerous third-party witnesses and experts; and briefed and argued significant legal issues, including the relevant scope of the New York Labor Law, and the risks and force of potential expert testimony. Id. at *47. Regarding substantive fairness, the Court found that because the settlements were the result of a fair process, and the consideration to be paid was also fair, adequate, and reasonable. Id. at *47. The Court determined that the settlement terms were well within the range of reasonableness, and were reflective of the uncertainties of law and fact and the concomitant risks and costs of litigating the cases through trial. Id. at *48. Accordingly, the Court approved the settlements.

In Re World Trade Center Lower Manhattan Disaster Site Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 75273 (S.D.N.Y. June 9, 2015). In the aftermath of the September 11 terrorist attacks, thousands of remediation workers who worked at the World Trade Center ("WTC") site, or buildings surrounding the WTC site, brought actions for various respiratory and gastrointestinal illnesses as a result of their work. The WTC site workers brought claims against the City and its contractors, and the workers at the surrounding buildings brought their claims against 345 building owners, managing agents, tenants, environmental consultants, general contractors, and sub-contractors that owned, leased, and performed work in the buildings. While many of those cases had been settled, 82 additional Plaintiffs represented by the law firms of Gregory J. Cannata & Associates, LLP and Robert A. Grochow, P.C. (the "Cannata Plaintiffs"), reached a settlement in principle with nearly all Defendants against whom they brought claims, and sought approval of the settlements and awards of attorneys' fees. Id. at *76. The Court granted the Cannata Plaintiffs' motions for settlement approval. To reach their settlements, the Cannata Plaintiffs used an approach that was functionally equivalent to that used to reach the settlement with the City of New York and its captive insurer (the "Captive Settlement") in the previous stage of the September 11 litigation, which the Court had approved in June 2010 as fair and reasonable. After a careful review of both the methodology used in reaching the settlements and the aggregate settlement amount, the Court found that the settlement was fair and appropriate. Id. at *79. First, regarding the issue of procedural fairness, the Court determined that the law firms that represented Plaintiffs were competent law firms with considerable experience in mass tort litigation, including being involved in the September 11 litigation since 2005. Id. Further, as the firms' negotiations with Defendants were adversarial and at arms' length, there was no evidence of collusion, and resolution came at a time when discovery was sufficiently advanced to permit the parties to fairly evaluate the value of the lawsuits. Id. at *79-80. Regarding substantive fairness, the Court opined that because the settlements were the result of a fair process, the consideration to be paid was also presumably fair, adequate, and reasonable. Id. at *80. While the aggregate settlement amount was $53,801,796.96, the payments to Plaintiffs ranged from $25,000 to $1,453,089.72, and the average settlement amount was $656,119. Id. The Court found that the settlement amounts here compared favorably with the Captive Settlement. Id. at *81. The Court thus concluded that the settlement terms were well within the range of reasonableness and reflective of the uncertainties of law and fact and the concomitant risks and costs of litigating the cases through trial. Id. Accordingly, the Court approved the settlements. Id. Regarding attorneys' fees, the Court determined a fee of 25% to be reasonable and thus approved it. Id.

Lilly et al. v. Jamba Juice Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34498 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 18, 2015). Plaintiffs filed a putative consumer fraud class action alleging that Defendants labelled their smoothie kits "all natural," when in fact the kits contained ingredients that consumers would not have understood to be natural, in violation of the California Consumer Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA"), the False Advertising Law ("FAL"), and the Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"). Id. at *1, 4. After the Court certified a class, the parties reached a settlement and moved for preliminary approval. The Court granted the motion. The settlement provided Plaintiffs injunctive relief even though Defendants previously had moved to dismiss on the ground that Plaintiffs lacked standing to pursue such relief. The Court, therefore, addressed the issue before addressing settlement approval. Id. at *5. The Court noted that, to have a standing to obtain injunctive relief, a Plaintiff must allege that a real or immediate threat exists and that he or she will be wronged again. Id. at *6. In a class action, unless Plaintiffs themselves are entitled to seek injunctive relief, they cannot represent a class seeking injunctive relief. Id. The Court noted that any rule that prevents a consumer from seeking an injunction does not comport with traditional notions of standing and prevents the person most likely to be injured in the future from seeking redress. Id. Because Plaintiffs stated that they would consider spending their own money to purchase Defendants' products if they were labelled correctly in the future, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs had standing to seek injunctive relief. Id. at *15. In its analysis on settlement approval, the Court first found that the settlement was procedurally fair. The Court explained that the settlement appeared to be the product of serious, informed, non-collusive negotiations, had no obvious deficiencies, did not improperly grant preferential treatment to the class representatives, and fell within the range of possible approval. Id. at *20. As to the substantive fairness of the settlement, the Court noted that its certification order indicated that Plaintiffs faced substantial obstacles to obtaining class-wide monetary relief. The Court found that Plaintiffs had not shown that common questions predominated for the purposes of determining damages, but that, although it could not certify a class for purposes of ascertaining damages, it could exercise its discretion to certify the class for determining the liability issue under Rule 23(c)(4). Id. at *21. In light of the difficulties that Plaintiffs would face in establishing damages on a class-wide basis, vis-à-vis the relatively small amounts to which individual class members would be entitled, the Court concluded that the settlement seemed substantively fair. Id. Accordingly, the Court preliminarily approved the settlement and directed notice to the absent class members.

Marshall, et al. v. National Football League,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 8373 (8th Cir. May 21, 2015). In this class action brought against Defendant alleging that for many years Defendant used the names, images, likenesses, and identifies of Plaintiffs, a group of National Football League ("NLF") players, in its various videos to generate revenue and promote the NFL in violation of Lanham Act, common law, and statutory rights of publicity under several states' law, the Eighth Circuit affirmed the District Court's approval of the parties' class action settlement. The settlement prohibited any payments made direct to the class. Instead, it established a "common good" entity to distribute funds to unidentified, third-party charitable organizations, which in turn, would offer benefits to either class members or similarly-situated non-class members. Id. at *6. The settlement further provided two unique benefits to the class, including: (i) the establishment of a licensing agency to assist former NFL players in marketing their publicity rights with the support of the NFL; and (ii) up to a $42 million pay-out by the NFL for the benefit of the class. Id. at *2. A group of objectors contended that the District Court abused its discretion in approving the settlement because it did not provide for a direct financial payment to each class member. The objectors attempted to characterize the settlement as simply "giving away" their proceeds to a third-party charity. Id. at *4. The Eighth Circuit, however, noted that the financial payment to the third-party organization was not the only benefit of the settlement agreement. The licensing agency created by the settlement allowed for one-stop shopping for those seeking to purchase the publicity rights of former NFL players. Id. at *7. Thus, according to the Eighth Circuit, all class members received a direct benefit from the settlement through the opportunity to license their publicity rights through the established licensing agency as well as the payments by the NFL to the licensing agency. The Eighth Circuit agreed with the District Court that, through the licensing agency, class members had an avenue to pursue commercial interests in their own images, and even in the absence of any financial pay-out, the settlement would not fail as a matter of law. Id. at *13. Further, although the $42 million was not paid directly to class members, the Eighth Circuit found that the money was clearly designated for the benefit of the class as the "common good" entity was obligated to administer the money for the benefit of class members under specifically identified purposes. Id. at *13-17. The Eighth Circuit therefore held that the class action settlement agreement did not fail as a matter of law merely because it did not provide a specific financial pay-out to each class member or because the financial pay-out was made through a third-party organization. Id. at *17. The Eighth Circuit further found that the settlement was fair, reasonable, and adequate, as the resolution of the publicity rights claims would have required tremendous efforts regarding issues of statute of limitations for the various class members' home states, complex conflict of law analyses involving multiple states, and many legal obstacles, including Defendant's plausible affirmative defenses and highly speculative nature of Plaintiffs' alleged damages. Id. at *20-26. Thus, evaluating the strength of Plaintiffs' case, the potential value, and the interests of the entire class, the Eighth Circuit concluded that the District Court properly determined that the settlement was "a remarkable victory for the class as a whole." Id. at *44. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit affirmed the District Court's approval of the settlement.

Monteferrante, et al. v. The Container Store, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13212 (D. Mass. Feb. 4, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant collected zip codes from its customers when they made purchases using credit cards at its retail stores and used the zip codes and names to identify customers' addresses and/or telephone numbers using commercially available databases. Subsequently, the parties reached a settlement, and the Court granted final approval, albeit with reservations. The Court observed that zip code class actions confer little benefit on society and that class members receive just a small value coupon to encourage shopping at the store that allegedly victimized them, while class counsel reap a big cash award. Id. at *1-2. Here, the settlement provided a $10 coupon to each class member, and attorneys' fees and costs were $120,000. The Court noted that, if the action had been brought under the Class Action Fairness Act ("CAFA"), rather than the Massachusetts Consumer Protection Act, an award of attorneys' fees would have been based on the value of the coupons actually redeemed by class members. Id. at *2. Although there were about 87,700 class members, only 1,627 claims had been submitted. If the 1,627 class members intended to redeem the coupons, the value of the settlement would be $16,270, rather than the $877,000 asserted by class counsel. Thus, the Court noted that the $120,000 fee award would be roughly 600% of the value of the settlement fund under the CAFA. Further, the Court opined that there must be at least some rational connection between the fee award and the amount of the actual distribution to the class, and the approval of attorneys' fees absent any such inquiry could have several troubling consequences. Id. at *3. The Court found that an arrangement such as the one at issue here potentially undermines the underlying purposes of class actions by providing Defendants with powerful means of enticing class counsel to settle lawsuits in a manner detrimental to the class. Id. Thus, although the Court approved the settlement, it noted that it would not have granted approval if Plaintiff had brought the action under the CAFA.

Poertner, et al. v. The Gillette Co.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 12318 (11th Cir. July 16, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative nationwide class action alleging that Defendant put misleading statements on the package of Ultra batteries in violation of the Florida Deceptive and Unfair Trade Practices Act. Id. at *3. Subsequently, the parties settled the action, and Defendant offered to give class members $12 worth of batteries with proof of purchase and $6 worth of batteries without proof of purchase. Defendant also agreed to make a donation of $6 million of batteries to charitable organizations, and pay $5.68 million in attorneys' fees. Id. at *5. The District Court granted final approval to the settlement. Upon the appeal of a group of objectors, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed. First, the Eleventh Circuit found that the settlement was fair and reasonable as it provided both monetary and equitable relief between $6.00 and $12.00 per class member, and Defendant's contribution of $6 million of batteries to charitable organizations. Therefore, the Eleventh Circuit determined that the monetary relief of $6 that could be claimed without proof of purchase exceeded the damages that an average class member would have received if the class had prevailed at trial. Id. at *10. Further, the Eleventh Circuit ruled that because only those class members who submitted claims could receive monetary relief, the use of a claims process was not suspect, nor was the claims process of completing a one-page form difficult or burdensome. Id. The objectors also argued that the District Court abused its discretion when it included the value of the non-monetary relief and cy pres award as part of the settlement. Id. at *11. The Eleventh Circuit reasoned that in another class action settlement, it had held that attorneys' fees awarded from a common fund shall be based upon a reasonable percentage of the fund established for the benefit of the class, as well as other pertinent factors, including any non-monetary benefits. Id. The objectors contended that the non-monetary relief was illusory because Defendant was no longer selling Ultra batteries when it agreed to stop putting the allegedly misleading statements on the batteries' packaging. The Eleventh Circuit, however, found that Defendant's decision to stop selling and marketing Ultra batteries was motivated by the present litigation. Id. at *12. Third, the objectors argued that the District Court's approval of the cy pres award was inappropriate as it favored the non-class member charities over class members. The Eleventh Circuit held that the donation was independent of the monetary relief available to the class. Id. at *14. The Eleventh Circuit rejected the objectors' argument that the charitable recipients of Defendant's distribution were vague, and it remarked that the settlement provided that the donation recipients would be charitable organizations, including first responder charitable organizations like Toys for Tots and The American Red Cross or 501(c)(3) organizations that regularly used consumer batteries. Id. The objectors contended that the settlement was not the best practical means of providing relief to the class. The Eleventh Circuit, however, reasoned that the record was clear that Defendant did not sell at retail, so it had no records from which it could identify actual purchasers of Ultra batteries and hence the District Court's finding – that attempting to gain information from retailers would be difficult, expensive, and essentially fruitless – was not unsupported by the record. Id. at *16. Further, the Eleventh Circuit noted that the parties settled only after engaging in extensive negotiations moderated by an experienced mediator. Id. at *17. Finally, the objectors claimed that the fees and costs award was unreasonable. The Eleventh Circuit, however, rejected this objection because it was based on a flawed valuation of the settlement, limiting the monetary value to actual payments, and excluding the substantial non-monetary benefit and the cy pres award. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's order.

Segal, et al. v. Raymond Bitar,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 76620 (S.D.N.Y. May 26, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of internet poker players, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants processed players' funds through illegal means and denied players access to approximately $150 million deposited in their accounts. Plaintiffs held Full Tilt Poker Player Accounts and contended that their accounts were frozen by Defendants when the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York seized the assets of the "Big Three" internet poker companies. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiffs demanded return of player funds and sought damages under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO"). In December 2012, the Court entered a stipulation and order of settlement in the government's civil money laundering and in rem forfeiture action in regard to Defendant Howard Lederer, who agreed to forfeit to the United States certain property, to liquidate funds and other assets in certain accounts, and to pay a civil money laundering penalty judgment in the amount of $1.25 million. Id. at *10. In March 2014, a stipulation and order of settlement were entered with regard to Defendant Christopher Ferguson, who agreed to forfeit all funds in his accounts to the United States. Id. at *11. In July 2013, Defendant PokerStars filed a stipulation and proposed order of settlement wherein it agreed to forfeit $547 million to the United States and to make available for withdrawal all balances for players of the Full Tilt Group in an amount believed to be $184 million. Id. at *12. Plaintiffs moved for preliminary settlement approval. The Court denied the motion. Plaintiffs contended that the proposed settlement addressed Defendants' allegedly deceptive conduct by providing carefully tailored therapeutic relief to the class without the risk and delays of continued litigation, trial, and appeal. With respect to numerosity, the Court noted that the proposed settlement agreement defined the class as including all persons or entities, exclusive of Defendants and their employees or affiliates, who had monies in the Full Tilt Poker Player Account but were unable to access the funds. Id. The Full Tilt Poker Claim Administration Website, resulting from the related civil money laundering and in rem forfeiture action brought by the United States, demonstrated that the number of potential class members was in the thousands. Accordingly, the Court found that the class was so numerous that joinder of all members was impracticable and the numerosity requirement was satisfied. However, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate commonality. The Court noted that Plaintiffs merely recited questions that they alleged were common to the class and failed to identify any contention whose truth or falsity would resolve an issue that was central to the validity of each claim in one stroke. Id. at *30-32. Further, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the adequacy requirement because they negotiated a proposed settlement agreement that included a definition of the class different from the putative class definition in their complaint and, therefore, they failed to protect and fairly and adequately represent the interests of the putative class members. Id. at *33. Finally, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that they met the requirements of Rule 23(b)(2). Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for preliminary approval of the settlement.

United States v. City Of New York*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29859 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 11, 2015). The United States brought a suit against the City of New York alleging that certain aspects of the City's policies for selecting entry-level firefighters for the New York Fire Department ("NYFD") violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. Specifically, the United States alleged that the City's pass-fail and rank-order use of Written Exams 7029 and 2043 had an unlawful disparate impact on black and Hispanic candidates for entry-level firefighter positions. Id. at *10. Subsequently, the parties reached an agreement to settle claims for back pay and fringe benefits, including interest, and jointly moved to provisionally approve and enter a Monetary Relief Consent Decree ("MRCD"). Id. at *23. After 101 Claimants objected to the settlement, the United States filed an amended decree (the "AMRCD"), which the parties jointly moved for final approval. The AMRCD, as compared to the MRCD, contained a technical change regarding the entity (the City versus the Court-appointed claims administrator) that would be issuing payments to claimants for the fringe benefits and interest portions of their awards. Id. at *25. Under the AMRCD, the City agreed to pay to eligible claimants a total of $80 million in back pay; $11 million in interest on back pay; $6.2 million in fringe benefits; and $832,129.54 in interest on fringe benefits – amounting to a total settlement sum of $99,098,358.29. Id. at *30. The amounts included interest accrued through the end of 2014, and the decree provided for allocation of the aggregate funds by the claims administrator, according to a methodology devised by the United States and firefighters who intervened in the case as Plaintiffs. Id. at *31. The Court approved the settlement. The Court first applied the nine factors articulated in City of Detroit v. Grinnell Corp., 495 F.2d 448 (2d Cir. 1974), and found that the approximately 15% discount from the City's likely post-mitigation liability was fair, reasonable, and adequate. Id. at *53. The Court explained that resolving those claims currently would speed relief to claimants who had been waiting years for relief, as those claimants took the unlawful exams 12 and 15 years ago, and the case was pending for eight years. Id. The Court concluded that increased speed was desirable, and avoiding the continued use of the claims process eliminated a material burden on claimants, who would be subjected during that process to additional discovery, individual hearings before special masters, motions to dismiss, and further litigation. Id. at *54. Furthermore the Court found that the generally positive response to the decree weighed in favor of the final approval. Further, the Court scrutinized the allocation methodology and found it fair. The Court explained that all claimants were assigned to one of the eight damages categories based on: (i) the race identified on his or her claim form; (ii) the Court's determination of the examination for which the claimant was eligible for relief; and (iii) the Court's determination regarding the claimant's status as a non-hire or delayed-hire claimant. Id. at *59. Pursuant to the decree's allocation methodology, the claims administrator was provided with interim earnings data with respect to each eligible non-hire claimant, and it averaged each non-hire claimant's annual interim earnings over the back pay period. Id. at *60. The Court determined that the allocation methodology for non-hire claimants, delayed-hire claimants, allocation of fringe benefits, and calculation of allocation of interest met the relevant standard for approval. Although the Court received several objections against the allocation methodology, it nevertheless concluded that none warranted denial of the final approval of the settlement agreement. Accordingly, the Court granted the joint motion for final approval of the settlement agreement.

Wilkins, et al. v. HSBC Bank Nevada, N.A.,* Case No. 14-CV-190 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 6, 2015). In this class action alleging that Defendants violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by placing unauthorized automated calls to thousands of individuals, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for final settlement approval and sought clarification from the class counsel on the number of timely claimants. On February 27, 2015, the Court issued a memorandum opinion and order granting Plaintiffs' motion for final approval of the class action settlement finding a nearly $40 million settlement fair, reasonable, and adequate. The Court also approved a fee award of $9,495,000 to class counsel and payment of incentive awards for the class representatives in the amount of $5,000 each. The Court further requested the parties to submit an agreed proposed order effectuating their settlement agreement consistent with the Court's opinion. In response, the class counsel submitted a "Proposed Final Order of Dismissal and Final Judgment" ("Proposed Order") on March 5, 2015, stating that "a total of 284,344 settlement class members submitted timely and proper claims." Id. at 1. The Court noted that, in both a memorandum in support of motion for attorneys' fees and at the fairness hearing, class counsel had represented that a total of 286,433 class members had submitted timely claims. Id. The Court had relied on class counsel's representation about the number of timely claimants in its order approving the settlement. Because the Court found discrepancies in the number of timely claimants, it ordered the class counsel to file statements by March 9, 2015, clarifying the number of class members who submitted timely and proper claims. Id. The Court also ordered class counsel to include an explanation as to why they failed to identify and correct their multiple inaccurate representations, if the number of timely claimants was indeed 284,344 as set forth in the Proposed Order. Id. Accordingly, the Court directed the parties to submit a revised proposed order.

Editor's Note: The $40 million settlement in Wilkins is the largest TCPA class action settlement in 2015.

(xxv) Mootness Issues In Class Action Litigation

Bais Yaakov Of Spring Valley, et al. v. ACT, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 14718 (1st Cir. Aug. 21, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, a college-entrance examination services provider, sent three unsolicited facsimile advertisements in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). After the parties mutually agreed on a deadline for the class certification motion, Defendant tendered Plaintiff an offer of judgment under Rule 68. Defendant offered to pay $1,600 for each fax ($1,500 for violating the TCPA and $100 for violating the New York General Business Laws). Id. at *2. Defendant contended that this figure represented the maximum amount that Plaintiff could be awarded in damages; Defendant also offered to be enjoined from sending any additional unsolicited faxes to Plaintiff and offered to pay attorneys' fees and costs. Plaintiff moved for class certification four days after the Rule 68 offer, and did not respond to the offer within 14 days after it was served, which meant that the unaccepted offer was withdrawn by Rule 68. Id. at *3. Instead of renewing the withdrawn offer, Defendant moved to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. The District Court denied the motion to dismiss, and certified for appeal to the First Circuit the question of whether an unaccepted Rule 68 offer of judgment in a putative class action moots Plaintiff's entire action, if the offer is made before a class certification motion is filed. In certifying the question, the District Court accepted Defendant's contention that had Plaintiff accepted the offer, it would have provided Plaintiff with all the relief that it would be entitled to if Plaintiff had prevailed in the action. The First Circuit agreed to review the question. At the outset, the First Circuit remarked that Plaintiffs seeking to pursue a class action must show they are members of the class, and they adequately represent the class. Id. at *6. The First Circuit remarked that Defendant advanced a stratagem for defeating motions for class certification: offer only the named Plaintiff full payment for individual claims, and then move to dismiss the suit as moot before the District Court has a chance to consider whether a Plaintiff can represent the putative class. Id. at *6-7. The First Circuit observed that the U.S. Supreme Court's previous holding in Deposit Guaranty National Bank v. Roper, 445 U.S. 326 (1980), found that the entry of judgment over the putative class Plaintiffs' objection, of full payment on their individual claims after a class certification motion had been denied, did not moot their private case, and that they could still appeal the denial of class certification motion. The Supreme Court reasoned that allowing claims of class representatives to be "picked off" would frustrate the objectives of class actions, and also noted Plaintiffs' desire to shift part of the costs of the litigation to those who would share in its benefits. Id. at *8. Plaintiff argued that it too had a continuing economic interest in the litigation, i.e., of sharing the attorneys' fees, and a possible incentive award for serving as the lead Plaintiff. The First Circuit observed that in order to decide whether an unaccepted Rule 68 offer triggers mootness, the District Court must first decide whether a Plaintiff who has refused such an offer has received complete relief, such that there remained no individual case or controversy sufficient to satisfy Article III. Id. at *13. The First Circuit noted that in Genesis Healthcare Corp. v. Symczyk, 133 S. Ct. 1523 (2013), four of the dissenting justices expanded on the reasoning of Rooper, finding that a rejected Rule 68 offer does not moot a claim because the rule itself provides that an unaccepted offer is considered withdrawn. Id. Accordingly, the First Circuit concluded that an unaccepted Rule 68 offer cannot, by itself, moot a Plaintiff's claim, as an unaccepted offer does not provide any relief on its own. Id. at *16.

Chapman, et al. v. First Index, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13767 (7th Cir. Aug. 6, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant sent him unsolicited fax advertisements in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Plaintiff alleged that he received two unsolicited faxes demanding $3,000 in damages, without substantiating his actual damages. Id. at *5. After the District Court certified a class action, Plaintiff attempted to change the class definition and moved for amendment of the certification order. The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion. Id. at *2-3. While the class certification motion was pending, Defendant made an offer of judgment of $3,002 and an injunction to Plaintiff. When Plaintiff failed to respond, the District Court denied his claims as moot, and dismissed his complaint. Id. at *3. The District Court also denied a motion to intervene filed by "All American Painting, Inc.," who wanted to replace Chapman as the named Plaintiff. Id. at *5. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit reversed in part. At the outset, the Seventh Circuit noted that pursuant to Rule 68, a District Court cannot enter judgment in a moot case, but only could dismiss the case for lack of controversy. Id. at *7. Under the circumstances, the Seventh Circuit noted that if $3,002 offer made this case moot, then even if Plaintiff had accepted it, the District Court could not have ordered Defendant to pay, and at most it could dismiss the case for lack of an Article III controversy. Id. at *7-8. The Seventh Circuit further noted that Rule 68(d) provides that failure to accept a fully compensatory offer may suggest that Plaintiff is an inadequate representative of the class, for he has nothing to gain and may have given up something that the class values. Id. at *8. The Seventh Circuit remarked that if there is only one Plaintiff, District Courts should not be required to assist in a controversy when a Defendant fully compensates Plaintiff's claims with an offer of judgment. Id. at *10. The Seventh Circuit, however, observed that Defendant did not make an argument there was no sum currently in dispute, and that a fleeting offer could not reasonably be equated to full compensation. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit vacated the judgment as to Plaintiff's personal claim, but affirmed as to the order denying the motion to intervene.

Epps, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66647 (E.D. Ark. May 21, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to credit them for the full amount of insurance proceeds that they received for services at Wal-Mart Vision Centers. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs sought relief on theories of conversion, unjust enrichment, and violations of the Arkansas Deceptive Trade Practices Act. Id. Plaintiffs also sought damages for themselves and a class of all individuals similarly-situated. Defendant served an offer of judgment to Plaintiffs under Rule 68 and filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that the action was moot because it had offered Plaintiffs full relief satisfying their individual claims before they filed a class certification motion. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs, in response, moved to strike Defendant's offer of judgment and to certify a class. The Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss, granted Plaintiff's motion to strike, and held Plaintiff's motion to certify a class in abeyance. Id. The Court noted that in Alpern v. UtiliCorp United, Inc., 84 F.3d 1525 (8th Cir. 1996), the Eighth Circuit had held that Defendant's offer of payment of the putative class representative's individual claim did not moot the class action. Id. at *15. Following the guidance of Alpern, case law authorities in the Eighth Circuit had held that a pre-motion-to-certify Rule 68 offer of judgment that would satisfy only the named Plaintiffs' claims failed to offer complete relief for the claims of the class and thus did not moot the class action. Id. at *15. The Court reasoned that "an unaccepted pre-motion-to-certify Rule 68 offer of complete relief to the named Plaintiff is ineffective to moot the name Plaintiff's claim because the cost-sharing provision of Rule 68(d) creates a conflict of interest between the class representative and the class members." Id. at *16. Because the class has some legal status prior to certification and because Defendant's offer created a conflict of interest between the named and unnamed Plaintiffs, the Court concluded that striking the Rule 68 offer of judgment would be appropriate. Id. at *21-22. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss and granted Plaintiffs' motion to strike Defendant's Rule 68 offer of judgment.

Floyd, et al. v. Sallie Mae, Inc., John Doe,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 7322 (11th Cir. May 4, 2015). In this action challenging the District Court's order granting Defendant's motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, the Eleventh Circuit reversed and remanded the case. Plaintiff argued that the District Court erred in concluding that his case was moot after he rejected Defendant's Rule 68 offer of judgment. Id. at *1. Plaintiff contended that the District Court erred because Defendant's offer provided him complete relief on his individual claims, while providing no relief to the putative class. Id. At the outset, the Eleventh Circuit noted that in Stein v. Buccaneers Limited Partnership, 772 F.3d 698 (11th Cir. 2014), it held that unaccepted offers of judgment did not render the named Plaintiffs' complaint moot. Id. at *2. Defendant argued that Plaintiff waived his argument that an unaccepted Rule 68 offer of judgement cannot moot his claim because he never presented it to the District Court. The Eleventh Circuit, however, noted that the District Court explicitly held that Plaintiff's claim was moot because the Rule 68 offer included more than all of this relief that Plaintiff could obtain at trial. Id. at *2-3. Therefore, the Eleventh Circuit remarked that the issue of whether Plaintiff's claim was moot was undoubtedly before the District Court. Id. at *3. Accordingly, based on its precedent in Stein, the Eleventh Circuit concluded that Plaintiff's claim was not moot simply because he rejected Defendant's Rule 68 offer of judgment. For this reason, it reversed the District Court's order.

Hooks, et al. v. Landmark Industries, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 14116 (5th Cir. Aug. 12, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action seeking statutory damages for violations of the Electronic Funds Transfer Act ("EFTA"). Plaintiff alleged that Defendant charged $2.95 for withdrawals from the ATM it operated without posting a notice on or at the ATM to inform customers of the fee. Id. at *2. Defendant tendered a Rule 68 offer of judgment to settle the statutory claim and offered to pay reasonable attorneys' fees and costs. Id. at *2-3. When Plaintiff did not accept the offer, Defendant filed a motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. The Magistrate Judge issued a recommendation to certify a class and to dismiss Defendant's motion as moot. Id. Defendant then filed a second motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, arguing that the unaccepted Rule 68 offer of judgment mooted Plaintiff's individual claim as well as Plaintiff's class action. The District Court granted the motion. Plaintiff appealed and the Fifth Circuit reversed and remanded. At the outset, Plaintiff argued that the Rule 68 offer was not a complete offer of judgment because it included only reasonable attorneys' fees accrued through the date of the offer. The Fifth Circuit refused to offer an opinion on the issue, noting that the outcome of the appeal did not hinge on the completeness of the offer but on whether an unaccepted offer moots a Plaintiff's individual claims. Id. at *7. The Fifth Circuit observed that in Diaz v. First American Home Buyers Protection Corp., 732 F.3d 948 (9th Cir. 2013), and in Stein v. Buccaneers Limited Partnership, 772 F.3d 698 (11th Cir. 2014), the Ninth Circuit and the Eleventh Circuit, respectively, held that an unaccepted offer of judgment to a named Plaintiff in a class action was a legal nullity, with no operative effect. Id. at *11-12. Following these decisions, the Fifth Circuit ruled that, because the unaccepted offer did not moot Plaintiff's individual claim, it did not moot Plaintiff's class claim. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit reversed the District Court's order and remanded the action.

Lafollette, et al. v. Liberty Mutual Fire Insurance Co.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2283 (W.D. Mo. Jan. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of homeowner's insurance policyholders, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the terms of their insurance policies by applying a $1,000 deductible to the actual cash value payment for the losses to their homes. After several months of litigation, Defendant made offers of judgment to all Plaintiffs. In the offers of judgment, Defendant offered to pay each Plaintiff $1,000 plus pre-judgment interest and costs, but did not address the class claims. Plaintiffs moved to strike Defendant's offers of judgment, and Defendant moved to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion and denied Defendant's motion. Defendant argued that, because its offers of judgment provided relief for the entirety of Plaintiffs' claims, no controversy existed for the Court to exercise its Article III jurisdiction. The Court noted that the majority of circuits addressing the issue had held that unaccepted Rule 68 offers of judgment do not moot a pending class action. Id. at *3. The Court observed that Rule 68 gives a Plaintiff 14 days to accept an offer of judgment, after which time an unaccepted offer is automatically withdrawn and rendered a legal nullity. Id. The Court, therefore, opined that Defendant's offers had lapsed, and a justiciable controversy remained. Defendant contended that, after the Court has considered and denied class certification, a Rule 68 offer of judgment for the entirety of Plaintiffs' claims should moot the action. Id. at *4. The Court, however, found that Plaintiffs had alleged a putative class claim in their complaint and that the time for filing a motion for class certification had not yet run. Because Defendant provided no relief for putative class members in its offers of judgment, the Court found that a justiciable controversy existed regarding the remainder of the damages to which Plaintiffs argued they were entitled, and, therefore, Plaintiffs' claims were not moot. Id. Plaintiffs further contended that Defendant's Rule 68 offers of judgment should be stricken because they created an unacceptable conflict between the Plaintiffs and putative class members. The Court agreed. It reasoned that forcing a Plaintiff to weigh her personal risks against the potential benefit to the remainder of the class, i.e., benefits in which she would share equally with the other class members, would threaten the entire class action mechanism. Id. at *6-7. The Court held that, because the time for filing a motion for class certification had not run when Defendant made its offers of judgment, the offers did not moot Plaintiffs' claims. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss and granted Plaintiffs' motion to strike Defendant's offers of judgment.

Tanasi, et al. v. New Alliance Bank*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 7932 (2d Cir. May 14, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants made improper assessments of overdraft fees on his account and the accounts of others similarly-situated and sought money damages. Defendants offered to settle Plaintiff's individual claims pursuant to Rule 68 for an amount greater than the statutory damages to which Plaintiff would have been entitled if successful. Id. at *4. After Plaintiff refused to accept the offer, Defendants filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that the unaccepted Rule 68 offer rendered Plaintiff's individual and putative class action claims moot. The District Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that although Plaintiff's individual claims were rendered moot by the unaccepted Rule 68 offer, his putative class action claims were not. On appeal, the Second Circuit reversed the District Court insofar as it held that Plaintiff's claim was moot. At the outset, the Second Circuit noted that under Rule 68, if a offeree accepts an offer within 14 days after it is made, the clerk must enter judgment; however, if the offeree does not accept the offer, it is considered withdrawn, and the case must proceed. Id. at *7. The Second Circuit remarked that what Rule 68 does not make clear is the effect, if any, of an unaccepted offer on the justiciability of Plaintiff's claim under the U.S. Constitution's case or controversy clause. Id. at *8. The Second Circuit observed that a case becomes moot pursuant to Article III's case or controversy clause when it is impossible for the District Court to grant any effectual relief to the prevailing party. The Second Circuit further observed that the Third, Fifth, Seventh, Tenth and Federal Circuits have all concluded that a Rule 68 offer of complete relief to an individual renders his case moot for purposes of Article III, regardless of whether judgment is entered against Defendant. On the other hand, the Ninth and Eleventh Circuits have concluded that an unaccepted Rule 68 cannot moot a case because giving controlling effect to an unaccepted Rule 68 offer is flatly inconsistent with the Rule. Id. at *9. In this case, the District Court summarily concluded that in the Second Circuit it was settled that if Plaintiff was not seeking to represent a class, Defendants complete offer of judgment would moot his claims and strip the Court of subject-matter jurisdiction. The Second Circuit remarked that the District Court reached this conclusion based on the circuit's case law, which was not clear on this subject. Id. at *10. Consequently, the Second Circuit opined that the District Courts within the circuit have not deduced a single rule on the issue. In the light of this confusion, the Second Circuit clarified the rule that a rejected settlement offer under Rule 68, by itself, cannot render a case moot. Id. at *11. The Second Circuit further held that if the parties agree that a judgment should be entered against Defendant, then the District Court should enter such a judgment. Id. The Second Circuit concluded that absent such agreement, however, the District Court should not enter judgment against Defendant if it does not provide complete relief. Applying this standard to the present case, the Second Circuit reasoned Plaintiff's individual claims were not rendered moot, in the constitutional sense, by the unaccepted Rule 68 offer. Id. at *12. Instead, because the District Court had not yet entered judgment against Defendants when it reached its decision on the motion to dismiss, the Second Circuit concluded the District Court maintained Article III subject-matter jurisdiction over the case regardless of Plaintiff's putative class action claims. Id. at *12-13.

Walker, et al. v. Financial Recovery Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 4976 (11th Cir. Mar. 27, 2015). In this putative class action, the District Court found that the Rule 68 offer of judgment Plaintiff rejected her claim, and dismissed the complaint. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Eleventh Circuit reversed the order, holding it contravened the recent decision in Stein v. Buccaneers Limited Partnership, 772 F.3d 698 (11th Cir. 2014). Id. at *1-2. In Stein, the named Plaintiff had received Rule 68 offers of judgment before moving for class certification. The Eleventh Circuit had held that the unaccepted offers of judgment did not render the named Plaintiffs' complaint moot. Id. at *2. Defendant argued that while the offers in Stein were deemed revoked if not accepted and Defendant did not request that the District Court enter judgment on the terms of its offers, in this case Defendant continued to stand behind its offer and requested that the District Court provide Plaintiff with complete relief by entering judgment. The Eleventh Circuit remarked that Stein broadly held that "[g]iving controlling effect to an unaccepted Rule 68 offer . . . is flatly inconsistent with the rule." Id. at *2-3. In so concluding, Stein adopted the reasoning of four U.S. Supreme Court Justices in Genesis Healthcare Corp. v. Symczyk, 133 S. Ct. 1523 (2013). Those Justices specifically stated that "an unaccepted offer of judgment cannot moot a case. When a Plaintiff rejects such an offer – however good the terms – her interest in the lawsuit remains just what it was before. And so too does the Court's ability to grant her relief. An unaccepted settlement offer – like any unaccepted contract offer – is a legal nullity, with no operative effect." Id. at *3. The Eleventh Circuit remarked that even if the facts of this case were distinguishable from Stein, its second alternative holding would still bind this case. Specifically, Stein held that even assuming a putative class representative's individual claim was mooted, a Rule 68 offer of full relief to the named Plaintiff does not moot a class action even if the offer precedes a class certification motion, so long as the named Plaintiff has not failed to diligently pursue class certification. Id. Accordingly, the Eleventh Circuit reversed the District Court's order of dismissing complaint for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

Webster, et al. v. Bayview Loan Servicing,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 18295 (7th Cir. Oct. 21, 2015). Plaintiff, a borrower, brought an action alleging that Defendant continued to call her cell phone regarding debt she owed Defendant even after she was discharged in bankruptcy, in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") and the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA"). Plaintiff sought individual relief and requested actual and compensatory damages, including an order enjoining Defendant from committing any future violations of the FDCPA and the TCPA and a declaratory judgment of the violations. Plaintiff moved to file an amended complaint to assert the claims as a class action and simultaneously moved for class certification. While the motions were pending, Defendant offered to settle Plaintiff's claims by tender of the full relief sought, which Plaintiff rejected. Defendant moved to dismiss, which the Court granted. Id. at *3-4. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit vacated and remanded the District Court's order. Plaintiff argued that she moved to amend her complaint to allege a class action and had also sought class certification prior to Defendant's offer to settle her individual claims and that Defendant's offer not did moot her individual claims because the offer did not provide her with the full relief requested. The Seventh Circuit found that Defendant's offer of full compensation did not moot Plaintiff's lawsuit. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit reversed the District Court's order and remanded the action.

(xxvi) Experts In Class Action Litigation

Chen-Oster, et al. v. Goldman, Sachs & Co.*, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29813 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former female employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendants denied them equal compensation and opportunities for promotion in violation of Title VII. Plaintiffs moved for class certification, and each side moved to exclude a part of the other side's expert testimony, which the Court granted in part. Defendants first moved to exclude the report of Plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Henry S. Farber. Dr. Farber used a multiple regression analysis, and found that female associates earned 7.6% less than male associates after accounting for the factors in his model. Id. at *7-8. Similarly, Dr. Farber determined that female Vice Presidents were paid 21.36% less than similarly-situated male Vice Presidents. Id. at *8. Defendants first challenged Dr. Farber's report on the basis that he failed to include in his model two measures of performance – 360 reviews and quartile placements – that might be considered predictors of compensation and promotion. Id. at *14. The Court observed that Dr. Farber did incorporate Defendants' performance measures in his model, and found that, although the performance variables resulted in a less dramatic disparity in compensation between men and women, a statistically significant pay differential, however, remained. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Dr. Farber's model considered performance and productivity in his analysis. Defendants also argued that Dr. Farber did not use the AAP job codes – codes that are assigned pursuant to a DOL regulation – to make evaluation, compensation, or promotion decisions, primarily because 70% of the putative class members fell in one of the three AAP job codes. Id. at *18. The Court observed that since Defendants might be able to identify a different variable that would lead to a better fit between a model and the data, that was an issue to analyze the weight of the evidence; hence, it did not render Dr. Farber's report inadmissible. Id. at *19. Plaintiffs sought to exclude one aspect of the report of Defendants' expert, Dr. Michael P. Ward, to the extent that his analysis examined pairs of Vice Presidents who, without accounting for gender, shared similar characteristics but who had very different compensation. The Court found that Dr. Ward's pair studies were unreliable because: (i) he did not determine the statistical significance of his findings; and (ii) his sample size of two pairs was too small to serve as the basis for any statistical interference. Id. at *30-31. Accordingly, the Court excluded Dr. Ward's report. Defendants also challenged the report of Plaintiff's expert, Dr. David L. Yermack's, insofar as he concluded that financial services firms had similar ranges of jobs and that staff at the Associate and Vice President levels were comparable across firms. While Defendants challenged Dr. Yermack's report in several respects, the Court noted that he was a rebuttal expert, whose evidence would be offered only to the extent it was necessary to controvert the opinions of another expert, Dr. Michael P. Curran. Id. at *43. The Court similarly determined the admissibility of experts' reports of Dr. Wayne P. Cascio, Dr. Michael A. Campion, and Dr. Michael P. Curran, and denied the requests to exclude their testimony.

In Re Blood Reagents Antitrust Litigation,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 5630 (3d Cir. April 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, direct purchasers of traditional blood reagents, brought a class action alleging that Defendants increased the prices by 2,000% and sought damages under Clayton Act for alleged horizontal price fixing in violation of the Sherman Act. Id. at *3. After Plaintiffs settled with one of the Defendants, Immucor, Inc., the District Court preliminarily approved the settlement and certified a settlement class. Plaintiffs had relied on expert testimony to produce their antitrust impact analyses and damages models. The District Court evaluated the testimony, and held that the expert testimony could evolve to become admissible evidence at trial, and determined that Plaintiffs had satisfied the predominance requirement. Id. at *4. The other Defendant, Ortho-Clinical Diagnostics, Inc., ("Ortho") challenged the class certification order, and the Third Circuit vacated it and remanded the case. Ortho pointed to Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, 133 S. Ct. 1426 (2013), and asserted that the District Court erred when it declined to address whether Plaintiffs' damages models were capable of producing just and reasonable damage estimates at trial, and by accepting Plaintiffs' theory as capable of proving class-wide antitrust impact. Id. at *5. Ortho contended that the methodologies of Plaintiffs' expert could not prove antitrust impact as a matter of law because they were incapable of distinguishing lawful price increases resulting from the creation of a duopoly from price increases resulting from the alleged price-fixing conspiracy. Ortho based its argument on statements in Comcast such as, prices whose level above what an expert deems competitive has been caused by factors unrelated to an accepted theory of antitrust harm are not anti-competitive in any sense relevant here, and the suggestion that a damages model must be able to bridge the differences between supra-competitive prices in general and supra-competitive prices attributable to the antitrust violation. Id. at *6. The Third Circuit observed that a Plaintiff cannot rely on challenged expert testimony, which is critical to class certification, to demonstrate conformity with Rule 23, unless Plaintiff also demonstrates that the expert testimony satisfies the standard set out in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993). Id. The Third Circuit observed that Plaintiffs primarily relied on the expert testimony to produce most of their antitrust impact analyses and damages models, and they offered this testimony to demonstrate that common questions predominated over individual ones. Id. at *11. Because Ortho consistently challenged the reliability of the methodologies of Plaintiffs' expert and the sufficiency of the testimony to satisfy the Rule 23(b)(3) requirement, the Third Circuit remanded the action and left it to the District Court to rule on Ortho's reliability attacks, and if necessary conduct a Daubert inquiry before assessing Rule 23 requirements. Id. at *11-12. Accordingly, the Third Circuit vacated and remanded the action.

In Re Chinese Manufactured Drywall Products Liability Litigation*, MDL No. 2047 (E.D. La. May 14, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendant's gypsum wallboards emitted various sulfide gases, damaged structural, mechanical, and plumbing systems in homes, and damaged other home appliances. Defendant moved to compel documents upon which Plaintiffs' damages expert, George Inglas, relied. The Court denied the motion, finding that the documents were protected from disclosure under Rules 26(b)(3)(B) and 26(b)(4)(B) as drafts of reports or disclosures that contain the "metal impressions, conclusions, opinions, or legal theories of a party's attorney or other representative concerning the litigation." Id. at 1. The Court found that Inglas' role in helping to create the information invoked work-product protection under Rule 26(b)(4)(B). Defendant argued that Plaintiffs waived any protection when they sent the information to Brown Greer, the settlement administrator. The Court, however, ruled that the work-product sent between Inglas and Greer fell within the ambit of protection under Rule 26(b)(3)(B) because Greer worked on behalf of the litigation in the interest of all settling parties and not as a "third-party." Id. at 1-2. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to compel.

In Re Processed Egg Products Multi-District Antitrust Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9965 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 26, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of purchasers of Defendants' egg or egg products, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants conspired and inflated the prices for processed eggs in violation of Sherman Act. Seeking class certification, Plaintiffs offered the testimony of Dr. Gordon Rausser, an economist. Defendants filed a Daubert motion to exclude Rausser's declaration, opinions, and testimony. Defendants asserted that Dr. Rausser's analysis of whether the "Egg Industry is Conducive to Price Manipulation through Output Restriction" and whether "Conspiracy Period Behavior and Pricing is Consistent with Collusion" did not involve the application of his "scientific, technical, or specialized knowledge" because Dr. Rausser merely based his expert credential on factual records. Id. at *12-13. The Court denied Defendants' motion. The Court found that, although Dr. Rausser's conclusions appeared to be based on nothing more than his reading of record and finding evidence in support of Plaintiffs' positions, he did go through the factors that make a market conducive to collusion, and did apply those principles to the factual record. Id. at *24. Particularly, the Court found that Dr. Rausser tied the evidence of the case to the economic theory of collusion, and his economic expertise allowed him to opine on whether the evidence supported the conditions for collusion. Id. at *25-26. Defendants challenged each of Dr. Rausser's opinions, including his methodology for showing class-wide impact of the prices of various egg products. The Court, however, found Dr. Rausser's analysis – called a co-movement analysis – as a reliable analytical form relevant for the purposes of the case, and sufficient for the facts of the case. According to the Court, analysis of the market structure and the common factors affecting price supported Dr. Rausser's co-movement analysis, and any expert in statistics or economics could understand and test his methods. Moreover, Defendants failed to identify any factor that Dr. Rausser failed to account for that could render his analysis unreliable and inadmissible. Id. at *47. To the extent Defendants asserted flaws in Dr. Rausser's model due to some factors, the Court determined that Dr. Rausser's reply declaration adequately accounted for each of the contended flaws, and that the critique of Dr. Rausser's model did not make it inadmissible under Daubert. Id. at *59. The Court concluded that Dr. Rausser's methodology was a fairly straightforward way of estimating the increase in price attributable to the conspiracy, and thus reliable. Id. at *65. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to exclude the opinions and testimony of Dr. Rausser.

In Re Zoloft (Sertraline Hydrochloride) Products Liability Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1598 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 7, 2015). In this multi-district class action litigation, Plaintiffs alleged that Zoloft, a prescription anti-depressant, caused birth defects in the children born to exposed mothers who took the drug while pregnant. Although the Plaintiffs' steering committee ("PSC") had offered the testimony of four expert witnesses on the issue of general causation, the Court had excluded the opinions of all four experts, ruling that these experts could not testify that Zoloft caused birth defects in humans, but could testify as to the limited question of the existence of plausible biological mechanisms in which altered concentrations of serotonin in a developing embryo could cause birth defects. Id. at *1-2. The PSC then sought to introduce expert testimony by Nicholas Jewell, Ph.D., a professor at the University of California, Berkeley in the Division of Biostatistics, School of Public Health, and in the Department of Statistics. The PSC asserted that Jewell would opine that in utero exposure to Zoloft could cause congenital heart defects. The Court granted the motion. The Court remarked that although there would be additional expense to litigate the admissibility of Jewell's proposed testimony, this prejudice did not warrant denial of the motion. Although the PSC and Jewell had the benefit of the Court's prior rulings in the formulation of the new expert report, the Court opined that this did not prejudice Defendant because either Jewell's expert report and testimony would pass muster under Rule 702 or they would not. Id. at *6-7. Further, because there was a possibility that Jewell would be presented as an expert witness in Zoloft cases currently pending in state courts, or in cases that may be filed in the future, the Court reasoned that Defendant likely must address his expert testimony at some point. The Court also noted that the evidence was of critical importance to Plaintiffs because the decision to admit or exclude scientific evidence and expert testimony strongly affected the ability of a party to prevail. Id. at *7. Further, the Court opined that there was no reason to conclude that the PSC had acted in bad faith or that its present predicament was the result of deliberate strategy instead of a miscalculation as to the persuasiveness of one of the other experts. Additionally, the Court observed that the initial hearing under Daubert v. Merrel Dow Pharmaceuticals, 509 U.S. 579 (1993), was not futile, because the testimony of the experts offered previously had been limited, and Jewell's proposed expert testimony encompassed a significantly more limited range of birth defects than did the PSC's other experts. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court granted the PSC's motion to permit the testimony of Jewell.

Whitlock, et al. v. Pepsi Americas,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16815 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 11, 2015). Plaintiff and 30 other persons brought an action alleging personal injuries caused by the emission of toxic chemicals, including hexavalent chromium, from Defendant's Remco facility. Initially, Plaintiff asserted that based upon the scientific information available in 2010, her medical expert, Dr. Vera Byers, was unable to attribute Plaintiff's reproductive ailments and miscarriages to her chemical exposure, to a reasonable degree of medical certainty. Id. at *3. Subsequently, Dr. Linda Remy, Plaintiffs' epidemiology expert in the related case of Avila v. REMCO, Case No. 99-CV-3941, prepared a report (the "2012 report") based on a study she conducted through the University of California, San Francisco. Id. at *4. Remy found that women living in Willits, California experienced significantly higher rates of miscarriages, endometriosis, ovarian cysts, and other pregnancy-related maladies compared to the rest of the county. Id. Thereafter, Plaintiff asked Byers to review Plaintiff's case. Plaintiff contended that Byers began to suspect that the 2012 report regarding reproductive injuries was applicable to Plaintiff, and in June 2013 Byers contacted Remy. Id. at *5. Remy, however, advised that although the data was striking, the 2012 report could not be reliably compared to Plaintiff because the data had been collected for hospitalized patients, who were sicker than Plaintiff. Id. In May 2014, Remy received new patient discharge data ("PDD") from the California Office of Statewide Health Planning and Development for 99 female Plaintiffs in this action and various other lawsuits regarding the Remco facility. Based on the PDD, Remy concluded for the first time that 62 Plaintiffs identified in the database had statistically significantly higher rates of genitourinary and reproductive illness and procedures compared to the rest of the county. Id. Byers then re-reviewed Plaintiff's medical history, and notified her counsel that based on Remy's new findings, she would be able to revise her expert report regarding Plaintiff and could now opine that exposure to hexavalent chromium was a cause or substantial contributor to Plaintiff's reproductive problems. Id. at *6. Plaintiff thus moved to supplement the expert reports with this updated information, which the Court granted. The Court opined that Plaintiff demonstrated good cause to permit the supplemental report. Plaintiff submitted the declaration of Remy, wherein she explained that the data analyzed in her 2014 report was new, and that she could not have conducted that analysis earlier. Further, Byers diligently updated her medical opinion based upon Remy's 2014 report, and it was only after Remy issued the 2014 report that Byers became confident about offering an opinion that the exposure to hexavalent chromium was a cause or substantial contributor to Plaintiff's reproductive problems. Additionally, the Court found that Defendants would not be prejudiced by the amendment because Plaintiff was not adding a new legal theory or claim, and was only supplementing an expert report to strengthen her claims of reproductive injuries. Id. at *8. Thus, because the existing expert report was incomplete or incorrect, and Plaintiff had a duty to supplement that report, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion.

(xxvii) Sanctions In Class Action Litigation

David, et al. v. Signal International, LLC,* Case No. 08-CV-1220 (E.D. La. Feb. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of migrant workers, brought a class action seeking to recover damages inflicted by Defendants and their recruiters and agents operating in India, the United Arab Emirates, and the United States. Over 500 Indian men came to the United States through the federal government's H-2B guest-worker program to provide labor and services to Defendants. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants fraudulently recruited them to work in the United States and effectuated a broad scheme of psychological coercion, threats of serious harm and physical restraint, and threated abuse of the legal process to maintain control over the class members. The Court ordered Defendants' lead counsel to appear and show good cause why she should not be sanctioned for statements made during her closing arguments before the jury. The Court opined that sanctions were appropriate. During direct examination, defense counsel questioned Defendants' chief operating officer, Ron Schnoor, about the investigation of the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL"). Schnoor testified that the DOL requested all records regarding how Defendants hired and paid its employees, and toured Defendants' facilities and interviewed H-2B workers and non-H2B workers. Subsequently, the DOL concluded that nothing was improper. Id. at 3. Schnoor also testified that the DOL did not cite Defendants for any violations as a result of the investigation. Id. Later, during a bench conference, Defendants offered not to introduce a certain letter from the DOJ or mention any other government investigations, and Plaintiffs agreed not to reference the charges filed against Defendants by the EEOC. Id. The parties honored this agreement for the remainder of trial. During her closing argument, defense counsel, however, discussed the DOL investigation as recounted by Schnoor. Although Plaintiffs did not expect Defendant to reference the DOL investigation in closing argument, the Court remarked that Defendant's counsel could have believed in good faith that it was permissible to reference Schnoor's testimony on direct examination. Id. at 4. Accordingly, the Court reasoned that sanctions were not appropriate for this statement made by Defendant's counsel. In addition, during closing arguments, defense counsel also stated that named Plaintiff Sabulal Vijayan's medical records showed that his suicide attempt was a suicide gesture. Id. at 5. The Court had ruled before trial that Defendant could not supplement its exhibit list with a one-page, uncertified copy of a medical record in which an emergency room doctor referred to Sabulal's suicide attempt as a "suicide gesture." Id. The Court had not listed the record in the pre-trial order and it was not a certified record. The doctor for the provider was never deposed. Id. Thus, because it should have been clear to all counsel that no testimony could be produced about the medical record, the Court found that defense counsel made the statement in direct contravention of the Court's previous orders, and with reckless disregard of the duty owed to the Court. Accordingly, the Court imposed sanctions on defense counsel for that statement and ordered her to participate in the first available session of the ethics school sponsored by the Louisiana State Bar Association at her own personal expense.

Guzman, et al. v. Bridgepoint Education, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38801 (S.D. Cal. Mar. 26, 2015). Plaintiff, a student, brought an action alleging that Defendant, a publicly-traded for-profit college, engaged in a pattern or practice of using standardized, misleading tactics to recruit students and over-charge the federal government for federal financial aid. According to the complaint, 67,744 students enrolled in Defendant's institutions and 99% of students attended classes exclusively on-line. Plaintiff alleged that the explosive growth in Defendant's enrollment at its on-line academic institutions was a direct result of misleading marketing tactics designed to recruit students to attend its schools. Id. at *3. There were two related actions filed in the same district, including Rosendahl v. Bridgepoint Education, Inc., Case No. 11-CV-61 (S.D. Cal. Jan 11, 2011), and Ferguson v. Bridgepoint Education, Inc., Case No. 11-CV-493 (S.D. Cal. Mar. 10, 2011). In Rosendahl, Plaintiffs asserted nearly identical claims, and proposed a near verbatim class definition. The Rosendahl action was administratively closed after the Court granted the Defendant's motion to compel arbitration. Id. at *16. In Ferguson, Plaintiffs brought a qui tam action under the False Claims Act based on allegations that prospective students were induced to enroll at Bridgepoint schools by making misrepresentations and concealing material information. Defendant filed a motion for sanctions against Plaintiff because she failed to list Ryan Ferguson (a former employee who filed the qui tam action against Defendant) as a potential witness either in her disclosures or in her interrogatory responses. Id. at *18, 20. Plaintiff's counsel, Francis A. Bottini, along with two other attorneys, represented Ferguson and his co-Plaintiff in the qui tam action. After class certification discovery closed, Plaintiff filed her motion for class certification, submitted a declaration from Ferguson, and relied heavily on it to substantiate her contention that the proposed class satisfied the commonality requirements. Subsequently, Plaintiff served amended initial disclosures and identified Ferguson as a possible witness. Id. at *21. The Court noted that, when a party fails to provide information or identify a witness as required by Rule 26(a) or (e), the party is not allowed to use that information or witness to supply evidence on a motion, hearing, or at trial. Id. at *23. The Court noted that Bottini previously had represented Ferguson in an action against Defendant that featured allegations closely matching those that Plaintiff asserted in her complaint. Id. at *24. The Court opined that the suspicious circumstances surrounding Ferguson strongly suggested that Plaintiff violated Rule 26's disclosure requirements. Id. The Court explained that Plaintiff could not claim that she was unaware of Ferguson's identity prior to responding to Defendant's interrogatories or serving her amended disclosures. Id. The Court, therefore, ruled that Plaintiff failed to meet her burden of demonstrating that her failure to disclose Ferguson was either substantially justified or harmless. Id. at *28. The Court further found that Plaintiff's failure to disclose Ferguson's identity before the close of discovery prejudiced Defendant by, at the very least, preventing it from deposing Ferguson as a witness during the regular course of litigation. Id. at *35. The Court remarked that, had Plaintiff properly disclosed Ferguson's identity as a witness prior to serving Defendant her second amended initial disclosures, Defendant could have deposed Ferguson as a witness during discovery and fully litigated against Plaintiff's motion for class certification. Accordingly, the Court sanctioned Plaintiff and excluded Ferguson's declaration. Id. at *35-36. The Court also denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification finding that the class was not ascertainable.

In Re Delta/Airtran Baggage Fee Antitrust Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101474 (N.D. Ga. Aug. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of airline passengers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants colluded to impose baggage fees for checked bags. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant AirTran Airways agreed to impose baggage fees as soon as Defendant Delta Air Lines imposed baggage fees so that both carriers could profit without sacrificing market share in violation of the Sherman Act. Id. at *7-10. In February 2009, the Antitrust Division of the U.S. Department of Justice (the "DOJ") served a Civil Investigative Demand ("CID") upon Delta seeking information regarding its decision to impose a first-bag fee. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs argued that Delta erred in its early efforts to preserve and produce e-mail and other electronic evidence in response to the CID and moved for spoliation sanctions alleging a loss of data. Id. at *10. Although the Court admonished Delta for its delay in preserving evidence, the Court found sanctions for spoliation inappropriate. Id. at *13-14. Later, new evidence and documents relevant to the DOJ's bag-fee investigation came to light during the DOJ's unrelated antitrust investigation into Delta's proposal to swap airport landing slots with U.S. Airways at certain airports outside of Atlanta. Id. at *15. Plaintiffs filed a second motion for sanctions. Finding that Delta clearly failed to comply with its obligation to produce documents, the Court re-opened discovery. In September 2012, Plaintiffs raised new concerns regarding the adequacy of Delta's document production. Delta disclosed that it found an additional 29 backup tapes that it had not previously reviewed or searched for bag-fee evidence. Id. at *18. Delta argued that the backup tapes were largely redundant of backup tapes that it already had searched but, conceding its error, asked the Court to appoint an independent discovery expert to expedite resolution of the issue. On November 19, 2012, the Court directed Plaintiffs to hire an expert, at Delta's expense, to conduct an extensive review of Delta's electronic files and its discovery efforts. The expert issued an initial report of more than 100 pages and an invoice totaling almost $5 million. Before addressing the merits of expert's conclusions, the Court directed Plaintiffs to file a new motion for sanctions. Characterizing Delta's conduct as a widespread pattern of bad-faith spoliation, Plaintiffs sought to preclude Delta from disputing the existence of a conspiracy with AirTran to impose first bag fees. Id. at *20. The Court referred the motion to a Special Master. The Special Master rejected Plaintiffs' spoliation arguments, finding insufficient evidence but recommended imposition of $1,855,255.09 in monetary sanctions against Delta to compensate Plaintiffs for the additional time and expenses they incurred as a result of Delta's failure to comply with its discovery obligations. Id. at *22-23. On its review of the sanction, the Court agreed with the Special Master that a monetary award was the appropriate sanction because Delta's discovery misconduct rendered the Court's attempts to manage the action and move it toward resolution on the merits futile. Id. at *27. The Court, however, increased the monetary sanctions to $2,718,795.05, reasoning that the Special Master's recommendation was "too generous" to Delta and inadequately compensated Plaintiffs for the time their attorneys spent on the discovery dispute. Id. at *57. In increasing the award, the Court measured the fees by the current billing rates of Plaintiffs' counsel to compensate for the lengthy delay in resolving the sanctions motions. The Court then overruled several of Plaintiffs' objections to the Special Master's report, finding that, whereas Delta's discovery practices were ineffective, inefficient, and inept, there was no evidence that Delta withheld documents in bad faith or that it should have known that it needed to preserve all of the disputed evidence. Id. at *49-50. The Court also upheld part of the report forbidding Plaintiffs from presenting evidence to the jury related to the discovery fight, reasoning that it would transform the trial into a fight over discovery practices and would be unfair to AirTran, which was not involved in the sanctions motions. Id. at *47-48. The Court further denied Plaintiffs' motion to re-open discovery on the basis that the discovery dispute had been resolved and the parties should turn to the merits of the action. Id. at *84. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for sanctions and ordered Delta to pay $2,718,795.05 to Plaintiffs.

Editor's Note: The $2.7 million discovery sanction in this case is believed to be the largest sanction in any class action in 2015.

In Re Tesla Motors, Inc. Securities Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36123 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 23, 2015). In this consolidated securities class action, Plaintiffs, a group of purchasers, alleged that Defendants, Tesla Motors and Elon Musk, made materially false and misleading statements about the risk of fire caused by the lithium batteries that power the Tesla Model S car in violation of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and Securities and Exchange Commission Rule 10(b)-5. The Court held that Plaintiffs failed to allege a single actionable false or misleading statement in their complaint and, accordingly, granted Defendants' motion to dismiss. Id. at *4. Defendants asked the Court to amend the judgment by imposing sanctions on Plaintiffs' counsel. The Court denied the motion. After conducting a post-judgment review of the attorneys' conduct for compliance with Rule 11(b), the Court concluded that each of the representations by Plaintiffs' counsel to the Court was proper, non-frivolous, and factually supported, although ultimately unpersuasive. Id. at *1-2. The Court also found sanctions unwarranted under the Private Litigation Reform Act framework because Plaintiffs' factual contentions had full evidentiary support. Id. at *4. The evidence supported the allegations that Defendants made various press releases, conducted various battery tests, and that the Model S experienced fires caused by road debris. Id. Further, Plaintiffs supported the complaint allegations by a thorough investigation, which included witness interviews, a detailed history of the engineering and development of the Roadster and Model S Tesla vehicles, and reviews of public documents, financial filings, and stock performance. Id. at *4-5. The Court opined that, by and large, the underlying events occurred much in the way Plaintiffs alleged. Id. at *5. Defendants did not argue otherwise but, rather, took umbrage at the legal conclusions that Plaintiffs advanced, i.e., that, in light of the battery tests and fires, Defendants' press releases and statements were false and misleading representations to investors. Id. The Court ruled that, although it found that Plaintiffs failed to allege factual allegations that pled a single false statement sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss, the case was hardly one of the rare and exceptional cases that warranted the extraordinary remedy of Rule 11 sanctions. The Court found that facts known to Plaintiffs supported a good faith, if erroneous, argument that Defendants' disclosures were misleading. Id. The Court, accordingly, held that Plaintiffs' filings complied with Rule 11(b) and denied Defendants' motion to amend the judgment.

Johnson, et al. v. Ford Motor Co.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 115425 (S.D. W. Va. Aug. 28, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that some of Defendant's vehicles produced between 2002 and 2010 were prone to sudden, unintended acceleration and that the company failed to install fail-safe systems that allowed the drivers to physically prevent or mitigate sudden acceleration. Id. at *120-21. In the course of discovery, Plaintiffs requested that Defendant produce Automotive Safety Office ("ASO") reports and databases for any alleged unintended acceleration of vehicles in the class definition, as well as documents related to any government correspondence or investigations concerning the electronic throttle control systems. Id. at *121. In October 2014, after producing non-privileged documents responsive to Plaintiffs' request, Defendant provided Plaintiffs with a privilege log related to its 2010 investigation. Id. Plaintiffs' counsel alleged that the log failed adequately to describe each document withheld by Defendant, questioned whether the vast majority of documents were indeed shielded from disclosure, and expressed their belief that the documents might not be privileged. Id. at *122-23. In May 2015 Defendant produced a supplemental ASO privilege log containing 132 documents that it claimed met the requirements of Rule 26 and were shielded from discovery due to attorney-client privilege and attorney work-product immunity. Id. at *123-24. Plaintiffs then moved to compel and for sanctions contending that the supplemental ASO privilege log was deficient because it did not contain enough information for Plaintiffs to determine whether to challenge the assertions of privilege. Id. at *123. The Court explained that the case law authorities have not been entirely consistent about the level of detail that is necessary to comply with Rule 26(b)(5)(A). Id. at *133. The Court remarked that, notwithstanding such inconsistencies, Defendant's privilege log did not comply because it failed to provide any concrete facts about the nature or subject matter of the withheld documents. Id. at *135. The Court noted that Defendant used the same two document descriptions throughout the entire log, and those descriptions were – essentially synonymous. Id. More importantly, the Court stated the descriptions were nothing more than conclusory statements as to the privileged nature of the documents. Id. The Court determined that Defendant could have provided more factual detail to describe the withheld documents without disclosing privileged information, as was evidenced by information it submitted to the Court that was not included in the supplemental privilege log. Id. at *135-36. The Court, however, refused to sanction Defendant regarding the withheld ASO investigation documents because, while Defendant should have realized that its document descriptions were inadequate, waiver of privilege was not an appropriate sanction at that juncture. Id. at *139-40. Accordingly, the Court ordered Defendant to supplement the ASO privilege log with more detailed descriptions of the withheld documents and cautioned that a failure to properly supplement its logs could result in a waiver of privilege. Id. at *140. Finally, the Court awarded Plaintiffs attorneys' fees related to their motion to compel. Id. at *142-43.

Johnson, et al. v. SmithKline Beecham Corp.*, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28210 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs brought personal injury class actions alleging that thalidomide, a drug developed, produced and distributed by Defendants, caused Plaintiffs to suffer severe birth defects. Given that Plaintiffs' injuries occurred in the late 1950s and early 1960s, Plaintiffs' attorneys Hagens Berman Sobol Shapiro LLC ("Hagens Berman") anticipated a statute of limitations' affirmative defense, and specifically pleaded that Defendant's fraudulent concealment as to thalidomide's dangers had tolled the statute of limitation. Id. at *6. Because Plaintiffs claims were subjected to a two-year statute of limitations, Defendants contended that they should not be compelled to defend against claims that were obviously time-barred. Id. After Defendants demonstrated that contrary to the Court's orders, several Plaintiffs had failed to produce highly probative evidence, including on-line posts that they had known for decades that thalidomide caused their birth defects, Defendants sought dismissal. Id. at *7. The Court instead appointed a Special Discovery Master ("the Special Master"), who found that several of Plaintiffs' claims were not viable. Id. at *8. Defendants GlaxoSmithKline ("GSK") and Grünenthal GMBH urged Hagens Berman to review the claims, and dismiss the meritless or time-barred claims, and also offered to assume costs. Hagens Berman did not agree to dismiss any cases, and instead the parties engaged in massive discovery with over 130 depositions being taken, which only belied the claims of almost all Plaintiffs. Id. at *9. Defendants filed motions for sanctions in respect of claims of three Plaintiffs, which the Court granted. The Court adopted the recommendation of the Special Master, who found that Hagens Berman should be sanctioned for its delay and evasiveness in connection with written discovery. Id. at *89. In his report, the Special Master noted that all 52 Plaintiffs alleged fraudulent concealment as the basis for tolling the statute, and a sub-set of Plaintiffs alleged a non-fraud theory for tolling. Id. at *45. As it became apparent that at least some of Plaintiffs' claims were deeply flawed, defense counsel had written to Hagens Berman to review the outstanding cases before the parties spent more time and money on continuing the oral discovery, but Hagens Berman nonetheless continued to pursue discovery. Id. at *49-50. As to Plaintiff Merica's claim, the Special Master found that Merica and his mother understood that she had taken thalidomide, but Hagens Berman persisted in its insistence that Merica had no clue on what it meant to be a thalidomider and no idea who was responsible for developing and distributing the drug. Id. at *69. Similarly, the Special Master found that although Hagens Berman could have prevented further discovery as to other claims, it still persisted with the oral discovery, adding to additional costs. Id. at *77, 83. Based on these findings, the Special Master recommended awarding Defendants 100% of their reasonable fees and expenses solely in the matters relating to Plaintiffs Merica, Boiradi, and Garza, and 3/49ths of their reasonable fees and expenses incurred on work done on the three Plaintiffs. Id. at *95. The Court reviewed Plaintiffs' Rule 72 objections to the Special Master's report and found that Defendants demonstrated with clear and convincing evidence that Hagens Berman multiplied proceedings unreasonably and in a vexatious manner and litigated the claims of Merica, Boiradi, and Garza well after Defendants put the firm on notice that the claims were baseless, time-barred, or both. Id. at *35. As to Defendant GSK, the Special Master had reported that GSK would drop its sanctions claims contingent on Plaintiffs' claims being dismissed with prejudice, and therefore it was difficult to determine whether GSK would be entitled to recover sanctions. Id. at *89. The Special Master had recommended to hold GSK's motion for sanctions in abeyance, which the Court adopted. Id. at *95.

Markey, et al. v. Lapolla Industries, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 112915 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 25, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a putative class action alleging that they suffered personal injuries and property damages due to spray polyurethane foam insulation ("SPF") manufactured by Defendant Lapolla Industries Inc., which was installed in Plaintiffs' home by Defendant Delfino Insulation Co., Inc. Id. at *3. After the parties started depositions, Plaintiffs' former counsel, Morelli Alters Ratner, LLP ("MAR"), filed a motion to withdraw as counsel of record asserting irreconcilable differences with Plaintiffs. Id. at *7. After the grant of the motion to withdraw, Plaintiffs, through their new counsel, filed a motion to dismiss the action with prejudice and without costs. Defendants opposed and filed a motion seeking sanctions, asserting that Plaintiffs and MAR failed to disclose certain documents during discovery, and that Plaintiffs maintained an allegedly frivolous lawsuit. Id. at *3. The Court granted Defendants' motion to the extent that sanctions be imposed against MAR for its failure to exercise due diligence and to comply with its discovery obligations. Id. at *91. When Plaintiff began to develop adverse medical symptoms after the installation of SPF at her home, she contacted George Maul, an industrial hygienist for Insight Environmental, Inc., to conduct air quality testing of her home. Id. at *13. Maul e-mailed a copy of his environmental analysis report to Plaintiff, which she forwarded to Attorney Barry Cohen (the "Original Report"). Id. at *15. Subsequently, Plaintiff and Maul exchanged various e-mails, which resulted in some revisions in the Original Report (the "Revised Report"), but Plaintiff never disclosed the Original Report and the e-mails in their initial disclosures signed by Attorney David Sirotkin at MAR's office. Id. at *23. Plaintiff testified later that she sent only the Revised Report to both the Law Office of Pravato, the firm she retained in August 2012, and to MAR, thinking that the Revised Report was the final one, and never provided MAR with the e-mails she exchanged with Maul because she did not know that she had to do so. Id. at *24-27. Defendants received a copy of the Original Report in October 2013 in response to a subpoena it served on Insight Environmental, and even after that, MAR took no action to learn more about the Original Report. Id. at *33. Based on these records, the Court concluded that MAR violated its discovery obligations. Id. at *53. The Court found that the Original Report and the e-mails were "reasonably available" prior to the filing of the Initial Disclosures, and therefore should have been disclosed. Id. at *55. Moreover, the evidence adduced during the hearing demonstrated that neither Attorney Sirotkin nor anyone at MAR made a reasonable inquiry to determine what documents and other discovery Plaintiffs possessed before certifying that the Initial Disclosures were complete. Id. at *56. Acknowledging that an attorney could rely on the representations by its clients or by other attorneys when conducting the reasonable inquiry, the Court remarked that it was not reasonable for MAR to simply assume that the documents it received from the Pravato Firm and Plaintiffs encompassed all the documents required to be disclosed. Id. at *57. The Court also found that MAR's inquiry was similarly lacking with respect to its certification of Plaintiffs' responses to Defendants' request for production, as the record revealed that its attorneys had little to no direct contact with Plaintiffs during the process of gathering the responsive documents. Id. at *57-60. The Court therefore concluded that Attorney Sirotkin's certifications of Plaintiffs' Initial Disclosures and discovery responses were improper. Because the evidence showed that MAR's failure to disclose the documents caused Defendants to incur additional and otherwise unnecessary attorneys' fees and expenses, the Court concluded that MAR's failure to disclose warranted monetary sanctions. Id. at *71. The Court, however, declined to impose discovery sanctions against Plaintiffs, finding that their failure to provide the Original Report and the e-mails was "substantially justified" by the lack of guidance and oversight of the attorneys representing them. Id. at *72. Because the Court was unable to conclude that Plaintiffs' personal injury claims were entirely meritless and because Defendants presented no evidence to show that MAR's decision to withdraw as Plaintiffs' counsel was made in bad faith, the Court denied Defendants' motion to impose sanctions against MAR and Plaintiffs under the Court's inherent power. Id. at *85-88. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendants' motion for sanctions.

Nilon, et al. v. Natural-Immunogenics Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 146315 (S.D. Cal. Oct. 28, 2015). Plaintiff, a consumer, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant falsely advertised its "Sovereign Silver" products to have the ability to support consumers' immune systems in violation of California's Consumers Legal Remedies Act and False Advertising Law. Previously, the Court had entered a tentative order and dismissed Plaintiff's claims, but also denied Defendants' motion for sanctions against Plaintiff's counsel based on allegations of bad faith, improper conduct, and recklessness. Id. at *1. The Court had remarked that the sanctions request was not a proper motion under Rule 11, as it was made in response to the Court's tentative order, and that Defendants could move the Magistrate Judge with a proper motion. Defendants then filed a separate motion for sanctions, and the Magistrate Judge denied the motion. The Magistrate Judge observed that Rule 11 authorizes imposition of deterrent sanctions if an attorney certifies that: (i) the information presented to the Court is not being presented for any improper use; (ii) the claims, defenses, and other legal contentions are warranted by existing law; (iii) the factual contentions have evidentiary support; and (v) the denials of factual contentions are warranted on the evidence. Id. at *7. The Magistrate Judge remarked that when those rules are broken, a party can file a motion for sanctions and the Court can direct the erring party to pay attorneys' fees, but cannot impose monetary sanctions. Id. at *8-9. The Magistrate Judge noted that in light of Rule 11's express instructions, it was clear that Rule 11 did not apply to discovery issues. Thus, the Magistrate Judge denied the motion for sanctions that was based on discovery. Id. at *10. As to Defendant's grievances with respect to the conduct of Plaintiffs' counsel during discovery, the Magistrate Judge denied the motion for sanctions, finding that they should have been raised at the time they occurred. Id. at *11. The Magistrate Judge observed that 28 U.S.C. § 1927 authorizes an award of attorneys' fees where an attorney had multiplied the proceedings to increase costs unreasonably and vexatiously. Id. at *15. The Magistrate Judge reasoned that sanctions under § 1927 were not appropriate because Defendant had not proven that Plaintiff's counsel multiplied the proceedings in this case. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge denied Defendants' motion for sanctions.

Rabin, et al. v. Dow Jones & Company, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101967 (S.D.N.Y. July 30, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action against Defendants – The New York Times Co., Forbes, Inc., and Dow Jones & Co., Inc., – for their alleged participation in a fraudulent subscription renewal scheme, orchestrated by Circulation Billing Services ("CBS") and its related entities. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff asserted claims for a conspiracy to defraud, deceptive acts or practices in violation of the New York General Business Law, and negligence in disclosing subscribers' information to third-parties and failing to notify subscribers about the CBS fraud. Id. at *2. Defendant Dow Jones moved for sanctions, alleging that Plaintiff brought the action for improper purposes and that the complaint was entirely without evidence. The Court granted Defendant's motion, finding that Plaintiff's amended complaint pled no actual facts to support the purported conclusory allegations of Dow Jones' liability in the CBS fraud. Id. at *5. The Court opined that the record contained sufficient evidence to show that Plaintiff and his attorney acted in bad faith. During the course of Plaintiff's deposition regarding the alleged conspiracy of Dow Jones with CBS, Plaintiff had admitted that his assertions were no more than "overstatements." Id. at *6. Further, the record showed that Plaintiff's attorney failed to conduct a good faith investigation into evidence that Dow Jones had been fighting the fraud. Although Dow Jones' attorney informed Plaintiff's attorney during a meeting that the publisher had not cashed any of CBS-generated checks after it learned of the fraud scheme, Plaintiff's amended complaint reasserted the allegation that Dow Jones received payment and retained the fraudulent proceeds for subscriptions obtained by CBS. Id. at *7-8. The Court determined that Plaintiff's admissions and his attorney's failure to investigate or adjust the pleadings supported an inference of bad faith. The Court also found no factual evidence to support an inference that Dow Jones engaged in "misleading acts or practices" or "itself misrepresented anything." Id. at *9. In addition, the Court ruled that Plaintiff withheld relevant evidence from Defendant throughout the litigation, including the reverse side of the CBS renewal notices which stated that there was "not necessarily a direct relationship" between CBS and Dow Jones, and the three checks Plaintiff received from CBS refunding a portion of the payments Plaintiff's wife made in response to the CBS notices. Id. at *10-11. The Court thus determined that Plaintiff and his attorney sought to suppress the truth underlying the viability of their action against Dow Jones. Finally, the Court opined that there was no merit to Plaintiff's argument that there was no "vexatious multiplication" of proceedings because the case only lasted three months. Id. at *12. The Court held that sanctions against Plaintiff and his attorney would be appropriate. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for sanctions in the amount of its attorneys' fees and costs incurred following the filing of the amended complaint.

True Health Chiropractic, Inc., et al. v. McKesson Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43908 (N.D. Cal. April 1, 2015). In this class action brought under the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") challenging Defendants' alleged practice of sending unsolicited facsimile advertisements, the Court granted, in part, Plaintiffs' motion for sanctions. Plaintiffs had previously moved to compel Defendants to: (i) produce exemplars of all fax advertisements that did not include an opt-out notice that Defendants sent during the class period; (ii) show the recipients of fax advertisements sent by Defendants had given Defendants prior permission to send those faxes; and (iii) produce transmission records of recipients of the fax ads. Id. at *4-8. After the Court had granted the motion, Defendants produced only four exemplar faxes and transmission records for eight job numbers, each showing one broadcast of one of the eight known fax images. Id. at *14. Defendants produced no additional documents or information regarding its claim that it obtained prior express invitation or permission ("prior express permission defense") to send fax advertisements to the class members. Plaintiffs moved for sanctions on the basis that Defendants failed to produce discovery previously ordered by the Court. As to discovery of exemplar faxes, the Court noted that its previous order was clear requiring Defendants to produce all documents that fell within this description. Id. at *20. The Court remarked that it could not excuse Defendants from producing such documents; however, based on defense counsel's representation that production of such documents would be impossible by the Court's set deadline, it ordered the parties to meet and confer further. Id. at *19. The Court held that if the parties could not agree on the scope and phased production of documents, they should file a joint letter. Id. Similarly, the Court ordered Defendants to produce discovery of transmission records and documents related to its prior express permission defense by the Court's set deadline. Id. at *21-25. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs did not meet and confer about the purported deficiencies in their production prior to seeking sanctions. The Court, however, observed that Plaintiffs' submissions included declarations from three of their attorneys, which described the sequence of communications between Plaintiffs' counsel and Defendants' attorneys and attached written communications between the two. Id. at *25. The Court remarked that this demonstrated that Plaintiffs had repeatedly informed Defendants of the insufficiency of their discovery responses, and accordingly concluded that Plaintiffs were within their right to move for sanctions. The Court reasoned that pursuant to Rule 37(b)(2)(C), it must order the disobedient party, the attorney advising that party, or both to pay the reasonable expenses, including attorneys' fees, caused by the failure, unless the failure was substantially justified or other circumstances made an award of expenses unjust. Id. at *28. Since this was the third time that the Court had ordered Defendants to produce the discovery that Plaintiffs originally requested in October 2013, the Court held that Plaintiffs should be awarded attorneys' fees. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for sanctions in the form of attorneys' fees and costs.

True Health Chiropractic, Inc., et al. v. McKesson Corp., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 122272 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 12, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by sending unsolicited facsimile advertisements or junk faxes, and hiding the existence of third-party fax broadcaster and its role in sending or providing a software platform, Slingshot, to send the alleged faxes. Plaintiffs alleged that in 2010 it received unsolicited fax advertisements for software products called Medisoft and Lytec, offered by Physician Practice Solutions ("PPS"), a business unit of MTI. Id. at *4. Discovery commenced, and Plaintiffs served its first set of discovery request on October 1, 2013, requesting production of documents and interrogatories that broadly sought information concerning any third-party fax broadcaster, that Defendants might have used to transmit its fax advertisements. Id. at *6. Defendants responded in January 2014, but failed to identify or provide documents referencing any third-party fax broadcasters, stating that it did not enter into any contracts or agreements for the provision of fax broadcasting services. Id. at *7. On April 28, 2015, Plaintiffs deposed Kari Holloway, who worked for PPS, and she testified that she used her computer to send the alleged faxes using Slingshot. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs then requested Defendants to serve supplemental discovery responses that referenced the role of Slingshot in sending the faxes at issue. Id. Defendants formally disclosed the use of Slingshot only in their June and July 2015 discovery responses, and produced responsive records, including e-mail communications between Holloway and Slingshot, and records indicating that Holloway paid for Slingshot using her personal corporate credit card. Id. at *14. Plaintiffs moved for sanctions asserting that Defendants' knew of Holloway's identity at least as of July 2014, but failed to supplement its initial disclosures or identify her in its discovery responses. Id. at *17. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendants were aware that Slingshot played a significant role in sending faxes by at least September 2014, but their January 2014 and August 2014 discovery responses both explicitly stated and implied that no third-parties had been involved in sending the faxes, and they waited until Plaintiffs' request for the Slingshot information to reveal its role in their June and July 2015 responses. Id. at *17-18. Plaintiff moved for sanctions. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for sanctions, and found that Defendants' failure to timely supplement their discovery responses to disclose Holloway and Slingshot were without good cause. Id. at *18. The Court, however, denied Plaintiffs' request for issuance of preclusion sanctions, finding that granting it would potentially end the case, and Plaintiffs failed to sufficiently show that they suffered harm from Defendants' actions. Plaintiffs also sought preclusion of two of Defendants' affirmative defenses, i.e., that the fax recipients had established business relationships with Defendants, and/or they gave prior express permissions to Defendants to send the faxes. Id. at *21. The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to sufficiently explain how the information they received from Holloway or Slingshot was related to Defendants' defenses or how it caused them harm that warranted a harsh preclusion sanctions. Id. at *20. Since Defendants' behavior prejudiced Plaintiffs' ability to conduct discovery and to make the best possible arguments at class certification, and because the Court had already awarded significant attorneys' fees as sanctions against Defendants for certain work that Plaintiffs had to undertake due to Defendants' discovery behavior, the Court imposed monetary sanctions on Defendants in the amount of $15,000. Id. at *24-25. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' motion for sanctions.

Wengle, et al. v. DialAmerica Marketing, Inc., Case No. 14-CV-10644 (E.D. Mich. Oct. 27, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant, a professional telemarketing company, placed solicitation calls to Plaintiff using artificial or pre-recorded voices after she registered her phone number with the National Do Not Call Registry in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Defendant moved for summary judgment arguing that: (i) Defendant called Plaintiff on behalf of a tax-exempt non-profit organization and, therefore, was exempt from the TCPA's prohibitions (the "non-profit exemption"); and (ii) Defendant did not use an artificial or pre-recorded voice when it called Plaintiff. Id. at 1-2. The Court granted Defendant's motion, concluding that Defendant fell within the non-profit exemption. Id. at 2. Defendant filed a motion for sanctions, and the Court denied the motion. Defendant argued that Plaintiff filed and pursued a completely frivolous action that had no basis in fact or law. Id. The Court disagreed, noting that, as it stated in its order granting Defendant's motion, it found no case law authority addressing whether a calling program exactly like the one Defendant used qualified for the non-profit exemption. Id. In fact, the Court found only two judicial decisions – both unpublished and from outside the Circuit – that applied the non-profit exemption. Id. In addition, the Court found that Plaintiff's arguments were thoughtful and required careful consideration, particularly the argument that Defendant's calling program was similar to Defendant's earlier calling program which, according to the Federal Communication Commission, did not qualify for the non-profit exemption. Id. at 3. The Court, therefore, concluded that an award of sanctions was unwarranted. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion.

Wolfchild, et al. v. Redwood County,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74316 (D. Minn. June 9, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of descendants of the Mdewakanton Indians, brought a class action against Defendants – landowners, Lower Sioux Indian Community (the "Community") and municipals – seeking damages and possession of certain lands on behalf of themselves and others similarly-situated. According to the complaint, legislation from 1863 stated that the land set aside for Indians who remained loyal during the 1862 Sioux Uprising had the right to exclusive title, occupancy, and use and the right of quiet enjoyment. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs sought to eject Defendants from the land and to award them trespass damages. Defendants moved for sanctions pursuant to Rule 11, arguing that Plaintiffs and their counsel knowingly commenced and prosecuted a frivolous action on legal theories that were not supported by existing law or that involved a non-frivolous argument for extending, modifying, or reversing existing law or to establish new law. Id. at *7. Defendants argued that sanctions were appropriate in this action because Plaintiffs were well aware that there was no legal basis for filing this action against any Defendants, because Plaintiffs had previously brought similar claims against United States, which had been rejected in the Court of Federal Claims and the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals. Id. at *16-18. The Court granted Defendants' motion. Although Plaintiffs argued that the law was not settled as to whether the Community was immune from the action, the Court found that a reasonable and competent attorney would have recognized that, and given the well settled law that the Community was entitled to sovereign immunity, the Court did not have subject-matter jurisdiction over asserted claims against the Community. Id. at *21. The Court thus held that Plaintiffs violated Rule 11(b)(1) by bringing the action against the Community. Even assuming that the Court had subject-matter jurisdiction, the Court found that Plaintiffs' claims were frivolous and without a factual or legal basis because the United States had held the disputed land in trust for the Community, and the United States was an indispensable party with respect to Plaintiffs' claims for damages and ejectment. Id. at *22. The Court therefore found that Plaintiffs and their counsel acted in bad faith and with reckless disregard for the law by pursuing this action against the Community. As to Landowner Defendants and municipal Defendants, the Court noted that the claims grounded in the 1863 Act had been found to be without merit earlier, and there was no private right of action under the 1863 Act. Id. at *24. The Court further noted that, even if there was such a right of action, the land was sold no later than 1895, and the claims raised over 100 years later were equitably barred, and a reasonable and competent attorney would have known this. Id. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs acted in bad faith and with reckless disregard for the law by pursuing this action against Defendants, and a monetary sanction in the form of reasonable attorneys' fees and costs was necessary to deter Plaintiffs and their counsel from engaging in frivolous litigation in the future. Id. at *27-28. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion for sanctions and ordered Defendants to submit a detailed accounting of the attorneys' fees incurred.

Wolfchild, et al. v. Redwood County,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 128896 (D. Minn. Sept. 26, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of Native American descendants, brought a putative class action alleging that Congress passed legislation setting aside the 12 square miles at issue in the litigation for them and the U.S. government gave the land to Defendants, the Lower Sioux Indian Community (the "Community") and landowners. Plaintiffs were descendants of Native Americans who defended white settlers in 1862. They brought this action in May 2014. The District Court granted Defendants' motions to dismiss the action with prejudice, finding that Plaintiffs waited too long to file their complaint, and that it lacked subject-matter jurisdiction to address the claims against the Community due to tribal sovereignty, and that legislation prevented legal action on the land in question. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs had filed an appeal to the Eighth Circuit. Id. at *3. Following the dismissal of the action, certain Defendants moved the Court for sanctions on the grounds that Plaintiffs and their counsel knowingly commenced and prosecuted the action on legal theories that were not supported by existing fact or law, and did not involve a non-frivolous argument for extending, modifying, or reversing existing law, which the District Court granted. Plaintiffs appealed that order to the Eighth Circuit. Id. Meanwhile, Plaintiffs moved to stay the sanctions proceeding pending the appeal, arguing they were likely to succeed on the merits on appeal based on the same arguments that were included in their opposition to the motions to dismiss. Id. at *4. The District Court reviewed the factual background of the case and all of the arguments submitted, and again found Plaintiffs' arguments without merit. Id. The District Court reiterated that the Community was immune from suit, Plaintiffs failed to state a claim for relief, and pursuant to the equitable doctrine, Plaintiffs were not entitled to the relief sought. Id. Accordingly, the District Court held Plaintiffs had failed to demonstrate a likelihood of success on the merits on appeal. Id. The District Court also found Plaintiffs had not demonstrated they would be irreparably injured absent a stay. Id. at *7-8. The District Court remarked that sanctions were designed to publically admonish, reprimand, or censure individuals who advanced frivolous litigation in bad faith; therefore, harm to reputation was not a basis to stay the order and Plaintiffs could still seek relief through their appeal of that order. Id. at *8. Finally, the District Court considered Defendants' argument that sanctions were necessary to deter Plaintiffs and their counsel from engaging in frivolous litigation in the future, and found the grand total of the reasonable attorneys' fees and costs was $281,906.34. Id. at *17-18. Plaintiffs' lead counsel Erick Kaardal asked the District Court to further reduce the sanction award from the near $350,000 amount initially requested by Defendants, arguing that the invoices he and his clients were responsible for were vague, excessive, and unreasonable, making it difficult to determine whether they were reasonably incurred. Id. at *18. The District Court also rejected Kaardal's request not to impose the sanction on his small firm because he was the only attorney at his firm handling the case, and since such a sanction would cause significant financial harm to its business and employees. Id. at *19. The District Court observed that in addition to Kaardal, attorney James V.F. Dickey, an associate with the firm, was named as lead counsel and attorney to be noticed in the Court's docket and was also included in the signature block of Plaintiffs' memorandum in opposition to the motions to dismiss, and Plaintiffs' memorandum in opposition to Defendants' motions for sanctions. Id. Further, the Court noted the three-partner firm did not submit any financial information to the Court. Therefore, Kaardal and his firm had not met their burden of demonstrating that the firm was unable to pay all or part of the sanction. Id. Accordingly, the District Court concluded Plaintiffs and their counsel were jointly liable for the sanction. Id. at *20.

(xxviii) Issues With The Judicial Panel On Multi-District Litigation In Class Actions

In Re Ashley Madison Customer Data Securities Breach Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 166049 (J.P.M.L. Dec. 9, 2015). In this multi-district class action litigation stemming from a dating website's data breach that resulted in the personal details of millions of users being posted on-line, the Judicial Panel for Multi-District Litigation (the "Panel") transferred the cases pending outside the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri to that district. The litigation consisted of five actions, including two actions in Central District of California, and one in Northern District of Alabama, the Eastern District of Missouri, and the Northern District of Texas. The Panel also took note of 13 related class actions pending in eight other districts. Id. at *1. With one exception, all responding parties agreed that centralization was warranted, but disagreed about the appropriate transferee district. On the basis of the papers filed, the Panel found that the actions involved common questions of fact, and that centralization in the Eastern District of Missouri would serve the convenience of the parties and witnesses and promote the just and efficient conduct of this litigation. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff in a potential tag-along class action pending in the District of Maryland ("Russell") opposed the inclusion of that action in any centralized proceedings because the allegations in that action were different from those in the remaining actions. Id. at *4. Contrary to Plaintiff's argument in Russell, the Panel opined that at least five other related class actions asserted similar, if not identical, consumer fraud claims on behalf of putative nationwide classes. Id. Thus, the Panel concluded that Russell likely would involve common factual questions regarding the data breach and the operation of the Ashley Madison website. Id. at *5. The Panel, however, remarked that to the extent that Russell involved unique issues, the transferee judge had the discretion to handle those issues through use of appropriate pre-trial devices, such as separate tracks for discovery and motion practice. Id. Accordingly, the Panel found that the transfer was appropriate to the Eastern District of Missouri.

In Re Kmart Corp. Customer Data Security Breach Litigation,* MDL No. 2625 (J.P.M.L. June 9, 2015). In this multi-district class action litigation, consisting of three actions pending in the Northern District of Illinois, the Eastern District of Louisiana, and the Western District of Pennsylvania, Plaintiffs moved to centralize pre-trial proceedings in the Northern District of Illinois, which the Judicial Panel denied. The Judicial Panel noted that the actions shared factual questions arising from an alleged criminal intrusion into the payment data system at retail stores owned or operated by Defendant that resulted in the electronic theft of payment card information of customers who made purchases. Id. at *1. The Judicial Panel, however, remarked that there were only five actions, three of which were pending in the same district. The Judicial Panel noted that In Re Best Buy Co., Inc., California Song-Beverly Credit Card Act Litigation (J.P.M.L. 2011), held that centralization under 28 U.S.C. § 1407 should be the last solution after considering review of all other options. Id. at *1. Those options included: (i) transfer pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1404; and (ii) voluntary cooperation and coordination among the parties and the involved transferee courts to avoid duplicative discovery or inconsistent pre-trial rulings. Id. at *2. Here, although, no § 1404 motion to transfer venue was filed in any of those actions, Plaintiffs in both actions pending outside the Northern District of Illinois had indicated that they agreed that this litigation should proceed in that district. Id. Accordingly, the Judicial Panel opined that the parties should be able to agree to voluntarily transfer those two actions to Northern District of Illinois. The Judicial Panel observed that if the parties were unable to do so, voluntary cooperation and coordination among the small number of parties would not be feasible. Id. Accordingly, the Judicial Panel recommended that the parties employ various alternatives to transfer so as to minimize the potential for duplicative discovery and inconsistent pre-trial rulings in this action.

In Re Michaels Stores, Inc., Fair Credit Reporting Act Litigation,* MDL No. 2615 (J.P.M.L. April 9, 2015). In these three putative nationwide class actions, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant failed to properly disclose that it would access Plaintiffs' credit reports in connection with their employment applications in violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") and similar state laws. Plaintiffs filed the actions in the U.S. District Courts for the Western District of Missouri, the District of New Jersey, and the Northern District of Texas. Id. at 1. Plaintiffs in the Northern District of Texas action moved under 28 U.S.C. § 1407 to centralize pre-trial proceedings in the Northern District of Texas. Plaintiffs in the District of New Jersey action initially opposed centralization, but at oral argument announced that they did not oppose centralization in the District of New Jersey. The Judicial Panel on Multi-District Litigation transferred the actions to the District of New Jersey. At the outset, the Judicial Panel opined that, because the actions involved common questions of fact – Defendant's failure to disclose its intention to access Plaintiffs' credit reports – centralization of the litigation in the District of New Jersey would serve the convenience of the parties and witnesses and promote the just and efficient conduct of the litigation. Id. The Judicial Panel also found that centralization would eliminate duplicative discovery, prevent inconsistent pre-trial rulings, and conserve the resources of the parties, their counsel, and the judiciary. Because Defendant had a nationwide presence, Plaintiffs were from numerous states, and Plaintiffs filed the first action in the District of New Jersey, the Judicial Panel concluded that the District of New Jersey was the appropriate transferee district. Accordingly, the Judicial Panel transferred the actions to the District of New Jersey. Id. at 1-2.

In Re National Football League's "Sunday Ticket" Antitrust Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 166043 (J.P.M.L. Dec. 8, 2015). In this multi-district class action litigation concerning alleged anti-competitive agreements between the NFL and DirecTV, the Judicial Panel centralized and transferred the action to the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs in one out of six pending actions in two districts moved to centralize the litigation in the Central District of California. Id. All responding

Plaintiffs and Defendants supported the centralization, but disagreed on the transferee district. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs in four actions supported centralization in the Central District of California and others supported the Southern District of New York. Id. At the outset, the Judicial Panel observed that the actions involved common questions of fact and that centralization would serve the convenience of the parties and witnesses, thus promoting just and efficient conduct of the litigation. Id. The Judicial Panel found that the actions shared complex factual questions arising out of allegations that the NFL and DirecTV had entered into anti-competitive agreements granting DirecTV the exclusive right to broadcast certain NFL Sunday afternoon football games through a subscription sports package known as the "NFL Sunday Ticket," outside of a viewer's local television market, in violation of federal and state antitrust law. Id. at *2-3. The Judicial Panel further found that the common questions of fact would include whether Defendants entered into the alleged agreements and the terms of the agreements, the effect of the alleged agreements on the relevant market, and whether Defendants had pro-competitive justifications for the alleged conduct and the scope of relief. Id. The Judicial Panel noted that since all actions were on behalf of overlapping putative nationwide classes of subscribers to DirecTV's NFL Sunday Ticket service, centralization would eliminate duplicative discovery, prevent inconsistent pre-trial rulings, and conserve the resources of the parties, their counsel and the judiciary. Id. Consequently, the Judicial Panel held that the Central District of California was an appropriate transferee district, as fifteen actions were pending in the district and since DirecTV had its headquarters there, and common evidence was likely to be located there. Id. Further, the Judicial Panel held that the district also had the support of all Defendants and majority of the responding Plaintiffs and that the Judge was an experienced jurist. Id. at *4. Accordingly, the Judicial Panel transferred the action to the Central District of California for coordinated or consolidated pre-trial proceedings.

In Re Pacquiao-Mayweather Boxing Match Pay-Per-View Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 107022 (J.P.M.L. Aug. 14, 2015). In this multi-district class action litigation, Plaintiff moved to centralize pre-trial proceedings in the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California. This litigation consisted of ten actions pending in eight districts arising from allegations that Defendants fraudulently concealed a shoulder injury suffered by Emanuel "Manny" Pacquiao one month before a professional boxing match between Pacquiao and Floyd Mayweather, Jr., which was to be broadcasted nationally on a "pay-per-view" basis. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs alleged that Pacquiao and Defendants failed to disclose the injury to the public and misrepresented Pacquiao's health prior to the fight, so as not to risk the alleged $300 million in revenue from pay-per-view purchases of the fight. The actions were all brought on behalf of overlapping nationwide or state putative classes of purchasers of the pay-per-view fight. The Judicial Panel found that the actions involved common questions of fact and held that centralization in the Central District of California would be appropriate. Id. at *3. The Judicial Panel remarked that in spite of some variations in Plaintiffs' causes of action, all were based upon the theory that members of the public were fraudulently induced to purchase the pay-per-view showing of the fight. Id. at *4. The Judicial Panel held that as the Central District of California had the largest number of related actions of any district, and since several Plaintiffs and Defendants supported centralization in this district, it was appropriate to select this district as the transferee district for this litigation. Moreover, the Judicial Panel also found that as Pacquiao suffered the shoulder injury, and sought medical treatment at locations within the district, documentary evidence and witnesses concerning the injury at the center of this dispute likely would be located within the Central District of California. Accordingly, the Judicial Panel ordered that all the actions be transferred to the Central District of California.

In Re SeaWorld Marketing And Sales Practices Litigation,* MDL No. 2640 (J.P.M.L. Aug. 5, 2015). In this multi-district litigation, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants misled the public regarding the conditions and treatment of orcas at SeaWorld parks. Defendants moved to centralize four class actions in the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Florida. Plaintiffs in all four actions opposed centralization. Id. at 1. The Judicial Panel found that although those four actions had the same factual issues, the three Southern District of California actions essentially constituted a single action, as those actions were brought by the same firm, and their factual allegations, proposed classes, and claims were virtually identical. Id. Thus, based on the small number of actions and few involved counsel, the Judicial Panel remarked that centralization was not necessary. Accordingly, the Judicial Panel denied Defendants' motion for centralization of the actions.

In Re Volkswagen "Clean Diesel" Marketing, Sales Practices, & Products Liability Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 164986 (J.P.M.L. Dec. 8, 2015). In this multi-district class action litigation, Plaintiffs alleged that certain diesel engines sold by Defendants contained software that enabled the vehicles to evade emissions requirements by engaging full emissions controls only during official emissions testing. Id. at *2. The Judicial Panel On Multi-District Litigation (the "Panel") centralized all of the actions for pre-trial proceedings and transferred them to the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California. The Panel found that all actions involved common factual questions regarding the role of Defendants and related entities in equipping diesel engines with software allegedly designed to engage emissions controls only during official testing. Id. at *3. The Panel reasoned that centralization would eliminate duplicative discovery, avoid inconsistent pre-trial rulings, and conserve the resources of the parties, their counsel, and the judiciary. The Panel noted that the litigation was international in scope, and the potentially relevant witnesses and some evidence from Defendants and other entities were located outside the United States. Id. at *4. Further, the controversy touched multiple judicial districts across the United States, and the various Defendant entities held ties to many districts. Id. at *5. Although no party opposed centralization, the parties advocated for 28 different transferee districts across the nation. The Panel, however, ruled that the Northern District of California was the appropriate transferee district because Plaintiffs had filed 30 actions in that District, including the first-filed case, and Plaintiffs had filed a total of 101 cases in California. Id. at *6. Further, the Panel noted that relevant documents and witnesses could be found both in the District and throughout California given the role played by the California Air Resources Board in uncovering Defendants' use of defeat devices on their diesel engines. Id. at *6-7. Further, the Panel also concluded that the transferee judge in the Northern District of California was thoroughly familiar with the nuances of complex, multi-district litigation by virtue of having presided over nine MDL dockets, some of which involved numerous international Defendants. Id. Accordingly, the Panel transferred the actions to the Northern District of California for coordinated or consolidated pre-trial proceedings.

In Re Walgreens Herbal Supplements Marketing And Sales Practices Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 75045 (J.P.M.L. June 10, 2015). In this multi-district litigation, arising out of an investigation into the herbal supplements industry, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for centralization in part. Plaintiffs in six class actions sought to centralize their dockets on a retailer-specific basis in various districts. Id. at *1. All Defendants and responding Plaintiffs supported centralization, but disagreed on the structure of the proposed dockets and the proposed transferee districts. Id. at *2. The issue before the Judicial Panel was whether creation of a single multi-retailer MDL or four retailer-specific MDLs would achieve greater efficiencies. The parties supporting creation of retailer-specific MDLs argued that each Defendant's labeling, marketing, manufacturing, and sourcing practices would raise unique factual issues, the retailer-specific motions could be more efficiently presented and resolved in separate dockets, and Defendants would need to be protected against the disclosure of confidential information. Plaintiffs supporting a single multi-retailer MDL argued that the central factual issues in all four dockets focused on the same investigation and since overlapping discovery and motion practice would be substantial, centralization was necessary to avoid inconsistent rulings and retailer-specific factual issues; and that protection of confidential proprietary information could be addressed by creating separate tracks for each retailer. Id. at *4-5. The Judicial Panel opined that a single MDL encompassing all four retailers was necessary to ensure the just and efficient conduct of the litigation since the actions stemmed from the same government investigation and there was significant overlap in the central factual issues, parties, and claims. The Judicial Panel found that although there were certain retailer-specific issues, 28 U.S.C. § 1407 did not require a complete identity of common factual issues or parties as a prerequisite to transfer, the presence of additional facts was not significant where the actions arose from a common factual core, and the transferee judge could employ any number of pre-trial techniques, such as establishing separate discovery and motion tracks, to manage pre-trial proceedings efficiently. Id. at *6-7. Subsequently, the Judicial Panel found that the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois was an appropriate transferee district noting that Walgreens, Wal-Mart, Target, NBTY, and GNC and responding Plaintiffs in over 20 actions also supported this district and Walgreens Defendants were also based there. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Judicial Panel centralized the actions and transferred them to the Northern District of Illinois.

(xxix) Standing Issues In Class Actions

In Re Horizon Healthcare Services Inc. Data Breach Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41839 (D.N.J. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiffs, on behalf of putative class members whose personal information was housed in stolen laptops, brought this action alleging that Defendant's wrongful action or inaction placed them at imminent, immediate, and continuing increased risk of harm from identity theft. Defendant provided health insurance products and services to approximately 3.7 million members, and maintained medical information of its members, including names, dates of birth, and social security numbers. Id. at *2. In November 2013, two password protected laptop computers containing information of more than 839,000 members were stolen from Defendant's headquarters. Plaintiffs claimed to have sustained economic damages and actual harm for which they were entitled to compensation, and asserted causes of action under the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") and several state law causes of action. Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint, and the Court granted the motion. Defendant first contended that Plaintiffs did not demonstrate a cognizable injury sufficient for Article III standing. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs did not allege that their personal information was accessed or misused, that there have been any unauthorized withdrawals from their accounts, or that their identities were stolen. Id. at *9. The Court noted that Plaintiffs failed to point out any individual harm suffered by the named Plaintiffs. Instead, they rested on generalized allegations of harm based on: (i) economic injury; (ii) violation of common law and statutory rights; and (iii) an imminent risk of future harm. As to economic injury, Plaintiffs claimed that they paid insurance premiums to Defendant that were, at least in part, allocated for data protection and Defendant did not encrypt all computers. Plaintiffs relied on Resnick v. AvMed. Inc., 693 F.3d 1317 (11th Cir. 2012), where two laptop computers containing members' personal information were stolen. The Court noted that in stark contrast to Plaintiffs here, Plaintiffs in Resnick alleged that they were careful in guarding their sensitive information, and they had become victims of identity theft within a year of the laptop larceny. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs did not allege an economic injury sufficient for standing. In addition, the Court found that the named Plaintiffs did not allege any specific harm as a result's of the stolen laptops and therefore, they could not merely rest on violation of common law and statutory rights to have an Article III standing. Id. at *13. With respect to an imminent risk of future harm, Plaintiffs contended that despite their lack of injury, identity theft could occur at any moment, and therefore, they had demonstrated standing. The Court reasoned that if there was no misuse of information, there was no harm. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the complaint for lack of standing.

In Re Zappos.com, Inc. Customer Data Security Breach Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71185 (D. Nev. June 1, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of Zappos customers, brought putative class actions over the alleged theft of their personal identifying information. On January 16, 2012, Defendant sent an e-mail to its customers notifying them that its servers had been breached and that data had been stolen, including customers' names, account numbers, passwords, e-mail addresses, billing and shipping addresses, phone numbers, and the last four digits of their credit card numbers. Defendant moved to dismiss on the basis that Plaintiffs lacked Article III standing. The Court granted the motion. To attempt to establish standing, Plaintiffs alleged that they sought to recover the "substantial value" of their personal information. Id. at *9. They alleged that a "robust market" existed for the sale and purchase of consumer data such as the personal information that was stolen during the breach, and that Defendant's security breach deprived Plaintiffs of the "substantial value" of their personal information. Id. Plaintiffs also asserted that they suffered an increased threat of future identify theft and fraud as a result of Defendant's security breach. Id. at *11-12. The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to allege how their personal information became less valuable as a result of the breach. Id. at *12. Further, the Court determined that Plaintiffs could not credibly allege that the threat of future identity theft or fraud was certain, impending, imminent, or immediate because 3.5 years had passed since the incident without any Plaintiff alleging actual or attempted identify theft or financial fraud. Id. at *29. Thus, according to the Court, the increased threat of identity theft and fraud stemming from Defendant's security breach did not constitute an injury-in-fact sufficient to confer standing. Id. at *25. Plaintiffs claimed that cybercriminals often hold onto stolen personal and financial information for several years before using and/or selling the information to other identity thieves, indicating that the alleged harm is not merely speculative despite the years that passed without an occurrence of theft or fraud. Id. at *24. The Court, however, held that a harm that is "not merely speculative" does not constitute an injury-in-fact sufficient to confer standing. Id. The Court explained that the years that had passed without Plaintiffs making a single allegation of theft or fraud demonstrated that the risk was not immediate, and even if Plaintiffs suffer identify theft or fraud at some point in the future, there might be a genuine issue regarding whether Defendant's breach was the reason for the damages then incurred. Id. at *25-29. The Court, therefore, concluded that Plaintiffs failed to allege a threat of future harm sufficiently imminent to confer standing. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss without prejudice and granted Plaintiffs leave to "allege instances of actual identify theft or fraud." Id. at *34-35.

Machlan, et al. v. Procter & Gamble Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2599 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 6, 2015). Plaintiff brought a consumer class action in state court alleging that Defendants deceptively marketed several lines of personal wipes as "flushable" when in fact they were not and asserted claims for false advertising ("FAL"), unfair, unlawful and deceptive trade practices ("UCL), and for violation of the Consumer Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA"). Plaintiff also sought injunctive relief for his CLRA, UCL, and FAL claims. Defendants removed the action under the CAFA, and moved to dismiss, which the Court granted in part. Defendants argued that Plaintiff lacked standing to seek injunctive relief because Plaintiff did not, and could not, allege that such relief would redress a real and immediate threat of repeated injury. Defendants further argued that Plaintiff did not allege that he was likely to purchase those wipes again, and in any event, there was no basis for concluding that he was likely to be misled into making such purchases based on the advertising and labeling that he challenged. Id. at *8. The Court remarked that the crux of Plaintiff's case was that he was allegedly deceived about the true nature of the "flushable" wipes that Defendants marketed and sold. Id. at *10. Plaintiff paid a premium for the wipes because he thought "flushable" meant "suitable for flushing," but according to his complaint, Plaintiff later learned that those "flushable" wipes were not, in fact, suitable for flushing. Id. The Court remarked that even if Plaintiff were to allege that he intended to buy those wipes again, and even if Plaintiff had continued to purchase those wipes daily, the nature of his alleged injury, i.e., deception, was such that he personally could not be harmed in the same way again. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiff did not have Article III standing to seek an injunction prohibiting Defendants from continuing to engage in the conduct complained of in the complaint. The Court, however, reasoned that injunctive relief was an important remedy under California's consumer protection laws, and allowing a Defendant to undermine the consumer protection statutes and defeat injunctive relief simply by removing a case from state court was an affront to federal and state comity. Id. at *14. As this case was originally filed in the California state court by a California Plaintiff on behalf of a putative class of California residents under California's state law, the Court remanded the case for Plaintiff to assert injunctive relief under the UCL, the FAL, and the CLRA before the state court. Id. at *15. Defendants also argued that Plaintiff lacked standing to prosecute any claims on the products that he did not buy, i.e., Plaintiff never bought Charmin Freshmates product, he bought only the Pampers Kandoo product. The Court noted that Defendants allegedly played different roles with respect to the Charmin wipes and the Pampers wipes. Id. at *17. For the Pampers wipes, a smaller manufacturer – Nehemaiah – was alleged to have held the license to have developed the product line, and for the Charmin wipes, Plaintiff alleged that Defendants manufactured and marketed them. Because Plaintiff never purchased the Charmin wipes, the Court dismissed the claims. Id. at *19. Defendants further contended that Plaintiffs lacked standing to pursue claims for Pampers Kandoo Wipes as well because Defendants shared the responsibility with Nehemaiah for manufacturing and marketing of the product. The Court disagreed and found that an issue that went directly into Defendants' liability could not be resolved on a motion to dismiss. Id. at *20. The Court also ruled that despite Defendants' argument that it shared joint liability with Nehemaiah, or if Defendants had no responsibility for the development or manufacturing of Kandoo wipes, Defendants ultimately had the approval rights over the products bearing a licensed mark and on any advertising or promotional materials related to those products. Id. at *21. Consequently, the Court rejected Defendants' argument that Plaintiff lacked standing to assert claims as to his purchase of Kandoo Wipes.

Neale, et al. v. Volvo Cars Of North America, LLC,* 794 F.3d 353 (3d Cir. 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers from six states, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants sold certain vehicles with defective sunroof drainage systems. The District Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to certify a nationwide class, but granted Plaintiffs' motion to certify six state-wide classes. Following the Supreme Court's decision in Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, 133 S. Ct. 1426 (2013), Defendants moved for reconsideration of the District Court's order granting class certification. The District Court denied that motion and Defendants appealed. Id. at 358. The Third Circuit thereafter vacated the grant of class certification, and remanded the case to the District Court. Id. at 375. First, in rejecting Defendants' argument that Plaintiffs did not suffer an injury and therefore lacked Article III standing, the Third Circuit found that so long as a named class representative has standing, a class action presents a valid case or controversy under Article III. Id. at 369. As the Third Circuit concluded, "requiring Article III standing of absent class members is inconsistent with the nature of an action under Rule 23." Id. However, the Third Circuit held that the District Court failed to identify which precise claims were subject to class treatment in its certification order, thus requiring a remand. Id. at 370. Defendants further argued that the District Court erred by certifying six state-wide classes without analyzing whether those claims were subject to common proof. The Third Circuit declined to engage in an analysis of predominance and remanded the issue to the District Court. Id. at 373. Finally, Defendants argued that the District Court erred in denying the motion to reconsider the class certification decision in light of Comcast, specifically for the proposition that Plaintiffs must show that damages are susceptible of measurement across the entire class for purposes of Rule 23(b)(3). Id. at 374. Following Fifth Circuit precedent, the Third Circuit noted that Comcast does not preclude certification under Rule 23(b)(3) in any case where the class members' damages are not susceptible to a formula for class-wide measurement. Id. at 375. Accordingly, the Third Circuit vacated and remanded the District Court's class certification decision to allow the District Court to define the class membership, claims, and defenses, and to analyze the predominance requirement. Id.

Editor's Note: Rulings in "no-injury" class actions often conflate a number of different Rule 23 issues. In Neale, the District Court denied certification of a nationwide class because the case did not present a case or controversy under Article III. The Third Circuit vacated and remanded, clarifying that, while the case before it presented numerous predominance problems, so long as the named Plaintiff has a valid claim, Article III standing is met.

Oetting, et al. v. Norton,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13535 (8th Cir. Aug. 4, 2015). Plaintiff was a representative of a class action lawsuit alleging violations of the federal securities laws for legal malpractice and breach of fiduciary duty against NationsBank Corp. and BankAmerica Corp., for which Defendant was a class counsel. Id. at *2. The litigation settled and the District Court appointed Heffler, Radetich & Saitta, LLP ("Heffler") as claims administrator to distribute the settlement funds to class member claimants. During the claims process, one of Heffler's employees conspired to submit fifteen false claims against the fund. In 2010, the District Court denied Defendant's motion for leave to file a complaint against the claims administrator to recover the loss. Plaintiff subsequently filed a separate action against the claims administrator. After two distributions in 2004 and 2009, Defendant moved to have the remaining amount distributed by cy pres and requested an additional award in attorneys' fees for post-settlement work. Id. at *3. Plaintiff opposed the cy pres distribution as it was contrary to the class members' interests, and opposed the award of additional attorneys' fees on the basis that Defendant should disgorge fees for abandoning the class. Plaintiff also filed a separate class action against Defendant. The District Court granted Defendant's motion and granted the supplemental fee award and denied Plaintiff's request for disgorgement. On appeal, the Eight Circuit reversed the cy pres award, ordering the District Court to allow an additional distribution to the class and then to consider a cy pres award. Further, the Eight Circuit vacated the supplemental fee award as premature prior to completion of additional distributions. Id. at *4. On remand, Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint, which the District Court granted. Plaintiff moved to amend the District Court's dismissal order, which was denied in part. While Plaintiff's second motion to amend was pending in the District Court, Plaintiff moved to file a second motion to amend, and appealed from the final judgment and the denial of his first motion to amend. Id. at *5-6. On the subsequent appeal, the Eight Circuit concluded that the District Court had no jurisdiction over the case and affirmed the judgment dismissing the complaint. The Eight Circuit found that Plaintiff's lack of personal standing would deprive the District Court of subject-matter jurisdiction over the entire case. Id. at *7. Further, the Eighth Circuit found that to show personal standing, Plaintiff had to establish that he had suffered some actual injury that could be redressed. Id. at *8. Plaintiff, however, had excluded himself from the class as he alleged no injury other than a loss to his share of the settlement fund, which became zero as Plaintiff did not cash his settlement checks. Id. at *9. Thus, the Eighth Circuit held that Plaintiff lacked a personal claim from the settlement fund and was not a member of the class he sought to represent. The next issue was whether the class had standing. Id. at *10. The Eighth Circuit held that Plaintiff's status as class representative in the main action did not allow Plaintiff or the class itself to maintain claims in a separate action. Id. at *13. Further, the Eighth Circuit found that if a case had only one class representative and that party did not have standing, then the District Court lacked jurisdiction over the case and it must be dismissed. Id. at *13. Plaintiff argued that the District Court erred in not appointing a substitute Plaintiff. Id. at *14. The Eighth Circuit found that Plaintiff did not timely amended his complaint and did not move to add a substitute Plaintiff, when he had ample notice that Defendant was asserting lack of standing as a jurisdictional defense. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit concluded that the District Court had no jurisdiction over the case and affirmed its judgment dismissing the complaint.

Osborn, et al. v. Visa Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13529 (D.C. Cir. Aug. 4, 2015). In this consolidated class action brought by a group of users and operators of independent (non-bank) ATMs against Visa, MasterCard, and certain affiliated banks, alleging anti-competitive schemes for pricing ATM access fees, the D.C. Circuit found that the District Court erred in concluding that Plaintiffs lacked standing. The crux of Plaintiffs' complaints was that when someone used a non-bank ATM, the cardholder paid a greater fee and the ATM operator earned a lower return on each transaction because of certain Visa and MasterCard network rules that prohibited differential pricing based on the cost of the network that links the ATM to the cardholder's bank in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act and various state laws. Id. at *1-2. The District Court determined that Plaintiffs lacked Article III standing because their allegations showed neither injury nor redressability, and it dismissed the action. Plaintiffs then moved to amend the judgment, which the District Court denied. Plaintiffs contended that in the absence of the access fee rules, ATM operators would offer consumers differentiated access fees at the point of transaction, consumers would then demand multi-bug PIN cards from their banks, their banks would provide these cards, and the market for network services would become more competitive, all resulting in more choice of networks and lower access fees for consumers. Id. at *11. The D.C. Circuit observed that two distinct theories of injury were relevant in this case. First, the ATM operators' theory of harm claimed that MasterCard and Visa, working in concert with the member banks, had maximized their own returns on each transaction, thereby minimizing the independent ATM operators' cut. Id. at *12. Second, the consumers' theory of harm alleged that they paid inflated access fees when they visit ATMs, and the access fee rules inhibited competition in the network services market for ATM access fees. Id. at *13. The D.C. Circuit observed that economic harm, such as that alleged here, was classic form of injury-in-fact. Id. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs' allegations were speculative and conclusory, and the District Court agreed. The D.C. Circuit, however, found that at the pleadings stage, a District Court must accept as true all material allegations of the complaint. Id. at *14. The D.C. Circuit remarked that Plaintiffs' theories were susceptible to proof at trial. Id. Since the economic facts alleged by Plaintiffs were specific, plausible, and susceptible to proof at trial, the D.C. Circuit concluded that they passed muster for standing purposes at the pleadings stage. Id. at *17. Further, the District Court had held that Plaintiffs failed to plead adequate facts to establish the existence of concerted activity. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that the member banks used the bankcard associations to adopt and enforce a supra-competitive pricing regime for ATM access fees. Id. at *20. Defendants argued that since they were publicly held corporations, the public offerings would terminate any possible agreements and conspiracies. Id. at *21. The D.C. Circuit found that the agreement, which originated when the member banks owned Defendants, continued even after the public offerings. Id. at *24. The D.C. Circuit held that Defendants' anti-competitive conduct had forced the independent operators to pay supra-competitive network fees, which proved injury. Id. at *25. Accordingly, the D.C. Circuit vacated and remanded the District Court's judgment denying Plaintiff's motion to amend.

Peters, et al. v. St. Joseph Service Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16451 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 11, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action against Defendants for damages arising from an intrusion into Defendants' computer network and the resulting data breach. Plaintiff alleged violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"), and various common law claims. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss, and the Court granted the motion. Defendants contended that the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction to hear the claims because Plaintiff did not suffer an injury, actual or imminent, that was traceable to Defendants' conduct, and Plaintiff lacked standing to bring this action. Id. at *6. The Court noted that Article III limits the jurisdiction of federal courts to actual cases and controversies, and one element of the case-or-controversy requirement is that Plaintiffs must establish that they have a standing to sue. Id. at *12. The Court noted that to establish standing, two prongs should be satisfied, including: (i) that there is an injury-in-fact; and (ii) there is a causal connection between the injury and the complained of conduct. Id. Plaintiff argued that the increased risk of future identity theft and fraud constituted imminent injury. The Court disagreed that Plaintiff faced a "certainly impending" or "substantial" risk of identity theft as Article III required. Id. at *13. The Court explained that Plaintiff cited to reports from the Government Accountability Office and the Federal Trade Commission for the proposition that thieves could potentially use the personal information to drain her bank accounts, make charges on her credit cards, or obtain false identification cards. Id. at *13-14. The Court opined that Plaintiff's alleged future injuries were speculative, and certainly not imminent. Id. at *14. Similarly, the Court ruled that the incidents identified by Plaintiff as evidence of actual identity theft failed to meet the causation and redressability elements of the standing test. The Court explained that Plaintiff essentially argued that her injuries were traceable to the FCRA because they stemmed from Defendants' failure to comply with the requirements of the statute. Plaintiff contended that as a result of this failure, acts of identity theft and fraud were (and continued to be) perpetrated against her, albeit by unknown third-parties, for which Defendants should be held responsible. Id. at *21. Although Plaintiff alleged that Defendants' failures proximately caused those injuries, the allegation was conclusory and failed to account for the sufficient break in causation caused by opportunistic third-parties. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's claims.

Remijas, et al. v. Neiman Marcus Group, LLC*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 12487 (7th Cir. July 20, 2015). Following a cyber-attack on Defendant's luxury department store in December 2013, which exposed the credit card numbers of approximately 350,000 of its card holders to the hackers' malware, Defendant notified all customers who had shopped at its stores between January 2013 and January 2014 and offered them one year of free credit monitoring and identity-theft protection. Id. at *3. Those disclosures prompted the filing of a number of class action complaints alleging negligence, breach of implied contract, unjust enrichment, unfair and deceptive business practices, invasion of privacy, and violation of multiple state data breach laws. Id. at *4. Following consolidation, Plaintiffs filed a first amended complaint, and Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint for lack of standing. The District Court granted the motion. The Seventh Circuit, however, reversed the District Court's decision. Id. at *6. To prove standing, Plaintiffs pointed to several injuries they suffered, including: (i) lost time and money resolving the fraudulent charges; (ii) lost time and money protecting themselves against future identity theft; (iii) the financial loss of buying items at Defendant's stores that they would not have purchased had they known of the store's careless approach to cybersecurity; and (iv) lost control over the value of their personal information. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs also alleged that they had standing based on two imminent injuries, i.e., an increased risk of future fraudulent charges and greater susceptibility to identity theft. Id. at *8. The Seventh Circuit addressed the alleged imminent injuries first. The Seventh Circuit cited Clapper v. Amnesty International USA, 133 S. Ct. 1138, 1147 (2013), wherein the U.S. Supreme Court held that allegations of future harm could establish Article III standing if that harm was certainly impending, but allegations of possible future injury were not sufficient. Id. at *8. The Seventh Circuit, however, found that, unlike Clapper, where there was no evidence that any communications either had been or would be monitored, in this case, there was no need to speculate as to whether customers' information had been stolen and what information was taken. Id. at *11. In addition to the alleged future injuries, Plaintiffs asserted that they already had lost time and money protecting themselves against future identity theft and fraudulent charges. Id. at *13. The Seventh Circuit noted that Defendant did not contest the fact that the initial breach took place, and offered one year of credit monitoring and identity-theft protection to all customers for whom it had contact information and who had shopped at their stores between January 2013 and January 2014. Id. at *14. The Seventh Circuit opined those credit-monitoring services came at a price that was more than de minimis and that easily qualified as a concrete injury. Id. at *14-15. The Seventh Circuit found the other asserted injuries more problematic. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs could not trace their injuries to the data incursion at the company rather than to one of several other large-scale breaches that took place around the same time. Id. at *19. The Seventh Circuit held it was enough at that stage of the litigation that Defendant admitted that 350,000 cards might have been exposed and that it contacted members of the class to tell them they were at risk. Those admissions and actions by Defendant adequately raised Plaintiffs' right to relief above the speculative level. Id. at *20. Defendant further argued that Plaintiffs' injuries could not be redressed by a judicial decision because Defendant already had reimbursed them for the fraudulent charges. The Seventh Circuit pointed out that, because reimbursement policies varied, a favorable judicial decision could redress any of Plaintiffs' injuries caused by less than full reimbursement of unauthorized charges. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit concluded that injuries associated with resolving fraudulent charges and protecting against future identity theft were sufficient to confer Article III standing.

Silha, et al. v. ACT, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 19996 (7th Cir. Nov. 18, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former information exchange program participants, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants deceived them and concealed the sale of licensing of the students' personally identifiable information ("PII") under the cover of the information exchange programs. Defendants were national testing agencies that administered the American College Test ("ACT") and the Scholastic Aptitude Test ("SAT") college entrance exams. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs contended that in connection with the examinations, Defendants offered optional programs to facilitate the exchange of information between the student test-takers and colleges and universities. Id. Plaintiffs contended that the test-takers were required to affirmatively respond "yes" to authorize Defendants to share certain PII with participating educational groups. Id. According to Plaintiffs, Defendants sold their PII to educational organizations for profit. Id. The District Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss, finding that Plaintiffs did not establish Article III standing. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed. At the outset, the Seventh Circuit noted that in order to have Article III standing, Plaintiffs must allege personal injury fairly traceable to Defendants' allegedly unlawful conduct that is likely to be redressed by the requested relief. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants had deceived them by not disclosing the sale of their PII and seeking damages from the income Defendants derived from the alleged deception. Id. at *10. The Seventh Circuit remarked that Plaintiffs alleged that they took the tests that Defendants administered, they consented to participate in the information exchange programs that Defendants offered, and they did not know at the time of their examinations that Defendants profited from those information exchange programs. Id. The Seventh Circuit opined that Plaintiffs actually benefited from participation in the information exchange. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit concluded that Plaintiffs' pleading did not establish an injury-in-fact, and therefore, the District Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction over the case.

State Of Mississippi, et al. v. Johnson,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 5573 (5th Cir. April 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of immigration and customs enforcement agents and deportation officers and the State of Mississippi, brought an action against Defendants, the Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security ("DHS") and its directors, challenging the 2012 Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program (the "DACA program"), which allowed certain immigrants who entered the country as children to delay deportation and work in the country for at least two years. Plaintiffs alleged that the DACA program caused additional aliens to remain in the State and, as a result, caused the State to spend money on providing social services. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs sought declaratory and injunctive relief attacking the constitutional and statutory validity of the DACA program. The District Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claims for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, as Plaintiffs lacked standing. Although Plaintiffs asserted that the cost to the State in providing support services to DACA beneficiaries was an adequate injury to support standing, the District Court found that Plaintiffs produced no studies or other evidence tending to establish that the DACA program added to the state's already existing costs. Id. at *13. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Fifth Circuit affirmed, agreeing that Plaintiffs lacked standing to maintain the suit. The Fifth Circuit noted that Article III standing principles mandate that Plaintiffs show a "concrete and particularized" injury that is "fairly traceable" to the DACA, and Plaintiffs failed to carry this burden. Id. at *17. Because Plaintiffs' claim of injury was not supported by any facts, the Fifth Circuit agreed with the District Court that Plaintiffs' injury was purely speculative. Id. Plaintiffs asserted that they suffered an injury-in-fact because enforcing the DACA required them to violate their oaths of office. The Fifth Circuit held that the violation of such an oath was an insufficient injury to support standing. Id. at *20. Plaintiffs also asserted that the burden of compliance with the DACA qualified as a sufficient injury to satisfy the requirements of constitutional standing. In particular, Plaintiffs alleged that they inevitably altered their current processes to ensure that they deferred action with respect to DACA-eligible aliens. The Fifth Circuit, however, agreed with the District Court that the burden of compliance with the DACA was insufficient to satisfy the injury requirements of standing. Id. at *20-21. Plaintiffs did not point to any cases where a Plaintiff had standing to challenge a department policy merely because it required employees to change their practices and failed to allege with any specificity how their practices changed in a substantial way. Id. at *21. Finally, Plaintiffs alleged that they suffered an injury-in-fact by virtue of being threatened with employment sanctions if they failed to comply with the terms of the DACA directive. The Fifth Circuit, however, held that Plaintiffs provided no evidence that Defendants sanctioned agents or threatened them with employment sanctions for detaining an alien and refusing to grant deferred action under the DACA. Id. at *22. Although Plaintiffs alleged in their complaint that an agent received a non-disciplinary letter admonishing him for refusing to follow his supervisor's instruction to defer action under the directive, the Fifth Circuit found that it did not support Plaintiffs' claim that Defendants threatened them with employment sanctions for failing to exercise their discretion to grant deferred action to an alien who satisfied the DACA's criteria. Id. at *22-23. The Fifth Circuit explained that Plaintiffs' reading of the DACA directive that it always required them to grant deferred action without detaining an alien who met the directive's criteria was erroneous, as the directive made clear that Plaintiffs could exercise their discretion in deciding to grant deferred action and could do so on a case-by-case basis. Id. at *23. The Fifth Circuit, therefore, concluded that Plaintiffs failed to allege a sufficient injury-in-fact to satisfy constitutional standing requirements, and accordingly, affirmed the District Court's dismissal of Plaintiffs' claims.

Storm, et al. v. Paytime, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31286 (M.D. Pa. Mar. 13, 2015). In this consolidated class action brought by Plaintiffs, a group of victims of a security breach of Defendant's computer systems in which an unknown third-party allegedly accessed Plaintiffs' confidential, personal, and financial information, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss for lack of standing. Plaintiffs included current and former employees of companies that used Defendant, a national payroll service company, for their payroll processing service. In order to facilitate payroll processing, Plaintiffs provided confidential personal and financial information to their employers. In April 2014, unknown third-parties gained unauthorized access to Defendant's computer systems, and consequently, to Plaintiffs' confidential personal information. Plaintiffs alleged that over 233,000 individuals had their personal and financial information "misappropriated" as a result of this data breach, and they would need to spend time and money to protect themselves from identity theft. Id. at *8-9. Plaintiffs asserted claims for negligence, breach of contract, and violations of Pennsylvania's Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law. The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to allege an actual injury. Id. at *17. The Court noted that based on relevant precedent, standing in data breach cases depended on well-pled allegations that Plaintiffs' information was actually misused or its misuse was "certainly impending." Id. at *12-13. Although Plaintiffs alleged that they were at increased risk of identity theft and suffered other harms as a result of the breach, the Court determined that the risks were too speculative and uncertain to establish actual, imminent injury sufficient to confer Article III standing. Particularly, the Court noted that Plaintiffs nowhere alleged that the hacker caused a new bank account or credit card to be opened in any of Plaintiffs' names, or any other form of identity theft, and thus alleged no actual "misuse" of the data. Id. at *18. Plaintiffs contended that they have alleged actual injury based on harm to their privacy interests, in having their confidential personal information accessed by an unauthorized third-party. The Court, however, pointed out that it "cannot be in the business of prognosticating whether a particular hacker was sophisticated or malicious enough to both be able to successfully read and manipulate the [stolen] data and engage in identify theft." Id. at *22. Since Plaintiffs did not allege that the unidentified hacker was actually able to view, read, or otherwise understand the data it accessed or that their information was exposed in such a way to make it easily viewed, the Court concluded that it would be speculative to find that the hacker "read, copied, or understood the data." Id. at *23-24. The Court therefore held that Plaintiffs failed to plead specific facts to demonstrate injury and standing, and accordingly, granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

(xxx) Application Of Tolling Principles In Class Actions

Ewing Industries Corp., et al. v. Bob Wines Nursery, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13484 (11th Cir. Aug. 3, 2015). In 2010, Aero Financial, Inc. ("Aero") filed a class action complaint in Florida state court alleging that Defendants sent unsolicited facsimile advertisements to the putative class in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act. The claims were governed by a four-year statute of limitations and over three years had passed between the alleged conduct and the filing of the complaint. In 2013, the Florida state court granted summary judgment in favor of Defendants on the basis that Aero did not have standing. The Florida state court did not rule on the issue of class certification, but held that the defect was due to the class representative. Id. at *2. Plaintiff filed a similar class action complaint in federal court against Defendants containing similar allegations. As four years had passed since the alleged conduct, Plaintiff alleged that the statute of limitations was tolled during the pendency of Aero's purported class action. In 2014, Defendants filed a motion to strike the class allegations in Plaintiff's complaint, contending that the claims were barred by the statute of limitations. The District Court relied upon the decision in Griffin v. Dugger, 17 F.3d 356, 359 (11th Cir. 1994) ("Griffin II"), and concluded that the pendency of Aero's purported class action did not toll the statute of limitations for Plaintiff's class action and denied Plaintiff's pending motion for class certification. Id. at *3. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the judgment of the District Court. Plaintiff argued that Griffin II addressed different facts and that the statute of limitations was tolled due to the inadequacy of the class representative and not due to the defects in the class complaint itself. Id. at *4. At the outset, the Eleventh Circuit found that the pendency of a previously filed class action did not toll the limitations period for additional class actions by putative members of the original asserted class. Id. at *8. Further, the Eleventh Circuit, relying upon Griffin II, found that it did not matter whether the first purported class action failed due to the inadequacy of the class representative or due to defects in the class itself. Id. at *9. Finally, the Eleventh Circuit held that Plaintiff could not piggy-back one class action onto another and engage in endless rounds of litigation. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the judgment of the District Court.

Phipps, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 11616 (6th Cir. July 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, the unnamed class members in Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. 2541 (2011), brought an action in Tennessee alleging individual and class claims under Rule 23(b)(2) and Rule 23(b)(3), on behalf of current and former female employees of Wal-Mart. Id. at *2. On June 8, 2001, six named Plaintiffs filed suit under Title VII in the Northern District of California on behalf of all former and current female employees nationwide. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs sought certification of a nationwide class of current and former female employees under Rule 23(b)(2), or alternatively, under Rule 23(b)(3). Id. at *3. In 2004, the District Court certified a nationwide class under Rule 23(b)(2). Id. In 2007, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's certification of a nationwide class under Rule 23(b)(2) for current employees and remanded for the District Court to consider certification of punitive damages classes under Rule 23(b)(2) or Rule 23(b)(3) and certification of former employees classes under Rule 23(b)(3). Id. The U.S. Supreme Court subsequently granted certiorari and, in June 2011, issued its landmark decision, reversing certification of a nationwide class of current employees under Rule 23(b)(2). The Supreme Court held, among other things, that Plaintiffs did not demonstrate questions of law or fact common to the class because they failed to provide "significant proof" of a nationwide policy or other "specific employment practice" that affected 1.5 million class members in the same way. Id. at *4. Thereafter, Plaintiffs promptly filed a motion in the District Court in California to extend tolling of the statute of limitations. The District Court granted the motion and directed all class members who had not filed administrative charges with the EEOC to do so on or before May 25, 2012. Plaintiffs then amended their California case to narrow the scope of the proposed class to current and former female employees who had been subjected to gender discrimination within California regions. Id. at *5. In addition, Plaintiffs filed class actions in four other jurisdictions – including Tennessee, Texas, Florida, and Wisconsin – to bring individual and class claims concerning other Wal-Mart regions. Id. In Tennessee, three unnamed class members filed their own lawsuit asserting individual and putative class claims under Rule 23(b)(2) and Rule 23(b)(3) on behalf of current and former female employees in Defendant's "Region 43," a region allegedly centered in Middle and Western Tennessee, and including portions of Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, and Mississippi. Plaintiffs had filed administrative charges with the EEOC within the deadline ordered by the District Court, and then filed suit within 90 days of receiving right-to-sue letters. Defendant moved to dismiss the putative class claims under Rule 12(b)(6), arguing that Sixth Circuit precedent prohibited tolling for any purported class action brought after a previous denial of class certification. The District Court agreed and dismissed the class claims with prejudice, but certified its decision for interlocutory appeal. Id. at *6. The timely filing of a class action complaint normally tolls the statute of limitations for all members of the putative class until a ruling that the suit is not appropriate for class treatment. Id. at *7. At that point, the putative class members can move to intervene as Plaintiffs in the pending action or can file their own lawsuits. Id. Defendant argued that, because the Supreme Court already had rejected class certification of Plaintiffs' claims in Wal-Mart, tolling was not available for Plaintiffs' rebooted class theory. The Sixth Circuit disagreed. With respect to Plaintiffs' Rule 23(b)(3) claims, the Sixth Circuit found that, when Plaintiffs initiated their action in Tennessee, no order in any jurisdiction had denied certification of a Rule 23(b)(3) class of current and former female employees. Id. at *13. Indeed, the original motion for class certification under Rule 23(b)(3) filed by Plaintiffs in Wal-Mart remained pending in the District Court in California after the Supreme Court issued its decision. Id. at *15. With respect to Plaintiffs' Rule 23(b)(2) claims, the Sixth Circuit held that the issue was not whether the class action was timely filed but whether Plaintiffs' class claims were precluded by the Supreme Court's decision in Wal-Mart. It found no preclusion. Plaintiffs, for the first time, sought certification of a regional class under Rule 23(b)(2) for themselves and all other current employees in Region 43. Id. at *18. The Sixth Circuit observed that "[t]hese" substantive claims are within the scope of those asserted by the nationwide class in Dukes, . . . but the class seeks neither re-litigation nor correction of the earlier class claims." Id. The Sixth Circuit rejected Defendant's argument that it is unfair to permit absent class members to "stack" one class action onto another, noting that "this form of argument flies in the face of the rule against non-party preclusion." Id. at *21. The Sixth Circuit reasoned that "existing principles in our legal system, such as stare decisis and comity among courts, are suited to and capable of address these concerns." Id. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit reversed and remanded the action.

Sparkle Hill, Inc., et al. v. Interstate Mat Corp.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 9236 (1st Cir. June 3, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging violations of the Telephone Consumers Protection Act ("TCPA"). Plaintiff alleged that, in May 2006, Defendant paid a marketing firm to fax a one-page advertisement to 10,000 potential customers, including Plaintiff and another company, West Concord. More than three and a half years later, West Concord filed a putative class action in Massachusetts state court. Id. at *2. More than a year after West Concord filed suit, Plaintiff – represented by the same counsel – filed this putative class action alleging the same violation. Id. at *3. The District Court certified a class of all persons to whom Defendant successfully sent a fax in May 2006. The District Court then granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that Plaintiff's claim was time-barred. In ruling on Plaintiff's motion, the District Court considered whether the putative class action filed in state court tolled the statute of limitations for Plaintiff's subsequent class action under American Pipe & Construction Company v. Utah, 414 U.S. 538, 553 (1974), which established the principle that the commencement of a class suit tolls the running of the statute for all purported class members who make timely motions to intervene after the suit is deemed inappropriate for class certification. Id. at *6. The District Court, however, concluded that Basch v. Ground Round, Inc., 139 F.3d 6, 11 (1st Cir. 1998), which held that the "Plaintiffs may not stack one class action on top of another and continue to toll the statute of limitations indefinitely" foreclosed the application of American Pipe tolling to sequential class actions, as opposed to individual actions. Id. Thereafter, Plaintiff moved under Rule 60(b)(6) to vacate the District Court's order. Plaintiff argued that, even if American Pipe tolling did not apply to its class action, tolling still might apply to the individual claims of Plaintiff and other class members, and that the District Court should have decertified the class and allowed class members to pursue individual tolling arguments, instead of entering judgment for Defendant. Id. at *8. The District Court denied the motion. On Plaintiff's appeal, the First Circuit affirmed. The First Circuit noted that, in its opening brief, Plaintiff did not challenge the express grounds upon which the District Court prominently relied in entering judgment. Without expressing any view on the correctness of the District Court's denial of American Pipe tolling to a second class action, the First Circuit noted that it did not perceive the District Court's reasoning on the issue as clearly or obviously wrong. Id. at *12. Further, although the First Circuit agreed with Plaintiff that, rather than entering judgment against the entire class, the District Court should have decertified the class, the First Circuit read the District Court's orders as doing just that. The District Court denied Plaintiff's request for permission to send notice to the absent class members, and absent such notice, no members of a Rule 23(b)(3) damages class could have been bound by the judgment. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the First Circuit affirmed the order granting summary judgment against Plaintiff.

(xxxi) Exhaustion Principles In Class Actions

Ellis, et al. v. Costco Wholesale Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 67284 (N.D. Cal. May 22, 2015). In this Title VII class action alleging gender discriminations in promotions, one of the named Plaintiffs, Elaine Sasaki, claimed that Defendant failed to promote her from the position of Assistant General Manager to General Manager because of her gender, and that Defendant retaliated against her after making an internal complaint about gender discrimination with the California Department of Fair Employment & Housing ("DFEH"). Id. at *3. Defendant moved for partial summary judgment, arguing that Sasaki's claim was time-barred. Sasaki filed a charge of discrimination with the DFEH on or about March 1, 2005, and according to Defendant, her disparate treatment claims were viable only for events that took place 300 days prior to that date, or May 5, 2004. Sasaki disagreed and argued that she could challenge any GM promotion filed on or after January 3, 2002 because the original named Plaintiff, Shirley Rae Ellis, who initiated this action, filed an administrative complaint 300 days after that date, and thus Sasaki could "piggy-back" on Ellis' original charge. Id. at *5-6. The Court agreed with Sasaki and stated that the Ninth Circuit had held, in Harris v. County of Orange, 682 F.3d 1126 (9th Cir. 2012), that where one class member had timely filed an administrative complaint, then other members of that class might piggy-back on that administrative complaint, thereby satisfying the exhaustion requirement. Id. at *6. The Court thus found that because Ellis filed a class action and timely filed an administrative complaint, other members of the class, including Sasaki, might piggy-back on Ellis' administrative complaint. Id. Defendant attempted to distinguish Harris, and argued that unlike the other class members in Harris, Sasaki had filed her own administrative complaint. The Court, however, found that filing her own administrative compliant did not mean that Sasaki abandoned her charge because she had joined Ellis' action before receiving her right-to-sue letter, and thus initiating a new lawsuit was not necessary. Id. at *8-9. The Court therefore rejected Defendant's contention that Sasaki's claim for disparate treatment was partially time-barred. The Court, however, agreed with Defendant that Sasaki's claim for retaliation was time-barred. Defendant pointed out that Sasaki filed an administrative complaint with the DFEH on March 3, 2013, and thus any retaliation claim preceding May 7, 2012 was time-barred. Id. at *10. The Court noted that Sasaki filed her administrative complaint for disparate treatment on or about March 1, 2005, and she gave no indication for approximately eight years that she intended to follow up on or pursue a retaliation claim. Id. at *15. The Court held that Sasaki had effectively waived the benefit of the "reasonably related" rule when she failed to follow up on any retaliation claim for approximately eight years, and only those failures to promote that took place 300 days prior to her administrative complaint for retaliation were actionable. Id. at *17-21. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion for partial summary judgment. Defendant also moved for summary judgment on the merits of Sasaki's claim arguing that Sasaki offered no evidence to support a prima facie case and that it denied her promotion for the non-discriminatory, non-pretextual reason that she was not qualified. Id. at *24. The Court, however, found evidence sufficient to raise a genuine dispute regarding Sasaki's qualifications and temporal proximity for the actionable retaliation, and therefore denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

(xxxii) Appointment And Selection Of Counsel In Class Actions

Haley, et al. v. Kolbe & Kolbe Millwork Co., Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42584 (W.D. Wis. April 1, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a class action and alleged that Defendant sold them defective windows. Defendant had purchased general liability insurance policies from several insurance companies, which provided that the insurers had the "right and duty to defend the insured against suit seeking damages." Id. at *4-5. Plaintiffs brought this action in February 2014, and subsequently, Defendant tendered its defense to the insurers and forwarded the complaint to them. Defendant also notified the insurers about its choice of Foley & Lardner LLP to represent it in the litigation. Because the insurers did not object to that choice, Defendant proceeded with the defense of the action, while the insurers investigated coverage, and Defendant's counsel began to work on the action. On June 18, 2014, the insurers wrote to Defendant stating that they would "agree to the appointment" of one of two other law firms. By then, Defendant's counsel had performed substantial work on the case including answering the original complaint, preparing initial disclosures, filing a motion for a protective order, conducting internal interviews, reviewing Plaintiffs' discovery responses, and initiating discovery requests. Id. at *8. Defendant therefore responded that the insurers had forfeited their right to choose counsel. The insurers then filed a motion to intervene in this action, which the Court granted on December 10, 2014, stating that the insurers could file a motion for summary judgment on the issue of Defendant's choice of counsel. The parties then filed cross-motions for summary judgment on the issue. Denying summary judgment to the insurers, the Court found that, even assuming that insurers had a right to choose counsel even when they defend an insured under a reservation of rights, Defendant was entitled to summary judgment because the insurers lost whatever right they had through their own inaction. Id. at *13. Although Defendant tendered its defense to the insurers the day after Plaintiffs filed their complaint, the Court noted that the insurers did not object or otherwise place any restrictions on Defendant with respect to their choice of counsel over the course of four months despite Defendant's regular updates on the matter. Even when the insurers informed Defendant, after four months, that they did not want Defendant's chosen counsel, they provided no information about the two law firms they proposed, except for their names. Id. at *14. Further, the insurers did not cite any evidence that they gave Defendant any indication that they wanted to select different counsel until April 22, 2014, when one insurer wrote to Defendant that it was in contact with other carriers to coordinate the defense and discuss the retention of independent counsel, and even then, it did not tell Defendant that its retained counsel would be expected to withdraw in the future. Id. at *16-17. According to the Court, the prejudice to Defendant was not simply a matter of not knowing that the insurers might choose another firm, but rather that the insurers failed to make a selection until Defendant's counsel had already invested significant time and resources into the case. Id. at *17. The Court pointed out that by the time that the insurers filed their motion for summary judgment on the selection of counsel issue, the case had been proceeding for more than ten months. Id. at *21. The Court thus held that it would be impossible to grant the insurers' motion without causing substantial prejudice to Defendant or completely resetting the case's schedule, and it would not be fair to Defendant, or Plaintiffs, to allow the insurers to stall the proceedings by substituting new counsel. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

In Re Enzymotec Ltd. Securities Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 25720 (D.N.J. Mar. 3, 2015). In this securities class action alleging violations of the Securities Act of 1933 and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, the Court granted Plaintiff Enzymotec Investor Group's ("EIG") motion for appointment as lead Plaintiffs and approval of their selection of counsel, and denied Plaintiff 3B Communications' ("3B") competing motion. Id. at *2. The Court noted that the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act ("PSLRA") creates a detailed procedure that must be followed by any party seeking to be named lead Plaintiff in a securities class action. In lieu of that rule, the PSLRA requires the Court to adopt a rebuttable presumption that the most adequate Plaintiff is the group or group of persons that has the largest financial interest in the outcome of the litigation and otherwise satisfies the requirements of Rule 23. Id. at *4. The Court found no dispute that 3B possessed the largest financial interest in the outcome of the litigation, and that 3B made a prima facie showing of the typicality and adequacy requirements of Rule 23. Id. at *5. EIG, however, argued that 3B's certification, which 3B filed with its motion pursuant to 15 U.S.C. § 78u-4(a)(2)(A), was defective because it failed to demonstrate the authority of the signer to take action on 3B's behalf. Id. at *6. EIG posited that 3B's deficient certification would subject it to a unique defense that rendered 3B incapable of adequately representing the class, and thus 3B was not the presumptively most adequate lead Plaintiff. Id. The Court agreed with EIG, and observed that 3B's certification could be subject to attack because it provided no indication that its signer was authorized to sign the certification on 3B's behalf. Id. at *6-8. Further, the Court observed that nowhere in 3B's certification did the signer identify himself or provide any indication of his role within 3B. Id. at *8-9. The Court found that EIG met the threshold elements required to demonstrate entitlement to the PSLRA's rebuttable presumption. Id. at *10. Specifically, the Court found that EIG possessed the second largest financial interest in the litigation, EIG's claims were typical of the class, and that EIG would adequately represent the class. Although 3B argued that the members of EIG bore no relation to one another, the Court relied on the proposition that there is nothing in the PSLRA preventing even a group of unrelated persons from serving as lead Plaintiff. Id. at *10-11. In addition, 3B identified no defense unique to EIG that would render them inadequate lead Plaintiffs. The Court also found EIG's selection of counsel clearly acceptable, as the firm's biographies disclosed a wealth of experience in litigating securities class actions. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court granted EIG's motion for appointment as lead Plaintiff and approval of its selection of counsel.

Lusk, et al. v. Life Time Fitness, Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-1911 (D. Minn. July 10, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants undervalued Life Time Fitness Inc.'s stock shares in a transaction in which the company was going private, in violation of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. Plaintiff Matthew Lusk and movant St. Clair County Employees' Retirement System had each filed a motion to be appointed lead Plaintiff in the case. Lusk commenced the action in federal court in April, 2015. Movant St. Clair had not filed a separate case in federal court, but had filed a state action in Minnesota, also alleging claims arising out of the same transaction. Id. at 2. Both parties owned shares with Defendants prior to the transaction. Matthew Lusk was an individual shareholder and St. Claire was an institutional investor. Id. at 3. St. Claire had a significantly greater financial stake in the outcome of the action. Lusk contended St. Clair was not the most adequate Plaintiff because St. Clair started the state court action in the name of Defendants as a shareholder derivative action. Id. at 3-4. Thus, Lusk argued that St. Clair and its counsel acted on behalf of Defendants in the state case, but sought to litigate against the company in this federal action, creating an inherent conflict of interest. Id. at 4. St. Clair asserted that that the rebuttal argument was illusory because Defendants had already been merged out of existence, effectively terminating the equity interests of shareholders and mooting any derivative claims. St. Clair also contended that none of the class members presented any proof of conflict, and that it would dismiss the state court action in the event of its appointment as lead Plaintiff in this case. Id. Lusk alternatively moved for his appointment as co-lead Plaintiff and approval of his selected law firms as co-lead counsel and liaison counsel, arguing that the combination of an individual investor and an institutional investor would insure representation for all class members. Id. The Magistrate Judge found that although St. Clair was presumptively the most adequate Plaintiff due to its significantly greater financial interest in the outcome of the case, both Lusk and St. Clair satisfied the typicality and adequacy prerequisites of Rule 23. The Magistrate Judge observed that despite that presumption, St. Clair faced a possible conflict of interest defense which might well become manifest at the class certification stage of the action. Id. The Magistrate Judge remarked that it was not the Court's intent to foreclose arguments against class certification, but the Court had an interest in managing and maintaining the orderly progression of the case. Id. at 4-5. Thus, the Magistrate Judge held that the appointment of Lusk and St. Clair as co-lead Plaintiff would best protect the interests of both individual and institutional class members and deter any interruption in the litigation arising out of a conflict of interest challenge to class representation. Id. at 5. The Magistrate Judge concluded that a combination of investors as co-lead Plaintiffs would represent a broader range of shareholder interests than if only one or the other type of investor was appointed. Id. at 7.

Microsystems Development Technologies, Inc., et al. v. Panasonic Corp.*, Case No. 15-CV-3820 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of direct and indirect purchasers, brought an antitrust class action against several Defendants alleging violation of the Sherman Act, the Cartwright Act, California's Unfair Competition Law, and other states' laws by conspiring to raise, fix, or stabilize the price of resistors. Plaintiffs sub-divided their class claims for both direct purchasers and indirect purchasers. Plaintiffs requested appointment of two separate lead counsel to represent both the direct purchaser Plaintiffs and the indirect purchaser Plaintiffs. Multiple law firms sought appointment as lead counsel. After a hearing, the Court appointed the law firms of Cohen Milstein Sellers & Toll PLLC and Hagens Berman Sobol Shapiro LLP as lead counsel for the direct purchaser Plaintiffs, and Cotchett, Pitre & McCarthy, LLP as counsel for the indirect purchaser Plaintiffs. Pursuant to Rule 23(g), the Court found that the three law firms were highly skilled in complex litigation, and had conducted extensive investigations of the antitrust claims in the litigation. Id. at 4-5. The firms also had submitted "a prosecution plan with specific case management proposals to minimize duplication of efforts and ensure oversight." Id. at 6. Based on the available resources and their proposals to simplify case management and minimize costs, the Court selected the three law firms as lead counsel.

(xxxiii) Workplace RICO Class Actions

Brink, et al. v. Continental Insurance Co.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 9112 (D.C. Cir. June 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of civilian government contractor employees, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants engaged in an elaborate and fraudulent scheme to deny Defense Base Act ("DBA") medical benefits to thousands of civilian contractor employees for the injuries they suffered in Iraq and Afghanistan. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendants discriminated or retaliated against them for asserting such claims in violation of the Longshore and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act ("LHWCA"), the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO"), and several state laws. The District Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claims. The District Court held that Plaintiffs' state law causes of action arose out of their underlying claims to DBA benefits and, therefore, the exclusive scheme set forth in the DBA and LHWCA barred those claims. Id. at *6. The District Court similarly held that the comprehensive statutory scheme barred Plaintiffs' RICO claims as well as their discrimination and retaliatory discharge claims arising under the LHWCA. Id. On appeal, the D.C. Circuit affirmed the dismissal of Plaintiffs' RICO and LHWCA claims. The dismissal, however, did not preclude any individual Plaintiffs from bringing independent claims outside of the DBA's statutory scheme. Id. at *2. At the outset, the D.C. Circuit found that the statutory scheme of the DBA and LHWCA contained exclusive remedies, which left no room for Plaintiffs' RICO claims. Id. at *14. Although Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants violated RICO by conspiring to misrepresent information related to DBA claims, and by denying claims using fraud, the D.C. Circuit found that § 931 of the LHWCA (which the DBA incorporated) already provided a remedy for the alleged misconduct. Id. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendants violated RICO by conspiring to delay payments to providers or to claimants and to stop payments on checks. Id. at *15. The D.C. Circuit, however, found that § 914 of the LHWCA, as incorporated by the DBA, already provided a penalty for employers who make untimely payments. Thus, there was no room for a RICO claim based on delayed or stopped compensation payments. Id. Further, even if the statutory scheme left room for Plaintiffs' RICO claims, the D.C. Circuit agreed with the District Court that Plaintiffs failed to state a cause of action under RICO. Id. at *15-16. The D.C. Circuit found that Plaintiffs did not allege any facts establishing required elements of a RICO enterprise, including: (i) a common purpose among the participants; (ii) organization; and (iii) continuity. Id. at *16. Plaintiffs also failed to plead predicate acts with particularity to satisfy Rule 9(b). Id. Neither Plaintiffs' mail nor wire fraud claims contained any reference to specific fraudulent statements, who made the statements, what was said, when or where the statements were made, and how or why the alleged statements were fraudulent. Id. The D.C. Circuit concluded that the District Court did not err in dismissing Plaintiffs' RICO claims, and accordingly, affirmed the District Court's order of dismissal.

Torres, et al. v. S.G.E. Management, LLC,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 17974 (5th Cir. Oct. 16, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of Independent Associates ("IAs"), brought a class action under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO") alleging that Defendants induced them to participate in an illegal pyramid scheme causing them to suffer monetary losses. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs paid a fee to participate in Defendant Ignite's multi-level marketing program to market Defendant Stream Energy's electricity services to potential customers. Id. at *3-4. An IA's success depended primarily on recruiting other IAs who, in turn, recruit other IAs and customers into the Ignite program. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs alleged that they were defrauded into thinking that Ignite was a legitimate enterprise, but it was instead an illegal pyramid scheme, whereby the real aim was not to sell Stream Energy products and services, but to recruit others to become IAs and collect fees. Id. at *8-9. Alleging that Defendants violated the RICO, Plaintiffs moved to certify a class action for victims of the alleged pyramid scheme. The District Court certified the class, concluding that, although Plaintiffs could not establish class-wide reliance on any particular misrepresentation, the jury could infer reliance based on the fraudulent and illegal nature of Defendants' pyramid scheme. Id. at *8. On Defendants' appeal, the Fifth Circuit disagreed and decertified the class. While Plaintiffs' theory of reliance depended on the premise that a pyramid scheme was a unique type of fraud, the Fifth Circuit found that reliance could not be inferred merely because a business was alleged to be a pyramid scheme, particularly when the record suggested that Defendants told the investors that it was a pyramid scheme. Id. at *21-25. The Fifth Circuit held that Plaintiffs' evidence did not support a sufficient inference of reliance. The Fifth Circuit reasoned that an investor could reasonably choose to knowingly invest in a pyramid scheme in the hope that they would make make money as a pyramid scheme provides an opportunity for those at the top of the pyramid to profit from their investments. While many IAs might have decided to invest in the scheme in the belief that it was legal, the Fifth Circuit noted that it was equally possible that many of the IAs chose to invest in the scheme in the belief that, legal or illegal, it provided them with an opportunity to make money. Id. at *35-36. The Fifth Circuit thus found that Plaintiffs would have to rely upon individualized proof to establish reliance. As to Plaintiffs' argument that class members would not have knowingly joined an illegal scheme, the Fifth Circuit observed that Plaintiffs cited no case law that has adopted such an elevated view of human nature, and thus there could be no class-wide inference that, merely because the enterprise was an alleged pyramid scheme, no individual would have rationally joined it had he or she known about the scheme. Id. at *34. The Fifth Circuit therefore concluded that the District Court erred in the certifying the class and accordingly vacated the certification order.

(xxxiv) Public Employee Class Actions

Bargsley, et al. v. United States,* 2015 U.S. Claims LEXIS 454 (Fed. Cl. April 17, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of military veterans, brought a putative class action pursuant to the Tucker Act, alleging that the Department of the Navy failed to promptly implement a Department of Defense directive requiring it to determine "combat-related" separation of sailors and marines. Prior to 2008, the law prohibited veterans of the U.S. military from receiving both disability severance pay and the disability compensation of the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs ("VA"). However, in 2008, the National Defense Authorization Act, 10 U.S.C. § 1212(d), required the military to determine if any disabilities leading to separation from service were "combat-related," and provided that, if found combat-related, then the veterans would be entitled to both disability severance payment and monthly disability compensation from the VA. Id. at *5-6. The Army and Air Force promptly implemented the law, but the Navy and Marine Corps did not. By the time they began to implement it on a prospective basis, they had medically separated many sailors and marines, including Plaintiffs, without determining their combat-related disability, and consequently, the VA improperly recouped Plaintiffs' disability severance pay from their VA disability compensation. Plaintiffs alleged that their separation was due to combat-related disabilities, and that their separation forms did not reflect this. Plaintiffs sought correction of the forms and the repayment of the funds withheld from their VA disability compensation. Plaintiffs premised their sole claim for relief on § 1212(d), which describes when, how, and from whom the government can recoup an award of disability severance pay. Id. at *35. Defendant moved to dismiss asserting lack of jurisdiction, and the Court of Federal Claims granted the motion. The Court of Federal Claims agreed with Defendant that § 1212(d) concerned the reduction of disability compensation awarded by the VA, and that only the VA was statutorily authorized to adjudicate claims related to veterans' benefits. Id. at *38. The Court of Federal Claims rejected Plaintiffs' argument that § 1212(d) concerned the reduction and ultimate recoupment of the disability severance pay awarded by the military and not the reduction of disability compensation awarded by the VA. Id. The Court of Federal Claims noted that, under the plain language of § 1212(d), the only amounts subject to reduction were amounts the VA awarded, and thus it could not be read to protect the reduction of anything other than compensation paid by the VA, including the reduction of disability severance pay. Id. at *39. Because Plaintiffs' premised their sole claim for relief on § 1212(d), the Court of Federal Claims determined that the appropriate forum for Plaintiffs' claim was VA. According to the Court of Federal Claims, the comprehensive, integrated scheme for the administrative and judicial review of claims for veterans' benefits set forth in Title 38 of the United States Code preempted the Court of Federal Claims' jurisdiction to entertain claims concerning the reduction of VA disability compensation pursuant to § 1212(d). Id. at *47. The Court of Federal Claims therefore concluded that it lacked jurisdiction over the § 1212(d) claim, and accordingly, granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Medici, et al. v. City Of Chicago,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 145655 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 27, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of patrol officers with the Chicago Police Department (the "CPD"), brought an action alleging that the City of Chicago infringed on their First Amendment rights in violation of 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Plaintiffs claimed that the CPD changed its uniform policy, requiring the on-duty officers representing the CPD, whether in uniform, conservative business attire, or casual dress, to cover any tattoos on the hands, face, neck, and other areas not covered by clothing, with skin tone adhesive bandages or tattoo covers (the "Tattoo Policy"). Id. at *2. Plaintiff sought a declaratory judgment that the Tattoo Policy violated the First Amendment. The City moved to dismiss the complaint, which the Court granted. At the outset, the Court noted that a government employer can enact certain restraints on the speech of its employees that would be unconstitutional if applied to the general public. Id. at *6. The Court found that Plaintiffs' tattoos were a form of personal expression, and not a form of speech on matters of public concern. Id. at *7. The Court observed that when an individual decides to place a symbol or design on his or her body, he or she is engaging in the form of personal expression, rather than a form of commentary on the interests of the public. Id. Under the circumstances of this case, the Court found that when an on-duty police officer publicly displays any tattoo, it might cause members of the public to question whether allegiance to their welfare and safety was paramount. Id. at *11. Thus, the Court concluded that the Tattoo Policy furthered the CPD's interest in ensuring that professionalism and uniformity was maintained. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted the City's motion to dismiss.

(xxxv) Injunctions In Class Actions

Addington, et al. v. US Airline Pilots Association,* Case No. 13-CV-471 (D. Ariz. Sept. 22, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action challenging Defendant's ability to combine the East and West pilots into a single seniority regime after the America West/US Airways merger and sought for an injunction to prevent any person or entity acting on behalf of former US Airway pilots from advocating something other than the Nicolau Award – a precedent from a previous arbitration ruling – in the pending seniority integration arbitration. Id. at 1. The National Mediation Board had certified the Allied Pilots Association ("APA") as the exclusive collective bargaining representative for all pilots for the merged airline, called New American. New American pilots could not agree on an integrated seniority list and therefore the seniority matter proceeded to arbitration, and the APA designated separate committees to advocate on behalf of discrete groups of pilots in the arbitration proceeding. Id. at 2. Accordingly, the American Airlines Pilots Seniority Integration Committee, the USAPA Merger Committee, and the West Piltos' Merger Committee were set to participate in the seniority list integration arbitrations. On June 26, 2015, the Ninth Circuit found that the USAPA violated its duty of fair representation in conducting the seniority integration of US Airways and enjoined USAPA from participating in the McCaskill-Bond seniority integration proceedings, including any seniority-related discussions leading up to those proceedings, except to the extent that USAPA advocated the Nicolau Award. Id. Consequently, the USAPA Merger Committee sent notice to the arbitration panel that USAPA would no longer be participating in the arbitration. The APA then appointed a new East Pilots Merger Committee and scheduled arbitration proceedings for September 29, 2015. Plaintiffs sought to enjoin USAPA, APA, and their officers, agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, and those persons in active concert or participation with them from taking any action on behalf of legacy US Airways East pilots in the McCaskill-Bond proceedings, including any seniority-related discussions leading up to those proceedings, except to the extent that they advocated the Nicolau Award. Id. at 5. Defendants, including APA, opposed the proposed injunction as too broad. Whereas the District Court found that an injunction prohibiting USAPA from participating in the arbitration unless it advocated the Nicolau Award appeared necessary pursuant to the Ninth Circuit's mandate, it disagreed that the injunction explicitly should reach parties other than USAPA. Id. at 8-9. Although the new East Pilots Merger Committee was using the same lawyers and experts that the USAPA Merger Committee had planned to use, the Court found no evidence in the record to show that the new East Pilots Merger Committee was USAPA with a different nametag, or that it was directly or indirectly operating under USAPA's control. Id. at 10. Plaintiffs argued that, regardless of any connection between the new committee and USAPA, the new committee should be prohibited from arguing something other than the Nicolau Award. The Court disagreed, pointing out that the Ninth Circuit explicitly had refused to order such relief while entering an injunction against USAPA for its clear misdeeds, and Plaintiffs failed to explain why they were entitled to an injunction against non-parties to remedy USAPA's harmful activity. Id. at 10-11. The Court explained that an injunction against every representative of the East Pilots would be an injunction requiring a remedy against entities and individuals with no connection to USAPA beyond past membership. Id. at 11. The Court, therefore, concluded that the injunction should not explicitly reach non-parties but only members of the new committee, if any, working in concert with USAPA. Id. at 12. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' request for a broad injunction.

Melendres, et al. v. Arpaio,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 6110 (9th Cir. April 15, 2015). In this class action brought against Defendants, the Sheriff and the Maricopa County Sheriff's office, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants maintained a custom, policy, and practice of racially profiling Latino drivers and passengers, and of stopping them pre-textually under the auspices of enforcing federal and state immigration-related laws, in violation of federal constitutional and statutory law. The Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's post-trial injunction against Defendants. After a bench trial, the District Court had concluded that Defendants employed an unconstitutional policy of using race as a factor in determining where to conduct patrol operations, in deciding whom to stop and investigate for civil immigration violations, and in prolonging the detentions of Latinos while confirming their immigration status. Id. at *6. The District Court therefore had permanently enjoined Defendants from detaining, holding, or arresting Latino occupants of vehicles in Maricopa County using race or Latino ancestry as a factor and detaining them for a period longer than reasonably necessary. Id. at *7. A supplemental permanent injunction required Defendants to increase training, improve traffic-stop documents, develop an early identification system for racial profiling problems, enhance supervision and evaluation of deputies, and improve reporting of misconduct complaints. Id. at *9. The supplemental injunction also directed the appointment of an independent monitor to assess and report on Defendants' implementation of the original and supplemental injunctions. Id. The injunction applied across the board to all law enforcement activity within Defendants' office. Defendants appealed, challenging the scope of the injunction insofar it applied to Defendants' conduct outside saturation patrols. Defendants maintained that the evidence did not support the District Court's finding that Defendants' constitutional violations occurred during regular, non-saturation patrols. Id. at *10. Defendants also asserted that several terms of the injunction were broader than necessary to cure the constitutional violations found by the District Court, that the named Plaintiffs lacked standing to represent the claims of unnamed class members stopped, detained, searched or questioned outside of a saturation patrol, and that the class should be partially decertified and limited to Latino vehicle occupants stopped, detained, searched, or questioned during a saturation patrol. Id. at *10-11. The Ninth Circuit found that Plaintiffs had standing because their claims did not implicate a significantly different set of concerns than the unnamed Plaintiffs' claims. Id. at *18-19. The Ninth Circuit noted that the operative set of concerns was that the constitutional violations flowed from Defendants' policies that the District Court found to apply across the board to all traffic stops, not just to those conducted during saturation patrols. Id. at *20. Because the impermissible activity extended beyond saturation patrols and amounted to system-wide constitutional violations, the Ninth Circuit held that it was proper to extend the injunction to all patrols, and that the District Court did not err in holding that the named Plaintiffs had standing to assert the claims of absent class members whom Defendants stopped during non-saturation patrols. Id. at *22-23. The Ninth Circuit also ruled that the injunction was not overbroad because the District Court had the discretion to develop policies that would remedy conditions that did not explicitly violate the Constitution or did not flow from such a violation. Id. at *26-29. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's order granting an injunction against Defendants.

(xxxvi) FACTA And FDCPA Class Actions

Altman, et al. v. J.C. Christensen & Associates, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 7980 (2d Cir. May 14, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant, a debt collector, violated the Fair Debt Collections Practices Act ("FDCPA") by offering to settle his debt for less than the full amount without warning him that his total savings might be reduced by an increase in his tax liability. Plaintiff received a letter from Defendant, which stated that Plaintiff's Bank of America FIA Card Services N.A. account had an outstanding balance of $6,068,13 and Defendant was contracted for the recovery efforts of his delinquent account. Id at *2. The letter also stated that to resolve the matter, Defendant was authorized to negotiate generous settlement terms and offered to: (i) settle the account for a lump-sum payment of $3,155.43, which was a savings of 48% on the outstanding account balance; (ii) extend the time and settle the account in three payments of $1,314.76, which was a savings of $2,123.85 on the outstanding account balance; or (iii) further extend the time and pay the balance in full in 12 payments of $505.68. Id at *3. Plaintiff alleged that the language in the letter was deceptive because the forgiven debt might be taxable under the Internal Revenue Code, and any savings could be less than the amount represented in the letter once taxes were taken into account. The District Court found that Defendant need not warn of possible tax consequences when making a settlement offer for less than the full amount owed to comply with the FDCPA. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed. Id. at *2. The Second Circuit noted that the FDCPA bars the use of false or misleading representations or means in connection with the collection of debt. Id. at *5. Plaintiff argued that by specifying that the savings that he would enjoy if he accepted one of the choices set forth in the letter without warning him that any savings might be off-set by possible tax consequence, Defendant violation the FDCPA. Plaintiff relied on Ellis v. Cohen & Slamowitz, LLP, 701 F. Supp. 2d 215 (N.D.N.Y. 2010), which allowed a similar claim to survive a motion to dismiss. In Ellis, Plaintiff argued that a letter from a debt collector offering to discount or give forgive part of debt, without notifying him of the possible tax consequences, violated the FDCPA. The Second Circuit found that Ellis was unpersuasive because the letter at issue here stated that the percentage saved was on his outstanding account balance.

Id. at *6. The Second Circuit explained that the fact that a debtor may have to pay tax on the amount saved was simply not deceptive in the context of what the savings were on a debtor's outstanding account balance. Id. The Second Circuit cited to case law authority that held that the language of the FDCPA does not require a debt collector to make any affirmative disclosures of potential tax consequences when collecting a debt. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's order of dismissal.

Beauvoir, et al. v. Israel,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 12535 (2d Cir. July 24, 2015). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant, an attorney representing National Grid New York ("National Grid"), sent them a letter stating that National Grid referred the matter to him for the purposes of collection of a debt based upon the consumption of unmetered gas at their residence. Plaintiffs alleged that although the letter advised them of their right to dispute the claim, it did not advise them that they had 30 days to do so or state the amount of the debt. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs contended that these omissions violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA"). Separately, National Grid sued Plaintiffs in the state court alleging that Plaintiffs diverted and consumed unmetered natural gas. Id. at *4. Defendant moved to dismiss, asserting that Plaintiffs had failed to state an FDCPA claim because Defendant initiated an action concerning an alleged theft of natural gas, and thus, it did not concern a debt as that term is defined in the statute. Id. at *5. The District Court granted the motion, holding that obtaining natural gas through meter tampering was theft, and was outside the scope of the FDCPA. Id. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision. The Second Circuit noted that the FDCPA defined a debt as any obligation or alleged obligation of a consumer to pay money arising out of transaction in which money, property, insurance, or services were the subject of the transaction. Id. at *6-7. The Second Circuit reasoned that liability from theft or torts did not constitute debt within the meaning of the FDCPA. Id. at *7. The Second Circuit thus concluded that Plaintiffs had not plausibly alleged a "debt" within the meaning of the FDCPA. Id. at *8-9. Accordingly, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's order that granted the motion to dismiss.

Buchanan, et al. v. Northland Group, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 517 (6th Cir. Jan. 13, 2015). Plaintiff filed a putative class action under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA"). Plaintiff claimed that Defendant made a settlement offer to Plaintiff to resolve an unpaid debt without disclosing that the statute of limitations had run on the debt and, thereby, falsely implied that Defendant could enforce the debt by law. Id. at *4. Plaintiff also claimed that Defendant failed to disclose that a partial payment on a time-barred debt restarts the statute of limitations under Michigan law. Id. The District Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss, concluding that the letter was not misleading as a matter of law. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit reversed. The Sixth Circuit noted that the FDCPA bans all false, deceptive, or misleading debt collection practices and protects all consumers from practices that would mislead the reasonably unsophisticated consumer. Id. at *5-6. First, the Sixth Circuit held that whether the letter is misleading raised a question of fact and that the District Court should have rejected such a fact-based claim only after drawing all reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor and concluding that Plaintiff failed to allege a plausible theory of relief. Id. at *7-8. The Sixth Circuit found that Plaintiff's theory was sufficiently plausible such that she deserved an opportunity to prove her case. Plaintiff identified an expert in the area, Dr. Timothy E. Goldsmith, a professor of psychology, who planned to testify about consumers' attitudes toward, and their understanding of, time-barred debt. The Sixth Circuit concluded that the District Court should have ascertained on summary judgment – not through a motion to dismiss – whether it should resolve Plaintiff's claim as a matter of law. Id. at *9. Second, the Sixth Circuit opined that Plaintiff offered a plausible theory of consumer deception and confusion that nudged her claims across the line from conceivable to plausible. Formal and informal dictionaries alike contain a definition of "settle" that refer to concluding a lawsuit, and Wiktionary defines "settlement agreement" as a contractual agreement between parties to actual or potential litigation by which each party agrees to a resolution of the underlying dispute. Id. at *12. The Sixth Circuit, therefore, found it plausible that a settlement offer falsely could imply that the underlying debt was enforceable by law. Id. Another problem with the letter was that an unsophisticated debtor who could not afford the settlement demand nevertheless could assume from the letter that some payment was better than no payment. The general rule in Michigan, however, is that partial payment restarts the statute of limitations, giving the creditor a new opportunity to sue for the full debt. Therefore, paying anything less than the settlement demand would expose a debtor to substantial new risk. Id. at *13. The Sixth Circuit noted that this point almost assuredly was not known to most people, whether sophisticated, reasonably unsophisticated, or unreasonably unsophisticated, and it was not hard to imagine how attempts to collect time-barred debt might mislead consumers into trying their best to repay. Id. at *13-14. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit reversed the District Court's order dismissing the complaint.

Foley, et al. v. Buckley's Great Steaks, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 46477 (D.N.H. April 9, 2015). In this putative class action, Plaintiff alleged that Defendants issued approximately 32,000 electronically printed point-of-sale credit card receipts that included the card's expiration date in violation of the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act. Plaintiff moved for class certification, which the Court denied. Defendants first argued that Plaintiff did not satisfy the adequacy requirement of Rule 23(a)(4). Defendants did not suggest that there was a conflict of interest between Plaintiff and the other members; instead, they focused on: (i) Plaintiff's lack of knowledge and her passivity as a litigant; and (ii) a lack of credibility that manifested itself at her deposition. Id. at *6-7. With regard to Plaintiff's knowledge, Defendants pointed to her testimony that her communications with counsel had been limited to two telephone conversations and two e-mails; she did not learn until her deposition that her complaint had been amended; she engaged in no research to determine her counsel's qualifications; and she knew nothing about the terms of a proposed settlement agreement before it was submitted to Defendants and the Court until it was produced at her deposition. Id. at *7. Defendants relied on Berger v. Compaq Computer Corp., 257 F.3d. 475 (5th Cir. 2001), which applied a test for the adequacy requirement focusing on the zeal and competence of the class representative's counsel, and the willingness and ability of the class representative to take active role in and control the litigation to protect the interests of the absent class members. Id. at *7-8. The Court noted that in Carrier v. American Bankers Life Assurance Co. of Florida, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8603 (D.N.H. Feb. 1, 2008), the Court observed that the Berger standard had not been adopted in the First Circuit. In Carrier, the Court found that the class representative need not have expert knowledge of the subject matter of the suit as long as the representative had not abdicated control of the case to counsel, and maintained sufficient involvement in the case. Id. at *8-9. In Carrier, the Court held that two Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that they understood how to fulfill their duty to protect the interests of the class because the witnesses failed to answer questions such as what they would do if there was a conflict of interests between the class counsel and the class. Id. at *9. Similarly, in this case, the Court noted that Plaintiff was not aware of the full extent of her responsibilities, or her duty to protect the class against conflicting interests. Id. at *11-12. Moreover, the Court opined that Plaintiff's deposition testimony demonstrated that she had minimal involvement in her case. Id. at *12. In sum, the Court concluded that even under the less stringent standard in Carrier, rather than the Berger standard, Plaintiff failed to satisfy the adequacy requirement. Defendants next argued that a class action was not superior to individual litigation because the threat of the exorbitant damages that Plaintiff sought would leave Defendants with no choice but to shut down their operations, and destroy a business that provided livelihood to 50 individuals. Id. at *16. The Court accepted Defendant's position. It ruled that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate that a class action was superior because the proposed class would be difficult to manage because it was not ascertainable that a successful individual action would provide her with costs and attorneys' fees, and the proposed class action appeared to be substantially more attorney-driven than client-driven. Id. at *24. Accordingly, the Court declined to certify the class action.

Legg, et al. v. Laboratory Corp. Of America Holdings*, Case No. 14-CV-61543 (S.D. Fla. Nov. 10, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant systematically printed debit and credit card transaction receipts that revealed the expiration dates of the cards used in transactions in willful violation of the Fair and Accurate Credit Transaction Act ("FACTA"), 15 U.S.C. § 1681c(g)(1). Plaintiff alleged that Defendant violated the FACTA by printing the credit and debit card information on receipts after customers paid for their lab tests. As a result, Plaintiff asserted that he and the class members were exposed to higher risk of identity theft. After discovery, the parties agreed to a class settlement of $11 million, and Plaintiff filed a motion for preliminary approval and certification of a settlement class. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion.

Editor's Note: The settlement class in Legg was estimated at 665,000 class members. The $11 million settlement is believed to be the largest cash settlement ever under the FACTA.

McMahon, et al. v. LVNV Funding,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 21223 (7th Cir. Dec. 8, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA") by seeking to collect or settle debts that were not legally enforceable because the statute of limitations had run. Plaintiff sought to certify a class of people who had received misleading dunning letters from Defendant, which the District Court denied. Id. at *1. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit vacated and remanded the District Court's order. Id. The Seventh Circuit noted that Plaintiff had first appealed in McMahon v. LVNV Funding, LLC, 744 F.3d 1010 (7th Cir. 2014) ("McMahon I"), challenging the District Court's dismissal of his class claims under Rule 12(b)(6) and the conclusion that his individual claims were rendered moot by a settlement offer. Id. In McMahon I, the Seventh Circuit reversed the District Court's judgment that Plaintiff's individual claims were moot and further concluded that the class allegations had been incorrectly dismissed. Id. Here, Plaintiff argued that the District Court erred by ruling that the need for individual damages determinations justified denying class certification. Id. at *6. At the outset, the Seventh Circuit noted that the need for individual proof alone did not necessarily preclude class certification. Id. at *7. The Seventh Circuit observed that, if a case required determinations of individual issues of causation and damages, a District Court may bifurcate the case into a liability phase and a damages phase. Id. at *8. The Seventh Circuit also rejected the District Court's analysis that the amount of each class member's actual damages were capable of ministerial determinations, yet the question of causation was not. Id. The Seventh Circuit found that a Plaintiff must prove causation under the FDCPA to establish actual damages. Id. Consequently, the Seventh Circuit held that since actual damages were capable of ministerial determination, causation likewise must be capable of ministerial determination. Id. at *9. Defendant defended the District Court's denial of class certification as a ruling that merely recognized that class certification was problematic where determining membership in the class required an assessment of individual class members. Id. The Seventh Circuit observed that although the class included people who made payments after receiving a dunning letter in violation of the FDCPA, the definition of the proposed class said nothing about their reason for doing so; thus, membership in the sub-class did not hinge on causation. Id. at *10. The Seventh Circuit further held that since the FDCPA is a strict liability statute, members of the class would be entitled to statutory damages for a violation of the law regardless of any actual damages. Id. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit vacated and remanded the District Court's order.

O'Brien, et al. v. Airport Concessions, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5515 (D. Colo. Jan. 16, 2015). Plaintiff, a customer, brought an action alleging that he received a computer-generated cash register receipt from Defendant's store displaying the expiration date of his credit card, which violated the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act ("FACTA"). Subsequently, the parties settled, and the District Court granted final approval to the settlement. Plaintiff moved for attorneys' fees and an incentive award, which the Court granted in part. The settlement provided each class member a 25% discount off their purchase at Defendant's stores on certain days with a maximum discount per class member of $100 per transaction or per day. As the settlement did not provide a common fund to compensate the class members, the Court applied the lodestar method to determine reasonable attorneys' fees. Id. at *3. Regarding a reasonable hourly rate, the Court ordered Plaintiff to explain why it should award more than the rate customarily paid to attorneys in cases brought under the Fair Debt Collection Practice Act ("FDCPA"), and noted that FACTA cases were fundamentally similar to FDCPA cases. Id. at *6. Although, Plaintiff argued that FDCPA cases were typically settled early without significant motions practice, the Court noted that this case also resulted in an early settlement before the filing of a motion for summary judgment or to dismiss. Id. at *7. The Court, however, agreed with Plaintiff that the claim here did merit a greater hourly rate than what was typically awarded in FDCPA litigation, since Plaintiff sued on behalf of a larger class action and the settlement negotiations were relatively complex. Accordingly, the Court used a rate of $250 per hour and adjusted the fee upward to compensate for the novelty and complexity in this case. Id. at *10. Regarding the reasonableness of hours expended on the action, the Court held a hearing and distributed redline comparisons of several filings from this case and another Plaintiff's counsel previously litigated in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois. The Court found substantial similarities between these pleadings and asked Plaintiff's counsel to explain why he required 30 hours to draft documents when it appeared he used a similar template from a previous case. Plaintiff justified the facially excessive billing, arguing that the issues here required substantial amounts of extra research. The Court, however, declined to accept that these revisions took Plaintiff's counsel 30 hours to complete, especially considering counsel's professed 18 years of experience in commercial class action litigation and the fact that electronic research allows attorneys to quickly determine whether cases have been overruled. Id. at *12. The Court also opined that Plaintiff's counsel did not exercise good billing judgment in charging for 16 hours of work on the original motion for attorneys' fees, and found examples of duplicative billing where the associate charged for the same tasks as Plaintiff's counsel. Accordingly, the Court made adjustments to the total hours spent by Plaintiff's counsel, and awarded $73,266 in fees and $2,252.93 in costs. Regarding the incentive award, the Court remarked that the class representative was an average consumer, only familiar with the FACTA truncation requirements from a previous lawsuit, and Plaintiff's counsel did not need any information from the class representative apart from an oral account of the transaction at issue and a receipt that showed a FACTA violation. Id. at *18. Further, the class representative incurred no personal risk by becoming a named Plaintiff. Thus, the Court reduced the class incentive award from $5,000 to $2,500.

Powers, et al. v. Credit Management Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 486 (8th Cir. Jan. 13, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA") and the Nebraska Consumer Protection Act ("NCPA") by using standard-form pleadings to commence consumer debt collection actions in state courts. Plaintiffs alleged, among other things, that Defendant improperly alleged that more than 90 days had elapsed since the presentation of the claim to the consumer and sought pre-judgment interest. The District Court certified four classes of persons sued by Defendant in state courts using standard-form complaints and discovery requests. On Defendant's appeal, the Eighth Circuit reversed, finding that the District Court abused its discretion by failing to conduct the rigorous analysis that Rule 23 requires. First, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant improperly sought pre-judgment interest pursuant to §§ 45-104 and 25-1801 of the Nebraska Revised Statutes. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's standard-form allegations violated § 1692f(1) of the FDCPA because § 45-104 did not apply if the consumer contested the collection lawsuit, in which case Defendant had an unliquidated claim and could not recover pre-judgment interest under § 45-103.02. Id. at *7-8. The Eighth Circuit found that, if Plaintiffs' interpretation of § 45-104 was wrong, then Plaintiffs would lose on this theory, and prompt resolution of the pending cross-motions for summary judgment would have obviated the need for class certification of these claims. On the other hand, if Plaintiffs' state law theory was correct, many individualized inquiries would be required to resolve the class members' claims. The Eighth Circuit reasoned that the records pertaining to every state court collection suit would have to be reviewed to determine: (i) whether Defendant claimed pre-judgment interest under § 45-104; (ii) if claimed, whether Defendant recovered pre-judgment interest under § 45-104, making the alleged violation of FDCPA § 1692f(1) material; (iii) for every material violation, whether the underlying consumer transaction reflected that Defendant had a legitimate claim under § 45-104; and (iv) whether Plaintiffs' legal theory was litigated by the class member and resolved by the state court for issue preclusion purposes. Id. at *9. Second, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's standard-form complaints violated § 1692f(1) because Defendant alleged that more than 90 days had elapsed since the presentation of the claim when, in fact, Defendant had not presented the claim but relied on the original creditor's billing statement. Id. at *13. Even though every standard-form complaint apparently included the 90-day allegation, the Eighth Circuit noted that, if Plaintiffs' state law theory was correct, individualized inquiries would be required. Each class member's state court collection suit would have to be examined to determine whether: (i) Defendant sought pre-judgment interest under § 25-1801; and (ii) if so, whether Defendant personally provided the 90-day presentation or relied on an assignor's billing statement or demand for payment; (iii) Defendant recovered pre-judgment interest, thereby making the alleged FDCPA violation material; and (iv) Plaintiffs' legal theory was litigated by the class member and resolved by the state court for issue preclusion purposes. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit concluded that the standard-form complaint classes did not meet the commonality, predominance, or superiority requirements of Rule 23. Further, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's standard-form discovery instructions confused and misled unsophisticated consumers as to their rights in answering the discovery and demanded irrelevant and highly personal financial information. The Eighth Circuit noted that, where an attorney is interposed as an intermediary between a debt collector and a consumer, it was assumed that the attorney, rather than the FDCPA, would protect the consumer from a debt collector's fraudulent or harassing behavior. Id. at *17.

Thus, applying the competent lawyer standard to discovery requests served on represented debtors during the course of litigation, the Eighth Circuit opined that Plaintiffs' facial invalidity claims did not meet the commonality and predominance requirements of Rule 23. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit reversed the District Court's order granting class certification.

Sykes, et al. v. Mel S. Harris And Associates*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 2057 (2d Cir. Feb. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs brought separate actions alleging that Defendants obtained default judgments against them in New York City civil courts between 2006 and 2010, without serving them a summons and complaint. Id. at *6. Defendants included a debt buyer, a law firm, and a process server. Plaintiffs contended that Defendants obtained those default judgments by: (i) obtaining charged-off consumer debt; (ii) initiating a debt collection action by serving summons and complaint on the purported debtor; and (iii) submitting fraudulent documents in order to obtain a default judgment. Id. Plaintiffs' actions asserted claims under the Fair Debt Collections Practices Act ("FDCPA"), the New York General Business Law ("GBL"), and the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO"). After the actions were consolidated, the District Court certified the class. On Defendants' appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed. At the outset, the Second Circuit noted that the FDCPA was enacted to eliminate abusive debt collection practices by debt collectors. Defendants challenged the District Court's conclusion that liability under the FDCPA can be established irrespective of whether the presumed debtor owes the debt in question. Defendants contended that individual issues would predominate over common issues in this case because the District Court would be forced to confront individual issues with respect to damages, timeliness, and service. Id. at *36. Plaintiffs' complaint sought three kinds of damages, including statutory damages, actual and/or compensatory damages in an amount to be proven at trial, and incidental damages. It was undisputed that statutory damages under GBL § 349 can be assessed on the basis of common proof, as they were capped at $50. Id. at *38. Similarly, the Second Circuit noted that the FDCPA caps class damages at $500,000, and accordingly provides common proof to consider the scope of violations of the FDCPA. Id. The Second Circuit therefore noted that the only individualized damages inquiries that may exist were those related to the return of the money extracted from the class as a result of fraudulent judgments, as well as incidental damages. The Second Circuit remarked that the inquiries into alleged damages were not sufficient grounds on which to conclude that the District Court's determination was an abuse of discretion in finding that individualized damages issues would not predominate in this case. Id. Defendants also suggested that the District Court did not engage in a rigorous analysis of the Rule 23 requirements required at the class certification stage. Defendants contended that the District Court's statement that individualized questions did not preclude a finding of predominance under Rule 23(b)(3) was insufficient to make out the opposite conclusion, i.e., that common questions predominated. The Second Circuit disagreed, and found that the District Court did factor in the individualized questions and had ruled that it did not outweigh other common issues. Id. at *41. The Second Circuit also found that the class action was the superior method of adjudication, and affirmed the order certifying the class.

Walker, et al. v. Greenspoon Marder, P.A.*, Case No. 13-CV-14487 (S.D. Fla. Jan. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of debtors, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA") by attaching misleading notices to foreclosure complaints. Plaintiffs moved for certification of a class of all persons with an address in a county in Florida who were subject to and served with a state court debt collection lawsuit filed by Defendant and issued a notice identical to the notice attached to Plaintiffs' complaint. Id. at 2. The District Court granted the motion. First, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs established numerosity. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant served complaints containing the improper notice to more than 500 individuals residing in Florida, and they provided materials identifying 2,606 Florida residents who received a notice from Defendant. Second, the Court found that the class consisted of individuals who shared a common question of law, i.e., whether the notices identical to that attached to Plaintiffs' complaint violated the FDCPA. Each class member's claim depended on the resolution of that common contention. Id. at 5. Third, the Court determined that Plaintiffs demonstrated typicality. The Court noted that typicality requires special consideration of whether there is a nexus between the class representative's claims or defenses and the common questions of fact or law that unite the class. Id. The Court found that the class included individuals who, like Plaintiffs, received a form notice in connection with Defendant's efforts to foreclose on their properties and that this nexus was sufficient to render Plaintiffs' FDCPA claim typical of the FDCPA claims of the class members. Fourth, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs met the adequacy requirement because Plaintiffs had no substantial conflict of interest with the class and that they would adequately prosecute the action on behalf of the class. Fifth, the Court opined that predominance was satisfied. The Court noted that the allegations of consumer fraud under the FDCPA centered around a common question of fact, namely the receipt of Defendant's form notice, and a common question of law, namely whether that notice violated the FDCPA. Id. at 7. The Court found that no individual questions overshadowed these common questions. Finally, the Court observed that the large number of potential claims – along with the relatively small statutory damages, the desirability of adjudicating these claims consistently, and the probability that individual members would not have a great interest in controlling the prosecution of these claims – all indicated that class treatment was the superior method of adjudication. Id. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied both Rule 23(a) and Rule 23(b) requirements and certified Plaintiffs' proposed class.

Zarichny, et al. v. Complete Payment Recovery Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6556 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 21, 2015). Plaintiff, a college student, brought a putative class action against Defendants, Complete Payment Recovery Services ("CPRS") and its parent company, Fidelity National Information Services ("FIS"), alleging violations of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA") and the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Plaintiff alleged that she rented college textbooks and began receiving a series of calls on her cell phone that were recorded messages from CPRS to collect overdue amounts on two textbooks she had rented but not returned. Plaintiff alleged that she had returned the books and did not owe any money. Plaintiff also alleged that FIS, acting as debt collector, provided her with no information about the alleged debt, placed calls to her through CPRS at unusual and inconvenient times, and did so repeatedly and continuously with the intention of harassing her. Id. at *8-9. Plaintiff brought the lawsuit as a nationwide class action on behalf of all those who allegedly received calls on their cell phones from Defendants to whom Defendants did not send a written notice pursuant to FDCPA, and on behalf of those people who received calls from Defendants without their prior consent as required by the TCPA. Id. at *2. Defendants moved to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiff had failed to allege that FIS placed any calls to her as the TCPA required or acted as a debt collector as the FDCPA defines the role. Id. at *11. Defendants also argued that CPRS' acts might not be imputed to its parent company because Plaintiff had failed to allege that FIS dominated CPRS or that CPRS was either an instrumentality of FIS or a sham corporation. Id. Defendants further maintained that Plaintiff's FDCPA claim against CPRS included only rote recitals of the statute's sub-parts and therefore must be dismissed. Id. at *12. The Court partly granted Defendants' motion. First, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss FIS. The Court noted that Plaintiff alleged no factors that could make FIS responsible for its subsidiary's acts under either the FDCPA or the TCPA. Plaintiff not only had failed to allege that FIS was a debt collector, but also failed to allege that FIS enlisted CPRS to call her or that CPRS acted as FIS' agent in placing the alleged telephone calls. Id. at *14-15. Further, Plaintiff's generalized allegations about FIS' business conduct, including tax collection, call-center operation, and shared executives with CPRS, fell short of the intrusive control required to hold a parent corporation accountable for its subsidiary's action. Id. at *16. The Court therefore dismissed FIS from the action. The Court also granted Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's claim against CPRS pursuant to the FDCPA to the extent Plaintiff had not sufficiently alleged that the calls were placed at a statutorily defined "inconvenient" time. Id. at *19. Plaintiff had conceded that all of the phone calls she received occurred within the statutorily permissible time and offered nothing to support that CPRS was aware of her idiosyncratic circumstances that made those times inconvenient for her. Id. at *20-21. The Court therefore dismissed Plaintiff's claim based on the "inconvenient" time theory. Id. Finally, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's claim that CPRS violated the FDCPA by causing her telephone to ring repeatedly or continuously with the intent to annoy, and her claim that CPRS' voice-mail was confusing and misleading. Id. at *21-22. The Court opined that Plaintiff had failed to meet the threshold level to support a reasonable inference that she has made a plausible claim of an annoying call, and her allegations were devoid of any communications from CPRS that could be reasonably interpreted as anything other than a request that she contact the company about the debt. Id. The Court, however, denied Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's claim that CPRS violated the written notice provision of the FDCPA. The Court ruled that the alleged recorded message left for Plaintiff was plainly a communication, and CPRS should have sent follow-up written notice within five days as the FDCPA required. Id. at *26. Since CPRS did not do so, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's claim based on the FDCPA written notice. Accordingly, the Court partly granted and partly denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

(xxxvii) TCPA Class Actions

Anderman, et al. v. Sprint Spectrum L.P.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 7727 (7th Cir. May 11, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of mobile phone service subscribers, brought a class action under the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") alleging that Defendant made unsolicited phone calls advertising its offers and devices to fit Plaintiffs' needs. Plaintiffs obtained mobile phone service from U.S. Cellular under a renewable two year contract, which was renewed for the last time in 2012, and the contract included an arbitration clause. Id. at *1-2. The contract also provided that U.S. Cellular might assign this agreement without notice to Plaintiffs. Id. at *2. Defendant Sprint Spectrum L.P. ("Sprint") was a mobile service provider. In 2013, U.S. Cellular sold Plaintiffs' service contract to Sprint without any notice. Several months later, Sprint sent a letter to Plaintiffs informing them of the sale and that their mobile service would be terminated on January 31, 2014, because U.S. Cellular's cellphones were not compatible with Sprint's network. After Sprint made several phone calls to Plaintiffs regarding the expiration of the service and about a set of offers, Plaintiffs brought this action. Sprint moved to compel arbitration, which the District Court denied. The District Court reasoned that, since Sprint's contract with Plaintiffs terminated before the phone calls, the legality of the calls could not have arisen from or related to the contract. Id. at *5. Id. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit reversed and remanded. The Seventh Circuit remarked that in order to prevent the loss of all those customers, Sprint made calls to the customers about a set of offers and services available, and, as a result, the calls gave rise to the dispute. Thus, the Seventh Circuit opined that, by stepping into U.S. Cellular's shoes, Sprint established a business relationship that would have been disrupted had it told Plaintiffs only that their services were going to be cut-off, as opposed to calling them an making an offer to substitute an equivalent service. Plaintiffs neither took any of Sprint's calls nor called back; instead, they signed on with another service provider. Id. at *9-10. The Seventh Circuit, therefore, concluded that Sprint's motion to order arbitration should have been granted. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit reversed and remanded the judgment of the District Court.

Grok Lines, Inc., et al. v. Paschall Truck Lines, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124812 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 18, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, a freight-carrier, sent unsolicited faxes to Plaintiff and numerous other unwilling recipients in violation of the TCPA. Id. at *2. The violation of TCPA is punishable by actual damages or statutory damages of $500 per violation. Id. The Court previously dismissed Plaintiff's state law claim for failure to state an adequate claim, and rejected Defendant's argument that the faxes did not constitute unlawful advertisement. Id. The discovery that followed showed that Defendant sent one junk fax to about 180 recipients. Id. The parties eventually engaged in settlement negotiations, and agreed that Defendant would take steps to avoid TCPA violations, but no money would be paid to the class. Id. at *3. The parties also agreed to the payment of attorneys' fees of $98,500 to Plaintiff's counsel and an incentive award of $1,500 to the named Plaintiff, and sought settlement approval from the Court. The Court denied approval, finding the proposed settlement unfair, unreasonable, and inadequate. The Court found that the request of Plaintiff's counsel for the entire settlement fund, except for the $1,500 incentive award to the named Plaintiff, solely on the basis of proposed injunctive relief, offered no prospect of meaningful impact on either the class members' interests or Defendant's future behavior. Id. at *9. While the Court acknowledged that an injunction could be a powerful, long lasting tool secured by a settlement in circumstances where it bars a party from doing something harmful that it has been doing in the past, it pointed out that Plaintiff's counsel missed a fundamental point regarding the action, i.e., that Defendant was accused of sending one junk fax to a large number of companies, not a repeated pattern of behavior that required the Court's intervention. Id. at *10. The record showed that there was no reason to believe that Defendant would send out bulk advertising faxes again, and Plaintiff's counsel was unable to identify any tangible risk of repeated harm to the class. Id. The Court therefore found that the injunction failed to meet a minimal threshold of reasonableness and adequacy for its supposed beneficiaries, the class members. Id. at *18. Beyond the weakness of the injunction, the Court found it unacceptable to allocate zero settlement dollars to class members. Id. at *19. Plaintiff's counsel maintained that meaningful monetary relief under the TCPA was simply not feasible based on Defendant's size and resources. The Court, however, noted that Defendant appeared willing to pay regardless of the recipient, and at $500 per violation and a recipient list of 180, Defendant would be on the hook for $90,000 in statutory damages if the entire class submitted claims, which would mean that $100,000 settlement would fully cover the damages. Id. at *20-21. While the Court acknowledged that leaving just $8,500 for legal fees would be unfair, it also noted that giving the lawyers $98,500 and the class members nothing would be equally unfair. Id. at *21. The Court held that the parties would need to craft an agreement that allocated the settlement fund between Plaintiff's counsel and class members in a manner consistent with legal precedent. Id. at *32-34. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for approval of the class action settlement.

Imhoff Investment, LLC, et al. v. Alfoccino, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 11617 (6th Cir. July 7, 2015). Plaintiff Avio, Inc. (substituted for original Plaintiff Imhoff Investment, LLC), brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by hiring Business to Business Solutions ("B2B") to send unsolicited facsimile advertisements to Plaintiff and a class of similarly-situated individuals. The District Court granted Defendant summary judgment based on: (i) lack of standing because Plaintiff failed to show that anyone actually printed or viewed the faxes; and (ii) Plaintiff's inability to prove Defendant's vicarious liability for B2B's transmission of the faxes. Id. at *5. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Sixth Circuit reversed. The Sixth Circuit found that Plaintiff, as the recipient of Defendant's unsolicited advertising faxes, alleged an injury sufficient to meet Article III standing requirements. Id. at *7-8. The Sixth Circuit found guidance in a recent TCPA case – American Copper & Brass, Inc. v. Lake City Industrial Products, Inc., 757 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2014) – where it expressly rejected the proposition that only the "owner" of the fax machine who received the unsolicited fax had standing to sue. Id. at *8-10. The Sixth Circuit noted that Congress might "enact statutes creating legal rights, the invasion of which creates standing, even though no injury would exist without the statute." Id. at *12. The Sixth Circuit explained that, in American Copper, it found that Congress, through the TCPA, intended to remedy a number of problems associated with junk faxes, including the cost of paper and ink, the difficulty of the recipient's phone line being tied up, and the stress on switchboard systems. Id. The Sixth Circuit, therefore, concluded that printing a fax advertisement was not necessary to suffer a violation of the statutorily-created right to have one's phone line and fax machine free of the transmission of unsolicited advertisements. Id. at *12-13. The Sixth Circuit noted that its decision was consistent with recent TCPA decisions issued by the Eleventh, Seventh, and Eighth Circuits. As to vicarious liability, the Sixth Circuit held that, because Defendant, as a sender of an unsolicited fax advertisement, was subject to direct liability under the TCPA, Plaintiff need not prove vicarious liability. Id. at *15-16. Based on the U.S. Federal Communications Commission's definition of "sender" as the "the person or entity on whose behalf a facsimile unsolicited advertisement is sent or whose goods or services are advertised or promoted in the unsolicited advertisement," the Sixth Circuit explained that direct TCPA liability attaches to the entity whose goods and services are advertised. Id. at *16-17. Because evidence showed that the unsolicited advertisements Plaintiff received from B2B on two occasions in late 2006 advertised or promoted Defendant's goods and services, the Sixth Circuit ruled that Defendant could be directly liable as the sender of the faxes. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit reversed the District Court's order granting summary judgment to Defendant.

In Re Capital One Telephone Consumer Protection Act Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17120 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 12, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the TCPA by using an automatic telephone dialing system and/or an artificial pre-recorded voice to call cell phones in connection with an attempt to collect on a credit card debt without the prior express consent of the recipients. The parties eventually settled the action wherein Defendant agreed to pay $75,455,099 into a settlement fund out of which all eligible class members who made a timely claim would receive their pro rata share. The value of the settlement to class members amounted to $47,700,569, after subtracting notice and administration costs of $5,093,000, requested service awards of $25,000 for the five named Plaintiffs, and requested attorneys' fees of $22,636,530. Id. at *12. The settlement achieved an estimated $34.60 recovery per claimant. Finding the settlement fair, reasonable, and adequate, the Court granted final approval of the class action settlement. The Court noted that the $34.60 per claimant did not seem so miniscule in light of the fact that class members did not suffer any actual damages beyond a few unpleasant phone calls, which they received ostensibly because they did not pay their credit card bills on time. Id. at *20. A group of objectors then contended that class counsel's requested fee was excessive. Class counsel sought an award of attorneys' fees equal to 30% of the settlement fund, and argued that their requested fee was less than the 33.3% fee consistently awarded in TCPA and non-TCPA class action litigation. Id. at *32. The Court disagreed, recalculated the percentage fee sought by class counsel, and found that class counsel sought slightly above 32%, which exceeded the market rate. The Court noted that each of the potential impediments to establishing Defendant's liability, including the class members' alleged consent to be called, only affected class counsel's ability to prove their case on liability and once the risk resulting from such impediments was overcome, class counsel's ability to obtain a large recovery was no longer materially affected by that risk. Id. at *60-61. The Court determined that the risk premium related to class counsel's fees should apply only to the attorneys' fees associated with the initial recovery tier negotiated between class counsel and the sophisticated class members before the case was filed. Id. The Court then analyzed each benchmark set by the Seventh Circuit to estimate the market fee, including data from similar common fund cases where fees were privately negotiated, and it concluded that 20% of the settlement fund would be the appropriate percentage for the class counsel's fee. Id. at *66-67. The Court therefore awarded class counsel $15,668,265 or 20.77% of the entire settlement fund toward attorney fees. The Court also granted requested incentive awards of $5,000 each to the named Plaintiffs finding it consistent with the awards granted by other courts in similar litigation. Id. at *67. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for final approval of the class action settlement.

Meinders, et al. v. Unitedhealthcare, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 15501 (7th Cir. Sept. 1, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action in Illinois state court alleging that Defendant sent him and a number of similarly-situated persons unsolicited faxes advertising Defendant's services in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") and the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Practices Act. Id. at *2. Defendant removed the case and then moved to dismiss the complaint for improper venue. Defendant argued that the alleged junk fax that it allegedly sent Plaintiff was related to a provider agreement entered by Plaintiff with a Defendant-owned entity, ACN Group, Inc., and the provider agreement required Plaintiff to arbitrate his claim in Minnesota. Id. at *2-3. In response, Plaintiff argued that Defendant could not enforce the agreement's arbitration provision because it was neither a party nor a signatory to the provider agreement. Id. at *7. Plaintiff also contended that Defendant did not provide evidentiary support for its claim of ownership of ACN Group and that, even if it had, its ownership theory did not itself confer a right upon Defendant to enforce the arbitration provision. Id. at *8. In its reply, Defendant conceded that it was not a signatory to the Provider argument, but argued that it was entitled to enforce the agreement based on a contractual theory of assumption, and Defendant introduced a declaration of its Chief Executive Officer ("CEO") stating that ACN Group became its wholly-owned subsidiary in 2003 and assumed important obligations under the provider agreement, such as ACN Group's obligation to coordinate and transmit payments to providers. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiff then moved to strike or, in the alternative, for leave to file a sur-reply addressing the assumption theory. The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion, concluding that Defendant was entitled to enforce the agreement's arbitration clause because it assumed important obligations under the provider agreement. Id. After Plaintiff appealed, the Seventh Circuit reversed. Although Defendant submitted a declaration stating that ACN Group became its wholly-owned subsidiary in 2003, and assumed important obligations under the provider agreement, the Seventh Circuit found that Plaintiff did not have a fair and reasonable opportunity to respond to Defendant's reply that introduced the new evidence. According to the Seventh Circuit, once the District Court permitted Defendant to file its reply, it should have granted Plaintiff leave to file a sur-reply responding to Defendant's novel assumption theory and the CEO's declaration. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit reversed the District Court's dismissal order and remanded the action to allow discovery to the extent necessary for Plaintiff to submit a full response to Defendant's declaration and assumption theory. Id. at *12.

Palm Beach Golf Center-Boca, Inc., et al. v. Sarris*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 3630 (11th Cir. Mar. 9, 2015). Plaintiff, a golf equipment store, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, a dental practitioner, sent unsolicited fax advertisements in violation of the TCPA. Plaintiff hired a marketing manager, who in turn hired a Business to Business ("B2B") solution, which allegedly sent 7,085 successful transmissions of an advertising promotion for the dental practice. The District Court granted summary judgment to Defendant, relying on In Re Dish Network, LLC, 28 FCC Rcd. 6574 (2012), where the Federal Communications Commission ("FCC") held that an unsolicited fax constitutes a TCPA violation only by the actual sender of the fax. In other words, the District Court found that Defendant was liable for the acts of its marketing manager under the TCPA on a theory of vicarious liability only if it were established he was an employee acting within the scope of his employment. Id. at *4. Because Plaintiff failed to plead vicarious liability, the District Court concluded that the claim was defective. Id. at *5. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Eleventh Circuit reversed and remanded. Plaintiff first challenged the District Court's finding that it lacked Article III standing. For Plaintiff, the specific injury targeted by the TCPA was the sending of the fax and resulting occupation of the recipient's telephone line and fax machine, and not the fact that no one at Plaintiff's facility actually read or printed the fax. The Eleventh Circuit noted that the TCPA's legislative history showed that the prohibition against sending unsolicited fax advertisements was intended to protect citizens from the loss of the use of their fax machines during the transmission of fax data. Id. at *10. Such types of telemarketing shifted some of the costs of the advertising from the sender to the recipient, and it occupied the recipient's fax machines so that it was unavailable for legitimate business messages while processing and printing the junk fax. Id. Here, although the fax advertisement was neither seen nor printed by any of Plaintiff's employees, the unrefuted record showed that the fax advertisement was successfully transmitted by B2B's fax machine and that the transmission occupied Plaintiff's telephone line and fax machine during that time. Id. at *11-12. This occupation of the fax machine was one of the injuries contemplated under TCPA. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Eleventh Circuit concluded that Plaintiff had Article III standing. The Eleventh Circuit solicited the FCC's position regarding liability for violations of the TCPA's ban on junk faxes in the context of this action. The FCC submitted a letter stating that the Dish Network ruling applied only to the liability for telemarketing calls and neither addressed nor altered its pre-existing regulatory treatment of unsolicited fax advertisements. Id. at *17. Because Dish Network did not address the TCPA's junk-fax ban provision, the Eleventh Circuit ruled that the District Court's reliance on it was misplaced. The Eleventh Circuit observed that the record contained sufficient evidence to support having a jury decide whether the fax was sent on behalf of Defendant. The record showed that Defendant hired a marketing manager to market its dental practice and gave him free reign to do so. Id. at *26. Further, the record demonstrated that Defendant's marketing manager contracted with B2B to initiate a fax advertisement campaign on behalf of the dental practice. Id. Accordingly, the Eleventh Circuit ruled that the District Court erred in granting summary judgment to Defendant.

Roberts, et al. v. Paypal, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 18836 (9th Cir. Oct. 29, 2015). Plaintiff, a customer, brought a putative class action alleging that after adding his cellular telephone number to his PayPal account, Plaintiff received text messages in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Plaintiff alleged that the TCPA restricted calls using an automatic telephone dialing system without prior express consent. Id. at *2. The District Court granted summary judgment to Defendant, finding that Plaintiff had expressly consented to receiving text messages by knowingly providing his cellphone number to Defendant. Id. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed. The Ninth Circuit observed that the Federal Communications Commission's ("FCC's") 1992 Report and Order specified that persons who knowingly release their phone numbers have, in effect, given their permission to be called at the number which they have given, absent instructions to the contrary. Id. The Ninth Circuit found that Plaintiff had expressly consented to text messages from Defendant when he provided his cell phone number. Id. at *3. Furthermore, the Ninth Circuit held that even if Plaintiff believed that Defendant only would contact him on his cell phone about problems with his on-line transactions, that limitation did not apply because he failed to communicate it to Defendant. Id. Defendant contended that the FCC's 1992 Report and Order limited the consent expressed by release of a phone number to normal business communications. Id. The Ninth Circuit reasoned that the FCC's Report was not meant to limit its interpretation of prior express consent, but merely as a support of that interpretation. Id. Finally, the Ninth Circuit remarked that the FCC has since changed its approach to the prior express consent in recent years, but those changes occurred subsequent to the text message and therefore they did not apply retroactively. Id. at *4. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's order.

(xxxviii) The Cy pres Doctrine In Class Actions

Oetting, et al. v. Green Jacobson, P.C.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 306 (8th Cir. Jan. 8, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of shareholders, filed numerous class actions alleging violations of federal and state securities laws after NationsBank and BankAmerica merged to form Bank of America Corp. The District Court certified two classes of NationsBank shareholders and two classes of BankAmerica shareholders, and subsequently, approved a $490 million global settlement. Id. at *1. The District Court also ordered that any remaining balance of the settlement fund shall be distributed cy pres to the Legal Services of Eastern Missouri, Inc. ("LSEM"). Class representatives appealed the cy pres distribution order, arguing that a further distribution to the classes was feasible, and LSEM was unrelated to the classes or the litigation and was therefore an inappropriate cy pres recipient. The Eighth Circuit agreed and reversed the cy pres award. First, the Eighth Circuit observed that a cy pres distribution to a third-party of unclaimed settlement funds is permissible only when it is not feasible to make further distributions to class members, except where an additional distribution would provide a windfall to class members with liquidated damages claims that were 100% satisfied by the initial distribution. Id. at *6-7. Here, because class counsel advised the District Court that the claims administrator would distribute the remaining settlement fund free of charge, the Eighth Circuit opined that a further distribution to the class was clearly feasible. The claims administrator's cost estimate confirmed that lists of class members who received and cashed prior distribution checks existed and would form the basis of a further distribution to the classes. The District Court had previously ordered that no further search needed to be made for class members whose checks were returned undelivered, so that potentially burdensome expense was eliminated. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit opined that the District Court erred in finding that further distributions would be costly and difficult so as to preclude a further distribution, and that it was appropriate to order a cy pres distribution to unrelated third-party charities. Id. at *8. Further, the Eighth Circuit noted that a cy pres distribution is not authorized by declaring that all class members submitting claims have been satisfied in full, and disagreed that class members with unliquidated damage claims in the underlying litigation are fully compensated by payment of the amounts allocated to their claims in the settlement. Id. at *10. The settlement notice to the class stated that the settling parties disagreed as to both liability and damages, and did not agree on the average amount of damages per share that would be recoverable by any of the classes. Thus, the Eighth Circuit remarked that the notion that class members were fully compensated by the settlement was speculative. Further, the Eighth Circuit observed that a cy pres distribution must be for the "next best use" for indirect class benefits, and for uses consistent with the nature of the underlying action and with the judicial function. Id. at *14. The Eighth Circuit opined that although the LSEM was a worthy charity, it was not the next best recipient of unclaimed settlement funds. When approving LSEM, the District Court had found that there was no immediately apparent organization that would indirectly benefit the class members, and that LSEM sufficiently approximated the interests of the class because it served victims of fraud. The Eighth Circuit, however, reasoned that it was not sufficient to find that no next best recipient was immediately apparent, and that a District Court should instead weigh all considerations, and make a thorough investigation into whether a recipient can be found that most closely approximates the class' interests. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit reversed the award of cy pres distribution.

(xxxix) Impact Of Unethical Conduct In Class Actions

Adams, et al. v. United Services Automobile Association*, Case No. 14-CV-2013 (W.D. Ark. Dec. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action against Defendant in Arkansas state court claiming that Defendant had improperly applied depreciation under certain homeowners insurance policies. On January 15, 2014 Defendants removed the case to federal court, where it remained for 17 months. Id. at 1. On June 19, 2015, the parties entered a stipulation of dismissal and the case was dismissed 3 days later on June 22, 2015. Id. The next day, the parties re-filed the case in Arkansas state court along with a motion to preliminarily approve a class action settlement. Id. The settlement agreement was dated June 16, 2015 (while the matter was still pending in federal court) and defined the "court" as the state court. Id. When the federal judge became aware of this case, he issued a sua sponte order to show cause for sanctions based on apparent forum-shopping on behalf of the parties. Id. at 3-4. The Court had previously indicated concern with the settlement terms in a related case and there were terms in the new proposed settlement that might have been disapproved of by the federal judge. These included a claims-made recovery provision with attorneys' fees adding up to 50% of the potential settlement, regardless of the level of claims made by class members. Id. at 4. In addition, the settlement included a clear sailing provision, onerous claims requirements, and a reversionary fund. Id. at 4. The federal judge expressed concern that the parties had had an improper purpose in removing the case and had manipulated the legal process and wasted the Court's resources in doing so. Id. at 5-6. The Court accordingly set a hearing for counsel to respond to the order to show cause.

Editor's Note: The ruling in Adams is extraordinary. The Court noted – at footnote 2 of its decision – that the state proceeding came to his attention by way of a newspaper article. In issuing the show cause order, the Court reasoned that "the ethical problem presented in this case is compounded by counsel's abuse of process in using the Court and its exercise of jurisdiction as a bargaining chip in the negotiation of the ultimately questionable settlement." Id. at 5.

In Re American Express Anti-Steering Rules Antitrust Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102714 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 4, 2015). In this multi-district class action litigation against American Express ("AmEx") over the inclusion of "anti-steering" rules in its merchant acceptance agreements that expressly prohibited merchants from steering transactions to less costly payment cards, the Court rejected Plaintiffs' motion for final approval of the class settlement agreement on the grounds that the leading lawyer for the merchant class compromised the fairness of the settlement. Id. at *3. After the consolidation of series of class actions filed by merchants and consumers against Defendant's anti-steering rules, the Court appointed Gary Friedman, along with two other attorneys, as interim lead counsel for the putative class of merchants. Id. at *17. Friedman also represented certain Plaintiffs in another antitrust suit concerning the credit and charge card industry – a case entitled In Re Payment Card Interchange Fee & Merchant Discount Antitrust Litigation – which alleged that Visa U.S.A. Inc. and MasterCard Inc. conspired to fix interchange fees. Id. at *20-21. In February 2014, the Court granted preliminary approval to the settlement of the claims of the proposed class of AmEx merchants and provisionally certified a class for settlement purposes. The settlement provided no monetary relief to the merchants, but allowed them to impose a surcharge on AmEx users, thereby potentially treating those cardholders differently from other customers. Id. at *23-24. The agreement further allowed class counsel to ask for up to $75 million in fees and expenses. A sizeable number of class members, constituting approximately 20% of the class in terms of charge volume, filed objections to the settlement. Id. at *28. Plaintiffs eventually sought final approval of the class settlement agreement and class counsel moved for an award of attorneys' fees. Before the Court could rule on the fairness of the settlement agreement, new developments came to light. The disclosure ensued as a result of Keila Ravelo's arrest on December 22, 2014 for defrauding two law firms of several million dollars; Ravel, a partner of Willkie, Farr & Gallagher LLP, had served as MasterCard's defense lawyer. Id. at *34. In the course of an internal audit of Ravelo's conduct, Willkie discovered documents in Ravelo's possession that were subject to protective orders entered in this action and various communications with Friedman. These materials showed that Friedman improperly sent e-mails containing confidential information of AmEx that was subject to protective orders to Ravelo, who was counsel for MasterCard, AmEx's major competitor and not a party to the protective orders. Id. at *52. Friedman also improperly disseminated confidential information and attorney work-product of Plaintiffs to Ravelo and consulted with her on strategic issues, including the negotiations for the proposed settlement. Id. at *55. The Court found that these disclosures violated the fiduciary duty owed by Friedman to the class members and showed him to be an inadequate representative of the class. Id. at *55-56. The Court further found that Friedman's decision to exchange confidential and privilege information with MasterCard's counsel and bringing Ravelo into the negotiations process created a conflict between class members and class counsel, and a risk that Friedman negotiated settlement terms that were worse for the class than terms he might have negotiated absent the conflict. Id. at *68-73. The Court concluded that this risk required it to deny approval of the settlement. Furthermore, because the proposed settlement provided class members with only injunctive relief of questionable value while class counsel requested up to $75 million in attorneys' fees, the Court found that the communications between Friedman and Ravelo were blatant collusion, in which the class counsel proposed to work together with Defendant to achieve a result contrary to the best interests of the class. Id. at *79-80. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for final approval of the settlement.

Editor's Note: The unethical conduct at issue may well have been the most costly in 2015, inasmuch as it derailed a potential $75 million fee award.

(xl) Objectors In Class Actions

Hill, et al. v. State Street Corp.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 12868 (1st Cir. July 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of individuals and entities who purchased publicly traded common stock of Defendant State Street Corp., brought a class action asserting claims for violation of various securities laws against Defendants. In settling the case, Plaintiff's counsel agreed with Defendants that some class members would be deemed uninjured, and that others who were injured in amounts less than $10 would be paid nothing. Id. at *1. Notices were sent to approximately 7,000 potential class members on August 18, 2014, and notice was implemented in a manner that ensured that all large investors got ample notice of their right to opt-out or object. Id. at *2. As there were foreseeable delays as to small investors, the District Court continued the final settlement hearing from October 27, 2014 to November 20, 2014. Id. at *3. The distributed notices, however, continued to publish an objection deadline of October 6, 2014 and a hearing date of October 27, 2014. Id. Class members who objected to the settlement raised no complaint about the substance of the settlement or the notice, but they claimed that they were given too little time to register objections. The objectors appealed the order approving the settlement, and the First Circuit affirmed the District Court's order. In rejecting the objections, the District Court cited to Scklonick v. Harlow, 820 F.2d 13 (1st Cir. 1987), which affirmed use of Rule 7 to bar objectors from appealing unless they posted a bond in amount of $75,300. Id. at *4. Scklonick had justified this order by finding that any appeal from rulings on the objections would be frivolous, and the bond amount would ensure there would be funds available to pay the Plaintiffs' counsel for their fees in defending the frivolous appeal. Id. In Scklonick, the First Circuit conducted a preliminary examination of merits, and concluded that it could not say that the District Court abused its discretion in judging the appeal to be frivolous. Id. at *5. Here, the First Circuit, noted that the objectors received written notices around October 4, and they filed their objections in writing on November 4, and the District Court held its rescheduled approval hearing on November 20 to consider all objections on merits. Id. at *7. In addition, the First Circuit noted that the District Court had allowed the objectors' counsel the right to appear at the approval hearing by telephone. Id. The First Circuit also rejected the objectors' challenge of the order as to attorneys' fees, finding that they did not have a standing to challenge the fee award.

Rodriguez, et al. v. West Publishing Corp.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 3901 (9th Cir. Mar. 12, 2015). In this action, the District Court had approved a nationwide class action settlement and awarded attorneys' fees and expenses. A group of objectors challenged the settlement, and the District Court overruled the objections and denied their request for attorneys' fees. Following a remand from the Ninth Circuit to calculate the appropriate amount of attorneys' fees that should be awarded to the objectors in light of the benefit they conferred on the class, the District Court reduced the lodestar amount to $315,516.37, and by applying a 0.75 multiplier (i.e., a 25% reduction) to the adjusted lodestar amount, further reduced the ultimate fee award to $236,637. Id. at *2-3. Counsel for a group of objectors appealed, and the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded with instructions. First, the objectors' counsel contended that the District Court had abused its discretion when it awarded fees using the lodestar method, and had disobeyed the Ninth Circuit's earlier mandate in this regard. The Ninth Circuit found that the District Court was well within its discretion to choose the lodestar method to calculate the fee award, rather than awarding a percentage of the benefit conferred to the class because there was no requirement in its mandate about how to set fees. Id. at *3. The Ninth Circuit maintained that in its earlier order, it had found that certain objectors were eligible for fees, but never expressed its opinion how to calculate fees. Id. The objectors also argued that the District Court erred in applying the lodestar method. The Ninth Circuit found that the District Court abused its discretion in applying the 0.75 multiplier to the adjusted lodestar amount because neither of its explanations had sufficient support in the record to warrant its adjustment. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit reversed the District Court's award and remanded with instructions to award $315,516.37 in fees, representing its original, unadjusted calculation of counsel's lodestar. Id. at *5-6.

Rose, et al. v. Bank Of America Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64780 (N.D. Cal. May 18, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a class action alleging that Defendants violated the Telephone

Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by engaging in a systematic practice of calling or texting consumers' cellphones using automatic dialing systems and/or an artificial or prerecorded voice without their prior express consent. The parties reached a settlement. A group of objectors challenged the settlement, arguing that the compensation offered to the class members was too low, the injunctive relief did not benefit the class, the attorneys' fees were excessive, and the "quick pay" fee provision elevated class counsel's interests over those of the class. Id. at *3. The Court nevertheless granted final approval of the class action settlement, and granted in part Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees. Id. at *4. The objectors then filed a motion seeking $393,311.24 in attorneys' fees and an incentive award of $2,000 each. The Court denied the motion. The objectors contended that their objections to the settlement agreement materially benefitted the class in three ways, including: (i) the Court agreed with their assessment that the injunctive relief provided little in the way of real benefit to class members; (ii) they drew the Court's attention to the low recovery as compared to other TCPA cases and the settlement's indicia of unfairness and collusion; and (iii) they pointed out class counsel's high attorneys' fees. Id. at *6. The Court found the objectors' fee request unwarranted because the objectors' participation was limited to filing an eight-page brief, and there was no indication that the objectors attended the final hearing to advance their objections. Id. at *7. Significantly, the Court noted that it did not rely on the objectors' arguments in issuing its decision; in fact, the objectors admitted that the Court's rationale differed from their own objections. Id. Further, the objectors' counsel failed to comply with Civil Local Rule 54-5(b), which requires a motion for attorneys' fees to include a statement of services rendered by each person for whom fees are claimed. Id. at *8. The Court, therefore, deemed attorneys' fees unwarranted. Similarly, the Court found the objectors' request for incentive pay and their request to enjoin the quick pay provision unsubstantiated. The Court, accordingly, denied the objectors' motion.

(xli) Privacy Class Actions

Allen, et al. v. Schnuck Markets, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 113892 (S.D. Ill. Aug. 27, 2015). In this class action brought by a group of grocery store customers, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss and motion to transfer venue. Plaintiffs contended that hackers gained access to Defendant's credit/debit card processing systems in December 2012, and managed to obtain customers' personally identifying information ("PII") and confidential financial data ("CFD"). Id. at *4. Plaintiffs asserted that although Defendant received reports from banks that customers who had used their cards at its stores had incurred fraudulent charges by mid-March 2013, it continued to accept cards, and did not warn its customers of the risks of an unauthorized PII/CFD disclosure until March 30, 2013. Id. Plaintiffs sued Defendant under various theories, including negligence, breach of implied contract, and violation of the Illinois' Personal Information Protection Act. In its motion to dismiss, Defendant challenged the sufficiency of Plaintiffs' complaint. The Court, however, noted that Plaintiffs' complaint passed the plausibility threshold. The Court explained that despite Defendant's assertions that Plaintiff failed to properly allege damages, the Court opined that the pleadings contained more than unsupported, conclusory allegations. Id. at *8. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs alleged that they had suffered and would continue to suffer financial losses caused by fraudulent charges to their compromised cards and bank fees associated with the data breach. Id. at *9. The Court found that this was sufficient to state a claim. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss. The Court also denied Defendant's motion to transfer venue to the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri, finding that access to resources and sources of proof was effectively the same in each forum. Id. at *11.

Burrow, et al. v. Sybaris Clubs International, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53781 (N.D. Ill. April 24, 2015). Plaintiff, a reservations desk employee, brought a class action alleging that Defendants recorded all inbound and outbound phone calls from the reservations desks without anyone's consent, in violation of the Federal Wiretap Act (the "Act") and related Indiana and Wisconsin statutes. Defendants purchased a telephone system called "ShoreTel," which allowed them to record the phone calls made to and from phones at the various reservations desks. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff sought to certify a class consisting of all persons who made a telephone call into or out of the reservation telephone lines at Defendants' five locations between March 19, 2012, and April 11, 2013, which the Court granted. Id. at *2. First, the Court noted that the Act prohibits the recording of telephone conversations, unless one party consents to the recording. The Act, however, does not impose any intent requirement. Id. at *4. Here, there was no dispute that Defendants intended to record phone calls and in fact did record phone calls. Defendants argued, however, that they received implied consent when they generally informed their employees of the new ShorTel system and those employees chose to continue working for them by taking phone calls on the recorded lines. Id. at *8-9. The Court disagreed that knowledge of something generally was synonymous with consent. Id. at *9. Hence, the Court found that although Defendants claimed that the individual issues related to employee consent precluded class certification, the evidence related to that defense was common to the class. The Court remarked that just because a class might "go down in flames on the merits" did not mean that a Court should refuse certification. Id. at *11. Moreover, the eighteen individual affidavits that Defendants submitted in support of its consent defense accounted for less than one-third of all the potential class members. Thus, the Court maintained that even if those affidavits conclusively established consent for those specific class members, it could not deny class certification as to the other potential class members who might have given no form of consent. Id. at *12. Therefore, the Court found that concentrating the case into a single forum was more desirable than thousands of cases all hearing the same claim involving the same recording system. Id. at *13. The Court held there was no problem in identifying potential class members because every guest with Defendants must be a "member" and pay an annual fee in order to stay at the hotel. Id. at *14-15. Further, Defendants assigned each member a unique identification number that could identify customers who made reservations during the class period, and Defendants' phone logs along with those customers' own phone records could determine if they called in to make the reservations. Id. at *15. The Court observed that the number of potential Plaintiffs was in the thousands, which was sufficiently numerous for Rule 23(a) purposes. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court certified the proposed class.

Coulter-Owens, et al. v. Time, Inc.*, Case No. 12-CV-14390 (E.D. Mich. July 27, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant improperly disclosed the private information of individuals who subscribed to its magazines through third-party websites in violation of the Video Rental Privacy Act ("VRPA"). Plaintiff alleged that Defendant sent subscriber information to marketing database vendor Axiom Corp. and third-party database cooperative Wiland Direct without customers' written consent. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff moved to certify a class consisting of all Michigan residents who between March 31, 2009, and November 15, 2013, purchased a subscription to Time, Fortune, or Real Simple magazines through a third-party website such as www.magazines.com. The Court granted the motion. Defendant argued that the proposed class definition turned on whether a person was a purchaser as opposed to a subscriber, and, therefore, the Court would have to look to the third-parties from whom magazine subscriptions were purchased to determine if a person fell within the proposed class definition. Id. at *3. Plaintiff responded that the proposed class members all purchased magazine subscriptions from Defendant's authorized agents, and Plaintiff could obtain the information from the third-party agents in discovery because the third-parties, under contract with Defendant, were required to maintain the records of purchasers for a period of six years. Id. The Court agreed with Plaintiff, reasoning that the question was not, as Defendant framed it, whether records of purchasers were within its possession; rather, the inquiry in determining if the proposed class was ascertainable was whether it was defined in a way that made it administratively feasible for the Court to determine whether a particular individual was a member. Id. Defendant also contended that it was unable to determine who a purchaser was in every circumstance because a purchaser was not always a subscriber and that information was not always provided to Defendant. For example, many people purchased subscriptions as gifts for their spouses or parents. Id. Defendant contended that there was no way of knowing who the purchaser was in those instances. Id. The Court rejected Defendant's argument, pointing out that it could determine whether a purchaser was also a subscriber by comparing the billing information and the subscriber information, which could be obtained from Defendant's third-party agents. Id. Defendant further argued that there was no way to determine whether a magazine subscription was purchased from a third-party agent using the Internet as opposed to mail orders or via telephone. Id. The Court was not persuaded and found that, to the extent that information was not available in the records of the third-party agents, which would seem unlikely, the individual purchasers might be in possession of evidence to support the fact that a magazine subscription was purchased using the Internet. Id. Finally, Defendant argued that the proposed class members did not purchase magazine subscriptions "at retail," as defined in the VRPA, because they bought the subscriptions from third-party agents. Id. The Court concluded that, while Defendant's argument may have some merit, it was an affirmative defense, and not an attack on the ascertainability of the proposed class. Id. at *4. The Court, accordingly, granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

In Re Facebook Internet Tracking Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 145142 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 23, 2015). In this consolidated multi-district class action brought by and on behalf of individuals with active Facebook accounts seeking more than $15 billion in damages and injunctive relief for Defendant's purported tracking of their on-line activities, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss on the grounds that Plaintiffs failed to articulate a cognizable basis for standing pursuant to Article III. In their complaint, Plaintiffs claimed that Facebook's use of "tracking" or "persistent" cookies to track and transmit a user's browsing history without the user's consent after the user logged-off of Facebook violated numerous state and federal laws, including the Federal Wiretap Act, the Stored Communications Act ("SCA"), the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act ("CFAA"), and California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), Computer Crime Law ("CCCL"), Invasion of Privacy Act ("CIPA"), and Consumer Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA"). Id. at *24-25. Plaintiffs also raised common law claims that Facebook's tracking practices amounted to an invasion of privacy, intrusion upon seclusion, trespass to chattels, and conversion. Id. Arguing that Defendant wrongly profited from its improper tracking practices, Plaintiffs asserted that the data has massive economic value, that a market exists for the sale of such information, and that profits to Defendant are tantamount to billions of dollars in fees. Id. at *21-22. Seeking dismissal, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs lacked standing to pursue all claims. Although Plaintiffs asserted that the information Facebook collected from its tracking activities was valuable, Defendant argued that they did not allege that anyone was willing to pay for their personal information or that its purported conduct lessened the value of that information or affected its marketability. Id. at *26. The Court agreed with Defendant. The Court found that, although Plaintiffs showed some degree of intrinsic value to their personal information, they could not establish constitutional standing as to any of the claims presented because they failed to adequately connect this value to a realistic harm or loss that was attributable to Facebook's alleged conduct. Id. at *30. The Court explained that the complaint did not demonstrate that any Plaintiff personally lost the opportunity to sell their information or the value of the information was diminished by Facebook's tracking practices, and that the complaint alluded to injury that was "conjectural or hypothetical." Id. at *30-31. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs failed to articulate a cognizable basis for standing pursuant to Article III. Id. at *32. Under the same rationale, the Court also dismissed all of Plaintiffs' common law claims, which require economic harm related to the loss of personal information as an element of damages, as well as Plaintiffs' UCL, CLRA, and CCCL claims, which also required a plausible economic injury. Id. at *33-35. Because economic injury was not a prerequisite for Plaintiffs' Federal Wiretap Act, SCA, or CIPA claims, the Court found that the allegations alone were sufficient to establish standing as to those claims. Id. at *35. The Court then reviewed the sufficiency of each claim and held that Plaintiffs might never be able to state an actionable Wiretap Act claim because they failed to plead that Facebook intercepted the "contents" of an electronic communication, and their argument on the issue was unpersuasive. Id. at *40-41. The Court further dismissed the SCA claims as deficient, noting that the language and legislative history of "electronic storage" under the SCA makes clear that the SCA is "targeted at communications temporarily stored by electronic communication services incident to their transmission," as opposed to cases as this one which involved personal information permanently stored in users' personal web browsers. Id. at *41-42. Finally, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' CIPA claim for failure to state a claim, accepting Defendant's arguments that Plaintiffs failed to plead facts showing Facebook used a "machine, instrument, or contrivance" to obtain the contents of communications. Id. at *44-45. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss but permitted Plaintiffs leave to file an amended complaint.

In Re Hulu Privacy Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43157 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of on-line users, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Video Privacy Protection Act ("VPPA") by disclosing information about users' identities and videos viewed on Facebook, a third-party social-networking website. Defendant moved for summary judgment arguing that it did not "knowingly" send Facebook information that could identify users and that it did not know that Facebook might read the information it sent so as to yield personally identifiable information ("PII") under the VPPA. Id. at *3. The Court granted Defendant's motion, finding no genuine issue of material fact regarding whether Defendant knowingly disclosed Plaintiffs' information. The VPPA prohibits a video tape service provider from knowingly disclosing PII that "included information which identifies a person as having requested or obtained specific video materials or services" from the provider. Id. Defendant's conduct regarding Facebook consisted of inserting "like" buttons on its web pages. Plaintiffs alleged that, in order to implement the "like" button on pages where Plaintiffs watched videos, Defendant separately sent Facebook the page's URL, in which it embedded the video's title and a "c_user" cookie that could contain an on-line user's Facebook ID in a numeric format. Id. at *8-10. Plaintiffs alleged that this transmission enabled Facebook to link information identifying the user and the user's video choices to other information about the particular user. Id. at *11. Defendant argued that providing these two data points separately to Facebook did not constitute a disclosure under the VPPA and that it had no knowledge that Facebook would link them to determine that a specific user had requested or obtained the video from that watch page. The Court agreed with Defendant that neither the c_user cookie nor the URL qualified as a prohibited disclosure under the VPPA because neither piece of information, by itself, identified an individual and the video materials or services that the individual requested. Id. at *17. The Court found that Plaintiffs had to show more than the mere fact that Defendant disclosed such information to Facebook. Rather, Plaintiffs had to demonstrate a "connection of the two" pieces of information that could create the disclosure of PII. Id. at *19. Because there was no evidence that Defendant knew that Facebook might combine the two pieces of information, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to prove that Defendant knowingly disclosed PII. Id. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' argument that Defendant knew that Facebook could combine the two pieces of information together to tie a user to the videos he or she watched finding that Plaintiffs could not show that Defendant worked together with Facebook to communicate this information in separate forms. Id. at *21. The Court also rejected Plaintiffs' arguments that Defendant knew that it was disclosing user identities through the c_user cookies while acknowledging that proof of this element, without proof of a connection to a user's viewing history, could not form the basis for a VPPA claim. Id. at *25-26. The Court dismissed Plaintiffs' reliance on evidence regarding the presence of the c_user cookie during Defendant's internal testing, noting that Plaintiffs lacked proof that Defendant saw this or generally knew what c_user signified. Id. at *34-35. Finally, the Court rejected Plaintiffs' reliance on Defendant's internal e-mails regarding cookies and Defendant's privacy policy finding that these generalized communications did not address "the Like button, the c_user cookie, the watch-page URLs, or any connection among these things." Id. at *37-38. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

In Re Nickelodeon Consumer Privacy Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6428 (D.N.J. Jan. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a multi-district consolidated class action on behalf of a putative class of minors under the age of 13. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants Viacom and Google violated their privacy rights by gathering information from children who registered and used Viacom's Nick.com, Nickjr.com, and Neopet.com websites. Plaintiffs alleged that Viacom created a record when a user viewed a video or played a video game by placing a cookie in the user's browser that allowed Viacom to collect a range of information, including the user's gender and age, without his or her consent, shared this information with Google, and allowed Google to place its own cookies on the user's browser. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs asserted, among other things, violations of the Video Protection and Privacy Act ("VPPA") and the New Jersey Computer Related Offenses Act ("CROA"). The Court found that Plaintiffs' VPPA claim against Viacom failed because Plaintiffs did not allege that Viacom disclosed personally identifiable information ("PII"). The Court determined that Plaintiffs' CROA claim failed because Plaintiffs did not allege that they suffered any "business or property" damage. Id. at *7. The Court held that Plaintiffs' intrusion upon seclusion claim failed because Plaintiffs did not allege an intrusion that would be highly offensive to a reasonable person. Id. Subsequently, Plaintiffs filed a second consolidated class action complaint ("SAC") alleging additional facts to attempt to cure these deficiencies. Defendants moved to dismiss, asserting that Plaintiffs' SAC suffered from the same fundamental defects. Id. at *8. The Court agreed. The Court found that Plaintiffs still did not allege that Defendants could identify the individual Plaintiffs in the case, as opposed to identifying people generally, nor that Defendants had identified any Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs argued that, with the information that Google collects about the users of its services in hand, Google could take the information Viacom supplies and ascertain personal identities. Id. at *10-11. The Court observed that, even if it considered what Google could do with the information, rather than the nature of the information itself, Plaintiffs' claim still failed because it was entirely theoretical. Id. at *11. According to Plaintiffs, in order for Google to connect the information with the identity of an individual Plaintiff, such a Plaintiff would need to have registered on one of Google's servers, but Plaintiffs failed to allege that they registered with Google. Indeed, the Court noted that Google would not allow a child under the age of 13 to register for its services, which would rule out the entire class of Plaintiffs. Id. at *12. The Court, therefore, dismissed Plaintiffs' VPPA claim with prejudice. Id. at *12-13. As to Plaintiffs' CROA claim, the Court noted that, because the law targets computer hacking, it is dubious whether it would cover situations like that alleged by Plaintiffs in which Plaintiffs' computers had not been hacked and their information had not been stolen. Id. at *13. Assuming the statute applied, Plaintiffs still failed to allege "business or property" damage stemming from Defendants' conduct. Id. Although in the SAC Plaintiffs rhetorically framed their damages in terms of unjust enrichment in a quasi-contractual setting, Plaintiffs pointed to the same concepts set forth in their initial complaint. Id. at *14. The Court, therefore, dismissed the CROA claim with prejudice. Finally, regarding Plaintiffs' common law privacy claims, the Court noted that, although Plaintiffs highlighted statistics suggesting that a large majority of the public opposed tracking children's on-line activity, such a statistic did not answer the relevant inquiry of what a reasonable person finds "highly offensive." Id. at *17. The Court cited an example that a large majority of voters could disapprove of a given politician's job performance, but that would not indicate that a reasonable person finds the politician's performance "highly offensive." Id. The Court, therefore, dismissed Plaintiffs' common law privacy claims with prejudice.

In Re Target Corp. Customer Data Security Breach Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123779 (D. Minn. Sept. 15, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a class action alleging that they suffered economic damage from Defendant's 2013 data breach that allegedly compromised their personal information. The massive data breach occurred during the 2013 holiday shopping season when computer hackers stole credit and debit-card information and other personal information of approximately 110 million customers of Defendant's retail stores. Plaintiffs moved for class certification, and the Court granted the motion. Defendant accepted that class-wide proof was available as to the existence of a duty and breach of that duty, but contended that Plaintiffs could not rely on class-wide proof to establish injury or causation. Defendant also argued that Plaintiffs' injuries were the risk of future harm that were not cognizable or susceptible of class-wide proof. The Court noted in the record a 2014 survey by American Bankers Association survey, which stated that banks reissued nearly every card that was subject to an alert after Defendant's data breach. Id. at *11. Thus, the Court opined that Plaintiffs' harm was not a future harm, and that it was a cost borne at the time of the breach, and as a result of the breach. Accordingly, the Court opined that Plaintiffs established that they had suffered an injury proximately caused by the data breach for the purposes of the class certification inquiry. Plaintiffs also claimed that Defendant violated the Minnesota Plastic Card Security Act ("PCSA"). The Court noted that after being notified that its cards were involved, a financial institution took action, at least in part, to protect the institution's customers' information and to provide service to those customers. Thus, the Court opined that the PCSA claim was susceptible of class-wide proof, and that class certification of this claim was appropriate. The Court noted that Plaintiffs' claims were typical as they arose from the same event or practice or course of conduct that gave rise to the claims of other class members, and were based on the same legal theory. The Court also opined that class action was a superior method of adjudicating the claims considering the number of financial institutions involved and the similarity of all class members' claims. Accordingly, the Court granted class certification.

Pavone, et al. v. The Law Offices Of Anthony Mancini Ltd.*, Case No. 15-CV-1538 (N.D. Ill. July 28, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action on behalf of a class of similarly-situated individuals against Defendant, a law firm, alleging that it obtained Illinois traffic crash reports and used the information in those reports to send targeted solicitations to persons involved in car accidents, in violation of the Driver's Privacy Protection Act ('DPPA'). Defendant sent various documents to Plaintiff, including a solicitation letter and a copy of a crash report that listed his name, date of birth, address, license plate number, driver's license number, and his car's make and model. Id. at *1. Defendant moved to dismiss and the Court denied the motion. First, the Court observed that the DPPA prohibits knowingly obtaining, disclosing, or using personal information, from a motor vehicle record, for a purpose not permitted under the statute. Id. at 2. Defendant argued that DPPA did not apply in this case because it excluded accident reports from the definition of protected "personal information." Id. The Court conceded that based on the plain language of the statute, the exclusion referred to information about vehicular accidents, driving violations, and driver's status. Id. at 2-3. The Court pointed out, however, that the exclusion did not cover personal information such as the driver's address, license number, and plate number included in the accident report. Id. at 3. Moreover, case law precedent supported the conclusion that information in crash reports could constitute personal information. Id. The Court also rejected Defendant's argument that crash reports were not motor vehicle records under the DPPA. Id. The Court noted that an accident report is not a motor vehicle record according to the language of the statute. Id. at *4. Nevertheless, the Court observed that the DPPA also protects any personal information obtained from a motor vehicle record; thus, even if a document was created by the police, the DPPA protects any information in the report that the police obtained from the motor vehicle record. Id. The Court maintained the key question was whether the Illinois Secretary of State was the original source of the information, as the DPPA proscribes only the publication of personal information that had been obtained from motor vehicle records, thus, the origin of the information was crucial to the illegality of its publication. Id. at *4-5. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs had plausibly alleged that the information listed on the crash reports came from motor vehicle records produced by the Secretary of State. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant knowingly obtained a copy of the report from the Schaumburg Police Department, and/or the Illinois Secretary of State directly and/or through a private entity supplier of such motor vehicle records as part of Defendant's regular practice and procedure of obtaining such records for advertising and solicitation purposes. Id. at *5. The Court remarked that even if the Secretary of State did not share that information with private parties, it was also plausible that officers obtained the information on the crash reports from a Secretary of State's database. Id. Moreover, even if that information was not directly supplied by the Secretary of State, it was plausible that officers who wrote the crash reports copied the name, license number, and address from the driver's license, which was a motor vehicle record. Id. Finally, the Court was also not persuaded by Defendant's argument that the law firm's use of the accident report fell under an exception in the DPPA that allows personal information to be used if it is related "to the operation of a motor vehicle or public safety." Id. at *5-6. Defendant argued that because the crash reports were created after an accident, they were related to the operation of a motor vehicle. Id. at *6. The Court pointed out that Defendant's use of the report was not related to the operation of a motor vehicle; instead, Defendant obtained the crash reports and used their contents to solicit business. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Defendant's use did not fall within the § 2721(b)(14) exception and denied the motion to dismiss. Id.

Peterson, et al. v. Aaron's, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 72062 (N.D. Ga. June 4, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of computer leasers and purchasers, brought an invasion of privacy action alleging that Aspen Way Enterprises, Inc., a franchisee of Aaron's, Inc., remotely accessed their computers and retrieved private information through the PC rental agent software. Id. at *2. Defendants moved to dismiss, and the Court denied the motion. The Court observed that to show the tort of unreasonable intrusion, a Plaintiff must show a physical intrusion which is analogous to a trespass, which can be met by showing that Defendant conducted surveillance on Plaintiff or otherwise monitored Plaintiff's activities. Id. at *6. Here, Plaintiffs alleged that Aspen leased/sold computers to them which, without Plaintiffs' knowledge, contained software that allowed Aspen to access their private information. Aspen argued that it installed the software so as to track down a lost or stolen computer or a computer whose lessee was in default and that this did not constitute an unreasonable intrusion. The Court, however, noted that Aspen did not use the software for only this limited purpose, but instead allegedly used the software to access Plaintiffs' computers without permission and collect private information. Id. at *8. The Court thus denied Aspen's motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' common law intrusion of privacy claim. The Court also examined whether Plaintiffs asserted a plausible common law invasion of privacy claim. Plaintiffs argued that Aaron's, Inc. was liable because it conspired with Aspen to access their computers and collect their private information. The Court observed that the essential element of the alleged conspiracy is proof of a common design establishing that two or more persons in any manner, either positively or tacitly, arrive at a mutual understanding as to how they will accomplish an unlawful design. Id. at *9. Here, however, Plaintiffs failed to adequately allege that Defendants agreed to engage in the alleged unlawful acts, and besides a conclusory conspiracy allegation, the complaint contained no other supporting factual matter. Plaintiffs argued that because Aaron's, Inc. aided and abetted Aspen's surveillance of its customers, it was liable for tort claims asserted against the latter. The Court noted that Plaintiffs adequately alleged that Aaron's, Inc. knew that Aspen was invading its customers' privacy and provided substantial assistance that aided Aspen's unlawful acts. The complaint alleged that Aaron's, Inc. promoted the software to Aspen, trained Aspen's personnel on the use of the software, and granted Aspen permission to use the software websites by opening a portal on the Aaron's intranet, allowing Aspen to access and use the software and thereafter illegally spy on its customers. Id. at *11. Further, Aaron's, Inc. allegedly provided Aspen with assistance with the use of antivirus software in relation to the PC rental agent. Id. To establish scienter, Plaintiffs alleged that several employees informed Aaron's, Inc. that the software which Aspen was using was very intrusive, key-logging all the customer's key strokes, transmitting images of the customers' screenshots, and transmitting photographs of computer users taken through the customers' webcams. The Court remarked that the aiding and abetting argument was a means by which Aaron's, Inc. may be found jointly liable for the invasion of privacy claim asserted against Aspen, and that Plaintiffs need not establish an independent aiding and abetting claim. Id. at *12-13. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' invasion of privacy claim.

(xlii) Choice-Of-Law Issues In Class Actions

Bobbit, et al. v. Milberg LLP,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 16082 (9th Cir. Sept. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of class members from a previously-filed securities class action, brought an action against their attorneys alleging malpractice for failing to meet discovery requirements. Plaintiffs named four law firms and their lawyers, all residents of different states, as Defendants. Plaintiffs moved for class certification, and the District Court denied the motion based on choice-of-law principles. Id. at *3. The District Court found that Plaintiffs failed to meet the predominance requirement because the law applicable to each class member's claim was the law of that class member's domicile state. Id. at *4. Because Plaintiffs' claims implicated the laws of up to 50 states, and Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden to show that conflicts between 50 states' laws did not defeat the predominance requirement, the District Court denied class certification. Id. Subsequently, Plaintiffs moved for voluntary dismissal of their individual claims, and the District Court granted the motion. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded. Plaintiffs argued that the District Court erred in holding that the law of each class member's home state governed his or her individual claim, rather than the law of Arizona where the alleged malpractice occurred. The Ninth Circuit found that the place of injury was Arizona because the class members were injured by Defendants' negligence in an Arizona legal proceeding. Id. at *6. Further, the Ninth Circuit reasoned that the center of the relationships among the parties also supported application of Arizona law because the relationships between the class members and their lawyers existed in Arizona. Id. at *9. Finally, the Ninth Circuit held that, because the class members were scattered in different states, the laws of all of those states could not be applied. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit vacated the District Court's order denying class certification and remanded for further proceedings.

David, et al. v. Signal International, LLC, et al.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73159 (E.D. La. June 4, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendants recruited them to work as temporary workers and forced them to pay inbound travel expenses, visa expenses, and other recruiting expenses. Plaintiffs also claimed that Defendants discriminated against them and forced them to work as welders, pipefitters, and marine fabrication workers. Plaintiffs initially filed their action in Mississippi, and the Court transferred it to Louisiana under the "first-to file" rule. Id. at *202. Defendants moved for summary judgement on choice-of-law issues. The threshold question was whether Mississippi law or the law of Louisiana governed the choice-of-law analysis. Id. The Court found that Louisiana law governed the choice-of-law analysis. The Court noted that the Supreme Court in Ferens v. John Deere Co., 494 U.S. 516 (1990), held that, when a case is transferred under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) due to a change of venue for the convenience of parties and witnesses and in the interest of justice, the Court may apply the choice-of-law rules that prevailed in the transferor jurisdiction. Plaintiffs contended that the "Van Dusen rule" applied, and, therefore, Mississippi's choice-of-law principles controlled. Id. at *203. Plaintiffs first argued that a transfer order under the first-to-file rule was effectuated through § 1404(a) as a matter of law. The Court, however, found that the first-to-file rule is a distinct procedural mechanism for transferring venue. Id. Second, Plaintiffs argued that, even if this case was transferred under the first-to-file rule, the logic and holdings of both Van Dusen and Ferens should apply. The Court observed that the Fifth Circuit had not addressed this issue, and, of the other four case authorities that had addressed whether the Van Dusen rule applied to first-to-file transfers, one held that it did not, and the other three expressed skepticism. Id. at *204-05. Finding this reasoning persuasive, the Court opined that, because the policy justifications underlying § 1404(a) and the first-to-file rule are often in tension, it made little sense to apply the Van Dusen rule – a rule developed to govern § 1404(a) transfers – to a first-to-file transfers. Id. at *205. Accordingly, the Court concluded that, because the Van Dusen rule was inapplicable, Louisiana law governed the choice-of-law analysis. Therefore, the Court held that Mississippi law governed the claims for breach of contract and agency.

In Re Yahoo Mail Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 68585 (N.D. Cal. May 26, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief against Defendant for its alleged practice of scanning and analyzing e-mails of non-Yahoo e-mail subscribers in violation of the federal Stored Communications Act ("SCA") and the California Invasion of Privacy Act ("CIPA"). Plaintiffs were individuals who did not use Yahoo's e-mail service ("Yahoo Mail") but sent e-mails to Yahoo Mail subscribers from non-Yahoo e-mail addresses. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs contended that Defendant intercepted and scanned Yahoo Mail subscribers' e-mails, copied the entirety of the e-mails, extracted keywords from the bodies of the e-mails, reviewed and extracted links and attachments, and classified the e-mails based on their content. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs sought certification of a nationwide class of persons who were not Yahoo Mail subscribers who had sent e-mails to or received e-mails from a Yahoo Mail subscriber or who would send e-mails to or receive e-mails from a Yahoo Mail subscriber in the future. The Court granted the motion in part. First, the Court noted that, to establish standing for prospective injunctive relief, a Plaintiff must demonstrate that he or she suffered or was threatened with a concrete and particularized legal harm, coupled with a sufficient likelihood that he or she would be wronged again in a similar way. Id. at *18. Defendant challenged Plaintiffs' standing to seek injunctive and declaratory relief under Rule 23(b)(2), arguing that Plaintiffs consented to its actions because Plaintiffs continued to send e-mails to Yahoo subscribers after they learned that Defendant allegedly scanned, stored, and used those e-mails. Id. at *17. The Court rejected this proposition as overly narrow. The Court found that, if Article III standing was as narrow as Defendant contended, it would be precluded from enjoining false advertising under California consumer protection laws. Id. at *22. Defendant also opposed certification, arguing that the issue of whether putative class members consented to Yahoo's interception, disclosure, and use of their e-mails was a key question that defeated commonality. Id. at *31. Defendant relied on In Re Google Inc. Gmail Litigation, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36957 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 18, 2014), wherein the Court concluded that individualized questions with respect to consent were likely to overwhelm any common issues. Id. The Court found the case distinguishable. It noted that, unlike Gmail, Plaintiffs here did not seek to certify a class under Rule 23(b)(3), that Defendant in Gmail did not challenge whether Plaintiffs satisfied the commonality requirement, and that Gmail turned on Plaintiffs' failure to demonstrate predominance. Id. at *32. The Court concluded that, even if Defendant might be correct that consent could present individualized legal and factual questions, that fact did not preclude Plaintiffs from identifying other common legal and factual questions that were significant to Plaintiffs' claims and capable of class-wide resolution. Id. at *33. The Court considered whether applying California law to a nationwide class was appropriate as to Plaintiffs' CIPA claim. The Court found that the actual interception and scanning of e-mail occurred in data centers located throughout the country and the physical location of the sender or receiver did not necessarily determine whether an e-mail would be intercepted in one state or the other. Id. at *72. Accordingly, the Court concluded that, for non-California class members, other states' interests would be more impaired by applying California law than would California's interest by applying other states' laws. Therefore, it found that certification of the nationwide class under California law would be improper. Each non-resident class member's state law claims should be governed by and decided under the wiretapping laws of the state in which the class members resides. Because adjudication of the state law claims would require application of the laws of 50 states, the Court found that a nationwide class would not satisfy the cohesiveness requirements under Rule 23(b)(2). However, the Court granted Plaintiffs' alternative request to certify a California-only sub-class as to the CIPA claim. Id. at *78. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to certify a nationwide class as to Plaintiffs' SCA claim, denied Plaintiffs' motion to certify a nationwide class as to Plaintiffs' CIPA claim, and granted Plaintiffs' motion to certify a California-only sub-class as to Plaintiffs' CIPA claim. Id. at *79.

(xliii) Insurance-Related Class Actions

Littleton, et al. v. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2788 (W.D. Ark. Jan. 8, 2015). Plaintiff, an insured, brought a class action alleging that Defendant, an auto insurer, paid reduced rates by improperly tapping into so-called "PPO network reductions," which were negotiated by doctors and third-party re-pricers on behalf of health insurance providers. Id. at *2-3. As a result, Plaintiff allegedly remained personally liable to his medical providers for the difference between the bills he actually incurred and the reduced amounts Defendant paid, even though his insurance coverage limits were not exhausted. Id. at *3. Plaintiff authorized his medical care providers – Washington Regional Medical Center ("WRMC') and Blair Masters ("Masters") – to collect medical payments directly from Defendant. In turn, Defendant forwarded Plaintiff's bills to a re-pricing company, Mitchell International, which recommended payment of discounted in-network PPO rates for the medical services provided. Id. at *4. In support of the discounted rates, Defendant produced a contract between WRMC and USA Managed Care Organization ("USAMCO"), and a contract between Masters and Integrated Health Plan, Inc. ("IHP"). Defendant asserted that it did not enter into a contract directly with WRMC or Masters, was not a signatory to either contract, and that it instead had contracted with a third-party, Cofinity, Inc., which had entered into agreements with USAMCO and IHP on its behalf. Id. at *4-5. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment, and the Court denied both motions. Defendant contended that both medical providers accepted its reduced rates as payment in full. The Court, however, found a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether Masters refused to accept the reduced rates and demanded payment from Plaintiff. Alternatively, Defendant argued that, because Plaintiff assigned the payment of benefits to Masters, he no longer maintained an injury-in-fact. The Court, however, noted that, even if Plaintiff permitted Masters to bill Defendant directly for medical care costs, this designation of procedure for collection did not equate to a contractual assignment of rights under the Policy, nor did such an assignment prohibit the medical provider from collecting residual balances from its patient. Id. at *11. The Court opined that Plaintiff still would remain personally liable for any medical debt claimed by his medical providers that Defendant refused or otherwise failed to pay. Id. The Court also found a material issue of disputed fact as to whether the payment of reduced rates could be considered "reasonable" under the terms of Defendant's own Policy. Id. at *11-12. In order to be "reasonable," rates must be agreed by the medical care providers, and here there was a genuine issue of disputed fact as to what Masters agreed. The Court, therefore, denied summary judgment to Defendant. Plaintiff further argued that the payment of reduced network rates was illegal and violated the express terms of the Policy. The Policy defined the payment of "reasonable expenses" as the fees agreed by both the insured's healthcare provider and Defendant. Id. at *12. Thus, even in the absence of a direct contract between Defendant and the medical care providers, the Court opined that Defendant's payment of reduced rates could be deemed reasonable if some other means of agreement could be demonstrated. Id. at *12-13. The Court noted that it was at least arguable that WRMC and Defendant came to a constructive agreement to accept reduced rates, as evidenced by WRMC's actual acceptance of payment from Defendant, followed by WRMC's release of Plaintiff's medical lien and its affirmation that no further debt was owed. Id. at *13. Because WRMC's example was evidence that Defendant's policy might be reasonable under the Policy's terms, the Court refrained from holding that Defendant's practice of paying reduced rates breached the Policy's terms. Accordingly, the Court denied summary judgment to Plaintiff.

McDonough, et al. v. Horizon Blue Cross Blue Shield Of New Jersey,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 16841 (3d Cir. Sept. 17, 2015). In this class action arising under the ERISA relating to employer-sponsored healthcare benefit plans insured or administered by Defendants, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's grant of final approval to a class action settlement and awarded Plaintiffs attorneys' fees and costs. This case stemmed from two putative class action lawsuits filed in 2009 and 2010 in which Defendant's Horizon Blue Cross Blue Shield of New Jersey ("Horizon") subscribers and providers claimed that its use of two flawed databases – Ingenix and Top of Range (or "TOR") – caused it to systematically underpay both subscribers and providers for out-of-network healthcare services. Id. at *2. The two class actions were later consolidated. Id. After the parties settled, approximately 2.7 million of the 2.8 million class members received the Court-approved notice. Id. Six objectors filed their objections to the settlement. Id. A group of objectors sought a continuance of the hearing, which the District Court denied, and it approved the settlement. Id. at *4. On appeal, the objectors first argued that the current legal standards for assessing the fairness of a class action settlement under Rule 23(e) should be modified when the settlement consisted solely of non-pecuniary benefits. The Third Circuit refused to entertain this argument because the objectors had not raised this argument in the District Court, and also because this issue was not preserved for appeal. Id. at *7. The objectors also argued that the District Court erred because the settlement did not offer a real or substantial benefit to the class. Specifically, the objectors asserted that the settlement required the class to relinquish $10 billion in claims in order to receive an exclusively non-pecuniary relief – the discontinuation of Ingenix and TOR – which it claimed the class would have received anyway, as Horizon was planning on discounting those databases regardless of the outcome of the litigation. The Third Circuit disagreed, finding that the District Court had noted that the $10 billion damages calculation came from Plaintiffs' expert report, which at the time of the settlement, was subject to Daubert challenge, and was calculated using a model that the District Court had rejected in a similar case. The Third Circuit remarked that placed in that context, the likelihood of Plaintiffs actually recovering any portion of that damages calculation was dubious. Id. at *10. The Third Circuit agreed with the District Court that a settlement could be fair without involving pecuniary relief. Id. at *11. Finally, the objectors argued that they were denied procedural fairness in voicing their objections to the proposed settlement because the District Court refused to continue the final fairness hearing to accommodate their counsel's vacation schedule. Id. at *13. The Third Circuit pointed out that the objectors were heard through counsel in both their papers and at two sessions of the final fairness hearing and, therefore, they were not denied procedural fairness. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling.

Monteleone, et al. v. The Auto Club Group,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 510 (E.D. Mich. Jan. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of insureds, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants denied their valid property damage claims by erroneously applying the terms of their policies. Plaintiffs had homeowners policies from Defendants. Plaintiffs claimed that they paid for coverage for water damage losses where water from the home is unable to reach the municipal sewer due to a blockage or other plumbing failure, which forces the exiting water to re-enter the home through a basement or floor drain. Id at *3. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants denied coverage under the policies' exclusion, which provided that no coverage exists for water or water-borne material that backs up through sewers or drains or water which enters into and overflows from within a sump pump, sump pump well, or other type of system designed to remove sub-surface water that is drained from the foundation area. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs sought a declaratory judgment that Defendants' misinterpretation of certain policy provisions was erroneous (Count I); alleged breach of contract on behalf of the class members who purchased policies (Count II); and alleged breach of contract on behalf of class members whose claims were denied (Count III). Defendants moved to dismiss Count II, and the Court granted the motion. Defendants moved to dismiss the breach of contract claim arising out of the alleged policy of denying certain legitimate overflow claims, which was brought on behalf of all policyholders regardless of whether they sought coverage for water damage. The Court opined that Plaintiffs failed to state a claim for breach of contract arising out of the theory that all homeowners paid for certain coverage for which they did not receive. Id. at *10. The Court observed that unless Plaintiffs filed a claim with their insurer, Plaintiffs could not establish a breach under the policy, and there can be no breach in the absence of a duty. Id. Further, the Court ruled that even if Defendants' method of reviewing water damage claims relied on an improper interpretation of policy provisions, this alleged error did not give rise to a cognizable claim because no covered loss occurred for those Plaintiffs who never suffered water damage, and Defendants owed no duty to them. Id. at *11. The Court remarked that Defendants' duty to perform under the insurance contracts does not arise unless a homeowner submits a valid claim, and Plaintiffs who never filed property loss claims can show no actual injury. Id. Additionally, the Court observed a general rule of insurance law which states that an insured may not have any part of his or her premium returned once the risk attaches, even if it eventually turns out that the premium was in part unearned. Id. at *16. Because Defendants were not at risk for any legitimate claims once the insurance contract was executed, the Court found that there was no basis for the return of any premiums. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss.

(xliv) Disparate Impact Issues In Class Actions

Abril-Rivera, et al. v. U.S. Department Of Homeland Security,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13299 (1st Cir. July 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought an action under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act alleging that the Federal Emergency Management Agency's ("FEMA") implementation of a rotational staffing plan at the Puerto Rico National Processing Service Centers ("PR-NPSC") and eventual closure of the facility discriminated against them on the basis of their Puerto Rican national origin and constituted unlawful retaliation for protected conduct. Id. at *2. The FEMA established a temporary call center in Puerto Rico to address calls from Spanish-speaking victims of Hurricane Marilyn, and, in 2003, it became a full-fledged NPSC even though it lacked the state of the art furniture and equipment found in the other NPSCs. Id. at *3-4. In 2007, the FEMA's Occupational, Safety & Health Office conducted a Management Evaluation and Technical Assistance Review of the PR-NPSC facility and disclosed several serious deficiencies rated as significant risks to health and safety. Id. at *4-5. In May 2008, the Branch Chief for NPSC Operations notified the employees about the suspension of operations at the PR-NPSC until the correction of identified fire and life safety deficiencies. Id. at *6-7. Another notification to the employees in July 2008 explained that, based on the FEMA's review of the inspection result, it had decided to continue making repairs to the facility and to resume operations with a reduced staff on a rotational basis. Id. at *9. The FEMA eventually decided to close the PR-NPSC explaining that the facility, originally established only to serve a temporary mission, no longer had an operational requirement and, in view of the inadequacy of the facility, it would not be a sound investment to repair or relocate it to a new facility. Id. at *11. The District Court granted summary judgment to Defendants, finding that Defendants had legitimate, non-discriminatory reasons for their action and that Plaintiffs failed to show a causal link between their protected conduct and the purported retaliation. Id. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the First Circuit affirmed the District Court. The First Circuit agreed with the District Court that the rotational staffing plan served the FEMA's legitimate needs of maintaining as many employees as possible to assist in the event of a disaster while still maintaining a safe working environment. Id. at *22. The record was clear that the 2008 inspection revealed serious safety concerns, and the FEMA's decisions to reduce staffing levels while addressing those concerns and evaluating the future of the PR-NPSC were reasonable. Id. Further, the undisputed facts showed numerous business justifications for the conclusion that the PR-NPSC should have closed, including remedying the deficiencies identified in the 2008 inspection and establishing and operating a new facility in Puerto Rico both being expensive and lacking critical modern infrastructure. Id. at *23-24. The First Circuit thus found no contrary evidence against Defendants' legitimate business justification for its conduct and, therefore, affirmed the District Court's dismissal of Plaintiffs' disparate impact claims as baseless. Plaintiffs based their retaliation claim on an EEOC complaint filed in 2006 by several groups of PR-NPSC employees asserting less payments compared to their mainland counterparts and on an EEOC complaint filed in response to the July 2008 implementation of the rotational staffing system. Id. at *27. The First Circuit found that the first set of complaints was far too temporally remote from the challenged actions to support an inference of causality. Id. at *28. Because over 14 months had elapsed between the complaint regarding pay and the implementation of rotational staffing system during repairs, the First Circuit also reasoned that it was too long to support an inference that the complaint led to a decision to reduce staffing during fire-safety related repairs. Id. The First Circuit, therefore, concluded that the entire lawsuit was without merit and, accordingly, affirmed the District Court's judgment.

Waldon, et al. v. Cincinnati Public Schools,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12464 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendant school district terminated their employment based on § 3319.391 of the Ohio Revised Code and the firings had a racially-discriminatory impact. The House Bill 190, which the Ohio Legislature enacted in 2007 as § 3319.391 of the Ohio Revised Code, requires schools to terminate employees with certain convictions regardless of how remote in time or how little they related to the employees' qualifications. Id. at *3. Pursuant to this law, Defendant terminated Plaintiffs based on criminal matters that were decades old. Plaintiffs asserted violations of Title VII and § 4112 of the Ohio Revised Code. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. While Defendant contended that Plaintiffs had failed to show statistical proof of disparate impact of the criminal background check requirement and therefore had not shown the requirement resulted in a disparate impact, Plaintiffs contended that nine of the ten employees discharged were African-Americans, and Defendant had offered no business necessity justifying the use of the policy. Id. at *2. The Court granted Defendant's motion and denied Plaintiffs' motion. Plaintiffs offered statistical analysis showing that while African-Americans comprised slightly more than 50% of Defendant's non-licensed employees, they comprised 100% of Defendant's non-licensed employees who lost their jobs due to the criminal background check policy. Id. at *8. Defendant, however, argued that Plaintiffs were wrong to focus solely on the sub-set of employees that Defendant terminated, but should instead offer relevant statistical evidence of the effects of the policy state-wide, as § 3319.391 applied state-wide and not merely to Defendant's employees. Id. Although Plaintiffs contended that the "total group" at issue was Defendant's employee population, the Court found Defendant's position "well-taken" that the policy at issue was one that came from a state mandate, and, therefore, the onus was on Plaintiffs to show that the total group impacted state-wide was disproportionally comprised of minorities. Id. at *8-10. The Court observed that it was appropriate to view the "total group" in order to examine whether the policy had a disproportionate impact. Id. at *10. The Court found that Plaintiffs had not offered evidence showing state-wide disparate impact of the background check policy. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to establish a prima facie case, and that their claim failed as a matter of law. Id. Finally, the Court ruled that because Plaintiffs' federal claims failed, their state law claim under § 4112 also failed.

(xlv) ADA Class Actions

Heinzl, et al. v. Starbucks Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28365 (W.D. Pa. Mar. 9, 2015). Plaintiff, a customer, brought a putative class action under the ADA alleging that Defendant's facilities were not fully accessible to and independently usable by individuals who used wheelchairs for mobility. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant violated the ADA by failing to remove architectural barriers, to alter its stores' design, or construct accessible facilities, which would deter similarly-situated individuals from returning to Defendant's facilities. Id. at *4. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court denied. Defendant argued that it did not own or control the parking lots with the alleged violations, that it was only one of the many tenants at the location, and that Plaintiff had either sued the wrong party or failed to join the necessary parties. Id. at *5. Defendant further argued that Plaintiff lacked standing to bring this class action, as she claimed that she was likely to return to only three of the alleged incompliant facilities and not to 19 other locations cited in the complaint. Defendant also claimed that Plaintiff lacked standing under a deterrent effect theory because she could not allege that she had knowledge regarding barriers at other Starbucks locations, and that she could not create a standing by making class action allegations. Id. at *6. Plaintiff argued that she demonstrated an intent to return to the subject properties based upon past discriminatory conduct, a reasonable inference that the conditions would continue, and a reasonable inference that her stated intent to return were plausible. Plaintiff also contended that she satisfied the deterrent effect test based upon the barriers she encountered that impeded her safe access to Defendant's store. Id. The Court observed that because a Plaintiff only may seek injunctive relief under the ADA, and no damages were available, the case law precedents look beyond the alleged past violations and consider the possibility of future violations. Id. at *11. The Court also observed that case law precedents have used a four part test under the ADA, which requires a Plaintiff to show his or her: (i) proximity to Defendant's place; (ii) past patronage; (iii) definitiveness of return; and (iv) frequency of travel. Id. The Court noted that the intent of return test for standing in ADA cases favors the deterrent effect test. In turn, the deterrent effect test, the Court reasoned, relies on the provision in the ADA that a disabled person shall not be required to engage in a futile gesture if such person has actual notice that an organization does not intend to comply with its provision. Id. at *15. The Court observed that even under the deterrent effect test, Plaintiff must still assert an intent to return to a particular place where violations allegedly occur. The Court, however, concluded that Plaintiff had established these requirements here because she was not required to show that she would likely visit the remaining 19 locations, as such was an issue for consideration during the determination of a class certification motion, and not one for a motion to dismiss. Id. at *17. Further, the Court explained that in a class action, the issue of standing was limited to Plaintiff's individual standing, not whether Plaintiff can challenge policies as they related to a multitude of locations. Id. Finally, the Court rejected Defendant's argument that necessary parties were not included in this action. The Court explained that Defendant had numerous alternatives to overcome this, since it could notify the landlords to comply with the ADA, and could join or implead the landlords as additional Defendants. Id. at *32. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss, finding that Plaintiff had standing to bring this action.

Mielo, et al. v. Aurora Huts, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1471 (W.D. Pa. Jan. 7, 2015). Plaintiff, a wheelchair bound individual, brought a class action alleging that, when he visited Defendant's retail property, he experienced unnecessary difficulty and risk due to excessively sloped surfaces in a purportedly accessible parking space and access aisle. Plaintiff asserted that investigators examined multiple retail locations owned by Defendant, and they found numerous specified conditions in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") at each of the locations. Plaintiff alleged a failure to remove architectural barriers in violation of 42 U.S.C. § 12182(b)(2)(A)(iv) and a failure to alter, design, or construct accessible facilities in violation of § 12183(a)(1) that deterred him from returning to or visiting Defendant's facilities. Plaintiff asserted that, without injunctive relief, he would be unable to fully access Defendant's facilities. Id. at *9. Defendant moved to dismiss, and the Court denied the motion. The Court noted that, because the remedy for a private ADA Title III violation is injunctive relief, it must look beyond the alleged past violations and consider the possibility of future violations. Plaintiff, therefore, had to demonstrate a real and immediate threat of injury in order to satisfy the injury-in-fact requirement of standing. Id. at *11. Defendant argued that Plaintiff lacked standing because, although he alleged that he visited one location, he did not claim to have visited any of the other 12 locations identified in the complaint, nor did he allege any concrete plans to visit any of the locations in the future. Further, Defendant contended that Plaintiff's lack of definitive allegations regarding plans to return to all locations described in the complaint resulted in a failure to sufficiently allege standing to assert ADA claims. The Court observed that Heinzl v. Boston Market Corp., 2014 WL 5803144 (W.D. Pa. Nov. 7, 2014), held that, when a Plaintiff has presented a class action complaint, the issue of standing is limited to Plaintiff's individual standing, not whether Plaintiff can challenge policies as they relate to a multitude of locations, which is an issue of class certification. Id. at *14. Further, the Court noted that the question of whether an injunction properly may extend to stores that Plaintiff has not actually visited should be answered by asking whether Plaintiff can serve as a representative of a class that seeks such relief. Id. at *15. Thus, the Court found that the issue of standing should not be conflated with class certification under Rule 23. Id. Additionally, the Court observed that, at the pleading stage, general factual allegations of injury resulting from Defendant's conduct may suffice because, on a motion to dismiss, the Court presumes that general allegations embrace those specific facts that are necessary to support the claim. Id. Accordingly, the Court opined that, at this initial stage of litigation, Plaintiff sufficiently alleged the requirements of standing and denied Defendant's motion to dismiss for lack of standing. Additionally, the Court noted that Plaintiff alleged a commonality of barriers and a centralized policy regarding the management and operation of Defendant's facilities, as well as a lack of plan or policy that was reasonably calculated to make Defendant's facilities fully accessible to and independently usable by individuals with mobility disabilities. Plaintiff alleged specific conditions at each location that violated the regulations promulgated pursuant to the ADA and provided sufficient factual allegations to plausibly state a cause of action for relief pursuant to the ADA. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6).

National Federation Of The Blind Of California, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51767 (N.D. Cal. April 17, 2015). Plaintiffs, National Federation of the Blind of California ("NFBC") and three individuals, brought a class action alleging that Defendants discriminated against blind individuals by refusing to transport guide dogs in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"), the California Unruh Civil Rights Act, and the California Disabled Persons Act ("DPA"). Defendants use mobile software applications to arrange rides between passengers and their drivers. To use Defendants' services, a customer submits a request through a mobile software application. Individuals who downloaded Defendants' mobile software application agreed to Defendants' terms of service, including an agreement to submit all disputes to binding arbitration. Id. at *3. Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint for failure to establish standing and failure to state a claim. Specifically, Defendants alleged that Plaintiffs NFBC, Hingson, and Pedersen did not have standing to sue under the ADA or state law and that Defendant Uber was not a public accommodation under the ADA. The Court denied the motion to dismiss on all grounds. First, the Court found that NFBC met the test set forth in Hunt v. Washington State Apple Advertising Commission, 432 U.S. 333, 342 (1977), for associational standing because: (i) at least one Plaintiff had standing to sue in his own right; (ii) NFBC's purpose – to achieve the integration of the blind into society on a basis of equality with the sighted – was relevant to the purpose of the litigation; and (iii) NFBC was seeking to represent its members in claims for declaratory and injunctive relief that did not require individualized proof. Id. at *8-9. Second, the Court found that the arbitration agreements were not a bar to associational standing because NFBC brought claims on behalf of members who had standing and did not seek monetary relief. Id. at *10-11. Third, the Court concluded that prudential considerations did not preclude NFBC's associational standing because NFBC was not simply standing in for one of its members, but rather it represented a broad membership base that allegedly had been injured by Defendants. Id. at *11-12. Fourth, the Court noted that the ADA does not require Plaintiffs to engage in futile gestures, and Plaintiffs can establish injury-in-fact under the ADA by showing that they were deterred from visiting an accommodation on specific occasions because of known barriers. Id. at *12-13. The Court also found that Plaintiff Hingson had standing because he had knowledge that Defendants turned away disabled individuals with service animals and believed that there was a likelihood of continued discrimination. Id. at *15. Fifth, the Court concluded that Plaintiff Hingson could seek monetary recovery under the Unruh Act Claims and the DPA for his actual harm and his attorneys' fees because the ADA did not provide for those two remedies. Id. at *17. Finally, the Court found that, because the NFBC had standing under the ADA, it also had standing to pursue state law claims. Id. at *17-18. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss the complaint.

Vondersaar, et al. v. Starbucks Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18222 (C.D. Cal. Feb. 12, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of disabled individuals, brought an Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") action alleging that an unspecified number of Defendant's stores had pick-up counters that were too high for Plaintiffs to reach. Plaintiffs alleged that thousands of stores across the country had high counters, and identified 50 such stores in California, some of which Plaintiffs had personally visited. Plaintiffs moved for certification of a nationwide class comprised of all disabled wheelchair and scooter users who were adversely affected by high counters in Defendant's stores constructed between January 26, 1993 and 2005. Id. at *2-3. The Court denied the motion. Defendant submitted evidence that no California store location currently had a counter higher than 34 inches. The Court observed that because a private Plaintiff can sue only for injunctive relief under the ADA, a Defendant's voluntary removal of alleged barriers prior to trial can moot a Plaintiff's ADA claim. Id. at *5. Further, the Court noted that inherently transitory class claims, which by their nature are capable of repetition or likely to repeat as to the class, are not mooted upon the mooting of the proposed class representative's claim, and that a Defendant's litigation decision to "pick off" a named class representative may also render a claim transitory and preclude a finding of mootness. Id. Here, Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant picked off class representatives in a perpetual "cat and mouse game" whereby Plaintiffs visited a store and Defendant then fixed those counters and asserted mootness. Id. The Court, however, found that Defendant had not lowered counters only at those stores visited by the named Plaintiffs, nor had it limited its alterations to the broader set of stores specifically identified in the complaint. Defendant had instead addressed the counter height issue at every one of its stores in California, which the Court opined did not amount to a focused attempt to "pick off" the named Plaintiffs. Id. at *6. Thus, the Court concluded that the transitory claim exception to the mootness doctrine was inapplicable. Plaintiffs contended that the absence of the alleged violations within California did not moot Plaintiffs' ADA claim because named Plaintiff Taruc regularly traveled outside California, and had encountered a high counter at a Defendant store in Arizona. Plaintiffs, however, had not alleged any of these facts regarding Taruc in the complaint, and only raised them for the first time in their reply in support of their motion. Defendant thus had no opportunity to respond to Plaintiffs' contentions. Nevertheless, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to carry their burden to demonstrate that Taruc's claims and the defenses against them were typical of those of the class, or that Taruc would be an adequate class representative. Id. at *7. The Court thereby denied Plaintiffs' motion to certify the ADA class.

Wagner, et al. v. White Castle System, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125773 (S.D. Ohio Sept. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant discriminated against them in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") by failing to have accessible facilities at 54 of its Ohio-based White Castle restaurant sites. Plaintiffs alleged that they had encountered architectural barriers at the White Castles they had visited that made it more difficult for them to enter the premises, to eat inside the premises, and to use the counters; as a result, they were denied the full and equal access to Defendant's restaurants. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs sought a permanent injunction, requiring Defendant to correct the alleged problems, and also asked for costs and attorneys' fees. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs sought to represent a class of individuals with mobility impairment, who desired to use Defendant's White Castle locations in Ohio. Id. at *4-5. The Court denied the motion, finding that they had not met their burden under Rule 23(a)(2). In light of Plaintiffs' allegations and the evidence before it at that time, the Court was persuaded by the approach that the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania took under similar circumstances in Mielo v. Bob Evans Farms, Inc., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36905 (W.D. Penn. Mar. 23, 2015). Id. at *12. The Court in Mielo held that the proposed class members would not share common legal issues or salient core facts and any determinations regarding ADA compliance would have to be answered on a store-by-store basis. Id. at *13-14. Similarly, the Court observed here that Plaintiffs had not demonstrated that there was a common answer to the question of whether the putative class members had been denied the full and equal enjoyment of the goods, services, facilities, privileges, advantages, or accommodations of Defendant's facilities due to Defendant's failure to operate its facilities in compliance with the ADA. Id. at *15. The Court determined that Plaintiffs presented no evidence of a common design or blueprint as to any specific feature of Defendant's 54 Ohio-based White Castle restaurants, or a common policy applicable to the stores. Id. at *15-16. Moreover, Plaintiffs provided no counter-evidence to the affidavit offered by Defendant's Director of Engineering who averred that the restaurants varied significantly. Id. at *16. The Court pointed out that even Plaintiffs' own expert identified varied alleged ADA violations among the handful of restaurants he visited. Id. The Court remarked that Plaintiffs had presented no evidence of the years in which the 54 challenged White Castle restaurants were built and, therefore, which legal standard applied in terms of the ADA's requirements. Id. at *17. The Court maintained even if they had, differences in applicable law would require it to answer a variety of restaurant-specific questions. Id. Accordingly, the Court declined certification of a Rule 23 class, but allowed Plaintiffs to re-file for class certification at a later date if they were able to present evidence demonstrating that a narrower or more specifically defined class of individuals met the prerequisites for Rule 23 class certification. Id. at *18-19.

(xlvi) Government Enforcement Litigation

Case New Holland, Inc. v. EEOC,* Case No. 13-CV-1176 (D.D.C. Sept. 22, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employers, brought an action alleging that the EEOC and certain EEOC officials violated the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA") and the Fourth and Fifth Amendments of the U.S. Constitution by sending e-mails and web-linked inquiries to 1,330 business e-mail addresses of Plaintiffs' employees without prior notice to Plaintiffs. Id. at 1. The e-mails allegedly contained a link to a series of questions relevant to the EEOC's investigation into allegations that Plaintiffs discriminated against job applicants and current and former employees. Plaintiffs alleged that the EEOC's e-mails disrupted its business operations, and the blast e-mail trolled for individuals to sue Plaintiffs and force a monetary settlement regardless of the merits of any claim. Id. at 2. In October 2014, the Court dismissed the action without prejudice, finding that Plaintiffs' claims were conclusory, consisting of generalities and speculation that were insufficient to establish a cognizable injury, and nothing in the complaint suggested that litigation was impending. Id. at 2-3. Plaintiffs moved to reconsider the dismissal order, or in the alternative to grant leave to Plaintiffs to file a first amended complaint. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to alter or amend its previous order, but granted leave to file an amended complaint. The Court found that the factual assertions presented in Plaintiffs' complaint, even if assumed to be true, were insufficient to allege a cognizable injury, and that it applied the appropriate standard while entering the dismissal order. Id. at 6. Plaintiffs argued that they were injured-in-fact by the statutory and constitutional violations, regardless of other harm or results, merely because the complaint contained allegations that Defendants violated the APA and U.S. Constitution. Id. The Court, however, pointed out that standing principles demand some form of injury and not a mere showing that a law has been violated. Id. at 6-7. Because the Court did not reach the merits of Plaintiffs' claims, and dismissed the action without prejudice so as to provide Plaintiffs with an opportunity to remedy their shortcomings by amending the pleadings, the Court permitted Plaintiffs to file an amended complaint. Id. at 7-8. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to alter or amend the dismissal order and granted leave to file a first amended complaint.

Editor's Note: This case represents the rare instance where an employer initiated litigation against the EEOC over its alleged unlawful investigatory techniques.

County Of Cook, et al. v. Bank Of America Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34468 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 19, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action alleging that Defendants discriminated against African-American and Hispanic borrowers in violation of the Fair Housing Act ("FHA"). Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that Defendants targeted minority borrowers and made approximately 95,000 home loans with less favorable terms and conditions than loans made to similarly-situated white borrowers. Id. at *2. Defendants moved to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiff lacked Article III and statutory standing, and that Plaintiff failed to state any FHA claims upon which relief could be granted. The Court denied Defendants' motion on the basis that Plaintiff asserted an adequate injury-in-fact that was plausibly connected to Defendants' alleged discriminatory lending activities. Id. at *11. Plaintiff asserted several distinct injuries arising from Defendants' alleged discriminatory practices, including: (i) an eroding tax base; (ii) declining property tax revenues; (iii) the cost of providing government services associated with foreclosed and/or vacant properties; (iv) lost recording fee income; and (v) intangible injuries to the fabric of its communities. Id. at *8. The Court found that Plaintiff's asserted injuries satisfied Article III's injury-in-fact requirement. Id. Defendants also argued that Plaintiff did not fall within the FHA's zone of interests. Because the Court had already determined that Plaintiff's complaint satisfied Article III's standing requirements, and found a plausible causal connection between Defendants' alleged conduct and Plaintiff's injuries, it declined to undertake a separate zone of interests analysis. Id. at *12. Defendant further asserted that the FHA's two-year statute of limitations barred Plaintiff's claims. The Court, however, applied the continuing violation doctrine, finding that Plaintiff's complaint was not limited to discrete home loan decisions made between 2004 and 2008, but that Defendants "continued" to charge minority borrowers discriminatory fees and costs during the servicing of home loans. Id. at *14-16. Finally, Defendant contended that Plaintiff failed to state plausible disparate treatment and disparate impact claims. The Court rejected this argument, finding that Plaintiff's central allegation – that Defendants targeted minority borrowers and steered them into more expensive home loans with a higher risk of default than loans made to similarly-situated white borrowers – was sufficient to state a plausible disparate treatment claim. Id. at *17-18. Because Plaintiff's disparate impact claim was cognizable under the FHA and because Plaintiff identified specific practices that allegedly caused minority borrowers to receive a disproportionate share of high cost home loans, the Court concluded that Plaintiff had sufficiently alleged a disparate impact claim. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Lone Star College System, et al. v. EEOC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30266 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 12, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action alleging that the EEOC failed to follow its own procedures and regulations in conducting an investigation into Plaintiff's employment practices. Plaintiff alleged eleven claims against the EEOC, including opening an investigation without an authorizing regulation; violating the duty to verify an aggrieved party's charge; attempting to depose Plaintiff's general counsel and inquire into matters protected by the attorney-client privilege; disclosing information to a third-party; requiring compliance with investigations that constitute undue hardship for the company; subjecting it to unreasonable searches and seizures in violation of the Fourth Amendment; and violating the Fifth Amendment by demanding access Plaintiff's data. Id. at *2-3. The EEOC filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court granted in its entirety. The Administrative Procedure Act ("APA") authorizes judicial review of a final agency action, and without a final agency action, a Court lacks subject-matter jurisdiction over an APA claim. Id. at *7. The Court found that it lacked jurisdiction because the alleged claims involved no final agency action. According to the Court, the EEOC's actions during the investigation process, including issuing a subpoena and making reasonable cause determination, were not final actions appropriate for judicial review because they did not fix obligations or legal relationships or change the legal position of the party being investigated. Id. at *11. Plaintiff argued that the EEOC's written determination on its petition to revoke the subpoenas was a final agency action sufficient to garner judicial review. The Court, however, rejected that argument, finding that the EEOC could not enforce subpoenas without a Court's order and thus the determination fixed no obligation or consequences to Plaintiff. Id. at *13. The Court explained that, although compliance with an EEOC subpoena might "speed the investigation along, and in many cases is the right thing to do, there may be valid reasons not to comply" absent a Court's order. Id. Therefore, according to the Court, if Plaintiff believed that the charge was invalid or insufficient, its remedy was to refuse to comply with the EEOC's subpoenas in accordance with regulations regarding such refusals to comply, and if the EEOC sought judicial enforcement of its subpoenas, it would have to demonstrate the validity of the charge to the Court. Id. at *17. Because the claims at issue were not brought in relation to the judicial enforcement of a subpoena, the Court concluded that Plaintiff did not challenge a final action, and thus the claims were not ripe for review. Id. at *16. The Court also rejected Plaintiff's claim that the EEOC's questioning of its general counsel about privileged matters was unauthorized, and that the investigator was biased. The Court noted that all of Plaintiff's claims involved different facets of the investigation process, and thus, were not the kind of exceptional circumstances that could persuade it to overlook the requirement for final agency action. Id. at *17-18. Moreover, the regulations that Plaintiff claimed to be violated state that a violation does not create an enforceable right against the EEOC or its officers or employees. The Court thus found no stand-alone cause of action for a violation of the regulation. Id. at *19. Claiming that the EEOC plan to provide a third-party with a list of all of Plaintiff's Hispanic employees, Plaintiff sought a declaratory judgment and injunction prohibiting the disclosure. The Court, however, found that the claim did not involve a final agency action because the information had not yet been released and the Court could not engage in pre-violation review of the EEOC's actions. Id. at *22-23. As to the alleged constitutional violations, the Court found no injury because the EEOC had not yet required Plaintiff to submit to any searches or seizures, or sought enforcement of the subpoena. Id. at *24. The Court therefore concluded that the complained-of-actions could be raised for judicial review only if the EEOC sought judicial enforcement, and until then it lacked jurisdiction over Plaintiff's claims. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motion to dismiss.

Poursaied, et al. v. EEOC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 153686 (M.D.N.C. Nov. 13, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action alleging that Defendants – the EEOC and Defendant Constangy, Brooks, Smith, & Prophete, LLP ("Constangy") – violated the Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA"). This case arose out a discrimination action that Plaintiff filed against her former employer, the Wake Forest University Baptist Medical Center ("WFUBMC"). In this action, Plaintiff contended that the EEOC released her file to Constangy, WFUBMC's counsel, without her permission. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff claimed that Constangy sent her a copy of her EEOC file via unsafe e-mail, and later sent a physical copy through standard mail, which caused her serious emotional injury. Id. at *3. Defendants moved to dismiss, and the Court granted the motion. At the outset, the Court noted that the FOIA grants Courts authority to enjoin agencies from withholding agency records, and to order an agency to produce records improperly withheld from a complainant. Id. at *4. The Court found that Plaintiff did not claim that the EEOC improperly withheld agency records, and she admitted that this case was not about improperly withheld records. Id. at *5. The Court further determined that the complaint also contained no allegations relating to Plaintiff's administrative remedies. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff failed to state a claim under the FOIA. The Court noted that while the complaint could be construed as an attempt to invoke the Privacy Act ("PA"), which prohibits agencies from disclosing certain types of records without consent, the complaint still failed to state a claim. Id. at *6. The Court observed that Plaintiff did not plead any cognizable pecuniary damages, which is a requirement to state a claim under the PA. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff failed to state a claim under either the FOIA or the PA, and dismissed the complaint.

United States v. City Of Jacksonville,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74422 (M.D. Fla. June 9, 2015). In this Title VII action, the U.S. Department Of Justice and other intervener Plaintiffs alleged that ten specific promotion exams the City of Jacksonville and the firefighters union conducted between 2004 and 2011 with the City's Fire Department caused a disparate impact on African-American candidates. After completion of discovery, the parties both moved for summary judgment on the issue of whether Plaintiffs had presented a prima facie case of disparate impact based on race under § 707 of Title VII. The Court held a hearing to determine whether Plaintiffs had demonstrated disparate impact as to any of the ten challenged exams, and examined the testimony of the parties' experts that explained the statistical calculations and methodologies at issue. The Court found that, as to nine of the ten tests, Plaintiffs had offered statistical evidence of a kind and degree sufficient to show that the practice in question had caused the exclusion of applicants for jobs or promotions because of their membership in a protected group. Id at *5. Thus, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs had made the necessary prima facie showing of disparate impact to warrant the continuance of the lawsuit. The Court, however, deferred the motions for summary judgement as to the rank order use of the tenth test until further discovery was taken to determine whether the results may be aggregated with those of the 2006 district chief suppression exams. Id at *6. Accordingly, the District Court granted Plaintiffs' motions for summary judgement.

United States v. Maricopa County,* Case No. 12-CV-981 (D. Ariz. June 15, 2015). The U.S. Department of Justice ("DOJ") brought an action alleging that Defendants, Maricopa County, its Sheriff and head of the Maricopa County Sheriff's Office ("MCSO"), violated the U.S. Constitution and federal statutes by engaging in a pattern or practice of discrimination against Latinos in Maricopa County. The DOJ alleged discriminatory police conduct directed at Latinos, including stopping, detaining, and arresting Latinos on the basis of race, denying Latino prisoners with limited English language skills constitutional protections, and illegally retaliating against perceived critics through baseless criminal actions, lawsuits, and administrative actions. Id. at 9. The DOJ asserted violations of 42 U.S.C. § 14141 and the Fourteenth Amendment based on a pattern or practice of law enforcement practices, including traffic stops, workplace raids, home raids, and jail operations, with the intent to discriminate, and a pattern or practice of unreasonable searches and seizures conducted without probable cause or reasonable suspicion. Id. The DOJ also asserted violations of Title VI based on the use of federal financial assistance by persons alleged to be engaging in discriminatory law enforcement practices and violations of Title VI's contractual assurances. Id. Defendants moved for summary judgement, arguing that the claims were moot because of a related action. In 2007, private individuals had initiated a class action against Defendants alleging racial discrimination against Latinos under the guise of enforcing immigration law (the "Melendres" action). The Melendres action focused on "saturation patrols," described as "crime suppression sweeps" in which officers saturated a given area and targeted persons who appeared to be Latino for investigation of their immigration status. Id. at 2. Following the issuance of findings of facts and conclusion of law, the Court in Melendres enjoined the MCSO from using Hispanic ancestry or race as a factor in making law enforcement decisions, and implemented standards for bias-free detention and arrest policies and training, including the appointment of an independent monitor to report on the compliance of the Sheriff and the MCSO and collection of traffic stop data (the "Melendres injunction"). Id. at 3-4. Although Defendants appealed and argued that the evidence was insufficient to sustain Court's conclusion in Melendres that the unconstitutional policies extended beyond the context of saturation patrols, the Ninth Circuit found that the Court in Melendres did not err in finding that Defendants' policy applied across-the-board to all enforcement decisions. Id. at 5. Based on these findings, Defendants argued that the DOJ's claims involving discriminatory traffic stops were moot. The Court denied Defendants' motion, finding that it would be premature to conclude that the DOJ's allegations would lead to a replica of the Melendres injunction. Id. at 15. Defendants argued that the Melendres injunction eliminated the threat of immediate and future discriminatory traffic stops as well as the ability of Court to provide redress for those claims. Id. at 9. Although portions of the DOJ's claims of discriminatory policing involved conduct addressed in the Melendres litigation, the Court noted that the DOJ's claims also included allegations regarding discriminatory home raids, worksite raids, and non-motor vehicle related arrests and detentions. The Court thus found that the DOJ had extended its claims to discrimination in general law enforcement, and its interest was distinct from those of Plaintiffs in Melendres. Id. at 14. The Court further found that the Melendres injunction did not moot the portions of the DOJ's claims which overlapped with Melendres because continued violations by the Sheriff and the MCSO following the issuance of the injunction demonstrated a real and immediate threat of future harm, as well as the importance of granting the DOJ the authority to enforce injunctive relief addressing the MCSO's discriminatory traffic stops. Id. Moreover, Plaintiff's broader claims might lead to different injunctive measure than those put forth in Melendres. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion for summary judgment.

(xlvii) Alien Tort Statute And Trafficking Victims Class Actions

Menocal, et al. v. The Geo Group, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87831 (D. Colo. July 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of detainees at a private for-profit immigration detention facility maintained by Defendant, brought a class action alleging violations of the Colorado Minimum Wage Order ("CMWO") and the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's ("TVPA"). Plaintiffs alleged that, while at the facility, they participated in a "voluntary work program" performing tasks such as doing laundry and preparing meals for compensation of $1 per day instead of the Colorado minimum wage, in violation of the CMWO. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs also alleged that each day Defendant required six randomly selected detainees to clean the facility's "pods" without compensation under threat of solitary confinement, in violation of the TVPA. Id. The Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss in part. First, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs were not "employees" under the FLSA, and that the CMWO did not extend to those working in government custody. Defendant cited Alvarado Guevara v. I.N.S., 902 F.2d 394, 396 (5th Cir. 1990), which held that immigration detainees did not qualify for protection under the FLSA because they were not employees. Id. at *3-4. Defendant also cited an Advisory Bulletin from the Colorado Department of Labor ("CDOL"), which declared that inmates and prisoners were exempt from the CMWO and were not employees according to Colorado law. Id. at *4. Defendant asserted that the reasoning in Alvarado applied here because immigration detainees were housed by the government and did not require the minimum wage to bring up their standard of living. Id. The Court remarked that, although immigration detainees appeared to fall under the broad definition of "employee," so did prisoners, and the CDOL had found that the CMWO's definition of "employee" should not apply to prisoners. Id. Further, because immigration detainees, like prisoners, did not use their wages to provide for themselves, the Court opined that the purposes of the CMWO were not served by including them in the definition of "employee." Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' CMWO claims. Defendant further argued that the TVPA was inapplicable because its purpose was to prevent human trafficking. Defendant also contended that 18 U.S.C. § 1584, which prohibits "knowingly and willfully holding any person to involuntary servitude," required dismissal of Plaintiffs' TVPA claims. Id. at *12. The Court observed that, in U.S. v. Kozminski, 487 U.S. 931 (1988), the U.S. Supreme Court held that § 1584 reaches only compulsion of services by use of physical or legal, as opposed to psychological, coercion. Id. Further, in Channer v. Hall, 112 F.3d 214 (5th Cir. 1997), the Fifth Circuit held that an immigration detainee forced to work in the kitchen under threat of solitary confinement was not subjected to involuntary servitude in violation of the Thirteenth Amendment. Id. The Court noted that both Kozminski and Channer interpreted the term "involuntary servitude," whereas § 1589 reached "whoever obtains the labor or services of a person by threats of physical restraint." Id. at *14. Thus, the Court opined that the language at issue here was broader than the language at issue in Kozminski and Channer. Finally, the Court observed that Defendant cited no authority for reading a civic duty exception into § 1589, or for applying such an exception to a private, for-profit corporation under contract with the government. Thus, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' TVPA claim.

You, et al. v. Japan,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 167219 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 14, 2015). In this putative class action for personal injury and crimes against humanity during the Second World War, the Court granted six out of the 20 Defendants' motion to dismiss, and granted one Defendant's motion for summary judgment in part. Plaintiffs, a group of Korean citizens, alleged that the Japanese government abducted them, forced them into servitude, and exploited them as sex slaves for the benefit of Japanese soldiers at comfort stations in Japan. Plaintiffs brought claims under the Alien Tort Claims Act ("ATCA") against five categories of Defendants, which they referred to as "Wartime Defendants," "Corporation Defendants," "Headquarter Defendants," "Subsidiary Defendants," and "Individual Defendants." Id. at *3. Each of the six moving Defendants was the U.S. subsidiary of a parent company based in Japan. Without specifying whether they were referring to the parent or the subsidiary, Plaintiffs alleged that each of the moving Defendants provided war material to Japan during Second World War, and that each realized huge profit from such conduct. Id. at *4. At the outset, the Court noted that in 1951, Japan entered into a treaty of peace with the Allied Powers, and Article 14 of the Treaty required Japan to pay certain reparations to the Allied Powers for the damage and suffering it caused during the war. Id. at *6. Additionally, the 1951 Treaty ("1951 Treaty") included a waiver of all claims of the Allied Powers and their nationals arising out of any actions taken by Japan and its nationals in the course of the prosecution of the war. Id. The Court observed that in 1965, Japan entered into a treaty with Republic of Korea ("1965 Treaty"), and § 1 of Article II of the Treaty settled completely and finally, all claims between the parties and their nationals, including those addressed in the 1951 Treaty. Id. at *7. The Court further noted that in Joo v. Japan, 413 F.3d. 45 (D.C. Cir. 2005), the D.C. Circuit dismissed similar claims because they presented non-justiciable political questions. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs in Joo argued that the 1951 Treaty with Japan only waived claims by Americans against Japan and its nationals, and not the claims by citizens of other non-party nations. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs in Joo also argued that Korea believed that its citizens' claims against Japan and its nationals survived the 1965 Treaty. The United States submitted a statement of interest in Joo, asserting that the Congress precluded Americans and non-Americans from bringing their war-related claims against Japan or use the American judicial system as a venue to litigate any such claims. Id. at *7-8. As to the 1965 Treaty, the Court held that it was not the province of the Court to decide whether Korea's reading or Japan's reading of the treaty between them was correct. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' claims against the moving Defendants must be dismissed inasmuch as they presented non-justiciable political questions. Id. at *15. Moreover, the Court noted that the wrongs in question occurred more than 70 years ago, while the longest limitations period of any of Plaintiffs' claims was 10 years under the ATCA. Id. at *16. The Court opined that Plaintiffs failed to make credible arguments to overcome the time-bar on their claims, and accordingly, dismissed those claims against the moving Defendants. Id. at *20.

(xlviii) Workplace Antitrust Class Actions

In Re Animation Workers Antitrust Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111262 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 20, 2015). In this consolidated class action brought by three former employees alleging that Defendants, various animation and visual effects studios, engaged in a conspiracy to fix and suppress employee compensation and to restrict employee mobility, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss and found that Plaintiffs timely and sufficiently pled federal and California antitrust claims. In 2014, Plaintiffs, a group of artists and engineers employed by one or more of Defendants, filed a series of class action complaints asserting that Defendants violated Sherman Act and California's Cartwright Act and Unfair Competition Law ("UCL") by conspiring to suppress employee compensation by entering into non-solicitation agreements and agreeing on salary ranges. The Court had previously dismissed Plaintiffs' antitrust claims as time-barred. Id. at *47. Plaintiffs then filed a second amended complaint alleging that Defendants concealed the conspiracy, preventing Plaintiffs from timely filing their claims. Defendants moved to dismiss the second amended complaint. In denying dismissal, the Court found that Plaintiffs had adequately pled fraudulent concealment, and the statute of limitations could be tolled. Id. at *48. The Court found that Plaintiffs' allegations that Defendants made pre-textual statements regarding compensation – that salaries were based on performance, skills, and proficiency – in combination with allegations that they actively concealed and ensured the secrecy of the conspiracy – were sufficient to allege "affirmative acts." Id. at *62-64. The Court also found that Plaintiffs made more detailed allegations with respect to Defendants' affirmative attempts to maintain the secrecy of the conspiracy, and their attempt to conceal the existence of the conspiracy. This included the allegations that Defendants opted for in-person meetings; they explained the non-solicitation agreement as a "gentleman's agreement" because it was not in writing; and Lucasfilm made affirmative efforts to eliminate a paper trail regarding its code-named "DNR" agreements, including a requirement that all discussions of "DNR" needed to be conducted over the phone. Id. at *67. According to the Court, these factual allegations raised the reasonable inference that Defendants took affirmative steps to conceal the details of their conspiracy. The Court found that Plaintiffs adequately alleged that they did not have actual or constructive knowledge of their claims, and they acted diligently once the claims were discovered. Id. at *76-77. Plaintiffs claimed that they had no reason to know that Defendants conspired to suppress compensation until 2013, when incriminating documents were unsealed and filed publicly in the related litigation entitled In Re High-Tech Employees Antitrust Litigation. Id. at *77. Plaintiffs diligently pursued and investigated their claims shortly after the documents disclosing the conspiracy were first released, and also tried to obtain information concerning their claims, but were met with misrepresentations. Id. Taking the allegations as true, the Court determined that the fraudulent concealment claim was sufficient to toll the statute of limitations. Id. at *80. The Court therefore denied Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims as time-barred. The Court also denied Defendant Blue Sky and Sony Pictures' separate motions to dismiss, finding that Plaintiffs were not obligated to allege fraudulent concealment as to each Defendant. Id. at *88. In addition, the Court noted that Plaintiffs made plausible claims for relief against Blue Sky and Sony because, at a minimum, the inclusion of Blue Sky on Pixar's anti-solicitation list rendered it plausible that Blue Sky was an active participant in the conspiracy. Id. at *90. Plaintiffs further supported their claims with allegations of conversations between Blue Sky's Human Resources Director and other Defendants concerning no-poaching practices. Id. Similarly, the Court found that Plaintiffs had adequately alleged that Defendant Sony participated in the conspiracy, as they claimed that Sony and Pixar executives met and reached a "gentleman's agreement" where neither company's recruiters would approach the others' employees, and provided evidence that Sony was included on Pixar's "do not poach" list and that Sony HR representatives exchanged sensitive compensation information with competitors, including salary information, salary budgets, salary ranges, and overtime. Id. at *94-95. Plaintiffs further alleged sufficient facts to support a plausible per se claim that Defendants conspired to suppress the compensation of the putative class by systematically sharing information and agreeing not to solicit each other's employees, and that the purpose of the information-sharing and no-poaching scheme was to suppress wages. Id. at *105. The Court therefore held that Plaintiffs successfully alleged a single conspiracy to suppress the compensation of Defendants' employees. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

In Re VHS Of Michigan, Inc., d/b/a Detroit Medical Center,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 1816 (6th Cir. Feb. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of registered nurses ("RNs"), brought a class action against eight local hospitals in the Detroit area alleging that Defendant engaged in a conspiracy to suppress nurses' wages in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. Seven hospitals settled, leaving Detroit Medical Center as the only remaining Defendant. Plaintiffs alleged two theories of liability, including: (i) a per se theory that the hospitals had a wage-fixing agreement; and (ii) a rule of reason theory that the hospitals softened competition by sharing compensation information. Id. at *2-3. The District Court granted summary judgment on the per se argument and then certified the class. On Defendant's appeal, in light of the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, 133 S. Ct. 1426 (2013), the Sixth Circuit ordered the District Court to reconsider class certification. On remand, the District Court analyzed Comcast, determined that it did not call into question its prior decision, and then reinstated its order granting class certification. Id. at *3. The District Court noted that Comcast would apply if Plaintiffs' two initial theories of liability brought about separate and distinct harm to the class members, and Plaintiffs' damages calculation aggregated those distinct harms. Id. Plaintiffs' damages calculation, however, did not aggregate distinct harms because Plaintiffs' two theories of liability were mutually exclusive, and Plaintiffs' damages calculation could equally represent either theory of recovery. Id. at *4. Defendant filed a petition seeking permission to appeal, and the Sixth Circuit denied the petition. Relying primarily on Comcast, Defendant contended that Plaintiffs had not established a link between their damages model and their rule of reason theory and that the damages from Plaintiffs' two theories could be aggregated. Id. At the outset, the Sixth Circuit found that the District Court correctly concluded that Defendant's argument did not implicate the concerns of Comcast. Comcast applies where multiple theories of liability exist, those theories create separable anti-competitive effects, and the combined effects can result in aggregated damages. Id. at *5. The Sixth Circuit held that, where there is no chance of aggregated damages attributable to rejected liability theories, the Supreme Court's concerns in Comcast do not apply. Id. The Sixth Circuit agreed with the District Court that Plaintiffs' two theories of anti-competitive conduct – the per se wage-fixing claim and the rule of reason "softened competition" claim – were mutually exclusive. Id. Further, the Sixth Circuit noted that, because Plaintiffs' damages calculation applied to either theory of anti-competitive conduct, Plaintiffs did not improperly aggregate damages. Id. The Sixth Circuit ruled that the case did not raise the aggregated-damages concern present in Comcast. Id. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit concluded that Defendant failed to show that it was likely to succeed in making the requisite strong showing that the District Court abused its discretion, and denied Defendant's request to appeal. Id. at *6.

Ryan, et al. v. Microsoft Corp.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 158944 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 23, 2015). Plaintiffs, two former employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendant unlawfully suppressed their wages by entering into multiple employee non-solicitation agreements with its competitors. The case was spawned by the same U.S. Department of Justice ("DOJ") investigation that eventually resulted in several class action wage suppression antitrust suits brought against a number of Silicon Valley technology companies. In those cases, the Court eventually approved settlements totaling $435 million. In this case, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs delayed too long before filing suit and dismissed all counts of their first amended complaint with prejudice. In 2009, the DOJ initiated an investigation of the employment and recruitment practices of a number of Silicon Valley technology companies. In 2010, the DOJ filed two lawsuits against seven different companies. Those companies entered into stipulated final judgments in which they agreed to injunctions preventing them from entering into or maintaining any agreement not to solicit each other's employees. Id. at *3-4. In 2009, the DOJ also opened an investigation into possible antitrust violations by Defendant, but on October 29, 2014, it informed Defendant that it would not pursue a case against it. Id. at *27. Plaintiff's class action complaint, which was filed on October 16, 2014, asserted four causes of action, including: (i) § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1; (ii) California's Cartwright Act, Cal. Bus & Prof. Code § 16720; (iii) California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code, §§ 17200, et seq.; and (iv) California Business and Professions Code §§ 16600, et seq. Id. at *13. Each of the claims was subject to a four year statute of limitations. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs must allege that the causes of action accrued on or after October 16, 2010, or that the statute of limitations were tolled until at least October 16, 2010. Id. at *22. The Court had previously dismissed Plaintiffs' original complaint on the grounds that the statute of limitations had expired. In granting leave to amend, the Court warned that failure to cure the timeliness problem would result in dismissal of the complaint with prejudice. Id. at *18-19, 34. Under the Sherman Act, a claim accrues when a Defendant commits an unlawful act that injures a Plaintiff. In this case, Plaintiffs alleged that they were injured by the anti-solicitation agreements because they were not contacted or offered employment by competitors of Defendant. However, the last such agreement was allegedly reached in 2009. Thus, unless tolling applied, the four year statute of limitations expired in 2013. Id. at *23. Under California law, a claim accrues when it is complete with all of its elements, including wrong-doing, harm, and causation. Again, the latest that all of those elements could have occurred would have been in 2009. Thus, without tolling, the Court concluded that the applicable statute of limitations expired in 2013. Id. at *24-25. Regarding the Sherman Act claim, the Court rejected Plaintiffs' arguments that statutory tolling should apply during the pendency of the DOJ investigation, that the continuing violation doctrine applied, and that Defendant fraudulently concealed the violations. Statutory tolling did not apply because the DOJ never filed a complaint against Defendant. Id. at *29. The continuing violation doctrine also did not apply because merely maintaining the alleged unlawful agreements did not constitute an overt act necessary for application of the doctrine. Id. at *37-38. Finally, fraudulent concealment was not adequately alleged because, among other things, insufficient facts supporting the doctrine were pled to satisfy the heightened pleading requirements of Rule 9(b). Id. at *42-43. The Court also rejected Plaintiffs' argument that the California discovery rule applied to Plaintiffs' UCL claim. While the California discovery rule might apply to a UCL claim grounded in fraud, it does not apply in cases like this one where the UCL claim involves solely unfair competition. Id. at *65. Finally, the Court also rejected Plaintiffs' argument that California's "continuous accrual" rule applied; the "continuous accrual" rule requires a separate recurring invasion of the Plaintiff's rights. Id. at *65-67. Here, while entering into a new anti-solicitation agreement could constitute a separate recurring invasion, merely maintaining an existing agreement did not. Accordingly, the Court reasoned that the doctrine did not apply. Id. at *70. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' complaint with prejudice.

(xlix) Stays In Class Action Litigation

Davis, et al. v. Electronic Arts, Inc.,* Case No. 10-CV-3328 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 3, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of retired NFL football players, brought a putative class action alleging that their statutory and common law rights of publicity were violated through unauthorized use of their likenesses in Defendant's Madden NFL video game. Defendant filed an interlocutory appeal to challenge the denial of its "anti-SLAPP" motion, which the Ninth Circuit rejected. Defendant sought a stay in light of its filing of a petition for certorari to the U.S. Supreme Court. The District Court denied Defendant's motion to stay. The District Court explained that it was divested of jurisdiction of all aspects of the case pertaining to the appeal, with the result that those parts of the case were effectively stayed. Id. at *1. Subsequently, Defendant filed a "request for clarification" as to whether that automatic stay extended to the entire case or whether there were issues outside the scope of the appeal, and therefore outside the scope of the stay. In response, Plaintiffs asserted that although the automatic stay did not encompass all of the issues in the case, they found it appropriate to agree to a permissive stay of the remaining issues. Id. As a result, the Court denied Defendant's request for an order staying all proceedings pending the outcome of Defendant's appeal.

Fanning, et al. v. HSBC Card Services, Inc.,* Case No. 12-CV-885 (C.D. Cal. Aug. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants recorded telephone conversations without consent in violation of the California's Invasion of Privacy Act ("CIPA"). In November 2014, the Court consolidated this action with Lindgren v. HSBC Card & Retail Services, Inc., ("Lindgren") which asserted similar allegations against Defendants. Id. at 2. Plaintiffs in this action and Plaintiffs in Lindgren then moved to intervene in another action – Medeiros, et al. v. HSBC Card & Retail Servs. ("Medeiros") – filed in July 2014 in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of California on behalf of a class that received calls from Defendants alleging that Defendants violated the CIPA by recording calls without their consent. Id. As Defendants had settled with Plaintiffs in Medeiros, they moved to stay the consolidated cases until final approval of the proposed class action settlement in Medeiros. Id. The Court granted Defendants' motion to stay, finding minimal to no damage to Plaintiffs from granting a stay. Id. at 5. Plaintiffs contended that a stay would deprive them of the opportunity to complete the discovery process critical to their ability to successfully challenge the proposed settlement in Medeiros. Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs did not identify what further discovery they needed to challenge the fairness, reasonableness, and adequacy of the proposed settlement in Medeiros. Id. Further, nearly half of Plaintiffs' brief in opposition to the motion for a stay outlined the inadequacy and unfairness of the proposed settlement; according to the Court, this suggested that Plaintiffs already possessed the information they needed. Id. Moreover, Defendants claimed that they would be forced to endure duplicative motion practice and unnecessary, costly discovery because the putative class in Medeiros was the same as those in this action and Lindgren, and given that the certification process was on-going in the consolidated cases, the putative class could simultaneously receive a notice related to the proposed settlement in Medeiros and a notice related to class certification in consolidated cases, thereby causing confusion among putative class members. Id. at 5-6. The Court thus found that in weighing the hardships of not granting a stay against the damage from granting a stay, the dual risks of inconsistent rulings and confusion among the putative class members outweighed the potential minimal damage to Plaintiffs from granting a stay. Id. at 6. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to stay until further order of the Court.

Galicki, et al. v. State Of New Jersey,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 145173 (D.N.J. Oct. 26, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action for alleged damages caused to them due to the closure of multiple lanes of traffic on the George Washington Bridge from September 9, 2013 through September 13, 2013. The Court granted the United States' motion for permission to intervene and for a stay in part. On April 23, 2015, a federal grand jury indicted two Defendants in this civil case for their roles in allegedly deliberately causing traffic problems, and another Defendant in this case was found guilty for his role in the same scheme. Id. at *3. Because of the criminal case, set for trial in March 2016, the United States sought to intervene in this civil matter, and stay it until completion of the criminal case. Id. Plaintiffs recognized that United States had a right to intervene, but opposed a stay prior to the completion of the pleadings. Id. at *4. The crux of the United States' motion was that discovery should not proceed, and for the first time in its reply it argued that an immediate stay would have the added benefit of avoiding the threat of inconsistent judgments if the Court were to resolve motions to dismiss in the civil case before the issues raised by those motions relating to criminal charges were fully adjudicated in the criminal case. The Court noted that the United States did not raise these issues in its motion, and at the time of the indictment of two of the Defendants in April 2015, the prior motions to dismiss were pending, and that United States did not seek to intervene at that time either. Id. at *6. The Court observed that the United States did not offer any explanations as to why the Court's consideration of the new motions to dismiss addressing the same issues as it had previously addressed, without intervention and objection by the United States, would now prejudice the Government or interfere with the criminal case. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted the United States' motion to intervene but denied the motion to stay at that stage of the litigation.

Hillson, et al. v. Kelly Services, Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-10803 (E.D. Mich. July 15, 2015). In this class action brought for alleged violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"), the Court granted Defendant's motion to stay all proceedings. Considering all the factors discussed in Landis v. North America Co., (1936), the Court concluded that the case should be stayed until the U.S. Supreme Court issued its ruling in Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins. Id. at 1. The Court found that a stay was warranted because Spokeo had the high potential to be completely dispositive of the instant case and because judicial economy favored a limited delay in awaiting the decision in Spokeo. Id. at 1-2. In addition, the Court opined that the Supreme Court's ruling in Spokeo could directly impact the Court's anticipated class certification ruling, as it likely would bear upon the issue of whether the proposed class members had Article III standing under the FCRA. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to stay all proceedings.

In Re Petrobras Securities Litigation,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51451 (S.D.N.Y. April 13, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants violated federal securities laws in connection with a bribery and corruption scheme involving named Defendant Petroleo Brasileiro S.A. Petrobras ("Petrobras"). The lead Plaintiff, Universities Superannuation Scheme, Ltd. ("USS"), moved to lift the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act ("PSLRA") discovery stay with respect to two categories of discovery, including: (i) documents that Petrobras, its wholly-owned subsidiary Petrobras Global Finance B.V., and the underwriter Defendants had already produced, or would soon produce, to regulatory, governmental, or investigative agencies in connection with the wrong-doing that was the subject of USS' amended complaint; and (ii) permission to initiate the process to obtain discovery from foreign non-parties pursuant to either the Inter-American Convention on Letters Rogatory or Hague Convention on the Taking of Evidence Abroad in Civil and Commercial Matters, as applicable based on the location of the foreign non-parties. The Court denied USS' motion. USS argued that the first category of discovery was necessary to prevent undue prejudice because it was at an "increasing informational disadvantage" regarding the various governmental authorities that were investigating Petrobras. Id. at *5-6. Although USS argued that its lack of access to the materials produced to governmental authorities prejudiced its ability to make informed strategic decisions regarding the prosecution and settlement of its claims, the Court found that the existence of parallel government enforcement proceedings is commonplace in actions subject to the PSLRA. Id. at *6-7. Further, the Court opined that finding "undue prejudice" on that ground would create an exception that would swallow the PSLRA's automatic discovery stay. Id. at *7. The Court remarked that the deferral of strategic decisions until after Defendants' motion to dismiss was resolved did not constitute undue prejudice, as delay is an inherent part of every stay of discovery required by the PSLRA. Id. Regarding the second category of discovery, USS argued that without a lift of the stay, it might be unable to obtain discovery from foreign non-parties under the relevant treaty procedures before this Court's deadline for the completion of fact discovery. Id. at *8. The Court, however, stated that the deadline had not yet been set, and if the scenario USS envisioned ever occurred, then USS could apply to the Court for appropriate relief at that time. Accordingly, the Court denied USS' motion to lift the PSLRA discovery stay.

Mohamed, et al. v. Uber Technologies*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95712 (N.D. Cal. July 22, 2015).
Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants ran background checks on drivers without authorization in violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act and state fair credit reporting laws. After the District Court denied Defendants' motion to compel arbitration, Defendants appealed to the Ninth Circuit and moved the District Court to stay proceedings pending the appeal. Id. The District Court granted the motion in part and denied the motion in part. Id. First, the District Court found that, although Defendants failed to make a sufficient showing that they were likely to succeed on the merits of their appeal, the appeal presented "serious legal issues" or "substantial questions" that warranted a stay. Id. at *19-20. The District Court identified two such issues, including: (i) whether an arbitration provision that contains a conspicuous and meaningful opt-out provision may nevertheless be found at least somewhat procedurally unconscionable under California law, as articulated by Gentry v. Superior Court, 42 Cal. 4th 443 (2007), leaving the door open to a general finding of unconscionability; and (ii) whether the ruling in Iskanian v. CLS Transportation L.A., LLC, 59 Cal. 4th 348 (2014), that pre-dispute PAGA waivers are unenforceable as a matter of California law, is preempted by the Federal Arbitration Act. Id. at *5. As to the first issue, in denying Defendants' motion to compel arbitration, the District Court rejected Defendants' claim that, as a matter of California law, an arbitration provision could not be procedurally unconscionable if the signatory to the agreement had a "meaningful opportunity to opt-out of the arbitration program" because it found that Gentry overruled previous authority to that effect. Id. at *12. The District Court held that, although Defendants presented no reason to suggest that the Ninth Circuit would reverse its ruling on this issue, the propriety of its application of Gentry at least presented a "serious issue" because few judges in the Ninth Circuit had recognized that Gentry abrogated previous authority, and the Ninth Circuit had not expressly addressed the impact of Gentry. Id. at *13-14. As to the second issue, the District Court held that no Ninth Circuit authority had resolved whether the ruling in Iskanian – that pre-dispute PAGA waivers are unenforceable as a matter of California law – was preempted by the Federal Arbitration Act, and the issue had been the subject of significant disagreement at the District Court level. Id. at *17. The District Court held that, until the Ninth Circuit issued a ruling one way or another, the validity of both Iskanian, and pre-dispute PAGA waivers more generally, remained issues of first impression that were sufficiently serious for purposes of Defendants' motion to stay. Id. at *17-18. For these reasons, the District Court found that the balance of hardships absent a stay tipped sharply in favor of staying all non-discovery-related activity pending the Ninth Circuit's decision on the merits of Defendants' appeal. The District Court noted that, if the case proceeded on the merits without a ruling from the Ninth Circuit, the District Court's substantive rulings might be for naught, and the parties would have expended significant resources to obtain what, in all likelihood, would constitute non-binding advisory opinions. Id. at *23. Alternatively, if any ruling on the merits by the District Court had binding effect on the arbitration, Defendants would have lost the benefit of arbitration. Id. Further, because Defendants would be required to engage in discovery irrespective of the outcome of their appeal, the District Court reasonably could protect Plaintiffs' interests by allowing reasonable discovery to continue. Id. at *23-24. Accordingly, the District Court stayed the case for all purposes with the exception of reasonable discovery pending the issuance of the Ninth Circuit's mandate in Defendants' appeal. Id. at *27.

Patel, et al. v. Trans Union, LLC*, Case No. 14-CV-522 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 3, 2015). In this class action, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant Trans Union Rental Screening Solutions and its parent Trans Union, LLC violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Earlier, the Court had certified two Rule 23(b)(3) classes, including: (i) a national class challenging Defendants' willful failure to maintain and follow reasonable procedures to ensure the maximum possible accuracy of their information; and (ii) a national sub-class challenging Defendants' willful failure to provide consumers with all information in their files. Id. at 1-2. Defendants subsequently moved to stay the proceedings in this case until the U.S. Supreme Court decided two cases: Robins v. Spokeo, Inc., 742 F.3d 409 (9th Cir. 2014), and Bouaphaekeo v. Tyson Foods, Inc., 765 F.3d 791 (8th Cir. 2014). Id. at 2. The Court granted the motion. The Court noted that judges in two similar FCRA cases in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California – Larson v. Trans Union LLC, No. 12-CV-05726 (N.D. Cal. June 22, 2015), and Ramirez v. Trans Union LLC, No. 12-CV-632 (N.D. Cal. June 22, 2015) – had granted stays. The Court noted that the issue in Spokeo was whether a Plaintiff has Article III standing by alleging a willful violation of 15 U.S.C. § 1681n(a) without suffering actual damages. Whereas the Ninth Circuit held that because a cause of action under the FCRA does not require proof of actual damages, a Plaintiff can suffer violation of the statutory right without suffering actual damages. Id. at 3. The Court remarked that the Supreme Court's grant of certiorari in Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, No. 13-1339 (U.S. April 27, 2015), had a direct bearing on this case. Accordingly, the Court stayed this case pending the Supreme Court's decision in Spokeo.

Physicians Healthsource, Inc., et al. v. Endo Pharmaceuticals,* Case No. 14-CV-2289 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 5, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action under the Junk Fax Protection Act alleging that Defendants sent two facsimile advertisements without opt-out notices. Plaintiff asserted its claims without regard to whether the facsimile advertisements received were solicited or unsolicited. Defendants moved to stay this case, which the Court granted. The Court noted that the Federal Communications Commission ("FCC") has implemented regulations requiring opt-out language on both unsolicited and solicited facsimile advertisements. Id. at 1. Defendants disputed the validity of the regulation, and argued that the FCC had exceeded its statutory authority in promulgating a regulation requiring opt-out notices in solicited faxes. Id. Defendants cited to a number of administrative petitions filed with the FCC, which requested the FCC to rule on issues related to the subject of this litigation. Id. The Court noted that there was no schedule for the FCC to reach a final decision, and any stay could be open-ended. Id. at 2. Nonetheless, the Court reasoned that judicial efficiency would be better served by imposing a stay of litigation while the FCC considered those related issues, which had already been presented to it, which were within the FCC's domain of specialized knowledge, and which might significantly limit the scope of this action. Id. In addition, the Court considered the risk of inconsistent rulings if the FCC was not permitted to issue its ruling before the judicial system considered these issues. Id. Thus, balancing the equities, the Court found potential prejudice to Defendants if they must defend this action without guidance from the FCC on issues such as statutory authority and standing to pursue a private right of action. Id. Because Defendants had acknowledged their duty to preserve evidence, and would alert pertinent third-parties that they must preserve evidence while the case was stayed, the Court found that a stay would not prejudice Plaintiff. Id. at 2-3. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to stay, and placed the case in administrative suspense pending adjudication of related actions.

Schartel, et al. v. OneSource Technology, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 155967 (N.D. Ohio Nov. 17, 2015). Plaintiff brought an action alleging that Defendant reported the criminal charges filed against him that were dismissed more than seven years prior to the issuance of the report in violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Id. at *1. Plaintiff requested statutory and punitive damages. Id. Defendant moved to stay the case pending the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 135 S. Ct. 1892 (2015). Id. at *2. Defendant contended that Spokeo would address whether Article III standing existed for cases in which Plaintiffs alleged no actual damages, suffered no concrete harm, and relied solely on statutory standing. Id. The Court further noted that the Supreme Court in Gomez v. Campbell-Ewald Co., 135 S. Ct. 2311 (2015), would decide whether an unaccepted Rule 68 offer that would fully satisfy a Plaintiff's claim moots the claim and that the answer would differ depending on whether the offer was made before or after the Court certified a class action. Id. at *3. The Court remarked that although the parties disputed whether a ruling in Spokeo would have a dispositive effect in this litigation, its outcome was directly relevant to whether a class could be certified. Id. at *4. The Court observed that Defendant's motion on its offer of judgment (which mooted Plaintiff's claims), was made before the Court certified a class in this case and thus, Campbell-Ewald was directly relevant to Defendant's dispositive motion as well as to class certification. Id. The Court found that the possible prejudice to Plaintiff that would result from a stay was minimal as the Supreme Court had already heard oral arguments in both Spokeo and Campbell-Ewald and decisions would likely be rendered within several months. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to stay the proceedings.

Speer, et al. v. Whole Food Market Group, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57783 (M.D. Fla. April 29, 2015). Plaintiff, a former employee, brought a class action on behalf of himself and others similarly-situated for violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Plaintiff alleged that Defendant conducted background checks on many of its job applicants as part of a standard screening process, and on existing employees from time-to-time during the course of their employment through a third-party, LexisNexis. Plaintiff asserted that an applicant had to first read and sign two forms, including a disclosure statement and a consent and release of information. Plaintiff contended that the consent form was both an authorization to procure a consumer report and a release, and thus violative of the FCRA because both the disclosure and consent forms must be read and reviewed at the same time. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant willfully failed to make proper disclosure, and to obtain proper authorization in violation of the FCRA. After the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss, Defendant moved to stay the proceedings pending the outcome of the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in the Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, No. 13-1339 (U.S. April 27, 2015). Denying the motion, the Court stated that it could not predict whether the Supreme Court would decide the Spokeo case in such a manner as to benefit Defendant's position regarding Plaintiff's lack of standing to pursue the case for himself and those similarly-situated to him. Id. at *2. The Court thus concluded, consistent with established Eleventh Circuit precedent, that a grant of certiorari by the Supreme Court does not change the law and does not constitute new law, and that a stay of these proceedings to await a decision from the Supreme Court in Spokeo was not warranted. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion.

Stone, et al. v. Sterling Infosystems, Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-7351 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 21, 2015). Plaintiff, a consumer, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant furnished consumer reports for employment purposes without first obtaining a certification from users in violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Id. at 2. The District Court took judicial notice of a nearly-identical action that Plaintiff filed against Defendant in March 2015 entitled Stone v. Sterling Infosystems, Inc., No. 15-CV-711 (C.D. Cal.), wherein the Court had granted a motion to stay pending the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 135 S. Ct. 1892 (2015). Id. at 2. In Spokeo, the Supreme Court granted certiorari on the question of whether Congress can confer Article III standing upon a Plaintiff who suffered no concrete harm, and who could not otherwise invoke federal jurisdiction, by authorizing a private right of action based on a bare violation of a federal statute. Id. Defendant moved to stay this case pending the decision in Spokeo, and the District Court granted the stay. First, the District Court found that minimal damage would result from a stay because Plaintiff could not credibly claim prejudice from having to wait slightly longer to pursue his claim for a mere statutory violation. Id. at 3. Plaintiff sought money damages, and not injunctive or declaratory relief, and therefore a delay in the proceedings potentially would delay only his monetary recovery and potentially deprive Plaintiff of accompanying interest, which would be the extent of his damage. Id. Second, the District Court found that the Supreme Court's decision in Spokeo would direct whether Plaintiff had standing to bring the case and whether the District Court had subject-matter jurisdiction. Id. at 4. The District Court noted that, in the absence of a stay, Defendant would be forced to begin the significant effort of defending a purported nationwide class action with a putative class of more than 1,000 individuals. Id. Accordingly, the District Court concluded that this factor also weighed in favor of a stay. Plaintiff argued that, even if the Supreme Court's decision rendered Plaintiff's claims non-actionable in federal court, the work done in this action would not be wasted because the District Court would remand the case to state court. Id. at 6. The District Court ruled that Plaintiff failed to account for the complication of issues of proof that could arise when discovery begins in the District Court, is interrupted by a remand, and then continues in a state court. Id. The District Court, therefore, ruled that the orderly course of justice also weighed in favor of a stay. Accordingly, the District Court granted Defendant's motion to stay the proceedings.

(l) FCRA Class Actions

Berry, et al. v. Schulman*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 21062 (4th Cir. Dec. 4, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendants violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") by selling certain Accruint brand reports to debt collectors without treating the reports as consumer reports within the meaning of the FCRA. After several years of litigation, the parties settled, wherein Defendants agreed to make sweeping changes to its product offerings in order to protect consumer information, and in exchange, the class members would release any statutory damages under the FCRA. Id. at *3. The District Court approved the settlement, a group of objectors appealed, and the Fourth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision. The objectors challenged the District Court's certification of a Rule 23(b)(2) class for settlement purposes. According to the objectors, the statutory damages waived under the settlement agreement predominated over the injunctive relief awarded and were not of the incidental and non-individualized sort that may be certified under Rule 23(b)(2). Id. at *16. The Fourth Circuit disagreed, finding that all the statutory damages claims released under the settlement agreement were not the kind of individualized claims that threatened class cohesion or were prohibited by Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. 2541 (2011). Id. The Fourth Circuit remarked that the availability of statutory damages in this case was a simple function of Defendants' policies with respect to Accruint reports, that were applicable to the entire Rule 23(b)(2) class. Id. at *17. The objectors also argued that the statutory damages claims released by the settlement agreement could not be deemed incidental to injunctive relief and did not permit consumers to seek injunctive remedies. Id. at *18. The Fourth Circuit disagreed and determined that the FCRA does not expressly provide a private right of action for injunctive relief, and did not permit consumers to seek injunctive remedies. Id. at *19. The Fourth Circuit remarked that failing to acknowledge the critical role of the settlement agreement, the objectors relied on authority from outside the settlement context, which was unavailing here. Id. Alternatively, the objectors argued that even if the statutory damages claims released by the Rule 23(b)(2) class were incidental and not predominant, due process precluded certification of the class without opt-out rights. The objectors relied on Wal-Mart, noting the serious possibility that due process requires opt-out rights under the Rule 23(b)(2), even where the monetary claims did not predominate. The Fourth Circuit, however, reasoned that the Supreme Court did not go that far in Wal-Mart, holding instead only that claims for individualized monetary relief may not be certified under Rule 23(b)(2). Id. at *22. The Fourth Circuit observed that federal case law precedent had long permitted certification of mandatory Rule 23(b)(2) classes involving monetary relief so long as that relief was incidental to injunctive or declaratory relief (meaning that damages must be in the nature of a group remedy directly from liability to the class as a whole). Id. The objectors further challenged the District Court's approval of a Rule 23(b)(2) class settlement, arguing that it was unfair and inadequate because it released class members' statutory damages claims without providing for any monetary relief in exchange. Id. at *28-29. The Fourth Circuit held that it found no reason to disturb the District Court's assessment of the relative strength of the parties' legal positions of its fact-intensive analysis of the benefits provided the Rule 23(b)(2) class by the parties' settlement. Id. at *33. The Fourth Circuit remarked that in its view, the District Court was well within its discretion in approving the settlement as fair, reasonable, and adequate under Rule 23(e). For these reasons, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the District Court's approval of the settlement.

Coleman, et al. v. Kohl's Department Stores, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135746 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 5, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former hourly non-exempt employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendant unlawfully acquired applicants' consumer reports during the hiring process, in violation of the FCRA. During the application process, Defendant provided an employment application, and a consent and disclosure for acquisition of consumer reports. Both forms required the applicant to fill out identifying information, and the consent disclosure forms stated that Defendant would use a consumer reporting agency to obtain consumer reports or investigative consumer reports on the applicant, and that the report could include personal information such as criminal history, past employment, personal references, drug offenses, and sex offender status. Id. at *4-8. Defendant moved to dismiss, and the Court granted the motion. Plaintiffs alleged that in accordance with the FCRA, Defendant must first give a clear and conspicuous disclosure that it may obtain a report for employment purposes, in a document that consists solely of the disclosure. Id. at *15. Plaintiffs' claimed that the disclosure contained in the consent and disclosure form appeared together with other extraneous information in the employment application such as a release of liability provision. The Court found that Plaintiffs did not sufficiently allege a failure to comply with the statute, and remarked that Plaintiffs themselves acknowledged in their complaint that the two forms were two separate documents. Further, the Court noted the consent and disclosure form was formatted differently than the other forms, and bore a distinct title and form code, and related only to consumer reports. Thus, the Court opined that Defendant provided two separate documents to Plaintiffs in compliance with the FCRA. In addition, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant violated the FCRA provision that states whenever an employer requests a consumer report, it must notify the consumer in writing within three days of the request. Id. at *19. It also states that the notification must include a written summary of rights which must contain certain disclosures, such as the consumer's right to obtain a copy of the consumer report, dispute information contained in the report, and obtain a credit score from the consumer reporting agency. Id. at *19-20. The Court observed that to state a viable claim, Plaintiffs need to specifically allege that Defendant violated the statutes in question, and did so willfully. Id. at *20. Plaintiffs merely alleged that Defendant did not comply with the FCRA and failed to allege any facts at all as to the willfulness element. Thus, the Court concluded that the assertions were insufficient to survive dismissal. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Ford, et al. v. CEC Entertainment, Inc.*, Case No. 14-CV-1420 (N.D. Cal. July 7, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") and related statutes by using background check disclosure forms in its employment applications that contained extraneous information, such that the forms did not solely consist of the disclosure. Id. at *2. The parties settled the litigation. Defendant estimated that it procured background checks for approximately 28,500 people who executed those forms ("settlement class"), and Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant took adverse employment action with respect to nearly 400 people as a result of the background checks ("adverse action sub-class"). Plaintiffs moved to certify the class for settlement purposes as the parties had agreed on a class-wide resolution of the dispute, which the Court granted. At the outset, the Court noted that the proposed settlement class consisted of all individuals for whom Defendant obtained a background check from a third-party credit reporting agency during the class period, without fully complying with the disclosure and authorization requirements of the FCRA, the California Consumer Credit Reporting Agencies Act, and the California Investigative Consumer Reporting Agencies Act. Id. at *2. The adverse action sub-class consisted of members of the settlement class against whom Defendant took adverse employment action based on those background checks. Defendant agreed to settle the class claims for $1,750,500, which included: (i) individual settlement payments; (ii) class representative service awards of up to $5,000; (iii) payment of attorneys' fees to class counsel of up to 33% of the settlement; and (iv) class counsel's expenses. Id. at *3. The Court noted that as the settlement class consisted of over 28,500 members, the numerosity requirement was satisfied. Id. at *5. Further, as each settlement class member executed a form disclosing the employer's intent to obtain a credit report, the question common to the class was whether Defendant willfully violated the law by using those forms. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the commonality requirement was satisfied. Similarly, the Court found that typicality and adequacy of representation requirements were also satisfied. The Court observed that the common issue of whether Defendant willfully violated the relevant laws predominated over individual issues because proof of actual injury for this statutory cause of action was not necessary. Id. at *7. The Court therefore certified the settlement class. The Court also analyzed the fairness of the settlement, and found that in order to succeed on the merits, Plaintiffs would have to prove that Defendant's violations were willful, which when coupled with Plaintiffs' burden of proof, would make it difficult to prove liability. Id. at *9. The parties also argued that there was a risk that the class ultimately would not be certified, or, if the class was certified, Defendant would appeal the certification order, or that the class might later be decertified. Id. at *10. The Court opined that these threats weighed in favor of preliminary approval of the settlement. Moreover, the Court noted that the FCRA provides statutory damages between $100 and $1,000 for a willful violation. Id. The settlement agreements required Defendant to pay a total of $1,750,000, which would mean that class members would receive $36 in actual cash payments without having to file a claim. Therefore, the Court concluded that the settlement amount was fair. Accordingly, the Court preliminarily approved the settlement.

Freckleton, et al. v. Target Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4130 (D. Md. Jan. 12, 2015). Plaintiff, a job applicant, brought an action alleging that Defendants violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") 15 U.S.C. §§ 1681b(b)(3), 1681e(b), when Defendant refused to hire her pursuant to a consumer report that Defendant First Advantage LNS Screening Solutions, Inc. prepared for Target. First Advantage completed a background screening and reported to Target that she had been involved in a theft. Id. at *6. First Advantage moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim, after which Plaintiff filed an amended complaint. Subsequently, Plaintiff moved for leave to amend, and Target moved to strike the amended complaint, or, alternatively, to dismiss the amended complaint for failure to state a claim. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion and denied all other motions. First, Defendants argued that the amended complaint should be struck because it was filed more than 21 days after Target's motion to dismiss. The Court noted that under Rule 15(a)(2), leave should be denied only when an amendment would unduly prejudice the opposing party, amount to futility, or reward the movant's bad faith. Id. at *11. Here, discovery had not yet begun, and there had been no showing of prejudice or bad faith. The Court noted that an amended pleading supersedes the original pleading, and that motions directed at superseded pleadings are to be denied as moot. Id. at *12. Thus, the Court denied Defendants' motions to dismiss the original complaint as moot. Target further contended that the amended complaint should be dismissed because the background check performed by First Advantage was not a consumer report protected by the FCRA, and that its actions, as described in the amended complaint, were within one of the FCRA's exclusions. The Court noted that § 1681a(y) of the FCRA creates an exclusion of certain communications for employee investigations. Id. at *15. The Court also observed that the FCRA protects consumers from the transmission of inaccurate information about them, and establishes credit reporting practices that utilize accurate, relevant, and current information in a confidential and responsible manner. Id. at *15-16. Target's background check was not performed in connection with an investigation into misconduct, and Plaintiff alleged in the amended complaint that Target did not suspect her of any misconduct when it requested the background check, and that the check was merely a matter of routine. Id. at *16. Further Target was not running the check to be compliant with state or federal regulations, and the amended complaint alleged that Target requested a background check that was a consumer report, and made her ineligible for hire based on that report without giving her prior notice. Id. at *17. Plaintiff also alleged that knowing that First Advantage gathered information subject to the FCRA, Target chose not to comply with the FCRA notification requirements. Since the Court concluded that Plaintiff's amended complaint stated an FCRA claim against Target, the Court denied Target's motion to dismiss the amended complaint, and granted Plaintiff's motion for leave to amend.

Harris, et al. v. Home Depot, U.S.A., Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93576 (N.D. Cal. June 30, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant obtained pre-employment background checks without a proper written disclosures in violation Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Plaintiff contended that the disclosure document that she signed did not merely consist of a disclosure; instead, it also included language requiring her to release Defendant of any liability it might incur in connection with the background check. Id. at *1-2. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court denied. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's FCRA claim was barred by the statute of limitations. The Court noted that, as it was unlawful to procure a report under the FCRA without first providing the proper disclosure and receiving the consumer's written authorization, Defendant could not have violated the statute until it procured a report on Plaintiff. Id. The Court observed that the complaint did not clearly mention when the reports were obtained. Id. Because Defendant's statute of limitations argument was based on an erroneous argument that the FCRA violations allegedly occurred when Plaintiff signed the disclosure form, the Court rejected the statute of limitations argument. Id. Thus, it denied the motion to dismiss on statute of limitations grounds. Defendant also argued that the complaint did not adequately allege that the violation was willful as required under the FCRA. Defendant relied on Peikoff v. Paramount Pictures Corp., No. 15-CV-68 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 26, 2015), which held that there could be no willful violation for inclusion of release language in a disclosure form as a matter of law. Id. at *4. The Court observed that in Peikoff, the Court held that the language the employer included in its disclosure form was so closely related to the disclosure that it was inherently implausible that anyone would include it in a willful attempt to violate the statute. Id. The Court remarked that in other words, in Peikoff, the employer had nothing to gain – other than improving chances that the background checks would be accurate – by insisting on the additional language in the disclosure form. Id. at *4-5. In this case, however, the Court found that it was plausible that Defendant inserted this language into the disclosure form despite knowing that to do so would violate the FCRA, or at least with reckless disregard for the FCRA's requirements. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Hawkins, et al. v. S2Verify,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 134415 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 1, 2015). Plaintiff, a job applicant, brought an action alleging that the consumer report that Defendant had obtained on him contained numerous inaccuracies as well as information that the FCRA mandates be excluded from reports. Plaintiff, a former drug addict who had committed various petty theft crimes, was denied employment because his consumer report contained criminal record information on multiple cases, none of which had resulted in a conviction. Named Defendant S2Verify, LLC (S2V), a consumer reporting agency, moved to strike all class allegations under Rule 23, and the Court denied the motion. First, the Court ruled that Plaintiff made a prima facie showing of commonality and typicality such that it would be better to review these issues at the time of class certification, rather than on a motion to dismiss. Some of the common questions included: (i) whether S2V violated the FCRA by failing to notify consumers contemporaneously of the fact that their criminal history information was being sent to employers; and (ii) whether S2V violated the FCRA by failing to maintain strict procedures to assure that the criminal history information furnished was complete, accurate, and up-to-date. Id. at *6. The Court remarked that Plaintiff sufficiently pled that a class action would be superior to adjudicating these claims individually. The Court noted that under the FCRA, statutory damages are limited to $1,000 per violation, and thus, there would be little incentive for consumers to bring individual lawsuits. Id. at *10. The Court also opined that the issue of equitable relief would be best resolved at a later stage. Further, although the Court agreed with S2V that some case law precedents held that the FCRA does not have a remedy for such equitable relief, it observed that the federal circuits had not directly ruled on this issue, and that it was thus not redundant, immaterial, impertinent, or scandalous for Plaintiff to request equitable relief. Id. Since S2V failed to raise adequate Rule 23(b) objections that justified striking Plaintiff's class allegations at this early stage, the Court denied the motion to dismiss.

Huff, et al. v. Telecheck Services, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3185 (M.D. Tenn. Jan. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that, in providing consumer disclosures, Defendants willfully or negligently violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") by refusing or failing to provide the information required under the FCRA. Defendants moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims for declaratory or injunctive relief and to strike all class allegations. The Court granted Defendants' motions. First, the Court held that private litigants may not bring claims for injunctive and declaratory relief under the FCRA. The Court, therefore, dismissed Plaintiffs' claims for injunctive and declaratory relief. Id. at *3. Second, the Court held that, because the FCRA does not provide a private right of action for injunctive and declaratory relief, Plaintiffs could not satisfy the requirements for class certification under Rule 23(b)(2). The Court, therefore, struck Plaintiffs' class allegations pertaining to Rule 23(b)(2). Finally, the Court noted that an action to enforce liability under the FCRA must be brought no later than the earlier of: (i) two years after the date of discovery by Plaintiff of the violation that is the basis for liability; or (ii) five years after the date on which the violation that is the basis for liability occurs. Id. at *4. Defendants contended that, because Plaintiffs' proposed class definition relied upon the statute of repose of five years, rather than the two-year statute of limitations, individualized inquiries would be required to determine whether each Plaintiff's claim was timely filed and, therefore, the Court should strike the class allegations under Rule 23(b)(3). Id. The Court found Defendants' request moot. Plaintiffs agreed to modify the class definition to those individuals who received a Telecheck File Report on or after September 2012. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims for injunctive and declaratory relief, granted Defendants' motion to strike class allegations under Rule 23(b)(2), and held that Plaintiffs class allegations under Rule 23(b)(3) were limited by agreement.

Kirchner, et al. v. Shred-It USA, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42238 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to comply with Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") while conducting pre-employment background checks by failing to notify Plaintiff that it might obtain a consumer report for employment purposes on a form consisting "solely of the disclosure." Id. at *2. The parties reached a settlement and moved for preliminary approval. Under the settlement agreement, Defendant agreed to pay a gross settlement amount of $250,000, which consisted of up to $80,000 in attorneys' fees and a settlement fund of $170,000. Id. at *23. The Court preliminarily certified the action for settlement purposes and approved the settlement on the understanding that Plaintiff's counsel would demonstrate the fairness of the proposed fee award on or before the date of the final fairness hearing. Id. at *34. The Court granted class certification for settlement purposes, finding that Plaintiff and the proposed class of approximately 3,238 members satisfied Rule 23 requirements. The Court agreed that the potential claims of the class members arose from a set of circumstances similar to Plaintiff's circumstances, i.e., the receipt or signing of Defendant's form that contained language beyond the disclosure and authorization language permitted by the FCRA, and the question of whether these forms complied with the FCRA was common to all class members and predominated over any individual issues. Id. at *7. The Court further found, for the purpose of preliminary approval, that Plaintiff's injuries were reasonably co-extensive with those of the putative class members, and therefore appeared to be aligned with them. Id. at *10-11. At the same time, the Court raised doubts about the appropriateness of the attorneys' fee award. While the settlement agreement provided for attorneys' fees of up to $80,000, which Defendant agreed to pay separately, Plaintiff's counsel stated in a declaration that he would only seek 25% of the gross settlement, or $62,500. Id. at *31. The Court assumed that the counsel calculated this percentage in fees based on the $250,000 in total liability that Defendant faced under the settlement agreement. The settlement agreement, however, did not establish a common fund of $250,000 because it stated that $250,000 would be the total amount of money Defendant would pay pursuant to the settlement and it arrived at that number by combining the $170,000 available to class members with class counsel's right to collect a maximum of $80,000 from Defendant. Id. at *32. The Court, therefore, raised concern that Plaintiff's counsel based his percentage-of-the-fund calculation in part on an amount that Defendant might never pay. Id. The Court opined that a disparity existed between attorneys' fees and the amount available for class members because an award of $80,000 represented approximately 47% of the amount recovered, and the request of $62,500 represented 37% of $170,000. Id. at *33-34. Because Plaintiff's counsel had not yet presented evidence to justify the amount he intended to request, the Court ordered Plaintiff's counsel to justify the proposed fee award. Accordingly, the Court granted preliminary approval of the class action settlement.

Larson, et al. v. Trans Union, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 83459 (N.D. Cal. June 26, 2015). Plaintiff, a consumer, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") by providing him and approximately 18,000 putative class members with file disclosures that were not clear and accurate within the meaning of 15 U.S.C. § 1681g. Plaintiff moved for class certification, and Defendant cross-moved for summary judgment on the grounds that Plaintiff was not entitled to the free file disclosure on which his claims were based. The Court denied Defendant's motion, and stayed the proceedings pending resolution of writ of certiorari granted by the U.S. Supreme Court in Robins v. Spokeo, Inc., 742 F.3d 409 (9th Cir. 2014). The Court noted that Defendant's argument was based largely on the interaction between § 1681g and § 1681j. Section 1681j authorizes credit reporting agencies to charge a reasonable fee, not to exceed $8, for file disclosures under § 1681g. Id. at *14. The Court observed that some exceptions to the statute included § 1681j(a)(1)(A), which provides that consumers were entitled to one free file disclosure per 12 month period. Id. The undisputed facts showed that Plaintiff requested a free disclosure on July 15, 2010, and because Plaintiff had already obtained a free disclosure within 12 months, Defendant sent him a letter explaining that he was not entitled to a free disclosure. Id. at *15. On August 11, 2011, Plaintiff again requested a free disclosure, which Defendant provided. Id. In October 2011, Plaintiff submitted an on-line request for another free disclosure; Plaintiff indicated that he was entitled to another by checking the box stating that he "received an adverse action notice based on information from" Defendant's credit report. Id. at *16. Defendant provided the disclosure, which became the subject of this litigation. Defendant contended that because Plaintiff's claims were based on § 1681n(a), the FCRA's damages provision, he must show that Defendant willfully failed to comply with any requirement imposed under the FCRA to prevail. The Court observed that Plaintiff accused Defendant of willfully violating § 1681g, which requires credit reporting agencies to clearly and accurately disclose to a consumer all information in the consumer's file upon request. Id. at *18. Moreover, even if § 1681g's clear and accurate disclosure requirement was subject to § 1681j, § 1681j does not require a consumer either to pay a fee or to qualify for an exception to obtain his file from a credit reporting agency. Id. at *19. Finding that Defendant's argument was misplaced, the Court denied the motion for summary judgment. Further, the Court noted that after the motion for class certification was fully briefed, certiorari was granted in Robins. In Robins, the Ninth Circuit held that Plaintiff alleged Article III standing, regardless of whether he had sufficiently alleged actual harm, by merit of his claims for willful violations. Id. at *20. The question before the Supreme Court was whether Congress may confer Article III standing upon a Plaintiff who suffered no concrete harm, and who therefore, could not otherwise invoke federal jurisdiction. Id. at *21. The Court remarked that the question presented in Robins was squarely implicated in this case. The Court explained that Plaintiff's ability to establish injury-in-fact without reliance on the FCRA's statutory damages provision had not been tested in this case and was far from certain. Id. at *24. The Court remarked that even if Plaintiff himself could make a sufficient showing of actual harm to satisfy Article III, the record indicated that a significant portion of the putative class would not be able to do the same. Id. A decision in Robins reversing the Ninth Circuit would thus raise serious questions regarding Plaintiff's ability to establish his own individual standing, as well as the predominance and superiority requirement necessary to certify and maintain a class action under Rule 23(b)(3). Id. The Court, however, deferred on making a tentative ruling on Plaintiff's motion for class certification, and found that all the requirements of a class certification under Rule 23 were nevertheless, satisfied, but stayed the proceedings until the resolution of Robins.

Manuel, et al. v. Wells Fargo Bank National Association,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109781 (E.D. Va. Aug. 19, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant's background checks violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Plaintiff had a conditional job offer from Defendant pending the successful completion of a background check. Plaintiff completed a consent form that had language releasing liability from Defendant, their vendor, and other third-parties in relation to the background check obtained along with their conditional offer of employment. Id. at *8. When Plaintiff's background check reflected several convictions on Plaintiff's records, Defendant coded Plaintiff as "ineligible," thereby initiating a pre-adverse action protocol in which Plaintiff received the "Pre-Adverse Action Notice," copy of the report and a copy of the summary of rights as outline by the FCRA. Id. at *3. Upon receiving the documents, Plaintiff began the appeal process with Defendant. The vendor then generated a revised report that still contained the disputed convictions. Id. Defendant eventually determined that Plaintiff was ineligible for employment. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant violated the FCRA requirement of "a clear and conspicuous" disclosure in a document that consisted solely of a disclosure that a background check might be obtained because it also had language releasing the company and others from liability arising from the background check. Id. at *16. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant's coding of him as "ineligible" in the background check vendor's system and initiating the adverse action protocol violated the FCRA requirement that the pre-adverse action notice, a copy of the report, and summary of rights be provided to the individual before taking adverse action. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that Plaintiff lacked standing because he had not alleged a legally-cognizable injury-in-fact. Id. at *11. The Court denied Defendant's motion on the basis that Plaintiff demonstrated an injury-in-fact through his allegations that he was deprived of the appropriate type of information under the FCRA. Id. at *18. Although Plaintiff received some information through Defendant's disclosure, the Court found that it was not the type of information that Plaintiff was entitled to under the FCRA. Id. at *16. Defendant argued that it was entitled to summary judgment on Plaintiff's ineligible claim because the action of sending notice to the vendor that a candidate was likely ineligible and thus needed to receive the two adverse action letters did not qualify as an "adverse action" under the FCRA. Id. at *22-23. Plaintiff asserted that when Defendant determined that the applicant was not eligible because of the consumer report and sent a message to the vendor to code the consumer's file as "ineligible," it committed an adverse action under the FCRA. Id. at *26. Finding the evidence sufficient to support a reasonable jury's finding that Defendant's actions were adverse, the Court concluded that the issue was one for the jury. Id. at *31. Finally, Defendant argued that it did not procure consumer reports within the meaning of the FCRA and thus its background checks were not subject to the FCRA requirements. The Court, however, found sufficient evidence to find that Defendant's background checks qualified as consumer reports under the FCRA. The Court noted that Defendant sought information about the applicant's criminal history, academic achievement, employment history, social security number verification, character, general reputation, personal characteristics, and mode of living. Id. at *40. The Court reasoned that such a broad-reaching background check supported the conclusion that it was a consumer report as contemplated by the FCRA. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Newton, et al. v. Bank Of America, N.A.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62930 (C.D. Cal. May 12, 2015).
Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought an action alleging that Defendant willfully violated § 1681b(b)(2)(A) of the FCRA by procuring consumer reports using invalid authorization forms that failed to provide Plaintiffs and the class members with a clear and conspicuous disclosure in a document that consisted solely of the disclosure. As a condition of employment, all applicants had to consent to and pass both the applicant screening investigation ("ASI background check"), and the criminal background screening ("criminal background check") (collectively the "background screening"). Id. at *2. The Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgement. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' claim failed because it did not procure consumer reports within the FCRA's definition. The Court noted that certain reports are not considered as consumer reports if the communication is made to an employer in connection with an investigation of: (i) suspected misconduct relating to employment; or (ii) compliance with federal, state, or local laws and regulations, the rules of a self-regulatory organization, or any pre-existing written policies of the employer. Id. at *12. Defendant's routine background screening was a mandatory condition of employment, which did not require a careful degree of inquiry into its compliance with laws or its pre-existing written policies. Defendant did not require Plaintiffs to undergo background screening in connection with its investigation; rather, it required Plaintiffs to undergo background screening pursuant to its written policies and federal law. Id. at *13-14. Thus, the Court found that the background screening was not an investigation within the plain language of the exclusion, and that reports Defendant procured in connection with its background screening were consumer reports as defined by the FCRA and thus, subject to the FCRA's disclosure requirements. Further, Defendant provided evidence that it procured Plaintiffs' consumer reports using disclosures that complied with the FCRA, namely the criminal background authorization and ASI authorization (the "authorizations"). The Court observed that both authorizations were clear and conspicuous, they disclosed that a consumer report could be obtained for employment purposes, and they were in a document that consisted solely of the disclosure. Id. at *16. Plaintiffs had authorized the procurement of their consumer reports. The Court thus concluded that the authorizations met the FCRA's disclosure requirements. Plaintiffs also contended that even if Defendant procured the consumer reports pursuant to the criminal background authorization, the disclosure violated the FCRA because it was presented in a job application and side-by-side with extraneous information. Further, Plaintiffs alleged that the FCRA disclosure was not a clear and conspicuous document consisting solely of the disclosure because Defendant sought applicants' authorization during its job application process through a convoluted electronic book exceeding 15 pages. The Court opined that a "clear and conspicuous" disclosure means "in a reasonably understandable form and readily noticeable to the consumer." Id. at *21. The Court reasoned that the authorizations were conspicuous to applicants and used language that a lay person would understand. The amount of text was minimal with headings in boldface, and capital font using a larger typeface than the surrounding text. Further, the Court determined that the FCRA does not prohibit an employer from providing an FCRA disclosure as part of the employer's job application process or prohibit an employer from providing an FCRA disclosure at the same time the employer provides other employment documents. Id. Thus, because the background screening complied with the FCRA's disclosure requirements, the Court found that Plaintiffs' claim failed as a matter of law. Accordingly, the Court granted summary judgment to Defendant.

Patel, et al. v. Trans Union, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84142 (N.D. Cal. June 26, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant inaccurately reported that Plaintiff was on a terrorist watch list in violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Plaintiff contended that he when he applied to rent an apartment, his application was refused because of Defendant's inaccurate reporting. Id. at *6. Plaintiff sought to certify: (i) a national class challenging Defendant's willful failure to maintain and follow reasonable procedures to ensure maximum accuracy of their information, in violation of 15 U.S.C. § 1681e(b); and (ii) a national sub-class challenging Defendant's willful failure to provide consumers with all information in their files, in violation of 15 U.S.C. § 1681g. The Court certified the two classes. Defendant challenged the class definitions on the ground that the classes were not ascertainable because the "accuracy class" could not be defined by reference to objective criteria and instead inaccurate information could be shown only by examining files individually. Id. at *24. Defendant disagreed with Plaintiff's assertion that tagging the class members as terrorists was always inaccurate and thus was enough to define the class. The Court noted that Defendant's implied argument was that a significant number of the proposed class may have been accurately tagged as potential terrorists. Id. at *25. The Court remarked that absent some significant proof to the contrary, it was willing to assume that no significant fraction of the proposed class was accurately tagged as potential terrorists. As to the disclosure sub-class, Defendant argued that cross-referencing lists among Defendants would not necessarily produce a list of "disclosure" class members who requested a file disclosure, and even if it did, the list would contain people who may or may not be entitled to their files. Id. at *28. The Court opined that when a Defendant is in the business of collecting, analyzing, and arranging data for sale or on-demand retrieval, when it had already identified over 11,000 people with alerts, and when all tagged persons gave their contact information as part of the background check process, Defendant's argument that the class was not ascertainable was not convincing. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that both the classes were ascertainable. The Court noted that Defendant themselves identified 11,000 persons with an alert on their report and therefore the class satisfied the numerosity requirement. Id. at *31. The Court also found that common questions predominated and were common across the class, thereby satisfying the commonality requirement. Id. at *32. Likewise, the Court determined that all other Rule 23(a) and (b) requirements were satisfied, and accordingly, granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Rawlings, et al. v. ADS Alliance Data Systems, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 81055 (W.D. Mo. June 23, 2015). Plaintiff, a job applicant, brought an action under the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") alleging that Defendant obtained a consumer report on her without providing her a copy of the report and without providing reasonable time to cure any inaccuracies in the reports. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant obtained the report based on a disclosure form that was not on a document consisting solely of the disclosure and instead containing extraneous information such as state law disclosures; and that Defendant failed to obtain proper authorization from her and others before procuring the consumer reports. Id. at *2-3. Defendant moved to dismiss, which the Court granted in part. Defendant argued that the report obtained fell within a statutory exclusion from the definition of a consumer report, since the communication was made to an employer in connection with an investigation of compliance with federal, state, or local laws and regulations, or any pre-existing written policies of the employer. Id. at *5. Defendant provided a document titled "Background Checks and Investigation Policy," arguing that the pleadings embraced this document. Id. The Court, however, remarked that it could not determine that the report obtained was excluded from the definition of a consumer report, because the policy was a general one and made repeated references to consumer reports, was couched in the terms used in the FCRA, and described investigation procedures that would be used, which were the same as those contained in the FCRA. Id. at *7. The Court observed that interpreting the FCRA to exclude an employer's general policy of performing background checks swallows the protections the FCRA affords applicants for employment, and thus it denied the motion to dismiss Plaintiff's claims in their entirety. Id. Alternatively, Defendant argued that the Court must dismiss or strike the adverse action claim because Plaintiff proposed a fail-safe class that could not be certified. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant had a common and uniform policy and practice of making adverse hiring decisions based on consumer reports without allowing the impacted applicant to view the report or correct inaccuracies. The Court observed that under the FCRA, it is a violation to use a consumer report to make adverse employment actions unless the consumer to whom the report relates is given a copy of the report and a description in writing of the rights of the consumer under the FCRA. Id. at *10.

Thus, the Court held that even if Plaintiff's proposed class was a fail-safe class, it was possible to redefine the class at the class certification stage. Id. at *10-11. Defendant also argued that the disclosure form it provided Plaintiff was not objectively unreasonable, and she could not prove that Defendant willfully violated the FCRA. Plaintiff alleged that the disclosure form was not a document consisting solely of the FCRA disclosure, but that it included extraneous information such as state law disclosures. Further, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant knowingly used a disclosure form to obtain a consumer report that contained extraneous information, and that Defendant's violations of the FCRA combined with its knowledge of the requirements of the FCRA was evidence that its violations were willful. The Court opined that the complaint was sufficient to state a claim that Defendant violated the FCRA's stand-alone disclosure requirement, and thus it denied the motion to dismiss the improper disclosure claim. Id. at *15. Finally, Defendant argued that Plaintiff failed to allege any facts consistent with a willful violation of the FCRA because she merely alleged that Defendant obtained her consumer report without proper authorization. The authorization form Plaintiff signed provided that a consumer reporting agency would prepare a background report, and that the authorization sufficed to permit the company to perform additional background checks throughout the applicant's period of employment. The Court remarked that a reasonable person would be on notice that the background report being obtained by the consumer reporting agency was in the nature of a consumer report, and that the form satisfied Defendant's obligation to obtain authorization to procure a consumer report. Id. at *16. The Court thus granted Defendant's motion in this regard.

Rodriguez, et al. v. Equifax Information Services, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93560 (E.D. Va. July 17, 2015). Plaintiff, a job applicant, brought a class action alleging that Defendant, a consumer reporting agency, provided the U.S. Office of Personnel Management ("OPM") with a consumer report containing public record information that would have had an adverse effect upon his ability to obtain employment, without providing notice to him "at the time" it furnished the report to OPM, as required by 15 U.S.C. § 1681k(a)(1). Id. at *7. The consumer report contained a reference to a public record listing of a bankruptcy and a civil judgment, as well as a collection account. Id. at *7. Defendant moved for summary judgment, which the Court granted. Plaintiff contended that Defendant was required to have a notification system that allowed it to actually send to the affected consumer the required notice before or at the same time Defendant sent the consumer report to OPM, and not afterwards. Id. at *13. Under Defendant's notification system, a notice to a consumer was triggered and created internally at the same time a report to OPM was generated internally. Id. Defendant then printed the notice and mailed it to the consumer as part of a continuous process that was designed to be completed on the same day as OPM received the consumer report. The Court observed that Congress did not impose a "same time" requirement with respect to the receipt of notice and that in 2000, the Federal Trade Commission interpreted the "at the time" requirement to permit the mailing of § 1681k(a)(1*)* notices. Id. at *14. Although Plaintiff contended that Defendant's decision to automate its delivery system to OPM required it to similarly update and automate its notice process to consumers, the Court refrained from concluding that the text of the statute requires such technological symmetry during periods of technological innovation so long as the system initiated, at the same time Defendant initiates a report to OPM, a process that was designed to deliver notice to the consumer according to a reasonable, standard, and accepted method of delivery. Id. at *14-15. Further, Plaintiff asserted that Defendant's system of notification was so flawed that he had affirmatively discovered from Defendant that it had no procedure to actually get these notices from a computer to the U.S. Postal Service on the same day of the report. The Court noted that testimony of Defendant's employees established that during the time period relevant to this litigation, Defendant had a policy and seamless practice beginning with the automated generation of the report and PR files from midnight to 3:00-4:00 a.m., printing the notices beginning at approximately 7:00 a.m., and sending them out by U.S. mail that same business day. Id. at *16. Although Plaintiff contended that Defendant did not establish that its mailing vendor mailed the notices on the same business day the report was delivered to OPM, the record contained uncontroverted evidence that Defendant designed the system for that purpose, Defendant contracted for that service, and the vendor picked up notices daily. Id. at *17. The Court remarked that isolated instances when Defendant did not mail a notice on the same business day did not establish that Defendant violated § 1681k by virtue of the overall system used to provide notice. In addition, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant violated § 1681e(b), because the consumer report on him contained an objectively incorrect civil judgment under a name other than his and a collection amount that had been discharged in bankruptcy. Id. at *18-19. Plaintiff sought actual damages and alternatively, statutory and punitive damages. The Court opined that there was insufficient evidence to establish that Plaintiff suffered any cognizable damages or that Defendant engaged in either a negligent or willful violation of § 1681e(b). Accordingly, the Court granted summary judgement in favor of Defendant.

Sweet, et al. v. LinkedIn Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 49767 (N.D. Cal. April 14, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of rejected job applicants, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant's reference search function did not comply with the requirements of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Defendant designed a reference search function available to premium account holders to generate a list of individuals who previously worked with a job applicant and who might be able to provide feedback about the applicant's previous job performance. Id. at *8. Plaintiff submitted a resume to a potential employer through LinkedIn, and got invited for an interview. Plaintiff did not get the job as the potential employer changed its mind to hire her after checking references allegedly based on LinkedIn's references search function. Plaintiffs asserted that the references search violated the FCRA because it provided the reports without determining their intent on using the information. Defendant moved to dismiss and argued that the reference search could not be considered as "consumer reports" under the FCRA, and that it was not acting as a "consumer reporting agency." Id. The Court agreed with Defendant and granted the motion to dismiss. The Court found that the reference search function on LinkedIn was not a "consumer report" for the purpose of FCRA. The Court explained that the information contained in references search came solely from LinkedIn's transactions or experiences with consumers, and the FCRA defines "consumer report" to exclude a "report containing information solely as to transactions or experiences between the consumer and the person making the report." Id. at *12-13. The Court noted that Plaintiffs' own allegations showed that consumers provided LinkedIn with information about their employment histories so that LinkedIn could publish the information on-line, and sharing information was precisely why Plaintiffs or anyone else on LinkedIn provided their employment histories to LinkedIn. Id. at *13-14. The Court reasoned that to meet the definition of a consumer report, a communication must be made by a consumer report agency, and Defendant was not a "consumer reporting agency" under the FCRA. Id. at *18. The FCRA defines consumer reporting agency as "any person which, for monetary fees, dues, or on a cooperative non-profit basis, regularly engages in whole or in part in the practice of assembling or evaluating consumer credit information or other information on consumers for the purpose of furnishing consumer reports to third-parties…" Id. Because consumers had voluntarily provided their names and employment histories to LinkedIn for the purpose of publication, the Court ruled that the facts alleged in Plaintiffs' complaint supported the inference that Defendant gathered the information about the employment histories of the subjects for the purpose of carrying out Plaintiffs' information-sharing objectives, and not for the purpose of creating consumer reports. Id. at *19-20. The Court also noted that Defendant marketed the reference search results – and therefore expected them to be used – as a way for potential employers to locate people who could provide reliable feedback about job candidates and did not market the results themselves as a source of reliable feedback about job candidates. Id. at *28. The Court therefore concluded that Defendant's reference search function was not a consumer report subject to FCRA, and accordingly, dismissed Plaintiffs' action.

(li) Appeals In Class Action Litigation

Ades, et al. v. Omni Hotels Management Corp.,* Case No. 13-CV-2468 (C.D. Cal. June 22, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a class action alleging that Defendants' representatives recorded their personal information when they called their toll-free telephone numbers in violation of the California Invasion of Privacy Act ("CIPA"). Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendants had a company-wide policy of recording inbound telephone conversations with consumers without seeking permission or informing consumers about the monitoring. Id. at *1. After the Court certified the class, the Court granted Defendants' ex parte application to compel the production and consideration of a notice mailed to Verizon Wireless ("Verizon") subscribers who were potential class members in this action. Plaintiffs claimed that they subpoenaed that information because, among other reasons, it would help prove that class members were physically located in California when they made calls to Defendants. Subsequently, the Court issued an order concluding that § 2891(a) of the California Public Utilities Code applies to cellular telephone subscribers, and that the names, addresses, and physical whereabouts of subscribers at the time of those calls constitute information protected by that statute. The Court therefore ruled that the information that Plaintiffs sought should not be released without the telephone subscribers' express consent. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs then filed a motion to certify three questions for interlocutory review by the Ninth Circuit under § 1292(b), including: (i) is the name and address demographic information; (ii) is historical cell site location information relating to a specific call a "calling pattern" or "demographic information;" and (iii) if the term "residential subscribers" includes wireless subscribers. Id. at *4. The Court declined to certify the questions to the Ninth Circuit. Id. at *7. At the outset, the Court noted that a question is controlling if resolution of the issue on appeal could materially affect the outcome of litigation. Id. at *5. The Court further observed that the issue need not be dispositive of the lawsuit in order to be regarded as controlling, but it cannot be collateral to the basic issues of the case. Id. Additionally, a question is not controlling merely because it is "one the resolution of which may appreciably shorten the time, effort, or expense of conducting a lawsuit." Id. Applying these standards, the Court concluded that none of the issues that Plaintiffs sought to certify could be properly described as controlling. The Court noted that discovery-related orders are rarely appropriate for appeal under § 1292(b). Id. at *6. Although Plaintiffs argued that reversal on any of the disputed issues would require a completely new trial, the Court noted that Plaintiffs cited to no precedent in support of that position. Furthermore, the Court remarked that the mere possibility that a reversal on appeal could lead to a new trial, without more, was not sufficient reason for granting the relief requested by Plaintiffs. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the issues presented by Plaintiffs did not present a controlling issue of law, and should not be certified for interlocutory appeal. Id.

Augustin, et al. v. Nassau County Sheriff's Department,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 6317 (2d Cir. April 17, 2015). In this consolidated class action, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants arrested and strip searched them on misdemeanor charges, without individualized suspicion, in violation of their federal and state constitutional rights. After Defendant Nassau County conceded liability, the District Court certified two classes as to liability and damages, and entered summary judgment on liability because of Nassau County's concession. Id. at *3. Before the District Court entered final judgment, Defendants moved to vacate the summary judgment order and to dismiss the action based on the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders, 132 S. Ct. 1510 (2012). In Florence, the Supreme Court held that under certain circumstances, the Fourth Amendment does not prohibit such searches. Id. The District Court granted the motion as to the federal constitutional claim, but denied the request as to the state constitutional claim and entered final judgment in favor of Plaintiffs. After the parties filed cross-appeals, the District Court, pursuant to Rule 62(d), granted in part Defendants' motion to stay enforcement of the judgment. Id. at *2. Defendants moved for a continuation of the temporary stay pending appeal, but without depositing the monies or without posting a bond, which the Second Circuit granted. Defendants argued that pursuant to the District Court's order, Plaintiffs must wait anyway to recover until the conclusion of the appeals process, and that it was essentially guaranteed that Defendants, a group of government entities, would pay the judgment if Plaintiffs prevailed. Id. at *5. The Second Circuit noted that Rule 62(d) provides that an appellant is entitled to a stay pending appeal, by posting a supersedeas bond. Id. at *6. The Second Circuit found that Defendants had demonstrated the existence of appropriated funds, available for the purpose of paying judgments without substantial delay or other difficulty. Id. at *7. The Second Circuit thus concluded that there was no practical reason to require Defendants to post a bond or deposit funds in order to secure a Rule 62(d) stay pending appeal. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Second Circuit stayed the judgment, including the order for payment of fees and costs, without bond or other condition pending appeal. Id.

Gelboim, et al. v. Bank Of America Corp.*, 135 S. Ct. 897 (2015). Plaintiffs brought several actions alleging that a number of banks, acting together, violated federal antitrust law. The London InterBank Offered Rate ("LIBOR") is a reference point in determining interest rates for financial institutions in the United States and globally. The Judicial Panel on Multi-District Litigation established a multi-district litigation, the LIBOR MDL, for cases involving allegations that Defendant banks understated their borrowing costs, thereby depressing LIBOR and enabling the banks to pay lower interest rates on financial instruments sold to investors. Id. at 898. Those actions, including a class action filed by petitioners Ellen Gelboim and Linda Zacher ("Petitioners"), who raised a single claim that several banks violated antitrust law, were consolidated for pre-trial proceedings. The District Court dismissed four categories of cases included in the MDL, three of which involved putative class actions, with a single lead case, namely: (i) the present action; (ii) an action filed on behalf of purchasers of over-the-counter LIBOR-based instruments ("OTC Plaintiffs); and (iii) an action filed on behalf of purchasers of LIBOR-based instruments on exchanges ("Exchange Plaintiffs"). Id. at 903. The District Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss Petitioners' antitrust claims, the sole claim raised, holding that no Petitioner could assert a cognizable antitrust injury. The Second Circuit held that the District Court's dismissal of the complaint was not fit for appellate review. Id. at 904. The U.S. Supreme Court granted review of the Second Circuit's order and reversed. The Supreme Court noted that cases consolidated for MDL pre-trial proceedings ordinarily retain their separate identities, so an order disposing of one of the discrete cases in its entirety should qualify under § 1291 as an appealable final decision. Id. The Supreme Court observed that Congress specifically stated that, at or before the conclusion of pre-trial proceedings, each of the transferred actions must be remanded to the originating district unless the action shall have been previously terminated. Id. at 905. Because the District Court completed its adjudication of Petitioners' complaint and terminated their action, the Supreme Court opined that Petitioners were no longer participants in the consolidated proceedings. Id. The Supreme Court noted that nothing about the initial consolidation of their civil action with other cases in the MDL rendered the dismissal of their complaint in any way tentative or incomplete. Further, the Supreme Court reasoned that the § 1407 consolidation did not meld the Petitioners' class action and others in the MDL into a single unit. Id. Defendants asserted that Plaintiffs with the weakest cases may be positioned to appeal because they stated only one claim, while Plaintiffs with stronger cases would be unable to appeal simultaneously because they had other claims still pending. The Supreme Court, however, observed that, under Rule 54(b), the District Court could grant certification of a final judgment, thereby enabling Plaintiffs in actions that have not been dismissed in their entirety to pursue immediate appellate review. Id. Here, the District Court granted Rule 54(b) certification to the OTC Plaintiffs and the Exchange Plaintiffs so that they could appeal at the same time as Petitioners in this action. The Supreme Court remarked that, if the MDL believed that further proceedings might be relevant to a claim that Defendants moved to dismiss, the MDL ordinarily could defer ruling on the motion, thus allowing all Plaintiffs to participate in the on-going MDL proceedings. Id. at 906. The Supreme Court opined that Rule 54(b) was of no avail here because it addresses orders finally adjudicating fewer than all claims presented in a civil action and does not apply to a single claim action or to a multiple claim action in which all of the claims have been finally decided. Id. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed the order of the Second Circuit.

Paz, et al. v. AG Adriano Goldschmeid,* Case No. 14-CV-1372 (S.D. Cal. Jan. 27, 2015). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that although a pair of jeans he bought were allegedly made in the United States, certain components of the jeans were manufactured in other countries. After the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss on the ground of preemption, Defendants moved to certify the order for interlocutory review and to stay proceedings pending appeal. The Court denied the motion, finding that Defendants failed to establish the second and the third requirements of 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), that there is substantial ground for difference of opinion, and that an immediate appeal from the order may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation. Id. at 1. Regarding the second requirement, the Court noted that a substantial ground for difference of opinion exists where circuit case law precedents are in dispute on the question and the court of appeals of the circuits have not spoken on the point, if complicated questions arise under foreign law, or if novel and difficult questions of first impression are presented. Id. at 2. The Court observed that the mere presence of a disputed issue that is a question of first impression, standing alone, is insufficient to demonstrate a substantial ground for difference of opinion. Id. at 3. Although the Court agreed with Defendants that the preemption issue was one of first impression, it remarked that this was insufficient to warrant certification under § 1292(b). Id. Because Defendants' assertion that other jurists may disagree with the Court's conclusion was speculative, the Court opined that the second requirement for certification was not met. Regarding the third requirement, the Court observed that if the Ninth Circuit disagreed with its decision that Plaintiff's claims were not preempted, Plaintiff's claims would be dismissed and the litigation would come to an end, but if the Ninth Circuit agreed with the decision, then certification would have delayed the progress of the case and its ultimate termination. Id. at

3. Therefore, the Court denied Defendants' motion for § 1292(b) certification of its order on the preemption issue.

(lii) Certification Of Defendant Classes

Medical Protective Co., et al. v. Center For Advanced Spine Technologies,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102577 (S.D. Ohio. Aug. 5, 2015). Plaintiff, the Medical Protective Co., brought an action alleging that Defendant, Abubakar Atiq Durrani, breached conditions of his insurance policies when he fled the country in December 2013. Plaintiff issued insurance policies to Durrani, the president and sole shareholder of Defendant Center for Advanced Spine Technologies, Inc. ("CAST") and CAST, and Defendant/Cross-Claimant Cincinnati Insurance Company ("CIC") issued general liability insurance policies to CAST. Id. at *6-7. Durrani faced more than 405 lawsuits from former patients who claimed that he performed unnecessary surgeries and accused him of fraudulently billing Medicare millions of dollars for unnecessary procedures (the "Underlying Litigation"). Durrani fled the country after a warrant was issued for his arrest. Plaintiff's contract with Durrani required him to "fully cooperate" with any claims brought against him and required him to "attend and assist in the preparation and trial" related to any claim. Id. In December 2013, Durrani advised Plaintiff via e-mail that he would not return to the country or assist Plaintiff in any way in defense of the cases pending against him. Id. at *8. Plaintiff, therefore, sought a declaration that Durrani's absence from the trials violated the terms of his contract and that it had no duty to defend or indemnify Durrani or CAST in the underlying litigation under its policies. CIC also sought a declaratory judgment that Durrani and CAST breached their duties to cooperate in CIC's investigation of the claims asserted in the underlying litigation, that it would be prejudiced by their failure to cooperate, and it had no obligation to defend or indemnify Durrani or CAST. Id. at *15-16. Plaintiff and CIC (the "Movants") moved to certify a Defendant class of any person or legal entity who had or might have a claim, cause of action, or judgment against Durrani, CAST, Plaintiff, or CIC in connection with the underlying litigation. Id. at *18-19. The Court granted class certification. First, the Court found that Movants satisfied the numerosity requirement because they identified over 400 pending lawsuits against Defendants. Second, the Court ruled that Movants satisfied commonality because they demonstrated that the issue of whether Durrani and CAST satisfied the policies' cooperation requirements would be based on the same conduct, namely Durrani's refusal to participate in the defense of the underlying litigation. Id. at *26. Third, the Court determined that Movants satisfied typicality because they showed that the policy provisions at issue were the same for all putative class members, and the putative class representatives' interests were typical of those of the class, i.e., to defend against declarations that Movants were not obligated to provide defense or indemnity to Durrani or CAST with respect to the underlying litigation. Id. at *29. Fourth, the Court found that Movants satisfied the adequacy requirement because they demonstrated that the proposed class representatives' interests were aligned for the purposes of this action because all members of the class shared the same unified interest in seeking to establish that Movants were obligated to defend and indemnify Durrani and CAST. Id. at *30. The Court, therefore, held that class certification under Rule 23(b)(2) was proper. Although technically Movants were situated more like traditional Defendants because the case involved the validity of class members' potential claims against Movants for indemnification of Durrani and CAST, the Court found no risk that Plaintiff or CIC could control the outcome of the action by its own conduct because the Court ultimately would be tasked with determining whether Movants were obligated to defend Durrani and CAST given the relevant policy language and the facts. Id. at *34. The Court, therefore, granted Movants' motion to certify a Defendant class pursuant to Rule 23(b)(2).

Strawser, et al. v. Strange,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66399 (S.D. Ala. May 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, several same-sex couples, brought an action alleging that Alabama's laws excluding same-sex couples from marriage and refusing to recognize same-sex marriages violated the Fourteenth Amendment. Plaintiffs moved for certification of a Plaintiff Class and a Defendant Class. The Plaintiff Class included all persons in Alabama who wished to obtain a marriage license to marry a person of the same sex, wished to have that marriage recognized under Alabama law, and were unable to do so because of the enforcement of Alabama's laws prohibiting the issuance of marriage licenses to same-sex couples and barring recognition of their marriages. The Defendant Class included all Alabama county probate judges who enforced the Alabama law at issue. Id. at *1-2. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. First, regarding the Plaintiff Class, Plaintiffs cited to census data from 2010 indicating that Alabama is home to approximately 6,582 same-sex couples. Id. at *4. The Court found that the 2010 census data, coupled with the actual experiences in other states, amply supported the conclusion that the number of same-sex couples in Alabama seeking to be married far exceeded any number which would be practical for joinder. Id. at *8. The Court also agreed with Plaintiffs that probate judges would have no difficulty identifying those affected by the requested injunction because any same-sex couples who attempted to apply for a marriage license plainly qualified as members of the proposed class. Id. As to the Defendant Class, the Court found that Alabama had 68 probate judges, all of whom had refused, or could in the future refuse, to issue marriage licenses to same-sex couples. Id. at *10. The Court concluded that, whereas all 68 probate judges were known, it was impracticable to join them all, and their inclusion in the class would serve the interests of judicial economy. Id. at *11. Second, regarding the commonality requirement, the Court found that Plaintiffs based their claims on the same legal theories as absent class members and sought the same legal relief, i.e., a declaratory judgment striking down Alabama's laws banning same-sex marriage and an injunction barring their enforcement. Id. at *12-13. Similarly, the question common to the entire Defendant Class was whether their enforcement of Alabama's laws barring same-sex couples from marriage violated the Fourteenth Amendment. Id. at *13. Third, the Court found that Plaintiffs met the typicality requirement because the injuries, claims, and defenses of the Plaintiffs and Defendants were typical of the injuries, claims, and defenses of the proposed classes. Id. at *15. Fourth, regarding adequacy of representation of the Defendant Class, named Defendant Judge Don Davis asserted that he could not be an effective class representative because the 68 probate judges had no unified position on the constitutionality of denying marriage licenses to same-sex couples and because he had never made public statements or taken a public stance on the matter. Id. The Court, however, noted that the issuance of marriage licenses is a purely ministerial act and that none of the Defendant Class members were charged with discretion or judgment in carrying out that ministerial duty. Id. at *16-17. The Court found that certification was proper under Rule 23(b)(1) and (2). The Court reasoned that a class-wide ruling would definitively determine the issues as to all of Plaintiffs' claims against all 68 probate judges. Id. at *19. Because Defendants allegedly directed their conduct against a specific class of people and applied it uniformly, the injuries of all Plaintiff Class members could be properly addressed by class-wide injunctive relief. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court certified the Plaintiff and Defendant Classes.

(liii) Venue Issues In Class Actions

Fernandez, et al. v. UBS AG,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47767 (D.P.R. Mar. 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of Puerto Rico residents who invested in Defendants' mutual funds, brought a class action alleging that Defendants improperly steered Plaintiffs – most of whom were older individuals focused on preserving their capital and generating income for retirement – to invest in the mutual funds without regard to their suitability, and in violation of Defendant's fiduciary and contractual obligations. Plaintiffs initially filed the action in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York where they recognized their contractual obligation to litigate their civil action in New York. Id. at *3. The parties' client agreements contained a forum-selection clause pursuant to which Plaintiffs agreed to bring suit in the courts of the State of New York or in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York for the purpose of determining all matters with regard to their agreements. Further, the agreements waived any objection to such venue. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs, however, voluntarily dismissed the New York complaint and then filed the same action in Puerto Rico. Id. Defendants moved for a change of venue to New York based on the exclusivity of that forum, which the Court granted. The Court cited Bremen v. Zapata Off-Shore Co., 407 U.S. 1 (1972), which held that forum-selection clauses should be enforced absent a showing that to do so would be unreasonable and unjust, or that the clause was invalid for such reasons as fraud or overreaching. Id. at *4-5. The Court noted that when the parties have agreed to a valid forum-selection clause, the Court should ordinarily transfer the case to the forum specified in that clause. Id. at *5. Although Plaintiffs argued that the factors overwhelmingly favored litigating the action in Puerto Rico, they failed to persuade the Court that the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico itself had an interest in the action. Id. at *6. The Court noted that when parties have contracted in advance to litigate disputes in a particular forum, it should not unnecessarily disrupt the parties' settled expectations. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court transferred venue for the case to the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Hicks, et al. v. PGA Tour, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 115416 (N.D. Cal. July 24, 2015). In this workplace antitrust class action, the Court denied Defendant's motion to transfer venue to the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Florida. Applying the multi-factor test applied to transfer of venue motions, the Court concluded that Defendant failed to meet the burden of showing that a transfer was warranted for the convenience of the parties and witnesses, and also failed to meet its burden of showing that a transfer would promote the interests of justice. Id. at *60. Specifically, the Court remarked that although the alleged antitrust violations were allegedly harming PGA Tour caddies in California as well as in the Middle District of Florida, the case likely would be adjudicated more quickly in California. The Court also noted that document production and written discovery would be easier if the case was located in California. Moreover, the Court found that Defendant had made no showing that a trial in California would be more inconvenient for third-party witnesses than a trial in the Middle District of Florida. Id. at *61-62. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for transfer of venue.

Horanzy, et al. v. Vemma Nutrition Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21906 (N.D.N.Y. Feb. 18, 2015). Plaintiff, a consumer, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants were responsible for marketing, advertising, and selling of liquid dietary supplements based on false and misleading health claims in violation of the federal Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act. Plaintiff also asserted claims under New York's General Business Law as well as common law claims for unjust enrichment, negligent and fraudulent misrepresentation, and breach of express warranty. Defendant Vemma Nutrition Co. ("Vemma") was an Arizona corporation, whereas Plaintiff was a New York resident, and sought to represent all persons in the United States who purchased Defendants' products. Defendants moved to transfer venue to the U.S. District Court for the District of Arizona pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a), which the Court granted. The parties agreed that the action could have been brought in the District of Arizona. The Court remarked that the only question to be decided was whether the transfer would promote the interests of justice and the convenience of the parties, which depended on nine factors. Id. at *8. The Court noted that the first factor was Plaintiff's choice of forum, which is given substantial weight. Id. at *9. Defendants, however, argued that Plaintiff's choice of forum had little weight because the operative facts concerned misrepresentations made by Vemma in connection with its nationwide sales campaign. Defendants contended that since those representations originated from its headquarters in Arizona, the proper venue was Arizona. Id. The Court noted that at least in the patent infringement context, case law authorities have held that where a party's products are sold in many states, sales alone are insufficient to establish a material connection to the forum and to override other factors favoring transfer. Id. at *10. Therefore, the Court concluded that although Plaintiff was a suitable representative for the New York sub-class, the overarching operative facts had little relation to New York. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiff's choice of forum was irrelevant to this context. The District Court found that the second factor – the convenience of witnesses – weighed in favor of transfer, as it was logical to assume that Vemma's corporate officers, all of whom were located in Arizona, would offer some degree of relevant testimony on Vemma's marketing, sales, and distribution network. Id. at *13. Similarly, the Court reasoned that the remaining factors – the location of documents, convenience of parties, locus of operative facts, availability of process, relative means of parties, familiarity with governing law, and trial efficiency & interests of justice – were either neutral, or weighed in favor of transfer of venue to Arizona. Id. at *14-19. Accordingly, the Court granted the motion to transfer venue to the District of Arizona.

Legg, et al. v. Quicken Loans, Inc.,* Case No. 14-CV-61116 (S.D. Fla. Mar. 5, 2015). Plaintiff, a Florida resident, brought a putative class action under the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") alleging that Defendant purchased Plaintiff's cell phone number from a credit reporting bureau and used an autodialer and/or pre-recorded message to call Plaintiff. Plaintiff alleged that callers with six different numbers called him without his permission. Defendant moved to transfer venue, arguing that the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan was the proper venue for the action because its primary operations were located in Michigan, substantially all of the witnesses resided in Michigan, and the vast majority of anticipated documents and physical evidence were located there. Id. at 2. The Court denied the motion. First, the Court found that Defendant did not actually identify potential witnesses it claimed were residing in Michigan. The Court also determined that the supporting declarations that Defendant's senior telecommunications engineer submitted did not include any detail on how the potential witnesses were relevant to the unsolicited calls made to Plaintiff. Id. Second, the Court ruled that the majority of relevant documents could be produced electronically and other evidence, such as Plaintiff's testimony, was located in Florida. Id. at 3. Third, the Court agreed with Plaintiff that the convenience of the parties factor weighed in his favor because "where a transfer merely shifts the inconvenience from one party to another, Plaintiff's choice of forum should remain." Id. The Court observed that Defendant's argument that depositions and mediation could take place in Florida for Plaintiff's convenience undermined the argument that Florida was inconvenient for Defendant. Id. Regarding the locus of operative facts, the Court observed that the alleged incidents took place in Florida, and that Defendant's declarations did not introduce evidence that facts related to the calls or any facts other than the location of Defendant's headquarters were centered in Michigan. Id. at 4. Concerning the relative means of the parties factor, the Court reasoned that Defendant would be significantly better able to bear any travel costs or other expenses associated with the litigation as it was a large corporation with significant resources. Id. As a result, the Court held that the weight accorded a Plaintiff's choice of forum favored Plaintiff. Although Defendant argued that Plaintiff's preference should not matter because this was a putative class action and thus it could include class members from all over the country, the Court found that some deference for Plaintiff's forum was still appropriate. Id. Finally, regarding trial efficiency and the interests of justice factor, the Court explained that Florida has a more developed TCPA body of case law than Michigan. Id. at 4-5. Thus, the Court concluded that transfer was inappropriate and denied Defendant's motion to transfer venue.

Nguyen, et al. v. Barnes & Noble, Inc.,* Case No. 12-CV-812 (C.D. Cal. Feb. 17, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant improperly continued to sell HP Tablets on its website after its inventory was gone and complaining that Plaintiff was unable to purchase an HP Tablet during the liquidation period for the discounted price. After HP announced it was discontinuing production of certain tablets, retailers including Defendant offered steep promotional discounts, and Plaintiff ordered two tablets. Id. at 1-2. Fifteen hours after Plaintiff ordered the tablets, Defendant cancelled the transaction because of shortage of inventory. Id. at 3. Defendant moved to transfer the action to the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York. The Court denied the motion, finding that transfer of venue did not serve the convenience of the parties and witnesses and did not promote the interests of justice. First, because Plaintiff asserted three claims under New York law and three claims under California law, the Court noted that neither it nor the Southern District of New York was likely to be more familiar with the legal issues raised by Plaintiff. Id. at 6. Second, the Court observed that, when an individual purports to represent a class, Plaintiff's choice of forum may be given less weight, and consideration must be given to the extent of the parties' contacts with the forum. Id. at 7. Because Plaintiff styled his action as a putative nationwide class action, the Court found that Plaintiff's choice of forum was entitled to less weight. Third, the Court observed that the doctrine of reduced deference to a Plaintiff's forum choice in a class action serves as a guard against the dangers of forum shopping, especially when a representative Plaintiff does not reside within the district. Id. Plaintiff resided in the Central District of California, ordered the tablets using a billing address in that District, and requested that the tablets be shipped to an address in that District. Because the danger of forum shopping was absent here, the Court opined that Plaintiff's choice of forum weighed against transfer. The Court concluded that, because Plaintiff resided in the Central District of California, and Defendant allegedly operated dozens of physical bookstores in California and made on-line sales to customers living in that District, both parties' contacts with that forum were significant. Id. at 8. Further, because Plaintiff used a billing address in the Central District of California, the Court found that the parties' contacts with the forum were intertwined with Plaintiff's claims. Id. Finally, although Defendant asserted that its corporate witnesses worked and resided in New York, and the costs of litigation in New York were less, the Court found that the convenience of corporate witnesses ordinarily was entitled to less consideration than that of non-party witnesses. Id. The Court also reasoned that, considering the progress of the action since its filing, transfer only would impede its speedy resolution. Id. at 9. Accordingly, considering the totality of factors, the Court denied the motion to transfer on the basis that transfer would neither serve the convenience of parties and witnesses, nor further the interests of justice.

Romo, et al. v. McKesson Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 77429 (C.D. Cal. June 9, 2015). Plaintiffs filed several separate product liability class actions in California state courts alleging cardiovascular injuries as a result of ingestion of prescription pain medications containing propoxyphene. In 2012, a group of attorneys responsible for many of the propoxyphene actions against Defendants filed petitions with the California Judicial Council to establish a coordinated proceeding for all California propoxyphene actions under § 404 of the California Code of Civil Procedure. Plaintiffs asked for coordination of their lawsuits due to concerns that there could be potential duplicate and inconsistent rulings, orders, or judgments. After the petitions for coordination were filed, Defendants removed the cases under the mass action provision of the Class Action Fairness Act ("CAFA"). The Court found that it lacked jurisdiction under the CAFA because Plaintiffs' petitions were not proposals to try cases jointly and remanded the cases to state court. Subsequently, the Ninth Circuit reversed the order of remand, holding that the propoxyphene actions were removable under the mass action provision of the CAFA because Plaintiffs asked in state court that the cases be coordinated before "one judge . . . for all purposes." Id. at *2. After Plaintiffs in the propoxyphene actions did not agree to join a multi-district litigation ("MDL") in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky where other related cases were pending, Defendants moved to transfer this action to the Eastern District of Kentucky or to sever. The Court granted Defendants' motion to transfer the action to the Eastern District of Kentucky, which rendered moot the motion to sever. The Court first addressed Plaintiffs' threshold argument that the transfer of a CAFA mass action under § 1404(a) was prohibited. While the Court agreed with Plaintiffs that transfer to an MDL is forbidden without the consent of the majority of Plaintiffs in a mass action, the Court opined that Plaintiffs failed to persuade it that such prohibition applied to a venue transfer under § 1404. Id. at *6. The Court further assessed whether transfer of the propoxyphene actions was appropriate under § 1404. First, the Court noted that the parties did not dispute that this action might have been filed in the Eastern District of Kentucky because, as Defendants pointed out, venue is appropriate in any judicial district in which a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred or a substantial part of property that is the subject of the action is situated. Id. at *7. Second, the Court found that the transfer of the propoxyphene actions to the Eastern District of Kentucky would promote the interests of justice. Id. at *7-8. Defendants argued that the propoxyphene actions should be transferred to the Eastern District of Kentucky for efficiency purposes because the Eastern District of Kentucky had presided over the propoxyphene MDL and, therefore, efficiently could handle these claims as well. Id. at *9. The Court observed that the Eastern District of Kentucky had become familiar with the issues at stake in this litigation and, consequently, would resolve them more efficiently. Id. at *10. Moreover, the Court observed that a transfer to the Eastern District of Kentucky would move the matter from a more congested to a significantly less congested venue, which could lead to a faster resolution of these actions. Id. at *11. Third, the Court found that transferring the actions would be convenient for the parties and witnesses because Xanodyne, a primary Defendant, was located in Kentucky, and none of the alleged manufacturing Defendants had a meaningful connection to California. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the Eastern District of Kentucky was the most convenient forum to hear the propoxyphene actions.

Ryan, et al. v. Microsoft Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47753 (N.D. Cal. April 10, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant conspired with technology companies to suppress employee wages by illegally entering into anti-solicitation and restricted hiring agreements, in violation of antitrust laws. Defendant moved to transfer venue and contended that the forum selection clauses in Plaintiffs' employment agreements required Plaintiffs to litigate in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Washington. Id. at *12. Plaintiffs did not contest that the action could have been brought in the Western District of Washington, but contended that they chose to bring the action in the Northern District of California because Defendant made and performed the alleged anti-solicitation and restricting hiring agreements in the Silicon Valley area. Id. at *14. The Court denied Defendant's motion and found that Defendant failed to carry its burden of showing that transfer was warranted. The Court noted that the relevant forum selection clauses covered "any action arising out of" Plaintiffs' employment agreements, and Plaintiffs' claims did not "arise out of" the employment agreements because the issue of whether Defendant violated antitrust laws did not require interpretation of Plaintiffs' employment agreements. Id. at *18. Defendant argued that because Plaintiffs agreed to non-competition clauses that prevented Plaintiffs from working for competitor companies for a period of one year following their termination, the non-competition clauses created a powerful disincentive for competing companies to poach them, and this would be material to the adjudication of Plaintiffs' claims against Defendant. Id. at *17. The Court, however, pointed out that Defendant had failed to explain why resolution of Plaintiffs' antitrust claims would require interpretation of the scope of Plaintiffs' non-competition agreements. According to the Court, whether Defendant engaged in a conspiracy that had the effect of depressing employee wages and restricting mobility did not require determining whether Plaintiffs breached employment agreements, or the scope of the rights and responsibilities of the parties under Plaintiffs' employment agreements. Id. at *20. Since Plaintiffs' claims were based on Defendant's alleged illegal conduct, the Court concluded that the forum selection clauses in Plaintiffs' employment agreements did not apply to this action. Id. The Court therefore denied Defendant's motion to transfer venue based on the employment agreements.

Silvis, et al. v. Ambit Energy, LP,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31681 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 13, 2015). Plaintiff, a Pennsylvania resident, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants, a residential energy supplier and a host of related entities based in Texas, breached their promise of providing lower competitive electricity rates. Plaintiff accused Defendants of giving her an initial one-month "teaser rate" before nearly doubling the rate. Id. at *2. Plaintiff alleged breach of contract, breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, unjust enrichment, and declaratory relief. Defendants moved to transfer venue to Texas, arguing that the operating terms of service called for dispute resolution in Texas and the Court should enforce the forum-selection clause therein. The Court denied the motion. Id. at *10-11. Although Plaintiff disputed the validity of the forum-selection clause, the Court found that the current record was not sufficiently developed to resolve the question of contract validity. Id. at *8-9. The Court applied the public-interest factors and determined that Commonwealth's interests compelled that the litigation be conducted in Pennsylvania. The Court noted that the parties formed the contracts at issue in Pennsylvania, the alleged breach occurred in Pennsylvania, and the proposed class had only current or former Pennsylvania residents. Id. at *13. The Court thus found that the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania had a decisive and stronger interest in this case than any other state. Id. Further, because the case implicated Pennsylvania's historical and on-going regulation of the commodity at issue, one with substantial impact on Pennsylvania's citizens and economy, the Court concluded that it was a truly exceptional case that precluded enforcement of the forum-selection clause. Id. at *14-15. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to transfer the venue.

(liv) Bifurcation Issues In Class Actions

Jean-Louis, et al. v. Clear Springs Farming, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 91964 (M.D. Fla. July 15, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action on behalf of Haitian, Afro-Haitian, and African-American farm workers alleging race, color, and national origin discrimination in their employment in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act and the Florida Civil Rights Act. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants recruited them to pick blueberries during the March 2012 season, but failed to provide them any work when they reported for duty. Id. at *3. After the Court certified the class and granted the parties' joint motion to continue the pre-trial conference and trial, Plaintiffs moved to bifurcate the trial into two phases. The first phase would consist of a trial on liability, and if Plaintiffs prevailed in this phase, then the parties would engage in discovery as to damages with a trial on damages following the discovery period. The Court denied the proposed bifurcation plan on the basis that it was inefficient and would unnecessarily delay the case. Id. at *4. The Court found that the circumstances did not warrant bifurcation because staying discovery as to damages when the parties had ample time to conduct damages discovery prior to the trial would needlessly delay the case. Id. Moreover, Plaintiffs' motion largely focused on Haitian farm workers, who spoke primarily Haitian-Creole, and who worked outside of Florida during the summer months. The Court determined that this point was unpersuasive because the fact that damages discovery might be inconvenient to Plaintiffs did not warrant bifurcation. Id. Defendants pointed out that the discovery they sought were simple interrogatories relevant to Plaintiffs' mitigation efforts and allegations of compensatory damages. Because the Court opined that the case was not complex or difficult and that Plaintiffs' bifurcation plan did not promote convenience and efficiency, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion.

(lv) Joinder And Severance Issues In Class Actions

DeCrane, et al. v. Eli Lilly And Co.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 141924 (S.D. Ind. Oct. 19, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought an action alleging that they suffered personal injuries and damages as a result of Defendant's failure to provide adequate instructions about its drug Cymbalta. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant failed to provide adequate instructions for stopping Cymbalta and an adequate warning that fully and accurately informed Plaintiffs about the frequency, severity, and/or duration of symptoms associated with Cymbalta withdrawal. Id. at *7-8. Along with this action, Plaintiffs' counsel also filed numerous other lawsuits across the country relating to Cymbalta, specifically as to withdrawal symptoms, including numerous Plaintiffs from different states. On July 23, 2015, Plaintiffs in the numerous Cymbalta-related lawsuits moved to transfer the pending Cymbalta cases to an MDL proceeding in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Indiana. The Judicial Panel for Multi-District Litigation denied transfer and found that all factors weighed against centralization of the 41 cases. Id. at *7. Defendant then filed a motion to sever and transfer Plaintiffs' claims, arguing that Plaintiffs' claims should be severed into separate actions and that each action should be transferred to Plaintiffs' home state of Kentucky. Id. at *10. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' action should be severed because the lawsuit combined the claims of two Plaintiffs whose allegations rested on distinct, unrelated factual scenarios, including that they commenced Cymbalta therapy at different times, for distinct reasons, and discontinued it under the care of his or her own distinct healthcare professional. Id. at *11-12. The Court granted Defendant's motion to sever, but denied the request to transfer Plaintiffs' claims to the District of Kentucky. The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that their claims arose out of a single transaction or occurrence so that a joinder of their claims would be appropriate. Id. at *17. While some of Plaintiffs' claims related to Cymbalta's development and the way in which Defendant marketed and sold the drug might have arisen from the same set of facts, the Court noted that the crux of Plaintiffs' claims would be highly individualized as it would not turn on the wording of Defendant's warning, but rather on Plaintiffs' interactions with their medical providers. Id. at *15. The Court explained that each Plaintiff would need to show that Defendant's conduct caused his or her injuries, which would require evidence relating to why the health care provider prescribed Cymbalta, the nature of the health care provider's knowledge regarding withdrawal from Cymbalta, for what medical condition he/she was taking Cymbalta, how much and how long he or she took Cymbalta, and how he or she attempted to discontinue using Cymbalta. In sum, these issues would require highly individualized inquiries. Id. at *17-18. The Court therefore concluded that the differences made Plaintiffs' claims improper for joinder. The Court was unable to determine whether each Plaintiff's claims should be transferred as the parties' brief addressed transfer based on the present multi-Plaintiff status of the case, and the collective analysis of the transfer issue no longer applied given that the Court severed the claims. Id. at *28. The Court thereby denied Defendant's motion to the extent that it sought transfer of Plaintiff's class claims to the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky, but without prejudice should Defendant seek transfer in any individual case. Id. at *28-29. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to sever Plaintiffs' claims and denied transfer of the claims to the Eastern District of Kentucky.

(lvi) Comity Principles In Class Actions

Baker, et al. v. Microsoft Corp.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS (9th Cir. Mar. 18, 2015). Plaintiff, a group of consumers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant's Xbox 360 video game console's optical disc had a design defect and was unable to withstand even the smallest of vibrations, which resulted in scratched discs that were rendered permanently unplayable. Previously, several Xbox owners had sued Defendant alleging similar claims in In Re Microsoft Xbox 360 Scratched Disc Litigation, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109075 (W.D. Wash. Oct. 5, 2009), where the District Court had denied class certification, finding that individual issues predominated and relying heavily on Gable v. LandRover North America, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 82996 (C.D. Cal. Sept. 29, 2008). Id. at *4. After the denial of class certification in Wolin v. Jaguar Land Rover North America, LLC, 617 F.3d. 1169 (9th Cir. 2010), the Ninth Circuit reversed Gable, finding that the District Court in Gable erred when it concluded without a discussion that certification was inappropriate because Plaintiffs did not prove that the defect manifested in a majority of the class' vehicles. Id. at *7. Here, the District Court found that the ruling in Wolin did not undermine the causation analysis articulated in the Scratched Disc Litigation, and that comity required deferral to the earlier certification order. On that basis, the District Court dismissed the action. On appeal, however, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded. At the outset, the Ninth Circuit noted that here, the District Court cited Scratched Disc Litigation and its description of the causation analysis in Gable for the notion that individual issues of causation predominated in this case. The District Court determined that nothing in Wolin undermined the causation analysis in Scratched Disc Litigation's. The Ninth Circuit, however, noted that Wolin expressly and specifically rejected the notion that individual manifestations of the defect precluded resolution of the claims on a class-wide basis. Id. at *13. Wolin held that although individual factors might affect premature tire wear, they did not affect whether the vehicles were sold with an alignment defect. Id. Similarly, in this case, the Ninth Circuit noted that although individual factors may affect the timing and extent of the disc scratching, they did not affect whether the Xboxes were sold with a defective disc system. Id. at *14. Likewise, the Ninth Circuit found that proof that the allegedly defective disc system caused individual damages was not necessary to determine whether the existence of the alleged design defect breached Defendant's express warranty. Id. at *16. The Ninth Circuit accordingly, ruled that the District Court's erroneously applied the principle of comity, and reversed and remanded the case.

(lvii) Breach Of Contract Class Actions

Hirsh, et al. v. Jupiter Golf Club,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62719 (S.D. Fla. May 13, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action against Defendants alleging breach of contract, and seeking injunctive relief and declaratory judgment. Plaintiffs alleged that they signed agreements to be members of Ritz-Carlton Golf Club & Spa Jupiter (the "Club"). Defendants RBF, LLC ("RBF") and Jupiter Golf Club, LLC ("JGC") either previously or currently owned the Club. Id. at *2. When JGC brought the Club from RBF, JGC changed the club membership terms set forth in the membership agreements, which triggered Defendants' obligation under the contract to refund Plaintiffs' membership deposits. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that JGC breached the membership agreements by attempting to alter the membership refund policy and RBF failed to convey title to the club facilities, subject to the terms of the existing membership plan. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs moved for class certification, which the Court granted. At the outset, the Court found that the numerosity requirement was satisfied because there were 150 individuals who purchased one of the three types of Club memberships, paid a membership deposit, and had not received a full refund. Id. at *5. The Court noted that Defendants challenged the existence of commonality by citing the language of the membership agreement and other supporting documents, which addressed the merits of Plaintiffs' claim. Id. at *12. The Court opined that Plaintiffs need not prove their claim to get the class certified, but they did show that the questions such as whether Defendants breached the membership agreement were common across the class. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that commonality requirement was satisfied. Similarly, the Court found that common issues were predominant over individual issues, and that a class action was a superior method of adjudication. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court certified a class consisting of individuals who purchased a Club membership but did not receive a full refund of their membership deposit.

Pagliaroni, et al. v. Mastic Home Exteriors, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 126543 (D. Mass. Sept. 22, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a putative class action alleging defects in Oasis Decking ("Oasis"), a wood-plastic composite exterior decking product, manufactured by Defendant Deceuninck North American ("DNA") and distributed by Defendant Mastic Home Exteriors ("Mastic"). Plaintiffs installed Oasis decks at their homes and later noticed cracking, splitting, and other problems. Plaintiffs alleged that DNA licensed a patented composite formula and manufacturing process of using a high-density polyethylene ("HDPE") for making decks from Strandex Corp, but used more talc than the formula called for and a brand of HDPE other than the one recommended by Strandex. Id. at *5. Contending that defect in the formula caused the damages in the decks, Plaintiffs asserted claims against Mastic for breach of express warranty and negligent misrepresentation, and against both Defendants for breach of implied warranty, unjust enrichment, and negligence. Id. at *16. Plaintiffs also asserted claims under the consumer protection laws of Massachusetts, New York, and Minnesota and unjust enrichment claims under the laws of Massachusetts, Minnesota, New York, and Oregon. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification and proposed a class defined as all individuals and entities that own homes, residences, buildings, or other structures physically located in the states of Massachusetts, Minnesota, New York, and Oregon in which Oasis had been installed. Id. at *31. The Court denied class certification on the basis that Plaintiffs failed to meet Rule 23 requirements of commonality, typicality, and adequacy of representation. Plaintiffs raised two theories of express warranty liability, including: (i) Mastic breached an express warranty arising out of the statements Mastic made in the course of marketing Oasis about the product's durability; and (ii) Mastic breached the limited warranty it offered by suggesting that Oasis would last for 10 to 25 years. Id. at *40. The Court found that Plaintiffs offered no common questions that could drive the resolution of the litigation of either of these express warranty theories. Id. The Court noted that Plaintiffs' expert warranty claims against Mastic were not common to the class because determining which representations by Mastic formed the basis of the bargain with each Plaintiff would require individual proof as Mastic used a multi-tiered distribution system and did not sell Oasis directly to Plaintiffs. Id. The Court found similar problems with Plaintiffs' implied warranty claims against Mastic and DNA. The Court noted that, while some consumers received Oasis decks that were alleged to be unfit for ordinary use, others found no performance problems with their decks, and thus, whether a particular Oasis deck failed ordinary expectations for use was not a common question susceptible to class-wide proof or determination. Id. at *41. The Court also rejected Plaintiffs' argument that their claims were typical of the class because they all bought Oasis decks that later split or cracked, noting that most class members had not reported problems with their decks and those who had reported problems had accepted warranty payments, which the named Plaintiffs had not. Id. at *44-47. Further, the proposed class included purchasers of Oasis and transferee owners who purchased a building that already had Oasis installed and the named Plaintiffs were all direct purchasers of Oasis decks, and thus the theory of Defendants' liability would differ from the claims of a transferee owner who did not view any representations by Mastic about Oasis and did not select or pay for Oasis. Id. at *48. For the same reasons, the Court found Plaintiffs to be inadequate representatives for the proposed class. Id. at *48-49. The Court also found that the questions of injury and causation were not amenable to common resolution for proposed class where the record raised individualized questions of proof as to whether an Oasis owner actually suffered any injury, whether that injury has been remedied by the Oasis warranty program, and whether a particular representation or action by Defendants caused that owner's damages. Id. at *42-43. For these reasons, the Court therefore denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Richey, et al. v. Matanuska-Susitna Borough*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 45166 (D. Alaska April 7, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant illegally denied its employees the benefits of Alaska's Public Employees Retirement System ("PERS") in violation of state laws. The PERS provides retirement, disability, and death benefits to certain public employees. In 1968, Defendant entered into a contract with the state that required Defendant to enroll its employees in the PERS once "the employee is employed by [Defendant] in a qualified position, receives PERS-eligible compensation, and is eligible to make PERS contributions." Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs filed their complaint in Alaska state court and moved for class certification before they conducted discovery. The state court denied their motion without prejudice, ruling that Plaintiffs failed to provide information to establish each of the requirements for class certification. Before renewing their motion, Plaintiffs amended their complaint to add a claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, and Defendant removed the case under federal question jurisdiction. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs then moved for class certification. The Court denied the motion. First, the Court found that Plaintiffs' seven-part class definition was unwieldy and failed definitively to identify the class. Plaintiffs had not attempted to demonstrate by reference to any objective criteria that it would be administratively feasible for the Court to identify, without individualized inquiries, all employees to whom Defendant provided "all equipment, tools, clothing, [and] supplies necessary to the performance of their duties," or all employees who "routinely" worked more than 15 or 30 hours per week for a "sufficient" amount of annual hours. Id. at *6-7. Because Plaintiffs did not explain why Defendant's provision of equipment, tools, clothing, and supplies was relevant to the case, or which employees had worked the "requisite" number of hours, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to show that identifying the class members was administratively feasible. Id. at *7-8. Regarding numerosity, the Court found that, although Plaintiffs estimated that the number of class members exceeded 300, they did not explain how they arrived at that estimate and asserted they would obtain conclusive data in discovery. Id. at *11. The Court noted that, although Plaintiffs had submitted several documents, some of which contained information purportedly relevant to the class size, Plaintiffs had not established how many hours an employee had to work annually before becoming PERS-eligible, or the extent to which employees referenced in deposition testimony were excluded from the PERS. Id. at *12-13. Thus, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to submit evidence sufficient to demonstrate numerosity. Id. at *13. Plaintiffs argued that they satisfied commonality by showing that class members' "common harm" was exclusion from the PERS "on account of arbitrary job classifications." Yet the Court noted that Plaintiffs failed to identify the elements of any of their claims or explain why a determination that Defendant improperly excluded the class members from the PERS would be central to the validity of any of them. Id.

at *15. Further, Plaintiffs did not specifically identify any allegedly arbitrary job classifications, did not explain the basis of those allegedly arbitrary classifications, and did not explain how or why Defendant applied those allegedly arbitrary classifications consistently among the purported class. Id. Regarding typicality, the Court noted that Plaintiffs did not mention any of the named Plaintiffs in their motion or point to facts that showed that their claims were typical of the class members' claims. Id. at *16. Finally, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate adequacy because they failed to cite facts or evidence to support their assertions that Plaintiffs confronted the same discriminatory barriers that the proposed class members confronted. The Court found that, without basic details regarding the Plaintiffs, it was unable to determine whether they had any conflicts of interest with the proposed class, or whether they were each qualified to serve as class representatives. Id. at *17-18. The Court noted that, because Plaintiffs' counsel failed to respond to many of Defendant's arguments, to propose a cogent class definition, or to demonstrate compliance with any of Rule 23(a)'s requirements in two consecutive class certification motions, they would not be satisfactory class counsel. Id. at *21-22. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

(lviii) Amendments In Class Action Litigation

In Re Lipitor Antitrust Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38887 (D.N.J. Mar. 16, 2015). In this class action, after the Court dismissed the complaint, Plaintiffs filed a motion to amend the judgment and for leave to amend the complaint. Plaintiffs argued that the Court should allow an amendment of the complaint because the Court announced a new, heightened pleading standard in its last memorandum opinion. Id. at *12. The Court denied the motion. The Court remarked that the timing of the motion to dismiss expanded over a long period of time in order to await the Supreme Court's decision in FTC v. Actavis, 133 S. Ct. 2223 (2013). Id. at *12-13. The Court noted that after the decision in Actavis, the Court authorized amendments to the complaint, and a year had elapsed since then. The Court opined that after the Supreme Court decided Actavis, the parties knew the appropriate precedent from which to write a complaint. Moreover, after Actavis, the Court had allowed Plaintiffs to amend the complaint but Plaintiffs made only a few changes. The Court remarked that Plaintiffs' characterization that the Court employed an entirely new standard was overstated because the Court's memorandum opinion principally relied upon the cases of Actavis, Twombly v. Bell Atlantic Corp., 550 U.S. 544 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). The Court observed that there was nothing "novel" in its memorandum opinion because it simply applied these precedents. Id. at *13. Accordingly, given the long timeframe and the existence of established precedent, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to amend.

Strawser, et al. v. Strange*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 33348 (S.D. Ala. Mar. 18, 2015). Plaintiffs, several same-sex couples, brought an action alleging that Alabama's laws excluding same-sex couples from marriage and refusing to recognize their marriages violated the Fourteenth Amendment. Plaintiffs filed a motion for leave to file second amended complaint adding additional parties and Plaintiff and Defendant classes, which the Court granted. Defendant argued that the lawsuit had been pending for many months, and thus Plaintiffs should not be allowed now to convert the lawsuit into a class action between an ill-defined class of Plaintiffs and a class of 68 Defendants, very few of which resided within the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Alabama. Id. at *2. The Court found that the case had only progressed to the preliminary injunction stage and although current Plaintiffs had all received marriage licenses, the licenses were of little value if they were not recognized as valid in Alabama. Thus, the Court found that allowing the amendment was not likely to delay resolution of the case for the current parties nor disturb the schedule set by the Court. Id. at *3. The Court determined that the proposed new Plaintiffs, like current Plaintiffs, were same-sex couples that sought to marry and have their marriages recognized, and presented a common legal question that current Plaintiffs asserted. As such, the Court opined that joinder of the new Plaintiffs was appropriate. Id. at *4. In addition, the Court found that it was a premature to decide whether Plaintiffs met the requirements for class certification. The Court explained that for Plaintiffs' motion to amend, it was required to consider only whether Plaintiffs had sufficiently alleged class claims. Thus, although the Court might dismiss class allegations where it is facially apparent from the pleadings that there is no ascertainable class, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs had alleged adequate facts to support a potential class claim. The Court determined that it would not engage in a detailed and rigorous analysis of the class claims until all of the current parties had the opportunity to oppose or support the motion for class certification. Id. at *5-6. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to amend.

Town Of Lexington, et al. v. Pharmacia Corp. Solutia, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36814 (D. Mass. Mar. 24, 2015). Plaintiff, the Town of Lexington, filed a putative class action against Defendants alleging that they breached the implied warranty of merchantability, based on design defects and failure to warn, in their manufacture and sale of polychlorinated biphenyls ("PCBs"). Plaintiff moved for class certification, and before the Court could rule on the motion, it moved for leave to file an amended motion for class certification to modify the class definition. The Court denied both motions. Plaintiff originally brought the action on behalf of a class consisting of all school districts in Massachusetts that had one or more buildings with airborne PCBs above public health levels. Id. at *6. When Plaintiff initially moved for class certification, Defendants argued that the class was not ascertainable because testing was the only way to establish the presence of PCBs, and school districts were not obligated to conduct testing. Id. at *9. Plaintiff moved to amend the class definition: (i) to exclude from the class any school district that, at the time of class certification, had filed its own individual action against any of the Defendants seeking the past or future costs of investigation; and (ii) to seek class certification of only certain liability-related issues under Rule 23(c)(4). Id. at *10. The Court first noted that Plaintiff requested an amendment of the class definition more than two years after it filed the lawsuit. Plaintiff asserted that its new definition did not prejudice Defendants because the gravamen of the case remained the same and Plaintiff did not add any new theories of liability. The Court noted that, with its motion to amend, Plaintiff altered its course by stating that it intended to prove only that the caulk in one of its school buildings had a level of contamination in excess of 50 parts per million, but did not allege that the caulk in any of the school buildings contained PCB. Id. at *13. The Court reasoned that the amendment would require Defendants to adapt their defense to Plaintiff's new theory of its case more than two years into the proceedings. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff's new theory unduly would prejudice Defendants. In addition, the Court found that Plaintiff's substantial change in the class definition and its proposed class issues likely would require additional discovery and a postponement of the scheduled trial date. Id. at *17. The Court ruled that the substantial delay in seeking amendment, along with the postponement of the scheduled trial date, favored denial of the motion to amend. Finally, the Court observed that, in Plaintiff's new class definition, Plaintiff proposed to include all school districts in Massachusetts that constructed or renovated schools within a specified time period, but Plaintiff failed to inform potential class members or the Court what claims Plaintiff asserted or what issues were central to the case. Id. at *20. Plaintiff also failed to describe the harm that the class members allegedly suffered. The Court, therefore, held that Plaintiff's proposed amendment would be futile because its proposed class definition was overbroad and vague. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification and denied Plaintiff leave to amend its motion for class certification.

(lix) Foreign Worker Class Actions

David, et al. v. Signal International, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1482 (E.D. La. Jan. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, filed a complaint in intervention, seeking prospective relief under 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g) and compensatory damages for pecuniary and non-pecuniary losses. This action was brought on behalf of 578 workers from India alleging violations of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act ("TVPA"), the RICO, the Klu Klux Klan Act, and the Civil Rights Act of 1866. The workers contended that they were trafficked into the United States through the federal government's H2-B guest-worker program with dishonest assurances of becoming lawful permanent U.S. residents, and subjected to squalid living conditions, fraudulent payment practices, and threats of serious harm upon arrival. Plaintiffs contended that the recruiting agents hired by Defendants held the guest-workers' passports and visas; coerced them into paying extraordinary fees for recruitment, immigration processing, and travel; and threatened them with legal and physical harm if they did not work under Defendants' restricted guest-worker visas. Defendants filed a motion for partial summary judgment on Plaintiffs' TVPA claim, which the Court denied. Defendants sought summary judgment on three grounds, including that: (i) the TVPA claims were not extraterritorial and did not cover these claims; (ii) financial harm was not a component of serious harm under the pre-amendment version of the TVPA; and (iii) there was no evidence of the requisite scienter to support a TVPA claim. Defendant argued that in 2008, Congress amended the TVPA to provide extraterritorial jurisdiction over certain claims; however, Plaintiffs claims were governed by the pre-amendment version of the TVPA, which restricted the claims to purely domestic trafficking claims. Id. at *199. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs' claims were not extraterritorial, as the TVPA is not applied extraterritorially when it addresses trafficking people into United States to perform forced labor here, even if done by means of threats of serious harm in part elsewhere. Id. The Court remarked that although certain elements of the alleged trafficking scheme occurred abroad, the focus and the touchstone of the territoriality inquiry of the TVPA in this case was where the forced labor occurred and to where the victims were trafficked. Accordingly, the Court rejected Defendants' argument. The Court also noted that the pre-amendment version of § 1589 of the TVPA proscribed the knowing provision of labor by threats of serious harm to, or physical restraint against, the victim. Id. at *200. The Court observed that, unlike the previous version, the new version contained a broad definition of serious harm to include financial harm. Defendants argued that the addition of this definition demonstrated that serious harm under pre-amendment Section 1589 did not include financial harm. The Court disagreed, finding that the pre-amendment version distinguished between serious harm and physical restraint, which suggested that Congress intended that serious harm not be limited to physical harm, and instead include at least some non-physical harm. Id. at *201. In addition, the Court noted that at least two case precedents had squarely held that financial harm was cognizable as serious harm prior to the December 2008 amendment to the TVPA. Accordingly, the Court rejected the second ground for summary judgment as well. Finally, the Court found that Plaintiffs had introduced evidence from which a jury could infer that Defendants knowingly threatened immigration consequences as to Plaintiffs in order to maintain its labor force. Id. at *202. Accordingly, the Court rejected Defendants' motion for summary judgment.

Joseph, et al. v. Signal International LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 33870 (E.D. Tex. Feb. 4, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of illegal immigrants, brought suit alleging that Defendants violated the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act ("TVPRA"), the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO"), the Civil Rights Act of 1866, and the Ku Klux Klan Act. Plaintiffs were among 590 men who were allegedly trafficked into the United States in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina in 2005. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants made false promises of permanent work-based immigration to the United States, and as a result, Plaintiffs allegedly went into debt to pay mandatory recruitment, immigration processing, and travel fees. Id. Defendant Signal International, LLC, and its subsidiaries (collectively "Signal") moved for summary judgment. The Magistrate Judge issued a recommendation denying the motion. Signal primarily argued that the TVPRA did not apply extraterritorially at the time of the alleged trafficking and, because Plaintiffs' claim stemmed from conduct that was significantly extraterritorial, their claim failed as a matter of law. After reviewing the plain language of the TVPRA, as well as its legislative history, the Magistrate Judge remarked that critical to the TVPRA was where the forced labor "occurred" and "to where" victims were trafficked and not "from where" the victims were trafficked. Id. at *11. It was undisputed that Plaintiffs eventually were brought to the United States, and the Magistrate Judge found that imposing liability under § 1590 of the TVPRA required only a domestic application of the statute. Id. at *12. Signal also sought summary judgment on the grounds that there was no evidence that Signal knowingly trafficked Plaintiffs for forced labor, which is a prerequisite under § 1590. The Magistrate Judge found that there was a factual dispute as to whether Signal subjected Plaintiffs to forced labor. For example, most Plaintiffs testified that Signal made numerous threats that, if they left Signal, they would be handed over to immigration authorities. Id. at *19. Signal further argued that Plaintiffs' trafficking claim was not actionable under the TVPRA until 2008. In other words, in 2008, the TVPRA was amended, and "serious harm" was defined to include "any harm, whether physical or nonphysical including psychological, financial, or reputational harm." Id. at *21. Signal asserted that, because financial hardship was added to the TVPRA in 2008, it could not have been part of the statute prior to 2008. The Magistrate Judge remarked that, while financial coercion may be a part of Plaintiffs' claim, it was not their only basis for imposing liability under the TVPRA. Id. at *22. The Magistrate Judge found that there were other alleged actions taken by Signal that met the definition of forced labor under the TVPRA. The Magistrate Judge concluded that the goal of the TVPRA was to combat modern day slavery, which could take many forms, and therefore the term "serious harm" in the TVPRA should be interpreted broadly to include Plaintiffs' claim for financial coercion. Id. at *23-24. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge ruled that summary judgment was not warranted.

Tanedo, et al. v. Charlotte Placide, Universal Placement International, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 20824 (9th Cir. Dec. 1, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of Filipino school teachers, brought an action alleging violations of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act ("TVPA") and the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. Id. at *1. Defendants appealed the District Court's judgment following a jury verdict on claims brought against them by a class of 347 Plaintiffs. The Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Id. First, the Ninth Circuit found that Defendants' challenge to class certification of the TVPA claim was moot, as the jury had returned a verdict for them on the TVPA claim and thus, there was nothing for them to challenge. Id. The Ninth Circuit also determined that the evidence admitted to prove the TVPA claim did not unfairly prejudice the jury. Id. Similarly, the Ninth Circuit found that the challenge to class certification of the negligent misrepresentation claim was also moot, as the recovery provided to the class was entirely subsumed within its recovery under the California Employment Agency, Employment Counseling and Job Listing Services Act ("CEAA"). Id. The Ninth Circuit held that the damages award did not provide class members a double recovery, as the District Court had required that each class member, before receiving any recovery in the case, submit an affidavit attesting that he or she had not received and would not pursue payment arising from other judgments or disbursements in related actions. Id. The Ninth Circuit also noted that the District Court's amended judgment prevented any double recovery, as it specified that any payment received by a class member as compensation for the fees recoverable in the action would partially satisfy the judgment. Id. at *3-4. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's judgement.

(lx) Juries In Class Actions

In Re Oil Spill By The Oil Rig "Deepwater Horizon" In The Gulf Of Mexico,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 54600 (E.D. La. April 27, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of business entities, individuals, and the government, brought class actions against British Petroleum Exploration & Production, Inc. ("BP") based on injuries resulting from the 2010 explosion aboard the Deepwater Horizon, an off-shore drilling rig, and the consequent discharge of oil into the Gulf of Mexico. BP moved to strike individual class member LeRoy G. Wilson's demand for a jury trial in his Back-End Litigation Option ("BELO") lawsuit, which the Court denied. At the outset, the Court dispelled BP's argument that no jury was available because general maritime law governed Wilson's personal injury claims. Id. at *4-5. The Court analyzed whether an individual class member's BELO complaint was bound by the Rule 9(h)/non-jury election in the class action complaint that gave rise to the Deepwater Horizon Medical Benefits Class Action Settlement Agreement ("Medical Settlement"). Id. at *5-6. While class counsel designated the claims in the class action complaint as admiralty or maritime claims and requested a non-jury trial, Wilson's BELO complaint prayed for a jury if allowable under the Medical Settlement terms and law of this case. Id. at *6. Wilson cited the BELO provision of the Medical Settlement and admiralty jurisdiction, and requested permission to amend his complaint to assert diversity jurisdiction in order to preserve his right to a jury trial. The Court opined that if it certified the class, and then conducted a bench trial, the class members would be bound in most instances by class counsel's Rule 9(h)/non-jury election. The Court, however, remarked that this was not the situation here. Id. While the Medical Settlement contained a general provision requiring that it be interpreted in accordance with general maritime law, the Court did not read this provision as mandating admiralty's traditional bench trial procedure for a BELO lawsuit. Id. at *8. While the class action complaint invoked admiralty jurisdiction and Rule 9(h), the Court found that there was nothing distinctively or uniquely maritime about that proceeding that would preclude a BELO Plaintiff from invoking some other jurisdiction. The Court concluded that a BELO Plaintiff who properly invokes diversity jurisdiction and timely demands a jury is entitled to a jury trial in his or her BELO lawsuit. Id. at *8-9. Thus, the Court denied BP's motion to strike Plaintiff's demand for a jury trial. Id. at *9-10.

(lxi) Disqualification Of Counsel In Class Actions

Daniels, et al. v. Sanchelima & Associates*, Case No. 15-CV-21321 (S.D. Fla. Dec. 2, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a collective action against Defendants, a law firm and an attorney, alleging violations of the FLSA. Defendants moved to disqualify Plaintiffs' counsel and strike Plaintiffs' demand for attorneys' fees, which the Court denied. Defendants sought to disqualify counsel based on counsel's communications with named Plaintiff Caridad Daniels following a trial on which Daniels served as a juror in an FLSA action with which counsel was connected. Id. at 3. The Court observed that Florida Local Rule 4-3.5(d) (the "Florida Rule") prohibits a lawyer from communicating with the juror with limited exceptions. Id. at 4. Florida Local Rule 11.1(e) prohibits a lawyer from interacting with a juror, absent an application in writing and for good cause shown to the Court. Id. at 4. Defendants relied only on Rule 11.1(e) as support for their argument, and evidence that Defendants' counsel violated Local Rule 11.1(e) on another occasion and was disciplined by the Ad hoc Committee on Attorney Admissions, Peer Review, and Attorney Grievance. Id. The Court noted that the Florida Rule in comparison to Local Rule 11.1(e), was clearly less restrictive. The Court observed that the rationales of both the Florida Rule and Local Rule were predicated on preserving jury verdicts and insulating jurors from harassment from litigants after a trial. Id. at 5. The Court reasoned that violations of the rules proscribing contact with jurors typically arise where counsel on the losing side unilaterally initiates communications with the juror regarding the trial without prior approval from the court. Id. Here, the Court noted that the counsel's conduct did not appear to violate the Florida Rule. Accordingly, the Court ruled that counsel's conduct did not merit disqualification.

Wise, et al. v. SLM Corp.,* Case No. 14-CV-1426 (S.D. Ill. Aug. 19, 2015). In this class action, Defendants moved to disqualify Plaintiffs' counsel, contending that he was a family member of a member of the putative class. Defendants asserted that as a result, Plaintiffs' counsel could not fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class under Rule 23(a)(4). The Court denied the motion without prejudice. The Court found that the motion was premature because Plaintiffs had yet to move for class certification, and the class was still non-existent. Id. at 1.

(lxii) Statute Of Limitations Issues In Class Actions

Garrison, et al. v. Oracle Corp.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53653 (N.D. Cal. April 22, 2015). Plaintiff, a senior account manager, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated California and federal antitrust laws by entering into a "restricted hiring agreement" with Google, Inc. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant entered into the agreement with the intent and effect of fixing the compensation of employees at artificially low levels. Id. at *6. Defendant moved for judgment on the pleadings, asserting that the applicable statute of limitations ("SOL") barred Plaintiff's claims, that Plaintiff failed to plead injury-in-fact sufficient to establish Article III standing, and that Plaintiff failed to adequately allege an agreement between Defendant and Google. The Court granted Defendant's motion and agreed with Defendant that the SOL barred Plaintiff's claims. The Court noted that four-year SOL applied to all of Plaintiff's antitrust claims, the applicable SOL began to run in May 2007, and thus the limitations period ended in May 2011; however, Plaintiff had until March 18, 2012 to file the action as the SOL was tolled during the pendency of the U.S. Department of Justice's investigation of these claims. Id. at *18-19. Plaintiff brought this action on October 14, 2014, and argued that the doctrine of continuing violation and fraudulent concealment tolled the SOL. The Court, however, found that Plaintiff's assertion – that Defendant's conspiracy was a continuing violation through which Defendant repeatedly invaded Plaintiff's interests by adhering to enforcing, and reaffirming the anti-competitive agreements at issue – was insufficient to show a continuing violation. Id. at *21. Plaintiff's factual allegations revealed no alleged wrongful communications or specific conduct during the limitations period. Defendant and Google allegedly entered into the agreement in May 2007, and the complaint was largely bereft of any dates or details with regard to Defendant's specific conduct. Plaintiff alleged no new or independent actions Defendant took after October 14, 2010 – i.e., within four years of the complaint's filing – that caused Plaintiff any new or accumulating injury. Id. Although Plaintiff alleged that Defendant communicated by phone, e-mail, and through in-person meetings to further the conspiracy, the Court was not convinced because Plaintiff offered no facts detailing when, where, or with whom the alleged phone calls, e-mails, and in-person meetings took place. Id. at *22. The Court therefore determined that Plaintiff failed to sufficiently plead a continuing violation. The Court also held that Plaintiff failed to sufficiently plead fraudulent concealment. Since Plaintiff provided no basis to find that Defendant owed Plaintiff a fiduciary duty, the Court concluded that Defendant had no obligation to affirmatively disclose its alleged illicit conduct. Id. at *25. Although Plaintiff alleged that Defendant provided pre-textual, incomplete, or materially false and misleading explanations for hiring, recruiting, and compensation decisions made under the conspiracy, Plaintiff failed to allege when, where, or to whom Defendant allegedly provided these explanations. Id. at *26. The Court opined these conclusory allegations were devoid of factual content and insufficient to meet the pleading standard. Thus, because Plaintiff failed to adequately allege a plausible tolling, the Court concluded that the SOL barred Plaintiff's claims. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Howard, et al. v. U.S. Department Of Commerce,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 77 (D.C. Cir. Jan. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees of the U.S. Department of Commerce, brought an action following dismissal of complaint by an administrative law judge, alleging racial discrimination against African-American workers in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act ("Title VII"). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant maintained a system of racially discriminatory and subjective employment practices with respect to promotions, awards, and performance ratings. Plaintiffs initially sought relief pursuant to Title VII, on behalf of a class and the class representatives, for race discrimination and retaliation via injunctive relief; however, Plaintiffs later dropped the class requests for compensatory damages and added several individual claims, including claims related to disparate impact, a hostile work environment, and retaliation. Id. at *9-10. Defendant moved to dismiss on the grounds that the six-year statute of limitations for non-tort suits against U.S. barred the suit. The District Court agreed and dismissed Plaintiffs' action in 2010. The District Court found that the individual claims pursued by Plaintiffs in 2005 had accrued in 1995 and by 1998 respectively, when they could have filed suit 180 days after filing their initial charges. The District Court also rejected Plaintiffs' argument that the statute of limitations in 28 U.S.C. § 2401(a) did not apply to Title VII because the phrase "every civil action" in § 2401(a) meant that its six-year limitations period applied. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs appealed. While Defendant contended that a Title VII suit is a civil action under 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-16(c), a suit against a federal official acting in an official capacity is a suit against the U.S. and thus, § 2401(a) applied by its express terms to "every civil action commenced against the United States," Plaintiffs maintained that the plain text must give way where two statutes irreconcilably conflict, and a conflict existed here because applying § 2401(a) to § 2000e-16(c) would undermine Congress' goal of encouraging employees to resolve their employment discrimination disputes administratively. Id. at *12-14. The D.C. Circuit reversed the District Court's dismissal, finding that § 2401(a) did not apply to Title VII civil actions brought by federal employees. Id. at *3. The D.C. Circuit reasoned that there was an irreconcilable conflict such that the specific time limit of § 2000e-16(c) trumps the general limitations period § 2401(a). Id. at *16. The D.C. Circuit determined that Congress chose to address employment discrimination in a manner that emphasized using the employing agency and the EEOC to resolve complaints free of judicial involvement and vested broad remedial authority in them, and applying § 2401(a) would irreconcilably conflict with Congress' intent that federal employees not be at a disadvantage relative to private-sector Title VII employees in pursuing administrative remedies. Id. at *18-28. The D.C. Circuit further found that applying § 2401(a)'s limitation period to Title VII claims would run counter to the understanding that "Title VII 'is remedial legislation dependent for its enforcement on laymen,' and that 'resort to technicalities to foreclose recourse to administrative or judicial processes is particularly inappropriate.'" Id. at *28. According to the D.C. Circuit, Title VII has no "jurisdictional outer-limit" because Congress chose not to impose one given its "hope that recourse to the private lawsuit would be the exception and not the rule," and "its knowledge that there would be long administrative delays." Id. at *30. Further, Defendant neither cited any Title VII text or legislative history, or judicial precedent regarding Title VII, indicating that Congress intended employees – who were aggrieved by agency inaction less than six-and-a-half years after filing their initial charges – to be treated differently from those who are not aggrieved until six-and-a-half years have passed. Furthermore, Defendant did not point to anything in Title VII or its legislative history indicating that Congress intended to preclude civil suits whenever the administrative process lasted more than six-and-a-half years. Id. at *33. The D.C. Circuit therefore concluded that the District Court erred in applying § 2401(a)'s six-year statute of limitations to Plaintiffs' Title VII claims, and accordingly, reversed the dismissal of the complaint.

In Re NHL Players' Concussion Injury Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38755 (D. Minn. Mar. 25, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of former National Hockey League players, brought multiple class actions alleging that Defendant National Hockey League ("NHL") was responsible for the pathological debilitating effects of brain injuries caused by concussive and sub-concussive impacts sustained during their professional careers. The six named Plaintiffs played in the NHL from 1977 through 2008. Id. at *3. The cases were subsequently consolidated. Then the NHL moved to dismiss the complaint. The NHL argued that complaint was time-barred because the relevant statute of limitations periods began running on the dates on which the head injuries were allegedly suffered, and the fact that those injuries may have progressed into more complicated medical conditions did not restart the limitations periods. Id. at *13-14. The NHL pointed out that, when the cases were transferred for consolidation, the transferee Court must apply the state law of the transferor Courts. Accordingly, the NHL argued that laws of Minnesota, District of Columbia, and New York governed the statute of limitations analysis claims by named Plaintiffs, who brought suits in those respective jurisdictions. Plaintiffs argued that the injuries at issue were not the discrete head injuries they suffered while playing in the NHL, but rather were the increased risk and development of permanent degenerative brain diseases that result from the repeated head injuries and which arose and of which Plaintiffs became aware only after they retired from the NHL. The Court noted that under Minnesota law, a Plaintiff must file suit for personal injuries on claims of negligence, fraud, and misrepresentation within six years after the claim accrues. Id. at *15. The Court further noted that although the cause of action accrues when the accident occurs, the Minnesota Supreme Court has held that an action for negligence cannot be maintained, nor does the statute of limitations begin to run, until damage has resulted from the alleged negligence. Id. at *15-16. For relief on the ground of fraud, the cause of action cannot be deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud. Id. at *16. Similarly, the Court observed that District of Columbia law provides for the application of a discovery rule and the statute of limitations will not run until Plaintiff knows or reasonably should know that an injury has been suffered due to the defendant's wrong-doing. Id. Finally, under New York law, personal injury tort claims must be commenced within three years from the date of the injury. Id. at *17. The Court remarked that even assuming that NHL properly identified which states' statute of limitations applied to Plaintiffs' claims, it was not clear from the face of the complaint that those limitations periods had run. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs alleged injuries in the form of an increased risk of developing serious latent neurodegenerative disorders and diseases that are caused due to repeated brain trauma of the sort that Plaintiffs repeatedly suffered. Id. Thus, the Court ruled that when such injuries occurred or resulted were matters that could not be determined from the face of the complaint and were proper subjects of discovery. Because it could not be determined from the face of the complaint when Plaintiffs' causes of action accrued, the Court denied NHL's motion. Id.

Pedersen, et al. v. National Collegiate Athletics Association,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 159067 (D.N.J. Nov. 24, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former female athletes, brought an action asserting claims for gender discrimination arising out of penalties imposed on them. Id. at *1. Defendants filed motion to dismiss, which the Court granted. First, Defendants argued that the two-year statute of limitations barred Plaintiffs' claims under Title IX, equal protection violations under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, conspiracy under 42 U.S.C. § 1985, New Jersey Law Against Discrimination ("NJ LAD") violations, and negligence. Id. at *7. The Court found that these claims have no statute of limitations, and therefore, New Jersey's two-year statute of limitations for personal injury torts applied. Id. The Court found that the five claims revolved around Defendants' revocation of Plaintiffs' scholarships in September 2011; consequently, because Plaintiffs instituted this action in April 2014, their claims were time-barred. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs, however, argued that the continuing violation doctrine should apply to Defendants' continued refusal to grant scholarships. The Court determined that Defendants' refusal was simply a residual effect of the original scholarship revocation and that the fist denial alerted Plaintiffs to the existence of their claim. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court dismissed these claims as time-barred. Id. Finally, the Court declined to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' remaining state law claims for interference with contractual advantage, breach of contract, breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing and promissory estoppel because they involved interpretation of wholly state-based claims sounding in tort and contract. Id. at *17. For these reasons, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Thompson, et al. v. North American Terrazo, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27287 (W.D. Wash. Mar. 4, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of employees from various ethnic backgrounds, brought an action alleging that Shawn Novoa, a foreman at Defendants' facility, discriminated against employees in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act ("Title VII"), the Washington Law Against Discrimination ("WLAD"), and the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA"). The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment. The Court granted Defendants' motion in part, and denied Plaintiffs' motion. Defendants argued that various statute of limitations doomed all or part of Plaintiffs' claims. At the outset, the Court noted that Plaintiffs' state law claims for violation of the WLAD, negligence, breach of implied contract, and wrongful discharge were subject to statute of limitations of three years or less. Id. at *12. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs could sue only to the extent that their claims accrued on or after June 11, 2010, and dismissed Plaintiffs' claims based on occurrences prior to June 11, 2010. As to the FLSA claims, the Court noted that the FLSA provides a two-year statute of limitations. Because Plaintiffs stopped working at Defendants' facility more than two years before filing their action, the Court found their claims time-barred and granted summary judgment to Defendants. As to the Title VII claims, the Court noted that a Title VII Plaintiff suing over a discrete act must file a complaint with the EEOC within 180 days of the act, or within 300 days if the complaint was made to a qualifying state or local agency. Id. at *17. The Court found that, with the exception of named Plaintiff Vitaliy Ostapyuk, the remaining Plaintiffs had filed timely charges with the Seattle Office of Civil Rights. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants summary judgment on Plaintiff Ostapyuk's claims and allowed the remaining claims to continue. Finally, as to the WLAD claims, the Court observed that the key difference between the WLAD and Title VII was that the WLAD did not require a Plaintiff to exhaust his or her administrative remedies, but required a claim to be filed within three years after the alleged incident. Therefore, except for Plaintiff Ostapyuk's claims, which occurred more than three years before the action was filed, the Court denied summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' WLAD claims. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Court granted in part Defendants' motion for summary judgment.

(lxiii) Medical Monitoring Class Actions

Riva, et al. v. PepsiCo, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26494 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 4, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of Pepsi consumers, brought a putative class action alleging that the beverage contained a chemical – 4-methylimidazole ("4-MeI") – that increased the risk of lung cancer in humans. Plaintiffs sought medical monitoring as a remedy for their claims of negligence, strict liability based on defective design, and strict liability based on failure to warn. Specifically, Plaintiffs sought an order requiring Defendant to establish a "fund from which those individual class members can seek monetary recovery for the costs of actual or anticipated medical monitoring expenses incurred by them." Id. at *6. Defendant moved to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiffs lacked standing. The Court granted Defendant's motion. The Court agreed with Defendant that Plaintiffs failed to establish standing because they did not establish that the alleged risk of cancer was both credible and substantial. Id. at *13. Although Plaintiffs claimed that 4-MeI has been found to cause lung tumors in lab mice and rats, the Court determined that it was speculative to infer an increased risk of harm to humans. Id. The Court noted that "even considering the rodent studies, the levels allegedly consumed by the named Plaintiffs herein would not appear to come close to the equivalent exposure in those studies." Id. at *33. According to the Court, "[t]he specific problem here is not the general value of animal studies but the lack of any factual content to show that 4-MeI causes bronchioloalveolar cancer in humans and the failure to plead that the level of consumption alleged herein are sufficient to trigger credible risk of such cancer." Id. at *43. Citing Potter v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 6 Cal. 4th 965 (1993), the Court pointed out that to obtain medical monitoring, Plaintiffs must show that a chemical would significantly increase the chances of serious disease. In this case, Plaintiffs could not show how much 4-MeI would have to be exposed to humans in order to bring the risk of cancer to a credible level. None of the articles relied on by Plaintiffs linked 4-MeI to lung cancer in humans. Id. at *30. Plaintiffs provided no context as to the significance and extent of exposure to make the necessary ultimate showing that "the need for future monitoring is a reasonably certain consequence of [the] toxic exposure." Id. at *25. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs failed to adequately plead their specific theory of injury – an increased risk for bronchioloalveolar cancer sufficient to warrant medical monitoring – "above the speculative level." Id. at *29. Further, because the very scientific studies that Plaintiffs relied on to plead necessary elements in their claims failed to support their claims, and because Plaintiffs conceded the non-availability of any additional scientific studies they could cite to support their claims, the Court concluded that any amendment to the complaint would be futile. Id. at *43. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the class action with prejudice.

Vietnam Veterans Of America, et al. v. CIA*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11193 (9th Cir. June 30, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of veterans' organizations and individuals who were subject to United States military conducted chemical and biological weapons experiments, brought a class action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief against the Department of Defense, the Army, the CIA, and the Department of Veterans Affairs ("VA"). Plaintiffs contended that in these experiments, tens of thousands of members of the U.S. armed services were intentionally exposed to a range of chemical and biological agents. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs claimed that the Army unlawfully failed to notify test subjects of new medical and scientific information relating to their health as it becomes available. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs also asserted that the Army unlawfully withheld medical care for diseases or conditions proximately caused by their exposures to chemicals during the experiments. Id. On cross-motions for summary judgment, the District Court held that Army Regulation 70-25 ("AR 70-25") imposed on the Army an on-going duty to notify former test subjects of relevant new health information as it becomes available. Id. at *4-5. The District Court issued an injunction requiring the Army to comply with that duty. Hence, the District Court further held that AR 70-25 imposes on the Army an on-going duty to provide medical care, but it declined to compel the Army to provide such care on the ground that Plaintiffs could seek medical care from the VA. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed in part. At the outset, the Ninth Circuit noted that § 706(1) of the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA") provides that a District Court shall compel agency action unlawfully withheld or unreasonably delayed. Id. at *17. The Ninth Circuit also observed that AR 70-25 imposes unequivocal commands on the Army to provide former test subjects with current information about their health, and to provide medical care for diseases caused by the experiments. Id. The Ninth Circuit also reasoned that AR 70-25 obligates the Army to warn volunteers of the risks of participating in the experiments, and to provide them with new information that may affect their well-being as it becomes available. Id. at *18. The Ninth Circuit further opined that sub-section (h) of AR 70-25, included in 1988, makes it clear that the duty to provide notice applies not only to possible future subjects, but also to former subjects. Id. at *19. Despite this, Defendants contended that sub-section (h) applied only to human subjects upon whom experiments were performed after 1988, and that under Auer v. Robbins, 519 U.S. 452 (1997), the Court must defer to the interpretation that the Army proposed during this litigation. Id. at *22. The Ninth Circuit observed that under Auer, an administrative rule may receive substantial deference if it interprets the issuing agency's own ambiguous regulation. Id. However, that deference is not warranted when there is reason to suspect that the agency's interpretation does not reflect the agency's fait and considered judgment on the matter in question. Id. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the agency had a duty to warn Plaintiffs. The Army argued that the District Court's injunction was improper in its scope and duration. Specifically, the injunction directed the Army to provide to members of the class any information that may affect their well-being that had been acquired by the Army and/or its agents since June 30, 2006, or would be acquired in the future. Id. at *27. The Ninth Circuit held that the injunction was appropriately tailored to direct the Army to carry out its duty to warn, and therefore, the District Court did not abuse its discretion. The Ninth Circuit noted that Chapter 3-1(k) of AR 70-25 provides that volunteers are authorized all necessary medical care for injury or disease that is a proximate result of their participation in research. Id. at *29. The Ninth Circuit, therefore, concluded that the text of sub-section (k) compelled the conclusion that the Army must provide care to former test subjects. Id. at *33. For this reason, the Ninth Circuit held the District Court was right to find that Chapter 3-1(k) imposed a duty to provide medical care. The Ninth Circuit, however, found that the District Court did not have the power to decline the power to compel care on the grounds that another agency was providing similar care to some former test subjects. Id. at *3. The Ninth Circuit, therefore, vacated the District Court's summary judgment for the government on this claim and remanded the action.

(lxiv) Pseudonyms And Confidential Witnesses In Class Action Litigation

Doe, et al. v. Avid Life Media, Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-640 (E.D. Ark. Dec. 14, 2015). After hackers broke into Defendants' website ashleymadison.com, the self-described "world's leading married dating service for discreet encounters," and stole information about Defendants' customers, Plaintiff, a customer, brought a class action alleging that Defendants were negligent in storing the personal information and were unjustly enriched when they charged customers for a "paid-delete" service. Id. at 1. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss, and the Court denied the motion. Defendants contended that Plaintiff improperly filed the case under a pseudonym. The Court noted that under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, a complaint must name all the parties. The Court noted that Eleventh Circuit case law precedents have created exceptions to this rule, which provide that to determine privacy concerns that may warrant proceeding anonymously, a judge should consider whether Plaintiff would be required to disclose information of the utmost intimacy. Id. at 2. The Court found that requiring Plaintiff to proceed without anonymity simply revealed that he was a member of a website that catered to individuals who wanted to have discreet relationships. Id. The Court further held that the details of whether Plaintiff did anything beyond signing up were not relevant to the claims. Id. Consequently, the Court held that Plaintiff's privacy concerns did not outweigh the strong presumption in favor of requiring a party to proceed under his own name. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss and directed Plaintiff to file an amended complaint, using his real name.

In Re Millennial Media, Inc. Securities Litigation*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 69534 (S.D.N.Y. May 29, 2015). Plaintiffs, purchasers of Millennial Media, Inc. ("MM") securities, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants made false and misleading statements about MM's technological capabilities and outlook that inflated the stock price. The Court accepted Plaintiffs' voluntary dismissal of their claims without prejudice. Plaintiffs then filed a letter with the Court seeking leave to file a supplemental amended complaint that removed all references to an individual designated as "Confidential Witness-4" ("CW-4"). Id. at *4. Plaintiffs explained that, after they filed an amended complaint, CW-4 had informed Plaintiffs that he did not wish to be quoted in the complaint. The Court granted Plaintiffs leave, and Plaintiffs filed a supplemental amended complaint that removed all references to CW-4. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs also submitted four affidavits, including one from CW-4 and three from personnel affiliated with one of Plaintiffs' law firms. Id. at *7. These materials revealed that CW-4 learned that Plaintiffs quoted him in their amended complaint as a confidential witness only after they publicly filed the amended complaint and Plaintiffs' counsel sent him a copy. Id. They also revealed that CW-4 disputed the accuracy of various statements that Plaintiffs attributed to him in the amended complaint and that he had told Plaintiffs' counsel as much. The Court subsequently authorized Plaintiffs to redact the publicly filed versions of the documents to protect witness identities and to protect counsel's work-product. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs then filed a notice of voluntary dismissal with Defendants' consent. The Court ruled that, notwithstanding the anticipated dismissal, counsel remained obliged to publicly file the redacted versions of their ex parte submissions. Id. at *12. The Court noted that the facts revealed by the parties' submissions, including the four CWs' request that all references to them be stricken, were "problematic." Id. at *17. Plaintiffs' counsel explained in his affidavit that his law firm's practice was to identify all witnesses referenced in a complaint as confidential witnesses rather than by name and that this practice was consistent with the practice of other law firms. Id. at *16. The Court found such practice problematic for two reasons. First, Plaintiffs did not provide the CWs an opportunity to verify or refute their quotes, which created the potential for inaccuracy. Id. at *17. The Court noted that these deficiencies could have been avoided if Plaintiffs' counsel had sought to confirm with those witnesses the facts and quotations that counsel proposed to attribute to them before filing. Id. at *31. Second, Plaintiffs' designation in a complaint of 11 witnesses as CWs without their knowledge also raised issues of fairness to those witnesses. Id. at *37. The Court explained that ideally a witness would know what questions to ask and what directives to give the investigator to protect his interests, including remaining anonymous, but not all witnesses would have the sophistication or intuition to ask the right questions. Id. at *38-39. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion seeking voluntary dismissal without prejudice and approved Plaintiffs' application to permit redactions of their filings.

(lxv) Consumer Fraud Class Actions

Casey, et al. v. Florida Coastal School Of Law, Inc.,* Case No. 14-CV-1229 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 11, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of law school graduates, brought a class action alleging that Defendant publicized deceptive and unfair employment and salary data in violation of the Florida Deceptive and Unfair Trade Practices Act ("FDUTPA"). Defendant, one of the country's largest law schools, published its employment statistics on its website after obtaining the employment and salary data from surveys it sent to all recent graduates. Id. at 4-5. Defendant published the employment data and salary information for the classes of 2004, 2005, 2006, and 2009, and reported placement rates of 88% to 92%. For the class of 2010 graduates, Defendant published a rate of employment within nine months of graduation of 80%, breaking down the percentage by private practice, business, government, public interest, judicial clerkship, academia, seeking employment, unemployment, and not seeking employment and unknown. Id. at 5-6. Defendant added that 82% of those employed had jobs for which a J.D. was required or preferred. Id. Defendant also disclosed a $48,615 average starting salary, with 29% of employed graduates providing salary data, and the average salary for all graduates in private practice as $51,981. Id. Defendant, however, did not disclose the exact percentages of graduates for each particular job category who reported salary information, and calculated the average salary based only on those who submitted their salaries, who were mostly the private practitioners. Id. at 6. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's employment data was misleading because Defendant included part-time, non-legal, temporary, voluntary, school-funded, and solo-practitioner jobs in calculating the employment percentages. Id. at 9. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant reported higher salary averages because it calculated them based on a small, deliberately selected sub-set of compensated graduates who reported their salary information. Id. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant's action constituted unlawful, unfair, deceptive, and fraudulent practices prohibited by FDUTPA, and Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of knowingly and intentionally making numerous false representations and omissions of material facts with the intent to deceive and fraudulently induce reliance by Plaintiffs and members of the class. Id. at 12. Defendant moved to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiffs insufficiently alleged deception, causation, and actual damages. Specifically, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' allegations were insufficient because they did not allege that Defendant ever claimed that its figures for employment data represented only full-time, J.D. required, or preferred positions. Id. at 25. Defendant further argued that Plaintiffs alleged no knowledge about its employment or salary data when they enrolled or stayed enrolled and how they would have proceeded differently, and thus their allegations that the data was material to their decision to enroll at Defendant's law school and proximately caused them to pay inflated tuition were legal conclusions entitled to no consideration. Id. at 26. Defendant contended that it provided Plaintiffs with a thorough legal education that prepared them to practice law, if they wished, and thus Plaintiffs could not allege that they suffered actual damages. Id. The Court granted Defendant's motion. Id. at 36. The Court found that Plaintiffs did not allege that Defendant ever affirmatively and wrongfully stated that the employment rate was based on a limited sub-set of lucrative jobs, or that Defendant published the data alongside "full-time legal employers" or another misleading heading. Id. at *36-37. Further, Defendant's website provided information about a variety of jobs and specified the salary data based on responses supplied by only 29% of the employed graduates, and according to the Court, a reasonable consumer would not draw from that small sampling that it reflected the average salary of all employed graduates or that nearly all employed graduates were in working in a full-time, permanent job for which a J.D. was required or preferred. Id. at 38. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs failed to allege facts that stated a plausible deceptive or unfair act or practice under FDUTPA, and therefore failed to state a FDUTPA claim upon which relief could be granted. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Ciser, et al. v. Nestle Waters North America, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 195 (3d Cir. Jan. 7, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action against Defendant alleging violations of the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act ("CFA"), breach of contract, and unjust enrichment for charging exorbitant late fees to its customers. Plaintiff contracted with Defendant for the delivery of bottled water to his home office, and Defendant allegedly charged a flat late fee of $15 for each overdue bill. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's late payment fee was grossly disproportionate to the actual costs it incurred as a result of Plaintiff's late payment, and, therefore, Defendant engaged in an "unconscionable commercial practice" under the CFA as well as actionable conduct under New Jersey common law. Id. at *3. The District Court dismissed Plaintiff's complaint in its entirety with prejudice. The District Court found that Plaintiff failed to plead sufficient facts to create a plausible claim for relief and that the CFA did not prohibit the disclosed and contractually agreed late fees because they did not have the capacity to "mislead." Id. at *4. Upon Plaintiff's appeal, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's judgment. The Third Circuit rejected Plaintiff's suggestion that the CFA allows a Plaintiff to bring a claim challenging late fee assessments without alleging any deception or misleading contractual provisions. Id. at *12. The Third Circuit found no binding authority for such an argument and, to the contrary, it relied on precedent suggesting that the CFA requires some elements of deceptive conduct, explicit or implicit. Id. Further, even assuming a cognizable claim existed under the CFA, the Third Circuit disregarded Plaintiff's conclusory allegations that Defendant's scheme was oppressive, exorbitant, illegal, and stratospheric and found that Plaintiff failed to state a plausible claim for relief. Id. at *15. Plaintiff asserted that the only two components of "actual costs" incurred from late payments were lost interest on the overdue balances and the incremental administrative costs to send letters to customers, which according to Plaintiff, would incur Defendant a maximum cost of $1.14. Id. at *16. The Third Circuit, however, held that the dearth of factual information did not result in a plausible claim that Defendant's only incurred costs were $1.14, and, therefore, without more information, a $15 late fee on its face did not plausibly suggest an unfair penalty or an unconscionable practice, especially when competitive with an industry standard. Id. at *16-17. The Third Circuit, therefore, concluded that Plaintiff failed to plead facts sufficient to show that Defendant's late fee charges resulted in an injustice for the purpose of the CFA, and accordingly, affirmed the decision of the District Court.

Ehret, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 161803 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 2, 2015). Plaintiff, a customer, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the California Unfair Competition Law and the Consumers Legal Remedies Act by misleading customers about how it shared gratuities with drivers. According to the complaint, Defendant advertised on its website and in various blog posts and e-mails that it charged 20% as a gratuity for the drivers when in fact it took a fee of approximately 10% of the metered fare, including a 2% credit processing fee, leaving about half of the 20% gratuity to drivers. Id. at *4-5. Alleging that Defendant's representations were false, misleading, and likely to deceive members of the public, Plaintiff moved for certification of a class of individuals who arranged and paid for taxi rides through Defendant's service for a defined period. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion in part and certified the class as to all individuals who received Defendant's e-mail with the representation that the 20% charge would be gratuity only, who then arranged and paid for taxi rides through Defendant's service. Id. at *48-49. The Court expressed concerns as to how the customers would be able to prove that Defendant's alleged misrepresentation violated the law, but found that the inclusion of reference to e-mails justified certification of a limited class of passengers. Id. at *39-40. The Court determined that the e-mails specifically and heavily promoted Defendant's services, as they featured three bullet points expressly stating that "metered fare+20% gratuity" would be charged to the rider. Id. at *41. Thus, according to the Court, the customers who received the e-mail were highly likely to have seen and been exposed to the alleged misrepresentation about the 20% tip, and thus sufficient class-wide exposure could be inferred. Id. The Court, however, declined to include in the class certain customers who relied on Defendant's website or blog posts before deciding to use the taxi service, finding insufficient evidence of customers' exposure to the misrepresentation. Id. at *38. The Court explained that, just because the information was available on the website, it did not necessarily imply that visitors would have seen it, especially when there was a good deal of other information on the website. Id. Since Plaintiff met all other requirements of Rule 23 – including commonality by raising the common questions of law of whether Defendant represented that the 20% additional was gratuity only, and typicality, by showing that Plaintiff's claim was substantially similar to those of other class members who received the misleading e-mail – the Court concluded that a class action would be the superior method to resolve the class members' claims. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification in part.

Harnish, et al. v. Widener University School Of Law,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 86124 (D.N.J. July 1, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of alumni of Widener Law School, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the consumer fraud statutes of New Jersey and Delaware by publishing misleading employment statistics. Id. at *2-5. Between 2005 and 2011, Defendant advertised that over 90% of its alumni found jobs involving their law degrees within nine months of graduation. Plaintiffs alleged that the statistics were misleading because Defendant did not disclose that the employment rates included part-time legal, law-related, and non-legal positions. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant failed to disclose that many graduates did not respond to the law school's employment surveys and, therefore, were not included in the data. Plaintiffs moved to certify a class of all individuals who enrolled at Defendant's law school within the six-year period prior to the filing of the complaint. Id. at *7. The Court denied class certification, finding that Plaintiffs failed to meet the typicality requirement under Rule 23(a) and the predominance requirement under Rule 23(b)(3). First, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to meet the typicality requirement. Although Defendant allegedly advertised misleading employment statistics between 2005 and 2011, Defendant changed its reporting practices in 2012, and the proposed class included law students who enrolled through 2014. Id. at *22-23. The Court, therefore, noted that Plaintiffs, who graduated between 2008 and 2011, had very different factual circumstances than members of the proposed class who enrolled after 2011. Id. at *23. The Court also found that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate typicality because some alumni, particularly those pursuing full-time legal careers, might not want their alma mater to be found liable for consumer fraud. Id. Second, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to meet the predominance requirement because Plaintiffs could not prove damages under the New Jersey and Delaware consumer fraud statutes using common, class-wide evidence. Plaintiffs based their damages theory on their allegation that Defendant's misleading job statistics inflated tuition prices, and they intended to use an expert price inflation analysis to show the amount of inflation. Id. at *16. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs' theory that all of Defendant's students sustained corresponding damages ignored the reality that many students obtained the full-time legal jobs they sought when enrolling, and, therefore, the losses incurred by students who did not obtain full-time legal employment were different from the losses incurred by those who merely experienced Defendant's alleged misrepresentations. Id. at *17-18. Further, Plaintiffs relied on a "fraud on the market" damages theory, which New Jersey case law authorities have limited to the federal securities fraud context, and the Court was not persuaded that law school tuition costs followed the same market dynamic with regard to advertised employment statistics. Id. at *18. The Court, therefore, concluded that Plaintiffs could not prove that the proposed class members sustained common damages from Defendant's alleged misrepresentations. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Pulaski & Middleman, LLC, et al. v. Google, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 16723 (9th Cir. Sept. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of internet advertisers who purchased Defendant's ad-placement service known as AdWords, brought a putative class action under the California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL") and Fair Advertising Law ("FAL") alleging that Defendant misled them as to the type of websites on which their advertisements could appear. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs alleged that they bought pay-per-click ads through AdWords on-line advertising service, which displayed ads consistent with results returned by the popular search, and that Defendant purposely concealed the fact that their ads would sometimes end up on less valuable "parked domain and/or error page websites." Id. at *6. Alleging that Defendant misled the advertisers, Plaintiffs moved to certify a purchaser class seeking restitution of money Defendant wrongfully obtained from the putative class. Id. at *7. The District Court denied the motion, finding that common questions did not predominate. Specifically, the District Court noted that individual inquiries would be required to determine which advertisers were entitled to restitution and to determine the amount of restitution owed to each advertiser. Id. at *10. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed. The Ninth Circuit found that the District Court erred to the extent it held that individual inquiries would be required to identify each class member's entitlement to restitution. Id. at *13. The Ninth Circuit reasoned that "restitution is available on a class-wide basis once the class representative makes the threshold showing of liability under the UCL and FAL," and thus the District Court need not make individual determinations regarding entitlement to restitution. Id. at *17. Citing Yokoyama v. Midland National Life Insurance Co., 594 F.3d 1087 (9th Cir. 2010), the District Court acknowledged that damage calculations alone do not defeat class certification, and held that this rule did not apply in this instance because of the complexity of the individual inquiries that predominated. Id. at *3. The Ninth Circuit found that the District Court erred in failing to follow Yokoyama because its holding applies regardless of the degree of individualized calculations required. Likewise, the Ninth Circuit rejected Defendant's argument that the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, 133 S. Ct. 1426 (2013), cast Yokoyama in doubt. Id. at *18. The Ninth Circuit viewed Comcast as requiring only that any proposed class damages method align with the case's theory of liability, and reaffirmed that "Yokoyama remains the law of this [circuit], even after Comcast." Id. at *20-21. The Ninth Circuit further rejected Defendant's argument that any restitution measure must also account for any subsequent benefits a putative class member received in having ads placed by Defendant on parked domain and error page websites, holding that restitution "need not account for benefits received after purchase because the focus is on the value at the time of purchase." Id. at *24. Plaintiff's primary main method of calculating restitution used Defendant's smart pricing ratio, which directly addressed Defendant's alleged unfair practice by setting advertisers' bids to the levels a rational advertiser would have bid if it had access to all of Defendant's data about how ads performed on different websites. Id. The Ninth Circuit concluded that Plaintiffs' proposed UCL and FAL restitution calculation measures were not arbitrary because the method targeted to remedying the alleged harm and did not turn on individual circumstances. Id. at *23-24. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit reversed the District Court's order denying class certification of Plaintiffs' UCL and FAL claims.

(lxvi) Recusal Issues In Class Actions

Case, et al. v. Miami Beach Healthcare Group. Ltd.,* Case No. 14-CV-24583 (S.D. Fla. May 29, 2015). In this data breach action, the District Judge recused herself from the action based on a potential conflict of interest. After the District Judge received a notice from Defendants that the Judge's personal data had been breached, and that the Judge was therefore potentially a member of the proposed class at issue in this case, the Judge notified the parties and disclosed these facts. All parties, however, consented for the Judge to remain on the case despite her potential conflict of interest. The Judge, however, keeping in mind her continuing obligation to avoid even the slightest appearance of impropriety, determined to recuse herself from the action.

Fero, et al. v. Excellus Health Plan, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 152751 (W.D.N.Y. Nov. 10, 2015). Several class actions involving common questions of law and fact were filed alleging that Defendants failed to protect customer information. Id. at *6. In 2015, the cases were consolidated and transferred to the District Judge. Id. In reviewing the cases, the District Judge determined that she might be a putative member of the alleged class. Id. The District Judge found that it was likely that many judges would qualify as putative class members. Id. Consequently, the District Judge determined that the appropriate course was to renounce any financial interest that could arise from her potential membership in the class. Id. Thus, the District Judge renounced any putative class membership and waived any future claims. Id. Accordingly, the District Judge held that she would forego any financial interest in any future settlement or adjudication resulting in any payment to members of the class, would refuse to accept any future payments made to the members of the putative class, and waive any individual right to recover against Defendants on the claims alleged in these consolidated matters.

Rock, et al. v. National Collegiate Athletic Association*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10216 (S.D. Ind. Jan. 29, 2015). Plaintiff, a college football player, brought a putative class action challenging the National Collegiate Athletic Association's ("NCAA") prohibition on multi-year Division I football scholarships and its cap on the number of Division I football scholarships that Division I member institutions can award. Plaintiff moved for leave to file a third amended complaint ("TAC") and a motion to vacate the deadline to file a reply in support of his motion for leave. After the Judge denied his motion to vacate, Plaintiff moved to disqualify the Judge. Thereafter, the Chief Judge of the District reassigned Plaintiff's motion to amend to himself and granted Plaintiff leave to file the TAC. Id. at *8-9. The Judge then addressed Plaintiff's motion for disqualification and recused himself from the action. Plaintiff sought disqualification pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 455(a), arguing that a reasonable observer could question the Judge's impartiality to preside over the action because the Judge was a member of the Butler University Board of Trustees, and Butler University ("Butler") was a Division I football school within the NCAA. Id. at *9. Plaintiff also sought disqualification pursuant to § 455(b)(1) on the basis that the Judge's position as a Butler Trustee allegedly gave him personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts. Id. at *9-10. Finally, Plaintiff sought disqualification pursuant to § 455(b)(4) because Butler had an interest in the outcome of the litigation. Id. at *10. When the Judge had become a Butler Trustee, Plaintiff's second amended complaint ("SAC") was the operative pleading. In Plaintiff's arguments for disqualification, Plaintiff assumed that the Court would grant him leave to file his proposed TAC, and because some Butler football players would be included in the putative classes proposed in the TAC, his request for injunctive relief substantially would impact Butler. Id. at *13. The Judge noted that Plaintiff's claims had never been a topic at a Butler Trustee meeting during his tenure on the Board because Butler was a member of the Pioneer Football League, which did not award athletic-based scholarships. Id. Further, because Butler did not award football scholarships, its student athletes who played football could not have been part of the putative classes that Plaintiff proposed in his SAC. Therefore, because the Judge had no personal knowledge regarding any disputed evidentiary fact at issue in Plaintiff's action, and because Butler did not have an interest that could be substantially impacted by the outcome of Plaintiff's claims as they proceeded before him, the Judge stated that disqualification under § 455(b)(1) and § 455(b)(4) was inappropriate. Id. at *15. In addition, because a well-informed, reasonable observer would realize that Plaintiff challenged NCAA practices regarding Division I football scholarships, which Butler did not award, the Judge opined that disqualification under § 455(a) was also unwarranted. Id. The Judge considered Plaintiff's motion in light of the changes that Plaintiff made to his allegations in the TAC. In the TAC, Plaintiff proposed an injunctive relief class comprised of individuals who had been classified under NCAA rules as an "initial counter" on an NCAA Division I football team. Id. at *16. Plaintiff asserted that seven Butler football players were classified as "initial counters" and, therefore, were members of his proposed injunctive relief class. In light of the TAC, the Judge found a dispute regarding whether any Butler football players could be members of the putative classes and whether Butler could be substantially impacted by the injunctive relief Plaintiff requested. Although such issues were not previously present in the case, Plaintiff raised the issues with his filing of the TAC, and they existed solely because of the Judge's role as a Butler Trustee. Id. at *19. Accordingly, considering the TAC, the Judge recused himself from the action.

(lxvii) Settlement Administration Issues In Class Actions

Flo & Eddie, Inc., et al. v. Sirius XM Radio, Inc.*, Case No. 13-CV-5693 (C.D. Cal. July 22, 2015). Plaintiff brought a putative class action in state court on behalf of sound recordings owners, alleging that Defendant infringed on the property rights of recording owners by publicly performing their recordings without authorization. Id. at *1. Defendant later removed the case. Id. Plaintiff's law firm, Gradstein & Marzano, P.C. ("G&M"), also filed similar actions on behalf of Plaintiff in New York and Florida. Id. Subsequently, Capitol Records, LLC, Sony Music Entertainment, UMG Recordings, Inc., Warner Music Group Corp., and ABKCO Music & Records (the "Record Companies") brought a similar action in California state court. Id. at *1-2. In September 2014, the Court granted summary judgment in favor of Plaintiff as to all causes of action. Id. at *2. In May 2015, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification and appointed G&M as class counsel. Id. Defendant appealed the certification order, and the Court stayed the case pending the ruling. Id. While the appeal was pending in the Ninth Circuit, the Record Companies and Defendant reached a settlement (the "Capitol Records Settlement). Id. G&M claimed in its opposition to the settlement that they requested inclusion in Defendant's settlement talks, but Defendant refused. Id. Plaintiff and G&M requested that the Court lift the stay to impose ex parte relief, including: (i) enjoining Defendant from paying the Capitol Records Settlement; (ii) imposing a lien on the Capitol Records Settlement in favor of G&M; (iii) permitting discovery regarding the Capitol Records settlement; and (iv) barring Defendant and its counsel from directly or indirectly communicating with class members. Id. at *4. Plaintiff argued it was an ethical violation for Defendant and the Record Companies to meet and settle the Capitol Records lawsuit without including G&M in the process. Id. Plaintiff argued that the Capitol Records Settlement was improper because it purported to settle the claims of class members other than the Record Companies. Id. The Court declined to lift the stay. Id. at *5. The Court opined that G&M's delay in challenging Defendant's communications with the Record Companies and even the settlement itself suggested they did not care to enjoin the settlement payment or seek to recover a portion of it until they learned the size of the settlement. Id. The Court pointed out that if class counsel took issue with Defendant communicating with the Record Companies post-certification, they should have moved to restrict such communication after the Court certified the class on May 27, 2015. Id. The Court noted that G&M had notice of the Record Companies' scheduled mediation with Defendant as of May 7, 2015. Further, the Court observed that after the Capitol Records Settlement took place, if G&M believed that it was entitled to recover fees out of the settlement fund, it should have so moved when it discovered that the parties had reached a settlement. Id. The Court noted that G&M was not spurred to action until Defendant disclosed the amount on the settlement – $210 million – in its June 26, 2015 SEC filing; it was only then that G&M filed the ex parte application on July 8, 2015. Id. The Court concluded the size of the settlement payment was not germane to any of the arguments proposed in the application. Id. The Court found that under the circumstances of this case, distribution of the alleged common fund from the Capitol Records Settlement would not irreparably injure G&M because G&M could later recover its fees directly from the five Defendant entities, comprising the Record Companies. Id. at *7. The Court cited Savoie v. Merchants Bank, 84 F.3d 52, 58 (2d Cir. 1996), which held that distribution of a common fund constitutes irreparable harm when the beneficiaries are so numerous that recovering from them directly would be highly impractical. Id. at *8. The Court reasoned that no such impediment existed here. Accordingly, the Court declined to lift the stay in this case to grant the ex parte application. Id.

In Re Diet Drugs Products Liability Litigation*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 2585 (3d Cir. Feb. 20, 2015). In this consolidated class action alleging that diet drugs caused primary pulmonary hypertension, Wyeth LLC entered into a nationwide class action settlement agreement. The agreement provided compensation to qualifying diet drug users based on their age and the severity level of their medical condition. The agreement had two payment matrices to calculate compensation, including: (i) Matrix A applied to claimants who ingested diet drugs for fewer than 61 days and did not have any of the alternative causation factors listed in the agreement; and (ii) Matrix B applied to resolve all other qualifying claims. Two claimants submitted claims for Matrix A, Level III benefits. The settlement trust denied Randall Herman's claim, and limited Rayna Hirschbein's claim to Matrix B benefits. Id. at *2. The trust credited the findings of the auditing cardiologists, who determined there was no reasonable basis for the representation of Herman's treating physician that he had mild aortic regurgitation or the representation of Hirschbein's treating physician that he did not have aortic stenosis. Id. at *2-3. The District Court then referred the matters to the Special Master, who appointed a Technical Advisor. The Technical Advisor came to a similar finding as the auditing cardiologists. The District Court found that both claimants failed to meet their burden of establishing a reasonable medical basis for their claims, and affirmed the denial of their claims for Matrix A, Level III benefits. Id. at *3. On appeal, the Third Circuit affirmed. The Third Circuit opined that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in holding that Herman failed to rebut the opinions of the auditing cardiologist and the Technical Advisor that he did not have mild regurgitation. Although Herman cited his own physicians' affirmations, which disagreed with those findings, the Third Circuit remarked that disagreement is not enough to show that the District Court abused its discretion. Id. at *5. Herman also argued that he met his burden by submitting an aortic regurgitation measurement based on more than a single frame and including some indication of the maximum jet's representativeness. The Third Circuit, however, noted that Herman relied on a prior decision in this litigation, which had merely stated that the identification of a single jet without any explanation or indication of its representativeness will not satisfy a claimant's burden. Id. Although claimants also asserted that the auditing cardiologist's findings were unreasonable because they did not include regurgitation measurements, the Third Circuit reasoned that quantitative measurement was unnecessary where, as here, an auditing cardiologist indicated that regurgitation is well below the necessary threshold. Id. at *5-6. The Third Circuit also observed that because Herman mischaracterized the auditing cardiologist's method for measuring his aortic regurgitation, he did not demonstrate that the cardiologist's approach departed from accepted medical standards. Id. at *6. Finally, the claimants contended that the District Court abused its discretion by not considering the representative measurements by Hirschbein's treating physicians. The Third Circuit, however, noted that the District Court had conducted an extensive review of the record, and simply chose to credit different findings. Id. Accordingly, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's order.

In Re Oil Spill By The Oil Rig "Deepwater Horizon" In The Gulf Of Mexico,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20324 (E.D. La. Feb. 19, 2015). In this multi-litigation class action resulting from the 2010 explosion aboard the Deepwater Horizon, the Court had granted final approval to a settlement agreement resolving economic loss and property damage. The United States and BP Exploration & Production Inc. ("BPXP") cross-moved regarding the maximum per-barrel civil penalty that could be imposed under § 311(b)(7)(D) of the Clean Water Act ("CWA"). The Court agreed with the United States that the maximum penal amount was $4,300 per barrel of oil discharged. The CWA prohibits the discharge of harmful quantities of oil into covered waters or in connection with activities under the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act. Id. at *30. The CWA imposes administrative penalties as well as civil penalty of an amount not exceeding $1,000 per barrel of oil discharged, and $3,000 per barrel for discharges resulting from gross negligence or willful misconduct. Id. The Court noted that the Inflation Adjustment Act (the "Act") establishes a mechanism that allows for regular adjustment for inflation of civil monetary penalties in order to maintain the deterrent effect of civil monetary penalties and promote compliance with the law. Id. at *31-31. At the time of the Deepwater Horizon oil spill, the Environmental Protection Agency ("EPA") had set the maximum civil penalty at $4,300, while the Coast Guard set the amount at $4,000. Id. at *32. Because the Court had previously found that the discharge resulted from BPXP's gross negligence and willful misconduct and BPXP was thus subject to the higher maximum civil penalty, the United States argued that the maximum CWA civil penalty that may be imposed on BPXP was $4,300 per barrel. Id. at *33. The Court opined that the EPA had the authority under the Act to adjust the civil penalty contained in sub-section (b)(7)(D). Id. at *35. The Court found that because § 1321(b)(7) does not expressly provide that the EPA Administrator does not administer that provision, the civil penalties at issue were within the jurisdiction of the EPA for purposes of the Act. Id. The Court disagreed with BPXP's position that the U.S. Attorney General's authority to bring and control a civil action for penalties meant that the penalty was not within the EPA's jurisdiction for purposes of the Act. Id. at *35-36. The Court remarked that neither the Act nor the CWA equates the authority to bring a lawsuit with the authority to promulgate the regulations to be enforced by that suit. Further, the Court reasoned that the CWA does not divest entirely the EPA's ability to represent the United States in a civil action under the CWA. Id. at *36. Alternatively, BPXP argued that the EPA's regulation was procedurally defective because it did not follow the notice and comment procedure typically required under the Administrative Procedure Act. The Court observed that the Administrative Procedure Act does not require notice and comment when the agency, for good cause, finds that notice and public procedure therein are impracticable, unnecessary, or contrary to the public interest. Id. at *37-38. The Act required agencies to issue regulations promulgating inflation adjustments every four years. Id. at *38. More than four years had passed between the time the EPA adjusted the sub-section (b)(7) penalty to $4,300. Further, the Act also provided a detailed formula for calculating these adjustments. Id. Thus, the Court found that the EPA had no discretion and it was instead required by Congress to adjust the penalty according to the formula. The Court opined that the usual notice and comment procedure was unnecessary in this instance. Accordingly, the Court imposed a maximum CWA civil penalty against BPXP at $4,300 per barrel of oil discharged, and $1,100 per barrel against Anadarko Petroleum Corporation.

Editor's Note: As a result of the Court's order, BPXP would be subject to a $13.7 billion cap.

Keepseagle, et al. v. U.S. Department Of Agriculture,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53365 (D.D.C. April 23, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant engaged in systemic racial discrimination in its Farm Loan Program from 1981 to 1999. After nearly eleven years of litigation, the parties reached a settlement. The settlement agreement created a $680 million fund, most of which was dedicated to providing compensation to class members submitting claims through a non-judicial claims process. Id. at *17-18. The parties also agreed that the claims administrator would direct any leftover funds, after the completion of non-judicial claims process, to a cy pres fund. Nearly three years after the settlement approval, class counsel notified the Court that approximately $380 million remained unclaimed. Id. at *19. Class counsel then filed a proposed modification of the settlement agreement to create a trust with a 20-year life span, which would distribute the funds to organizations that were deemed to serve Native American farmers and ranchers. Id. at *20. The parties asked the Court to approve the modification without directing notice to the class or holding a fairness hearing. The named Plaintiff, Marilyn Keepseagle, opposed the modification and proposed to redistribute the cy pres funds to the successful class members. Following this opposition, the Court held further proceedings in abeyance. Later, Keepseagle filed a motion seeking to remove the named class representatives and a motion to compel class counsel to produce certain materials. The Court denied both the motions. The Court found that it was not authorized to remove the class representatives after a final judgment has been approved, and when the modification did not implicate the legal rights of class members. Id. at *25. Keepseagle argued that the named class representatives were no longer adequate because they abdicated their fiduciary duties by supporting class counsel's proposal even though a substantial minority opposed the proposal, and because they had been proposed as potential trustees of the trust to be created by modification of the settlement agreement, thereby rendering their interests divergent from those of the class. Id. at *24. The Court, however, found that class members had no legal right to the cy pres fund. The Court noted that the class members had agreed to a final settlement that entirely extinguished their legal claims, provided a framework for the distribution of damages, and mandated that all excess funds be distributed pursuant to cy pres remedy. Id. at *31. The Court concluded that it had no authority to remove the class representatives, because class counsel's modification targeted only the process of distributing the cy pres fund according to the mandate of the settlement agreement. The Court also found that the class representatives did not become inadequate merely because other class members disagreed with their strategic decisions, and that they had no conflict of interests that rendered them inadequate. Id. at *36-39. Although Keepseagle argued that the class representatives would be eligible to receive up to $10,000 annually, and this created an incentive to support the modification, the Court noted that their nomination was contingent on Court's approval and subject to terms and reappointment. Id. at *41. The Court further opined that the class representatives stood to gain more from the proposal of distributing the cy pres fund to successful class members because they would have been among those who directly benefitted, without the need for approval of a nomination, continue service, years of work, or reappointment. Id. at *40-42. The Court therefore denied Keepseagle's motion to remove the class representatives on the basis of adequacy. The Court further denied Keepseagle's motion to compel the submission of materials related to "in-person informational meetings" held by class members and the class counsel relating to the proposed modification. Id. at *44-46. The Court found that Keepseagle failed to clarify the legal basis for obtaining the information sought. Id. at *47. Accordingly, the Court denied Keepseagle's motion to compel and the motion to remove the named class representatives.

Keepseagle, et al. v. U.S. Department Of Agriculture*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57986 (D.D.C. May 4, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant engaged in systemic racial discrimination in its Farm Loan Program from 1981 to 1999. After litigating for over a decade, the parties reached a settlement creating a compensation fund ("the Fund") of $680 million, which covered attorneys' fees, individual awards, liquidated awards, and Debt Relief Tax Awards on behalf of the class pursuant to an agreed upon non-judicial claims process. Id. at *161. The Court preliminarily approved the settlement and emphasized that the provisions of the settlement agreement regarding leftover funds "mandated that all excess funds be distributed pursuant to a cy pres remedy." Id. at *162. After the parties commenced the non-judicial claims process, class counsel filed a status report notifying the Court that approximately $380 million remained leftover, and class counsel noted that this rendered some of the conditions for cy pres distribution impractical. Id. at *164. Class counsel subsequently filed an unopposed motion to modify the settlement agreement and proposed that 10% of the cy pres fund be distributed immediately to non-profit organizations approved by the Court and the remainder of the fund be utilized to create a trust for the purpose of distributing the cy pres. Id. at *164-65. The Court raised three questions for the parties in connection with class counsel's proposal, including: (i) whether the Court must direct notice to the class and hold a fairness hearing pursuant to Rule 23(e); (ii) if Rule 23 does not permit the Court to require such notice and hearing, whether the Court may exercise discretion to direct notice to the class; and (iii) what form the notice should take. Id. at *166. At the status hearing, the Court heard from Marilyn Keepseagle, a class representative, who opposed class counsel's motion. The Court nevertheless concluded that Rule 23(e) did not apply but that the settlement agreement and the Court's supervisory authority over the case permitted it to direct class counsel to provide notice to the class to allow the class members to submit written comments on class counsel's motion. Class counsel and Defendant asserted that Rule 23(e) did not apply to the motion for modification of the settlement agreement because the modification would not materially alter the legal rights of any class member. The Court noted that Rule 23's procedural protections were to protect the rights of absent class members whose legal claims would be resolved by adjudication of the class' claims. Id. at *168. The Court also noted that Rule 23(e) provides that, when the class claims are settled or voluntarily dismissed, the Court must direct notice to the class members. Id. at *169. The Court, however, remarked that modifications to a previously approved settlement raised a different issue because, by definition, the class' underlying legal claims already had been extinguished by the original settlement. Id. at *170. Therefore, it found that Rule 23(e) applied to a modification of a previously-approved settlement only when the settlement would be materially altered. Id. Because no legal right was hindered in this case, the Court concluded that Rule 23(e)'s procedural protections did not apply because the absent class members were under no risk and would not be legally harmed by the approval of the modification. Id. at *173. The Court remarked that, because all class members had settled their legal claims and retained no property interest in the unclaimed funds, a modification of the procedures for distributing the unclaimed funds as cy pres would not alter the legal rights of any class member. Id. at *177. The Court further reasoned that, although it was not empowered to hold a Rule 23(e) fairness hearing, it retained the authority to hear from any class member who wished to speak at the motion hearing. Id. at *179. Accordingly, the Court ordered notice to the class members to present their comments about class counsel's motion.

Pigford, et al. v. Vilsack*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 1889 (D.C. Cir. Feb. 6, 2015). A group of African-American farmers brought an action under the Equal Credit Opportunity Act alleging that Defendant, the U.S. Department of Agriculture ("USDA"), discriminated against them by denying their applications for credit and benefit programs on the basis of race. In 1999, the District Court certified a class for the purpose of determining Defendant's liability. After several months, the parties reached a settlement of their claims, and the District Court approved a consent decree. The consent decree established a two-track claim resolution process. In Track A, an adjudicator reviewed a claimant's allegations under the forgiving "substantial evidence standard," and a prevailing claimant could obtain a one-time payment of $50,000 and forgiveness of any debt he owed the USDA. In Track B, an arbitrator required claimants to establish their claims by a preponderance of the evidence, but allowed claimants to seek an unlimited amount in monetary damages if they prevailed after a day-long live hearing. Id. at *3-4. In the consent decree, the District Court appointed a facilitator to publicize the settlement, and it retained jurisdiction to remedy any violations of the provisions of the consent decree. Plaintiff initially brought his claim under Track B, but later changed to Track A, and then attempted to change back to Track B. In the meantime, an adjudicator responsible for determining entitlement to relief under Track A found for Plaintiff and awarded him $50,000. Id. at *8. Plaintiff refused to accept payment and petitioned the District Court to vacate the Track A adjudication and to order arbitration of his claim under Track B. Plaintiff contended that the facilitator erred by not reassigning his claim to Track B despite his request and, therefore, violated the consent decree. The District Court granted Plaintiff's petition, vacated his Track A award, and remanded his claim to the arbitrator for Track B consideration. Upon appeal, the D.C. Circuit affirmed the District Court's judgment. The D.C. Circuit found that the consent decree empowered the District Court to correct the facilitator's error in transmitting a claim to the wrong track. Id. at *12. Whereas the D.C. Circuit acknowledged that the consent decree rendered any determination by the adjudicator "final" and unreviewable by any court, it noted that Plaintiff's petition and the District Court's review did not focus on the adjudicator's conduct but on the facilitator who sorted Plaintiff's claim into Track A adjudication. Id. at *13. The D.C. Circuit noted that, after submitting a claim sheet that manifested his indecision between the two tracks, Plaintiff initially called and wrote to the facilitator in 1999 requesting that his claim proceed under Track B. Id. at *23. According to the D.C. Circuit, given the centrality of Plaintiff's choice of track to his ability to obtain relief and the amount of monetary damages available if he could establish his claim, the facilitator either should have informed Plaintiff that his initial choice of Track A was irrevocable, or honored his wishes and forwarded his claim package to the arbitrator. Id. at *23. Because the facilitator did not do either, the facilitator allowed Plaintiff to think that he successfully had switched to Track B, only to be surprised nearly a year later when he received an initial decision denying his claim. Id. at *24. After Plaintiff petitioned for review and requested to remand his claim to the arbitrator under Track B, neither the facilitator nor the monitor attempted to confirm which track Plaintiff wanted. Id. The D.C. Circuit, therefore, found that the facilitator erred in sorting Plaintiff's claim into Track A and remanded Plaintiff's claim to the arbitrator.

(lxviii) Removal Issues In Class Actions

Alaska, et al. v. Merck & Co., Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14445 (D. Alaska Feb. 6, 2015). The State of Alaska brought an action under the Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act ("UTPA"), alleging that Defendant marketed Vioxx, a drug for osteoarthritis, to consumers in Alaska while knowing that Vioxx was unsafe and presented significant health risks. Based on Defendant's representations that Vioxx was a safe drug, the State had placed Vioxx on the Alaska Medicaid Program's list of drugs. Id. at *2. Research and clinical trials revealed that the use of Vioxx increased the risk of a heart attack and other serious cardiovascular and cerebrovascular medical complications. Id. at *3-4. Alleging that Defendant induced it to authorize expenditures of Medicaid funds for the purchase of Vioxx, the State sought the recovery of the value of all payments made for Vioxx prescriptions. Defendant removed the case, asserting federal question jurisdiction on the basis that the State's claim implicated two federal laws, including the Food, Drug & Cosmetic Act and statutes relating to Medicaid. Id. at *4. The State moved for remand, which the Court granted. Defendant contended that the State's theory of recovery was that it would not have covered Vioxx prescriptions under Medicaid if Defendant had adequately disclosed the drug's risks. Based on this allegation, Defendant argued that the action was governed by Grable & Sons Metal Products, Inc. v. Darue Engineering's & Manufacturing, 545 U.S. 312 (2005), which held that federal jurisdiction encompasses actions where the state law claim implicates significant federal issues. Id. at *8. Here, however, the State did not contest its obligations to pay for approved drugs under Medicaid law; instead, the State claimed that Defendant fraudulently induced it to cover Vioxx, for which it was obligated to reimburse payments spent on Vioxx prescriptions. Thus, the Court opined that it was not required to analyze the Medicaid statutes in determining whether the State was entitled to relief, and that federal law was not implicated by the State's claims. Id. at *9. Additionally, the Court noted that in Grable, federal jurisdiction was appropriate because the issue of whether Plaintiff was given notice within the meaning of the federal statute was an essential element of his state common law claim. Id. Here, however, the federal Medicaid law raised in the State's complaint was not an essential element of the state law claims, and the Court remarked that it did not have to assess the construction of Medicaid law or Medicaid regulations or apply them to the facts of the case to resolve whether Defendant violated the UTPA. Id. at *10. Thus, because state law independently supported the State's theory for relief, the Court granted the State's motion for remand.

(lxix) Employee Testing Issues In Class Actions

Gulino, et al. v. Board Of Education Of The City School District Of The City Of New York*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48294 (S.D.N.Y. April 13, 2015). In 1996, Plaintiffs brought an action on behalf of a class of African-American and Latino teachers in the New York City public school system, alleging that Defendant discriminated against them in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act by requiring them to pass certain discriminatory certification exams in order to secure a teaching license. To teach in city public schools, teachers must obtain certification from the New York State Education Department ("SED"). Id. at *2. Prior to 2014, the SED required prospective teachers to pass three exams, including the Liberal Arts and Science Test ("LAST"), which the Court held was discriminatory pursuant to Title VII. Id. at *4-5. In 2014, however, the SED introduced the Academic Literacy Skills Test ("ALST"). Plaintiffs had since asked the Court to assess whether that test was similarly discriminatory. Id. On March 30, 2015, the Court established a schedule for assessing the validity of the ALST. Several days later, the SED submitted a letter to the Court objecting to the entirety of the March 30, 2015 order, specifically arguing that the Court lacked the authority to assess the ALST. Id. The SED asserted that pursuant to Rule 65, the Court may not enjoin it because it was not a party to the action, and because a previous appellate decision in this case allegedly established that the SED was not "in active concert or participation with anyone" whom the Court could otherwise enjoin. Id. at *5-6. The Court remarked that it had no plans to enjoin SED. Id. at *6. Defendant, however, continued to follow the SED's requirement that passage of the ALST was a prerequisite to employment as a New York City public school teacher. Id. The SED asserted that facially neutral state licensing requirements should not be actionable under Title VII. The Court, however, did not consider that argument because it had already been dismissed. Id. at *7. Finally, the SED argued that the Court lacked jurisdiction to consider the ALST because the ALST was not a "subsequent exam" pursuant to the decision in Guardians Association of New York City Police Department, Inc. v. Civil Service Commission of the City of New York, 630 F.2d 79 (2d Cir. 1980). Id. at *8. The Court pointed out that although the SED read the discussion in Guardians of a "subsequent exam" to mean "successor exam," that was by no means an obvious reading; all that was required for the ALST to fall within the Court's remedial authority was for the ALST to be an exam that followed the LAST in time. Id. at *9-10. The Court found that SED phased in the ALST at the same time when it phased out LAST, and under that reading of Guardians, it was clear that the ALST was an exam "subsequent" to the LAST. Id. at *10. Thus, the Court concluded that assessing ALST's validity was within the Court's remedial authority. Id. The Court observed, however, that even if it accepted the SED's more narrow reading of Guardians, the ALST was also a "successor" of the LAST. Id. at *13. The Court noted that the Assistant Commissioner for the New York State Education Department testified at a hearing before the Court that "the replacement for the LAST was the ALST, the Academic Literacy Skills Test," and the remainder of her testimony confirmed the direct link between the two exams. Id. The Court also found that the SED provided a chart in its website to inform prospective teachers about the certification exams they must pass in order to receive their teaching license and that chart clearly depicted the ALST as being a replacement for the LAST. Id. at *13-14. Further, the Court maintained that the function of the ALST within the SED's certification scheme was similar to that of the LAST in requiring applicants to demonstrate three areas of aptitude before they become certified. Id. at *14-15. Accordingly, the Court concluded that because the ALST was a successor of the last ALST, and it had remedial authority pursuant to Title VII, as interpreted by Guardians, to assess the validity of the ALST, the validity of its March 30, 2015 order remained in effect.

Gulino, et al. v. Board Of Education Of The City School District Of The City Of New York,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103952 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of African-American and Latino individuals employed as New York City school teachers, brought a class action against the New York City Board of Education ("BOE") and the New York State Educations Department ("SED"), alleging that BOE's use of an

Academic Literacy Skills Test ("ALST") violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as it had disparate impact on African-American and Latino applicants. Plaintiffs originally filed the action in 1996 claiming that Defendants' two certification tests, the Liberal Arts and Sciences Test ("LAST") and a predecessor test, violated Title VII because they had a disparate impact on minority test-takers and were not job-related. Id. at *8. In 2012, the Court held that the BOE violated Title VII, finding that LASTs had not been validated properly and was thus not "job-related." Id. at *9-10. The SED recently required prospective teachers to pass the ALST, an exam that purported to measure a teacher candidate's academic literacy skills by assessing knowledge, skill, and abilities within the domains of reading and writing. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiffs alleged that the ALST was also discriminatory under Title VII. The Court disagreed and held that the ALST was job-related. Id. at *37. The Court noted that the SED adopted new federal and state pedagogical and curricular standards – called the common core standards – that redefined the role of teachers, and because Defendants derived the ALST from those standards, it was appropriately designed to ensure that only those applicants who possess the necessary knowledge, skills, and abilities to teach successfully might be hired to do so in New York's public schools. Id. at *3. According to the Court, the standards were a particularly sound basis for validation because they contained so much detail about how and what teachers should teach. Id. at *46. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' argument that the standards were no different from the documents from which Defendants derived the LAST, finding that the standards were different in meaningful ways from the documents used to develop the LAST. The Court determined that the applicable common core standards defined with great specificity the degree of literacy that teachers were expected to instill in their students, and Defendants used reasonable competence in constructing the ALST and showed that it was job-related. Id. Although the ALST was flawed to a certain extent because it used overly broad terms to describe performance indicators and the ALST did not meaningfully describe the skill being tested, the Court determined that the error was not fatal because Defendants clearly linked the ALST to the common core standards and this ensured that it was job-related. Id. at *69-70. The Court therefore concluded that the BOE did not violate Title VII by complying with the SED's requirement that teachers pass the ALST before becoming eligible for employment.

(lxx) Consolidation Issues In Class Actions

City Of San Jose, et al. v. Office Of The Commissioner Of Baseball,* Case No. 13-CV-2787 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 2, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendants failed to approve the Oakland Athletics Baseball Club's proposed relocation from Oakland to San Jose in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act and California's Cartwright Act. Defendants moved to relate Miranda, et al. v. Office of the Commissioner of Baseball, to either this action ("City of San Jose") or Senne, et al. v. Office of the Commissioner of Baseball. The Court denied Defendants' motion. Defendants argued that the City of San Jose and Miranda cases both accused Major League Baseball ("MLB") of restraining competition in violation of federal antitrust laws. Id. at 1-2. Defendants contended that because both the actions revolved around the same determinative legal question – whether the Supreme Court's long-standing antitrust exemption continues to apply to the business of baseball – there would be an unduly burdensome duplication of labor and expense or conflicting results if the cases were conducted before different judges. Id. at 2. The Court, however, disagreed, and opined that although both City of San Jose and Miranda generally involved the application of the long-standing baseball antitrust exemption, the cases arose from different properties, transactions, or events, did not involve substantially the same parties, and implicated different legal questions. Id. The Court observed that while City of San Jose arose out of the proposed relocation of the Oakland Athletics Baseball Club from Oakland to San Jose, Miranda challenged MLB's practices regarding the compensation of minor league professional baseball players, including the use of reserve clauses in minor league players' contracts. Id. The Court also noted that although MLB and its member franchises were Defendants in both the City of San Jose and Miranda cases, the cases involved different Plaintiffs and Plaintiffs' counsel. Id. Further, the Court opined that the cases involved different applications of baseball's antitrust exception. While the Miranda case challenged the legality of the antitrust exemption's application to minor league players and the reserve clause in their contracts, City of San Jose involved the question of whether club relocation was a part of the "business of baseball." Id. at 2-3. Although both cases ultimately turned on the application of the baseball antitrust exemption, the Court reasoned that the specific legal issues were largely distinct. Id. at 3. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to relate City of San Jose and Miranda. Id.

Hall, et al. v. SeaWorld Entertainment, Inc.*, Case No. 15-CV-660 (S.D. Cal. Aug. 7, 2015). Plaintiffs filed a putative class action alleging violations of California's Unfair Competition Law, Consumer Legal Remedies Act, and False Advertising Law. Plaintiffs moved to consolidate this case with two other related cases entitled Gaab v. SeaWorld Entertainment, Inc., and Simo v. SeaWorld Entertainment, Inc., which alleged identical facts and claims related to alleged deceptive practices at Defendant's parks in San Diego, California, Orlando, Florida, and San Antonio, Texas. Id. at *2-3. The Court granted the motion and consolidated the three cases. Defendant's only argument in opposition was that the ruling on this motion should be deferred until the Judicial Panel for Multi-District Litigation ruled on its pending motion to transfer various cases for coordinated or consolidated pre-trial proceedings. Id. at *3. By the time of its ruling, however, the Court noted that the MDL Panel had since denied Defendant's motion. The Court, therefore, remarked that the most efficient course of action was to consolidate the three related putative class actions to reduce case duplication; to avoid harassment to parties and witnesses from multiple inquiries and proceedings, and to minimize expenditure of time and money by all concerned persons. Id. at *3. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to consolidate.

Swank, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41789 (W.D. Pa. Mar. 31, 2015). Plaintiffs, Andrew Swank and James Paolicelli, for themselves and on behalf of Defendant's other assistant store managers, brought two separate class actions to recover unpaid overtime compensation. While the Swank lawsuit alleged violations of Pennsylvania law and sought to represent a class of employees in that state, the Paolicelli lawsuit alleged violations of the FLSA and sought to represent a collective action of employees nationwide. Id. at *2. The Swank Plaintiffs opted-in to the Paolicelli FLSA action, and the Paolicelli Plaintiffs fell within the definition of the putative class in Swank. Due to this overlap, Plaintiffs moved to consolidate the cases. Id. at *4. In turn, Defendant moved to dismiss the Second Amended Complaint ("SAC") in the Swank action, arguing that Plaintiffs failed to plead that assistant managers across Pennsylvania worked more than 40 hours in a workweek and that the Swank case could never be certified as a class action. Id. at *4-5. The Court denied both of the motions without prejudice. The Court concluded that the Swank Plaintiffs pled a plausible claim for relief. Although Defendant argued that Plaintiffs could not possibly know about the working situations of the more than 1,000 assistant managers across Pennsylvania, Plaintiffs alleged otherwise in the SAC. Plaintiffs alleged that, through a number of training and other business meetings of Defendant's assistant managers, Defendant employed a highly-integrated, systemic approach to store operations that affected the work of assistant managers such that it was likely that they utilized a single system of work assignments. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs also alleged that, in training for their roles, Defendant regularly and routinely used such a comprehensive system and that Defendant scheduled, assigned, and paid assistant managers in the same ways. Id. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs could not have personal knowledge about how many hours assistant managers worked (and how many hours they worked each workweek) at every Pennsylvania store, and that they had not expressly pled that any other assistant managers worked more than 40 hours in a workweek. Id. at *9-10. The Court noted that, in the SAC, Plaintiffs alleged that all of the other assistant managers worked and received pay in substantially the same fashion as Plaintiffs, including in terms of hours worked over each week. Plaintiffs also laid out a detailed foundation from which the Court could draw a permissible inference that supported the conclusion that it was much the same for assistant managers across Defendant's stores in Pennsylvania. Id. at *12. The Court noted that, although Defendant could prevail when the issue arrived at the decision point as to whether the cases could proceed to disposition as class actions or collective actions, or on the merits of Plaintiffs' claims, that was not the question before the Court. The issue was whether the allegations of the Swank SAC, if true, were enough to get to the next step and, in the Court's estimation, they were. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' motions without prejudice to reassertion of the bases alleged at a later procedural juncture upon more fulsome discovery.

(lxxi) Settlement Enforcement Issues In Class Action Litigation

Crusan, et al. v. Carnival Corp.*, Case No. 13-CV-20592 (S.D. Fla. June 2, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of passengers who booked a trip on Defendant's cruise ship, brought an action after suffering injuries as a result of an engine room fire on the ship. Subsequently, the parties settled the action and Plaintiffs' counsel filed a notice of settlement, along with a motion to withdraw as counsel with respect to four Plaintiffs. Defendant moved to enforce the settlement asserting that regardless of any irreconcilable differences between Plaintiffs' counsel and the four Plaintiffs, their counsel had apparent authority to settle the entire case, and any irreconcilable differences should not affect the enforceability of the parties' settlement. Id. at *2. The Magistrate Judge recommended that the motion be granted. The Magistrate Judge noted that under federal law, an attorney of record is presumed to have authority to compromise and settle on behalf of his clients, and that to rebut the presumption of an attorney's authority, the party opposing the settlement must come forward with evidence that the attorney lacked the authority to settle on behalf of his client. Id. at *2-3. In this case, Plaintiffs' counsel was the attorney of record for all 55 Plaintiffs and had consistently stated that he had the authority to settle the entire case at the time of mediation. The settlement terms required resolution of the entire case for all 55 Plaintiffs, and Defendant provided the Court with the settlement agreement in camera, which was signed by representatives of both parties. Id. at *3. Further, Plaintiffs' counsel had also averred that two of the four Plaintiffs had given him authority to settle the claims on behalf of the entire family at a prior mediation, and that he subsequently confirmed his authority with the third Plaintiff to settle the claims. The fourth Plaintiff had not come forward with affirmative proof that the attorney lacked the authority to settle on his behalf. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended granting the motion to enforce the settlement.

Lerma, et al. v. Schiff Nutrition International Inc.,* Case No. 11-CV-1056 (S.D. Cal. Mar. 26, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of customers, brought a class action alleging that Defendants falsely marketed their glucosamine supplement as an arthritis treatment. Although the parties settled the action for $5 million, they had filed two motions to stay the settlement process based on a Seventh Circuit decision in Pearson v. NBTY, Inc., 772 F.3d 778 (7th Cir. 2014). In denying those two motions, the Court had rejected the view that the Pearson decision required a stay of the proceedings in this case to allow the parties to return to mediation and consider changing their settlement agreement ("agreement"). Id. at 4. The Court had found that differences between the parties' agreement and the settlement agreement in Pearson, and differences in circuit law, did not invalidate the terms of the agreement in this case. Id. Plaintiffs moved for leave to withdraw from the settlement, and the Court denied the motion. Plaintiffs initially sought the Court's approval to withdraw from the amended agreement based upon the perceived impact of Pearson, upon the Court's ultimate determination of fairness, and on the likelihood of the Pearson ruling inspiring objections. Id. at 2. Defendants disagreed that Pearson or the possibility of objections would authorize Plaintiffs to withdraw from the agreement. Considering Plaintiffs' assertion that they would not support final approval nor move to seek final approval, Defendants suggested that the Court should consider replacing class counsel and the class representatives. Id. at 3. The Court found that neither party had addressed the provision in the agreement that provided for the circumstances under which a party could withdraw from the agreement. After a review of that provision, the Court found that it did not provide a basis for withdrawal by either party at this time. Id. Although Plaintiffs asked the Court to invoke its inherent power as a fiduciary for the class as a whole to allow withdrawal in their interest, the Court declined Plaintiffs' invitation. Id. The Court also indicated that it had previously held that it would not rule in advance of any objections that had not yet been filed; rather, it left it to the parties to decide whether to negotiate changes and seek the Court's approval to further modify the agreement. Id. at 4. The Court found that the possibility of objections did not justify a stay or continuance in the case. Id. Thus, for the same reasons, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to persuade the Court that their withdrawal from the agreement was justified or warranted. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to withdraw from the agreement. Further, because Plaintiffs' counsel unequivocally renounced their previous statement that they would not support the agreement and would not bring the motion for final approval, the Court decided not to replace the representative Plaintiffs nor their counsel at that time. Id. at 4-5.

(lxxii) Case Management Issues Of Class Actions

In Re C. R. Bard, Inc., Pelvic Repair System Products Liability Litigation,* MDL No. 2187 (S.D. W. Va. Mar. 12, 2015). In this multi-district litigation, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant defectively designed, manufactured, and sold the surgical mesh products used to treat pelvic organ prolapse and stress urinary incontinence without adequate warnings regarding their risks, dangers, and complications. Defendant moved to strike Plaintiffs' expert disclosures in the Wave 3 "Miniwave" cases, which the Court granted in part. Id. at *1. Defendant contended that rather than disclosing three expert witnesses per case, as required by a pre-trial order ("PTO"), Plaintiffs disclosed a minimum of 14 expert witnesses. Id. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' numerous disclosures would burden the parties and the Court with wasteful motion practice. Plaintiffs asserted that the limitation might prevent them from carrying their burden of proof if one or more of their experts in a particular case was not available or was excluded by motion practice. Id. at *2. Further, Plaintiffs contended that they had no intention of calling duplicative witnesses at trial, but in some cases they might require more than three experts, including a pathologist, a materials expert, a causation expert (urogynecologist, gynecologist, or urologist), and a specialist, such as a pelvic pain specialist. Id. The Court ruled that its intention was to quickly work up those cases for trial and remand them to the appropriate districts for trial. Id. at *3. The Court remarked that the three-expert limitation contained in the PTO would remain in place. The Court, however, reminded the parties that the PTO provided a provision for the disclosure of additional experts for good cause shown. Id. Regarding Plaintiffs' concern of lack of availability of experts given the large number of remands, the Court explained that the issue could be taken up with the judge who was ultimately assigned the case on transfer or remand. Id. Accordingly, the Court struck Plaintiffs' disclosure of experts, and ordered them to disclose experts again in compliance with the PTO.

In Re General Motors LLC Ignition Switch Litigation*, Case No. 14-CV-4798 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 17, 2015). In this multi-district class action litigation, Plaintiffs alleged that a defect in certain vehicles caused the vehicle's ignition switch to move unintentionally from the run position to the off position. The Court established a bellwether trial plan for eligible personal injury and wrongful death claims based on alleged defects in vehicles. The trial plan consisted of adjudicating "test cases" of wrongful death claims, severe personal injury claims, and mild to moderate personal injury claims. Id. at 1. The Court granted approval to the parties' proposed classification for distinguishing between "severe" and "mild to moderate" personal injury claims. Id. at 2. The Court determined that severe personal injury claims would include a claim for injuries including skeletal or bone fracture requiring surgery; spinal injury requiring surgery; traumatic brain injury resulting in a Glasgow Coma Scale score of 12 or lower; limb amputation; cuts or lacerations resulting in permanent and significant scars or disfigurement; second or third degree burns on more than 10% of the body; paraplegia; quadriplegia; blindness or vision impairment lasting for one week or more; brachial plexus injury; or nerve damage or any other medically diagnosed injury that prevents the injured person from performing substantially all of the material acts that constitute such person's usual and customary daily activities, or results in the loss or limitation of a body function or system. Id. The Court concluded that any other claim involving an injury other than those listed would be eligible for inclusion in the mild to moderate personal injury claims. Id.

(lxxiii) Trial Issues In Class Action Litigation

David, et al. v. Signal International, LLC*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35907 (E.D. La. Mar. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of migrant workers, brought a putative class action seeking to recover damages inflicted by Defendants and their recruiters and agents operating in India, the United Arab Emirates, and the United States. Over 500 Indian men came the United States through the federal government's H-2B guest-worker program to provide labor and services to Defendants. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants fraudulently recruited them to work in the United States and effectuated a broad scheme of psychological coercion, threats of serious harm and physical restraint, and threated abuse of the legal process to maintain control over the class members. Claims of five Plaintiffs ("Trial Plaintiffs") proceeded to trial, and the jury returned its verdict and awarded the Trial Plaintiffs over $14 million in damages. Id. at *220. The Trial Plaintiffs moved for entry of final judgment, and the Court granted the motion. The Court noted that the primary issue was whether the Court should enter final judgment even though multiple claims of seven Plaintiffs (the "non-Trial Plaintiffs") and claims under the FLSA were pending. The Court observed that Rule 54(b) allows entry of judgment in these scenarios if two requirements were met: (i) the Court must determine that is it dealing with a final judgment; and (ii) the Court must determine there was no just reason for delay. Id. at *221. The Court remarked that the first requirement had two elements, i.e., the decision on which appeal is sought: (i) must be a "judgment" in the sense that it is a decision upon a cognizable claim for relief; and (ii) it must be "final" in the sense that it is an ultimate disposition of an individual claim entered in the Court of an action with multiple claims. Id. Here, the Court noted that Trial Plaintiffs worked at Defendant's facility at Mississippi, and the non-Trial Plaintiffs worked in Texas; therefore, the evidence presented for the two would substantially different. Id. at *222. To the extent that there was an overlap between the claims of the Trial Plaintiffs and the non-Trial Plaintiffs, the Court found that that was not dispositive for two reasons. First, the Fifth Circuit and the U.S. Supreme Court had long recognized that claims arising out of the same transaction or sharing certain factual elements may be appealed separately under Rule 54(b). Id. at *223. Therefore, a certain amount of overlap was permissible. Second, the potential for piece-meal appeals may be off-set by a finding that an appellate resolution of the certified claims would facilitate a settlement of the remainder of claims. Id. The Court remarked that if it did not enter final judgment now, the Trial Plaintiffs would be forced to wait an extraordinary amount of time (approximately 19 months) to proceed. Id. at *224. Accordingly, the Court ruled that there was no just reason to delay entry of final judgment. In addition, the Court remarked that it must determine whether execution should be stayed pending appeal. The Court opined that Defendant had made no showing that there was a likelihood of success, or it would be irreparably injured absent a stay. Id. at *226. Accordingly, the Court entered final judgment.

David, et al. v. Signal International, LLC,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 119980 (E.D. La. Sept. 9, 2015). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendants violated the Trafficking Victims Protection Act ("TVPA") and state law claims of fraud, negligent misrepresentation, and breach of contract. After a trial, the jury rendered its verdict in two distinct stages. First, the jury affirmed the questions asked with respect to individual Defendants for all alleged claims and in the second stage the jury did not award damages against individual Defendants personally, but instead entered an award of $0 for all claims. Id. at *1. The Court subsequently entered judgments as to the individual Defendants, dismissing all claims against Defendants with prejudice. Plaintiffs subsequently filed a motion requesting amendment of the judgments, which the Court granted in part. Id. at *2. First, Plaintiffs argued that the damages verdicts of $0 against Defendants personally were entered due to the jury's belief that the damages would be duplicative of damages awarded against the corporate Defendants. The Court found that the interrogatories regarding damages against Defendants individually came before the interrogatories concerning the corporate Defendants, and if the jury intended to award damages, they would have awarded damages against Defendants due to the order in which the jury interrogatories were formulated and appeared. Thus, the Court found that the jury performed its task of assessing damages and its verdict was not inconsistent. Id. at *3-4. Second, Plaintiffs argued that an award of nominal damages be granted as Defendants violated a civil rights statute. The Court found that Plaintiffs were entitled to an award of nominal damages for the violation of their civil rights, even where there is no injury. The Court held that the TVPA was intended to redress slavery and involuntary servitude to increase civil rights protections under which nominal damages should be awarded. Thus, the Court awarded nominal damages in the sum of $1.00 to Plaintiffs. Id. at *5-7. Plaintiffs further argued that if the judgment was not amended, there should be a new trial in the alternative. Id. at *10. The Court found no justification for granting a new trial on both TVPA and non-TVPA counts and concluded that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate a lack of evidence to support the jury's verdict. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs motion in part and denied in part.

(lxxiv) Immigration Class Actions

Lyon, et al. v. U.S. Immigration & Customs Enforcement,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97694 (N.D. Cal. July 27, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of immigration detainees, brought a putative class action against Defendants – the Department of Homeland Security ("DHS"), Immigration and Customs Enforcement ("ICE"), and certain employees of both agencies – alleging that Defendants violated Plaintiffs' constitutional and statutory rights while Defendants held Plaintiffs in government custody awaiting deportation proceedings. Id. at *2. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants applied telephone policies and practices that did not allow them adequate access to resources necessary to prepare for their removal proceedings. Id. at *3. Following certification of a class consisting of all detainees held at the three County Detention Facilities located throughout Northern California (the "County Facilities"), Plaintiffs moved to modify the certification order to include detainees housed at ICE's newly-opened Bakersfield facility, to file a supplemental complaint in order to add allegations regarding the new facility, and to extend all deadlines to allow for necessary discovery regarding that facility. Id. at *3-4. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. Defendants argued that adding detainees at the Bakersfield facility to the class defeated commonality because the Bakersfield facility differed from the County Facilities in ways material to determining whether the facility conditions impeded detainees' communications with their attorneys. The Court rejected

Defendants' argument, finding that Plaintiffs asserted harm with regard to the Bakersfield facility that fell within their overarching claim that Defendants denied detainees effective access to telephones and, thereby, impeded their communications with counsel, family, and others necessary to protect and vindicate their legal rights. Id. at *19. The Court found that variations among the practices of each facility, including how those practices specifically impacted individual class members, were not sufficient to defeat commonality. Id. Defendants argued that differences between the Bakersfield facility and the County Facilities precluded a finding that Defendants "acted or refused to act on grounds that applied generally to the class" because practices at any particular facility could not be enjoined or declared unlawful as to all of the facilities given the particular security concerns, physical make-up, and staffing of each individual facility. Id. at *25. The Court rejected Defendants' arguments on the basis that they hinged upon the practical differences between the Bakersfield facility and the County Facilities. The Court held that the differences did not negate the fact that Plaintiffs sought relief applicable to and appropriate for the entire class. Id. at *26. The Court concluded that allowing Plaintiffs to file their proposed supplemental complaint would allow the Court to fashion more complete relief for the class than forcing Plaintiffs to bring a second suit on behalf of detainees at the Bakersfield facility. The Court noted that, given Plaintiffs' evidence of significant overlap between Defendants' practices at the Bakersfield facility and the County Facilities, adding the Bakersfield facility would promote judicial efficiency by saving the Court and the parties time and expense. Id. at *31-32. Because Plaintiffs based their supplemental complaint on new and pertinent information, and because Plaintiffs exercised due diligence in moving for leave to supplement, Plaintiffs satisfied the good cause requirement. The Court, accordingly, granted Plaintiffs' motion to modify the class certification order and to file a supplemental complaint and extended all deadlines by sixteen weeks to allow for additional discovery.

Mehta, et al. v. U.S. Department Of State,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 137261 (W.D. Wash. Oct. 6, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of beneficiaries of approved employment-based visa petitions for highly skilled workers, brought an action challenging the U.S. Department of State's ("State Department") revised Visa Bulletin. The State Department had published a monthly Visa Bulletin with a date for which applicants could submit adjustment of status applications that comes before the projected date on which final adjudicative action would occur. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs alleged that they spent significant time and money assembling adjustment applications based on their reasonable expectation that the Government would abide by the Visa Bulletin it published on September 9, 2015. Id. at *3-4. On September 25, 2015, however, the State Department published a revised Visa Bulletin withdrawing or changing the date on which applicants could submit adjustment of status applications. Plaintiffs filed this action, and moved for a temporary restraining order ("TRO"), which the Court denied. Plaintiffs argued that Defendants' abrupt and unexplained change in visa bulletin policy was an arbitrary and capricious action in violation of the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA") and the Immigrant and National Act, and that the rescission of the original Visa Bulletin and replacement of it with a Revised Visa Bulletin was a final agency action subject to the APA's judicial review provisions. Id. at *4. The Court, however, noted that pursuant to 4 U.S.C. § 704, agency action made reviewable by statute and final agency action for which there is no other adequate remedy were subject to judicial review. Id. at *5. Further, the Court noted that a preliminary, procedural, or intermediate agency action or ruling not directly reviewable is subject to review after the final agency action. Id. Defendants explained that the earlier Visa Bulletin did not accurately reflect visa availability to accept adjustment of status applications, and argued that the initial Visa Bulletin erroneously implied that visas were immediately available to certain individuals. The revised Visa Bulletin was necessary to prevent the State Department from exceeding its statutory authority. Id. at *7. The Court thus remarked that even if the Visa Bulletins constituted final agency action, Plaintiffs failed to show a likelihood of success on their APA claim because the revised Visa Bulletin included a plausible explanation for its action, and noted that the revised Visa Bulletin did not in fact substantially alter or diminish the rights of Plaintiffs and potential class members, and that it clarified an erroneous prior statement of their rights. Id. at *7-8. Without citing to a declaration of an injured Plaintiff or any other evidence, Plaintiffs argued that a TRO was necessary to prevent economic losses including non-refundable monies paid to civil surgeons for medical examinations and for certifications. The Court, however, ruled that as most if not all of the harm cited had already occurred, and since Plaintiffs' economic damages were recoverable if they ultimately prevail at trial, Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden on this element. Id. at *11. Defendants also contended that it was in the public's interest that the agency has the authority to update its guidance when necessary. Because the revised Visa Bulletin corrected a statement contrary to statutory authority, the Court opined that the public interest lay in denying the motion.

R.I. L-R, et al. v. Johnson,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20441 (D.D.C. Feb. 20, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of mothers and their minor children who sought asylum in the U.S., brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants, the Department of Homeland Security and Immigration and Customs Enforcement ("ICE") and its officials, enforced a policy to detain Plaintiffs despite their credible fears of persecution in their home country. Plaintiffs alleged that this violated the Immigration and Nationality Act, was arbitrary and capricious under the Administrative Procedure Act and ICE policies, and violated constitutional guarantees of due process. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants' policy began in June 2014 when increased violence and instability in Central America and Mexico led to a surge in immigration, particularly of children. All Plaintiffs crossed the border with intent to seek asylum. None had a criminal history and all had family members in the U.S. who offered shelter and support through their immigration proceedings. Id. at *5. Defendants allegedly refused bond for each Plaintiff even after establishing credible fear of persecution, and detained each family for weeks or months in a Texas facility before releasing them based on custody re-determination hearings. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiffs claimed that an abrupt about-face occurred when Defendants adopted an unprecedented "no-release policy" in response to the increased immigration, which resulted in denial of their releases. Id. at *7-8. Plaintiffs moved for a preliminary injunction barring the continued implementation of the no-release policy during the pendency of this action, as well as for provisional class certification for purposes of the requested injunction. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motions. Although the Court was reluctant to find the existence of a universal no-release policy, it ruled that ICE does have a policy of considering mass migration deterrence when making custody decisions and this policy had played a significant role in the increased detention of Plaintiffs. Id. at *13-16. Defendants argued that because Plaintiffs were not the U.S. citizens and entered the country illegally, they had very few due process protections. The Court, however, found that case law precedents have made it clear that once a person is in the U.S., he or she has due process rights. Citing Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 212 (1953), the Court found that "[a]liens who have once passed through our gates, even illegally, may be expelled only after proceedings conforming to traditional standards of fairness encompassed in due process of law." Id. at *48-49. The Court therefore held that Plaintiffs, as people apprehended within the U.S. and with the possibility of legitimate claims to asylum, had clear rights to due process. Responding to Defendants' justification for detention, the Court pointed out that "[t]he simple fact that increased immigration takes up government resources cannot necessarily make its deterrence a matter of national security, with all the attendant deference such characterization entails." Id. at *52-53. According to the Court, the government's power over immigration is subject to significant constitutional limitations, and Defendants' justification was poorly substantiated in its own right. Id. at *55-56. The Court further found that a large number of asylum-seeking families were currently being detained as a result of Defendants' policy and such detention could harm them, particularly minor children, in myriad ways, and the harm could not be balanced by the public interest in this case. Id. at *57-58. The Court therefore granted Plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction. The Court also granted Plaintiffs' motion for provisional class certification, finding that Plaintiffs satisfied the Rule 23 requirements. The Court noted that ICE's consideration of mass immigration as a factor in its custody determinations united over 40 Central American families who had been detained since June 2014, and a determination of whether Defendants' policy requiring deterrence of mass immigration was unlawful would resolve all class members' claims "in one stroke." Id. at *29-35. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motions for a preliminary injunction and provisional class certification for purposes of the requested injunction.

(lxxv) Class Actions Under 42 U.S.C. § 1981

Burgis, et al. v. New York City Department Of Sanitation*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 13353 (2d Cir. July 31, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of 9 employees, brought an action alleging that Defendants discriminated against them on the basis of their race and/or national origin in the New York City Department of Sanitation's ("DSNY") promotional practices. After the DSNY promoted sanitation workers to supervisor positions, these supervisors were promoted to the position of general superintendent of various levels. Prior to 1979, DSNY promotions were based on one to three written examinations; the examinations were later eliminated for promotions to levels two and three, and promotions to levels two, three, and four were done on the basis of recommendations. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs alleged that such recommendations created a supervisory workforce that was not representative of the racial and/or national origin composition of the sanitation worker workforce. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss, which the District Court granted. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed. The Second Circuit observed that to state a discrimination claim under the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause or 42 U.S.C. § 1981, Plaintiffs must sufficiently allege that Defendants acted with discriminatory intent. Id. at *8. Here, all Plaintiffs at some point had been promoted from a sanitation worker to supervisor, and five of the nine were subsequently promoted to general superintendent level one, the highest level. Although Plaintiffs alleged that several of them were passed over for subsequent promotions, and White individuals who were allegedly less qualified were promoted, Plaintiffs failed to provide meaningful specifics of the alleged difference in qualifications, let alone discriminatory intent. Id. at *8-9. The Second Circuit opined that the bare allegations in the complaint did not present circumstances that give rise to an inference of unlawful discrimination. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs also argued that statistics alone were sufficient to warrant a plausible inference of discriminatory intent if they showed a pattern or practice that could not be explained except on the basis of intentional discrimination. The Second Circuit noted that to show discriminatory intent in a § 1981 or equal protection case based on statistics alone, the statistics must not only be statistically significant in the mathematical sense, but they must also be of a level that makes other plausible non-discriminatory explanations very unlikely. Id. at *11. The statistics provided by Plaintiffs showed only the raw percentages of White, Black, and Hispanic individuals at each employment level, without providing any detail as to the number of individuals at each level, the qualifications of individuals in the applicant pool and of those hired for each position, or the number of openings at each level. Id. at *12. The Second Circuit reasoned that the fact that each Plaintiff had been promoted at some point to the position of supervisor undermined their allegations of discrimination in the promotion of sanitation workers to supervisors. Five of the nine Plaintiffs had also been promoted from supervisor to general superintendent level one, again calling into doubt their allegations of discrimination at that phase, especially given that the racial composition between individuals in the supervisor and general superintendent level one positions was essentially the same. Thus, the Second Circuit affirmed the order granting Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' equal protection and § 1981 claims.

Heldt, et al. v. Tata Consultancy Service*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 126131 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 18, 2015). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant, an information technology ("IT") consulting and outsourcing company headquartered in Mumbai, India, discriminated against them in their hiring, employment, and/or termination practices based on race and national origin in violation of Title VII and 42 U.S.C. § 1981. Specifically, Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant had a pattern or practice of intentional discrimination relative to its U.S. workforce whereby it treated those of South Asian descent, South Asian race, and South Asian national origin, more favorably than those who were not South Asian, including Plaintiffs. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs alleged that, as a result of Defendant's discrimination, its 14,000 employees in 19 offices across the U.S. consisted of approximately 95% South Asian descent, race, and/or national origin, compared to 1% to 2% of the U.S. population. Id. at *3. Plaintiff Heldt alleged he was initially appointed to a position that utilized his advanced experience and skills but Defendant subsequently assigned him to other positions that involved more menial work, and effectively "benched" him throughout his employment. Ultimately, Defendant terminated him after less than two years. Id. at *4-5. Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint, which the Court denied. First, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to state claims under both Title VII and § 1981 to the extent they based those claims on Defendant's alleged use of the H-1B, L-1, and B-1 visa programs to recruit foreign workers to achieve its goal of discrimination against persons who were not South Asian. Defendant contended that that basis for Plaintiffs' claims was "self-defeating" because Defendant's use of the visa program established that its recruitment was non-discriminatory as a matter of law. Id. at *9. The Court found Defendant's attempt to recast the complaint as an attack on its business model was the result of a skewed reading of Plaintiffs' allegations. Id. Further, the Court stated Defendant's argument was misplaced insofar as it asserted that its use of the visa programs was non-discriminatory by definition and Plaintiffs could never show that the named Plaintiffs (or any class members) were discriminated against as a result of Defendant's use of the visa programs. Id. The Court observed that for purposes of the motion, the complaint had sufficient allegations of discriminatory conduct to put Defendant on notice of the basis for the claim. Id. Defendant also contended that the Court did not have subject-matter jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' claims insofar as Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant misused the visa programs because Plaintiffs had not exhausted their administrative remedies with the U.S. Departments of Justice and Labor. Id. at *14. The Court maintained that, in light of Plaintiffs' affirmative denial that Defendant misused the visa program, Defendant's argument was moot. Moreover, the Court found Defendant provided no authority to support its proposition that jurisdiction over the proper use of the visa program also would be lacking. Id. Finally, Defendant contended that because it hired Plaintiff Heldt, he did not have standing to bring a failure to hire claim. Id. at *15-16. The Court reiterated that a named Plaintiff's individual standing was a threshold issue; thus, Heldt's allegations challenging Defendant's discriminatory hiring practices were sufficient to maintain his cause of action at that juncture. Id. at *16. The Court concluded by expressing concern with Plaintiffs' definition of the persons included in the proposed class, and ordered Plaintiffs to file an amended complaint. Id. at *20-21.

Hill, et al. v. City Of New York,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 130928 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 28, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of police communications technicians ("PCTs"), brought an action alleging that Defendants discriminated against them on the basis of race in violation of 42 U.S.C. § 1981 and § 1983, and the New York State and City Human Rights Laws. Id. at *3. Defendant, the New York Police Department ("NYPD"), employed PCTs to answer and direct public emergency calls to the City's 911 response system so that the appropriate police, fire, or emergency resources could be dispatched. According to Plaintiffs, Defendants instituted several policies starting in May 2013 that overworked 911 operators without regard for their health and safety. Plaintiffs alleged that NYPD mandated that 911 operators work several double-shifts of undefined lengths, often consecutively, without meal or rest breaks, and seven of the named Plaintiffs worked 16-hour tours three times a week in accordance with the policy. Id. at *9-10. Since July 2013, the NYPD also required 911 operators to work two 12-hour tours weekly as a minimum amount of overtime until relieved from duty, and as a result, seven named Plaintiffs worked a minimum of two 12-hour overtime shifts each week, with additional overtime and tours as required. Id. Defendants further subjected the 911 operators who refused or did not complete mandatory overtime to discipline. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants' policies were driven by discriminatory animus toward the 911 operators and as punishment for their use of sick and FMLA leave, and that none of the challenged policies were imposed on other non-minority NYPD employees, including police administrative aids. Id. at *13-19. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendants undertook some of the alleged policies in retaliation for Plaintiffs' public complaints about their work conditions. Id. at *20. Defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs' allegations were insufficient to raise an inference that the applicable policies were motivated by race. Id. at *31. The Court granted the motion in part. The Court found that Plaintiffs' allegations of an overarching pattern of intentional over-work, under-staffing, and punitive measures against 911 operators, motivated by racial animus, and detrimental to their health and safety, sufficiently stated a pattern or practice claim. Id. at *32. Plaintiffs' complaint alleged facts regarding Defendants' formal announcement of the challenged policies and specific instances of the policies being enforced against Plaintiffs. Id. Thus, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs met their minimal burden, particularly at this stage of litigation, to allege an inference of discriminatory intent. Id. at *44. Since Plaintiffs' allegations asserted facts that suggested personal involvement by each of the individual Defendants sued in their personal capacity, and provided the individual Defendants with fair notice of the basis for Plaintiffs' personal capacity claims against them, the Court also denied Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' §§ 1981 and 1983 claims against the individual Defendants in their personal capacities. Id. at *47-48. The Court further denied Defendant DC-37's (a labor organization) motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' § 1981 racial discrimination claim based on DC 37's alleged acquiescence to the City's discriminatory treatment of the 911 operators. Plaintiffs had alleged that DC 37 violated § 1981 by subjecting Plaintiffs to differential terms and conditions of representation because of race by approving of the NYPD's discriminatory policies. Id. at *13. The Court, however, granted Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' FMLA inference claims based on certification delay, miscalculation of eligibility hours, use of a designated FMLA numbers, and investigation of FMLA use and Plaintiffs' FMLA retaliation claim based on the "high absentee" list, finding that Plaintiffs' allegations failed to raise a non-speculative, plausible FMLA claims based on Defendants' alleged practices. Id. at *65-71. The Court also granted Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' First Amendment retaliation claim, finding that Plaintiffs failed to adequately plead a causal connection between their protected activity and any adverse employment action. Id. at *72-74. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Wynn, et al. v. The New York City Housing Authority,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 99419 (S.D.N.Y. July 29, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of African-American and Hispanic employees, alleged that Defendant systematically under-compensated them based on their race and/or ethnicity in violation of 42 U.S.C. § 1981 as well as New York City Human Rights Law ("NYCHRL"). Id. at *1. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss both for failure to state a claim as well as for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. The Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion to dismiss. Plaintiffs were employed as plasterer tenderers with Defendant. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs worked for Defendant from between 12 and 17 years, and alleged that they were discriminated against based on their race and were not paid prevailing wages. Id. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant attempted to cover up its discriminatory practices by assigning them to an improper job title (and thus locking them into certain salary schedule set by an applicable collective bargaining agreement). Id. at *3. The Court set forth what must be established by a party seeking to have a case dismissed under both Rule 12(b)(1) and 12(b)(6). With respect to a Rule 12(b)(1) dismissal, a Court must "take all uncontroverted facts in the complaint as true, and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the party asserting jurisdiction." Id. at *8. In reaching such a decision, the Court may look to "evidence outside of the pleadings" when deciding issues of fact concerning jurisdiction. Id. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' claims were governed by a collective bargaining agreement, and thus the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction because Plaintiffs failed to exhaust their administrative remedies. Id. at *13. The Court rejected Defendant's argument, finding that "NYCHA fails to cite any case linking the existence of a collective bargaining agreement to depriving federal courts of subject-matter jurisdiction to hear a claim of employment discrimination. There is none." Id. at *14. As such, the Court refused to dismiss the case based on lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. Id. As to the remainder of Defendant's motion, the Court granted Plaintiffs leave to file an amended complaint. With respect to their § 1981 claim alleging municipal liability, Plaintiffs' proposed amended complaint alleged that Defendant gave preferential treatment to mason helpers – who are predominantly white – by assigning them to a higher rate of pay than the positions Plaintiffs held (plasterer tenderers, a position mostly occupied by Hispanic and African-American employees). Id. at *17-18. The Court held that the new alleged practice – assigning a lower compensation and incorrect job title to minority workers – could constitute a "persistent or widespread practice that has the force of law" which is needed to state a claim for municipal liability. As such, the Court allowed Plaintiffs to amend their complaint. Id. at *18. The Court similarly granted Plaintiffs leave to amend their §§ 1981 and 1983 claims, as well as their claims for discrimination under the New York City Human Rights Law. Id. at *18-20. The Court, however, refused to grant Plaintiffs leave to assert a disparate impact theory of liability in connection with their §§ 1981 and 1983 claims since such claims are not cognizable under § 1981 or a claim of denial of equal protection under § 1983. Id. at *21. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion to dismiss.

(lxxvi) Costs In Class Actions

Resnick, et al. v. Netflix, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 3095 (9th Cir. Feb. 27, 2014). Plaintiffs, a class of subscribers, brought an antitrust class action alleging that Defendant violated the Sherman Act by illegally allocating and monopolizing the on-line DVD-rental market. Defendant and Wal-Mart Stores Inc. allegedly agreed to split up the market with Defendant promising to refrain from selling new DVDs and Wal-Mart agreeing to shut down its on-line DVD rental program and transfer subscribers to Defendant. While Wal-Mart settled its portion of the class action, in late 2011 the District Court granted summary judgment to Defendant finding that Plaintiffs could not establish antitrust injury-in-fact. Id. at *13-14. Defendant then sought $744,740.11 in discovery costs. The District Court ultimately awarded Defendant $710,194.23 in costs. Id. at *12. While Plaintiffs appealed that award arguing that the District Court erred in its taxing of e-discovery and data management costs totaling $317,616.69, and abused its discretion in taxing consulting fees, Tagged Image File Formats ("TIFFs"), and copying costs totaling $245,471.31, Defendant cross-appealed arguing that the District Court abused its discretion in disallowing $21,000 in costs to copy certain PowerPoint files. Id. at *23. The Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's summary judgment order, but partly vacated the discovery costs award. The Ninth Circuit found that even though the District Court applied applicable precedent offering broad access to costs for electronic production as copying, a U.S.

Supreme Court ruling overturning that precedent required a new evaluation of what electronic discovery costs might be properly taxed as costs of "making copies of any materials where the copies are necessarily obtained for use in the case." Id. at *22. Plaintiffs identified four broad categories of charges appeared on Defendant's invoices as non-taxable, including: (i) data upload; (ii) endorsing; (iii) keyword; and (iv) professional services. First, as to the data upload charge, the Ninth Circuit determined that it was non-taxable because the charge description established only that the copy was essential to the document process but failed to establish that it was necessarily obtained for use in the case. Id. at *36. Second, as to the endorsing charge, the Ninth Circuit refused to consider it, finding that the parties did not specifically and distinctly argue that matter. Id. at *37. Third, as to the key wording charge, the Ninth Circuit found that the charge was not taxable as Defendant used an automated software process to identify which documents to copy and which not to copy. Id. at *39. Fourth, as to the professional services charge, the Ninth Circuit remanded the issue to the District Court as the record before it was insufficient to make a determination. Id. at *40. Finally, Plaintiffs challenged Defendant's $10,000 cost involved in copying nearly 80GB of data for production of 167,311 documents. Although the cost incurred for some of the described tasks appeared to be taxable, the Ninth Circuit determined that not all the tasks were taxable. The Ninth Circuit held that to the extent the invoiced tasks exceeded optical character recognition, conversion to TIFF, and other activities essential to the making of copies necessary to the case, they were not taxable. Id. at *41. The Ninth Circuit thus concluded that, out of the $317,616.69 costs challenged by Plaintiffs, Defendant could recover only those costs attributable to optical character recognition, converting documents to TIFF, and endorsing activities, all of which Plaintiffs explicitly required. The Ninth Circuit, however, also found that the District Court properly awarded $245,471.31 in consulting fees, TIFF images, and copying costs as the records supported the District Court's conclusion. The Ninth Circuit noted that Defendant had provided sufficient information for the District Court to identify the documents being reproduced, and ultimately, to determine which costs were taxable. Id. at *41-45. The Ninth Circuit further noted that the District Court properly denied Defendant $21,000 in costs to copy certain PowerPoint files as Defendant could have avoided the duplicative production by first producing the documents maintained in its usual course of business. Id. at *46. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit partly affirmed and partly reversed the District Court's award of costs.

(lxxvii) Media Privilege Issues In Class Actions

Goldberg, et al. v. Amgen, Inc.,* 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110726 (D.D.C. Aug. 21, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of investors, brought a putative class action against Amgen and four of its former officers claiming that they misled investors when they publicly stated that their product Aranesp was safe for its FDA-approved uses. In 2007, Paul Goldberg, a journalist, wrote an article about a clinical trial conducted by the Danish Head and Neck Cancer Group (the "DAHANCA10") that showed significantly inferior therapeutic outcomes from adding Aranesp to radiation treatment of patients with head and neck cancer. Id. at *3. In the article, Goldberg reported that DAHANCA10 suspended the study in October 2006, that DAHANCA10 decided not to resume the study on December 1, 2006, and that Defendant had failed to announce the study's results in public disclosures or during its January 2007 investor call. Id. Defendant sought to depose Goldberg regarding the article, and Goldberg moved to quash Defendant's subpoena claiming that the information that Defendant sought was protected by the First Amendment reporter's privilege. The Court granted Goldberg's motion to quash the subpoena. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs claimed that, through Goldberg's article, they first learned of DAHANCA10's study results and that the article, therefore, was a "corrective disclosure" that revealed the truth about Aranesp's safety. Id. at *5. Defendant contended that it could defend itself by showing that investors or other stock market participants learned of the termination of DAHANCA10 before the publication of the article, and, therefore, the article's publication did not cause their losses. Id. at *5-6. Defendant argued that Goldberg, as the author of the article, was uniquely positioned to provide admissible testimony critical to Defendant's defenses concerning the disclosure of the DAHANCA10 termination to market participants and that, because it sought to elicit non-confidential evidence, i.e., how and when Goldberg learned of the DAHANCA10 termination and when he spoke to the identified and anonymous sources cited in the article, the journalist's privilege did not apply. Id. at *6, 11. Although the Court agreed that evidence showing that sources spoke to Goldberg about the DAHANCA10 study before the article's publication went to the heart of Defendant's defenses, the Court found that Defendant failed to demonstrate the requisite diligence in seeking evidence from alternative sources before attempting to compel disclosure of a journalist's First Amendment activities. Id. at *18-19. Although Defendant knew of 26 analysts who followed the company at the time of DAHANCA10 study, it only deposed three of them to discover which of them might have spoken to Goldberg. Id. at *19-20. Defendant also failed to attempt to obtain the information from alternative sources discussed in Goldberg's article. Id. at *21. According to the Court, a journalist's privilege could be overridden only as a "last resort," and unless Goldberg learned about the DAHANCA10 study from a direct market participant, the manner by which he learned about the study would do little to establish that the market was aware of the DAHANCA10 results with the degrees of intensity and credibility necessary to sustain Defendant's defenses. Id. at *23-25. The Court, therefore, found no evidence to show that questioning Goldberg would provide critical evidence and concluded that there would be little purpose in requiring Goldberg to invoke the privilege on a question-by-question basis. Id. at *26-28. Accordingly, the Court granted Goldberg's motion to quash Defendant's subpoena.

(lxxviii) Issue Certification Under Rule 23(c)

I.B., et al. v. Facebook, Inc.*, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29357 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 10, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of minors, brought an action alleging that Defendant's policy representing that purchases made through its website were final, or otherwise non-refundable, violated § 6701(c) of the California Family Code. Defendant permitted its users, including minors, to make purchases through its website. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs allegedly made purchases without parental permission through Defendant's website. The minors sought to invoke the protections of century-old protections under California law, which recognizes that minors will occasionally use their lack of judgment to enter into contractual relationships and later assert the right to walk away from the contract. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs sought to certify a class of Facebook users who were minors, and a sub-class consisting of minors who made purchases through Facebook, which the Court granted in part. At the class certification hearing, the Court raised the issue whether §§ 6701 and 6710 could be invoked by minors, who were not residents of California. The Court remarked that in order to determine the applicability of §§ 6701(c) and 6710, it must determine whether the parties' anticipated application of California law, and whether the statutes were intended to protect transactions between out-of-state minors and a California-based corporation. Id. at *10. The Court observed that Defendant clearly intended California law to control, as its statement of rights and responsibilities, which must be accepted before joining or making a purchase, stated that laws of California would govern it. Id. at *11. Because it was Defendant that selected California law to apply to interactions between itself and its users, and also because Defendant was located in California, the Court concluded that §§ 6701(c) and 6710 applied to all minors in the proposed class. Id. at *14-16. Regarding Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' proposed injunctive relief failed to address a common injury suffered by the class as a whole, and that the relief was aimed exclusively at users who were currently minors, and would be pointless for those members who were now adults. Id. at *27. The Court disagreed, and remarked that if it found that certain contracts were void, those contracts would be rendered null regardless of whether the minor had since reached the age of majority. Id. at *28. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs raised common questions as to their injunctive as well as declaratory relief claims. Defendant also contended that Plaintiffs' demands were atypical because they conflicted with the rest of the class. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' requested relief was to restrain it from selling Facebook credits or similar currency to accounts that belonged to minors. Defendant pointed to an expert report stating that millions of users, including minors, made in-app purchases to enhance their game play, and therefore many minors in the proposed class would object to such a demand. Id. at *32. Plaintiffs argued that their goal for injunctive relief was focused on requiring Defendant to change its practices to conform their refund policy to California law, and not to end sales to minors. Id. at *33. Because Plaintiffs' relief focused on making Defendant conform with California law, and not to prevent sales to minors, the Court found that typicality was satisfied. The Court noted that Plaintiffs' class claim for restitution would require refunding the money spent by any class member who made a transaction over Facebook, if it was ultimately found to be void or voidable. The Court therefore denied certification of Plaintiffs' restitution claims, but granted certification for Plaintiffs' claims for injunctive and declaratory relief.

(lxxix) Special Masters In Class Actions

In Re General Motors LLC Ignition Switch Litigation*, Case No. 14-MD-2543 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 11, 2015). Plaintiffs filed several class actions relative to defects in Defendant's ignition systems in their cars. The parties entered into a memorandum of understanding ('MOU") to resolve certain claims. Pursuant to Rule 53(a)(1)(A), the parties requested the Court to appoint Special Masters to create a settlement framework to identify criteria to evaluate claims; assign "points and allocate dollar values" to claims they evaluate; and retain experts, if necessary, to assist in the evaluation of the claims. Id. at 2. The Court granted the parties' motion. The parties nominated Daniel Balhoff and John Perry to jointly perform general duties as Special Masters. Id. at 2. The Court reviewed the credentials of Balhoff and Perry and concluded that both were well-qualified for the appointment. Each had an expertise in mediation and dispute resolution, and had previous experience as Special Masters charged with allocating settlement funds in complex litigation, including several multi-district litigation settings. Id. The Court determined that Balhoff and Perry possessed the requisite skills, experience, knowledge, and credibility necessary to aid in the implementation and administration of the MOU. Id. at 3. The Court further determined that the Special Masters would be compensated privately as specified in the MOU and in anticipation of the contract to be entered into between the parties and the Special Masters. Id. at 4.

(lxxx) Incentive Awards In Class Actions

In Re Payment Card Interchange Fee & Merchant Discount Antitrust Litigation,* Case No. 05-MD-1720 (E.D.N.Y. Jan. 23, 2015). A group of merchants brought an antitrust class action lawsuit against Visa, MasterCard, and a number of banks, alleging that Defendants conspired to fix certain credit card fees and rules. After extensive litigation, the Court approved the parties' settlement agreement of $5.7 billion and subsequently awarded $544.8 million in attorneys' fees using a percentage-of-the-fund calculation. Plaintiffs moved for class representative service awards for their prosecution of the litigation and for their efforts obtaining the settlement on behalf of the class. Plaintiffs originally moved for incentive payments totaling $1.8 million for nine class representatives. The Court noted that the $1.8 million constituted only 0.03% of the $5.7 billion settlement fund, but that an average class representative service award of $200,000 would dwarf the average monetary recovery per class member (of which there were an estimated 12 million class members). As a result, the Court requested class counsel to submit additional authority to support their request. Class counsel subsequently did so, and the Court granted the motion and awarded a total sum of $950,000, as well as costs, to nine representative Plaintiffs. The Court ordered that the amounts should be paid from the net cash settlement escrow account no less than 20 days after the final settlement date. Id. at 2.

Appendix I

Table Of 2015 Workplace Class Action And Collective Action Litigation Rulings

Page

Federal Cases

U.S. Supreme Court

First Circuit

Second Circuit

Third Circuit

Fourth Circuit

Fifth Circuit

Sixth Circuit

Seventh Circuit

Eighth Circuit

Ninth Circuit

Tenth Circuit

Eleventh Circuit

District Of Columbia Circuit

Federal Court Of Claims

Judicial Panel Of Multi-District Litigation

Federal Agencies

National Labor Relations Board

U.S. Consumer Financial Protection Bureau

U.S. Department Of Justice

U.S. Department Of Labor

State Cases

Connecticut

Delaware

Florida

Georgia

Iowa

Illinois

Indiana

Kentucky

Louisiana

Massachusetts

Michigan

Minnesota

Missouri

Montana

North Carolina

North Dakota

New Jersey

New Mexico

New York

Ohio

Oregon

Pennsylvania

South Carolina

Texas

Utah

Washington

Wisconsin

West Virginia

Appendix II

Largest Employment Discrimination Class Action Settlements

Largest Employment Discrimination Class Action Settlements

1. $250 million – Arnett v. California Public Employees' Retirement System, Case No. 95-3022 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 29, 2003) (approval given to consent decree in a lawsuit involving charges that the California Public Employees' Retirement System discriminated against public safety officers who took disability retirements on the basis of age).

2. $240 million – Kraszewksi v. State Farm, Case No. 79-CV-1261 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 13, 1988) (approval given to consent decree in a long-running sex discrimination lawsuit involving female employees of State Farm in California alleging that the company discriminated against them in recruitment, hiring, job assignment, training and termination).

3. $192.5 million – Abdallah v. The Coca-Cola Co., Case No. 98-CV-3679 (N.D. Ga. June 7, 2001) (approval given to consent decree involving class action brought on behalf of salaried African-American employees alleging race discrimination consisting of systemic discrimination in promotions, compensation, and performance evaluations).

4. $175 million – Velez, et al. v. Novartis, Case No. 04-CV-9194 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 2010) (preliminary approval granted to settlement of a nationwide class action accusing Novartis of discriminating against 5,600 current and former female sales representatives in pay and promotions).

5. $172 million – Roberts v. Texaco, Case No. 94-2015 (S.D.N.Y. July 29, 1997) (approval given to settlement in a lawsuit involving fees for services rendered prior to the entry of judgment in the race discrimination lawsuit).

6. $160 million – McReynolds v. Merrill Lynch & Co., Case No. 05-CV-6583 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 6, 2013) (final approval given to settlement of a class action involving African-American employees claiming discrimination in pay and promotions).

7. $132.5 million – Haynes v. Shoney's, Inc., Case No. 89-30093 (N.D. Fla. Jan. 25, 1993) (approval given to consent decree in a race discrimination lawsuit brought in 1989 by a class of African-American Shoney's employees).

8. $128 million –The Vulcan Society, Inc., et al. v. City Of New York, Case No. 07-CV-2067 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 11, 2015) (final approval granted for a class action settlement to resolve claims alleging that certain aspects of the City's policies of the pass-fail and rank ordering used on written exams had an unlawful disparate impact on African-American and Hispanic candidates for entry-level firefighters positions).

9. $89.5 million – Lane v. Hughes Aircraft Co., Case No. S059064 (Cal. S. Ct. Mar. 6, 2000) (approval granted to settlement of race discrimination class action lawsuit).

10. $81.5 million – Shores v. Publix Super Markets, Inc., Case No. 95-CV-1162 (M.D. Fla. May 23, 1997) (final approval given to a consent decree in a class action involving sex discrimination claims that Publix Super Markets had discriminated against female employees in job assignments, promotions, allocation of hours and full-time work, and otherwise limited advancement, pay, and employment opportunities for women at Publix stores in Florida and the Southeast).

11. $80 million – McReynolds, et al. v. Sodexho Marriott Services, Inc., Case No. 01-CV-510 (D.D.C. Aug. 10, 2005) (settlement of class action filed by African-American employees alleging discriminatory promotion and pay policies and practices).

12. $76.3 million – Andrews, et al. v. City Of New York, Case No. 10-CV-2426 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 26, 2015) (final approval granted for a pay equity class action settlement for female school safety agents suing over the City's alleged violations of the Equal Pay Act, Title VII, and the New York Human Rights Law, claiming that they were paid less than male counterparts, including $33 million in back pay and $43.3 million in retroactive raises).

13. $72.5 million – Beck, et al. v. Boeing Co., Case No. 00-CV-0301 (W.D. Wash. July 16, 2004) (settlement of Title VII class action alleging gender discrimination in pay, promotions, and other conditions of employment of 29,000 female employees).

14. $70 million – In Re TV Writers Cases, Case Nos.: BC 268 882 (Sup. Ct. Cal. Jan. 22, 2010) (preliminary approval granted to settlement by state court to television writers aged 40 and over in litigation involving 23 age discrimination class action cases against television networks, studios, and talent agencies).

15. $65 million – Frank v. Home Depot, Inc., Case No. 95-CV-2182 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 14, 1998); Butler v. Home Depot, Inc., Case No. 94-4335 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 14, 1998) (final approval given to a consent decree in a Title VII class action lawsuit involving female current and former employees and job applicants at Home Depot stores in 10 western states).

16. $61 million – Glover, et al. v. U.S. Postal Service, EEOC Case No. 320-A2-8011 (U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission – Denver, Colorado May 23, 2007) (approval given to a settlement agreement for a class action brought by 7,500 workers with disabilities claiming discrimination in denial of promotions and advancement opportunities).

17. $57 million – Williams, et al. v. Sprint Corp., No. 03-CV-2200 (D. Kan. Sept. 10, 2007) (final approval given to a settlement for a collective action involving 1,697 former employees claiming age discrimination in lay-offs between 2001 and 2003).

18. $55 million – Satchell, et al. v. Federal Express Corp., Case No. 03-CV-2659 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 14, 2007) (final approval given to a consent decree for a class action settlement involving African-American lower-level managers and Hispanic non-supervisory workers claiming race and national origin discrimination with respect to pay, promotions, and terms and conditions of employment).

19. $54 million – EEOC v. Morgan Stanley & Co., Case No. 01-CV-8421 (S.D.N.Y. July 12, 2004) (settlement of EEOC pattern or practice lawsuit for alleged sex discrimination in compensation and denials of promotions for present and former female employees).

20. $53 million – Brady, et al. v. Airline Pilots Association, Case No. 02-CV-2917 (D.N.J. May 29, 2014) (court approval of class action brought by TWA pilots over discriminatory application and breach of duty of fair representation relative to seniority lists).

21. $50 million – Gonzalez, et al. v. Abercrombie & Fitch, Case Nos.: 03-CV-2817, 04-CV-4730 & 04-CV-4731 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 9, 2004) (settlement of consolidated Title VII class actions alleging race and national origin discrimination against female, African-American, and Asian-American applicants, employees, and ex-employees in pay, promotions, and terms and conditions of employment).

22. $48.9 million – EEOC v. Bell Atlantic, Case No. 97-CV-6723 (S.D.N.Y. June 5, 2006) (final approval of consent decree in pregnancy discrimination pattern or practice lawsuit where female employees of Bell Atlantic in 13 states were denied pension credits for their pregnancy and maternity leaves in alleged violation of Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act and the Equal Pay Act).

23. $47 million – Wilfong v. Rent-A-Center, Inc., Case No. 00-CV-680 (S.D. Ill. Oct. 4, 2002) (approval given to a consent decree to settle two lawsuits alleging class-wide sex discrimination under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964).

24. $46 million – Augst-Johnson, et al. v. Morgan Stanley & Co., Inc., Case No. 06-CV-1142 (D.D.C. Oct. 26, 2007) (final approval given to a consent decree for a class action settlement involving female financial advisors and trainees claiming gender discrimination in pay and promotions).

25. $45 million – Sanchez v. Detroit Edison, Case No. 97-706639 (Mich. Cir. Ct. Oct. 28, 1999) & Gilford v. Detroit Edison, Case No. 93-333296 (Mich. Cir. Ct. Oct. 28, 1999) (approval given to a class action settlement involving Detroit Edison Co. employees alleging unlawful race, age, and national origin discrimination during a reorganization).

26. $42.4 million – In Re General Motors Corp. / United Auto Workers (1984) (approval granted to settlement in a class action lawsuit alleging the company engaged in a pattern or practice of sex and race discrimination).

27. $39 million – Calibuso, et al. v. Bank of America, Case No. 10-CV-1413 (E.D.N.Y. Dec. 30, 2013) (final approval granted in settlement of a class action alleging gender discrimination involving pay and promotions allegedly withheld from female employees).

28. $37 million – Burns, et al. v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith Inc., Case No. 04-CV-4135 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 13, 2005) (preliminary approval of settlement of class action alleging violations of federal and state wage & hour laws in treating inside sales representatives as exempt from overtime requirements).

29. $37 million – Andrews, et al. v. Lawrence Livermore National Security, LLC, Case No. RG09453596 (Cal. Super. Ct. Sept. 30, 2015) (settlement of an employment discrimination class action involving 129 workers who claimed the company discriminated against them on the basis of age in a workforce restructuring).

30. $36.5 million – Frank v. United Airlines Inc., Case No. 92-CV-0692 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 11, 2004) (settlement of Title VII class action alleging UAL's weight policies for male and female flight attendants constituted sex discrimination).

31. $34 million – EEOC v. Mitsubishi Motor Manufacturing of America, Case No. 96-1192 (C.D. Ill. June 23, 1998) (approval given to consent decree involving an EEOC pattern or practice lawsuit involving sexual harassment).

32. $33 million – Amochaev, et al. v. Citigroup Global Markets, Inc., Case No. 05-CV-1298 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 13, 2008) (final approval given to class action settlement involving female managers claiming gender discrimination with respect to pay, promotions, and terms and conditions of employment).

33. $31 million – Kosen, et al. v. American Express Financial Advisors, Inc., et al., Case No. 02-CV-82 (D.D.C. Feb. 19, 2002) (approval of a consent decree stemming from a class action lawsuit brought on behalf of more than 4,000 female employees alleging sex and age discrimination consisting of denial of equal pay and promotions).

34. $30 million – Butler, et al. v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., Case No. BC 268250 (S. Ct. Cal. May 6, 2005) (settlement of class action filed by account executives who alleged that company misclassified them as exempt from receiving overtime compensation under state wage & hour laws).

35. $29.5 million – Babbitt v. Albertson's Inc., Case No. 92-CV-1883 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 5, 1994) (final approval given to class action settlement agreement and consent decree brought on behalf of former female and Hispanic workers alleging race and sex discrimination involving pay and promotions).

36. $28 million – EEOC v. Johnson & Higgins Inc., Case No. 03-5481 (S.D.N.Y. July 29, 1999) (final approval given to consent decree settlement in an age discrimination lawsuit brought on behalf of 13 former company directors compelled to retire at age 62).

37. $27.5 million – EEOC v. Sidley & Austin LLP, Case No. 05-CV-208 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 4, 2007) (final approval given to a settlement of an EEOC pattern or practice lawsuit alleging age discrimination in a law firm's demotions of partners).

38. $24.4 million – EEOC v. Walgreen Co., Case No. 05-CV-440 (S.D. Ill. Mar. 24, 2008) (final approval given to settlement of an EEOC pattern or practice lawsuit alleging race discrimination with respect to pay and promotions of a class of more than 10,000 African-American employees).

39. $23.5 million – Jaffe, et al. v. Morgan Stanley & Co., Case No. 06-CV-3903 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 22, 2007) (stipulation filed by the parties for preliminary approval of a consent decree for a class action settlement involving African-American and Hispanic financial advisors and trainees claiming gender and race discrimination in pay and promotions).

40. $22 million – Womack, et al. v. Dolgencorp, Inc., Case No. 06-CV-465 (N.D. Ala. July 23, 2012) (final approval granted for settlement of a sex discrimination class action involving female store managers who claim they were victims of sex-based compensation discrimination)

41. $22 million – David, et al. v. Signal International, LLC, Case No. 08-CV-1220 (E.D. La. July 12, 2015) (settlement through bankruptcy of class action claims of 500 foreign-based workers who alleged discrimination under 42 U.S.C. § 1981 due to their national origin in terms of their recruitment and treatment at oil-rig repair and construction sites in Mississippi and Texas).

42. $21.4 million – Davis, et al. v. Eastman Kodak Co., Case No. 04-CV-6512 (W.D.N.Y. July 4, 2009) (preliminary approval granted to settlement of a nationwide class action involving former and current African-American employees claiming discriminatory practices in pay and promotions).

43. $21 million – Wright, et al. v. New York City Parks Department, Case No. 01-CV-4437 (S.D.N.Y. May 15, 2008) (final approval given to class action settlement involving African-American and Hispanic employees claiming race discrimination and national origin discrimination with respect to pay and promotions).

44. $20 million – EEOC v. Verizon Delaware LLC, Case No. 11-CV-1832 (D. Md. July 6, 2011) (approval of a consent decree stemming from an EEOC pattern or practice disability discrimination lawsuit involving claims that the company's attendance policies failed to accommodate a class of workers whose absences were caused by their disabilities).

45. $20 million – EEOC v. LA Weight Loss Centers, Inc., Case No. 02-CV-648 (D. Md. Dec. 1, 2008) (final approval given to a settlement of an EEOC pattern or practice lawsuit alleging sex discrimination against male applicants in hiring).

46. $19 million – EEOC v. Outback Steakhouse Of Florida, Inc., Case No. 06-CV-1935 (D. Colo. Dec. 29, 2009) (approval of a consent decree stemming from an EEOC pattern or practice gender discrimination lawsuit involving pay and promotions brought by the EEOC on behalf of a nationwide class of over 150,000 women).

47. $17.5 million – Nelson, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., Case No. 04-CV-171 (E.D. Ark. July 8, 2009) (final approval granted to settlement of a nationwide class action involving approximately 4,500 African-American truck drivers who claimed they were rejected for truck driver jobs or were discouraged from applying due to their race).

48. $16.65 million – Weddington v. Ingles Markets Inc., Case No. 98-CV-44 (N.D. Ga. April 15, 1999) (final approval given to class action settlement involving approximately 39,000 current and former female employees claiming gender discrimination in pay and promotions).

49. $16 million – Wade, et al. v. Kroger Co., Case No. 01-CV-699 (W.D. Ky. Nov. 21, 2008) (final approval given to class action settlement involving African-American hourly employees and management trainees claiming race discrimination with respect to pay and promotions).

50. $16 million – Curtis-Bauer, et al. v. Morgan Stanley & Co., Case No. 06-CV-3903 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 22, 2008) (final approval given to class action settlement involving African-American and Hispanic financial advisors claiming race discrimination and national origin discrimination with respect to pay and promotions).

51. $15.36 million – Bellifemine, et al. v. Sanofi-Aventis U.S. LLC, Case No. 07-CV-2207 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 6, 2010) (final approval granted to settlement of a class action involving approximately 5,200 current and former Sanofi-Aventis female sales representatives accusing the French drug-maker of gender bias in pay and promotions).

52. $15 million – Carlson, et al. v. CH Robinson, Inc., Case No. 02-CV-3780 (D. Minn. Sept. 18, 2006) (final approval of consent decree for a class action settlement involving approximately 2,000 female employees and ex-employees claiming gender discrimination in promotions and compensation).

Workplace Class Action Blog

Visit our blog: www.workplaceclassaction.com

Follow Us On Twitter @sswcab

SEYFARTH SHAW

Atlanta	Los Angeles	Shanghai
Boston	Melbourne	Sydney
Chicago	New York	Washington, D.C.
Houston	Sacramento
London	San Francisco	www.seyfarth.com