Dear Clients:

The last few years have seen a transformation in class action and collective action litigation involving workplace issues. This came to a head in 2014 to 2017 with several major class action rulings from the U.S. Supreme Court.

The stakes in these types of employment lawsuits can be extremely significant, as the financial risks of such cases are enormous. More often than not, class actions adversely affect the market share of a corporation and impact its reputation in the marketplace. It is a legal exposure which keeps corporate counsel and business executives awake at night.

Defense of corporations in complex, high-stakes workplace litigation is one of the hallmarks of Seyfarth Shaw's practice. Through that work, our attorneys are on the forefront of the myriad of issues confronting employers in class action litigation.

In order to assist our clients in understanding and avoiding such litigation, we are pleased to present the 2018 Edition of the Seyfarth Shaw Annual Workplace Class Action Litigation Report. This edition, authored by the class action attorneys in our Labor & Employment Department, contains a circuit-by-circuit and state-by-state review of significant class action rulings rendered in 2017, and analyzes the most significant settlements over the past twelve months in class actions and collective actions.

We hope this Annual Report will assist our clients in understanding class action and collective action exposures and the developing case law under both federal and state law.

Very truly yours,

Peter C. Miller
Chairman, Seyfarth Shaw LLP

Author's Note

Our Annual Report analyzes the leading class action and collective action decisions of 2017 involving claims against employers brought in federal courts under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 ("Title VII"), the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA"), the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA"), the Employee Retirement Income Security Act ("ERISA"), and a host of other federal statutes applicable to workplace issues. The Report also analyzes class action and collective action rulings involving claims brought against employers in all 50 state court systems, including decisions pertaining to employment laws, wage & hour laws, and breach of employment contract actions. The key class action and collective action settlements over the past year are also analyzed, both in terms of gross settlement dollars in private plaintiff and government-initiated lawsuits as well as injunctive relief provisions in consent decrees. Finally, the Report also discusses important federal and state court rulings in non-workplace cases which are significant in their impact on the defense of workplace class action litigation. In total, there are 1,408 decisions analyzed in the Report.

The cases decided in 2017 foreshadow the direction of class action litigation in the coming year. One certain conclusion is that employment law class action and collective action litigation is becoming ever more sophisticated and will continue to be a source of significant financial exposure to employers well into the future. Employers also can expect that class action and collective action lawsuits increasingly will combine claims under multiple statutes, thereby requiring the defense bar to have a cross-disciplinary understanding of substantive employment law as well as the procedural peculiarities of opt-out classes under Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the opt-in procedures in FLSA and ADEA collective actions.

This report represents the collective contributions of a significant number of our colleagues at Seyfarth Shaw LLP. We wish to thank and acknowledge those contributions by Richard L. Alfred, Lorie Almon, Raymond C. Baldwin, Brett C. Bartlett, Edward W. Bergmann, Holger Besch, Daniel Blouin, Michael J. Burns, Robert J. Carty, Jr., Mark A. Casciari, John L. Guide To Citation Formats

As corporate counsel utilize the Report for research, we have attempted to cite the West bound volumes wherever possible (e.g., Monroe, et al. v. FTS USA, LLC, 860 F.3d 389 (6th Cir. 2017)). If a decision is unavailable in bound format, we have utilized a LEXIS cite from its electronic database (e.g., Dolemba, et al. v. Kelly Services, Inc., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13508 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 31, 2017)). If a ruling is not contained in an electronic database, the full docketing information is provided (e.g., Durling, et al. v. Papa John's International, Inc., Case No. 16-CV-3592 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 29, 2017)).

Search Functionality

This Report is fully searchable. Case names, Rule 23 terms, and class action topics can be searched by selecting Edit and then Find (or Ctrl+F), and then by typing in the word or phrase to be searched, and then either selecting Next or hitting Enter.

eBook Features

The 2018 Workplace Class Action Litigation Report is also available as an eBook. The downloaded eBook is accessible via freely available eBook reader apps like iBook, Kobo, Aldiko, etc. The eBook provides a rich and immersive reading experience to the users.

Some of the notable features include:

1. The eBook is completely searchable.
2. Users can increase or decrease the font sizes.
3. Active links are set for the table of contents to their respective sections.
4. Bookmarking is offered for notable pages.
5. Readers can drag to navigate through various pages.

A Note On Class Action And Collective Action Terms And Laws

References are made to Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) throughout this Report. These are the two main statutory sources for class action and collective action decisional law. Both are procedural devices used in federal courts for determining the rights and remedies of litigants whose cases involve common questions of law and fact. The following summary provides a brief overview of Rule 23 and § 216(b).

Class Action Terms

The Report uses the term class action to mean any civil case in which parties indicated their intent to sue on behalf of themselves as well as others not specifically named in the suit at some point prior to the final resolution of the matter. This definition includes a case in which a class was formally approved by a judge (a certified class action), as well as a putative class action, in which a judge denied a motion for certification, in which a motion for certification had been made but a decision was still pending at the time of final resolution, or in which no formal motion had been made but other indications were present suggesting that class treatment was a distinct possibility (such as a statement in a complaint that the plaintiffs intended to bring the action on behalf of others similarly-situated).

Although certified class actions may receive considerable attention if they are reported publicly, defendants also must confront putative class actions that contain the potential for class treatment as a result of filing a motion for certification or because of allegations in the original complaint that assert that the named plaintiffs seek to represent others similarly-situated. Even if such cases are never actually certified, the possibility of the litigation expanding into a formal class action raises the stakes significantly, perhaps requiring a more aggressive (and costlier) defense or resulting in a settlement on an individual basis at a premium.

Rule 23

Rule 23 governs class actions in federal courts, and typically involves lawsuits that affect potential class members in different states or that have a nexus with federal law. Rule 23 requires a party seeking class certification to satisfy the four requirements of section (a) of the rule and at least one of three conditions of section (b) of the rule. Under U.S. Supreme Court precedent, a district court must undertake a "rigorous analysis of Rule 23 prerequisites" before certifying a class. General Telephone Co. of Southwest v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 161 (1982). More often than not, plaintiffs will support their motion for class certification with deposition testimony, declarations of putative class members, and expert opinions in the form of affidavits of expert witnesses. Courts often observe that the appropriate analysis in reviewing this evidence is not equivalent to an examination of the merits or a battle between the parties' experts. Rather, the salient issue is whether plaintiffs' legal theories and factual materials satisfy the Rule 23 requirements.

The Rule 23(a) requirements include:

- Numerosity – The individuals who would comprise the class must be so numerous that joinder of them all into the lawsuit would be impracticable.
- Commonality – There must be questions of law and fact common to the proposed class.
- Typicality – The claims or defenses of the representative parties must be typical of the claims and defenses of putative class members.
- Adequacy of Representation – The representative plaintiffs and their counsel must be capable of fairly and adequately protecting the interests of the class.

The standards for analyzing the commonality requirement of Rule 23(a)(2) were tightened in 2011 with the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, et al., 564 U.S. 338 (2011). As a result, a "common" issue is one that is "capable of class-wide resolution – which means that determination of its truth or falsity will resolve an issue that is central to the validity of each of the claims in one stroke." Id. at 2551.

Once a plaintiff establishes the four requirements of Rule 23(a), he or she must satisfy one of the three requirements of Rule 23(b). In practice, a plaintiff typically establishes the propriety of class certification under either Rule 23(b)(2) or Rule 23(b)(3) in an employment-related case.

Because application of each rule depends on the nature of the injuries alleged and the relief sought, and imposes different certification standards on the class, the differences between Rule 23(b)(2) and (b)(3) are critical in employment-related class action litigation. In the words of the rule, a class may be certified under Rule 23(b)(2) if the party opposing the class "has acted or refused to act on grounds generally applicable to the class, thereby making appropriate final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief with respect to the class as a whole." In other words, plaintiffs seeking to certify class actions under Rule 23(b)(2) are restricted to those cases where the primary relief sought is injunctive or declaratory in nature. Rule 23(b)(2) does not extend to cases in which the appropriate final relief relates exclusively or predominantly to money damages. Rule 23(b)(2) provides for a binding litigation order as to all class members without guarantees of personal notice and the opportunity to opt-out of the suit.

Rule 23(b)(3) is designed for circumstances in which class action treatment is not as clearly called for as in Rule 23(b)(1) and Rule 23(b)(2) situations, when a class action may nevertheless be convenient and desirable. A class may be certified under Rule 23(b)(3) if the court finds that questions of law or fact common to the members of the class predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action is superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy. Pertinent considerations include the interest of the members of the class in individually controlling the prosecution of separate actions; the extent and nature of any litigation concerning the controversy already commenced by members of the class; the desirability of concentrating the litigation of the claims in one particular forum; and the difficulties likely to be encountered in the management of a class action.

To qualify for certification under Rule 23(b)(3), therefore, a class must meet not only the requirements of Rule 23(a), but also two additional requirements: "(1) common questions must predominate over any questions affecting only individual members; and (2) class resolution must be superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy." Amchem Products, Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 615 (1997). While the common question requirement of Rule 23(a)(2) and the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3) overlap, the predominance requirement is more stringent than the common question requirement. Thus, even though a case may present common questions of law or fact, those questions may not always predominate and class certification would be inappropriate.

Rule 23(b)(3) applies to cases where the primary relief sought is money damages. The Supreme Court has determined – in Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corp., 527 U.S. 815 (1999) – that unlike in Rule 23(b)(2) class actions, each class member in a Rule 23(b)(3) class action for money damages is entitled as a matter of due process to personal notice and an opportunity to opt-out of the class action. Accordingly, Rule 23(c)(2) guarantees those rights for each member of a class certified under Rule 23(b)(3). There are no comparable procedural guarantees for class members under Rule 23(b)(2).

Finally, two recent decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court have established a gloss on the Rule 23 requirements that play out in class certification proceedings in a significant manner, including: (i) Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, et al., 564 U.S. 338 (2011), as referenced above, which tightened commonality standards under Rule 23(a)(2); and (ii) Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, 133 S. Ct. 1426 (2013), which interpreted Rule 23(b)(3) – that requires "questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members" – to mandate that plaintiffs' proposed damages model show damages on a class-wide basis. In Wal-Mart and Comcast, the Supreme Court reaffirmed that lower federal courts must undertake a "rigorous analysis" of whether a putative class satisfies the predominance criterion set forth in Rule 23(b)(3), even if that analysis overlaps with the merits of the underlying claims.

29 U.S.C. § 216(b)

This statute governs multi-plaintiff lawsuits under the ADEA and the FLSA. Generally, such lawsuits are known as collective actions (as opposed to class actions).

Under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), courts generally recognize that plaintiffs and other "non-party" individuals may not proceed collectively until they establish that they should be permitted to do so as a class. Under § 216(b), courts have held that "similarly-situated" individuals may proceed collectively as a class. The federal circuits have not agreed on the standard according to which such a class should be certified. Two competing standards for certification are recognized.

The first approach adopts the view that the "similarly-situated" inquiry is coextensive with the procedure used in class actions brought pursuant to Rule 23. Using this methodology, the court analyzes the putative class for factors including numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequacy of representation. This typically occurs after some discovery has taken place. This approach is unusual and is not favored.

The second approach is a two-tiered approach involving a first stage conditioned certification process and a second stage potential decertification process. It is more commonly used and is the prevailing test in federal courts. In practice, it tends to be a "plaintiff-friendly" standard.

In the context of the first stage of conditional certification, plaintiffs typically move for conditional certification and permission to send notices to prospective class members. This generally occurs at an early stage of the case, and often before discovery even commences. Courts have held that a plaintiff's burden at this stage is minimal. A ruling at this stage of the litigation often is based upon allegations in the complaint and any affidavits submitted in favor of or in objection to conditional certification.

Courts have not clearly defined the qualitative or quantitative standards of evidence that should be applied at this stage. Courts are often reluctant to grant or deny certification on the merits of a plaintiff's case. This frustrates defendants with clearly meritorious arguments in defense of the litigation, such as those based on compelling proof that would establish the exempt status of the plaintiffs and other employees alleged to be similarly-situated.

Instead, courts appear to find the most convincing proof that certification is improper based on evidence that putative class members perform different jobs in different locations or facilities, under different supervisors, and potentially pursuant to differing policies and practices. Courts also have held that certification is inappropriate when individualized inquiries into applicable defenses are required, such as when the employer asserts that the relevant employees are exempt.

Where conditional certification is granted, a defendant has the opportunity to request that the class be decertified after discovery is wholly or partially completed in the subsequent, second stage of decertification. Courts engage in a more rigorous scrutiny of the similarities and differences that exist amongst members of the class at the decertification stage. The scrutiny is based upon a more developed, if not entirely complete, record of evidence. Upon an employer's motion for decertification, a court assesses the issue of similarity more critically and may revisit questions concerning the locations where employees work, the employees' supervisors, their employment histories, the policies and practices according to which they perform work and are paid, and the distinct defenses that may require individualized analyses.

Opt-In/Opt-Out Procedures

Certification procedures are different under Rule 23 and 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Under Rule 23(b)(2), a court's order binds the class; under Rule 23(b)(3), however, a class member must opt-out of the class action (after receiving a class action notice). If he or she does not do so, they are bound by the judgment. Conversely, under § 216(b), a class member must opt-in to the lawsuit before he or she will be bound. While at or near 100% of class members are effectively bound by a Rule 23 order, opt-in rates in most § 216(b) collective actions typically range from 5% to 40%.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

I. Overview Of The Year In Workplace Class Action Litigation

A. Executive Summary

The prosecution of workplace class action litigation by the plaintiffs' bar has increased exponentially over the past decade. More often than not, class actions pose unique "bet-the-company" risks for employers. An adverse judgment in a class action has the potential to bankrupt a business and adverse publicity can eviscerate its market share. Likewise, the on-going defense of a class action can drain corporate resources long before the case even reaches a decision point.

Companies that do business in multiple states are also susceptible to "copy-cat" class actions, whereby plaintiffs' lawyers create a domino effect of litigation filings that challenge corporate policies and practices in numerous jurisdictions at the same time. Hence, workplace class actions can adversely impact a corporation's business operations, jeopardize or cut short the careers of senior management, and cost millions of dollars to defend. For these reasons, risks from workplace class actions are at the top of the list of challenges that keep business leaders up late at night.

Skilled plaintiffs' class action lawyers and governmental enforcement litigators are not making this challenge any easier for companies. They are continuing to develop new theories and approaches to the successful prosecution of complex employment litigation. New rulings by federal and state courts have added to this patchwork quilt of compliance problems and risk management issues.

In turn, the events of the past year in the workplace class action world demonstrate that the array of litigation issues facing businesses are continuing to accelerate at a rapid pace while also undergoing significant change. Notwithstanding the transition to new leadership in the White House in 2017, governmental enforcement litigation pursued by the U.S. Equal Employment Commission ("EEOC") and the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") continued to manifest an aggressive "push-the-envelope" agenda by agencies, with regulatory oversight of workplace issues continuing as a high priority.

The combination of these factors are challenging businesses to integrate their litigation and risk mitigation strategies to navigate these exposures. These challenges are especially acute for businesses in the context of complex workplace litigation.

Adding to this mosaic of challenges in 2018 is the continuing evolution in federal policies based on a new political party occupying the White House for part of 2017. Furthermore, while changes to government priorities started on Inauguration Day and are on-going, others are being carried out by new leadership at the agency level who were appointed in the fourth quarter of this past year. As expected, many changes represent stark reversals in policy that are sure to have a cascading impact on private class action litigation. While predictions about the future of workplace class action litigation may cover a wide array of potential outcomes, the one sure bet is that change is inevitable and corporate America will continue to face new litigation challenges.

B. Key Trends Of 2017

An overview of workplace class action litigation developments in 2017 reveals four key trends.

First, the monetary value of the top workplace class action settlements rose dramatically in 2017. These numbers increased over past years, even after they had reached all-time highs in 2014 to 2016. The plaintiffs' employment class action bar and governmental enforcement litigators were exceedingly successful in monetizing their case filings into large class-wide settlements, and they did so at decidedly higher values than in previous years. The top ten settlements in various employment-related class action categories totaled $2.72 billion in 2017, an increase of over $970 million from $1.75 billion in 2016. Furthermore, settlements of employment discrimination class actions experienced over a three-fold increase in value; statutory workplace class actions saw nearly a five-fold increase; and government enforcement litigation registered nearly a ten-fold increase. Whether this is the beginning of a long-range trend or a short-term aberration remains to be seen as 2018 unfolds, but the determinative markers suggest this upward trend will rise further in 2018, at least insofar as private plaintiff class actions are concerned.

Second, while federal and state courts issued many favorable class certification rulings for the plaintiffs' bar in 2017, evolving case law precedents and new defense approaches resulted in better outcomes for employers in opposing class certification requests. Plaintiffs' lawyers continued to craft refined class certification theories to counter the more stringent Rule 23 certification requirements established in Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 564 U.S. 338 (2011). As a result, in the areas of employment discrimination and ERISA class actions, the plaintiffs' bar scored well in securing class certification rulings in federal courts in 2017 (over comparative figures for 2016). Class actions were certified in significant numbers in "magnet" jurisdictions that continued to issue decisions that encourage – or, in effect, force – the resolution of large numbers of claims through class-wide mechanisms. Yet, while the sheer volume of wage & hour certification decisions in 2017 increased as compared to last year, employers actually fared better in litigating those class certification motions in federal court than last year. Of the 257 wage & hour certification decisions in 2017, plaintiffs won 170 of 233 conditional certification rulings (approximately 73%), but lost 15 of 24 decertification rulings (approximately 63%). By way of comparison, there were 224 wage & hour certification decisions in 2016, where plaintiffs won 147 of 195 conditional certification rulings (approximately 76%) and lost 13 of 29 decertification rulings (approximately 45%). In sum, employers beat slightly more first stage conditional certification motions in 2017, and dramatically increased their odds – a jump of 18% – of fracturing cases with successful decertification motions.

Third, filings and settlements of government enforcement litigation in 2017 did not reflect a head-snapping pivot from the ideological pro-worker (or anti-big business) outlook of the Obama Administration to a pro-business, less regulation/litigation viewpoint of the Trump Administration. Instead, as compared to 2016, government enforcement litigation actually increased in 2017. As an example, the EEOC alone brought 184 lawsuits in 2017 as compared to 86 lawsuits in 2016. Further, the settlement value of the top ten settlements in government enforcement cases jumped dramatically – from $52.3 million in 2016 to $485.25 million in 2017. The explanations for this phenomenon are wide and varied, and include the time-lag between Obama-appointed enforcement personnel vacating their offices and Trump-appointed personnel taking charge of agency decision-making power; the number of lawsuits "in the pipeline" that were filed during the Obama Administration that came to conclusion in the past year; and the "hold-over" effect whereby Obama-appointed policy-makers remained in their positions long enough to continue their enforcement efforts before being replaced in the last half of 2017. This trend is critical to employers, as both the DOL and the EEOC have had a focus on "big impact" lawsuits against companies and "lead by example" in terms of areas that the private plaintiffs' bar aims to pursue. As 2018 opens, it appears that the content and scope of enforcement litigation undertaken by the DOL and the EEOC in the Trump Administration will tilt away from the pro-employee/anti-big business mindset of the previous Administration. Trump appointees at the DOL and the EEOC are slowly but surely "peeling back" on positions previously advocated under the Obama Administration. As a result, it appears inevitable that the volume of government enforcement litigation and value of settlement numbers from those cases will decrease in 2018. The ultimate effect, however, may well prompt the private plaintiffs' class action bar to "fill the void" and expand the volume of workplace litigation pursued against employers over the coming year as the DOL and the EEOC adjust their litigation enforcement activities.

Fourth and finally, class action litigation increasingly has been shaped and influenced by recent rulings of the U.S. Supreme Court. Over the past several years, the U.S. Supreme Court has accepted more cases for review – and issued more rulings – that have impacted the prosecution and defense of class actions and government enforcement litigation. The past year continued that trend, with several key decisions on complex employment litigation and class action issues that were arguably more pro-business than decisions in past years. More cases also were accepted for review in 2017 that are positioned for rulings in 2018, including what may be the most high-stakes issue impacting employers since the Wal-Mart ruling in 2011 – the Epic Systems, Murphy Oil, and E & Y trilogy of cases on the legality of workplace arbitration agreements with class action waivers. The ruling expected in the Epic System, Murphy Oil, and E & Y cases in 2018 may well change the class action playing field in profound ways. Coupled with the appointment of Justice Neil Gorsuch in 2017 and potential additional appointments to the Supreme Court by President Trump in 2018 and beyond, litigation dynamics may well be re-shaped in ways that further change the playbook for prosecuting and defending class actions.

C. Significant Trends In Workplace Class Action Litigation In 2017

(i) Higher Class Action Settlement Numbers In 2017

As measured by the top ten largest case resolutions in various workplace class action categories, overall settlement numbers increased exponentially in 2017 as compared to 2016.

This continued the reversal of a trend that began with the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Wal-Mart in 2011. By tightening Rule 23 standards and raising the bar for class certification, Wal-Mart made it more difficult for plaintiffs to certify class actions, and to convert their class action filings into substantial settlements.

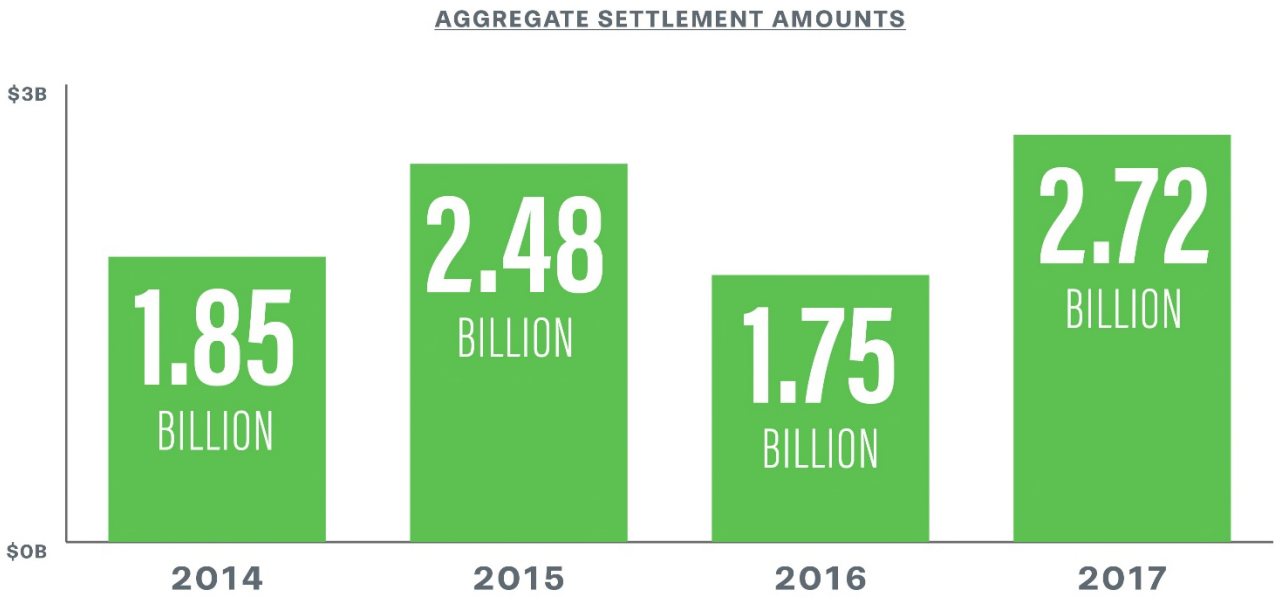
The settlement statistics for 2017 underscore how the plaintiffs' bar has successfully "found a way" around the impediments to transforming their case filings into large settlements on a class-wide basis. This also reflects a process whereby there has been a maturing of case architecture considerations, as plaintiffs' lawyers have "re-booted" their strategic approaches to take account of Wal-Mart, and crafted refined class certification theories with better chances of success.

That phenomenon is still being played out, as well as manifesting itself in settlement dynamics.

Considering all types of workplace class actions, settlement numbers in 2017 totaled $2.72 billion, which increased significantly from 2016 when such settlements totaled $1.75 billion.

The 2017 figure also eclipsed the settlement numbers of 2015, which were then at the all-time high of $2.48 billion.

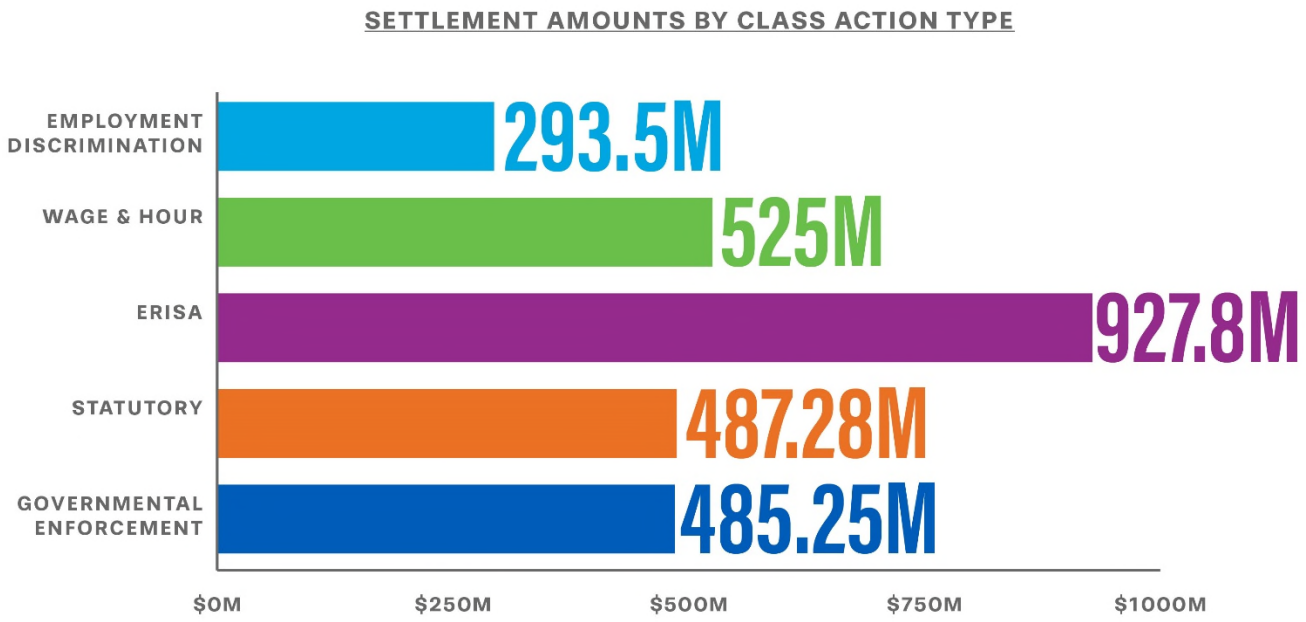
The following graphic shows this trend:



In terms of the story behind the numbers, the breakouts by types of workplace class action settlements are instructive.

In 2017, there was a slight downward trend for the value of wage & hour class action settlements, and significant increases across-the-board for resolutions of class actions involving employment discrimination, statutory workplace laws, and ERISA class actions, as well as governmental enforcement litigation.

This phenomenon is shown by the following chart for 2017 settlement numbers:

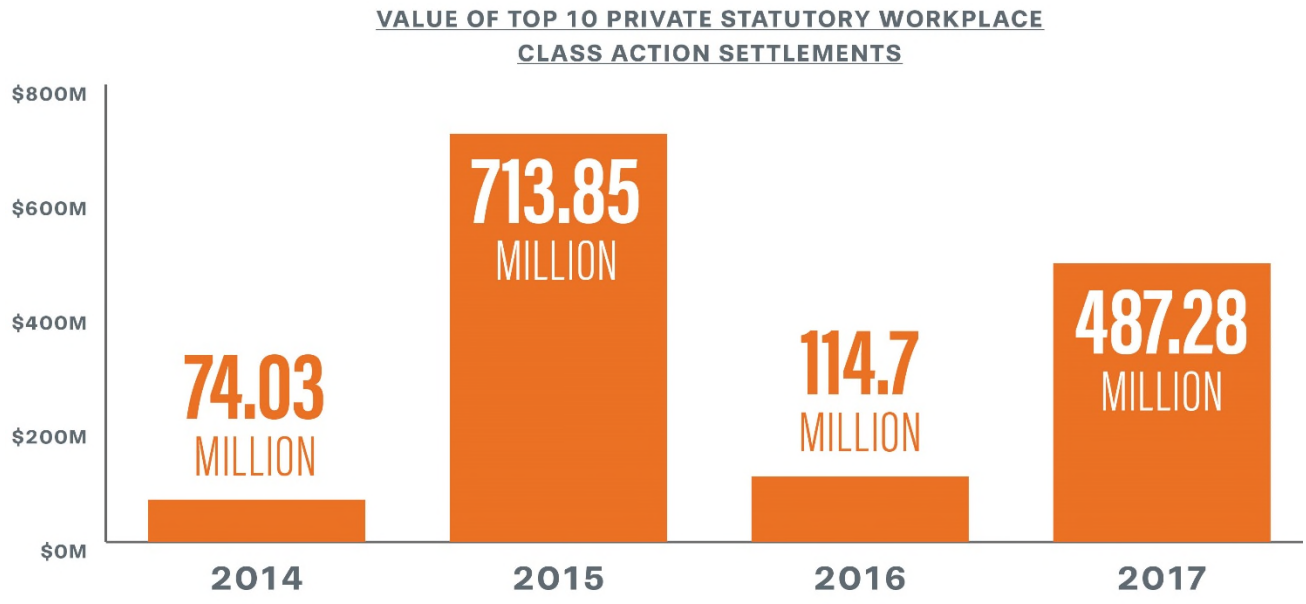


By type of case, settlements values in employment discrimination class actions, private plaintiff statutory workplace class actions, and government enforcement cases experienced the most significant increases.

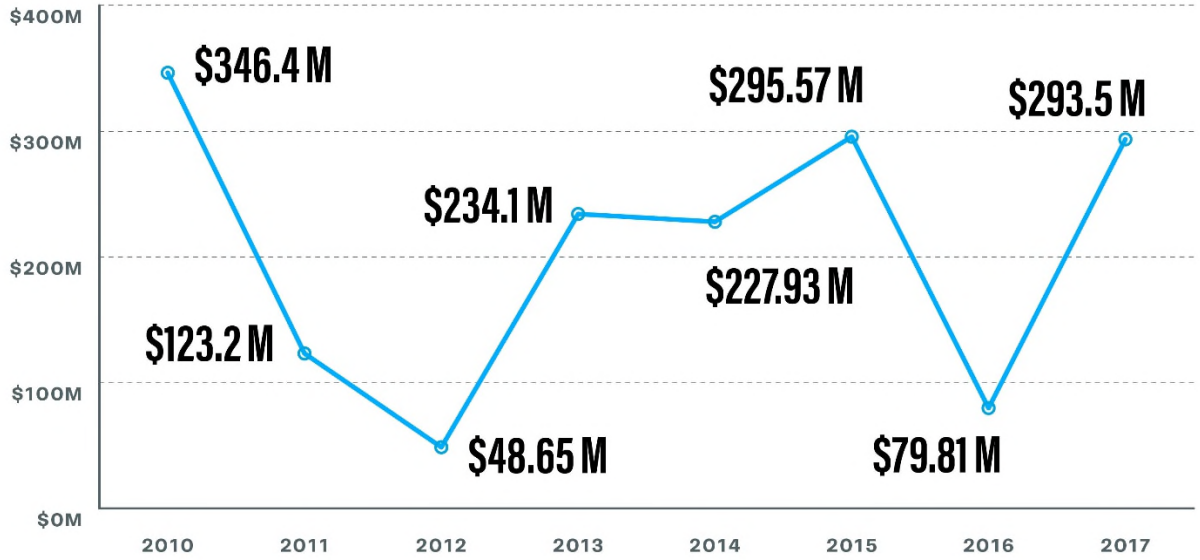
The top ten settlements in the private plaintiff statutory class action category (e.g., cases brought for breach of contract for employee benefits, and workplace antitrust laws and statutes such as the Fair Credit Reporting Act or the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act) totaled $487.28 million.

This figure increased from $114.7 million in 2016.

The following chart shows this nearly five-fold increase:



Most telling, however, the reversal of the "Wal-Mart effect" is shown by the pattern for employment discrimination class action settlements in 2017, as well as a comparison of the settlement figures with previous settlement activity over the last decade. This trend is illustrated in the following chart:



VALUE OF TOP 10 EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION CLASS ACTION SETTLEMENTS

In 2017, the value of the top ten largest employment discrimination class action settlements of $293.5 million was the second highest figure since 2010,[1] and bucked the trend that started in 2011 (after Wal-Mart was decided) that showed decreases in settlement amounts over three years of that four-year period. On a comparative basis, the settlement figure for 2017 was the third highest over the past eight years.

This trend, however, did not hold for wage & hour class action settlements. In 2017, the value of the top ten wage & hour settlements was $525 million, a decrease of over $170 million from 2016. However, when analyzed over the past eight years, the figure of $525 million actually was the second highest annual total in that time period.

When coupled together, the two-year period of 2016 and 2017 saw over $1.2 billion in the top wage & hour settlements. Further, this is most telling in examining the last four years, for 2016 represented almost a quadrupling (after two years of declining numbers in 2013 and 2014) in the value of the top wage & hour settlements as compared to 2014.[2]

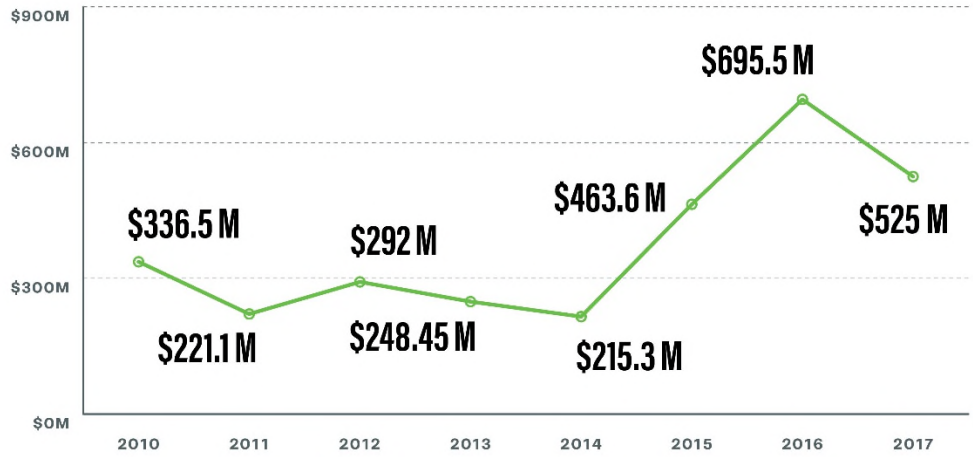
[1] An analysis of class action settlement activity is discussed in Chapter II of this Report. The total of $293.5 million in 2017 was the second highest total since the Wal-Mart ruling in 2011. By comparison, the total of $79.81 million for the top ten largest employment discrimination class action settlements in 2016 was the second lowest total since 2006; the figures for each year were as follows: 2015 – $295.57 million; 2014 – $227.93 million; 2013 – $234.1 million; 2012 – $48.6 million; 2011 – $123.2 million; 2010 – $346.4 million; 2009 – $86.2 million; 2008 – $118.36 million; 2007 – $282.1 million; and 2006 – $91 million. With the issuance of the Wal-Mart decision in June of 2011, settlements were decidedly lower in 2012, and relatively depressed in 2013 and 2014, and with the second lowest total in 2017 since the Wal-Mart ruling.

[2] By comparison, the top ten wage & hour class action settlements in 2015 totaled $463.6 million, compared to $215.3 million in 2014 and $248.45 million in 2013. The figure of $695.5 million in 2016 is the highest amount over the last decade.

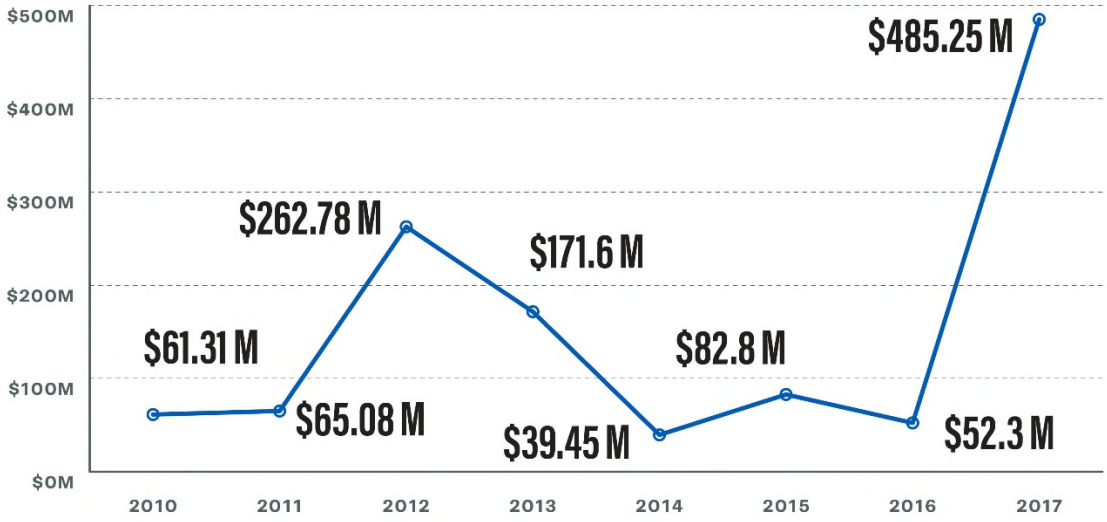
This trend is illustrated by the following chart:



VALUE OF TOP 10 WAGE & HOUR CLASS ACTION SETTLEMENTS

These settlement numbers reflect that Wal-Mart has had far less of an impact in this substantive legal area, as FLSA settlements are not explicitly tied to the concepts on class certification addressed in Wal-Mart (and instead, are based on the standards under 29 U.S.C.§ 216(b)).

Relatedly, the top ten settlements in government enforcement litigation experienced a booming upward arc, as they increased nearly ten-fold from $52.3 million in 2016 to $485.25 million in 2017. By comparison, the top ten settlements in 2016 represented a slight decrease even from 2015, when settlements hit one of their lowest points in the past eight years.[3] This trend is illustrated by the following chart of settlements from 2010 to 2017:



VALUE OF TOP 10 GOVERNMENT ENFORCEMENT LITIGATION SETTLEMENTS

[3] The total for the top ten government enforcement litigation settlements was $82.8 million in 2015, compared to $39.45 million in 2014, $171.6 million in 2013, and $262.78 million in 2012. Other than in 2014 (when governmental settlements hit their lowest point in the last decade at $39.45 million), the value of the top ten settlements in 2016 was the second lowest figure for the past decade.

ERISA class action settlements also were up in 2017, as the top ten settlements totaled $927.8 million. This figure represented an increase from $807.4 million in 2016.

Further, ERISA settlements for the two-year period of 2016 and 2017 were a combined $1.73 billion.

While the 2016 aggregate settlement number was nearly six times greater than in 2013,[4] it entailed a significant decrease from 2014 (when settlements were $1.31 billion).

VALUE OF TOP 10 ERISA CLASS ACTION SETTLEMENTS

Settlement trends in workplace class action litigation are impacted by many factors.

In the coming year, settlement activity is apt to be influenced by developing case law interpreting U.S. Supreme Court rulings, the impact of the Trump Administration's labor and employment enforcement policies, case filing trends of the plaintiffs' class action bar, and class certification rulings

(ii) Class Certification Trends In 2017

Anecdotally, surveys of corporate counsel confirm that complex workplace litigation – and especially class action and multi-plaintiff lawsuits – remains one of the chief exposures driving corporate legal budgetary expenditures, as well as the type of legal dispute that causes the most concern for companies.

The prime component in that array of risks is now indisputably complex wage & hour litigation.

The circuit-by-circuit analysis of 290 class certification decisions in all varieties of workplace class action litigation is detailed in the following map:

[4] The total for the top ten ERISA class action settlements in 2015 was $926.5 million compared to $1.31 billion in 2014 and $155.6 million in 2013.

Wage & Hour Certification Trends

While plaintiffs continued to achieve robust numbers of initial conditional certification rulings of wage & hour collective actions in 2017, employers also secured significant victories in defeating conditional certification motions and obtaining decertification of § 216(b) collective actions.[5] The percentage of successful motions for decertification brought by employers rose by nearly 18% in 2017. This was the highest success rate over the past decade.

Most significantly, for only the second time in over a decade, and for the second year in a row, wage & hour lawsuit filings in federal courts decreased. That being said, the volume of FLSA lawsuit filings for the preceding four years – during 2014, 2015, 2016, and 2017 – is the greatest in the last several decades.

[5] An analysis of rulings in FLSA collective actions in 2017 is set forth in Chapter V, and analysis of rulings in state law wage & hour class action in 2017 is set forth in Chapter VII, Section B.

As a result, an increase in FLSA filings over the past several years had caused the issuance of more FLSA certification rulings than in any other substantive area of complex employment litigation – 257 certification rulings in 2017, as compared to the 224 certification rulings in 2016 and 175 certification rulings in 2015.

The analysis of these rulings – discussed in Chapter v. of this Report – shows that more cases are brought against employers in "plaintiff-friendly" jurisdictions such as the judicial districts within the Second and Ninth Circuits. This trend is shown in the following map:

U.S. Courts Of Appeal – Analysis Of FLSA Certification Decisions

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	D.C. Circuit
Conditional Certification Motions Granted	6	33	4	12	25	21	17	8	25	10	8	1

15 Decertification Motions Granted / 9 Decertification Motions Denied

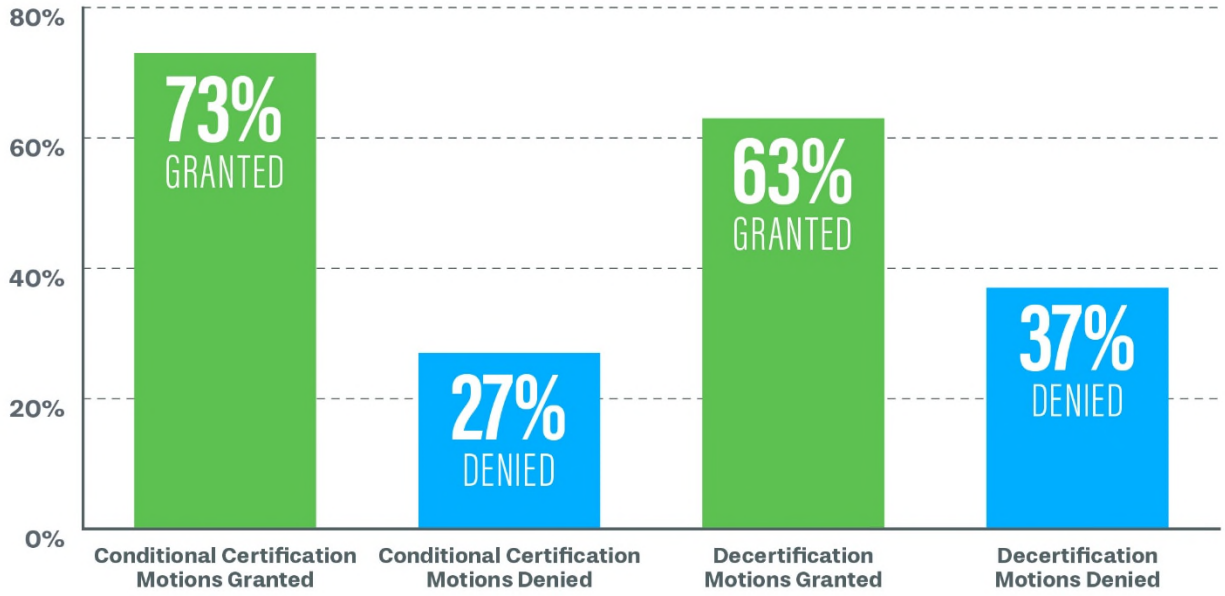
The statistical underpinnings of this circuit-by-circuit analysis of FLSA certification rulings is telling in several respects.

First, it substantiates that the district courts within the Ninth Circuit and the Second Circuit are the epi-centers of wage & hour class actions and collective actions. More cases were prosecuted and conditionally certified – 48 certification orders in the Ninth Circuit and 39 certification orders in the Second Circuit – in the district courts in those circuits than in any other areas of the country. The district courts in the Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Circuits were not far behind, with 30, 26, and 24 certification orders respectively in those jurisdictions.

Second, as the burdens of proof reflect under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), plaintiffs won the overwhelming majority of "first stage" conditional certification motions (170 of 233 rulings, or approximately 73%). However, in terms of "second stage" decertification motions, employers prevailed in a majority of those cases (15 of 24 rulings, or approximately 63% of the time).

The "first stage" conditional certification statistics for plaintiffs at 73% for 2017 are aligned to the numbers in 2016, when plaintiffs won 75% of "first stage" conditional certification motions. However, employers fared much better in 2017 on "second stage" decertification motions. Employers won decertification at a rate of 63%, which was up from 45% in 2016 and 36% in 2015.

The following chart illustrates this trend for 2017:



2017 FLSA CONDITIONAL CERTIFICATION MOTIONS AND DECERTIFICATION MOTIONS

Third, this reflects that there has been an on-going migration of skilled plaintiffs' class action lawyers into the wage & hour litigation space. Experienced and able plaintiffs' class action counsel typically secure better results. Further, securing initial "first stage" conditional certification – and foisting settlement pressure on an employer – can be done quickly (almost right after the case is filed), with a minimal monetary investment in the case (e.g., no expert is needed, unlike the situation when certification is sought in an employment discrimination class action or an ERISA class action), and without having to conduct significant discovery (per the case law that has developed under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b)).

As a result, to the extent litigation of class actions and collective actions by plaintiffs' lawyers is viewed as an investment of time and money, prosecution of wage & hour lawsuits is a relatively low cost investment, without significant barriers to entry, and with the prospect of immediate returns as compared to other types of workplace class action litigation. Finally, as success in litigation often begets copy-cat filings, that the value of top wage & hour settlements in 2017 topped $525 million – and over $1.2 billion in the last two years – is likely to prompt more litigation in 2018.

Hence, as compared to ERISA and employment discrimination class actions, FLSA litigation is less difficult or protracted for the plaintiffs' bar, and more cost-effective and predictable. In terms of their "rate of return," the plaintiffs' bar can convert their case filings more readily into certification orders, and create the conditions for opportunistic settlements over shorter periods of time. The certification statistics for 2017 confirm these factors.

Employment Discrimination & ERISA Certification Trends

At the same time, the rulings in Wal-Mart and Comcast also fueled more critical thinking and crafting of case theories in employment discrimination and ERISA class action filings in 2017. The Supreme Court's two Rule 23 decisions have had the effect of forcing the plaintiffs' bar to "re-boot" the architecture of their class action theories.[6] At least one result was the decision two years ago in Tyson Foods v. Bouaphakeo, 136 S. Ct. 1036 (2016), in which the Supreme Court accepted the plaintiffs' arguments that, in effect, appeared to soften the requirements previously imposed in Wal-Mart and Comcast for maintaining and proving class claims, at least in wage & hour litigation.

Hence, it is clear that the playbook on Rule 23 strategies is undergoing a continuous process of evolution. Filings of "smaller" employment discrimination class actions have increased due to a strategy whereby state or regional-type classes are asserted more often than the type of nationwide mega-cases that Wal-Mart discouraged. In essence, at least in the employment discrimination area, the plaintiffs' litigation playbook is more akin to a strategy of "aim small to secure certification, and if unsuccessful, then miss small."

In turn, employment-related class certification motions outside of the wage & hour area were a mixed bag or tantamount to a "jump ball" in 2017, as 7 of the 11 were granted and 4 of the 11 were denied.

The following map demonstrates this array of certification rulings in Title VII and ADEA discrimination cases:

U.S. Courts Of Appeal – Analysis Of Employment Discrimination Decisions

Total: 7 Granted / 4 Denied

[6] An analysis of certification rulings in Title VII employment discrimination class actions in 2017 is set forth in Chapter III, Section A; an analysis of ADEA collective action certification rulings is set forth in Chapter IV, Section A; and an analysis of state court employment discrimination certification decisions is set forth in Chapter VII, Section A. In addition, an analysis of non-workplace class action rulings that impact employment-related cases is set forth in Chapter IX.

In terms of the ERISA class action litigation scene in 2017,[7] the focus continued to rest on precedents of the U.S. Supreme Court as it shaped and refined the scope of potential liability and defenses in ERISA class actions.

The Wal-Mart decision also has changed the ERISA certification playing field by giving employers more grounds to oppose class certification. The decisions in 2017 show that class certification motions have the best chance of denial in the context of ERISA welfare plans, and ERISA defined contribution pension plans, where individualized notions of liability and damages are prevalent.

Nonetheless, plaintiffs were more successful than defendants in litigating certification motions in ERISA class actions, as plaintiffs won 17 of 22 certification rulings in 2017.

Overall Trends

So what conclusions overall can be drawn on class certification trends in 2017?

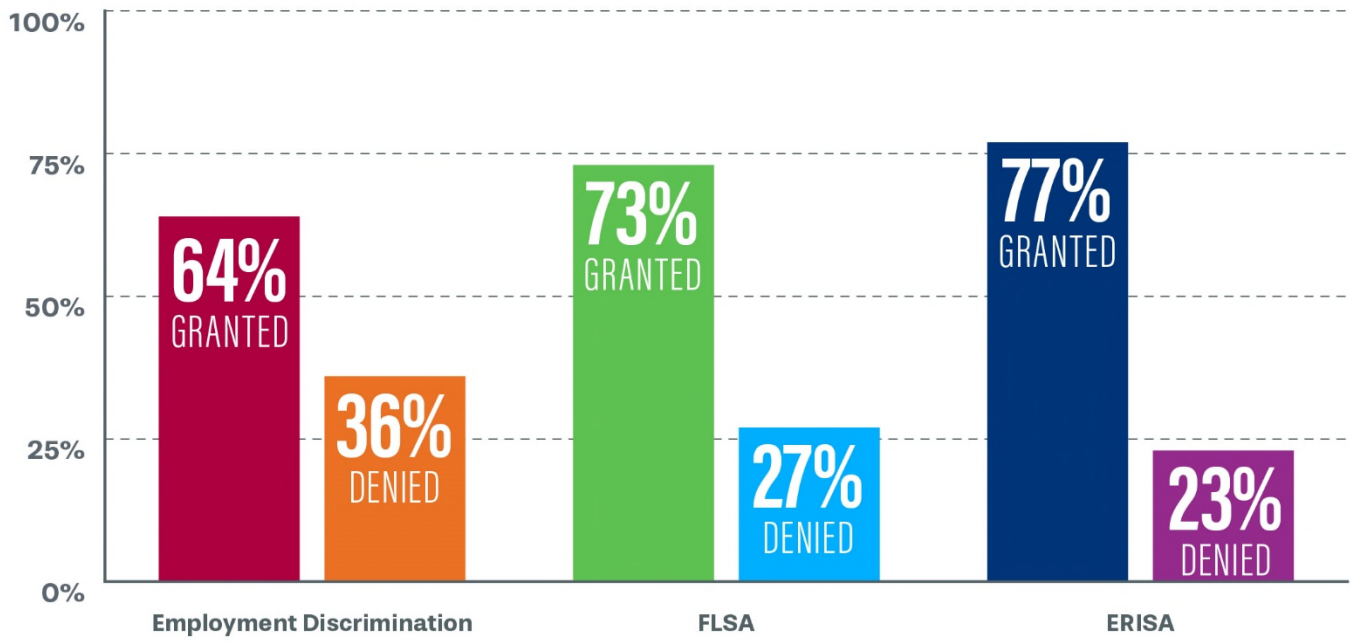
[7] An analysis of rulings in ERISA class actions in 2017 is set forth in Chapter VI, Section A.

In the areas of employment discrimination, wage & hour, and ERISA, the plaintiffs' bar is converting their case filings into certification of classes at a high rate. To the extent class certification aids the plaintiffs' bar in monetizing their lawsuit filings and converting them into class action settlements, the conversion rate is robust.

Whereas class certification was somewhat of a coin toss for employment discrimination cases (7 motions granted and 4 motions denied in 2017), class certification is relatively easier in ERISA cases (17 motions granted and 5 motions denied in 2017), but most prevalent in wage & hour litigation (with 170 conditional certification motions granted and 63 motions denied, as well as 15 decertification motions granted and 9 motions denied).

The following bar graph details the win/loss percentages in each of these substantive areas:

- a 64% success rate for certification of employment discrimination class actions (both Title VII and age discrimination cases);
- a 77% success rate for certification of ERISA class actions; and,
- a 73% success rate for conditional certification of wage & hour collective actions.



2017 CERTIFICATION MOTIONS FOR EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION, FLSA, AND ERISA

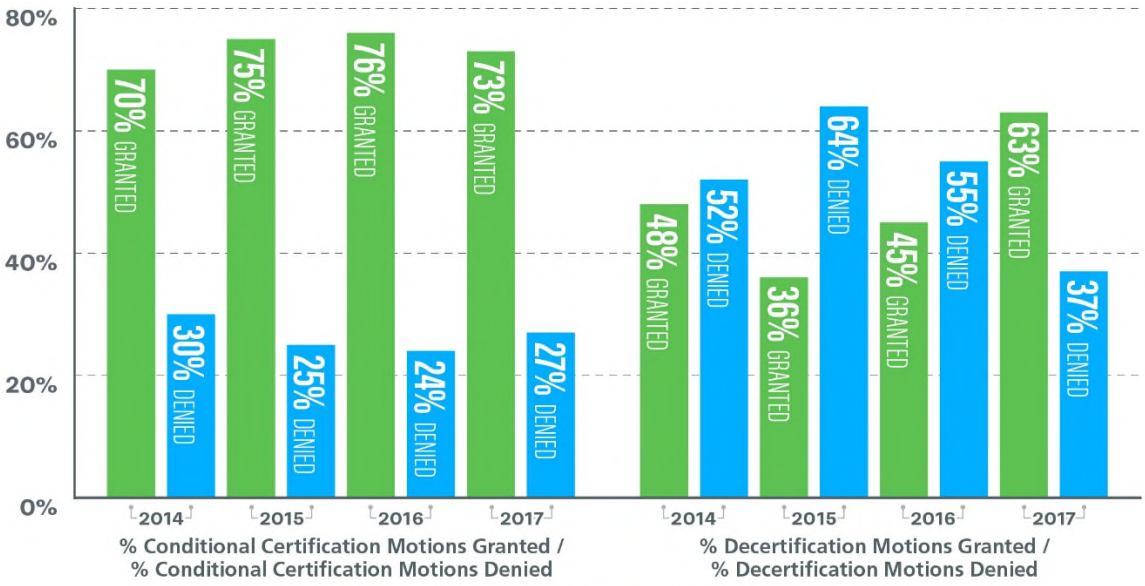
Obviously, the most certification activity in workplace class action litigation is in the wage & hour space.

The trend over the last three years in the wage & hour space reflects a steady success rate that ranged from a low of 70% to a high of 76% (with 2017 right in the middle at 73%) for the plaintiffs' bar, which is tilted toward plaintiff-friendly "magnet" jurisdictions were the case law favors workers and presents challenges to employers seeking to block certification.

Yet, the key statistic in 2017 for employers was an increase in the odds of successful decertification of wage & hour cases to 63%, as compared to 45% in 2016, 36% in 2015, and 52% in 2014.

The on-going defense of litigation and participation in discovery following conditional certification is often an expensive proposition for employers, and many choose to settle to avoid that scenario. However, for employers that face the costs of discovery and then litigate decertification motions, the pay-off in 2017 was a fracturing of cases at the highest success rate in over a decade – a decertification percentage of 63%.

Comparatively, the trend over the past four years for certification orders is illustrated in the following chart:



2014 - 2017 FLSA CONDITIONAL CERTIFICATION MOTIONS AND DECERTIFICATION MOTIONS

While each case is different and no two class actions or collective actions are identical, these statistics paint the all-too familiar picture that employers have experienced over the last several years. The new wrinkle to influence these factors in 2017 was the Supreme Court's ruling in 2016 in Tyson Foods. To the extent it assists plaintiffs in their certification theories, future certification decisions may well trend further upward for workers.

Lessons From 2017

There are multiple lessons to be drawn from these trends in 2017.

First, while the Wal-Mart ruling undoubtedly heightened commonality standards under Rule 23(a)(2) starting in 2011, and the Comcast decision tightened the predominance factors at least for damages under Rule 23(b) in 2013, the plaintiffs' bar has crafted theories and "work arounds" to maintain or increase their chances of successfully securing certification orders. In 2017, their certification numbers were consistent with levels in the last several years.

Second, the defense-minded decisions in Wal-Mart and Comcast have not taken hold in any significant respect in the context of FLSA certification decisions for wage & hour cases. Efforts by the defense bar to use the commonality standards from Wal-Mart and the predominance analysis from Comcast have not impacted the ability of the plaintiffs' bar to secure first-stage conditional certification orders under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). If anything, the ruling two years ago in Tyson Foods has made certification prospects even easier for plaintiffs in the wage & hour space, insofar as conditional certification motions are concerned.

Third, while monetary relief in a Rule 23(b)(2) context is severely limited, certification is the "holy grail" in class action litigation, and certification of any type of class – even a non-monetary injunctive relief class claim – often drives settlement decisions. This is especially true for employment discrimination and ERISA class actions, as plaintiffs' lawyers can recover awards of attorneys' fees under fee-shifting statutes in an employment litigation context. In this respect, the plaintiffs' bar is nothing if not ingenuous, and targeted certification theories (e.g., issue certification on a limited discrete aspect of a case) are the new norm in federal and state courthouses.

Fourth, during the certification stage, courts are more willing than ever before to assess facts that overlap with both certification and merits issues, and to apply a more practical assessment of the Rule 23(b) requirement of predominance, which focuses on the utility and superiority of a preclusive class-wide trial of common issues. Courts are also more willing to apply a heightened degree of scrutiny to expert opinions offered to establish proof of the Rule 23 requirements.

In sum, notwithstanding these shifts in proof standards and the contours of judicial decision-making, the likelihood of class certification rulings favoring plaintiffs are not only "alive and well" in the post-Wal-Mart and post-Comcast era, but also thriving.

(iii) Governmental Enforcement Litigation Trends In 2017

On the governmental enforcement front, the change-over from the Obama Administration to the Trump Administration had little to no impact on reducing the pace of litigation filings and settlements in 2017. Both the EEOC and the DOL intensified the focus of their administrative enforcement activities and litigation filings in 2017. At the same time, the number of lawsuits filed and the resulting recoveries by settlement – measured by aggregate litigation filings and the top 10 settlements in government enforcement litigation – constituted a ten-fold increase as compared to what the EEOC and DOL achieved in 2016.

To the extent the Trump Administration aims to change those dynamics, its agency appointees either were not nominated in time to influence their respective agencies or were not put into place until mid to late 2017. The result was a delay in charges to agency policies and priorities. In this respect, fundamental changes to patterns in government enforcement litigation are more akin to changing the direction of a large sea-going cargo tanker than a small motor boat. Change is inevitable, but it takes time. Thus, the impact of change on governmental litigation enforcement trends is not likely to be felt until well into 2018.

As a result, the EEOC's lawsuit count increased geometrically in 2017. By continuing to follow through on the systemic enforcement and litigation strategy plan it announced in April of 2006 (that centers on the government bringing more systemic discrimination cases affecting large numbers of workers), the EEOC filed more cases as well as more systemic lawsuits. As 2017 demonstrated, the EEOC's prosecution of pattern or practice lawsuits remained an agency-wide priority backed up by the numbers. Many of the high-level investigations started in the last three years mushroomed into the institution of EEOC pattern or practice lawsuits in 2017.

By comparison to previous years, 2017 was a big one for the EEOC in terms of the number of lawsuits filed. Total merits filings were up more than 100% as compared to 2016. In fact, the EEOC filed more lawsuits in the month of September of 2017 than it did in all of the months of 2016 combined.

This past year also marked the first year of the EEOC's new Strategic Enforcement Plan ("SEP"), which is intended to guide enforcement activity for 2017 to 2021. Although the new SEP outlines the same six enforcement priorities as in prior years, few people familiar with how the agency pursues its objectives expect that the EEOC will continue to enforce those priorities in the same way under the Trump Administration. The six enforcement priorities include: (1) the elimination of systemic barriers in recruitment and hiring; (2) protection of immigrant, migrant, and other vulnerable workers; (3) addressing emerging and developing issues; (4) enforcing equal pay laws; (5) preserving access to the legal system; and (6) preventing harassment through systemic enforcement and targeted outreach.

Each of these priorities can be interpreted in multiple ways. For example, the EEOC has consistently focused on the protection of lesbians, gay men, bisexuals, and transgender people as one of the most important emerging and developing issues in the workplace. The EEOC's efforts in this area have resulted in a body of case law in many jurisdictions over the past several years that now holds that discrimination against transgender individuals, or on the basis of sexual orientation, is a form of sex discrimination prohibited by Title VII. However, the Department of Justice under President Trump has recently disagreed with that interpretation. This may signal that this is one area that will shift in 2018 as high-level personnel changes are made within the EEOC.

The EEOC also focused in the past year on employers' utilization of social media and the use of algorithms and information available on the internet to screen job applicants. Recent comments by the EEOC's staff indicate that this may be one of the "barriers to recruitment and hiring" that the agency will focus on in 2018 and beyond. Along the same lines, the EEOC has shown an increased willingness to bring ADEA lawsuits against employers – especially in the hospitality industry – that it believes are discriminating against hiring applicants aged 40 and over.

The EEOC also recently issued new guidance impacting two of its enforcement priorities, including preserving access to the legal system (i.e., through increased enforcement of the anti-retaliation provisions of Title VII, the ADA, and the ADEA) and preventing harassment in the workplace. Among other things, the retaliation guidance expands the definition of "adverse action" to include one-off incidents and warnings, as well as anything that reasonably could be likely to deter protected activity. With respect to preventing harassment, the new guidance clarifies the EEOC's thinking about what constitutes a hostile work environment and the defenses available to employers when that hostile work environment is the result of supervisors' misconduct. Although important developments in their own right, the real impact of these new guidelines may not be clear until employers see how they are interpreted by the EEOC in active litigation situations. Like the priorities themselves, that will be impacted by whatever new policies and directives are put in place by the new Trump appointees.

It also appears that the EEOC is finally executing on its oft-stated intention to increase enforcement under the Equal Pay Act ("EPA"). The EEOC filed 11 EPA lawsuits in 2017. This is a significant increase over prior years (six EPA lawsuits were filed in 2016, five in 2015, and two in 2014). However, its enforcement efforts in this area may have suffered a setback when the changes the EEOC planned to make to the EEO-1 reporting requirements were put on hold in 2017. It was widely speculated that the new reporting requirements would have assisted the EEOC in bringing more claims under the EPA. Under the leadership of the new Administration, the Office of Management and Budget, pursuant to its authority under the Paperwork Reduction Act, stayed implementation of the EEOC's new EEO-1 regulations this past year.

The Commission's 2017 Performance Accountability Report[8] announced that its systemic litigation program continues to be a focus for the EEOC. The EEOC labels a case "systemic" if it "has a broad impact on an industry, company, or geographic area." The EEOC's FY 2017 report[8] outlined the EEOC's activity from October 2, 2016 to September 30, 2017. It showed the following:

- The EEOC's field offices resolved 329 systemic investigations and collected $38.4 million in remedies (compared to 273 systemic investigations and $20.5 million in 2016). The figures for 2017 constitute significant increases over the previous year, and are near record amounts for monetary relief for systemic cases.
- The EEOC also issued cause determinations finding discrimination in 167 systemic investigations (compared to 113 in 2016). Consequently, not only did the EEOC resolve more systemic investigations compared to 2016, but also it made considerably more cause determinations that it converted into beefed-up recoveries for claimants compared to last year.
- The EEOC secured approximately $484 million in total relief in 2017 in litigation, mediations, and pre-litigation investigations. This tracks closely to last year's total relief figure of $482.1 million. It also includes $355.6 million obtained through mediation, conciliation, and settlement for victims of discrimination in private, state and local government, and federal workplaces. That number is marginally up from last year, which saw $347.9 million in such recoveries.

[8] The EEOC's 2017 Performance Accountability Report is at https://www.eeoc.gov/eeoc/plan/2017par.cfm.

- Litigation recoveries, on the other hand, have been steadily declining over the past few years, hitting only $42.4 million in 2017. This is markedly lower than 2016 and 2015, which saw the EEOC obtain $52.2 million and $65.3 million in litigation recoveries respectively.
- The EEOC filed 184 merits lawsuits in 2017. This is more than double the 86 merits lawsuits that were filed in 2016. Of the lawsuits, 124 were on behalf of individuals, 30 were non-systemic suits with multiple victims, and the other 30 were systemic claims. The EEOC also filed 18 subpoena enforcement actions in 2017. Hence, the EEOC in the first year of the Trump Administration was far more active in filing lawsuits than in the final year of the Obama Administration.
- In FY 2017, the EEOC resolved 99,109 charges, a marked increase over the past two years. As a result, the EEOC decreased its charge inventory by 16.2%, to 61,621 charges. This is the lowest level of charge inventory in 10 years and represents a significant reduction compared to FY 2016, when the EEOC only reduced its outstanding charges by 3.8%.

By comparison, the DOL's enforcement recoveries dwarfed those of the EEOC in 2017, as the DOL undertook aggressive enforcement activities over the past year and scored increases in settlements both in court actions and in the administrative investigation process. Without a full leadership team in place at the DOL's Wage & Hour Division ("WHD"), the enforcement program continued on the same track as it had been under the Obama Administration. In FY 2017, the WHD recovered more than $270 million in back pay wages for more than 240,000 workers, which represented a solid increase from the back wages recovered in the previous year. Given the Trump Administration's focus on policy changes, employers can expect that many of these enforcement strategies will get a closer look as the new DOL leadership team falls into place in 2018.

Over the past several years, the WHD fundamentally changed the way in which it pursues its investigations. Suffice to say, the investigations have been more searching and extensive, and often result in higher monetary penalties for employers. According to the DOL, since early 2009, the WHD has closed 200,000 cases nationwide, resulting in more than $2.2 billion in back wages for over 2.24 million workers. In FY 2017, the WHD collected more than $270 million in back wages. For much of the year, the DOL kept up its aggressive enforcement program, particularly in the hotel, restaurant, and retail industries. Much of the WHD's enforcement and other activities took place under the umbrella of "fissured industries" initiatives, which focus on industries with high usage of franchising, sub-contracting, and independent contractors. At the conclusion of those enforcement actions, the WHD continued to increase its use of civil money penalties, liquidated damages, and enhanced compliance agreements. As the Trump Administration reviews and considers the prior Administration's enforcement policies, we expect that 2018 is apt to bring a stark change in enforcement priorities and strategies.

The new year brought a new Administration and high expectations by employers for change at the WHD. Political reality and the Senate calendar, however, combined to limit the WHD's ability to implement that change. For most of 2017, only Secretary of Labor Alex Acosta and a single Assistant Secretary had been confirmed by the Senate. By year's end, the DOL Solicitor and several Assistant Secretaries had been confirmed; the critical position of the WHD Administrator remained vacant, as well as another dozen or so senior positions at the DOL. With the senior leadership team in place at the DOL by 2018, the agency is likely to make significant headway on the Trump Administration's policy objectives in the coming year.

Nevertheless, 2017 provided an opportunity for the new WHD to address some of its most pressing issues. The DOL was immediately tasked with defending the prior Administration's revisions to the Part 541 overtime exemption regulations, which had been enjoined in federal court in advance of their effective date in late 2016. Those revisions, which would have doubled the existing salary level required for the white-collar exemptions, substantially increased the minimum level required for the highly-compensated-employee exemption, and automatically increased the salary level on a periodic basis. These were the first changes to Part 541 in more than 10 years. However, those changes were ruled invalid on the basis that the salary level established in the regulation exceeded the Department's authority.

The Trump Administration managed to position itself well for future developments regarding the overtime regulations, defending the DOL's authority to set a salary level generally (which some believed had been called into question by the order declaring the Obama overtime rule invalid), while electing not to defend the specific salary level established in the 2016 regulation. It is likely that DOL will propose yet another change to the regulations in 2018.

The DOL also took the first steps in rolling back the prior Administration's view of what it means to be "employed" under the FLSA. In June of 2017, the DOL announced the withdrawal of the WHD Administrator's Interpretation 2015-1 ("AI"), which contained the WHD's analysis of the employee vs. independent contractor issue, and AI 2016-1, which contained the WHD's analysis of the joint employment issue. Both AIs were regarded as having an incredibly broad interpretation of what it means to have an employment relationship. Although no replacement guidance has yet been issued, the withdrawal of the AIs is seen as a signal that the current Administration does not take such an expansive view of what it means to be "employed" under the FLSA.

Around the same time as its withdrawal of the AIs, the DOL also announced the return to the use of opinion letters. After decades of use, these regulatory tools had been abandoned by the Obama Administration. The DOL's decision to restart its issuance of opinion letters allows employers and employees alike to seek formal guidance from the WHD on some of the most challenging wage & hour issues. No opinion letters have yet been issued, but it is clear that compliance assistance will once again be a valuable tool in the arsenal of the WHD, alongside its enforcement activities.

Not to be outdone, the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB") also undertook an ambitious agenda in 2017. It reconsidered well-settled NLRB principles on joint employer rules and representative elections, entertained the possibility of extending the protections of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") to college athletes, and litigated novel claims seeking to hold franchisors liable for the personnel decisions of franchisees. By the end of the year, however, the Trump Administration's appointees began to roll-back NLRB precedents and positions that had been espoused during the Obama Administration, such as a reversal of the expansive view of joint employer liability, allowing more deference to employer workplace rules, eliminating protections for obscene, vulgar, and highly inappropriate activity under the NLRA.

(iv) The Impact Of U.S. Supreme Court Rulings

Over the past decade, the U.S. Supreme Court – led by Chief Justice John Roberts – increasingly has shaped the contours of complex litigation exposures through its rulings on class action and governmental enforcement litigation issues. Many of these decisions have elucidated the requirements for pursuing employment-related class actions.

The 2011 decision in Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes and the 2013 decision in Comcast Corp. v. Behrend are the two most significant examples. Those rulings are at the core of class certification issues under Rule 23. To that end, federal and state courts cited Wal-Mart in 586 rulings in 2017; they cited Comcast in 238 cases in 2017.

The past year also saw a change in the composition of the Supreme Court in April of 2017, with Justice Neil Gorsuch assuming the seat of Antonin Scalia after his passing in 2016. Given the age of some of the other sitting Justices, President Trump may have the opportunity to fill additional seats on the Supreme Court in 2018 and beyond, and thereby influence a shift in the ideology of the Supreme Court toward a more conservative and strict constructionist jurisprudence. In turn, this is apt to change legal precedents that shape and define the playing field for workplace class action litigation.

Rulings In 2017

In terms of direct decisions by the Supreme Court impacting workplace class actions, this past year was no exception. In 2017, the Supreme Court decided seven cases – three employment-related cases and four class action cases – that will influence complex employment-related litigation in the coming years.

The employment-related rulings included one case brought under the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act, one ERISA case, and one EEOC case. A rough scorecard of the decisions reflects two distinct plaintiff/worker-side victories, and defense-oriented rulings in five cases.

- EEOC v. McLane Co.,* 137 S. Ct. 1159 (2017) – Decided on February 21, 2017, the case involved the applicable standard of appellate review of district court decisions to quash or enforce EEOC subpoenas. The Supreme Court held that the standard must be based on an abuse of discretion, and contrary lower court decisions – which called for de novo review – were rejected. The EEOC has broad statutory authority to issue subpoenas in the course of investigating charges of employment discrimination, and it may seek enforcement of its subpoenas in federal court when employers refuse to comply with them. In that event, the applicable test favors enforcement of the subpoena. The Supreme Court determined that if the charge is proper and the material requested is relevant, the subpoena should be enforced unless the employer can establish that the subpoena is too indefinite, has been issued for an illegitimate purpose, or is unduly burdensome. In sum, the Supreme Court underscored the breadth of the agency's authority to subpoena information from employers in the course of investigating discrimination charges.
- Expressions Hair Design, et al. v. Schneiderman*, 137 S. Ct. 1144 (2017) – Decided on March 29, 2017, this case involved a class action by a group of New York merchants, arguing that a New York statute that prohibits merchants from charging a surcharge to customers who use credit cards violated the First Amendment because it regulates what they say about their prices. The lower courts had dismissed the suit out of hand, concluding that price regulations regulated conduct alone and thus are immune from scrutiny under the First Amendment. The Supreme Court held that because the statute goes beyond the pure regulation of price sufficiently into the realm of regulating speech, it is subject to scrutiny under the First Amendment. As a result, the case was remanded for further consideration of the validity of the statute under the First Amendment. The ruling is a narrow one, but ensures the continuation of class action litigation over the New York statute.

- Advocate Health Care Network, et al. v. Stapleton*, 137 S. Ct. 1652 (2017) – Decided on June 5, 2017, this ruling determined that pension plans that otherwise meet the definition of a church plan definition under the ERISA can qualify for the exemption without being established by a church. The decision is the culmination of a wave of ERISA class actions brought by employees of religiously affiliated non-profit hospitals who asserted that the employers improperly claimed that their pension plans were ERISA-exempt "church plans."

- Microsoft Corp. v. Baker, et al.*, 137 S. Ct. 1702 (2017) – Decided on June 12, 2017, this ruling determined that the voluntary dismissal of individual claims by class representatives after denial of class certification deprives appellate courts of jurisdiction over review of the underlying class certification decision. The case involved consideration of a strategy for appealing denials of class certification whereby plaintiffs responded to a denial of class certification with a voluntary agreement to dismiss their claims. With that dismissal in hand, they would claim they have a final order that they can appeal, planning to revive their claims if the appeal reversed the certification order. The Supreme Court unanimously rejected this practice. It held that plaintiffs in putative class actions cannot transform a tentative interlocutory order into a final judgment simply by dismissing their claims with prejudice – subject, no less, to the right to revive those claims if the denial of class certification was reversed on appeal. The ruling should help corporate defendants in defeating piece-meal attacks on favorable class certification orders.

- Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., et al. v. Superior Court Of California*, 137 S. Ct. 1773 (2017) – Decided on June 19, 2017, this opinion established limitations on personal jurisdiction over non-resident plaintiffs in "mass actions," a litigation strategy often utilized by plaintiffs' class action lawyers to sue corporations in plaintiff-friendly jurisdictions that have little to no connection with the dispute. The Supreme Court determined that the requisite connection between the corporate defendant and the litigation forum must be based on more than a combination of the company's connections with the state and the similarity of the claims of the resident plaintiffs and the non-resident claimants. The ruling reversed a lower court decision that hundreds of plaintiffs who sued a corporation in California state court over alleged injuries associated with a corporation's product could not sue in that state because they were not residents. In effect, it reversed a decision of the California Supreme Court and directed the dismissal of 592 non-California claims from 33 other states. The ruling has significant implications for the location and scope of class action litigation. As a result, the ruling supports the view that plaintiffs cannot simply "forum shop" in large class actions, and instead must sue where the corporate defendant has significant contacts for purposes of general jurisdiction or limit the class definition to residents of the state where the lawsuit is filed. It should provide some measure of protection to corporations that often are hauled into plaintiff-friendly jurisdictions across the country to which they have nor the plaintiffs suing them had any connection.

- CalPERS, et al. v. ANZ Securities, Inc., 137 S. Ct. 2042 (2017) – Decided on June 26, 2017, this decision involved a relatively technical question regarding the right to opt-out of a class action – when plaintiffs file a class action, are members of the class entitled to opt-out and represent themselves, and how statutes of limitations work in that situation. Federal securities laws include two different kinds of filing deadlines for claims about misrepresentations in connection with the issuance of securities, including a one-year deadline running from the discovery of the untrue statement and an outside three-year deadline running from the date on which the statement was made. The Supreme Court held that tolling under American Pipe applies only to the one-year deadline, not the three-year deadline. Applying that rule, it barred the action brought in this case by CalPERS, which had opted-out of a large class action brought against Lehman Brothers; the original action was brought in a timely manner, but CalPERS did not opt-out of that action until more than three years after the challenged statements. The ruling closes off a tactic of successive class claims by barring the traditional power of lower federal courts to modify statutory time limits in the name of equity despite any practical obstacles this creates in class actions.

- Czyzewski, et al. v. Jevic Holding Co., 137 S. Ct. 973 (2017) – Decided on March 22, 2017, this case involved the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification ("WARN") Act and the interplay between worker rights under that statute and the rights of creditors in bankruptcy proceedings after a company allegedly violates the WARN Act. In considering whether priority in distributing assets in bankruptcy may proceed in a manner that allegedly violates the priority scheme in the Bankruptcy Code, the Supreme Court held that such a distribution is improper and priority rules may not be evaded in Chapter 11 structured dismissals. The Supreme Court's ruling protects workers with WARN claims and bars priority deviations in bankruptcies implemented through non-consensual structured dismissals.

The decisions in Advocate Health Care Network, Baker, Bristol-Myers, CalPERS, Expressions Hair Designs, Jevic, and McLane Co. are sure to shape and influence workplace class action litigation and government enforcement litigation in a profound manner. Theses rulings will impact standing concepts and jurisdictional challenges, liability under the WARN and the ERISA, appeals of class certification decisions, challenges to EEOC administrative subpoenas, and rules on American Pipe tolling and application of statute of limitations in class actions. To the extent that extrinsic restrictions on class actions – i.e., limits on the ability of representative plaintiffs to appeal certification orders (as in Baker), and jurisdictional restrictions on bringing cases in "plaintiff-friendly" jurisdictions (as in Bristol-Myers) – were tightened, class actions will become harder to maintain and litigate. On the other hand, McLane Co. is certainly a setback for employers and strengthens the EEOC's ability to conduct wide-ranging administrative investigations through its subpoena power.

Rulings Expected In 2018

Equally important for the coming year, the Supreme Court accepted five additional cases for review in 2017 – that will be decided in 2018 – that also will impact and shape class action litigation and government enforcement lawsuits faced by employers.

Those cases include three employment lawsuits and two class action cases. The Supreme Court undertook oral arguments on two of these cases in 2017; the other three will have oral arguments in 2018.

The corporate defendants in each case have sought rulings seeking to limit the use of class actions or raise substantive defenses to class actions or employment-related claims. Further complicating several of these cases, government agencies have either taken opposing stances with each other or reversed positions they held in pervious Supreme Court terms or in the lower court proceedings in these cases.

- Epic Systems Corp. v. Lewis, NLRB v. Murphy Oil USA & Ernst & Young LLP v. Morris,* Nos. 16-285, 16-300 & 16-307 – Argued on October 2, 2017, these three consolidated appeals in employment cases deal with the interpretation of workplace arbitration agreements between employers and employees and whether class action waivers within such agreements – which require workers to arbitrate any claims on an individual basis (and waive the ability to bring or participate in a class action or collective action) – violate employees' rights under the National Labor Relations Act to engage in "concerted activities" in pursuit. The Supreme Court's ultimate decision is likely to have far-reaching implications for litigation of class actions and collective actions. The issue started when the NLRB under the Obama Administration began challenging employers' use of arbitration agreements with class action waivers. During briefing of the issue before the Supreme Court, The Department of Justice under President Trump opposed the NLRB's position, and has sided with employers and argued that the Federal Arbitration Act favors the validity and enforcement of arbitration agreements that include class waivers.
- Cyan, Inc., et al. v. Beaver County Employees Retirement Fund,* No. 15-1439 – Argued on November 28, 2017, this class action case poses the issue of whether federal law bars state courts from hearing certain securities class actions. The case turns on interpretation of the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995 – which imposes tougher standards on securities class actions brought in federal courts – and if it mandates that state courts can no longer hear class actions based on the Securities Act of 1933. The ultimate ruling by the Supreme Court will impact what many view as a "cottage industry" of state court-based class action filings in states such as California where class action lawyers target public companies with securities claims over drops in stock process.
- Encino Motors, LLC v. Navarro, et al.,* No. 16-1362 – In this case, the Supreme Court will examine whether service advisors at car dealerships are exempt under 29 U.S.C. § 213(b)(10)(A) from the overtime pay provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The future ruling in the case may have far-reaching implications on the legal tests for interpretation of statutory exemptions under the FLSA. A broader reading of the exemption potentially could reduce the number of workers allowed to assert wage & hour claims against their employers. The case is set for argument on January 17, 2018.
- Janus, et al. v. AFSCME,* No. 16-1466 – In this employment case, the Supreme Court will consider whether Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977), should be overruled and public-sector "agency shop" arrangements invalidated under the First Amendment so as to prevent public-sector unions from collecting mandatory fees from non-members. In deciding the constitutionality of "fair share fees" being imposed on public-sector employees as a condition of employment, the Supreme Court's future ruling likely will impact millions of workers in 22 states that do not have right-to-work laws. Since many workers are apt to cease paying union dues if the fair share fee payments requirement is abolished, the future ruling will have a significant impact on the ability of public-sector unions to conduct their business. The case is set for oral argument on February 26, 2018.
- Resh, et al. v. China Agritech, Inc.,* No. 17-432 – In this class action case, the Supreme Court will examine whether the tolling rule for class actions established in American Pipe & Construction Co. v. Utah, 414 U.S. 538 (1974), tolls the statute of limitations to permit a previously absent class member to bring a subsequent class action outside the applicable limitations period. In American Pipe, the Supreme Court held that the filing of a class action tolls the running of the statute of limitations for all putative members of the class who make timely motions to intervene after the lawsuit is deemed inappropriate for class action status. In essence, a future ruling in this case will limit or expand the tolling rule in American Pipe to apply only to subsequent individual claims or if it is expanded broadly to successive class actions where plaintiffs were unnamed class members in failed class actions. The case has yet to be set for oral argument.

The Supreme Court is expected to issue decisions in these five cases in 2018.

Each decision may have significant implications for employers and for the defense of high-stakes class action litigation. Further, the decision in Epic Systems / E & Y / Murphy Oil may well end up being one of the most significant rulings for employers since Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes in 2011.

D. Complex Employment-Related Litigation Trends In 2017

While shareholder and securities class action filings witnessed an increase in 2017, employment-related class action filings remained relatively stable and aligned with case filing numbers of previous years.

By the numbers, filings for employment discrimination and ERISA claims were slightly higher over the past year, while the volume of wage & hour lawsuits decreased for only the second time in over two decades.

By the close of the year, ERISA lawsuits totaled 6,727 filings (up slightly as compared to 6,530 in 2016 and down slightly as compared to 6,925 in 2015), FLSA lawsuits totaled 7,575 filings (down considerably as compared to 8,308 in 2016 and 8,954 in 2015), and employment discrimination lawsuits totaled 12,040 filings (an increase from 11,593 in 2016 and an increase from 11,500 in 2015).

In terms of employment discrimination cases, however, the potential exists for a significant jump in case filings in the coming year. Workplace harassment issues dominated the news cycles in the fourth quarter of 2017, as the #MeToo movement squarely place sex harassment litigation in the national debate. Inevitably, litigation filings will increase over the next year as a result of this focus.

By the numbers, FLSA collective action litigation filings in 2017 far outpaced other types of employment-related class action filings; virtually all FLSA lawsuits are filed and litigated as collective actions. Up until 2015, lawsuit filings reflected year-after-year increases in the volume of wage & hour litigation pursued in federal courts since 2000; statistically, wage & hour filings have increased by over 450% in the last 15 years.

The fact of the second annual decrease in FLSA lawsuit filings in 17 years is noteworthy in and of itself. However, a peek behind these numbers confirms that with 7,575 lawsuit filings, 2017 was the sixth highest year ever in the filing of such cases (only eclipsed by levels in 2012, 2013, 2014, 2015, and 2016). When viewed on a continuum, the current volume of wage & hour cases within the “pipeline” in the federal courts is as large and vast as ever.

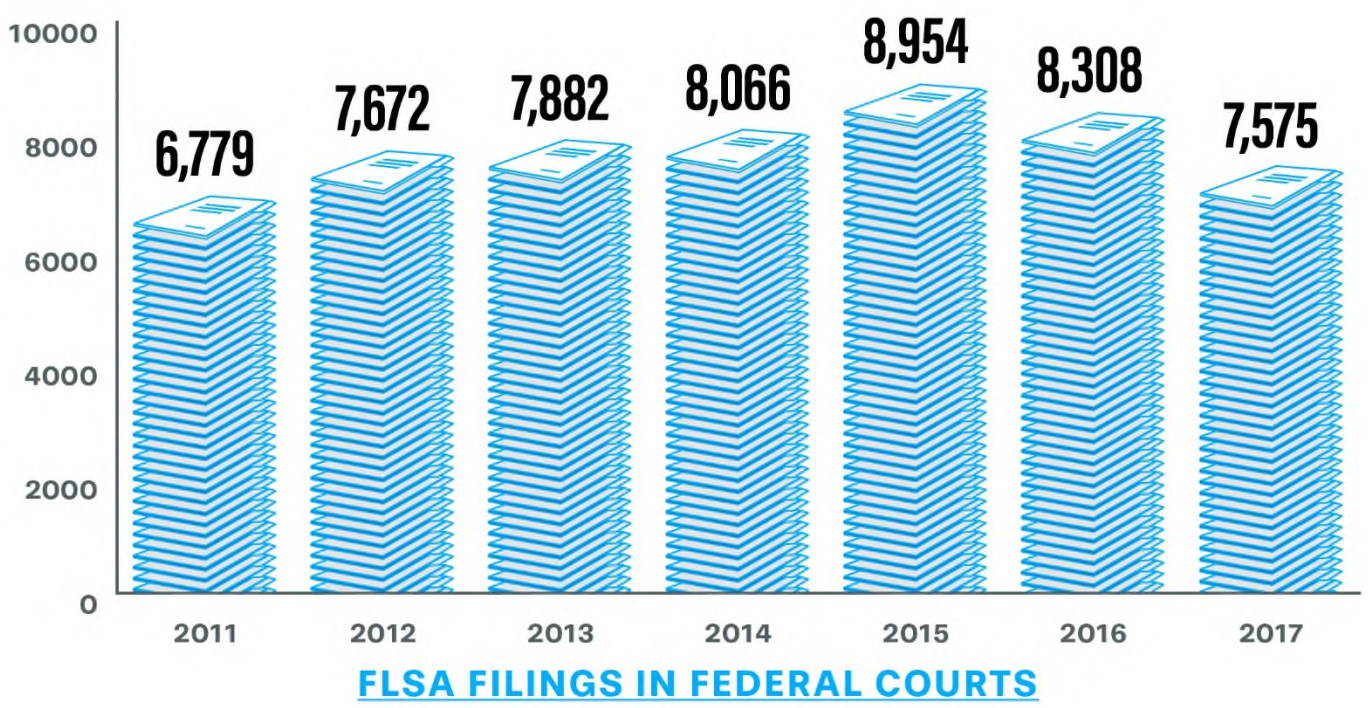
Given this trend, employers may well see a record-breaking increase in the number of FLSA filings in 2018. Various factors are contributing to the fueling of these lawsuits, including: (i) minimum wage hikes in 21 states and 22 major cities that took effect in 2017; (ii) the intense focus on independent contractor classification and joint employer status, especially in the franchisor-franchisee context; and (iii) a decrease in expected filings by the DOL in 2018, which is apt to fuel filings by the private plaintiffs’ bar.

Layered on top of those issues is the difficulty of applying a New Deal piece of legislation to the realities of the digital workplace that no lawmakers could have contemplated in 1938.

The compromises that led to the passage of the legislation in the New Deal mean that ambiguities, omitted terms, and unanswered questions abound under the FLSA (something as basic as the definition of the word “work” does not exist in the statute), and the plaintiffs’ bar is suing over those issues at a record pace.

Virtually all FLSA lawsuits are filed as collective actions; therefore, these filings represent the most significant exposure to employers in terms of any workplace laws. By industry, retail and hospitality companies experienced a deluge of wage & hour class actions in 2017.

This trend is illustrated by the following chart:



The story behind these numbers is indicative of how the plaintiffs' class action bar chooses cases to litigate. It has a diminished appetite to invest in long-term cases that are fought for years, and where the chance of a plaintiffs' victory is fraught with challenges either as to certification or on the merits. Hence, this reflects the various differences in success factors in bringing employment discrimination and ERISA class actions, as compared to FLSA collective actions.

An increasing phenomenon in the growth of wage & hour litigation is worker awareness. Wage & hour laws are usually the domain of specialists, but in 2017 wage & hour issues made front-page news. The widespread public attention as to how employees are paid almost certainly contributed to the sheer number of suits. Big verdicts and record settlements also played a part, as success typically begets copy-cats and litigation is no exception. Yet, the pervasive influence of technology is also helping to fuel this litigation trend. Technology has opened the doors for unprecedented levels of marketing and advertising by the plaintiffs' bar – either through direct soliciting of putative class members or in advancing the overall cause of lawsuits. Social media also allows for the virtual commercialization of wage & hour cases through the internet and digital technology.

Against this backdrop, wage & hour class actions filed in state court also represented an increasingly important part of this trend. Most pronounced in this respect were filings in the state courts of California, Florida, Illinois, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania. In particular, California continued its status in 2017 as a breeding ground for wage & hour class action litigation due to laxer class certification standards under state law, exceedingly generous damages remedies for workers, and more plaintiff-friendly approaches to class certification as well as wage & hour issues under the California Labor Code. For the fourth year out of the last five, the American Tort Reform Association ("ATRA") selected California as one of the nation's worst "judicial hellholes" as measured by the systematic application of laws and court procedures in an unfair and unbalanced manner.[9] Calling California one of the worst of the worst jurisdictions, the ATRA described the Golden State as

indeed that for plaintiffs' lawyers seeking riches and the expense of employers and where "lawmakers, prosecutors, and judges have long aided and abetted this massive redistribution of wealth." [10]

E. Likely Trends For The Future Of Workplace Class Actions In 2018

The developing trends in workplace class action litigation are continuing to evolve, morph, and adjust to the modern realities of the American workplace. These trends require corporate counsel to plan and re-order their compliance strategies to stay ahead of and mitigate these risks and exposures.

So, what can corporate counsel expect in 2018?

Based on these evolving trends, we anticipate significant developments in the coming year relative to certification rulings in employment discrimination and ERISA class actions; less aggressive governmental enforcement litigation prosecutions; and continuing growth in wage & hour litigation, either in courtrooms or in arbitrations.

ERISA Litigation –

This year's ERISA class action litigation space saw two primary trends. First, the U.S. Supreme Court issued a significant decision relating to the parameters of what is known as the "church plan" exemption to the ERISA, and unanimously held in Advocate Health Network v. Stapleton, 137 S. Ct. 1652 (2017), that a pension benefits plan need not be established by a church to qualify as a church plan exempt from the ERISA's funding and other rules. Although the decision settled one of the major questions in church plan litigation, a second wave of these cases may be starting as the plaintiffs' action bar attempts to challenge the religious bona fides of these principal purpose organizations.

Second, the plaintiffs' class action bar filed an influx of new 401(k) and 403(b) fee and investment lawsuits against various employers, with a particular concentration on institutions of higher education. In particular, the university ERISA lawsuits challenge the design model of their 403 (b) retirement plans, and the payment of allegedly excessive fees for record-keeping and administrative services. Many of the cases remain active and rulings are expected throughout 2018 on these issues.

The last 12 months also saw an uptick in ERISA class action filings, and while there were relatively few class certification rulings this year, we expect their number to increase next year as the cases work though the system. However, that trend may be mitigated to some extent by a trend among defendants to stipulate to class certification – a by-product of the greater ease of obtaining class certification in ERISA cases than in other types of workplace class actions. Given the long odds, employers now seem more willing to consider stipulating to narrowed and more focused classes to avoid the cost of litigating certification issues.

Given the volume of ERISA class action filings in 2017, corporate counsel can also expect to see further litigation regarding the reasonableness of 401(k) and 403(b) plan fees and expenses in the numerous class action lawsuits pending around the country on these issues. Further, courts are likely to continue to grapple with the complicated and intertwined issues relating to who has standing to bring claims under the ERISA and when those claims accrue, following the Supreme Court's decision in Spokeo v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540 (2016).

In addition, corporate counsel can except to see the following developments:

- In the health and welfare space, plan sponsors can expect some potential additional confusion if Congress and the Trump Administration take up the repeal of the Affordable Care Act. As many plan

[10] Id. at 1. The "eight worst" jurisdictions in 2017 according to the ATRA report were: (1) Florida, (2) California, (3) Missouri (and, in particular, St. Louis), (4) New York (and, in particular, New York City), (5) Pennsylvania (and, in particular, Philadelphia), (6) New Jersey, (7) Illinois (and, in particular, Cook and Madison Counties), and (8) Louisiana.

sponsors know, employers have spent the last few years preparing for and then implementing the Affordable Care Act. The potential changes again to health coverage may cause some confusion amongst plan participants, which in turn could lead to an increase in class action litigation if the participants remain unsure about their applicable coverage for various benefits. In this same vein, one can expect that the surge in class actions regarding coverage by out-of-network providers will continue. As many plan sponsors experienced last year, various network providers have challenged the reimbursement rates from insurers and plans, thus dragging both administrators and plans into numerous litigation matters. Given the uncertainty in the future of the Affordable Care Act and the continuing disputes between insurers and out-of-network providers, it is anticipated that this variety of class action litigation will increase in the coming year.

- Further, a fight in the courts is expected regarding the DOL's recently issued final regulations on disability plan administration. These regulations dramatically change the landscape for the handling of disability claims through the frequently offered long-term disability benefits. These regulations are apt to be challenged in the courts given their sweeping and onerous changes. As a result, it is possible that these regulations will never see the light of day. Insurers and plan sponsors need to watch the litigation and its potential results closely. However, if the regulations do go into effect in 2018, as currently contemplated, plan administrators will need to closely examine them to ensure compliance. Additionally, the implementation of these regulations could spur class action lawsuits and DOL enforcement actions if they are not handled appropriately on a plan basis.

Employment Discrimination Class Action Litigation –

Both in terms of private plaintiff employment discrimination class action litigation, employers can expect this area to remain an intense focus in 2018 by the private plaintiffs' bar.

On the employment discrimination front, corporate counsel can expect to see the following developments:

- The plaintiffs' bar will continue the process of refining the architecture of employment discrimination class actions to increase their chances to secure class certification in the post Wal-Mart and Comcast era. Their focus is likely to be on smaller class cases (e.g., confined to a single corporate facility or operations in one state) as opposed to nationwide, mega-class action cases, as well as cases confined to a discrete practice – such as a hiring screen (e.g., a criminal background check) – that impacts all workers in a similar fashion.
- Given the Supreme Court's plaintiff-friendly ruling in 2016 in Tyson Foods, employers can expect more aggressive positions being advocated by plaintiffs' class action lawyers to "end run" Wal-Mart and Comcast, especially on damages theories under Rule 23(b)(3).
- In terms of certification theories, the plaintiffs' bar is apt to pursue hybrid or parallel class certification theories where injunctive relief is sought under Rule 23(b)(2) and monetary relief is sought under Rule 23(b)(3), as well as a range of partial "issues certification" theories under Rule 23(c)(4). The take-away from this strategy is an effort to "aim small" in order to certify a piece of the litigation, and use fee-shifting statutes on attorneys' fees to pressure employers into class-wide settlements.
- Plaintiffs are also likely to pursue certification of liability-only classes, while deferring damages issues and determinations, and pressuring employers to settle due to the transaction costs of individualized mini-trials on damages. In effect, this tactic is another end-run around the limitations on Rule 23(b)(3) articulated in Comcast.

Government Enforcement Litigation –

In 2018, employers can expect changes based on the Trump Administration's business-friendly priorities. Employers also can anticipate less aggressive enforcement of employment-related laws and regulations by the EEOC, the DOL, and the NLRB.

The EEOC's FY 2017-2021 Strategic Enforcement Plan: In FY 2017, the EEOC created and announced a new Strategic Enforcement Plan ("SEP") to guide its enforcement mission through fiscal years 2017 through 2021. The new SEP establishes the same six enforcement priorities as the previous version of the SEP, including: (i) elimination of systemic barriers in recruitment and hiring; (ii) protection of immigrant, migrant, and other vulnerable workers; (iii) addressing emerging and developing issues; (iv) enforcing equal pay laws; (v) preserving access to the legal system; and (vi) preventing harassment through systemic enforcement and targeted outreach. Those enforcement priorities have proved to be a reliable guide to how the EEOC pursues its enforcement agenda.

The new SEP added two substantive areas of focus to its "developing and emerging issues" priority list. During the next four years, the EEOC has said that it will focus on "complex" employment relationships, including clarifying the employment relationship and the application of workplace civil rights protections in light of the increasing complexity of employment relationships and structures, including temporary workers, staffing agencies, independent contractor relationships, and the on-demand economy. The EEOC has also identified "backlash discrimination" as a new area of focus, meaning discrimination against those who are Muslim or Sikh, or persons of Arab, Middle Eastern, or South Asian descent, as well as persons perceived to be members of these groups, that might arise against them as a result of current events affecting the Muslim world. Given the EEOC's track record of making good on its word, employers would be well advised to pay attention to these issues.

The EEOC's Continued Focus On LGBT Discrimination: Over the past few years, the EEOC has expended significant litigation resources advocating for the protection of LGBT rights under the existing anti-discrimination laws. It has done this through multiple avenues, including using its own administrative rule-making and quasi-judicial powers to decree that transgender discrimination is a form of sex discrimination because it is tantamount to discrimination on the basis of a perceived failure to adhere to stereotypical gender norms. The EEOC is now using the same tactics to try to establish that Title VII prohibits discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. The key issue for the future is whether the new leadership of the EEOC appointed by President Trump will view these LGBT issues as part of the EEOC's enforcement agenda.

Potential Changes Brought By The Trump Administration: The biggest political development that will shape the EEOC's agenda in the coming years is the agenda of the Trump Administration. While there is considerable administrative "inertia" behind the EEOC's current agenda, these political changes are likely to have a profound impact on how the EEOC pursues its mission. In particular, the EEOC's increased focus on the strategic use of large, high-impact "systemic" cases to push forward its strategic goals has come under withering criticism by Republican members of Congress. These types of cases can have a significant impact because they tend to affect a larger number of employees and employers, but also they have often come with overly aggressive litigation positions with respect to the EEOC's "latest and greatest" theories of discrimination. Given the intense focus on this area, this may be one aspect of the EEOC's enforcement agenda that becomes an early target of the Trump Administration.

- Had candidate Hillary Clinton won the White House in the November 2016 elections, most believe that the EEOC, the DOL, and the NLRB would have continued to "push the legal envelope" on joint employer, franchisor/franchisee, and the propriety of arbitration/class waiver issues. With the election of President Trump, the future direction of these initiatives is less clear. The new Administration may well pivot on these positions, which in turn will cause a change in the landscape of workplace class action and governmental enforcement litigation.
- While the WHD is posed to continue its focus on what it calls "fissured" industries, including restaurants, hotels, construction, janitorial services, healthcare, home healthcare, grocery, and retail, the DOL is likely to change course on those policies. In its investigations, an increasing number of which appear to have been coordinated at higher levels of the agency, the WHD had been using its full assortment of enforcement tools, including the assessment of liquidated damages and civil money penalties, investigations spanning the three-year period for willful violations, and the use of media to influence the behavior of employers. Maintenance or a lessening of these litigation strategies remains to be seen in 2018.

- With the pro-business priorities of the Trump Administration, federal workplace agencies are certainly expected to be more employer-friendly. Efforts are likely to shift away from punitive enforcement measures and aggressive enforcement litigation toward a more comprehensive strategy of achieving compliance, including employer outreach, education, and other cooperative opportunities.
- Finally, should government enforcement litigation decrease substantially at the federal level due to changes directed by the Trump Administration, employers should brace for the private plaintiffs' bar and States' Attorney General offices to "fill the void" to champion employment discrimination litigation.

Wage & Hour Class Action Litigation –

Despite the slight decrease of FLSA lawsuit filings in the last 12 months, it is expected that the number of wage & hour claims will continue to rise. We expect the needle to point upwards on that issue in 2018.

- News and other commentary regarding the proposed revision to the FLSA overtime exemption regulations that were to become effective on December 1, 2016, attracted the attention of employees and lawyers who represent them. Historically, when the FLSA and related wage & hour laws have received active media attention, the number of lawsuits filed under those laws has spiked.
- Legislatures and government agencies in various states also have revised or are actively planning to revise laws and rules governing how businesses pay employees, including minimum wage hikes. A focus on enacting or strengthening "wage theft" laws is in vogue at the state and local level.
- Regardless of the increased activity that could be linked to the new regulations and their demise, workers' lawyers have continued to focus on cases challenging the classification status of employees in "gray area" jobs that are more likely to call into question amounts of time spent on exempt and non-exempt activities.
- They have also focused on more sophisticated claims involving questions of whether overtime rates were properly determined, bonus calculations, and amounts of time allegedly spent off-the-clock before and after shifts and during meal breaks.
- Likewise, developments in litigation challenging co-defendants – whether franchisees and franchisors or parents and subsidiaries – as joint employers will continue to inspire litigation motivated in part by the view that many business relationships create joint liability for the wage & hour violations of affecting employees of only one party to that relationship.

Plaintiffs' wage & hour lawyers increasingly share the WHD's past focus on challenging the use of independent contractors. This trend may be intensified by several large settlements in 2017 involving this issue, including FedEx's class action settlement of $227 million to delivery drivers who claimed that their classification as independent contractors was improper. As success by the plaintiffs' class action bar often serves to encourage "copy-cat" lawsuits, employers are apt to see an increase in private party class actions in this context, especially given that the top wage & hour settlements over the past two years were in excess of $1.2 billion.

Workplace Arbitration – Perhaps the most important workplace class action development for 2018 – which could affect all different kinds of class and collective actions – will be one that could allow employers to prevent workplace class actions from being asserted in the first place. Early in 2018, the U.S. Supreme Court is expected to issue a ruling in three cases that were consolidated for hearing – Epic Systems Corp. v. Lewis, Ernst & Young LLP v. Morris, and NLRB v. Murphy Oil – arising out the Seventh, Ninth, and Fifth Circuits, respectively. The issue in the three cases is whether an agreement that requires an employer and employee to resolve employment-related disputes through individual arbitration, and waive class and collective proceedings, is enforceable under the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"), notwithstanding the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"). The case was heard by the Supreme Court in the first argument of the first day of the 2017/2018 year's term and should resolve a circuit split on whether filing a purported class or collective action asserting a violation of an employment statute constitutes protected concerted activity within the meaning of § 7 of the NLRA, whether agreeing with employees to waive their ability to bring such class or collective actions violates § 8 of the NLRA, and, even if so, whether the FAA mandates enforcement of an arbitration agreement containing a class waiver.

Given the breadth of the NLRA – it covers most employees, with the most significant exclusions being for independent contractors and supervisors – a ruling in favor of the employees would render unenforceable the vast majority of arbitration agreements containing class waivers, thus causing corporate counsel for those companies currently using class waivers to prepare for a substantive defense of purported class and collective action and to reconsider whether to maintain an arbitration program.

Yet, at the same time, a ruling by the Supreme Court in favor of the employers could radically reshape the landscape of workplace class actions because the argument that the NLRA precludes enforcement of a class waiver is seemingly the last remaining impediment against enforcement of arbitration agreements containing class waivers. If that argument is rejected, the vast majority of employers would be able to implement arbitration programs to resolve disputes bilaterally and without resort to class or collective proceedings (other than as to certain transportation employees, who are excluded from the FAA's coverage), so long as the arbitration program is properly drafted and implemented. The extent to which employers would enact arbitration programs remains to be seen, but at a minimum, all employers would have to at least consider in 2018 whether to adopt arbitration agreements with class waivers and weigh the pros and cons of them as applied to their company's circumstances.

Considering the Supreme Court's current composition, the history of the rulings in other FAA cases, and the course of questioning from the oral argument on October 2, 2017, employers have reason to be cautiously optimistic that they will be have the option to agree to resolve employment disputes on a bilateral basis, and without resort to class or collective actions.

Certification Standards & Developments – The standards for certifying a class action under Rule 23, and for permitting employees to opt-in to would-be collective actions, remain important battlegrounds. Employers have enjoyed increasing success in preventing certification or moving for decertification, but plaintiffs' counsel have responded by seeking certification of class actions as to specific issues, and by attempting – sometimes successfully – to expand the applicability of Rule 23(c)(4). When a class action or collective action has been decertified, some plaintiffs' counsel – hoping to replicate the settlement pressure of a class or collective action – have filed individual wage & hour suits by many of the employees who were class or collective action members. The strategy appears to be to "win" a single plaintiff case and then seek multiple settlements on behalf of other individual plaintiffs. Some plaintiffs' counsel have stated that their initial class action was filed primarily to obtain discovery and a class list of contact information, so that they can locate multiple individual plaintiffs for multiple individual lawsuits. Employer strategies to counter these efforts were sometimes successful in 2017, but plaintiffs' counsel are likely to continue to modify this tactic going forward, especially if arbitration defenses become more widespread in the wake of the future Supreme Court ruling in Epic Systems Corp. v. Lewis, Ernst & Young LLP v. Morris, and NLRB v. Murphy Oil.

F. Conclusion

The one constant in workplace class action litigation is change. More than any other year in recent memory, 2017 was a year of great change in the landscape of Rule 23. As these issues play out in 2018, additional chapters in the class action playbook will be written.

The lesson to draw from 2017 is that the private plaintiffs' bar and government enforcement attorneys at the state level are apt to be equally, if not more, aggressive in 2018 in bringing class action and collective action litigation against employers.

These novel challenges demand a shift of thinking in the way companies formulate their strategies. As class actions and collective actions are a pervasive aspect of litigation in Corporate America, defending and defeating this type of litigation is a top priority for corporate counsel. Identifying, addressing, and remediating class action vulnerabilities, therefore, deserves a place at the top of corporate counsel's priorities list for 2018.

II. Significant Class Action Settlements In 2017

While 2016 was a blockbuster year for class action settlement recoveries, overall settlement figures sharply increased in nearly all categories in 2017. The plaintiffs' bar and government enforcement attorneys obtained many significant settlements in a wide range of areas. The "top ten" settlement values in 2017 in workplace class actions were significantly higher than those from 2016. Other than wage & hour class action settlements, which saw a slight drop-off in settlement amounts in 2017, areas such as employment discrimination class actions, ERISA class actions, governmental enforcement lawsuits, and other workplace statutory class actions saw bigger settlement amounts than in past years.

This Chapter evaluates the top ten private plaintiff-initiated monetary settlements, government-initiated monetary settlements, and noteworthy injunctive relief provisions in class action settlements.

A. Top Ten Private Plaintiff-Initiated Monetary Settlements

Plaintiffs' lawyers and governmental enforcement attorneys secured many large settlements in 2017 for employment discrimination, wage & hour, and ERISA class actions, as well as governmental enforcement lawsuits. The top ten settlements from these categories totaled $2.23 billion in 2017. This represented a significant jump as compared to both 2016 and 2015, when the top ten settlements from these categories totaled $1.67 billion and $1.58 billion, respectively.

As the plaintiffs' bar has aggressively pursued various statutory workplace class actions, the Workplace Class Action Report has recently expanded Chapter 2 to include this category, which encompasses workplace antitrust laws, the Fair Credit Reporting Act, and other various workplace-related statutory laws. The top ten settlements in this category saw a sharp four-fold increase over the past year, totaling $487.28 million in 2017 as opposed to $114.7 million in 2016.

In sum, based on all categories, the top ten aggregate settlement numbers in 2017 increased to $2.72 billion, a significant climb when compared with $1.75 billion in 2016.

Settlements In Private Plaintiff Employment Discrimination Class Action Lawsuits

For employment discrimination class actions, the monetary value of the top ten private plaintiff settlements entered into or paid in 2017 totaled $293.5 million. This represents nearly a four-fold increase from 2016, where the total was $79.81 million.

1. $90 million – Twenty-First Century Fox, Inc.
2. $45 million – Family Dollar Stores, Inc.
3. $35.5 million – Wells Fargo Advisors, LLC
4. $32.5 million – Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.
5. $24 million – U.S. Department Of Homeland Security
6. $20 million – U.S. Department Of Justice
7. $19.5 million – Qualcomm Inc.
8. $13 million – State Of Washington
9. $7.5 million – Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.
10. $6.5 million – Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority

The biggest settlements in 2017 involved pay and promotions class actions. By category, there were five gender discrimination class actions, four race discrimination class actions, and one veterans discrimination class action.

1. $90 million – City Of Monroe Employees' Retirement System, et al. v. Twenty-First Century Fox Inc., Case No. 2017-833 (Del. Ch. Nov. 20, 2017) (request for settlement approval of claims stemming from workplace sexual harassment incidents and gender discrimination allegations at Fox News).

2. $45 million – Scott, et al. v. Family Dollar Stores, Inc., Case No. 08-CV-540 (W.D.N.C. Nov. 14, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement of gender discrimination claims involving female store managers who alleged discrimination with respect to their pay).

3. $35.5 million – Slaughter, et al. v. Wells Fargo Advisors, LLC, Case No. 13-CV-6368 (N.D. Ill. May 4, 2017) (final approval granted for a class action settlement of race discrimination claims involving a group of financial advisers and trainees who alleged the bank limited pay and advancement opportunities for African-American employees).

4. $32.5 million – Creighton, et al. v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., Case No. 15-CV-8321 (S.D.N.Y. June 27, 2017) (final approval granted for a class action settlement for race discrimination claims involving African-American financial services representatives alleging that the company provided very few chances to work with colleagues, which restricted their training opportunities and precluded them from getting favorable accounts).

5. $24 million – Moore, et al. v. U.S. Department Of Homeland Security, Case No. 00-CV-953 (D.D.C. May 3, 2017) (final approval granted for a race discrimination class action brought by a group of African-American Secret Service agents who alleged they were denied promotions for the highest ranks in the agency).

6. $20 million – White, et al. v. Department Of Justice, Case No. 510-2012-77 (EEOC Jan. 17, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement involving current and former female prison workers who alleged they were assigned to work in areas of the prison where they were forced to experience sexual harassment from inmates).

7. $19.5 million – Pan, et al. v. Qualcomm Inc., Case No. 16-CV-1885 (S.D. Cal. July 31, 2017) (final approval granted for a gender discrimination class action settlement involving 3,300 current and former female employees who claimed they were not paid and promoted on the same scale as men).

8. $13 million – Martin, et al. v. State Of Washington, Case No. 14-2-00016-7 (Wash. Super. Ct. May 5, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement involving state patrol troopers claiming that Defendant engaged in discrimination in violation of the Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act ("USERRA") by depriving Washington State Patrol employees and applicants of various benefits of employment while they were away on military duty).

9. $7.5 million – Cote, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., Case No. 15-CV-12945 (D. Mass. May 16, 2017) (final approval granted for a gender discrimination class action settlement where Wal-Mart was accused of failing to provide spousal health benefits to employees who had lawful marriages to same-sex spouses).

10. $6.5 million – Little, et al. v. Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority, Case No. 14-CV-1289 (D.D.C. Dec. 7, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for a race discrimination class action involving railroad workers who asserted that the employer's criminal background check policy disproportionately discriminated against African-Americans).

Settlements In Private Plaintiff Wage & Hour Class Actions

For wage & hour class actions, the monetary value of the top ten private plaintiff settlements entered into or paid in 2017 totaled $574.49 million. This represented a decrease from the value of the top ten settlements in 2016, which totaled $695.5 million. At the same time, the overall value of the top ten wage & hour settlements had higher values than in the two preceding years, which totaled $463.6 million in 2015 and $215 million in 2014.

1. $227 million – FedEx Ground Package System, Inc.
2. $110 million – American Commercial Security
3. $61.69 million – The City Of Dallas, Texas
4. $27 million – Lyft, Inc.
5. $21 million – U.S. Security Associates, Inc.
6. $19.1 million – Carlson Restaurants, Inc.
7. $16.7 million – JP Morgan Chase & Co.
8. $16 million – PNC Bank, N.A.
9. $13.5 million – Duane Reade, Inc.
10. $13 million – Wells Fargo

The top ten settlements primarily involved nationwide claims, while three involved state-specific claims (both in California). Furthermore, six of the top ten wage & hour settlements involved lawsuits pending in either state or federal courts in California or New York.

1. $227 million – In Re FedEx Ground Package System, Inc. Employment Practices Litigation, Case No. 05-MD-527 (N.D. Ind. April 28, 2017) (final approval granted for a class action settlement of wage & hour claims involving drivers from terminals in 19 states claiming that FedEx misclassified them as independent contractors and deprived them of overtime wages, reimbursement for expenses, and employee benefits).

2. $110 million – Augustus, et al. v. American Commercial Security, Case No. BC336416 (Cal. Super. Ct. April 6, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement of wage & hour claims involving 15,000 current and former guards who alleged the company violated California labor laws by requiring them to carry radios so they could be "on-call" while on break and meal periods).

3. $61.69 million – Albert, et al. v. The City Of Dallas, Texas, Case No. 199-00697-94 (Tex. Dist. Ct. Nov. 14, 2017) (request for approval of class action settlement stemming from state law breach of contract claims relative to the city failing to pay police, fire, and rescue officers a 15% raise according to a 1979 ordinance).

4. $27 million – Cotter, et al. v. Lyft, Inc., Case No. 13-CV-4065 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 16, 2017) (final approval granted for a class action settlement of wage & hour claims of current and former drivers accusing the company of misclassifying them as independent contractors and skimming 20% off their tips as an "administrative fee").

5. $21 million – Abdullah, et al. v. U.S. Security Associates, Inc., Case No. 09-CV-9554 (C.D. Cal. Aug. 14, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement of wage & hour claims involving a class of 17,000 security guards accusing the company of failing to give meal breaks).

6. $19.1 million – Zorrilla, et al. v. Carlson Restaurants, Inc., Case No. 14-CV-2740 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 26, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement of wage & hour claims involving tipped workers claiming the restaurant chain violated FLSA and state wage & hour laws in 19 states).

7. $16.7 million – Taylor, et al. v. JP Morgan Chase & Co., Case No. 15-CV-3023 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 3, 2017) (request for settlement approval for a putative class action involving thousands of bank employees' allegations that the banking giant violated the FLSA by failing to pay proper overtime compensation).

8. $16 million – Bland, et al. v. PNC Bank, N.A., Case No. 15-CV-1042 (W.D. Pa. April 11, 2017) (final approval granted for a class action settlement relative to FLSA claims brought by current and former mortgage loan officers who accused the company of failing to pay overtime and a proper commission).

9. $13.5 million – Jacob, et al. v. Duane Reade, Inc., Case No. 11-CV-160 (S.D.N.Y. May 5, 2017) (final approval granted for a class action settlement of wage & hour claims involving current and former assistant store managers alleging the company failed to pay overtime wages).

10. $13 million – In Re Wells Fargo Wage & Hour Cases, Case No. JCCP4702 (Cal. Super. Ct. Dec. 19, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement of wage & hour claims for missed meal and rest breaks and off-the-clock claims).

Settlements In Private Plaintiff ERISA Class Actions

For ERISA class actions, the monetary value of the top ten private plaintiff settlements entered into or paid in 2017 totaled $927.8 million. This represents a noteworthy increase from the value of the top ten settlements in 2016, which totaled $807.4 million.

1. $352 million -– Providence Health & Services

2. $125 million – Franciscan Missionaries Of Our Lady Health Systems

3. $98.3 million – Bon Secours Health System, Inc.

4. $75 million – Trinity Health Corp.

5. $75 million – Peabody Energy Corp.

6. $75 million – JP Morgan Chase & Co.

7. $42 million – St. Joseph's Hospital & Medical Center

8. $31 million – Holy Cross Hospital

9. $29.5 million – Wheaton Franciscan

10. $25 million – Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc.

The largest ERISA class action settlements involved disputes over treating pension plans as “church plans,” breaches of fiduciary duty, failures to make required contributions into retirement funds, and various theories of mismanagement.

1. $352 million – Griffith, et al. v. Providence Health & Services, Case No. 14-CV-1720 (W.D. Wash. Mar. 21, 2016) (final approval granted for settlement of an ERISA class action alleging a non-profit hospital chain under-funded its pension plan by improperly treating it as a "church plan" exempted from federal funding requirements).

2. $125 million – Nicholson, et al. v. Franciscan Missionaries Of Our Lady Health Systems, Case No. 16-CV-258 (M.D. La. Oct. 24, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for settlement of a proposed class action alleging that the hospital and the Plans' administrators and fiduciaries had violated the ERISA by improperly classifying the Plans as "church plans" to exempt them from funding requirements).

3. $98.3 million – Hodges, et al. v. Bon Secours Health System, Inc., Case No. 16-CV-1079 (D. Md. July 10, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for settlement of a putative class action accusing the hospital of violations of the ERISA by erroneously claiming its Plans were exempt because they are "church plans").

4. $75 million – Lann, et al. v. Trinity Health Corp., Case No. 17-CV-2237 (D. Md. May 31, 2017) (final approval granted for settlement of an ERISA class action alleging that Trinity Health improperly claimed its plan qualified as a "church plan" under ERISA).

5. $75 million – In Re Peabody Energy Corp., Case No. 16-BK-42529 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. Mar. 16, 2017) (request for settlement approval for an ERISA class action alleging mismanagement of workers' pension plan).

6. $75 million – In Re JP Morgan Stable Value Fund ERISA Litigation, Case No. 12-CV-2548 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 3, 2017) (request for settlement approval for an ERISA class action alleging mismanagement of retirement funds and breaches of fiduciary duties with respect to 401(k) plans).

7. $42 million – Garbaccio, et al. v. St. Joseph's Hospital & Medical Center, Case No. 16-CV-2740 (D.N.J. Oct. 5, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for settlement of a putative consolidated class action alleging the hospital violated the ERISA by under-funding an employee pension plan by claiming its Plan was a "church plan").

8. $31 million – Butler, et al. v. Holy Cross Hospital, Case No. 16-CV-5907 (N.D. Ill. June 29, 2017) (final approval granted for settlement of an ERISA class action claim filed by former employees accusing the hospital of under-funding its pension plan).

9. $29.5 million – In Re Wheaton Franciscan ERISA Litigation, Case No. 16-CV-4232 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 13, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for settlement of a class action alleging a non-profit healthcare system denied ERISA protections to the participants and beneficiaries of the Plan by claiming that the Plan qualified as an exempt "church plan").

10. $25 million – Fernandez, et al. v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., Case No. 15-CV-22782 (S.D. Fla. Dec. 21, 2017) (final approval granted for settlement of an ERISA class action accusing the broker-dealer firm of profiting from unreasonable fees charged to 401(k) plans).

Settlements In Private Plaintiff Statutory Workplace Class Actions

Plaintiffs' lawyers also pursued a myriad of statutory claims in workplace class actions brought against employers (outside of the areas of employment discrimination, wage & hour, and ERISA class actions). These cases involved workplace antitrust laws, the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"), and other federal and state statutory law violations. The top ten settlements in this category increased significantly in 2017, as they totaled $487.28 million; by contrast, the total was $114.7 million in 2016.

1. $209 million – National Collegiate Athletic Association

2. $150 million – Dreamworks Animation SKG, Inc.

3. $44.4 million – New York State Department Of Taxation & Finance

4. $41.4 million – Bank Of America, N.A.

5. $8 million – Trans Union, LLC

6. $7.5 million – Uber

7. $7.33 million – Carey Salt Co.

8. $6.749 million – Kelly Services, Inc.

9. $6.7 million – Act II Jewelry, LLC

10. $6.2 million – American Airlines, Inc.

The biggest settlements involved class actions under workplace antitrust laws, the FCRA, and breaches of contracts and denials of employee benefits. Others included class actions over benefit denials, discriminatory taxes, and unfair competition.

1. $209 million – In Re NCAA Grant-In-Aid Antitrust Litigation, Case No. 14-MD-2541 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 20, 2017) (final approval granted for a settlement of a class action alleging violations of antitrust laws relative to anti-competitive caps on student scholarships).

2. $150 million – In Re Animation Workers Antitrust Litigation, Case No. 14-CV-4062 (N.D. Cal. June 5, 2017) (final approval granted for a settlement of a workplace class action involving animation and visual effects workers alleging violations of antitrust laws by conspiring to suppress wages via non-poaching agreements).

3. $44.4 million – Owner-Operator Independent Drivers Association, et al. v. New York State Department Of Taxation & Finance, Case No. 5551-13 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. April 19, 2017) (final approval granted for a class action settlement involving allegations relative to an illegitimate highway use tax that discriminated against out-of-state truck drivers).

4. $41.4 million – Childress, et al. v. Bank Of America, N.A., Case No. 15-CV-231 (E.D.N.C. Sept. 13, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement involving 125,000 military members claiming the Defendant violated the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act ("SCRA") when charging illegal high interest charges on principle balances).

5. $8 million – Patel, et al. v. Trans Union, LLC, Case No. 14-CV-522 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 26, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement regarding allegations that Defendant violated the FCRA by wrongfully describing applicants as terrorists and criminals).

6. $7.5 million – In Re Uber FCRA Litigation, Case No. 14-CV-5200 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 15, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement regarding allegations that Uber violated the FCRA by using applicants' background checks to make adverse employment decisions).

7. $7.33 million – In Re Carey Salt Co., Case No. 15-CA-19704 (NLRB Mar. 2, 2017) (settlement agreement stemming from an employer's unfair labor practices against unionized employees).

8. $6.749 million – Hillson, et al. v. Kelly Services, Inc., Case No. 15-CV-10803 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 11, 2017) (final approval granted for a class action settlement relative to a lawsuit brought by job applicants and employees who claimed the company violated the FCRA by conducting background checks without disclosures that were required by law).

9. $6.7 million – West, et al. v. Act II Jewelry, LLC, Case No. 15-CV-5569 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 21, 2017) (preliminary approval granted for a class action settlement of claims for breach of contract and denial of benefits to workers when the company shut down its direct sales operations).

10. $6.2 million – Allman, et al. v. American Airlines, Inc. Pilot Retirement Benefits Program Variable Income Plan, Case No. 14-CV-10138 (D. Mass. Feb. 15, 2017) (final approval granted for a class action settlement involving a class of 1,270 American Airlines pilots alleging the airline violated its benefit plans by denying full pension contribution to pilots who were on long-term military leave).

B. Top Ten Government-Initiated Monetary Settlements

In 2017, the EEOC and the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") continued their previous pattern of aggressively litigating government enforcement actions, albeit with mixed results.

Based on figures for the U.S. Government's 2017 fiscal year, the EEOC filed 184 new merits lawsuits, including 30 non-systemic multi-party suits and 30 systemic lawsuits. The 30 systemic lawsuits represented a sizeable jump over prior years, as the EEOC filed 18 such cases in 2016 and 16 such cases in 2015. In 2017, the EEOC increased the number of charges resolved to 99,109 charges, up slightly from the 97,443 in 2016. Furthermore, the EEOC reported that it recovered approximately $38.4 million in relief for victims of systemic discrimination, up from $20.5 million in 2016. In addition, the EEOC obtained $484 million in total recoveries through mediation, conciliation, and settlements, a slight increase from the $482 million it collected in 2016.

For all types of government-initiated enforcement actions, the monetary value of the top ten settlements entered into or paid in 2017 totaled $485.25 million. This represents a major increase from 2016, when the total was $52.3 million.

1. $300 million – Avaya, Inc.
2. $95 million – Asplundh Tree Expert Co.
3. $21.6 million – VIUSA, Inc.
4. $15.75 million – First Bankers Trust Services, Inc.
5. $12 million – Texas Roadhouse, Inc.
6. $10.5 million – Bass Pro Outdoor World, LLC
7. $10.1 million – Ford Motor Company
8. $9.8 million – American Airlines, Inc.
9. $5.5 million– Ginsberg
10. $5 million – State Street Corp.

Four of the settlements involved EEOC litigation, three involved DOL enforcement actions, and three involved NLRB, OFCCP, and DOJ enforcement actions.

Settlements Of Government-Initiated Enforcement Actions And Pattern Or Practice Lawsuits

1. $300 million – In Re Avaya, Inc., Case No. 17-BK-10089 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 7, 2017) (settlement agreement stemming from enforcement action for the termination and under-funding of the company's pension plans for hourly and salaried workers).

2. $95 million – U.S. Department Of Justice v. Asplundh Tree Expert Co., Case No. 17-CR-492 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 28, 2017) (final approval granted for settlement of an enforcement action brought by the DOJ alleging supervisors misclassified undocumented workers who were in the country illegally).

3. $21.6 million – NLRB v. VIUSA, Inc. (NLRB Oct. 30, 2017) (settlement agreement stemming from an investigation involving claims from 257 former employees alleging that their employer violated federal labor laws by refusing to hire, recognize, and bargain with the union that represented these individuals because it was a minority-based union).

4. $15.75 million – U.S. Department Of Labor v. First Bankers Trust Services, Inc., Case No. 12-CV-8648 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 25, 2017) (consent judgment entered in a DOL investigation relative to the defendants' alleged violations of ERISA by failing to ensure its stock was bought at a fair price).

5. $12 million – EEOC v. Texas Roadhouse, Inc., Case No. 11-CV-11732 (D. Mass. Mar. 31, 2017) (consent decree approved in an EEOC pattern or practice lawsuit alleging age discrimination relative to servers).

6. $10.5 million – EEOC v. Bass Pro Outdoor World, LLC, Case No. 11-CV-3425 (S.D. Tex. July 25, 2017) (approval of a consent decree stemming from an EEOC pattern or practice lawsuit involving Defendant's hiring practices against qualified African-American and Hispanic applicants).

7. $10.1 million – EEOC v. Ford Motor Co. (EEOC Aug. 15, 2017) (settlement agreement stemming from an EEOC investigation of sexual and racial harassment allegations by workers at two of the company's Chicago-area plants).

8. $9.8 million – EEOC v. American Airlines, Inc., Case No. 17-CV-4059 (D. Ariz. Nov. 3, 2017) (consent decree approved in an EEOC pattern or practice lawsuit alleging violations against disabled workers).

9. $5.5 million – U.S. Department Of Labor v. Ginsberg, Case No. 15-CV-985 (S.D.N.Y. July 25, 2017) (consent judgment entered relative to a DOL investigation of Defendants' alleged breach of their duties under ERISA while acting as fiduciaries of the plan).

10. $5 million – Office Of Federal Contract Compliance Programs v. State Street Corp., Case No. R00174213 (OFCCP Sept. 29, 2017) (entry of conciliation agreement stemming from an investigation of the employer's discrimination against African-American and female executives in the senior vice president, managing director, and vice president positions by paying them less than their white and male colleagues).

C. Noteworthy Injunctive Relief Provisions In Class Action Settlements

Generally, the types of relief obtained in settlements of employment discrimination class actions can be grouped into five categories, including modification of internal personnel practices and procedures; oversight and monitoring of corporate practices; mandatory training of supervisory personnel and employees; compensation for named plaintiffs and class members; and an award of attorneys' fees and costs for class counsel. In addition to substantial payments for overtime liability, settlements of FLSA collective actions often involve changes to payroll practices and procedures. In ERISA class action settlements, the terms typically include monetary payments along with injunctive orders barring fiduciaries and third-parties from serving as plan fiduciaries or managers.

Class action settlements involving private plaintiffs generally contain one or more of these items of non-monetary injunctive relief, but rarely contain all of them. Attorneys representing the U.S. Government in enforcement litigation actions also secured several settlements in 2017 that included noteworthy injunctive relief provisions. This reflects in some measure the significant "public interest" component of government-initiated enforcement litigation.

Among the more novel and/or onerous non-monetary relief requirements imposed on employers in 2017 were the following:

- Institute a new policy making same-sex spouses eligible for employer-sponsored benefits;
- Provide a report to the EEOC regarding any employees requesting employer-sponsored benefits for same sex spouses, and whether or not such requests were granted;
- Install a computerized time-keeping system;
- Hire formerly disqualified candidates or upgrade the seniority of current employees;
- Train human resources staff on the anti-discrimination provisions of the Immigration & Nationality Act;
- Cease and desist from requiring applicants to be subjected to pre-offer medical examinations or make any pre-offer medical inquiries;
- Dismiss an allegedly retaliatory lawsuit against an employee who previously filed an EEOC complaint; and,
- Expunge any poor evaluations or discipline of employees from employment records.

The top ten settlements in 2017 involving significant injunctive relief provisions include:

1. EEOC v. Prince George's County*, Case No. 15-CV-2942 (D. Md. June 1, 2017). The EEOC brought an EPA action against Prince George's County's Department of Environment alleging it rebuffed a female engineer's efforts to negotiate a higher starting salary that would match her experience and education. Under the terms of the consent decree entered by the Court, in addition to paying her lost wages and liquidated damages, the county employer agreed to increase her salary by nearly $25,000 to ensure parity with her male comparators. The employer also agreed to hire a consultant to ensure that its compensation policies and procedures and individual salary determinations comply with the Equal Pay Act, and further agreed to provide training on federal anti-discrimination laws to the county's position review board members, managers, and supervisors.

2. EEOC v. S&B Industry Inc.*, Case No. 15-CV-641 (N.D. Tex. Feb. 15, 2017). The EEOC brought an action against a cellphone repair facility alleging it violated the ADA by refusing to hire two deaf applicants. Under the terms of the consent decree, the employer agreed to have managers, supervisors, and human resource professionals attend a training session presented by the Deaf Action Center, a Dallas organization that provides advocacy services for individuals with hearing impairments, covering topics such as the use of sign language interpreters in employment and interview settings. The company also agreed to post a notice about the settlement, provide training for employees on the ADA, keep a written log of all complaints of disability discrimination, and report to the EEOC on a semi-annual basis.

3. Salazar, et al. v. McDonald's Corp.*, Case No. 14-CV-02096 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 15, 2017). The Court approved a consent decree relative to a wage & hour class action lawsuit brought on behalf of current and former employees at eight franchisee restaurants. The McDonald's employees accused the franchisee restaurants of violating wage and overtime provisions required under California law. In addition to monetary relief, the consent decree requires the employer to pay overtime premiums to current and future hourly employees who work more than eight hours, review all time and payroll records at least once a day, and provide detailed wage statements to employees.

4. EEOC v. Downhole Technology, LLC*, Case No. 17-CV-574 (S.D. Tex. April 26, 2017). The EEOC alleged that a manufacturer of equipment retaliated against an employee who complained that he was racially harassed when co-workers displayed a white hood to intimidate, ridicule, and insult him. In a consent decree entered by the Court, in addition to monetary relief, the company agreed to educate its employees about the history of hate groups, their symbols, and the harm they cause to others. The employer also agreed to revamp its anti-discrimination policy and establish a toll-free telephone number through which employees would be able to report discrimination and harassment.

5. EEOC v. Allsup's Convenience Stores, Inc.*, Case No. 15-CV-863 (D.N.Mex. Sept. 25, 2017). The EEOC brought an action under the ADA alleging that a convenience store employer subjected pregnant employees to different working conditions by making negative comments to them and giving them less favorable tasks and shifts. The three-year consent decree settling the suit required Allsup's to pay $950,000 to 28 women who were discriminated against based on pregnancy or a pregnancy-related disability, provide offers of re-employment to the 28 women, and provide them with letters of reference.

6. Seaman v. Duke University Health System*, Case No. 15-CV-462 (M.D.N.C. Aug. 25, 2017). The Court approved a settlement agreement stemming from allegations of an illegal conspiracy involving University of North Carolina and others in a no-poaching agreement for medical faculty. The employer's senior administrators and deans had entered into agreements that eliminated or reduced competition among them for skilled medical labor. Under the terms of the consent decree, the medical school and the UNC Health Care System are enjoined and prohibited from making agreements to refrain from recruiting, hiring, or competing for employees.

7. EEOC v. Orion Energy Systems, Inc.*, Case No. 14-CV-1019 (E.D. Wis. April 5, 2017). The EEOC brought a lawsuit alleging that a lighting company employer's wellness program violated the ADA by unlawfully requiring medical examinations and making disability-related inquiries. In addition to paying $100,000 in monetary relief, the employer agreed that it will not maintain any wellness program in the future that poses disability-related inquiries or seeks a medical examination that is not voluntary within the meaning of the ADA and its regulations. The company also agreed to conduct an additional training meeting with its chief executive officer and other high ranking executives, which includes an explanation of the provisions of the consent decree and the requirements of the ADA and its regulations as they pertain to wellness programs.

8. People Of The State Of Illinois, et al. v. Xing Ying Employment Agency*, Case No. 15-CV-10235 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 5, 2017). The Court approved a consent decree stemming from allegations of discrimination involving two restaurants and an employment agency that under-paid and mistreated immigrant workers, many of whom were undocumented workers. In addition to paying $212,500 in monetary relief, the businesses are required to change their employment practices, keep records of employees' hours and wages, provide training on employment discrimination laws, develop and implement an anti-discrimination policy, and provide training. The employers also must not compel workers to pay for food as a condition of their employment.

9. EEOC v. IDEX Corp.*, Case No. 15-CV-22777 (S.D. Fla. April 19, 2017). The EEOC alleged that the company violated the ADA when its supervisors repeatedly asked a regional manager invasive questions about his cancer treatments and questioned his ability to perform job tasks. In addition to providing $380,000 in monetary relief to the terminated employee, the consent decree also requires the employer to train all human resources managers on the ADA's prohibition against disability discrimination, and review hypothetical accommodation request scenarios with managers. The company also agreed to post and distribute notices concerning the decree through email, its company website, and at locations nationwide.

10. EEOC v. Chemtrusion, Inc.*, Case No. 16-CV-180 (S.D. Ind. July 20, 2017). In an ADA action, the EEOC alleged that a manufacturing services company refused to hire or provide reasonable accommodations to a class of job applicants because of medical information it obtained during pre-employment medical examinations. In addition to monetary relief, the consent decree requires that Chemtrusion: (i) instruct its hiring personnel and medical providers not to conduct medical inquiries until after a conditional offer is made; (ii) conduct individualized analyses before withdrawing job offers; (iii) train its hiring personnel on what the ADA requires with respect to medical examinations and hiring; (iv) submit decisions to rescind job offers to legal counsel for review; and (v) track rescinded offers.

III. Significant Federal Employment Discrimination Class Action And EEOC Pattern Or Practice Rulings

This Chapter examines rulings in 2016 in employment discrimination class action cases arising under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as well as "pattern or practice" enforcement actions brought by the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Rulings are divided into these two substantive sections, and sub-divided into the federal circuits in which the appellate or district court rendered the decision.

The plaintiffs' bar had mixed success on Rule 23 motions in 2017, as illustrated by the following map:

Lamarr-Arruz, et al. v. CVS Pharmacy, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 157842 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 26, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of market investigators or store detectives, filed an action asserting a hostile work environment pursuant to the Civil Rights Act of 1991, the New York Human Rights Law ("NYHRL"), New York State Executive Law ("NYSEL"); and the New York City Human Rights Law ("NYCHRL"). Plaintiffs moved for certification of a class based on their hostile work environment claims pursuant to Rule 23. Plaintiffs sought to certify a class of all Black and Hispanic market investigators and/or store detectives who have worked and/or are working in New York City and/or under the same regional loss prevention managers ("RLPMs") as New York City market investigators at any time during the applicable liability or statute of limitations periods. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs claimed that the conduct of RLPMs and store managers created a hostile work environment for Hispanic and Black employees. Plaintiffs submitted documentary evidence in the form of declarations, depositions, and pleadings from 14 other market investigators who had filed individual hostile work environment actions that were pending against Defendant. Id. at *5. The 16 market investigators claimed to have worked under eight of the 12 RLPMs and at around 111 (78%) of the approximately 142 stores in the New York City area owned by Defendant during the class period. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs claimed that some combination of RLPMs and/or store managers instructed them to racially profile Black and Hispanic customers, and also used language that was racially degrading. Id. Plaintiffs also adduced evidence of complaints from Defendant's customers that they were the subjects of racial profiling and racially derogatory language at various stores. The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to establish that there were common questions of law or fact that could be answered on a class-wide basis that covered all of the members of the purported class who worked for all of the RLPMs and store managers over an extended period of time. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to meet the commonality requirement of Rule 23. As to Rule 23(b)(3), the Court determined that common issues did not predominate over individual issues with respect to the hostile work environment claim. The determination of actionable conduct was not subject to generalizable proof. Id. at *18. The Court explained that investigators reported to 12 different RLPMs within the Loss Prevention Department. Id. at *19. The Court determined that the main contention in the action was that the market investigators all received the same instruction from their RLPMs – to target Black and Hispanic customers – that they were obliged to follow if they wanted to keep their jobs. However, the Court stated that the evidence showed the majority of the RLPMs did not instruct any market investigators to profile based on race or use any racially degrading language. Id. The Court therefore determined that the specific allegations would require individualized inquiries to determine liability, and then to determine damages. Id. at *20-21. The Court also found that Plaintiffs failed to meet the superiority requirement, as 14 of the 16 Plaintiffs had commenced individual actions against Defendant arising out of similar allegations. Id. at *22. Those actions were at various stages, and many had been pending for over a year. The Court stated that the proposed class was not so numerous that a class action would be superior to individual actions, especially given that a class action in this case would simply devolve into individual trials on the merits for each class member. Id. at *23. Therefore, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the commonality requirement of Rule 23(a)(2) and the requirements of Rule 23(b)(3). Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Sellars, et al. v. CRST Van Expedited Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47674 (N.D. Iowa Mar. 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, three female truck drivers, brought claims against Defendant under Title VII and the California Fair Employment and Housing Act. Defendant employs thousands of truck drivers on two-person teams, so that one driver can sleep while the other drives. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant maintained a pattern or practice of discrimination amounting to a hostile work environment and retaliation toward female drivers who reported sexual harassment. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that three practices of Defendant created a hostile work environment, including: (i) failing to find a harassment complaint corroborated without an admission by the accused himself or a third-party's eyewitness account; (ii) failing to discipline male drivers even when a harassment complaint was corroborated; and (iii) tolerating the failure of responsible employees to act promptly in the face of a harassment complaint and instead encouraging the accuser to keep driving with the accused. Id. at *9-10. Plaintiffs also alleged that three practices of Defendant constituted retaliation against female drivers who reported harassment, including: (i) requiring an accuser to exit the truck upon complaining and thereby precluding her from earning wages by continuing to drive; (ii) forcing accusers to cover transit and lodging costs after exiting the truck; and (iii) extending student-driver training for those student-driver accusers who were forced to exit the truck after complaining of harassment. Id. at *22-23. Plaintiffs moved for certification of two classes under Rule 23, which consisted of: (i) female drivers subjected to a hostile work environment based on sex ("hostile work environment class"); and (ii) female drivers subjected to retaliation in response to complaints of sexual harassment ("retaliation class"). Id. at *35-36. Plaintiffs also moved to certify a California-only class of female drivers. The Court certified the hostile work environment and retaliation classes only with respect to particular issues under Rule 23(b)(3) and Rule 23(c)(4), and denied certification of the California-only classes. The Court's decision to certify the classes rested upon Plaintiffs' proposal of bifurcating the case in two phases. Under Plaintiffs' proposal, Phase I – the "liability" phase – would determine whether Defendant: (i) created or tolerated a hostile work environment; and (ii) retaliated against women based on sex. Id. at *42-43. If such "liability" were established, each case would then proceed to Phase II to determine in individual trials whether: (i) each Plaintiff subjectively believed the work environment to be hostile (a finding required to prove a hostile work environment claim and, therefore, a part of liability omitted from Phase I's "liability" trial); and (ii) damages. Id. at *43. The Court found that Plaintiffs' theories of discrimination provided common questions of law and fact that predominated over individual questions affecting the claim. The Court emphasized that the fact that Plaintiffs would attempt to prove those theories through anecdotal evidence. With respect to the retaliation class, the Court found that Plaintiffs' theory that Defendant retaliated by requiring female drivers to exit the truck after complaining of harassment provided common questions of law and fact, which predominated over individual questions affecting the claims and thereby satisfied Rule 23(a) and 23(b)(3). Id. at *59. However, the Court opined that Plaintiffs' two other theories of retaliation presented too many individualized questions to be adjudicated by representative evidence, even in a bifurcated trial. In finding that the classes on these issues satisfied Rule 23(a) and Rule 23(b)(3), the Court cited Rule 23(c)(4) in certifying them, which allows a class "with respect to particular issues," as opposed to an entire claim. Id. at *71. Nonetheless, in considering Plaintiffs' "alternative" request for certification under Rule 23(c)(4), the Court noted a circuit split as to whether a Plaintiff must show that his entire claim satisfies the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3) before certifying particular issues under Rule 23(c)(4), or whether a Plaintiff need only show predominance with respect to the particular issue for certification under 23(c)(4). The Court acknowledged that while the Eighth Circuit has not yet decided the issue, the Court would follow the Second, Fourth and Ninth Circuits in certifying the sufficiently common issues presented by Plaintiffs despite the fact that Plaintiffs' claims in their entirety did not merit certification. Id. at *74. Accordingly, as to the hostile work environment class, the Court certified the issues of whether Defendant had any of the following policies, patterns or practices that create or contribute to a hostile work environment: (i) failing to find their complaints were corroborated without an eyewitness or admission; (ii) failing to discipline drivers after complaints were corroborated; and (iii) failing to discipline responsible employees for not promptly responding to sexual harassment complaints. Id. at *78-79. As to the retaliation class, the Court certified the issue of whether Defendant had a policy, pattern, or practice of retaliating against women complaining of sexual harassment by requiring them to exit the truck after complaining. Id. at *80. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification in part.

Buchanan, et al. v. Tata Consultancy Services*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 212170 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a putative class action alleging that Defendant maintained discriminatory employment practices based on national origin in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Specifically, Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant maintained a pattern or practice of intentional discrimination whereby it treated employees who were of South Asian or Indian national origin more favorably than those who were not of South Asian or Indian national origin. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification of two classes, including: (i) a hiring class consisting of all individuals who were not of South Asian or Indian national origin who sought a position with Defendant in the United States and were not hired between April 14, 2011 and the date of class certification; and (ii) a termination class consisting of all individuals who were not of South Asian or Indian national origin who were employed by Defendant in the United States, were placed in an unallocated status, and were terminated between April 14, 2011 and the date of class certification. Id. at *49-50. In analyzing Plaintiffs' motion, the Court addressed commonality under Rule 23(a) and predominance under Rule 23(b). The Court determined that with regard to the two proposed classes, Plaintiffs' claims hinged on several common questions capable of proof with evidence common to the class. The Court stated that with regard to the proposed termination class, Plaintiffs offered sufficient proof that Defendant operated under a general policy of discrimination. Id. at *53. By contrast, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to offer sufficient proof that Defendant operated under a general policy of discrimination with regard to the proposed hiring class. The Court opined that the potential size of the proposed class could easily exceed 250,000. Id. at *54. The Court also determined that with regard to the documentary evidence offered in support of the proposed hiring class, the evidence was anecdotal and failed to establish a general policy of discrimination even if persuasive as to individual incidents involving individual class members. Id. at *54-55. The Court further noted that Plaintiffs offered no evidence of a "leadership directive," "corporate directive," or "management decision" with regard to hiring. Id. at *55. Finally, the Court stated that Plaintiffs failed to address the fact that Defendant's clients were apparently involved in the hiring process for positions that required technical skills which presents individual inquires. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion as to the hiring class. As to the termination class, the Court found that Plaintiffs' established numerosity for purposes of Rule 23(a), as expert testimony showed that Defendant involuntarily terminated between 896 and 1,116 non-South Asian and non-Indian employees during the class period. Id. at *56. The Court also held that Plaintiffs made a sufficient showing of typicality. The Court stated that Plaintiff Slaight was an adequate class representative and his counsel would adequately represent the class, and therefore the adequacy requirement under Rule 23(a)(4) was also satisfied. Id. at *57. As to superiority, Court reasoned that a liability determination would resolve as a whole the question of whether Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of discrimination, thus obviating the need for further litigation on this issue, saving judicial and class member resources, and avoiding the possibility of inconsistent judgments. Id. at *61. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification of the termination class and it denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification of a hiring class.

Gittens, et al. v. The School Board Of Lee County, Florida,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 115987 (M.D. Fla. July 7, 2017). Plaintiffs, four African-Americans educators, brought an action alleging that Defendant had a pattern or practice of failing to hire African-American candidates to administrative positions in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the Court denied. Plaintiff held various teaching and administrative positions at various schools within the School District. Id. at *6-12. All four Plaintiffs had advanced degrees, and sought administrative positions at various schools, including the position of assistant principal. All four had at least one interview for the assistant principal position, and two were interviewed by panels of all-White school administrators. All four Plaintiffs were rejected for assistant principal positions. To be considered for an assistant principal position, an applicant must first apply and be accepted into the AP Pool. Id. at *13. Once accepted, an individual may then apply and be hired for a specific assistant principal position at a certain school. Each individual school advertises its open assistant principal positions, screens the applicants, conducts its own interviews and, when selected by the Principal of that specific school, the candidate's name is submitted to the Superintendent, who then sends it to the School Board for final approval. Plaintiffs moved to certify a class of current and former employees who had applied for various positions with the School Board, including assistant principal positions. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. First, the Court rejected Plaintiffs' class definition, "[a]ny and all black/African-American employees who applied for an AP Pool position in the four years preceding this action but who were denied such a position by Defendant," as being improperly vague and ambiguous. Id. at *18-20. The Court noted that that the class definition was unclear as to whether "denied" referred to the AP Pool or the actual assistant principal position. After the Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied the numerosity requirement of Rule 23, it held that Plaintiffs failed to establish that there were common questions of law or fact sufficient to satisfy the commonality requirement. The Court opined that "[s]imilar to [Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 564 U.S. 338 (2011)], Plaintiffs here wish to bring suit calling into question a relatively large number of employment decisions at once. Without some glue holding the alleged reasons for all those decisions together, it will be impossible to say that examination of all the class members' claims for relief will produce a common answer to the crucial question why was I disfavored." Id. at *28. The Court held that the exercise of discretion by schools and principals over time at different schools precluded a finding of commonality. Id. at *30. Turning to the typicality requirement of Rule 23, the Court reasoned that the named Plaintiffs also failed to meet this requirement because each individual school advertised its opening for an assistant principal position and had its own decision-maker screening applicants and conducting interviews before the school principal selected the top applicant. Id. at *37. The Court determined that Plaintiffs did not meet their burden to show that their claims were based on the same event, pattern, or practice as the claims of other putative class members. Regarding the adequacy of representation requirement, the Court cited the motion to withdraw of Plaintiffs' counsel for the named Plaintiffs as caused by "a breakdown in the attorney-client relationship." The Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden. Id. at *39-40. Finally, Plaintiffs could not meet the Rule 23(b) requirements since not all of the Rule 23(a) requirements were met. Id. at *40-41. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Perrero, et al. v. Walt Disney Parks And Resorts U.S., Inc.*, Case No. 16-CV-2144 (M.D. Fla. June 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of administrative office employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendant intentionally discriminated against them based on their national origin and race in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Id. at 1. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs asserted that they were among a group of employees who were terminated and replaced by Indian nationals. Id. at 2. Plaintiffs alleged that they were made to train the new employees and that during the training period, Defendant was curt, unprofessional, and gave the Indian workers special treatment. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that this behavior created a hostile work environment. Defendant contended that in 2013, it made a business decision to reorganized its Information Technology ("IT") department and hired vendors to outsource routine work. Id. at 3. Defendant eliminated IT positions based on an employee ranking criteria, including hire date, time in role, current training, recent ratings, performance issues, and other issues. Once reviews were completed, Defendant informed 253 employees that they would be terminated unless they obtained other jobs with Defendant or one of its affiliates. Of the 253 affected employees, 105 obtained employment, and the remaining 148 were terminated. Id. at 3-4. Defendant argued that the motion for class certification should be denied because: (i) Plaintiffs failed to establish that common questions predominated over individual ones; (ii) Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate commonality because they cannot prove intentional discrimination with common evidence; and (iii) Plaintiffs failed to offer evidence to support a race discrimination class claim. Id. at 6. The Court agreed with Defendant and found that Plaintiffs' claims and the relief sought were inherently individualized and fact-intensive, as Plaintiffs had a variety of jobs, performed different functions, and worked at different levels at the company. Id. at 8. Further, Defendant employed Plaintiffs for varying lengths of time and rated each job performance individually. The Court noted that should a jury find Defendant liable to some Plaintiffs, it would have to make individualized determinations on compensatory and putative damages. Id. at 9. The Court therefore determined that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy predominance. The Court also held that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate commonality because there was no question of law of fact capable of common resolution that would make the handling of the case on a class-wide basis more efficient. Id. at 11. Defendant presented evidence that it made separate employment decisions for every person who was terminated. Id. The Court found therefore the individualized proof would preclude any class-wide decision on the reason each Plaintiff lost their job. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

(xii) District Of Columbia Circuit

Little, et al. v. Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48637 (D.D.C. Mar. 31, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, alleged that Defendant's criminal background check policy was discriminatory on the basis of race in violation of Title VII. Defendant, the primary public transit agency for the Washington D.C. metropolitan region, adopted its Policy 7.2.3 to govern how and when individuals with criminal convictions can obtain or continue employment with Defendant and its contractors and sub-contractors. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiffs alleged that although the policy was facially neutral, it had a disparate impact on African-Americans. Defendant asserted that the policy was adopted as a business necessity. Id. at *6. Further, Defendant argued that the make-up of its employee and contractor workforce, which included 12,000 individuals, was 75% African-American, thus demonstrating that no discrimination occurred. Plaintiffs moved for certification of a hybrid Rule 23(b)(2) and Rule 23(b)(3) class, seeking both injunctive and individual monetary damages for the alleged discriminatory policy. Id. at *16. Alternatively, if the Court determined monetary damages were not suitable for class-wide determination, Plaintiffs proposed certification under Rule 23(b)(2) for liability and injunctive relief determinations, and the application for Rule 23(c)(4) to allow the question of liability to be answered on a class-wide basis, with individual hearings on damages owed to each specific class member. The Court held that certification was proper under Rule 23(b)(2) and Rule 23(c)(4) and certified three classes for a determination of liability and injunctive relief under Rule 23(b)(2), but withheld any individual damages determinations. Id. at *46. Beginning with its Rule 23(a) analysis, the Court first noted that as Defendant did not dispute Plaintiffs' assertion that the overall class included over 1,000 individuals, and each sub-class included at least 200, the Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied the numerosity requirement. Further, the Court determined that Plaintiffs satisfied the commonality requirement since the policy at issue was mandated for non-discretionary application to all hiring decisions regarding the class members, regardless of whether the candidates applied for positions with different contractors, sub-contractors, or directly with the WMATA. Id. at *50. Regarding typicality, the Court concluded that the class representatives' claims were typical of the class as they addressed each part of the policy with the exception of one policy appendix, for which Plaintiffs did not present a class representative. Finally, regarding the adequacy requirement, the Court rejected Defendant's argument that the proposed named Plaintiffs were inadequate because they lacked standing, noting the merits of their allegations were not to be considered as part of the class certification calculus. Id. at *56-57. The Court also analyzed Plaintiffs' motion for certification of a hybrid Rule 23(b)(2) and (b)(3) class. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to identify which parts of Policy 7.2.3 produced a disparate impact, and their failure to identify the particular challenged employment practice prohibited certification. Noting that each appendix to the policy constituted a separate employment practice, and that Plaintiffs identified three appendices to the policy that allegedly had a disparate impact on African-Americans, the Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied their burden under Rule 23(b)(2). Id. at *59-60. However, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to meet the predominance requirement under Rule 23(b)(3) and therefore it refused to certify the class for monetary damages. Id. at *65-66. Specifically, the Court reasoned that the case involved "more than just the individual determination of damages" – namely, the trier of fact must also determine, for each individual class member, whether that class member was not hired or fired due to the Policy 7.2.3., or for some other reason. Id. at *66. Accordingly, the Court granted in part Plaintiffs' motion for class certification and certified three classes under Rule 23(b)(2) and Rule 23(c)(4) with respect to liability and the availability of injunctive relief.

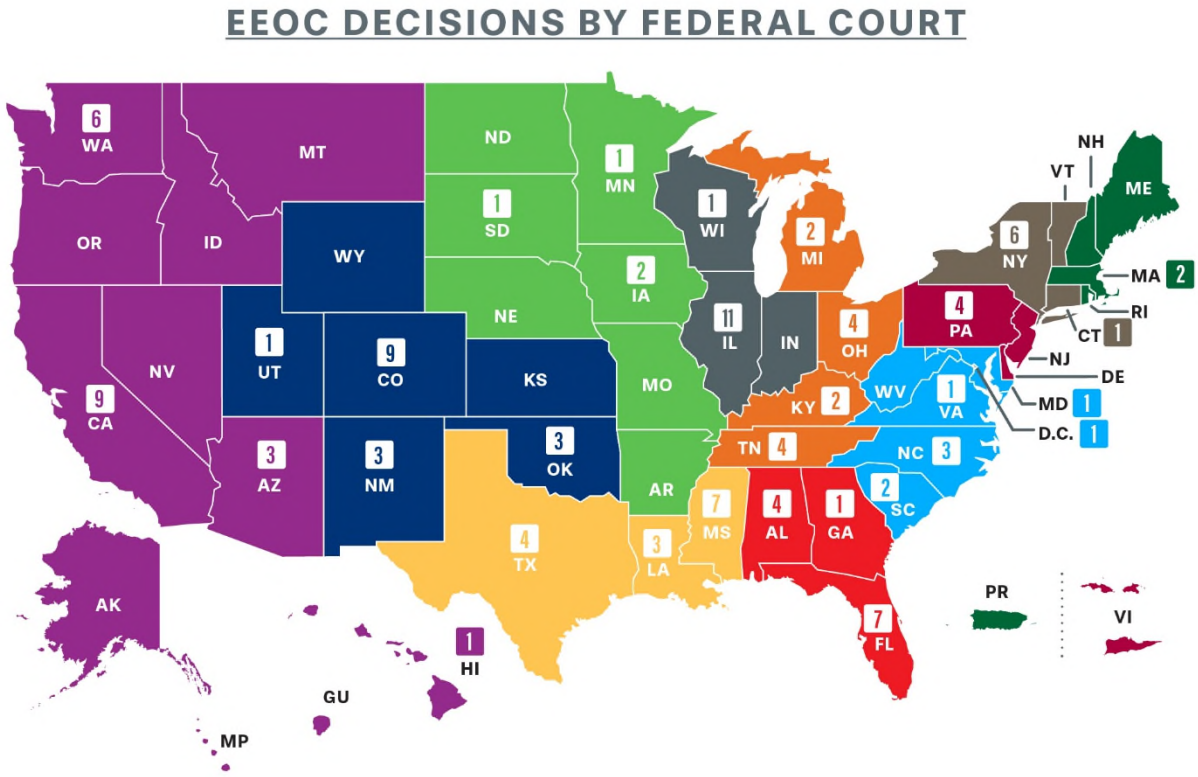
B. EEOC Pattern Or Practice Cases

"Pattern or practice" lawsuits brought by the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission are not governed by Rule 23. Instead, Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 governs these types of lawsuits. Under the statute, the EEOC need not satisfy Rule 23's requirements in order to sue on behalf of a group of allegedly injured individuals. Instead, the EEOC must follow the framework established by the U.S. Supreme Court in International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324 (1977). Nonetheless, EEOC pattern or practice cases tend to involve litigation issues similar to private party Rule 23 class actions.

The EEOC launched a new systemic litigation initiative in 2006. As a result, the volume of rulings in EEOC pattern or practice lawsuits increased significantly in 2016. The 110 rulings over the past year covered a wide gamut of issues.

In terms of geographic distribution of rulings on EEOC lawsuits, the following map illustrates that decision-making:



(i) First Circuit

EEOC v. Baystate Medical Center, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 179016 (D. Mass. Oct. 30, 2017). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of the charging party, Stephanie Clark, alleging that Defendants discriminated against her by terminating her employment after she refused to receive an mandatory influenza shot because of religious beliefs in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. The EEOC filed a motion to compel answers to interrogatories 3, 4, and 5, and to produce documents in response to its document request numbers 13, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 38, 39, 40, 41, and 44. Defendants asserted that they declined to answer the interrogatories and requests to produce documents that sought: (i) so-called comparator information; (ii) material concerning Defendants' affirmative defenses; and (iii) information concerning Defendants' influenza immunization and teleworking policies. Id. at *3. The Court found that production of information for all relevant parties would be overly broad as there were over 500 employees for the information sought. The Court therefore instructed the parties to sample 75 employees from whom to produce information relating to the EEOC's requests. Id. at *13. The Court ordered Defendants – for the 75 employees and for interrogatory three – to provide the EEOC with name title, department, dates of declination of the vaccine, and reasons given for declining. Id. at *14. The Court granted the EEOC's motion to compel a response to interrogatory number four for all personnel who declined influenza immunizations and for whom Defendants had any record of discipline for non-compliance with the policy in effect at the time. Id. at *17. The Court also granted the EEOC's motion as to interrogatory number five and ordered Defendants to produce the names of the two individuals who wore masks. Id. at *19. The Court denied the EEOC's request for documents number 13, finding it overbroad. The Court allowed the EEOC's requests for documents 16 through 22, to the extent the EEOC sought disclosure of the documents and electronically-stored information disclosing the facts supporting Defendants' affirmative defenses that were identified in these document requests. Id. at *21. The Court allowed request for documents number 38, 39, 40 and 44 only as to paper documents and electronically-stored information that concerned Defendants' influenza immunization policy, including any records related to discipline, in the personnel files of the employees identified previously. Id. at *24. Accordingly the Court granted the EEOC's motion in part.

EEOC v. Texas Roadhouse, Inc.,* Case No. 11-CV-11732 (D. Mass. Mar. 9, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant discriminated against job applicants on the basis of their age in violation of Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA"). The EEOC alleged that Defendants hired younger, less experienced applicants for jobs at its restaurants and avoided hiring workers over the age of 40. Defendant moved for a 12-month continuance on the trial set to begin in May of 2017 because of an opinion piece printed in The Boston Globe, which it contended misrepresented the facts of the case and thereby would unfairly impact the opinions of potential jurors. Defendant argued that the article raised three specific concerns, including: (i) that it appeared likely that the EEOC provided the columnist with information regarding jurors who she then contacted and interviewed; (ii) the article focused on evidence previously excluded prior to trial regarding the EEOC's enforcement tactics; and (iii) the article insulted male jury members by insinuating that their gender prejudices would render them unable to complete their civic duty impartially. The EEOC asserted that Defendants' request for a continuance should be denied. The EEOC alleged that Defendants have been trying to hold up the case's conclusion since a previous mistrial was declared. The EEOC further argued that Defendants failed to cite any case law precedent supporting the notion that publicity of the type at issue here provided grounds for granting either a significant continuance of trial or a change of venue. The Court agreed with the EEOC, and declined to accept Defendants' argument that it could not receive a fair trial in light of the recent newspaper article. The Court therefore denied Defendant's motion for a continuance. However, the Court stated that it would allow voir dire questioning by Defendants at the time of jury selection about the exposure of potential jurors or prior media coverage.

(ii) Second Circuit

EEOC v. AZ Metro Distributors*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 132447 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 18, 2017). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of Defendant's two former employees, Archibald Roberts and Caesar Fernandez, alleging violations of the ADEA. Defendant filed an answer asserting thirty-one affirmative defenses. Id. at *4. Thereafter, the EEOC filed a motion to strike the third, fourth, fifth, sixth and eighth affirmative defenses pursuant to Rule 12(f) or Rule 56(a). The Magistrate Judge previously recommended that the EEOC's motion be denied in part and granted in part. The Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court grant the EEOC's motion to strike the third, fifth and sixth affirmative defenses, but deny the motion as to the fourth and eighth affirmative defenses. Defendant's third, fifth and sixth affirmative defenses all purported to be complete defenses to the ADEA claims brought by the EEOC. The third and sixth affirmative defenses contended that the EEOC failed to satisfy statutory prerequisites for commencing its enforcement action. The fifth defense alleged that the EEOC unlawfully retaliated against Defendant. Defendant argued that there were questions of fact and law that, if found in its favor, would allow these affirmative defenses to succeed and that the EEOC would not be prejudiced by the discovery related to them. Id. at *5. However, the Court found that the Magistrate Judge's thorough and well-reasoned analysis regarding the third, fifth, and sixth affirmative defenses was not erroneous and it adopted the Magistrate Judge's findings as to those defenses. The Court noted that Defendant's fourth and eighth defenses were best interpreted as requests for attorneys' fees and costs. The EEOC argued that these two defenses must be stricken because they are not affirmative defenses. The Court found that regardless of any ultimate entitlement to them, requests for fees and costs are not affirmative defenses to a substantive claim. Id. at *7. In recommending that the fourth and eighth affirmative defenses not be stricken, the Magistrate Judge found it "crucial that the EEOC has not moved to strike the seventh affirmative defense," which also asserted a claim for attorneys' fees, costs, and sanctions, premised, essentially, on the same facts undergirding the EEOC's decision to bring its enforcement action. Therefore, even if the fourth and eighth defenses were stricken, the scope of discovery would not be altered materially. Id. at *8. The Magistrate Judge concluded that no prejudice would attach to a decision not to strike the fourth and eighth affirmative defenses because discovery into the EEOC's decision to sue would commence regardless. The Court disagreed and stated that because these so-called affirmative defenses were not affirmative defenses, they generated no right to pretrial discovery in the first place, and denial of the motion to strike would prejudice the EEOC by denying its right to be free of them in the course of the substantive litigation. Id. at *9. The Court further determined that the EEOC's failure to move against the seventh defense was not a barrier to striking the fourth and eighth affirmative defenses. Accordingly, because the EEOC would be burdened by the inclusion of the fourth, seventh and eighth affirmative defenses seeking attorneys' fees, costs, and sanctions, the Court ruled these defenses stricken from Defendant's answer. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court adopted the report and recommendation in part and ruled on the EEOC's motion to strike.

EEOC v. Day & Zimmerman NPS, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 133918 (D. Conn. Aug. 22, 2017). In the fall of 2012, Defendant hired 147 temporary electricians, including the charging party, who was a member of Local 35 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers ("Local 35"). Id. at *4. After the charging party began training for the position, he provided a doctor's note to Defendant indicating that he could not work around radiation. The note requested a reasonable accommodation. After receiving the doctor's note and the request for a reasonable accommodation, Defendant terminated the charging party's employment. In October 2012, the charging party filed a charge of discrimination with the EEOC, alleging that Defendant failed to accommodate his disability reasonably and unlawfully terminated his employment. Id. at *5. In March 2014, the EEOC sought information from Defendant as part of its investigation of the employee's charge, including the names and contact information of other electricians who had worked for Defendant at the Millstone Power Station in Waterford, Connecticut in the fall of 2012. In June 2014, before providing the requested information to the EEOC, Defendant sent a letter to approximately 146 individuals, all of whom were members of Local 35 and all of whom had worked or continued to work for Defendant. Id. at *6-7. In the June 2014 letter, Defendant identified the allegedly aggrieved employee by name and indicated that he had filed a charge of discrimination on the basis of disability. The letter identified his union local, the medical restrictions on his ability to work, and the accommodation he had requested. It further informed the recipients of their right to refuse to speak to the EEOC investigator, and offered them the option to have counsel present if they chose to speak to the EEOC. The EEOC subsequently sued, and moved for partial summary judgment on its interference claim under the ADA. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that: (i) the EEOC's legal theories would violate Defendant's free speech rights under the First Amendment of the U. S. Constitution; (ii) that the June 2014 letter was protected by the litigation privilege under Connecticut law; (iii) that the EEOC could not, as a matter of law, make out a claim for retaliation under the ADA; (iv) that the EEOC could not, as a matter of law, make out a claim for interference under the ADA; and (v) that the EEOC lacked standing to bring this case under Article III of the U.S. Constitution. The Court denied both parties' motions for summary judgment. First, the Court rejected Defendant's claim that the EEOC lacked Article III standing to bring the case because no punitive or compensatory damages were available to the EEOC. Id. at *13-14. The Court noted that Defendant cited to no legal authority supporting that proposition. Defendant argued that if the Court found that its sending of the letter was either retaliation or interference in violation of the ADA, then the Court would be establishing a content and speaker-based restriction on speech that violated the First Amendment. The Court rejected this argument, holding that Defendant identified no authority supporting its argument that the First Amendment protects speech from a Defendant if that speech gives rise to liability under the ADA or other employment discrimination statutes. Id. at *16-19. Turning to the ADA retaliation claim, Defendant argued that there was no genuine dispute of material fact that the EEOC would not be able to establish the third and fourth prongs of the prima facie case of retaliation under the ADA, i.e., either an adverse employment action or a causal connection between the protected activity and the adverse employment action. Id. at *26-28. Defendant also argued that, even if the EEOC showed a genuine dispute of material fact as to the prima facie case for retaliation, the EEOC did not rebut Defendant's legitimate non-retaliatory reasons for sending the letter. The Court found that when an employer disseminates an employee's administrative charge of discrimination to an employee's colleagues, a reasonable fact-finder could determine that such conduct constitutes an adverse employment action. In regards to Defendant's legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for sending the letter – to "minimize business disruption" and notify the recipients that Defendant had disclosed their "home telephone numbers and addresses . . . to the EEOC" – the Court found that a reasonable jury also could conclude that Defendant's explanation was pretextual because the letter did not need to explain that recipients need not speak to the EEOC investigator and that counsel for Defendant could be present if the recipient chose to speak to the EEOC. Id. at *34. Finally, the Court addressed both parties' motion for summary judgment on the ADA interference claim. Id. at *35-39. The EEOC argued that Defendant interfered with the rights under the ADA of all the letter recipients because a reasonable jury would need to conclude that the letter had a tendency to chill recipients from exercising their rights under the ADA. Citing its previous order denying Defendant's motion to dismiss, where the Court held that the disclosure of sensitive personal information about an individual could well dissuade that individual from making or supporting a charge of discrimination under the ADA, the Court found that a reasonable jury could conclude that the letter could have the effect of interfering with or intimidating the letter's recipients with respect to communicating with the EEOC about possible disability discrimination by Defendant. Accordingly, explaining that because this question should be reserved for the jury, the Court denied both parties' motions for summary judgment.

EEOC v. Frontier Hot-Dip Galvanizing*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 208632 (W.D.N.Y. Dec. 18, 2017). The EEOC filed an action against on behalf of two employees alleging that Defendant subjected them to discrimination on the basis of their race (African-American) in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The EEOC moved to strike 11 of Defendant Frontier's affirmative defenses. Frontier in turn had sued Coastal Staffing Services of New York ("Coastal Staffing"), who filed a motion for judgment on the pleadings; subsequently, Frontier filed a motion to amend its third-party complaint. Id. at *1-2. The Magistrate Judge recommended granting the EEOC's motion in part, granting Costal Staffing's motion, and denying Frontier's motion. Frontier commenced a third-party action against Coastal Staffing on the basis that Coastal Staffing breached its contract to provide the best quality services in providing staff to Frontier, and failed to properly train and/or screen staff to exclude individuals who would engage in misconduct. Id. at *2-3. Frontier's proposed amended complaint asserted that Coastal Staffing was an employer and/or joint employer and that Costal Staffing knew or should have known that its employees had a history of engaging in inappropriate and/or unlawful discriminatory harassment. Id. at *4. The Magistrate Judge found that Frontier failed to allege any agreement by Coastal Staffing to screen employees for a history of workplace discrimination, let alone an unmistakable intent on the third-party contract that Coastal Staffing would indemnify, contribute, or otherwise incur liability for discrimination or retaliation at Frontier's workplace. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended that Coastal Staffing's motion for judgment on the pleadings be granted and Frontier's motion to amend its complaint be denied as futile. Id. at *9. As to the EEOC's motion to strike, the Magistrate Judge rejected Frontier's second affirmative defense that the employees represented by the EEOC failed to exhaust all available administrative remedies because it failed to articulate which, if any, administrative procedures the EEOC failed to complete before bringing suit. Id. at *10. As Title VII "imposes no limitation upon the power of the EEOC to file suit in federal court," the Magistrate Judge recommended striking this affirmative defense with prejudice. Id. at *12. The fourth affirmative defense asserted that the complaint exceeded the scope of the administrative charges of discrimination made by the complaining employees. The Magistrate Judge stated that the content of an individual employee's charge does not limit the scope of a lawsuit brought by the EEOC in an enforcement capacity, and therefore recommended that this affirmative defense be stricken with prejudice. The sixth affirmative defense asserted that Frontier was not liable for the acts of its employees. The Magistrate Judge concluded that this affirmative defense was not available when, as here, the supervisor's harassment culminated in a tangible employment action, such as discharge. Id. at *14. The Magistrate Judge also recommended striking the defenses asserting that the employees represented by the EEOC were estopped from asserting their claims, due to lache, and unclean hands. The 16th affirmative defense asserted that the EEOC failed to engage in a good faith conciliation and failed to provide Frontier with information that would allow Frontier to investigate the claims, and the 18th affirmative defense asserted that the EEOC failed to endeavor to eliminate the alleged unlawful employment practice by informal methods of conference, conciliation, or persuasion. Id. at *17. The Magistrate Judge held that the EEOC failed to establish that there was no factual or legal issue regarding its compliance with its obligations under 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(b) or that discovery with respect to those obligations would be prejudicial. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the motion to dismiss these affirmative defenses be denied. Id. at *19.

EEOC v. Sterling Jewelers Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3011 (W.D.N.Y. Jan. 4, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant engaged in a nationwide pattern or practice of sex-based pay and promotion discrimination in violation of Title VII. The EEOC filed a motion to compel Defendant to produce four documents in discovery. Id. at *1. Defendant had produced hundreds of thousands of documents with respect to the lawsuit and in a parallel arbitration entitled Jock, et al. v. Sterling Jewelers Inc. On March 27, 2013, Defendant advised the EEOC that it had inadvertently produced over 1,000 documents labeled "attorney-client privileged" or "attorney work product," and that the documents should be returned and/or destroyed pursuant to the parties' negotiated protocol and confidentiality order. Defendant sought the return and/or destruction of the documents pursuant to the claw-back provisions of the confidentiality order entered into between Sterling and the EEOC, which provided that a party's inadvertent production of privileged information did not operate as a waiver of the privilege. The EEOC agreed to destroy the documents, but reserved the right to demand production in the future if additional facts came to light that impacted the claim of privilege. Subsequently, in the Jock arbitration, a similar issue relative to the four documents was litigated before a Special Master, who ruled that Defendant had waived the privilege by waiting a month to request return of the documents. Claimants in Jock then submitted the documents in support of their motion for class certification. On February 2, 2015, the Arbitrator granted their motion and certified Claimants' disparate impact class claims on liability issues only ("Class Determination Award"). Id. at *4. In making the award, the Arbitrator quoted directly from three of the four documents at issue. Defendant then filed a motion to vacate the Arbitrator's Class Determination Award in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York. Defendant attached an unredacted copy of the Award to its public filing. Subsequently, in November of 2016, the EEOC requested that Defendant produce the four documents quoted in the Award. Defendant refused on the grounds that the documents were privileged. The EEOC argued that the documents were not privileged and that even if the documents were privileged, Defendant had waived the privilege by publicly disclosing some of the contents of the documents in its motion to vacate the Award. The EEOC further asserted that Defendant was collaterally estopped from asserting the privilege because of a finding of waiver in the parallel arbitration proceeding. In rejecting the EEOC's position, the Magistrate Judge held that all of the documents were privileged. The Magistrate Judge further ruled that Defendant waived the privilege only as to the portions of information that it publicly disclosed in its motion to vacate the Award. Accordingly, Defendant did not waive the privilege as to the entirety of the documents. The Magistrate Judge also found that the doctrine of collateral estoppel did not apply because the issues raised in both cases were not identical. The Magistrate Judge noted that the EEOC did not initially challenge Defendant's claw-back request and agreed to return or destroy the documents pursuant to the confidentiality order. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge granted the EEOC's motion to compel in part and denied it in part.

EEOC v. Sterling Jewelers Inc., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 200269 (W.D.N.Y. May 4, 2017). The EEOC sued Defendant for alleged systemic discrimination relative to the starting pay and promotional opportunities of female sales employees who worked for Defendant in over 1,800 retail jewelry stores in all 50 states. The claimants at issue numbered over 77,000 current and former employees. The EEOC asserted that Defendant engaged in disparate treatment discrimination in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and it sought compensatory and punitive damages on behalf of the claimants. The Commission also asserted that Defendant's pay and promotion practices had a disparate impact on female sales employees. After extensive discovery, Defendant moved for partial summary judgment on the grounds that the EEOC failed to fulfill its statutory prerequisites to filing suit, and that it had falsely plead that it had conducted a nationwide investigation of Defendant's pay and promotional practice prior to filing its lawsuit. Although the EEOC asserted that it had conducted a sufficient investigation of Defendant's pay and promotional practices, Defendant argued that the EEOC's pre-suit investigation involved only 2 stores in Buffalo, New York, and Tampa, Florida. The District Court agreed with Defendant, dismissed the litigation, and granted the motion for partial summary judgment in EEOC v. Sterling Jewelers, 3 F. Supp. 3d 57 (W.D.N.Y. 2015). The EEOC appealed, and during the briefing on the appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Mach Mining LLC v. EEOC, 135 S. Ct. 1645 (2015), that – as to the scope of review when the Commission's efforts at conciliation are in dispute – so long as some effort was made at conciliation, that was sufficient in terms of fulfilling the statutory pre-suit requirements of the EEOC, and no more probing judicial review is appropriate. Subsequently, the Second Circuit reversed the dismissal of the litigation in EEOC v. Sterling, 801 F.3d 96 (2d Cir. 2015), on the grounds that the District Court should not have analyzed the degree to which the EEOC had conducted an investigation, as any investigation was sufficient (on the grounds that, similar to the review of the conciliation issues in Mach Mining, the EEOC's investigation duties should be construed in a similar fashion). After the U.S. Supreme Court denied Defendant's petition for certiorari, the case was remained to the District Court for trial. Subsequently, that parties settled. The consent decree agreed to by the EEOC included no monetary relief for any of the 77,000 claimants. Further, the consent decree did not provide for appointment of an outside monitor relative to oversight of the employer's pay and promotional practices. The consent decree obligated Defendant to train its managers on avoidance of workplace discrimination, and required the employer to engage an outside employment practice expert to review its pay and promotional practices and to make recommendations for avoiding discrimination if the outside expert found any adverse impact on the pay and promotional practices. Specifically, as part of the consent decree, Defendant maintained all management discretion in terms of its administration of human resources functions, but agreed to retain an employment practices expert to work with Defendant to evaluate and recommend changes, if any, regarding: (i) skills and competencies necessary for certain retail positions; (ii) essential valid criteria for promotion; (iii) factors used to set starting pay: (iv) Defendant's policies or procedures for setting starting wages; (v) procedures that enabled Defendant to monitor compensation of sales associates; (vi) identification of disparities in compensation of female and male retail sales employees; and (vii) Defendant's promotion programs with the goal of increasing participation of eligible qualified women. Id. at *12. The Consent Decree also outlined the ways that the employment practices expert would focus on equal employment procedures for compensation and promotion, including: (i) working on job descriptions for positions bases upon job analyses; (ii) evaluating criteria for starting rate of pay and merit pay for positions; and (iii) maintaining a registry for employees to express interest in promotions and other employment-related opportunities. Further, Defendant was required to post a notice of the consent decree in each of its stores. Defendant also was required to bear the costs incurred with implementation of the consent decree and each party agreed to bear their own attorneys' fees and expenses incurred in the litigation. Id. at *46.

Editor's Note: The settlement of this lawsuit is precedent-setting insofar as it was the largest EEOC lawsuit ever filed (involving over 77,000 claimants), and was resolved for the payment of no money and without the requirement of an outside monitor.

EEOC v. United Parcel Service, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34929 (E.D.N.Y Mar. 9, 2017). The EEOC brought an action against Defendant alleging that Defendant violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and discriminated against the charging parties when it refused to provide religious accommodations to employees. Id. at *1, 3. Defendant's appearance policy prohibited male employees from having beards and growing their hair longer than collar length. Id. at *3. The EEOC moved to strike seven of Defendant's affirmative defenses pursuant to Rule 12(f). Id. at *2. The Magistrate Judge recommended that the EEOC's motion to strike be granted as to the defenses of: (i) failure to conciliate; (ii) failure to exhaust administrative remedies; and (iii) limitations of claims. Id. at 58. The Magistrate Judge recommended that the motion be denied as to: (i) waiver and estoppel; (ii) laches and unclean hands; (iii) the statute of limitations; and (iv) failure to make a prompt determination. Id. at 58. The Magistrate Judge noted at the outset that motions to strike are generally disfavored. Id. at *9. Defendant acknowledged that the EEOC had reached out to resolve and engage in conciliation, but alleged that the EEOC acted in bad faith. Id. at *19. The Magistrate Judge recommended that the defense be stricken because the appropriate scope of review was limited to a determination of whether the parties conciliated and not to whether it was in good faith. Id. at *20. The Magistrate Judge recommended that the defense of failure to exhaust the administrative procedures also be granted because of the limited nature of the judicial review of the EEOC's pre-suit obligations and Defendant's failure to plead this defense with particularity. Id. at *47. The Magistrate Judge also recommended that the affirmative defense of limitation of claims be stricken because the EEOC is permitted to add claimants and charges to a complaint after suit has been filed based on an investigation conducted during the process of litigation. Id. at 55. The Magistrate Judge recommended denying the motion as to the defense of waiver and estoppel because it was impossible to state definitively, due to limited discovery, that there were no set of facts that would provide a viable defense of waiver or estoppel. Id. at *37. As to unclean hands, because there is no per se rule against assertions of the defense of laches and unclean hands against the EEOC and as limited discovery had been conducted, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the motion to strike be denied as premature. Id. at *42. Regarding the statute of limitations, because the Court had previously addressed that question and found that factual issues remained as to when Defendant received sufficient notice of the EEOC's investigation for the purposes of triggering the 300-day filing limit, the Magistrate Judge recommended that EEOC's motion to strike Defendant's statute of limitations defense be denied. Id. at *46. Because there were still factual issues surrounding whether the EEOC failed to make a prompt determination, the Magistrate Judge recommended denying the motion to strike this defense as well. Id. at *58. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the EEOC's motion to strike Defendant's affirmative defenses be granted in part and denied in part. Id.

EEOC v. United Parcel Service, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101564 (E.D.N.Y June 29, 2017). The EEOC brought an action against Defendant alleging that it violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and discriminated against individuals, as well as a nationwide group of similarly-situated employees when it refused to provide religious accommodations to employees. Id. at *2. Defendant's appearance policy prohibited male employees that had customer contact from having beards and growing their hair longer than collar length. Id. at *3. The EEOC brought a motion to strike Defendant's affirmative defenses. The Magistrate Judge recommended that the motion be granted as to: (i) failure to conciliate; (ii) failure to exhaust administrative remedies; and (iii) limitations of claims. The Magistrate Judge recommended that the motion be denied as to: (i) waiver/estoppel; (ii) laches and unclean hands; (iii) statute of limitations; and (iv) failure to make a prompt determination. On Rule 72 review, the Court considered the parties' objections and granted the EEOC's motion to strike as to all of Defendant's affirmative defenses except: (i) statute of limitations; (ii) waiver/estoppel; and (iii) limitations of claims as to yet named claimants. Id. at *53. Neither party objected to the recommendation that the Court deny the motion to strike the statute of limitations defense; therefore, the Court denied the EEOC's motion to strike as the statute of limitations defense. Id. at *18. Defendant objected to the recommendation that the Court strike Defendant's defense of failure to conciliate. Id. at *18. The Court ruled that the EEOC had met its obligation to conciliate, as Defendant submitted numerous letters between the parties as part of their conciliation efforts and did not dispute that the EEOC attempted to conciliate the charges. Id. at *26. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motion to strike this defense. The EEOC objected to the recommendation that the Court deny its motion to strike Defendant's affirmative defense of waiver and/or estoppel and argued that where the government undertakes to enforce a public right or protect the public interest, equitable defenses cannot apply. Id. at *30. The Court disagreed and denied the motion to strike, reasoning that the law as to the applicability of equitable defenses to government agencies was not well settled. Id. at *34. The EEOC also objected to the recommendation that the Court deny its motion to strike as to the affirmative defense of latches. Id. at *34. The Court agreed with the EEOC's argument that the Court had already rejected the affirmative defense of laches when it denied Defendant's motion to dismiss on that basis, and therefore it granted the motion. Defendant objected to the recommendation that the Court strike the affirmative defense of failure to exhaust the administrative procedures. Id. at *39. The Court agreed with the recommendation and opined that Defendant failed to articulate which procedures the EEOC failed to exhaust. To the extent that Defendant challenged the EEOC's investigatory process, neither party disputed that the EEOC investigated the claim and the Court's review was limited to that determination. Id. at *41. Defendant also objected to the recommendation that the Court strike Defendant' affirmative defense of limitation of claims in that the EEOC should not be able to recover any damages or pursue any claim on behalf of any claimant based on conduct outside the scope of the underlying charge of discrimination, or based upon conduct outside the scope of the charging parties' respective charges. Id. at *42. The Court adopted the recommendation, but only as to the yet-unnamed claimants. Id. at *45. The EEOC also objected to the recommendation that the Court deny its motion to strike Defendant's affirmative defense of failure to make prompt determinations. Id. at *50. The Court declined to adopt the recommendation and ruled that this defense was legally insufficient as Title VII does not require the EEOC to complete its investigation and issue a determination within a particular time-frame. Id. In sum, the Court granted the EEOC's motion in part and denied it in part.

(iii) Third Circuit

EEOC v. Bob Evans, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 131015 (W.D. Pa. Aug. 17, 2017). The EEOC brought an action claiming that Defendant discriminated against the charging party because she was pregnant in violation of Title VII. Id. at *1. The EEOC moved for partial summary judgment as to liability and as to Defendant's "good faith defense." Id. a*t* *2. In turn, Defendant moved for summary judgment as to liability and alternatively summary judgment as to the claims for emotional distress, damages, and injunctive relief. Id. at *3. The Court granted the EEOC's motion for summary judgment as to liability, but denied it as to the good faith affirmative defense. Id. at *81. In addition, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. The charging party worked as a food server and Defendant used an automated computer-based scheduling system to create its employees' schedules. Id. at *6-7. Servers could change their availability in the system for purposes of the automated generated shift schedule. Id. The charging party was due to give birth in September and testified that her manager asked her in mid-July when she would be taking leave at which time she indicated that she would work until she had the baby. Id. at *11. She further testified that the manager indicated that she should take her name out of the automated schedule but that she would still get her hours. Id. at *12. Defendant did not dispute that the manager said he was going to set her availability to zero, but disputed that the charging party objected to being taken out of the automated schedule. Id. The manager took the charging party out of the automated schedule, and she worked less shifts than she had previously and was required to call to see if there were shifts available for her to work. Id. at *19. Defendant asserted that the manager removed the charging party from the automated scheduling system because he believed her due date was imminent and her attendance was unpredictable, and not because of her pregnancy. Id. at *23. Defendant argued that manager made the decision to remove the charging party from the automated scheduling system for the predictability of the schedule and to ensure the restaurant's staffing needs. Id. Defendant asserted that this was an indirect evidence case and the EEOC could not establish an inference of discriminatory motive under the burden-shifting framework for indirect evidence cases. Id. The EEOC argued that there was no genuine issue of fact and that the undisputed direct evidence established intentional discrimination against the charging party based on her pregnancy as a matter of law. Id. The Court agreed with the EEOC and ruled that there was direct undisputed evidence that Defendant discriminated against the charging party because of her pregnancy. Id. at *51. The Court opined that she suffered an adverse employment action because she went from a regularly scheduled worker to a fill-in worker because she was pregnant. Id. at *58. The Court denied the EEOC's argument that because Defendant did not list pregnancy discrimination in its anti-discrimination policy it was not entitled to raise the good faith affirmative defense, as there was evidence from which a reasonable jury could find that the conduct of the manager was contrary to the good faith efforts of Defendant to comply with Title VII. Id. at *76. The Court also denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment on punitive damages because there was evidence from which a jury could find that Defendant's violation was willful. Id. at *77. The Court further denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to injunctive relief, ruling that the parties at trial will present evidence as to whether there is a cognizable danger of recurrent violation. Id. at *81. In sum, the Court granted the EEOC's motion for summary judgment on liability, but denied it as to the good faith defense to punitive damages. Id. The Court also denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment in all respects. Id.

EEOC v. City Of Long Branch*, 866 F.3d 93 (3d Cir. 2017). The EEOC investigated a charge filed by Lyndon Johnson, an African-American Lieutenant in the Long Branch Police Department, who alleged that he was discriminated against on the basis of his race in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Johnson alleged that he was subjected to different and harsher disciplinary measures than similarly-situated white colleagues who committed the same or similar infractions. During the investigation, the EEOC requested disciplinary records for Johnson and six white comparators. In response, Defendant notified the EEOC that it was gathering the materials, but would produce them only if the EEOC agreed to certain restrictions in the use and disclosure of the confidential materials. Id. at 96. The restrictions included a prohibition against providing any material designated confidential in whole or in part, other than in the form of the EEOC's opinions and conclusions to Johnson, and/or his counsel. Id. When the EEOC refused to agree to the restrictions, Defendant advised the EEOC that it would not produce the requested information absent a judicial order. Id. at 97. The EEOC subsequently brought a subpoena enforcement action to secure the records, and the Magistrate Judge issued an order to enforce the subpoena in part. The Magistrate Judge compelled Defendant to provide the requested documents, but required the EEOC to avoid disclosure of the comparators' employment and personnel records to Johnson, reasoning that disclosure of the comparators' records to Johnson would be improper. Id. Per Rule 72, the EEOC sought review of the order with the District Court. The District Court adopted the Magistrate Judge's order. On appeal, the Third Circuit vacated the District Court's ruling and remanded for further proceedings. The EEOC raised two substantive issues on appeal, the first regarding the exhaustion of administrative remedies and the second regarding the disclosure to the charging party of other employees' disciplinary and related records. Based on its review of the record, the Third Circuit found a significant procedural defect pertaining to the treatment of the motion to enforce under the Federal Magistrates Act, which precluded it from reaching the merits of the EEOC's arguments. The Third Circuit held that the District Court erroneously treated the motion to enforce that the Magistrate Judge had reviewed as a non-dispositive motion instead of a dispositive motion. The Third Circuit explained that there is a meaningful distinction under the Federal Magistrates Act as the categorization of a motion dictates the level of authority with which a Magistrate Judge may act on a motion and the availability and standard of review afforded by the District Court. Id. at 98. The Third Circuit stated that it previously had held that because a proceeding to enforce an administrative subpoena "is over regardless of which way the Court rules," a motion to enforce an administrative subpoena is a dispositive motion. Accordingly, any assignment of the motion by the District Court required the Magistrate Judge "to submit to a judge of the Court proposed findings of fact and recommendations" for the motion. Id. at 100. The Third Circuit reasoned that had the motion been so assigned, the parties could have objected to the Magistrate Judge's report and recommendation, in which case the District Court would have reviewed their objections or been silent as to objections, and would have "given some reasoned consideration to the Magistrate Judge's report before adopting it as the decision of the Court." Id. Hence, the District Court's erroneous categorization of the motion was compounded by the fact that the EEOC raised the disclosure issue, but not the exhaustion issue, to the District Court. As a result, the Third Circuit found that the District Court – proceeding as if the motion had been referred to the Magistrate Judge as non-dispositive – applied the clearly erroneous or contrary to law standard to the objected-to disclosure issue and apparently did not review the unobjected-to exhaustion issue at all. Id. at 101. The Third Circuit thereby vacated the District Court's ruling and remanded for further proceedings. The Third Circuit ruled that the District Court could consider the motion to enforce in the first instance or it could treat the Magistrate Judge's order as a report and recommendation and allow the parties the opportunity to object.

EEOC v. Commonwealth Of Pennsylvania*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 107664 (M.D. Pa. June 12, 2017). The EEOC filed an action asserting that Defendant violated the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA"). The EEOC requested that the Court exclude at trial the testimony of Monique Ericson ("Ericson"), a forensic accountant and expert witness on the subject of back pay damages offered by Defendant based on Ericson's reliance on the "aggregate method" of calculating such damages in her report. The EEOC argued specifically that mitigation of back pay must be calculated periodically by quarter rather than in the aggregate and that Ericson's report and testimony based on an aggregate method were thus inadmissible under Rule 702. Id. at *1. Defendant conceded that "it is true that [the] periodic mitigation method of computation for back pay may be the preferred manner of calculation," but asserted that "the aggregate computation method may also be used," and that the periodic mitigation method applies, that mitigation should be calculated annually rather than quarterly. Id. at *2. The Court opined that limited decisional law exists on the question of proper calculation of mitigation in cases such as this, and in which the aggrieved individual, Joseph Bednarik ("Bednarik"), over time earned total mitigation income exceeding his total back pay damages. The Court further observed that the Third Circuit has not addressed whether the aggregate mitigation method or the periodic mitigation method applies in such circumstances, but that other case law authorities addressing the question routinely adopt the periodic mitigation method and that the practical implications of the aggregate mitigation method incentivize employers to delay a remedy as long as possible because "every day the employee put[s] in on the better paying job reduce[s] back pay liability." Id. The Court agreed with the EEOC to the extent that a periodic mitigation method rather than an aggregate mitigation method should apply to any back pay damages calculation sub judice, but disagreed with the EEOC to the extent it recommended quarterly computations. The Court concluded that the weight of authority in the ADEA context supports computation on a yearly basis. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motion in limine to the extent that the aggregate mitigation method for calculating back pay damages was used. Id. at *3. The Court further stated that to the extent Bednarik was entitled to back pay damages, they would be calculated pursuant to the periodic mitigation method on a yearly basis.

EEOC v. Scott Medical Health Center, P.C.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 189577 (W.D. Pa. Nov. 16, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant subjected the charging party, Dale Massaro, to harassment on the basis of his sex in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Defendant defaulted, and the Court held a hearing on damages, after which it issued findings of fact and conclusions of law based on the hearing. The Court determined that Massaro was subjected to sex-based harassment in the form of anti-gay slurs and comments directed at him by his supervisor, Robert McClendon, including being repeatedly referred to as "faggot" and having to endure offensive questioning about his sex life and relationships. Massaro reported the harassment to Defendant's owner and chief executive officer, but he refused to take action to stop the harassment. Id. at *3. The harassment continued, and eventually Massaro was forced to quit his job. Massaro suffered depression and emotional distress as a result of the harassment and loss of employment. Massaro started receiving counseling for his depression through an employee assistance program and received medical treatment for his emotional distress. Id. at *5. The Court noted that although Defendant had an anti-harassment policy, Massaro was never trained on the policy, and was not permitted to read or have a copy of the policy. The Court found that EEOC proved by preponderance of the evidence that Massaro was entitled to a back pay award and it adopted the EEOC's back pay calculation, including pre-judgment interest, using the adjusted prime rate, in the amount of $5,500.43. Id. at *8. The Court further determined that the EEOC proved by a preponderance of the evidence that Massaro was entitled to an award of non-pecuniary compensatory damages. The Court noted that the witness testimony demonstrated that Massaro sustained significant emotional distress caused by McClendon's severe harassment of Massaro and his resulting loss of employment, including depression, anxiety, social isolation, changes to his sleeping patterns, and significant weight gain. Id. at *10-11. The Court therefore held that Massaro sustained compensatory damages in excess of the $50,000 statutory damages limit set forth at 42 U.S.C. § 1981a(b)(3)(A). The Court awarded damages to that cap. Id. at *11. The Court also granted an award of punitive damages in the amount of $75,000, based on its conclusion that the discrimination for which Defendant had been found liable was intentional and egregious. Id. at *16. Finally, the Court determined that injunctive relieve was also warranted in this case. Based on the foregoing, the Court found that the EEOC demonstrated its entitlement to back pay, compensatory and punitive damages on behalf of Mr. Massaro, as well as to injunctive relief.

(iv) Fourth Circuit

EEOC v. Bojangles Restaurants*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 105347 (E.D.N.C. July 6, 2017). The EEOC filed an action on behalf of Jonathan Wolfe ("Wolfe") alleging that Defendant subjected her to a hostile work environment due to her gender identify in violation of Title VII. The EEOC further stated that Defendant discriminated and retaliated against Wolfe by involuntarily transferring her and terminating her for complaining about the alleged harassment. Defendant served a subpoena on Wolfe's current employer, Worth the Weight, Inc. ("Worth the Weight") requesting production of documents, including all personnel records, documents, files or correspondence relating to Wolfe. Id. at *3. The EEOC moved to quash the subpoena served on Worth the Weight on the grounds that it was procedurally defective, sought irrelevant and duplicative information, was overbroad, and imposed an undue burden. Id. The EEOC first argued that the subpoena was procedurally defective. The Court held that the subpoena on its face contained procedural defects that required correction. The Court found that in violation of Rule 45(a)(2), the subpoena was issued from the Western District of North Carolina, and not the Eastern District of North Carolina, where the action was pending. Id. at *13. Second, the subpoena commanded production of documents from Fayetteville, North Carolina to a location in Charlotte, North Carolina, which exceeded the permissible 100 mile geographical limit imposed by Rule 45 by a distance of approximately 30 miles. Id. The Court held that the flaw required quashing or modifying the subpoena. The Court stated that it would allow Defendant to reissue its subpoena to correct the deficiencies, and therefore it addressed the EEOC's substantive objections. On the merits, the EEOC argued that the subpoena to Worth the Weight should be quashed for seeking irrelevant and duplicative information and imposing an undue burden. As noted, the subpoena to Worth the Weight sought any and all personnel records, documents, files, or correspondence relating to Wolfe. Id. at *13-14. The EEOC conceded that the pay information sought by this subpoena was relevant, but argued it was unreasonably duplicative because tax transcripts have been provided. The Court disagreed and opined that Defendant is not precluded from seeking pay information from Worth the Weight merely because the EEOC provided similar information from another source. Id. at *14. The EEOC also argued that all of the other information contained in Wolfe's personnel file was not even tangentially related to discrimination and retaliation Wolfe experienced while employed by Defendant. The Court again disagreed and found that Defendant offered a credible basis for seeking Wolfe's records bearing on performance evaluations, job applications, and resumes, where one of its defenses concerns Wolfe's public disclosure of her gender identity. However, the Court determined that seeking an entire personnel record could capture "medical information, . . . information about family members, and other documents completely extraneous to this litigation." Id. at *15. The Court therefore directed Defendant to provide a more narrow description of the documents sought and specifically exclude any documents relating to medical information, information about family members, or other extraneous materials. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motion to quash in part and directed Defendant to revise and reissue the subpoena.

EEOC v. Consol Energy, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 10385 (4th Cir. June 12, 2017). The EEOC alleged that Defendant refused to provide an employee with a religious accommodation by subjecting him to a biometric hand scanner for purposes of clocking-in and out of work. The employee believed the hand scanner was used to identify and collect personal information that would be used by the Christian Anti-Christ, as described in the New Testament Book of Revelation, to identify followers with the "mark of the beast." Id. at *2. Following a jury verdict in favor of the EEOC, the District Court denied Defendant's renewed motion for judgment as a matter of law under Rule 50(b), motion for a new trial under Rule 59, and motion to amend the Court's findings and conclusions under Rule 59. On appeal, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. In 2012, Defendant implemented a biometric hand-scanner system at the mine where the employee worked in order to better monitor attendance and work hours. Id. at *4. The scanner system required each employee clocking-in or out of a shift to scan his or her right hand; the shape of the right hand was then linked to the worker's unique personnel number. While Defendant implemented the scanner to produce more efficient and accurate time reporting, the employee alleged it presented a threat to his core religious commitments. As the employee consistently and unsuccessfully sought an accommodation that would preclude him from having to clock-in with the scanner, Defendant meanwhile allowed employees with injured hands to scan in using a different keypad system. Id. at *7. Eventually, the employee decided to retire in lieu of using the hand-scanner, and later found a lower paying job. The EEOC thereafter brought an action against Defendant on behalf of the employee, alleging a failure to accommodate religious beliefs and constructive discharge. Id. at *9. After the case ultimately proceeded to trial, the jury found Defendant liable for failing to accommodate the employee's religious beliefs. The jury awarded $150,000 in compensatory damages and $436,860.74 in front pay, back pay, and lost benefits. Id. at *10-11. Defendant then filed a renewed motion for judgment as a matter of law under Rule 50(b), a motion for a new trial under Rule 59, and a motion to amend the Court's findings and conclusions under Rule 59. The District Court denied all three post-verdict motions, and Defendant appealed. Id. at *11. The Fourth Circuit affirmed the District Court's denial of Defendant's three post-verdict motions. First, Defendant challenged the denial of its renewed motion for a judgment as a matter of law, arguing that the District Court erred in concluding that there was sufficient evidence to support the jury's verdict against it. Defendant argued that it did not fail to reasonably accommodate the employee's religious beliefs because there was in fact no conflict between his beliefs and its requirement that he use the hand scanner system. The Fourth Circuit rejected this argument, noting that in both the employee's request for an accommodation and his trial testimony, the employee laid out his religious objection to use of the scanner system. Id. at *13. Regarding the District Court's denial of its motion for a new trial under Rule 59, Defendant raised a handful of objections that primarily related to the District Court's exclusion of evidence and various issues related to jury instructions. Id. at *20. The Fourth Circuit noted that it would "respect the [D]istrict [C]ourt's decision absent an abuse of discretion, and will disturb that judgment only in the most exceptional circumstances." Id. Further, it opined that, "[w]hen, as here, a new trial is sought based on purported evidentiary errors by the District Court, a verdict may be set aside only if an error is so grievous as to have rendered the entire trial unfair." Id. Applying this standard, the Fourth Circuit found that the District Court did not abuse its discretion. Regarding the jury instructions, the Fourth Circuit held that the District Court properly found that Defendant failed to show any prejudice arising from any of the instructions at issue. Id. at *26. Finally, both parties cross-appealed the District Court's rulings on lost wages and punitive damages. The Fourth Circuit rejected Defendant's argument that the employee failed to adequately mitigate his damages by accepting a lower paying job, noting that whether a worker acted reasonably in accepting particular employment is preeminently a question of fact, and that it would not second-guess the District Court. The Fourth Circuit also rejected the EEOC's cross-appeal regarding punitive damages, holding that the District Court did not err in concluding that the EEOC's evidence fell short of allowing for a determination that Defendant's Title VII violation was the result of the kind of "reckless indifference" necessary to support an award of punitive damages. Id. at *34. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the District Court's denial of Defendant's three post-verdict motions.

EEOC v. Correct Care Solutions,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 105956 (D.S.C. July 10, 2017). The EEOC brought suit on behalf of charging party Kevicia D. Cody, who was hired by Defendant as a licensed practical nurse. Cody allegedly began experiencing seizures, which were currently controlled by medication. The EEOC asserted that Cody's seizures qualified as a disability under the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). After Defendant learned about Cody's seizures, the company's director of nursing required Cody to provide medical clearance in order to continue working for the company. Cody provided a note from her treating physician clearing her to return to work with certain restrictions related to her disability. The EEOC alleged that Defendant placed Cody on unpaid medical leave and ultimately discharged her. The EEOC subsequently filed a motion to dismiss and for attorneys' fees, which the Magistrate Judge recommended granting in part. The Magistrate Judge recommending granting the EEOC's motion to dismiss with prejudice and denying the motion for attorneys' fees. Finding no clear error, the Court adopted the findings of the Magistrate Judge, dismissed the complaint, and denied the motion for attorneys' fees.

EEOC v. McLeod Health, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 154156 (D.S.C. Sept. 21, 2017). The EEOC filed an action under the American With Disabilities Act of 1990 ("ADA") alleging that Defendant subjected the charging party to improper medical examinations and terminated her employment in violation of the ADA. Id. at *1. Summary judgment was previously granted on the improper medical examination claim and the Court remanded to the Magistrate Judge on the wrongful termination claim and requested that the Magistrate Judge address the EEOC's futile gesture doctrine argument, as well as any potential failure to accommodate claim. Id. at *3. The Magistrate Judge recommended summary judgment on the wrongful termination claim and the Court adopted the recommendation. Id. at *4. After discovery closed, Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, and the EEOC introduced a new theory of failure to accommodate, asserting that Defendant's lack of automatic reassignment to a vacant position was evidence in support of a discriminatory discharge. Id. at 7. Defendant objected to the EEOC raising a claim of failure to accommodate or failure to reassign, as the EEOC had not pled a claim of failure to accommodate. Id. at *44. Accordingly, the Court ruled that the Magistrate Judge correctly determined that no claim of failure to accommodate existed. Id. The Magistrate Judge had analyzed the Defendant's alleged failure to accommodate as possible evidence supporting Plaintiff's wrongful discharge claim, and the Court found that this was proper. The Court agreed with the Magistrate Judge's conclusion that the EEOC was unable to meet its burden as to the futile gesture doctrine. Id. at *13. The Court ruled that an objectively reasonable person in the charging party's position would not have believed that the interactive process was futile where the charging party was invited on at least six occasions to submit contrary evidence challenging the characterization of her limitations and restrictions and was repeatedly assured that any evidence would receive consideration. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court rejected the notion that the charging party's failure to obtain an alternative opinion should be excused under the futile gesture doctrine. Id. *13. The undisputed evidence showed that the charging party rejected assignment alternatives that arose during the six months that she was on medical leave of absence, because she was dissatisfied with the reduced pay. Id. at *26. By the time she communicated with Defendant that she was interested in a position, she had been discharged and the ADA's rules for reassignment of employees no longer applied to her. Id. at 27. The Court ruled that the EEOC failed to establish that the discharge occurred under circumstances that raised a reasonable inference of unlawful discrimination and that Defendant's unsuccessful attempts to reassign the charging party did not establish unlawful discrimination. Id. at *36. The evidence established that Defendant was willing to consider the charging party for a position that she was "qualified" for only in a generous view of her qualifications. The evidence established that the charging party declined to pursue the position due to her objection to the rate of pay. Id. at *41. The Court noted that it would be an absurd interpretation of the statute to require an employer to reassign a displaced employee to a vacant position without regard to the employee specifically declining to be considered for the position. Id. at *42. The Court opined that it need not decide this case on a determination of an employer's duty to reassign a displaced employee in contravention of the employer's facially neutral hiring policy, for the EEOC failed to demonstrate a genuine issue of material fact as to the discriminatory nature of the charging party's termination. Id. at *43. Accordingly, the Court granted summary judgment in Defendant's favor.

EEOC v. Mission Hospital, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124183 (W.D.N.C. Aug. 7, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant's policy requiring all employees to get a flu vaccination was discriminatory on the basis of religion in violation of Title VII. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, which the Court denied. The EEOC also filed motions to strike Defendant's expert testimony and certain individual declarations. Thee EEOC alleged that employees had requested religious exemptions to the flu vaccine requirement, but were not provided exemptions and were subsequently terminated when they failed to comply with the vaccination requirement. Defendant asserted that the workers failed to make the request for accommodation by its required deadline and the requests were thereby denied. Id. at *5. Defendant had staggered dates to request exemptions to the flu vaccine requirement, such that exemption requests were due September 1 and employees must be vaccinated by December 1. Id. at *6. The Court stated that this was not a case where Defendant did or did not believe the workers' religious beliefs; instead, it rejected requests for religious accommodations because they did not meet a prescribed deadline. Id. At this stage in the proceedings, the Court found that the EEOC presented a prima facie case of religious discrimination. The Court noted that workers had sincerely held beliefs, communicated those beliefs to Defendant, and adverse employment action was then taken for that reason. Id. at *7. The Court explained however, that assuming a prima facie case was established, the burden would then on Defendant to prove either that: (i) it provided the workers with a reasonable accommodation for their religious observances; or (ii) that such accommodation was not provided because it would have caused an undue hardship. Id. at *7-8. The Court found that with regard to the first prong, the EEOC's own facts noted that since 2012, 89 religious exemptions had been filed, with 23 denied. Id. at *8. Therefore, 74% of religious exemption requests (66/89) had been approved. The Court opined that a jury could reasonably find that a reasonable accommodation to the religious observances would be to timely file an exemption request. Further, with regard to the second prong, the Court noted that Defendant operated a large hospital and that these employees were interacting with vulnerable populations, and therefore a jury could reasonably find that strictly-enforced exemption procedures to vaccination requirements protected the hospital patients. Id. Accordingly, the Court found that genuine issues of material fact existed so that summary judgment was inappropriate. As to the EEOC's motions to strike, it requested that the Court strike certain paragraphs of Dr. Westle's expert testimony, including facts about the prevalence and virulence of the flu virus. The EEOC also asserted that Defendant did not properly designate Dr. Westle as an expert. Id. at *10. The Court held that if the EEOC thought Dr. Westle was a non-expert in the field of medicine, it would have the opportunity, at trial, to challenge his credentials if and when he was offered as an expert witness. Id. The EEOC also sought to strike several individual declarations, arguing that Defendant did not properly disclose them. Id. Defendant claimed that the declarations were covered under the attorney work product privilege, but the EEOC claimed that Defendant did not produce a privilege log. Id. at *11. The Court found that even if the declarations were privileged, Defendant had now introduced them. The Court stated that if the individuals were to testify at trial or if their declarations were used, Defendant must have the opportunity to develop the record. Id. Therefore, the Court held that the EEOC would have the opportunity to depose any of the declarants if: (i) their declarations were to be used at trial; or (ii) the declarants were to be called to testify at trial.

EEOC v. Performance Food Group Co., LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87131 (D. Md. June 6, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant engaged in gender discrimination by failing to hire a class of female applicants for certain positions at its warehouses. The EEOC served a subpoena on Charlotte Perkins, Defendant's former Chief Human Resources Officer ("CHRO") for a deposition and production of documents. Id. at *5. Perkins previously filed a charge of discrimination with the EEOC and later filed a related action in Virginia state court, which Defendant settled. Perkins did not file a motion to quash or otherwise object to the subpoena until she appeared for her deposition, at which time she refused to answer any questions pertaining to the Virginia action or her EEOC charge, among other topics. Id. at *6. Regarding the subpoena's command to produce documents, Perkins initially claimed that they were in the possession of her former attorneys, but after her deposition, she served written objections through her then-current attorney claiming that the documents were "protected from disclosure pursuant to a protective order or a settlement agreement absent a court order." Id. at *6-7. The EEOC subsequently sought an order compelling Perkins to comply with the subpoena and to: (i) order Perkins to answer the questions she refused to answer during her deposition; (ii) order her to produce the documents commanded by the subpoena; and (iii) order the continuance of her deposition. Id. at *7. The EEOC argued that private parties cannot contract to prohibit a person from complying with compulsory process, and that the sealing of any such agreement in Virginia state court had no effect on the enforceability of the subpoena in the EEOC's lawsuit. Id. at *7-8. Defendant opposed the scope and continuance of the deposition, arguing that the EEOC unduly delayed and that Perkins already answered all relevant questions. Id. at *8. The Court found that even if the Virginia action and resulting settlement made no mention of any allegations of discrimination, the documents and testimony in that matter would have concerned Perkins' role as CHRO, where she was uniquely positioned to acquire information relevant to the allegations of "systemic" sex discrimination in this case. The Court found that the EEOC's deposition questions were specifically directed to the nature of Perkins' employment with Defendant and the circumstances of her termination, as well as her statements to EEOC investigators concerning her own allegations of sex discrimination. Id. at *9. Defendant further objected to the continuance of Perkins' deposition on the basis of undue delay, arguing that the EEOC waited nearly nine months to file its motion. The EEOC asserted that any delay was due to a lack of cooperation by Perkins and her counsel, which Defendant could have easily facilitated. Id. at *11. The Court determined that there was ample time left in the current schedule for the parties to prepare for and conduct a continuance of Perkins' deposition. Accordingly, the Court ordered the continuance of Perkins' deposition, but limited the length of the deposition to a maximum of two hours, and required that it be scheduled within 30 days of the date of the Court's order. Id. at *11-12. Turning to Perkins' confidentiality objections, the Court noted that it was well established that the Fourth Circuit does not recognize a settlement privilege, and that confidential settlement materials are not automatically shielded from discovery. Rather, the parties could address confidentiality and privacy concerns through the Court's stipulated confidentiality order. Id. at *12. As to Perkins' written responses, the Court found there was no showing of burden or expense related to the subpoena. The Court therefore ordered Perkins to fully comply with the subpoena's command to produce by no later than seven days prior to the date of her deposition.

EEOC v. Triangle Catering, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28476 (E.D.N.C. Mar. 1, 2017). The EEOC brought an action against Defendant on behalf of Michael Reddick, Jr. ("Reddick"), alleging employment discrimination in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The EEOC alleged that Defendant failed to accommodate Reddick's religious belief of wearing a head covering ("crown") and that Defendant unlawfully discharged Reddick on the basis of his religion, Rastafarian. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment, and the Court granted in part and denied in part the motions. Defendant is a catering company and Reddick applied to be a delivery driver. During his interview, Reddick did not wear religious headwear or discuss a need to wear religious headwear. Following the interview, Defendant hired Reddick as a delivery driver. Reddick began working at Defendant and spent his first day shadowing another employee. The following day, Reddick encountered Defendant's co-owner and executive director, Melissa Aldred, who told Reddick to remove his hat. Id. at *5. Reddick informed Aldred that he wore the hat for religious purposes and indicated that he was Rastafarian. Aldred sent Reddick home from work early and told Reddick that she and another manager needed to discuss how to proceed. Reddick returned to work the next day and was ultimately terminated. Reddick filed a charge of discrimination with the EEOC and it subsequently brought suit. As a threshold matter, Defendant asserted that it was entitled to summary judgment on the basis that Reddick was not Defendant's employee. The EEOC also moved for summary judgment on this affirmative defense. Id. at *15. The Court found that given the materiality of the disputed facts, summary judgment was not proper on the discrete issue of whether or not Reddick was Defendant's employee. The Court therefore ruled that summary judgment was not proper on this basis, and denied the parties' motions. Turning to the EEOC's failure to accommodate claim, the Court determined that it was reasonably related to the charge Reddick filed with the EEOC. Reddick's EEOC charge alleged that he was discharged on a religious basis. The Court stated that the EEOC's investigation of the charge established probable cause that Defendant also failed to accommodate Reddick's religious practices. Defendant contended that because Reddick's actions were inconsistent with his purported beliefs, he did not hold a bona fide religious belief. For example, Defendant noted that despite claiming to need to wear a crown at all times, Reddick did not wear a crown to his interview. Id. at *22. The Court found that while Reddick's purported inconsistences were insufficient to warrant entry of summary judgment in Defendant's favor, they would be relevant to determining whether Reddick's beliefs were sincere. However, the Court determined that viewed in the light most favorable to the EEOC, the temporal proximity between Reddick's interaction with Aldred and his termination, together with the termination notice's reference to the "hat" situation, created a reasonable inference that Reddick's need for a religious accommodation was a motivating factor in Defendant's termination decision. Id. at *23. Therefore, the Court found that the EEOC adduced sufficient evidence to establish a prima facie case for failure to accommodate. Defendant also moved for summary judgment on the EEOC's discriminatory discharge claim. The Court held that the EEOC failed to provide sufficient evidence to establish a prima facie case for discriminatory discharge. The Court found that the EEOC failed to produce evidence establishing that Reddick was performing his job at a level that met his employer's legitimate expectations. The Court explained that the EEOC could not satisfy the element of the prima facie case merely by providing Reddick's self-serving assessment of his work; rather, the EEOC must provide some objective evidence that Reddick's performance met his employer's legitimate expectations. Id. at *29. The Court reasoned that since the EEOC was lacking an essential element of a discriminatory discharge claim, it need not consider the parties' additional arguments. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment on the EEOC's discriminatory discharge claim. Finally, the Court considered, sua sponte, whether Defendant was entitled to summary judgment on the issue of punitive damages. The Court found that a reasonable juror could conclude that Defendant engaged in good faith efforts to comply with Title VII by viewing pass accommodations granted and that Defendant did not act with malice or reckless indifference to Reddick's federally protected rights. Accordingly, the Court granted summary judgment to Defendant on the issue of punitive damages.

(v) Fifth Circuit

EEOC v. Accentcare Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 152472 (N.D. Tex. Sept. 22, 2017). The EEOC brought an alleging that Defendant refused to reasonably accommodate Alisia Beasley's ("Beasley's") disability (bipolar disorder) and discriminated against her by terminating her employment because of her disability in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act. The Court entered a scheduling order that set February 29, 2016 as the deadline for a party to file a motion for leave to amend the pleadings. Defendant moved for summary judgment, which the Court granted in part and denied in part. The EEOC filed a motion for leave to file an amended complaint past the deadline to file. The EEOC sought to amend paragraph 15, which alleged, in relevant part, that "Beasley informed her supervisor that she had seen her psychiatrist who took her off for an indefinite period of time." Id. at *2. The EEOC sought to clarify its use of the term "indefinite" to summarize Beasley's email communication. Id. The Court previously held that, "unless and until the EEOC amends its complaint to change this allegation, the EEOC may not contradict its judicial admission that Beasley informed her supervisor that she had seen her psychiatrist, who took her off for an indefinite period of time." Accordingly, the EEOC now sought to amend the complaint to reflect that "Beasley informed Nelson that as a result of her medical condition, she would be out for an 'extended amount of time.'" Id. at *4. Defendant argued that the EEOC failed to explain the unreasonable delay in seeking to modify the scheduling order, and that Defendant would be significantly prejudiced by the proposed amendment. At the outset, the Court noted that four factors are assessed when deciding whether to grant an untimely motion for leave to amend under Rule 16(b)(4), including: (i) the explanation for the failure to timely move for leave to amend; (ii) the importance of the amendment; (iii) potential prejudice in allowing the amendment; and (iv) the availability of a continuance to cure such prejudice. The EEOC contended that it did not realize until the Court filed its prior opinion that use of the term "indefinite" to summarize Beasley's email communication may have created confusion for the Court and Defendant. Id. at *7. As a result, the Court held that the EEOC provided a sufficient explanation for its failure to move for leave to amend by the Court-ordered deadline. The EEOC further asserted that it is important to amend to ensure that the factual allegations were correct. The Court agreed that the amendment was important and stated that factor also favored amendment. Further, the Court noted that the EEOC presented evidence that would enable a reasonable jury to find that, in Beasley's communications with Defendant, she was actually requesting a few days of leave rather than indefinite leave, and that Defendant terminated her employment before acting on her leave request. The Court found that unless it granted the EEOC leave to amend, the EEOC would will be saddled at trial with the judicial admission that Beasley informed her supervisor that she had seen her psychiatrist, who had taken her off for an indefinite period of time. As to the third factor, Defendant maintained that allowing the EEOC to amend would prejudice it because discovery had already closed and the EEOC had been aware of Defendant's reliance on the admission made in paragraph 15 for more than one year. However, the Court concluded that the amended pleading would not likely cause Defendant to suffer prejudice because no new facts were alleged. Finally, as to the fourth factor, the Court opined that no additional discovery appeared to be necessary given the presence in the current record of supporting evidence for the EEOC's amended allegation, and any prejudice caused by the need for additional trial preparation time arising from allowing this amendment could be accommodated by a trial continuance. Accordingly, the Court held that the EEOC met the good cause standard for modifying the scheduling order, and granted the motion to amend.

EEOC v. Bass Pro Outdoor World, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 495 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 3, 2017). The EEOC brought an enforcement action alleging a pattern or practice of race discrimination in Defendant's stores on a nationwide basis. The EEOC brought claims under §§ 706 and 707 of Title VII. The Court had previously issued several rulings regarding whether the EEOC had satisfied Title VII's administrative requirements, including: (i) that it must undertake distinct analyses of the EEOC's § 706 and § 707 claims on the issue of conciliation; (ii) that the EEOC had satisfied Title VII's conciliation requirements with regard to its § 707 claim; (iii) that the EEOC had not satisfied Title VII's conciliation requirements with regard to its § 706 claim; and (iv) that individuals who had not yet applied to work for Bass Pro by April 26, 2010, the date on which the EEOC issued its letter of determination ("post-LOD applicants") should be dismissed from the case. Id. at *2. The Court reasoned that the EEOC could not possibly have conciliated the claims of these individuals, since they had not yet applied to work for Defendant at the time the conciliation took place. Id. The Court subsequently ruled that the EEOC could prove its § 706 claims using the framework established in Franks v. Bowman Transportation Co., Inc., 424 U.S. 747 (1976), and Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324 (1977). The Court also subsequently opined that the EEOC had satisfied Title VII's administrative prerequisites with regard to its § 706 claims even for individuals not specifically identified during the investigation, although it did not rule on the issue of post-LOD applicants. Id. at *3. The Fifth Circuit then affirmed both that the Franks/Teamsters framework may be applied in § 706 cases and that the EEOC may engage in the investigation and conciliation process without naming specific victims. Id. On remand, the EEOC argued that, in light of the Court's subsequent rulings, as well as the Fifth Circuit's affirmation, the post-LOD applicants should be restored to eligibility for the § 706 claims. The EEOC further argued that the Court's dismissal of the claims of the post-LOD applicants was fundamentally tied to the two rulings that were subsequently overturned. Id. at *3-4. The Court did not address the EEOC's arguments and instead focused on the proper sequencing of the EEOC's enforcement powers under Title VII. Id. at *4. The Court noted that, because the post-LOD applicants by definition applied for work after the investigation was completed, "the Commission could not possibly have learned about these individuals during its investigation and could not possibly have conciliated their claims." Id. Therefore, the Court reasoned that its reversal of course on the issues of separate conciliation analysis and the Franks/Teamsters model had no effect on the dismissal of the post-LOD applicants, and those applicants remained ineligible for the § 706 claims. Id. The Court thereby denied the EEOC's motion.

EEOC v. Bass Pro Outdoor World, LLC,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 7628 (5th Cir. April 28, 2017). The EEOC brought an enforcement action alleging a pattern or practice of race discrimination in Defendant's stores on a nationwide basis. The EEOC brought claims under §§ 706 and 707 of Title VII. Following the Fifth Circuit's ruling affirming the District Court's decision allowing the EEOC to seek compensatory and punitive damages under §§ 706 and 707, Defendant filed a petition for a rehearing en banc. The Fifth Circuit panel of judges deadlocked in a 7-7 split on whether to grant the rehearing, thus resulting in Defendant's petition being denied. The Dissent initially summarized its argument by matter-of-factly noting "this 'pattern or practice' case cannot be brought under § 706 or § 707 as to provide individualized compensatory and punitive damages for a mass of 50,000 persons." Id. at *6. In support of this assertion, the Dissent argued that the plain language and legislative history of the Title VII forbids § 706 "pattern or practice" suits, and the Panel's contrary holding rendered § 707 of the Act a meaningless appendage to Title VII and hence superfluous. Id. at *7. The Dissent also opined that allowing pattern or practice suits for individualized compensatory and punitive damages poses insurmountable manageability concerns, which the Supreme Court has addressed before and rejected. Finally, the Dissent asserted that allowing pattern or practice suits for individualized compensatory and punitive damages for the 50,000 allegedly aggrieved individuals necessarily ran afoul of the Seventh Amendment. Asserting that Defendant ignored "the independent role of the EEOC when it sues on behalf of the United States government . . . [and] asks us to hold as a matter of law that damages authorized by the 1991 amendments to the Civil Rights Act can only be recovered in individual suits," the Panel rejected these positions. Id. at *20-21. After clarifying the role of the EEOC in light of the 1991 amendments of the Civil Right Act of 1964, the Panel opined that Defendant's "argument rests upon a fundamental premise: that the EEOC's enforcement authority and choice of remedies is tethered to the individuals for whose benefit it seeks relief. That premise is false." Id. at *23. The Panel reasoned that because the EEOC brought suit under both § 706 and 707, Defendant's argument that the EEOC was not entitled to punitive damages failed because it "would be truly perverse to withhold the remedy of punitive damages from the EEOC when it targets discrimination in its most virulent and damaging form: polices intentionally calculated to exclude protected minorities and perpetrated on a large scale." Id. at *35. Finally, the Panel addressed Defendant's argument that even if Congress did grant the EEOC the authority to seek compensatory and punitive damages via the pattern or practice model, this grant of authority was unconstitutional. Noting that Defendant's argument appeared to implicate due process concerns under the Seventh Amendment, the Panel held that Defendant's reliance on Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 564 U.S. 338 (2011), was misplaced as that case involved Rule 23 class actions, which have "no force" in EEOC litigation. Id. at *36. After providing a hypothetical analysis as to how a jury may award various types of damages, the Panel concluded that Defendant's manageability concerns were unfounded, and its "claim that this suit cannot be tried is not a statement of fact but an advocate's prayer. Seeking to limit its exposure to liability, Defendant asks us to shut down this lawsuit before it even gets off the ground." Id. at *41-42. The Dissent noted "[l]est there be any mistake, the [P]anel's 'response' must not be confused with a binding opinion on the denial of an en banc petition, because no authority authorizes any such opinion." Id. at *42. As such, the Dissent concluded by asserting that in no way should the Panel's response be treated as precedential. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit denied Defendant's motion for rehearing.

EEOC v. BDO USA LLP,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 7965 (5th Cir. May 4, 2017). The EEOC brought an enforcement action against Defendant after it sought production of information relating to an administrative investigation and asserted that Defendant's privilege log failed to establish that the attorney-client privilege protected the company's withheld documents. Id. at *4. The District Court held that the log was sufficient and granted Defendant's request for a protective order. Id. at *6. On appeal, the Fifth Circuit vacated and remanded the District Court's ruling. Id. at *7. The EEOC argued that the District Court erred when it concluded that all communications between a corporation's employees and its counsel are per se privileged and inverted the burden of proof, requiring that the EEOC prove that Defendant improperly asserted the attorney-client privilege as to the withheld documents. Id. at *8. The Fifth Circuit agreed and ruled that Defendant did not make prima facie showing of attorney-client privilege because the log possessed three types of deficiencies that prevented a determination of the applicability of the privilege because the entries: (i) were vague and/or incomplete; (ii) failed to distinguish between legal advice and business advice, and (iii) failed to establish that the communications were made in confidence and that confidentiality was not breached. Id. at *9. The Fifth Circuit noted that a privilege log's description of each document must provide sufficient information to permit the District Court to test the merits of the privilege claim. Id. at 7. The attorney-client privilege limits the normally broad disclosure requirements of Rule 26. Id. The Fifth Circuit agreed with the EEOC that many of Defendant's log entries lacked sufficient detail to permit a determination as to whether the entire document or just portions were protected from disclosure. Id. at *10. Some of the 278 logs referenced "confidential" emails and documents, including communications between employees and in-house counsel, yet failed to provide a description of the subject matter and stated only that "legal advice" was sought without indicating whether the communications were made in confidence. Id. at *11. The Fifth Circuit rejected Defendant's assertion that its position statements provided the necessary details for its privilege log as they are not facts and Defendant failed to present any evidence that would allow the District Court to assess whether attorney-client privilege applied to each entry on the log. Id. at *12. The Fifth Circuit noted there is no presumption that a company's communications with in-house counsel are privileged. Id. at *13. The Fifth Circuit ruled that the District Court erred when it determined: (i) that the entries were sufficient to establish a prima facie case of privilege, and (ii) the burden was on the EEOC to show that Defendant's communications were not privileged. Id. at *15. The EEOC also argued that the basis of the protective order grounded on an "overly broad" legal standard of non-disclosure of all communications involving an attorney. Id. at *20. While the Fifth Circuit agreed that the District Court may have applied an incorrect standard, it did not find that the protective order unwarranted. Id. at *21. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit vacated and remanded the District Court's ruling. Id.

EEOC v. Dolgencorp, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 181061 (N.D. Miss. Nov. 1, 2017). The EEOC requested that the Court modify its case management order by setting a date by which the EEOC must identify all allegedly injured individuals. The EEOC stated neither party raised the issue of identification of allegedly injured individuals with the Court at the case management conference, and that when the EEOC subsequently contacted the Court to inquire about setting a deadline for such, a law clerk advised the EEOC to contact Defendant to discuss a mutually agreeable date. The parties did not agree on a date, and the EEOC then filed a motion with a proposed a deadline of November 30, 2017. Defendant opposed the EEOC's motion, arguing that the EEOC failed to show good cause to modify the schedule as is required under Rule 16(b). Defendant pointed out that EEOC did not previously request a deadline for identifying additional aggrieved individuals that was separate and distinct from the deadline for joinder of parties and amendments to the pleadings, and as such, the July 7, 2017 joinder/amendments deadline was the operative deadline. Id. at *1. Defendant argued that EEOC should be required to move to add allegedly aggrieved parties, and must show good cause for being permitted to do so subsequent to the joinder/amendments deadline. Id. at *2. The Fifth Circuit has articulated four factors to consider when determining whether good cause exists to amend the scheduling order, including: (i) the explanation for the failure to timely move for leave to amend; (ii) the importance of the amendment; (iii) potential prejudice in allowing the amendment; and (iv) the availability of a continuance to cure such prejudice. Id. at *3. The Court noted that the EEOC presented information just over a week after the case management conference regarding establishing a deadline for EEOC to identify allegedly injured individuals. Id. at *4. The Court therefore determined that it was clear that the EEOC made efforts to address the issue soon after the scheduling deadlines were set. Id. As to the importance of the amendment, the Court reasoned that allowing EEOC to name additional claimants would be vitally important to those claimants. Id. As to potential prejudice in allowing the amendment, the Court opined that the EEOC's proposed deadline of November 30, 2017 would leave almost two months afterwards for Defendant to conduct discovery regarding any additional claimants before expiration of the discovery period. Id. at *5. The Court further stated that should Defendant request additional time to complete its discovery, the Court could order an extension of the discovery and dispositive motion deadlines without jeopardizing the trial date. Id. at *6. Therefore, the Court granted the EEOC's motion to modify the Rule 16(b) scheduling order and specified that the EEOC must identify all claimants on whose behalf it seeks relief in an amended complaint to be filed no later than November 30, 2017.

EEOC v. Emcare, Inc.,* 857 F.3d 678 (5th Cir. 2017). The EEOC brought suit on behalf of three employees alleging that Defendant terminated them in retaliation for complaining of sexual harassment. Following a trial, a jury found that Defendant terminated the three employees in retaliation for complaining of sexual harassment in the workplace. The District Court then denied Defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law. Defendant appealed the judgment with respect to Luke Trahan, one of the employees. Specifically, Defendant contended that the EEOC failed to present sufficient evidence of a causal link between Trahan's protected activity and termination because there was no evidence that the individual who decided to terminate Trahan was aware he had engaged in protected activity. The Fifth Circuit found there was sufficient evidence to support the jury's verdict, and therefore it affirmed the District Court's ruling. Defendant contended that there was no evidence that Sean Richardson, the person who decided to terminate Trahan, was aware of Trahan's complaints of sexual harassment. Thus, Defendant claimed: (i) there was no evidence that Richardson knew about Trahan's complaints; and (ii) there was no evidence that anyone other than Richardson decided to fire Trahan. The Fifth Circuit noted that as an initial matter, there was an abundance of conflicting testimony over critical issues, thereby entitling the jury to discredit the versions of events of Richardson and another co-worker, Ken Thornton, and find their testimony not credible. For example, the jury heard conflicting accounts regarding whether Thornton and Richardson ever personally observed CEO Jim McKinney make sexually offensive comments, whether Trahan and Shaw ever complained to HR about McKinney's behavior, and whether the audit of Trahan's unit produced any legitimate grounds to fire him. Id. at 682. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit found that the jury was entitled to determine that Richardson and Thornton had both witnessed inappropriate behavior in the workplace and had taken no action, that Trahan and other employees complained to HR numerous times, and that the justification for firing Trahan was pretextual. In light of these contradictory statements, as well as the circumstances surrounding Trahan's termination, the Fifth Circuit held that the evidence was sufficient for the jury to find that Richardson was aware of Trahan's complaints. Id. at 683. More specifically, Trahan testified that McKinney would criticize Trahan whenever he complained, allowing the jury to infer, at the very least, that McKinney knew about the complaints. The Fifth Circuit also concluded that the jury could also have logically inferred that Thornton told Richardson about the complaints when they discussed Trahan's performance and subsequent termination. In addition, the Fifth Circuit found that there was sufficient evidence for the jury to find that Thornton and Richardson both made the decision to fire Trahan. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit determined that the District Court did not err in denying Defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law.

EEOC v. Faurecia Automotive Seating,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19222 (N.D. Miss. Feb. 10, 2017). The EEOC filed a complaint on behalf of a group of individuals alleging that Defendant violated the Americans With Disabilities Act by failing to hire them on the basis of their disabilities. Defendant filed a motion to transfer venue to the Southern District of Mississippi, and stated that every claimant resided in that district. Id. at *2. In support, Defendant produced an exhibit listing the names and addresses of approximately twenty-five individuals it identified as charging parties. Defendant then filed an unopposed motion to seal the exhibit it produced with its motion to transfer venue, which the Court granted. Defendant sought to seal the exhibit in order "to protect against the public disclosure of personal information." Id. at *3. The Court found that Defendant's motion failed to follow Local Rule 79, which required Defendant to file its motion with a non-confidential supporting memorandum or a proposed order. However, the Court stated that since the document to be sealed was already filed on the docket and because Defendant's motion stated sufficient grounds for sealing, the Court excused the procedural deficiencies in the interest of judicial efficiency. Id. The Court opined that as a general matter, personal information triggered a privacy right that created good cause for sealing." Id. at *4. The Court determined that the interest in protecting the private information of these individuals far outweighed the public's interest in the document and the Court's role in deciding Defendant's non-dispositive motion. Accordingly, the Court concluded that good cause existed to seal the exhibit and thereby granted Defendant's motion to seal.

EEOC v. Faurecia Automobile Seating,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15193 (N.D. Miss. Sept. 19, 2017). The EEOC brought an action claiming that Defendant discriminated against a group of workers in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") by failing to retain the employees Id. at *2. Defendant filed a motion to transfer venue to the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi on the grounds that all claimants resided in the Southern District. Id. The Court granted Defendant's motion to transfer, ruling that Defendant met its burden under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) to establish that a transfer to the Southern District would be more convenient. The Court noted that while case law authorities have traditionally considered § 1404(a)'s reference to convenience and the interest of justice to mandate separate inquiries, the Fifth Circuit has collapsed the two inquiries such that a motion to transfer venue pursuant to § 1404(a) should be granted if the movant demonstrates that the transferee venue is clearly more convenient taking into consideration several factors. Id. at *5. The Court considered eight factors, including: (i) the relative ease of access to sources of proof; (ii) the availability of compulsory process to secure the attendance of witnesses; (iii) the cost of attendance for willing witnesses; (iv) all other practical problems that make trial of a case expeditious and inexpensive; (v) the administrative difficulties flowing from docket congestion; (vi) the local interest in having localized interests decided at home; (vii) the familiarity of the forum with the law that will govern the case; and (viii) the avoidance of unnecessary problems of conflict of laws. Id. at *6. In addition, the Court ruled that where an action, such as the one at hand, is subject to the special venue provision of 42 U.S. C. § 2000e-5, the inquiry should also consider the four venue factors in the special venue statute, including: (i) where the wrongful employment action was committed; (ii) the location of the relevant employment records; (iii) where the aggrieved person would have worked but for the wrongful employment action: and (iv) the location of the employer's principal office. Id. at *6. The Court found that various factors weighed in favor of transfer, including: (i) access to relevant documents; (ii) the cost of attendance of witnesses; and (iii) having a localized interest, as the alleged discriminatory acts occurred in the Southern District. When balancing the factors, the Court noted that three of the four venue factors in the special venue statute weighed in favor of transfer to the Southern District. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion. Id. at *11.

EEOC v. Methodist Hospitals Of Dallas,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 33970 (N.D. Tex. Mar. 9, 2016). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant, a Dallas medical center, failed to accommodate an injured employee, Adrianna Cook, by refusing her request to take a different job in violation of the ADA. Defendant hired Cook in 2008 as a patient care technician ("PCT"). In early 2012, Cook injured her back and was diagnosed with an annular tear and degenerative disk condition. Defendant ultimately terminated Cook's employment in September 2012, after she failed to respond to a letter offering her additional unpaid leave and asking that she speak to a human resources representative about her employment. The EEOC claimed that Defendant failed to reasonably accommodate Cook by refusing to assign her to a scheduling coordinator position in violation of the ADA. Defendant moved for summary judgment, contending that it accommodated Cook by placing her on light duty, granting her FMLA leave for three months, and offering her numerous opportunities to take additional unpaid personal leave, an accommodation for which Cook never responded. The Court granted Defendant's motion on the grounds that the EEOC failed to establish a genuine issue of material fact regarding any of its claims. The EEOC subsequently requested reconsideration of the Court's order, which the Court denied. The EEOC contended that while the Court addressed Defendant's reassignment policy as applied to Cook, the Court did not address the EEOC's broader pattern or practice claim. Id. at *2. Defendant stated that the EEOC did not sufficiently allege a "pattern or practice" claim in its complaint, and therefore the Court did not err in not addressing it. Id. The Court found that while the EEOC's pattern or practice claim could have been alleged more clearly, its broader policy claim should be decided. Id. at *3. In its response to Defendant's motion for summary judgment, the EEOC stated that under the ADA, a "reasonable accommodation" included "a reassignment to a vacant position." Id. at *4. Defendant disagreed with the EEOC that it was "required to reassign a disabled employee to a vacant position for which that employee meets the minimum qualifications, regardless of whether that employee is the most qualified applicant." Id. Defendant maintained that this would amount to affirmative action, which was not required by the ADA. Id. Defendant further contended that the ADA permitted it to require a disabled employee to compete with non-disabled applicants and hire the most qualified candidate for a position. The Court noted that the Fifth Circuit had not directly addressed the issue of whether the ADA requires an employer to reassign a disabled employee as a reasonable accommodation. Id. at *5-6. Nonetheless, the Court concluded that Defendant was correct that the weight of Fifth Circuit authority provided that the ADA does not entitle a disabled employee to preferential treatment. Id. at *6. The Court thus held that the EEOC did not demonstrate that Defendant's policy of requiring disabled employees to compete with non-disabled applicants to hire the best candidate ran afoul of the ADA. Id. Thus, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to the EEOC's pattern or practice claim and denied the EEOC's request for reconsideration.

EEOC v. Oncor Electric Delivery Co*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 189584 (N.D. Tex. Nov. 16, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant's policy of requiring employees to fill out a return to work memorandum ("memorandum") after returning from medical leave violated the Americans With Disabilities Act. The EEOC sought enforcement of a subpoena requiring Defendant to produce information needed as part of the EEOC's investigation of charges of unlawful employment practices. Id. at *2. The Court granted the EEOC's motion. Delores McCraney worked for Defendant and took a medical leave of absence due to treatment of carpal tunnel surgery. Id. at *4. Defendant requested that McCraney fill out the memorandum, which required that she agree to inform her supervisor of all medications she was on that could affect her "ability to safely perform your essential job functions and possible side effects that could affect your job performance." Id. at *5. McCraney refused to sign the memorandum and Defendant placed her on unpaid leave. Defendant admitted that that it maintained a company-wide policy regarding mandatory employee disclosure of medications, which the EEOC contended was contrary to the ADA's prohibition against medical inquiries of employees under 42 U.S.C. Sec. 12112(d)(4)(A). Id. at *6. The EEOC sent Defendant a subpoena which sought identifying information as to employees who suffered discipline or discharge because of Defendant's medical inquiry policy, including: (i) a document listing the following for each employee who has been disciplined and/or discharged pursuant to the prescription medication disclosure policy between February 1, 2015 to the present: name, last known address and telephone number, dates of employment, job title, department, supervisor's name and job title; (ii) the employee's written disciplinary record; and (iii) his/her medical file. Id. at *7-8. The Court noted that "to enable the [EEOC] to make informed decisions at each stage of the enforcement process," Title VII "confers a broad right of access to relevant evidence." Id. at *10-11. The Court indicated that if the charge is proper and the material requested is relevant, the Court should enforce the subpoena unless the employer establishes that the subpoena is "too indefinite," has been issued for an "illegitimate purpose," or is unduly burdensome. Id. at *11-12. The Court agreed with the EEOC's position that the charge in this matter was proper, and that Defendant had not asserted that the subpoena was indefinite in its terms, had been issued for some kind of illegitimate purpose, or that compliance would be unduly burdensome. Id. at *12. The Court determined that the information that the subpoena sought related to unlawful employment practices covered by Title VII and was therefore relevant to the charge under investigation. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motion to enforce the subpoena.

EEOC v. Pioneer Health Services, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 83237 (N.D. Miss. May 30, 2015). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") with respect to alleged unlawful employment practices and sought relief for a former employee who was allegedly discriminated against due to her disability. Defendant's responsive pleadings were due on April 20, 2017. On April 21, 2017, the EEOC filed a motion for entry of default against Defendant for failure to timely file the responsive pleadings. On April 24, 2017, the Court filed an entry of default as to Defendant. On May 2, 2017, Defendant filed a motion to set aside the Court's entry of default, contending that Defendant's default was not willful and that setting aside the default would not prejudice the EEOC. Id. at *2. Defendant maintained that it tendered the defense of the action to its insurer, who retained counsel to represent the Defendant's interests, and that Defendant had been investigating the matter and preparing responsive pleadings. Id. at *2-3. Defendant also filed its answer contemporaneously with its motion to set aside the entry of default. The EEOC argued that the Court should not set aside the entry of default against Defendant, as Defendant did not articulate good cause as required by Rule 55(c) and did not demonstrate that the delay in filing the responsive pleading was due to mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect. Id. at *3. The Court noted that under Rule 55, a Court "may set aside an entry of default for good cause." Id. at *3-4. The Court further explained that case law authorities generally grant motions to set aside a default unless the default was willful, Plaintiff will be prejudiced, or Defendant has no meritorious defense. Accordingly, the Court found that Defendant's motion to set aside the entry of default should be granted, because Defendant indicated its delay in filing a responsive pleading was due to inadvertence, not willfulness; that the EEOC would not be prejudiced by setting aside the entry of default, and that Defendant's filing of its answer demonstrated good faith in pursuing a meritorious defense. Therefore, the Court granted Defendant's motion.

EEOC v. Stone Pony Pizza, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 49328 (N.D. Miss. Mar. 31, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant, a restaurant company, failed to hire job applicants on the basis of their race in violation of Title VII. The EEOC also contended that Defendant maintained a racially segregated workforce, and failed to retain records as required by Title VII. After four years of litigation and shortly after the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment, Defendant stopped participating in the defense of its case. Id. at *1. The Court noted that Defendant allowed its attorneys to be dismissed, failed to respond to pleadings in the case, and failed to respond to direct orders of the Court. Id. at *2. Defendant also failed to respond to a Report and Recommendation issued by the Magistrate Judge, failed to respond to the Court's order directing it to inform the Court of its intention to proceed in this matter and of its representation, and to appear at the final pre-trial conference. Id. Defendant also failed to respond to any of the several pending motions in limine, and failed to return any of the acknowledgments that the Court mailed it. Id. Defendant also failed to appear at the final pre-trial conference. The Court stated that it has not had any substantive contact or response from Defendant since summary judgment was denied, over a year prior. The Court found that Defendant's conduct presented a clear record of delay and contumacious conduct. Id. The Court held that Defendant repeatedly refused to comply with the Court's orders and attempted to frustrate the progress of the case by refusing to comply and participate in the proceedings. Based on the record in the case, the Court determined that it was clear that sanctions were warranted under Rule 16(f). Id. at *3. The Court reasoned that since none of the previous orders or requests had any effect on Defendant, it found that imposing a fine or levying costs against Defendant was unlikely to compel Defendant to comply with Court's orders. Id. at *4. The Court therefore found that that a default judgment was warranted to serve the interests of justice. Id. at *4-5. Therefore, because Defendant exhibited a pattern of willful, deliberate, contumacious conduct, refused to participate in the case, and failed to appear at the final pretrial conference, the Court entered a default judgment against the Defendant on all of the EEOC's claims pursuant to Rule 16(f). Id. at *5.

EEOC v. Stone Pony Pizza, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 189491 (N.D. Miss. Nov. 16, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant, a restaurant company, failed to hire job applicants on the basis of their race in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The EEOC also contended that Defendant maintained a racially segregated workforce, and failed to retain records as required by Title VII. After four years of litigation and shortly after the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment, Defendant stopped participating in the defense of its case. The Court ultimately entered a default judgment against Defendant on all of the EEOC's claims pursuant to Rule 16(f). Subsequently, the EEOC filed briefs and affidavits calculating damages. The Court found that the EEOC provided ample evidence to support an award of compensatory damages for each of the claimants. The Court stated that the claimants suffered inconvenience and emotional pain as a result of the openly discriminatory policies and actions of Defendant, and Defendant openly taunted and refused interviews to some Plaintiffs, while others were subjected to irrational and unreasonable application requirements. Based on all of the evidence in the record, and looking at all of the circumstances of the case, the Court awarded the compensatory damages requested by the EEOC for a total award of $164,000. Id. at *2-3. The EEOC also requested back pay, which the Court also found was warranted based on all of the evidence in the record. The Court accordingly awarded back pay in the amount of $308,641.59. Id. at *3. The EEOC further requested that the Court award punitive damages. The Court noted that Defendant intentionally discriminated against African-American employees and applicants in addition to intentionally maintaining a segregated workforce with minority employees relegated to back of house jobs and white employees exclusively staffing the front of house positions. Id. at *4-5. The Court reasoned that there was also ample evidence, in both corporate deposition testimony and Defendant's corporate documents, that Defendant's management was fully aware of the relevant federal anti-discrimination statutes and knowingly violated them. The Court therefore awarded punitive damages in the amount of $25,000 per charging party for a total punitive damages award of $350,000. Id. at *5. Finally, the EEOC sought injunctive relief against Defendant as authorized under 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5 when an employer "has intentionally engaged in or is intentionally engaging in an unlawful employment practice." Id. Specifically, the EEOC asked that Defendant be enjoined from engaging in racial discrimination against African-American job applicants, maintaining a segregated workforce on the basis of race, and discarding personnel or employment records, including employment applications, resumes, and any other documents submitted by job applicants for a period of one year. Id. The Court held that the EEOC's request for injunctive relief was warranted and necessary to ensure that Defendant did not engage in these prohibited discriminatory practices in the future. Id. at *6.

EEOC v. Vicksburg Healthcare, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6821 (S.D. Miss. Jan. 18, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants terminated Beatrice Chambers, a nurse, because of her disability and also failed to provide her with a reasonable accommodation in violation of the ADA. Chambers was a nurse for Vicksburg Healthcare, LLC d/b/a River Region Medical Center ("River Region"). After taking medical leave for shoulder surgery, Chambers' physician sent a note to River Region stating that she could return to duty as long as she was limited to "light work." Id. at *3. Because River Region concluded that Chambers could not perform the essential functions of her job when limited to "light work," River Region terminated Chambers. Id. The day after Chambers was terminated, Chambers' physician filled out a disability insurance claim form that stated that Chambers had a "temporary total disability." Id. at *4. Chambers reviewed the form and sent it to her insurer. The EEOC subsequently filed suit on Chambers' behalf, claiming she could perform the essential functions of her job while being limited to light duty and that her termination violated the ADA. After discovery, Defendant moved for summary judgment. The District Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, and on appeal, the Fifth Circuit reversed and remanded for further proceedings. The Fifth Circuit held that the employee's claim to temporary total disability, made the day after she was terminated from her job because of a disability, did not prevent her from contending that she was able to work if granted a reasonable accommodation. Id. at *3. After remand, the District Court then subsequently ruled on the parties' motions in limine. As to the first motion, Defendant requested that the District Court exclude from evidence the fact that Chambers requested and was denied leave under the FMLA because there were no FMLA claims, and as such, the evidence would pose the risk of unfair prejudice and jury confusion. Id. The EEOC asserted that Chambers requested leave and was immediately denied leave, and those facts were relevant to whether lifting and pushing heavier weights was an essential function of her job and whether it supported a pattern of similar conduct by Chambers' supervisor. Id. The District Court agreed that this request for leave and its subsequent denial were relevant to the EEOC's case. The District Court also found that the risk of confusion and prejudice was minimal, as the jury would be instructed on which issues to decide, while the request and the denial were substantially probative on two of the key issues in the EEOC's case. Id. at *4. For these reasons, it denied Defendant's motion. Defendant further requested that the District Court exclude as hearsay any statements Ron Ella allegedly made to Chambers as to the reasons Defendant fired him. Id. at *5. The EEOC did not respond to this motion, and therefore the District Court held that the statement should be excluded as hearsay and it granted Defendant's motion. The District Court also determined that the parties had reached an agreement as to Defendant's motion to exclude the EEOC's letter of determination, and accordingly, the District Court denied the motion as moot. As to the EEOC's motion in limine, the District Court granted the motion as to several items to which Defendant agreed to exclude. As to the remaining portions, the District Court granted the EEOC's motion with respect to Chambers' receipt of retirement and unemployment benefits, the EEOC's investigation, responses to discovery requests, and Chambers' prior medical condition. However, the District Court denied the EEOC's motion with respect to Chambers' application for benefits. Id. at *10-14.

(vi) Sixth Circuit

EEOC v. Autozone, Inc.*, Case No. 14-2760 (6th Cir. June 9, 2017). The EEOC alleged that Defendant was liable under Title VII for a store manager's alleged sexual harassment of three female employees. In May 2012, Defendant transferred a store manager to its Cordova, Tennessee location. Id. at 2. The store manager could hire new hourly employees and write up employees at the store for misbehaving, but could not fire, demote, promote, or transfer employees. Authority over firing, promoting, and transferring rested with the district manager for the store. After an employee claimed that the store manager made lewd comments to her, Defendant internally investigated the allegations. As part of Defendant's internal investigation, two other female employees who worked at the Cordova location confirmed that the store manager made lewd sexual comments. Defendant ultimately transferred and terminated the store manager. Subsequently, the EEOC brought a lawsuit alleging that Defendant subjected the three female employees to sexual harassment. Following discovery, Defendant moved for summary judgment, which the District Court granted, finding that the store manager was not a supervisor under Title VII and therefore Defendant was not vicariously liable for his actions. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's grant of Defendant's motion for summary judgment. First, the Sixth Circuit instructed that under Title VII, if the harassing employee is the victim's co-worker, the employer is liable only if it was negligent in controlling the working conditions, or in other words, if the employer knew or should have known of the harassment yet failed to take prompt and appropriate corrective action. Id. at 4. However, if the harasser is the victim's supervisor, a non-negligent employer may become vicariously liable if the agency relationship aids the victim's supervisor in his harassment. Id. The Sixth Circuit further elucidated that an employee is a "supervisor" for purposes of vicarious liability under Title VII if he or she is empowered by the employer to take tangible employment actions against the victim. Id. Applied here, the Sixth Circuit found that Defendant did not empower the store manager to take any tangible employment action against his victims since he could not fire, demote, promote, or transfer any employees. Id. at 5. Further, the Sixth Circuit held that the store manager's ability to direct the victims' work at the store and his title as store manager did not make him the victims' supervisor for purposes of Title VII. The Sixth Circuit also noted that while the store manager could initiate the disciplinary process and recommend demotion or promotion, his recommendations were not binding, and his ability to influence the district manager did not suffice to turn him into his victims' supervisor. Id. at 5-7. Finally, the Sixth Circuit held that the store manager's ability to hire other hourly employees was irrelevant since he did not hire the employees he harassed. Id. at 7. After finding that the store manager was not a supervisor for purposes of Title VII, the Sixth Circuit further concluded that even if the storage manager was found to be a supervisor, Defendant had established an affirmative defense to liability. The defense has two elements, including: (i) that the employer exercised reasonable care to prevent and promptly correct any sexually harassing behavior; and (ii) that the harassed employees unreasonably failed to take advantage of any preventive or corrective opportunities provided by the employer or to avoid harm otherwise. Id. The Sixth Circuit held that Defendant met the first element by utilizing an appropriate anti-harassment policy to prevent harassment, and by transferring and later terminating the store manager promptly after it investigated the allegations. Regarding the second element, the Sixth Circuit held that Defendant satisfied this prong since the victims failed to report the store manager's behavior for several months. The Sixth Circuit thus held that Defendant established an affirmative defense to liability. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's grant of Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at 10.

EEOC v. Dolgencorp, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 163739 (E.D. Tenn. Aug. 7, 2017). The EEOC brought an action claiming that Defendant discriminated against the charging party, Linda Adams, in violation of the American With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Id. at *5. After the EEOC filed suit, Adams intervened alleging discrimination, failure to accommodate, and retaliation based on her Type II diabetes. Id. The Court granted summary judgment in favor of Defendant as to the retaliation claim, but denied the motion as to reasonable accommodations and discriminatory discharge claims. Id. At trial, a jury determined that Defendant discriminated against Plaintiff because of her disability by failing to provide her with a reasonable accommodation and terminating her because of her disability. Id. at *6. Adams requested attorneys' fees in the amount of $528,425 and costs. Id. At the outset, the Court noted that it was undisputed that as a prevailing party, Adams was entitled to attorneys' fees. Id. at *11. The Defendant objected to the amount sought, arguing that this case was a routine ADA case and that it was co-prosecuted by a total of seven attorneys for the EEOC. Id. at *8. The Court opined that the only determination was whether the requested amount of attorneys' fees was reasonable. Id. The Court employed the "lodestar method," which is the proven number of hours reasonably expended on the case by the attorney, multiplied by a reasonable hourly rate. Id. The Court noted the most critical factor in determining the reasonableness of a fee award is the degree of success obtained. Id. Defendant asserted that the hourly rates of the attorneys and legal assistant should be lowered. The Court lowered the rates, but not as much as Defendant asked for, noting that the appropriate rate is not necessarily the rate of the firm, but the market rate in a venue sufficient to encourage competent lawyers to undertake representation. Id. at *13. The Defendant also asserted that the overall hours requested were excessive and must be reduced. Id. at *22. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that counsel's time spent on extensive pre-litigation activities should be reduced because Adams was joining a lawsuit already in progress, and refused to reduce the time billed for pre-litigation activities. Id. The Court ruled that Adams was required to exhaust the EEOC process and her counsel's time spent pursuing the EEOC charge and communicating and consulting with the EEOC was necessary. Defendant also asserted that travel time should be reduced by 50%. Id. The Court denied this request because counsel was local and the only travel was to a mediation and the attorneys submitted that they used the travel time to prepare. Id. at *26. Defendant also contended that the time spent on Adams' unsuccessful retaliation claim was not recoverable. Id. at *28. The Court rejected this argument because the retaliation claims arose out of the same common set of facts as the other claims. Id. at *29. Further, Defendant objected to fees for any time spent on clerical work. Id. at *30. The Court deducted billing entries for work performed by the attorneys that were truly clerical. Id. at *32. Defendant argued that the lodestar amount should be lowered for attorneys' duplicative work with the EEOC. Id. at *34. The Court declined, noting a strong presumption that exists in awarding a prevailing party's attorney their loadstar fee. Id. at *35. Finally, Defendant claimed that Adams' request for "fees for fees" – an award of attorneys' fees for preparing and litigating the fee petition – was excessive and unwarranted. Id. at *42. The Court agreed and reduced the hours under a reasonableness standard. Id. at *42 The Court recommended that Adams be awarded litigation expenses, as there was no objection. Id. at *43. In sum, the Court granted Adams' motion in part and denied it in part, and awarded a total amount of $445,322.25 in attorneys' fees and $1,676.95 in litigation expenses. Id. at *44.

EEOC v. G4s Secure Solutions USA, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 206969 (E.D. Mich. Dec. 18, 2017). The EEOC filed an enforcement action on behalf of charging party Christina Ross alleging that Defendant violated the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") when it terminated her employment. Defendant removed Ross from her seated security officer position and placed in her in a foot-patrol position. Id. at *1. Ross struggled with this new position because of her connective tissue disorder and lupus, and therefore requested to return to her seated-security position. Id. Defendant subsequently terminated her employment. Id. at *2. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) on the basis that: (i) the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction because the EEOC did not attach its charge of discrimination to the complaint; (ii) Ross' condition did not constitute a disability within the meaning of the ADA; and (iii) the EEOC did not exhaust its administrative remedies. Id. at *2. The Court found that it had subject-matter jurisdiction, because under 28 U.S.C. § 1331, the Court has subject-matter jurisdiction over all civil actions arising under the laws of the United States, including EEOC enforcement actions. Further, no authority supported Defendant's proposition that the Court only has subject-matter jurisdiction when the EEOC attaches its charge of discrimination to the complaint. Id. at *2-3. The Court also determined that the EEOC alleged that "Ross has a mixed connective tissue disorder and lupus," both of which are musculoskeletal, neurological, and skin-related, and accordingly physical impairments under 45 C.F.R. § 84.3(j)(2)(i). Id. at *3. As the EEOC alleged that Ross' conditions interfered with her foot-patrol assignment, the Court reasoned that it could infer that these conditions substantially limited her walking, which is a major life activity under § 12102(2)(A). Accordingly, the Court held that the EEOC sufficiently alleged that Ross had a disability under the ADA. Id. at *4. Finally, Defendant argued that because Ross had not yet initiated arbitration proceedings, the EEOC has not exhausted its administrative remedies and could not pursue an enforcement action. The Court disagreed, and stated that the EEOC may pursue this action regardless of whether Ross signed an arbitration agreement or pursued arbitration. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

EEOC v. Indi's Fast Food Restaurant, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65748 (W.D. Ky. May 1, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging the Defendants violated Title VII. The EEOC alleged that Defendants failed to timely respond to requests for admission that it propounded on December 20, 2016 and December 30, 2016. The EEOC requested the Court to deem admitted all of the requests for admission pursuant to Rule 36(b). The EEOC asserted that Defendants demonstrated an unwillingness or inability to adhere to Court-imposed deadlines and that they had not shown that they failed to meet the discovery deadlines sufficient to satisfy the excusable neglect standard set forth in Rule 6(b). Id. at *4. On February 13, 2017, Defendants filed a motion for an extension asking the Court to accept as timely their responses to the EEOC's December 30, 2016 requests for admission which they also filed on that day. The Court stated that the first requests for admission were served on Defendants on December 20, 2016. The Court found that, absent an extension of time, Defendants were required to respond to that set of discovery requests no later than January 19, 2017. Id. at *7. Defendants responded to the December 20 discovery requests on January 31, 2017, 12 days after the deadline passed. The second requests for admission were served on Defendants on December 30, 2016. The Court again found that, absent an extension of time, Defendants were required to respond to that set of discovery requests no later than January 30, 2017. Defendants responded to the December 30 discovery requests on February 13, which was 14 days after the deadline passed. The Court explained that it would apply the five-factor standard for excusable neglect. Looking to that standard, the Court held that the reason for the delay was firmly within the control of Defendants and their counsel. Id. at *9. The Court rejected Defendants' argument that its counsel reasonably believed that the second set of discovery requests was a supplement to the first set, and that therefore a later deadline attached to both sets. Id. at *10. Additionally, Defendants' assertions regarding the untimely completion of responses were unpersuasive, as vacations and not knowing the answer to a request were not valid defenses for not responding. The Court opined that Defendants were free to assert objections to any of the discovery requests served by the EEOC, but a failure to respond was impermissible. Id. at *11. The Court also found that defense counsel's conduct was indicative of acting in bad faith. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the factors of the excusable neglect balancing test weighed in favor of the EEOC. The Court further determined that there was little or no danger of prejudice to the EEOC, as Defendants admitted every request for admission posed by the EEOC in both sets of discovery requests, and they answered, without objection, the two interrogatories posed therein. Id. The Court explained that the consequences of denying the motions for extension and granting the motions for extension were identical: (i) if the motions are denied, the requests for admission would be deemed admitted and any objections to the interrogatories will be deemed waived; and (ii) if the motions are granted, the responses, which admit everything asked by the EEOC and do not contain objections to the interrogatories, would be deemed timely. Id. at *12. In either case, the EEOC would achieve its desired result and was not prejudiced. Finally, the Court found that the length of delay was insignificant. The Court opined that granting Defendants' motions for an extension and deeming the two sets of discovery responses timely would ensure a more complete record. The Court therefore granted Defendants' motions for an extension and deemed Defendants' discovery responses as timely.

EEOC v. Indi's Fast Food Restaurant, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 177363 (W.D. Ky. Oct. 26, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging the Defendants violated Title VII. The parties filed cross-motions for partial summary judgment based on whether the sexual harassment experienced by Plaintiffs created a hostile work environment. The EEOC requested the Court to grant judgment on its claims as to 10 claimants. Defendants requested the Court to enter summary judgment in its favor dismissing the claims of 11 claimants. The Court addressed the allegations of the claimants for whom only the EEOC requested summary judgment. The Court found that that summary judgment was inappropriate as there were issues of fact surrounding these claims, including credibility of their stories and the fact their declarations contained what Defendants called "irreconcilable differences" from the testimony given in depositions. Id. at *11. Defendants also suggested that several claimants may have had ulterior motives to fabricate stories and make the harassment they experienced seem more severe as the alleged harasser terminated their employment. Id. at *12. The Court held that in order to determine what harassment the claimants experienced and whether any harassment created a hostile work environment, the claims must be resolved by a jury. Id. at *12-13. Defendants also sought summary judgment as to six claimants, asserting that the EEOC had not met its burden of proving harassment on account of the severity required for a hostile work environment claim. The EEOC argued that there were disputes of material fact in each of these claims. After considering the totality of the circumstances, the Court found that as to claimant Williams, the alleged inappropriate comments did not give rise to a Title VII claim for sexual harassment. Accordingly, the Court determined that Defendants were entitled to summary judgment as to the claims for harassment of Williams. Id. at *15. However, as to the other five claimants, the Court found genuine issues of material fact regarding whether management was aware of the alleged sexual harassment. Further, the Court found that core facts of the claimant's complaints were in dispute. Lastly, with respect to the claimants that both parties sought summary judgment for in their motion, the Court found that none of them had claims that strongly favored one party or the other. Id. at *19. The Court opined that each woman had shared a story of harassment that a jury may or may not find severe and pervasive, as the analysis for finding a hostile work environment is not a mathematically precise test. Id. Further, the Court noted that the stories of harassment told by claimants were discredited by managers for Defendants who claimed that they were not aware any of these claimants were harassed. Id. at *20. The Court therefore determined that these considerations, along with the reliability and subjective experiences of the claimants, were best left to the jury. Therefore, finding that a reasonable jury could find for either the EEOC or for Defendants, the Court held that summary judgment for either party on these claims was inappropriate.

EEOC v. MGH Family Health*, 230 F. Supp. 3d 796 (W.D. Mich. Jan. 27, 2017). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of Avis Lane, a community outreach coordinator, alleging that Defendant discriminated against Lane based upon a perceived disability in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Defendant hired Lane and required her to undergo a post-offer physical with a third-party medical evaluator prior to commencing employment. However, Lane began her employment duties before undergoing the exam. After undergoing the physical exam, the medical provider recommended Lane be placed on "medical hold" even though she had passed the physical exam. Id. at 799. The medical provider recommended that Lane not begin employment until a functional capacity evaluation ("FCE") was performed because her medical records indicated that she took prescription medicine for migraines and thoracic outlet syndrome, raising the possibility of "a cognitive problem at work." Id. at 802. After Lane worked for 14 days, Defendant told Lane that she was going to be put on medical hold and that she must undergo another FCE. Defendant also told Lane that it would not pay for the FCE. Lane indicated that she would pay for the exam herself. Defendant then encouraged Lane to get medical clearance from her own provider. Lane obtained a letter from her medical provider clearing her to work without restrictions. Lane thereafter continued to work in her position for five weeks without incident. However, Defendant terminated Lane. Defendant also failed to follow up on Lane's offer to pay for the FCE or conduct an individualized inquiry. After terminating her, Defendant then offered Lane her job back without any further medical examinations requested. The EEOC moved for summary judgment, and Defendant cross-moved for summary judgment. Defendant asserted that the EEOC's motion should be denied because the EEOC had not alleged that Lane had a disability that substantially limited one or more life activities. The Court rejected this argument, ruling that a "regarded as" claim under the ADA only requires the EEOC to plead that Lane was regarded as having a physical or mental impairment. Defendant also asserted that it did not know about Lane's medical condition and that the third-party medical provider's knowledge could not be imputed to Defendant. The Court rejected this argument as well, noting that employers are unable to escape their responsibilities under the ADA by "contracting out" personnel decisions to third-parties. Id. at 810. The Court ruled that Defendant perceived Lane as having an impairment, and therefore Defendant regarded her as disabled. The Defendant also asserted that Plaintiff was not otherwise qualified under the ADA . The Court held that Defendant was estopped from arguing that Lane was "not otherwise qualified" because the Defendant terminated Lane without completing an individualized inquiry. Id. at 813. The Court granted summary judgment in favor of the EEOC on the issue of liability and denied Defendant's cross-motion for summary judgment.

EEOC v. R&L Carriers Shared Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 172424 (S.D. Ohio Oct. 18, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants refused to hire female job applicants as loaders or dockworkers on the basis of their sex in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss on the grounds that the EEOC failed to state a plausible claim for relief. The EEOC asserted that its pleading was sufficient, but requested leave to amend if the Court determined it was insufficient. Id. at *5. Defendants argued that the complaint failed to contain sufficient factual allegations to raise the right to relief above the speculative level to the required plausibility level. The EEOC asserted that it alleged multiple incidents of discrimination relative to the refusal to hire women as dockworkers or loaders since at least January 1, 2010, at Defendants' Wilmington, Ohio facility. Id. at *6. Upon consideration, the Court was not convinced that the EEOC stated a plausible claim for relief, because the EEOC failed to allege facts about which women, or how many women, if any, applied for positions as dockworkers or loaders at the Wilmington, Ohio facility. Id. Likewise, the Court found that the EEOC failed to alleged facts suggesting that Defendants instead hired men as dockworkers or loaders during the same time period. Id. The Court stated that without these facts, it could only speculate as to whether Defendants violated Title VII by refusing to hire women for the dockworkers and loaders positions. Id. The Court opined that it had reason to believe the EEOC knows more facts about the alleged discriminatory conduct than it pleaded in the complaint, because: (i) the EEOC had sufficient knowledge to have issued an amended letter of determination "finding reasonable cause to believe that Title VII was violated;" and (ii) in its memorandum in opposition to Defendant's motion to dismiss, the EEOC informally requested leave to amend the complaint. Id. The Court determined that the EEOC would not request leave to amend if it did not have additional facts to plead. Id. The Court stated that it has the authority to deny leave to amend when, as here, the EEOC failed to submit the proposed amended pleading for review. However, the Court held that in this case, which was at the earliest stage of litigation, the equities favored granting the EEOC leave to amend the complaint, because amendment would not unduly delay these proceedings nor prejudice Defendants. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court ordered the EEOC to file an amended complaint.

EEOC v. R.G. & G.R. Harris Funeral Homes, Inc.,* Case No. 16-2424 (6th Cir. Mar. 23, 2017). The EEOC sued Defendant, a closely-held for-profit corporation operating three funeral homes in Michigan. Defendant had a strict employee dress code policy with several requirements, including that men must wear suits and women must wear jackets and skirts/dresses. Charging party Aimee Stephens transitioned from male to female during her employment and filed a charge with the EEOC asserting that Defendant subjected her to discrimination on the basis of her sex. The EEOC subsequently filed suit, which the District Court dismissed. On the EEOC's appeal, Stephens moved to intervene as a matter of right, or in the alternative, permissively. The Sixth Circuit stated that to intervene as a matter of right, the party must satisfy four elements, including: (i) that the request was timely; (ii) the party has a substantial legal interest in the case; (iii) that the party's interest will be impaired absent intervention; and (iv) that the parties already before the Court cannot adequately represent the interest. Id. at 2. The Sixth Circuit noted that timeliness should be evaluated in the context of all relevant circumstances. Id. Given that Stephens knew or should have known about the case at the outset, the Sixth Circuit found that her delay in seeking to intervene suggested that the request was untimely. Id. However, the Sixth Circuit reasoned that until recently, Stephens had no reason to question whether the EEOC would continue to adequately represent her interests. The Sixth Circuit determined that the EEOC's actions post-appeal, implied that the new Trump Administration would be less aggressive in pursuing transgender rights. The Sixth Circuit also opined that Defendant would not be prejudiced in Stephens were to intervene, as she indicated that she did not intend to raise any new issues. Id. The Sixth Circuit held that Stephens' intervention would serve judicial economy, because should the EEOC withdraw from the case, it would not require delaying the case. Id. at 3. The Sixth Circuit also ruled that Stephens unquestionably possessed a substantial legal interest in the case. Therefore, the Sixth Circuit granted Stephens' motion to intervene.

EEOC v. Roark-Whitten Hospitality,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 132026 (E.D. Tenn. Aug. 7, 2017). The EEOC brought an action claiming that Defendant discriminated against a group of minority hotel workers, in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Id. at *2. The Magistrate Judge granted the EEOC's motion to compel discovery of Defendants' financial information, and agreed that the EEOC's requests from Defendants and other non-party hotels were relevant to the EEOC's claims for punitive damages and successor employer liability. Id. at *4. Defendants maintained that the production requests were unnecessary and immaterial. That Magistrate Judge found that information requested was relevant and proportional to the needs of the case pursuant to Rule 26 (b)(1) and granted the motion. Id. Defendants argued that the EEOC was not entitled to financial information of the non-party entities. Id. at *15. The EEOC alleged that each hotel for which it sought information was managed by the same corporation, as the hotels shared the same business office, which was responsible for accounting for all hotels. Id. at *12. The EEOC argued that the financial documents that it sought, such as financial statements and profit-and-loss statements, could demonstrate whether the hotels had interrelated operations, and were under common management and financial control. Id. Additionally, financial information from all hotels was relevant for the purposes of establishing the appropriate statutory damages cap. Id. at *13. The Magistrate Judge noted that the EEOC could have subpoenaed the information and Defendant did not object to the production of the non-parties' financial information on the basis that it did not have possession or control of the information. Id. at *15. The Magistrate Judge also ruled that the financial information for all four hotels was relevant to the EEOC's claim for successor employer liability. Id. at *16. Third, the information was also relevant to the EEOC's claim for punitive damages. Id. at *14. Defendants also objected to the production of financial information, asserting that the EEOC failed to establish a prima facie showing that it was entitled to punitive damages. Id. at *18. However, the Magistrate Judge ruled that because the EEOC had alleged sufficient facts to claim punitive damages against the Defendant, information of Defendant's net worth or financial condition was relevant because it could be considered in determining punitive damages. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge granted the EEOC's motion to compel.

EEOC v. Southeast Food Services Co. d/b/a Wendy's*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44266 (E.D. Tenn. Mar. 27, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant violated Title VII by denying the charging party, Christine Cordero, a promotion because she refused to sign a release form. Defendant hired Cordero as a crew member at one of its restaurant locations. Id. at *2. Shortly thereafter, Defendant promoted Cordero to crew leader. Id. As part of her promotion, Defendant requested that Cordero sign a general release of all claims she may have against Wendy's up to that point, but not including future claims. Id. For the past 20 years, Defendant had conditioned promotions on signing this type of release. Id. Despite not having any claims against Defendant, Cordero refused to sign the release. Id. As a result of her refusal, Defendant did not receive the promotion, but still received training for the position and a small raise that would have accompanied the promotion. Id. at *3. Cordero continued to work for Defendant, and filed a charge of discrimination with the EEOC in December 2014. Id. In the charge, Cordero alleged that Defendant retaliated against her by not promoting her due to her refusal to sign the release. Id. In the course of its investigation of Cordero's charge of discrimination, the EEOC learned of Defendant's longtime practice of requiring employees to sign a release of claims as a condition of promotion, and thereafter sent Defendant a letter indicating it intended to expand the investigation. Id. In this letter, the EEOC also requested information from Defendant regarding current and former employees who had worked for the company since December 2012. Id. Defendant, however, refused to provide this additional information, and the EEOC then issued a subpoena seeking the same information. Id. at *4. The EEOC's subpoena sought the identity and contact information of all current and former employees since December 2012, including employees who signed the release of claims and who had been promoted. Id. In addition, the subpoena sought the employees' dates of hire, promotion, termination, reasons for termination, and titles, as well as copies of all releases that Defendant had employees sign during that period, among other things. Id. Defendant again objected and refused to provide the information and documentation that had been subpoenaed. Id. The EEOC filed a motion to enforce the subpoena, and the Court denied the motion. The EEOC argued that it "require[d] the contact information for [Wendy's] employees to mail questionnaires in order to determine if those employees gave up any claim in order to receive promotions." Id. at *5-6. In response, Defendant asserted that the sole issue with regard to the charge was whether its uniform policy regarding a signed release as a condition of promotion was sufficient to sustain Cordero's Title VII retaliation claim, and that the information sought for the questionnaires was neither relevant nor necessary to the EEOC's investigation. Id. at *6. The Court rejected the EEOC's argument, finding that "whether other 'employees gave up any claim in order to receive promotions' [was] irrelevant to resolving Ms. Cordero's charge." Id. at *7. The EEOC further argued that sending the questionnaires to other employees was the only way to verify Defendant's contention that no other employees aside from Cordero refused to sign the release. Id. at *8. The Court again rejected the EEOC's position, noting it was "unclear how another employee's refusal to sign a release 'might cast light' on the instant charge, particularly where there is no dispute that for the past 20 years, all employees have been required to sign a general release of all claims as a condition of promotion." Id. at *8-9. The Court further reasoned that the potential unlawfulness of Defendant's employment practice was not dependent on how many other employees signed a release. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court held that the EEOC did not meet its burden in demonstrating that the information subpoenaed was relevant to Cordero's charge, and it declined to enforce the subpoena.

EEOC v. Southeast Food Services Co. d/b/a Wendy's,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97340 (E.D. Tenn. June 23, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant violated Title VII by denying charging party Christine Cordero a promotion because she refused to sign a release form. Defendant hired Cordero as a crew member at one of its restaurant locations, and promoted her to crew leader shortly after her hire. As part of her promotion, Defendant requested that Cordero sign a general release of all claims she may have against Defendant up to that point, but not including future claims. Id. at *2. Despite not having any claims against Defendant, Cordero refused to sign the release. Id. As a result of her refusal, Defendant did not receive the promotion, but still received training for the position and a small raise that accompanied the promotion. Id. at *3. Cordero continued to work for Defendant, and filed a charge of discrimination with the EEOC in December 2014. Id. In the charge, Cordero alleged that Defendant retaliated against her by not promoting her due to her refusal to sign the release. Id. During the EEOC's investigation into Cordero's claims, the EEOC requested information from Defendant regarding current and former employees who had worked for it since December 2012. Id. at *3. Defendant, however, refused to provide this additional information, and the EEOC then issued a subpoena seeking the same information. Id. at *4. The EEOC's subpoena sought the identity and contact information of all current and former employees since December 2012, including employees who signed the release of claims and who had been promoted. Id. In addition, the subpoena sought the employees' dates of hire, promotion and termination, reasons for termination, and titles, as well as copies of all releases that Defendant had employees sign during that period, among other things. Id. The EEOC filed a motion to enforce the subpoena, and the Magistrate Judge recommended denial of the motion. The Magistrate Judge held that the EEOC did not meet its burden in demonstrating that the information subpoenaed was relevant to Cordero's charge, and recommended the Court deny enforcement of the subpoena. The EEOC objected, and the Court ultimately found that the information sought by the EEOC was not relevant to Cordero's charge. First, the Court was not convinced that Cordero's charge alleged a pattern or practice of discrimination, as argued by the EEOC. Id. at *15. The Court explained that nothing in the language of Cordero's charge indicated her desire to bring a claim on behalf of another employee or to allege a pattern of discriminatory behavior. Id. Second, the Court found that other employees' information would not provide context for, or shed light on, Cordero's retaliation charge. Id. at *15-16. The Court reasoned that Defendant had admitted that it required all employees seeking a promotion to sign the release for the past 20 years and that anyone who refused to sign the release was denied a promotion. Thus, the Court opined that the EEOC need not evaluate broader employment information in order to determine whether Defendant refused to promote Cordero because of her refusal to sign the waiver. Id. at *16. Second, although the EEOC need not prove "probable cause or reasonable cause to believe that the charge of discrimination is true," the Court reasoned that the Commission may not "use an enforcement proceeding as an opportunity to test the strength of the underlying complaint." Id. at *17-18. Finally, the EEOC argued that Defendant admitted to a failure to preserve its employee records, which is required under Title VII. The EEOC contended, therefore, that it has a duty to investigate this record-keeping violation and that the subpoenaed information will aid in this investigation. Id. at *18. The EEOC argued that it was not required to amend the charge or to file a separate charge in order to investigate the alleged record-keeping violation. The Court noted that the EEOC did not bring a charge of record-keeping violation, and the Commission failed to demonstrate how the subpoenaed information at issue was relevant to the EEOC's investigation into Cordero's charge. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court accepted the Magistrate Judge's recommendation to deny the EEOC's motion to enforce its subpoena.

EEOC v. UPS*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 10280 (6th Cir. June 9, 2017). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of Sinisa Matovski, an operations manager who has a disability, claiming that Defendant discriminated and retaliated against him in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990 ("ADA"). In particular, the EEOC asserted that Defendant published confidential medical information about him and other employees on its intranet page. The EEOC issued Defendant a subpoena requesting information about how it stored and disclosed employee medical information. Id. at *1-2. Defendant opposed the subpoena, claiming that the requested information was irrelevant to Matovski's charge. As a result, the EEOC filing an application to enforce the subpoena. In his charge, Matovski claimed that Defendant violated the ADA by publishing a medical leave request on its Health and Safety intranet site. Matovski requested that his information be removed from the site; however, it remained accessible, and that others had their information compromised in the same manner. Id. at *3. As part of its investigation into the allegations, the EEOC issued a subpoena for a report containing information about employee injuries and accidents, a copy of the privacy criteria used by Defendant, and a copy of Defendant's 'RiskConsul' Oracle Database. Id. at *4. Defendant petitioned the EEOC to modify the subpoena, arguing that some of the requested information was irrelevant and burdensome. The EEOC then filed an application for an order to show cause why an administrative subpoena should not be enforced. The District Court granted the application, and Defendant appealed. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision because the information that the EEOC requested "relates to unlawful employment practices" covered by the ADA. Id. at *2. The Sixth Circuit explained that it has held in the Title VII context that "the EEOC is entitled to . . . evidence [that] focuses on the existence of patterns of racial discrimination in job classifications or hiring situations other than those that the EEOC's charge specifically targeted." Id. at *5. Defendant argued that "[t]he EEOC is only entitled to information regarding similarly-situated employees." Id. at *7. The Sixth Circuit stated that there was no such restriction under § 2000e-8(a), as it had previously deemed evidence to be relevant despite the fact that it concerned employees who were decidedly not similarly-situated to the employee who was the subject of the EEOC charge. Id. at *7-8. The Sixth Circuit determined that the true test of relevance was not whether the information was about similarly-situated employees, but whether the evidence "provides context for determining whether discrimination has taken place." Id. at *8. The Sixth Circuit stated that the EEOC's first and third requests, which were for the databases that stored and allegedly disclosed employee medical information, were relevant to Matovski's charge. Matovski's charge directly implicated the databases that Defendant uses to store and potentially disclose employee medical information. The Sixth Circuit therefore found that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in finding such reports relevant to Matovski's charge. The Sixth Circuit also held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in finding that Defendant's privacy criteria were relevant to Matovski's charge. Id. at *10-11. The EEOC provided that the privacy criteria might reveal an acknowledgment on the part of Defendant that some information in the databases was "confidential information that shouldn't be shared with all managerial employees throughout the country." Id. at *11. The Sixth Circuit found that it was not an abuse of discretion for the District Court to deem evidence regarding such knowledge to be relevant. Finally, Defendant also argued that the EEOC's requests were unduly burdensome. The Sixth Circuit, however, opined that Defendant failed to identify how producing the requested pieces of evidence would be unduly burdensome. Because Defendant did not show that the subpoena was burdensome in any material way, the Sixth Circuit ruled that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in ordering Defendant to comply with the subpoena. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the ruling of the District Court.

(vii) Seventh Circuit

EEOC v. Amsted Rail Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 189713 (S.D. Ill. Nov. 16, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant discriminated against Anthony Montrell Ingram and a group of other applicants in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Ingram and the other claimants alleged that Defendant discriminated against them when they applied for the job position of "chipper," which required the use of a hammer because Defendant regarded them as disabled due to having carpel tunnel syndrome and/or a record of CTS. Defendant offered employment to claimants, but the offers were contingent on passing a medical examination, which included a nerve conductive test ("NCT") to identify applicants at greater risk of developing CTS. Id. at *4. Defendant made conditional job offers to the claimants, but placed them on medical hold because of an abnormal NCT result. Id. at *7. Ingram did not have an abnormal NCT, but Defendant placed him on hold because of his history of being previously diagnosed with CTS. Ingram had undergone surgery to relieve it and had been released to return to work previously. Despite this, Defendant's medical examiner believed that Ingram was at increased risk of developing CTS again. Id. at *9. Both parties agreed that an abnormal NCT did not indicate that an individual had CTS and did not render the individual incapable of performing the chipper job. Id. at *8. Defendant asserted that it believed that all claimants could have performed the job of chipper, but could not have done so safely. The EEOC moved for partial summary judgment on the issue of liability and Defendant's direct threat affirmative defense. Defendant also moved for summary judgment and argued that claimants were not qualified under the ADA because they posed a direct threat to their health and safety of others. Id. at *13. The Court granted summary judgment in favor of Defendant as to claimants Cashmen and Welch, because both previously declared in applications for Social Security benefits that they were disabled and were awarded benefits. The EEOC offered nothing to explain this contradictory position of the claimants and therefore, the Court ruled that Defendant was entitled to summary judgment. Id. at *25. As to all other claimants, the Court granted the EEOC's motion on the issue of liability and the direct threat affirmative defense. The Court also granted the EEOC's motion as to Ingram because the evidence established that Ingram did not have CTS, and was physically capable of performing the chipper job when Defendant placed him on medical hold. The only evidence that suggested otherwise was Defendant's medical examiner's beliefs that in the future Ingram might pose a danger to himself. The Court opined that no reasonable jury could find that Defendant's medical examiner's speculation about Ingram's future safety spoke to his current ability to do the job absent CTS or any symptoms, and determined that the EEOC was therefore entitled to summary judgment on his claim. The Court applied the same analysis to the other applicants and determined that whether the claimants were qualified focused only on the claimants' condition at the time of Defendant's employment decision. Accordingly, there was no genuine issue of material fact regarding whether Ingram and the other claimants were qualified to be chippers at the time of their applications. Further, the Court granted the EEOC's motion for summary judgment on Defendant's direct threat affirmative defense for similar reasons. Defendant's medical examiner relied solely on the statistic that those with abnormal NCT results were three to four times more likely to develop CTS than someone with a normal NCT result. The Court concluded that this risk was small and not the type of significant risk that the direct threat defense contemplated. Id. at *39. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the EEOC was entitled to summary judgment on Defendant's direct threat affirmative defense. Id. at *42.

EEOC v. Autozone, Inc.*, 860 F.3d 564 (7th Cir. 2017). The EEOC filed an action on behalf of Kevin Stuckey, an African-American sales manager, alleging that his transfers between Chicago-area stores constituted discrimination on the basis of his race in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Stuckey asserted that he was transferred numerous times. However, none of these transfers entailed any loss in pay, benefits, or job responsibilities. Id. at *565. Defendant then transferred Stuckey to a store that served a largely Hispanic population. This transfer also involved no reduction in his pay or responsibilities. Following discovery, Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that the record conclusively established that the transfer: (i) was not an act of intentional segregation of its workforce by race; and (ii) did not adversely affect Stuckey's employment status. The District Court agreed that the undisputed evidence showed that Stuckey did not suffer an adverse employment action. Id. at *568. The District Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *566. The EEOC appealed, arguing that Title VII does not require it to prove that the challenged action adversely affected a claimant's employment opportunities or status. Id. at *567. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed, finding that the EEOC's reading could not be squared with the plain statutory text of Title VII. The Seventh Circuit held that the evidence was undisputed that the July 2012 transfer – and all other transfers – were purely lateral, and entailed no reduction in pay, benefits, or job responsibilities. Further, the transfers did not otherwise alter Stuckey's conditions of employment in a detrimental way. The Seventh Circuit explained that it was well established that a purely lateral job transfer does not normally give rise to Title VII liability because it does not constitute a materially adverse employment action. Id. at *569. The Seventh Circuit therefore determined that the evidence would not permit a reasonable jury to find that Stuckey's lateral transfer deprived or even tended to deprive him of any employment opportunity or otherwise adversely affected his employment status. Id. at *570. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling granting summary judgment to Defendant.

EEOC v. Autozone, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 23704 (7th Cir. Nov. 21, 2017). The EEOC filed an action on behalf of Kevin Stuckey, an African-American sales manager, alleging that his transfers between Chicago-area stores constituted discrimination on the basis of his race in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The District Court previously granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment. The EEOC appealed, arguing that Title VII did not require it to prove that the challenged action adversely affected a claimant's employment opportunities or status. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed, finding that the EEOC's reading of the statute could not be squared with the plain statutory text of Title VII. The EEOC filed a motion for rehearing, and the Seventh Circuit panel voted unanimously to deny rehearing. A judge in active service subsequently called for a vote on the request for rehearing en banc. Id. at *2. The majority of the Seventh Circuit judges voted to deny rehearing en banc. The Seventh Circuit therefore denied the EEOC's petition for rehearing and for rehearing en banc. The chief judge and two circuit judges issued a dissenting option objecting to the majority's refusal to reconsider its ruling. The dissent argued that the case is "worth the attention of the full" Seventh Circuit because of the "importance of the question and the seriousness with which we must approach all racial classifications." Id. at *3. The dissent stated that deliberate racial segregation "by its very nature has an adverse effect on the people subjected to it." Id. The dissent argued that the assertion that an employer could maintain intentional "separate-but-equal" work arrangements if the EEOC cannot show an adverse action "is contrary to the position that the Supreme Court has taken in analogous equal protection cases as far back as Brown v. Board of Education." Id. at *5. The dissent also maintained that this case presented a plausible allegation, backed up with evidence, that an employer was deliberately maintaining racially segregated workplaces. Id. at *7. The dissent opined that such a practice is one that, at a minimum, tends to deprive a person of employment opportunities, and adversely affects their status as an employee by telling the employee that his job opportunities are limited by race. Id. The dissent reasoned that the Seventh Circuit's decision endorsed the erroneous view that "separate-but-equal" workplaces are consistent with Title VII, and therefore the three circuit judges dissented from the denial of rehearing en banc. Id.

EEOC v. CVS Pharmacy*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7337 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 18, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of discrimination in violation of Title VII. After the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, it also granted Defendant's motion to stay the deadlines for submission of any motion for attorneys' fees. Id. at *2. Subsequently, the summary judgment order was affirmed on appeal, and the EEOC petitioned for an appellate rehearing en banc. Defendant filed a motion to lift the stay and set a schedule for briefing its motion for attorneys' fees, which the Court granted. Defendant then filed a motion for attorneys' fees pursuant to Rule 54(d), which the Court granted in part. Defendant's motion sought compensation for 249.2 hours for the motion to dismiss and for summary judgment and 574.3 hours for the appeal. First, the EEOC argued that Defendant's billing records were insufficient and lacked detail, which precluded an accurate determination of what hours were spent on frivolous claims and what hours were spent on non-frivolous claims. Id. at *4. The Court noted that it must only award fees requested that would not have accrued but for the EEOC's frivolous claim. Id. at *7. The Court determined that there was only one such claim, i.e., that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of resistance to the rights secured by Title VII by conditioning certain employees' severance pay on the signing of a separation agreement. Id. The Court found that the claim was legally frivolous because the EEOC did not follow its obligation to engage in good faith conciliation before filing suit. The EEOC then challenged the amount of time that Defendant spent on each component of the trial and appellate court litigation. Id. at *7-8. Defendant responded that the nature of the issues required an in-depth understanding of Title VII's text, structure, and history. The Court determined that the amount of hours claimed for the motion to dismiss or, in the alternative, for summary judgment, was reasonable. However, the Court found that Defendant claimed to spend more than twice the number of hours spent on the appeal. The Court held that the amount of hours spent on the appeal was excessive in light of the fact that the legal issues were the same as those presented in the original motion practice, and there was no need to develop a factual record at the appellate stage. Id. at *8. The Court reasoned that other case law authorities have similarly reduced the hours claimed on appeal where there was no apparent reason for the disparity given the similarity of the issues raised in the initial action and those presented during the subsequent appeal. Id. Therefore the Court reduced the number of requested hours for the appeal from 574.3 hours to 300 hours. Accordingly, the Court granted in part Defendant's motion for attorneys' fees.

EEOC v. Dolgencorp, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 54634 (N.D. Ill. April 10, 2017). The EEOC brought suit alleging that Defendant's criminal conviction background check policy had a disparate impact on African-Americans in violation of Title VII. Amongst its defenses, Defendant asserted that the EEOC's claims were barred as beyond the scope of the charges of discrimination and agency investigation (its 7th enumerated defense), and that the EEOC failed to satisfy the statutory pre-conditions for bringing suit when it failed to conciliate with Defendant (its 8th enumerated defense). The EEOC moved for partial summary judgment as to Defendant's two enumerated defenses. Id. at *2. The EEOC contended that, on the undisputed facts, these two defenses failed as a matter of law. The Court granted the EEOC's motion for partial summary judgment regarding Defendant's two enumerated defenses. Defendant's seventh enumerated defense relied upon two separate propositions, including: (i) the EEOC's claims were barred because they went beyond the claims delineated in the charges of discrimination that generated the EEOC's lawsuit; and (ii) the EEOC's claims were barred because the EEOC failed to investigate those claims adequately prior to bringing suit. Id. at *5. The Court rejected the first proposition, holding that when the EEOC files suit, it is not confined to claims asserted by the charging party, and further, that any violations that the EEOC ascertains in the course of a reasonable investigation of the charging party's complaint are actionable. Id. As to the second proposition, the Court similarly opined that the Seventh Circuit has held that EEOC lawsuits are not limited to claims made in the administrative charge, or claims that are found to be supported by the evidence obtained in the Commission's investigation. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court rejected Defendant's defenses insofar as it sought to dismiss the EEOC's claims because they went beyond the charges of discrimination or because they were not subject to an adequate pre-suit investigation. Id. at *6-7. In addition, the Court addressed Defendant's eighth enumerated defense, which contended that the suit could not go forward because the EEOC did not satisfy its pre-suit statutory obligation to conciliate. Id. at *7. The EEOC sent two letters of determination to Defendant that stated that the EEOC found reasonable cause to believe that Defendant engaged in discrimination in violation of Title VII because, through application of its background check policy, a class of African-American applicants and employees were not hired, not considered for employment, or discharged. Defendant argued that the notice of the charge was not specific enough because it failed to identify the persons allegedly harmed or to identify the allegedly discriminatory practice. Id. at *8. Rejecting Defendant's argument regarding the specificity of notice, the Court held that the EEOC's letters clearly set forth that there were African-American applicants and employees who were harmed by the allegedly discriminatory practice. Id. at *9. Further, the Court opined that as the Seventh Circuit has explained, the sufficiency of the EEOC's investigation was not a matter to be second-guessed. Id. Defendant also argued that the EEOC failed to describe the allegedly discriminatory practice with specificity, and that merely pointing to the background check policy was not sufficient. The Court rejected this argument, holding that the EEOC's notice was sufficient since it identified the two complainants and further put Defendant on notice that the EEOC's allegations related to African-American applicants and employees that were not hired, not considered for employment, or discharged due to failing a background check. Id. at *10. Finally, Defendant contended that the EEOC's conciliation discussions were inadequate because the EEOC did not provide Defendant with an opportunity to remedy the allegedly discriminatory practice. Id. at *12 Citing Mach Mining, LLC v. EEOC, 135 S. Ct. 1645, 1655-56 (2015), the Court refused to examine the sufficiency of the EEOC's investigation, noting it was beyond the scope of its review. Id. The Court thus rejected Defendant's argument that the EEOC did not adequately engage the employer in conciliation discussions. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motion for partial summary judgment on Defendant's seventh and eighth enumerated defenses.

EEOC v. Dolgencorp, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 211498 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 11, 2017). The EEOC filed a lawsuit alleging that Defendant used a criminal background check policy that had a disparate impact on African-American job applications in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. Id. at *1. Defendant filed a motion to compel discovery and to stay the expert report deadline. Id. Specifically, Defendant sought to compel the EEOC to: (i) identify specific job positions where African-American applicants experienced disparate impact due to the criminal background check policy and the portions of the policy that were responsible for the disparate impact; (ii) identify the less discriminatory policies and practices it believed Defendant should implement; and (iii) explain how the policies and practices would be consistent with Defendant's business needs. Defendant also sought any responsive documents the EEOC intended to rely upon at trial and admissions or denials to certain requests for admissions. Id. at *1-2. The Court granted in part and denied in part the motion to compel and denied the motion to stay. The EEOC argued that a position-by-position disparate impact analysis was not required because Defendant applied the same background check policy to all applicants. Id. at *3. The Court agreed with the EEOC and stated that since Defendant applied the criminal background check policy to all positions, the Court lacked the authority to relieve Defendant of its obligation of demonstrating the business necessity for each position for which the policy applied. Assuming the EEOC presented sufficient evidence that the application of the policy caused a disparate impact on African-American applicants, the Court reasoned that it would fall to Defendant to try and refute the claim and show that its decision was based on legitimate business needs. Id. at *6. The Court therefore denied Defendant's request as to the position-by-position analysis. The Court also denied Defendant's request as to less discriminatory policies, finding that that identification of specific procedures Defendant should implement to remedy any disparate impact fell within the province of the experts. Id. at *7-8. The Court stated that it therefore followed that the experts were in the best position to assess whether each particular less discriminatory alternative procedure met Defendant's business needs. Id. at *10. Defendant also moved to compel the EEOC's responses where it identified "other (unspecified) documents." Id. at *11. The Court determined that the time for allowing open-ended responses that contemplated additional investigation had long passed, and therefore it ordered the EEOC to produce any "other documents" on which it intended to rely. Id. at *11-12. Finally, the Court denied Defendant's motion to stay since the majority of Defendant's motion to compel was denied.

EEOC v. Flambeau, Inc.*, 846 F.3d 941 (7th Cir. 2017). The EEOC filed suit against Defendant on behalf of a former employee. Defendant had terminated the employee's health insurance because he failed to complete a "health risk assessment" and biometric testing, which Defendant required of employees to participate in its employer-subsidized health plan. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The District Court granted summary judgment for Defendant and denied summary judgment for the EEOC. The District Court found that Defendant's program was exempted from liability for involuntary medical examinations under the ADA's safe harbor provision for the administration of a bona fide benefits plan. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit declined to decide the case on the merits, but nonetheless affirmed on the grounds that the relief sought by the EEOC was unavailable or moot. The Seventh Circuit found that the EEOC's claim was moot because Article III of the Constitution limits federal jurisdiction to "live controvers[ies]." Id. at 946. Accordingly, a case is moot if a party "lacks a personal stake" in the outcome. Id. The EEOC argued that: (i) the former employee had a personal stake in the outcome because he had both compensatory and punitive damages; and (ii) the EEOC had a stake because voluntary cessation of illegal conduct – here, Defendant's wellness program – typically does not moot a case. The Seventh Circuit rejected both arguments. First, the Seventh Circuit ruled that the former employee failed to establish compensatory damages because he did not actually pay the $82.02 in medical expenses he incurred while without Flambeau's insurance. Id. The former employee also failed to establish any damages for emotional distress. Id. at 946-47. Furthermore, the Seventh Circuit held that Arnold was not entitled to punitive damages. Punitive damages are recoverable under the ADA where an employer acts "with malice or reckless indifference to the federally protected rights of an aggrieved individual." Id. at 947. The Seventh Circuit explained that Defendant did not act with reckless indifference to the former employee's federally protected rights because whether or not the ADA's safe harbor covered Defendant's wellness plan was an unsettled question when Defendant utilized it. Id. at 948. Punitive damages are not available under the ADA where a Plaintiff's theory of liability is "novel or otherwise poorly recognized." Id. at 947. Importantly, the Seventh Circuit noted that the fact that Defendant's program potentially contravened the EEOC's guideline on wellness programs did not amount to reckless indifference. Id. at 948. Second, the Seventh Circuit found that Defendant's voluntary cessation of its wellness program mooted the case because there was no reasonable expectation Defendant would reinstate the program. Id. at 949. The record showed that Defendant dropped the program because, based on two years of experience, its economic costs outweighed its benefits. Id. Moreover, Defendant's pre-suit cessation of the program evidenced that it was a genuine business decision and not a mere litigation tactic. Id. This distinguished it from cases wherein an employer stopped its illegal activity abruptly in relation to litigation and without a sufficient alternative explanation. Id. at 950. Finally, the Seventh Circuit noted that prudential concerns also weighed against deciding the case on the merits. Id. Given the prevalence of wellness programs among employers, such a decision would have wide-ranging implications. Id. Moreover, the EEOC had promulgated further regulations on the issue after this case's events. As such, the Seventh Circuit reasoned that the "issues should be decided . . . in a case where the answers will matter to the parties." Id. at 950-51. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit upheld the decision of the District Court.

EEOC v. GGNSC Holdings, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 45488 (E.D. Wis. Mar. 28, 2017). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of Juanette Roberts, a former stocking employee, alleging that Defendants discriminated against her in violation of the ADA when her employment was terminated after she requested an accommodation of indefinite leave because she was unable to use her right arm. Defendants GGNSC Administrative Services LLC ("Administrative Services") and GGNSC Holdings LLC ("Holdings") moved for summary judgment on the ground that they did not employ Roberts, nor were they named as respondents in her charge of discrimination. Id. at *1-2. All Defendants also moved for summary judgment on several grounds, including that Roberts was not a qualified individual within the meaning of the ADA. The EEOC moved for partial summary judgment, seeking dismissal of several affirmative defenses in Defendants' answer. Id. at *2. The Court stated that given its conclusion on the merits of the summary judgment motion filed by all Defendants, resolution of the motion filed by Holdings and Administrative Services was unnecessary. Id. at *6. The Court found that all the EEOC offered in support of its position that Roberts was able to perform her duties with accommodations were conclusory statements in her declaration. The Court held that there was no evidence (medical or otherwise) showing how Roberts could perform her stocking duties without the use of her right arm. Further, the Court noted that the only accommodation she requested was indefinite leave. Id. at *22. Lastly, Roberts' declaration also conflicted with her deposition testimony in which she conceded that she needed to use both of her arms to perform her lifting and stocking responsibilities. Id. at *23. Without more, the Court found that Roberts' declaration was insufficient to permit a jury to conclude that she would have been able to perform the essential functions of her job with a reasonable accommodation. Id. at *24. In sum, the Court held that the EEOC failed to meet its threshold burden of demonstrating that Roberts was a qualified individual who could have performed the essential functions of her job with reasonable accommodations. Thus, the Court found that summary judgment was appropriate as to the EEOC's failure to accommodate claim. Id. at *25. Because the EEOC failed to present sufficient evidence for a jury to conclude that Roberts was qualified to perform her essential job functions with or without reasonable accommodations, the Court held that summary judgment for Defendants also was warranted on the EEOC's disparate impact claim. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion for summary judgment and dismissed the action.

EEOC v. Mach Mining, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10353 (S.D. Ill. Jan. 25, 2017). The EEOC filed an action on behalf a group of female job applicants who had applied for non-office jobs. The EEOC asserted that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of unlawful employment practices in violation of Title VII by engaging in sex discrimination. Following remand from the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling rejecting the EEOC's position that its conciliation activities were beyond judicial review, the parties entered into extensive settlement negotiations, and agreed on a consent decree. The EEOC filed a motion for approval of the consent decree. The Court stated that in reviewing a consent decree, it pays deference to the expertise of the agency and the policy encouraging settlement, and as such, there is a presumption in favor of approval. Id. at *3-4. The Court opined that a consent decree is procedurally fair if the negotiations in reaching it were open and at arms-length. The Court found that all parties were represented by experienced counsel, and there was no evidence suggesting the consent decree was reached through anything but a procedurally fair negotiation process. As such, the Court held that the consent decree was the result of a procedurally fair process. Id. at *4. The Court reasoned that a consent decree is substantively fair if it involves "corrective justice and accountability: a party should bear the cost of the harm for which it is legally responsible." Id. at *4. The Court found that the consent decree was substantively fair because it obtained a civil penalty for the alleged non-compliance and required Defendants to comply with EEOC regulations and an injunctive protocol on future hiring. The Court also held that the consent decree was reasonable because it would compensate the individuals harmed by Defendant's hiring practices and set forth procedures for future hiring. Finally, the Court reasoned that the proposed consent decree was consistent with the EEOC's goals because it provided for corrective practices in Defendant's hiring practices, compensation for those individuals harmed by Defendant's previous hiring policies, and also injunctive relief. Id. at *5-6. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motion for approval of the consent decree.

EEOC v. Rent-A-Center East,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 147695 (C.D. Ill. Sept. 8, 2017). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of Meagan Kerr, a transgendered employee, alleging that Defendant terminated her employment after learning that she was transitioning from male to female in violation of Title VII. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgement and argued that Kerr's materially inconsistent and objectively unprovable statements could not lead a reasonable fact-finder to find in favor of the EEOC. Id. at *2. The EEOC filed a motion for partial summary judgment on Defendant's affirmative defense of failure to mitigate. The EEOC argued that the evidence demonstrated that Kerr made substantial efforts to obtain employment after her termination by Defendant, and eventually succeeded in finding a job. The EEOC argued that Defendant could not demonstrate that Kerr failed to engage in a reasonable search for comparable employment. According to the complaint, Kerr informed her manager that she was transitioning from male to female. Kerr then used a company delivery vehicle to move some furniture for another employee, and was subsequently terminated. Defendant stated that it had a policy that prohibits store employees from "using Company property (including company vehicles) for personal use." Id. at *4. Kerr asserted that she was terminated on the basis of her transgender status and that she had permission to use the vehicle. The Court concluded that considering the evidence as a whole, there was evidence from which a reasonable fact-finder could conclude that Kerr's sex, specifically, her transgender status, caused her discharge. Id. at *7. The Court agreed with the EEOC that discharging Kerr because she is transgender, or because she transitioned from male to female, is a form of sex discrimination and thus prohibited by Title VII. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgement. The Court also agreed with Defendant that the EEOC was not entitled to summary judgment on Defendant's affirmative defense of failure to mitigate damages. First, the Court noted that to establish the affirmative defense of failure to mitigate damages, an employer must show that: (i) the worker failed to exercise reasonable diligence to mitigate her damages; and (ii) there was a reasonable likelihood that the worker might have found comparable work by exercising reasonable diligence. Id. at *8. As part of its response to the EEOC's motion for partial summary judgment, Defendant provided copies of resumes Kerr used in her job search. The Court stated that the resumes contain numerous spelling errors and grammatical errors. In addition, the Court found that some of the resumes include qualifications that were blatantly untrue. Id. at *9. The Court therefore found that the resumes prepared by Kerr were sufficient to raise a genuine dispute of material fact regarding whether Kerr failed to exercise reasonable diligence to mitigate her damages. Id. at *10-11. Accordingly, the Court also denied the EEOC's motion for partial summary judgment.

EEOC v. Union Pacific Railroad Co.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 15228 (7th Cir. Aug. 15, 2017). Defendant's former employees, Frank Burks and Cornelius Jones, filed administrative charges of race discrimination and retaliation under Title VII alleging that Defendant denied them the opportunity to take a test for an "assistant signal person" position. Burks and Jones asserted that they were discriminated against on the basis of their race and were discharged in retaliation for having engaged in protected activity. In March of 2012, the EEOC sent Defendant a request for information that sought, among other things, company-wide information about persons who sought the assistant position during the relevant period. Defendant refused that request, and the EEOC issued an administrative subpoena in May of 2012, and then brought suit to enforce the subpoena in March of 2013. This first subpoena enforcement action was resolved when Defendant agreed to provide some of the requested information. Meanwhile, in July of 2012, the EEOC issued a right-to-sue letter to the charging parties so they could pursue their claims individually. They filed a joint complaint, asserting discrimination claims in Burks v. Union Pacific R.R. Co., No. 12-CV-8164 (N.D. Ill.). The case was dismissed in July of 2014 after the District Court found insufficient evidence to support the claims of discrimination, and on appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the decision. In January of 2014, while the charging parties were still litigating in District Court, the EEOC continued its administrative investigation and issued a second request for information that sought information about Defendant's electronic storage systems, additional testing and computer information, and details about signal helpers across the company who were similarly-situated to the charging parties. Defendant refused to provide this information, and the EEOC brought a second action to enforce the new subpoena. Defendant requested that the District Court dismiss the enforcement action, and argued that the EEOC lost its investigatory authority when it issued the right to sue notice to the charging parties, or, alternatively, when the District Court dismissed the charging parties' claims in the civil action. The District Court rejected those arguments and enforced the subpoena. On Defendant's appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's order. The question for the Seventh Circuit was whether the EEOC could continue its investigation even after it issued a notice of right-to-sue letter to Burks and Jones, and after the District Court dismissed the charging parties' civil lawsuit on the merits. This was a matter of first impression in the Seventh Circuit, and one that has produced a split among the other federal circuits that have considered the issue. The Fifth Circuit held in EEOC v. Hearst, 103 F.3d 462 (5th Cir. 1997), that the EEOC's authority to investigate a charge ends when it issues a right-to-sue letter. More recently, in EEOC v. Federal Express Corp., 558 F.3d 842 (9th Cir. 2009), the Ninth Circuit came to the opposite conclusion. The Seventh Circuit analyzed this split of authority in light of the history and purpose of Title VII. According to the Seventh Circuit, the Fifth Circuit based its opinion on the fact that Title VII sets forth an integrated, multi-step enforcement procedure that is divided into distinct stages, including the charge phase, investigation phase, conciliation phase, and enforcement through litigation. The Seventh Circuit stated that it did not see how this reasoning necessarily restricted the EEOC's investigative authority to the pre-enforcement phase. The Seventh Circuit sided with the Ninth Circuit, which had rejected the Fifth Circuit's concept of distinct, linear stages of enforcement by the EEOC, and it held that the beginning of a new stage does not necessarily end the prior stage. The Seventh Circuit noted that Title VII was just as much about the public interest as the enforcement of private rights. Therefore, even when the EEOC is acting for the benefit of specific aggrieved individuals, it is also acting to vindicate the public interest in preventing employment discrimination. Moreover, the limitations that Title VII imposes on the EEOC are minimal. In order to commence an investigation, the statute merely requires that a charge be filed. The statute is silent as to when the investigation must end. In particular, the Seventh Circuit found no support for the notion that the EEOC's authority is limited by the 180-day window within which it must issue a right-to-sue letter, or the actions of the charging party. The Seventh Circuit also relied on the Supreme Court's more recent holding in EEOC v. Waffle House, Inc., 534 U.S. 279 (2002), which held that the charging party's agreement to arbitrate with his or her employer did not bar the EEOC from pursuing relief on her behalf. The Supreme Court held in EEOC v. Waffle House that the EEOC is the master of its case, which it prosecutes upon its own evaluation of the strength of the public interest at stake, independent of the charging party. Finally, the Seventh Circuit rejected Defendant's argument that Title VII provides other avenues for the EEOC to continue its involvement in the charging parties' claims, i.e., specifically, that it could serve a Commissioner's charge or intervene in the charging individual's lawsuit. According to the Seventh Circuit, the fact that these other avenues were available to the EEOC did not support a limitation on the EEOC's most effective avenue, or otherwise undermine support for the broad investigatory authority of the EEOC.

EEOC v. WestRock Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21858 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 16, 2017). The EEOC investigated claims on behalf of a group of individuals alleging that Defendant subjected them to sex discrimination in violation of Title VII. The EEOC served an administrative subpoena on Defendant requesting documents and data, which Defendant declined to honor. The EEOC then brought an enforcement action as to the subpoena. The Magistrate Judge issued a Report and Recommendation to enforce an administrative subpoena issued to Defendant. The subpoena required Defendant to produce an electronic database with the name, date of hire, position and title, current employment status, date and reason for separation if not currently employed, last known home address, and all known telephone numbers for "each female individual under the age of 50 employed at any time at the Hillsdale, Illinois facility," for the period from January 1, 2011 to June 30, 2015. Id. at *1-2. The Magistrate Judge found the investigation into charges of sex discrimination was within the scope of the EEOC's statutory authority, and the EEOC had met its burden of showing the information sought by the subpoena is reasonably relevant and not too indefinite. Therefore, the Magistrate Judge recommended that Defendant should be ordered to produce the requested information, except, by agreement of the parties, Defendant "need only provide termination codes (and the keys to those codes), and not information regarding the specific reasons for each employee's separation." Id. at *2. On Rule 72 review, the Court adopted the findings of the Magistrate Judge and granted the EEOC's application to enforce the administrative subpoena. The Court ordered that Defendant produce the information as requested by the subpoena, except it need only provide termination codes (and the keys to those codes), and not information regarding the specific reasons for each employee's separation. Id. at *3.

(viii) Eighth Circuit

EEOC v. CRST Van Expedited, Inc.,* 2017 LEXIS 155134 (N.D. Iowa Sept. 22, 2017). In August of 2013, after the District Court imposed the nearly $4.7 million fee sanction award to Defendant against the EEOC, the EEOC appealed, and the Eighth Circuit reversed and remanded several fee issues for further proceedings. Id. at *2. Following Defendant's appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed and remanded the Eighth Circuit's ruling. On remand, the Eighth Circuit vacated its prior judgment and remanded back to the District Court. Thereafter, Defendant moved for a supplemental fee award in the amount of approximately $975,000, consisting of attorneys' fees for work performed in the case following the District Court's order of August 1, 2013. The District Court subsequently ordered the EEOC to pay approximately $1.9 million in attorneys' fees, out-of-pocket expenses, and taxable costs to Defendant, but denied Defendant's motion for a supplemental fee award. Section 706(k) authorizes District Courts to award attorneys' fees to the "prevailing party" in a Title VII case. After Defendant successfully obtained the dismissal of the EEOC's Title VII claims for sexual harassment, the District Court granted Defendant's motion for an award of attorneys' fees and costs and directed the EEOC to pay Defendant nearly $4.7 million, finding that the EEOC's actions in pursuing its lawsuit were unreasonable, contrary to the procedure outlined by Title VII, and imposed an unnecessary burden on both CRST and the District Court. After the EEOC appealed, the Eighth Circuit reversed and held that the District Court "did not make particularized findings of frivolousness, unreasonableness, or groundlessness as to each individual claim" and remanded these claims to the District Court to make such individualized determinations. Id. at *3-4. Further, the Eighth Circuit found that the District Court's dismissal of 67 claims based on the EEOC's failure to satisfy Title VII's pre-suit obligations did not constitute a ruling on the merits, and that therefore, Defendant was not a prevailing party as to these claims. Id. at *4. Thereafter, following Defendant's petition for certiorari, the U.S. Supreme Court accepted the case for review. The Supreme Court reversed the Eighth Circuit and remanded the case for further proceedings. Id. at *5. The Eighth Circuit then entered a judgment vacating its prior panel opinion and remanding to the District Court for further proceedings. As a result, the District Court ordered briefing on the issues remanded by the U.S. Supreme Court, where Defendant requested an additional supplemental fee award in the amount of approximately $975,000, consisting of attorneys' fees for work performed in the case following the District Court's order of August 1, 2013. In awarding nearly $1.9 million in attorneys' fees, out-of-pocket expenses and taxable costs to Defendant, the District Court also denied Defendant's motion for a supplemental fee award. In ordering the $1.9 million award, the District Court found that Defendant was the prevailing party as to the 67 claims at issue and made individualized findings as to 78 of the individual claimants for which it had granted summary judgment. Id. at *5-6. Defendant had moved for a supplemental fee award of $975,000 for the following work it performed: (i) briefs, oral argument, and rehearing petition in the EEOC's appeal to the Eighth Circuit from the August 1, 2013 order; (ii) the petition for certiorari, briefs, and oral argument in the Supreme Court resulting in reversal of the Eighth Circuit's opinion vacating the August 1, 2013 fee award; (iii) the brief resisting the Rule 60(b) motion; and (iv) the briefs on remand as required by the Eighth Circuit's vacated decision with respect to the fees awarded for claims dismissed on summary judgment. Id. at *6-7. The EEOC argued that Defendant's application for fees was untimely and that Defendant could not demonstrate that any of the actions that the EEOC took with respect to the requested categories of fees were frivolous, unreasonable, or groundless. The EEOC further argued that the fees sought by CRST were unreasonable. Regarding timeliness, the Court accepted the EEOC's argument and held that Defendant's motion for a supplemental fee award was filed more than 120 days after the latest final judgment for which it requested attorneys' fees. Id. at *7. Regarding the EEOC's argument that the fees sought by Defendant were unreasonable, the District Court similarly found in favor of the EEOC, noting that neither its appeal of the fee award to the Eighth Circuit nor Defendant's appeal to the Supreme Court were amenable to fees. Id. at *12-13. Accordingly, the District Court denied Defendant's motion for a supplemental fee award.

EEOC v. CRST Van Expedited, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 178382 (N.D. Iowa Oct. 27, 2017). In August 2013, after the District Court imposed a nearly $4.7 million fee sanction award against the EEOC, the EEOC appealed and the Eighth Circuit reversed and remanded several fee issues for further proceedings. Id. at *2. Following Defendant's subsequent appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed and remanded the Eighth Circuit's ruling. On remand, the Eighth Circuit vacated its prior judgment and remanded back to the District Court. On remand, the District Court entered an order finding that the claims dismissed for the EEOC's failure to comply with statutory presuit requirements were amenable to an award of attorneys' fees. The District Court ultimately awarded nearly $1.9 million in attorneys' fees and costs, which included $128,414.50 in fees "representing the claims dismissed for failure to comply with pre-suit requirements." Id. at *3. Defendant argued that an additional award of $1,726,330.32 was proper with respect to the claims dismissed for the EEOC's failure to comply with its pre-suit requirements, representing 72 claims ultimately dismissed on those grounds multiplied by Defendant's calculated per-claimant average of $23,976.81. Id. The EEOC asserted that Defendant could not recover fees incurred after the time that Defendant should have moved for dismissal of the claims for which it sought additional fees. Id. at *4. The EEOC also argued that Defendant's work on the pre-suit requirements issue began after it conducted written discovery, depositions, and briefing on Defendant's various motions for summary judgment. Id. Thus, the EEOC contended that Defendant expended the fees it sought on discovery and motion practice unrelated to the basis for dismissing the claims that were dismissed for failure to comply with pre-suit requirements. Id. at *5. Defendant asserted that none of its fees and costs incurred in defending against the pre-suit requirements dismissed claims would have been incurred but for the EEOC's filing and litigation of these claims despite having failed to comply with Title VII's statutory requirements. Id. Defendant asserted that it should not be barred from seeking additional fees for the discovery work performed with respect to the claims dismissed for failure to comply with pre-suit requirements because the District Court only permitted the EEOC to proceed on such claims after it represented that there was a good faith basis for the claims. Id. at *6. The District Court found that additional fees associated with the claims dismissed for the EEOC's failure to comply with its statutory pre-suit requirements were appropriate. Id. at *10. The District Court held that Defendant's per-claimant method was appropriate and reasonable. However, the District Court agreed with the EEOC that the substance of the fees that Defendant now sought appeared to be beyond the scope of what should be awarded. Id. at *11. The District Court stated that its original fee award, less the fees associated with the failure to comply with pre-suit requirements and the pattern or practice claim, still contained work performed on briefing and argument of Defendant's various motions for summary judgment. Id. at *11-12. Because the per-claimant average appeared to contain fees associated with CRST's motions for summary judgment, the District Court stated that it was over-inclusive and declined to rely on such figure to determine a corrected fee award. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the District Court directed Defendant to file a supplemental filing detailing, with specificity, the work that it believed was encompassed by the $23,976.81 per-claimant average and/or, if appropriate, provide the District Court with an alternate per-claimant average for work performed solely because of the claims dismissed for failure to comply with pre-suit requirements without inclusion of fees generated for work performed on Defendant's motions for summary judgment. Id. at *13.

EEOC v. M.G. Oil Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 126757 (D.S.D. Aug. 10, 2017). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of the charging party, Kim Mullaney, alleging that Defendant violated the Americans With Disabilities Act when it rescinded her job offer on the basis of a non-negative drug test result. Mullaney applied for a job with Defendant and subsequently failed the drug test she took as a condition of an employment offer. Mullaney asserted that she took prescription drug medication for a back injury, which resulted in the non-negative test result. Defendant had a contract with TestPoint to have TestPoint analyze its drug tests of prospective new employees. Defendant asserted that if a sample analysis yielded a non-negative result, then TestPoint was obligated to send the drug test to a medical review officer to determine whether the non-negative result was a consequence of the test subject taking a legal prescription drug. If the non-negative result was due to a legal prescription drug, TestPoint would report the test results as negative to Defendant. Id. at *2. Defendant alleged there was no indication that there was a valid legal reason for Mullaney's non-negative result and based on this assumption, it rescinded its employment offer to Mullaney. The EEOC subsequently filed suit against Defendant claiming that it discriminated against Mullaney in violation of Title I of the ADA. Defendant filed a third-party complaint against TestPoint, claiming that if it were found liable to Mullaney for discrimination, then TestPoint was liable to it for all (on the basis indemnification) or part (on the basis of contribution) of the judgment because TestPoint breached its contract with Defendant and was negligent. Id. at *4. The EEOC moved to strike Defendant's third-party complaint. TestPoint also moved to dismiss Defendant's third-party complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. The EEOC and TestPoint both argued that Defendant's claims for indemnity and contribution from TestPoint are not permitted under Title I of the ADA. Id. at *6. The EEOC and TestPoint relied on the Supreme Court's holding in Northwest Airlines, Inc. v. Transport Workers Union, 451 U.S. 77 (1981), to support their arguments. In Northwest Airlines, the airline was previously found to be liable to its female employees under Title VII and the Equal Pay Act for failing to provide back pay to a class of female employees. After the previous litigation concluded, Northwest Airlines filed a claim seeking contribution from the Transport Workers Union. The issue in Northwest Airlines was whether a claim for contribution could be pursued by employers under Title VII or the Equal Pay Act. Id. Northwest Airlines established that the right to contribution under a federal statute may be created in two ways, including: (i) by express or implied language in the statute; and (ii) by federal common law "through the exercise of judicial power to fashion appropriate remedies for unlawful conduct." Id. at *7. The Court concluded that the holding in Northwest Airlines barring claims for contribution applied equally to bar claims for indemnification. Id. at *10. The EEOC and TestPoint also argued that, through analogy, the holding in Northwest Airlines applied to ADA claims because of the similarities between the relevant federal anti-discrimination statutes. Id. The Court agreed, and opined that the ADA adopted the same enforcement provisions as Title VII. The Court stated that "[g]iven that Congress enacted the ADA well after the Supreme Court decided Northwest Airlines, Congress presumably chose to incorporate into the ADA the construction of Title VII remedies set forth in Northwest Airlines." Id. at *11. Further, the Court noted that the enforcement provisions of the ADA and Title VII do not exist to protect employers, nor did they provide employers with the option to transfer liability by indemnification or contribution to others. Thus, given that the ADA contained the same enforcement provisions as Title VII, the Court concluded that the holding in Northwest Airlines applied to claims brought under the ADA. The Court therefore determined that that Defendant's third-party claims for contribution and indemnification were impermissible under the ADA. Id. at *11-12.

EEOC v. North Memorial Health Care,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 104482 (D. Minn. July 6, 2017). The EEOC brought suit on behalf of charging party Emily Sure-Ondara alleging that Defendant retaliated against her for requesting a religious accommodation in violation of Title VII. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court granted. Defendant gave Sure-Ondara a conditional offer of employment as a nurse. As part of the nurses' union contract, all nurses were required to work a night shift every other weekend. Sure-Ondara was a Seventh Day Adventist and asserted that due to her religion she was unable to work Friday nights, and she requested an accommodation for the requirement that she work every other weekend. Defendant ultimately determined that it could not grant Sure-Ondara's request, rescinded her job offer, and encouraged her to apply to other positions within the company. Id. at *3. Sure-Ondara filed a charge with the EEOC and subsequently the EEOC filed suit. Defendant argued that the EEOC's claim should be dismissed because requesting a religious accommodation is not a protected activity under Title VII. At the outset, the Court noted that to establish a prima facie case of retaliation, the EEOC must show that: (i) Sure-Ondara engaged in protected conduct; (ii) she suffered an employment action that would dissuade a reasonable employee from making a charge of discrimination; and (iii) that there is a causal connection between the two. Id. at *6. In answering the question of whether requesting a religious accommodation is protected activity under Title VII, the Court reasoned that it must interpret Title VII according to its "plain language." Id. Under Title VII, an employee engages in protected activity when she either: (i) opposes any practice made an unlawful employment practice by Title VII (the opposition clause); or (ii) makes a charge, testifies, assists, or participates in any manner in an investigation, proceeding, or hearing under Title VII (the participation clause). Id. Applying the plain language of the statute, the Court concluded that requesting a religious accommodation is not a protected activity. Id. The Court stated that under the opposition clause, a Plaintiff must communicate her opposition to a practice that she believes, in good faith, is unlawful. The Court found that there was no evidence that Sure-Ondara believed that Defendant's denial of her religious accommodation request was unlawful. Id. at *7. The Court determined that merely requesting a religious accommodation is not the same as opposing the allegedly unlawful denial of a religious accommodation. Id. Therefore, the Court held that Sure-Ondara's accommodation request was not protected activity under the opposition clause. The Court also found that Sure-Ondara's accommodation request also was not protected activity under the participation clause. Id. at *8. The Court noted that there was no evidence that Sure-Ondara "made a charge, testified, assisted, or participated in any manner in an investigation, proceeding, or hearing" prior to her termination. Id. As a result, the Court concluded that requesting a religious accommodation is not protected activity under Title VII, and therefore granted Defendant's motion for summary judgement.

EEOC v. Dash Dream Plant, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 169984 (E.D. Cal. Oct. 13, 2017). The EEOC brought an action claiming that Defendant discriminated against Yanet Perez on the basis of her pregnancy by transferring her to a different department in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Perez informed

Defendant's general manager that she was pregnant and the next day she was transferred to a different position, even though she had not requested any modifications to her job. Id. at *1-2. Defendant subsequently held a staff meeting, at which both the general manager and president told female employees not to get pregnant, that there should be "no more babies," and that there were "too many babies coming." Id. at *2. Defendant subsequently forced Perez to go on leave, and refused to allow her to return to work following the birth of her child. Id. The EEOC sought a permanent injunction, an order that Defendant institute new policies to ensure it would not engage in further unlawful employment discrimination, and monetary relief for back pay, pecuniary and non-pecuniary losses, and punitive damages. The parties ultimately settled the matter. Thereafter, the parties sought approval of a proposed consent decree. The consent decree provided $110,000 in monetary relief for Perez and any other claimants. Id. at *3. The consent decree further provided general injunctive relief preventing Defendant and its agents from engaging in discrimination on the basis of sex in the future, as well as from retaliating against employees who oppose or report such practices. Id. at *3-4. The consent decree also required Defendant to retain a third-party "Equal Employment Opportunity Monitor" to ensure compliance with the consent decree and applicable law. Id. at *4. Additionally, Defendant was required to review and revise its written employment policies prohibiting sex discrimination in the workplace and its handling of complaints, as well as post a notice of the consent decree. Id. The consent decree also contained additional training, record-keeping, and reporting requirements and would remain in effect for five years. Id. The Court concluded that the consent decree provided substantial relief to claimants and Defendants' current and future employees, and was the product of a fair arms-length negotiation process. Id. The Court ruled that the consent decree as proposed was fair, reasonable, and adequate, and not illegal, collusive, or against the public interest and was reached following a settlement conference presided over by a judge of the Court. Accordingly, the Court granted the parties' joint motion for approval of the consent decree.

EEOC v. Discovering Hidden Hawaii Tours, Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 154576 (D. Haw. Sept. 21, 2017). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of five former male employees alleging sexual harassment, constructive discharge, and retaliation claims in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 against three Defendants, including Discovering Hidden Hawaii Tours ("DHHT"), Hawaii Tours and Transportation, and Big Kahuna. The EEOC specifically asserted that the owner and President of DHHT, Leopoldo Malagon III, subjected the male employees to unwelcome sexual comments and touching. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss on several grounds, including: (i) claims of claimants 1 and 2 as untimely because the events associated with their claims occurred more than 300 days before the charging parties filed their discrimination charges with the EEOC; (ii) the retaliation claim brought by claimant 1 due to the absence of an adverse employment action; (iii) the constructive discharge allegations of claimants 1, 3, and 4 as insufficiently pled; (iv) claimant 4's sexual harassment claim because the harassment, as alleged, was neither severe nor pervasive; and (v) any claims against Hawaii Tours and Transportation Inc. and Big Kahuna because they were not the employers of any claimant. Id. at *2. The Court granted Defendants' motion with leave to amend. The Court found that any claims that accrued before January 14, 2015 – which was 300 days prior to the filing of the initial charge on November 10, 2015 – were time-barred. The claims of claimants 1 and 2 occurred well-before this date, and therefore the Court determined that their claims were untimely. Id. at *9. Further, the Court stated there were no allegations that either claimant 3 or 4 provided notice of Malagon's alleged conduct to anyone in order to allow Defendants the opportunity to address the harassment. Id. at *18. The Court opined that even assuming that claimants 3 and 4 could not be "expected to remain on the job while seeking redress," the EEOC's complaint did not allege that they resigned specifically as a result of intolerable working conditions. Id. at *20. Accordingly, because the EEOC failed to sufficiently allege constructive discharge on behalf of claimants 3 and 4, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss as to these claims. Defendants further moved to dismiss the sexual harassment claim brought on behalf of claimant 4, arguing that the EEOC failed to allege that he was subjected to unwelcome conduct that was severe or pervasive. The Court noted that the EEOC's complaint alleged that Malagon subjected claimant 4 to "unwelcome sexual comments during the recruitment for employment with Defendants and continued to make comments of a sexual nature during his employment" as a bartender between July 2015 and August 2015. Id. at *24. In analyzing the totality of the circumstances alleged, the Court held that the EEOC failed to demonstrate either the severity or pervasiveness required in order for the conduct to have altered the conditions of claimant 4's employment and create an abusive working environment. Id. at *25. The Court accordingly granted Defendants' motion as to this claim. Defendants further sought dismissal of Hawaii Tours and Transportation and Big Kahuna because neither was allegedly an employer of the charging parties or any claimant. Id. at *26-27. The Court held that the complaint failed to allege plausible facts showing that Big Kahuna could have been an employer (or joint employer) of any of the claimants because Kahuna did not even exist at the time of any of the incidents of harassment described in the complaint. Id. at *27. Further, to the extent the EEOC sought to hold Hawaii Tours and Transportation liable as a joint employer, the complaint did not allege facts showing that such a joint employment relationship actually existed. Id. at *30-31. Accordingly, the Court also granted Defendants' motion to dismiss Hawaii Tours and Transportation and Big Kahuna. However, the Court granted the EEOC leave to amend the complaint, and stated that should it choose to amend the dismissed causes of action as to any claimant and/or Defendant, the EEOC must allege additional facts as to each element required to state a claim.

EEOC v. Goodwill Industries Of The Greater East Bay, Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 178706 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 27, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants subjected a group of nightshift janitors to sexual harassment and disability discrimination in violation of Title VII of the Civil Right Act of 1964. The EEOC moved to quash the deposition subpoena served by Defendants on the EEOC's investigator, Christopher Green. The EEOC asserted that that the deposition of Green would be burdensome, duplicative of information contained in the investigate file already produced to Defendants, and likely would invade the governmental deliberative process privilege. The Court explained that the deliberative process privilege protects "documents reflecting advisory opinions, recommendations and deliberations comprising part of a process by which government decisions and policies are formulated." Id. at *2. In order to be protected by the deliberative process privilege, a document must be both "pre-decisional" and "deliberative." Id. A "pre-decisional" document is one "prepared in order to assist an agency decision-maker in arriving at his decision" and may include "recommendations, draft documents, proposals, suggestions, and other subjective documents which reflect the personal opinions of the writer rather than the policy of the agency." Id. A pre-decisional document is part of the "deliberative process" if "the disclosure of the materials would expose an agency's decision-making process in such a way as to discourage candid discussion within the agency and thereby undermine the agency's ability to perform its functions." Id. Defendants stated that their line of questioning at Green's deposition would focus on the interviews he conducted, in order to clarify information obtained and the responses of those interviewed. Id. at *2-3. Moreover, Defendants sought clarification on Green's handwritten notes and typewritten interview summaries. Id. at *3. Based on relevant case law authorities, the Court found that depositions of EEOC investigators taken for clarification purposes are routinely permitted. The Court therefore held that because revealing the information sought by Defendants would not expose the EEOC's deliberative process, the deposition of Green was warranted. Accordingly, the Court denied the EEOC's motion to quash the subpoena of Green.

EEOC v. La Louisanne, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 200135 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 5, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act when it terminated an employee due to her pregnancy. The Court explained that absent a showing of good cause, an action must be dismissed without prejudice if the summons and complaint were not served on the Defendant within 90 days after the complaint is filed. The Court also could dismiss the action prior to the 90 days if the EEOC had not diligently prosecuted the action. The Court noted that in this case, it appeared that one or more of the time periods was not met. Accordingly, the Court ordered the EEOC to show cause why this action should not be dismissed for lack of prosecution. Id. at *2. The Court held that an order to show cause would stand submitted upon the filing of the EEOC's response when there was proof of service of the summons and complaint on Defendant and a subsequent answer by Defendant. Id. The Court ruled that if the EEOC did not file timely responses to the order to show cause, the action may be dismissed for lack of prosecution and for failure to comply with the orders of the Court, pursuant to Local Rule 41.

EEOC v. LXL Learning, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 200184 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 4, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant retaliated against charging party Adrian Scott Duane. Duane sought to intervene in the EEOC's lawsuit. The parties previously stipulated to dismiss a prior lawsuit with prejudice, which would typically bar Duane's intervention, and would preclude the EEOC from seeking damages on Duane's behalf. Id. at *1. However, concurrent with the voluntary dismissal of the prior lawsuit, Duane and Defendant agreed that Duane would be permitted to intervene in the EEOC's lawsuit notwithstanding dismissal of the prior lawsuit with prejudice. The Court noted that by agreeing to Duane's intervention, Defendant was agreeing that Duane could engage in "claim-splitting," and that a res judicata defense would not apply to Duane's participation as a party in the EEOC's lawsuit. Id. at *1-2. Duane also sought to add a state law claim not asserted in the prior lawsuit and sought to assert a different factual theory in support of the Title VII claim. Id. at *2. Defendant argued that the dismissal of Duane's prior lawsuit with prejudice barred him from asserting any claims or theories in this case beyond what the EEOC has included in its complaint. Duane asserted that the dismissal and the parties' claim-splitting agreement only barred claims he actually brought in the prior lawsuit, meaning that he may intervene now to pursue not only the claims brought by the EEOC, but also any other claims he did not assert previously. Id. The Court agreed with Defendant and opined that although there was a statutory right to intervene to assert Title VII claims, there was not a statutory right to intervene to bring other claims, such as the state law claim Duane attempted to add. Id. The Court thereby found that the state law claim Duane sought to bring was barred, under res judicata principles, by the dismissal of the prior lawsuit with prejudice. However, the Court held that the record with respect to the agreement between Duane and Defendant regarding the preclusive effect of the prior dismissal was messy and potentially incomplete. Id. at *5. The email exchange among counsel about intervention was ambiguous and the briefing submitted by Duane and Defendant in connection with the issue has been of poor quality, which raised questions with the Court. Id. at *6. The Court therefore determined that these failures meant that it would be premature, in the context of the motion to intervene, to definitively adjudicate Defendant's res judicata defense. Therefore, the Court granted Duane's motion to intervene, with the understanding that Defendant could further pursue its res judicata defense in discovery, and raise it again (with a properly developed record) at the summary judgment stage of the case, with the likely result being that Duane will be precluded from asserting his state law claim and any factual theories in support of the Title VII claim not asserted by the EEOC. Id.

EEOC v. Magnolia Health Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32472 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 7, 2017). The EEOC brought pattern or practice action alleging that Defendants unlawfully discriminated against a group of individuals due to their actual, record of, or perceived disability in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). The EEOC also alleged that Defendants used qualification standards that screened out or tended to screen out individuals with disabilities. After a series of settlement conferences, the parties reached a settlement on monetary and injunctive terms. The EEOC subsequently sought approval of a proposed consent decree reflecting the parties' agreement. Id. at *2. The proposed consent decree provided monetary relief to claimants of $325,000, to be allocated at the sole discretion of the EEOC. The proposed consent decree also provided procedures for reinstatement of eligible and qualified claimants, as well as other victim-specific relief. In addition, the proposed consent decree set forth injunctive relief, including that Defendants will: (i) retain a third-party equal employment opportunity monitor to ensure compliance with the decree and the ADA; (ii) assign an internal ADA coordinator to review and process requests for accommodation, changes in the terms and conditions of employment, and complaints regarding disability discrimination and retaliation; (iii) review and, if necessary, revise Defendants' policies and procedures regarding disability discrimination, reasonable accommodation, and retaliation; and (iv) provide training on employer obligations and employee rights under the ADA. Id. at *3-4. The Court concluded that the proposed consent decree provided substantial relief to the claimants and Defendants' employees, and that it was the product of a fair, arms-length negotiation process. Id. at *4. Accordingly, the Court found that the proposed consent decree was fundamentally fair, reasonable, and adequate, and that was is not illegal, a product of collusion, or against the public interest. Id. The Court thereby granted the EEOC's motion for approval of the parties' proposed consent decree.

EEOC v. Marquez Brothers,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 153339 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 18, 2017). The EEOC brought an action claiming that Defendants maintained a pattern or practice of using hiring preferences for Hispanic and Spanish-speaking applicants in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Id. at *2. Defendants moved to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction and for failure to state a claim. The Court denied the motion. Id. at *2. Defendants argued that because the EEOC failed to meet several conditions precedent necessary to file a Title VII action, its complaint should be dismissed for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. Id. at *5. The Court rejected Defendants' argument, denying the motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction and ruling that the requirements of § 2000e-5(f)(1) were not jurisdictional conditions precedent to suit. Id. at *11. The Court also held that the EEOC adequately alleged in its complaint that it satisfied the conditions precedent. Id. at *11. Defendants also contended that the EEOC failed to place Defendants' affiliate companies on adequate notice of the nationwide scope of the EEOC's investigation. Defendants argued that as a result, the claims of discrimination regarding all facilities, except one, should be dismissed. Id. at *12. The Court opined that even if the EEOC was restricted to bringing claims only against Defendants that charging parties name, the Ninth Circuit has articulated exceptions to the general rule. Id. at *17. The Court determined that the EEOC alleged sufficient factual material to suggest that Defendants were substantially identical, which was an exception to the rule. Id. Furthermore, the Court also found important that Defendants had notice, as the EEOC's determination of reasonable cause was directed to all Defendants. Id. at *18. As such, Defendants' motion to dismiss for lack of notice or failure to be named was denied. Id. Defendants also argued that the EEOC inadequately investigated the alleged pattern or practice of discrimination at Defendants' other facilities. Id. The Court ruled that its review of the sufficiency of such an investigation is limited to a determination of whether the EEOC attempted to confer about a charge. Because the Court would not delve into the substance of the EEOC's investigation, and the EEOC represented that it investigated, the Court reasoned that the EEOC had adequately alleged that it conducted an investigation that related to all Defendants. Id. at *19. The Court denied the motion to dismiss on that basis as well. Id.

EEOC v. McLane Co.*, 857 F.3d 813 (9th Cir. 2017). The EEOC issued an administrative subpoena as part of its investigation into a charge of discrimination filed by a former employee of subsidiary of Defendant. Id. at 815. The employee alleged that Defendant discriminated against her on the basis of sex when it fired her after she failed to pass a physical capability strength test. The EEOC's subpoena requested "pedigree information" (i.e., name, Social Security number, last known address, and telephone number) for employees or prospective employees who took the test. Following its precedent at the time, the Ninth Circuit applied a de novo review to the District Court's ruling that the pedigree information was not relevant to the EEOC's investigation. Id. The U.S. Supreme Court subsequently vacated the Ninth Circuit's judgment after holding that a District Court's decision whether to enforce an EEOC subpoena should be reviewed for abuse of discretion. The Supreme Court remanded the case to the Ninth Circuit so that the Ninth Circuit could re-evaluate the District Court's ruling under the proper standard of review. After reviewing the District Court's decision under the abuse-of-discretion standard, the Ninth Circuit still held that the District Court abused its discretion by denying enforcement of the subpoena. Id. The District Court found that the pedigree information was not relevant "at this stage" of the EEOC's investigation because the evidence McLane had already produced would "enable the [EEOC] to determine whether the [strength test] systematically discriminates on the basis of gender." Id. The Ninth Circuit rejected this approach, noting that the District Court's ruling was based on the wrong standard for relevance. The Ninth Circuit stated that under Title VII, the EEOC may obtain evidence if it relates to unlawful employment practices and is relevant to the charge under investigation. Quoting EEOC v. Shell Oil Co., 466 U.S. 54, 68-69 (1984), the Ninth Circuit opined that the relevance standard encompasses "virtually any material that might cast light on the allegations against the employer." Id. Applying Shell Oil, the Ninth Circuit found that the pedigree information was relevant to the EEOC's investigation since conversations with other employees and applicants who have taken the strength test "might cast light" on the allegations against McLane. Id. Defendant argued that, given all of the other information it had produced, the EEOC could not show that the production of nationwide pedigree information was relevant to the charge or its investigation under either a disparate treatment or disparate impact theory. Id. at 816. The Ninth Circuit construed the District Court's application of relevance to be a heightened "necessity" standard, and noted that the governing standard was "relevance," not "necessity." Id. The Ninth Circuit found that the District Court erred when it held that pedigree information was irrelevant "at this stage" of the investigation. Id. Rejecting the District Court's conclusion that the EEOC did not need pedigree information to make a preliminary determination as to whether use of the strength test resulted in systemic discrimination, the Ninth Circuit held that the EEOC's need for the evidence – or lack thereof – did not factor into the relevance determination. Id. While Defendant had argued that the pedigree information was not relevant because the charge alleged only a "neutrally applied" strength test – which by definition cannot give rise to disparate treatment – the Ninth Circuit rejected this approach, holding "[t]he very purpose of the EEOC's investigation is to determine whether the test is being neutrally applied; the EEOC does not have to take McLane's word for it on that score." Id. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit held that because the District Court based its ruling on an incorrect view of relevance, it necessarily abused its discretion when it held that the pedigree information was not relevant to the EEOC's investigation. The Ninth Circuit concluded by noting that on remand, Defendant was free to renew its argument that the EEOC's request for pedigree information was unduly burdensome. Id. at 817. In explaining that it did not reach the issue in its original decision, the Ninth Circuit instructed that "[o]n remand, the District Court should also resolve whether producing a second category of evidence – the reasons test takers were terminated – would be unduly burdensome to McLane." Id. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit vacated the District Court's judgment and remanded for further proceedings.

EEOC v. PC Iron, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 141187 (S.D. Cal. Aug. 31, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging Defendant engaged in unlawful employment practices in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. In the complaint, Elsa Perez was identified as the charging party whose allegations provide the basis of the EEOC's action. Perez filed a motion seeking to intervene. The EEOC filed a notice of non-opposition. Perez asserted that the substantial overlap in the evidence needed to prove both the Title VII and her individual state law claims provided grounds for the Court to invoke its supplemental jurisdiction. Perez sought to pursue remedies for compensatory damages, punitive damages, and injunctive relief under Title VII and the California Fair Employment and Housing Act ("FEHA"). Defendant opposed the intervention on the grounds that it was untimely, would cause it substantial prejudice, and that Perez's rights were adequately represented by the EEOC. Id. at *3. The Court first noted that the parties did not dispute that Perez was an aggrieved person because she filed the charge upon which the EEOC's lawsuit was based, and thus Perez had the right to intervene. The Court reasoned that in determining whether the application to intervene had been timely requested, the Court should broadly construe the requirements of Rule 24 in favor of the moving party. As to timeliness, the parties disputed whether or not the motion to intervene was brought in a timely manner. Defendant asserted that Perez had been aware of this action since she filed a charge of discrimination with the EEOC on August 24, 2012, had been actively involved in this case and was aware of the deadline to intervene, and that the delay in moving to intervene was caused by her own lack of diligence. The Court disagreed, finding that unavoidable circumstances including Perez's own hospitalization, her son's health issues, and her full-time work schedule which caused the delay in filing were sufficient reasons to warrant the delay. Id. at *5. Defendant also argued that it would suffer considerable prejudice if forced to litigate Perez's claims because the addition of six causes of action would prolong the litigation and increase costs. The Court found that Perez had shown that her claims shared common questions of fact and were part of the same case and controversy, and but for Ms. Perez's reporting of the alleged discriminatory acts, the EEOC would not have filed suit. Id. at *6. The Court found that the claims shared a common nucleus of operative fact and the evidence needed to resolve Perez's state law claims substantially overlapped with the evidence relevant to the federal claims. Id. at *7. Finally, Defendant claimed that in order to sufficiently demonstrate her intervention as a matter of right, Perez must show that the applicant's interest must be inadequately represented by the parties before the Court. Defendant asserted that Perez failed to argue that her interest has not been adequately presented nor provided any evidence that it had not been adequately represented by the EEOC, and therefore failed to meet the standard for intervention. Id. The Court determined that Perez's intervention as a matter of right was authorized by a Title VII, and therefore she was not required to prove this adequacy requirement. Id. at *8. Regardless, the Court stated that it agreed with Perez's argument that "when the EEOC acts, albeit at the behest of and for the benefit of specific individuals, it acts also to vindicate the public interest in preventing employment discrimination." Id. Therefore, the Court held that Perez established that the EEOC would not adequately represent her interests. Accordingly, the Court held that the request to intervene was timely and concluded that Perez has established that she is entitled to intervene as of right. The Court also exercised supplemental jurisdiction over Perez's state law claims in accordance with 28 U.S.C. § 1367. The Court found that the state law claims involved the same operative facts as the EEOC's claims and Perez's individual Title VII claims, and trying both cases in the same action would save the parties' time and money and would not prejudice the parties. Accordingly, the Court granted the motion to intervene.

EEOC v. Sensient Dehydrated Flavors Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101351 (E.D. Cal. June 29, 2017). The EEOC brought suit alleging that Defendant engaged in unlawful employment practices on the basis of disability, such as discharging employees based on their use of leave as a reasonable accommodation, discharging employees based on actual or perceived disabilities, and failing to engage in the interactive process or providing reasonable accommodations for known disabilities in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). The EEOC sought both monetary and injunctive relief. The parties reached a settlement on monetary and injunctive terms. The EEOC filed a motion seeking approval of a proposed consent decree. Id. at *2. The Court noted that "before approving a consent decree," it must "independently determine that the proposed agreement is fundamentally fair, adequate, and reasonable," and that it conforms "to applicable laws." Id. at *2. The Court observed the proposed consent decree provided monetary relief to claimants in a total sum of $800,000, with $600,000 going to the eight known claimants in this case, and up to $200,000 in a contingent fund from which currently unknown potential claimants could obtain relief, to be allocated at the EEOC's discretion. Id. at *3. The Court determined that the proposed consent decree set forth a number of forward-looking injunctive measures, including a prohibition on discriminatory employment practices and retaliation, and a requirement that Defendant engage in the interactive process with and provide reasonable accommodations to qualified individuals with disabilities. Id. at *4. Additionally, the parties agreed that Defendants would: (i) designate an equal employment opportunity monitor to ensure compliance with the decree and the ADA; (ii) designate an in-house ADA coordinator to track, monitor, process, and report on requests for accommodation; (iii) review and, if necessary, revise its policies and procedures regarding disability discrimination, reasonable accommodation, and retaliation; and (iv) provide training on employer obligations and employee rights under the ADA. Id. The Court concluded that the proposed consent decree provided substantial relief among claimants and Defendant's employees, and that it was the product of a fair arms-length negotiation process. Id. Accordingly, the Court found that the proposed consent decree was fundamentally fair, reasonable, and adequate, and thereby granted the EEOC's motion.

EEOC v. The Cheesecake Factory,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144391 (W.D. Wash. Sept. 6, 2017). The EEOC brought an action claiming that Defendant unlawfully discriminated against a hearing-impaired charging party due to his disability. Id. at *2. The EEOC alleged that Defendant: (i) failed to provide reasonable accommodations for his physical disability; (ii) terminated his employment due to his disability; and (iii) retaliated against him in violation of the American With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Id. at *2. Defendant moved to compel responses to discovery requesting information regarding the charging party's employment and medical history. Defendant also requested that the EEOC admit or deny whether the charging party had any disability or impairment other than deafness. Id. at *5. The EEOC refused on the basis that the information was privileged. Id. Defendant believed that the charging party had another a disability in addition to hearing impairment because the EEOC had partially redacted documents, based on psychotherapist/patient privilege. Id. The EEOC moved to quash Defendant's subpoenas to prior employers. Id. at *1. The EEOC raised several objections to Defendant's request for discovery, including: (i) the psychotherapist-patient privilege; (ii) the charging party's privacy interest in medical records containing information about any other disabilities; and (iii) the relevance and proportionality of prior employment records. Id. at *5. The Court granted Defendant's motion in part and denied it in part, and denied the EEOC's motion to quash in its entirety. Id. at *31. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that the charging party had waived the privilege related to psychotherapist-patient communications by asserting damages based on "garden variety emotional distress." Id. at *13. However, the Court ruled that the information Defendant sought were discoverable because psychotherapist-patient privilege did not apply as the privilege applies only to communications that occurred "in the course of diagnosis or treatment." Id. at *8. Accordingly, the names of mental health providers and dates of treatment were discoverable. Id. at *9. Even where the privilege was applicable, the Court reasoned that the charging party had waived the privilege when he disclosed the information to third-party providers for purposes of seeking a benefit. Id. at *17. The Court also rejected the EEOC's argument that the charging party had a privacy interest in his medical records, noting there is no physician-patient privilege protecting medical records under federal law. Id. at *18. The Court acknowledged the constitutional right to privacy in medical records in some contexts, but ruled that because the charging party put his medical condition at issue, any privacy interest was waived. Id. at *22. The Court ordered the EEOC to respond to Defendant's discovery requests that related to any disability and provide any mental health records that contained information regarding a disability. Id. at *28.

EEOC v. The Cheesecake Factory,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 153549 (W.D. Wash. Sept. 19, 2017). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of Oleg Ivanov, a hearing impaired employee, alleging that Defendants violated the Americans With Disabilities Act when they failed to provide him with accommodations during employment orientation. The Court had previously granted Defendants' motion to compel discovery. The Court issued a ruling on discovery issues, and subsequently the EEOC filed a motion requesting that the Court to reconsider its ruling on certain discovery disputes between the parties. The Court found that the EEOC failed to make a showing that: (i) there was error in the prior ruling, or (ii) new facts or legal authority existed that could not have been brought to the attention of the Court earlier through reasonable diligence. Id. at *2. The Court stated that it required EEOC to produce all of Ivanov's medical records that "relate to either Ivanov's hearing impairment or any other condition that constitutes a disability from January 1, 2010, to the present." Id. The Court held that medical records of Ivanov's hearing impairment were relevant to the EEOC's ADA claims and to Defendants' defenses. Additionally, the Court found that the EEOC produced evidence of an undisclosed disability, and Defendants were entitled to discover information related to this undisclosed disability because of the relevance to their defense of EEOC's claims. Id. at *3. Similarly, the Court held that Ivanov waived his medical privacy rights and his psychotherapist-patient privilege as to records related to his hearing impairment and any undisclosed disability because he placed his disability or disabilities at issue due to the substance of the EEOC's claims under the ADA. Id. at*4. The Court determined that Defendants were entitled to Ivanov's medical and/or mental health records to the extent those records contained information about his hearing impairment or any undisclosed disability. Id. The Court reasoned that the EEOC placed those records at issue here by virtue of the substance of its ADA claims on Ivanov's behalf. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court denied the EEOC's motion for reconsideration.

EEOC v. Trans Ocean Seafoods,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 33240 (W.D. Wash. Mar. 8, 2017). The EEOC brought suit alleging that Defendant engaged in discrimination and retaliation against its shellfish harvesters in violation of Title VII. Some of the shellfish harvesters joined the lawsuit as Plaintiff-Interveners. Defendant filed a motion for a protective order to safeguard witnesses who fear retaliation as a consequence of testifying at trial and a motion to grant Defendant relief from the deadline to serve its pretrial statement. Id. at *2. Defendant contended that it could not get a fair trial because material witnesses were afraid that if they testified, Plaintiff-Interveners would engage in retaliatory tactics, such as reporting them to Immigration and Customs Enforcement ("ICE") or harming them in other ways. Id. The Court found that a protective order was unnecessary because of laws that prohibit any party from intimidating or retaliating against a witness. Id. at *4. The Court stated that these already-existing laws, which all parties must observe, are sufficient protections against witness retaliation and rendered a protective order unnecessary. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for a protective order. Defendant also contended that it should be permitted to serve its pretrial statement after the applicable deadline. Defendant asserted that the EEOC was at fault for it missing the deadline because the EEOC's lawyers "only sent their pretrial statement to the lead counsel for this case, without copying any of his staff or other lawyers for Defendant." Id. at *5. Defendant also argued that it missed the deadline in good faith and that extending the Rule 16 deadline would not prejudice the EEOC. Id. The Court held that Defendant failed to explain why the email address to which the EEOC sent the pretrial statement had any bearing upon its independent responsibility to comply with Rule 16(i). The Court explained that the deadline supplied by the rule was set in relation to the pretrial order deadline; it was not triggered by the receipt of the EEOC's pretrial statement. Id. at *5-6. The Court therefore found that Defendant did not establish good cause to justify an extension. The Court also held that Defendant failed to show that it acted diligently or that its lack of diligence was outweighed by any other factor. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to grant relief from the deadline to serve its pretrial statement.

EEOC v. Trans Ocean Seafoods,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38249 (W.D. Wash. Mar. 16, 2017). The EEOC brought suit alleging that Defendant engaged in discrimination and retaliation against its shellfish harvesters in violation of Title VII. In preparation for jury trial, the EEOC and Plaintiff-Interveners filed several motions in limine, which the Court granted in part and denied in part. The EEOC first moved to exclude "any inquiry, evidence, argument, suggestion or mention of the immigration status, work authorization, or documents that indicate such information of Plaintiffs-Interveners, Claimants, their family members, or their witnesses." Id. at *3. The Court partially granted the motion and excluded all evidence concerning the immigration status of any party, claimant, witness, or other individual implicated in this matter. The EEOC also moved to exclude "testimony, evidence, comment, argument and questioning regarding the sexual behavior and predisposition of Claimants in this lawsuit, other than such information involved in direct conversations or contact with the alleged harasser." Id. at *5-6. The Court granted the motion and found the Defendant's assertions of relevance were speculative and unsupported. Id. at *6. The EEOC also moved to exclude "testimony, argument or other evidence relating to domestic violence allegedly experienced by Claimants, their family members, or their witnesses prior to 2011, when the incidents alleged in the complaint began, and after the Claimants no longer worked at Trans Ocean." Id. at *7. The Court also granted this motion. The EEOC further moved to exclude "testimony, argument or other evidence of the employment of any of the Claimants by entities other than Defendant." Id. at *8. Defendant opposed the motion on the basis that whether Claimants' other employers "had written harassment policies is relevant to whether Plaintiffs understand the requirements on the businesses to have written policies." Id. The Court granted the motion, stating that it failed to see how the Claimants' degree of understanding about requirements to maintain written policies was a fact of consequence concerning Defendant's liability under anti-discrimination statutes. Id. at *8-9. The EEOC likewise moved to exclude "evidence or testimony regarding medical conditions or medical records regarding any Claimant." Id. at *9. Defendant opposed the motion, asserting that it had relevant, admissible evidence of Claimants' medical records. The Court granted the motion and stated that it would not fail to exclude irrelevant, unfairly prejudicial evidence with a vague, unsupported hypothetical in which sensitive material potentially could be used to impeach a witness. Id. The EEOC further moved to exclude "all testimony, evidence, comment, argument and questioning at trial of the wage & hour lawsuit that two of the Claimants' filed against Defendant in Skagit County Superior Court." Id. at *10. The Court found that the Skagit County action had no bearing on the instant matter and granted the motion. The EEOC next moved to exclude "evidence or argument at trial regarding current or former Defendant employees who asserted they have not been subjected to a sexually hostile or retaliatory work environment." Id. The Court reserved ruling on the EEOC's motion and stated that it would allow limited argument at the pre-trial conference on the merits of this motion and would issue its ruling at that time. Id. at *11. Finally, Plaintiffs moved to exclude evidence and testimony offered by witnesses that Defendant had not disclosed as required in accordance with Rule 26(a). Defendant opposed the motion, contending that it planned to use these witnesses solely for impeachment. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court denied the EEOC's motion and ruled that Defendant was permitted to present testimony from those witnesses for impeachment.

EEOC v. Trans Ocean Seafoods,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 100196 (W.D. Wash. June 28, 2017). The EEOC brought suit alleging that Defendant engaged in discrimination and retaliation against its shellfish harvesters in violation of Title VII. The shellfish harvesters subsequently joined the case as Plaintiff-Interveners. At trial, the jury reached a partial verdict, finding against the EEOC and Plaintiffs-Interveners on all claims except for the EEOC's federal sexual harassment claim seeking relief for Serapia Matamoros and Plaintiff-Intervener Serapia Matamoros' federal and state sexual harassment claims. Id. at *2. The Court declared a mistrial on those claims as to which the jury could not reach a verdict. Defense counsel sought to withdraw from representing Defendant, but stated that they were willing to continue representing Defendant throughout the duration of post-trial motions practice. Id. at *3. The Court ordered defense counsel to submit supplemental briefing identifying the specific reasons they sought to withdraw. Defense counsel filed a supplemental brief containing these reasons and moved to seal the brief, asserting that it contained sensitive matters concerning their attorney-client relationship with Defendant. The EEOC and Plaintiffs-Interveners contended that it planned to relitigate the claims on which the jury deadlocked and that permitting counsel to withdraw would result in a prejudicial delay because Defendant would need to secure substitute counsel and, if they failed to do so, the Court would declare default judgment necessitating motions practice on the appropriate amount of damages. Id. at *4. After reviewing Defense counsel's reasons for seeking to withdraw, the Court found that professional considerations necessitated withdrawal. The Court agreed with defense counsel that the considerations implicated sensitive matters concerning their attorney-client relationship with Defendant. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to seal. Id. at *4-5. The Court noted that it would unseal the brief at the conclusion of the proceedings, including any subsequent appellate proceedings. Id. at *5. In permitting the motion to withdraw, the Court held that the EEOC and Plaintiffs-Interveners failed to make a sufficient showing of prejudice to warrant denying the request of counsel for Defendant. The Court stated that it was not in a position to force a law firm to continue representing a client when professional considerations dictated otherwise. Id. As for EEOC and Plaintiffs-Interveners' concern that Defendant would default by failing to secure substitute counsel, the Court was not persuaded that the prospect of default would cause prejudice, harm the administration of justice, or unreasonably delay the resolution of the case. Accordingly, the Court granted Defense counsel's motion to withdraw.

EEOC v. Trans Ocean Seafoods,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 146576 (W.D. Wash. Sept. 8, 2017). The EEOC brought claims of sexual harassment against Defendant in violation of Title VII and the Washington Law Against Discrimination ("WLAD"). Plaintiffs-Interveners alleged that they were sexually harassed by their immediate supervisor, Bartolo Pilar ("Pilar"), and other male employees while working as clam harvesters. Following a trial, the jury found, by a preponderance of the evidence, that Defendant did not know or should have known of the harassment of Plaintiff-Interveners Elena Perea Olea ("Perea") and Celia Sanchez Perea ("Sanchez") by Pilar or other employees. Id. at *2. Perea and Sanchez then filed a motion for a new trial. Plaintiffs-Interveners argue that Defendant's response to a request for admission, business records, and testimony at trial established that Defendant knew that Perea and Sanchez were being harassed. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs-Interveners also submitted as exhibits notes entitled, "Sexual Harassment Claim Investigation," and discipline documentation forms indicating a prior complaint against Pilar. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs-Interveners argued that Matamoros, Perea, Sanchez, and Emily John-Martin all provided testimony corroborating Plaintiffs-Interveners' claim that Perea and Sanchez reported their sexual harassment to Defendant's Operations Manager, Sebastian Santelices. Matamoros, Perea, and Sanchez testified that they reported that Pilar was sexually harassing them on two occasions prior to filing a complaint with the EEOC. At a meeting off-site, Perea and Matamoros told Santelices that Pilar was making sexual comments about them. Id. at *6. Santelices then advised the women that there would be another meeting and that he would talk to Pilar. Perea and Sanchez made a second complaint about Pilar's sexual comments – shortly after the first – at an employee meeting. Id. Their account of this meeting with Santelices was supported by Santelices' notes from the "Sexual Harassment Claim Investigation" and Matamoros' discipline documentation form. At trial, Santelices stated that he did not remember meeting with Matamoros, Perea, and Sanchez. Id. at *7. The Court found that the jury, having observed Matamoros, Perea, Sanchez, and John-Martin, and considered their credibility, credited Santelices' testimony over theirs. However, when considering whether to grant a new trial, the Court opined that it could weigh the evidence and assess the credibility of the witnesses. As there was disparity between Santelices' testimony and that of the four other witnesses, the Court considered other corroborating evidence that supported each party's arguments. The parties agreed that there was a prior complaint against Pilar for his inappropriate use of "sexual language." Id. at *8. It was also undisputed that Matamoros told Santelices that Pilar was sexually harassing her and other female employees. After Matamoros reported that Pilar was engaging in sexually harassing behavior, Santelices met with Pilar and gave him a second warning. The Court held that this evidence, coupled with the compelling testimony of Matamoros, Perea, Sanchez, and John-Martin, outweighed Santelices' testimony and his version of these events. Id. at *8-9. Even crediting Santelices' testimony contradicting Plaintiffs-Interveners' claim that they reported that Pilar was sexually harassing them, there was still ample evidence that Defendant had notice of Pilar's behavior for at least a year before Matamoros filed her complaint with the EEOC and should have known that the harassment was occurring. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court found that the jury's verdict was contrary to the clear weight of the evidence and should be set aside. The Court thereby granted Plaintiff-Intervener's motion for a new trial.

EEOC v. UPS*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 112004 (D. Ariz. June 19, 2017). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of Desiree Barnabas, a sales support representative, asserting that Defendant failed to provide her a reasonable accommodation and terminated her employment in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990 ("ADA"). In particular, the EEOC asserted that due to a brain surgery and knee surgery with subsequent leave of absences, Barnabas was unable to remember how to use the requisite computer systems needed to perform her job. The EEOC alleged that instead of accommodating Barnabas, Defendant terminated her employment. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment of all the EEOC's claims, which the Court denied. The EEOC provided a report from Barnabas' neuropsychologist that stated that Barnabas' working memory was "broadly within the high end of the low average range, which is surprising given her high average intellectual functioning." Id. at *11. The Court found that a reasonable jury could find that a limitation that placed someone even in the high end of the low average range of the general population limits someone "as compared to most people in the general population." Id. Defendant asserted that it was entitled to summary judgment because Barnabas failed to demonstrate that she was disabled under the ADA, as there was no evidence that her surgery and subsequent memory loss substantially limited any major life activity. The Court found that there were genuine issues of material fact remaining as to whether Barnabas was disabled under the ADA, and therefore declined to dismiss the EEOC's failure to accommodate claim. Therefore, the Court also denied summary judgment as to the EEOC's discriminatory discharge claims, as the issue of whether Barnabas was actually disabled was still in dispute. Id. at *12. Finally, Defendant argued that the Court should grant summary judgment on Barnabas' retaliation claim because she did not endure an adverse employment action. Defendant asserted that Barnabas chose to take an unpaid leave of absence, and remained an inactive employee. Id. at *13. However, the Court opined that Barnabas testified that she approached Defendant to request additional accommodations for her disability, not to request a leave of absence. Barnabas stated that Defendant insisted she take an unpaid leave of absence until she could provide medical documentation establishing her disability. The Court noted that if Barnabas' testimony was true, then Defendant placed her on unpaid leave in response to her request for additional accommodations for her disability. Therefore, taking the evidence in the light most favorable to EEOC, the Court held that summary judgment on the retaliation claim was inappropriate at this time. Id. at *13-14. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgement.

EEOC v. ValleyLife, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7558 (D. Ariz. Jan. 19, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant engaged in unlawful employment practices in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Defendant provides services to disabled individuals. Defendant's managers, supervisors, and employees receive no formal training on the FMLA or the ADA. The EEOC alleged that Defendant failed to accommodate four employees following work-related injuries that required FMLA leave. The parties filed cross-motions arguing that that they were entitled to summary judgment on the issue of whether the four charging parties were qualified individuals under the ADA. Id. at *11-12. The EEOC also sought summary judgment with regard to Defendant's alleged failure to engage in the interactive process with the individuals and the availability of potential reasonable accommodations. Defendant countered that it had no duty to engage in the interactive process, and that it was entitled to summary judgment because the EEOC could not demonstrate that it had an inflexible leave policy. The Court denied both motions because material questions of fact existed for all claims. The Court found that there were issues of fact as to whether Defendant had a duty to engage in the interactive process and/or whether it did so in good faith, as testimony from the charging parties conflicted with Defendant's assertions regarding accommodating their requests for FMLA leave and reasonable accommodations. Id. at *14-18. Defendant also contended that it was entitled to summary judgment on the EEOC's request for punitive damages because it had "no intractable leave policy" and it therefore "acted in good faith from a policy standpoint." Id. at *28. However, the testimony of Defendant's human resources director indicated that she was well trained on the ADA and arguably should have known the law. The Court determined that the question was not whether Defendant knew it was acting in a discriminatory manner, but whether Defendant was aware "that it may be acting in violation of federal law." Id. at *29. Furthermore, the Court found that the EEOC presented genuine issues of disputed fact related to its claims that Defendant terminated the charging parties' employment and refused to supply reasonable accommodations for the individuals once their FMLA leave expired that could affect the resolution of the EEOC's claim for punitive damages. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment.

EEOC v. VF Jeanswear LP,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103487 (D. Ariz. July 5, 2017). Charging party Lori Bell filed a charge of discrimination with the EEOC against Defendant alleging discrimination based on sex and age in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act and the Equal Pay Act. Before filing her charge, Bell filed a lawsuit against Defendant in state court alleging gender and age discrimination as well as violations of equal wage statutes. On August 28, 2014, Defendant removed the lawsuit. The EEOC then issued Bell a right-to-sue notice and sent Defendant its first request for information as part of an administrative subpoena. Defendant responded with substantial information, but objected to Request No. 10 on grounds that it was unduly burdensome and not relevant to the issues involved in the charge. The EEOC sent Defendant a modified Request No. 10 and Defendant again objected, contending that even as narrowed, the request sought information not reasonably related to the charge. The EEOC filed a motion to enforce the administrative subpoena, which the Court denied. The EEOC asserted that the information sought was relevant to Bell's individual claims and class claims regarding lack of promotional opportunities for women and gender-based pay disparities. Id. at *4. The EEOC further contended that the information would provide the identities of witnesses and others who may be victims of disparate treatment and might also help the EEOC formulate other requests for information. Id. at *5. The EEOC's subpoena sought an electronic database identifying all supervisors, managers, and executive employees at Defendant's facilities (company-wide and nationwide) from January 1, 2012, to present, and for each individual identified, production of routine employment information, such as name, contact information, age, sex, date of hire, and employment history within the company. Id. at *14. In addition, the subpoena sought the reason for termination for individuals who were no longer employed by Defendant. The Court noted that Bell's charge alleged only a single discriminatory demotion and unequal pay claim. Id. at *15. Further, the Court explained that although Bell never held, sought, or was refused a managerial or "top" position, she asserted that females were not afforded the opportunity to compete for top positions. Id. The Court held that the requested information regarding all supervisors, managers, and executive employees did not bear on unequal pay claims, and was just a tip not bearing on her own experience or detriment. The Court held that even under a generous reading of relevance, the EEOC's nationwide, company-wide search for systemic discrimination in promotions to top positions was too removed from Bell's charge of a single demotion from a sales job to be relevant. Id. at *16-17. The Court noted that as of August 15, 2016, Defendant had about 2,500 employees, including than 600 employees in a supervisor, manager, or executive position during the relevant period, and 200 had been terminated during that time. Id. at *19. Defendant asserted that it did not maintain an electronic database in the ordinary course of business with the requested information, and personnel files were maintained at the location where the employee worked or reported or at an off-site location. Id. Defendant estimated that it would require 24 hours of work to identify and prepare a complete list of the employees, 300 hours to retrieve and compile information that was available from its computerized personnel records, and additional time to obtain personnel files not available from its computerized personnel records, and would cost approximately $10,698.00. Id. at *19-20. The Court stated that it would order Defendant to supply only the data that its computer system would yield, with no searches of files or people's memories, and that anything more would be unduly burdensome. Id. at *22-23. Accordingly, the Court denied the EEOC's motion to enforce its administrative subpoena.

(x) Tenth Circuit

EEOC v. BNSF Railway Co.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 6204 (10th Cir. April 11, 2017). The EEOC brought an ADA action alleging that Defendant discriminated against the charging party, Kent Duty, when it revoked his offer of employment. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, which the District Court granted, finding that Duty was not disabled under the definition of the ADA. On appeal, the Tenth Circuit affirmed the judgement of the District Court. At age sixteen, a car accident left Duty with severe injuries to his right arm. Duty applied to work at Defendant as a locomotive-electrician. The job posting stated that Defendant expected its locomotive electricians to climb on and off locomotives and equipment, work around heavy machinery, lift equipment, use hand tools, and maintain and repair high-voltage electrical equipment. Id. Defendant made Duty a conditional job offer in which it explained that Duty would have to pass a background check and drug screening, and complete a medical-history questionnaire. Id. at *3-4. On the questionnaire, Duty revealed that he had nerve trauma and had undergone surgery in the past. Defendant's third-party medical contractor contacted Duty and arranged a medical exam. The exam showed that Duty had a normal range of motion in his right shoulder and elbow, but that his range of motion in his right wrist, particularly his backward movement, was zero as compared to a normal degree of range of 60. Id. at *4. Based on this test result and subsequent testing, Defendant ultimately determined that Duty could not meet its three-point-contact rule, a safety standard that applies to climbing in the workplace. Id. Defendant thereafter notified Duty that it had revoked the employment offer, but stated that he may be qualified for other positions. Duty never applied for any other positions at Defendant. The District Court found insufficient evidence that Duty had a "disability" within the ADA's definition, and granted summary judgment on all claims. Id. at *5. The EEOC conceded that Duty did not have an actual physical impairment that rose to a protected disability. Nevertheless, the EEOC contended he was disabled under the ADA because Defendant regarded him as disabled. The EEOC asserted that Defendant mistakenly believed that Duty's impairment substantially limited him in the major life activity of working. In response, Defendant asserted that it only considered Duty for the single job for which he applied. The Tenth Circuit found that was not the case because Defendant specifically pointed to other job opportunities in its communication to Duty. Further, Defendant only looked to perception of Duty's hand injury related to a specific task, i.e., complying with the three-point-contact rule. The Tenth Circuit stated that looking to that perception, combined with Defendant's email inviting Duty to apply to other positions, could not establish that Defendant regarded Duty as unable to work in general. Defendant argued that the three-point-contact rule is "well-established in industrial settings." Id. at *9. Since the EEOC failed to show that Defendant considered Duty unable to perform jobs other than the locomotive-electrician job, the Tenth Circuit held that the District Court properly found that Plaintiffs failed to show Defendant regarded Duty as substantially limited in the major life activity of working. Id. at *18-19. The EEOC also asserted that Defendant regarded Duty as substantially limited in the major life activity of performing manual tasks. The Tenth Circuit opined that complying with a three-point-contact rule while climbing and gripping tools with both hands were both jobs-centered tasks, which do not amount to major life activities. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Tenth Circuit held that the EEOC failed to show that Defendant regarded Duty as unable to perform any task central to his daily life. Id. at *20. The EEOC also claimed that Defendant violated the ADA by improperly "us[ing] the results of a pre-employment medical 'examination' by its physician to disqualify [him]." Id. The Tenth Circuit found that the medical exam occurred after Duty received a conditional offer of employment, and was therefore a post-offer, pre-employment medical exam, which falls under 42 U.S.C. § 12112(d)(3). Id. at *21. Thus, if Duty had a claim, it would arise under § 12112(d)(3) rather than (d)(2). The Tenth Circuit determined that because the EEOC failed to show that Duty was disabled, any claims under (d)(3)(C) necessarily fail as well. Accordingly, the Tenth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling granting summary judgment to Defendant.

EEOC v. Brown-Thompson General Partnership*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 133173 (W.D. Okla. Aug. 21, 2017). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of Casey Crothers, an employee, alleging that Defendant terminated him on the basis of his disability in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act. The EEOC contended that Defendant neglected to make reasonable accommodations for Crothers and other employees by failing to provide light or modified duty assignments in the absence of workers' compensation claims or on-the-job injuries and by enforcing a policy that permitted no more than three-days of consecutive absences rather than additional leave as an accommodation. Id. at *1-2. The EEOC alleged that Crothers informed his supervisors about his psoriatic arthritis condition and his inability to lift more than ten pounds for a period of two to three weeks, the result of inflammation in his hands, feet, and back. Id. at *2. Crothers was not eligible for FMLA leave, and the EEOC argued that he was terminated rather than temporarily transferred as he had requested a leave of absence. Id. The EEOC filed a motion to compel discovery, contending that Defendant failed to provide adequate responses to certain discovery requests. Defendant asserted that it adequately responded to the EEOC's requests. The Court granted the EEOC's motion in part. Id. at *3. Specifically, the Court granted the EEOC's motion to the extent it sought: (i) information and documents relating to Defendant providing light or modified duty to employees with non-work related medical conditions, including the identity of such employees from May 2012 to present; (ii) information and documents relating to Defendant providing reasonable accommodations for employees with non-work related medical restrictions from May 2012 to present, including the identity of such employees from May 2012 to present; (iii) documents that related to Defendant providing reasonable accommodations to employees with work-related medical conditions from May 2012 to present; and (iv) documents identified or relied upon in Defendant's response to interrogatories. Id. at *3-4. The Court found the information sought was relevant and Defendant failed to establish that production of the requested information or documents would create an undue burden. The Court denied the EEOC's motion to the extent it sought Defendant's financial statements for 2015 and 2016. Id. at *5. Finally, the parties disagreed regarding Defendant's responses as they related to Interrogatory 13, which fell into the category of "facts and documents relevant to the EEOC's claims as well as allegations in the 7-Eleven's answer and the identity of persons with knowledge of those facts." Id. at *5-6. Defendant contended it offered the information requested as well as the documents in support of its responses. As such, the Court denied the EEOC's motion as it related to this Interrogatory 13. Accordingly, the Court granted in part the EEOC's motion to compel discovery.

EEOC v. Centura Health,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 141469 (D. Colo. Sept. 1, 2017). The EEOC received 11 discrimination charges against Defendant claiming violations of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Id. at *1. The EEOC issued an administrative subpoena and Defendant complied in part, but refused to produce all the information sought by claiming that compliance was an undue burden. Id. at *2. The EEOC sought to enforce the subpoena and presented a declaration from its investigator, which asserted that Defendant's representative had previously indicated that the information easily could be produced as it was stored in a searchable electronic data base. Id. at *4. Defendant claimed that it would take nine employees and years of work to comply as the files would need to be manually checked, and that this would cost $730,000. Id. at *5. The Court referred the dispute to the Magistrate Judge and authorized him to modify the subpoena if he found that compliance would be unduly burdensome for Defendant. Id. The Magistrate Judge granted the EEOC's application in part and denied it in part, noting that compliance with the full scope of items sought would likely be unduly burdensome as the subpoena sought information requiring manual review of files of 15,500 employees. Id. at *21. However, the Magistrate Judge found that Defendant's declarations were inaccurate regarding the burden of complying with all of the items sought and that it did electronically store some of the information sought, such as information as to which employees were placed on leave and the type of leave requested. Id. at *16. To the extent that the information sought was stored electronically, the Magistrate Judge ordered compliance. Id. at *31. The Magistrate Judge also rejected the Defendant's argument that compliance with the subpoena was not required because the EEOC was seeking the information to investigate if Defendant engaged in a pattern of discrimination and not to investigate the individual charge. Id. at *25. The Magistrate Judge noted that the Court referred only on the issue of undue burden. Id. However, the Magistrate Judge indicated that how Defendant treated other employees who requested accommodations at the same facilities was directly relevant to whether Defendant discriminated against the 11 charging parties based on disability. Id. at *23. The Magistrate Judge also rejected Defendant's argument that its non-charging employees had privacy interests in their medical information that precluded production of that information, noting that Defendant cited no legal authority in support of its privacy argument. Id. at *25. The Magistrate Judge concluded that the sensitive nature of non-charging parties' private medical information was not a basis for an employer to withhold the information from the EEOC. Id. at *28-29. The Magistrate Judge therefore modified the subpoena to require Defendant to produce all information in its electronically searchable sources that was responsive to requests and all information and all physical documents sought in items that were in Defendant's control. Id. at *30. The Magistrate Judge noted that if Defendant wanted to avoid the need for manual review of the 880 personnel files at issue, it may in the alternative produce the 880 employees' entire personnel files or have the files scanned and converted by software in an electronically searchable format. Id. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge ruled that the application was granted in part. Id. at *32.

EEOC v. CollegeAmerica Denver, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 17094 (10th Cir. Sept. 5, 2017). The EEOC brought a claim on behalf of Debbi Potts, Defendant's former employee. The EEOC sued for unlawful-interference with statutory rights, which the District Court ultimately dismissed as moot. Regarding the EEOC's retaliation claim that remained for trial, Defendant presented a new defense that Potts had breached the settlement agreement by reporting adverse information to the EEOC without notifying Defendant. In response, the EEOC argued that by presenting this new theory, Defendant was continuing to interfere with the statutory rights of the former employee and the EEOC. As such, the EEOC appealed the dismissal of its unlawful-interference claim, arguing that the claim was no longer moot in light of Defendant's new case theory. On appeal, the Tenth Circuit reversed the dismissal of the EEOC's unlawful-interference claim. First, the Tenth Circuit opined that in determining whether a claim is moot, a special rule applies when Defendant voluntarily stops the challenged conduct. Id. at *4-5. When the conduct stops, the claim will be deemed moot only if two conditions exist, including: (i) it is absolutely clear the allegedly wrongful behavior could not reasonably be expected to recur, and (ii) interim relief or events have completely and irrevocably eradicated the effects of the alleged violation. In arguing that the case was moot, Defendant submitted two declarations from its general counsel assuring that Defendant would not take the "positions known to trouble the EEOC." Id. at *6. In response, the EEOC argued that the declarations should not be relied upon since Defendant presented a new theory after the filing of the declarations – that the employee had breached the settlement agreement by reporting adverse information to the EEOC without notifying CollegeAmerica – an argument that continued Defendant's unlawful interference with statutory rights. The Tenth Circuit held that because Defendant planned to present its new theory in its state court suit, the potential for Defendant to repeat its allegedly wrongful behavior remained, and Defendant thus did not satisfy its burden of demonstrating the absence of a potential for reoccurrence. Id. The Tenth Circuit also rejected Defendant's argument that the case was moot because the outcome "would not affect anything in the real world." Id. at *7. The Tenth Circuit noted that in its state court suit, Defendant planned to argue that the employee breached the settlement agreement by reporting adverse information to the EEOC without notifying Defendant. The EEOC asserted that this argument would constitute unlawful-interference with the employee's rights, and thus it sought a permanent injunction prohibiting Defendant from unlawfully interfering with the statutory rights of the employee and the EEOC. The Tenth Circuit accepted the EEOC's argument, holding that if the EEOC prevailed on the merits and obtained an injunction, Defendant could not present its new theory in the state court suit against the employee, which "would constitute an effect in the real world." Id. Finally, the Tenth Circuit declined to consider Defendant's argument that the EEOC's unlawful-interference claim brought under 29 U.S.C. § 626(f)(4) failed as a matter of law since it could not be used as an affirmative cause of action, noting the District Court had not yet ruled on the issue and therefore it was to consider that issue on remand. Id. at *7-8. The Tenth Circuit also refused to consider Defendant's argument that the EEOC sought overly broad, unauthorized injunctive and declaratory relief, explaining it would not consider this issue since it was raised on appeal for the first time. Accordingly, the Tenth Circuit reversed and remanded the District Court's dismissal of the EEOC's unlawful-interference claim.

EEOC v. Columbine Management Services, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 152986 (D. Colo. Aug. 16, 2016). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendants discriminated against its personal care providers ("PCPs") and terminated them on the basis of their race and national origin in violation of Title VII. The EEOC also brought a retaliation claim on behalf of white supervisor, Marlene Hoem, for engaging in protected activity.

Id. at *1. The EEOC contended that Kiros Aregahgn (an Ethiopian national), and Mohamed Osman Mahboub, Sawson Ibrahim, and Hanaa Gual (all Sudanese nationals) had worked with Defendants for over 14 years, were well-liked by patients, and spoke English at all times. Pamela Lewis, a director, allegedly told Hoem that she had to get rid of the black-African PCPs because they did not speak English. Id. at *3. When Hoem refused to comply with Lewis' director, she was allegedly terminated. Id. Defendants then required the PCPs to take PCP training, administered a test, and terminated the four black-African PCPs because they did not pass the test. Id. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment, which the Court granted in part. The EEOC sought summary judgment on its claim for unlawful discrimination based on disparate impact. The Court explained that to establish a prima facie claim for disparate impact, the EEOC must come forward with evidence that shows that an employer's employment practice disparately impacted a protected group of employees. Id. at *7. As to the first element, there was no dispute that required passage of the PCP examination was a condition of employment, and was therefore an employment practice. Defendant contended that the EEOC, however, failed to provide sufficient statistical evidence to show that the PCP exam had a disparate impact on employees of a protected race or protected black-African. The EEOC's statistical evidence included test results indicating passage rates of 42.8% for black-African exam-takers, 55.6% for Black exam-takers, 99.3% for White exam-takers, and 100% for Hispanic exam-takers. Id. at *10. Defendant's expert refuted the findings, contending that the conclusions of the EEOC's expert were unreliable because the statistical sample was too small. Id. at *12. The Court thereby determined it was left with conflicting expert opinions. Id. at *13. Accordingly, because the conflict went to a material factual issue, the Court ruled that it must to be resolved by a jury, and summary judgment was not appropriate. Id. at *14. The EEOC also sought summary judgment on four affirmative defenses, including: (i) waiver/estoppel; (ii) bona fide occupational qualification; (iii) after-acquired evidence; and (iv) failure of conditions precedent. Defendant argue that charging parties led Defendant to believe they were fluent in English when they were hired, and had the Defendants known that they were not fluent in English, they would not have been hired. As a consequence, Defendant contended that the EEOC was now estopped from claiming that these employees were discriminated against on the basis of their limited English skills. The Court stated that estoppel was not an affirmative defense to a disparate impact claim. Defendant conceded that the bona fide occupational qualification defense was not applicable in this matter. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Court found dismissal appropriate. As to the after-acquired evidence defense, Defendant argued that had it known of claimants' limited English, it would not have hired them. The Court determined that Defendant failed to provide evidence that the ability to speak fluent English was material to the performance of the PCP job at the time the claimants were hired or that Defendant had standards that advised employees that they would be discharged for false statements made in employment applications. Id. at *23. Finally, Defendant argued that it made monetary offers to the individual claimants to settle claims during conciliation, but the EEOC failed to disclose those offers to claimants. The Court stated that Defendant offered no legal authority for the proposition that, during conciliation efforts, the EEOC was required to convey settlement offers to the aggrieved employees. Id. at *22. The Court therefore granted summary judgment on the EEOC's failure to conciliate defense. Defendant also moved for summary judgment on the EEOC's retaliation claim for Hoem. The Court found that taken as true, the EEOC's evidence was sufficient to establish a prima facie disparity in test results for the protected groups. Viewed in the light most favorable to the EEOC, the Court opined that Hoem's verbalized disagreement could be interpreted as discrimination based on national origin and was sufficient for a prima facie showing. Id. at *30. The Court found that a reasonable jury could determine that in challenging Lewis' perceptions of the black-African PCPs, Hoem was identifying what she perceived to be unlawful discrimination. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

EEOC v. JBS USA, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58303 (D. Col. April 17, 2017). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of several aggrieved Somali Muslim employees alleging religious discrimination in violation of Title VII and retaliation based on their requests for religious accommodation for prayer breaks in the workplace. The Court bifurcated the case, resulting in the "Phase I" issue involving the pattern or practice claims presented by the EEOC, and the "Phase II" issue addressing all individual claims for relief of any claims not tried in Phase I, including all claims of harassment/hostile work environment as well as entitlements to back pay, compensatory damages, and punitive damages. Defendant moved to dismiss the EEOC's Phase I claim pursuant to Rule 12, and the EEOC moved to strike Defendant's motion to dismiss on procedural grounds. The Court noted that the deadline for dispositive motions passed more than three years before Defendant filed its motion to dismiss. Id. at *27. Defendant did not move to modify the deadline and did not argue in its motion that there was good cause to do so. Defendant asserted that EEOC v. Abercrombie & Fitch, 135 S. Ct. 2028 (2015), "recently confirmed" the legal principle on which it based its motion and suggested there was a change in law. Id. at *28. However, the Court found that EEOC v. Abercrombie & Fitch simply restated and interpreted the pre-existing statutory provisions of Title VII and did not alter the pleading requirements for such claims in way relevant to the case. Id. The Court stated that even if Abercrombie & Fitch made material changes to the law, Defendant would need to seek permission to file a belated Rule 12(b)(6) motion, which it did not do. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss as untimely and denied the EEOC's motion as moot.

EEOC v. JBS USA, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 122908 (D. Colo. Aug. 4, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant, a meat packing company, discriminated against its Muslim employees on the basis of religion by engaging in a pattern or practice of retaliation, discriminatory discipline and discharge, harassment, and denying its Muslim employees reasonable religious accommodations. After the EEOC moved for sanctions regarding Defendant's failure to produce two types of records relating to delays on its production line, the Court granted in part the EEOC's motion and barred Defendant from presenting evidence, testimony, or argument in its motions, at hearings, or at trial that unscheduled prayer breaks led to production line slowdowns or stoppages. Defendant operated a beef processing plant in Greeley, Colorado. Id. at *2. During the first week of Ramadan 2008, a dispute occurred between Defendant and its Muslim employees over their opportunities to pray, resulting in hundreds of Muslim employees walking off the job. Defendant subsequently fired 96 Muslim employees that refused to return to work. After the mass termination, numerous former employees filed discrimination charges with the EEOC. Id. In response, Defendant submitted a position statement where it argued that granting prayer breaks to employees would be an undue burden, in part, due to losses resulting from "each minute of production down-time." Id. Defendant continued to assert its undue burden affirmative defense, arguing in its summary judgment motion that production line slowdowns and downtime would have been caused by allowing prayer breaks to Muslim employees. The EEOC sought discovery from Defendant about its undue burden affirmative defense. The EEOC served a production request regarding the production of all reports or data showing all dates and times the fabrication lines on any and all shifts were stopped, as well as the speed of the lines. In response, Defendant produced documents that included records showing scheduled breaks, but did not provide or reference the down time reports or clipboards, which show unplanned downtime and slowdowns. The EEOC thereafter moved for sanctions for the loss or destruction of documents directly relevant to Defendant's allegations of undue hardship. The Court granted the EEOC's motion for sanctions. While Defendant had produced clipboards from 2012-2016 and down time reports from 2016, it claimed that all others had been destroyed. A designee of Defendant later testified via a Rule 30(b)(6) deposition that the down time reports were shipped to storage each year, but may have been destroyed. After searching its warehouse for "a day" in 2017, Defendant later located and produced some additional records. Id. at *6. The Court thus found that Defendant failed to supplement its production with responsive records in a timely manner. The Court held that because Defendant did not show that its failure to supplement was substantially justified or harmless, it would impose sanctions pursuant to Rule 37(c)(1). Id. The Court explained that spoliation occurs when a party loses or destroys evidence that it had a duty to preserve because it was relevant to proof of an issue at trial in current or anticipated litigation. Id. at *7. Defendant argued that it did not have a duty to preserve these documents because it had no way of knowing or anticipating that the EEOC would be interested in knowing the specific time of every instance of every day that the production line stopped for an unplanned or unexpected reason. The Court rejected this argument, holding that Defendant ignored the fact that it asserted an undue burden defense within a year of the September 2008 incident and after charges of discrimination had been filed against it. As such, the Court held that Defendant had a duty to preserve documents relevant to the burden posed by the proposed accommodations. Id. at *8. Arguing that the lack of production of records did not cause prejudice to the EEOC, Defendant asserted that the records did not show whether any slowdown or stoppage was related to a prayer break because the information they contained was "only as specific as the information known to the person filling out the down time report." Id. at *10. The Court rejected this argument, holding that "[r]ecords such as those sought, which potentially show the actual impact of unscheduled employee prayer breaks, are particularly important to understanding the impact such breaks would have on production line slowdowns or stoppages because they would provide contemporaneous records of whether unscheduled breaks led to production downtime." Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court found that the EEOC was prejudiced by Defendant's spoliation of evidence. Id. The Court held that it would bar Defendant from presenting evidence, testimony, or argument in its motions, at hearings, or at trial that unscheduled prayer breaks led to production line slowdowns or stoppages. Id. at *14. The Court explained that this sanction was "tailored to the evidence lost, destroyed, or withheld by Defendant because it alleviates the prejudice which the EEOC would otherwise suffer, namely, that Defendant may present evidence of stoppages through witnesses, but the EEOC would not be able to rebut such testimony with records that would likely prove whether stoppages actually occurred and, perhaps, for what reason." Id. Accordingly, the Court granted in part the EEOC's motion for sanctions for the loss or destruction of documents.

EEOC v. Jetstream Ground Services*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 26867 (10th Cir. Dec. 28, 2017). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of five Muslim females who applied for and were denied cabin cleaning positions with Defendant. The EEOC alleged that Defendant refused to hire them for discriminatory reasons after they requested to cover their heads with a hijab and wear long skirts for religious purposes. The applicants also joined the EEOC's lawsuit as Interveners. Defendant asserted that its decisions to not hire the individual applicants were based on their applications and interviews. Id. at *3. However, during discovery, Defendant altered its positions and argued that the hiring decisions were based on the recommendations of supervisor Arnold Knoke. Id. Defendant asserted that two employees, Frank Austin and Gail Cadorniga, met with Knoke to hear recommendations on which employees to hire. Austin wrote the names Knoke recommended on a piece of paper; and after the meeting Cadorniga obtained the phone numbers for the recommended persons from the applications. Id. at *4. Cadorniga entered the information into an Excel spreadsheet, which she saved on her laptop and a flash drive. Id. Defendant claimed that Knoke's recommendations, and not any discriminatory animus, drove its hiring decisions. Id. The EEOC requested that Defendant produce all documents related to the non-discriminatory reasons for not hiring individual Plaintiffs, and Defendant produced a version of the Excel spreadsheet saved five days after the original spreadsheet was created. The earlier version was updated as information was modified or added, although it was undisputed that the names on the later spreadsheet were identical to the new hire names. Id. at *5. The EEOC filed a pre-trial motion for spoliation sanctions against Defendant, claiming that its failure to maintain the original versions of the recommendations violated 29 C.F.R. § 1602.14, which requires employers to preserve for one year all personnel or employment records that it makes or keeps and, if a discrimination charge has been filed, to continue to preserve the records until final disposition of the charge. Id. In the alternative, the EEOC requested exclusion of testimony by Defendant's witnesses about the list of Knoke's recommendations, or an instruction to the jury that they should infer that the missing documents were harmful to Defendant. Id. at *6. At a pre-trial hearing, the District Court reserved ruling on the motion, stating that it needed to "hear the evidence at trial" and that it could not determine at that point whether Defendant acted in bad faith in discarding the documents or whether the EEOC would be prejudiced. Id. at *6-7. At trial, the EEOC did not renew its request to exclude evidence of the Knoke list. The jury found for Defendant. The EEOC unsuccessfully moved for a new trial under Rule 59. On appeal, the EEOC argued that the District Court abused its discretion by refusing to impose a sanction on Defendant. The Tenth Circuit found that the EEOC never argued at trial that such evidence should be excluded. Although the EEOC filed a pre-trial motion to exclude the evidence as a spoliation sanction, and the District Court deferred ruling on the motion. The Tenth Circuit explained that only when a District Court rules definitively on the record before trial is the party seeking to exclude evidence excused from renewing the objection at trial. Id. at *8. The Tenth Circuit further determined that the EEOC conceded during closing argument at trial that the loss or destruction of the documents from the Knoke meeting was not in bad faith. Id. at *14. The Tenth Circuit concluded that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in rejecting the EEOC's requests for spoliation sanctions or denying the motion for new trial based on the failure to impose such sanctions. Id. at *18.

EEOC v. Midwest Regional Medical Center,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 147961 (W.D. Okla. Sept. 13, 2017). The EEOC filed an action on behalf of Janice Withers ("Withers"), alleging that Defendant violated the Americans with Disabilities Act ("ADA") when it terminated Withers from her employment. Id. at *1. At trial, the jury entered a verdict in favor of Defendant. Id. The EEOC filed a renewed motion for judgment as a matter of law under Rule 50(b), contending that the evidence at trial was legally insufficient to sustain a verdict for Defendant. Id. at *1-2. Further, the EEOC contended that, alternatively, a new trial was proper where the jury was permitted to hear and consider irrelevant comments and evidence that substantially prejudiced EEOC's right to a fair trial. Id. at *2. Lastly, the EEOC asserted that it was entitled to summary judgment because Defendant's Rule 30(b)(6) deposition errata sheet of Bryttani Bay ("Bay") should have been stricken from consideration. The EEOC argued that based on the evidence presented, the jury should have found that Withers was a qualified individual with a disability and that Withers' skin cancer was a determining factor in her termination. Id. at *3. Defendant contended that the evidence was sufficient for the jury to find it did not violate the ADA when it terminated Withers. The EEOC stated that Withers was discharged by Defendant while she was on a medical leave of absence ("LOA"). Id. at *4. The EEOC alleged that the reasons Defendant gave for terminating Withers; i.e., excessive absences and three days straight of no call/no show, were pretext and, further, overwhelmingly supported the inference that Withers was terminated because of her skin cancer. Id. at *4-5. The Court found that while the EEOC may have proved by a preponderance of the evidence that Withers was a qualified individual with a disability under the ADA, it was reasonable for the jury to determine, based on the evidence presented at trial, that Withers' skin cancer was not a determining factor that prompted Defendant to discharge her. Id. at *5. In construing the evidence and inferences in favor of Defendant, the Court found that the jury could reasonably infer that while the policies and procedures were not followed with the termination of Withers, the decision and process to terminate Withers, while wrongful, was not because of Withers' skin cancer, but because of her excessive absences. Id. at *6-7. The EEOC further contended that errors committed during the trial entitled it to a new trial. However, the Court also determined that that the EEOC failed to demonstrate that any trial errors constituted prejudicial error against it. Id. at *7. Finally, the EEOC contended that it was entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law because had the Court not considered the errata sheet submitted by Defendant's Rule 30(b)(6) deponent Bay, it would have been undisputed that the medical LOA that Withers was placed on was legally protected as a reasonable accommodation. Id. at *8. Defendant contended that the EEOC's request for reconsideration of the Court's order on summary judgment in this matter was untimely, and, further, that the EEOC was barred from raising this argument because it was not made in its Rule 50(a) motion at trial. Id. The Court determined that the EEOC failed to set forth any new grounds warranting reconsideration of the Court's order on EEOC's motion for summary judgment. The Court found that the EEOC's request for the Court to reconsider its order on EEOC's motion for summary judgment was untimely, and essentially moot, as the issue of reasonable accommodation was not an issue the EEOC pursued at trial or raised in its Rule 50(a) motion for judgment as a matter of law at trial. Accordingly, the Court denied the EEOC's motions.

EEOC v. Midwest Regional Medical Center,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 147962 (W.D. Okla. Sept. 13, 2017). The EEOC challenged the Court's decision to allow Defendant to recover certain copying costs in the amount of $252.64 and transcripts in the amount of $311.68. The EEOC sought a Court order reducing the award of costs to Defendant from $3,890.33 to $3,326.01. Specifically, the EEOC contended that Defendant's costs of $139.66 for color copies were not necessary, and therefore not recoverable. Id. at *1. Further, the EEOC contended that all but $.30 of Defendant's copies in black and white were not recoverable. Lastly, EEOC contended that Defendant's costs of $311.68 for transcripts were not recoverable because the transcripts in question were not offered into evidence at trial. Id. at *1-2. Defendant asserted that the challenged costs were reasonable and necessary. At the outset, the Court explained that to be recoverable, a prevailing party's transcription and copy costs must be "reasonably necessary to the litigation of the case." Id. at *3. Further, the Court noted that materials produced "solely for discovery" did not meet this threshold. Id. Having reviewed the parties' submissions, the Court found that Defendant was not entitled to the costs of the transcripts of John Paul and Amy Voliva, as they were not used at the trial. Id. at *4. The Court further determined that Defendant was entitled to the costs for the black and white and color copies it used at trial. Therefore, the Court held that the Court's award of costs to Defendant should be reduced by $311.68 and Defendant should be awarded $3,578.65 in costs as the prevailing party.

EEOC v. Montrose Memorial Hospital*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144424 (D. Colo. Sept. 4, 2017). The EEOC brought an action against Defendant alleging violations of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") for constructive discharge of nurses over the age of 40. The EEOC determined during the process of seeking aggrieved individuals during discovery, between one and six alleged aggrieved individual entered into a separation agreements with Defendant. Accordingly, the EEOC moved for an order: (i) allowing removal of specific identifying information in the agreements and replace with "subject;" (ii) declaring that paragraphs 6, 9, 10, 12, and 13-16 are void as against public policy; (iii) finding that any individuals who signed agreements should be entitled to file charges with the EEOC or other agencies; (iv) determining that individuals who signed the agreement should be provided 300 days from the date of receipt of the notification to file a charge of discrimination with the EEOC; and (v) holding that the settlement agreements be deemed to have no effect on the rights of aggrieved individuals to participate in the lawsuit. Id. at *2-3. Defendant did not oppose the relief sought as to striking certain paragraphs of the settlement agreement in toto. The Court therefore ordered that paragraphs 13, 14, and 16 be struck from the settlement agreement. Id. at *3. The EEOC also requested that paragraph 6 regarding a non-disparagement agreement be struck due to being vague and overly broad. The Court found that the non-disparagement agreement was not vague, was not overly broad, and need not be struck. Id. at *10. The EEOC also argued that a notice provision in the settlement agreement should be struck because it "might precipitate a chilling effect on claimants in violation of public policy." Id. at *11. The Court agreed that it could have that effect but amended the notice to reduce that possibility. As to the EEOC's remaining requests, the Court found that blanket orders as requested were not yet appropriate. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part the EEOC's motion.

EEOC v. PJ Utah, LLC,* Case No. 14-CV-695 (D. Utah Jan. 4, 2017). The EEOC brought a civil enforcement action against a franchisee of Papa John's for violating the ADA by denying a reasonable workplace accommodation to the charging party, Scott Bonn, and for firing him for requesting this accommodation. The parties filed a joint stipulation for an extension of time of discovery deadlines, which the Court granted in part. The Court granted the parties' request to extend the last day of written discovery and fact discovery each by one month, with new deadlines of February 3, 2017 and February 17, 2017, respectively. Id. at 1. The Court also vacated the status conference scheduled for the day following this order. However, the Court denied the parties' request for a continuance as to any further dates given the age of the case. Id. The Court therefore held that the deadline for filing dispositive motions remained April 14, 2017. Id. The Court thereby granted in part and denied in part the parties' joint stipulation for a continuance of discovery deadlines.

EEOC v. Roark-Whitten Hospitality 2 LP*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 153891 (D.N.Mex. Sept. 21, 2017). The EEOC brought an action claiming that Defendants discriminated against a group of minority hotel workers in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Id. at *2. The EEOC sought specific relief from Defendant Jai, including a permanent injunction enjoining "Jai Hanuman and any other successor employer" from engaging in discriminatory employment practices; an order requiring Jai to carry out and institute "policies, practices, and programs which provide equal employment opportunities" and "which eradicate the effects of its past and present unlawful employment practices;" back pay; front pay; reinstatement; "compensation for past and future pecuniary losses," including relocation and job search expenses; emotional distress damages; and punitive damages. Id. at *3-4. Jai filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court denied. Jai argued that the EEOC failed "to even plead elements of a cause of action against Jai" other than, "at best, inferring some sort of successor liability against Jai." Id. at *8. Jai further argued that it was not a necessary party to the lawsuit because EEOC alleged that Whitten Inn committed the discriminatory acts, not Jai. Finally, Jai asserted that, because it had sold the hotel, "it is impossible for Jai to implement the requested policies and procedures." Id. at *8-9. The EEOC contended that the Court should not consider the sale of the hotel from Jai to SGI, because the fact was outside the operative pleading, i.e., the second amended complaint. The EEOC asserted that its claims against Jai were based on successor liability for the wrongdoings of its predecessor, rather than direct liability for Jai's own conduct. Id. at *9. The EEOC further argued that the test for successor liability "must be determined upon the facts and circumstances of each case," and that therefore it would be an error for the Court to dismiss its claims prior to discovery. Id. at *10. The Court found that the EEOC asserted plausible factual allegations of successor employer liability against Jai, and thus it stated a claim of successor employer liability. Id. at *11. The EEOC alleged that Jai had notice of the case, could grant relief including back pay, and various facts to demonstrate the continuity of the operation between Whitten Inn and Jai, including continuing to operate a hotel and using the same location, personnel, machinery, and equipment. Jai primarily argued that it could not be liable because it sold the property and hotel. Id. at *12-13. Jai argued that it "cannot provide the relief requested, i.e., reinstatement" because it sold the hotel. Id. at *15. The Court determined that though Jai could not reinstate the charging parties, other relief against Jai could be granted, including lost wages and benefits during the period Jai owned the hotel. Jai further argued that it should be dismissed because it was not a necessary party under Rule 19. However, the Court found that whether an existing party is necessary is not the issue addressed by Rule 19. Rather, under Rule 19, Jai would be entitled to dismissal if it identified an absent person in whose "absence, the Court cannot accord complete relief among existing parties," or whose absence impairs or impedes Jai's ability to protect its interest, or whose absence leaves a current Defendant at a substantial risk of incurring multiple or inconsistent obligations. Id. at *16-17. The Court found that Jai had not identified such an absent person, and thus Rule 19 did not require dismissal of Jai as a Defendant. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

EEOC v. Roark-Whitten Hospitality 2 LP,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 183012 (D.N.Mex. Nov. 2, 2017). The EEOC brought an action claiming that Defendants discriminated against a group of minority hotel workers in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Defendant Whitten sold Roark-Whitten 2 ("RW2") to Defendant Jai in 2014. The EEOC added Defendant Jai to the lawsuit as a successor employer. Jai subsequently sold the hotel to SGI, LLC ("SGI") and the EEOC added SGI as a successor employee in a third amended complaint. On August 15, 2017, Charles Archuleta, an attorney for Defendants RW2 and Jai, filed a motion to withdraw as counsel. Id. at *3. Archuleta contended that he had not been in contact with RW2 since July of 2017 and had not communicated with Whitten since June of 2017. Archuleta stated that Jai did not oppose his motion to withdraw. Accordingly, the Court granted the motion and ordered Defendants RW2 and Jai to obtain new counsel no later than October 2, 2017. Id. at *4. Despite the Court's order, no attorney entered an appearance on behalf of RW2 or Jai by October 2, 2017. On October 6, 2017, the EEOC filed a motion asking the Court to issue an order to show cause why RW2 and Jai should not be held in civil contempt and, upon a finding of civil contempt, enter default judgment against them. The Court explained that to determine the appropriate sanction for a violation of the Court's order, it should consider five factors, including: (i) the degree of actual prejudice to the non-offending party; (ii) the amount of interference with the judicial process; (iii) the culpability of the litigant; (iv) whether the Court warned the party in advance that dismissal would be a likely sanction for noncompliance; and (v) the efficacy of lesser sanctions. Id. at *8. As to the first factor, the Court found that Defendants' failure to retain replacement counsel prejudiced the EEOC by causing considerable delay, as the case had been pending for three years, and some basic discovery had yet to take place. As to the second factor, the Court opined that the amount of interference with the judicial process was also substantial. The depositions of the principals of RW2 and Jai had not taken place, and depositions of the charging parties had been put on hold. Further, the Court had not been able to reschedule the settlement conference or set additional scheduling order deadlines due to Defendants' lack of counsel. Id. at *10. The Court further determined that the culpability for failing to comply with the Court's orders was squarely with RW2 and Jai, and heavily weighed in favor of imposing sanctions. Additionally, the Court found that RW2 and Jai were specifically warned in advance that a default judgment could result from their failure to obtain counsel. Finally, the Court opined that a lesser sanction, such as a monetary sanction or striking certain defenses, would not be effective. Id. at *15. The Court found that RW2 and Jai willfully failed to comply with the Court's order to obtain counsel and participate in discovery, which had brought the case to a complete standstill. Id. at *15-16. The Court entered a default judgment against RW2 and Jai. The Court concluded that lesser sanctions would not be effective because without counsel for Defendants, this case could not move forward, and Plaintiffs would be left without a way to pursue their claims. Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motion and entered judgement against Defendants.

EEOC v. State Of New Mexico*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 198770 (D.N.Mex. Dec. 4, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant discriminated against corrections officers on the basis of their age, and retaliated against them for engaging in protected activity in violation of ADEA. The EEOC also alleged that Defendant engaged in similar discrimination against other aggrieved individuals. Defendant moved to dismiss the claims with respect to the unidentified aggrieved individuals pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6). Defendant argued the claims were insufficient under the Twombly standard – from Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007) – and that the EEOC failed to provide sufficient notice about any additional aggrieved individuals during the pre-filing conciliation period. Id. at *4. In support of these arguments, Defendant offered various exhibits relating to the EEOC's investigation and conciliation. Id. The EEOC opposed Defendant's motion to dismiss, and stated that if Court was willing to entertain Defendant's evidence regarding pre-filing communications, the EEOC requested that the motion to dismiss be converted to a summary judgment proceeding. Id. Defendant favored exclusion of the contested exhibits rather than conversion to ensure any distinct arguments about notice pleading were not subsumed by a converted summary judgment motion. Id. at *5. The Court agreed with Defendant's approach, excluded the contested exhibits, and denied the EEOC's motion to convert. The Court stated that the parties would also be permitted to amend their pending summary judgment motions to include any evidence or arguments not considered in the Court's ruling. The Court noted that to demonstrate age discrimination under the ADEA, the EEOC must allege the aggrieved parties: (i) are over 40 years of age; (ii) suffered an adverse employment action; (iii) were qualified for the positions at issue; and (iv) were treated less favorably than others not in the protected class. Id. at *10. A retaliation claim under § 623(d) requires a showing that: (i) the employees engaged in a protected activity; (ii) the employer took a subsequent materially adverse action against them; and (iii) a causal connection exists between the protected activity and the adverse action. Id. at *10-11. The Court explained that there was no binding case law addressing how much information the EEOC's complaint must provide about unidentified parties. The Court noted that case law authorities have suggested that the complaint must identify: (i) specific facts about the charging parties; (ii) a description of the group of workers; (iii) a description of the discriminatory conduct; and (iv) the time-frame during which the discrimination occurred. Id. at *11. Applying these principles, the Court concluded that the EEOC's complaint stated a plausible claim for relief on behalf of the unidentified aggrieved individuals. The complaint alleged all of the necessary statutory elements of age discrimination and retaliation claims under 29 U.S.C. §§ 623(a)(1) and (d). Id. at *13. The Court therefore declined to dismiss the EEOC's complaint under the Twombly standard. Id. at *14. Defendant also argued that the EEOC's claims on behalf of the unidentified aggrieved individuals violated the "Party Plaintiff" rule contained in 29 U.S.C. § 216(c). Id. at *15. By its terms, § 216(c) sets two relevant limitations, including: (i) it terminates an employee's right to become a "Party Plaintiff" in a private employment action when the EEOC files its own suit; and (ii) it establishes when the statute of limitations begins to run on certain FLSA enforcement actions. Id. The Court stated that at oral argument, the EEOC offered to file an amended complaint to satisfy the Party Plaintiff rule, if it in fact applied. Id. at *16. The Court agreed that the EEOC should identify each aggrieved individual in the record, and ordered the EEOC to file a supplemental pleading. The Court held that a supplemental pleading would be less disruptive at this phase in the litigation because an amendment triggers various obligations and deadlines on the part of Defendant. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss and ordered the EEOC to file a supplement pleading.

EEOC v. TriCore Reference Laboratories,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 3481 (10th Cir. Feb. 27, 2017). The EEOC brought an action claiming that Defendant violated the Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990 ("ADA") and Title VII by failing to provide Kellie Guadiana with a reasonable accommodation and by terminating her employment. In 2011, Guadiana began working at the Albuquerque, New Mexico location of Defendant as a phlebotomist. Id. at *4. In November 2011, Guadiana requested accommodations to her work schedule and responsibilities due to her rheumatoid arthritis, which she asserted was exacerbated by her pregnancy. After reviewing the doctors' notes that Guadiana submitted in support of her requests, Defendant determined that she could not safely perform the essential functions of her position. Defendant offered Guadiana the opportunity to apply to other positions within the company for which she was qualified and whose essential functions she could perform. After Guadiana did not apply to a new position, Defendant terminated her employment. Guadiana filed a charge of discrimination with the EEOC alleging that Defendant had discriminated against her due to her disability (rheumatoid arthritis) and sex (and pregnancy). Id. at *5. Based on evidence uncovered during the EEOC's investigation of the underlying charge, the EEOC informed Defendant that the scope of its investigation was expanded to include a "[f]ailure to accommodate persons with disabilities and/or failure to accommodate women with disabilities (due to pregnancy)." Id. at *6. As part of its investigation, the EEOC requested: (i) a complete list of employees who had sought an accommodation for disability, along with their personal identifying information; and (ii) a complete list of employees who had been pregnant while employed at Defendant, including the employees' personal identifying information and whether they sought or were granted any accommodations. The EEOC sought this information for a four-year time-frame. Defendant refused on the grounds that the EEOC did not have an actionable claim of discrimination. The EEOC submitted another letter seeking the same information but limited to a three-year time-frame. After Defendant again refused to comply, the EEOC subpoenaed the information it had sought in its letter. Defendant petitioned the EEOC to revoke the subpoena, arguing it was unduly burdensome and constituted a "fishing expedition." Id. at *7. The EEOC denied Defendant petition. The EEOC submitted an application to the District Court requesting an order to show cause why the subpoena should not be enforced. Defendant argued the information requested was not relevant to Guadiana's charge. The District Court noted that to the extent the subpoena sought evidence to show Defendant had a pattern or practice of discrimination, Tenth Circuit case law did not support such a request. Further, to the extent the subpoena sought evidence to compare Guadiana with other employees, the pregnancy request would not provide evidence of relevant comparators. As a result, the District Court denied the EEOC's request. On the EEOC's appeal, the Tenth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision. As an initial matter, the Tenth Circuit explained that to show subpoenaed information was relevant, the EEOC must establish that it had a realistic expectation that the information requested would advance its investigation, and must further establish the link between its investigatory power and the charges of discrimination. The Tenth Circuit noted that "[t]he EEOC has not alleged anything to suggest a pattern or practice of discrimination beyond TriCore's failure to reassign Ms. Guadiana." Id. at *15. Second, the EEOC argued that the District Court erred in denying the comparator-evidence pregnancy request. While the Tenth Circuit disagreed with the District Court and found that the pregnancy request might uncover information that was potentially relevant to Guadiana's charge, it nonetheless held that the EEOC failed to present the relevance arguments in District Court and therefore failed to meet its burden of explaining how the pregnancy request would offer information relevant to Guadiana's charge. Finally, the Tenth Circuit noted that even if the EEOC provided such an explanation regarding relevancy, its request was nonetheless overbroad because it sought information having no connection to Guadiana's charge, such as information about pregnant employees who never sought an accommodation. Accordingly, the Tenth Circuit affirmed the District Court's denial of the EEOC's request to enforce the subpoena.

(xi) Eleventh Circuit

EEOC v. Austal,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 133302 (S.D. Ala. Aug. 22, 2017). The EEOC brought an action to enforce an administrative subpoena relative to a pending EEOC charge alleging that Defendant discriminated against the charging party in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Id. at *2. The EEOC asserted that Defendant terminated the charging party for violating its attendance policy when he should have been granted a leave of absence. Id. Defendant claimed that the charging party was granted a leave of absence. Id. at *3. Defendant provided the EEOC with a list of 88 other employees who had been terminated under its attendance policy, and the EEOC sought to enforce a subpoena requesting additional information about the other employees including whether they had a disability and had requested an accommodation. Id. at 1. Defendant moved to quash the subpoena. The Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court deny the EEOC's motion and grant Defendant's motion. Id. at *34. Defendant refused to provide additional information and repeatedly asked the EEOC the relevance of the information regarding other employees in determining the individual charging party's charge. It was not until the EEOC brought the matter before the Court that it argued that the information was relevant to the attendance policy under which the charging party was terminated. Id. at *27. The Magistrate Judge noted that the EEOC's argument was made too late and should have been supplied to Defendant during the enforcement stage. Id. Based upon the EEOC's inability to consistently articulate how the information it sought was relevant, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court find that the EEOC had not met its burden of demonstrating that the information subpoenaed was relevant to the individual charge of discrimination. Id. at *33. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court deny the EEOC's application to enforce the administrative subpoena and grant Defendant's motion to quash subpoena. Id. at *34.

EEOC v. CRST International, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 180761 (M.D. Fla. Nov. 1, 2017). The EEOC bought an action on behalf of the charging party, Leon J. Laferriere, alleging that Defendant discriminated against Laferriere on the basis of his disability, denied him a reasonable accommodation, denied him a job, and retaliated against him in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, or in the alternative, to transfer the matter to the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Iowa. Id. at *4. The EEOC argued that the alleged unlawful employment practices were committed in Florida and therefore venue was proper. Laferriere's psychiatrist prescribed an emotional support dog to help him cope with his post-traumatic stress and mood disorders from his military service. Laferriere applied for a truck driver position with Defendant, and was informed that because he had no prior experience, if hired, he would be required to do over-the-road training. Laferriere informed Defendant that he wanted to bring the support dog with him during his training. Defendant explained that it could not force Laferriere's lead driver to take the dog on the truck when it came time to complete the over-the-road training. Id. at *5. Defendant attempted to make other arrangements to accommodate Laferriere, but ultimately it did not hire him. The Court noted that the first statutory basis for venue focuses on the judicial district in which the unlawful practice was committed. Defendant argued that venue in Florida was not proper under this prong, as the allegedly unlawful employment practices occurred in Iowa. In support of its motion, Defendant provided the declarations of Nichole Moreland and Morris Schneider. Moreland explained that all of her contact with Laferriere, including her review of his on-line application and discussions regarding the driver training program occurred from her office in Cedar Rapids. Similarly, Schneider conducted all of his communications regarding alternate arrangements for Laferriere from his office in Cedar Rapids. Id. The EEOC alleged that the unlawful employment practices in this case consisted of "a series of events that involve conduct both in Iowa and in Florida." Id. The "events" the EEOC alleged occurred in Florida included Laferriere's review of the job description for the position; his completion of his job application; participation in telephone and email communications with Defendant; attending driving school in Jacksonville at Defendant's direction; requesting a reasonable accommodation while in Florida; and objecting to Defendant that its no-pet policy was discriminatory. Id. at *8. The Court found that the EEOC neither alleged nor produced any evidence suggesting that the practice of denying Laferriere the position in Oklahoma City took place in the Middle District of Florida. The Court held that the acts the EEOC referenced as occurring in Florida merely comprised the events leading up to the allegedly unlawful employment practice. Id. at *9. The Court stated that the decision not to hire Laferriere because of his disability was the allegedly unlawful decision, and that decision took place in Iowa. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court granted the motion to transfer.

EEOC v. Doherty Enterprises, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34688 (S.D. Fla. Feb. 28, 2017). The EEOC brought an action seeking to enjoin Defendants from using its arbitration agreement to deter its employees from filing charges or cooperating with the EEOC or state fair employment practices agencies. According to the allegations, Defendants had conditioned employment on the agreement of the applicants and employees to sign the arbitration agreement. The EEOC filed a second motion to compel discovery responses and documents, which the Court denied. Previously, on July 20, 2016, the EEOC moved to compel several items, including "[f]or the period of April 23, 2012-April 23, 2015, a copy of any internal complaint of employment discrimination either: (i) made by any applicant or employee via Defendant's hotline; or (ii) made by any applicant or employee to any person and made known to Defendants' human resources personnel in accordance with Defendant's EEO policies." Id. at *2. The Court granted the motion with respect to the EEOC's discovery, as it sought "complaints made to Defendant's human resources personnel, but only for the time period from July 2013 through January 2015." Id. The EEOC subsequently claimed that Defendant provided responsive information regarding 39 internal complaints of discrimination, but the Commission believed that only a few of those internal complaints could possibly have related to harassment because, at the deposition of Defendant's 30(b)(6) representative, Kathleen Coughlin, she explained that she had produced complaints of discrimination, but not complaints of harassment. The EEOC also sought Rule 37 sanctions against Defendant. Defendant argued that the Court only ordered it to produce internal complaints of employment discrimination and that Coughlin testified at her deposition that Defendant did produce all internal complaints of employment discrimination from July 2013 to January 2015 as ordered by the Court. Id. at *3. Defendant contended that completing a search for all file documents with the word "harassment" in them would return irrelevant documents and would be burdensome. Id. The EEOC argued that Defendant should have known that harassment is a form of discrimination as this has been established by the relevant case law. Id. at *4. The EEOC asserted that it sought the documents to refute Defendant's affirmative defenses. Id. at *5. Defendant, on the other hand, argued that requiring it to conduct a further search of the large number of paper records in its possession would be overly burdensome. Id. Defendant asserted that if the EEOC wanted to include documents reflecting harassment complaints on the basis of a protected category, it should have properly and specifically requested such documents. Id. at *6. The Court agreed with Defendant and found that the EEOC should have specifically sought documents regarding harassment complaints based on a protected category if that was what it wanted. Id. at *7. The Court further noted that good faith conferral between the parties could have resolved the issue, but that the parties refused to confer in good faith throughout this case. The Court further stated that discovery was already closed and that the parties had filed motions for summary judgment. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court denied the EEOC's motion to compel discovery.

EEOC v. Doherty Enterprises, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34787 (S.D. Fla. Feb. 28, 2017). The EEOC brought an action seeking to enjoin Defendants from using an arbitration agreement to deter employees from filing charges or cooperating with the EEOC or state fair employment practices agencies. According to the allegations, Defendants had conditioned employment on the agreement of applicants and employees to sign the arbitration agreement. The EEOC filed a motion for a protective order prohibiting the deposition of the EEOC's lawyers, Robert Weisberg and Kristen Foslid*. Id.* at *1. The Court found that the EEOC had shown good cause for the Court to enter a protective order as to the deposition of Weisberg because his deposition would constitute wasteful and unnecessary discovery disproportionate to the issues in the case. Id. at *11. The Court noted that Weisberg was the EEOC's Rule 30(b)(6) representative, and he had already participated in a lengthy deposition as the EEOC's corporate representative. Although the Court recognized that a Rule 30(b)(6) deposition is distinct from a deposition given in one's individual capacity, in this case it appeared that nothing further could be asked of Weisberg that was not asked in the Rule 30(b)(6) deposition and that would be relevant and would not invade the attorney-client privilege, the work-product privilege, and/or the government deliberative process privilege. Id. The Court determined that the personal deposition of Weisberg would appear to amount to nothing more than harassment and an improper fishing expedition. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court granted the motion with respect to Weisberg. The Court found that Foslid was different, however, for numerous reasons, including the facts that: (i) she signed and verified the EEOC's interrogatory responses; and (ii) she was the only individual who had personal knowledge about how she herself searched for Defendant's arbitration agreement on the internet. Id. at *14. The Court noted that one of the discrete issues about which Defendant sought to depose Foslid was the EEOC's fourth supplemental objections and answers to Defendant's first set of interrogatories. Id. at *15. Defendant argued that it should be permitted to have Foslid testify under oath as to why the EEOC changed its supplemental interrogatory response so recently. Id. at *16. The Court found that that this specific information sought by Defendant was relevant and proportional. Id. The Court also determined that the need for the information outweighed the dangers of deposing the EEOC's attorney since Foslid chose to draft and sign the interrogatory responses on the EEOC's behalf. Id. at *17. The Court held that a deposition of Foslid was the only practical means available of obtaining the information as to why the interrogatory response was changed. Thus, the Court ruled that Foslid should be required to testify on this limited issue.

EEOC v. GMRI, Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-20561 (S.D. Fla. Mar. 10, 2017). The EEOC brought suit alleging that Defendant engaged in discrimination and retaliation in violation of the ADEA. The parties disagreed on whether communications between the EEOC and persons/witnesses for whom the EEOC sought relief were privileged. As no Eleventh Circuit case law precedent existed, the Court requested that the parties submit notices of supplemental authority. Id. at 1. Based on the case law submitted, the Court adopted the view that although there was no formal attorney-client relationship between the EEOC and the witnesses/prospective employees, the EEOC counsel were acting as de facto counsel for the witnesses. However, the Court noted that the privilege belonged to the client, and therefore a client may waive the protection. The Court explained that the EEOC could not force a witness/person for whom relief is sought to maintain the privilege and it could not prohibit that person from expressly and affirmatively advising that he or she did not want the EEOC to act as counsel or on his or her behalf. Id. at 2. Accordingly, the Court stated that communications between the EEOC and the persons for whom it was seeking relief were privileged and Defendant was not entitled to obtain discovery about the communication unless these persons waived that privilege. The Court further noted that Defendant would need to demonstrate the person actually did not want the EEOC to represent him or her in order to obtain discovery under a waiver theory. Id. at 3.

EEOC v. GMRI, Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-20561 (S.D. Fla. Oct. 12, 2017). The EEOC brought suit alleging that Defendant engaged in discrimination and retaliation in violation of the ADEA at over 30 restaurants. The EEOC filed a motion for spoliation and Rule 37(e) sanctions on the ground that Defendant failed to preserve documents and electronically-stored information ("ESI"). The Court held a hearing on the motion and determined that it must conduct a supplemental evidentiary briefing to rule on the EEOC's motion. Defendant contended that it was under a duty to preserve the information and documents for only one restaurant because the two charges that triggered the EEOC's investigation concerned that sole location. Id. at 1. The EEOC argued that Defendant was under a duty to preserve for all of Defendant's restaurants in the U.S. because the scope of the investigation expanded into a national investigation encompassing all restaurants. Id. at 1-2. In support of its position, the EEOC relied on a letter from EEOC investigator Katherine Gonzalez on August 31, 2011 in which she purportedly advised Defendant that the scope of the investigation had expanded Id. at 2. Defendant contended that it did not receive the letter and noted several unusual aspects about it, including: (i) the letter had an incorrect address; (ii) it was not signed by Investigator Gonzalez; (iii) its records did not contain the letter or a copy; and (iv) it received another letter one day later, on September 1, 2011, which was signed by Investigator Gonzalez. Id. Defendant argued that it never knew the EEOC's investigation was national until the lawsuit was filed in February of 2015. Id. at 4. However, the EEOC also submitted a letter from Defendant's in-house paralegal in January of 2012, which stated that evidence Defendant submitted of employee rosters showing that 16.4% of employees were over the age of 40 "refutes the allegation that Defendant maintains a nationwide hiring policy that discriminates against individuals over the age of 40." Id. Accordingly, the Court determined that Investigator Gonzalez and Defendant's in-house paralegal were important fact witnesses and should testify at a hearing. The Court therefore scheduled a follow-up supplemental evidentiary hearing and declined to rule on the EEOC's motion.

EEOC v. GMRI, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 181011 (S.D. Fla. Nov. 1, 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging that Defendant discriminated against Anthony Scornavacca, Hugo Alfaro, and a group of applicants over the age of 40 in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA"). Id. at *11. The EEOC's administrative investigation focused on the hiring location where Scornavacca and Alfaro interviewed. Subsequently, the investigation extended to other hiring decisions at other restaurants. The EEOC filed a nationwide lawsuit after the parties were unable to resolve the matter after the conclusion of the administrative investigation. After discovery, Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment and the EEOC filed a motion for spoliation and Rule 37(c) sanctions. Id. at *3. The parties disagreed as to when and if Defendant was on notice that the EEOC was expanding its investigation to include Defendant's hiring practices throughout the nation. Id. at *8. The EEOC alleged that Defendant failed to preserve and intentionally destroyed paper applications and interview booklets and failed to preserve electronically-stored emails regarding the specific hiring decisions challenged in the lawsuit. Id. at *3. The EEOC sought an order: (i) prohibiting Defendant from introducing evidence about the content of lost emails; (ii) permitting the EEOC to introduce evidence of the email destruction; (iii) allowing the EEOC to argue to the jury that the lost emails would have contained information supporting its claim; (iv) authorizing the Court to consider the lost email arguments for summary judgment purposes; and (v) permitting a permissive inference, both at the summary judgment stage and at trial, that the emails, had they been preserved, would have mentioned that Defendant preferred younger applicants. Id. at *4. The Magistrate Judge denied the EEOC's motion in part and granted it in part. After two hearings where witnesses testified, the Magistrate Judge denied the EEOC's request for permissible inferences at the summary judgment and trial stages. Id. at *6. However, the Magistrate Judge ruled that the EEOC could present evidence of the purported destruction of the missing documents and emails in the trial and argue to the jury that Defendant acted in bad faith as defined by Rule 37(e)(2) and that if the jury agreed with the EEOC then the jury could infer that the loss of the electronically-stored information was unfavorable to Defendant. Id. As a result, the Magistrate Judge ruled that the parties would be able to introduce evidence of the missing documents and electronically-stored information and the circumstances surrounding the destruction or absence of the records, as well as the possible motives for their alleged destruction. Id. at *8. In addition, the Magistrate Judge denied the EEOC's request for a permissible inference as to the paper applications and interview booklets because the EEOC failed to establish that they were crucial to its case or that Defendant acted in bad faith to deprive the EEOC of the information's use in litigation. Id. at *7. However, with respect to the email evidence, the Magistrate Judge ordered that the EEOC, pursuant to Rule 37 (e)(2), would be allowed to seek a permissible inference, if it persuaded a jury that Defendant acted in bad faith, to deprive the EEOC of the email evidence's use in the litigation. Id. at *89.

EEOC v. KB Staffing, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 37938 (M.D. Fla. Mar. 16, 2017). The EEOC brought an action challenging Defendant's use of a pre-offer health questionnaire that applicants were required to fill out prior to placement in any position. The EEOC asserted that from 2011 to 2013, Defendant required all applicants to complete the same pre-employment medical questionnaires in violation of the ADA. Further, the EEOC alleged that the applicants "suffered damages" as a result of Defendant's use of the pre-employment medical questionnaire. Id. at *3. Defendant moved to dismiss and contended that the EEOC was required to allege actual damages suffered by the applicants. The EEOC countered that Defendant was not entitled to judgment on the pleadings where the facts in EEOC's complaint plausibly establish a violation of § 102(d) of the ADA. The Court noted that under the ADA, a job applicant, whether or not disabled, must "show some damages" resulting from the prospective employer's violation. Id. To state a plausible claim for relief, "damages liability under § 12112(d)(2)(A) must be based on something more than a mere violation of that provision" and "there must be some cognizable injury-in-fact of which the violation is a legal and proximate cause for damages to arise." Id. at *4. Defendant contended that the EEOC has failed to allege that any applicants suffered any damages. Defendant pointed out that the EEOC's claim that the class members "suffered damages" was nothing more than a conclusion, and therefore did not meet the applicable pleading standards. Id. The Court found that the EEOC alleged only a conclusion that individuals subjected to Defendant's unlawful practices in connection with its obtaining medical information from applicants for employment have suffered damages. Id. at *4-5. The Court held that the EEOC's allegation pled no more than a conclusion consistent with Defendant's liability, and therefore fell short of the line between possibility and plausibility of entitlement to relief. Id. at *5. The Court determined that because the EEOC failed to allege "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face" on behalf of the purported group of applicants, its claim was insufficient as a matter of law. Id. Therefore, the Court found that the EEOC's claim brought on behalf of the applicants should be dismissed. However, the Court stated that there was a distinction between the EEOC's purported claim on behalf of a group of applicants, and a claim asserted on its own. The EEOC contended that it suffered injury sufficient to confer standing to bring its own claim. The Court held that the EEOC may assert a claim in its own right, deriving standing directly from the statute and its own "statutory enforcement authority." Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss as to the claim brought by the EEOC on behalf of the purported group of applicants and denied the motion with respect to the EEOC's own claim.

EEOC v. Labor Solutions Of AL, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38619 (N.D. Ala. Mar. 17, 2017). The EEOC investigated charges of discrimination against East Coast Labor Solutions, LLC ("East Coast"), alleging that East Coast discriminated against the charging parties on the basis of their national origin and that it failed to accommodate their disabilities. Following its investigation, the EEOC issued a letter of determination to East Coast finding reasonable cause to believe that Title VII and the ADA were violated with respect to the charging parties and a group of current and former employees. Id. at *8. The EEOC thereafter unsuccessfully attempted to conciliate with East Coast. Id. In November 2013, East Coast ceased operations. Defendant Labor Solutions of Alabama, LLC ("LSA") was formed in October 2014. Despite the fact that Defendant was not in existence when the alleged misconduct occurred, the EEOC filed a lawsuit alleging that Defendant subjected claimants to discriminatory treatment based on their national origin and failed to accommodate their disabilities. While East Coast partnered with its owner Labor Solutions (a different entity than Defendant), the only entity named in the lawsuit was Defendant. Thereafter, Defendant moved to dismiss, arguing that the EEOC failed to allege that Defendant employed claimants, and therefore the case should be dismissed for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction and failure to state a claim under Title VII and the ADA. Id. at *9. Defendant also argued that the EEOC failed to exhaust its administrative prerequisites, noting that it was not named in the original EEOC charge or in any amendment thereto. Id. The Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss. First, the Court addressed the EEOC's argument that it alleged plausible facts to infer so-called "successor liability." Id. at *11. After thoroughly examining various Eleventh Circuit precedents regarding successor liability, the Court explained that "[a]lthough the Court agrees with the EEOC that successorship does not have to be conclusively determined at this stage of the litigation, that does not absolve the agency from pleading facts which make its existence plausible." Id. at *28-29. The Court determined there were "no facts suggesting substantial (or even any) continuity in business operations from East Coast to LSA. The complaint contains no allegations that there was any sale of East Coast, or any of its assets, to LSA." Id. at *30. Finding there was no successor liability, the Court further reasoned that: (i) East Coast had been defunct nearly an entire year before Defendant was formed; (ii) there was no allegation that Defendant employed substantially the same workforce and/or supervisors as East Coast; (iii) the Complaint did not allege that Defendant operated at the same location as East Coast; (iv) there was no allegation as to whether East Coast could have provided relief before or after any alleged sale or transfer; and (v) there was no allegation as to whether Defendant could provide any relief now. Id. The Court further rejected the EEOC's argument that East Coast and Defendant were both temporary staffing agencies and that both entities shared the same managing officers, principal office address, and company email accounts; the Court opined that this was not enough to demonstrate continuity when one considered the break in time between when East Coast ceased operations and Defendant began operations. Id. at *30-31. Finally, the Court concluded that even if the complaint had plausibly alleged that Defendant was the successor to East Coast, it should still be dismissed since it was undisputed that Defendant was not named in the original EEOC charge, or in any subsequent amendment. Id. at *32. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss, but noted the EEOC could file an amended complaint to attempt to cure its deficiencies.

EEOC v. Labor Solutions Of AL, LLC*, Case No. 16-CV-1848 (N.D. Ala. April 18, 2017). The EEOC investigated charges of discrimination against East Coast Labor Solutions, LLC ("East Coast"), alleging that East Coast discriminated against multiple employees on the basis of their national origin and failed to accommodate their disabilities. The Court previously held that the EEOC failed to plausibly allege that Defendant was the successor to East Coast and dismissed the action. Id. at 1. The Court allowed the EEOC to amend its complaint within 21 days to state any facts that may be appropriate to the inquiry. Further, the Court allowed the EEOC to amend in order to allege facts that may be relevant to whether the EEOC exhausted its administrative remedies to Defendant. The EEOC filed an amended complaint adding three new Defendants, including East Coast Labor Solutions, LLC; Labor Solutions, LLC; and East Coast Labor Solutions of West Virginia. LLC. Id. The Court found that the amended complaint was filed well past the 21 day deadline. Further, the Court determined that the EEOC failed to demonstrate that it had any opposing parties' written consent to file the amended complaint. Id. at 2. Finally, the Court held that its previous order did not allow amendment for the purpose of adding Defendants. Id. Accordingly, the Court ordered that the amended complaint be stricken. The Court stated that the EEOC could file a new amended complaint that complies with the Court's prior order or it could file a motion seeking leave to file an amended complaint that exceeds the Court's prior order. Id. at 3.

EEOC v. Labor Solutions Of AL, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 180729 (N.D. Ala. Nov. 1, 2017). The EEOC investigated charges of discrimination against East Coast Labor Solutions, LLC ("East Coast"), alleging that East Coast discriminated against multiple employees on the basis of their national origin and that it failed to accommodate their disabilities. The Court had previously held that the EEOC failed to plausibly allege that Defendant was the successor to East Coast and dismissed the action. Id. at *1. However, the Court allowed the EEOC to amend its complaint within 21 days to state any facts that may be appropriate to the inquiry. Further, the Court allowed the EEOC to amend in order to allege facts that may be relevant to whether the EEOC exhausted its administrative remedies as to Defendant. The EEOC subsequently filed an amended complaint adding three new Defendants, including East Coast Labor Solutions, LLC, Labor Solutions, LLC, and East Coast Labor Solutions of West Virginia, LLC. Id. The Court struck the amended complaint, finding that: (i) it was filed well past the 21 day deadline; (ii) that the EEOC failed to demonstrate that it had any opposing parties' written consent to file the amended complaint; and (iii) that its previous order did not allow amendment for the purpose of adding Defendants. Id. The EEOC then filed a motion for leave to file an amended complaint, which the Court granted. The proposed amended complaint contained pertinent factual allegations relevant to whether the EEOC satisfied the administrative prerequisites prior to filing suit. Id. at *3. Defendant argued that filing the amended complaint would be futile as to Defendants East Coast Labor Solutions, LLC, Labor Solutions, LLC, and East Coast Labor Solutions of West Virginia, LLC. Id. at *7. Specifically, Defendant asserted that, as to these entities, the EEOC failed to exhaust the administrative prerequisites to filing suit. The Court noted that in the original complaint the EEOC alleged that "more than 30 days prior to the institution of this lawsuit, the Charging Parties filed charges of discrimination with the Commission alleging violations of Title VII and the ADA by Defendant East Coast." Id. The new allegations in the proposed amended complaint asserted that claimants filed the charge "alleging violations of Title VII and the ADA by Defendants." Id. at *8. The proposed complaint further stated that "Claimants, in their charges, identified their employer as "East Coast Labor Solutions, Inc." and the EEOC did not argue that any entity other than East Coast was actually named. Id. Defendant contended that the EEOC failed to plausibly plead that allowing East Coast Labor Solutions, LLC, Labor Solutions, LLC, and East Coast Labor Solutions of West Virginia, LLC to be named as Defendants would fulfill the purposes of Title VII. In response, the EEOC argued that the more liberal standard of Rule 9(c) should apply. Rule 9(c) provides "in pleading conditions precedent, it suffices to allege generally that all conditions precedent have occurred or been performed. But when denying that a condition precedent has occurred or been performed, a party must do so with particularity." The Court stated that the EEOC pled in the proposed amended complaint that "all conditions precedent to the institution of this lawsuit have been fulfilled." Id. at *11. The Court held that this satisfied the EEOC's burden pursuant to Rule 9(c). Accordingly, the Court granted the EEOC's motion for leave to file an amended complaint.

EEOC v. West Customer Management Group, LLC,* 678 Fed. Appx. 836 (11th Cir. 2017). The EEOC brought an action alleging national origin discrimination on behalf of Derrick Roberts, whom Defendant, a customer service provider, allegedly did not hire as customer service representative based on his thick Jamaican accent. At trial, the jury returned a verdict for Defendant, finding that Roberts was not qualified for the customer service representative position. Defendant then moved for an award of attorneys' fees and expenses under Title VII, arguing that the EEOC's action was frivolous, unreasonable, and groundless. The District Court granted Defendant's motion for attorneys' fees. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit reversed the District Court's decision The Eleventh Circuit found that the District Court abused its discretion in awarding attorneys' fees and costs to Defendant because the EEOC's case was not "so patently devoid of merit" as to justify an award. Id. at 838. The Eleventh Circuit opined that the District Court previously had denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment, which illustrated that the EEOC offered sufficient evidence to create a triable issue of discrimination. Id. at 839. The Eleventh Circuit further opined that the District Court held trial on the merits, and although the EEOC's case at trial may have been weak, it was not frivolous. The Eleventh Circuit observed that the EEOC offered evidence that: (i) Defendant did not want to hire Roberts because of Roberts' accent; (ii) Roberts' accent did not interfere with his ability to communicate; (iii) Defendant treated Roberts differently than other applicants by refusing to inform Roberts that he could reapply with Defendant; and (iv) Defendant, over time, had revised its rationale for rejecting Roberts' application. Id. The Eleventh Circuit found that, taken together, the evidence provided support for a finding that Defendant denied Roberts employment based on his accent and national origin. Therefore, the Eleventh Circuit concluded that because the EEOC's case was not "patently devoid of merit," it must reverse the District Court's award of attorneys' fees and costs to Defendant. Id.

EEOC v. McLane Co.,* 137 S. Ct. 1159 (2017). The EEOC brought an action on behalf of charging party, a "cigarette selector," which was a physically demanding job that required employees to lift, pack, and move large bins of products. The EEOC alleged that McLane violated Title VII when it terminated her employment. Id. at 1165-66. After charging party returned from three months of maternity leave, she was required to undergo a physical evaluation that was required for all new employees and employees returning from medical leave. Id. at 1165. The charging party tried three times to pass the evaluation, but failed each time. Id. McLane then terminated her employment. The charging party claimed that she was terminated on the basis of her gender. Id. During the investigation of her charge of discrimination, the EEOC requested, among other things, a list of employees who were requested to take the physical evaluation. Id. Although McLane provided a list that included each employee's gender, role at the company, evaluation score, and the reason each employee had been asked to take the evaluation, the company refused to provide "pedigree information" relative to names, social security numbers, last known addresses, and telephone numbers of employees on that list. Id. In the process of negotiating the scope of information that would be provided, the EEOC learned that McLane used its physical evaluation on a nationwide basis. The EEOC therefore expanded the scope of its investigation to be nationwide in scope. The District Court refused to order the production of pedigree information, holding that it was not "relevant" to the charges at issue because that information (or even interviews of the employees on the list provided by McLane) could not shed light on whether an evaluation represented a tool of discrimination. Id. at 1066. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit reviewed the District Court's decision de novo and held that the District Court had erred in finding the pedigree information irrelevant to the EEOC's investigation. Id. On further appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari to resolve the disagreement among the Courts of Appeals regarding the appropriate scope of review on appeal. Id. The EEOC and McLane both agreed that the District Court's decision should be reviewed under an abuse-of-discretion standard. Id. The Supreme Court therefore appointed an amicus curiae to brief the Ninth Circuit's use of de novo review. Id. The Supreme Court began its analysis by noting that in the absence of explicit statutory command, the proper scope of appellate review is based on two factors, including: (i) the history of appellate practice; and (ii) whether one judicial actor is better positioned than another to decide the issue in question. *Id.*at 1166-67. Regarding the first factor, the Supreme Court noted that abuse-of-discretion review was the longstanding practice of the Courts of Appeals when reviewing a decision to enforce or quash an EEOC administrative subpoena. Id. at 1167. The Supreme Court noted that Title VII had conferred on the EEOC the same subpoena authority that the National Labor Relations Act had conferred on the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB"), and decisions of District Courts to enforce or quash an NLRB subpoena were reviewed for abuse-of-discretion. Regarding the second factor, the Supreme Court held that the decision to enforce or quash an EEOC subpoena is case-specific, and one that does not depend on a neat set of legal rules. Rather, a District Court addressing such issues must apply broad standards to "multifarious, fleeting, special, narrow facts that utterly resist generalization." Id. In particular, in order to determine whether evidence is relevant, the District Court has to evaluate the relationship between the particular materials sought and the particular matter under investigation. Id. The Supreme Court reasoned that these types of fact-intensive considerations were more appropriately done by District Courts rather than Courts of Appeals. The amicus curiae argued that the District Court's primary role is to test the legal sufficiency of the subpoena, which does not require the exercise of discretion. Id. at 1168. The Supreme Court held that this view of the abuse-of-discretion standard was too narrow. Id. at 1168-69. The Supreme Court explained that the abuse-of-discretion standard is not only applicable where a decision-maker has a broad range of choices as to what to decide, but also extends to situations where it is appropriate to give a District Court's decision an unusual amount of insulation from appellate revision for functional reasons. Id. at 1169. The Supreme Court found that those functional considerations weighed in favor of the abuse-of-discretion standard rather than a de novo standard of review. Id. Because the Ninth Circuit did not apply that standard on appeal, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the Ninth Circuit for further proceedings.

IV. Significant Collective Action Rulings Under The Age Discrimination In Employment Act

Multiple-plaintiff age discrimination claims under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") are not governed by Rule 23. Instead, these claims are known as "collective actions," and are governed by the litigation procedures in the Portal-to-Portal Act at 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Courts and litigants commonly refer to these lawsuits as "§ 216(b) actions."

Collective actions brought under the ADEA raise "opt-in" issues quite similar to those arising under the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA"). In other words, class members (technically, "collective action" members, as class actions do not exist under the § 216(b) framework) do not become part of the litigation unless and until they affirmatively opt-in to the lawsuit (whereas under Rule 23, a class member must opt-out of the class action or otherwise will be bound by any judgment in the litigation).

The plaintiffs' bar typically utilizes the FLSA's two-step procedure under § 216(b) to obtain conditional certification of ADEA collective action claims. This approach, based upon the Tenth Circuit's seminal decision in Thiessen, et al. v. General Electric Capital Corp., 267 F.3d 1095 (10th Cir. 2001), involves substituting "pattern or practice" claims for evidence of commonality and typicality. The pattern or practice vehicle by definition requires a higher threshold of proof, but plaintiffs have taken advantage of the more lenient step-one process in the ADEA's two-step procedure for certifying collective actions. In the "notice" or "conditional" certification stage, there is a lower threshold of proof than in cases brought under Rule 23, where Supreme Court decisional law requires a "rigorous analysis" of a plaintiff's claims and evidence. Conditional certification under the ADEA authorizes plaintiffs to send class notices based on minimal evidentiary showings and enables them to gain leverage over employers who must then endure extensive discovery as plaintiffs seek to gather further proof of their claims.

Knox, et al. v. John Varvatos*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171705 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 17, 2017). Plaintiff, a former sales associate, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant, a clothing designer and retail store, provided a clothing allowance of $12,000 a year to male employees and not female employees in violation of the Equal Pay Act ("EPA"). Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part and denied in part. Id. at *1. Plaintiff alleged that under Defendant's clothing policy, male sales employees working at Defendant-operated stores were provided with a $12,000 annual allowance to purchase branded clothing to wear to work. Id. at *4. In support of her allegations, Plaintiff supplied a written employee dress code which addressed itself to "all employees working in our retail locations" and stated that "all male retail employees receive a clothing allowance." Id. Plaintiff also provided an email exchange she had with an employee in Defendant's human resources department, in which the employee informed Plaintiff that Defendant does not "provide a clothing allowance for female employees." Id. Defendant asserted that its policy was "giving a credit to male sales professionals who, unlike female sales professionals, are required to wear expensive menswear when working." Id. at *5. Plaintiff argued that she was similarly-situated to all female sales associates employed by Defendant nationwide because Defendant subjected them to the same clothing allowance policy in violation of the EPA. Id. at *8. The Court opined that Plaintiff made the requisite modest factual showing in light of her own observations and Defendant's numerous statements that the male-only clothing allowance policy existed. Id. at *12. The Court found that the dress policy stated unequivocally that all "male" employees receive a clothing allowance, and applied to "all employees working in retail locations," thereby indicating that the clothing allowance policy was applicable to all sales associates employed at any one of Defendant's 22 U.S.-based stores. Id. Defendant also argued that conditional certification was inappropriate because Plaintiff had not demonstrated that potential opt-in Plaintiffs performed "equal work" to either Plaintiff or to male comparators. Id. at *15. However, the Court stated that the question for the "similarly-situated" inquiry was not whether Plaintiff's job duties are identical to other potential opt-in Plaintiffs, but, rather, whether the proposed Plaintiffs were similarly-situated under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) with respect to their allegations that the law has been violated. Id. at *15-16. The Court ruled that Plaintiff made the requisite modest factual showing that she and potential opt-in Plaintiffs were similarly-situated with respect to Plaintiff's allegation that Defendant's policy to provide the clothing allowance to male sales associates and not to female sales associates violated their rights under the EPA. Id. at *16. Finally, Defendant disputed Plaintiff's proposed collective action as overbroad and too vaguely defined. Id. at *17. The Court held that it could address Defendant's concerns in the manner in which notice under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) would be sent to the proposed collective action members. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification, with modifications to the proposed notice to address Defendant's concerns.

(iii) Third Circuit

Bryan, et al. v. Government Of The Virgin Islands*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19843 (D.V.I. Feb. 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former government employees in the U.S. Virgin Islands brought an action alleging Defendant violated the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") and territorial law of the Virgin Islands when it required older employees to pay additional salary amounts into their retirement funds. Plaintiffs sought class certification of their territorial law claims under Rule 23 and conditional certification of their ADEA claims under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Plaintiffs sought class certification under Rule 23(b)(3). The Court found that Plaintiffs met the requirements of Rule 23(a) and Rule 23(b)(3). The Court thereby granted class certification for Plaintiffs' territorial law claims for a class defined as all employees who attained 30 or more years of credited service as of July 5, 2011, who did not retire as of September 30, 2011, and thereafter paid an additional 3% of their salary into the retirement fund. Id. at *4-5. The Court found that the named Plaintiffs were adequate class representatives and it approved Plaintiffs' counsel as class counsel. Id. at *5. The Court also found that Plaintiffs met the fairly lenient standard for conditional certification of their ADEA claims by making a modest factual showing that the employees identified were similarly-situated to Plaintiffs. The Court requested that the parties submit a proposed notice form in short order. The Court also ordered Defendant to provide Plaintiffs with the names, last known addresses, email addresses, and telephone numbers of potential Plaintiffs. Id. at *7.

Dayton, et al. v. Oakton Community College,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74916 (N.D. Ill. May 17, 2017). Plaintiff, a former part-time faculty member, filed an action on behalf of himself and a proposed collective action of similarly-situated part-time and adjunct faculty of the college, alleging that the implementation of a new retirement policy violated the ADEA. Defendant, a two-year community college, employs full-time, part-time, and adjunct faculty to teach the courses it offers. Plaintiffs are not covered by a collective bargaining agreement, and are not eligible for tenure. State Universities Retirement Systems ("SURS") is a pension plan that provides retirement benefits to eligible individuals who are or were employed by covered public Illinois state universities or community colleges. Defendant is one of the public community colleges covered by SURS. In 2012, Illinois amended its Return to Work Law to place additional earnings limitations on SURS annuitants who return to work for covered colleges and universities over age 60. Under the amended law, an employer must pay a financial penalty to SURS if the employer employs an "affected annuitant" after August 1, 2013. Following the passage of the amended Return to Work Law, Defendant decided that it would not re-employ any SURS annuitants who became affected annuitants under the law so that it could avoid paying the penalty for employing affected annuitants. Id. at *5-6. Approximately 79 faculty and staff members became ineligible for employment as a result of the college's decision. Id. at *7. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant's decision to terminate the annuitants' employment because of their status as annuitants violated the ADEA and the Illinois Constitution. Plaintiff moved to certify that group as an ADEA collective action and Rule 23 class action including all part-time and adjunct faculty who were denied employment at Oakton Community College as the result of its policy to not employ or re-employ SURS annuitants and who are not affected annuitants. Id. at *8. Defendant argued that collective action certification would be inappropriate because each purported collective action member's claim was different from the claims of other collective action members and required individualized assessment. The Court concluded that the putative collective action members shared sufficiently similar factual and employment settings to justify conditional certification of a collective action. The Court stated that although their likelihood of being assigned courses, and the number of courses they might be assigned might differ, it was undisputed that Defendant's decision not to employ SURS annuitants was made on a college-wide basis and was not based on any particular annuitant's individual circumstances such as his or her job performance, class schedule, or availability to teach classes. Id. at *12. Thus the questions of whether the college's decision had a disparate impact on older faculty and whether this violated the ADEA were questions common to each collective action member's claims. Id. Defendants argued that Rule 23(a)'s commonality requirement was not satisfied because the issue of whether each proposed class member would continue to receive course assignments, and could thus assert a claim for damages, depended upon individualized circumstances. Id. at *16. The Court opined that Plaintiffs' claims concerned a single decision applied college-wide. Thus, the Court found that each of the proposed class members suffered the same injury, irrespective of the damages to which each member might be entitled, and the determination of whether the college's decision that resulted in their injury violated the ADEA or the Illinois Constitution may be determined in one stroke. Defendant also contended that Plaintiff's claims were not typical of those of proposed class members because each putative class member's entitlement to damages would depend upon his or her individual circumstances. Id. at *17. The Court found that though the putative class members' damages might be different, Defendant's liability to each of them was based on the same alleged employment practice. Defendant further argued that Plaintiff could not satisfy Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement because questions of individual damage calculations would inevitably overwhelm questions common to the class. Id. at *19. The Court found that the calculation of damages in this case appeared unlikely to be overly complicated, as each putative class member's prior course load and wage rate could be easily identified. The Court thereby granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification of the Illinois Constitution claims and conditional certification of their ADEA claims.

(xi) Eleventh Circuit

Jones, et al. v. RS&H, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 60088 (M.D. Fla. April 20, 2017). Plaintiff, a former employee, alleged that Defendant violated the ADEA when it terminated a group of employees as part of a reduction-in-force ("RIF"). Plaintiff worked for Defendant from 1991 through 2015. When Defendant terminated Plaintiff, it stated that his termination was part of the RIF. Id. at *1-2. After Defendant terminated 23 employees nationwide, including seven from its Tampa location, Plaintiff filed an EEOC charge alleging age discrimination. Plaintiff stated that Defendant had more work than the projected staffing requirement, and thus there was no reason for his termination. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant rarely allowed non-officers to work until they retired. In addition, Defendant was alleged to have hired young employees, and then terminated older employees once the young employees were trained. According to Plaintiff, one supervisor commented just prior to the RIF that he had been informed that Defendant was looking to reduce staff, specifically older personnel. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant's agents often said, "young people are our future." Id. at *2. After being issued a notice of suit rights letter from the EEOC and thereafter bringing suit, Plaintiff sought to conditionally certify a nationwide collective action of former employees who were terminated from October 28, 2014 through August 24, 2015 (i.e., within 300 days prior to Plaintiff's filing of his EEOC charge), and who were at least 40 years old at the time of their termination. Two opt-in Plaintiffs who also worked at the Tampa location and were terminated during the 2015 RIF filed affidavits in support of Plaintiff's allegations of age discrimination. In opposition to the motion for conditional certification, Defendant argued that: (i) Plaintiff was not a proper representative because his ADEA claim was time-barred; (ii) Plaintiff's EEOC charge did not provide sufficient notice of claims from the proposed collective action; and (iii) the scope of the proposed collective action was too large. The Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification. First, in support of its argument that conditional certification was not warranted since Plaintiff was not a proper representative, Defendant argued that Plaintiff's suit was untimely because he filed his suit 95 days after the EEOC issued the notice of rights to sue letter. Id. at *5-6. The Court rejected this argument, citing evidence submitted by Plaintiff's counsel illustrating that he did not receive the notice of letter until over two weeks after it was stamped. Defendant also argued that conditional certification was not warranted for the proposed nationwide collective action because Plaintiff's EEOC charge did not give adequate notice that such claims were being asserted. Id. at *7. After examining Plaintiff's EEOC charge, which indicated that "[o]n the day of my termination 5 of the 7 [Tampa, Florida] employees let go were over 50 and had at least 10 years with the company," the Court found that Plaintiff's EEOC charge could not be read to give notice that he was asserting claims on behalf of a nationwide group of employees. The Court agreed with Defendant that, at best, Plaintiff's charge put Defendant and the EEOC on notice that Plaintiff may be pursuing age discrimination claims on behalf of himself and the four other employees terminated on the same day at his Tampa work location. Id. at *9-10. In addition, the Court determined that the decision-maker who terminated Plaintiff and the two opt-ins was never involved in a decision to terminate any employee outside of the Tampa location. Accordingly, the Court declined to certify a nationwide collective action. The Court explained that to conditionally certify a collective action: (i) there must be other employees who desire to opt-in; and (ii) those employees must be similarly-situated to Plaintiff. Given that two former employees had already opted-in, and that three of the five individuals that were over 50 and were terminated during the June 2015 RIF wanted to pursue ADEA claims, the Court found that the first element was met. Regarding the similarly-situated element, the Court noted that while Plaintiff attempted to assert company-wide claims of pattern or practice of age discrimination, he did not show a sufficient factual basis on which a reasonable inference could be made that Defendant had a pattern or practice of discriminating against all employees at all locations based on their age. Id. at *15-16. Plaintiff offered no evidence that any employees outside of Tampa were interested in joining the lawsuit, nor did he identify any decision-makers outside of Tampa who allegedly discriminated on the basis of age during the RIF. The Court further opined that the evidence that Plaintiff submitted only could support his contention of a pattern or practice of age discrimination within the Tampa location. As such, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to conditionally certify a nationwide collective action of former employees over 40 who were terminated during the June 2015 RIF, but conditionally certified a collective action consisting of the five individuals that were terminated from the Tampa location.

Jones, et al. v. RS&H, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 77187 (M.D. Fla. May 22, 2017). Plaintiff, a former employee, alleged that Defendant violated the ADEA when it terminated a group of employees as part of a reduction- in-force ("RIF"). Plaintiff worked for Defendant from 1991 through 2015. When Defendant terminated Plaintiff, it stated that his termination was part of the RIF. Id. at *1-2. After Defendant terminated 23 employees nationwide, including seven from its Tampa location, Plaintiff filed an EEOC charge alleging age discrimination. After being issued a notice of right to sue letter and thereafter bringing suit, Plaintiff initially moved to conditionally certify a nationwide class of former employees who were terminated from October 28, 2014 through August 24, 2015 (i.e., within 300 days prior to Plaintiff's filing of his EEOC charge), and who were at least 40 years old at the time of their termination. Id. at *2-3. The Court granted conditional certification for a much narrower class consisting of the five employees at the Tampa location that were terminated in the June 2015 RIF who were at least 40 years old at the time of their termination. The Court found that the scope of the nationwide collective action for which Plaintiff requested conditional certification was too broad. Plaintiff subsequently sought reconsideration of the order. Plaintiff asserted three major grounds justifying reconsideration, including: (i) an intervening change in controlling law; (ii) the availability of new evidence; and (iii) the need to correct clear error or to prevent manifest injustice. Id. at *5. When investigating Plaintiff's charge of discrimination, the EEOC asked Defendant to provide the name, age, position, and department for the 23 employees that were terminated during the June 2015 nationwide RIF. Defendant's response to the EEOC's request showed that 21 of the 23 people terminated during the June 2015 nationwide RIF were over 40 years old. Plaintiff contended that the EEOC's request for information regarding the employees affected by the RIF nationwide demonstrated that the EEOC and Defendant were on notice that Plaintiff's charge of discrimination included a nationwide collective action. Furthermore, Plaintiff contended that the fact that 21 of the 23 employees terminated during the June 2015 RIF were over 40 provided evidence of a significant age bias, and, therefore, these 21 employees should be certified as a collective action. Id. at *6-7. The Court stated that even accepting this new evidence, its original decision to limit the collective action was correct. The Court found that Plaintiff failed to show that there were other employees that were employed outside of Tampa who desired to opt-in and that those employees were similarly-situated to Plaintiff. The Court held that the now narrower proposed nationwide collective action of 21 still consisted of workers employed in a different divisions and located in ten cities in four states and involved different decision-makers. Id. at *7. Thus, the Court concluded that Plaintiff's motion for reconsideration must be denied, as conditional certification was not warranted for a nationwide collective action consisting of the 21 people that were terminated during the June 2015 RIF that were over 40 years old at the time of their termination. Id. at *8.

B. Other Federal Rulings Affecting The Defense Of ADEA Collective Actions

Numerous federal courts issued rulings in ADEA collective actions in 2017 that implicated § 216(b) certification issues. These rulings included arbitration issues in ADEA collective actions; discovery in ADEA collective action litigation; disparate impact issues in ADEA collective actions; disqualification issues in ADEA collective action litigation; procedural issues in ADEA collective action litigation; and release and notice issues in ADEA/EPA collective action litigation.

(i) Arbitration Issues In ADEA Collective Actions

Cerjanec, et al. v. FCA US, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 206409 (E.D. Mich. Dec. 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant's employee-evaluation policy had a disparate impact on employees aged 55 and older in violation of the ADEA. Plaintiffs alleged that as a result of Defendant's policy, they received lower evaluation scores, which resulted in missed career advancements, bonuses, and other employment opportunities. Id. at *1-2. Defendant sought to compel arbitration, asserting that Plaintiffs assented to arbitration when they continued to work at Defendant after receiving notice of Defendant's arbitration policy. Id. at *2. The Court denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration. In 1995, Defendant began utilizing an Employment Dispute Resolution Process ("EDRP"), under which non-union employees were required to arbitrate most disputes arising from their employment. Id. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs, although hired prior to the implementation of the EDRP, were bound to arbitrate by continuing to work with Defendant after being notified of the EDRP's implementation. Id. at *5. Defendant stated that in May of 1995, Plaintiffs were sent a letter informing them that it would soon implement the EDRP. Id. at *9-10. Attached to the letter was a brochure that provided an overview of the process and stated that: "IT APPLIES TO YOU. It will govern all future legal disputes between you and Chrysler that are covered under the Process." Id. at *10. The 1995 EDRP policy provided for exclusive, final, and binding arbitration for "all eligible disputes whether based on federal, state or local law including breach of contract, discrimination or retaliation claims." Id. at *10-11. Since Plaintiffs continued working with Defendant after receiving this policy, Defendant argued that they assented to the 1995 policy via their conduct. The Court disagreed and found that the policy language did not inform employees how the EDRP applied to them and did not tell them that it applied to them if they continued to work at Defendant. Id. at *13. The Court reasoned that in the absence of any signed agreement or any Defendant-distributed materials expressly telling Plaintiffs that they would accept the terms of the EDRP by continuing their employment, the Court could not find that there was an agreement to arbitrate. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

(ii) Discovery In ADEA Collective Action Litigation

Heath, et al. v. Google, Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-1824 (N.D. Cal. July 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of job applicants, brought an action alleging that Defendant engaged in a systematic pattern or practice of discriminating against individuals over 40 years old in its hiring, compensation, and other employment decisions in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") and the California Fair Employment and Housing Act. The parties disputed the scope of discovery, and sought an order delineating the scope and extent of discovery Defendant could obtain from the opt-in Plaintiffs. The Court reviewed the arguments and stated that it wanted to be fair and give Defendant necessary discovery, but not impose an undue burden on the opt-ins and their counsel. Id. at 2. The Court determined that Defendant was entitled to discovery relative to: (i) all facts that supported Plaintiffs' claims that Defendant failed to hire because of age; (ii) witnesses that could attest to the ADEA claim facts; (iii) an estimate of Plaintiffs' damages or other compensation sought from Defendant; and (iv) Plaintiffs' efforts to mitigate the damages estimated. Id. at 2-3. As to Defendant's request for documents, the Court found that Defendant was entitled to: (i) Plaintiffs' documents supporting the facts identified in the interrogatory responses; (ii) Plaintiffs' documents referred to in preparing interrogatory answers; and (iii) copies of Plaintiffs' birth certificates or government-issued documents showing date of birth. Id. at 3. The Court stated that the parties must agree on a process to randomly select 75 opt-in Plaintiffs from which to propound the discovery. Further, the Court held that Defendant may select 35 individuals for depositions not to exceed 3 hours each, 30 of which would be conducted by video and 5 in-person.

Heath, et al. v. Google, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 133564 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of job applicants, brought an action alleging that Defendant engaged in a systematic pattern or practice of discriminating against individuals over 40 years old in its hiring, compensation, and other employment decisions in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") and the California Fair Employment and Housing Act. Defendant filed a motion for relief from the Court's order denying two of Defendant's requests for relief and requested briefing on the remaining ground for relief involving the language of Defendant's interrogatory. Defendant originally served two interrogatories requiring opt-in Plaintiffs to detail "all facts of any kind that relate" to their claims that Google failed to hire them because of their age and their self-assessment of how they performed at their interviews at Defendant. Id. at *3. The Court analyzed the two interrogatories and narrowed the language to require the opt-in Plaintiffs to "identify and describe in detail all facts of any kind that support your claim that Google failed to hire you because of your age." Id. Defendant objected to the language that required opt-in Plaintiffs to provide only information helpful to their claims, and not information that undermines them. Thus, the question before the Court was whether its order substituting the word "support" for Defendant's word "relate" was clearly erroneous or contrary to law. Id. at *4. The Court found that it was neither because as drafted the interrogatory "cast much too wide a net." Id. The Court noted that the substitution of the word "support" in the interrogatory would strike a fair balance between limiting the burden on Plaintiffs from Defendant's broad discovery requests while still allowing Defendant to secure discovery to sufficiently prepare its defenses. Id. at *5. The Court determined that the core issue was what Defendant knew at the time it made its hiring decisions, and information regarding how the opt-in Plaintiffs perceived their interview performance was tangentially relevant at most. Accordingly, The Court denied Defendant's motion for relief.

(iii) Disparate Impact Issues In ADEA Collective Actions

Heath, et al. v. Google, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 147763 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of job applicants, brought an action alleging that Defendant engaged in a systematic pattern or practice of discriminating against individuals over 40 years old in its hiring, compensation, and other employment decisions in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") and the California Fair Employment and Housing Act. Plaintiffs filed a motion for leave to file a second amended complaint. Plaintiffs sought to amend their complaint to add a disparate impact claim in order to conform the complaint to the evidence, and to add updated U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") workforce statistics. Id. at *2. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. Plaintiffs argued that good cause existed to amend the complaint because recent case law authority held that the right to make a disparate impact claim under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") extends to any adversely affected individual regardless of whether he or she is an applicant or employee. Id. at *3. The Court found that that Plaintiffs acted with diligence and did not unduly delay in seeking leave to amend the complaint in light of the new authority. Id. at *5. The Court also further determined that the prejudice to Defendant in allowing the amendment was minimum. Given the trial date of April 1, 2019, the Court noted that Defendant would have ample time to brief and argue a motion to dismiss the disparate impact claim, and to conduct further discovery, if necessary, in the event that the disparate impact claim survived. Id. at *6. The Court also found that Plaintiffs had not unduly delayed in seeking the proposed amendment, and there was no evidence in the record of bad faith or dilatory motive. Id. at *7. Finally, the Court found that futility did not weigh against Plaintiffs in this instance. The Court explained that whether applicants may allege disparate impact claims under the ADEA is a novel question in the Ninth Circuit, and the parties were limited in their briefing on the issue in the context of Plaintiffs' motion for leave to amend. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for leave to amend.

Karlo, et al. v. Pacific Glass Works, LLC, 849 F.3d 61 (3d Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of salaried employees over 50 years old, brought a putative collective action against Defendant under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") alleging claims of disparate treatment, disparate impact, and retaliation after Defendant engaged in several reductions-in-force ("RIF") due to a decline of sales in the automobile industry. The District Court originally granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a sub-group comprised of employees terminated by Defendant that were at least 50 years old. Id. at 66. Subsequently, the case was transferred to another District Court, which granted Defendant's motion to decertify the collective action. Id. at 67. Defendant also moved for summary judgment on each claim. The District Court granted summary judgment on the disparate impact claim because the District Court found that it was not cognizable under the ADEA because the group that was favored was at least 40 years old and within the protected class of the ADEA. In addition, Plaintiffs lacked evidence to support their disparate impact theory because the District Court excluded statistics relating to the testimony of their expert. Id. The District Court also granted summary judgment as to the disparate treatment claim, which Plaintiffs did not appeal. On Plaintiffs' appeal of the disparate impact ruling, the Third Circuit reversed. It held that the disparate impact claim was cognizable where a sub-group of employees over 50 years old were alleged to have been disfavored relative to younger employees under 50 years old who also were protected under the ADEA. The Third Circuit held that while the ADEA protects only those individuals who are at least 40 years of age, the fact that the favored group members were over 50 years old was "an utterly irrelevant factor," as the ADEA protects individuals of a protected class and not the protected class itself. Id. at 72. The Third Circuit held that an ADEA disparate impact claim may proceed when a Plaintiff offers evidence that a specific facially neutral employment practice claim caused a disproportionate adverse impact based on age. The District Court had excluded the report of Plaintiffs' expert because the facts used were not reliable, it failed to utilize any of the generally accepted statistical adjustments, and his testimony did not fit the claims at issue. The Third Circuit vacated the District Court's order, finding that it erred in excluding the expert's report and remanded for examination of the expert's opinion under Daubert v. Merrill Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993). However, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision to decertify the collective action because the named Plaintiffs failed to show that the opt-in Plaintiffs were similarly-situated, as required under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), as incorporated by the ADEA. Because the opt-in Plaintiffs held several different titles with varied duties located in separate divisions and there were six different decision-makers that were involved in the RIF decisions, the Third Circuit concluded that the District Court did not commit clear error when it determined that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated. Id. at 86.

O'Brien, et al. v. Caterpillar*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 140264 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 31, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action asserting that Defendant's Supplemental Unemployment Benefit ("SUB") Plan liquidation program caused a significant disparate impact on older workers in violation of the ADEA. The parties cross-filed motions for summary judgment. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion and granted Defendant's motion. Since the 1950s, Defendant's labor contract included a pension plan and, until 2012, it included a SUB plan. The SUB plan provided supplemental compensation to eligible employees who were laid off. In March 2012, Defendant and the Union began renegotiating the collective bargaining agreement ("CBA"), with one objective in the renegotiation being to eliminate the SUB plan. Id. at *4. Defendant wanted to use the accumulated SUB funds to incentivize retirements among retirement-eligible employees, so their positions could be filled by newly-hired employees who would be subject to a lower "new hire" compensation package. Id. at *6. Defendant proposed to eliminate the SUB and distribute pro rata the accumulated SUB funds as a retirement incentive for retirement-eligible SUB participants who retired before the end of 2012 pursuant to a "metering" chart, which was intended to regulate departures to avoid operation disruptions. Id. at *7. The Union ultimately rejected this and all additional proposals from Defendant because it did not want to eliminate the SUB plan. Id. The 2005 CBA thus expired without an agreement between Defendant and the Union, and, subsequently, the Union went on strike and a federal mediator negotiated an agreement. The new agreement provided for termination of the SUB plan as of August 20, 2012. Id. at *8. Defendant would distribute the SUB fund assets in equal shares to two groups, including: (i) SUB participants who were retirement-eligible under the pension plan and who voluntarily retired between October 1, 2012, and January 1, 2013; and (ii) SUB participants who were not eligible to retire under the pension plan, but who remained employed and were participants in the 401(k) tax-deferred retirement plan as of January 1, 2013. Plaintiffs were 48 retirement-eligible SUB participants who chose not to retire and, therefore, did not receive a share of the SUB funds. Plaintiffs claimed that the memorandum of understanding that contained the SUB plan distribution provision of the 2012 CBA had a disparate impact on older participants. The Court found that the undisputed facts demonstrated that Plaintiffs failed to establish a prima facie case of disparate impact discrimination. Id. at *18. First, the Court noted that Plaintiffs did not point to a specific employment practice or policy. Although Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant's SUB liquidation plan resulted in a significant disparate impact on older workers, that plan failed to satisfy the specific employment practice requirement because it was the culmination of several elements unrelated to age. Further, the Court found that the CBA defined which members could participate in the SUB plan, and that determination was unrelated to age. Likewise, despite Plaintiffs' attempt to show statistical disparity based on age, the Court noted that the correlation between age and retirement-eligibility is definitional. Further, the Court found that Plaintiffs mistakenly painted the SUB plan requirement that employment-eligible participants choose to retire in order to receive a share of the funds as an "unlawful choice." Id. at *19. The Court opined that the choice was not defined by age, but by retirement eligibility. Id. at *20. The Court held that the decision to retire and partake in the SUB plan liquidation, rather than forego the disbursement and keep working, was determined not by age, but by the "host of other factors." Id. Thus, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to establish a prima facie case of disparate impact age discrimination. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment and denied Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment.

Romero v. Allstate Ins. Co, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS (E.D. Pa. April 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of insurance agents, brought an action alleging that Defendant terminated their employment contracts in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") and § 510 of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 ("ERISA"). The Court granted Defendant's motions for partial summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' ADEA disparate impact claims and Plaintiffs' ERISA claims. Plaintiffs challenged Defendant's decision to transition over 6,200 employee agents to independent contractor status for business reasons, leaving those independent contractors without employee benefits, including pension and health and welfare benefits. Id. at *199. Under the "Preparing for the Future Program," employees with R830 and R1500 agreements could remain with Defendant under independent contractor R3001 agreements. Id. at *220. Existing R3000 agents could continue to work the remainder of their 18-month contracts after which they could become R3001 agents or leave the company. Id. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant's decision not to include the temporary R3000 employee agents in the Preparing for the Future Program, while including the other employee agents with R830 or R1500 contracts, created a disparate impact upon this 18-month employee group that tended to be younger. Id. at *227. Plaintiffs' expert concluded that the median age of R3000 agents was 37, while the median age of R830/R1500 agents was 50. Id. at *228. Plaintiffs argued that the program violated the ADEA by creating a disparate impact between the younger R3000 temporary employee agents and Plaintiffs. Id. at *227. The Court ruled that, although Plaintiffs established a prima facie case, their disparate impact claim failed because Defendant demonstrated that it based its differentiation on reasonable factors other than age. Id. at *232. The Court found that Defendant met its burden of production and persuasion on this affirmative defense because it instituted the program to end indefinite employment arrangements in favor of independent contractor agreements. Id. at *233. Absent the program, R830 and R1500 agents would have continued working as employees indefinitely. Defendant explained that it did not subject R3000 agents to the program because, unlike R830 and R1500 agents, R3000 agents had temporary 18-month employment agreements, after which they could seek to become R3001 agents. The Court ruled that Defendant's decision to exclude R3000 agents from the program was reasonable because the R3000 agents could either part ways with Defendant after their term or convert to R3001 agents. Plaintiffs also alleged that this same decision violated § 510 of the ERISA. Id. at *234. Plaintiffs contended that Defendant's termination of their employment contracts through the Program constituted an adverse employment action depriving them of pension and other benefits to which they would otherwise be entitled under the ERISA plans. Id. at *234. The Court granted Defendant's motion for partial summary judgment as to this claim because Defendant offered legitimate, non-discriminatory reasons for eliminating its employment agent force in favor of an independent contractor force. The Court relied upon the Seventh Circuit's ruling in Isbell v. Allstate Insurance Co., 418 F.3d. 788 (7th Cir. 2005), cert. denied, 547 U.S. 1021 (2006), that Defendant's same decision did not violate § 510. Id. at *237. In Isbell v. Allstate Insurance Co, the Seventh Circuit ruled that Allstate had legitimate business reasons for its decision, as independent contractors were paid higher commissions than the employee agents, and Allstate believed paying its sales force primarily through commissions spurred the salespeople to sell more. As such, the Court ruled that Defendant had the same legitimate business reasons tied to this decision. Id. at *243. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for partial summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' ADEA disparate impact claim and the motion for partial summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' § 510 ERISA claims. Id.

Villarreal, et al. v. R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 11455 (11th Cir. June 27, 2017). Plaintiff, a job applicant, brought an action alleging that Defendants rejected his job application on the basis of his age in violation of the ADEA. Plaintiff's job application was rejected in 2007, and over two years later in 2010, lawyers contacted him and told him that Defendants discriminated against him on the basis of his age. The screening guidelines described the targeted candidate as someone 2 to 3 years out of college, who adjusted easily to changes, and Defendant had instructed the hiring contractor to stay away from applicants who had been in sales for 8 to 10 years. After he filed his charge with the EEOC, Plaintiff continued to apply with Defendants, and was rejected every time. Plaintiff brought a collective action under the ADEA alleging disparate treatment under § 4(a)(1), and disparate impact under § 4(a)(2). The District Court dismissed the disparate impact count and the untimely parts of both counts. When Plaintiff later moved for leave to amend the complaint, he alleged in his proposed complaint that he was not an employee of Defendants and that he was unaware of the screening guidelines. The District Court denied the motion to amend, and subsequently, Plaintiff moved to dismiss the remaining parts of the complaint, which the District Court dismissed with prejudice. On appeal, a divided panel of the Eleventh Circuit reversed in Villareal v. R.J. Reynolds Tobacco, Co., 806 F.3d 1288 (11th Cir. 2015). Subsequently, the Eleventh Circuit granted a rehearing en banc, and affirmed the dismissal, in part. The Eleventh Circuit ruled on Plaintiff's argument that his disparate treatment claim was timely under the continuing-violation doctrine. Because of the nature of hostile work environment claims, the Supreme Court has held an employer may be liable for acts outside of the 180-day limitations period if: (i) at least one act contributing to the claim happens within the limitations period; and (ii) the acts outside of the limitations period are part of the same hostile work environment claim. In such a case, a Plaintiff need only bring suit within 180 days of any "act contributing to the claim." Id. at *3. Plaintiff argued that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of discrimination against older job applicants, and therefore the continuing-violation doctrine should make his disparate treatment claim timely. Id. at *4. However, the Eleventh Circuit held that Plaintiff's disparate treatment claim did not fall within the scope of the continuing-violation doctrine, because claims under the continuing-violation doctrine can apply only to types of discriminatory acts that "are different in kind from discrete acts," specifically, those minor incidents that alone would not be actionable, but which become actionable due to their "cumulative effect." Id. at *5. The Eleventh Circuit opined that Plaintiff was not challenging the cumulative effect of Defendants' multiple refusals to hire older applicants; instead, he was challenging each individual refusal-to-hire, and the Supreme Court specifically has recognized that "refusal to hire" is a discrete act. Id. As a result, Eleventh Circuit determined that the continuing-violation doctrine could not make Plaintiff's disparate treatment claim timely. Therefore, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's dismissal of Plaintiff's complaint.

(iv) Disqualification Issues In ADEA Collective Action Litigation

Shields, et al. v. General Mills,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 208921 (D. Minn. Dec. 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant discriminated against them in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") when it terminated their employment as a result of a workforce restructuring. Defendant filed a motion to disqualify Plaintiffs' counsel Snyder & Brandt PA and Nicholas Kaster. The Magistrate Judge recommended denying the motion, and on Rule 72 review, the Court adopted the Magistrate Judge's recommendation. Defendant moved for disqualification because former executive James Heflin, a named Plaintiff, had worked with Defendant's attorneys in an earlier age bias case raising nearly identical allegations and gained knowledge of privileged information, including details about litigation strategy.

Defendant therefore contended that counsel should not be permitted to represent Heflin or Plaintiff Peggy Maxe, a named Plaintiff in the earlier case. The Magistrate Judge found that although the evidence suggested that Heflin did have access to some privileged communications, the attorneys took numerous, substantial steps to prevent any disclosures. The Magistrate Judge concluded that the preventative measures employed by Plaintiffs' counsel were sufficient to resolve the minimal possibility the Heflin had access to confidential information, no disclosure occurred, and as counsel did not have an improper intent, the risk of taint to future litigation was minimal. On Rule 72 review, the Court agreed and held that Snyder & Brandt and Nichols Kaster could continue to represent Plaintiffs as long as they "maintain the currently established ethical wall" that each had erected. Id. at *2.

(v) Procedural Issues In ADEA Collective Action Litigation

Rabin, et al. v. PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP,* Case No. 16-CV-2276 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 15, 2017). Plaintiff, an accountant, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant's hiring practices discriminated against job applicants aged 40 and over in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967 ("ADEA"), the California Fair Employment and Housing Act ("FEHA"), the California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), and the Michigan Elliott-Larsen Civil Rights Act ("MCRA"). Prior to briefing on Plaintiff's motion for class certification, Defendant moved to file a joint discovery letter under seal. Specifically, Defendant sought to seal information relative to the total number of potential class members, including approximately 14,000 potential job applicants. Defendant argued that this information was confidential and commercially sensitive. Plaintiff argued that the number of potential Plaintiffs was not privileged, protectable as a trade secret, or otherwise entitled to legal protection. The Court denied Defendant's motion to seal information regarding the total number of potential class members. Id. at *1. The Court noted that the number of potential members and number of members in the proposed class action was not confidential information. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to seal. Id.

(vi) Release And Notice Issues In ADEA/EPA Collective Action Litigation

McLeod, et al. v. General Mills, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 6422 (8th Cir. April 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA") by terminating approximately 850 employees as part of a corporate restructuring plan. The employees were offered severance packages in exchange for signing release agreements. Id. at *3. The release agreements required the employees to release Defendant from all claims related to their termination, including claims under the ADEA. Id. The release agreements also contained a dispute resolution provision that required the employees to submit any claim covered by the release agreement to arbitration on an individual basis. Id. Plaintiffs sought a declaratory judgment that the releases were not "knowing and voluntary," as required by 29 U.S.C. § 626(f)(1). Id. at *5. Plaintiffs also asserted collective action claims and individual claims for alleged ADEA violations. Id. Defendant moved to compel arbitration of the employees' claims, and the District Court denied the motion. Id. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit reversed. Plaintiffs argued that § 626(f) contains the necessary "contrary congressional command" to render their release agreements invalid. Id. Specifically, Plaintiffs relied on § 626(f)(1) and § 626(f)(3) of the ADEA to argue that compelling arbitration results in an effective waiver of their substantive rights under the ADEA. Id. Section 626(f)(1) of the ADEA prohibits the waiver of any ADEA right or claim, unless the waiver is "knowing and voluntary." Id. at *6. Section § 626(f)(3) describes how to prove a "waiver," requiring that the "the party asserting the validity of a waiver shall have the burden of proving in a Court of competent jurisdiction that a waiver was knowing and voluntary . . . ." Id. Plaintiffs argued that, by moving to compel arbitration of their claims, Defendant was asserting the validity of a waiver by forcing them to forego their "right" to a jury trial and their "right" to proceed by a collective action. Id. The Eighth Circuit rejected this argument. "In § 626(f)," the Eight Circuit explained, '"waiver' refers narrowly to waiver of substantive ADEA rights or claims – not, as the former employees argue, the 'right' to a jury trial or the 'right' to proceed" in a collective action. Id. at *7. The Eighth Circuit, therefore, decided that no "rights or claims" are "waived" by agreeing to bring claims in arbitration. Id. The Eighth Circuit also rejected Plaintiffs' argument that § 626(b), by incorporating 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), gave them a "right" to bring a collective action. Id. at *9. The Eighth Circuit noted that the ADEA borrows the procedural mechanism for a collective action from § 216(b) of the FLSA. Section 626(b) incorporates § 216(b), which allows an employee to sue on behalf of himself "and other employees similarly-situated." Id. Thus, the Eighth Circuit explained that § 626(b) expressly allows employees to bring collective actions for age discrimination. Although the Eighth Circuit acknowledged that the ADEA expressly authorizes employees to sue collectively, it held that § 626(b) does not create a non-waivable, substantive right to do so. Id. The Eighth Circuit reasoned that "[s]tanding alone, § 216(b) does not create a non-waivable substantive right; rather, its… authorization can be waived by a valid arbitration agreement." Id. The Eighth Circuit found no convincing reason why § 626(b)'s incorporation of § 216(b) would "elevate the procedural… authorization to a substantive § 626(f)(1) 'right.'" Id. Ultimately, the Eighth Circuit concluded that the ADEA does not provide a "contrary congressional command" overriding the Federal Arbitration Act's mandate to enforce agreements to arbitrate ADEA claims, and that the District Court should have granted the company's motion to compel arbitration. Id. Next, Plaintiffs argued that an arbitration panel could not grant them their declaratory relief, i.e., decide the question of whether their waiver of substantive ADEA rights was "knowing and voluntary." Id. at *10. Plaintiffs argued that the question could only be resolved in the District Court because of § 626(f)(1)'s mandatory language stating that a party "shall have the burden of proving in a Court of competent jurisdiction." Id. The Eighth Circuit declined to decide this issue, finding instead that the question was not justiciable. Id. Because Defendant had not yet asserted that any Plaintiffs had in fact waived their ADEA claims, and because Plaintiffs were seeking declaratory relief only "if and to the extent" Defendant asserted that defense, the Eighth Circuit concluded that declaratory relief was hypothetical. Id. at *12. "No Article III case or controversy arises," the Eight Circuit explained, "when Plaintiffs seek a 'declaratory judgement as to the validity of a defense' that a Defendant 'may or may not raise.'" Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit held that the District Court did not have jurisdiction to decide whether the employees' waiver was "knowing and voluntary." Id.

V. Significant Collective Action Rulings Under The Fair Labor Standards Act

Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA") collective action litigation continued at a rapid pace in 2017. FLSA collective actions were filed more frequently than all other types of workplace class actions.

Statistically, plaintiffs were successful in securing conditional certification approximately 73% of the time. In terms of "second stage" decertification motions, employers also prevailed in a majority of those cases (approximately 63% of the time). A map showing these rulings is as follows:

U.S. Courts Of Appeal – Analysis Of FLSA Certification Decisions

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	D.C. Circuit
Conditional Certification Motions Granted	6	33	4	12	25	21	17	8	25	10	8	1
Conditional Certification Motions Denied	2	6	2	1	5	5	7	4	23	1	7	0

Whereas in Title VII class actions the courts undertake a "rigorous analysis" required by the U.S. Supreme Court decisional law for determining class-worthiness under Rule 23, courts have continued the trend of utilizing a two-step process for determining certification in FLSA collective action cases under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Under the first step of this approach, known as "notice" or "conditional" certification, courts generally impose a much lighter burden on plaintiffs to obtain conditional certification and to authorize a notice being sent to all putative collective action members. It is only at a second-stage proceeding, usually when considering a motion to decertify after discovery has been taken, that courts apply a more rigorous analysis of the evidence offered by plaintiffs.

A. Cases Certifying Or Refusing To Certify FLSA Collective Action Claims

(i) First Circuit

Brayak, et al. v. New Boston Pie, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 187945 (D. Mass. Nov. 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former pizza delivery drivers, filed an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime wages, failed to pay all tips due or minimum wages for non-tipped work, and unlawfully retained some of the drivers' tips in the form of delivery charge, in violation of the FLSA and state wage & hour laws. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification of their state law claims, which the Court granted in part and denied in part. The Court stated that Plaintiffs' delivery charge and inside work claims previously received thorough treatment in a recent decision certifying a nearly identical class in other litigation. The Court therefore fully adopted the analysis and conclusions from that case and certified Plaintiffs' motion to certify the driver class with respect to the delivery charge and inside work claims. Id. at *3. The Court then examined Plaintiffs' claim for overtime wages. The Court explained that Plaintiffs, as restaurant workers, brought claims under the Massachusetts Wage Act on the basis that Defendants failed to timely remit all "wages earned," inclusive of payments required under federal overtime law, 29 U.S.C. § 207. Id. at *4. The Court was unpersuaded by Plaintiffs' allegations, holding that it was well settled that federal overtime claims must be brought as collective actions under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) rather than as class actions under Rule 23. Id. at *5. The Court noted that this was not a case in which Plaintiffs with independently valid state and federal claims sought class certification of both together. Instead, Plaintiffs cited federal overtime protections as a basis for their state law Wage Act recovery, but later disclaimed the federal scheme governing those protections when it carried less advantageous procedural requirements. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion as to the driver class for the inside work and delivery charge claims, and denied it as to the overtime claims. Id. at *6.

Chebotnikov, et al. v. LimoLink, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 104262 (D. Mass. July 6, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of limousine drivers, brought a class and collective action alleging that Defendant violated Massachusetts wage statutes and the FLSA by misclassifying them as independent contractors and denying them all gratuities paid by customers. Plaintiffs alleged that they operated their own limousine companies and, through those companies, contracted with Defendant to provide limousine services to its customers. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs moved to certify two classes pursuant to Rule 23. Plaintiffs' first putative class (the "tips class") consisted of 36 vendors who provided rides for Defendant's customers in Massachusetts and had not received the total proceeds of gratuities paid by customers since August 27, 2011. Plaintiffs' second putative class (the "misclassification class") consisted of 17 individual drivers, designated by Defendant as "independent operators," whom it classified as independent contractors since August 27, 2011. Id. at *2. The Court granted the motion for class certification as to the tips class and denied it as to the misclassification class. As to the tips class, the putative class included 36 vendors, which the Court found satisfied numerosity. The Court also held that there were common questions of law and fact, including whether Defendant charged a gratuity to its customers, whether it remitted that gratuity to individuals other than the drivers, and whether the drivers had any managerial responsibilities for Defendant in violation of the Massachusetts Tip Act. The Court determined that it was undisputed that, prior to 2014, Defendant had a policy of charging customers a gratuity and that it retained such charges as part of its general revenue stream. Id. at *4. The Court reasoned that there was no reason to think that the resolution of those factual inquiries would vary between class members. Id. The Court also held that the typicality requirement was satisfied because the alleged injuries all arose out of the same course of conduct, i.e., Defendant's practice of charging gratuities and retaining those gratuities as part of its general revenue stream. Id. at *5. The Court noted that there was also no reason to doubt that the named Plaintiffs would adequately represent the interests of the class, as they had established that all class members had the same interest in receiving gratuities allegedly owed to them and that there was no apparent conflict of interest between themselves and the other class members as to the tips claim. Id. at *5-6. Furthermore, the Court held that Plaintiffs' chosen lead counsel appeared to be a qualified and experienced attorney in the areas of employment law and class action litigation. The Court also found that common questions of law or fact predominated over questions concerning only individual class members. Finally, the Court ruled that a class action was superior to other available methods of adjudication, and given the common questions of law and fact, a class action would more efficiently resolve the Tips Act claims than would a series of individual cases. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to certify the tips class. As to the misclassification class, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to establish all of the elements required for class certification. First, the Court opined that the relatively low number of putative class members, combined with their ease of identification and geographic proximity, suggested that the numerosity requirement was not satisfied. Id. The Court also determined that there were not common questions of fact capable of class-wide resolution, because adjudicating whether Defendant misclassified independent operators required an individualized and fact-intensive inquiry. Id. at *8. The Court stated that it would need to determine the size and nature of each individual operator's limousine business, as well as whether each individual operator had the opportunity to negotiate the terms of Defendant's service agreement, which would affect the analysis of whether they were misclassified as independent contractors. Id. The Court concluded that because the answers to those central questions were not capable of class-wide resolution, certification was inappropriate as to the misclassification class. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

DaSilva, et al. v. Border Transfer Of MA,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 186012 (D. Mass. Nov. 9, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former delivery drivers, alleged that Defendant improperly classified them as independent contractors instead of employees, and therefore unlawfully deducted certain business expenses from their pay. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23, which the Court granted. Defendant provided delivery services for large retail stores such as Sears. Plaintiffs delivered merchandise and their relationship with Defendant was governed by a "contract carrier agreement," which stated that Plaintiffs were independent contractors. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs sought to certify a class of all individuals who: (i) entered into a contract carrier agreement directly or through a business entity; (ii) personally provided delivery services for Defendant on a full-time basis in Massachusetts; and (iii) who were classified as independent contractors, at any time since June 23, 2013. Id. at *6. Defendant did not dispute that the numerosity requirement was met, as 59 individuals made up the proposed class. Id. at *10. Defendants argued that individualized evidence was required to determine whether Massachusetts law applied to all putative class members' claims. The Court stated that the other potentially relevant jurisdictions were Rhode Island and Connecticut, and there were material differences in the wage laws of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, including the level of control required as a part of its independent contractor test. Id. at *12. The Court explained that the control test in the Massachusetts Wage Act is conjunctive and requires a company using an independent contractor to show that the contractor was free from its control both as a matter of contract and as a matter of fact. In contrast, both the Rhode Island and Connecticut independent contractor tests focus solely on the existence of a contractual right to control rather than the exercise of actual control. Id. at *13. Having found at least one potentially relevant difference among the state laws, the Court opined that it must undertake a choice-of-law analysis. The Court stated that the choice-of-law question was whether the Massachusetts Wage Act would apply to a driver who signed a contract with Defendant (a Michigan corporation headquartered in Tennessee that operates in Massachusetts) through a Rhode Island corporate entity to deliver goods from a Massachusetts facility to a mix of Massachusetts and out-of-Massachusetts customers. Id. at *14-15. Plaintiffs argued that because only a single common issue was necessary to meet the commonality requirement of Rule 23(a), they satisfied the requirement by showing that either contractual control or actual control could be adjudicated on a class-wide basis. Id. at *15. The Court agreed and held that since all drivers would be subject to the common proof of whether Defendants improperly took deductions in violation of the Wage Act, Plaintiffs met the commonality requirement. Id. at *27. The Court further found that typicality was met because Plaintiffs' claims and the putative class members' claims arose from the same agreements and class-wide treatment, and Plaintiffs and the class members asserted the same legal theory of misclassification. Id. at *28. The Court determined that Plaintiffs met the adequacy requirement because Plaintiffs and the putative class members shared an interest in recovering wages lost as a result of misclassification. Further, the Court opined that Plaintiffs' attorneys were highly experienced in class action employment litigation and specifically in Wage Act misclassification claims. Id. at *29. Finally, since Plaintiffs demonstrated that their claims appeared to be provable by common evidence that predominated over any individualized issues, the Court found that the predominance requirement was also met. The Court stated that although there may be a need for individual damage determinations, that fact did not alone defeat predominance. The Court also determined that efficiency and the policy considerations unique to the employment context made class adjudication superior. Id. at *31. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Dvornikov, et al. v. Landry's, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 49178 (D. Mass. Mar. 31, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant workers, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Massachusetts Tips Act and the Massachusetts Minimum Wage Law by forcing them to contribute to a tip-pool that included hostesses. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, and the Court granted the motion. Plaintiffs were employed at Defendant's Chart House restaurant as servers. Plaintiffs were paid at the service, or tipped rate, and were required to participate in an automated, tip-sharing program. Id. at *3-4. Defendants argued that Chart House hostesses properly participated in the tip-sharing program, in compliance with the Tips Act, because they were "waitstaff employees." Id. at *9. Plaintiffs asserted that Chart House hostesses should not qualify as "waitstaff employees." Id. Plaintiffs further argued that Defendants violated the Minimum Wage Law because Chart House servers remitted a portion of their tips to hostesses in violation of the Tips Act. Plaintiffs sought certification of a class of all individuals who worked as servers at the Chart House in Boston at any time from June 25, 2012 to July 1, 2015, and who remitted any portion of their tips to hostesses through Defendants' tip share program. Id. at *20. The Court found that Plaintiffs met all of the requirements of Rule 23(a) and 23(b)(3). The Court stated that the putative class included approximately 70 servers who worked at the Chart House over the past three years, and was therefore sufficiently numerous. Id. at *21. The Court also determined the Plaintiffs met the commonality requirement because Defendants employed a uniform, tip sharing system that applied to all servers and hostesses during the relevant time period. Id. at *24. Further, there was a single pivotal legal question at issue, i.e., whether Chart House hostesses qualified as "waitstaff employees" under the Tips Act, and thus whether the automated tip-sharing program complied with Massachusetts law. Id. at *25. The Court held that common questions of law and fact predominated over any questions specific to individuals because the evidence that would be presented at trial was common to all hostesses, including internal company documents, job descriptions, or other communications involving employer expectations for hostesses and firsthand employee experiences. Id. at *25-26. The Court addressed typicality and adequacy together and found that the alleged injuries arose from the same events or course of conduct, i.e., namely, the automated tip-sharing program that required all servers to remit portions of their tips to hostesses that shared the shift. Id. at *27. The Court stated that Plaintiffs were servers who worked at the Chart House in Boston during the relevant period, were required to participate in the program that remitted tips to hostesses, and were paid at a service rate. Id. Thus, the injuries of the proposed named Plaintiffs and putative Plaintiffs arose from same course of conduct by Defendant. Further, the Court opined that all of the claims were based on the same legal theory i.e., that the Chart House hostesses did not qualify as waitstaff employees and that the tip sharing program therefore violated the Tips Act. Id. at *28. Accordingly, Plaintiffs met Rule 23's typicality requirement. The Court also held that Plaintiffs would fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class. The Court opined that Plaintiffs' counsel was clearly qualified, experienced, and able to undertake this litigation. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied the adequacy requirement. Finally, the Court held that Plaintiffs demonstrated that a class action was superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating the controversy. The Court stated that judicial economy would be served by allowing the matter to proceed as a class action, rather than consolidated or individual actions. Further, the Court determined that it would be unlikely that individuals would litigate such cases alone because the average person, especially working on a server's salary, likely could not afford counsel or the time to proceed pro se. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Lazo, et al. v. Sodexo, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 183455 (D. Mass. Nov. 6, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of service employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Massachusetts Tips Act by retaining money collected from patrons as service charges, rather than remitting the monies to waitstaff and service employees as the statute requires. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs moved to certify a class of at least 604 food and beverage waitstaff and service employees working at 35 Massachusetts locations where Defendant imposed, and improperly retained, a "service charge," on patron food and beverage purchases. Id. at *1-2. The Court found that Plaintiffs only identified 15 locations in their brief, and described Defendant's purported practices at only seven locations. Id. at *8. The Court stated that Defendant's interrogatory responses and declarations explained a variety of different services to a variety of different clients at a variety of different locations employing a variety of different practices regarding fees. Id. at *12. The Court held that although Plaintiffs asserted that class certification was appropriate because the ultimate resolution was based on "one central issue – the legality of Defendant's practice and policy of collecting and retaining service charges from patrons" – that claim was refuted by the factual record. Id. The Court held that even if it were assumed that every member of the putative class had some version of a claim for relief under the Tips Act, the dissimilarities in billing practices and work procedures across the proposed locations, and therefore across class members, reflected an lack of a "practice and policy" of charging fees that was common to all service venues. Id. at *13. The Court further determined that Plaintiffs' proposed class was so broad that it included class members who worked at locations for which there is no evidence offered that fees were even imposed. Id. at *13-14. The Court stated that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that there were questions of fact or law that could provide a common answer across the various services provided by Defendant over the range of various locations, which was governed by differing contractual terms and fees between Defendant and clients. Id. at *14. The Court held that Plaintiffs were not aggrieved by the same practice or policy as the putative class members because there was no "practice or policy" common to the multiple locations where the putative class members worked. Id. The Court therefore opined that Plaintiffs failed to show a consistent practice or policy regarding the imposition of fees across their proposed class locations that would permit class-wide resolution of their claim, by permitting the determination of a "common answer" to a class-wide issue. Id. at *14-15. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Romulus, et al. v. CVS Pharmacy, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 107538 (D. Mass. July 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of shift supervisors, brought an action in state court alleging that Defendant had a policy under which they were required to remain on store premises when taking rest or meal breaks when there were no other managerial employees on-duty, and Defendant did not pay them wages for those breaks in violation of the Massachusetts Wage Act. Plaintiffs sought class certification of two classes pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3), including: (i) all shift supervisors who worked for an hourly wage in Massachusetts between July 25, 2008 and May 14, 2013 and were not paid for meal breaks during which Defendant required them to remain in the store, and sought recovery of wages for unpaid meal breaks during that period (the "First Class"); and (ii) all shift supervisors who worked for an hourly wage in Massachusetts between May 15, 2013 and the date of final judgment and who were not paid for meal breaks during which Defendant required them to remain in the store, and sought recovery of wages for unpaid meal breaks during that period (the "Second Class"). Id. at *3. Plaintiffs maintained that Defendant had two policies that led to their unpaid work during breaks: (i) in that until at least May 2013, Defendant's "management coverage policy" prohibited shift supervisors from leaving store premises when no other "managerial employees" were present; and (ii) under the "unpaid meal break" policy, meal breaks must be unpaid. Id. at *3-4. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs could not establish commonality. Plaintiffs maintained that commonality was established because all shift supervisors were subjected to Defendant's management coverage policy and unpaid meal break policy. Id. at *8. The Court agreed with Defendant and found that Plaintiffs' evidence on its face did not provide common proof of an illegal practice such that it was able to resolve all of the putative class members' claims. Id. at *9. The Court determined that the policies themselves did not necessitate that a shift supervisor remain in the store during unpaid meal breaks or that a shift supervisor must take a meal break when he or she is the only manager present. Id. at *10. Further, the Court found that to the extent a situation did arise where the shift supervisor was required to remain in the store during a meal break, Defendant's policies suggested that he or she would be compensated. Id. The Court thereby determined that Plaintiffs' testimony regarding whether they were paid for meal breaks for which they remained in store, and if not, why, would vary by the individual. Therefore, the Court held that neither of the proposed classes satisfied the commonality requirement, and denied Plaintiffs' motion.

Torrezani, et al. v. VIP Auto Detailing, Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31276 (D. Mass. Mar. 6, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of auto detailing employees, brought a class and collective action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the Massachusetts Minimum Fair Wage Law ("MMFWL"), the FLSA, and the Massachusetts Wage Act ("MWA") by failing to pay them and similarly-situated individuals overtime wages. Plaintiffs sought certification of their Rule 23 state claims and conditional certification of a collective action of their FLSA claims pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), which the Court granted. Plaintiffs worked for Defendants for several years performing vehicle detailing and cleaning at auto dealerships in Massachusetts. Plaintiffs asserted that they typically worked somewhere between 50 and 60 hours per week and were not provided breaks. Plaintiffs further alleged that they were paid on an hourly basis and were not paid premium or overtime compensation for hours worked in excess of 40 per week. Moreover, Plaintiffs contended that Defendants failed to accurately record the time worked by employees and did not issue them pay stubs detailing the hours worked and rate of pay. Id. at *2. Although the Court initially questioned whether the 30 identified potential class members met the numerosity requirement of Rule 23, it ultimately determined that one of the primary purposes behind class actions was judicial economy. Id. at *7. The Court found that avoiding multiple suits by as many as 30 additional class members strongly favored maintaining the lawsuit as a class action, particularly because Court could reasonably infer that substantially all of the class members had limited financial resources and would find it difficult to pursue the claims themselves. Id. at *8. With respect to commonality, the Court opined that Plaintiffs essentially alleged that Defendants had engaged in per se illegal wage policies, i.e., non-payment of overtime wages, which violated the rights of all class members. Id. at *8. The Court stated that Defendants did not dispute that there were factual and legal questions common to the class, i.e., that Defendant failed to pay employees who worked as car detailers and cleaners overtime wages for hours worked in excess of 40 hours per week. Id. at *9. The Court found that the evidence showed that the prospective class shared common questions of law and fact sufficient to satisfy commonality. The Court also ruled that Plaintiffs alleged injuries arose from the same events and course of conduct as the injuries of the proposed class members and therefore the claims were typical to the class. Id. at *10. The Court likewise determined that Plaintiffs would vigorously pursue both their own claims and those of the proposed class members, and that their counsel demonstrated that they were qualified, experienced, and fully prepared to represent the class. Id. at *12. The Court opined that common issues predominated because the form of monetary damages was common to all class members. The Court stated that while class members probably could litigate the claims on their own, it was unlikely many of the class members would have the resources to do so, particularly because many of the class members worked for only limited periods of time and were likely to recover a minimal amount so that pursuing individual claims would be impractical. Id. at *14. Hence, the Court held that class action would be a far more efficient and economical manner to proceed. The Court held that Plaintiffs met the Rule 23 requirements for class certification. As to conditional certification of Plaintiffs' FLSA claims, the Court determined Plaintiffs sufficiently met their burden of establishing that there was a similarly-situated group of potential Plaintiffs, such that conditional certification was warranted. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court authorized notice to proposed collective action members under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court therefore granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a FLSA collective action and their motion for class certification of state law claims pursuant to Rule 23. Id. at *18.

Vargas, et al. v. Spirit Delivery And Distribution Services, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43358 (D. Mass. Mar. 24, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of delivery drivers, brought a class action against Defendant alleging claims for violation of the independent contractor provision of the Massachusetts Wage Act (the "MWA"), unjust enrichment, and quantum meruit. Plaintiffs alleged that as a result of unlawfully characterizing them as independent contractors rather than employees, Defendant deprived them of various rights and benefits to which they were entitled. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs further alleged that as a result of mischaracterizing the nature of their employment, Defendant made illegal deductions from their wages and was unjustly enriched. Id. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs sought to certify a Rule 23 class of all individuals who signed settlement carrier contracts with Defendant, in either their individual capacities or through personal corporate entities, and who personally provided Massachusetts-based delivery services for Defendant at any time between June 28, 2010 and the present. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs asserted that the class met the commonality requirement because it was defined by the common legal question of the drivers' employment status, i.e., whether Defendant has misclassified them and other delivery drivers as independent contractors in violation of the independent contractor provision of the MWA. Id. at *37. Plaintiffs also asserted that the employment status of proposed class members could be resolved through common evidence. The Court found that the record demonstrated that drivers worked for different customers of Defendant who set their own standards and requirements, and therefore it remained an open question as to whether individualized scrutiny would be required as to each class member both on the issue of whether they were "employees" and, if they were, the extent to which Defendant was liable to them. Id. at *39. However, the Court stated that it appeared that answers to these inquiries should be readily ascertainable through Defendant's corporate records. Id. The Court therefore held that Plaintiffs' allegation that Defendant's system-wide policy of mischaracterizing its drivers as independent contractors in violation of the MWA satisfied the commonality requirement. Id. at *40. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs' claims were not typical of the claims of the proposed class. Defendant contended that the corporate status of various class members who contracted with it and the presence of some contracts with individuals and absence of contracts with others destroyed any possibility of a finding that Plaintiffs' claims were typical of the proposed classes' claims. Id. at *42. The Court disagreed and found the Plaintiffs' alleged injuries arose from the same events and course of conduct as those of the proposed class members. Id. at *42-43. Defendant also challenged whether Plaintiffs satisfied the adequacy requirement. Defendant argued that the named Plaintiff Civil lacked the integrity to represent the class because he failed to provide complete personal and corporate tax returns relating to the services he performed. The Court found that it would not determine that such conduct made Civil inadequate to represent the interests of the class at this time. Id. at *43. As to Rule 23(b) requirements, the Court stated that it was satisfied that common issues predominated, and that the proposed relief, in the form of monetary damages, was common to all class members. Id. at *44-45. The Court explained that there may be some individual issues, but these uncommon issues did not outweigh common ones. Id. at *45. Further, the Court found that while class members probably could litigate the claims on their own – given that some class members worked for Defendant only for a limited period and were likely to recover a minimal amount – pursuing individual claims would be impractical. Id. Moreover, the Court held that multiple actions would result in increased expense for the parties and the Court as the result of duplicative discovery and multiple proceedings. Id. at *45-46. The Court therefore concluded a class action was a superior method for resolving the claims at issue, and granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

(ii) Second Circuit

Alcantra-Flores, et al. v. Vlad Restoration LTD,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 67147 (E.D.N.Y. May 2, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective and class action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of the FLSA claims as a collective action. Plaintiffs alleged that the purported collective action of approximately 30 to 35 employees performed similar duties and functions working as foremen, demolition workers, restoration workers, and construction workers during the relevant period. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs further argued that the potential collective action members were similarly-situated because all of the employees performed similar job duties and were paid pursuant to a "scheme that enacted an improper policy of failing to compensate these employees with proper overtime premium pay." Id. In opposing Plaintiffs' motion, Defendants argued that conditional certification was not proper because 21 potential collective action members executed release agreements waiving any claims in the action. Id. at *2-3. Defendants concurrently filed a motion to remove the 21 potential collective action members from the action, relying on the same arguments they made in opposition to Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification. The Magistrate Judge granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification, finding that the affidavits submitted – stating that Defendants "failed to pay them overtime premium wages" and asserting that they have "personal knowledge of other employees" subject to the same unlawful practices – were an adequate showing to merit conditional certification. Id. at *3. The Magistrate Judge explicitly declined to consider or rule on Defendants' motion to remove the 21 potential collective action members. On Rule 72 review, Defendants argued that the Magistrate Judge erred in granting conditional certification because it "overlooked" Defendants' motion to remove the 21 potential Plaintiffs, thereby undermining the requirement that the purported collective was similarly-situated and sufficiently numerous. Id. at *4. The Court opined that the appropriate time to consider the purported releases of the 21 potential Plaintiffs would be after discovery, and Defendants would be able to move to decertify the collective action at that time. Id. at *10. Defendants further asserted that the potential collective members were not sufficiently numerous to proceed as a class action without the 21 Plaintiffs who purportedly released their right to proceed collectively. Id. at *11. The Court held that it would not be proper for it to consider whether to remove the 21 potential Plaintiffs at this stage of the litigation. The Court found that it therefore must accept Plaintiffs' allegation that the potential class size was between 30 and 35 members. Moreover, the Court explained, unlike certification under Rule 23, numerosity is not a prerequisite to conditional certification for FLSA claims. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion.

Ansoralli, et al. v. CVS Pharmacy, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20075 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former market investigators, brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Lab ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of their collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs submitted declarations from themselves and five other former employees who worked as market investigators under the supervision of Anthony Salvatore and Abdul Saliu, two regional loss prevention managers. The declarations averred that Salvatore and Saliu required market investigators to work off-the-clock, and that the work resulted in unpaid overtime. Id. at *3. The off-the-clock tasks included responding to work-related telephone calls, emails, and text messages from Salvatore and Saliu, attending meetings with other market investigators, completing paperwork and communicating with police about shoplifting suspects "caught" while on-the-clock, and performing surveillance of shoplifting suspects. Id. at *4. Defendant contended that Plaintiffs' declarations fell short of establishing the existence of a formal, uniform company-wide policy to require employees to work off-the-clock and not pay overtime wages. Id. Defendant argued that at most Plaintiffs alleged unlawful actions by individual, anomalous managers. Defendant further argued that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated to the putative collective action members because the factual allegations regarding the terms and conditions of employment in the complaint and Plaintiffs' declarations were "entirely different" than those of the five other former employees. Id. As to Defendant's first argument, the Court opined that the FLSA does not require that a Plaintiff identify a formal, facially unlawful policy before obtaining conditional certification of a collective action. The Court opined that it was sufficient to show that Defendant's managers implemented a facially lawful policy in an unlawful manner, which resulted in a pattern or practice of FLSA violations. Id. at *5. As to Defendant's second argument, the Court determined that at this stage it was immaterial that there may be factual differences between the complaint and the various declarations in support of the motion for conditional certification. The Court determined that all that was necessary was some identifiable factual nexus binding the named Plaintiffs and potential collective action members together as victims of a particular practice. Id. at *6. The Court held that Plaintiffs and the putative collective action members were sufficiently similar in that they were all required to work off-the-clock and were not paid for that time. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action and authorized notice to be sent to potential collective action members.

Arciello, et al. v. County Of Nassau*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 179182 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of County employees in various departments, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs alleged that they consistently experienced six-to eight-week delays in payment of their overtime wages. Id. at *4. Moreover, when Plaintiffs eventually received their overtime wages, they asserted that their pay stubs did not specify the day, week, or month to which those wages corresponded. Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs had made a sufficient factual showing that they and the potential collective action members –other non-exempt employees of the County who did not receive overtime compensation in a timely manner – were together victims of a common policy or plan that violated the FLSA. Id. at *11. The Court stated that Plaintiffs' complaint alleged that Defendants had a policy and practice of refusing to promptly pay overtime compensation at the statutory rate to Plaintiffs for their hours worked in excess of 40 hours per workweek, and that Defendant knew of the issue but their failure to pay in a prompt manner continued. Id. at *12. The Court determined that Plaintiffs' allegations were supported by Plaintiffs' respective declarations submitted in support of their motion, each of which described Defendant's practice of paying overtime wages six to eight weeks late, specifically named other employees who had been affected by such delays, noted that a previous grievance was filed relating to the delayed payment of overtime wages, and claimed that the delays continued even after Defendant became aware of the issue. Id. at *13. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated to the proposed collective action members because not all employees used the same time system as an interface for their time management. Id. at *14. The Court reasoned that while Plaintiffs' complaint suggested that Defendant's transfer to the new time system contributed to the delays in overtime payments, Plaintiffs did not allege that only those employees using time system in question experienced such delays. Id. Instead, Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants' policy and practice of refusing to promptly pay overtime compensation affected both those employees that use the time system and those that did not. Id. In light of the evidence that Defendant's allegedly unlawful practices were widespread and impacted employees beyond those using the time system, the Court found a sufficient "factual nexus" between Plaintiffs' situation and the situation of the proposed collective action members such that conditional certification should be granted. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Balderramo, et al. v. Go New York Tours Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 100106 (S.D.N.Y. June 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of tour bus drivers, brought a class and collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay minimum wages, overtime, and uniform reimbursement in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs sought to certify their NYLL claims as a class action pursuant to Rule 23 on behalf of all employees of Defendant who worked as tour bus drivers and tour guides within six years prior to the filing of the complaint. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. It found that the proposed class consisted of over 40 members and was therefore met the numerosity requirement. Id. at *8. Because all of Plaintiffs' claims derived from the same wage & hour policies, the Court determined that there were a number of questions common to the class, including: (i) whether Defendant paid overtime for hours worked over 40 each week; (ii) whether Defendant paid the class members uniform maintenance pay; (iii) whether Defendant failed to pay spread of hours compensation; and (iv) whether Defendant failed to provide employees with proper wage notices and statements. Id. at *10. The Court also found that Plaintiffs met the typicality requirement because all class members' claims arose from the same policies and practices – namely failure to pay the overtime premium, spread-of-hours, and uniform maintenance pay – and the arguments Plaintiffs made in support of Defendants' liability were typical of those that would be made by others in the class. Id. at *11. The Court held that Plaintiffs adequately represented the class because they were willing to be class representatives and to protect the interests of the class, as they specifically claimed to have knowledge of Defendants' compensation policies and practices, and their claims mirrored those of the other class members. Id. at *13. Relative to Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement, the Court opined that the principal issue in this case concerned Defendants' wage & hour practices, which were subject to generalized, rather than individual, proof. Id. at *15. The Court determined that the questions that were common to all class members therefore predominated over those questions of damages individual to each employee. The Court also found superiority was met because Plaintiffs' recoveries were likely to be small and they were thereby less likely to bring individual suits. Finally, the Court concluded that because the class was merely comprised of Defendants' tour bus drivers and tour guides since March 27, 2009, it could be easily ascertained by reference to Defendants' own records. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Balverde, et al. v. Lunella Ristorante, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 59778 (S.D.N.Y April 19, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of hourly restaurant employees, filed an action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions on the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs had previously filed a motion to conditionally certify a collective action. Pursuant to Plaintiffs' motion, the Court conditionally certified the FLSA minimum wage and overtime claims as a collective action. Plaintiffs subsequently filed a Rule 23 motion for class certification of the NYLL claims, which the Court granted in part. Specially, Plaintiffs sought to certify: (i) claims for unpaid minimum wages, overtime wages, unpaid spread-of-hours, and failure to provide wage notice as a Rule 23(b)(3) class action on behalf of a class defined as "all hourly employees who worked for Lunella Ristorante, Inc. at any time from July 15, 2009 through the present" (the "unpaid wage class"); and (ii) claims for unlawfully withheld gratuities (Count VII) as a Rule 23(b)(3) class action on behalf of a tipped sub-class defined as "all waiters, bussers, runners and bartenders who worked for Lunella Ristorante, Inc. at any time from July 15, 2009 through the present" (the "unpaid tips sub-class"). Id. at *8-9. As a threshold matter, the Court considered whether the unpaid wage class should be certified with respect to back of the house kitchen employees. The Court had previously held in its conditional certification ruling that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate a common policy or practice that applied to back of the house employees. Id. at *10. Therefore, the Court had granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification but only as to servers, bartenders, and runners. Id. at *11. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs submitted no additional substantive information that should alter the Court's determination with regards to back of the house employees for purposes of the Rule 23 motion. The Court agreed and therefore excluded kitchen or back of house employees from the unpaid wage class. Id. Turning to the Rule 23 requirements for the redefined class, Defendants argued that Plaintiffs were unable to satisfy the numerosity requirement if the Court did not include back of the house kitchen employees. Id. at *12-13. Defendants asserted that because there were 38 tipped workers that appeared in their records, Plaintiffs could not satisfy numerosity. However, the Court noted that the time period of Defendants' records was only through the end of 2015 and Plaintiffs sought to certify the class through the present. The Court stated that even without the records from 2016 and 2017, if there were 38 employees as Defendants alleged, the Court still found numerosity satisfied. Id. at *14. As to commonality, the Court held that because all of Plaintiffs' claims derived from the same wage & hour policies, it found questions common to the class. The Court determined that since the answers to these questions would drive the resolution of the litigation, the Court deemed that the commonality requirement was satisfied. Id. at *16. The Court also rule that named Plaintiff and counsel were adequate representatives for the litigation. The Court stated that Plaintiffs established that there were disputed issues that could be resolved through generalized proof on the legality of Defendants' various wage & hour practices. Id. at *18. The questions common to all class members therefore predominated over those questions of damages individual to each employee. Id. at *24. The Court further explained that Plaintiffs' NYLL claims arose out of the same nucleus of operative facts as their FLSA claims, which were going to be adjudicated as a collective action. Therefore, the Court concluded that a class action was superior to other available methods for adjudicating this controversy. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification of their NYLL claims subject to the redefined class definition excluding back of house employees from the unpaid wage class.

Benavides, et al. v. Serenity Spa NY,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 142137 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 1, 2017). Plaintiff, a spa worker, brought a putative class action against Defendant alleging Defendant failed to pay minimum wage and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Id. at *1. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant violated the spread-of-hours provisions, failed to provide proper wage statements, and neglected to issue wage & hour notices as required by NYLL. Id. at *2. Additionally, Plaintiff alleged that she was subject to a racially hostile work environment as Hispanic employees were spoken to "harshly" and expected to do work that the Chinese employees were not required to do. Id. Plaintiff moved for: (i) certification of the class as to the state law claims; and (ii) summary judgment on both the FLSA and state law claims. Id. The Court granted the motion for class certification and denied the motion for summary judgment. Id. The parties agreed that Plaintiff worked 10 hours a day; however, Defendant maintained that Plaintiff was given as many snack breaks as she wanted as well as a meal break, resulting in an eight-hour workday and no overtime. Id. at *8. Plaintiff and other employees were paid in cash without any wage statements, but some employees were paid "on the books." Id. Defendant maintained that it provided oral notice to employees that Defendant would be taking a tip credit and employees could keep all of their tips. Id. Plaintiff disputed this. Id. The Court declined to consider the declarations of five current employees that Defendant relied upon because: (i) Defendant did not demonstrate that the declarants were on notice of their rights; (ii) the weight of case law authority was against considering such declarants; and (iii) their content was of little evidentiary value. Id. at *14. The Court found that all elements were satisfied as to Rule 23. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that numerosity was not satisfied because most of the class lived in New York, and thus judicial economy was better served when class certification is granted in cases involving a tandem FLSA class claim. Id. at *24. The Court also rejected Defendant's argument as to commonality, noting that the objections went to the merits of the claims and not to whether the violations derived from the same wage policies. Id. at *28. The Court likewise rejected Defendant's argument that typicality and adequacy were not met because Plaintiff was paid in cash while some employees received checks. The Court reasoned that other employees were also paid cash and this did not change the contention that all employees were subject to the same course of conduct. Id. at *30. The Court further rejected Defendant's argument that Plaintiff did not qualify to be class representative because her separate race discrimination claim would divide Hispanic and Chinese employees, as the claim was against Defendant and not against other Chinese employees. Id. at *31. The Court ruled that the predominance and superiority requirements were satisfied and certified the class. Id. at *37. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, noting that it was not procedurally improper to file for summary judgment simultaneously with a motion to certify. Id. at *39. However, the Court determined that there was substantial support for the proposition that it would be unfair to Defendant to grant summary judgment in favor of Plaintiff before § 216(b) notices were sent. Id. at *40. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment and certified the class.

Birdie, et al. v. Brandi's Hope Community Services, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 91330 (S.D.N.Y. June 23, 2017). Plaintiff, a direct support professional ("DSP"), brought a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA. DSPs were responsible for providing assistance and care to disabled adults living in group homes operated by Defendant. Since these group homes were staffed at all times, DSPs were often required to stay with residents overnight. Plaintiff claimed that she frequently worked the night shift, which ran 17 hours from 3:00 p.m. to 8:00 a.m., and was required to clock-out between 10:00 p.m. and 6:00 a.m. but remain at the facility throughout the night. Id. at *2. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant violated the FLSA by requiring her and other similarly-situated DSPs to work over 40 hours a week without overtime compensation. Id. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action of all DSPs employed by Defendant since February 24, 2014. Id. at *3. Defendant did not oppose certification, but proposed that the scope of the proposed collective action be limited. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant subjected all DSPs to the same pay structure, the same training, and all performed the same duties in caring for Defendants' customers. Id. at *5-6.

Plaintiff further maintained that she observed and spoke with other DSPs and that, based on her experience and knowledge, she discerned that others would be interested in joining in her suit. Id. at *6 The Court was therefore satisfied that Plaintiff demonstrated a factual nexus binding her and potential collective action members together as victims of a particularly alleged policy or practice. Id. Defendant requested that the collective action be limited to all DSPs employed by Defendant since February 24, 2014, who were required to stay on the employer's premises overnight. Id. at *6-7. Acknowledging that only those DSPs staying with clients overnight were subject to Defendant's "sleep time" policy, Plaintiff indicated that she was amenable to modifying her proposed collective action definition. Id. at *7. The Court therefore determined that the pleadings supported the case theory that all DSPs who stayed overnight with patients were subject to the same pay structure and policy. Id. Based on the allegations, the Court ruled that Plaintiff satisfied her low burden at the notice stage under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) and thereby granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Brown, et al. v. Barnes & Noble*, Case No. 16-CV-7333 (S.D.N.Y May 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former managers, alleged that Defendant's policies violated the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs alleged that they, and others similarly-situated, were misclassified as exempt, and they sought unpaid overtime and other pay. Two months after filing the complaint, and before conducting any discovery, Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of their FLSA claim. Plaintiffs argued that, because the café managers had been uniformly classified as exempt, were all reclassified as non-exempt, work under the same job description, and because Defendant maintained detailed policies, procedures, and rules that control how the café managers, regardless of location, performed their work, that all such managers were "similarly-situated" to the named Plaintiffs. The Magistrate Judge first dispelled three oft-cited theories advanced by Plaintiffs to obtain conditional certification, including: (i) that a uniform classification of exempt status, standing alone, can satisfy the low threshold for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b); (ii) that the employer's reclassified of a position from exempt to non-exempt showed that the position was uniformly misclassified previously; and (iii) that a common job description means the position is the same everywhere. As to the first contention, the Magistrate Judge held that a uniform classification of exempt status was not sufficient, in and of itself, to establish the commonality required for conditional certification. The Magistrate Judge stated that as to the second point, "there could be many legitimate business reasons for an employer to reclassify employees." Id. at 11. On the third point, the Magistrate Judge reasoned that "a common job description does not mean that conditional certification is per se warranted in every case." Id. The Magistrate Judge determined that here, the job description "is of little utility…when, under Plaintiffs' own theory of the case, [it] did not accurately reflect the duties they personally performed." Id. at 12. The Magistrate Judge therefore held that based on the evidence before the Court, she could not "infer that Defendant had de facto policies of requiring all 1,100 café managers to perform non-exempt work based on the personal experiences of the nine people who have joined this suit" and "nor can it infer such a policy from general assertions" and "cookie-cutter declarations." Id. at 17-18. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge found that Plaintiffs failed to meet even the lenient standard for conditional certification, and denied Plaintiffs' motion.

Cabrera, et al. v. Stephens*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 160044 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of assistant managers at a 7-Eleven convenience store, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay minimum wage and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs asserted that they were required to clock-in and clock-out at the start and end of each shift; however, Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants routinely altered timesheets in order to make it appear that they worked fewer hours. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs further contended that Defendants failed to pay the mandated overtime premium for any hours worked over 40 per week. Id. Plaintiffs also asserted that others were similarly-situated and that the same wage & hour violations occurred at Defendants' other store locations. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs argued that they satisfied the low evidentiary burden applicable to conditional certification of a collective action under the FLSA by submitting declarations identifying putative opt-in Plaintiffs and substantiating a factual nexus between the wage violations that Plaintiffs allegedly suffered and those potentially suffered by other similarly-situated employees. Id. at *6. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs could not show an unlawful common policy because they had only submitted sworn statements of two employees that were primarily composed of boilerplate conclusory language. Id. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification with respect to all of Defendants' 7-Eleven stores. The Court found that Plaintiffs substantiated through their pleadings and submitted affidavits establishing the requisite factual nexus between the named Plaintiffs' claims – i.e., Defendants failing to make minimum wage and overtime payments as required under the FLSA and the NYLL – and the potential claims of similarly-situated employees. Id. at *13. The Court held that named Plaintiff declared that she and other non-managerial employees, several of which were identified by name, had similar duties, were subject to the same pay practices, and were also compensated at a rate below the minimum wage and in violation of the overtime requirements with respect to all the hours that they worked per week. Id. at *15. Additionally, the Court found that affidavit of opt-in Plaintiff Sinchi corroborated the named Plaintiff's allegations of the same or similar unlawful practices. Further, the Court stated that the additional sworn declaration from a former employee of Defendants confirmed the allegation that the Defendants' wage violations extended beyond the store in which they worked to Defendants' other locations as part of a common scheme to regulate the pay practices of the stores to promote a certain cost-to-sales ratio. Id. at *16-17. The Court therefore found that certification was appropriate as to all of Defendants' locations. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied their minimal burden at the first conditional certification stage and established a factual nexus supporting the contention that Plaintiffs and the putative collective members were similarly-situated. Id. at *19. The Court thereby granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Canelas, et al. v. World Pizza,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 50615 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 31, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant employees, brought a class and collective action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime and minimum wage provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The parties stipulated to conditional certification a collective action of the FLSA claims. Plaintiffs subsequently filed a motion for class certification of their NYLL claims pursuant to Rule 23, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs sought to certify a class and two sub-classes, consisting of: (i) all non-exempt persons, including pizza makers, waiters, bus boys, dishwashers, cooks, delivery persons, and counter persons, who were employed by Defendants on or after September 24, 2008, the date six years preceding the filing of the complaint (the "class"); (ii) members of the class who were tipped employees, including waiters, delivery persons, and bus boys (the "tipped sub-class"); and (iii) members of the class who were delivery persons (the "delivery sub-class"). Id. at *8-9. The Court found that Plaintiffs submitted sufficient evidence to reasonably infer that the class exceeded 40 members, and therefore met the numerosity requirement. Id. at *10. Further, the Court stated that joinder of all class members would be impracticable in light of their limited resources and language barriers. Id. at *11. Because all of Plaintiffs' claims derived from the same wage & hour policies, the Court found a number of questions common to the class, including: (i) whether Defendant had a policy of paying non-exempt employees regular hourly rates, rather than overtime rates, for overtime hours worked; (ii) whether Defendant had a policy of rounding employees' hours, and whether that policy systematically deprived them wages for hours worked; (iii) whether Defendant failed to pay spread of hours compensation; and (iv) whether Defendant failed to provide employees with proper wage notices and statements. Id. at *12-13. The Court also held that questions common to the tipped sub-class, including whether Defendant was entitled to claim tip credits against the minimum wage, as well as questions common to the delivery sub-class, including whether Defendant had a policy of requiring delivery persons to cover their own costs. Id. at *13. The Court also opined that all class members' claims arose from the same policies and practices, and the arguments Plaintiffs made in support of Defendant's liability were typical of those that would be made by others in the class. Id. at *14. In light of the fact that Plaintiffs' alleged injuries were identical in kind to those of the class, the Court found that Plaintiffs' interests and the class members' interests were aligned and therefore Plaintiffs met the adequacy requirement. Id. at *15. The Court further determined that Plaintiffs met the requirements of Rule 23(b). The Court stated that common questions of law and fact predominated because the principal issue was the legality of Defendant's various wage & hour practices and policies, which were subject to generalized, rather than individual, proof. Id. at *16. Finally, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs met the superiority requirement because Plaintiffs' NYLL claims arose out of the same nucleus of operative facts as their FLSA claims. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification of their NYLL claims.

Cazares, et al. v. Ava Restaurant Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 50834 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 31, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant employees, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime and minimum wages in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendants violated the spread of hours and wage notice provisions of the NYLL. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification of their NYLL claims pursuant to Rule 23, and the Court granted the motion. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants never paid overtime premiums to any of their employees, and paid the vast majority of their employees at rates significantly below the minimum wage. Further, Plaintiffs contended that Defendants never paid any of their employees a spread-of-hours premium for working a shift of more than 10 hours, nor did Defendants provide their employees with accurate wage notices or wage statements as required under New York law. Id. at *3. For numerosity, Plaintiffs relied on payroll spreadsheets comprised of 60 employees working in the same positions as the alleged class members. Accordingly, the Court found that numerosity was satisfied. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs had not carried their burden because they relied on payroll spreadsheets produced by Defendants. Id. at *8. The Court found Defendants' arguments meritless. It stated that Defendants produced the spreadsheet in response to Plaintiffs' document requests for relevant documents, and Plaintiff should be entitled to rely on them. Id. at *9. As to the commonality requirement, the Court held that the declaration of opt-in Plaintiff Vega and the payroll spreadsheets collectively provided evidence of a common pattern or policy of Defendants paying wages below the minimum wages, and failing to pay overtime premiums and spread-of-hours premiums. Id. at *10. The Court further stated that Plaintiffs and the class members also shared in common the question of whether they received wage statements and whether any wage notices received were accurate and whether Defendants' practices and policies violated the law. The Court also determined that the alleged harms suffered by Plaintiffs were typical of those of the class they sought to represent. The Court noted that all class members were employed by Defendants and allegedly were subjected to the same allegedly unlawful employment practices and policies. Id. at *11. As to adequacy of representation, Defendants argued that Plaintiffs were "untrustworthy" and not adequate class representatives because one of the named Plaintiffs allegedly "tricked" an employee into joining the lawsuit and Plaintiffs' counsel failed to explain certain forms to the employee. Id. at *15. Defendants also cited inconsistencies between the named Plaintiffs' depositions and the declarations submitted in support of this motion. The Court held that Defendants' argument failed because inconsistencies or inaccuracies in the named Plaintiffs' statements may reflect either a misunderstanding, or may raise an issue as to Plaintiffs' credibility, but did not necessarily disqualify them as adequate class representatives. The Court noted that named Plaintiffs' conduct showed that they were able to prosecute this action vigorously. Plaintiffs retained experienced and competent counsel, who had spent significant time and work preparing the action for litigation. Accordingly, the Court was satisfied that Plaintiffs met the requirement of Rule 23(a). As to Rule 23(b), the Court determined that Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants' employment policies and practices were unlawful, and the issues of whether they received the required overtime premium, and whether they received wage notices and wage statements, as well as spread-of-hours pay predominated over all individualized inquiries. Id. at *19. The Court also found that Plaintiffs met the superiority requirement. The Court reasoned that where the proposed class is significantly numerous and possesses relatively small individual claims and many potential class members are foreign-born, have limited reading and writing skills, and may fear reprisal from Defendants, a class action is both cost-efficient and fair and likely the only device by which many of the proposed class members would obtain relief. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Contrera, et al. v. Langer*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 165536 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of superintendents, porters, and handymen in residential buildings, filed a collective action alleging wage & hour violations by Defendant under the FLSA. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action. Id. at *6. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion in part and denied it in part. Id. Defendants objected, claiming that Plaintiffs were using an improper "integrated enterprise" theory to identify their employer for FLSA purposes, as four individuals alleged over 160 corporate entities were Plaintiffs' employers. Id. at *22. The Court rejected this argument and declined to decide if all Defendants were employers of Plaintiffs, as this was a fact-specific inquiry that could not be resolved at this stage of the litigation. Id. at *20, 23. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs met their modest burden at the conditional certification stage to show that one or more Defendant commonly owned and managed the buildings. Id. at *24. As to the superintendents, the Court found that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated to superintendents who worked at properties outside of the Bronx location as no declarant worked at a building outside of these areas or claimed to have information from employees of Defendants outside of the area. Accordingly, the Court authorized notice only to all superintendents who operated out of the property in Bronx, New York. Id. at *36. As to the porters, Plaintiffs did not allege that they had any conversations with other porters about their pay or work schedule. Id. at *36. However, they testified that they never received overtime pay despite working an average of 70 hours a week. Id. at *37. The Court considered this testimony with the testimony of the superintendents and found that they were similarly-situated as they performed substantially the same duties, and the Court authorized notice to all porters who operated out of the Bronx location. Id. at *38. As to the handymen, they testified that they worked with a team of 30 handymen and they were not paid overtime. Id. at *39. The Court found that the group of handymen were similarly-situated to these Plaintiffs and authorized notice to all handymen who operated out of the Bronx location, as there was no evidence of any handymen employed outside of this area. Id.

De Carrasco, et al. v. Life Care Services, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 206682 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 15, 2017). Plaintiff, a home healthcare aide ("HHA"), brought an action alleging violations of the FLSA, the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"), breach of contract, and unjust enrichment. Plaintiff sought to certify two FLSA collective actions and five New York state law class claims pursuant to Rule 23. The Court granted conditional certification of an FLSA collective action and class certification of a New York state law class on the overtime issue alone. The Court denied the remainder of the request for collective action and class action certification on all other issues. In support of her motion for certification, Plaintiff submitted a declaration from herself and another HHA, stating that in her capacity as an HHA, Plaintiff was sent to clients' homes to provide care, and that she frequently worked 24 hour shifts. Plaintiff asserted that during 24 hour shifts, she often did not receive meal breaks or get five hours of uninterrupted sleep, she frequently worked more than 40 hours a week, and that when she worked more than 40 hours, she was not always paid time and one half, the minimum wage, or time and one half of her standard rate after January 1, 2015. Id. at *2-3. The Court noted that although the FLSA has several express statutory exemptions from the overtime pay requirement, including for companionship employees, the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") issued an interpretive regulation – called the "Third-party Employment" regulation – which stated that "Third-party employers of [HHAs] may not avail themselves of the minimum wage and overtime exemption provided by section 213(a)(15) of the Act." Id. at *8-9. Plaintiff claimed she was a victim of Defendants' policy to pay only time and a half the minimum wage for overtime between January 1, 2015 and October 13, 2015, the date on which the Third-party Employment Regulation took effect. Defendants' primary argument was that the DOL regulation did not take effect until October 13, 2015. The Court found that the DOL regulation took effect on January 1, 2015, and that Plaintiff met the light burden required at this stage, and therefore it certified a collective action as to Plaintiff's overtime claims after January 1, 2015. Id. at*19. As to class certification of the NYLL state law overtime claims, the Court found that the class was sufficiently numerous at approximately 40 members, and that Plaintiff's allegations of commonality, typicality, and adequacy were simple, strong, and virtually unchallenged. Id. at *20. As to the Rule 23(b)(3) requirements, Plaintiff asserted that both predominance and superiority were established, since the main legal issue, whether Defendants violated New York state law by not paying time and one half the regular rate for overtime hours, was subject to generalized proof. Id. at *21. Moreover, Plaintiff contended that a class action was the superior method for resolution. The Court found that common questions predominated over individualized ones for the period of January 1, 2015 through October 13, 2015. Therefore, the Court certified a New York state law class of employees who were not paid overtime after January 1, 2015. Id. at *22. Plaintiff also moved to certify a New York state law class of employees not paid a full 24 hours for 24 hour shifts. The Court found that under New York law, an employee should only be paid 24 hours if she, in fact, was not receiving appropriate meal and sleep breaks. Id. at *23. As a result, the Court determined that individualized inquiries would predominate, and accordingly, a class action was not the superior method of adjudication for the 24 hour claim. Id. The Court also denied certification for each of Plaintiff's other proposed classes.

Durling, et al. v. Papa John's International, Inc.*, Case No. 16-CV-3592 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 29, 2017). Plaintiffs, five delivery drivers who worked at restaurants owned by independent franchisees of Defendant, alleged that Defendant and the franchisees under-reimbursed delivery drivers for wear and tear, gas, and other vehicle expenses in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant's control over its franchisees was such that it was the "joint employer" of Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs averred that they were paid $6 per hour plus $1 per delivery, which, at an average rate of five deliveries per hour, amounted to wages of approximately $11 per hour. Applying the IRS standard mileage rate, Plaintiffs claimed that they paid $13.50 per hour for upkeep on their vehicles, resulting in a net loss of $2.50 per hour. Accordingly, Plaintiffs asserted that they earned less than minimum wage in violation of the FLSA and corresponding state minimum wage laws. Defendant owns and operates approximately 700 of over 3,300 Papa John's restaurants in the United States, and the rest of the restaurants are franchisees. Although four of the five named Plaintiffs worked for franchisees, they did not sue any franchisees in this litigation (but only sued Defendant under their joint employer theory). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant disseminated policies to the franchisees that caused the drivers to be under-reimbursed in a uniform way. Plaintiffs supported this theory with purported evidence that all stores, both corporate and franchise-operated, use the same point-of-sale ("POS") technology to record deliveries and calculate reimbursements, and use the same logos and uniforms. In denying Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy even the modest standard generally used in step one for conditional certification motions under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court also declined to decide whether Defendant was in fact a joint-employer, finding this to be a merits issue. In framing the conditional certification issue, however, the Court reasoned that Plaintiffs could show that they were similarly-situated with the other members of the proposed collective action in two ways, either: (i) by demonstrating that Defendant dictated a common reimbursement policy for all delivery drivers working at both corporate and franchise-owned restaurants; or (ii) by showing that a common policy existed across the entire population of drivers of the proposed collective action. As to the first issue, the Court found that while Defendant admitted that it reimbursed the drivers it employed at corporate-owned stores by paying them a specific amount per delivery (without conceding that the rate was so low as to violate the FLSA), Plaintiffs failed to offer any evidence that Defendant was involved in its franchisees' policies for reimbursing delivery drivers. According to the Court, the mere use of the same POS system, with the corresponding ability to access data on how drivers are paid, in no way indicated that Defendant dictated a nationwide delivery driver payment policy. In analyzing the question of whether Plaintiffs could show a common policy across the population of drivers of the collective action that would bind them together, the Court answered it in the negative. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' attempt to show common policies regarding issues wholly unrelated to the purported practice of under-reimbursement. The Court reasoned that offering common policies such as wearing the same uniforms, or use of the Papa John's logo, or even the general use of personal vehicles to make deliveries, was not sufficient to demonstrate a common policy with respect to the payment of drivers. The Court determined that while Plaintiffs arguably had made a modest showing of a common policy across Defendant's corporate-owned stores and the two franchises for which Plaintiffs work, this evidence was insufficient to infer a nationwide policy. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' conclusory averments that other franchisees had the same policy, observing that witnesses as to this claim lacked personal knowledge. The Court also found that Plaintiffs failed to offer evidence of a common policy that violated the FLSA, noting that while the evidence showed that a few more franchisees did not use the IRS reimbursement rate, there was no evidence that the franchisees did not pay a rate reasonably related to driving and wear and tear costs, or that what they pay was so low that the drivers end up getting less than the minimum wage. The Court also opined that it had found no similar cases where Plaintiffs succeeded in certifying a nationwide collective action involving hundreds of franchisees where the declarations offered descriptions of only two stores, and no evidence existed that the franchisor dictated the policy at issue to all franchisees. Thus, even recognizing Plaintiffs' modest burden at the conditional certification stage, the Court declined to certify the collective action by inferring from the policy of two franchisees that a nationwide group of over 780 other franchisees reimbursed delivery drivers on a per-delivery basis that resulted in compensation below the minimum wage. Consequently, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a nationwide collective action, holding that Plaintiffs failed to meet their modest burden of showing that delivery drivers were similarly-situated.

Escamilla, et al. v. Uncle Paul's Pizza & Café Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 206731 (S.D.N.Y. May 18, 2017). Plaintiff, a restaurant worker, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants, the operators of two restaurants, violated the overtime and minimum wage requirements of the FLSA. Plaintiff alleged that Defendants failed to pay him and other employees the statutory minimum wage, spread of hours premium, and required overtime; improperly took tip credits from tipped employees; and failed to provide notice of legally mandated pay rate and wage statements. Id. at *3. To support these allegations, Plaintiff submitted a sworn declaration in which he stated that during his employment with Defendants, he was required to work at Paul's on Times Square on an as-needed basis, and that Defendants' other employees were interchangeable and shifted between the two restaurants as needed. Id. Plaintiff also asserted that based on his personal observations and conversations with these other employees, all other non-managerial employees employed by Defendants were subject to the same wage practices and policies. Id. at *4. Defendants submitted declarations that stated that Plaintiff never worked at Paul's on Times Square. Defendants contended, therefore, that Plaintiff was not similarly-situated to the employees of Paul's on Times Square. Id. at *5. Defendants also argued that Plaintiff's single declaration was vague and insufficient "to justify the size and scope of Plaintiff's requested collective action group," especially in light of the fact that Plaintiff only worked at Uncle Paul's Pizza. Id. at *8-9. The Court stated that it could not resolve factual disputes, decide substantive issues going to the ultimate merits, or make credibility determinations at the conditional certification stage. Id. at *9. The Court further opined that a single Plaintiff's affidavit may, in some circumstances, be sufficient to support conditional certification. The Court held that while Plaintiff's declaration was sparse, it averred that Plaintiff regularly was required to work overtime, was not paid for hours worked in excess of 40 hours each week, was not paid minimum wage, was not paid the spread of hours premium, and did not receive proper wage statements or wage, hour, and tip credit notices. Id. at *10. In addition, Plaintiff stated that he had specific conversations about wage violations with four other employees who he identified by first name and position. The Court found that these assertions were sufficient to show that there may be similarly-situated non-exempt employees subject to the same alleged pay policies and violations as Plaintiff at both locations. Id. Defendants also argued that Plaintiff's proposed collective action was overly broad because it included non-exempt employees who did not share the same positions as Plaintiff. The Court reasoned that at the conditional certification stage, however, the proper inquiry was whether Plaintiff and the putative collective action members were similarly-situated with respect to the allegations that the law has been violated. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff had met his modest burden to show that non-exempt employees at both restaurants were similarly-situated, and it granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Galicia, et al. v. 34th St. Coffee Shop Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 140402 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 30, 2017). Plaintiff, a busboy, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime wages and minimum wage in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. During his employment, Plaintiff was paid approximately $240 per week in cash for working approximately 69 hours per week. Plaintiff alleged that he observed several other employees, who were employed as waitresses and delivery persons, not being paid proper wages. Id. at *3. In support of his motion, Plaintiff submitted an affidavit that identified by name other employees at Defendant who were employed in similarly-situated jobs and whose working hours and pay would have constituted sub-minimum wages and unpaid overtime hours similar to Plaintiff's situation. Id. at *5. The Court noted that at this stage of the litigation, Plaintiff needed only to present a modest showing under 29 U.S.C. § 216 (b), and that Plaintiff thereby met this burden. Defendants contended that Plaintiff's showing did not establish that similarly-situated putative collective action members existed or establish any wrong-doing. Id. at *6. Defendant attached exhibits in support of its argument. The Court, however, found that Defendant's reliance on materials outside Plaintiff's submissions asked the Court to consider facts and make merits determinations that were "improper at this preliminary stage." Id. at *7. Further, the Court held that unlike the authority cited by Defendants, Plaintiff submitted an affidavit in support of his complaint and provided details in support of his allegations, such as names and a conversation with a similarly-situated employee. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Gomez, et al. v. Lace Entertainment,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5770 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 6, 2017). Plaintiff, a waitress, filed a putative class action and collective action alleging that Defendants violated various provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The Court previously granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of the proposed FLSA collective action and 13 individuals opted-in to the action. Thereafter, Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification of the NYLL claims pursuant to Rule 23, which the Court also granted. Plaintiff alleged that Defendants: (i) required waitresses to participate in a tip share that included non-service employees; (ii) took an illegal 15% deduction from credit card gratuities; (iii) failed to compensate for expenses related to maintaining their uniforms; (iv) failed to provide an annual notice or accurate wage statements detailing all tips and/or deductions taken by Defendant; and (v) improperly took a tip credit against the minimum wage of its waitstaff. Id. at *4. The Court found that Plaintiff met the numerosity requirement, because deposition testimony showed that the number of waitresses employed by Defendant during the class period who did not sign arbitration agreements was between 100 and 150. Id. at *14. The Court further opined that Plaintiff's claims and the claims of putative class members arose from alleged common wrongs, including Defendants' failure to comply with the NYLL's minimum wage requirements, tip sharing restrictions, and wage statement and uniform maintenance expense rules. Id. at *15. The Court thus held that the evidence that Plaintiff produced was sufficient to demonstrate that Defendants had (or at relevant times had) common policies concerning these issues, which affected all the proposed class members. Id. at *18. The Court determined that the proposed class was ascertainable as it was comprised of all waitresses employed by Defendant on or after April 29, 2009. Id. at *22. The Court stated that Plaintiff's affidavit indicated that she agreed to act as class representative and that Plaintiff had provided several declarations and testified at an evidentiary hearing in this matter, making her an adequate class representative. Id. at *24. The Court also found that Plaintiff's attorneys had ample experience litigating class actions, including wage & hour class actions, and were qualified to represent the proposed class. As to predominance, the Court held that common questions of liability predominated over individual inquiries. Finally, the Court concluded that class action was the superior method of adjudication of Plaintiff's claims, and thereby granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Griffin, et al. v. Aldi, Inc.,* Case No. 16-CV-354 (N.D.N.Y. Feb. 22, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of store managers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified managers as exempt employees and thereby failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs asserted that they were scheduled to work 50 hours per week and often ended up working 60 to 70 hours per week without overtime pay. Id. at 3. Plaintiffs alleged that they spent 90% of their time "unloading supply trucks, stocking shelves, operating cash registers, cleaning the store, setting up displays, and helping customers." Id. Plaintiffs further alleged that these duties were identical to the duties of hourly employees. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs submitted deposition transcripts and declarations of five opt-in Plaintiffs from other states, as well as the job description of store managers, and documents from two other lawsuits where similar FLSA claims against Defendant were conditionally certified. Id. at 4. Plaintiffs contended that they established that all store managers were classified as exempt, all worked over 40 hours per week, all were denied overtime compensation, and all exercised little, if any, discretion in the performance of their duties as store managers. Id. at 9. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs made the requisite showing to warrant conditional certification under the FLSA. Id. at 11. The Court found that Plaintiffs alleged a common plan of trying to control labor costs to meet productivity figures by having store managers work well above their scheduled 50 hours per week and perform manual labor that otherwise could have been performed by non-exempt employees. Id. at 12. The Court held that the deposition testimony and declarations from store managers working in other states supported Plaintiffs' contentions that they frequently performed routine manual tasks. Id. at 15-16. The Court stated that this evidence was sufficient to support the modest showing required to justify conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court further opined that, although conditional certification of Defendant's store managers in other related actions was not binding precedent on the Court, the findings that store managers were similarly-situated with respect to the identical misclassification claims supported Plaintiffs' motion. Id. at 23. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Gucciardo, et al. v. Titanium Construction Services, Inc.,* Case No. 16-CV-1113 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 30, 2017). Plaintiff, a construction supervisor, brought a putative class and collective action against Defendant alleging a failure to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Id. at 1. The Court had previously granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of his FLSA claims. Plaintiff subsequently filed a motion for class certification of his NYLL claims pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3). The Court granted Plaintiff's motion. Id. Plaintiff and five others testified during depositions that they often worked more than 40 hours per week, and that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation on those occasions. Id. at 3-4. In opposition to Plaintiff's motion for class certification, Defendant submitted deposition testimony from its managing director and superintendent, each of whom testified that employees rarely or never worked overtime. Id. at 4. The Court found that Plaintiff's motion should be granted because he met all the requirements of Rule 23. First, the proposed class included at least 50 individuals, making joinder impractical. Id. at 5. Second, the Court ruled that common questions of law and fact were capable of class-wide resolution because the claims arose from Defendant's alleged overtime compensation policy, including whether at least some employees worked over 40 hours per week and whether Defendants had a policy of paying overtime wages in cash and at the regular rate. Id. at 6-7. Third, the Court also noted that Plaintiff was a typical and adequate class representative. Plaintiff and each of the proposed class members alleged the same type of injury, i.e., loss of overtime wages resulting from a single, common policy. Id. at 8. Further, although Defendant argued that Plaintiff was not an adequate class representative because of past arrests and unexcused absences, the Court opined that this did not touch upon the prosecution of the lawsuit. Id. at 10. The Court also stated that the class was ascertainable, because the class was sufficiently definite such that no subjective criterial was required to determine class membership. Id. at 11-12. As to Rule 23(b)(3), the Court held that Plaintiff met the predominance requirement because Plaintiff alleged and offered evidence that construction workers employed by Defendant were subject to a common, illegal, overtime compensation policy. Id. at 13. The Court concluded that Plaintiff also met the superiority requirement because potential class members were aggrieved by the same policies, the damages suffered were small relative to the expense of individual litigation, and some potential class members were currently employed by Defendant. Id. at 14. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification of his NYLL claims.

Guevara, et al. v. Sirob Imports, Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-2895 (E.D.N.Y. Nov. 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of food packaging employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and state wage & hour laws by failing to pay them for time spent donning and doffing at the beginning and end of the workday, subjected them to rounding of time records, and failed to pay for break time. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action relative to their FLSA claims and for class certification of their state law claims pursuant to Rule 23, which the Court granted in part. At the beginning of their shifts, Plaintiffs were required to remove jewelry, wash their hands, and don a white coat, gloves, and a hairnet without being paid. Id. at 2. At the end of the day, Plaintiffs had to remove their work gear and retrieve their belongings, again without pay. Plaintiffs also contended that Defendant rounded their time punches down to the nearest quarter-hour. Id. at 3. Plaintiffs likewise asserted that Defendant offered 20-minute breaks, but then removed 20-minutes of pay from Plaintiffs' paychecks even if they did not take the breaks. Id. at 3-4. The Court held that Plaintiffs submitted substantial evidence sufficient to demonstrate that Plaintiffs met the requirement for Rule 23 certification and for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216 (b). However, the Court determined that the evidence demonstrated that Plaintiffs' donning and doffing claims were de minimis, and therefore it denied certification as to those claims. Id. at *8. As a result, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motions for conditional certification and class certification for all claims except the donning and doffing claims.

Hotaranu, et al. v. Star Nissan, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 56801 (E.D.N.Y. April 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of car sales representatives, alleged that Defendant violated the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL") by failing to pay minimum wage. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's sales representatives were paid pursuant to a commission agreement, plus a flat rate of $100 per week, regardless of hours worked. Plaintiffs further alleged that, although they worked more than 40 hours per week, often sales representatives earned no commissions during a given pay period, or did not earn enough commissions to satisfy the applicable minimum wage. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of their FLSA claims, and the Court granted the motion. Plaintiffs' proposed collective action consisted of all sales representatives who worked or have worked at Defendant's dealership since July 12, 2013. Id. at *7. The Court stated that the record demonstrated that Plaintiffs satisfied their modest burden of demonstrating that Defendant's sales representatives were subjected to a common policy that allegedly deprived them of minimum wages. Id. at *7-8. Plaintiffs submitted declarations evidencing Defendants' common policy of paying auto sales representatives a flat weekly rate of $100, plus commissions earned, regardless of hours worked, and asserting that, at least during certain pay periods, they did not earn commissions and thus did not receive the applicable minimum wage. Id. at *8. Three of the four declarants also asserted that they recalled certain pay periods when they earned only small commissions that they thought were insufficient to constitute the minimum wage. Id. Additionally, Plaintiffs' declarations included the full names of seven other sales representatives who they asserted "were paid a flat weekly rate" and Plaintiffs further asserted that Defendants never notified them of their entitlement to the applicable minimum wage for all hours worked. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs also submitted pay stubs as evidence that indicated that they were paid less than the applicable minimum wage during the relevant time period. Id. Defendant principally argued that Plaintiffs had not established the existence of a common unlawful policy because "commissions earned in a given period can be applied to the minimum wage for other periods" and there was no evidence that "when accounting for commissions earned in other pay periods, Plaintiffs were paid less than the applicable minimum wage." Id. at *9-10. The Court stated that it could not address Defendant's contention at this stage, as it involved a merits-based determination as to how minimum wages should be calculated, and further required an opportunity for the parties to exchange discovery and for a full record to be developed. Id. at *10. Similarly, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to account for commissions paid directly to them by Nissan Motor Corporation USA pursuant to various sales incentive programs. The Court found that it also could not entertain this factual argument at the conditional certification stage without the benefit of a full record. Id. at *11. Defendant further contended that determining whether the commissions earned by Plaintiffs were sufficient to satisfy Defendant's minimum wage obligation required an "individual inquiry and analysis." Id. at *12. The Court was not persuaded that such an analysis should bar conditional certification in light of the calculations routinely undertaken in wage & hour actions and the remedial nature of the statute. Accordingly, the Court held that conditional certification was appropriate at this stage of the litigation, and granted Plaintiffs' motion pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Hypolite, et al. v. Healthcare Services Of New York,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97897 (S.D.N.Y. June 23, 2017). Plaintiff, a home healthcare aide, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay minimum and overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action consisting of all current and former employees: (i) who are or were formerly employed by Defendant as home health aides at any time since June 24, 2010 to the entry of judgment in this case; and (ii) who were non-exempt employees within the meaning of the FLSA who were not paid minimum wages and/or overtime wages at rates not less than one and one-half times their regular rate of pay for hours worked in excess of 40 hours per workweek. Id. at *3. Plaintiff alleged that home health aides worked 24 hour shifts, but were only compensated for 13 of those hours, that home health aides who worked for more than one client in a shift were not compensated for any travel time, that she had to eat her meals on-the-job, for which she was not compensated, and that she was not properly compensated for sleeping time because she could not sleep for five uninterrupted hours without being awakened by her clients. Id. at *7. Plaintiff contended that her duties included "cleaning the entire house" (including dusting, vacuuming, scrubbing, and mopping), cooking, doing laundry, preparing three meals a day and snacks, making the bed, cleaning pots and pans, loading/unloading the dishwasher, and garbage removal. Id. at *7-8. Plaintiff claimed that she spent at least 30% of her time working in a "maid capacity" by performing such household work. Id. at *8. The Court noted that prior to January 1, 2015, home health aides were excluded from the FLSA's overtime provisions unless the aide could show that the aide's general household work exceeded 20% of the total weekly hours worked. Id. at *9. Further, the Court stated that home health aides employed by third-party employers were exempt from the FLSA. Id. at *9-10. The Court explained that the home health aide exemption has since been narrowed, which brought more home health aides within the scope of the FLSA. The Court found that Defendants did not attempt to comply with the revised regulation on January 1, 2015, and only began to comply by paying health care aides overtime in accordance with the revised regulation on October 13, 2015. Therefore, the Court held that for the period of January 1, 2015 to October 13, 2015, Plaintiff demonstrated that she and others like her were treated in a similar fashion under a common policy, i.e., Defendant's refusal to apply the revised home health aide exemption. Id. at *15. However, the Court stated that for the period before January 1, 2015, Plaintiff failed to demonstrate the factual nexus between herself and the proposed collective action of potential opt-in Plaintiffs. The Court found although Plaintiff asserted that Defendant "employed at least 40 other individuals, like Plaintiff, in positions as home health aides/maids," she provided no basis from which to conclude that any other potential opt-in Plaintiffs were similarly-situated with respect to the home health aide exemption. Id. at *17. Based on the submissions, the Court held that there was no feasible way to determine which potential opt-in Plaintiffs would be subject to the pre-January 1, 2015 exemption. The Court further opined that Plaintiff did not even provide a basis to determine whether she herself spent in excess of 20% of her time performing the type of "heavy cleaning" activities that would make her exempt from the exemption because she failed to distinguish between "heavy cleaning" activities and other types of "household" activities. Id. at *18. The Court noted that Plaintiff's declaration and pleadings were self-focused and offered no basis to assess Defendant's compensation practices only with respect to any other home health aide. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification with respect to home health aides employed by Defendant from January 1, 2015 to October 13, 2015.

In Re Doria/Memon Discount Stores Wage & Hour Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 167658 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 10, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retail workers, filed suit alleging Defendant violated the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL") for failure to pay minimum wage, overtime, and spread-of-hours premium pay, in addition to failure to comply with wage statement and pay rate notifications. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs moved to certify a proposed class pursuant to Rule 23 and the Court granted the motion. As Plaintiffs' motion for certification was brought almost three years after the filing of the complaint, Defendants objected, asserting that Plaintiff's motion was untimely, caused an undue delay of litigation, and was fundamentally unfair to Defendants. Id. at *8. The Court rejected Defendant's argument on the basis that Rule 23 does not set a specific time-frame and Plaintiffs' complaint described its allegations as a class action and mentioned their intention to seek certification under Rule 23. Furthermore, Plaintiffs had already moved for collective certification of their FLSA claims. Accordingly, Defendants were on notice of these case theories and could not claim surprise. Id. at *9. Furthermore, class certification would not prejudice Defendant's case or unduly delay the litigation, as discovery was still on-going. Id. at *10. Defendants did not dispute that Rule 23(a)'s requirements were satisfied and the Court ruled as such. Id. at *12. First, numerosity was satisfied as Plaintiffs identified over one hundred members and at a minimum, over 40 similarly-situated workers. Id. at *13. Commonality and typicality also were met because the allegations of the proposed class arose from the common company-wide policies and practices of Defendant's failure to pay minimum wage, overtime, and spread of hours premium pay. Id. at *14. Further, there was no dispute that the proposed class representatives' claims were typical of the class members. Id. at *15. Adequacy as to the proposed class representatives and class counsel was also satisfied. Id. at *17. The Court ruled that ascertainability was established as Plaintiffs had already assembled a list of prospective class and sub-class members by name, and class membership could be ascertained by objective documentation, such as payroll records and individuals identified by Defendants as non-exempt workers during discovery. Id. at *17, 18. The Court also found that Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance and superiority requirements were satisfied, as the overarching issues at play concerned matters of common policy and practice in Defendant's stores regarding pay, record-keeping, and notification obligations under the NYLL. Id. at *20. The Court noted that wage claims were especially suited to class litigation despite differences in hours worked, wages paid, and wages due, because all putative class members were allegedly harmed by a common practice. Id. The Court determined that class action was the superior method of adjudication given the common questions to all putative class members, the small amount of damages in relation to the expense of litigation for each individual Plaintiff, and because Plaintiffs' FLSA action had already been conditionally certified. Id. at *21. Accordingly, the Court concluded that a simultaneous class action over the NYLL claims would allow for cost-efficient litigation of common disputes. Id.

Lora, et al. v. To-Rise LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 112644 (E.D.N.Y. July 18, 2017). Plaintiffs brought an action against Defendant alleging violations of the FLSA and state law. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant: (i) failed to pay overtime; (ii) failed to pay "spread of hour" wages; (iii) made unlawful deductions from Plaintiffs' wages for traffic violations; and (iv) failed to provide proper wage statements. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action. The Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court grant Plaintiffs' motion on the grounds that Plaintiffs sufficiently alleged that they were victims of an unlawful policy and as Plaintiffs were similarly-situated. Id. at *19. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant instructed its payroll staff to reduce hours of other employees so as to pay them less than what they were owed and to make illegal deductions. Id. at *21. Defendant filed counterclaims against the named Plaintiffs alleging a breach of duty of loyalty and conversion and asserted that the counterclaims created a conflict within the membership of the collective action. Id. at *22. The Magistrate Judge rejected Defendant's argument that counterclaims against the proposed class representatives created an inherent conflict, and thus should not preclude conditional certification at this stage of litigation. Id. at *25. The Magistrate Judge recommended denial of Plaintiffs' request that the statute of limitations be tolled until they send notices, noting that it was not clear whether any potential opt-in Plaintiffs would even be time-barred. Id. at *28. Defendant made several objections to the content of the notice. Defendant asserted that the notice should contain a statement about Defendant's position on the claims and the Magistrate Judge agreed that some statement describing Defendant's position should be included as well as a statement and there has not been an adjudication on the merits. Id. at *35. However, the Magistrate Judge stated that Defendant's proposed language mentioning counterclaims should not be included as it might dissuade potential collective action members. Defendant also objected to the consent form being printed on color paper so as to look like an advertisement. The Magistrate Judge found that there was no issue with the format or color of the notice and consent. However, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the notice disclose the responsibilities of opt-in Plaintiffs if they decided to join the suit, but the language should minimize any dissuasive effects. Id. at *40. The Magistrate Judge agreed with Defendant that the notice also should disclose the fee arrangement of Plaintiffs' counsel. Id. at *41. The Magistrate Judge also agreed that Defendant should be given opportunity to review the Spanish translated version of the notice. Id. at *37. Furthermore, the Magistrate Judge recommended that Plaintiffs be allowed to post the notice in Defendant's place of business and send a reminder notice, so long as it did not to infer that the Court encouraged individuals to join the lawsuit. Id. at *49. The Magistrate Judge further recommended that Defendant be required to comply with Plaintiffs' request for names, mailing addresses, and telephone numbers to assist in notice of opt-in Plaintiffs, but denied the Plaintiffs' request for social security numbers and rates of compensation of potential opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. at *53. In sum, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court grant conditional certification of the collective action and approval of the notice and consent forms as modified. Id. at *58.

Lora, et al. v. To-Rise LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 151164 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action. The Magistrate Judge recommended granting the motion in part. On Rule 72 review, Defendants objected to the Magistrate Judge's report and recommendation, and argued that their counterclaims against Plaintiffs created a conflict of interest, which precluded the named Plaintiffs from securing conditional certification. Id. at *3. The Court found that Defendants had not cited any case law holding that counterclaims against proposed representatives of a FLSA collective action create an inherent conflict between the named Plaintiffs and potential opt-in Plaintiffs, such that conditional certification of a collective action was precluded. Id. at *3-4. The Court held that Defendants merely reiterated their arguments from their original opposition to conditional certification, and they offered no reason why the Magistrate Judge's ruling was clearly erroneous or contrary to law. Id. at *4. The Court further noted that arguments about conflicts of interest would be better raised during the second stage of certification. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Defendants failed to demonstrate that the Magistrate Judge's report and recommendation was clearly erroneous or contrary to law. The Court thereby adopted the Magistrate Judge's findings, and granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification in part.

Lynch, et al. v. City Of New York*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 178855 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of principle administrative associates level 1 ("PPA 1"), filed a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime compensation and overnight premium pay in violation of the FLSA. Previously the Court conditionally certified a collective action. Subsequently, Defendants filed a motion to decertify the collective action, and the Court granted Defendants' motion. Defendants argued that: (i) Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated with respect to their job duties; (i) that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated with respect to the impact of the City's overtime policies; and (iii) that the differences between Plaintiffs lent themselves to individualized defenses. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs argued that the circumstances in which the jobs were performed was similar enough, that individual defenses did not predominate, and that fairness considerations tilted the balance toward certification. Id. However, the Court noted that Plaintiffs failed to address Defendants' argument as to the factual differences between employees and their supervisors with respect to the overtime policies. Id. at *11. The Court found that Defendants offered evidence in support of a number of differences between the opt-in Plaintiffs, including varying levels of responsibility, times that employees were on and off-site, and different supervisors. The Court reasoned that the role of the supervisor would lead to differences between collective action members that would be incapable of collective action treatment. The Court also found that Plaintiffs' depositions further indicated critical differences in what supervisors told employees about overtime, ranging from those who said directly that Plaintiffs would not be paid for overtime due to "budgetary" concerns, those who said "no overtime" unless the employees were working on "special projects," to those whose supervisors regularly approved requests for overtime even after the overtime was worked. Id. at *12. In light of these variations, the Court held that decertification was appropriate. The Court also opined that the City's defenses likely would be highly individualized, as its knowledge of the alleged uncompensated time could vary from Plaintiff to Plaintiff, supervisor to supervisor, and unit to unit. Id. at *13-14. However, while the Court found that the certification of the entire § 216(b) collective action was not appropriate, it stated that nevertheless there may be groups, or sub-classes of Plaintiffs, for whom collective resolution of their claims would be efficient. Id. at *15. The Court therefore invited the parties to confer as to whether such groups existed. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion for decertification.

Masoud, et al. v. 1285 Bakery Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14927 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 26, 2017). Plaintiff, a banquet server, filed a putative class action and collective action alleging that Defendants violated various provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that Defendants failed to pay banquet servers overtime wages in violation of the FLSA, and illegally retained banquet servers' tips, failed to pay banquet servers a spread-of-hours premium, and failed to give banquet servers adequate wage statements and notices in violation of the NYLL. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff moved for class certification of the NYLL claims pursuant to Rule 23 and conditional certification of a collective action for the FLSA overtime claim pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court granted Plaintiff's motion. Plaintiff's proposed class was comprised of all banquet servers employed by Defendant on or after September 18, 2009. Id. at *11. The Court determined that class membership was easily ascertainable as Defendant provided a list of all banquet servers during the relevant time period. The Court stated that the class satisfied the numerosity requirement because the list identified more than 50 individuals. Id. at *12. The Court found that Plaintiff met the commonality and typicality requirements because Plaintiff's claims all arose from Defendants' alleged illegal activities, i.e., failure to comply with overtime pay requirements; failure to distribute the entire service charge, a purported gratuity, to banquet servers; failure to pay Plaintiff a spread-of-hours premium; and failure to give Plaintiff adequate wage statements and notices. Id. at *14. The Court further determined that there was sufficient evidence that Defendant had compensation policies common to all banquet servers, and therefore the policies which allegedly adversely affected Plaintiff equally affected all the banquet servers. Id. The Court opined that Plaintiff's counsel was qualified to represent the proposed class as they had extensive experience litigating class actions. Id. at *16. The Court also found that Plaintiff was prepared to act as a class representative and was familiar with the case's facts, including Defendants' allegedly illegal activities. The Court opined that common issues predominated and that any factual variations in the number of hours worked or the share of the service charge received would be relevant only for the issue of damages if the class prevailed. Thus, the Court found that Plaintiff satisfied the predominance requirement. Id. at *18. The Court also held that the size of the potential class suggested that a single class action was the superior form of adjudication. Id. at *19. As to Plaintiff's FLSA overtime wage claims, the Court found that Plaintiff's satisfaction of the Rule 23 requirements was sufficient to demonstrate that conditional certification of the FLSA collective action was also warranted. Id. at *21. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification of her NYLL claims and conditional certification of her FLSA claims.

McEarchen, et al. v. Urban Outfitters, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 33335 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 7, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of department managers ("DMs"), brought an action alleging that Defendant violated federal and state wage laws by misclassifying them and other DMs as managerial employees exempt from the laws' requirement to pay premium wages for overtime hours. The Court had previously conditionally certified a collective action under the FLSA. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs subsequently sought final certification of a collective action of "all persons who are or were formerly employed by [Urban] in the United States at any time since June 24, 2010 . . . as DMs and individuals holding comparable salaried positions." Id. at *3-4. At the same time, Defendant moved to decertify the collective action. The Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court deny Plaintiffs' motion and grant Defendant's motion. Id. at *4. DMs performed some non-exempt, non-managerial work. Defendant acknowledged that DMs performed at least some such work, and all Plaintiffs who gave depositions testified that they performed the same type of work as hourly employees. Defendant, however, contended that Plaintiffs and the opt-in Plaintiffs had widely varying duties arising from the differences in location and the structure of the stores in which they worked, and therefore could not be similarly-situated. Defendant asserted that named Plaintiffs spent much less time on managerial work than the opt-in Plaintiffs, that DMs performed vastly different types of work, and that several variables THAT produced differing work experiences for different DMs with respect to the supervision of and delegation of tasks to staff; training employees; interviewing and hiring employees; issuing discipline; creating schedules; making business decisions; and overall managerial authority. Id. at *14-15. Plaintiffs responded that any differences in employment settings were immaterial, because all of them had limited managerial authority and "performed predominantly non-exempt manual labor and customer service-related tasks" subject to Urban's uniform corporate policies. Id. at *5. The Magistrate Judge determined that the record showed that Plaintiffs and the opt-in Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated sufficient to grant final certification. For example, Plaintiffs uniformly testified that they played little to no role in the hiring and firing process of hourly employees, and that their opinions were given very little weight. Id. at *17. In contrast, several opt-in Plaintiffs described being active participants in the hiring and firing process. Id. Further, Plaintiffs were denied any meaningful involvement in training, but the opt-in Plaintiffs generally acknowledged some role in training. Id. at *20. There was also little uniformity among DMs with respect to their scheduling authority. Id. at *21. The Magistrate Judge stated that several Plaintiffs and opt-in Plaintiffs also testified to a range of disciplinary authority. Id. at *23. The Magistrate Judge found that all these factors favored decertification of the collective action. Additionally, the Magistrate Judge opined that the Plaintiffs' divergent duties and responsibilities made it unduly difficult for Defendant to rely on representative proof to counter Plaintiffs' claims. Id. at *28. The Magistrate Judge held that the pertinent differences among the various Plaintiffs as to their duties and authority would inefficiently require mini-trials for over a hundred claimants. Id. at *29-30. Such inefficiency weighed heavily in favor of decertification. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court deny Plaintiffs' motion for final certification of a collective action and grant Defendant's motion for decertification.

McEarchen, et al. v. Urban Outfitters, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144203 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 6, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of department managers ("DMs"), brought an action alleging that Defendant violated federal and state wage laws by misclassifying them and other DMs as managerial employees exempt from the laws' requirement to pay premium wages for overtime hours. The Court had previously conditionally certified a collective action under the FLSA. After discovery, Defendant sought to decertify the collective action, and the Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court grant Defendant's motion. Id. at *4. On Rule 72 review, the Court agreed that the collective action should be decertified, and adopted the Magistrate Judge's report and recommendation. The Court found that the record reflected significant variations among the named and opt-in Plaintiffs, as to both the amount of exempt work they performed and the level of managerial authority they exercised. Id. at *7. The Court determined that the variations made it unduly difficult for Defendant to counter the claims against it using "representative" proof. Id. Finally, the Court held that the differences in various Plaintiffs' duties and levels of authority would require inefficient mini-trials for over a hundred claimants, such that a collective action would not enhance fairness or procedural economy. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court adopted the Magistrate Judge's report and recommendation decertifying the collective action.

Miranda, et al. v. General Auto Body Works, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 172563 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 18, 2017). Plaintiff, an auto body worker, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants misclassified him and others similarly-situated and thereby failed to pay all wages in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. In support of the motion, Plaintiff submitted a declaration in which he alleged that during his five years of employment as an auto body worker and mechanic, Defendants regularly failed to pay him for overtime hours. Id. at *3. Plaintiff further claimed that Defendants did not accurately track employees' work hours, and intentionally omitted overtime hours from his paystub. Id. Plaintiff also identified two other auto body workers and mechanics, who claimed that Defendants failed to pay them overtime compensation for hours worked over 40 hours. Id. at *3-4. Defendants argued that Plaintiff's declaration and complaint did not meet the minimal evidentiary burden required for conditional certification. Id. at *4. The Court disagreed and stated that while it was true that mere allegations are not enough to justify conditional certification, there were numerous case law authorities granting conditional certification based on pleadings and a single affidavit by a Plaintiff. Id. The Court found that Plaintiff's affidavit – based on personal observation and conversations with a small collective of co-workers who share the same duties and responsibilities – was enough to show a "factual nexus" supporting a "common discriminatory scheme." Id. Furthermore, the Court noted that Defendants themselves suggested evidence of inadequate overtime and notice policies by requesting all members of the potential collective action to sign release waivers of all NYLL claims in exchange for a $400 "settlement." Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiff sufficiently demonstrated the possibility of a similarly-situated group of employees, and granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Murray, et al. v. City Of New York,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 130594 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees of the Department of Homeless Services ("DHS"), filed an action asserting that Defendant violated various overtime provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court denied. In support of their certification motion, Plaintiffs submitted seven declarations from declarants with various job titles assigned to different facilities. The Court opined that the seven declarations used overbroad, virtually identical language to describe why declarants believed that similarly-situated employees have been denied the protections of the FLSA. One declarant, Monique Murray, stated that she had the job title of community coordinator, and that she had been assigned to work in two different DHS facilities since she began her employment in 2013. Murray stated that she had a formal work schedule of 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., including one hour of unpaid meal time, and that outside of her formal schedule, she "often performed work activities" before and after her shift, and over her unpaid meal break. Id. at *19. Murray averred that she performed these tasks after logging-in to Defendant's time-recording system, but before and after her paid shifts.

The Court found that although Murray described her own work responsibilities and compensation, the descriptions of similarly-situated employees were overbroad and conclusory in nature. Id. The Court noted that Murray's declaration repeatedly invoked "knowledge and experience" or "experience and observations" regarding other employees, with no factual elaboration. Id. at *20. The Court held that the invocations of "knowledge and experience" and "experience and observations" failed to make a minimal showing that similarly-situated employees were subject to a common policy or practice. Id. The Court further noted that the other six declarations also broadly referenced knowledge, observations, and experience to assert that "all" employees with their same job titles were required to work through meal periods and perform uncompensated pre-shift and post-shift tasks. Id. at *21-22. The Court therefore found that because Plaintiffs had not come forward with facts showing that similarly-situated DHS employees were subject to a common policy in violation of the FLSA, Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification should be denied.

Perez, et al. v. La Abundancia Bakery & Restaurants, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123550 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former restaurant employees, filed an action asserting that Defendant violated the overtime and minimum wage provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant had a policy and pattern of failing to pay the minimum wage for all hours worked up to 40 hours per workweek and failing to pay an overtime premium of one and one-half the employees' hourly rate for all hours worked beyond 40 hours per workweek. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendant did not have a system in place to track employees' hours and failed to provide Plaintiffs with accurate wage statements. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of their FLSA claims, which the Court granted in part. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to identify any employees who were similarly-situated to them since many of the employees whom Plaintiffs sought to represent worked at different locations and held positions different from those held by Plaintiffs. Id. at *13. Defendant noted that the three named Plaintiffs were two dishwashers and a waitress/counter attendant, who worked at only two of Defendant's restaurants. Defendants further attacked Plaintiffs' submitted affidavits of individuals who had already settled their claims with Defendant, and were therefore ineligible to join the collective action. Id. The Court found that the pleadings and affidavits submitted by Plaintiffs satisfied the requisite modest factual showing that there are other similarly-situated employees. Id. at *13-14. The Court noted that Plaintiffs submitted sufficient evidence that Defendant's waiters, dishwashers, bussers, prep cooks, and kitchen workers at certain locations were subject to the same policy and practice of being denied overtime pay. Plaintiffs submitted affidavits from two waitresses, two dishwashers/cooks, and one busser – in addition to the allegations contained in the complaint pertaining to an additional dishwasher/cook and one waitress – all stating that they were subject to the same policies and procedures regarding their work schedule, the failure of Defendant to record their hours, Defendant's failure to provide them with wage notices, and Defendant's failure to pay overtime. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiff had made a sufficient showing with respect to restaurant locations in New York City, but not any location outside of New York. Id. at *16. The Court further determined that Plaintiffs failed to establish that there were similarly-situated workers who were denied minimum wages. Id. at *21. The Court stated that only one Plaintiff alleged that she was denied the required hourly minimum wage. The Court held that absent any evidence of a common scheme to deprive Plaintiffs of the minimum wage, the Court denied Plaintiffs' request to include such a claim in its notice to potential collective action members. Id. at *22. As to Plaintiffs' requested time scope, the Court noted that since the complaint alleged willful conduct by Defendant, the Court agreed that the three-year statute of limitations for FLSA claims should apply. Id. at *23. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification in part.

Rojas, et al. v. Kalesmeno Corp*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 112491 (S.D.N.Y. July 19, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant employees, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendants violated the minimum and overtime provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of their FLSA claims, and the Court granted the motion in part. Plaintiffs alleged that throughout their employment they were paid fixed, cash salaries below the minimum wage. Plaintiffs further asserted that their salaries did not account for overtime, although Plaintiffs worked over 40 hours per week. Furthermore, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants took an improper tip credit, as Plaintiffs received neither proper notice that Defendants were taking a tip credit, nor statements informing them of the amount of this credit. In addition to the restaurant at which Plaintiffs worked, The Flame Diner, Plaintiffs sued several individual Defendants and three other restaurant locations. Plaintiffs sought to conditionally certify a collective action consisting of "all non-exempt employees, including servers, bussers, delivery persons, porters, food preparers, dishwashers, cooks and cashiers, employed by Defendants at each of their restaurants within the last six years." Id. at *5. Defendants opposed the motion on the grounds that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that the prospective collective action members were similarly-situated to the named Plaintiffs. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs submitted their own declarations asserting that they were not paid overtime premiums, nor provided wage & hour notices, notices of a tip credit, or wage statements. Further, Plaintiffs each stated that they had learned that other employees were subject to these policies through personal observation and conversations with those employees and provided a list of 12 fellow employees to whom they spoke regarding pay polices. Id. at *8. The Court found that at this stage of the litigation, Plaintiffs' declarations were sufficient to establish that similarly-situated individuals existed at the restaurant at which Plaintiffs worked. Id. at *9. However, the Court opined that Plaintiffs did not claim to know the payroll systems and policies at Defendants' other restaurants. The Court determined that Plaintiffs' mere belief that the policies were the same at the other restaurants was insufficient to justify collective action certification. Id. at *13. The Court held that Plaintiffs' declarations provided no additional information tending to demonstrate a common policy across all locations. Accordingly, the Court granted conditional certification of the FLSA claims, but limited the scope to only Defendants' restaurant location at which Plaintiffs worked.

Roseman, et al. v. Bloomberg L.P.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 156413 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of analytics representatives, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the New York Labor Law ("NYLL") and the California Labor Code ("CLC"). The Court had previously issued an order granting Plaintiffs' motion to certify a class pursuant to Rule 23 in connection with the NYLL claims. Plaintiffs subsequently moved to certify a class of all California-based representatives in the analytics department in California who were not paid time and one-half for hours over 40 worked in one or more weeks or hours over 8 hours in one or more days at any time within the four years preceding the filing of the complaint. Id. at *2. The Court granted the motion. The Court stated that it was undisputed that over 100 current and former employees were putative class members. Defendant argued that the administrative exemption applied to California-based analytics representatives. The Court noted that unlike the NYLL, the CLC exemptions do not precisely mirror the criteria set forth in the FLSA. Id. at *3. While the CLC sets out its own definition of the exemption, it also requires the exemption to be construed in accordance with the relevant FLSA regulations. Id. The Court found that despite the differences between the NYLL and the CLC, the same analysis that justified certifying the New York class compelled certification of a California class. Id. at *4. As the Court described in its previous opinion, Plaintiffs had shown that the issues pertinent to Defendant's affirmative defense would be resolved through common proof at trial, and those issues far outweighed any individualized determinations that must be made. Id. The Court found that Defendant made no arguments unique to California law, and the Labor Code does not require anything beyond the analysis in the Court's previous order granting certification of the New York class in order to certify the California class. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Ruiz, et al. v. Citibank, N.A.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 6399 (2d Cir. April 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of personal bankers, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to compensate them for overtime hours worked in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs moved for class certification of their state law claims under Rule 23. The District Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. The District Court found that the state law classes lacked questions of law or fact common to the class under Rule 23(a)(2). The District Court observed that the record showed that Defendant's formal, company-wide policies were entirely legal and appropriate, and that there was no evidence of a common plan or scheme to subvert those policies. The District Court found that the evidence was insufficient to demonstrate either common direction or a common mode of exercising discretion. Therefore, it ruled that the commonality requirement was not satisfied. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The Second Circuit stated that the District Court's opinion was well-reasoned and comprehensive. The Second Circuit found that the District Court clearly explained at length why the evidence presented by Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate sufficient uniformity in the Defendant's exercise of managerial discretion. Id. at *2. The Second Circuit concluded that this failure was fatal to the Plaintiffs' ability to carry their burden with respect to commonality under Rule 23(a)(2), and that class certification was therefore not appropriate. The Second Circuit also found that District Court had correctly concluded that even if the commonality requirement had been satisfied, the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3) was not met. Id. The Second Circuit also stated that the District Court provided lucid and accurate analysis and carefully explained why Plaintiffs' position rested on a misapprehension of the burden that the law imposes on them at the class certification stage. Id. at *3. The Second Circuit held that the District Court had explained that under Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 564 U.S. 338 (2011), the "rigorous analysis" required at the class certification stage "will [frequently] entail some overlap with the merits of the plaintiff's underlying claim." Id. The District Court also correctly analyzed the Rule 23 issues by recognizing that the burden borne by a party seeking class certification "is not lessened by overlap between a Rule 23 requirement and a merits issue, even a merits issue that is identical with a Rule 23 requirement." Id. The Second Circuit therefore agreed with the District Court's ruling and found there was no abuse of discretion. The Second Circuit accordingly affirmed the District Court's ruling denying class certification of Plaintiffs' state law claims.

Samaniego, et al. v. Titanium Construction Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109727 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL") by failing to maintain proper time-keeping records. The Court had previously conditionally certified Plaintiff's FLSA collective action claims. Plaintiffs subsequently sought certification of their NYLL claims pursuant to Rule 23. Defendant also filed a motion to decertify Plaintiffs' collective action. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion and denied Defendant's motion. The parties did not dispute that the proposed class included at least 50 individuals; therefore, the Court found the numerosity requirement was satisfied. Id. at *8. The Court also determined that common issues of fact and law that were capable of a class-wide resolution existed, including; (i) whether at least some employees worked over 40 hours per week; (ii) whether Defendant had a policy of paying overtime wages in cash and at the "regular" hourly rate without the required premium for hours worked over 40 per week; and (iii) whether Anthony O'Donnell, the individual Defendant, was personally liable for failure to pay overtime compensation. Id. at *9. The Court stated that the named Plaintiffs' claims were typical and that they were adequate class representatives. First, the named Plaintiffs and each proposed class member alleged the same type of injury, i.e., lost overtime wages resulting from a single, common policy. Id. at *11. The Court noted that the record included the deposition testimony of five employees, in addition to the named Plaintiffs, each of whom testified that, when he worked more than 40 hours per week, he was paid his regular wages in cash. Id. Plaintiffs also submitted declarations of three employees, each stating that they were paid at his regular hourly rate regardless of how many hours they worked, and that they received cash payments for hours worked over 40 per week. Id. The Court found that this evidence was sufficient to satisfy the typicality requirement. The Court also held that the class was ascertainable, because it included all individuals that Defendant employed as construction workers at New York City job-sites since February 2010, and was sufficiently definite. Id. at *14. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs had shown that, as Rule 23 requires, common questions of law or fact predominated over any questions affecting only individual members. Id. at *17-18. Plaintiffs alleged, and offered evidence, that construction workers employed by Defendant were subject to a common, illegal overtime compensation policy. As to superiority, the Court stated that case law authorities in the Second Circuit regularly find that superiority is satisfied where, as here, "potential class members are aggrieved by the same policies, the damages suffered are small relative to the expense and burden of individual litigation, and some potential class members are currently employed by the defendants." Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. The Court also denied as moot Defendant's motion to decertify the collective action because Plaintiffs withdrew the consent to join forms of all opt-in Plaintiffs.

Sanchez, et al. v. New York Kimchi Catering Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 100357 (S.D.N.Y. June 28, 2017). Plaintiff, a food server, brought a class and collective action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification of their NYLL claims pursuant to Rule 23, which the Court granted in part. Plaintiff sought certification "on behalf of all non-exempt employees employed by Defendant at New York Kimchi located at 16 West 48th Street, New York, NY, 10036 on or after the date that is six years before the filing of the initial complaint." Id. at *5. Plaintiff also sought to certify a sub-class of tipped employees "including but not limited to waiters, bussers and delivery persons " related to the alleged minimum wage violations. Id. at *6. As to the overtime claim and spread of hours claim, Plaintiff's proposed class definition of all non-exempt employees dating back to 2010 was denied without prejudice to renewal. For both claims, the Court found that Plaintiff's proposed classes failed because of lack of commonality or typicality. Id. at *7. For the overtime claim regarding Defendants' alleged policy of paying the regular hourly rate for all hours worked, the Court noted that the only evidence Plaintiff adduced was his own declaration, and three pages of timesheets of two individuals who were delivery persons. Id. The Court found that these submissions were insufficient to show by a preponderance of the evidence either an explicit or de facto restaurant-wide policy of paying regular hourly rate instead of overtime rate. Although commonality and typicality could be established based on employee declarations, the Court opined that Plaintiff's sole declaration was of minimal value. The Court explained that Plaintiff, who worked in a single position, broadly stated that all other non-managerial employees were paid regular hourly rates rather than an overtime rate; however, he did not testify regarding who or what he personally observed nor did he identify to whom he spoke or when he spoke to them. Id. at *8. The Court concluded that these conclusory statements could not sustain Plaintiff's assertion of a restaurant-wide policy dating back to 2010. Id. at *9. As to the timesheets Plaintiff submitted, the Court found that they did not reflect that workers were consistently paid at the regular hourly rate rather than the overtime rate. To the contrary, the Court determined that the timesheets showed that, at least for some weeks, individuals were at times paid at an overtime rate. Id. at *9-10. The Court also noted that Plaintiff's evidence was temporally limited as he sought a class dating back to 2010, but his affidavit and timesheets concerned only part of 2014 and roughly two months in 2015. Id. at *10. Further, the Court noted that Defendant testified that it paid employees an overtime rate rather than a regular rate for hours worked in excess of 40 hours. Id. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiff failed to show by a preponderance of the evidence commonality and typicality for the overtime claim on behalf of a class of all non-exempt employees dating back to 2010. Id. Similarly, as to the spread of hours premium, the Court determined that Plaintiff's only evidence was a conclusory statement in his affidavit and a single week in a "punch clock record" for which Plaintiff argued the corresponding timesheet revealed no spread of hour premiums were paid*. Id.* The Court stated that the punch clock record and timesheet were of limited value because Plaintiff offered no deposition testimony or other evidence explaining what the punch clock record reflected. Id. at *11. Therefore, the Court ruled that, as to his spread of hours claim, Plaintiff failed to carry his burden to show commonality and typicality for a proposed class of all non-exempt employees who worked for Defendants from 2010 to the filing of the complaint. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Santiago, et al. v. The Tequila Gastropub, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52058 (S.D.N.Y. April 5, 2017). Plaintiff, a former employee of Defendants' restaurant called Daisy, brought a collective and class action alleging the Defendants violated the overtime and minimum wage requirements of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiff moved to certify a collective action of all non-exempt employees employed by Defendants during the six years prior to the filing of the complaint. Id. at *2. The Court granted in part Plaintiff's motion. The Court stated that at this stage of the litigation, Plaintiff only had to make the modest factual showing that he and potential opt-in Plaintiffs together were victims of a common policy or plan that violated the law. Id. The Court found that many, if not most, of Defendants' arguments for denying certification went to the merits of the case and thus did not present a basis to deny certification. Id. *2-3. However, the Court held that Plaintiff fell short of satisfying his burden to certify a collective action that included employees of Defendants' two restaurants locations called Agave and Mojave. Id. at *3. The Court explained that Plaintiff never worked at Mojave, and only asserted that "[d]uring his employment" at Daisy, he was "also required to work" at Agave, without providing any information concerning the timing, duration, terms, or conditions of such work. Id. Further all employees Plaintiff identified as potential collective action members all worked at Daisy; only one was identified as having also worked at Mojave and only one was identified as having also worked at Agave, and there was no information concerning the timing, duration, terms, or conditions of that work either. Id. The Court therefore determined that Plaintiff's allegations were too general and conclusory to support a finding that the employees of Agave and Mojave were similarly-situated to the employees at Daisy. Id. at *4. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification with respect to employees at Daisy only, and denied it with respect to employees at Agave and Mojave.

Schucker v. Flowers Foods, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 136178 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 24, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of delivery distributors, brought a class and collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, and the Court denied the motion. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs' motion should be denied as duplicative and unnecessary because conditional certification and notice already had been granted and issued in pending cases raising the same claims in Neff v. Flowers Foods, Inc., Case No. 15-CV-254, and Carr v. Flowers Foods, Inc., Case No. 15-CV-6391. Furthermore, Defendant stated that 94 of the 95 distributors in Plaintiffs' proposed FLSA collective action already received notice and an opportunity to join in either the Neff litigation or the Carr litigation, and 19 distributors received notice in both actions. Id. at *16. Defendant contended that where the same group of individuals received at least one chance to join a collective action, conditionally certifying a second (or third) collective action and issuing notice again would serve no purpose and waste the resources of the Court and the parties. The Court agreed and ruled that of the 95 individuals on Plaintiffs' proposed notice list, only one had not previously received notice through Neff or Carr. The Court found that there was no dispute that Plaintiffs raised the same claims as other distributors in New York and across the country, and thus there was no concern that certification was needed here to vindicate the rights of any distributor. Id. at *18. The Court therefore found no purpose would be served by allowing the FLSA claims to proceed as a collective action considering the concurrent cases and the attendant increased expense for Defendant, the risk of confusing potential collective members about their legal options, the possibility of inconsistent rulings, and the waste of judicial resources. Id. In addition, the Court noted that distributors who have not yet opted-in to a collective action would not be prejudiced as those individuals could bring their own individual actions or they could choose to do nothing and they would not be bound by any judgment. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Strauch, et al. v. Computer Sciences Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102560 (D. Conn. June 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of systems administrators, filed an action alleging that they were misclassified as exempt employees resulting in overtime violations under the FLSA and the state laws of California, Connecticut, and North Carolina. Id. at *3. The Court had previously conditionally certified the FLSA collective action and Plaintiffs moved to certify the three state law classes under Rule 23. Id. at *4. The Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Id. Plaintiffs' proposed class for each state encompassed two sub-classes consisting of: (i) associate professional systems administrators; and (ii) senior professional systems administrators. Id. at *63. The Court ruled that the North Carolina class was preempted by the FLSA and denied the motion to certify either of the proposed sub-classes. Id. at *65. As to the Connecticut and California sub-classes, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs lacked standing as the class definitions included employees who did not work more than 40 hours per workweek, and therefore, suffered no injury. Id. at *67. Plaintiffs responded that this was not an issue of standing, but rather an issue of damages, and class certification should not be denied on the basis of damages. Id. The Court agreed and redefined the classes to include only those who worked more than 40 hours per week. As to commonality, the Court ruled that the evidence regarding the actual job duties of individual senior professional administrators undermined Plaintiffs' claims of commonality because the evidence suggested that some performed tasks that were largely non-exempt, while others performed enough exempt tasks to treat them as exempt, and there was also a wide array of tasks performed. Id. at *82. Accordingly, the Court ruled that the proposed sub-class of senior professional systems assistants lacked commonality and it declined certification as to those California and Connecticut sub-classes. Id. The Court certified the proposed sub-classes of associate professional system administrators, and ruled that they satisfied the requirements of predominance and superiority. Id. at *83. In sum, the Court denied the motion to certify the North Carolina classes and the proposed California and Connecticut senior professional system administrators' sub-classes. Id. at *89. The Court certified the California and Connecticut sub-classes comprised of associate professional systems administrators who worked more than forty hours per week. Id.

Strauch, et al. v. Computer Sciences Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 172655 (D. Conn. Oct. 18, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of associate professional and professional system administrators, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs had previously filed a motion for class certification, which the Court granted in part. Defendant subsequently moved to decertify the class on the basis that the named Plaintiff was not an adequate class representative of the class he wished to represent. The Court denied the motion. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs were not an adequate class representative for California-based employees pursuing meal and rest break claims, because they worked from home and did not allege that Defendant denied them a meal or rest break. Id. at *7. Second, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs worked mostly as senior professional systems administrators. Defendant noted that the Court previously had held that the senior professional sub-class lacked sufficient commonality and thus could not be certified because of the wide array of tasks performed, and Defendant argued that if Plaintiffs could not establish commonality between Plaintiffs and their senior professional peers, it followed that they could not do so between Plaintiffs and the professional and associate professional SAs they purported to represent. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs stated that they no longer intended to pursue class-wide meal and rest break claims for the certified California sub-class. Plaintiffs further argued that Plaintiffs' job title had no bearing on their ability to serve as class representatives for professional and associate professional SAs because they worked in the position in California during the class period, had no conflicts with the class, and were therefore adequate class representatives. Id. In the alternative, Plaintiffs requested that if the Court accepted Defendant's arguments as to Plaintiffs, that Plaintiffs be permitted to substitute a new sub-class representative. Id. at *9. The Court stated that to conform Plaintiffs' briefing to their representation that they no longer intended to pursue class-wide meal and rest break claims for the certified California sub-class, it directed Plaintiffs to file an amended complaint in conformity with this position. Id. at *10. As to Plaintiffs' job duties and titles, the Court stated that the gravamen of Defendant's legal argument was that a putative class representatives could not be adequate where, despite being a member of the class with no apparent conflicts of interest, their typicality was established by individualized evidence in addition to common evidence. Id. at *11-12. The Court found that Defendant cited no binding or persuasive legal authority that stood for this proposition, and the position itself was unsupported in the text of Rule 23. The Court opined that under Rule 23, "it is settled that the mere existence of individualized factual questions with respect to the class representative's claim will not bar class certification." Id. at *16-17. Further, in the Court's order granting class certification and based on Plaintiffs' deposition testimony, it held that Plaintiffs' actual job duties largely fit the job functions inferable from the professional SA job description. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to decertify. Id. at *18.

Strauch, et al. v. Computer Sciences Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 197290 (D. Conn. Nov. 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of systems administrators, filed a class action alleging that they were misclassified as exempt employees resulting in overtime violations under the FLSA and the laws of California, Connecticut, and North Carolina. Id. at *3. The Court had previously conditionally certified the FLSA collective action and granted certification of Connecticut and California Rule 23 sub-classes of professional and associate professional system administrators ("SAs"). Id. at *2. Defendant then sought to appeal the District Court's order pursuant to Rule 23(f). The Court of Appeal, however, found that an appeal was unwarranted, and denied Defendant's request. Id. at *4. During the pendency of the petition for interlocutory review, Defendant moved to decertify the California class of associate professional and professional system administrators due to the purported inadequacy of Plaintiff Strauch as a class representative. Id. at *5. The Court denied the motion. Defendant subsequently filed another motion, arguing that both the California and Connecticut classes both should be decertified due to a legally deficient trial plan submitted by Plaintiffs. Defendant claimed that Plaintiffs' trial plan was inadequate because it called for an insufficient and arbitrarily-selected sample size of testifying witnesses, failed to account for variances among class members, failed to account for SAs in the certified classes who performed exempt job duties, and risked violating the parties' due process and Seventh Amendment rights. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs argued that: (i) Defendant was attempting to relitigate the class certification order by making the same arguments, as it did not raise previously pertinent case law or evidence; (ii) Plaintiffs intended to make their case primarily based on direct, common evidence such that they did not need to present a statistical sample of class members' live testimony; and (iii) Plaintiffs' trial plan posed no due process risks for either party. Id. at *6-7. The Court stated that in granting class certification, it considered and addressed Defendant's contentions that Plaintiffs' purported lack of a viable trial plan made class certification inappropriate. As the Court noted in its findings on superiority under Rule 23(b)(3), Defendant "devoted one paragraph to arguing that a class action was not superior" because, among other reasons, "Plaintiffs lacked a trial plan." Id. at *7. The Court rejected this argument again, noting that Plaintiffs had submitted a trial plan, and found that notwithstanding Defendant's objections, "the class action was a superior method of adjudicating the merits of the sub-class of Associate Professional and Professional SAs," given the common questions and common evidence, as well as the interests in uniformity of decision and cost-efficiency. Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs' initial trial plan set forth the common evidence that Plaintiffs propose to use for each of the common issues, while Plaintiffs' pre-trial memorandum and its exhibits set forth the specific witnesses Plaintiffs intend to call and exhibits upon which Plaintiffs intend to rely. Plaintiffs further refined this trial plan by offering their amended witness and exhibits lists, as well as their pre-trial disclosures. Id. at *8. The Court noted that the evidence on hours worked and damages had been stipulated by the parties, based on Defendant's time-keeping records, so the primary legal issue that would be decided by the jury at trial was whether class members were properly classified as exempt. Id. at *10. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs' trial plan relied primarily on common evidence to prove their case and only secondarily on class members' testimony and the Court's resolution of the majority of pre-trial motions filed up to this point. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's second motion to decertify.

Surdu, et al. v. Madison Global LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 142175 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective and class action alleging that Defendants failed to pay minimum wage, misappropriated gratuities, and failed to provide wage statements in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The parties settled the matter and then filed a motion for class certification for purposes of the settlement. The Court granted the motion. Plaintiffs requested that the Court conditionally certify a class consisting of individuals who worked as servers, runners, bussers and bartenders and who received tips at Defendant from August 19, 2009 through the date of the Court's order on the motion. Id. at *8. The Court found that Plaintiff identified 82 members of the putative class, thereby meeting the numerosity requirement. Id. at *9. The Court held that Plaintiffs identified several questions common to the putative class, including whether Defendants paid minimum wages and whether Defendants misappropriated tips. The Court determined that Plaintiffs' evidence was sufficient to satisfy the commonality requirement. Further, the Court stated that Plaintiffs satisfied the typicality requirement of Rule 23(a) because their claims arose from the same factual and legal circumstances that form the bases of the putative class members' claims. Id. at *12. Specifically, the Court noted that Plaintiffs and members of the putative class worked as tipped employees for Defendants and claimed that they were subjected to the same minimum wage and tipping practices. Id. at *12-13. For the adequacy requirement, the Court observed that Plaintiffs' counsel cited five recent multi-Plaintiff cases for which he has served as the attorney of record. Id. at *14. Additionally, the Court opined that there was no evidence that named Plaintiffs had any conflicts with any of the class members. Id. The Court also found the class was ascertainable because both Plaintiffs and Defendants produced extensive documentation, including pay stubs and schedules, from which class members could be identified. Id. at *15. As to Rule 23(b), the Court concluded that Defendants' alleged failure to pay minimum wages and misappropriation of Plaintiffs' tips were the central issues in the litigation and related to the general practices of Defendants with respect to their tipped employees, and therefore met the predominance requirement. Id. at *16. The Court also stated that Plaintiffs met the superiority requirement because litigation by way of a class action was more economically feasible due to the putative class members' limited financial resources. Id. at *17. Further, the Court noted that class adjudication, as opposed to multiple individual actions, would conserve judicial resources and avoid the waste and delay of repetitive proceedings on the same issues. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23 for settlement purposes.

Viriri, et al. v. White Plaines Hospital Medical Center,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88226 (S.D.N.Y. June 6, 2017). Plaintiff, a registered nurse, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of the FLSA claims, and the Court granted the motion. Plaintiff and other nurses were compensated on an hourly basis and typically worked three 12-hour shifts each week, with one week each month, including four 12-hour shifts. Plaintiff alleged that although the nurses were paid on an hourly basis pursuant to the pre-determined work schedule, they were required to arrive at least 15 minutes before their scheduled start time, and were regularly required to work one to two hours after their shift ended. Id. at *3. Plaintiff alleged that although nurses worked additional hours beyond the hours set forth in the schedule, they were not compensated for that time. Moreover, although nurses regularly worked more than 40 hours per week, Defendant did not pay nurses one-and-a-half times their regular rate of pay for that overtime. Id. Defendant argued that conditional certification was inappropriate because Plaintiff relied solely on conclusory allegations, based on his "observations" and "understandings," which was an approach that had been rejected in the Second Circuit. Id. at *8. In support his motion, Plaintiff submitted a declaration stating that "based on conversations with other registered nurses in the medical surgical unit as well as personal observations," he and the other nurses were not compensated for all hours worked and were not paid overtime. Id. at *9. Plaintiff also identified two other nurses, and stated that they had the same experiences as Plaintiff. The Court stated that it was not persuaded that Plaintiff's allegations were so bare and conclusory as to fail to meet the modest burden for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216 (b). Id. The Court held that while Plaintiff submitted only his own declarations, Plaintiff did not allege simply that he was under-paid for the work he performed, but that he alleged the specific manner and operation by which such under-payment was effected. Id. at *11. The Court agreed with Defendant that Plaintiff could have supplemented his declaration with more details about the alleged policy, but that the failure to provide that detail was not sufficient to defeat conditional certification. Id. at *12-13. Defendant further argued that Plaintiff failed to set forth a policy or practice of Defendant that violated the FLSA. Id. at *13. The Court stated that at this stage, Plaintiff need only provide some evidence that he and others

"together were victims of a common policy or plan that violated the law." Id. The Court noted that the allegations in the complaint and Plaintiff's declarations established that Plaintiff and potential opt-in Plaintiffs, despite working additional time before and after their scheduled shifts, were compensated solely on the hours set forth in the pre-determined schedule. Id. at *14. The Court found that therefore Plaintiff alleged a policy of Defendant of not compensating employees for actual time worked, but only for time reflected in the pre-determined schedules, which was sufficient to meet Plaintiff's burden to show that he and others were victims of a common policy or plan in violation of the FLSA. Id. Defendant additionally argued that Plaintiff failed to established that he was similarly-situated to the other registered nurses. The Court disagreed and found that regardless of what the other nurses' rates-of-pay were, they were entitled to full payment for hours worked and for overtime payment for hours worked in excess of 40 hours per week. Id. at *15-16. The Court further noted that Plaintiff had not sought to include any members in the proposed collective action except the nurses working in the medical surgical unit, and thus the titles or job descriptions of the potential opt-in Plaintiffs were irrelevant to finding that they were similarly-situated. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Williams, et al. v. The Bethel Springvale Nursing Home*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 147523 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of nurses, brought a collective action asserting that Defendant failed to pay overtime or break time compensation in violation of the FLSA. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that they regularly worked through their breaks due to their heavy workloads and were told by their superiors to work in excess of their scheduled 37.5 hour workweek without overtime pay. Id. at *2. The Court had previously granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification. Defendant subsequently moved to decertify the collective action. The Court denied Defendant's motion. Plaintiffs contended they were often asked to "clock-out" but to continue their work until it was completed. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs also provided numerous examples of instances where the records showed work in excess of 40 hours for a week but the pay for that period did not include commensurate overtime compensation. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated and that individualized issues precluded proceeding as a collective action. The Court found that the differences between Plaintiffs and the collective action members were insufficient to warrant decertifying the class. Id. at *11. The Court noted that the nurses testified to the existence of a generally applied policy on the part of Defendant to not pay and/or approve overtime that supervisors required, and to ignore complaints regarding the inability of staff to take their meal breaks. The Court opined that this evidence showed common liability issues. Id. Furthermore, the Court reasoned that just as individualized damages inquiries would not defeat class certification in the more stringent Rule 23(b) context, they did not do so in an opt-in FLSA collective action either. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for decertification of the collective action.

(iii) Third Circuit

Gordon, et al. v. Maxim Healthcare Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 113736 (E.D. Pa. July 21, 2017). Plaintiff, on behalf of a group of home healthcare workers, brought a putative class and collective action alleging that Defendant failed to timely pay for hours worked pursuant to the FLSA and state law. Id. at *2. After the Court conditionally certified a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), Plaintiff moved to certify the class pursuant to Rule 23. Id. at *1. At the same time, Defendant for moved to decertify the conditionally certified collective action and for summary judgment. Id. at *1. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion and granted both of Defendant's motions. Id. at *53. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's policy of requiring timesheets to be hand delivered caused late payment of wages. Id. at *12. Evidence was presented that supervisors permitted time reporting in different manners, including by fax, text, and mail. Id. at *13. The Court found that the commonality requirement was not met because there were lawful reasons why employees were paid for some hours in subsequent weeks. Id. at *19. The Court also determined that the typicality requirement was not met because the claims did not arise from the same practices and course of events as there were various mean of time reporting. Id. at *22. Defendant had a variety of means of accepting timesheets and some class members were paid on the regularly scheduled payday per scheduled hours and were then paid additional amounts in later paychecks if their timesheets reflected additional time worked. Id. at *22. Because commonality and typicality requirements were not met, the Court found that Plaintiffs' request for class certification failed. Id. at *23. The Court also concluded that common issues of fact did not predominate, because individual determinations would need to be made as to whether Defendant had knowledge of actual hours worked. Id. at *37. The practice was such that the amount of time worked was often different from an employee's scheduled time due to the need of clients. Id. In such cases, payroll would not know of the change until timesheets were submitted. Id. at *37. As such, the Court reasoned that Plaintiff failed to meet the predominance requirement. Id. at *40. Because the individual issues associated with payment would render managing the class untenable, Plaintiff also failed to meet superiority requirement. Id. at *40. The Court decertified the collective action because Plaintiff failed to show that the opt-in Plaintiffs were similarly-situated to her as there was no overarching policy as to how employees were to report their time. Id. at *44. The Court also granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment because the FLSA precludes coverage for employees in domestic servitude employment who provide companionship services for an individual. Id. at *46. There were no genuine issues of material fact that Plaintiff provided any services other than companionship services. Id. at *53. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification and granted Defendant's motions to decertify the conditionally certified collective action and for summary judgment. Id.

Herzfeld, et al. v. 1416 Chancellor, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88732 (E.D. Pa. June 9, 2017). Plaintiff, an exotic dancer, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant improperly classified dancers as independent contractors and thereby failed to pay minimum and overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and state wage & hour laws. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of her FLSA claims, and for class certification of her Pennsylvania claims pursuant to Rule 23. The Court granted Plaintiff's motions. First, the Court noted that Plaintiff alleged that Defendant applied the same policies to her and other dancers, and misclassified her and other dancers as independent contractors. Plaintiff produced evidence that Defendant classified all dancers as independent contractors and used the same lease agreement, same regulations, and same fee and tip requirements for the dancers. Id. at *8. Based on these factors, the Court found that Plaintiff made a modest factual showing at the conditional certification stage because all potential collective action members: (i) worked at the same location; (ii) shared the same "dancer" job duties and responsibilities; and (iii) have been classified as independent contractors. Id. at *8-9. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant violated Pennsylvania's Minimum Wage Act by improperly classifying her as an independent contractor and Pennsylvania's Wage Payment and Collection Law by taking her tips to cover its business expenses. The Court found that Plaintiff met Rule 23(a)'s requirements, as: (i) Defendant's corporate designee estimated that "a couple hundred" dancers signed Defendant's lease agreement and became independent contractors; (ii) the proposed class shared common legal questions; (iii) Plaintiff's claims were typical of the class because all class members were misclassified as independent contractors; (iv) Plaintiff and Plaintiff's counsel were adequate to represent the class. Id. at *19-21. The Court determined that Plaintiff met Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement because the predominant questions of fact and law for the class related to how Defendant misclassified its dancers as independent contractors and impermissibly required the dancers to tip-out other employers. Id. at *22-23. Further, the Court noted that Defendant used the same classification policy, fee policies, and tip-out requirements for all dancers and they shared the same causes of action as Plaintiff. Id. at *23. The Court noted that class action was superior method for resolving the dispute because many dancers worked at the club for a brief period of time and "for these dancers, the costs of pursuing an individual action would almost certainly outweigh any potential recovery." Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motions for conditional certification of her FLSA claims and class certification of her state law wage & hour claims.

Koenig, et al. v. Granite City Food & Brewery, Ltd.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71809 (W.D. Pa. May 11, 2017). Plaintiff, a tipped employee, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to give her sufficient notice of its use of the tip credit under the FLSA. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant violated Pennsylvania's Minimum Wage Act ("MWA") by: (i) failing to meet tip credit notification requirements; (ii) failing to pay tipped employees the full minimum wage when they performed non-tipped work; (iii) claiming a tip credit in excess of amounts permitted by Pennsylvania law; and (iv) forcing tipped employees to forfeit tips when customers walked out or the employee had a cash shortage. Id. at *2. Plaintiff moved to conditionally certify a collective action under the FLSA and to certify a class of Pennsylvania employees under Rule 23 for Defendant's alleged violations of the MWA, which the Court granted. Defendant argued that Plaintiff adduced no evidence that her allegations and injuries were consistent with other employees at the five locations at which she alleged violations occurred. The Court found that Plaintiff provided evidence that Defendant had the same tip credit policies and procedures for tipped employees at its five locations, including testimony from Defendant's corporate designee stating that all five locations utilized the tip credit provision for its tipped employees so the employees were similarly-situated for compensation purposes. Id. at *5. The Court also determined that Plaintiff made a modest factual showing that all tipped employees at Defendant's five locations were "similarly-situated" because it used the same procedure to inform tipped employees and used the same employee handbooks at its five locations. Id. at *6. Defendant argued that its local management personnel provided proper oral notice of the tip credit policy to some tipped employees and attached supporting declarations from those employees. Defendant argued that the existence of employees who received proper oral notice defeated a finding that tipped employees were similarly-situated for a collective action. Id. at *7. The Court stated that Defendant's actions in creating a written tip credit in 2016 and implementing a mandatory electronically signed policy in 2017 suggested there was a flawed policy of oral notification. The Court further found that Defendant's argument was more appropriate for a summary judgment motion at the second tier of review. As to Plaintiff's motion for class certification of the MWA claims under Rule 23, the Court held that Defendant's payroll data showed approximately 220 former and current tipped employees, and typically was therefore met. The Court further determined that the commonality requirement was satisfied because Defendant used standardized policies to notify tipped employees of the tip credit and standardized procedures to calculate their tip credit for payroll purposes, thereby evidencing tipped employees shared common factual allegations and legal theories for recovery. Id. at *8. The Court found Plaintiff's claims were typical of the class because all class members were tipped employees like Plaintiff. Further, the Court stated that Defendant used the same employee handbook and compensation policy for Plaintiff and the class members, paid Plaintiff and the class members under the same tip credit provision, and used the same payroll system. Id. at *10. The Court opined that Plaintiff's counsel was qualified, experienced, and able to conduct the litigation, and Plaintiff had no interests antagonistic to the class and was adequate to represent the class. Id. at *11. As to Rule 23(b), the Court reasoned that predominance was satisfied because Defendant used the same policies and procedures for all tipped employees and they shared the same cause of action under the MWA. Id. at *13. Further, the Court held that as each tipped employee's recovery would be relatively small, a class action was the superior method for adjudication of the minimum wage claims. Id. at *13-14. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for FLSA conditional certification and class certification under Rule 23.

Reinig, et al. v. RBS Citizens, N.A.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 134094 (W.D. Pa. Aug. 2, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of mortgage loan officers ("MLOs") alleged that Defendant failed to pay them all compensation due by: (i) devising a compensation plan whereby commission payments were calculated by subtracting the hourly wages of the MLO from the "gross commissions;" and (ii) maintaining an "unofficial policy" to discourage MLOs from fully reporting overtime hours worked in violation of the FLSA and corresponding state laws. Id. at *1-2. The Court had previously conditionally certified Plaintiffs' FLSA claims. Plaintiffs subsequently filed a motion for class certification of their state law claims pursuant to Rule 23. At the same time, Defendant filed a motion to decertify the FLSA collective action. The Special Master appointed to the case recommended granting Plaintiffs' motion for class certification and denying Defendant's motion. The Special Master noted that there was substantial testimony from numerous MLOs that Defendant enforced an unofficial policy that discouraged MLOs from reporting all of the hours they worked Id. at *38. This evidence of an unofficial policy discouraging the reporting of overtime hours was evidence of "a common employer practice that, if proved, would help demonstrate a violation of the FLSA." Id. Moreover, the Special Master found that Plaintiffs' timesheets were generally consistent with their testimony. Furthermore, the Special Master held that the similarities between the named Plaintiffs and opt-in Plaintiffs and the efficiencies to be had by litigating the claims on a collective basis, contrasted against the result of decertification, weighed strongly in favor of certification. Id. at *50. As to class certification of Plaintiffs' state law claims, the Special Master noted that the key point of dispute between the parties was whether the circumstances of each MLO's employment were so dissimilar that class treatment is inappropriate under Rule 23(a) and (b)(3). Plaintiffs argued they had identified a common question of fact or law of whether Defendant maintained a policy and practice of not allowing MLOs to report overtime commensurate with the amount of overtime MLOs were actually working, and that this policy was applied to all MLOs throughout Defendant's mortgage division. Id. at *52. The Special Master agreed with Plaintiffs that when an off-the-clock claim rests on an alleged unofficial policy requiring off-the-clock work, the resolution of whether such a policy exists drives the resolution of the claims of the entire class. Id. at *53. Plaintiffs contended that their claims were typical of the class members' claims because each of the named representatives were discouraged from seeking overtime compensation for hours actually worked in excess of 40 hours in a workweek in a manner typical to all class members. Id. at *54. The Special Master held that therefore the class claims depended on the same factual and legal theories as Plaintiffs' claims. Thus, to prove their own off-the-clock claims, Plaintiffs had to establish the same elements as class members, including the existence of an unofficial policy discouraging the reporting of all hours worked. Id. at *56. The fact that damages might vary between class members did not change the fact that Plaintiffs' claims were "typical, in common-sense terms, of the class." Id. at *57. The Special Master found that none of the factual differences Defendant identified caused the interests of Plaintiffs to diverge from those of the class. Id. at *58. The Special Master also concluded that Plaintiffs demonstrated that the unofficial policy upon which their off-the-clock claims were predicated was amenable to common proof and that this common question would predominate over any individualized questions. Id. at *59-60. Accordingly, the Special Master recommended granting Plaintiffs' motion for class certification and denying Defendant's motion for decertification.

Reinig, et al. v. RBS Citizens, N.A.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 134144 (W.D. Pa. Aug. 22, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of mortgage loan officers ("MLOs") alleged that Defendant failed to pay them all compensation due by: (i) devising a compensation plan whereby commission payments were calculated by subtracting the hourly wages of the MLO from the "gross commissions" (the "recapture claims"); and (ii) maintaining an "unofficial policy" to discourage MLOs from fully reporting overtime hours worked (the "off-the-clock" claims) in violation of the FLSA and corresponding state laws. Id. at *1-2. The Court previously had conditionally certified Plaintiffs' FLSA claims and approximately 350 Plaintiffs opted-in to the collective action. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs subsequently filed a motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23. At the same time, Defendant filed a motion to decertify the FLSA collective action. A Special Master appointed to the case recommended granting Plaintiffs' motion for class certification and denying Defendant's motion. The Court approved the Special Master's recommendation. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to establish adequacy and typicality concerning the New York and Massachusetts sub-classes. The Court noted that it previously granted leave for Plaintiffs to file a second amended complaint to substitute opt-in Plaintiffs to serve as named Plaintiffs and class representatives for those sub-classes in order to treat the alleged deficiencies. Id. at *5-6. As to Defendant's motion for decertification of Plaintiffs' FLSA claims, the Court found that Defendant's argument that opt-in and named Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated was without merit. As the Special Master had detailed, the MLOs shared the same job description with similar job duties, were paid pursuant to the same compensation plans, were subject to the same policies, and asserted the same claims for unpaid off-the-clock overtime wages in this lawsuit. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court adopted the Special Master's report and recommendation granting Plaintiffs' motion for class certification and denying Defendant's motion for decertification of the collective action.

Sloane, et al., et al. v. Gulf Interstate Field Services, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43088 (M.D. Penn. Mar. 24, 2017). Plaintiffs, natural gas pipeline inspectors, brought a putative collective action under the FLSA and a nationwide class action alleging that they were paid a day rate and were denied overtime wages. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs moved to certify the collective action and the class action and the Court denied both motions. Id. at *4. Previously, Plaintiffs had failed to obtain nationwide certification on a related matter pending before the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Ohio. Id. at *3. At the outset, the Court noted multiple features of this litigation that were fatal to certification, including: (i) significant disparities existed among the putative class members, their worksites, their responsibilities, and their clients; (ii) individualized inquiries as to the applicability of certain exemptions would overwhelm collective resolution; (iii) applicable payroll records revealed that the class members were likely paid a salary; and (iv) the pay letters at issue were ambiguous and indicated the possibility that the workers actually received a salary guarantee. Id. at *2. Since Plaintiffs had engaged in significant discovery for three years, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs had to offer something more than a modest factual showing to obtain collective action certification. Id. at *18. The Court required that Plaintiffs make at least an intermediate showing that any opt-ins were similarly-situated to the named representatives. Id. at *26. The Court ruled that the named Plaintiffs and opt-in Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated as required by § 216(b) of the FLSA. The Court reasoned that the named Plaintiffs and opt-in Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated because they held different positions, worked for different clients, and had different supervisors on different projects in different states pursuant to local policies and individualized salary agreements. The Court opined that because the members of the putative collective action were so diverse, resolution of Defendant's exemption defenses would require significant individualized fact-finding. Accordingly, the Court declined to certify the collective action. For similar reasons, the Court denied the motion to certify the class pursuant to Rule 23. Id. at *58. The Court ruled that the commonality requirement was not satisfied because determining eligibility for class membership would require particularized, factual inquiries into each worker's employment circumstance and answers common to the class did not predominate over individual ones. Id. at *59. The Court also concluded that the named Plaintiffs were inadequate representatives. Id. at *71. Accordingly, the Court denied both motions for certification and dismissed the putative opt-in Plaintiffs with prejudice. Id.

Wang, et al. v. Chapei LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 132501 (D.N.J. Aug. 18, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant cooks, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the minimum and overtime provisions of the FLSA and the New Jersey Wage & Hour Laws ("NJWHL"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of their FLSA claims, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs sought conditional certification of a collective action of all hourly paid, non-managerial employees of Defendant, including chefs, waiters, kitchen workers, dishwashers, delivery persons or any other equivalent employee, who previously worked, or were currently working at one of Defendant's restaurants during the past three years. Id. at *2-3. At the outset, the Court stated that although the "modest factual showing" standard is appropriate at the "notice stage" of litigation when little or no discovery has taken place, a stricter standard is more appropriate when Plaintiffs move for conditional certification near or after the close of discovery. Here, the parties were near the close of discovery when Plaintiffs filed their original motion to certify the collective action, and discovery had since closed. Id. at *4. The Court therefore determined that the "stricter" standard should apply at this stage of litigation. Id. The Court also noted that after approximately one year of discovery, Plaintiffs submitted only two affidavits in support of their motion for conditional certification. Plaintiffs claimed that they worked from 9:00 a.m. until 7:00 p.m. for six days per week, totaling 60 hours per week, and that their day off from work fluctuated. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs also claimed that they spoke with five additional individuals who allegedly worked for Defendant as food preparers and cooks for 60 hours per week, receiving a starting salary ranging from $1,300 to $1,900 per month with occasional raises. However, Plaintiffs did not submit any affidavits or certifications to the Court from these alleged co-workers. Id. at *8. The Court further determined that Plaintiffs asserted that they were assigned to different locations at different times throughout their employment, but provided no information regarding the dates that they worked at these various locations. Furthermore, Plaintiffs provided no evidence concerning whether their alleged co-workers worked at various locations, and if so, whether each location employed the same policies. Despite having ample discovery, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to produce evidence beyond pure speculation of a factual nexus between the manner in which the employer's alleged policy affected Plaintiffs and the manner in which it affected other employees. Id. The Court therefore determined that Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden under the stricter second stage certification standard. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for collective action certification.

(iv) Fourth Circuit

Brown, et al. v. Rapid Response Delivery, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 606 (D. Md. Jan. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of delivery drivers, filed a collective action on behalf of themselves and those similarly-situated alleging that Defendant misclassified drivers as independent contractors and thereby denied them minimum wages and overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, and the Court denied the motion finding that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated. Defendant operated a delivery service and employed drivers to make deliveries in Maryland and surrounding states. Plaintiffs worked as drivers for Defendant and were assigned to drive exclusively for two of Defendant's clients. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant compensated Plaintiffs with "a set amount for each delivery completed dependent on the mileage of the delivery," and that they received no other compensation. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs performed deliveries from 8:00 a.m. to 6:00 p.m., Monday through Friday, plus at least one 7:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. Saturday shift per month. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that they regularly worked more than 40 hours per week and that Defendant did not pay Plaintiffs additional compensation for overtime work and did not pay Plaintiffs the minimum wage for every hour of work performed. Id. at *4. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs were independent contractors, because they had the ability to set their own schedules, were permitted to take days off as they wished, and to not work or work only days that they choose. Id. Defendants further asserted that neither they nor the drivers maintained records of the time that Plaintiffs spent working. The Court determined that although Plaintiffs demonstrated that the approximately 30 putative Plaintiffs performed similar work, the actual work performed by each collective action member varied substantially. Id. at *7. The Court reasoned that while all potential collective action members performed a common function of making deliveries on behalf of Defendant, the work varied in terms of the number of deliveries made, the destination of the deliveries, and the time taken to make the deliveries. Id. The Court further found that Plaintiffs were not compensated based on their time spent working, but only for the distances traveled to make their deliveries. Id. at *8-9. The Court opined that there was no indication that Plaintiffs' work hours even existed because nowhere in Plaintiffs' briefs or in the accompanying affidavits did they suggest that they maintained such records, and Defendants affirmatively asserted that they did not have that information. Id. at *9. The Court found that because of the individualized determinations that would be required for each collective action member, and the need for "speculative reconstruction" of each Plaintiff's work hours, Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated so as to warrant conditional certification of a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court accordingly denied Plaintiffs' motion.

Harbourt, et al. v. PPE Casino Resorts Maryland, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9229 (D. Md. Jan. 23, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of trainees, brought a collective action and class action seeking unpaid wages for the time they spent training to become table game dealers for Defendant, a Maryland casino. Defendant created a "dealer school" to train about 830 employees to operate table games such as blackjack, poker, craps, and roulette, before its opening in 2013. Id. at *2-3. In mid-November of 2012, Defendant began advertising employment opportunities for table game dealers. Plaintiffs, as well as approximately 1,000 other people, applied for those advertised positions. Id. at *3. Defendant explained to applicants that the course was free, lasted 12 weeks, and would teach them how to conduct table games. The dealer school consisted of four hours of daily instruction Monday through Friday, offered in four time periods, and was scheduled to run for 20 hours per week for 12 weeks. Id. In 2014, Plaintiffs filed an action asserting violations of the FLSA, the Maryland Wage & Hour Law ("MWHL"), and the Maryland Wage Payment and Collection Law ("MWPCL"). Id. at *5. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court granted, finding that Plaintiffs failed to show that the primary beneficiary of their attendance at the training was Defendant rather than themselves. Id. In 2016, the dismissal order was reversed on appeal. After remand, Plaintiffs subsequently filed motions for conditional certification of a FLSA collective action and class certification of their state law claims pursuant to Rule 23. Plaintiffs also petitioned the Court to toll the statute of limitations under the FLSA beginning November 11, 2014, the date that Defendant's motion to dismiss was filed. Id. at *6. The Court held that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that equitable tolling should be granted under the narrow circumstances under applicable circuit case law has permitted, and therefore denied Plaintiffs' motion. Because the motion for equitable tolling was denied, and more than three years passed since the conclusion of the dealer school, the Court determined that Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action also must be denied. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs' motion for class certification proposed a class consisting of all persons that attended Defendant's twelve week dealer course at Marley Station between January 7, 2013, the date that the course began, and April 1, 2013, the date the course ended. Id. at *10. Defendant objected to the proposed scope of the class, and argued that the class should be limited to persons who completed all twelve weeks of the dealer school, were hired as table game dealers by Defendant, and actually worked as table game dealers. Id. at *11. The Court found that Plaintiffs met the numerosity requirement, as there were over 800 members of the proposed class that attended at least part of the dealer school. Id. at *12-13. The Court opined that Plaintiffs met the commonality requirement because all proposed class members suffered the same alleged injury of non-compensated work, and determining the common question of law, i.e., whether or not Plaintiffs' duties and class members' duties constituted compensable work, would resolve the contentions of each class member. Id. at *14. The Court also held that Plaintiffs shared the same factual and legal claims as the rest of the members of the proposed class, and therefore they had established the typicality requirement. The Court further determined that Plaintiffs were adequate representatives of the class. Id. at *15. As to Rule 23(b), the Court found that the common issues of compensation for participation in PPE's dealer school predominated over individual issues relative to the length of participation. Id. at *16. The Court stated that the proposed class of dealer school participants was sufficiently cohesive to warrant class adjudication because, although recovery for each class member would vary, their claims involved almost identical facts and the same legal issues. Id. Additionally, the Court concluded that a class action was a superior method for fair and efficient adjudication because with over 800 members in the proposed class, individual adjudication of the legal issues would be duplicative and inefficient. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification of their state law claims under Rule 23. Id. at *17.

Hart, et al. v. Barbeque Integrated, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 176755 (D.S.C. Oct. 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a food server and bartender, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay minimum wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part and denied in part. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant, while taking advantage of the FLSA's tip credit provision, required her and putative collective action members to perform non-tipped side work that was not related to their tipped occupations as servers and bartenders, as well as requiring that Plaintiff and putative collective action members spend more than 20% of their shifts performing non-tipped side work that was related to their tipped occupations. Id. at *2. Additionally, Plaintiff alleged that she and putative collective action members were required to pay Defendant out of their tips when a customer walked out, were required to purchase additional t-shirts with their tips, and were never notified that Defendant was paying them less than minimum wage pursuant to the FLSA's tip credit provision. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff sought conditional certification of a nationwide collective action of servers and bartenders who worked at any of Defendant's 67 restaurant locations across the country. Defendant opposed conditional certification and the breadth of the proposed collective action in the event that the Court granted conditional certification. Plaintiff argued that the members of the proposed collective action were similarly-situated because they were all subject to the same policies and duties. Plaintiff further asserted that Defendant maintained uniform policies across each of its restaurants. As support for this assertion, Plaintiff pointed to the corporate nationwide job descriptions for servers and bartenders, which included descriptions of the side work that servers and bartenders were expected to perform. Id. at *17. Plaintiff contended that the job descriptions, coupled with the declarations she submitted from servers and bartenders at three different restaurants in three different states, were more than enough to demonstrate that all servers and bartenders were sufficiently similarly-situated to surmount the low bar for conditional certification. Id. at *18. The Court agreed and found that conditional certification of a nationwide collective action of servers and bartenders was warranted. Id. at *19. The Court held that Plaintiff produced evidence of nationwide job descriptions for servers and bartenders that on their face required side work. The Court noted that requiring side work did not necessarily violate the FLSA, but Plaintiff made a sufficient showing that Defendant's nationwide side work policy potentially caused FLSA violations for servers and bartenders. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action of servers and bartenders as it pertained to violations of the dual-jobs regulation and the 20% rule. Id. The Court, however, declined to conditionally certify Plaintiff's other claims, including Defendant's failure to notify the putative collective action members that it was paying them a reduced minimum wage pursuant to the tip credit provision, Defendant's purported requirement that Plaintiff and the putative collective action members use their tips to reimburse Defendant for customer walk-outs, and Defendant's purported requirement that Plaintiff and the putative collective action members pay for additional t-shirts out of their tips. Id. at *20. The Court held that unlike Plaintiff's side work claims, the other claims were individual to Plaintiff, and that Plaintiff failed to show that the claims arose out of a corporate policy. The Court noted that Defendant provided evidence that it hung Department of Labor posters in each of its locations, that it orally told Plaintiff and all other employees that they were being paid using the tip credit provision, and that the tip credit provision was explained in its employee handbook. Id. The Court also determined that Plaintiff was the sole person to allege that she had to compensate the restaurant when a customer walked out without paying. Id. Further, only two declarants of five stated that they purchased additional restaurant shirts with their tips. The Court concluded that each of these claims was insufficient to justify conditional certification of a nationwide collective action. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Hollis, et al. v. Alston Personal Care Services, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 122043 (M.D.N.C. Aug. 3, 2017). Plaintiff, a home healthcare worker, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and the North Carolina Wage & Hour Act. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff's proposed collective action consisted of all current or former home healthcare workers employed by Defendants from January 1, 2015 to the present. Id. at *3. Defendants argued that Plaintiff failed to show that Defendants had a common policy or plan that violated the law or that she was similarly-situated to the proposed members of the collective action that she sought to represent. Id. at *5. Defendants objected to Plaintiff's declaration submitted in support of her allegations, and contended that it constituted "blatantly inadmissible hearsay." Id. at *6. Although the Court agreed that Plaintiff's affidavit included facts which were clearly hearsay, Plaintiff claimed to have spoken to other, similarly-situated employees, making their claims of failure to pay overtime within the knowledge of Plaintiff. Id. Because Plaintiff's source of the relevant information was her own personal knowledge of the alleged statements of other employees, the Court determined that it may consider evidence contained in Plaintiff's declaration that may otherwise constitute hearsay. Id. The Court therefore found that there were employees in similar positions to Plaintiff who worked more than 40 hours in certain workweeks and who were not paid any overtime. Id. at *7.

Further, the Court determined that Plaintiff's declaration alleged a policy or plan that Defendants allowed employees to work more than 40 hours in a workweek without paying overtime wages to her or to other employees working in her role or in roles with job descriptions similar to hers. Id. at *8. Defendants argued that Plaintiff "has not presented any evidence showing that she and these unidentified individuals are similarly-situated to her" and that "Plaintiff's [claim] and the putative class members' supposed claims would necessitate personalized and fact-specific inquiries into each individual's claims to determine both lability and damages." Id. The Court noted that by Defendants' own admission, 34 employees did work more than 40 hours per week, at least according to the time-cards submitted. Id. at *10. Defendants did not allege that they paid overtime wages to any of the 34 employees who worked over 40 hours in a week. Id. The Court therefore found that Plaintiff had made the relatively modest factual showing that a common policy, scheme, or plan that violated the law existed. Id. at *10-11. As a result, the Court ruled that conditional certification was appropriate. However, the Court declined to include all of Defendants' employees in the collective action and limited it to the 34 employees who submitted time-cards reflecting more than 40 hours of work in one week. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court granted in part Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Hood, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.*, Case No. 16-CV-998 (M.D.N.C. July 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA. Defendant contended that Plaintiffs' claims were subject to an arbitration agreement. Plaintiff subsequently filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs sought to certify a collective action of all "persons who have worked or who continue to work as an Uber Driver anywhere in the United States and who have opted out of arbitration." Id. at 1. The Court reviewed Plaintiffs' evidence and concluded that the claims of the putative collective action members were sufficiently similar to merit notice to the collective action members pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court further determined that Plaintiff met the modest requirements for conditional certification, and granted Plaintiffs' motion.

Kirkpatrick, et al. v. Cardinal Innovations Healthcare Solutions*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 141783 (M.D.N.C. Sept. 1, 2017). Plaintiff, an intellectual/development disability care coordinator ("I/DD coordinator") brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay her and other I/DD coordinators overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff brought a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, and the Court granted the motion. In support of her motion, Plaintiff submitted eight almost-identical declarations from herself and seven putative opt-in Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs declared that they routinely worked over 40 hours per week without overtime compensation, that they lacked the academic and professional credentials that would make them exempt "learned professionals," that they routinely performed tasks that did not require specialized skills or training, and that their positions shared the same title, job descriptions, and compensation and billing procedures. Id. at *3. Defendant opposed conditional certification primarily on two grounds. First, Defendant asserted that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate the existence of a common unlawful policy necessary to support a collective action. The Court noted that much of Defendant's contention on this issue amounted to a merits argument that Defendant's exemption policy complied with the FLSA. Id. at *13. The Court stated that at this stage, Plaintiff need not demonstrate conclusively that Defendant's policy was unlawful. Id. at *13-14. Second, Defendant argued that Plaintiff had not offered any factual support for her contention that the I/DD coordinators were misclassified. The Court disagreed, finding that Plaintiffs submitted eight declarations from I/DD coordinators in support of the motion. The Court determined that each declaration contained detailed factual assertions about the mechanics of the I/DD position and the coordinators' duties and limitations. Defendant argued that the declarations were form documents that were similar if not identical, and were little more than conclusory allegations that added no factual support to Plaintiff's argument that she was misclassified. Id. at *15. The Court held that attacks on the declarations are, in the end, challenges to their credibility and thus are factual matters the Court need not resolve at this point in the litigation. Id. at *16. Defendant also asserted that Plaintiff was not similarly-situated to her co-workers because she had "failed to show that all I/DD care coordinators exercise the same duties and responsibilities." Id. at *18. The Court opined that Plaintiff need not make such a showing at this stage. The Court determined that Plaintiff offered evidence that I/DD coordinators had the same job descriptions and titles and worked an average of over 40 hours per week without overtime compensation. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Mayhew, et al. v. Loved Ones In Home Care, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 197979 (S.D.W. Va. Dec. 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of home health care workers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs filed declarations stating that between early 2016 and May 2017, Defendants made out two distinct paychecks for each workweek with straight-time compensation on each check without regard for hours on the other, did not pay overtime despite including all the time on a single paycheck, and were told that the practices were "legal and proper because they paid hours by individual funding sources." Id. at *4. Defendants subsequently amended their overtime pay policy in 2017 and began to pay overtime compensation in accordance with the FLSA. The named Plaintiff Mayhew complained to the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") in early 2017, seeking overtime pay she was owed. Id. at *5. The DOL informed Mayhew of the its on-going investigation and preliminary opinion that Defendants had engaged in similar conduct that violated the FLSA with respect to 70 other employees in another office location. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs cited the May 2017 change of Defendants' approach to overtime pay as evidence that there was an illegal practice that covered Defendants' employees generally. The Court found that the fact that Defendants were in the midst of settling the DOL investigation of these overtime pay practices that was designed to determine the amount the workers should recover firmly supported the conclusion that such an illegal overtime practice existed. Id. at *9. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to present evidence of similarly-situated employees, as required by statute for the collective action to proceed. The Court disagreed, finding that Mayhew's affidavit was sufficient insofar as it stated that other employees were subject to the same overtime pay policy. The Court determined that Plaintiffs' contentions were sufficient to carry their burden at this first stage of conditional certification. Id. at *9-10. Defendants also argued that conditional certification should be denied because they were "in the midst of an on-going DOL investigation," which was "nearly complete" and would "moot" the collective action claims. Id. at *11. Defendants argued that with the DOL having already calculated preliminary figures of wages owed, judicial efficiency would not be served by certifying the collective action. Id. The Court stated that Defendants did not cite, and it was not aware of, any case law authorities holding that collective actions under the FLSA should not be allowed to proceed when there were on-going DOL investigations into similar claims. Id. Therefore, the Court opined that it was within its discretion to promote judicial efficiency by facilitating notice to potential Plaintiffs in the collective action, and Plaintiffs presented enough evidence of similarly-situated employees to proceed with conditional certification. Id. at *12. Moreover, the Court reasoned that an administrative settlement with DOL would not result in the same recovery and would not vindicate all the rights at issue. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Reagan, et al. v. City Of Hanahan,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58678 (D.S.C. April 18, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of firefighters, alleged that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA and the South Carolina Payment of Wages Act ("SCPWA"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of their FLSA collective action, and the Court granted the motion in part. The City of Hanahan employed Plaintiffs as firefighters and emergency medical services ("EMS") personnel. Plaintiffs alleged that the City administered two payment plans that violated the FLSA. The first payment plan, which was in place through July 2015, allegedly incorporated illegal sleep time and meal time deductions. The City implemented a new payment plan in July 2015. Under this plan, Plaintiffs alleged that the City did not compensate them for overtime work as required under the FLSA because it inappropriately took advantage of the overtime exception available under 29 U.S.C. § 207(k) for employees responsible for fire protection. Plaintiffs sought conditional certification of two groups relative to their FLSA claims, including: (i) all individuals employed by Defendant in its Fire Department, who were non-exempt employees and who did not receive overtime compensation of at least one and one-half times their regular hourly wage for all overtime hours from three years prior to their joining the lawsuit through July 1, 2015; and (ii) all individuals employed by Defendant in its Fire Department, but were assigned to EMS, who were non-exempt employees and who worked over 40 hours in any given workweek, but who did not receive overtime compensation of at least one and one-half times their regular hourly wage for all overtime hours from July 1, 2015 to the present. Id. at *2-3. Defendant consented to the first proposed collective action, but objected to conditional certification of the second collective action on the grounds that the pay plan in place from July 2015 to the present did not violate the law. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' allegations were not sufficient to demonstrate that they were subject to an illegal policy or plan because they are subject to the increased overtime threshold under 29 U.S.C. § 207(k), which applied to employees "in fire protection activities." Id. at *4.

Because most Plaintiffs indicated that their duties included fire suppression, Defendant asserted that they were subject to the overtime exemption in § 207(k). The Court agreed that most Plaintiffs indicated that their duties included fire suppression, and that they were expected to and dispatched to fight fires as part of their jobs; as a result, they fell within the overtime exemption under § 207(k). Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion as to the first collective action one and denied it as to the second collective action.

Turner, et al. v. Republic Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123907 (D.S.C. Aug. 7, 2017). Plaintiff, a waste disposal driver, filed a collective action alleging that: (i) Defendant miscalculated his and other drivers' regular rate of pay, paying them overtime at an illegally low rate of pay; and (ii) Defendant automatically deducted a 30 minute meal break each shift even though drivers regularly worked through the meal period, thus failing to pay all owed overtime in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification, which the Court granted. Defendant provided 18 driver declarations to support its position that potential members of the proposed collective action differed in whether they routinely worked through their meal breaks. Id. at *19. Defendant argued that drivers who worked through their meal breaks did so, if at all, because of decisions of individual supervisors as opposed to a company-wide policy or plan directing those enforcement decisions. Id. The Court first noted that Defendant never argued that Plaintiff failed to show that he was similarly-situated to other drivers in the way that Republic calculated his regular rate of pay. Further, the Court stated that it was unclear if Defendant objected to collective action certification on the regular rate claim or solely on the meal break claim, as its briefing focused solely on the meal break claim. Id. at *19-20. Regardless, the Court found that Plaintiff's FLSA overtime claim was premised on two adequate and independent grounds, including: (i) that Defendant improperly calculated the regular rate for the payment of overtime; and (ii) that Defendant improperly instructed drivers to routinely work through their meal breaks. Id. at *20. The Court held that Plaintiff's theory – that Defendant improperly calculated the regular rate because there was no "clear, mutual understanding" that compensation was for hours worked each workweek – was enough for the survival of the FLSA overtime claim. The Court stated that it would not delve into the merits of the meal break claim at this time. Further, the Court found that Plaintiff submitted sworn declarations and other evidence to establish that he and other drivers were similarly-situated in the way that Defendant calculated their regular rate for overtime purposes. Id. at *20-21. The Court therefore determined that Plaintiff satisfied the modest factual burden of showing that the proposed collective action of residential waste disposal drivers were similarly-situated. Id. at *21. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Sheffield, et al. v. BB&T,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 68099 (E.D.N.C. May 4, 2017). Plaintiff, a call center employee, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA when it failed to pay for pre-shift work. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant required call center employees to report to their workstations 10 minutes prior to beginning their shifts in order to start and log-in to their computers and computer programs and applications, but were not compensated for this time. Plaintiff alleged that as a result, Plaintiff and other call center employees were scheduled to work more than 40 hours per week and were not paid for overtime. Id. at *1. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Defendant did not challenge Plaintiff's assertion that she and the other call center employees were similarly-situated for purposes of conditional certification. Further, Plaintiff and Defendant conferred and stipulated to the form of the notice and consent to sue form under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), and also agreed that the statute of limitations on the notice should reference three years prior to the date the notice was sent. Id. at *4. The Court agreed that Plaintiff and the putative collective action members were similarly-situated for purposes of conditional certification. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion to conditionally certify a collective action consisting of "all Collections Representatives I and II employed by Branch Banking and Trust Company, its subsidiaries, or other related entities at its Lumberton, North Carolina call center, who were not paid for the overtime hours they worked off-the-clock prior to the start of their shifts from [three years prior to the date court-ordered notice is sent] through completion of this litigation." Id. at *5. The Court further found that the notice and forms submitted by Plaintiff were appropriate.

Szalczyk, et al. v. CBC National Bank,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3375 (D. Md. Jan. 10, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay minimum wage and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of the collective action, which the Court granted in part. Id. at *2. Defendant, an operator of a mortgage division that sells residential mortgage loan products, employed two types of loan officers to market and sell its mortgage products, including "Inside Loan Officers" ("ILOs") and "Outside Loan Officers" ("OLOs"). Id. at *3. Defendant treated ILOs as non-exempt employees for purposes of the FLSA. They were paid on an hourly basis through the submission of weekly timesheets. OLOs, by contrast, worked largely outside of Defendant's offices and were expected to generate their own sales leads. OLOs were exempt employees for purposes of the FLSA, and Defendant did not monitor the amount of time OLOs spent performing sales activities outside of the office. Id. at *3. Named Plaintiff Szalczyk worked as an ILO and was told when he commenced his employment that he would earn $15 per hour, plus commissions. Szalczyk also stated that he, along with all other loan officers in his office, were told in a meeting to only report 40 hours per week on the time-keeping system, but were then told to work as much as they could to get sales. Szalczyk also testified that he typically worked 55 hours per week, but was not paid overtime compensation. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs sought to conditionally certify a collective action of all current and former loan officers employed by Defendant in the preceding three years. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs argued that both groups were subject to a common policy denying overtime pay, and thus conditional certification was appropriate under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. at *9. Defendant asserted that ILOs and OLOs were not similarly-situated because the legal and factual issues involved in adjudicating claims by exempt OLOs would be entirely different from the legal and factual issues involved in adjudicating claims by non-exempt ILOs. Id. The Court concluded that ILOs and OLOs were not similarly-situated so as to warrant conditional certification of both groups together. Id. at *10. The Court determined that the potential application of the FLSA's outside sales exemption would apply to OLOs only, and therefore OLO could not be similarly-situated to ILOs. The Court further opined that ILOs and OLOs were compensated differently, as OLOs were not required to submit weekly timesheets. Finally, the Court found that while both ILOs and OLOs performed similar job functions insofar as they both sold mortgage products, there were significant distinctions between their respective job duties and work locations. Id. Thus, the Court agreed with Defendant that the primary legal issue in determining FLSA liability with respect to the OLOs would be whether each individual was properly classified as exempt. Id. at *11. The Court therefore held that ILOs and OLOs were not similarly-situated so as to warrant conditional certification of a collective action. However, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs made the required modest factual showing to warrant conditional certification of the claims of the ILOs, as Plaintiffs demonstrated that all ILOs were required to work overtime without being paid overtime compensation and were all subject to the same timesheet policy. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action for ILOs and denied the motion as to the claims of the OLOs.

Young, et al. v. Act Fast Deliveries,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 126792 (S.D. W. Va. Aug. 10, 2017). Plaintiff, a delivery driver, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant incorrectly classified him as an independent contractor and thereby failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant paid delivery drivers based on the number of deliveries made or routes driven in the course of a week rather than by the hour. Id. at *4. Plaintiff also alleged that he was required to work more than 40 hours in the course of a week without receiving any overtime pay and was not permitted to negotiate his pay, and that he had no control over the schedule of his workday, the assignation of his deliveries, the specific routes he was to take, or even the order in which he made deliveries. Id. at *5. Plaintiff was also required to purchase a uniform with Defendant's logo and wear it during every delivery, the cost of which was deducted from his pay. Plaintiff asserted that he and other delivery drivers were subjected to Defendant's daily control and direction such that the independent contractor classification was incorrect and that he was in an employer-employee relationship with Defendant. Five other former employees also submitted declarations describing the same or similar experiences. Plaintiff sought to certify a collective action of all current and former delivery drivers classified as independent contractors who performed work for the Defendant in West Virginia during the three-year period before the filing of his complaint up to the date of authorized notice under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. at *6. Defendant contended that Plaintiff failed to establish that putative collective action members were similarly-situated, and failed to establish a common scheme or policy that violated the FLSA. Id. at *7. Defendant asserted that the independent contractor agreements signed by the potential collective action members did not violate the FLSA, and that the Court would have to analyze every independent contractor agreement of every putative collective action member to determine whether they were similarly-situated to Plaintiff. Id. The Court found that the employee declarations indicated that Defendant maintained such control over the delivery drivers that they should have been classified as employees, rather than independent contractors. Id. at *8-9. The declarations further indicated that this incorrect classification allowed Defendant not to pay the drivers minimum wage during some weeks, and further not to pay the drivers overtime pay despite working in excess of 40 hours per week. Id. at *9. The Court therefore concluded that the declarations provided the modest evidence necessary to show that a similarly-situated group of potential Plaintiffs existed such that conditional certification was appropriate. Further, the Court stated that it need not examine every single independent contractor agreement separately to determine whether each putative collective action member was similarly-situated. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Ware, et al. v. AUS, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 56495 (D. Md. April 13, 2017). Plaintiff, a former restaurant employee, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendants violated the FLSA, the Maryland Wage & Hour Law ("MWHL") and the Maryland Wage Payment and Collection Law ("MWPCL"). Plaintiff alleged that Defendants "implemented and enforced a policy and practice of not paying overtime compensation to Plaintiff, and similarly-situated hourly employees who were regularly required to work more than 40 hours per week." Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Defendants argued that Plaintiff failed to establish that he and the potential collective action members were similarly-situated because Plaintiff only worked at one of Defendants' restaurant locations for four months, and because he failed to allege sufficient facts to show that other workers were subjected to similar wage practices. Id. at *3. Thus, Defendants asserted that if conditional certification was granted, it should be limited to only employees who worked at Fat Daddy's 82nd Street location from June 26, 2016 through October 2, 2016. Id. at *3-4. The Court noted that Plaintiff submitted two sworn affidavits in support of his allegations, which provided the requisite modest factual showing that there existed a similarly-situated group of potential Plaintiffs who were subject to a common policy, scheme, or plan that may have violated the FLSA. Id. at *6. Plaintiff stated that during his employment interview, Defendant Edward Braude told him that the restaurant "[doesn't] pay overtime." Id. at *7. The Court found that Plaintiff's affidavits and pay stubs revealed that he was paid on an hourly basis, regularly worked over 40 hours a week, and never received overtime compensation. Id. Plaintiff's affidavits further indicated that he spoke with "other workers who similarly did not receive overtime wages" and who "expressed concerns about it but worried about retaliation if they complained." Id. The Court determined that the facts supported Plaintiff's allegation that a similarly-situated group of potential Plaintiffs existed who may be able to show that they were victims of a common policy, scheme, or plan that violated the law. Defendants argued that because Fat Daddy's 82nd Street location was wholly owned and managed by Lisa Braude, and Fat Daddy's Baltimore Ave. location was wholly owned and managed by Edward Braude, that limiting the scope of the collective action was appropriate "because the two restaurants are separately owned, and do not share employees, books, accounts, records, scheduling or payroll." Id. at *8. However, the Court observed that this fact alone did not preclude the Court from finding a common policy, scheme, or plan carried out by the two restaurants. For purposes of conditional certification, Plaintiff's sworn affidavits sufficiently demonstrate that the two Fat Daddy's restaurants operated as a single enterprise because Plaintiff indicated that there was a substantial amount of interrelated activity between the two Fat Daddy's restaurants. Id. at *9. Plaintiff also identified two other employees who worked at both restaurant locations. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

(v) Fifth Circuit

Adams, et al. v. All Coast LLC*, Case No. 16-CV-1426 (W.D. La. Nov. 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA. The parties jointly moved for conditional certification of the FLSA collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), which the Court granted. The Court appointed the named Plaintiff as the collective action representative and Moore & Associates as counsel. Id. at 1. The Court conditionally certified a collective action consisting of all cooks, mates, deckhands, ordinary seaman, and able-bodied seaman employed by Defendant in the last three years, except for those employees who had signed waiver and release agreements. Id. The Court ruled that the collective action excluded all captains, training captains, licensed engineers, and unlicensed engineers. The Court further ordered that other than the approved § 216(b) notice and consent form, the parties and their counsel could not affirmatively act to encourage or discourage participation in the matter. Id. at 2. Accordingly, the Court granted the parties' joint motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Aguirre, et al. v. Tastee Kreme #2, Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 83944 (S.D. Tex. April 13, 2017). Plaintiff, an ice cream delivery driver, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified its drivers as exempt employees and thereby denied them overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, and the Magistrate Judge recommended that the motion be granted. Plaintiff contended that delivery drivers regularly worked over 40 hours a week with no overtime and were paid a base salary and 5% of the ice cream sales collections on their routes. Id. at *2. Plaintiff sought to certify a collective action of "all current and former ice cream delivery drivers or route drivers employed by the Defendants." Id. at *3. Defendant argued that Plaintiff had not shown that the putative collective action members were similarly-situated and that there are other aggrieved individuals who want to join the suit. Id. at *14. The Magistrate Judge found that Plaintiffs' declarations of other drivers provide substantial allegations that there were others who wished to join the collective action. The Magistrate Judge opined that the declarants put forth detailed information about the nature of their positions as delivery drivers for Defendants, averred that they often worked 40 hours a week and were never paid overtime, and that other delivery drivers were subject to the same policies. Id. at *15. The Magistrate Judge ruled that these facts demonstrated the existence of aggrieved individuals who were harmed by Defendants' policy to exempt them from overtime pay. The sworn statements outlined that declarants, including Plaintiff, held the same position, worked similar hours, had the same job responsibilities, and were paid a salary and commission with no overtime. Id. at *16. Through this evidence, the Magistrate Judge determined that Plaintiff had shown that putative collective action members were similarly-situated, as they held the same position and were paid a salary with no overtime compensation. Based on the foregoing, the Magistrate Judge concluded that Plaintiff provided substantial allegations demonstrating that the putative collective action members were victims of a uniform policy or plan. The Magistrate Judge thereby recommended the Court grant Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Alverson, et al. v. BL Restaurant Operations LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 188705 (W.D. Tex. Nov. 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of servers and bartenders, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay minimum wage in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant willfully violated the FLSA and improperly claimed the tip credit by: (i) failing to provide employees with adequate notice of Defendant's intent to claim the credit (the "notification claim"); (ii) requiring tipped employees to perform non-tipped side work unrelated to the tipped profession (the "dual-jobs claim"); and (iii) requiring tipped employees to spend more than 20% of their work time engaged in non-tipped "side work" (the "20% claim"). Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs submitted seven declarations from different opt-in Plaintiffs, who were current or former servers or bartenders employed by BL in Texas, Ohio, New Jersey, and Massachusetts. Id. at *5. The opt-in Plaintiffs' declarations all stated that they were paid less than the full minimum wage; they spent more than 20% of their time performing non tip-producing side work such as cleaning restrooms, cleaning coolers and shelves, washing dishes, polishing brass, dusting, mopping, and cutting fruit; that they were all subject to the "same policies and procedures," including Defendant's handbook; and that Defendant never explained it was paying them less than the full minimum wage because they were receiving tips or that their tips would be used as a credit against the minimum-wage requirement. Id. at *5-6. The Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied the "modest factual showing" required to show that they and other potential Plaintiffs were "similarly-situated" under 29 U.S.C. § 216 (b). Id. at *11. The Court noted that Plaintiffs submitted sworn statements indicating that Defendant subjected them to the same policies and procedures that failed to appropriately notify Plaintiffs of the requirements of § 203(m) and that required servers and bartenders to perform side work more than 20% of the time. Id. at *12. The Court determined that Plaintiffs also submitted evidence that Defendant paid its servers and bartenders similarly through use of the tip credit and assigned them similar side-work duties. The Court held that the evidence was sufficient to show for conditional certification purposes that Plaintiffs and putative collective action members "performed the same basic tasks as part of their employment and were subject to the same pay decisions, policies, or practices." Id. at *13. The Court further reasoned that conditional certification of a collective action with national reach was appropriate because "there is a reasonable basis to conclude that the same policy applies to multiple locations of a single company." Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Arceo, et al. v. Omni Hotels Management Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 180689 (N.D. Tex. Nov. 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of hotel housekeepers, filed an action alleging overtime violations pursuant to the FLSA.

Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Fifteen housekeepers who worked for a staffing agency run by Alfredo Orta, including 12 who were assigned to work at Defendant Omni's hotel in downtown Dallas, claimed that Orta did not pay them for some of the hours they worked and that they were not paid overtime when they worked more than 40 hours a week. Id. at *2. Although Omni paid Orta directly for the housekeeping services, Plaintiffs alleged that Omni and Orta acted as joint employers. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs moved for certification of a collective action comprised of all current and former housekeepers employed by Orta at hotels located in the Dallas/Fort Worth area, including those assigned to work for Omni. Id. at *3. The Court found that it was undisputed that Plaintiffs performed similar job duties for similar pay. Omni argued that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated because they worked at different hotels, so they were subject to different policies and practices that were too individualized for conditional certification to be appropriate. Id. at *6. The Court was unpersuaded by Omni's argument, and opined that to succeed at this stage of certification, Plaintiffs were not necessarily required to provide a substantial allegation that the potential collective action members were subject to a common decision, policy, or plan. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiffs each averred that Defendants did not pay them overtime for work in excess of 40 hours per week. Although Plaintiffs did not describe the exact scenarios under which Orta and Omni failed to pay overtime compensation to housekeepers, the Court held that no matter what method Defendants allegedly used to deny overtime compensation to housekeepers, each was allegedly part of a single policy or plan, applied to all potential collective action members, not to pay for overtime work. Id. at *7. The Court determined that the factual nexus was the alleged practice of Orta's failing to pay overtime to housekeepers who worked more than 40 hours per week. Id. The Court concluded that such a showing was sufficient to support conditional certification. Id. The Court opined that if discovery demonstrated that certain Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated due to differences in their employers, the Court could decertify the collective action. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Arceneaux, et al. v. Fitness Connection Option Holdings, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 194840 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified managerial employees as exempt and thereby denied paying overtime compensation, and required non-exempt employees to perform work off-the-clock without pay in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs sought to conditionally certify two collective actions, including: (i) a manager collective action comprised of all persons employed by Defendants during the applicable period as Operations Manager, General Manager, Assistant General Manager, General Sales Manager, Membership Manager, District Fitness Manager, Fitness Manager and Assistant Fitness Manager who were declared exempt from FLSA overtime compensation requirements; and (ii) a non-exempt worker collective action containing all persons employed during the applicable period as Fitness Consultants and Private Trainers who were declared non-exempt, but were required to work in excess of 40 hours per week and not paid overtime compensation. Id. at *3-4. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs submitted declarations of 15 employees with numerous job titles and descriptions. The Court initially addressed the non-exempt claims. The Court noted that Plaintiffs failed to identify a reasonable basis for believing that other aggrieved individuals existed. Id. at *8. The Court found that the proposed collective action consisted of private trainers and fitness consultants, but none of the named Plaintiffs were private trainers. Only Plaintiff Yarbrough was employed by Defendant as a fitness consultant, and although Yarbrough averred in his declaration that he routinely worked over 40 hours per week as a fitness consultant, he did not identify any other fitness consultants who did the same. Id. Further, only Yarbrough was allegedly classified as non-exempt at any time during employment with Defendant, and there was no evidence that he was aggrieved by any of Defendant's purportedly improper off-the-clock policies for non-exempt employees. Id. at *11-12. Yarbrough did not assert any claims that he was required to work off-the-clock while he was classified as non-exempt. Id. at *12. The Court then turned to the proposed manager collective action. The Court determined Plaintiffs met their burden to demonstrate that there was a reasonable basis to believe other aggrieved individuals existed, as Plaintiffs consisted of 17 individuals with "manager" titles and 15 Plaintiffs had submitted sworn declarations averring that there were others interested in joining this lawsuit. Id. at *15-16. However, the Court stated that the proposed collective action consisted of employees with eight different job titles, and although Plaintiffs made the conclusory assertion that all individuals with the numerous different job titles were "similarly-situated with respect to their job requirements and with regard to their pay provisions," they failed to cite any competent evidence or authority in support of their position. Id. at *17-18. The Court found that, to the contrary, Plaintiffs' own declarations displayed significant differences in job duties among the distinct job titles encompassed by the proposed manager collective action. The Court opined that while Plaintiffs need not have "identical" job duties to be "similarly-situated," Plaintiffs' proposed manager collective action plainly involved jobs with material distinctions in positions of authority and managerial responsibilities, issues that were at the heart of Plaintiffs' misclassification claim. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification for both the proposed non-exempt collective action and the proposed manager collective action.

Baucum, et al. v. Marathon Oil Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109390 (S.D. Tex. July 14, 2017). Plaintiff, a health, environment, and safety advisor ("HES"), filed a collective action alleging that Defendant improperly classified him and others similarly-situated as independent contractors and paid them a day rate with no overtime compensation for hours worked in excess of 40 hours in a workweek in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff alleged that he and all the putative collective action members shared the same or similar job requirements and pay provisions, were subjected to the same or similar policies and procedures, worked the same or similar hours, and were denied overtime as a result of the same illegal pay practice. Id. at *3. Plaintiff sought to certify a collective action of all persons who worked for Defendant as HES advisors and/or solids control operators who were classified as independent contractors and paid a day-rate with no overtime compensation from 2014 to the present. Id. In support of his motion, Plaintiff provided declarations of one HES advisor, Gerald Bounds, and one solids control operator, John Smith, both of whom stated that despite regularly working more than 40 hours per week, they did not receive overtime and were paid a day rate. Id. at *11. Bounds and Smith also stated that they knew of other similarly-situated former co-workers who would be interested to learn about their rights and the opportunity to join the action. The Court found that Plaintiff's evidence established that there was a reasonable basis for believing Plaintiff's assertion that other aggrieved individuals existed who worked for Defendant as both HES advisors and solids control operators. Id. at *12. Defendant contended that solids control operators were not similarly-situated to HES advisors, and that Plaintiff was not a proper representative for a collective action that included solids control operators because the nature of the relationships between Defendant and the consulting companies that provided HES advisors were very different from the contracts and the relationships between Defendant and the oilfield services companies that provided solids control operators, and the services provided by the HES advisors under these contracts were different from those provided by the solids control operators. Id. at *12-13. Defendant further argued that the Court should exclude solids control operators from the proposed collective action because application of the economic realities test would vary depending upon whether the workers to whom it applied were HES advisors or solids control operators, i.e., as the two positions were not similarly-situated. Id. at *16-17. The Court found that the declarations submitted by Plaintiffs Bounds and Smith uniformly stated that Defendant scheduled them to work 12 to 14 hour shifts and to be on-call 24 hours a day, provided the equipment necessary for them to perform their jobs, instructed them on how to perform their jobs, supervised their performance, required them to live in Defendant-owned trailers on or near their jobsites, and did not require them to make significant financial investments in their jobs. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff carried his burden of showing that HES advisors and solids control operators were similarly-situated in terms of job requirements. Id. at *22-23. The Court therefore ruled that conditional certification was appropriate, and it granted Plaintiff's motion.

Biller, et al. v. RMCN Credit Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 67210 (E.D. Tex. May 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, an hourly employee, filed a collective and class action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action. The Magistrate Judge recommended granting Plaintiffs' motion. Pursuant to Rule 72, Defendant objected to the Magistrate Judge's recommendation. Nonetheless, the Court adopted the Magistrate Judge's report. Id. at *2. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant, a credit repair company, required him to be on Defendant's jobsite prior to his scheduled start time in order to perform certain integral and indispensable tasks and therefore he began work 15 or 20 minutes early each day without compensation for the pre-shift activities. Id. at *3. The Magistrate Judge's report found that Plaintiff demonstrated: (i) that the employees were similarly-situated for the purposes of first stage certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b); (ii) other employees existed who were interested in opting-in to the lawsuit; and (iii) a reasonable basis existed for crediting Plaintiff's assertions. Id. at *6. The Magistrate Judge concluded that "Plaintiff meets the low burden required for conditional certification at the first stage of this litigation." Id. On Rule 72 review, Defendant contended that Plaintiff failed to meet even the minimal burden of "presenting preliminary facts to show that there is a similarly-situated group of potential Plaintiffs." Id. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs presented only allegations, not evidence, to meet this burden. Id. at *7. Defendant also claimed that Plaintiff failed to meet the burden of presenting facts supporting his claim that the hourly employees were similarly-situated because Plaintiff did not provide "a single factual allegation as to the nature of the alleged pre-shift activities." Id. The Court agreed with the Magistrate Judge that Plaintiff met the lenient first stage of conditional certification burden. Plaintiff's declaration revealed that Defendant employed Plaintiff on an hourly basis and required Plaintiff as a matter of course to engage in pre-shift activities without compensation and that Defendant required the same of other employees paid by the hour with whom Plaintiff worked and that Plaintiff observed other hourly employees performing similar tasks. Id. at *10. Additionally, Plaintiff submitted declarations from three former employees, who each averred Defendant similarly paid them on an hourly basis and required that they engage in pre-shift activities without pay. Id. The Court concluded that Plaintiff's allegations, combined with the declarations, were sufficient to carry Plaintiff's burden at the first stage of conditional certification. Id. at *11-12. Accordingly, the Court held that the findings and conclusions of the Magistrate Judge were correct and adopted the Magistrate Judge's report and recommendation granting Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Card, et al. v. Quality Cable Partners, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 213454 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 29, 2017).
Plaintiff, a foreman for a cable installation company, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants misclassified foreman and helpers as independent contractors and thereby failed to pay them overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part. Defendant, a provider of network cabling products and cable installation services to end-users in various industries, outsourced installation services to several businesses prior to January of 2015. After January of 2015, Defendant directly hired several workers, including Plaintiff. As a foreman, Plaintiff was primarily paid a commission for each project, calculated on a piece-rate basis for the service performed. Helpers who worked on the projects under a foreman' direction were paid by the hour. Id. at *3. Plaintiff sought conditional certification of a group of similarly-situated foremen and helpers who worked for Defendant during the relevant time period. The Court found that the evidence accompanying Plaintiff's motion was sufficient to establish that other foremen were similarly-situated to Plaintiff, given that they performed the same duties, were paid on the same piece-rate commission basis, and their pay was subject to certain deductions, including the hourly pay of the helpers on the job. Id. Thus, the Court held that while foremen might work at different job-sites, they were all subject to a single pay policy. Id. at *4. However, the Court determined that helpers were not similarly-situated to foreman because their job duties were not the same as the foremen who oversaw their work, they were not paid on the same basis as the foremen, and there were the material factual differences between the two jobs that might also give rise to different legal defenses at trial. Id. at *4-5. Accordingly, the Court concluded that helpers were not similarly-situated to Plaintiff and other foremen, and should not be included in the collective action. The Court therefore granted Plaintiff's motion in part, with respect to a collective action consisting of foreman only.

Collier, et al. v. CarePlus Health Services, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13649 (E.D. Tex. Feb. 1, 2017).
Plaintiffs, a group of vocational nurses, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation and did not accurately record all nurses' time in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs' primary job duties included traveling to patients' homes and providing patients with nursing care. Defendants compensated nurses on a salary basis, on a per visit basis consisting of a set amount of pay for each patient visit, on a salary plus points basis, or on a points only basis. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs submitted testimony that they each worked over 40 hours per week without being paid overtime compensation. Plaintiff further asserted that they were aware of other vocational nurses who were not paid overtime compensation. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action. Defendants contend that collective treatment was not appropriate because each nurse's schedule varied based on the "location of the patient, the type of treatment required, the day of the week or the time of the treatment, whether the patient required a nurse who spoke a foreign language, and the individual nurse's patient caseload for that day or week." Id. at *5-6. The Court stated that Plaintiffs need only to show that their positions were similar to the potential Plaintiffs. Id. at *6. The Court found that Plaintiffs submitted sufficient evidence that each of their primary duties involved traveling to a patient's house and providing nursing care. The Court opined that Plaintiffs performed the same basic tasks and were therefore similarly-situated, even if the time at which Plaintiffs provided nursing care or the language in which Plaintiffs spoke to patients differed. Id. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated because Plaintiffs were paid differently and some worked full-time while others worked part-time. However, the Court determined that Plaintiffs alleged that they each often worked over 40 hours a week and were not paid overtime compensation at any point during their employment, and that they are aware of other nurses who were not paid overtime compensation. Id. at *7. The Court therefore found that Plaintiffs sufficiently alleged that they were victims of a similar plan under which they did not receive overtime compensation. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Contreras, et al. v. Land Restoration LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22842 (W.D. Tex. Feb. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of manual landscape laborers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant required them to work for 10 to 12 hours a day and 50 to 60 hours a week, without paying overtime compensation, in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs' proposed collective action consisted of Defendants' current and former employees who worked as manual laborers and were paid an hourly or daily rate at any time during the three year period before filing the lawsuit. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs stated that they worked for Defendants from 2012 to 2014 as manual laborers in the areas of landscaping and construction, that neither they nor their co-workers were paid overtime, and that a number of potential collective action members feared both work and immigration status-related retaliation should they come forward and join the lawsuit. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiffs asserted that the possibilities of coercion and retaliation merited special consideration in light of the fact that the collective action would be composed of "almost all non-English-speaking immigrant workers who earn low wages, were relatively transient, moving as necessary to find employment, and had legitimate fears of retaliation for asserting their rights under the FLSA." Id. at *7. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' declarations did not demonstrate a reasonable basis to credit the assertion that other aggrieved individuals existed and were not paid overtime pursuant to a single decision, policy, or plan. Id. at *8. Defendant further argued that Plaintiffs failed to identify any other individuals who wished to opt-in to the lawsuit. The Court found that there was a reasonable basis for crediting the assertion that aggrieved individuals existed, and that those aggrieved individuals were similarly-situated to Plaintiffs. Id. at *13. The Court stated that Plaintiffs worked for Defendants for approximately two years, during which Defendants employed between ten and twenty other employees who performed similar manual labor. Id. The Court determined that Plaintiffs stated that they knew their co-workers were paid in the same way as they were and did not receive overtime for hours worked over 40 hours in a week, based on frequent conversations in which they and their co-workers complained about their pay. Id. at *14. The Court found Plaintiffs' allegations sufficient to demonstrate that there were other aggrieved employees who were subject to an allegedly unlawful policy or plan. The Court also held that Plaintiffs' allegations were sufficient to demonstrate that the aggrieved individuals were similarly-situated. Id. at *15. The Court further opined that Plaintiffs need not specifically show that other aggrieved individuals desired to opt-in at this stage of litigation. Id. at *16. The Court therefore granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action. The Court also ordered Defendant to distribute Plaintiffs' proposed notice and consent forms with its paychecks to current employees and to post the forms in English and Spanish in a conspicuous place readily and routinely available for review at Defendants' place of business. Id. at *25-26.

Cotiy-Monzon, et al. v. Fu Cheng,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 164746 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant workers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs argued that they and similarly-situated cooks, food preparers, and dishwashers who worked for Defendant were not paid overtime compensation for hours worked over 40 in a workweek and they were not paid for all hours works. Defendants argued that differences between cooks of Mongolian versus Chinese dishes precluded a finding that Plaintiffs and the opt-in Plaintiffs were similarly-situated. Id. at *1-2. The Court disagreed, and ruled that differences between food preparers or cooks and dishwashers could be addressed by sub-classes if necessary. Id. at *2. The Court found that Plaintiffs' evidence was sufficient for conditional certification. The Court stated that Plaintiffs could mail the requested notice to potential opt-in collective action members. The Court ordered Defendant to provide Plaintiffs with names and addresses of all cooks, dishwashers, and food preparers employed by Defendant during the three years before the filing of the action. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Ecoquij-Tzep, et al. v. Hawaiian Grill,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95458 (N.D. Tex. June 21, 2017). Plaintiff, a cashier and server, brought a collective action asserting claims under the FLSA for unpaid overtime and minimum wage. Plaintiff alleged that he worked an average of 70 hours per week and was paid in lump sum payments regardless of the actual number of hours worked. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff further alleged that he was not paid the extra half-time rate for any overtime hours worked above 40 hours per week and was paid an average effective hourly rate below the applicable minimum wage. Id. at *2. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), which the Court granted. Plaintiff's proposed collective action consisted of hourly employees employed by Defendant from March 5, 2013, to the present, including cashiers, servers, and cooks who were paid a fixed sum regardless of the total hours worked instead of being paid by the hour. Id. Plaintiff asserted that the employees were similarly-situated because Defendant had a common policy or practice to pay hourly employees lump sum payments regardless of the actual number of hours worked. Id. In support of his allegations, Plaintiff relied on the deposition of Defendant's corporate representative, Shizhong Zhang, who testified that Defendant had a practice of paying fixed sums instead of the minimum wage and overtime to certain hourly employees, including cashiers, servers, and cooks. Id. at *3. Zhang testified that Plaintiff was paid bi-monthly and that he was paid a set amount regardless of the hours he worked. Zhang also stated that he knew of at least five others paid bi-monthly in the same manner. Id. Defendant argued that a collective action definition based solely on bi-monthly payment was too broad and that cashiers/servers and cooks were not similarly-situated employees because they performed different lines of work and had different job duties, working schedules, and working conditions. Id. at *3-4. Defendant also asserted that Plaintiff failed to show how the hourly employees were subject to the same employment practices or common policy as Plaintiff. The parties also disagreed in their interpretations of the Court's previous order, in which the Court concluded that Plaintiff's individual coverage allegations were insufficient to state a claim and dismissed Plaintiff's FLSA claim based on individual coverage with prejudice. Id. at *4. Defendant argued that, even if the cashiers, servers, and cooks were similarly-situated to Plaintiff, the Court's order precluded any FLSA claim because, like Plaintiff, the cashiers, servers, and cooks could not state a claim for individual coverage. Id. Plaintiff asserted that, like him, they could pursue their FLSA claims under an enterprise coverage theory. Id. at *5. The Court ruled that "similarly-situated" did not mean identically situated, and Plaintiff alleged a strong nexus between himself and the potential collective action members that bound them together as victims of an alleged policy or practice, despite the different job duties of cashiers, servers, and cooks. Id. at *8-9. The Court determined that Plaintiff demonstrated that there were at least five potential collective action members who were similarly-situated based on Defendant's alleged policy to pay hourly employees on a lump sum basis regardless of the hours worked. The Court stated that the previous order did not preclude granting collective action certification. Id. at *9. The Court, therefore, concluded that its prior ruling was consistent and granted conditional certification on Plaintiff's remaining claim.

Escobar, et al. v. Ramelli Group, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110361 (E.D. La. July 17, 2017). Plaintiff, a landscape laborer, brought a collective action asserting that Defendants failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, and the Court granted the motion. Plaintiffs submitted six affidavits along with their pleadings that alleged they and potential collective class members were allegedly employed by Defendants and were not paid overtime for working more than 40 hours per week. Id. at *6. The Court noted that Plaintiffs provided sufficient evidence to warrant conditional certification at this stage of the litigation, since the affidavits all alleged that they experienced the same failure to pay overtime wages and knew of dozens of other individuals employed by Defendants who were paid in the same manner. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification. Plaintiff also requested that Defendants provide a computer-readable data file that included the full names, current or last known addresses, email addresses, and phone numbers for current and former employees fitting the description of the conditionally certified collective action. The Court granted the request and ordered Defendants to produce the information. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs also requested to send an agreed upon text message to each person's last known telephone number, which the Court also approved. Id. at *8. The Court reviewed Plaintiff's proposed notice and found that it adequately apprised potential Plaintiffs of their rights. Id. at *9. Finally, Plaintiff requested a 90-day time period after distribution of notice for interested collective action members to file their consents pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), which the Court also approved.

Espinosa, et al. v. Stevens Tanker Division, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64188 (W.D. Tex. April 27, 2017). Plaintiff, a dispatcher, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA when it improperly classified him and other similarly-situated employees as exempt and thereby denied them overtime compensation. The Court had previously granted conditional certification of a collective action comprised of all past or present salaried dispatchers who worked for Defendant any time since October 12, 2012, at any of Defendant's locations, who were not paid overtime compensation. In an unusual procedural motion, Plaintiff subsequently filed a motion to decertify the collective action because "in reviewing the potential claims of numerous opt-ins, it is apparent that their claims are not the same or similar and/or their work situations varied greatly from [Plaintiff]." Id. at *3-4. Plaintiff asserted that: (i) the opt-ins performed different job duties; (ii) Defendant had two separate district offices and each office worked under different management; (iii) some dispatchers worked under a dispatch supervisor while others did not; and (iv) some dispatchers were actually titled "senior dispatchers" while others were not. Id. at *11-12. As to the first assertion, based on employee affidavits, Plaintiff argued that each opt-in Plaintiff would have a different set of facts regarding alleged job duties, which precluded the opt-ins from being similarly-situated. The Court found that nowhere in the affidavits did it indicate that Plaintiff's job duties differed from those of the other opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. at *12. The Court stated that the evidence was actually to the contrary, as the affidavits showed that the job duties of the opt-ins did not differ. Id. As to the second assertion, the Court determined that Plaintiff provided no evidence to show that the existence of different locations, offices, "districts," or "district offices" had any meaningful effect on whether Defendant's dispatchers were similarly-situated. Id. at *14. As to Plaintiff's third argument, the Court found that the role of dispatch supervisors in advising some opt-ins but not others was also immaterial to the similarly-situated inquiry because their presence did not appear to change the opt-ins Plaintiffs' job duties. Id. at *19. Finally, the Court opined that Plaintiff's final argument for decertification, regarding the "senior night dispatch" title, was proven false by deposition testimony showing that the position did not exist. Id. at *20. Plaintiff also argued that a detailed determination of each individual opt-ins' job duties would be required in order to determine whether that opt-in was subject to the administrative exemption. Id. at *21. The Court disagreed, stated that Plaintiff and two opt-ins Plaintiffs provided declarations stating that they had the same job duties and that other dispatchers had the same duties as well. Id. at *21-22. Furthermore, the Court determined that since dispatch supervisors did not materially alter the opt-ins' job duties, their presence was irrelevant for purposes of the administrative exemption. Similarly, Defendant's different locations did not alter the opt-ins' job duties, nor did the "senior night dispatch" title because such a title did not actually exist. Id. at *22. Therefore, the Court held that the applicability of the administrative exemption could be determined on a collective basis, as the relevant facts pertaining to job duties appeared to be the same for all members of the collective action. Finally, the Court noted that procedural fairness went against decertification as the case had been on-going for over a year and a half and discovery was nearly closed. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to decertify the collective action.

Gomez, et al. v. Mi Cocina Ltd.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123085 (N.D. Tex. Aug. 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of waiters, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiffs contended that Defendants: (i) did not pay them for all hours worked; (ii) did not pay them overtime pay for hours worked in excess of 40 hours per week; (iii) required them to work during their breaks; (iv) required them and other tipped employees to work off-the-clock or for $2.13 per hour "to do deep cleaning outside of their normal responsibilities;" (v) deducted cash from earned tips to cover non-paying customers, broken items, or register shortages; (vi) required waiters/waitresses, bus boys, hostesses, and bartenders to participate in a tip-pool; (vii) withheld a percentage of credit card tips to cover transaction costs charged by credit card companies; (viii) required waitresses and waiters to contribute 3% of their tips to a tip-pool that was distributed to bartenders, bus staff, and hostesses; (ix) required a portion of tips to be paid to management and other ineligible employees; and (x) failed to inform them that Defendant intended to take a tip credit. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs had previously filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. After discovery, Defendant filed a motion to decertify the collective action, arguing that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated, that individual fact-findings and legal conclusions would inevitably dominate the case and make impossible a determination of any common facts or legal issues, and that Plaintiffs could not propose a manageable trial plan. Id. at *6. The Court granted Defendant's motion. The Court found that Plaintiffs provided no evidence of a single express decision, policy, or plan that was illegal and had the same impact on members of the entire collective action. Id. at *10-11. The Court held that the evidence showed that Defendants' policies were, on their face, lawful, prohibited all "off-the-clock" work, and recognized that employees must be paid overtime compensation in accordance with applicable state and federal law. Id. at *11. Moreover, the Court determined that opt-in Plaintiffs claims were so factually disparate as to make the case unmanageable as a collective action. Many opt-in Plaintiffs admitted they never worked off-the-clock, that their payroll records were accurate, that they never took breaks, or that they were compensated for breaks taken on-the-clock. Id. Similarly, with respect to Plaintiffs' contention that Defendant took a tip credit, those contentions were not susceptible to collective treatment because the Court noted that the collective action members did not have shared experiences. Id. Further, as to Plaintiffs' contention that they were deprived a minimum wage as a result of improper deductions, the Court found that the discovery showed that very few opt-in Plaintiffs even complained of having experienced deductions. Id. at *12. Further, several opt-in Plaintiffs admitted to rarely working overtime, or stated that they were properly paid for all overtime. Id. Finally, the Court held that Plaintiffs have not provided any feasible ways to have a trial of a case with so many factual dissimilarities relating to the opt-in Plaintiffs. The Court opined that the case involved too many different types of employees, working at too many different locations over a long time period, with dissimilar claims, issues and facts. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court found that decertification of the collective action was appropriate, and granted Defendant's motion.

Gremillion, et al. v. Cox Communication Of Louisiana,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96393 (E.D. La. June 22, 2017). Plaintiff, an installation technician, brought a putative collective action against Defendants alleging violations of the FLSA, as well as a putative class action alleging violations of Louisiana wage laws. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of his FLSA claims, which the Court granted. Plaintiff argued that conditional certification was appropriate because he and the putative collective action members were all subjected to Defendant's policy of being paid on a point system without compensation for overtime work. Plaintiff asserted that all technicians performed work such as driving to the warehouse to pick up equipment and driving to customers' homes, and all technicians were paid on a point system that did not take into consideration the actual time it took to complete a job. Id. at *9-10. Plaintiff further alleged that he and other technicians were subject to deductions from their paychecks, causing them to earn less than the minimum wage. Id. at *10. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff failed to present any evidence to establish that there were similarly-situated individuals outside of Louisiana. However, the Court noted that Plaintiff was seeking to conditionally certify a class of Louisiana technicians only. Id. The Court therefore found that Plaintiff met his burden at the conditional certification stage of showing that he was similarly-situated to the other putative collective action members because it was undisputed that all Louisiana technicians were paid under the same point-based policy that allegedly violated the FLSA. Id. Defendant also argued that Plaintiff's motion should be denied because he did not submit affidavits from any potential Plaintiffs, nor did he identify any other potential Plaintiffs. Id. at *11. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that Plaintiff's failure to include affidavits of other employees was fatal to his motion for conditional certification. Id. at *11-12. The Court determined that Plaintiff identified a common policy that affected all technicians covered by it. Further, the Court stated that Defendant did not dispute its payment method was a policy covering all technicians performing work for customers in Louisiana until November 2016. Id. at *12. Defendant also did not claim that individual technicians performing work in Louisiana might be subject to different policies or might display individual differences that would make administration of this lawsuit as a collective action inefficient. Id. at *12-13. Accordingly, the Court held that as to technicians performing work for Defendant in Louisiana, Plaintiff established that he and such other technicians were sufficiently similarly-situated. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Hendrix, et al. v. Shipcom Wireless, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 60718 (S.D. Tex. April 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of blueprinters, filed an action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA by misclassifying them as exempt and thereby failing to pay overtime. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action of all current and former blueprinters, who were employed by Defendant between September 7, 2013 and the present, and who worked more than 40 hours a week without receiving overtime pay. Id. at *4. In support of the motion, Plaintiffs presented seven declarations stating that: (i) each was a blueprinter at Defendant and he/she worked more than 40 hours a week but was not paid overtime; (ii) blueprinters at Defendant were classified as exempt employees; and (iii) blueprinters worked more than 40 hours a week and were not paid overtime. Id. at *7. Defendant did not deny that there were other blueprinters classified as exempt and not paid overtime, or that other blueprinters had different responsibilities. Id. at *10. However, Defendant asserted that their exempt classification was proper. Id. at *11. The Court stated that whether the classification was proper was a defense to the FLSA claims, but it was not a reason to deny conditional certification. Id. at *12. Further, the Court found that Plaintiffs' declarations made a reasonable showing that other aggrieved blueprinters existed. The Court determined that Plaintiffs were similarly-situated to members of the proposed collective action. Plaintiffs were all employed by Defendant as blueprinters with the same basic job responsibilities, including designing and reorganizing supply areas and operating rooms at VA hospitals. Id. The Court held that since the blueprinters all had similar job responsibilities, it was reasonable to believe other blueprinters performed the same tasks. Id. at *12-13. Therefore, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs established that their jobs were similarly-situated to those of a potential group of blueprinters. The Court opined that Defendant's concession that it classified all blueprinters as exempt employees showed that they were subject to the same pay provisions. Id. at *13. Defendant insisted that conditional certification was not appropriate because Plaintiffs "have not provided the substantial allegations necessary to show that any of them . . . were victims of an illegal pay policy under federal law. . . . [but] have merely alleged that their position was misclassified" without supporting evidence. Id. at *13-14. The Court ruled that whether Plaintiffs could actually prove their allegations that the complained of classification violated the FLSA did not defeat a showing that potential collective action members were subject to different pay provisions or that conditional certification was inappropriate. Id. at *14. Defendant also asserted that certification was not proper because many of the blueprinters were not employed by Defendant, but instead were staffing company contractors. Defendant argued that the potential collective action members were therefore not similarly-situated. The Court noted that Plaintiffs narrowed the potential collective action to "current and former blueprinters employed by Shipcom." Id. For that reason, the Court determined that any collective action would include only blueprinters that were employed by Defendant, and not contractors. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Hernandez, et al. v. Morning Call Coffee Stand, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 166018 (E.D. La. Oct. 6, 2017). Plaintiff, a kitchen helper, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff alleged that she, and at least 20 co-workers, frequently worked for Defendant more than 40 hours per week and were not paid overtime wages. Id. at *2. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant's unlawful pay practices were commonly applied throughout Defendant's business, and therefore the putative collective action members were similarly-situated such that conditional certification was appropriate. Id. at *2-3. In support of her motion, Plaintiff submitted her own written declaration and requests for admission. Id. at *3. Defendant subsequently failed to respond to Plaintiff's request for admissions, and they were now deemed admitted by the Court. As a result, Defendant admitted that it employed at least 20 other workers and/or kitchen helpers over the last three years and that Defendant had a company-wide policy of not paying its employees one-and-half times their hourly rate for all hours worked in excess of 40 in a workweek. Id. at *7. The Court found that Plaintiff satisfied her burden of demonstrating she was similarly-situated to the purported class. Further, the Court ruled that Plaintiff's proposed notice was "timely, accurate, and informative," and approved the proposed notice, in English and Spanish versions. Id. at *8. Finally, in order to facilitate sending the notice and consent forms, the Court ordered Defendant to provide the names and last known addresses of potential collective action members. The Court therefore granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Mahrous, et al. v. LKM Enterprises*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97918 (E.D. La. June 26, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former hourly employees, brought a collective action asserting that Defendants violated various provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of their FLSA claims, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs initially filed the same FLSA claims against a related Defendant, and later added the LKM Defendants in a third amended complaint. Defendants operate convenience stores in the New Orleans area. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants engaged in a deliberate and willful policy and practice of failing to pay non-exempt, hourly employees overtime pay as required by the FLSA. Plaintiffs asserted that they worked 70 to 80 hours per week for but were not paid legally required overtime for hours worked in excess of 40 hours per week. Plaintiffs further asserted that Defendants unlawfully deducted required business expenses from their pay, failed to maintain proper time records as required by law, and failed to compensate Plaintiffs for all hours worked. Plaintiffs sought to certify a collective action of all current and former non-exempt, hourly employees who had been employed by Defendants in Louisiana during the time period of November 28, 2009 through the present. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs alleged that members of this proposed collective action were similarly-situated because they all had similar job positions and requirements, were subjected to similar terms and conditions of employment, and were subjected to common policies and practices that denied them overtime pay and resulted in unlawful deductions of the cost of required uniforms and nametags from their wages. Id. Defendants did not oppose conditional certification, but objected to Plaintiffs' proposed definition of the collective action, the form and content of the proposed notice, and aspects of the plaintiffs' request for information. The Court found that Plaintiffs met the standard for conditional certification, as they submitted affidavits alleging that named Plaintiffs and other potential collective action members were subject to common unlawful practices and policies, including refusal to pay overtime wages, a requirement that employees pay for uniforms and nametags out of their wages, a failure to pay the federal minimum wage as a result of unlawful deductions, and a failure to maintain proper time-keeping records. Id. at *6. The parties disputed the appropriate time period for the collective action definition. Plaintiffs proposed that the conditionally certified collective action include all current and former non-exempt, hourly employees employed by Defendants in the three years prior to the filing of the original complaint, or in the alternative, a time period beginning three years before the filing of the third amended complaint on June 30, 2015. Defendants asserted that Plaintiffs' definition was overbroad and asked that the collective action be limited to employees who worked for Defendants within three years of the date of this order. Id. at *7. The Court stated that this case had a complex procedural history that still presented unresolved issues regarding the statute of limitations and possible tolling. Id. at *8. The Court noted that Defendants would have the opportunity at the appropriate time to challenge the timeliness of any claims brought by putative Plaintiffs who wished to opt-in to the litigation. Id. The Court therefore granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action with the liability period beginning on June 30, 2012, i.e., three years before the filing of the third amended complaint adding the LKM Defendants. The Court found that although Plaintiffs argued that the third amended complaint related back to the date of the original complaint, they did not explain how this would affect the statute of limitations for potential opt-in Plaintiffs. The Court thus held that the appropriate reference point to define the collective action was the date the complaint was filed against the LKM Defendants.

Malaska, et al. v. Saldivar Coastal Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 60721 (S.D. Tex. April 20, 2017). Plaintiff, a domestic service provider, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part. Defendant employed domestic service providers to provide in-house care for elderly and infirm patients. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant failed to pay for time traveling to and from patients' houses and attending mandatory meetings, and failed to pay overtime compensation for hours worked over 40 hours in any workweek. Defendant argued that Plaintiff had not established that a group of similarly-situated potential opt-ins Plaintiffs existed. Id. at *2-3. Defendant argued that the providers were highly individualized, performed different duties for each of their clients, and were paid differently because they worked different hours. Id. at *20. Defendant also argued that Plaintiff was unique in that she reached full-time status due to her hours, but that most providers worked part-time. Id. at *21. Finally, Defendant asserted that the practices of supervisors differed across its four offices. In support of her off-the-clock claims, Plaintiff submitted an affidavit and deposition testimony stating that domestic service providers were not compensated for transportation time between client homes. Id. at *23. The Court found that Plaintiff provided substantial allegations that potential collective action members were together the victims of a single decision, policy, or plan. Id. at *24. Further, the Court noted that the commonality of the facts between Plaintiff and the prospective class members on the off-the-clock issue would not require a fact-intensive inquiry about the nature of their work. Id. at *25. The Court also opined that the standard for conditional certification requires that Plaintiff show only that she and the employees in the proposed collective action are similarly-situated in terms of job requirements and similarly-situated in terms of payment provisions. Id. While the type of tasks, the number of hours, and other conditions of employment differed among providers, the Court found that the material aspects of the off-the-clock claim were consistent across all 1,400 workers. As to the overtime claims, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant did not pay providers the correct overtime rate of pay or for all overtime hours worked. In support, Plaintiff submitted timesheets purporting to show that she worked more than 40 hours per week in certain pay periods. Id. at *29. The Court, however, determined that Plaintiff failed to provide a factual basis for allegations that the other 1,400 providers were not paid appropriate overtime. The Court determined that even if it drew an inference from Plaintiff's allegations and deposition testimony that there were some instances where Defendant did not properly pay other employees overtime, the mere fact that violations occurred was not enough to establish similarity.

Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion with respect to her off-the-clock claims and denied it as to her overtime claims.

Mariena-Rivera, et al. v. Lanston Construction,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 99128 (M.D. La. June 27, 2017). Plaintiff, a construction laborer, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part. Plaintiff's proposed collective action consisted of all individuals who worked or were working for Langston Construction, LLC or Composite Architectural Design Systems, LLC during the previous three years and who were eligible for overtime pay pursuant to the FLSA, and who did not receive full overtime compensation." Id. at *6. Defendants argued that the group was too broad because it would appear to include, for example, office personnel, who were clearly not similarly-situated to Plaintiff, a general construction laborer who installed and fabricated materials and who was paid on an hourly basis. Id. at *7. The Court agreed that the proposed collective action was too broad. First, the proposed collective action would likely require the Court to engage in individualized inquiries into whether the Defendants' policy violated the FLSA as to some employees but not others. Id. Second, the Court noted that Plaintiff failed to introduce any evidence that other employees, besides manual laborers, were subjected to the alleged illegal policy in which they were not paid time-and-a-half for every hour worked over 40 hours. Accordingly, the Court found that in the absence of evidence about other employees beyond manual laborers, it would not certify such a broad collective action. Id. at *8. The Court therefore granted Plaintiff's motion in part, and conditionally certified a collective action consisting of only manual laborers, and not all hourly employees.

Moreno, et al. v. National Oilwell Varco, L.P.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 196199 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 29, 2017). Plaintiff, a rig welder, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified welders as independent contractors and thereby failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part and denied in part. Plaintiff sought to certify a collective action consisting of current and former welders, rig welders, and mechanics who worked at any location during the last three years and were classified as independent contractors. Id. at *2-3. Defendant opposed conditional certification and argued that Plaintiff failed to meet his burden of establishing that an employee-employer relationship existed and that similarly-situated individuals existed. Defendant further argued that if the Court granted conditional certification, it should be limited in location and job title. Plaintiff submitted four declarations of rig welders, including his own, in support of his assertion that there were other non-exempt, aggrieved employees who worked at Defendant as welders or rig welders, who were misclassified as independent contractors, and were not paid overtime wages. Id. at *4. The Court determined that Plaintiff provided sufficient evidence to credit his assertion that other individuals existed. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff failed to show that welders, as opposed to rig welders, were subjected to an unlawful policy in which Defendant failed to pay them overtime wages. The Court opined that although Plaintiff need only show that the employees performed the same basic tasks, Plaintiff failed to supply evidence of a welder's basic duties, thereby preventing the Court from comparing the two jobs' basic tasks. Id. at *8. The Court also found that Plaintiff did not provide sufficient factual support to show that mechanics performed the same job duties as rig welders. Thus, the Court held that Plaintiff's evidence only provided a reasonable basis to believe that there were other rig welders who performed the duties of repairing drilling rigs who were misclassified as independent contractors and were not paid overtime wages. Accordingly, the Court narrowed Plaintiff's proposed collective action to include rig welders only. Id. at *9. The Court further determined that Plaintiff provided a reasonable basis for concluding that Defendant's policy of misclassifying rig welders as independent contractors existed at the Galena Park location, but not at any other location, as all of the declarations were from workers who worked at Galena Park. Id. at *15. The Court also stated that Plaintiff provided evidence that others sought to join the lawsuit, as six additional opt-in Plaintiffs had filed consents to join the action, and another related action consolidated with this action where 26 opt-in Plaintiffs had joined. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification, but limited the scope of the collective action to rig welders at the Galena Park location.

Novick, et al. v. Shipcom Wireless, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 55699 (S.D. Tex. April 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of trainers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA by misclassifying trainers as exempt and thereby failing to pay overtime compensation. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant previously reclassified the trainer position as a non-exempt position. Plaintiff asserted that the fact that Defendant now paid trainers overtime was evidence that Plaintiffs were improperly denied overtime compensation when they were classified as exempt employees. Defendant contended, however, that not all of its trainer positions were reclassified, and that some individuals in that position were still classified as exempt. Id. at *3. In support of their motion for conditional certification, Plaintiffs each attached a declaration in which he or she claimed to have worked more than 40 hours a week, but was not paid overtime compensation. Id. at *6. The declarations also briefly described each Plaintiffs' job duties, the purported representations about compensation that were made to each worker at the time of hiring, and his or her knowledge that the position was reclassified from an exempt to a non-exempt status. Id. The Court found that while all six Plaintiffs filed declarations, not one of them averred that he or she had personal knowledge that there were any other similarly-situated individuals. Id. at *12. The Court opined that although it may presume the existence of other aggrieved individuals from circumstantial evidence, it would not do so in the absence of any evidence at all. The Court further determined that Plaintiffs were requesting permission to send notices to trainers, accounts payable clerks/financial analysts, field support engineers, and travel coordinators, but Plaintiffs' own statements showed that each of these jobs had entirely dissimilar duties. Id. at *14. The Court held that Plaintiffs did not show that there were other employees in these four job categories who were sufficiently similarly-situated to themselves to warrant conditional certification. Further, the Court ruled that there was a sound reason to require proof there were similarly-situated individuals who wanted to join this litigation, since evidence of other employees who were willing to join the litigation was necessary to ensure that the mechanism for a collective action was being used appropriately to promote judicial efficiency, rather than used as a tool to burden a Defendant and create settlement pressure. Id. at *15. The Court noted that Plaintiffs here do not identify anyone else who wished to join, and no other employee came forward to say that they wished to do so. Further, the Court held that if Plaintiffs were employed in several different jobs, as here, they must submit more evidence to demonstrate that other Plaintiffs exist, that they were subject to a similar policy regarding overtime compensation, and that they wished to join the lawsuit. Id. The Court therefore denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Plaintiffs, a group of on-site supervisors, alleged that Defendants misclassified them as exempt employees under the FLSA and thereby failed to pay overtime compensation. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. In providing full service staffing, contracting, and management consulting to customers, Defendants compensated Plaintiffs with a flat salary on a weekly basis. Id. at *2. Defendants regularly required them to work on weekends at the discretion of a supervisor and failed to pay Plaintiffs for any work time exceeding 40 hours per week. All on-site supervisors shared similar responsibilities, keeping a log of the trucks, ensuring that the helpers were properly attired, and verifying payroll. There was no distinction in duties, responsibilities, or obligations between the work Plaintiffs performed on the weekend and the work they performed during the week. Plaintiffs sought to certify a group of all of Defendants' current and former employees employed as on-site supervisors who were paid pursuant to a flat salary with no payment for hours worked beyond 40 hours before the filing of the complaint up to the present. Id. at *3. The Court determined that Plaintiffs provided substantial allegations that they were aggrieved individuals under the FLSA. Id. at *9. In their declarations, Plaintiffs put forth detailed information about the nature of their positions as on-site supervisors, averred that they often worked "well over forty hours per week" and "frequently worked on Saturdays" but were never paid overtime for these additional hours. Id. at *10. The Court found that these facts demonstrated the existence of aggrieved individuals who were subject to Defendants' policy to exempt them from overtime pay. Id. The Court noted that Plaintiffs also averred that they all held the same position, worked similar hours, had the same job responsibilities, and were paid a flat salary for each week with no overtime compensation. The Court therefore held that Plaintiffs demonstrated that the putative collective action members were similarly-situated, as they all had the same position and were subject to the same policy of being paid a salary with no overtime compensation. Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs provided substantial allegations demonstrating that the putative collective action members were victims of a uniform policy or plan, and therefore conditional certification was warranted. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Parker, et al. v. Silverleaf Resorts,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65638 (N.D. Tex. May 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of sales representatives, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants violated the overtime and minimum wage provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of their FLSA claims, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs asserted that they were paid on a commission basis and regularly worked over 40 hours per week. Plaintiffs seek to certify a collective action of all current and former non-exempt sales employees of Defendants, who worked on-site at Defendants' resort properties. Id. at *8. Defendants argued that substantial discovery occurred prior to Plaintiffs moving for conditional certification, and therefore the Court should skip right to the more stringent standard under 29 U.S.C. § 216 (b) in its similarly-situated inquiry. Id. at *9. Defendants supported their argument by noting that discovery had been on-going for 28 months and included responses to interrogatories, requests for admission, 175 requests for production of documents, and depositions of four named Plaintiffs. Ultimately, the Court agreed with Defendants and found it appropriate to conduct its analysis using the more stringent standard. The Court noted that Plaintiffs' deposition testimony demonstrated that they did not receive overtime compensation as required by the FLSA because: (i) they were told to record around 40 hours a week regardless of the number of hours worked; (ii) they recorded lunch breaks even though they did not take them; and (iii) that these practices likely extended beyond the four named Plaintiffs given the fact that managers and directors communicated these policies at meetings and other co-workers allegedly followed these rules as well. Id. at *15. Thus, the Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied the first element of the applicable test by showing that there was a reasonable basis for believing that other aggrieved individuals existed. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated to putative collective action members because the proposed Plaintiffs included people working in different sales departments, at different resorts across the nation, for different supervisors, using different time-keeping methods, and doing various jobs such as working in contracts, gifting, or hospitality. Id. at *25. The Court determined that while Plaintiffs held varying job titles, they clarified in their declarations that their duties as "sales representative," "closer," "vc sampler representative," and "sampler representative" were essentially the same in that the primary responsibility was to sell timeshare interests. Id. at *26. The Court further found that according to the declarations submitted by Defendants, the responsibilities for sales employees appeared to not change with each resort location. Therefore, from the evidence in the record, the Court held that all sales employees who worked in outside sales and were paid based on commission performed the same basic duties and were therefore similarly-situated with regard to job requirements. Id. at *27. In order to establish that some common policy or scheme existed that extended to all other sales employees, Plaintiffs provided deposition excerpts that indicated managers and supervisors communicated this policy to multiple employees and that Plaintiffs heard that other resort locations implemented the same policy. Id. Ultimately, the Court determined that Plaintiffs produced more than a minimal amount of evidence establishing that sales employees were similarly-situated with Plaintiffs with regard to the four locations in which they previously worked, but it declined to extend the certification to all of Defendants' locations. Therefore, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification but limited Plaintiffs' proposed collective action definition to current and former sales employees whose primary responsibility was to sell timeshare interests as part of their regular duties who worked at any of the four resorts specified.

Rodriguez, et al. v. Alsalam, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24489 (E.D. La. Feb. 22, 2017). Plaintiff, a convenience store employee, brought a collective action against Defendant alleging that he and others similarly-situated were not paid the minimum wage or overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court denied. Plaintiff's responsibilities included stocking shelves, sweeping, mopping, disposing of garbage, and other manual labor. Plaintiff asserted that he was paid $600.00 per week, worked up to twelve hours per day, seven days a week, and therefore was paid only $7.14 per hour. Plaintiff also alleged that he was paid the same rate – $7.14 per house – for any hours worked in excess of 40 hours per week. Plaintiff requested conditional certification of two groups, including: (i) one group comprised of all individuals who worked or were working for Defendant during the previous three years and who were eligible for minimum wage pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 206 and who did not receive at least $7.25 per hour; and (ii) one group of individuals who worked or were working for Defendant during the previous three years and who are eligible for overtime pay pursuant to the FLSA and who did not receive full overtime compensation. Id. at *3. Defendants asserted that Plaintiff failed to prove that the putative collective action members were substantially similar or had been victims of a single decision, policy, or plan that violated the FLSA. Id. The Court found that Plaintiff's declaration was insufficient to prove that a potential group of similarly-situated individuals existed. Id. at *7. The Court stated that Plaintiff's declaration failed to allege that he and the putative collective action members were victims of a singular decision, policy, or practice. Id. at *8. Furthermore, the Court opined that Plaintiff did not provide affidavits from any other employee employed by Defendant and did not name or otherwise identify any other employee employed by Defendant. Moreover, the Court held that Plaintiff did not allege that other individuals who worked for Defendant desired to join the collective action. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Rooks, et al. v. Coastal Chemical Co., LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15972 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 6, 2017). Plaintiff, a land technician, brought a putative collective action against Defendant alleging that he was improperly paid a base salary and bonus with no overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action of all similarly-situated land technicians, which the Court denied. The Court held that Plaintiff failed to make a minimal showing that similarly-situated individuals wished to join the lawsuit. Id. at *4. The Court explained that Plaintiff's only evidence was his own declaration, in which he stated that he knew that other similarly-situated current and former land technicians would be interested to learn about their rights and their opportunity to join his lawsuit. Id. The Court determined that this evidence was insufficient because a Plaintiff may not rely on his own allegations to show that similarly-situated individuals sought to join the lawsuit. Id. The Court found that even if Plaintiff were entitled to rely on his own assertions, the declaration alleged only that similarly-situated individuals would be "interested to learn about their rights," not that they sought to join the lawsuit. Id. Finally, the Court stated that even after over a year of litigation, Plaintiff remained the only Plaintiff in the case. As such, the Court concluded that Plaintiff failed to make the minimal showing required for conditional certification. Id. at *5. The Court therefore denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Russell, et al. v. Nationwide Eviction, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173027 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 19, 2017). Plaintiff, a court representative of an eviction company, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant paid a flat fee for each court appearance, even though some appearances required him to work more than 12 hours per day. Id. at *1. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification, which the Court denied, finding that Plaintiff failed to provide evidence that others who were similarly-situated wished to opt-in to the lawsuit. Plaintiff subsequently filed a renewed motion for conditional certification, which the Court again denied. Plaintiff sought to conditionally certify a collective action of "all individuals who, at any point during the past three years prior to the filing of this lawsuit, worked for Defendant as court representatives." Id. at *6. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff failed to meet his burden to justify conditional certification, and in the alternative, that the proposed collective action and notice should be limited. Id. In support of his claims, Plaintiff relied on a single statement he made in the declaration attached as an exhibit to his motion, which stated that he knew other court representatives who worked a similar number of hours and who received a flat rate for each court appearance and were not paid one and one half times their regular rates of pay for each hour they worked over 40 in a workweek. Id. at *7. Plaintiff also specifically named two other court representatives in the declaration. The Court determined that Plaintiff failed to make a minimal showing that other similarly-situated individuals wanted to opt-in to the lawsuit. Id. The Court found that Plaintiff's statement in his declaration provided no evidence that any other individual had an interest in joining the lawsuit. Id. at *8. Further, the Court noted that in the ten months that the case had been on-going, only one individual other than Plaintiff had opted-in to the lawsuit. Id. The Court stated that it had previously declined to conditionally certify collective actions when Plaintiffs have presented more evidence than what Plaintiff had presented here. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Salinas, et al. v. Wood Group PSN Commissioning Services*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 211507 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 26, 2017). Plaintiff, an employee at an industrial facility, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part and denied in part. Plaintiff sought conditional certification of a collective action consisting of all personnel employed by Defendant during the past three years who were paid the same hourly rate for all hours worked (including hours in excess of 40 hours in a single workweek) and no overtime compensation. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiff argued that conditional certification was appropriate because additional individuals who were employed by Defendant suffered injury as a result of Defendant's purported violations of the FLSA. Plaintiff further contended that the potential collective action members were similarly-situated because they: (i) worked as hourly employees for Defendant during the operative time period; (ii) received straight time for overtime; and (iii) were all required or permitted to work overtime without receiving compensation at the legal rate of pay. Id. at *4. Defendant asserted that conditional certification should be denied because: (i) the scope of the proposed collective action was overly broad; (ii) Plaintiff was not a proper representative of the membership of the proposed collective action because he was not similarly-situated to others with respect to job duties; (iii) Plaintiff was not a proper representative because he had not provided any evidence to support his claim that a nationwide policy existed with respect to paying exempt employees "straight time" instead of overtime; (iv) Plaintiff was not similarly-situated with other potential collective action members because individualized issues predominated; and (v) Plaintiff had not shown there were other eligible members of the proposed collective action who were interested in joining the lawsuit. Id. at *5-6. The Court found that Plaintiff asserted that he was not paid overtime compensation for work over 40 hours per week and therefore Plaintiff set forth a reasonable basis for crediting the assertions that aggrieved individuals existed. Id. at *10. However, the Court held that the proposed collective action was too broad and would include individuals who were not similarly-situated. The Court determined that limiting the scope of the collective action to persons classified by Defendant as exempt would ensure that the aggrieved individuals were similarly-situated to Plaintiff in relevant respects. Id. The Court therefore held that narrowing the collective action to include employees classified as exempt would establish a collective action with a common method of compensation and a similar issue of whether the positions were appropriately classified as exempt. The Court found that there were approximately 100 to 200 individuals who could be eligible to opt-in to the collective action if limited to employees classified as exempt. Id. at *13. The Court concluded that Plaintiff's affidavit indicated he knew of other employees who received a similar method of compensation and would be interested in joining the lawsuit. Id. at *14. Therefore, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a narrower collective action consisting of exempt employees.

Senegal, et al. v. Fairfield Industries, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43830 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 27, 2017). Plaintiff, a seismic crew worker, brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification and Defendant objected to the certification motion and the form of notice. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification subject to amendments in the proposed form of notice. Defendant objected to conditional certification because some of the opt-in Plaintiffs were exempt from the FLSA. Id. at *11. The Court rejected that argument on the basis that merit-based defenses to FLSA were not properly brought to defeat conditional certification at this stage. Id. However, the Court dismissed the marine crew opt-in Plaintiffs, as the proposed collective action consisted only of seismic crew members. Id. at *12. The Court also rejected Defendant's challenges to conditional certification on the basis that pre-shift and post-shift claims required individual analysis, ruling that such individual analysis does not mean that collective action members are not similarly-situated. Id. at *14. Defendant also maintained that the pay policies were appropriate and the collective action members were compensated for overtime, and therefore conditional certification should be denied. The Court also rejected this objection because some opt-in Plaintiffs claimed that that they worked more than 12 hours a day and were not paid overtime and Plaintiff challenged whether Defendant's day-rate policy was proper under the FLSA's regulations. Id. at *15. The Court also rejected Defendant' objection to conditional certification because the putative collective action members' jobs had different titles. The Court found that the jobs did not need to be identical, just similar enough and all members were part of the seismic crew, subject to a common plan or policy. Id. at *16. Defendant also objected to Plaintiff's proposed notice. The Court disagreed with Defendant's objections, finding that the broad purpose of the FLSA warranted such notice. Id. at *18. Defendant raised several objections to the form and content of the notice. The Court ruled that the statement that the Court approved the notice was neutral and that the language regarding statute of limitations was not coercive. Id. at *20. The Court agreed with Defendant that the potential collective action members must be advised that they may have to participate in discovery and testify at trial and that they have the right to choose their own counsel. Id. at *21. The Court also ruled that the Plaintiff's counsel could collect the signed opt-in notices, as opposed to the notices going directly to the Court, as this was the usual practice. Accordingly, the Court certified the collective action and allowed notice subject to amendments in the proposed form.

Serrano, et al. v. Republic Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 89551 (S.D. Tex. June 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of waste service employees, brought a collective action under the FLSA for unpaid wages and overtime premium. Id. at *137. Plaintiffs were paid on a piece-rate basis for each long haul and, upon hire, were provided a table of rates that listed the amount that Defendant would pay per long haul. Id. at *144. Defendant, however, maintained a pay plan with provisions in addition to the piece-rate system. The parties agreed to a bifurcated bench trial. The liability issues were: (i) whether the FLSA required that Plaintiffs and Defendant come to an agreement or understanding regarding compensation for non-production time; (ii) whether there was such agreement or understanding between the parties that the piece-rate by which they were paid compensated Plaintiffs for both production and non-production work; (iii) whether Plaintiffs' on-the-clock work was unpaid non-production time; (iv) whether Defendant violated the maximum hour overtime provision by paying an incorrect regular rate for the first 40 hours in a workweek and, therefore, paid an incorrect overtime premium for all hours worked over 40 in a workweek; (v) whether Defendant acted in good faith so as to avoid liquidated damages; (vi) whether any FLSA violation was willful so as to extend the statute of limitations to three years; and (vii) whether the collective action should be decertified. Id. at *138. The Court concluded that, under the facts presented, Defendant was not permitted to derive its regular rate for purposes of calculating the overtime premium by dividing its piece-rate compensation by all hours worked in the absence of an agreement or understanding to that effect. The Court reasoned that principal activities could either be productive or non-productive; either way, the hours must be counted and paid. The Court held that Defendant's inclusion of non-production hours in its calculation of the regular rate resulted in an amount less than what the FLSA required for the regular rate and, as a result, less than what was required for the overtime rate. The Court found that Plaintiffs were not paid any amount of straight-time pay for non-productive time on-the-clock. Whereas Plaintiffs could not recover unpaid straight-time pay for any of the first 40 hours worked in a workweek, Defendant improperly used uncompensated non-production hours in determining the regular rate, and it used that artificially low regular rate to calculate overtime pay. The Court determined that although non-haul driving represented production time, time spent on truck breakdowns, stock searches, administrative time, paperwork, vehicle inspections, meetings, checking-in or checking-out with dispatchers, and security clearance was non-production time. The Court opined that fueling the trucks, landfill wait time, and customer delays was non-production time only when the time was excessive. Further, the Court ruled that Defendant did not satisfy its burden to show good faith to eliminate or mitigate liquidated damages. The Court found that Plaintiffs did not satisfy their burden to show that Defendant acted willfully for purposes of extending the statute of limitations to three years. As a result, the Court denied Defendant's motions to decertify the collective action and for judgment on partial findings. The Court ordered the parties to mediate the question of damages and stated that the Court would address damages as part of the bifurcated trial if necessary. Id. at *192.

Shaw, et al. v. Jaguar Hydrostatic Testing,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 142862 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 5, 2017). Plaintiff, a field operator/tester, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff's duties included maintaining and servicing oil and gas production facilities and overseeing the testing and monitoring of wells, pumps, storage facilities, and other pressure control equipment. Plaintiff alleged that he was non-exempt and that Defendant paid him on a salary basis plus a day rate but did not pay overtime compensation. Id. at *3. Plaintiff further asserted that he often worked in excess of 80 – and sometimes 100 – hours per week and that other employees had also been denied overtime hours in violation of the FLSA. Id. Plaintiff sought to conditionally certify a collective action of all individuals who were employed by Defendant during the past three years as junior operators, operators, field operators and pressure testers, who were paid a base salary and a day-rate/job bonus with no overtime compensation. Id. at *4. Plaintiff argued that conditional certification was appropriate because all junior operators, operators, field operators, and pressure testers "performed the same essential job duties and were subjected to the same conditions of employment." Id. at *15-16. Plaintiff asserted that the work performed and method of compensation were consistent across all of Defendant's locations, and that the employees were similarly-situated. Id. at *17. Defendant opposed the motion and argued that the evidence demonstrated that "numerous variables affect daily conditions and duties of the putative [collective action] members, thus requiring a highly individualized inquiry as to damages and defenses available." Id. Defendant argued that the majority of the putative collective action members' job duties changed daily because of variables, including "the demands of the company man, the client and the specific worksite." Id. at *17-18. Defendant also pointed out that each job title represented a separate set of functions and/or levels of experience required for that position. Defendant further asserted that the putative collective action members received varying pay and had differing levels of eligibility for bonuses. Id. at *18. The Court determined that though the job descriptions of junior operators, test pump operators, and lubricator operators varied, they need not be identical. The Court noted that Plaintiff alleged a general scheme of misclassification of employees. Therefore, the Court opined that even if there were different job functions among employees, the limited evidence before the Court showed that, in general, the prospective collective action members performed manual labor and generally did not have supervisory functions. Id. at *22-23. Therefore, the Court found that given the light burden applicable to Plaintiffs at the preliminary stage, Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification should be granted. Id. at *24.

Vaughn, et al. v. Document Group, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 60222 (S.D. Tex. April 20, 2017). Plaintiff, a litigation support service independent contractor, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA by failing to pay overtime wages for work over 40 hours per week. Plaintiff alleged that he regularly worked in excess of 40 hours and was not paid overtime wages. Plaintiff sought conditional certification of a collective action comprised of all litigation support workers Defendant employed as independent contractors within the past three years who worked over 40 hours in a week and were not paid overtime at the rate of one and one-half times their regular hourly rate. Id. at *2-3. In addition to his own affidavit, Plaintiff submitted an affidavit from Naseem Roberson, in which Roberson affirmed his intention to join the lawsuit as an opt-in Plaintiff. Id. at *3. Roberson, like Plaintiff, stated that he performed litigation support work for Defendant and that Defendant classified Roberson as an independent contractor and did not pay him overtime wages. Roberson also stated that at least 15 other workers whose duties were similar to those Roberson performed were also not paid overtime for hours worked in excess of 40. Id. at *4. The Court found that Plaintiff provided sufficient evidence to credit his assertion that aggrieved individuals existed. Id. at *6. Plaintiff alleged that he and the other collective action members were similarly-situated because "Defendant has a common policy of mischaracterizing workers as independent contractors and thereby paying them straight time instead of the statutorily required overtime pay for hours worked above forty (40) each week," and second, "Plaintiff and putative class members performed the same job duties and were paid straight time instead of time and a half for overtime hours worked." Id. at *7. The Court determined that Plaintiff and members of the proposed collective action were sufficiently similarly-situated to one another with respect to their work for Defendant and its pay practices to satisfy this factor. The Court also stated that Plaintiff adequately alleged a common policy or plan, i.e., that Defendant misclassified certain litigation support workers as independent contractors in order to avoid paying those individuals overtime. Id. at *8. Defendant argued that because it retained employees who perform "the same manual labor" as its independent contractors, this evidence showed there was no such common policy, and "Defendant's decision to treat certain personnel as W-2 employees, as opposed to 1099 workers, depended on the circumstances of each person." Id. at *9. The Court found this argument unpersuasive and stated that whether Plaintiff and other potential collective action members were subject to the FLSA's overtime requirements because they are independent contractors and not employees was a merits-based defense to FLSA claims that must be addressed at a later stage of the case. Id. at *10. Defendant also contended that Plaintiff and members of the proposed collective action were not similarly-situated because there were "substantial differences" with respect to their hours, skills, pay, and duration of relationship with Defendant. Id. Defendant stated that whether it erred in its classification of litigation support workers would require the Court to assess those differences by performing an individualized analysis of each collective action member, which would render the action ill-suited to certification. Id. at *10-11. The Court again disagreed, and ruled that Defendant failed to demonstrate any material differences for purposes of denying conditional certification because Defendant plainly employed a single policy of not paying overtime to independent contract workers. Id. at *13-14. The Court further opined that individualized analysis would not be so onerous as to "eviscerate[] all notion[s] of judicial economy that would otherwise be served by conditional class certification." Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

(vi) Sixth Circuit

Abney, et al. v. R.J. Corman Railway Group*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 138723 (E.D. Ky. Aug. 29, 2017). Plaintiff, a railway operator and laborer, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay travel time in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of his FLSA claims, which the Court granted. Plaintiff asserted that he was required to travel to project locations away from home as part of his job requirements. Plaintiff further asserted that he and similarly-situated individuals were not paid for all time spent traveling away from their home site and back in violation of 29 U.S.C. § 207(a)(1). Plaintiff sought to certify a collective action of all operators/laborers who worked for Defendant from June 2014 to the present, who worked more than 40 hours per week and were paid an hourly rate plus overtime, but not paid for all travel time from: (i) their home site to assigned project location; (ii) one assigned project location to another assigned project location; and/or (iii) an assigned project location back to home site. Id. at *4. Plaintiff submitted several employee declarations in support of his motion, all which attested that they were employed as operators or laborers for Defendant and that they similarly were not paid for all travel hours worked. Id. Plaintiff also provided a letter Defendant issued to its current employees indicating that it "recently began reviewing its travel pay practices to determine compliance with the FLSA." Id. at *5. The Court found that Plaintiff demonstrated that at least three of Defendant's former employees wished to opt-in to the action. Further, the Court held that the employees attested that they worked for Defendant as operators/laborers and were subject to the same travel pay policy that deprived them of proper overtime pay when working away from home. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff had made the minimal showing for conditional certification required at the notice stage under 29 U.S.C. § 216 (b), and it granted Plaintiff's motion.

Amos, et al. v. Lincoln Property Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106051 (M.D. Tenn. July 7, 2017). Plaintiff, a business manager, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified business managers as exempt employees and thereby denied them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff was exempt from the FLSA's provisions because she was employed in a bona fide administrative and executive capacity. Id. at *2. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part. Plaintiff submitted her own declaration in support of her allegations, which contended that despite the fact that she routinely worked more than 40 hours per workweek, she was never paid for the additional hours. According to Amos, other business managers were similarly misclassified as exempt from the provisions of the FLSA, and therefore never paid required overtime wages. Plaintiff also asserted that she personally visited and "regularly communicated" with business managers at other Lincoln properties in Tennessee. Id. at *4-5. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff failed to: (i) identify any other potential opt-in Plaintiff by name; (ii) provide any affidavit from a potential opt-in Plaintiff; or (iii) provide the Court with any evidence of a widespread discriminatory plan. Id. at *5. The Court found that at this stage of the litigation, Plaintiff had provided sufficient factual support to demonstrate that she and other business managers suffered from a single, FLSA-violating policy whereby Defendant misclassified business managers as executives who were exempt from the FLSA's overtime wage provisions. Id. at *9. The Court opined that Plaintiff's own declaration provided sufficient details to support conditional certification. Id. Additionally, the Court found that Plaintiff stated that she personally visited and "regularly communicated" with business managers at other properties and learned that other business managers also did not supervise more than one full-time employee and were expected to work in excess of 40 hours per workweek without being paid an overtime wage. Id. At this stage in the proceedings, the Court ruled that Plaintiff made a modest factual showing that she and other business managers suffered from the same allegedly unlawful pay policy, i.e., a misclassification of business managers as executives who were exempt from the provisions of the FLSA, and therefore met the lenient standard governing conditional certification. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's declaration consisted of "vague and conclusory statements and does not provide any specific details" demonstrating that she had personal knowledge of the payment policies applicable to other business managers. Id. at *10. The Court, however, stated that Plaintiff's statements that she personally visited and spoke with business managers at two additional properties were not mere conclusory allegations and they were sufficient to support a finding that Plaintiff and other business managers were similarly-situated to each other. Moreover, the Court determined that Plaintiff's statements regarding the experiences of other business managers were corroborated by Defendant's employee handbook, which classified all business managers as supervisors who were exempt from the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Id. at *10-11. Finally, Plaintiff argued that there were likely hundreds of potential opt-in Plaintiffs who were similarly-situated to her. The Court held that Plaintiff, however, did not explicitly state that she sought conditional certification of a nationwide collective action. The Court concluded that Plaintiff did not supply sufficient evidence that Defendant misclassified employees in locations outside of Tennessee. Id. at *12-13. The Court therefore limited conditional certification to business managers who were employed by Defendant at its Tennessee locations.

Anderson, et al. v. P.F. Chang's,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 134144 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 23, 2017). Plaintiff, a sous chef, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime and the minimum wage in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court denied. Plaintiff alleged that he performed the same work as hourly line cooks and was not paid any overtime premium for hours worked over 40 hours in a week. Plaintiff further alleged that his duties did not include managerial responsibilities or the exercise of independent business judgment. Plaintiff sought to conditionally certify a collective action consisting of current and former employees of Defendant who worked as food preparation employees with the title "sous chef" or in other similar non-managerial, non-administrative positions on or after November 20, 2013. Id. at *21. In support of his motion, Plaintiff included his own declaration as well as a declaration from Patrick Stancil ("Stancil"), a former employee. Plaintiff argued that the two declarations demonstrated that Defendant adopted and adhered to a policy requiring cooks with the title "sous chef" to work a double shift in excess of 40 hours per week and paid them a salary but failed to pay them overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Id. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff could not meet his burden of demonstrating the appropriateness of conditional certification based solely on his conclusory declarations that his experience and Stancil's experience were similar to those of the approximately 900 other sous chefs across over 200 locations. Id. at *22. Defendant further argued that its uniform classification did not demonstrate that sous chefs were similarly-situated. In support of its position, Defendant included declarations from 12 individuals who worked as sous chefs in 16 different restaurants. The Court found that Plaintiff failed to meet his burden, even under the fairly lenient first stage standard, for conditional certification of a collective action. Although not dispositive, one factor that the Court considered was that no other Plaintiff had opted-in to the proposed collective action. Id. at *31. While Plaintiff's declaration and Stancil's declaration contained some details regarding their duties as sous chefs, these declarations were contradicted in part by Plaintiff's deposition testimony and Defendant's declarations. Id. The Court noted that Plaintiff had not put forth any other affidavit or declaration describing the duties of any other sous chef besides himself and Stancil. Id. at *33. Under the circumstances, the Court determined that Plaintiff did not make a modest factual showing sufficient to demonstrate that he and potential Plaintiffs together were victims of a widespread, unlawful de facto policy or plan. Id. at *34. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Anderson, et al. v. The Minacs Group (USA) Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 70513 (E.D. Mich. May 9, 2017). Plaintiff, a call center representative, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA by failing to pay her and other similarly-situated employees overtime compensation when they worked more than 40 hours per week. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, and the Court granted the motion. Defendant provides business and technology support services for clients in a wide range of industries, including manufacturing, retail, banking, health care, and the public sector. Id. at *2. Plaintiff submitted declarations from herself and another former call center representative in support of her motion for conditional certification. Plaintiff stated that at the beginning of each shift, she had to perform a number of tasks before she could begin to accept incoming customer calls as required for her job, including entering a security code to enter her office concourse, log-in to her computer, and load applications. Id. at *4. Plaintiff estimated that due to delays in the computer systems, it took anywhere from 3 to 10 minutes on most days for the required computer applications to open and load. Id. at *5. Plaintiff asserted that she was instructed to arrive 15 minutes before her scheduled shift in order to complete these duties. Plaintiff stated that she and other call center representatives were not paid for the time spent on these preparatory tasks. Id. at *6. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant had a practice of not paying for pre-shift time, even if a representative requested to be paid for it. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant denied compensation for time when representatives were not engaged in telephone calls with customers. Id. at *7. Plaintiff sought conditional certification of a collective action of "[a]ll current and former hourly customer service representatives who worked for Defendant in its Farmington Hills, Michigan call center at any time during the last three years." Id. at *15. Plaintiff argued that the record at this preliminary stage of this litigation sufficiently demonstrated that she and other call center representative were subjected to similar policies and procedures regarding their compensation that: (i) improperly disregarded some of their work-related activities in tallying the number of hours they worked, and (ii) thereby resulted in denial of overtime pay to which these employees were entitled under the FLSA. Id. at *17-18. The Court found that the declarations provided by Plaintiff supported the conclusion that Defendant operated under policies and practices that failed to count the time spent on certain work-related activities toward a representative's total hours worked. The Court determined that Plaintiff made the requisite modest factual showing that she and other potential opt-in Plaintiffs together were victims of a common policy or plan that violated the law. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Conklin, et al. v. 1800Flowers.com,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 126733 (S.D. Ohio Aug. 10, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of customer service representatives ("CSRs"), filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA and related Ohio wage & hour laws by requiring them to perform work off-the-clock without compensation. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs sought conditional certification of all call center "Customer Service Representatives," or similar job title, employed by 1-800-Flowers Services Support Center, Inc. anywhere in the United States or its territories, who were not paid for the overtime hours they worked. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs submitted three declarations in support of their motion. In their declarations, the employees asserted that: (i) their duties were to take customer calls and resolve issues customers had with Defendant's services or products; (ii) their trainers informed them that Defendant's management required employees to show up for their shifts between 15 and 30 minutes early; (iii) during this time before shifts, employees were required to find an open workstation; (iv) employees had to boot up their computers and log-in to computer and phone software before the start of their shifts; and (v) they were aware of other CSRs who performed the same duties and were subjected to Defendant's same compensation policy of not paying its employees for off-the-clock work. Id. at *8-9. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' motion should be denied because the proposed collective action was vague and overbroad, Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated to the putative collective action members, and Plaintiffs failed to identify a common policy or plan that violated the FLSA. Id. at *9. With regard to the collective action definition, Defendant pointed to the declarants' different job titles, including a CSR and a "Priority Voice Specialist," and noted that it would take an individualized determination across the putative collective action to determine whether various job titles were indeed similar. Id. at *10. As for whether putative collective action members were similarly-situated, Defendant submitted declarations of ten of Defendant's employees stating that they were not similarly-situated to Plaintiffs, as they did not work off-the-clock and did not come into work early. Id. The declarations also confirmed that Defendant's written policy was for "employees to accurately record their time" and that Defendant "properly pays them for all of the hours they work." Id. Because Defendant had this written policy that employees must not work off-the-clock, and that required employees to be paid for all hours worked, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs had not identified a common policy or plan that ran afoul of the FLSA. Id. The Court stated that at this stage of the litigation it does not matter if the employees held different job titles. The Court further opined that it should not consider the declarations submitted by Defendant, as doing so at this stage of the litigation would "constitute a premature examination of the merits of the FLSA claims." Id. at *11. However, the Court determined that Plaintiffs had not presented sufficient evidence to justify the conditional certification of a nationwide collective action, as the three declarations supporting Plaintiffs' motion contained information only about employees at Defendant's Hebron call center. Id. at *12-13. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification in part, and limited the collective action to CSRs employed at Defendant's Hebron call center only.

David, et al. v. Kohler Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 140766 (W.D. Tenn. Aug. 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of hourly manufacturing employees, filed a collective action asserting that Defendant failed to pay them for off-the-clock work in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification and the Magistrate Judge recommended granting the motion. On Rule 72 review, the Court subsequently adopted the Magistrate Judge's findings, and granted the motion. Fourteen opt-in Plaintiffs submitted declarations in support of the motion indicating that that they were also hourly-paid manufacturing employees of Defendant within the three years preceding the filing of the lawsuit and were subject to Defendant's off-the-clock policies or practices, all of which deprived them of compensation and resulted in violations of FLSA overtime requirements. Id. at *3. The opt-in Plaintiffs further asserted that they were similarly-situated to the named Plaintiffs. The Magistrate Judge concluded that Plaintiffs met their lenient burden at this stage of the case to show that they were similarly-situated to the members of the putative collective action they sought to represent, despite the fact that the named Plaintiffs and the opt-in Plaintiffs were employed at six different facilities and working different jobs in different departments. Id. at *4. The Magistrate Judge reasoned that these differences could result in decertification at a later stage of the case. Id. Defendant objected, emphasizing the disparities among the members of the putative collective action. Defendant argued Plaintiffs had not shown that they were similarly-situated to the rest of the collective action they sought to represent, that all members of the putative collective action suffered from a single company-wide policy in violation of the FLSA, or that a common theory of liability unified their claims against Defendant. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs contended that they had made a prima facie showing that they were similarly-situated to the members of the putative collective action and at the conditional certification stage, the Court was required to resolve any factual disputes in favor of Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs filed supplemental declarations, in which they described in greater detail how they alleged that Defendant failed to pay them for compensable time. Id. at *7. Having reviewed the Magistrate Judge's report and recommendation de novo, Defendant's objections to the report, and the entire record of the proceedings, the Court found good cause to grant Plaintiffs' motion. The Court held that Plaintiffs met their lenient burden to show how they were similarly-situated to the other employees they sought to represent. Id. at *12. The Court stated that named Plaintiffs as well as the opt-in Plaintiffs demonstrated through the pleadings and their supporting declarations that their "claims are unified by common theories of [Kohler's] statutory violations." Id. at *15. Each performed compensable, off-the-clock work for which they did not receive pay, specifically work before and after their scheduled shifts and during lunch breaks. Defendant raised a number of arguments to rebut Plaintiffs' showing, highlighting the potential for the putative collective action to exceed 8,000 members and the multiplicity of job functions and settings in which each collective action member worked. Id. at *16. The Court noted that it was possible that the putative collective action would be so large and diverse that Plaintiffs would not be able to show that they were similarly-situated to the members of the putative collective action. Id. at *16-17. However, the Court determined that was a question it need only reach at the second stage of the certification process and on the basis of a fully developed factual record. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Dillow, et al. v. Home Care Network,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 85788 (S.D. Ohio June 5, 2017). Plaintiff, a domestic service worker, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA and the Ohio Minimum Fair Wage Standards Act ("OMFWSA"). Plaintiff sought to conditionally certify a collective action under the FLSA and to certify a class action under Rule 23 of all domestic-service employees who: (i) worked for Defendants at any time from January 1, 2015 until April 30, 2016; and (ii) worked more than 40 hours in one or more workweeks. Id. at *2. Defendant did not oppose conditional certification of Plaintiffs' proposed class for the FLSA collective action, but requested that the class be limited to the state of Ohio as it claimed there were no domestic-service employees employed outside of Ohio. However, the Court found that Defendant presented no evidence regarding the geographic scope of the employees that may be affected by the proposed collective action, and therefore it found it appropriate to conditionally certify the collective action as proposed by Plaintiff. Id. The Court stated that even if Defendant was correct in its assertion that no covered employees worked outside of Ohio, there was no functional difference between the collective action as proposed by Plaintiff or Defendant. Id. at *2-3. Defendant, however, opposed certification of a class action under Rule 23(b). The Court found that Plaintiff provided a summation of Defendants' payroll records for domestic service employees showing that during the relevant time period, more than 230 workers were allegedly not paid overtime as was legally required. Id. at *5. Therefore, the Court stated that Plaintiff met the numerosity requirement. The Court determined that Plaintiff also established that there were questions of law or fact common to the class such that Rule 23 certification was appropriate, including that Defendant did not pay its domestic-service employees overtime in violation of state and federal labor laws. The Court further opined that Plaintiff and her counsel adequately met the typicality and adequacy requirements for class certification imposed by Rule 23, as Plaintiff was a domestic service employee for Defendant during the relevant time period and worked in excess of 40 hours per week at times during the relevant time period. Id. at *7. The Court also held that Plaintiff's interests aligned with those of putative class members, and there was no concern that Plaintiff would litigate any class action in a manner contrary to the interest of the class. Similarly, the Court stated that Plaintiff's counsel was well situated to advocate on behalf of the putative class. Id. at *8. Defendant argued that individual issues dominated over issues common to the class, and that class certification was therefore inappropriate. The Court found that Defendant's examples of individual issues were not persuasive. Some of the issues cited, such as whether an individual was a "domestic service worker," were determinative of the threshold issue of whether an individual was actually a member of the class and not an indication of how the cases of two confirmed class members may differ. Id. at *9. The Court noted that other individual issues cited by Defendant were related to calculation of damages, and it is not unusual for different class members in a Rule 23 class action to be entitled to differing damages based on their individual circumstances; class certification is appropriate in such circumstances, so long as the class is unified by a single theory of liability. Id. at *9-10. The Court further found no evidence that putative class members had any interest in maintaining this litigation in separate actions, and the relative size of the individual claims in the case made class resolution the superior form of adjudication. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23 and conditional certification of the FLSA claims.

Fitzpatrick, et al. v. Cuyahoga County*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 185280 (N.D Ohio Nov. 8, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of correction officers, filed a collective action alleging violations of the FLSA. Plaintiffs sought conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. The Court found that Plaintiffs met the lenient standard for conditional certification, and had demonstrated that they were similarly-situated to the putative collection active members. The Court held that the underlying legal and factual issues with respect to Plaintiffs and each of the potential collective action members' claims were substantially similar. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's non-exempt hourly employees were not paid the proper overtime premium for hours worked because Defendant failed to include longevity bonuses in the regular rate calculation. Both parties agreed that, although required to do so, Defendant did not begin incorporating longevity bonuses into employees' regular rate calculation until October 2015. Thus, the Court determined that each of Plaintiffs' claims would ultimately turn on their eligibility for longevity bonuses during the applicable period when Defendant was not including those payments in the regular rate calculation. Id. at *7. The Court noted that Plaintiffs submitted 15 additional declarations alleging that they worked in 2014 and 2015, and that they were eligible to receive a longevity bonus in 2014 and 2015. Id. In addition, Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant exhibited a practice of failing to include non-discretionary longevity bonuses in the regular rate calculation. Id. at *8. Further, Defendant had not provided a reason to conclude that the factual analysis as to the other collective action members would be substantially different even though the proof required may be individualized and distinct. Id. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs met the minimal burden for conditional certification. The Court therefore conditionally certified a collective action consisting of all present and former non-exempt employees of Cuyahoga County who, at any time during the last three years, received longevity payments and worked overtime during any period in which said payment was earned.

Ganci, et al. v. MBF Inspection Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 178210 (S.D. Ohio Oct. 27, 2017). Plaintiff, a welding inspector, filed a collective and class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the Ohio Minimum Fair Wage Standards Act ("OMFWSA"). Plaintiff had previously filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff subsequently sought class certification for state law claims pursuant to Rule 23. Plaintiff's proposed class consisted of all inspection personnel, other than chief inspectors and lead inspectors, who were paid a day rate and who worked for Defendant under a Spectra contract at any time since three years prior to filing of the complaint. Id. at *3. First, as to numerosity, the parties agreed that the proposed class consisted of approximately 67 individuals. However, Defendant argued that joinder would nevertheless be easily accomplished because: (i) it produced the names and contact information of all 67 members of the class, (ii) class members did not lack resources to bring their own individual suits; and (iii) judicial economy concerns were not implicated when there is no indication that a multiplicity of suits was imminent. Id. at *7-8. However, the Court found that employees' fear of their employer's retaliation might keep them from pursuing wage & hour claims individually. The Court found this assertion supported by the low opt-in rate among collective action members (5 out of 67). Moreover, the Court stated that Plaintiff offered evidence that at least one management employee had suggested to inspectors that Defendant should not hire for future assignments any inspectors who joined the FLSA collective action. Id. at *10. The Court therefore ruled that the ease of identifying and serving class members was outweighed by inspectors' concerns for their job security. Id. at *11. As to commonality, Defendant asserted as affirmative defenses that inspectors were exempt from statutory overtime requirements under the executive, professional, administrative, and highly compensated exemptions. Id. at *12. The Court found that Plaintiff sufficiently demonstrated that the inspectors' duties relevant to these exemptions were common to all putative class members. The Court also stated that Plaintiffs demonstrated that all putative class members had suffered the same alleged injury (i.e., misclassification as exempt employees, resulting in unpaid overtime wages), and that questions common to the class (i.e., the applicability of the FLSA exemptions) therefore satisfied Plaintiff's burden of demonstrating typicality. Id. at *22. As to adequacy, Defendant did not contest that Plaintiff and his legal counsel were adequate representatives of the putative class. As to the predominance requirement, the Court opined that Plaintiff identified multiple questions whose answers were common to all class members that predominated over any individual inquiries. Id. at *28. The Court also reasoned that Plaintiffs met the superiority requirement because: (i) individual class members likely have little interest in commencing or controlling separate actions due to the retaliation concerns; (ii) there were no other currently pending actions related to Defendant's failure to pay overtime wages to its inspectors; (iii) all putative class members worked in Ohio, making the Court an appropriate forum; and (iv) the class action would be manageable given the relatively small class size and limited necessary individual inquiries. Id. at *30. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23.

Holmes, et al. v. Kelly Services, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123835 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 7, 2017). Plaintiff, a former call center agent, alleged that Defendants violated the FLSA by failing to compensate her and the other employees at her call center for all of the time they spent working. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part. Id. at *2. Plaintiff sought certification of a collective action of all hourly call-center agents who worked at the Hampton, Virginia call center facility during the previous three years. However, the Court stated that Plaintiff failed to satisfy even the fairly lenient burden to show that all of the other call-center agents were similarly-situated to her. The Court therefore certified a much narrower collective action. The Court explained that Plaintiff provided evidence that eight other call-center agents, all of whom worked under one of two night-shift supervisors, were similarly-situated. First, Plaintiff submitted evidence that five team members were copied on that supervisor's email stating that they should arrive to work 10 minutes early but not log-in until their shift began. Id. at *15. Second, Plaintiff testified that two additional members of her team informed her they were not being paid for "off-the-clock" work. Id. Finally, Plaintiff testified that a downstairs night-shift agent who worked under a different supervisor said that she received an email that was similar to the one that Plaintiff's team received regarding "off-the-clock" work. Id. Accordingly, the Court opined that Plaintiff's evidence could support a finding that the hourly call-center agents at the Hampton facility who worked under the two supervisors were required to work "off-the-clock" without compensation. Id. at *16. Plaintiff requested the Court to certify a much broader collective action of all hourly call-center agents at the Hampton facility on that grounds that she had presented evidence that Defendants had a common policy or plan to deprive all agents of compensation for "off-the-clock" work. Id. The Court disagreed and concluded that Plaintiff failed to present evidence of a common policy or plan that applied to all of the hourly agents at the Hampton facility. Plaintiff submitted Defendant's training practices as evidence of a common policy or plan to not pay agents for "off-the-clock" work. The Court found that the fact that Defendant may have trained its call-center agents to arrive for work before their scheduled shift time (or to stay after their scheduled shift to log-off of their computers) was not evidence that Defendants had a common policy not to pay the agents for this pre-shift and post-shift work. Id. at *17. The Court stated that Plaintiff did not present any evidence that during the training agents were told: (i) not to record their pre-shift and post-shift work on their timesheets; or (ii) that they would not be paid for that work. Id. Plaintiff also argued that the Court could infer that Defendants had a common policy or plan not to pay its agents for all of the time they worked because she had "identified several specific co-workers" who were required to perform "off-the-clock" work without compensation. Id. at *18. However, the Court found that all of these "specific co-workers" worked on one of only two teams at the Hampton facility, and Plaintiff failed to produce any evidence that any other agents on any other team were not paid for "off-the-clock" work. Id. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiff presented some evidence that agents at the Hampton facility who worked for the two supervisors worked "off-the-clock" and were not paid for that time. Id. at *23. The Court therefore granted Plaintiff's motion in part, and conditionally certified a collective action of all hourly call-center agents who worked at the Hampton facility for the past three years that worked for either supervisors' team.

Johnson, et al. v. J&B Mechanical, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 141863 (W.D. Ky. Sept. 1, 2017). Plaintiff, a millwright laborer and field foreman, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff stated that in a normal workweek, he would work 50 to 70 hours or more, and approximately seven to 10 of those hours were spent in travel time to out-of-town worksites. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant did not count millwrights' travel time toward their total number of hours worked for calculation and payment of hourly overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff sought to certify a collective action of current and former field foremen, laborers, or helpers, or other functional equivalents who were also not paid overtime compensation. Id. at *3. The Court found that Plaintiff provided sufficient factual support to merit conditional certification of a collective action. Id. at *5. Plaintiff submitted an affidavit stating that all hourly, non-exempt employees in the positions of field foremen, laborers, helpers, or other functional equivalents were treated similarly. Plaintiff averred that while working on a job-site, all members of the crew did essentially the same type of work, regardless of whether they were classified by the company as field foremen, laborers, or helpers. Defendant argued that as it had filed several counterclaims, including breach of duty of loyalty, fraud, negligent misrepresentation, and unjust enrichment against Plaintiff, it rendered him a poor representative of the putative collective action. Id. at *7. The Court noted that while Defendant's counterclaims might be meritorious, it found that it was inappropriate to engage in a merits analysis at this stage of the action in order to determine whether conditional certification was warranted. Id. Defendant further asserted that conditional certification was inappropriate because Plaintiff is likely subject to the motor carrier exemption under the FLSA. The Court declined to consider the argument, noting that it was premature. Defendant further argued that the potential applicability of the motor carrier exemption would predominate the litigation by requiring a fact-intensive analysis of each employee's job to determine whether the exemption applied. The Court again determined this argument was more appropriately discussed in the final certification stage. Id. at *8. Finally, Defendant argued that Plaintiff's proposed opt-in group was overbroad and that conditional certification should be denied because Plaintiff provided no indication that any other employees have shown an interest in asserting a claim against Defendant. However, the Court stated that Plaintiff specifically listed 19 other individuals in his affidavit that he contended did not receive the correct amount of overtime pay. Id. at *9-10. The Court found that Plaintiff had made the modest factual showing sufficient to satisfy the fairly lenient standard governing conditional certification of a collective action under the FLSA. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Lindsey, et al. v. Tire Discounters, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 197996 (S.D. Ohio Dec. 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of service managers ("SMs"), filed a class action alleging overtime violations pursuant to the FLSA and the Ohio Minimum Fair Wage Standards Act ("OMFWSA"). Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant misclassified them as exempt from overtime pursuant to the FLSA's executive exemption. After discovery, Defendant moved to decertify the FLSA collective action on the basis that the opt-in Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated. At the same time, Plaintiffs brought a motion to certify a class as to the OMFWSA claims pursuant to Rule 23. First, in analyzing Defendant's decertification motion, the Court considered the factual and employment settings of the individual Plaintiffs. As the primary dispute was whether the SMs qualified for the executive exemption, the Court determined that the employees were not similarly-situated with respect to the elements of the executive exemption. The executive exemption applies to an employee: (i) compensated on a salary basis of not less than a rate of $455 per week; (ii) whose primary duty was management of the enterprise; (iii) who regularly directed the work of two or more other employees; and (iv) had the authority to hire or fire other employees or whose suggestions and recommendations as to hiring and firing were given weight. As evidence that the SMs were subject to a single policy that violated the FLSA, Plaintiffs relied upon the uniform job description, training programs, and the employees' uniform classifications, as well as their reclassification as non-exempt. Id. at *16. The Court reviewed the actual job duties of the SMs and determined that the opt-in Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated and the exemption defense could not be litigated on a collective basis. The Court determined that while the employees were similarly-situated as to the salary-based criteria, the employees were not similarly-situated with respect to the other three factors. The Court reasoned that the employees were not similarly-situated, as to their primary duties were management. Many SMs indicated that they did not have the authority to hire or fire employees and reported that senior technicians completed much of the training for new technicians. Some SMs reported no involvement with interviewing and training while others reported significant involvement. Because there was no consistency among SMs as to their actual interviewing, selecting, and training of employees, the Court concluded that the SMs were not similarly-situated for this aspect of the management definition. Id. at *21. Further, the Court determined that the SMs were not similarly-situated for purposes of whether they directed the work of two or more employees, as all the SMs, except for the named Plaintiff Lindsey, stated that there were more than two technicians under the SMs' supervision. The Court therefore concluded that the SMs were not similarly-situated relative to whether they directed the work of the two or more employees. Id. at *22. The Court found with respect to the final prong of the executive exemption that the employees were not similarly-situated, since their participation varied as to the hiring process and in recommending promotions. Accordingly, the Court ruled that the factual and employment settings of the SMs weighted in favor of decertification. The second factor of the decertification analysis – whether Plaintiffs were subject to different defenses on an individual basis – also weighed in favor of decertification because Plaintiffs' claims turned on the applicability of the executive exemption defenses. Id. The Court further determined that the third factor – fairness and procedural impact of certification – also weighed in favor of decertification. The Court opined that because Plaintiffs were unable to demonstrate that the employees were similarly-situated, there was no judicial economy to be gained by allowing their claims to proceed collectively and the only possible result was unfairness to the employer and manageability problems for the Court. Accordingly, the Court granted the Defendant's motion to decertify the collective action. The Court also denied Plaintiffs' motion to certify a class as to the OMFWSA claims pursuant to Rule 23 because the SMs were not similarly-situated, and therefore Plaintiffs could not satisfy the more stringent predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3) or the typicality requirement of Rule 23(a)(3). Plaintiffs' claims under the OMFWSA mirrored those under the FLSA because the OMFWSA incorporated the FLSA's protections for overtime wages. The Court ruled that because the job duties of the SMs varied so widely, determining whether putative class members qualified for executive exemption would inevitably require individualized inquiries. In addition, the Court concluded that typicality was not satisfied for the same reasons. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to decertify the collective action and denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23.

Luster, et al. v. AWP, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 116043 (N.D. Ohio July 26, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of traffic control specialists in a construction zone, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs alleged that they were not paid for time spent driving Defendant's trucks to and from worksites, fueling trucks, or performing inspections. Plaintiffs also alleged they were not paid time and a half for hours worked over 40 each week, despite being classified as non-exempt hourly workers. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of the collective action, which the Court granted. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' motion should be denied because they failed to identify an unlawful policy that members of the collective action were allegedly subject to and conditional certification would not serve judicial economy because the putative collective action definition was overbroad. Id. at *4. The named Plaintiff Luster submitted an affidavit that she was required to drive Defendant's truck from Defendant's place of business to the worksite and back; she was required to fuel Defendant's vehicle; she was required to pick up other employees and drop them off; she was required to perform pre-work and post-work inspections of the vehicle; and she was not paid for any of this work. Id. at *5. All opt-in Plaintiffs similarly alleged they drove from home or Defendant's place of business to work and back, were not paid for this time, and that this time put them over 40 hours for the week and they were not paid overtime. Id. Defendant argued that conditional certification should be denied because Plaintiffs had not identified an illegal policy or practice affecting the putative collective action members. The Court found that Defendant's assertions were questions of fact (i.e., what duties employees performed and whether they were paid for them) and questions of law (i.e., whether the alleged conduct constitutes a violation), and that questions on the merits were appropriate for the first stage of conditional certification. Id. at *6. The Court determined that it was sufficient at this stage of the case that Plaintiffs established a policy or practice and had advanced arguments that the policy violated the FLSA. Defendant also contended that allowing conditional certification would not promote judicial efficiency, as it would merely put off until later the large number of individual considerations that must be made. The Court found that Defendant's objection was better suited to the second stage of conditional certification. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Marek, et al. v. Toledo Tool & Die Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 196065 (S.D. Ohio Nov. 29, 2017). Plaintiff, a non-exempt hourly employee, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court denied. Plaintiff sought to certify a collective action of "all current and former hourly, non-exempt employees of Defendant, who worked in excess of 40 hours in a workweek, but were not paid their overtime rate for all such hours worked, resulting in unpaid overtime wages." Id. at *3. In support of his motion, Plaintiff submitted his own declaration, Defendant's payroll records listing hours worked and hourly rates, and the payroll records of six other employees. Id. at *7. The Court stated that a Plaintiff "seeking certification based solely on his own declarations" may have difficulty securing conditional certification because his experience may not be representative of other employees' experiences, particularly where the proposed collective action encompassed all hourly employees irrespective of job category. Id. at *8. The Court noted that although Plaintiff attested that he worked for Defendant as a maintenance technician and a maintenance supervisor performing "general maintenance," he did not explain what "general maintenance" was as it related to tool and die work. Id. Further, Plaintiff did not describe the job duties of other potential Plaintiffs. Plaintiff also did not indicate whether Defendant had multiple locations, multiple worksites within a single location, or a single worksite within a single location. Id. at *9. The Court also opined that it could not adequately consider "the different defenses to which Plaintiff may be subject on an individual basis." Id. at *10. Ordinarily, the Court explained, the likelihood that an employer may have to assert individualized defenses would not overcome a Plaintiff's minimal showing of similarity under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), so long as "sufficient common issues or job traits otherwise permit collective litigation." Id. However, without further information, the Court found that it could not discern whether "sufficient common issues or job traits permit collective litigation" in this case. Id. The Court reasoned that although the employee payroll records suggested that Defendant did pay several employees at their regular hourly rate for more than 40 hours of work in a single workweek, Plaintiff did not provide proof of personal knowledge that Defendant actually denied other employees overtime compensation, and the records were from periods where Defendant paid for holiday time off work over 40 hours in a week. The Court stated that "overtime for holidays is due only for that time in any particular week in which the employee actually worked more than forty hours." Id. at *13. The Court therefore ruled that the payroll records did not prove that any employee "actually worked" more than 40 hours in a workweek. Accordingly, the Court found, at most, that Plaintiff provided evidence that Defendant paid employees for "occasional periods" when they were "not at work," and did not credit "such payments toward overtime compensation due under the FLSA," just as regulations require. Id. at *15. The Court held that evidence of compliance with FLSA regulations was not a "colorable basis" to believe that a group of similarly-situated Plaintiffs existed. Id. at *16. The Court therefore denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

McClain, et al. v. First Acceptance Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 126733 (M.D. Tenn. Aug. 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of loss claims adjusters, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt employees and thereby denied them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff sought to represent a group consisting all past and present employees of Defendant who were employed as Total Loss Claims Adjusters at any time from March 2, 2014, to the present. Id. at *2. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs submitted a declaration stating that all loss claims adjusters performed the same work and were misclassified as exempt employees and denied overtime wages despite regularly working over 40 hours per week. Id. at *3. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs had not met the modest factual showing that they were similarly-situated because they only submitted a single, conclusory declaration, which did not discuss specific job duties. Id. at *5. However, the Court found that Defendant's own evidence showed that a collective action of similarly-situated total loss claims adjusters existed. Id. at *6. The Court noted that Defendant submitted declarations of one former and two present total loss adjusters, which outlined their job duties and indicated that all total loss adjusters performed the same or substantially similar job duties and had the same essential job functions. The Court therefore concluded that Defendant's own declarations clearly indicated that a definable group of similarly-situated Plaintiffs existed. Id. at *10. Defendant further argued that Plaintiffs failed to show that other total loss adjusters wished to opt-in to the litigation. However, the Court rejected that argument and opined that it would be difficult to opt-in to something that was not known, as notice had not been sent to any parties that could opt-in. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

McFarlin, et al. v. Word Enterprises, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 164968 (E.D. Mich. Oct. 5, 2017). Plaintiff, a delivery driver, filed a collective and class action alleging that Defendants failed to pay minimum wage and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA, the Michigan Minimum Wage Law ("MMWL"), and the Michigan Workforce Opportunity Wage Act ("MWOWA"). Id. at *2. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification of his state law claims pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3), which the Court granted. Plaintiff contended that the total number of drivers for each of four Defendant companies should be combined when considering numerosity. The Court agreed and found that Defendants should be treated as a single employer for class certification purposes. As a result, the class consisted of 106 to 117 members, and met the requirement for numerosity. Id. at *4-5. Defendants claimed that Plaintiffs failed to meet commonality because the different companies did not have uniform mileage reimbursement policies, and the claims of potential class members were too individualized. Id. at *6. The Court, however, noted that based on Sixth Circuit precedent, the fact that there would need to be individualized inquiry as to the amount of damages for each delivery driver is not enough to invalidate commonality. Id. at *9. The Court further found that depositions given by Defendants' employees stated that all locations had the same payroll policies and practices. The Court therefore ruled that Plaintiff met the commonality requirement. The Court also held that typicality was met because Plaintiff's allegations of under-payment of wages by Defendants was similar to all of the other potential class members. Id. at *11. Defendants did not contest that Plaintiff's counsel satisfied the adequacy requirement of Rule 23(a)(4). The Court also determined that Plaintiff had common interests with the unnamed members because of his interest, as a delivery driver, to get reimbursed for the costs he had to personally incur for his vehicle expenses from delivery driving. Accordingly, the Court also found that Plaintiff met the adequacy requirement. As to Rule 23(b)(3), the Court stated that the general issue of the adequacy of the reimbursement policies maintained by Defendants predominated over individual inquiries. Id. at *12. Although the damages for each delivery driver would entail an individual determination, the Court concluded that the damages arose from a course of conduct applicable to the entire class. Finally, the Court found that Plaintiffs claims arose from the single course of alleged wrongful conduct of Defendants in maintaining an inadequate reimbursement policy or policies. Therefore, the Court held that a class action was the superior method to bring the lawsuit. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Monroe, et al. v. FTS USA, LLC,* 860 F.3d 389 (6th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of cable technicians, filed suit pursuant to the Fair Labor and Standards Act ("FLSA") alleging overtime violations. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant implemented a company-wide policy that required its employees to systemically under-report their overtime hours. Id. at *2. The District Court certified the collective action and after a jury rendered a verdict in favor of Plaintiffs, the District Court awarded damages. Plaintiffs testified that they were required to "work off-the-clock" before and after scheduled hours or during lunch breaks and their timesheets were altered so as to under-report overtime. Id. at *29. On Defendant's appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's certification of the collective action and found that there was sufficient evidence to support the jury's verdict. However, the Sixth Circuit reversed and remanded as to the District Court's calculation of damages. Id. at *2. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated. The Sixth Circuit disagreed and ruled that Plaintiffs were similarly-situated for purposes of a collective under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), because they all performed essentially the same job and the policy of under-reporting overtime hours was company-wide and originated at the executive level. Id. at *27. In determining that Plaintiffs were similarly-situated, the Sixth Circuit applied three factors, including: (i) the factual and employment settings of the individual Plaintiffs; (ii) the different defenses to which Plaintiffs may be subject to on an individual basis; and (iii) the degree of fairness and procedural impact of certifying the action as a collective action. Id. at *14. The Sixth Circuit rejected Defendant's argument that there was insufficient evidence to establish Defendant's liability and ruled that the testimony of representative technicians along with direct evidence was more than sufficient to support the jury's verdict. The Sixth Circuit ruled that representative testimony from a sub-set of Plaintiffs may establish evidence of FLSA violations, when such proof would normally be individualized. Id. at *42. However, as to damages, the Sixth Circuit ruled that the District Court erred when it used a 1.5 multiplier to calculate damages, as the FLSA entitled piece-rate workers to an overtime multiplier of .5. Id. at *64. The Sixth Circuit reversed and remanded for recalculation of damages because the District Court should have used a .5 multiplier rather than the 1.5 multiplier that it used in its calculation. Id. at *65.

Myers, et al. v. Marietta Memorial Hospital*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 146233 (S.D. Ohio Sept. 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former nurses, brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them overtime compensation and minimum wages in violation of the FLSA and Ohio wage & hour laws. The Court had previously entered an order granting conditional certification of a collective action for Plaintiffs' FLSA claims. Plaintiffs subsequently filed a motion for class certification of their state law claims pursuant to Rule 23, and the Court granted the motion. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants' policy of automatically deducting 30 minutes for a meal break for nurses and patient care technicians violated the FLSA and Ohio wage laws because employees were routinely prohibited from either taking an uninterrupted meal break or canceling the automatic deduction. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs sought certification of a class of all of Defendant's current and former nurses and patient care technicians who were hourly employees and subject to Defendant's automatic meal deduction policy during the three years before this complaint was filed up to the present. Id. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs submitted affidavits stating that patient care employees did not clock-in and clock-out for meal breaks, and that the hospital had a policy of regularly deducting 30 minutes from each shift for a meal period, regardless of whether the employees actually received meal breaks. Plaintiffs also stated that they could not recall a single day in the past three years during which they were able to take a 30-minute meal break free from their job duties, and that they were aware of other employees who had the same experience. Id. at *3. The Court found that the numerosity requirement was satisfied, as Defendant provided a class list that contained 1,168 nurses and patient care technicians. Id. at *12. As to commonality, Plaintiffs asserted that there were 12 questions common to the class relating to Defendant's alleged violations. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs met commonality, as they argued that putative class members had all been injured by Defendant's common policies and pay practices. Id. at *13. Defendants disputed that Plaintiffs' claims were typical of those of the class members, claiming that the named Plaintiffs have "at most, claimed that a rogue supervisor instructed them differently than the proposed class." Id. at *20. According to Defendants, while several of named Plaintiffs claimed that a supervisor instructed them to ignore Defendant's "lawful compensation policy," their experience was unique and not typical of the practice of other supervisors. Id. The Court rejected Defendant's position, since Plaintiffs worked for various managers and in different departments, and also stated that they spoke with many co-workers who were subject to the same policies and practices. Id. at *20-21. For this reason, the Court determined that Plaintiffs met the typicality requirement. Defendant did not address the adequacy requirement, and therefore the Court assumed that Defendant conceded that Plaintiffs had met this requirement. Id. at *21. As to Rule 23(b)(3), the Court held that Plaintiffs satisfied the predominance requirement because the liability questions identified were the same for all putative class members. Id. at *22. Finally, as to the superiority requirement, the Court found that all factors weighed in favor of Plaintiffs, as they had no interest in litigating their claims individually, and they could prove class member claims through representative evidence. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Myers, et al. v. TRG Customer Solutions,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 136140 (M.D. Tenn. Aug. 24, 2017). Plaintiff, a call center employee, filed a collective action asserting that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court denied. Plaintiff sought to certify a collective action of all current and former hourly-paid non-exempt call center workers at Defendant's United States call centers who at any time from June 1, 2014 through the present worked in positions in which employees handled telephone calls on behalf of IBEX clients. Plaintiff stipulated that this definition excluded any employee who both received notice and opted-in to the nationwide class and collective action currently pending in the Court entitled Andrews, et al. v. TRG Customer Solutions, Inc., which was being actively litigated in a collective arbitration. Id. at *3. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff signed an acknowledgement in which she purportedly agreed to arbitrate any employment-related disputes, specifically including any claims under the FLSA. Defendant alleged that the arbitration agreements signed by Plaintiff and most or all of the employees she sought to represent barred collective action certification. Defendant further argued that Plaintiff failed to carry her burden of demonstrating that she was similarly-situated to the putative class of other call center employees throughout the United States. Id. at *5. The Court noted that Defendant had not filed a motion to compel arbitration, and the enforceability of the arbitration agreement was not before the Court. The Court stated that when presented with a fully briefed motion for conditional certification, it would typically proceed with the consideration of whether Plaintiff had demonstrated the requisite substantial similarity to justify granting the motion. Id. at *15. Here, however, the Court determined that consideration of the motion for conditional certification would be premature. The Court found that if Plaintiff and other similarly-situated current and former employees were subject to arbitration agreements that either implicitly or expressly required them to pursue arbitration individually rather than collectively, then certification of a collective class would be an exercise in futility. The Court recognized that in Andrews, the parties were able to reach an agreement to proceed with a collective arbitration, thereby avoiding lengthy litigation of the questions of whether the arbitration agreements signed by Plaintiffs were enforceable as to each individual opt-in Plaintiff and whether Defendant could compel individual arbitrations. Id. at *16. The Court thus encouraged the parties to try to reach a similar agreement, and deferred ruling on Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Ouellette, et al. v. Ameridial, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 107952 (N.D. Ohio July 12, 2017). Plaintiff, a customer service representative ("CSR"), brought a collective action asserting that Defendant willfully violated the FLSA by requiring CSRs to perform off-the-clock work. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff sought to conditionally certify a group of "all current and former hourly customer service representatives who worked for Defendant in any of its brick-and-mortar call centers in the United States at any time during the last three years." Id. at *7-8. Defendant argued that no collective action should be certified and, in the alternative, that any certified collective action should not include CSRs who work at call centers other than in Maine and should not cover any employee outside the two-year statute of limitations. Id. at *8. The Court noted that one person already filed a consent to join the lawsuit. Defendant did not challenge this person's consent and, therefore, the Court assumed that she was a legitimate, potential Plaintiff. To that extent, an additional potential Plaintiff had been identified. Plaintiff also submitted three job postings from Defendant's own website setting forth job descriptions for "healthcare customer service;" one for the same Maine location where Plaintiff worked, one in Canton, Ohio, and one in North Carolina. Id. at *9. The Court found that the job descriptions were broadly consistent with the job that Plaintiff described doing, and therefore established a "modest factual showing" of similarity in the job of CSRs at any location where healthcare customer services are provided. Id. at *10. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff failed to supply evidence of any widespread illegal plan maintained by Defendant. In particular, Defendant argued that Plaintiff failed to show that the call centers in all four locations focused exclusively on the service area of "Healthcare Call Center Solutions." Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court stated that the collective action could be limited by defining it to include only CSRs at any of the locations who worked in the "Healthcare Call Center Solutions" service line, since they were all using the same work tools, software, and procedures. Id. at *12. Defendant further asserted that Plaintiff failed to provide documentary evidence that other CSRs repeatedly worked in excess of 40 hours per week. Defendant maintained that Plaintiff's sole declaration in support of a motion for certification of a collective action was insufficient to make the "modest factual showing" required by 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court stated that Plaintiff supplied more than her own declaration, as she also provided the three job postings. Id. at *12-13. The Court noted that although the materials supplied may be of limited evidentiary value at a later stage of these proceedings, they were sufficient at the pre-discovery stage to make a showing for conditional certification. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiff was entitled to conditional certification of the collective action. However, the Court also agreed with Defendant's argument that Plaintiff made no showing of willfulness that would warrant expansion of the time-frame from the typical two years to three years. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification with the modified time-frame.

Paxton, et al. v. Bluegreen Vacations Unlimited,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 136531 (E.D. Tenn. Aug. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of non-exempt in-house sales representatives, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay proper wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action. The Magistrate Judge recommended granting the motion in part. Pursuant to Rule 72, Defendants objected to the Magistrate Judge's recommendation. The Court overruled Defendant's objections and adopted the Magistrate Judge's findings. Plaintiffs sought to certify a collective action consisting of sales representatives employed by Defendant at its Pigeon Forge, Gatlinburg, and Orlando, Florida locations within the last three years. Id. at *5. Defendants first objected to the Magistrate Judge's findings that the Florida employees and the front-line sales representatives should be part of the collective action. Defendant argued that the Florida employees: (i) were not similarly-situated to the Tennessee employees; (ii) allegations of FLSA violations were "inconsistent;" and (iii) "fairness and procedural impact" dictated that inclusion of the Florida employees was improper. Id. at *8. The Court noted that all Defendants' argument were presented to and rejected by the Magistrate Judge. The Court found that it was well-established that objections merely restating arguments previously presented are without merit and may be denied summarily. Accordingly, the Court overruled Defendant's objection regarding the Florida employees. Defendants also claimed that the Magistrate Judge's report erroneously found that front-line sales representatives should be included in the conditionally certified collective action. Defendants argued that front-line sales representatives were not similarly-situated to in-house sales representatives. Id. at *10. The Court rejected Defendants' arguments regarding the dissimilarities between job functions because they were merely recycled arguments that had already been rejected by the Magistrate Judge. Id. The Court stated that even if the objection were properly presented, it would find it meritless because the stated job differences were de minimis. The Court opined that the employees performed essentially the same function of selling time shares. Id. The Court thereby determined that Plaintiffs satisfied their burden at this early stage to show that they were similarly-situated to the employees they sought to include in the collective action. Accordingly, the Court adopted the Magistrate Judge's findings and overruled Defendants' objections.

Peer, et al. v. Grayco Management LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 85017 (M.D. Tenn. June 2, 2017). Plaintiff, a manager, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA by failing to pay him and other similarly-situated employees overtime compensation when they worked more than 40 hours per week. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, and the Court denied the motion. Defendants own and operate approximately 20 McDonald's restaurants in Nashville, Tennessee. Id. at *2. Plaintiff was the third shift manager responsible for taking food and drink orders, cooking, cleaning, and maintaining labor and sales. Plaintiff claimed that he regularly worked more than 40 hours per workweek and that his managers knew or should have known that he did so. Plaintiff further asserted that Defendant maintained a uniform time-keeping policy that automatically deducted 30 minutes from each shift he worked for an unpaid meal break, whether he actually took a break or not. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant altered his time records to reflect less time than he actually worked, thereby depriving him of receiving overtime compensation. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff also asserted that he was "personally aware of other former hourly employees" who were subjected to the same policy as he was, and "who worked more than 40 hours in a workweek but were not paid overtime pay for all hours they worked over 40 hours." Id. at *3. Defendant submitted declarations of four general managers from different McDonald's restaurants in Nashville operated by Defendant, which indicated that time records are reviewed regularly; employees are given an opportunity to review their time clock entries; time is not deducted from the time records; 30 minutes are not deducted for a meal break when an employee fails to take such a break; and employees are paid for all hours worked. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiff sought certification of a collective action containing all current or former employees who worked as hourly workers in the McDonald's restaurants owned by Defendant at any time within the last three years and who worked off-the-clock, had their time records altered to show less time worked than actually worked, and who did not receive overtime wages for all hours worked over 40 during some workweeks during the past three years. Id. at *9-10. The Court found that Plaintiff's declarations were based solely upon his alleged experiences at one McDonald's location, what he allegedly observed there, and what he allegedly was told by managers and co-workers at that restaurant. Id. at *10. The Court noted that despite this, Plaintiff sought conditional certification of all hourly employees at all 24 of Defendant's stores without any hint that those locations engaged in the same sort of FLSA violations. Id. at *11. The Court held that Plaintiff's allegations were insufficient, as a matter of law, to warrant conditional certification of the collective action that he proposed. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Perez, et al. v. El Torazo Mexican Restaurant,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 203771 (W.D. Ky. Dec. 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former tipped employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants violated various provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs sought to certify a collective action consisting of "servers, waiters, waitresses, and other tipped employees" employed by Defendants from August 24, 2013 to the present. Id. at *2. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs submitted declarations that averred that all tipped employees were similarly-situated under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) because: (i) the same type of invalid policy of "tip pooling" applied to similar types of tipped employees; (ii) tipped employees were paid the same rate for all hours of work, whether tip-producing or not; (iii) tipped employees were not informed of the application of a tip credit by Defendants; (iv) tipped employees were not paid minimum wage; and (v) tipped employees were not adequately compensated for overtime work. Id. at *5. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs' declarations were speculative, self-serving, and reliant on inadmissible hearsay, and therefore were not sufficient to establish that Plaintiffs were similarly-situated. Id. Defendants further alleged that the membership of the proposed collective action was overbroad, as it included potential Plaintiffs who, unlike the named Plaintiffs, were not servers and worked in both locations of the restaurant. Defendants further argued that Plaintiffs' affidavits failed to identify how they were similarly-situated to other potential collective action members, and that Plaintiffs failed to obtain any affidavits from non-server employees who had not received minimum and/or overtime wages. Id. at *6. The Court noted that it had found similar declarations in other cases relating to observations of FLSA violations in the workplace to be sufficient evidence to find a similarly-situated group of Plaintiffs in the first phase of certification under § 216(b). Id. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs' declarations were sufficient to meet the modest showing needed to find that putative members of the proposed collective action were similarly-situated. Id. at *6-7. As to Defendants' argument of overbreadth, the Court reasoned that it also had previously certified collective actions in other cases under situations where a uniform corporate policy applied to similar, but not identical, types of employees. Id. at *7. The Court concluded that, at a minimum, Plaintiffs offered a modest showing sufficient to meet their burden under the fairly lenient standard to establish the elements required for conditional certification. Id. at *7-8. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Pierce, et al. v. Wyndham Vacation Resorts, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 163529 (E.D. Tenn. Oct. 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of sales representatives for a vacation club, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs had previously filed a motion for conditional certification, which the Court granted. Defendant subsequently filed a motion to decertify the collective action, which the Court denied. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated and therefore conditional certification was not appropriate. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs asserted that decertification was unwarranted because the evidentiary record overwhelmingly confirmed that Plaintiffs were similarly-situated. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs explained that they were similarly-situated in their factual and employment settings and that Defendant's defenses were assertable on a collective basis. Id. Plaintiffs further contended that fairness and procedural considerations favored proceeding collectively. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs' purported representative sample was statistically inadequate. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs did not have any admissible proof that the testimony of their witnesses would be statistically adequate to constitute representative evidence. The Court noted that case law authorities have consistently allowed the use of representative testimony in establishing liability and damages in FLSA collective actions. Id. at *22. The Court further opined that determining whether Plaintiffs have actually presented representative testimony of liability and damages of the collective action was reserved for trial. Id. at *23. In finding Plaintiffs to be similarly-situated, the Court analyzed: (i) the factual and employment settings of individual Plaintiffs; (ii) the different defenses to which Plaintiffs may be subject to on an individual basis; and (iii) the degree of fairness and procedural impact of certifying the action as a collective action. Id. at *25. All Plaintiffs were sales representatives, employed to make sales, although they had different titles based on sales to different customers. Id. at *28. The Court found that all the sales representatives performed sales, and therefore different titles within different sales representatives was not grounds to decertify the action. Id. at *29. Defendants also argued that Plaintiffs worked at different locations. The Court reasoned that the different locations did not prohibit the Plaintiffs from proceeding as a collective action, because the hierarchy of management was similar at all locations. Defendants further argued that the hours worked and the hours recorded varied from each opt-in Plaintiff. The Court held that while hours varied, such differences were insignificant because Plaintiffs' claims were unified by common theories of Defendants' statutory violations, even if proof of these theories was inevitably individualized and distinct. Id. at *30. As to individual defenses, the Court found that Defendants only pointed to three Plaintiffs that were clocked-out and were not engaged in work activities in support of their defense. Id. at *32. The Court stated that there were approximately 156 Plaintiffs alleging a common policy in violation of the FLSA and fairness, and procedural impact was best served by treating the case as a collective action. Id. at *38. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for decertification.

Rodkey, et al. v. Harry & David, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87364 (S.D. Ohio June 7, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of call center employees, alleged that they were denied compensation in violation of the FLSA due to Defendants' policy and practice of excluding incentive pay, commissions, and bonuses in calculating overtime compensation. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, and the Court granted the motion. Defendants argued that conditional certification should be denied because the definition of the collective action was overbroad; Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated to all collective action members; and Plaintiffs had not shown that Defendants shared an unlawful common policy or plan. Id. at *2. Defendants argued that the definition of the collective action was fatally overbroad because it included "an untold number of individuals who did not suffer any injury." Id. at *5. Plaintiffs defined the collective action as all "non-exempt employees who were employed by Defendants and paid overtime and incentive pay, commissions, and/or other bonuses within the past three years preceding the Complaint's filing date." Id. at *5-6. Defendants stated that many of the putative collective action members were not injured by the alleged unlawful compensation practices because Plaintiffs' proposed collective action would include individuals who were paid commissions, incentive pay, or bonuses for periods during which they did not work any overtime (so long as they were paid overtime for any period over the last three years). Id. at *6. Plaintiffs countered that it was premature to determine whether every proposed collective action member had a valid claim against Defendants. Id. at *7. The Court found that based on the limited record before it, the collective action definition was not fatally overbroad. Id. at *8. The Court held the Defendants had not shown that the number of Plaintiffs without claims would be so large or the process for determining which Plaintiffs had viable claims would be so tedious that a collective action was inappropriate. The Court also found that Plaintiffs met their burden of making a modest factual showing that they were similarly-situated to the putative collective action members. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants miscalculated the rate for their overtime hours by failing to include their incentive pay, commissions, and bonuses in the calculation of their applicable base pay rate. Plaintiffs submitted declarations from 11 other employees supporting the allegations. Plaintiffs also presented evidence that Defendants shared the same compensation policies and practices. Id. at *9. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs and the putative collective action members were not similarly-situated because they had "different job titles, with different responsibilities and different terms and conditions of employment." Id. at *11. Defendants also asserted that the collective action members "were all subject to, and may have been eligible for, different payment programs from their respective employers." Id. The Court noted that although Plaintiffs had differing job titles, that fact did not defeat a finding that they were similarly-situated at this stage. Id. at *11-12. The Court noted that the argument that individual differences made the matter unsuitable to proceed as a collective action was better suited to the second stage of certification. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Smith, et al. v. Generations Healthcare Services, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106583 (S.D. Ohio July 11, 2017). Plaintiff, a home health aide, brought an action alleging that Defendants violated the overtime wage and time-keeping provisions of the FLSA and related Ohio statutes. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of their FLSA claims, which the Court granted. Plaintiff asserted that she and the putative collective action members had the same job duties and that Defendants treated them all the same by subjecting them to the same company-wide policies of failing to report hours worked in excess of 40 per workweek on their pay stubs and failing to pay them overtime premiums in violation of the FLSA. Id. at *8. Plaintiff also submitted excerpts from the deposition testimony of Defendants' corporate representative, Sabatha Umoette, who testified that: (i) she was unaware of the federal law requiring overtime pay; (ii) Defendants do not pay the required overtime premium; (iii) she was not aware of the change in the law effective January 1, 2015 that mandated overtime pay for home health workers; (iv) Defendants had not done anything to change their pay practices since the change in the law because they "did not think they were doing anything wrong;" and (v) all HHAs were "paid in the same manner, all subject to the same rules, the same timesheet, the same procedures, the same office manager." Id. at *9. Umoette also testified that Defendants never accepted employee timesheets with over 40 hours per workweek. Based on this evidence, Plaintiff argued that she has shown that she and putative collective action members were "similarly-situated because they were hourly, non-exempt employees of Defendants who share similar duties and responsibilities and were victims of Defendants' same policy, decision, and practice to deny them premium overtime wages for hours worked in excess of 40 per workweek." Id. at *9-10. Defendants argued that Plaintiff failed to meet her burden of showing that she and other potential collective action members were similarly-situated because she has not: (i) identified potential Plaintiffs or provided affidavits from potential Plaintiffs; or (ii) provided sufficient evidence of a common policy or plan that violated the FLSA. Id. at *11. The Court noted that by construing Plaintiff's allegations generously, she made a modest factual showing establishing at least a colorable basis for her claim that a group of similarly-situated Plaintiffs existed through the allegations in her complaint and her sworn declaration. Id. at *12. Moreover, although not presented with her conditional certification motion, the Court opined that the deposition testimony of Umoette provided additional evidence to support the fact that similarly-situated Plaintiffs existed. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Totte, et al. v. Quick Lane Oil*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 46068 (E.D. Mich. Mar. 29, 2017). Plaintiffs, three former employees, brought a collective action alleging the Defendant violated the overtime and minimum wage requirements of the FLSA. Plaintiffs asserted that their hourly wages that did not account for all time worked, including overtime. Plaintiffs further alleged that they received a weekly salary, as well as hourly wages, at a rate of pay less than the minimum wage for hours worked. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs alleged that their employee declarations, timesheets, and pay stubs demonstrated a "company-wide policy and practice" by Defendants to underpay oil change technicians for hours worked in violation of the FLSA. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs further asserted that since Plaintiff Totte spent time working at each Defendant location and was paid in the same manner, he had "reason to believe" the pay and hour policies were company-wide. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs asserted that they were similarly-situated with other technicians because of a common "policy or practice of not paying the statutorily mandated minimum wage and overtime wage rates." Id. Defendants asserted that Plaintiffs could not demonstrate interest by potential Plaintiffs, and therefore there was no need for a collective action. Id. at *9-10. Defendants also argued that Plaintiffs could not prove they were similarly-situated because there were differences in the treatment of pay and hours for each Plaintiff. Id. at *10. Defendants further contended that Plaintiffs' job duties were not similar (e.g., as one was a manager and exempt, one was a "greeter" who did not perform oil changes, and one was a technician). Id. at *11. The Court found that Plaintiffs' declarations offered evidence to suggest a common policy or plan by Defendant in compensating its oil change technicians. Id. at *12. The named Plaintiff Totte in his declaration stated that he had worked at each location of Defendant and was paid in the same manner. The Court reasoned that this suggested that pay practices did not vary across location. Id. The named Plaintiffs Totte and Hitch also attested to the existence of a 6-day schedule of shifts by which all oil change technicians abided. Id. at *13. The Court opined that this suggested that oil change technicians would have worked and reported a similar number of hours each week. Id. The named Plaintiff Totte described how he came to know other technicians were paid in the same way based on negotiations with co-workers over shifts and conversations about pay while working shifts. Id. at *13-14. The Court found that this was a plausible basis for such knowledge. Id. Although the Court stated that Defendants correctly noted that there were differences in the treatment of pay and hours between each Plaintiff, it failed to explain why the differences were relevant to proving an FLSA claim. Id. at *14. The Court explained that the named Plaintiff Hitch was paid a weekly salary in cash that did not correspond to all hours worked whereas the named Plaintiff Merrell was paid hourly by check for fewer hours than he worked. The Court opined that in both cases the effect was the same – underpayment based on hours worked. The Court held that Plaintiffs need not show they are "identical" in every respect, only that they are "similar" in respects material to proving an FLSA claim. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

(vii) Seventh Circuit

Balderamma-Baca, et al. v. Clarence Davis & Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35009 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 10, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of landscapers, brought a class action against Defendant alleging that it required them to perform off-the-clock work without pay in violation of the FLSA and the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"). Id. at *1. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant covered the costs of uniforms by taking payroll deductions without obtaining contemporaneous written authorization as required by the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection Act ("IWPCA"). Id. Plaintiffs sought class certification of the IWPCA claim. Id. The Court granted class certification, finding that all Rule 23 requirements were met. Id. at *9. Defendant opposed Plaintiffs' motion on the basis that the requirements of commonality, predominance, and superiority were not met. Id. Defendant argued that the commonality requirement was not met because the Defendant's uniform deduction policy changed several times during the class period. Id. at *11. The Court agreed that Plaintiffs' claims could be resolved only through inquiry into questions of whether they received payroll deductions without contemporaneous written authorization under the: (i) 2005-2010; (ii) 2011-2012; or (iii) the 2013-2016 uniform deduction policies. Id. at *12. However, the Court ruled that this was not a ground to deny certification, and instead modified Plaintiffs' three sub-class definitions. Id. Defendant disputed that its deduction policies could be characterized as applying class-wide because the amount of deductions varied among employees and because not every class member had deductions taken in every pay period. Id. at *16. The Court ruled that such differences went to damages and not liability. Id. The Court also found that Defendant's objections were ancillary to the overarching common questions capable of class-wide resolution. Id. at *18. The Defendant further asserted that the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3) was not met because of the individualized issues of the class members. Id. at *22. The Court opined that these questions went to damages and it noted that case law authorities routinely grant class certification on IWPCA cases, finding that issues of liability under IWPCA predominate over individualized issues of damages. Id. As to superiority, the Court noted that Defendant's arguments were identical to its arguments with respect to commonality and predominance. Id. at *25. The Court was unpersuaded by Defendant's position, and found that because common questions predominated, class certification was the most efficient method of adjudicating the class members' IWPCA claims. Id. at *24. Accordingly, the Court granted class certification of three sub-classes. Id. at *25.

Bridgewater, et al. v. Jadcore, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62167 (S.D. Ind. April 24, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, alleged that Defendant's policies violated the FLSA and the Indiana Wage Payment Act. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3) and for conditional certification of a collective action for their FLSA claims, which the Court granted. The Court agreed with the Plaintiff that the requirements of Rule 23(a) and 23(b)(3) were satisfied in this case and class certification therefore was appropriate. Id. at *1. Specifically, the Court found that with regard to numerosity, the class contained 500 potential members. The Court further determined that commonality and typicality were satisfied because Plaintiffs alleged that they and all other class members were subjected to a uniform practice that violated the Wage Payment Statute. Id. at *2. Further, the Court stated that there nothing to suggest that Plaintiffs would not adequately represent the interests of the class. With regard to Rule 23(b)(3), the Court found that Plaintiffs demonstrated that the issue of whether the Defendant's uniform policy violated the Wage Payment Statute predominated, and therefore litigating the claims by a class action was superior to other means. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification of their state law claims. With regard to the proposed collective action relating to Plaintiffs' FLSA claim, the Court held that conditional certification was appropriate because Plaintiffs made a modest factual showing that they and potential opt-in Plaintiffs were victims of a common policy or plan that violated the law. The Court therefore also conditionally certified Plaintiffs' FLSA claims as a collective action.

Crawford, et al. v. Professional Transportation Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41545 (S.D. Ind. Mar. 22, 2017). Plaintiff, an over-the-road ("OTR") driver, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay him and others similarly-situated overtime and minimum wages as required by the FLSA. The Court had previously conditionally certified a collective action. Id. at *3. After discovery, Defendant subsequently moved to decertify the collective action, and the Court granted the motion. Defendant provided OTR drivers transportation services to customers in the railroad industry across the United States. Id. at *4. Before July 1, 2011, Defendant classified its OTR drivers as exempt from the FLSA's overtime pay requirements pursuant to the Motor Carrier Act exemption. Since July 1, 2011, Defendant treated OTR drivers as non-exempt. Plaintiff alleged FLSA violations under seven different theories. The Court noted that notice and opt-in forms were mailed to potential opt-in Plaintiffs soon after conditional certification was granted. The collective action was comprised of all former and current OTR drivers employed from February 11, 2011 to the present with outstanding claims for wages. However, the Court stated that after the case was conditionally certified as a collective action, Plaintiff narrowed his theory of liability to two areas, including: (i) minimum wage/overtime compensation for OTR driving; and (ii) required pre-trip van inspections. Id. at *19. The Court thus found that absent individual inquiries into the reasons why each OTR driver decided to join this lawsuit, it could not ascertain whether the opt-ins purportedly had pre-trip inspection claims or claims based on some other theory. Id. The Court therefore determined that the collective action definition was fatally overbroad. Id. The Court further noted that over the certified time period, Defendant changed its policies and practices regarding the exempt status of its OTR drivers and its van inspection policy. Id. These policy and procedural practices impacted the putative collective action. Prior to July 1, 2011, Defendant classified OTR drivers as exempt from the FLSA's overtime pay provision, and therefore opt-in Plaintiffs who worked for Defendant before July 1, 2011, potentially had a claim for unpaid overtime. The Court also found that the policy and practice of performing pre-trip inspections raised issues regarding whether opt-in Plaintiffs were sufficiently similar to Plaintiff. The parties did not agree on the duration of a pre-trip inspection as Defendant claimed it took around 5 minutes and opt-in Plaintiffs claimed it took from 10 to 45 minutes. Id. at *21. The Court also noted that there was evidence in the record which casted doubt on whether OTR drivers consistently performed pre-trip inspections before every shift. Id. at *22. In addition, Defendant submitted evidence that 11 opt-in Plaintiffs were disciplined for failing to perform vehicle inspections. Id. Based on this evidence, the Court found that the opt-ins' pre-trip inspection claims raised inherently individualized issues that favored decertification. Finally, Plaintiff asserted that Defendant continued to require OTR drivers to perform pre-trip inspections. However, the evidence in the record reinforced the fact that there was no common policy or practice alleged to violate the FLSA that applied to the claims of the collective class. Id. at *23. Plaintiff and opt-in Plaintiffs experienced widely disparate factual and employment settings. Id. Furthermore, the Court opined that because the policy was effective May 1, 2011, and because opt-in Plaintiffs learned of the policy at differing times, an individualized inquiry into when each opt-in learned about the policy, and, if applicable, why he or she chose to ignore the policy, would be required to determine both liability and damages. Id. The Court stated that this type of individualized inquiry was not suitable for class certification, and therefore decertification was proper. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for decertification.

Dekeyser, et al. v. Thyssenkrupp Waupaca, Inc.*, 860 F.3d 918 (7th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendant failed to compensate them for time donning and doffing work clothes and protective gear, and for time spent showering and changing clothes at its foundries in violation of the FLSA and Wisconsin law. Plaintiffs moved to certify the Wisconsin law claims under Rule 23. At the same time, Defendant moved to decertify the previously certified FLSA collective action. The District Court granted Plaintiffs' motion and granted in part Defendant's motion. The District Court divided the FLSA class – which included employees from Indiana, Tennessee, and Wisconsin – into three sub-classes, i.e., one for each state. The District Court then severed the claims of the Indiana and Tennessee Plaintiffs and transferred them to District Courts in their respective states, on the ground that they could be more efficiently evaluated in those jurisdictions. Id. at 921. Defendant appealed the order under Rule 23(f), which permits interlocutory appeals of class certification decisions. Plaintiffs argued that Defendant should be ordered to give the class members overtime pay and back pay for the time they have spent or are spending on decontamination, as well as time for changing out of their work clothing and showering in the workplace locker rooms immediately after their shifts. Id. Defendant contended that Plaintiffs failed to meet Rule 23's requirement of identifying questions of fact common to the class because each Plaintiff must provide an individualized analysis of the chemicals exposed to in the foundry and provide information about his personal medical background that would demonstrate that changing clothes and showering on-site would indeed significantly reduce the risk to his health. Id. Defendant argued that the District Court erred by severing the FLSA claims of Plaintiffs from Indiana and Tennessee who had opted-in to the lawsuit and transferring those claims to their respective home districts. Id. at 922. The Seventh Circuit held that although the District Court's plan to sever and transfer was laid out in its class certification order, Rule 23(f) appeals are limited to "those issues related to [the] class certification decision." Id. The Seventh Circuit stated that it was true that the non-Wisconsin Plaintiffs had been conditionally certified under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), so in a sense the District Court "decertified" them from the FLSA action. However, the Seventh Circuit opined that Defendant did not challenge that aspect of the order by arguing that the Indiana and Tennessee Plaintiffs should be added back into the FLSA action; it simply requested the claims of non-Wisconsin Plaintiffs be dismissed. Id. The Seventh Circuit found that the District Court's plan to sever and transfer the non-Wisconsin Plaintiffs to their home districts did not bear on the soundness of the class certification decision for Wisconsin Plaintiffs, so Defendant was unable to challenge it on a Rule 23(f) appeal. Further, the Seventh Circuit held that there was no error in what the District Court did, as 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) gives a District Court discretion to transfer a civil action to any other district or division where it might have been brought if the transfer is "for the convenience of parties and witnesses, [and] in the interest of justice." Id. at 923. The Seventh Circuit thereby affirmed the District Court's decision severing the claims of the non-Wisconsin Plaintiffs and transferring them to their home districts.

De Leon, et al. v. Grade A Construction, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 205630 (W.D. Wis. Dec. 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and state wage & hour laws. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant had two unlawful practices, including: (i) Defendant's "banking" policy, in which an employee who worked more than 40 hours one week could "bank" overtime hours rather than be paid and "cash in" the hours at a later time when the employee worked less than 40 hours in a week; and (ii) Defendant's practice of paying staffing agency employees at the same rate even if they worked over 40 hours a week. Id. at *1. The Court had previously conditionally certified both groups as collective actions under the FLSA. Plaintiffs now sought class certification of their state law claims pursuant to Rule 23. At the same time, Defendant sought to decertify the FLSA collective actions. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion and granted Defendant's motion. Plaintiffs estimated that there were approximately 20 to 25 members in their proposed state law class. Id. at *2. The Court noted that although 20 to 25 members was not insufficient per se to establish numerosity under Rule 23(a)(1), it was on the lower end of the size of proposed classes that Courts have certified. Id. at *3. The Court opined, however, that where the number of proposed class members was relatively small, it was less reasonable to infer that joiner was impractical. Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs did not allege that it would be difficult to locate and contact each potential Plaintiff, and in fact, Plaintiffs asserted that they have already identified most of the employees in the proposed class. Id. at *4. Further, the Court determined that interest in joining the class seemed weak, and therefore the actual number of class members could be significantly less than 20. The Court also noted that only three other employees consented to join the FLSA collective action by filing opt-in consents. Id. Plaintiffs argued that the proposed class was sufficiently numerous because damages for the individual employees were relatively small and because the legality of Defendant's practice of delaying overtime hours could be resolved uniformly in one forum. Id. at *6. However, the Court found that Plaintiffs' argument missed the point because the question under Rule 23 was not whether it made sense for injured parties to combine claims rather than litigate them individually, but whether Plaintiffs could combine claims through joinder rather than class certification. Id. Because Plaintiffs failed to show that joinder was impracticable, the Court concluded that the proposed class was not sufficiently numerous. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Further, the Court held that it made sense for the federal and state law claims to proceed in the same fashion, as Plaintiffs did not contend that they would suffer undue prejudice if they were required to join other employees. The Court therefore granted Defendant's motion for decertification of Plaintiffs' collective actions.

Foday, et al. v. Air Check, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95183 (N.D. Ill. June 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of airport employees, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation and the minimum wage in violation of the FLSA, the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection Act ("IWPCA"), and the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"). Plaintiffs moved to certify a class for their IMWL and IWPCA claims pursuant to Rule 23. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs could not meet the commonality or typicality requirements. Plaintiffs contended that there were questions of law or fact common to the proposed class. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs asserted that each member of the proposed class was employed by Defendant under the same policy, which involved rounding of hours and failure to pay for time worked outside scheduled times. Id. at *6-7. The Court found that Plaintiffs sought to combine claims of employees that worked in very different jobs and who were subjected to different policies. Id. at *7. The Court determined that evaluating the alleged work that Plaintiffs claimed was performed without pay for each group would require an inquiry into a diverse set of facts that would not be consistent with the commonality requirement in Rule 23(a). Id. at *8. The Court therefore held that Plaintiffs failed to show that the commonality requirement was met and thus failed to satisfy Rule 23(a). Plaintiffs argued in regard to the Rule 23(b) requirements that the questions of law or fact common to proposed class members predominated over any questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action was superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating the controversy. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' position. The Court opined that Plaintiffs attempted to patch together workers in entirely different positions with different supervisory structures and different work requirements, work rules, work locations, and schedules. Id. at *10. Additionally, the Court determined that Plaintiffs asserted an array of varying alleged misconduct on the part of Defendant, including work being performed without pay before, during, and/or after shifts, and during different shifts and for a variety of different tasks. Id. The Court explained that a trier of fact would need to assess if each class member was required to work without pay during one or more of the time-periods at issue in this case, which included pre-shift time, break time, meal time, and post-shift time. Id. at *11. Further, the trier of fact would need to engage in an individualized inquiry as to the type of work performed without pay and under what type of supervisory command structure that employee was working. Id. The Court concluded that while sub-classes can be appropriate in certain instances to address such divisions among the class members' claims, Plaintiffs presented a host of diverse claims that could not be effectively addressed by sub-classes. Although the Court stated that the requirement of individualized inquiries for damages would not necessarily preclude class certification, in this case the diverse facts entwined in the proposed class were beyond mere damage calculations. Id. at *13. The Court therefore held that Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden to show that their proposed class was capable of effective resolution in this matter. Since Plaintiffs failed to show that any of the factors in Rule 23(a) were satisfied and Plaintiffs failed to show that any alternative in Rule 23(b) existed, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Grosscup, et al. v. KPW Management, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87014 (N.D. Ill. June 7, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of servers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA by paying them tip credited hourly wages while: (i) they performed excessive amounts of non-tipped work related to their jobs; and (ii) they were required to perform duties unrelated to their jobs. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs also alleged that they were denied the statutory right to retain all of their tips when they were forced to pay for customer walkouts and cash shortages from their tips. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action, and the Court granted the motion. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs provided declarations from five workers and Defendant's official training materials, schedules, and checklists, which outlined the responsibilities of the bartenders and servers. Id. at *11. Plaintiffs' declarations stated that all of their work at Defendants' restaurants was paid at below the minimum wage tip credited rate, and they were required to perform many job duties outside of serving customers that was not tipped work, including "filling 'sani' buckets with water and sanitizer in the back of the house and placing them at the server stations; lifting chairs from on top of tables and placing them on the floor underneath tables; putting nozzles onto the soda fountains; filling buckets with ice in the back of the house and carrying them to the front of the house to empty into ice bins; placing bus tubs at the server stations; making sure server stations are stocked with to-go boxes, paper boats, napkins, silverware, receipt paper, coasters, and to-go cups and lids; and setting up the patio, which involves carrying caddie buckets with condiments, wet naps and menus to the patio and watering the plants." Id. at *11-12. Defendants submitted contradictory declarations from 14 servers and bartenders at seven of their franchise locations asserting various defenses. However, the 14 declarants did not all claim that they were not required to do the same job duties. The Court found that Plaintiffs had made the required modest showing of a common policy among Defendants' 23 franchise locations. Id. at *14-15. The Court stated that the declarations and the materials setting out the workers' duties established enough commonality to survive Defendants' challenge to conditional certification of the collective action. Id. at *15-16. The Court opined that Defendant's evidence was hardly overwhelming as not all of its declarants attested to all of the same things. In fact, the Court noted, in most cases, only a couple of the declarants disavowed a particular task that the materials described as part of the duties of a bartender or server. Id. at *16. Defendant further argued that a collective action should not be conditionally certified because it would be unmanageable and require fact-intensive inquiries and individualized defenses that would necessitate "hundreds of mini-trials." Id. at *26. The Court held that although there might be genuine difficulties with managing a collective action that would entail discerning how much time individual bartenders and servers spent on related side work to determine whether it exceeded 20%, it found that it was premature to conclude that the action was per se unmanageable. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Heuberger, et al. v. Smith,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144783 (N.D. Ind. Sept. 7, 2017). Plaintiff, a fast food restaurant worker, brought a collective action alleging Defendants violated the FLSA and state labor law by failing to pay him and similarly-situated employees for their attendance at a mandatory orientation session and deducting a uniform clothing fee of $2.00, which reduced the employees' wages to below minimum wage. Id. at *2. Defendants Gamma, Destiny, and Diamond properties owned 19 fast-food restaurants. Id. at *3. Plaintiff was hired to and worked at one of Gamma's restaurants. Id. Plaintiff moved to conditionally certify a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) and Defendants moved to dismiss for lack of standing. Id. The Court denied Plaintiff's requests to certify two groups of employees consisting of those: (i) who participated in the alleged unpaid mandatory orientation; and (ii) whose wages were reduced by the crew uniform deductions. Id. at *6. The Court found that the group consisting of those who participated in unpaid mandatory orientation was overbroad because the restaurant that Plaintiff worked at was not owned by Defendants Diamond and Destiny. Id. at *15. Plaintiff offered no evidence to support his assertion that all three Defendants implemented this policy, as Plaintiff did not allege that any other employees at any of the restaurant underwent the same orientation. Id. The Court amended the membership of the proposed orientation collective action to exclude employees of Destiny and Diamond. Id. at *16. The Court also denied Plaintiff's request to certify the uniform deduction group because Plaintiff was not similarly-situated to the membership of the proposed collective action. Id. at *12. Plaintiff's pay stubs indicated that there were no deductions taken from his paychecks. Id. at *11. The Court dismissed all the counts as to Destiny and Diamond for lack of standing as Plaintiff failed to establish that the Defendants were joint employers or a single integrated enterprise. Id. at *34-35.

Holmes, et al. v. Sid's Sealants, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 194833 (W.D. Wis. Nov. 28, 2017). Plaintiff, a union crewmember employee, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime compensation and failed to pay for travel time in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Defendant Sid's and Defendant North Shore, although being separate and distinct businesses, had Defendant Sidney Arthur as the companies' registered agent and sole member of both LLCs. Id. at *2. Plaintiff alleged that Defendants shared policies that violated the FLSA, including a policy of not paying overtime compensation and requiring employees to punch-out at the start of travel. Plaintiff sought certification of a collective action consisting of all persons who worked as a jobsite employee for either Sid's or North Shore during the time period on or after December 12, 2013. Id. at *6. In support of his motion, Plaintiff submitted his own declaration describing his observations and experiences working for both companies. Defendants asserted that: (i) Plaintiff failed to offer additional employee declarations in support of his motion; and (ii) Plaintiff's facts were wrong, and thus he has not met his burden. The Court stated that Plaintiff was not required to present additional declarations at the conditional certification stage, and factual disputes would be resolved in Plaintiff's favor. Id. Defendants contended that Plaintiff should be held to an "intermediate" standard of scrutiny, because he had access to and interacted with other employees. However, the Court agreed with Plaintiff's view that such a standard was best applied after more robust discovery had occurred. Defendants also argued that the companies were not joint employers, and therefore their "separateness" disqualified Plaintiff as not being similarly-situated to employees of both companies. Id. at *7. The Court declined to make a determination of the joint-employer issue at the conditional certification stage, since such a ruling would go to the merits of Plaintiff's case. The Court opined that Plaintiff offered his personal observations and experiences in working with employees from both companies who were similarly impacted by policies apparently promulgated and enforced by the same sole member of both limited liability corporations. Defendants further maintain that the sole member, Defendant Arthur, gave discretion to his on-site employee managers to handle day-to-day tasks, including travel times and hours so that there was no policy capable of collective evaluation. Id. at *8. Based on these factors, the Court found that this argument went to the merits of Plaintiff's claims. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiff had made the modest factual showing required by the FLSA based on his declaration and on the companies' payroll documents, Plaintiff's own bank statement, and statements allegedly made by Defendant Arthur. Id. at *9. The Court determined that Plaintiff produced sufficient evidence to suggest that the companies had policies that prevented the payment of earned overtime compensation, and failed to count as hours worked return travel or travel between work locations. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Hudson, et al. v. Protech Security Group*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23864 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 21, 2017). Plaintiff, a security officer, brought an action on behalf of himself and a group of similarly-situated currently and former security officers and patrol personnel for violations of the FLSA, the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"), and the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection Act ("IWPCA"). Plaintiff contended that Defendant maintained an unlawful policy of not paying employees for all time worked, including failing to pay them overtime at a rate of one and a half times their regular rate and wrongfully classifying employees as independent contractors in an effort to avoid paying overtime wages. Id. at *4. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of their FLSA claims, which the Court granted. In support of his motion, Plaintiff submitted his own affidavit, a sampling of Defendant's payroll records, and an attorney-created summary table based on the Defendant's records. Id. Plaintiff attested that throughout his employment, he and other security officers worked in excess of 40 hours during most workweeks and were "not paid time and half, or overtime wages, for such work." Id. at *5. In addition, Plaintiff alleged that although he always performed work for Defendant as an employee and never requested to be paid as an independent contractor, Defendant would sometimes classify him and other employees as independent contractors. Id. at *6. Defendant argued that the affidavit and payroll evidence were not enough – at the conditional certification stage – to show that its policies violated the law or that Plaintiff was similarly-situated to other security officer employees. Defendant asserted that in order to obtain conditional certification, Plaintiff was required to submit additional evidence from other employees, written policies, and/or deposition testimony. Id. at *7. The Court disagreed. The Court found that the payroll records and summary tables that Plaintiff relied on supported his claim that security officers were routinely not paid overtime wages. Id. at *8. The Court opined that these records showed that during various time periods, at least 18 security officer employees worked more than 40 hours per week but were not paid overtime wages as required by the FLSA. Id. at *8-9. The Court further stated that Defendant admitted that it may not have paid its employees "the technically correct overtime amount" under the FLSA. Id. at *9. The Court concluded that the affidavit attesting that Defendant involuntarily classified Plaintiff as an independent contractor to avoid paying him overtime wages under the FLSA, together with Defendant admissions that it sometimes categorized Plaintiff and other employees as independent contractors, created the required "modest factual showing" supporting conditional certification. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action. The Court directed the parties to file a joint document proposing the form of notice and consent and the method for its delivery to potential Plaintiffs. Id. at *14-15.

Ivery, et al. v. RMH Franchise Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 202270 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 8, 2017). Plaintiff, an assistant manager, alleged that Defendant RMH, which owns 175 Applebee's restaurants throughout the U.S., misclassified assistant managers as exempt and therefore failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and Illinois wage & hour laws. Plaintiff sued Applebee's, the franchisor, as well as Defendant RMH, a franchisee, as joint employers. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification, which the Court granted in part. Defendant also filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiff did not properly allege that Defendant RMH was her employer and thus was not a proper Defendant, and that Plaintiff failed to plead a necessary element of one her Illinois wage claims. The Court granted Defendant's motion. At issue was whether Plaintiff had adequately alleged a joint employer relationship as to one of the franchise business entities. The Court applied the four-factor employment test under the FLSA. Because Plaintiff had failed to allege even the most basic facts about her employment, including who hired her, paid her, and directly supervised her work, the Court held that she had failed to identify which of the franchise entities was her primary, direct employer. Id. at *10-11. Given these pleading deficiencies, the Court held that the complaint failed to plead sufficient facts to establish a joint employer relationship as to all of the franchise business entities, and dismissed one of those entities from the case. Id. at *17. As to Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification, Plaintiff submitted two declarations in support of her motion. Id. at *21. Plaintiff's declaration stated that she spent 80% of her time performing manual and customer service tasks, and that her managerial duties took up only a small amount of her time. Id. The Court held that at the first stage conditional certification stage, Plaintiff's declarations were sufficient to make a modest factual showing necessary to warrant notice to the putative members of the collective action. Defendants argued that notice should be limited to the one restaurant where the named Plaintiff worked. Id. at *32. However, the Court held that Plaintiffs' declarations had sufficiently demonstrated commonality across the entire putative collective action. Id. The Court therefore conditionally certified a nationwide collective action that included all assistant managers who worked at an Applebee's restaurant operated by the franchise group.

Kolish, et al. v. Metal Technologies, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17464 (S.D. Ind. Feb. 8, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of factory workers, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and Indiana wage laws when Defendant automatically deducted 30 minutes from employees' wages for lunch breaks, even though employees sometimes clocked-out for lunch periods of 20 minutes or less. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification of a collective action under the FLSA and Rule 23 class certification for their state law claims, which the Court denied. Defendant submitted declarations of 22 employees that indicated that they always took 30-minute unpaid lunch breaks and that Defendant's time records did not accurately reflect the duration of their lunch breaks. Id. at *13. The named Plaintiff's records showed that at times she clocked-out for a period of 20 minutes or less, but they also established that she inexplicably clocked-out and back in for lunch in the same minute on 88 different occasions. Id. at *9. The Court found that while the numerosity and adequacy requirements of Rule 23 were met, Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the remaining requirements for Rule 23 class certification because the time and payroll records were not reliable and did not accurately reflect the duration of all the employees' lunch breaks. Id. at *22. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the commonality element because Plaintiffs were unable to demonstrate that all class members were subject to the same conduct of not getting paid for lunch breaks of twenty minutes or less. Id. at *30. Because the time records were unreliable, the Court would need to look beyond the employees' time and payroll records and inquire specifically into whether each class members' lunch breaks corresponded to their time clock entries. With respect to typicality, Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that their claims were typical to those of the class because the records failed to demonstrate that other employees suffered the same or any injury. Id. at *32. The Court also concluded that because the time and payroll records were an "unreliable barometer of whether wages were unpaid," individual issues would predominate over the issues common to the class. Id. at *39. Accordingly, the predominance requirement was not satisfied. The Court also held that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the superiority requirement because Plaintiffs relied upon the unreliable time and payroll records that did not establish that Defendant maintained a policy that violated state law. Therefore, the Court would need to conduct "mini-trials" to examine each class member's claim individually. Id. at *40. As to Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of the FLSA collective action, the Court found that Plaintiffs had not made the necessary showing that similarly-situated Plaintiffs were all subjected to the same policy or practice. Even though evidence was presented that Defendant rounded lunch breaks of 20 minutes or less to 30 minutes of unpaid lunch time, rounding practices and automatic meal deductions are not per se violations of the FLSA. Id. at *46. Second, Plaintiffs testified that they knew they were required to take 30 minutes of lunch breaks and when employees worked during their lunch breaks, Defendant required them to complete an overtime authorization form to be paid for the time that they worked. The Court noted that Defendant was only required to pay for work of which it was aware, and was not liable for FLSA violations unless it has actual or constructive knowledge of employees' overtime work. Id. at *47. Plaintiffs failed to establish that Defendant was aware that its employees were taking unpaid lunch breaks of twenty minutes or less. Accordingly, the Court also denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of the FLSA collective action as well.

Kramer, et al. v. American Bank & Trust Co., N.A.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48360 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 31, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of loan officers, filed suit alleging violations of the FLSA, the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"), the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection Act ("IWPCA"), as well as for common law breach of contract, fraud by misrepresentation, and fraud by omission. Id. at *2. The Court had previously granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action on their FLSA claims. After some discovery, Plaintiffs moved to certify the class and Defendant moved to decertify the collective action. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to certify the class and denied Defendants' motion to decertify the conditionally certified FLSA collective action. Id. at *36. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant classified them as sales employees and did not pay them minimum wage or overtime wages and instead paid them on a commission basis. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs also asserted that Defendants violated state law when they perpetrated a skimming scheme in which Defendants artificially deflated loan officers' commissions in contravention of their employment contracts. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant represented to Plaintiffs that they would be paid monthly commissions from the loans that they had originated, when this was not the case. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs sought to certify two classes under Rule 23, including: (i) an IMWL class alleging failure to pay minimum wage and overtime; and (ii) a class divided into two sub-classes consisting of a breach of contract and fraud claims. The Court ruled that numerosity was satisfied. Id. at *11. The Court also found that commonality was satisfied because in regards to the IMWL claim, the class members had clearly suffered the same alleged injury, as they were all classified as employees who were exempt from minimum wage and overtime laws. Id. The Court reasoned that there were common questions in regards to Plaintiffs' IWPCA and skimming claims, including: (i) whether individual Defendants were employers under the IWPCA; (ii) whether Defendants represented to Plaintiffs that their commissions would be a percentage of revenue generated; (iii) whether the portion withheld from commissions known as "secondary gain" included revenue generated from loans; and (iv) whether any Defendant failed to pay commissions owed to Plaintiffs. The Court rejected Defendants' argument that there were individual questions that precluded certification, including the amount of damages suffered and how each class member interpreted their contracts. The Court opined that Rule 23 did not require commonality of all questions and individual damages determinations did not require denial of certification. Id. at *14. The Court also rejected Defendants' argument that Plaintiffs were barred from proceeding as a class on their IWPCA claim because the IWPCA's amendment adding a class action right was a substantive change in the law, which could not be applied retroactively, as it ruled that the ability to bring a class action is a procedural, not a substantive, right. Id. at *15. The Court also found that typicality was satisfied and it rejected Defendants' assertion that the claims of the named Plaintiffs were not typical of the class, ruling that the class representative's claims arose from the same course of conduct and the same legal theory that was alleged by the class throughout the class period. The Court also concluded that the named Plaintiffs' lack of understanding of the issues at hand was insufficient to prevent certification. Id. at *17. The Court determined that the named Plaintiffs and class counsel adequately represented the class. Id. at *18-20. The Court ruled that Rule 23(b)(3)'s requirements of predominance and superiority were also satisfied. Id. at *29. The Court rejected Defendants' argument that it would be impossible to determine damages using a class-wide methodology, because the class members did not work the same schedule, reasoning that if this were a requirement for predominance, no collective action or wage & hour class action would ever be certified. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs motion to certify the class. The Court also denied Defendants' motion to decertify the FLSA collective action and ruled that Plaintiffs met their burden that the opt-in Plaintiffs were similarly-situated for purposes of § 216(b).

Lamarr, et al. v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 79241 (N.D. Ill. May 24, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of call center representatives ("CCRs"), brought an action alleging that Defendants required them to work before their shifts, during meal breaks, and after their shifts and were not compensated for such work in violation of the FLSA and the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"). Plaintiffs claimed that they were required to turn on equipment and boot up software programs before their scheduled shifts, that they were required to perform work during meal breaks, and they performed work after shifts such as completing calls. Id. at *3. As a result of Defendants' policies, Plaintiffs alleged that they were deprived of overtime compensation. Plaintiffs sought to conditionally certify their FLSA claims as a collective action, and the Court granted the motion. Defendants argued that the evidence showed that certain putative collective action members worked for entities that were not named as Defendants in the case. Id. at *7. However, the Court stated that the FLSA does not require that all members of a collective action have the same employer, and Plaintiffs produced evidence that the putative collective action members had a joint employer. Id. Plaintiffs also alleged that the named Defendants had control over the putative collective action members such that they would be considered an employer of the collective action members. The Court found that the joint employer question involved a consideration of matters outside the pleadings and its determination was premature at the conditional certification stage. Defendants further argued that the putative collective action members were not subjected to any common policies that would warrant certification. Id. at *8. The Court noted that Defendants, in making their arguments, focused on irrelevant conflicts and sought to impose a stringent evidentiary burden on Plaintiffs at the conditional certification stage that was not required under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. The Court held that Plaintiffs pointed to evidence, such as the testimony from Defendants Rule 30(b)(6) witnesses, deposition testimony from Plaintiffs, and declarations from putative collective action members to show at this juncture that there were certain common policies and practices among Defendants that the putative collective action members faced while employed by Defendants. Id. The Court further stated that the fact that Defendants allegedly had multiple policies and practices that violated the FLSA and deprived their employees of earned overtime did not preclude certification. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

McCaster, et al. v. Darden Restaurants, Inc.,* 845 Fed. 3d 794 (7th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, two former restaurant employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendants did not pay them their earned vacation pay as part of their final compensation when their employment ended in violation of the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection Act ("IWPCA"). Plaintiffs contended that Defendants had a vacation policy under which hourly employees earned vacation days based on length of service. Id. at 796. Plaintiffs sought to certify a class of all former Defendant employees in Illinois since December 11, 2003, who were subject to Defendants' vacation policy and who did not receive all earned vacation pay benefits. Id. at 797. The District Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. The District Court ruled that Plaintiffs' proposed class definition constituted an impermissible fail-safe class. Plaintiffs proposed an alternative class definition removing the phrase "and who did not receive all earned vacation pay benefits," which the District Court also rejected because it failed to meet the requirements of Rule 23. Id. Defendant also moved for partial summary judgment on Plaintiff Clark's individual claim, arguing that Clark was not eligible for vacation pay during the relevant time period because she worked part-time. The District Court agreed and granted the motion. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Seventh Circuit held that, because Defendant's vacation-pay policy covered only full-time employees, Clark did not qualify for benefits. Id. at 798. Clark argued that if an employer provides paid vacation to its full-time employees on a pro rata length-of-service basis, it may not deny this same benefit to its part-time employees. The Seventh Circuit rejected Plaintiffs' argument, holding that Clark's interpretation had no support in the text of the IWPCA, its implementing regulations, or in Illinois cases interpreting it, for "the Act merely prohibits the forfeiture of accrued earned vacation pay. Whether an employee has earned paid vacation in the first place depends on the terms of the employer's employment policy." Id. at 799. The Seventh Circuit stated that since Clark did not work full-time, she did not accrue benefits subject to forfeiture at separation. Id. at 802. The Seventh Circuit further concluded that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying class certification. Id. at 803. The Seventh Circuit held that, under Plaintiffs' class definition, class membership turned on whether class members had valid claims, "a classic fail-safe class," and therefore it was properly rejected by the District Court. Id. The Seventh Circuit found that although Plaintiffs' proposed alternative class was free from fail-safe concerns, Plaintiffs failed to identify any unlawful conduct on Defendant's part "that spans the entire class and caused all class members to suffer the same injury" with the proposed class definition. Id. at 804. The Seventh Circuit noted that Plaintiffs did not identify whether the vacation accrual pay policy violated Illinois labor law, or whether Darden had a practice of withholding such pay. Id. Plaintiffs simply argued that some separated employees did not receive all the vacation pay they were due. The Seventh Circuit noted that "that may be true, . . . but establishing those violations (if there were any) would not involve any class-wide proof." Id. The Seventh Circuit opined that it was not enough for Plaintiffs to allege that certain employees did not receive all the pay that was allegedly due to establish a class action, because resolving each class members' vacation pay claims would depend entirely on the members' individual work history and the specific payroll practices of the managers of the restaurants where they worked. Id. at 805. The Seventh Circuit therefore agreed with the District Court that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the commonality requirement of Rule 23. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling denying Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

McDonald, et al. v. P.F. Chang's,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73322 (N.D. Ill. May 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant servers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the minimum wage requirements of the FLSA by improperly requiring them to share tips, not compensating them at minimum wage for time spent doing non-tipped work, and not providing the required tip credit notice to servers. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part. With regard to their tip notice claims, Plaintiffs submitted three tip reporting agreement forms that Plaintiffs contended were deficient pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 203(m). The Court found that Plaintiffs made the minimal showing necessary for conditional certification on their claim that employees lacked the required tip notice, which was distributed consistently across multiple restaurants in multiple states. Id. at *14. Plaintiffs also claimed that: (i) they were required to perform "improper types" of tasks unrelated to their tipped occupation for which they should have the full minimum wage for the time they spent performing that work (the "unrelated dual jobs claim"); and (ii) they spent more than 20% of their time performing untipped tasks "related" to their tipped occupation for which they should have received the full minimum wage for that time (the "excessive related jobs claim"). Id. at *26. Plaintiffs relied on their own declarations, which described the type of tasks that they were made to perform and which stated that their managers required them to perform this work. Defendant argued that requiring employees to perform non-tip producing work is not unlawful as long as the work is related to the tipped occupation, and many of the side work tasks that Plaintiffs contested were "precisely the types of side tasks which the law recognizes may be performed at the tipped rate." Id. at *26-27. The Court opined that whether or not the tasks were "related" or "unrelated" went to the merits of Plaintiffs' claims and could not be resolved at the conditional certification stage. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs had made the minimal showing necessary for conditional certification on their unrelated dual jobs claim. However, the Court noted that Plaintiffs' only evidence that employees performed an excessive amount of non-tipped work came from their own affidavits, and therefore Plaintiffs had not met their burden to show the existence of any common policy in any other restaurants in Illinois or New York other than the restaurants where they worked. Id. Plaintiffs further alleged that they and other tipped employees were subject to a common policy requiring them to share a portion of their tips with ineligible employees. Id. at *28. As to that issue, the Court determined that the sole support for the allegations were the two declarations from Plaintiffs describing the tip-pooling arrangements at their restaurants. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs made the minimal showing necessary for conditional certification of the claim for employees at their own restaurants, but had not met their burden to show that a common illegal policy regarding tip-pooling arrangements existed for any of the other restaurants in Illinois and New York. Id. Plaintiffs also contended that they were regularly required to work off-the-clock. Id. at *32-33. Plaintiffs stated that they "saw other employees arrive early and not punch in" and that "they too were required to punch out while finishing closing side work." Id. at *33. Based on the evidence that Plaintiffs presented, the Court determined that they had made the minimal showing necessary for conditional certification of this claim for employees at their own restaurants, but that nothing about the practices that Plaintiffs observed at their restaurants suggested the existence of a policy of requiring off-the-clock work at any other restaurant. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification in part.

Meetz, et al. v. Wisconsin Hospitality Group,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 138380 (E.D. Wis. Aug. 29, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of pizza delivery drivers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants' expense reimbursement policy resulted in their failure to receive the federal minimum wage in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Defendants' delivery drivers supplied their own vehicles for deliveries. Id. at *4. Defendants paid drivers a per delivery reimbursement to defray the costs of operating their delivery vehicles. Id. Plaintiff alleged that Defendants failed to reasonably approximate the drivers' actual vehicle expenses and that the drivers' compensation therefore fell below the federal minimum wage. Id. at *5. Defendants contended that the 48 declarations filed by Plaintiff and opt-in Plaintiffs, 6 declarations filed by Defendants, and 3 depositions of Defendant's representatives taken by Plaintiff, as well as the company policies in the record, provided the Court with sufficient factual information to proceed under the heightened second stage certification standard. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs asserted that they still lacked requested reimbursement rate data for all of Defendants' restaurants, as well as complete payroll and time data for half of the opt-in Plaintiffs, and therefore discovery was not well underway. Id. at *10. The Court opined that regardless of whether the lenient standard or the heightened standard applied, conditional certification of a collective action was proper because Plaintiffs made an adequate showing that they and the other current and former delivery drivers in the putative class were similarly-situated. Id. The Court noted that the evidence in the record indicated that delivery drivers at all of Defendants' restaurants shared consistent job requirements, including responsibility for providing a delivery vehicle, maintaining it in a safe, working condition, and procuring an insurance policy that provided minimum coverage levels. Id. The Court determined that the evidence showed that delivery drivers employed by Defendants were subject to a common compensation and reimbursement policy that resulted in their failure to receive the federal minimum wage. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Morgan, et al. v. Northern Concrete Construction Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 212515 (E.D. Wis. Dec. 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of concrete finishers and laborers, alleged that Defendants CSW and Northern Concrete failed to pay them the minimum wage and overtime pay in violation of the FLSA and the Wisconsin wage & hour laws. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action for their FLSA claims against Northern Concrete, which the Court granted in part and denied in part. Plaintiffs sought certification of two collective actions, including: (i) all employees who traveled to Wisconsin to work on Northern Concrete jobsites after being referred to Northern Concrete by CSW; and (ii) all Northern Concrete direct-hire employees who received a per diem that exceeded their reasonably estimated meal expenses. Id. at *2. With regard to their travel time claim, Plaintiffs asserted that Northern Concrete was liable to them for unpaid overtime as a joint employer because Plaintiffs' travel time to and from Wisconsin was not counted as hours worked. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs argued that if travel time properly had been counted as hours worked, they would have worked over 40 hours per week without receiving overtime compensation. Id. Plaintiffs cited to several named Plaintiffs' time-cards, which indicated that when including travel time on Sundays with hours worked for the following week, they worked over 40 hours per week without receiving overtime compensation. Id. at *8. Based on this record, the Court was satisfied that Plaintiffs were similarly-situated to the members of the proposed travel time collective action. The Court stated that although Northern Concrete pointed to several alleged deficiencies in Plaintiffs' evidence, any shortcomings in the evidence did not change the fact that the claims turn on two critical questions, including: (i) whether Northern Concrete was liable to members of the proposed travel time collective action as a joint employer with CSW; and (ii) whether the practice of not paying workers referred to Northern Concrete by CSW for their travel time to Wisconsin violated the FLSA. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification as to the travel time claims. Plaintiffs also alleged that Northern Concrete paid its direct-hire employees a per diem that exceeded their actual meal expenses and therefore Northern Concrete should have included the excess portion of the per diem payment in the regular rate of pay when calculating overtime payments. Id. at *13. Considering the whole record, the Court determined that Plaintiffs failed to offer compelling evidence that the per diem payments were unreasonably excessive. The Court further stated that nature of Plaintiffs' per diem claim ultimately was not amenable to efficient resolution on a collective action basis. The Court reasoned that determining whether the per diem reasonably approximated any individual employee's expenses turned on highly individualized factors, including the distance between the particular worksite and the employee's home; whether the employee stayed in a hotel; whether and where the employee ate breakfast, lunch and dinner; and whether the employee drove his own vehicle, a company truck, or car-pooled with another employee. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to make an adequate showing that they were similarly-situated with members of the proposed per diem collective action. Id. at *17-18. The Court therefore denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification as to the per diem collective action.

Muir, et al. v. Guardian Heating & Cooling*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35232 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former hourly employees, brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay proper overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA, the Illinois Minimum Wage Law, and the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection Act. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification, which the Court granted in part. Plaintiffs' proposed collective action included all employees to whom Defendant failed to pay overtime because they worked through lunch without pay, worked past the end of the workday, spent time on the phone conducting phone consultations off-hours, and spent time commuting to job-sites. Id. at *3. The named Plaintiff Muir asserted in his declaration that many of Defendants' employees "are similarly-situated to me as they worked through lunch without pay, were not paid for call times on off-hours, and were not paid for all travel time." Id. at *5. Defendants contended that the members of Plaintiffs' proposed collective were not similarly-situated because installers, office staff, and service representatives were subjected to different sets of policies. The Court found that service representatives and installers were similarly-situated because Plaintiffs made a modest factual showing that both were victims of the challenged policies. The Court stated that both sets of employees predominantly spent their days visiting and traveling between job-sites to perform installations, maintenance, and other service work. Id. at *22. The Court found that the two employee types faced similar pressures that may make electing to take a 30-minute lunch break impracticable. Further, both types of employees drove company vehicles to job-sites, and they were therefore similarly-situated with respect to Defendant's alleged premature "punching out" of service employees upon their starting the engine of their vehicles (before completion of all job-related work). Id. at *23. The Court determined that Plaintiffs had made a modest factual showing that service representatives and installers shared the "same essential responsibilities," and were thus similarly-situated for purposes of the lunch, transit, and phone policies. Id. at *23-24. However, the Court found that office staff personnel did not experience work conditions "on-call" such as floating or discretionary lunch breaks, working on job-sites, or responding to emergency service requests. Id. at *24. The Court held that there was insufficient evidence that supported the notion that office staff ever performed itinerant work outside the office, drove company vehicles, or worked on job-sites. Id. at *25. Similarly, because the only particulars in Plaintiffs' phone policy claim related to in-person emergency service calls, Plaintiffs fell short of a modest factual showing that office staff were victims of Defendant's "on-call" policy or otherwise were shorted overtime based on uncompensated call time. Id. at *26. The Court therefore determined that Defendant's office staff were not similarly-situated and crafted the conditional certification order to include only service representatives and installers. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification in part.

Murphy, et al. v. Professional Transportation Inc.,* Case No. 14-CV-378 (S.D. Ill. Nov. 27, 2017). Plaintiff, a ground transportation provider on the Illinois High Speed Rail Project, filed a putative class action alleging minimum wage violations pursuant to the Illinois Prevailing Wage Act ("IPWA"). Plaintiff moved for class certification and the Court denied Plaintiff's motion on the grounds that he failed to satisfy Rule 23's requirements with respect to numerosity, adequacy, and predominance. Id. at *19. Defendant asserted that the IPWA was inapplicable for various reasons. The Court assumed, without deciding, for purposes of certification that the work that Plaintiff allegedly performed was subject to the IPWA. Id. at *2. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that the definition of the class was a fail-safe class because despite the incorporation of statutory laws, even if putative class members were found to be paid the correct amount, they would still be bound by the Court's judgment. As to numerosity, the Court found that the declaration of Plaintiff's counsel that there were 45 potential class members who performed this type of work for Defendant, standing alone, was not sufficient to satisfy the rigorous analysis required for class certification. Id. at *8. Plaintiff failed to offer any facts or argument as to why joinder would be impractical. Id.at *10. Therefore, the Court ruled that Plaintiff failed to satisfy the numerosity requirement. Id. With respect to adequacy, Plaintiff answered under oath in his interrogatories that he had never been convicted of a felony crime. However, during his deposition, he admitted that he had been convicted of voluntary manslaughter and was sentenced to ten years' incarceration. Id. at *14. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's failure to disclose his convictions in discovery raised questions regarding his credibility. Defendant asserted that due to an administrative error, Plaintiff was overpaid in a two-week period and this was an arguable defense which did not appear to pertain to the remaining putative class members. As such, because of these issues, the Court concluded that Plaintiff was not an adequate class representative. Id. at *15. Finally, the Court ruled the Rule 23(b)(3)'s requirement of predominance was not satisfied because Plaintiff's theory of liability would require significant individualized inquiries as to each driver to determine whether they worked on the project in question on any given day. Id. at *16. Further, calculation of damages would require inquiry into how long each driver spent in each county, and there was testimony that the drivers crossed multiple county lines in a day and the wages owed varied from county to county. Id. at *17. The Court found that when combined with the individualized proof required to establish liability, these issues made certification inappropriate. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Nicks, et al. v. Koch Foods Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 150763 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 18, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of chicken catching crew employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime and minimum wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Defendants used third-party contractors to staff its live-haul crews. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant paid based on the number of chickens caught, and the third-party contractors in turn paid the members of the chicken catching crews. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendants required crew members to work hours in excess of 40 hours per week, but did not pay them overtime or compensate them for travel time or time spent waiting for Defendants' machines to become available. Id. at *13. Plaintiffs contended that Defendants did not properly record the number of hours worked by crew members, and accordingly, they did not pay crew members minimum wages or pay them overtime for hours worked over 40 hours per work. Plaintiffs argued that they had made a modest factual showing that they and the other potential Plaintiffs were similarly-situated because they all worked for Defendant Koch Foods through independent contracting companies, they all performed similar chicken-catching work without receiving overtime pay, and all the contractors were subject to the identical service agreement. Defendants argued that: (i) Plaintiffs had not identified a common policy that violated the FLSA; and (ii) Plaintiffs and other potential claimants were not similarly-situated because they worked in different locations for different third-party contractors and supervisors. Id. at *21. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to show that Defendants' use of third-party contractors was a scheme to avoid FLSA liability and they had failed to show that the potential claimants were subjected to a vertical reporting structure in which they were required to work unpaid overtime. Id. at *22. However, the Court determined that Plaintiffs provided sufficient evidence, at the preliminary conditional certification stage, to make a modest factual showing that Defendants had a common policy or practice that caused chicken-catchers at their various complexes to work unpaid overtime. Id. at *25-26. The Court noted that Plaintiffs submitted multiple declarations from workers at multiple locations in which they averred that they were regularly required to work more than 40 hours per week without being paid overtime. Id. at *26. The Court stated that Plaintiffs need not identify a specific, written policy requiring them to work overtime. It is sufficient that they have provided multiple declarations indicating that Defendants had a de facto practice at more than one complex of not paying for overtime hours. Defendants also argued that Plaintiffs provided insufficient evidence that they were similarly-situated to other potential Plaintiffs because they worked at different complexes for different independent contractors and had different supervisors. Id. at *27. The Court determined that Plaintiffs sufficiently demonstrated that the chicken-catchers at the various complexes performed similar job functions and had similar duties such that they were similarly-situated for purposes of the FLSA. Id. at *30-31. Plaintiffs provided affidavits from five individuals who worked at different complexes as chicken-catchers, in which the individuals declared that they performed functionally the same work at each complex; catching chickens and loading them on to cages for transport to processing plants. Id. at *31. Additionally, all the chicken-catchers work for third-party contractors that provided "similar functions" for Defendants and had similar service contracts with Defendants, whereby Defendants set the daily catch schedules and determined "when and how many chickens to put in each cage on each load." Id. The Court found that these facts demonstrated that Plaintiffs provided sufficient evidence to make a modest factual showing that the potential collective action members were similarly-situated. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Owens, et al. v. GLH Enterprises,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 108808 (S.D. Ill. July 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants violated the FLSA by failing to pay overtime for hours worked over 40 in a workweek. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs requested the Court conditionally certify a collective action of all non-exempt cooks, servers, bartenders, and assistant managers who worked for Defendant at any time in the past three years. Id. at *2. Defendants opposed certification, asserting that Plaintiffs: (i) could not prove potential members of the proposed collective action were similarly-situated; (ii) could not prove Defendants were joint employers and part of an enterprise-wide action; and (iii) could not prove the three year statute of limitations applied. Id. at *3. As to Defendant's first argument, Plaintiffs alleged that the proposed collective action was similarly-situated because all members were non-exempt employees who were entitled to uncompensated overtime pay. Id. at *4-5. Defendants argued that potential members of the proposed collective action were not similarly-situated because of differences in the day-to-day job duties and method of payment for different groups of employees. Id. at *5. The Court found Defendants' arguments to be premature at this stage of the litigation, and declined to decide substantive issues going to the ultimate merits or make credibility determinations. Defendants further asserted that the Court must look to the type of work performed by each employee to determine whether they were similarly-situated, and that because dish washers, bartenders, servers, and assistant managers performed different daily functions, they were not similarly-situated. Id. at *6. The Court held that an analysis of the employee' daily duties was not necessary to determine whether they qualify as members of the collective action. The Court stated that the type of work done by a dishwasher or bartender was wholly irrelevant to the underlying claim of whether they were properly paid overtime. The employees identified as part of the proposed collective action were all non-exempt, and therefore entitled to overtime, and nothing about the job duties of the employees would change that status. Id. at *7. Further, with regard to pay structures, the Court found that since that claim was the same for both tipped and non-tipped employees, that fact that they may be compensated somewhat differently did not prevent them from being a homogenous group. Id. at *8. Defendants also argued that Plaintiffs failed to show they were "joint employers." Id. Defendants contended that an individualized inquiry would be necessary to determine whether they were joint employers, and that the certification process should be delayed until such a determination can be made. Id. at *10. The Court found Defendant's argument unpersuasive. Finally, the Court determined that Plaintiffs pled facts supporting their claim that Defendants' failure to pay overtime was done either knowingly or recklessly. Id. at *12. Therefore, the Court ruled that the allegations made by Plaintiffs were sufficient to allege willfulness on the part of Defendants and therefore a three-year statute of limitations time period was appropriate. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Pecor, et al. v. North Point EDC, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88894 (E.D. Wis. June 9, 2017). Plaintiff, an exotic dancer, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and Wisconsin wage laws by misclassifying dancers as independent contractors and thereby failed to pay the statutory minimum wage and overtime wages. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of the collective action, which the Court denied. Plaintiff contended that she met the minimal burden to show that she and potential Plaintiffs were victims of Defendant's common policy or plan. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's common schemes applied to all its exotic dancers, since: (i) each dancer kept their own tips for regular dance performances; (ii) Defendant required that each dancer's costume/performance complied with local laws regarding nudity and imitating sexual acts; (iii) each dancer had to pay $10 at the start of their shift to fund the juke box; (vi) a dancer's number of days performed was determined by their schedule and Defendant's need; (v) each dancer was encouraged to perform at least four "lap dances" and obtain a customer's purchase of approximately 10 drinks per day; (vi) the performance manager established the schedule a week early and assigned each dancer a number to keep track of performances, drinks, and dances sold; (vii) the bartender tracked which dancers performed according to the schedule; (viii) the bartender and dancer recorded the days the dancer worked, the time arrived, the drinks sold, and dances/lap dances performed and sold; (ix) the customers pay the bartenders for any lap dances; and (x) Defendant controlled performances to the extent necessary to comply with state and local laws. Id. at *9-10. Defendants asserted that Plaintiff was not similarly-situated to other putative collective action members. Defendant alleged that each dancer signed a different agreement for fees for their performances, usually based on experience, the nature of their performance, or individually negotiated daily bonus rates, and some dancers received an appearance bonus based on their popularity. Id. at *10. Defendants further asserted that because the majority of dancers did not work a minimum workweek and there was not commonality of earnings between dancers, there could be no similarly-situated claims. Id. at *10. Based on the record, the Court concluded that Plaintiff failed to make an adequate showing that she was similarly-situated with proposed collective action members so as to warrant conditional certification. Id. at *11. The Court found that Defendant provided evidence that significant variations existed between dancers. The Court noted that Plaintiff offered no evidence as to how many hours a week most dancers worked, the amount they generally received in tips and bonus payment, or how many reach the threshold number for requiring overtime pay. Id. The Court further noted that Plaintiff asserted that she had "heard" of other dancers not being paid for a week's worth of work, but she did not allege her weekly total was ever withheld. Id. The Court reasoned that a Plaintiff may not demonstrate she is similarly-situated for the purposes of conditional certification by relying on "unsupported assertions of additional Plaintiffs and widespread FLSA violations." Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional class certification.

Pietrzycki, et al. v. Heights Tower Service, Inc.,* Case No. 14 C6546 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 29, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of cell tower foremen and technicians, filed a class action pursuant to the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL") and a collective action under the FLSA. Both parties moved for summary judgment and the Magistrate Judge denied both motions for summary judgment, as well as Defendants' motion to decertify the class and the collective action. Id. at 46. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants failed to properly compensate them for time traveling to and from cell towers. With respect to traveling to worksites, Plaintiffs had two options, including: (i) arrange their own transportation; or (ii) travel on Defendants' trucks at no cost. Defendant paid its employees $10 per hour for travel time. If an employee traveled in one of Defendants' trucks they were required to meet at a designated location at the start of the day by a certain time. Plaintiffs challenged Defendants' failure to count the drive time when computing how many hours Plaintiffs worked in a week for purposes of overtime and in determining their regular rate. Id. at 27. As to the hours worked claim, Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants violated the IMWL and the FLSA by undercounting the number of overtime hours that they worked when it failed to count the drive time hours. The Court agreed that Defendant had a practice to compensate Plaintiffs for traveling as passengers to and from jobsites, but disagreed that such a practice automatically made the drive time hours worked into hours worked under the Portal-to-Portal Act ("PPA"). The Court determined that Plaintiffs failed to show that the drive time should be characterized as anything other than ordinary home-to work travel based upon the record. Plaintiffs asserted that when traveling on Defendant's trucks they went to designated meeting locations and did not directly commute from or to home. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' argument because Defendant did not require employees to go to a designated meeting spot and they were free to travel directly from home to their assigned towers at the start of the day and do directly home at the end of the day and Defendants' decision to provide transportation did not transform ordinary commuting hours into hours worked. The Magistrate Judge noted that the record was poorly developed as to how much time Plaintiffs spent traveling to job-sites and it was possible Plaintiffs could establish that the amount of time spent should not be characterized as ordinary home-to work travel, but Plaintiffs had not established a record of this. The Magistrate Judge rejected Plaintiffs' assertion that some sub-sets of drive time counted as hours worked, including: (i) hours worked under the continuous workday rule; (ii) hours in which employees performed other compensable work while traveling as passengers; and (iii) travel time away from home overnight. The Magistrate Judge also rejected Defendants' arguments that drive-time payments fell within the exclusion of 29 U.S.C. § 207(e)(2) because it found Defendants "undeveloped and unsupported" argument was not sufficient and failed to satisfy the burden of proving that an exclusion applied. Id. at 30. The Magistrate Judge also denied Plaintiffs' motion as to the regular rate because it could not determine whether any drive time counted as hours worked, and therefore could not determine whether Defendants' hourly rate of pay for overtime was too low. The Magistrate Judge concluded because of the uncertainty regarding Plaintiffs' hours worked and the uncertainty of how the exclusion of drive time from hours worked would affect the amount of overtime compensation due, Plaintiffs were not entitled to summary judgment on their regular rate claim. The Magistrate Judge also rejected Defendants' argument that the PPA shielded them from liability because they did not have a practice to pay for drive time, as the Court found that Defendants did have such a practice. Finally, the Magistrate Judge denied Defendants' motion to decertify the class. The Magistrate Judge noted that Defendants' motion was "somewhat in tension with the fact that they have moved for summary judgment on a class-wide basis." Id. at 45. Moreover, the Magistrate Judge had previously denied the Defendants' motion to decertify the collective action over a year prior to Defendants' new motion, and it had rejected Defendants' assertion that there was no custom or practice of compensating employees for drive time. Id. at 46. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge denied both parties' motions for summary judgment and Defendants' motion to decertify the class and the collective action.

Solsol, et al. v. Scrub, Inc.,* Case No. 13-CV-7652 (N.D. Ill. May 23, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of janitors who worked at the O'Hare International Airport ("O'Hare"), brought a collective action alleging that Defendants' method of determining their compensation based on the supervisor payroll input sheet ("input sheets") violated the FLSA. Janitors who worked at O'Hare clocked-in and clocked-out at the start of their shifts, and orally reported to supervisors the amount of time they worked. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant violated the FLSA in several ways. First, Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant only paid them for their scheduled, rather than actual, working hours. Second, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant rounded their time in a way that under-compensated them. Third, Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant automatically deducted 30 minutes for meal breaks even when Plaintiffs worked during their breaks. The Court conditionally certified a collective action of employees who worked as janitorial staff at that airport. Subsequently, after discovery was complete, Defendant moved to decertify the collective action, and the Court granted the motion. The Court first considered whether Plaintiffs and the opt-ins had similar factual and employment settings. It found that even though all opt-ins worked at O'Hare, it was at least questionable that all opt-ins worked in the same location given the size of O'Hare. Id. at 6. The Court determined that the opt-ins worked on different shifts for more than 40 different supervisors, a factor weighing in favor of decertification. Id. at 7. The Court also opined that the claims of the opt-ins varied, as some claimed they were required to start work 15 minutes before their scheduled shift time every day; others claimed they worked only a few minutes before the start of their shift; and others claimed they did not work prior to the start of their shift. Id. at 6-7. Some claimed their lunch breaks were interrupted for work about once per week; others claimed their lunch breaks were interrupted every day; others claimed they never took a lunch break; and others claimed they took full lunch breaks every day. Id. at 7. Significantly, the Court stated that each supervisor had his or her own rounding policy and therefore Plaintiffs and the opt-ins had different factual and employment settings. Id. at 12. Second, the Court considered whether Defendant had individualized affirmative defenses. The Court noted that Defendant could claim that it overpaid some opt-ins and that the unpaid time for some opt-ins was so minimal that it did not support a claim. Id. at 13. Third, the Court considered whether allowing the opt-ins' claims to be decided in one proceeding would be fair. The Court reasoned that the only way to determine the number of hours that each opt-in worked without pay would be through individualized inquiries. Id. at 15. Whereas Plaintiffs argued that the Court could determine the amount of off-the-clock work by comparing each employees' time-card with the time for which they were compensated, the Court found that this was, by necessity, individualized. Id. at 15-16. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for decertification.

Swafford, et al. v. Cent. Tri-Axle Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 186985 (S.D. Ind. Nov. 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former dump truck drivers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. In support of their motion for conditional certification, Plaintiffs submitted declarations describing their work duties and activities, the lack of time-keeping records by Defendant, their consistent workweek of more than 40 hours, and the failure of Defendant to pay them any overtime wages. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs also described that they worked with approximately 40 other drivers, and based on their observations of, and conversations with, these other drivers, they understand that the other drivers were subject to the same work policies, performed the same work responsibilities, did not have their work hours accurately recorded, worked overtime hours, and did not receive overtime wages. Id. at *8-9. Plaintiffs also submitted the declaration of a similarly-situated employee, which offered additional evidence regarding other similarly-situated employees who had similar work experiences. Id. at *9. Defendant argued that conditional certification of a collective action was not appropriate because Plaintiffs' declarations were not reliable and failed to establish that similarly-situated employees were subject to the same policies or practices that violated the FLSA. Id. at *10. The Court determined that conditional certification of a collective action for Plaintiffs' FLSA claim was appropriate because Plaintiffs made a threshold showing that they were similarly-situated to other drivers who were denied overtime wages. Id. at *13. The Court held that Plaintiffs' declarations established their work duties, their overtime hours, and the denial of overtime wages, and sufficiently described the similar conditions of other drivers employed by Defendant. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Ward, et al. v. Hat World*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 195778 (S.D. Ind. Nov. 29, 2017). Plaintiff, a regional loss prevention investigator ("RLPI"), filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff stated that he regularly worked more than 40 hours in a week, but Defendant never providing overtime compensation. Plaintiff further alleged that he talked with other RLPIs who experienced similar long work hours without overtime compensation. Id. at *4. In support of his motion, Plaintiff provided his own declaration and declarations from two other employees describing their experience of regularly working more than 40 hours in a week but not receiving overtime wages. The declarations also affirmed that Defendant classified Plaintiff and all other RLPIs as "exempt administrative employees" under the FLSA and failed to pay RLPIs overtime wages for any hours they worked in excess of 40 hours in a week. Id. at *5. The declarations also described the tasks RLPIs performed, which were consistent with the "job description" document that Defendant gave employees. Id. at *10. In response, Defendant argued that it properly classified RLPIs as exempt under the FLSA overtime provision, so there was no unlawful common practice or policy suffered by similarly-situated employees. Id. Defendant further asserted that a collective action was improper because of variations in job duties, which it attempted to illustrate through several of its own declarations. The Court determined that each of the declarations showed similar job responsibilities and working conditions at their core among the RLPIs. Additionally, the Court found that the declarations provided by Defendant actually confirmed that RLPIs worked more than 40 hours in a week and were not compensated with overtime wages. Id. at *12. The Court held that the arguments advanced by each party and the evidence offered in support showed that RLPIs had similar job responsibilities, were subject to similar company policies and practices, and were paid under a similar compensation structure. Id. at *13. The Court also noted that a determination of whether RLPIs were properly classified as exempt employees went to the merits of Plaintiff's claims, and therefore it declined to address the issue at the conditional certification stage. Therefore, the Court concluded that Plaintiff met his burden of making a modest factual showing that he was similarly-situated to the potential Plaintiffs for purposes of conditionally certifying a collective action. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Williams, et al. v. Angie's List, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64732 (S.D. Ind. April 27, 2017). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to compensate them for overtime hours worked as required by the FLSA. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant, through its sales trainers, sales managers, sales directors, and other executives and officers, routinely and regularly instructed sales representatives to under-report, or not report, hours worked in excess of 40 hours per week. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant knew or should have known that its sales representatives regularly worked hours in excess of 40 hours per week, but did not pay them for all overtime hours worked. Id. Plaintiffs previously sought to conditionally certify a collective action that included employees who worked for Defendant as advertising sales consultants, discovery representatives, eligibility representatives, and senior solutions consultants in the sales origination department. The Court found that Plaintiffs did not provide sufficient support for conditional certification, and denied their motion. The Court, however, allowed Plaintiffs to file another motion for conditional certification, which they subsequently presented to the Court. In their second motion, Plaintiffs sought conditional certification for a collective action of a number of current and former employees, including individuals who were advertising sales consultants in the sales origination department from three years prior to the date of the ruling to October 1, 2015, and employees in the sales origination department from October 1, 2015, to the present, who held several jobs, such as discovery representatives, eligibility representatives, and senior solutions consultants. Plaintiffs also sought to include current and former employees who work or worked as big deal representatives or e-commerce representatives in the big deal department or in the e-commerce department from three years prior to the date of the ruling to the present. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs also sought, in the alternative, conditional certification for six collective action sub-groups, which corresponded to the six identified job titles. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to show that they were similarly-situated to members of the proposed collective action or to each other. Defendant also contended that Plaintiffs had not offered any new substantive evidence to support their position and that they failed to show a common policy or plan that would have required the putative collective action members to under-report or not report overtime hours. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs submitted affidavits in support of their allegations, from employees across all job titles, claiming that their managers instructed them to work overtime without recording the work time and thereby not receiving overtime compensation. Defendants submitted contrary affidavits from employees stating that their managers never requested that they work overtime without recording it and receiving overtime compensation. The Court found that Defendant's evidence did not contradict Plaintiffs' evidence in a way that would lead it to resolve a conflict in Plaintiffs' favor. Id. at *15. The Court opined that it was possible for the facts in both Plaintiffs' affidavits and Defendant's affidavits to be true. The Court determined that if it accepted both sets of declarations as true, it could not conclude that the putative collective action members and Plaintiffs were victims of a common policy or plan. Plaintiffs' evidence, taken as true, failed to support a finding that Defendant instructed all identified employees to not report overtime hours or to under-report overtime hours in order to not pay them for all overtime that they worked; nor did it support a finding that any other common plan or policy applied to avoid paying all those employees for all hours worked. Id. at *16. The Court held that Plaintiffs may have individual claims against Defendant, but they failed to provide sufficient support for conditional certification of the proposed collective action or any sub-group. The Court therefore denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

(viii) Eighth Circuit

Coates, et al. v. Dassault Falc-on Jet Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 192345 (E.D. Ark. Nov. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt employees and thereby failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the Arkansas Minimum Wage Act ("AMWA"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs sought to certify a collective action of three different groups of employees, including: (i) team leaders and those in similar positions employed by Defendants since June 6, 2014; (ii) office personnel employees and those in similar positions employed by Defendants since June 6, 2014; and (iii) liaisons and those in similar positions employed by Defendants since June 6, 2014. Id. at *5. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs submitted that they and employees similarly-situated to them were victims of a common policy that violated the FLSA. Id. at *5-6. Defendant argued that the "similar positions" language in the proposed collective action definitions rendered the definitions too broad. Id. at *6. The Court agreed and opined that the "similar positions" language left the collective action definition too vague for efficient case administration. Id. In addition, the Court held that the collective action description must be limited to employees working in Arkansas, as Plaintiffs presented no evidence that similarly-situated employees existed in other states. Id. at *7. Defendant also argued that Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden to show that individuals similarly-situated to them existed. The Court disagreed, finding that the affidavits of Plaintiffs established that a number of employees held the same job title, worked in the same geographic region, experienced alleged FLSA violations during the same time period, and were subject to the same practices. Id. at *8. Defendant also argued that conditional certification was inappropriate because determining whether Plaintiffs were similarly-situated would require the Court to conduct an in-depth factual inquiry into the job duties of each individual employee. Id. The Court, however, noted that according to the affidavits, the duties for each position were sufficiently similar. Accordingly, the Court found that based on the pleadings and accompanying affidavits, Plaintiffs had made a modest factual showing that Defendant implemented a common policy unlawfully exempting team leaders, office personnel employees, and liaisons in Arkansas from the FLSA and the AMWA overtime requirements. Id. at *9. The Court therefore granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action limited to Arkansas-based team leaders, office personnel employees, and liaisons.

Cooper, et al. v. Integrity Home Care, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65521 (W.D. Mo. May 1, 2017). Plaintiff, a personal care aide ("PCA"), filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and the Missouri Minimum Wage Law ("MMWL") when it failed to pay overtime compensation for hours worked over 40. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification, which the Court granted. Defendant, a healthcare services provider in private homes, employs PCAs for "a wide variety of services including, but not necessarily limited to, companionship, respite, meal preparation, transportation, assistance with house work, arranging for medical care, and assistance with activities of daily living including dressing, grooming, toileting, feeding, laundry and bathing." Id. at *2-3. Advanced Personal Care Aides ("APCAs") "provide additional services including ostomy care, catheter care, bowel programs, and range of motion services. Id. at *3. Plaintiff's motion sought to certify a proposed collective action of all current or former PCAs and APCAs who were employed directly by Defendant and provided companionship services, who were not paid overtime for all hours worked in excess of 40 hours per week from January 1, 2015 to November 12, 2015. Id. at *4. Defendant argued conditional certification was unwarranted because: (i) Plaintiff was exempt from the overtime wage provisions of the FLSA during all periods when Defendant allegedly failed to pay overtime wages; and (ii) Plaintiff and the alleged putative collective action members were not similarly-situated. The Court determined that it would not consider the merits of Plaintiff's claims in ruling on a motion for conditional certification, and therefore declined to address Defendant's merits-based argument. Id. at *7. As to Defendant's argument that Plaintiff was not similarly-situated to members of the putative collective action, Plaintiff averred that the collective action definition included only PCAs and APCAs that were all denied overtime pay by Defendant. Plaintiff alleged she and Defendant's PCAs and APCAs were similarly-situated because they performed similar duties and were subject to the same unlawful policy, i.e., Defendant's failure to pay overtime. The Court held that though the duties of PCAs and APCAs could vary depending on the needs of a particular patient, the evidence before the Court illustrated that their job duties were similar. Id. at *8. Further, the Court found that the evidence suggested that Defendant knew personal care aides should be re-classified as "non-exempt" from FLSA overtime pay requirements after January 2015. Id. The Court opined that while this did not constitute direct evidence that all PCAs and APCAs were subject to a policy excluding them from overtime payment after January 2015, it was sufficient at this stage to show that the members of the putative collective action were similarly-situated for purposes of the FLSA. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Cope, et al. v. Let's Eat Out, Inc.*, 319 F.R.D. 544 (W.D. Mo. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of servers and bartenders, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay all wages due by requiring servers to reimburse the restaurant in the event a customer failed to pay in violation of the FLSA and the Missouri Minimum Wage Law ("MMWL"). The Court had previously conditionally certified a collective action as to Plaintiffs' FLSA claims. Plaintiffs subsequently sought class certification of their MMWL claims pursuant to Rule 23. First, with regard to numerosity, Plaintiff submitted that there were 99 opt-in members of the putative class who worked at Missouri locations during the relevant time period. Id. at 554. The Court found that this was sufficient for Plaintiffs to meet the numerosity requirement. Id. at 554-555. As to commonality, Defendants argued Plaintiffs' case theory would require individual inquiries into whether each class member was actually required to reimburse the restaurant for customer walkouts and/or cash shortages. The Court, however, stated that it was not necessary that all class members suffer from the same injury as the class representatives or one another. The Court held that factual and legal issues relating to Defendant's policies and the legality of the policies under the MMWL were common to the proposed classes and suitable for class-wide adjudication. Further, the Court noted that the named Plaintiff stated that she was required to reimburse the restaurant from her tips to cover an unpaid tab resulting from a customer walkout. The named Plaintiff also cited other occasions in which she was required to pay tips to cover another unpaid bill, and to reimburse the restaurant when the "cash register was short" at the end of the night. Id. at 556. The Court found that Plaintiff's grievances were the same or similar to the facts stated by other members of the proposed class who submitted declarations. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiffs met the typicality requirement. In addition, the Court stated that the named Plaintiff possessed the same interest and injury related to alleged violations of the MMWL as the class, had no currently discernable interests antagonistic to the interests of other class members, and was being represented by competent class counsel. Therefore, Plaintiffs met the adequacy requirement. Id. As to the Rule 23(b) requirements, the Court noted that questions of law and fact relating to Defendant's policies, and whether Defendants' maintenance and enforcement of the policy violated the MMWL and Missouri common law, were common questions that predominated over questions affecting individual members. Id. Further, because this matter involved common questions of fact and law relating to the same Missouri minimum wage laws and common laws, and potential class members could be ascertained by examining Defendants' payroll data, maintenance of the class action would be manageable. Additionally, the Court found that individual adjudication of the more than 99 potential claims that involved common issues would be unrealistic and unnecessarily repetitive. Id. at 557. Thus, the Court found that class action would be the superior method of adjudication, and therefore the superiority requirement of Rule 23(b)(3) was also satisfied. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Dean, et al. v. Billings*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 197953 (W.D. Okla. Dec. 1, 2017). Plaintiff, an exotic dancer, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants misclassified her and other dancers that she claimed were similarly-situated as independent contractors and thereby denied overtime compensation and minimum wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. The Court found that Plaintiff set forth substantial allegations that the putative collective action members were together the victims of a single decision, policy, or plan under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court determined that Plaintiff and the other putative collective action members were similarly-situated. Id. at *2. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiff's proposed collective action should be conditionally certified, and it granted certification of a collective action containing all current and former exotic dancers who worked for Defendants and were subject to Defendants' classification of dancers as independent contractors at any time from 2013 through the present. Id. at *3-4.

Dean, et al. v. Whispers Gentlemen's Club, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 197947 (W.D. Okla. Dec. 1, 2017). Plaintiff, an exotic dancer, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants misclassified her and other dancers as independent contractors and denied them overtime pay and minimum wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. The Court found that Plaintiff set forth substantial allegations that the putative collective action members were together the victims of a single decision, policy, or plan that violated the FLSA. Id. at *3. The Court also ruled that Plaintiff and the other putative collective action members were similarly-situated. Id. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiff's proposed collective action should be conditionally certified, and it granted certification to a collective action consisting of all current and former exotic dancers who worked for Defendants and were subject to Defendants' alleged misclassification of dancers as independent contractors at any time from 2013 through the present. Id. at *3-4.

Elliott, et al. v. Schlumberger Technology Corp.*, Case No. 13-CV-79 (D.N.D. Sept. 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of equipment operators, filed a collective action alleging Defendant violated the FLSA and North Dakota state wage & hour laws by paying them under the fluctuating workweek ("FWW") method. Id. at 1. The Court had previously conditionally certified a collective action consisting of "all equipment operators, equipment operator trainees, and other employees in substantially similar positions employed by Defendant in the Williston, North Dakota location who were paid under the fluctuating workweek method for at least one week during the three years prior to the commencement of the lawsuit to the present." Id. After discovery, Defendant moved to decertify on the ground that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated. Id. Plaintiffs also moved to class certification of their state law claims under Rule 23. The Court granted Defendant's motion and denied Plaintiffs' motion. At the outset, the Court noted that to qualify for the FWW method, there must be: (i) a clear mutual understanding between employer and employee; (ii) fixed salary not including overtime; (iii) salary above minimum wage; and (iv) overtime premium of one-half the rate of regular pay. Id. at 2-3. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant's FWW method did not pay a fixed salary, did not properly calculate overtime, and failed to pay minimum wage. Id. at 3. The Court found that the differences in Plaintiffs' claims were more than inconsequential as: (i) some claims damages for unpaid training and some did not; (ii) some received bonuses and others did not; (iii) some bonuses were revenue-based and others were flat fee; (iv) some understood the FWW method and some did not; (v) some signed acknowledgments regarding how they would be paid and some did not; (vi) and some were subject to Department of Transportation restrictions and some were not. Id. at 5. The Court reasoned that a fact-finder would be required to conduct an individual determination with regard to damages and liability, which would be dependent on the specific facts pertaining to each employee. Id. at 5-6. The Court determined that it was therefore not convinced that members of the collective action were similarly-situated to representative Plaintiffs due to their wide ranging employment and factual settings that give rise to their individual claims. Id. at 6. The Court further opined that based on the record, it was clear that employees' claims varied to such a degree that it was not possible to lump them in a single class in which common issues predominated over individual issues. Id. at 7. Accordingly, because common issues did not predominate, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Harris, et al. v. Chipotle Mexican Grill, Inc., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 90302 (D. Minn. June 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of fast food workers, filed an action alleging overtime violations pursuant to the FLSA and the Minnesota Fair Labor Standards Act ("MFLSA"). The Court conditionally certified the collective action for purposes of the FLSA. Plaintiffs claimed that they were automatically punched off-the-clock, but continued to work during closing shifts, resulting in non-payment of wages and overtime wages. Id. at *2. After discovery, Defendant moved to decertify the collective action, arguing that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated with respect to the alleged off-the-clock violations and that conflicts of interest among Plaintiffs compelled decertification. Id. at *21. The Court denied Defendant's motion. Defendant asserted that there was no common plan or unlawful policy, because its time-keeping policies that were common to all employees were entirely lawful. Id. The Court rejected this argument because evidence of a lawful written policy compensating for overtime work does not automatically defeat an FLSA claim if evidence exists of a common policy of not paying for overtime. Id. Defendant argued that any off-the-clock work stemmed from scattered and unrelated causes, such that no single, common policy was responsible. Id. at *23. The Court found that the off-the-clock work in question was not so varied as to warrant decertification. The collective action encompassed employees: (i) who were either punched off-the-clock at 12:30 p.m. by the automatic time-keeping system and continued to work; or (ii) who otherwise worked off-the-clock during closing shifts. Id. Because the alleged policy or plan of non-payment for work on the closing shift was the same, the Court ruled that decertification was not appropriate. Id. at *25. Defendant argued that decertification was appropriate because of disparate factual and employment settings among Plaintiffs for the off-the-clock work and the different nature of the work performed. Id. Defendant contended that the FLSA violations were attributable to varied reasons or the varied nature of the work, such as the automatic clock-out system at closing time, pre-shift work performed off-the-clock, and managerial requests to clock-out early and continue working. Id. The Court rejected Defendant's argument finding that the factual and employment settings factors supported the denial of Defendant's decertification motion because the class members worked at a single location, performed the same duties, and were subject to the same off-the-clock policies. Id. The Court found the declarations of non-Plaintiff employees that they did not perform any "off-the-clock" work to be irrelevant because the central question at issue was whether the named Plaintiffs and opt-in Plaintiffs were similarly-situated and not whether the FLSA was violated. Id. Defendant also argued that decertification was warranted because it needed to assert six individualized defenses against certain named Plaintiffs and opt-in Plaintiffs, but not others. Id. at *29. The Court found that none of the defenses warranted decertification. Id. at *30-35. The Court noted the remedial purpose of the FLSA and ruled that the case was amenable to collective resolution, as a collective action was a more efficient means of resolving Plaintiffs' clams Id. at *38. Because Plaintiffs had relatively small claims, it would be impractical for them to pursue individual claims. Id. at *38. Finally, Defendant asserted that conflicts of interests among Plaintiffs provided an independent basis for decertification. Id. Defendants argued that because some named Plaintiffs were kitchen managers who directed other Plaintiffs to perform the off-the-clock work, their interests were in conflict. Id. The Court rejected this position, ruling that there was no conflict of interest among Plaintiffs warranting decertification, as collective actions often include both hourly employees and supervisors. Id. at *42-43. As such, the Court denied Defendant's motion to decertify the collective action.

Harris, et al. v. Express Courier International, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 192363 (W.D. Ark. Nov. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former couriers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified couriers as independent contractors and thereby failed to pay minimum wages and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and state wage & hour laws. The Court had previously conditionally certified a collective action of Plaintiffs' FLSA claims. Plaintiffs subsequently moved for class certification of their state law claims pursuant to Rule 23. At the same time, Defendant moved to decertify Plaintiffs' collective action. The Court granted Defendant's motion and denied Plaintiffs' motion. In analyzing Defendant's motion for decertification, the Court noted that according to the deposition testimony taken in the case, even though Defendant considered all couriers to be independent contractors, it exerted control over the couriers in different ways, and it paid them differently. Id. at *14-15. The Court held that Defendant's treatment of its couriers varied so greatly, from location to location, and even from courier to courier, that there would be no way for a fact-finder to decide on a class-wide basis the degree to which Defendant affected the couriers' collective opportunity for profit and loss. Id. at *15. The Court further found that, even if a fact-finder could determine the misclassification issue on a class-wide basis, Plaintiffs had not presented the Court with a feasible method for establishing which, if any, collective action member was paid below the minimum wage or was denied overtime pay in violation of the FLSA. Id. at *21-22. As a result, the Court determined that multiple individual inquiries would be needed in order to determine how many hours each courier worked when driving for Defendant, and how much each courier was paid for that work. Id. at *22. The Court also stated that because couriers were paid in so many different ways, calculating the number of hours the couriers worked per week would necessitate individualized inquiries. Accordingly, the Court held that maintaining the collective action would not provide an efficient and cost-effective mechanism to resolve the liability questions in this case, as compared to proceeding with individual actions. Id. at *23. As to Plaintiffs' motion, Plaintiffs proposed certifying a Rule 23 class of approximately 260 couriers who drove for Defendant in Arkansas. The Court opined that Plaintiffs and the purported class lacked commonality with regard to how they would prove they are employees, rather than independent contractors. Id. at *28. Further, because Plaintiffs' claims differed from one another with respect to the degree of control Defendant exerted over their work and their ability to profit, and with respect to the ways in which they were paid for their work, the Court found that Plaintiffs' claims were not sufficiently typical of those of the rest of the class. Id. Plaintiffs argued that questions of law and fact regarding the status of the couriers predominated over individual questions. The Court stated a class-wide determination on this issue would be extremely onerous, if not impossible. Id. at *29. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the class action mechanism was not superior to holding individual trials on the issue of liability. The Court held that the lack of uniformity in how couriers were paid was fatal to achieving effective and efficient class-wide consideration of Defendant's alleged liability. The Court therefore granted Defendant's motion for decertification and denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Kumar, et al. v. Tech Mahindra (Americas) Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 116550 (E.D. Mo. July 26, 2017). Plaintiff, a software engineer, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA and Missouri state law. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of his FLSA claims, which the Court granted. Plaintiff's proposed collective action consisted of all persons who are, have been, or will be employed by Defendant as "Software Test Engineers" or "Software Engineers" at any time from three years prior to filing the action through the entry of judgment, and whose job it was to troubleshoot issues raised by test teams, deploy code, and compile production plans. Id. at *2. In response, Defendant consented to conditional certification of the collective action, but opposed the limitations period. Id. at *3. Defendant argued that the limitations period should be two years, not three, as there was no evidence that it willfully violated the FLSA. Defendant further argued that the limitations period, whether it is two years or three, should be measured from the date the Court conditionally certified the collective action, and not from the date Plaintiff filed his original complaint. Plaintiff argued that the FLSA's three-year statute of limitations should apply because he had pled that Defendant's violation was willful, and that at this conditional certification stage of the proceeding, no evidence of willfulness was required. Id. at *4. Plaintiff further contended that, for purposes of defining the scope of the conditionally certified FLSA collective action, the Court should run the limitations period from the date he initiated this action by filing his original complaint. Id. The Court agreed with the parties that Plaintiff met his burden for conditional certification, and granted Plaintiff's motion to the extent it included U1-U3 band IT delivery engineers. The Court further concluded that a three-year certification period was appropriate, as Plaintiff pled a willful FLSA violation in his amended petition. Id. at *6-7. However, the Court ruled that the certification period should run from October 5, 2016, as Plaintiff first purported to bring a collective action and filed written consent to be a party Plaintiff on that date. As such, the Court determined that the certification period for Plaintiff's claim should run from that date, and the earliest possible cut-off date for eligible claims by opt-in Plaintiffs was October 5, 2013. Id. at *7-8. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Mayberry, et al. v. SSM Health,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 81903 (E.D. Mo. May 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of hourly home healthcare workers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant required them to work off-the-clock, which resulted in a failure to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the Missouri Minimum Wage Law. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of their FLSA claims, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs submitted declarations in support of their claims, stating that they had to perform essential tasks of their job off-the-clock; their supervisors were aware of and permitted work to be performed outside of the regular paid shift; they complained to management about being unable to complete tasks during the workday and not being compensated for time worked off-the-clock; they utilized a defendant-issued laptop for work-purposes before and after their scheduled shifts, they routinely worked on and completed charting and patient reports at home off-the-clock; and they incurred unpaid overtime on a regular basis. Id. at *4. Defendant argued that in cases such as this, where Plaintiffs have been afforded discovery on the issue of whether or not the case should proceed as a collective action, the Court should apply a more restrictive standard requiring Plaintiffs to demonstrate at least modest factual support for the collective actions allegations in the complaint. Id. at *6. The Court found that while Plaintiffs relied on the evidence from Defendant's pay and time records in support of their motion, substantial discovery had not yet been conducted. Based upon the limited discovery conducted thus far, the Court stated that it would apply the more lenient standard typically applied for conditional certification motions. Id. at *7. The Court found that Plaintiffs performed similar duties, had a similar hourly compensation structure, recorded their hours through the same time-keeping program, and were treated as non-exempt for purposes of overtime pay. The Court determined that the affidavits and deposition testimony contained allegations that Defendant's supervisory employees were aware of the off-the-clock work and permitted Plaintiffs to work outside of their scheduled shifts and off-the-clock without receiving appropriate overtime compensation. Id. at *8. The Court held that the evidence was sufficient to satisfy the substantial allegations necessary for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court stated that even under the higher standard proposed by Defendant, Plaintiffs demonstrated at least modest factual support for the allegations in the complaint. Id. at *8-9. Defendant provided a number of declarations from employees stating either that: (i) they have not performed off-the-clock work; or (ii) to the extent they performed any off-the-clock work, they believed it was off-set by personal time spent on-the-clock. Id. at *9. Defendant's declarants also stated that Defendant did not have a practice or policy requiring or permitting home healthcare workers to perform work off-the-clock and that their supervisors have never instructed them to perform work off-the-clock. The Court determined that although Defendant offered evidence of contrary company-wide policies, it could not weigh such evidence at this juncture. Id. The Court found that Defendant's arguments were premature; at this stage of the litigation all that was required were substantial allegations, or applying Defendant's more restrictive standard, at least some modest factual support. Id. Defendant also argued that Plaintiffs had failed to demonstrate that they were similarly-situated to the hourly home healthcare workers they sought to represent. Id. at *10. However, the Court opined that Plaintiffs alleged that the putative class members had similar duties, compensation structures, and time-keeping methods, and that they had been subjected to similar policies or practices. Id. The Court therefore held that Plaintiffs' declarations and testimony, as well as Defendant's records, provided enough evidence at this stage to satisfy the substantial allegations standard that employees were similarly-situated and subject to a common practice. Id. at *10-11. The Court thus concluded that the evidence produced by Plaintiffs was sufficient to satisfy the lenient standard for conditional certification of the collective action. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Murray, et al. v. Silver Dollar Cabaret*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17462 (W.D. Ark. Feb. 8, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of exotic dancers, brought an action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them properly in violation of the FLSA and the Arkansas Minimum Wage Act ("AMWA"). Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that they and others were not paid a minimum wage or overtime compensation for hours worked in excess of 40 in a given week. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs sought conditional certification of their FLSA claims as a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) and Rule 23 class certification for their AMWA state law claims. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs requested that the Court conditionally certify and approve notice for all potential collective action members for a group defined as all exotic dancers who worked for Defendants at the two clubs in question within a three year period. The Court found that Plaintiffs met their burden to demonstrate that that they were similarly-situated with putative collective action members to the extent necessary to justify conditional certification. The Court stated that in the pleadings and sworn affidavits, Plaintiffs established that they and all other potential opt-in Plaintiffs were exotic dancers at the two adult entertainment clubs in question at all relevant times, and they were all subject to the same alleged FLSA violations by not being paid a minimum wage or compensated for overtime. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court conditionally certified the action for the purpose of giving notice to putative opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. at *8. The Court also approved Plaintiffs' proposed § 216(b) notice with some modifications. First, the Court held that because Plaintiffs alleged willful violations of the FLSA, a three-year limitations period applied. The Court found it appropriate to toll the statute of limitations from February 15, 2016, i.e., the date Plaintiffs' second motion for conditional certification was filed, until the date of the certification order, and therefore the period for collective action members began February 15, 2013. Id. at *12-13. The Court then opined that a 90-day opt-in period was sufficient and would best serve the interests of efficiently facilitating notice without further delaying the litigation because of the transient nature of potential Plaintiffs and the lack of available contact information. Id. at *17. As to Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to meet their Rule 23(b)(3) burdens. The Court, however, determined that having both collective certification of an FLSA claim and class certification of an AMWA claim was not appropriate due to the nature of the lawsuit. Id. at *21-22. The Court reasoned that since the FLSA provides for participation on an opt-in basis and Rule 23 requires that non-participating class members affirmatively opt-out of the suit, potential Plaintiffs deserve the ability to "control their participation in this litigation in a far more expeditious fashion" than that provided for under Rule 23. Id. at *22. Additionally, the Court stated that there would be inherent difficulties in managing a class action, because if both the collective action and class action were certified, notice and settlement issues could arise for individual members. Id. at *23. The Court found that the different notices of rights under the two actions would likely be confusing for recipients. The Court therefore granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), granted in part Plaintiffs' motion for Court-approved notice, and denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23.

Oxford, et al. v. Broadband Installations Of Iowa,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 212389 (S.D. Iowa Dec. 19, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former cable installation technicians, alleged that Defendants misclassified them as independent contractors and thereby denied paying them overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff sought certification of a collective action consisting of all technicians classified as independent contractors while performing installation and repair work for Defendant Broadband on behalf of Defendant Mediacom in the United States from May 19, 2014 to the present. Id. at *12. In support of their motion for conditional certification, Plaintiffs submitted several declarations describing their experiences. Defendant Broadband conceded that Plaintiffs met the standard for conditional certification for individuals working in Iowa, however, it argued that certification of a nationwide collective action was not appropriate. Id. at *12-13. Defendant Mediacom argued against Plaintiffs' request for certification in its entirety. The Court first addressed Mediacom's argument that Plaintiffs failed to meet their evidential burden because they failed to demonstrate they were similarly-situated with respect to the joint employment factors of the economic realities test. Id. at *14. The Court opined that such a requirement would add an additional dimension to the similarly-situated inquiry. Mediacom also argued that individual inquiries regarding each collective action member's employment relationship to Mediacom precluded conditional certification. The Court disagreed, finding that at this early stage, such considerations went to the merits of Plaintiffs' claims and were not appropriate in determining to appropriateness of conditional certification. Id. at *16. Further, the Court reasoned that denying Plaintiffs' motion only as to Mediacom would force putative collective action members to opt-in to the collective action against Broadband, and seek to join the action as an individual Plaintiff or file their own individual action to pursue claims against Mediacom, which would hardly promote judicial efficiency. Id. at *16-17. Finally, the Court found that Plaintiffs provided sufficient evidence that they and others similarly-situated were subjected to a common decision, plan, or policy. Id. at *17. The Court explained that Plaintiffs' declarations stated that they were paid on a piece-rate basis and were regularly required to work more than 40 hours per week without receiving overtime compensation. Plaintiffs were all classified as independent contractors and all performed the same type of work. Id. The Court therefore granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action. The Court also declined to limit the scope of the proposed collective action. It found that Defendant failed to provide any evidence of differences of employment policies or employee classifications at its locations, and Plaintiffs' evidence suggested that Broadband's practices were similar, if not the same, across Iowa and other states. Id. at *18.

Rasberry, et al. v. Columbia County,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 119688 (W.D. Ark. July 31, 2017). Plaintiff, a county jail janitor, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay her and others similarly-situated overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the Arkansas Minimum Wage Act ("AMWA"). Plaintiff claimed that she was a salaried employee and "was routinely required to work off-the-clock in excess of 171 hours in a 28-day work period and was not allowed to report all hours worked, including overtime." Id. at *2. The Court previously granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of the FLSA claims under 29 U.S. C. § 216(b). Plaintiff subsequently sought to certify her AMWA claims pursuant to Rule 23. Plaintiff's proposed class consisted of Defendant's salaried jailors (or similar positions) who worked in the State of Arkansas at the Columbia County Jail at any time after August 4, 2013. Id. at *3. As to numerosity, Plaintiff provided the Court with a spreadsheet reflecting 42 individuals who would allegedly fall within the class. Accordingly, the Court determined that the proposed class was large enough to make joinder impracticable. As to commonality, the Court opined that each potential class member's claim would concern the issue of whether Defendant maintained a policy of misclassifying salaried jailors, or those employed in similar positions, in violation of the AMWA. The Court thereby found that Plaintiff met her burden of showing that there were questions of law or fact common to the class. The Court was also satisfied that Plaintiff demonstrated that her claims were typical of the claims of potential class members. Plaintiff contended that all potential class members suffered under the same alleged policy. Accordingly, the Court determined that class members' claims would almost certainly be similar to Plaintiff's claims that Defendant misclassified them and failed to pay them overtime wages in violation of the AMWA. Id. at *9. The Court also concluded that Plaintiff met the adequacy requirement, as Plaintiff's allegations and supporting documents showed that Plaintiff's interests were the same as those of potential class members, and therefore Plaintiff and potential class members likely had the same interest in arguing that Defendant's policies and practices run afoul of AMWA requirements. Relative to the requirements of Rule 23(b), although the Court found that Plaintiff satisfied the commonality requirement of Rule 23(a)(2), the Court was unconvinced that Plaintiff has established that common questions predominated. Id. at *14. The Court reasoned that Plaintiff relied on general statements alleging that class issues predominated, but failed to provide the Court with a detailed argument explaining what is required to make out a prima facie case under the AMWA or how the common questions of law or fact would predominate over individualized questions. Id. at *14-15. Accordingly, though there were common questions that will affect all proposed class members, the Court held that Plaintiff failed to establish that common questions predominate. With regard to superiority, the Court noted that although Plaintiff made cursory arguments regarding the non-exclusive list of factors Courts may consider in making the superiority determination, her contentions were largely conclusory. Id. at *15-16. Accordingly, the Court was unconvinced that a Rule 23 class action was superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating Plaintiff's claims and potential class members' AMWA claims. The Court therefore denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Salley, et al. v. ABC Financial Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124992 (E.D. Ark. Aug. 8, 2017). Plaintiff, a technology support employee, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay for all hours worked in violation of the FLSA. Specifically Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's policy required that technology support employees must be available in the interactive client software when they clocked-in, and that when she worked there, it took her between 10 and 15 minutes to get her computer and the necessary software started. Plaintiff asserted that she and others similarly-situated were not paid for this time. Id. at *1. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification, which the Court denied. The Court first noted that Plaintiff did not submit any affidavits from other employees or former employees indicating that they desired to join the case. Id. at *2. The Court found that Plaintiff also failed to provide specific details about her allegations, including how often she or co-workers had to boot up their computers. The Court opined that the current record left too many questions, and without more proof of group-wide effect, some proof that having to boot up without pay occurred more than sporadically, and a firmer expression of interest from others in joining, this matter seemed more like a dispute between the parties, not a collective action. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Stagner, et al. v. Hulcher Services, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 115771 (W.D. Mo. July 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a laborer, brought a collective action alleging that Plaintiff failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant had a policy of: (i) failing to pay both non-exempt laborers and non-exempt managers for time worked for meetings and travel occurring before and after clocking-in at and out of the job-site; and (ii) failing to use a blended overtime rate of pay for employees who had multiple rates of regular pay, and instead paid overtime by calculating from the lowest rate of pay. Id. at *1. Plaintiff sought to conditionally certify a collective action including all current and former hourly non-exempt laborers and managers who worked for Defendant at any time within the preceding three-year period at any of Defendant's locations nationwide. Id. at *2. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion. In support of his motion, Plaintiff provided his own affidavit, indicating that "all" similarly-situated employees across the country worked more than 40 hours per week without receiving straight time for all hours worked and overtime compensation for hours worked in excess of 40 in a workweek. Id. at *3. In response, Defendant provided affidavits showing that, at all relevant times, Plaintiff was employed as division manager, which according to Defendant's job description was a position that was exempt from FLSA overtime requirements due to the positions' duties and pay. Defendant argued that: (i) Plaintiff lacked standing to bring an FLSA claim because he was always an exempt employee; (ii) Plaintiff was not a proper representative of the proposed collective action because he was exempt and his interests as a management employee were different from the interests of the laborer/operator employees he supervised; (iii) there were irreconcilable differences among the collective action; (iv) the collective action definition was inadequate, as Plaintiff had provided no information on the details/job duties of his position or the positions of others in the collective action; (v) Plaintiff's declaration failed to establish a colorable basis for his claim that the collective action members were victims of a single decision, policy or plan; (vi) Plaintiff should have provided evidence showing that higher level managers directed or encouraged off-the-clock work, but no such evidence is provided; (vii) off-the-clock work claims were too individualized to show that collective action members were similarly-situated; and (viii) the union status of the various laborer/operator employees created factual dissimilarities fatal to conditional certification. Id. at *7-8. The Court found Defendant's arguments that Plaintiff was classified as an exempt employee to be persuasive. Given that status, the Court ruled that Plaintiff lacked standing to bring claims on behalf of the proposed collective of non-exempt employees. Id. at *9. For that same reason, the Court held that Plaintiff was not a proper representative of the proposed collective action, and his interests as a management employee diverged from those of the non-exempt employees. The Court further held that Plaintiff's collective action definition was inadequate, as there was no information provided as to job duties and titles, leaving Defendant and the Court to guess which types of employees should be included. Id. The Court further determined that the union status of certain potential collective action members created another divergence between Plaintiff's interests and those of the collective action. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of his FLSA claims.

Thompson, et al. v. Spa City Steaks, Inc.,* Case No. 17-CV-6055 (W.D. Ark. Nov. 7, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of servers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant's tip pooling policy violated the FLSA. Plaintiff alleged that she was paid $2.63 per hour plus tips, but was not allowed to keep the tips she earned and was made to participate in a tip pooling arrangement where tips were distributed to other non-server restaurant employees, such as cooks and dishwashers. Id. at 1. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff's proposed collective action consisted of "all persons whom Defendant classified as tipped employees at any time since June 30, 2014. Id. at 5. Plaintiff submitted an affidavit in support of the motion and contended that she and potential collective action members all performed similar job duties, including taking customer orders, bringing food to tables, and meeting the dining needs of Defendant's customers. Id. Plaintiff further asserted that Defendant "had a mandatory policy of collective tips earned by servers and redistributing those tips among other restaurant staff." Id. Defendant did not dispute that its tipped employees were similarly-situated, and thus did not oppose Plaintiff's request for conditional certification. The Court analyzed whether Plaintiff established the requirements for conditional certification under 29 U.S.C.

§ 216(b). It found that Plaintiff met her burden to establish that she was similarly-situated to the potential collective action members. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Aboudara , et al. v. City Of Santa Rosa*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 142345 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 1, 2017). Plaintiff, a firefighter, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant improperly calculated overtime compensation and cash-out payments for compensatory time off ("CTO") in violation of the FLSA. Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant erroneously excluded two types of compensation that he received under the collective bargaining agreement between Defendant and Local 1401 when calculating his regular rate of pay. Pursuant to the collective bargaining agreement, Plaintiff and members of Local 1401 received cash payments in lieu of holidays ("HIL"), regardless of whether they actually worked those holidays. Id. at *2. Plaintiff and members of Local 1401 also received sick leave incentive payments ("SLI"), the equivalent of one shift's pay if they took fewer than 56 hours of sick leave in a year. Id. According to Plaintiff, Defendant excluded both HIL and SLI from Local 1401's overtime pay and CTO calculations. Id. at *3. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part. Defendant conceded that the claims of a group of firefighters should be conditionally certified as a collective action under the FLSA. Id. at *4. Plaintiff argued that the collective action should also include police officers who received HIL payments and worked overtime. Plaintiff asserted that the police officers were similarly-situated because "employees in multiple job classifications across multiple bargaining units received cash payments in lieu of holidays" and "were all subject to Defendant's practice of excluding such payments from the 'regular rate' of pay." Id. at *4-5. The Court, however, found that Plaintiff failed to show, even under the more lenient conditional certification standard, that he was similarly-situated to individuals outside of Local 1401. The Court noted that in the complaint, Plaintiff alleged that police officers received HIL payments that were not included in their overtime compensation, yet he offered no factual basis for this allegation. Id. at *5. Even if the Court could find based on the collective bargaining agreements that Santa Rosa police officers received HIL payments like Plaintiff, that provision was not itself unlawful. The Court opined that Plaintiff still must show that Defendant subjected those officers to an unlawful policy by omitting such payments from their overtime or CTO cash-out calculations. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification, but limited the scope of the collective action to only firefighters.

Allchin, et al. v. Volume Services*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123669 (S.D. Cal. Aug. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of concession employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the California Labor Law. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs sought to certify four classes, including: (i) an "overtime class" of all current and former non-exempt employees of Defendant compensated, at least in part, by service charge distributions and who worked overtime hours; (ii) a "late pay sub-class" of any member of the overtime class who also did not receive all their full overtime wages upon termination or resignation; (iii) an "inaccurate pay statement class" of all current and former non-exempt employees of Defendant not provided with an accurate, itemized pay statement; and (iv) a derivative "UCL class." Id. at *7-8. Plaintiffs argued that Defendant failed to include service charges in the calculation of employees' regular pay rates for purposes of determining the proper overtime rate. Plaintiffs further argued that Defendant's pay statements violated the California Labor Code because they did not include all hourly rates or the name and address of the employer. Id. at *8-9. As to the overtime and late pay sub-classes, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate the presence of commonality, typicality, or predominance. Plaintiffs provided pay stubs in support of their motion, but failed to explain how the pay stubs demonstrated a miscalculation of his overtime pay, much less a miscalculation common to the entire class. Furthermore, the Court determined that even if Plaintiffs were able to show that overtime pay was miscalculated, they offered no evidence to show that class members were injured in a common manner. Id. at *12. Because Plaintiffs offered no evidence of other class members' injuries, the Court ruled they failed to establish that named Plaintiffs were typical to the class. Id. at *14. As the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the commonality requirement because they offered no facts showing that class members were injured through a common course of conduct, they necessarily failed to show that common questions predominated over individual ones. Id. at *15. As to the inaccurate pay statement class, Plaintiffs stated that they were confused by their pay stubs. The Court found that even if Plaintiffs confusion was enough to establish injury to them personally, Plaintiffs offered no evidence that the confusion was uniform throughout the proposed class. Id. at *25. Plaintiffs also argued that class members were injured because class members' pay stubs included an inaccurate employer name and address. The Court noted that there was no evidence in the record that the address appearing on Plaintiffs' pay stubs was inaccurate. Id. at *27. Finally, Plaintiffs argued that Defendant's pay statements were inaccurate because employees' compensation stemming from services charges was not included in the hourly rates. Id. at *29. The Court, however, determined that Plaintiffs did not cite any legal support for their claim that "applicable hourly rates" should include the service charges. Id. at *30. Further, the Court opined that Plaintiffs failed to establish that the claim that employees' service charges were not included in their hourly rate was amenable to class proof. Id. The Court further held that Plaintiffs failed to show that proving that the alleged inaccurate statements were made knowingly and intentionally, a requirement under § 226, was subject to common proof. Id. at *31. The Court noted that overtime rates were calculated separately by individuals at each location, based on the location-specific constraints. Id. at *32. The Court determined that the site-specific differences complicated any common proof of whether misstatements were knowing and intentional. Id. at *32-33. Because the Court denied certification of the overtime class, the late pay sub-class, and the inaccurate pay statement class, the Court also denied certification of the derivative UCL class. Accordingly, the Court denied all aspects of Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Alonzo, et al. v. Akal Security, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 192204 (D. Ariz. Nov. 21, 2017). Plaintiff, an air security officer ("ASO"), filed a collective action alleging that Defendant deducted an hour lunch breach from his pay every day whether or not he actually took a lunch break, and that this practice violated the FLSA. Plaintiff moved to conditionally certify a collective action consisting of ASOs working for Defendant in Arizona on the grounds that they were similarly-situated to Plaintiff within the meaning of 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. at *2. Plaintiff alleged that ASOs provided services during return flights home, including cleaning up the aircraft, collecting and inventorying supplies, filling out paperwork, and generally preparing for the next mission. Id. at *5. Plaintiff further alleged that a one-hour meal break was automatically deducted, and that he did not actually take a "lunch break" because any meal he ate was done while performing services for the company. Id. Plaintiff also asserted that similarly-situated employees lost the same one-hour of pay pursuant to Defendant's lunch break policy. Id. Plaintiff also described activities that ASOs were precluded from doing during their lunch breaks due to being confined on an airplane, and therefore contended that ASOs were not given bona fide meal breaks within the meaning of the FLSA. Id. at *5-6. In support of his motion for conditional certification, Plaintiff submitted his own declaration that essentially reiterated the factual allegations of the complaint. Under even the lenient standards of the notice stage of § 216(b), the Court found that Plaintiff's allegations and sole declaration were insufficient to show the existence of a group of similarly-situated individuals. Id. at *6. The Court held that Plaintiff described his own experience, but had provided no evidence to show that others were similarly-situated to him, and therefore Plaintiff failed to demonstrate a factual nexus that could bind putative collective action members. Id. at *7. The Court also noted that, even if Plaintiff had established that similarly-situated individuals existed, Plaintiff failed to sufficiently allege that the group of workers was subjected to an illegal plan or policy. Id. at *8-9. The Court explained that an automatic meal deduction is not per se illegal under the FLSA, because although confined to an airplane, the ASOs' inability to enjoy entertainment or run errands was not in itself a violation of the bona fide meal break regulations. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiff failed to show that other ASOs were similarly-situated or that they were subjected to an illegal policy of working without compensation during their meal breaks. Id. at *10. The Court therefore denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Angeles, et al. v. US Airways*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20161 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of Fleet Service Agents ("FSAs"), brought a class action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them for all hours worked in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs, among other things, handled bags, mail, and cargo, as well as waved in, pushed back, and cleaned aircraft. In 2008, Defendant implemented time-keeping software called "Workbrain." Id. at *3. FSAs clocked-in and out electronically using the software, which tracked their time and pay. Each FSA's schedule was programed into Workbrain for each bid period so that if an FSA was clocked-in during their scheduled time, Workbrain automatically logged that period as paid time. Conversely, when an FSA clocked in before or remained clocked-in after their scheduled time, Workbrain logged this time as unpaid time. Many FSAs clocked-in before their scheduled shift or remained clocked-in after their shift ended. Workbrain automatically logged this time as unpaid, regardless of whether they were working or engaging in personal activities. Plaintiffs allege that they were not paid for work performed during these periods. The Court had previously granted class certification of the two grace period sub-classes, and following discovery, Defendant moved to decertify the sub-classes. Plaintiff's class members included all former US Airways FSAs "who worked as Fleet Service Agents in the State of California at any time on or after June 22, 2008, until the date of certification and who are members of one or more of Plaintiffs' sub-classes." Id. at 4. Sub-class 2 was made up of FSAs who, while clocked-in, engaged in pre-shift work, and were therefore owed compensation for hours worked. Sub-class 3 was comprised of FSAs who, while clocked-in, engaged in post-shift work and were owed compensation for hours worked. Defendant asserted that post-certification discovery revealed that each California station had station-specific policies and practices for tracking grace period work for which an FSA should have been paid. Id.* at *5. The Court determined that Plaintiffs failed to establish the commonality requirement of Rule 23(a)(2) or the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(2). The Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to provide evidence that Defendant had a common policy requiring FSAs to report to work early or perform work before and after their shifts. Instead, the Court found that the record demonstrated that employees made personal choices about how early to show up before their shifts and how late to leave afterwards. Id. at *9. Further, the Court opined that FSAs routinely engaged in personal activities during the grace periods, including watching TV, talking, and playing on their phones. Id. at *9-10. The Court reasoned that there was no way for common evidence to determine who was working, how long they were working, whether they reported working, and whether they were not paid for working. Id. at *10. The Court therefore ruled that it was impossible to conclude that common questions predominated over individual ones. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for decertification of Plaintiffs' grace period sub-classes.

Apodaca, et al. v. Costco Wholesale Corp.,* 675 Fed. Appx. 663 (9th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff, an employee, filed an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay minimum wage and overtime compensation in violation of the California Labor Code. Id. at 664. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant provided inaccurate wage statements in violation of § 226 of the California Labor Code. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification of her § 226 claims and for injunctive relief. The District Court denied class certification, and on appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed. At the outset, the Ninth Circuit stated that to establish a § 226 claim, Plaintiff must demonstrate both a violation of § 226(a) and an injury under § 226(e). Plaintiff asserted that she was entitled to relief as a result of Defendant's "knowing and intentional" failure to list on the wage statement the total hours and the separate hourly rates for vacation pay and vacation pay at the overtime rate on the line "vacation pay/non-exempt salaried vacation or float overtime." Id. at 665. In response, Defendant argued that it complied with § 226(a) because it listed the total hours worked, provided corresponding hourly rates, and that any alleged violation of § 226(a) was not "knowing and intentional" under § 226(e). Id. The California Labor Code provisions at issue require that an employer provide an accurate itemized wage statement listing "total hours worked by the employee," and "all applicable hourly rates in effect during the pay period and the corresponding number of hours worked at each hourly rate by the employee." Id. The District Court concluded that the line at issue – "vacation pay/non-exempt salaried vacation or float overtime" – did not reflect "total hours worked," but instead represented paid time-off. Id. at 665-66. The Ninth Circuit agreed and explained that in the line "vacation pay/non-exempt salaried vacation or float overtime," Defendant included additional information not required by the statute, i.e., information regarding paid vacation, and therefore Defendant's policy did violate § 226(a). The Ninth Circuit thereby found that Defendant's wage statements satisfied the requirements of § 226(a) because they listed the total hours worked and the corresponding hourly rates. The Ninth Circuit opined that the hours worked and hourly rate could be "promptly and easily determined from the wage statement alone." Id. Therefore, because Plaintiff had not established a § 226 claim, the Ninth Circuit found that the District Court properly denied Plaintiff's request for class certification and injunctive relief, and affirmed the District Court's decision.

Ayala, et al. v. U.S. Xpress Enterprises,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125247 (C.D. Cal. July 27, 2017). Plaintiff, a truck driver, brought a class action alleging that Defendant failed to provide meal and rest breaks, failed to pay for all hours worked, and failed to provide itemized wage statements in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23, which the Court granted. Defendant paid drivers for completed deliveries based on the computerized miles attributable to each delivery and certain accessorial wages. Plaintiff alleged that, as a result of Defendants' policy of paying drivers based on miles driven, he and the putative class members were not paid for off-the-clock work, not paid minimum wage, not provided meal and rest periods or a premium in their absence, not given properly itemized pay statements or accurate and complete time and pay records, and not paid accrued wages at the end of employment in violation of California's wage & hour laws. Id. at *4. Plaintiff initially sought class certification of a class of all truck drivers who worked in California for Defendant after the completion of training at any time since four years from the filing of the action until such time as there was a final disposition of the lawsuit. Id. at *5 The Court denied Plaintiff's motion because the nationwide scope of the class that included drivers residing in 47 states would require individualized choice-of-law analyses. The Court's primary concern was that it would need to perform separate analyses for the class members residing in each state. Id. at *6. Plaintiff subsequently amended his class definition to include only California residents, and provided additional evidence that he claimed would allow him to prove his substantive claims on a class-wide basis with limited individualized inquiry. Defendants argued that Plaintiff failed to satisfy the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3), and maintained that individualized inquiries would still dominate common ones with regard to both choice-of-law as well as Plaintiff's legal claims. Id. at *10. Defendants did not contest Plaintiff's ability to meet the other requirements of Rule 23. The Court agreed with Plaintiff that the new class definition solved the predominance issues related to choice-of-law. This is because the Court would no longer need "to perform a conflict-of-law analysis for each of the 48 states that the putative members reside in." Id. at *12. Further, the Court noted that as to Plaintiff's legal claims, Plaintiff contended that Defendants maintained a per mile compensation rate that failed to compensate employees for time spent on non-productive work tasks, and that Defendants not only failed to pay class members for time spent performing these tasks, but also required that class members perform certain tasks all of the time, including when they were on meal and rest breaks or during sleeper berth time. Id. at *27. As a result, the Court found that several common issues emerged that make resolution of the core of Plaintiff's claims amenable to class-wide proof. The Court briefly addressed the Rule 23(a) requirements and found that Plaintiff met all of the requirements as well. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Barker, et al. v. U.S. Bancorp,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93302 (S.D. Cal. June 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former in-store branch managers ("IBMs") filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant improperly classified them as exempt employees in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs asserted that the exempt classification was improper because they spent more than half of their time performing non-managerial duties similar to those of a "universal banker," which is a non-exempt position. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification of their California Labor Code claims pursuant to Rule 23(b), which the Court denied. Plaintiffs sought to represent a class consisting of "all current and former in-store branch managers who, at any time since July 23, 2011, were: (i) employed in California; (ii) classified as exempt from overtime; and (iii) for at least one workweek, spent over 50% of their time performing the same duties as non-exempt in-store bankers. Id. at *3-4. The Court found that a determination of whether IBMs were misclassified would require an individualized inquiry into how each IBM actually spent his or her time at work. Id. at *6. The Court held regardless of whether the class was defined as all California IBMs, or as California IBMs who spent more than 50% of their time on what Plaintiffs believe to be non-exempt work, the only IBMs who would be entitled to recovery would be ones who actually spent more than 50% of their time on non-exempt work. Id. at *6-7. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs' proposed class definition demonstrated that Defendant's policies affected each IBM differently depending on the IBM's specific working conditions. Id. at *7-8. The Court noted that as IBMs would not be class members simply by virtue of being an IBM, an inquiry into the individual circumstances of each IBM class member would be necessary to determine whether that class member had been misclassified. Id. at *8. The Court opined that Plaintiffs did not offer any method to determine membership in the proposed class using common evidence, which further highlighted how individual inquiries predominated and how a class action would not be superior to other means for adjudication. Id. at *9. In sum, the Court ruled that with their class definition, Plaintiffs essentially conceded that Defendant's policies did not cause all IBMs to spend more than 50% of their time on non-exempt tasks such that each IBM would be a class member merely by virtue of being an IBM. Id. Therefore, the determination of whether an IBM actually spent more than 50% of her time on non-exempt tasks and was misclassified as exempt required the presentation of evidence that "varies from member to member." Id. at *9-10. Thus, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden under Rule 23(b)(3). Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Barker, et al. v. U.S. Bancorp*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 162717 (S.D. Cal. Oct. 2, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of in-store branch managers ("IBMs") filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt employees and therefore failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. The Court previously granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification and certified a collective action of "all persons currently or formerly employed by Defendant in the United States as an in-store branch manager or any other similar position and classified as exempt at any time since July 23, 2012." Id. at *2-3. Following conditional certification, over 500 IBMs filed consents to join the lawsuit. Defendant subsequently moved to decertify the collective action on the grounds that: (i) there was no evidence that a uniform policy caused Plaintiffs' alleged injuries; (ii) Plaintiffs worked in disparate factual and employment settings; (iii) Defendant individualized defenses to Plaintiffs' claims could not be resolved on a collective basis; and (iv) collective treatment was neither fair nor efficient given the facts in evidence. Id. at *5. The Court first looked at whether Plaintiffs had differing job titles or duties, worked in different geographical locations, and worked under different supervisors. Id. at *5-6. Defendant argued that during depositions, several named Plaintiffs testified to differences in how they spent their time at work, and illustrated significant variations in how they executed their duties and spent their work time. Id. at *7. Defendant contended that each IBMs' experience varied depending on a myriad of factors, which in turn demonstrated that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated. The Court agreed, and found that Plaintiffs had not offered substantial evidence of a company-wide, uniformly enforced policy of improperly classifying IBMs as exempt employees. The Court noted that Plaintiffs offered 29 "fill in the blank" declarations from numerous opt-in Plaintiffs. The Court stated that it was unlikely that 29 branch managers had identical experiences and described them in exactly the same words, and therefore the uniformity of the declarations provided little insight into the declarants' actual duties and experiences. Id. at *8. The Court found that even if taken at face value, the declarations of the 29 IBMs and two named Plaintiffs did not support a finding that the hundreds of other IBMs managing 734 in-store branches were subject to widespread misclassification. Id. at *9. The Court held that Plaintiffs simply made generally conclusory allegations regarding overarching policies based on carefully chosen deposition excerpts without producing substantial evidence of a "single decision, policy or plan." Id. at *11. Additionally, the Court concluded that determining each Plaintiff's primary duty would require individualized inquiries and fact-specific analysis in order to establish misclassification and that their disparate employment settings weighed in favor of decertification. Id. at *12. The Court determined that the wide variation in Plaintiffs' descriptions of their job duties and responsibilities during depositions was indicative of the fact that Plaintiffs' misclassification claims were not well-suited for collective action treatment and that the members of the collective action were not similarly-situated. Id. Further, the Court stated that Defendant would have to introduce evidence that was inherently individualized because determining whether Plaintiffs were exempt was fact specific. Given the need for such individualized inquiries and the lack of substantial evidence that Plaintiffs were subjected to a uniform decision, policy, or practice of misclassification, the Court was persuaded that proceeding collectively would be "unmanageable, chaotic, and counter-productive." Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for decertification.

Benson, et al. v. HG Staffing, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 176064 (D. Nev. Oct. 23, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of room attendants formerly employed by Defendants, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants required them to arrive 20 minutes or more prior to their regularly scheduled start time to present themselves to their shift supervisors for room/floor assignments, a uniform inspection, and to retrieve tools necessary to complete their work tasks. Plaintiffs' case stemmed from an on-going case entitled Sargant et al. v. HG Staffing, et al., Case No. 13-CV-453. Id. at *2. In Sargant, the Court decertified a conditionally certified collective action because Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated as required by the FLSA. Id. After the collective action was decertified in Sargent, Plaintiffs filed an independent complaint to initiate this proceeding. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs sought to certify the proposed collective action for discovery and trial purposes based on a narrower collective action definition than that presented in Sargent. Plaintiffs' proposed collective action consisted of all current and former non-exempt employees employed by Defendants as room attendants who were required to perform pre-shift work activities without compensation at any time during the relevant time period. Id. at *3. Defendants opposed the motion for certification, arguing the doctrine of issue preclusion barred the proposed certification, the first-to-file rule barred the proposed certification, the FLSA procedures had yet to be fulfilled by Plaintiffs, and Plaintiffs did not meet the requirements for a collective action certification. Id. at *4. The Court found that the FLSA procedures were not fulfilled by Plaintiffs and denied the motion. The Court did not reach the parties' remaining arguments. Id. at *5. The Court held that Plaintiffs relied on actions taken in Sargent to argue that satisfaction of the FLSA procedural steps here. Id. at *6-7. However, the Court determined that this action was independent from Sargent, and even if Plaintiffs in Sargent sought conditional certification and joined with opt-in Plaintiffs as required by the FLSA, Plaintiffs were required to satisfy the FLSA requirements in this case independently. Id. at *7. While the Court recognized that the parties intended to use a substantial amount of discovery from the Sargent matter, the Court still required this independent matter to undergo the first step of conditional certification to provide the opportunity of an opt-in process for similarly-situated Plaintiffs. Id. The Court stated that otherwise Plaintiffs here have no right to represent a collective action brought under the FLSA. The Court thereby held that Plaintiffs skipped the procedural steps required for FLSA certification, rendering their motion for conditional certification premature. Id. As a result, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification without prejudice.

Blanco, et al. v. City Of Rialto,* Case No. 17-CV-994 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a fire captain and a police sergeant, alleged that Defendant excluded cash paid for foregoing healthcare benefits and/or healthcare contributions made of their behalf from the regular rate when calculating overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs sought certification of all of Defendant's current and former employees who received cash payments in lieu of healthcare benefits and/or received contributions made on their behalf toward the purchase of healthcare benefits and worked overtime since May 18, 2014. Id. at 2. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs submitted declarations describing Defendant's alleged FLSA violations and five different memoranda of understanding ("MOU") between different bargaining units and Defendant. Id. at 3. The Court found that the MOUs that Plaintiffs provided were not evidence that all collective action members were subject to the same policy over the same time period, as they covered different time periods and outlined different pay and overtime policies. Id. The Court further determined that Plaintiffs declarations were deficient because they did not include any evidence that other collective action members were improperly paid for their work. Id. Plaintiff stated that their base rates were improperly calculated, but the Court opined that they did not offer any evidence that other workers' overtime was improperly calculated. Id. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs have not provided substantial evidence that there were other similarly-situated potential collective action members. Id. at 4. The Court concluded that while the standard for conditional certification was lenient, it requires some evidentiary support that proposed collective action members are similarly-situated. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Bolding, et al. v. Banner Bank*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 206742 (W.D. Wash. Dec. 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former mortgage loan officers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them overtime compensation and that it required Plaintiffs to work off-the-clock in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part. Plaintiffs alleged that their daily functions could not be accomplished during normal business hours, that Defendant required mortgage loan officers to be available whenever clients needed them, and that Defendant knew that the mortgage loan officers were working more than 40-hours per week but discouraged accurate reporting of overtime hours and refused to compensate for overtime hours that were not pre-approved. Id. at *4. In support of these allegations, Plaintiffs provided job descriptions for loan officers, which identified both in-office and out-of-office functions as essential to the position. Plaintiffs also provided three declarations and a deposition transcript from four mortgage loan officers. The declarations supported the allegations that the loan officer positions, the way that hours were tracked, and compensation calculations were centrally controlled and did not vary from branch to branch or regional office to regional office. The declarations also stated that many of their tasks and responsibilities could not be performed in the office or during normal business hours, they were required to make themselves available to customers and potential leads after hours and on weekends, and that Defendant knew the mortgage loan officers were working additional hours outside the office, but pressured employees not to record overtime and/or refused to approve timesheets that recorded overtime hours. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiffs further alleged that their overtime compensation rate was not correctly calculated, which resulted in under-payment of wages. Id. at *5. In response, Defendant offered employee declarations stating that Defendant expected loan officers to work around 40 hours per week and that it had policies that specifically prohibit working "off-the-clock" and/or failing to record all hours worked. Id. at *6. The Court held that Defendants' challenges would be considered after discovery was completed during the second stage of the collective action analysis. The Court determined that at this stage of the litigation, Plaintiffs had sufficiently supported their allegations of a uniform policy resulting in unpaid hours and that other loan officers were similarly impacted by these practices. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action as to Plaintiffs' off-the-clock claims. However, with regard to Plaintiffs' overtime calculation claims, the Court held that Plaintiffs' allegations were not substantiated and their evidence was non-existent. Id. at *8. The Court determined that Plaintiffs provided no information regarding the basis for their belief that they had been short-changed and there was no evidence of the calculations Defendant used, no pay stubs, and no facts raising a plausible inference of wrongdoing. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court denied conditional certification as to the overtime calculation claims.

Bowerman v. Field Asset Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39000 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of vendors who perform property preservation services, brought a class action alleging violations of California Labor Code ("CLC"), the Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), and the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). Id. at *22. Plaintiffs moved for partial summary judgment as to their status as employees and their entitlement to overtime pay and expenses. Id. at *25. Defendant moved to decertify the class on grounds of commonality, predominance, and superiority. Id. at *34. The Court noted that Defendant's argument as to decertification was that the factual variations among vendors precluded class treatment because neither side could establish that every vendor was either an employee or an independent contractor. Id. at *35. The Court found that this was insufficient to negate class certification and denied Defendant's motion to decertify. Id. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion on the basis that Plaintiffs were employees, and therefore Defendant was liable for failure to pay overtime and business expenses. Id. at *74. The Court noted that pursuant to California law, Plaintiffs presented evidence that they provided services to Defendant and hence they established a prima facie case that the relationship was one of employer/employee. Id. at *53. The Court relied on a right of control test and ruled that the overwhelming weight of the evidence supported a finding that Defendant retained and exercised the right to control the manner and means of the vendors' work. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs presented Defendant's own documents, such as vendor qualification packets, work orders, vendor profiles, and training material to establish that Defendant retained the right to control. Id. at *50. The Defendant required work to be done within three days of receiving a work order and the Court found the fact that Defendant did not dictate the precise hours worked to be of little consequence. Id. at *55. The Court noted that some secondary factors for evaluating proper classification weighed in favor of independent contractor status, such as: (i) the parties' contract indicating independent contractor status; (ii) the opportunity for profit and loss for the Plaintiffs; and (iii) employment of others. Id. at *74. However, the Court ruled that Defendant could not overcome the strong evidence of control, as Defendant told vendors where to go, when to go, what to do, and when to get it done. This established that Plaintiffs were employees as a matter of law. Id. at *54. The Court denied Defendant's motion as to two class members finding that each of the businesses' level of success did not preclude a finding that they were employees because of the right to control that Defendant maintained. Id. at *84. However, the Court granted summary judgment as to one class member who never executed a contract with Defendant as the class included only those who were designated as independent contractors. Id. at *78. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to decertify the class and granted Plaintiffs' motion for partial summary judgment. Id. at *84-85.

Brown, et al. v. Permanente Medical Group, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15789 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 2, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of advice nurses, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay for all time worked, including overtime, as required by the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. The Court conditionally certified a collective action of "all current and former hourly advice nurses who work or have worked for Defendant at any time from October 20, 2013 through judgment." Id. at *2. The Court stated that the evidence of uniform policies and practices for advice nurses supported conditional certification. Id. Plaintiffs alleged in their declarations that Defendant's policies lead to systematic under-payment at the beginning, middle, and end of shifts, and they supported the declarations with documents submitted with their reply brief, including policy manuals and a job description for advice nurses. Id. at *3. The Court noted that Plaintiffs also all asserted that they were not paid for time they spent logging-in to software programs at the beginning of their shifts, preparing to resume taking calls at the end of meal breaks, and logging-out of the software programs and finishing phone calls at the end of their shifts. Id. In response to the Plaintiffs' declarations, Defendant submitted declarations from other employees, corporate policy documents, and portions of Plaintiffs' depositions that it contended contradicted Plaintiffs' declarations and the complaint's allegations. However, the Court determined that the corporate policy documents and arguments submitted by Defendant further supported Plaintiffs' contention that advice nurses were subject to uniform policies and training. Id. at *4. Defendant also pointed to some uncertainty in Plaintiffs' depositions about practices at the Vallejo and Sacramento call centers. The Court noted that it did not have declarations from nurses at the Vallejo and Sacramento call centers; however, the inability of Plaintiffs to remember who they talked with from the other call centers was not enough to show that they were unaware of the practices at those call centers. Id. The Court stated that Plaintiffs all stated in their declarations that Defendant did not fully compensate them for working more than eight hours in a day or 40 hours in a week during some weeks. Id. at *5. The Court therefore granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification and authorized notice to be sent to potential collective action members.

Christian, et al. v. Furmanite America, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20885 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 14, 2017). Plaintiff, an hourly technician, filed a putative class action alleging that Defendants violated various provisions of the California Labor Code and associated California wage & hour requirements. Defendant, a large industrial company, provides a variety of services in the machining, piping, and engineering fields. Plaintiff alleged that he was not allowed to take a second meal break to which he was entitled on days when he worked for more than ten hours. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff further alleged that all other technicians worked similar hours and were not allowed to take a second meal break. Plaintiff moved for class certification pursuant to Rule 23, which the Court denied. The Court found that Plaintiff failed to meet the superiority requirement of Rule 23(b)(3). The Court stated that Plaintiff made no argument as how the superiority requirement was satisfied, nor did he submit evidence to enable the Court to evaluate the four factors of Rule 23(b)(3). The Court found that Plaintiff only stated that certification was proper under Rule 23(b)(3) because a common legal issue predominated. Id. at *3. The Court held that predominance was only one half of the relevant standard, and accordingly, Plaintiff did not demonstrate that certification was warranted. Id. The Court declined to address whether the prerequisites of Rule 23(a) were satisfied or whether Plaintiff was correct that a common legal issue would predominate. Id. at *3-4. Therefore, since Plaintiff did not demonstrate that class resolution would be superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Conde, et al. v. Open Door Marketing, LLC*, 223 F. Supp. 3d 949 (N.D. Cal. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of sales representatives, filed suit against Defendants alleging that they were misclassified as independent contractors in violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA") and California labor laws. Plaintiffs also asserted a claim under the Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). Previously, the Court had granted Plaintiffs' motion for condition certification of the FLSA claims. Subsequently, Defendant 20/20 ("20/20") moved to deny class certification and for judgment on the pleadings with respect to the PAGA claim. At the same time, Plaintiffs moved to expand the scope of the certified collective action. In 2013, 20/20 began providing marketing services for providers of wireless service plans and cellular phones. 20/20 contracted directly with sales representatives and as part of the onboarding process the sales representatives were presented with a mutual arbitration agreement. In October 2014, Defendants jointly created Defendant Open Door ("Open Door") as a spinoff company from 20/20 in which sales representatives contracted directly with Open Door rather than 20/20. Open Door required sales representatives to execute an independent contractor agreement and starting in 2016 the agreement included a mandatory arbitration provision that did not contain an opt-out provision. Id. *954. Approximately 234 putative class members signed arbitration agreements with either 20/20 or Open Door, and neither named Plaintiff signed an arbitration agreement. At the outset, the Court noted that Rule 23 did not prelude 20/20 from bringing a preemptive motion to deny certification. Id. at *957. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' assertion that 20/20's motion to deny certification was premature because discovery had not yet taken place. The Court found that the discovery sought did not prevent the Court from ruling on 20/20's motion because 20/20's motion was premised on the fact that Plaintiffs did not sign arbitration agreements, but nevertheless intended to certify a class that included individuals who signed arbitration agreements. 20/20 asserted that Plaintiffs were unable demonstrate typicality, commonality, and superiority. The Court held that the named Plaintiffs were unable to demonstrate typicality because they did not sign arbitration agreements, and therefore they lacked the ability to challenge the arbitration agreements on behalf of the class members who had signed them. The Court granted Defendant's motion to deny class certification as to the individuals who signed arbitration agreements with 20/20, and denied the motion with respect to individuals who signed arbitration agreements with Open Door. The Court reasoned that 20/20 lacked an interest to enforce or rely on Open Door's arbitration agreements. Id. at *963. Plaintiffs moved to expand the scope of the certified collective action to include individuals who entered into arbitration agreements with 20/20 and Open Door and worked in California and Nevada. The Court rejected 20/20's argument that Plaintiffs lacked standing as they did not work directly for 20/20, because Plaintiffs alleged that 20/20 was liable as a joint employer. The Court ruled that FLSA conditional certification was warranted because whether employees were employed by 20/20 or Open Door, the employees were similarly-situated because they alleged that they suffered violations because of their misclassification as independent contractors. The Court therefore expanded the collective action to include individuals who signed the arbitration agreements, but limited the expansion to include only individuals in California to ensure the manageability of the case. Finally, the Court denied 20/20's motion for judgment on the pleadings as to the named Plaintiff Jennings' PAGA claim on the basis that she failed to adequately exhaust her administrative remedies and provided inadequate written notice to the California Labor & Workforce Development Agency. Id. at *970. The Court ruled that her notice was sufficient as it tied the alleged violations to Plaintiffs' misclassification theory, and therefore it denied the motion for judgment on the pleadings with respect to the PAGA claim. Id. at *973.

Culley, et al. v. Lincare, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121834 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 2, 2017). Plaintiff, a healthcare specialist, filed a class action alleging violations of the California Labor Code and claims under the California Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA") for failure to pay overtime and to provide meal and rest breaks. Id. at *2. Defendant moved for summary judgment, to decertify the class, and to exclude expert testimony. Id. The Court granted the motion for summary judgment in part and denied it in part, granted the motion to decertify, and denied the motion to exclude. Id. at *21-22. As to Plaintiff's reporting time claim, the Court preliminarily found sufficient numerosity when it included all 45 employees in its analysis as having potential claims. Id. at *5. After the close of discovery, however, Plaintiff identified only 20 members of the class with potential reporting time claims. Id. The Court agreed with Defendant that the reporting time claim lacked numerosity and granted Defendant's motion to decertify as to that claim. Id. at *6. As to the meal period claim, under the California Labor Code, an employer must pay an hour of pay for each workday that a meal period is not provided. Id. at *9. However, an employer is not liable if an employee chooses not to take or to wait before taking breaks. Id. In support of her motion for class certification, Plaintiff stated that she was not alleging that Defendant violated the meal period law. Instead, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant violated the California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL") when it unfairly or deceptively failed to pay meal premiums for missed meal breaks. Id. at *10. Plaintiff sought one hour of pay for each time a meal break was not taken or taken late, regardless of whether Defendant committed a violation, without distinguishing between breaks that were missed or delayed due to the employee's own preferences. The Court decertified the meal break claim on the basis that this was inconsistent with the theory of certification and Plaintiff could not simultaneously admit that Defendant did not violate California's meal period law and then attempt to collect wages accrued only when meal period laws were violated. Id. at *11. The Court noted that Plaintiff's proposed damages model was unconnected to any specific loss resulting from Defendant's allegedly unfair and deceptive treatment of meal breaks. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motions for summary judgment and to decertify as to the meal period claim. Id. at *12. As to her overtime claim, Plaintiff claimed that the bonuses that she and the class received were non-discretionary and improperly excluded from their regular rate of pay for purposes of calculating overtime. Id. at *13. The Court granted Defendant's motion to decertify the bonus overtime pay claim on the grounds that individual issues predominated as to whether the bonuses were discretionary. Id. at *15. Defendant also claimed that the waiting time penalties that Plaintiff sought were excessive. Id. at *17. However, because the parties had not established the amount of waiting time penalties to which Plaintiff was statutorily entitled, the Court declined to address the constitutionality of those amounts and denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment on the issue. Id. at *18. The Court further denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to the civil penalties sought pursuant to the PAGA for wage statement violations because Plaintiff had not properly pled the proper statutory provision for damages, since there was no authority to support the proposition that the exact measure of damages must be pleaded. Id. at *18. Defendant also sought to strike the statement of Plaintiff's attorney because it improperly offered an expert opinion as to damages. The Court disagreed and denied the motion to strike, ruling that the statement did not constitute expert testimony. Id. at *20. The Court, therefore, granted summary judgment in part, granted Defendant's motion to decertify, and denied Defendant's motion to exclude.

Davidson, et al. v. O'Reilly Auto Enterprises, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 213310 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 15, 2017). Plaintiff, a delivery driver, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the California Labor Code ("CLC"). Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification of two classes, including: (i) a wage statement class of all individuals who worked as non-exempt, hourly employees in California from March 29, 2016 to April 2017; and (ii) a rest period policy class consisting of all individuals who worked for Defendant as non-exempt, hourly employees in California from March 29, 2013 until the date of certification. Id. at *2. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion. The Court found that Plaintiff's wage statement class was predicated on violations of §§ 206(a)(8) and 1174(d) of the CLC, which it had previously dismissed with prejudice. Id. at *3. Accordingly, the Court denied certification of these claims on the grounds that they were moot. As to the rest period class, the Court determined that Plaintiff failed to meet the requirements of commonality and predominance. Plaintiff asserted that the common question across the class was whether Defendant's rest break policy was illegal. The Court found that while Plaintiff did provide evidence that, for a period of time, Defendant had a written rest break policy that violated California law, she failed to provide evidence showing how, or even if, that policy was consistently applied to all of the 21,000 proposed class members. Id. at *5. The Court determined that Plaintiff's evidence failed to implicate any illegal practices, and Plaintiff's own declaration did not state that she was ever denied proper rest breaks. Id. at *6. Moreover, in its opposition, Defendant offered declarations from 310 employees establishing several pertinent facts, including: (i) Defendant's policy was that rest breaks must be provided per California law; (ii) employees working between 6 and 10 hours were afforded the chance for a second 10-minute rest break; (iii) employees working from 10 to 12 hours were afforded the chance for a third 10-minute rest break; (iv) employees received a rest break every two hours; and (v) employees have never seen the rest break policy contained in the store operation manual. Id. at *11. The Court therefore held that Plaintiff failed to meet her burden to showing that Defendant not only maintained a facially effective policy, but also implemented unlawful practices pursuant to the policy. Id. Accordingly, the Court found that common issues did not predominate and it denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Delnoce, et al. v. Globaltranz Enterprises, Inc.*, Case No. 17-CV-1278 (D. Ariz. Sept. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of logistics specialists, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt employees and thereby failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs submitted four declarations in support of their motion for conditional certification. The declarations contained largely the same information, including that Plaintiffs were paid a base salary of $40,000 and typically worked five to 25 hours of overtime per week without compensation. Id. at 6. Plaintiffs also alleged that they were expected to work off premises, outside of regular business hours, during lunch, and on weekends. Id. at 4. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendant was aware of their work habits and did not keep records of, or provide compensation for, this work. Id. In response, Defendant submitted a declaration from its Vice President of Human Resources stating that Plaintiffs were actually employed in different positions than the members of the collective action they sought to certify, including as managers and a Vice President. Id. at 6. The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to carry their burden of showing that they were similarly-situated to other employees with the same job title. The Court noted that Plaintiffs' declarations were nearly identical, vague, conclusory, and did not discuss how they learned about Defendant's work expectations. Id. at 8. The Court further opined that Plaintiffs referred to Defendant's "policy" and "practice," but failed to identify a specific policy or practice that Defendant's used across the proposed collective action. Id. The Court also noted that Plaintiffs did not explain how it was that they knew that other employees are working more than 40 hours per week, or working after hours at home. Id. Accordingly, the Court stated that although the proposed collective action members may have had similar job descriptions and performed similar work, Plaintiffs had not shown a similarity of work schedules, experience with respect to Defendant's expectations, or that they were subjected to a single policy or plan. Id. at 9. The Court therefore denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Greene, et al. v. Jacob Transportation Services*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 151525 (D. Nev. Sept. 19, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of limousine drivers, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime and minimum wages in violation of the FLSA and state wage & hour laws. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification of their state law claims, and the Court granted the motion. Plaintiffs' proposed class consisted of all current and former employees of Defendants who worked as limousine drivers at any time during the relevant limitation periods. Id. at *3. The Court found that Plaintiffs' proposed class consisted of over 500 employees and therefore met the numerosity requirement. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs asserted there were three questions common to the entire class, including: (i) whether Defendants failed to compensate class members for all the hours that they worked; (ii) whether Defendants failed to compensate class members at least the minimum wage for all the hours that they worked; and (iii) as a result of failing to compensate class members for all the hours that they worked and their minimum wages, whether Defendants failed to compensate class members who were former employees all their wages due and owing at the time of their termination. Id. at *9. Moreover, Plaintiffs asserted that all class members worked under the same policies and procedures that resulted in the same injury to all class members. The Court determined that Plaintiffs posited questions of fact that were common to the class because the answers to these questions would provide a class-wide resolution. Id. at *10-11. Because the determination of the core issues of fact or law were common to the entire proposed class, the Court found that the commonality requirement was also satisfied. Id. at *11. Plaintiffs alleged that all limousine drivers suffered the same injury – the failure to pay wages pursuant to Nevada wage & hour law – stemming from Defendants' uniform off-the-clock policy. Plaintiffs and the class they sought to represent were all Defendants' employees and were subject to the same workplace policies. The Court stated that because they were subject to the same workplace policies, the proposed class was conceivably injured by the same course of conduct, and therefore the class met the typicality requirement. Id. at *12. As to adequacy, Plaintiffs maintained that neither the named Plaintiffs nor their counsel had "interests antagonistic to those of other class members." Id. at *12. As such, the Court found that pursuant to the proposed class' shared interest, Plaintiffs and their counsel would sufficiently prosecute the action, and therefore the adequacy requirement had been met. As to the predominance requirement, Plaintiffs claimed that their common question was "whether Defendants suffered or permitted Plaintiffs to perform unpaid work 'off-the-clock.'" Id. at *13-14. The Court held that this common question could be resolved for all members of the class in a single adjudication because the company-wide practices and policies impacted all members of the class that Defendants employed. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court opined that the common questions predominated over the individual questions that may arise, thereby satisfying the predominance requirement. The Court also stated that it would be more efficient and consistent to pool Plaintiffs' claims together, and the superiority requirement was thereby satisfied. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Greer, et al. v. Dick's Sporting Goods,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57165 (E.D. Cal. April 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the California Labor Code by: (i) requiring employees to wait, while off-the-clock, for an inspection of their personal belongings before exiting the store; and (ii) requiring employees to purchase apparel appropriate to their department without reimbursing employees for clothing-related expenses. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification of two classes, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs' classes included: (i) all non-exempt or hourly paid employees who worked for Defendant in its retail stores within California at any time from March 18, 2011 until January 31, 2015 (the "security check class"); and (ii) all non-exempt or hourly paid employees who worked for Defendant in its retail stores within California at any time from March 18, 2011 until the date of certification (the "business reimbursement class"). Id. at *4. Defendant did not dispute that Plaintiff's proposed classes met the requirements of Rule 23(a), but asserted that they could not meet the predominance and superiority requirements of Rule 23(b). As to the first class, the security check class, Plaintiff pointed to three common questions of fact and law to establish predominance, including: (i) whether Defendant's security check policy and practice resulted in employees undergoing security checks off-the-clock when leaving the store at the end of a shift; (ii) whether Defendant's security check policy and practice resulted in employees undergoing security checks off-the-clock when leaving the store for meal or rest breaks; and (iii) whether Defendant's security check policy and practice violated California law. Defendant argued that Plaintiff did not establish predominance because the amount of time spent off- the-clock was necessarily an individual determination because de minimis time is not compensable. The Court found that Plaintiff's declarations indicated nearly all class members were subjected to the security check policy, which therefore satisfied predominance. Id. at *18 . As to superiority, the Court noted that Plaintiff's claims were for relatively small amounts. The Court held that because class members had modest claims, individual litigation was unlikely to present a viable means of recovery. Id. at *25. Further, the Court noted that the number of potential Plaintiffs, as many as 9,000, also made joinder impracticable. Id. at *26. The Court concluded that the value of the claims was small enough to suggest individual actions would be inefficient, and therefore it ruled that the security check class also satisfied the superiority requirement. The Court then reviewed Plaintiff's business reimbursement class claims. Plaintiff relied on testimony from Defendant's corporate designees, his deposition testimony, and documents produced during discovery to support his argument that putative class members were required to purchase clothing appropriate to their department without reimbursement. Id. at *29. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant instituted a "look policy" that dictated what employees may wear and required employees to comply with one of three established looks and provided employees with a list of acceptable and unacceptable clothing. Id. at *32-33. The Court found that the underlying policies provided common proof relevant to class-wide resolution, and that the common questions predominated over individual inquiries. Id. at *33. The Court stated that Defendant provided a look policy with specific requirements as to what was acceptable, and although the policy may not have been expressly required, Defendant maintained a de facto policy by explaining that compliance was "extremely important" and that non-compliance was a basis for dismissal. Id. at *34. The Court thereby found that the business reimbursement class met the predominance requirement. As to superiority, the Court found that the business reimbursement class satisfied the superiority requirement for the same reasons as the security check sub-class. The Court thereby held that both classes satisfied the requirements of Rule 23(a) and Rule 23(b)(3), and it granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Guinn, et al. v. Sugar Transportation Of The Northwest, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 209604 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 20, 2017). Plaintiff, a truck driver, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA, failed to timely pay wages or provide meal and rest periods in violation of California Labor Code, and engaged in unlawful and unfair business practices in violation of §§ 17200 of California's Business and Professions Code. Id. at *3. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action of Plaintiff's FLSA claims and for class certification of his state law claims pursuant to Rule 23. The Court denied the motion. Defendants contended that all of the claims of the putative members of the proposed collective action and class action turned on case-by-case, fact specific analyses of whether each driver was exempt from the overtime requirement under the Motor Carrier Act exemption. Plaintiff asserted that none of the drivers qualified for this exemption because the drivers never crossed California's state lines and thus did not engage in interstate transportation. Id. at *6. The Court explained that at this stage of the litigation, Plaintiff had the burden of proving that the members of the collective action satisfied the similarly-situated requirement. The Court held that Plaintiff's attempt to establish that the class was similarly-situated was based entirely upon the fact that the drivers never crossed California state lines, but that drivers do not need to actually cross state lines in order to qualify for this exemption. Rather, it is sufficient that drivers "hauled goods in the practical continuity of movement in interstate commerce." Id. at *7. The Court therefore determined that it would need to engage in an individualized analysis to determine which, if any, of the drivers could in fact be categorized as exempt from the FLSA. As to class certification pursuant to Rule 23, the Court determined that Plaintiff failed to meet the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b). With regard to Plaintiff's meal and rest break claims, the Court held that Plaintiff had not identified a specific policy that precluded the drivers from taking a break. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the determination of whether a break was missed, and why, would involve an individual analysis into the daily behavior of each particular driver. Although Plaintiff argued that Defendants' delivery schedules impeded the ability of drivers to take meal and rest breaks, the evidence indicated that drivers themselves had discretion to decide when and if to take such a break. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiff failed to satisfy the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b) with regard to his meal and rest break claims. Id. at *17. As to Plaintiff's proposed wage claims, the Court noted that Plaintiff's wage claim, which was brought under both the FLSA and §§ 17200, centered on whether the drivers were exempt from overtime pay, which it already found would entail an individualized analysis and determination as to which of the drivers, if any, engaged in interstate transportation. Therefore, the Court reasoned that, for the same reason that Plaintiff did not satisfy the similarly-situated requirement necessary to maintain a FLSA collective action, he also failed to demonstrate that common issues would predominate over individual questions with regard to his state law overtime claim. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action and for class certification of his state law claims pursuant to Rule 23.

Hubbs, et al. v. Big Lots Stores,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 85265 (C.D. Cal. May 23, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retail employees, brought a putative class action alleging wage & hour violations under state law. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs moved to certify six classes pursuant to Rule 23. The Court granted certification in part and denied in part. The Court also denied Defendant's motion to exclude Plaintiff's expert. Id. at *3. The complaint proposed a single class, defined as all individuals who worked for Defendant in its California retail stores in a non-exempt, hourly-paid position, at any time during the past four years. Id. at *6. None of the six classes that Plaintiff sought to certify were defined in the complaint. Id. The first three proposed classes were based on allegations that were made in the complaint. The fourth, fifth, and sixth classes were not based upon allegations in the complaint. The Court denied certification as to those classes because they were not timely. Id. at *10. The Court ruled that certification of those classes would be unduly prejudicial to Defendant as it had not had the opportunity to conduct discovery on those classes. Id. The Court certified class one, a class that consisted of non-exempt employees of Defendant, who worked one or more closing shift at any store in which Defendant's record-keeping systems reflected a gap between the closing shift class members' end of shift time and the time the store's alarm was set. Id. at *23. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that the time worked off-the-clock by putative class members was de minimis and was not compensable under California law, ruling that Defendant had the burden of proving the affirmative defense. Id. at *22. The Court also denied certification as to proposed class two, which consisted of all non-exempt employees of Defendant who were subjected to security checks at Defendant's stores in California. Id. at 28. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs had not presented sufficient evidence to show that there was a common and consistent policy among the stores that all employees were subject to off-the-clock bag checks. Id. Plaintiffs presented insufficient evidence that managers at certain stores may have required off-the-clock bag checks. Id. As a result, the Court opined the requirements of Rule 23 as to commonality, predominance, numerosity, manageability, and superiority had not been shown. Id. at *29. The Court also denied certification as to the rest break class, consisting of non-exempt employees of Defendant in California who worked shifts longer than three and one-half hours at any time during the relevant period. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants did not inform them of the California law on rest breaks and were not compensated when such breaks were missed. Id. at *30. As Defendant's handbook stated the legal policy for rest breaks, the Court rejected Plaintiffs' argument that the stores did not comply with the policy, and ruled that when an employer has a facially valid policy, there is a risk that substantial individualized inquiries will be necessary to determine liability. Id. at *36. Accordingly, the Court denied certification as to the rest break class because Plaintiffs failed to show sufficient evidence of a common policy that violated the law and Plaintiffs failed to propose a viable means of identifying those employees who claimed to have missed breaks. Id. at *36. In addition, the Court denied Defendant's motion to exclude Plaintiffs' expert, rejecting Defendant's contention that the expert failed to consider certain evidence, misapplied evidence as to factual matters, and did not give certain evidence sufficient weight. Id. at *47. The Court ruled that these objections did not address the reliability of the expert's opinions and were not a basis to exclude them, but instead went to the weight that should be given to his testimony. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to exclude the expert and granted Plaintiffs' motion for certification in part and denied it in part. Id. at *47-48.

Humes, et al. v. First Student, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109858 (E.D. Cal. July 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of bus drivers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3). The Court denied the motion, finding that Plaintiffs failed to meet the commonality, typicality, and predominance requirements. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant: (i) failed to pay regular wages; (ii) failed to pay wages within the time allowed; (iii) failed to pay the minimum wage; (iv) failed to provide accurate itemized statements; (v) violated § 17200 of the Business and Professions Code with unlawful, unfair, and fraudulent business practices; and (vi) breached an oral contract. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs moved to certify a class of all current and former bus drivers who were employed by Defendant at its Fresno Yard location from October 28, 2011 to the present. The Court found that the parties submitted substantial contradictory evidence, including deposition excerpts and supporting declarations clearly demonstrating the absence of a common or uniform policy of failing to compensate drivers for additional time worked. Id. at *22. For example, Plaintiffs submitted evidence that drivers were not paid for additional time reported and that drivers were directed to change the times reported or that hours were reduced to conform to Defendant's default times. Id. at *22. Defendant, however, submitted evidence supporting its position that it paid for all hours worked. Id. Given the discrepancies, the Court held that Plaintiffs had not offered sufficient evidence that the compensation policy about which they complained was commonly applied to all class members. Id. at *23. Further, the Court determined that Plaintiffs failed to identify uniform policies and systemic practices that applied uniformly to the class of employees. Given the discrepancies between the drivers' experiences, including payment discrepancies between Plaintiffs' own declarants, the Court found that there was no indication that Plaintiffs suffered the same or similar injuries as all class members. Id. at *24. The Court therefore determined that Plaintiffs also failed to meet the typicality requirement. The Court also noted that Plaintiffs had not adequately explained or defined the proposed class to account for changes in the time recording process, nor did they adequately explain how the blend of class members who used several different processes would result in common questions that predominated across the proposed class. Id. at *28. As a result, the Court opined that there would be individualized inquiries specific to apparent different sub-sets of class members, and to individuals within those sub-sets, all of which demonstrated that the proposed class was not sufficiently cohesive to satisfy the Rule 23(b)(3) predominance requirement. Id. at *29. Further, since the Court held that that Plaintiffs had not met their burden to establish commonality, typicality, and predominance, it concluded that a class action would not be a superior method for resolving this litigation. The Court therefore denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Jama, et al. v. GCA Services Group*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 174239 (W.D. Wash. Oct. 20, 2017). Plaintiff, a bus driver, filed a class action alleging that Defendants failed to minimum wage required by SeaTac Municipal Code § 7.45 (the "Ordinance") and sought back pay. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23, which the Court granted. Plaintiff sought to certify a class of all employees of Defendant GCA Services jointly employed by Defendant Avis-Budget employed as hospitality workers or transportation workers and who worked one or more hours within the City of SeaTac at any time during the time period between January 1, 2014, to April 2016, who were paid less than the prevailing minimum wage. Id. at *2-3. The Avis-Budget Defendants opposed class certification and argued that some or all Plaintiffs were atypical and/or unrepresentative of the class and objected to the proposed class definition on the ground that it would create an impermissible "fail safe" class. Id. at *3. The Court noted that Plaintiffs submitted declarations stating that GCA Services and the Avis-Budget Defendants jointly employed approximately 80 people at the SeaTac facility, which it found sufficiently numerous to justify a class action. Id. at *6. The Court further determined that common questions existed as to Defendants' alleged failure to pay the prevailing wage and the answer to these questions would be the same for every class member. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court held that commonality was satisfied. The Court also found that each class member had claims based on the same alleged wrong as Plaintiffs, i.e., a joint employer's failure to pay the prevailing wage. The Court stated that if Plaintiffs were to establish Defendants' statutory liability, such proofs would also establish the claims of the absent class members, and therefore Plaintiffs met the typicality requirement. Id. at *14. The Court also concluded that both Plaintiffs and Plaintiffs' counsel demonstrated a commitment to vigorously prosecuting the action on behalf of the class and would do so in an adequate manner. Id. at *17. The Court held that common questions predominated because whether Plaintiffs were able to establish their joint employer theory and liability under the Ordinance would also establish Defendants' liability to the absent class members. Accordingly, the underlying questions concerning Defendants' liability predominated over any individual issues related to the calculation of back wages for each employee. Id. at *18. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs also met the superiority requirement because the relative small recovery amounts suggested that each class member would not have a "significant interest in litigating his or her claims separately." Id. at *20. Further, the Court was unaware of any other litigation pending against the Avis-Budget Defendants for the claims Plaintiffs asserted, and therefore treating Plaintiffs' claims as a class action appeared to promote judicial economy. Id. at *21. The Court reasoned that managing a single class action would require fewer judicial resources than managing separate suits. However, the Court determined that Defendants correctly noted that Plaintiffs' initial class definition failed to set forth characteristics that could be identified at the outset of the litigation and instead required adjudication of the joint employer issue before one would know whether he or she was a class member. Id. The Court found that such class definitions are unfair to Defendants because they allow putative class members to seek relief in Court without being bound by an adverse judgment. Accordingly, Plaintiffs redefined the class definitions by reference to GCA Services' contract with the Avis-Budget Defendants so that class members were employee of GCA Services who worked as part of the contract between GCA Services and the Avis-Budget Defendants. The Court therefore granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Luviano, et al. v. Multi Cable, Inc.*, Case No. 15-CV-5592 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of installation technicians ("ITs"), filed putative class and collective actions alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime, pay minimum wage, provide rest-time and meal periods, and itemized wage statements. Plaintiffs alleged that the Defendants violated the FLSA because Defendants improperly classified Plaintiffs as independent contractors, while treating them as employees. Plaintiffs brought motions to certify their class actions and collective actions. Defendant opposed both motions and moved to strike the declarations of Plaintiffs' expert. The Court conditionally certified Plaintiffs' collective actions, certified their class claims under Rule 23, and granted Defendants' motion to strike, in part, portions of Plaintiffs' expert declarations. Plaintiffs allege that Defendants employed Plaintiffs as independent contractors for purposes of compensation, paying them per job and not keeping time records, while essentially treating them as employees. Defendants controlled the jobs they performed, required them to wear uniforms, and display decals on vehicles. Plaintiffs were required to work more than 40 hours a week without overtime compensation. As to Plaintiffs' class certification motion, Defendants asserted that Plaintiffs' class definition created a fail-safe class and was not ascertainable. Id. at 19. Therefore, Defendants asserted that the class should not be certified. The class was defined as "all ITs paid as faux "independent contractors rather than employees." Id. The Court agreed that the adjective "faux" and phrase "paid as independent contractors rather than employees" incorporated improper legal conclusions. The Court modified the proposed class definition to include "all persons who entered into a contract for cabling services" and performed services between the relevant time-period. Id. at 22. The Court further found that the Plaintiffs satisfied the numerosity, commonality, and typicality requirements. However, Defendant asserted that the representative Plaintiff was not an adequate representative because he lacked integrity due to evidence that he had obtained employment through fraud, using a falsified driver's license, social security number, and insurance documents. The Court agreed that the credibility issues were well-founded and conditioned certification upon the satisfactory substitution of an adequate representative Plaintiff. The Court also found that Plaintiffs satisfied the Rule 23(b)(3) requirements that common questions predominate and that class action was a superior method of adjudication. Plaintiffs also moved for conditional certification of a collective action under the FLSA pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court granted the motion by applying the more lenient first-stage standard. Defendant asserted the heightened standard was the appropriate standard because the parties had already exchanged initial discovery and completed 12 depositions. The Court disagreed because discovery was not yet complete and as additional discovery might be necessary. Defendant also raised a § 7(i) FLSA exemption defense, but the Court refused to hear the merits of the FLSA exemption defense as it did not preclude conditional certification. The Court found that Plaintiffs' allegations as to the FLSA collective action satisfied the similarly-situated requirement, thereby rejecting Defendants' argument that Plaintiffs failed to set forth tests distinguishing between an employee and an independent contractor and did not show that the collective action members were not similarly-situated. Further, the Court noted that Defendants' assertions could be appropriately addressed at the second stage of § 216 certification. Accordingly, the Court also conditionally certified Plaintiffs' collective action.

Manigo, et al. v. Time Warner Cable*, Case No. 16-CV-6722 (C.D. Cal. April 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of cable dispatchers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay for meal and rest breaks in violation of California Labor Code. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the Court denied on the basis that Plaintiffs failed to establish typicality, commonality, predominance, or superiority. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant had a de facto policy requiring them to remain at their desks for the entirety of the workday due to understaffing. Id. at 1. Plaintiffs also asserted that they were required to work off-the-clock downloading computer programs. Defendant argued that its policies and procedures complied with the Labor Code and provided declarations from nine other workers confirming that Defendant enforced those policies and that they were not subjected to meal or rest break violations. Id. at 2. The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to identify common questions for which the answers would resolve any issue central to Defendant's alleged liability. The Court stated that understaffing was not an unlawful practice, nor was requiring employees to answer incoming calls. Id. at 7. While Plaintiffs alleged that these purported circumstances resulted in a de facto policy depriving the putative class of timely meal and rest breaks, the Court opined that the evidence fell short of establishing that connection. Id. The Court determined that even if Plaintiffs could show that all putative class members worked in a dispatch center that was understaffed, and that they were all subject to a policy requiring them to answer incoming calls, these circumstances did not establish that the class was uniformly denied the opportunity to take timely meal and rest breaks. Id. The Court also found that Plaintiffs could not show an injury common to the class, as Defendant provided evidence from nine workers who confirmed that they were not the victims of any meal or rest break violations and therefore not injured at all. Id. at 8. The Court also found that Plaintiffs' off-the-clock claims failed to satisfy Rule 23(a) because Plaintiffs had not identified any class-wide policy or procedure that required them to load computer programs before clocking-in or to clock-out before logging-out of those programs. Id. Plaintiffs also failed to demonstrate an injury common to the class regarding the off-the-clock claims. In addition, the Court held that Plaintiffs' claims would require individualized inquiries of each putative class members as to why breaks were not taken or were late, and why he or she worked off-the-clock and whether the work was de minimis. Id. at 9-10. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs did not meet the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b). The Court therefore denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Mann, et al. v. The Boeing Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7671 (W.D. Wash. Jan. 18, 2017). Plaintiff, a first line leader ("FLL"), brought an action alleging that Defendant violated Washington state law by wrongfully denying overtime pay to employees through improper invocation of the executive exemption and administrative exemption. Id. at *2. Plaintiff previously moved for class certification, which the Court had denied on the grounds that Plaintiff's proposed class definition failed to meet the commonality requirement of Rule 23. Id. Plaintiff subsequently filed a renewed motion for class certification. In Defendant's system of job classification, it assigned managers to particular operations and sub-divided them further into "job families," identifiable by a classification code. Defendant classified Plaintiff's position as DAKU-K, or a Level K Manufacturing Manager. Defendant submitted that, even within the DAKU-K classification, managers might have varying levels of responsibilities fundamentally different from those described by Plaintiff. In response, Plaintiff narrowed the class definition to include DAKU-Ks "directly supervising IAM members engaged directly in the assembly of 777 . . . aircraft in the Everett facility." Id. at *5. The Court held that the redefined class definition still included managers across all three of Defendant's business units, each of which had different responsibilities and different senior management. Defendant provided evidence that the responsibilities of a DAKU-K worker varied widely depending on his or her business unit, shift, the degree of supervision required by their crew, and the leadership abilities of the DAKU-K worker. Id. at *6. The Court opined that variation among the tasks actually performed by a group of workers with a single role within a company does not per se disqualify those workers from inclusion within a certified class. However, the Court determined that Plaintiff's own class definition indicated that employees within the proposed class had different authority and responsibilities, as the class definition excluded DAKU-Ks "whose principal supervisory responsibilities were related to training, tooling, staffing, quality control or who held Boeing Production System positions or other positions involving cross operational initiatives including Tactical Manager positions." The Court found that this suggested that DAKU-Ks had different "principal supervisory responsibilities," and though Plaintiff sought to exclude the ones that might qualify for the overtime exemption, his proposed class definition left open the possibility that a variety of "principal supervisory responsibilities" remained. Id. at 6-7. The Court therefore held that Plaintiff could not meet the commonality requirement without showing commonality of "principal supervisory responsibilities." Id. at *7. The Court reasoned that even if employees in Plaintiff's proposed class were incorrectly classified as exempt, Plaintiff failed to show that every employee in the proposed class was classified incorrectly for the same reasons. Id. Since the Court held that Plaintiff's proposed class failed the commonality requirement of Rule 23(a)(2), it did not evaluate whether Plaintiff's claims were typical of the class under Rule 23(a)(3) or whether a class action could be maintained under Rule 23(b)(3). Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Mares, et al. v. Swift Transportation Co. Of Arizona,* Case No. 15-CV-7920 (C.D. Cal. May 23, 2017). Plaintiff, a truck driver, brought a putative class action alleging violations of the California Labor Code ("CLC") for failure to provide rest periods. Plaintiff filed a motion to certify the putative class and the Court denied the motion on the basis that Plaintiff failed to satisfy Rule 23(b)(3)'s requirements of predominance and superiority. Plaintiff sought to certify a class of California residents who were employed by Defendant as truck drivers and were paid on a piece-rate basis. The Court found that the class was ascertainable and that numerosity was satisfied. Defendant objected on the basis that Plaintiff failed to satisfy the commonality requirement. Plaintiff argued that the common question for litigation was whether as a matter of law a piece-rate pay plan failed to compensate employees for rest time. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff failed to present a common question because the CLC did not provide a remedy for Plaintiff's theory of liability and there was no evidence that Defendant had a common policy or practice of not providing breaks in violation of CLC. The Court rejected Defendant's arguments because Defendant attacked the merits of Plaintiff's complaint and this was not a proper inquiry at the certification stage. The Court ruled that Plaintiff presented evidence of the common policy of not providing breaks. Therefore, Plaintiff satisfied the commonality requirement. The Court also found that Plaintiff's claims were typical. Defendant asserted that they were not typical because Plaintiff did not always take his rest breaks and he spent only about 25% of his worktime in California. The Court rejected Defendant's arguments, ruling that whether Plaintiff took his rest breaks was not relevant and many of the drivers delivered goods outside of California. The Court found that the claims arose from the same course of conduct that gave rise to the claims of the putative class member and was based upon the same legal theory. Accordingly, the Court found that typicality was satisfied. The Court likewise ruled that Plaintiff was an adequate representative and that Plaintiff's counsel was adequate. Nevertheless, the Court determined that individual issues predominated as to whether each putative class member suffered damages. Thus, Plaintiff's claims failed to satisfy the predominance requirement. Plaintiff claimed that putative class members were entitled to separately compensated rest breaks under Wage Order 9, which states that employees who worked at least three and a half hours a day in California were entitled to rest periods. The Court opined that to find that each driver's damages stemming from Defendant's actions, it would first need to determine whether each driver worked in California for at least three and half consecutive hours. The Court would need to examine each class member's wage statement and load files to determine if they were in California long enough to be entitled to a rest period. Then, the Court would be required to manually review each putative class members wage statements. Further, Defendant showed that it had 29 methods of pay and 10 methods of hourly rates. Thus, any hourly employee was not injured by Defendant's piece-rate pay policy, and individual questions would predominate whether a member even had any damages. As to the superiority requirement, the Court found that the likely difficulties of managing the class action were extensive because the Court would need to find each driver's damages stemmed from the Defendant's action that created legal liability. Accordingly, a class action would not be the superior method of adjudicating the putative class' claims. Because Plaintiff failed to satisfy Rule 23(b)(3)'s requirements, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to certify the class.

Marino, et al. v. CACafe, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 186307 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 9, 2017). Plaintiff, an in-store demonstrator ("ISD"), filed a collective action alleging that Defendants misclassified demonstrators as exempt employees and thereby failed to pay minimum wage, overtime, meal and rest break penalties, late payment penalties, and reimbursement of expenses in violation of the FLSA. Id. at *2. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff performed demonstrations in Costco warehouse stores to encourage sales of Defendant CDS' coconut-infused coffees and teas. Plaintiff contended that all ISDs were classified as independent contractors and paid solely based on the number of jars of product sold in Costco's stores on days they performed product demonstrations at Costco. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff submitted evidence that the conditions of the in-store demonstrations were dictated by the policies in Costco's standard operating procedures ("SOP"), which in turn were enforced by CACafe. CDS event managers conducted in-person, daily inspections of ISDs' performance, dress, and observance of safety rules at all Costco warehouses pursuant to Costco's SOP. Id. at *4. CDS also retained the right to "fire" ISDs for failing to be "in complete compliance with Costco and CDS guidelines and policies." Id. at *5. Plaintiff sought conditional certification of a collective action of all persons who work or worked for Defendants as in-store demonstrators and any other employees performing the same or similar duties for Defendants, within the United States, at any time from three years prior to the filing of the complaint to the final disposition of the case. Id. at *8. The Court found that Plaintiff submitted evidence from members of the proposed collective action, as well as evidence about Defendants' policies and practices, to support the argument that ISDs were subject to uniform conditions of work and daily supervision. Id. at *8-9. The Court further determined that Costco, acting through CDS and CACafe, retained the right to exert discipline over ISDs to ensure that they did not perform in an "un-Costco way." Id. at *9-10. Based on the evidence presented by Plaintiff, the Court held that conditional certification was appropriate since it met the "modest factual showing" threshold for conditional certification under the FLSA. Id. at *10. Defendants argued that the action should not be conditionally certified as against them, contending that Plaintiff had not established a sufficient showing that they were joint employers of the members of the collective action. Costco and CDS further contended that, barring denial of the motion, the Court should delay conditional certification as to them because they intended to file motions for summary judgment on the joint employer issue. Id. at *11. The Court stated that Defendants did not file a motion despite the pendency of the action for more than a year and Defendants' prior representations that they would bring such a motion. Id. The Court opined that delaying conditional certification would prejudice members of the collective action, whose claims would not be tolled until the motion was granted. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

McLeod, et al. v. Bank Of America, N.A.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 205273 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 13, 2017). Plaintiff, a mortgage loan officer, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the California Labor Code. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23, which the Court granted. Id. at *1-2. In support of her motion, Plaintiff presented eight declarations from putative class members (including Plaintiff herself) working in different offices and different regions across California, all claiming that loan officers were not aware their mileage could be expensed under the company's written policy, that they had not been instructed to make reimbursement requests for mileage, and that they regularly used their vehicles for business purposes, ranging from dozens to hundreds of miles per week. Id. at *11-12. The Court found that there was no dispute that the class included at least 1,881 individuals, and therefore Plaintiff clearly met the numerosity requirement. Id. at *14. The Court determined that Plaintiff presented substantial evidence of a common, class-wide practice of non-reimbursement for mileage incurred. Id. at *18. The Court reasoned that whether Defendant had constructive notice under § 2802 of the California Labor Code that loan officers were incurring mileage expenses and were not being reimbursed was a common question that could be resolved on a class-wide basis. Id. at *25. The Court also held that there were key common liability questions, such as whether Defendant had constructive knowledge of the regular failure to reimburse expenses incurred and whether Defendant satisfied its duty by promulgating its expense reimbursement policy and establishing an expense-reporting system. Id. at *31. The Court stated that the answer to those questions depended not on the actions of Plaintiff or individual loan officers, but Defendant's actions, and Plaintiff's claims would therefore be typical of the claims of the class. Id. The Court also reasoned that Plaintiff had prosecuted the case by producing discovery, attending a mediation session, cooperating with her counsel, assisting in the investigation of claims, and preparing for and attending her deposition; therefore, there was no reason to doubt her adequacy as a class representative. Id. at *33. The Court likewise determined that Plaintiff's counsel was adequate to represent the class. Id. at *34. As to Rule 23(b) factors, Defendant argued that any common question would be overcome by individualized inquiries into each loan officer's mileage reimbursement facts surrounding each trip taken and each reimbursement requested. Id. at *36-37. The Court found that the issues Defendant advanced did not defeat the predominance requirement, as many were irrelevant as a matter of law. The Court opined that Plaintiff need only prove Defendant's constructive knowledge that mileage was being incurred without being reimbursed, not actual knowledge of each individual trip. Id. at *38. The Court ruled that the fact that common questions predominated demonstrated that a class action would be a superior method of adjudication. Further, the Court held that class members would have minimal interest in pursuing independent suits considering the relatively small amount of individual damages; there was no other individual litigation underway that would be disrupted; there was nothing undesirable about concentrating California claims in this forum; and any future difficulties could be adequately managed. Id. at *43. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

McQueen, et al. v. Chevron Corp.,* Case No. 16-CV-2089 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of site managers, brought a collective action asserting that Defendant violated the FLSA. Plaintiffs sought conditional certification of a collective action of a group of site manager who were classified as independent contractors or consultants and were paid a day rate at any time within three years of the filing of the complaint through the trial. Id. at 1. The Court granted the motion, and found that Plaintiffs met their burden to demonstrate that conditional certification was appropriate under the lenient standard applicable at the first stage of 29 U.S.C.§ 216(b). Id. at 3. The Court found that Plaintiffs presented substantial allegations and evidence in the form of multiple declarations regarding the status of the proposed collective action members. Id. The Court further noted that Plaintiffs made allegations and offered evidence that all proposed collective action members acted as site managers, were required to follow Defendant's policies and use their equipment, performed similar duties, were classified as independent contracts, and were paid a day rate with no overtime premiums. Id. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs and the proposed collective actions members had different contracts and intermediary relationships with third-party contracting companies, which would be inconsistent with a finding that they were similarly-situated. Id. The Court held that Defendant's argument was better addressed at the second stage of certification of 29 U.S.C.§ 216(b). Id. at 4. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of the proposed collective action.

Mendis, et al. v. Schneider National Carriers Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17291 (W.D. Wash. Feb. 7, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former truck drivers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay drivers for all hours worked, made unlawful wage deductions, failed to provide itemized wage statements, and failed to pay drivers for rest breaks to which they were entitled in violation of Washington law. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification of pursuant to Rule 23 of a proposed class of all current and former employees who worked as drivers for Defendant while residing in Washington from December 30, 2011 to the date of the filing of the complaint. Id. at *2-3. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs failed to meet Rule 23's commonality, typicality, and adequacy requirements. The Court found that Plaintiffs met the numerosity requirement as the proposed class consisted of between 150 and 890 members. Id. at *4. As to commonality, Plaintiffs argued that their claims presented numerous common factual and legal issues, including whether, under Washington law: (i) Defendant was obligated to compensate class members for rest breaks; (ii) Defendant's per diem program resulted in a deduction from the wages of class members who are enrolled in the program to the benefit of Defendant; (iii) Defendant's fuel card program resulted in deductions from the wages of class members who use those cards to the benefit of Defendant; (iv) Defendant obtained a benefit from the wage deductions it took from class members to pay for safety equipment drivers are required to purchase as a condition of their employment; (v) Defendant was obligated to pay overtime compensation to class members; and (vi) Defendant willfully withheld wages. Id. at *5-6. Defendant argued that because some putative class members parked their trucks or began and ended their routes in Portland, Oregon, they were not Washington-based employees. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs asserted that the putative class members were residents of Washington, had Washington-issued commercial driver's license, Washington was listed as the driver's state of residence on her paystub, and Defendant paid Washington-specific taxes. The Court found that given the significant contacts with the state, Washington's wage & hour laws applied to the proposed class members. Id. at *8. Defendant further argued that Plaintiffs' overtime claim should not be certified because it would require individualized inquiries. Defendant asserted that because each driver earned a different percentage of the established hourly and overtime rate, the jury would have to determine liability for each individual Plaintiff. The Court opined that although each damage inquiry would be different, damages determinations are individual in nearly all wage & hour class actions and the presence of individualized damages could not, by itself, defeat class certification. However, the Court determined that creation of sub-classes was appropriate and it created two sub-classes. Id. at *12. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs' claims were typical of the claims of other class members because they arose out of the same alleged conduct and were based on the same legal theories. The Court held that the named Plaintiffs would adequately represent the class and that Plaintiffs' counsel were competent to prosecute the action. Id. at *13. Defendant further contended that Plaintiffs failed to meet the predominance requirement because the question of whether Washington law applied would require separate adjudication of that defense for every class member. The Court stated that the primary issue for resolution was whether Defendant's uniform policies and practices as they relate to compensation for rest breaks, alleged wage deductions, and overtime pay, violated Washington law. Id. at *17. The Court determined that a class action was superior to other available methods of adjudicating the class members' claims because filing multiple and duplicative lawsuits may yield different results. The Court thereby granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Metrow, et al. v. Liberty Mutual Managed Care,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73656 (C.D. Cal. May 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of Nurse Case Managers ("NCMs"), brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the California Business and Professions Code, the California Labor Code, and the Private Attorneys General Act by failing to pay overtime compensation and all wages due and because Defendant misclassified them as exempt. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the Court granted. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs submitted a declaration of Plaintiffs' counsel and numerous exhibits. Id. at *3-5. Defendant is a property and casualty insurance provider, and provides integrated managed care services, whereby claims adjusters assign a NCM to the claim to assess the prescribed medical treatment and develop return to work strategies. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs alleged that they were misclassified as exempt employees and asserted that they should not be exempt from overtime pay or meal and rest breaks under the administrative exemption because as NCMs, they do not have ultimate decision-making power and none of their job duties allow them to exercise their independent judgment and discretion. Id. Plaintiffs moved to certify a class pursuant to Rules 23(a) and 23(b)(3) of "[a]ll individuals who are or previously were employed by Defendant Liberty Mutual Managed Care, LLC as Telephonic Nurse Case Managers in California between February 24, 2012 to the present." Id. at *10. Plaintiffs' proposed class contained 51 current and former employees in California in the job positions at issue, which the Court opined was sufficient to make joinder of all class members' claims impracticable. Accordingly, the Court found that numerosity was satisfied. As to commonality, the Court stated that it was undisputed that all members of the putative class were classified as exempt from overtime pay under the administrative exemption, none of the NCMs received overtime pay, and their work was designated under the same general job description. Id. at *17. The Court held that the members of the proposed class, therefore, all suffered from the same injury and Plaintiffs advanced sufficient common questions for which adjudication would offer common answers. As to typicality, the Court held that Plaintiffs' claims were all premised on the contention that Defendant misclassified each putative class member based upon the same misapplication of federal and California law. Defendant, moreover, failed to point to any unique defenses that might render Plaintiffs' claims atypical. Id. at *20.

Accordingly, Plaintiffs fulfilled the typicality requirement. Defendant argued that the named Plaintiff Rose Ann Gainor was not an adequate class representative because the discrepancy between her performance reviews and how she has subsequently characterized her job duties raised "significant credibility issues." Id. at *22. The Court disagreed, and opined that Gainor would adequately represent the interests of the class as her interest in the action did not differ from those of the other class members in any materially significant way. Id. at *23. The Court further determined that class counsel had substantial experience handling large employment-related class actions and was found to be qualified class counsel in prior actions. Id. at *24. Defendant also argued that Plaintiffs could not satisfy the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b) because Plaintiffs lacked common proof that would enable the Court to adjudicate liability without individual inquiries overwhelming the trial. Id. at *26. The Court found that Plaintiffs' job responsibilities constituted common proof because the deposition testimony and Defendant's own admissions showed these descriptions and policies reflected the work that all Plaintiffs realistically performed. All Plaintiffs were also expected to complete each case on the same time-frame, perform each task within a standardized amount of time, and conform conduct to clearly delineated procedures and policies. Id. at *31. The Court stated that the proposed action was manageable as the class involved only California-based employees, making this forum appropriate and desirable. The Court opined that a class action was the superior method of resolving the class members' claims because it would "achieve economies of time, effort, and expense . . . without sacrificing procedural fairness or bringing about other undesirable results." Id. at *48-49. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs met the burden of demonstrating that the class satisfied the requirements of Rules 23(a) and 23(b)(3), and it therefore granted class certification.

Nguyen, et al. v. Wells Fargo,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 155632 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 22, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of home mortgage consultants, brought a putative class action alleging violations of California Labor Code ("CLC") for failure to reimburse for marketing programs and failure to timely pay commissions. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant's policy of not reimbursing the home mortgage consultants for Defendant's marketing programs, websites, and client communications program violated the CLC. Id. at *5. Defendant encouraged Plaintiffs to subscribe to these marketing programs, touting their advantage in job performance, although use of the programs was optional. Id. at *7, 9. Only a minority of the home mortgage consultants employed by Defendant chose not to use the programs. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant did not timely pay commission to the home mortgage consultants based on when commissions were earned in violation of the CLC. Id. at *2. Plaintiff moved for class certification and the Court granted certification, finding that all the requirements of Rule 23(a) and 23(b)(3) were satisfied. The Court certified three sub-classes, including: (i) the expense reimbursement sub-class, consisting of employees who participated in either marketing program; (ii) the commission pay stub sub-class, consisting of employees who did not receive their commissions timely; and (iii) the waiting-time penalties sub-class, consisting of all employees who did not receive all wages owed at the time of separation. Id. at *28. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Orozco, et al. v. Illinois Tool Works, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23179 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of non-exempt employees, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them overtime compensation in violation of California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"). The Court previously certified one of the Plaintiffs' two proposed classes. Plaintiffs now moved to certify a modified version of their second proposed class pursuant to Rule 23, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs are former material processors who worked for one of Defendant's forty business facilities in California. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs alleged that the hazards of the manufacturing process at the facility sometimes prevented material processors from taking their scheduled meal and rest breaks. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's policies for providing mealtimes were unfair under the UCL. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs' proposed UCL class consisted of all individuals who are or previously were employed as material processors by Defendant in California as non-exempt employees during the period March 27, 2010 to the present. Id. at *4. The Court found that the class was sufficiently numerous because it consisted of 44 members. Id. at *5. Defendant contended that Plaintiffs' UCL cause of action presented no single question, but instead a multitude of questions about why a particular employee took a meal break when he or she did on any given day. Id. at *5-6. The Court opined that while the reasons for any one delayed meal break could vary, there was a common, predominant question among the workers as to whether Defendant had a policy or practice that deprived them of their statutory right to opt for a meal break within the first five hours of work. Id. at *6. The Court stated that class-wide litigation was apt to generate a common answer of whether that scheme unfairly pressured employees into forgoing their statutory right to a meal break.

Id. at *6-7. The Court found that Plaintiffs met the typicality requirement because all material processors were subject to the same meal break policy. As to the adequacy requirement, the Court determined that Plaintiffs have committed to seeing the litigation to its conclusion, and Plaintiffs' counsel was already found qualified by the Court. Id. at *9. The Court stated that Plaintiffs only needed to provide evidence of undue pressure resulting from the team-based, manufacturing-process-informed approach to determining when meal breaks are taken, not individualized evidence as to why any one meal break was taken at any particular time. Thus, the Court determined that Plaintiffs satisfied the predominance requirement. Id. at *10. The Court also found that class action was superior to alternative methods of adjudication because individuals likely had little interest in pursuing litigation themselves, especially given potential fears of employment retaliation. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to certify their UCL class.

Patakay, et al. v. The Brigantine, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 70098 (S.D. Cal. May 8, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of food servers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA, the California Unfair Competition Law, and the California Business & Professions Code. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant maintained an unlawful "tip pooling" policy, under which Plaintiffs, who were paid tips from Defendant's customers, had to "tip out" significant portions of their earned tip income to other employees who do not provide direct table service to customers, such as Defendant's kitchen staff. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs sought to certify a collective action of all current or former employees of Defendant who had worked on and after February 22, 2014 as "servers," including the job titles of food servers, cocktail lounge servers, dining room servers, and bartenders. Id. at *4-5. Defendant opposed Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification on grounds that: (i) there was no corporate or company-wide policy regarding tip pooling or tip distributions; (ii) Defendant's "tipping suggestions" sheet did not reflect a company-wide policy, but rather reflected a suggestion created by two employees; and (iii) Plaintiffs had not offered evidence regarding tip pooling at any of Defendant's restaurants, other than Brigantine Seafood in Coronado, during the relevant class period. Id. at *7-8. Defendant contended that if conditional certification was granted, the Court should narrowly certify a collective action limited only to the Brigantine Seafood restaurant in Coronado. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant's mandatory and enforced tip pooling policy required servers to tip out portions of their earned tip income to kitchen staff who do not provide direct table service to customers, and that the tip pooling policy for servers was similar or identical across all of Defendant's restaurants. Id. at *10. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs lacked evidence regarding policies at other restaurants owned and operated by Defendant, since all three Plaintiffs provided evidence of managers requiring servers to contribute to a tip pool with kitchen staff at the Coronado location only. Id. at *12-13. The Court found that while Defendant offered evidence disputing Plaintiffs' allegations and affidavits, Defendant's argument went to the merits of Plaintiffs' claims, and thus the Court declined to rule on the merits at this stage. Id. at *14-15. The Court determined that Defendants' evidence did not negate the evidence offered by Plaintiffs, particularly Plaintiffs' testimony regarding personal experiences with managers requiring Plaintiffs to tip out to kitchen staff. Id. at *16. The Court opined that simply because the corporate office may not have issued a formal company-wide policy on mandatory tipping pools did not negate the possibility that such an undocumented policy existed. Id. Further, the Court found that Plaintiffs provided an identifiable legal and factual nexus binding together various claims of the proposed collective action, i.e., a uniform or substantially similar tipping policy across Defendant's restaurants that violated 29 U.S.C. §§ 203(m) and 206 by including in the tipping pool employees who did not customarily and regularly receive tips. Id. At this stage, the Court held that Plaintiffs met their lenient burden to show that they are similarly-situated to potential collective action members. Id. at *16-17. Accordingly the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Quiroz, et al. v. City Of Ceres,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96747 (E.D. Cal. June 22, 2017). Plaintiff, a police officer, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed by pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff asserted that as part of a collective bargaining agreement, Defendant offered and he accepted an option to receive monetary compensation in lieu of certain Defendant-sponsored health benefits. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff further alleged that, for the three years prior to the commencement of his action, Defendant failed to include the in-lieu payments in its calculation of Plaintiff's regular rate of pay, resulting in an under-payment of overtime compensation. Id. at *2. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification, which the Court granted. The Court found that Plaintiff met his burden of showing at the first step that conditional certification was warranted. The parties did not dispute defining those similarly-situated as "all current or former employees of the City of Ceres who have worked statutory overtime and received cash payments in lieu of health care benefits or savings payments if they chose coverage through the City that does not utilize the full dollar allowance." Id. at *4. Plaintiff also contended that his decision to receive monetary compensation in lieu of health benefits was part of a broader uniform policy affecting other employees. Id. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant similarly excluded such in-lieu compensation from its calculation of regular rates of pay for purposes of overtime compensation. Id. at *4-5. The Court determined that based on these representations, Plaintiff met his burden at this stage of the litigation. The Court conditionally certified a collective action comprised of all current or former employees who worked statutory overtime and received cash payments in lieu of health care benefits or savings payments, between February 17, 2014 and the date of entry of the order. Id. at *6-7.

Ramirez, et al. v. HG Staffing, LLC,* Case No. 16-CV-318 (D. Nev. Oct. 23, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA. Plaintiffs moved to conditionally certify a collective action for discovery and trial purposes. The Court denied the motion. The matter stemmed from an on-going case entitled Sargent, et al. v. HG Staffing, Case No. 13-CV-453 (D. Nev.). The Court in Sargent had decertified a conditionally certified collective action. Plaintiffs from that action filed this new lawsuit seeking to certify a narrower collective action than presented in Sargent. Id. at 2. Defendant argued that the doctrine of issue preclusion and the first-to-file rule barred certification. Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs' motion to certify the collective action failed because Plaintiffs had yet to seek conditional certification and had yet to join with opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. The Court determined that in filing their motion for conditional certification, Plaintiffs relied on actions taken in Sargent. However, the Court stated that this matter was independent from Sargent, and Plaintiffs herein must satisfy the FLSA requirements independently. Id. at 4. While the Court recognized that Plaintiffs intended to use a substantial amount of discovery from Sargent, it found that Plaintiffs still must provide an opportunity for an opt-in process for similarly-situated Plaintiffs. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification without prejudice.

Ridgeway, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores Inc*., Case No. 08-CV-5221 (N.D. Cal. May 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of truck drivers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the California Labor Code. Following a trial, the jury returned a verdict in favor of Plaintiffs on four of the 11 causes of action at issue including performing pre-trip inspections, performing post-trip inspections, taking 10-minute rest breaks, and taking 10-hour lay-overs. Id. at 1. The jury awarded damages of over $55 million. Defendant filed a motion for judgment as a matter of law and a motion for a new trial and for decertification. The Court denied the motions as to the litigated claims, and granted Defendant's motion as a matter of law with respect to the claims that were not tried. Defendant's primary argument for a new trial was that Plaintiffs failed to establish class-wide damages through common proof and representative evidence. Defendant contended that the evidence adduced at trial showed that the duration and frequency with which drivers took rest breaks, pre-trip and post-trip inspections, and lay-overs varied greatly, such that Plaintiffs' reliance on their expert was an improper basis for the jury's verdict. Defendant asserted that the jury verdict was not supported by substantial evidence, which entitled it to judgment as a matter of law, or alternatively, that the jury verdict was against the clear weight of the evidence, warranting a new trial and class decertification. Id. at 2. However, the Court determined that Defendant cross-examined Plaintiffs' expert on all issues and called its own witness to counter Plaintiffs' expert. Id. The Court found that there was substantial evidence to support the opinions of Plaintiffs' expert and to support the jury's verdict with respect to rest breaks, pre-trip and post-trip inspections, and lay-overs. The Court stated that Plaintiffs did not oppose Defendant's motion to enter judgment in favor of Defendant on Plaintiffs' untried claims, including violations of failing to provide off-duty meal periods, failing to authorize and permit rest breaks, for waiting time penalties, and for itemized wage statements. Id. at 3. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion with respect to Plaintiffs' untried claims and denied it in all other respects.

Riveria, et al. v. Saul Chevrolet, Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120094 (N.D. Cal. July 31, 2017). Plaintiff, a service counter salesperson, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant failed to provide meal and rest breaks, and failed to provide minimum wages and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, and the Court denied the motion. Plaintiff argued that he was similarly-situated to the putative collective action members because Plaintiff and the putative collective action members: (i) worked overtime without pay for overtime work; (ii) shared similar job duties, including a mixture of sales and non-sales work; and (iii) shared roughly the same pay structure. Id. at *11. Defendant argued that Plaintiff had not provided adequate evidence that a "single decision, policy, or plan" affected all of the putative collective action members, or that the job responsibilities and pay structures for the putative collective action members were similar. Id. Defendant also argued that Plaintiff had not sufficiently shown that positions, job duties, and pay structures were similarly administered at the dealerships where Plaintiff did not work. Id. at *11-12. The Court agreed with Defendant that Plaintiff had not identified the "single decision, policy, or plan" that affected all of the putative collective action members. Id. at *12. Although Plaintiff argued that the putative collective action members' compensation did not include overtime, he failed to allege how that overtime was accrued and not compensated. Id. at *13. Furthermore, although Plaintiff stated that he was non-exempt, he did not argue or provide evidence that the putative collective action members were non-exempt. Id. Thus, the Court found that from Plaintiff's allegations and evidence, he failed to identify a "single decision, policy, or plan" that applied to the members of the putative collective action. Id. at *14. Regardless, the Court found that even if Plaintiff sufficiently demonstrated a "single decision, policy, or plan," Plaintiff failed to satisfy his burden of showing that conditional certification of the putative collective action was appropriate. First, the Court noted that Plaintiff failed to provide any evidence that anyone but Plaintiff worked unpaid overtime, as his declaration did not state that any other putative collective action member worked in excess of 40 hours per week and was not paid overtime as a result. Id. at *16. Moreover, Plaintiff's declaration does not discuss any putative collective action member who worked unpaid overtime at any of the dealerships owned by Defendant. Id. at *16. Second, Plaintiff failed to provide sufficient evidence that Plaintiff and members of the putative collective action members had similar job responsibilities and pay structures. Id. at *14-15. The Court reasoned that Plaintiff only provided job listings for a sub-set of the positions in the putative collective action. Id. at *22. Third, Plaintiff did not provide sufficient evidence that whatever decision, policy, or plan existed in this case extended to all of Defendant's dealerships. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate that he and putative collective action members were similarly-situated, and therefore the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Riveria, et al. v. Saul Chevrolet, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 182190 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 2, 2017). Plaintiff, a service counter salesperson, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendants failed to provide meal and rest breaks, and failed to provide minimum wages and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs had previously filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, and the Court denied the motion because Plaintiff: (i) failed to identify the "single decision, policy, or plan" that affected all of the putative collective action members; (ii) failed to provide any evidence that anyone but Plaintiff worked unpaid overtime; (iii) failed to provide sufficient evidence that Plaintiff and members of the putative collective action members had similar job responsibilities and pay structures; and (iv) failed to provide sufficient evidence that whatever decision, policy, or plan exists in this case extended to all Defendants and their dealerships. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiff sought certification of a collective action consisting of all non-managerial employees at any of Defendant's dealerships from October 11, 2013 to present who worked as parts salespeople, counter-people, associates, auto salespeople, or maintenance employees and who were paid a base amount, whether by salary or by draw, with the possibility of a commission payment. Id. at *5-6. The Court found that Plaintiff again failed to provide any evidence that anyone but Plaintiff worked unpaid overtime and that he did not provide sufficient evidence that whatever decision, policy, or plan existed in this case extended to all Defendants and their dealerships. Id. at *12. Plaintiff submitted a declaration stating that he worked 52 hours per week on average and that he was not paid overtime for the hours in excess of 40 hours in the week. Plaintiff's declaration also stated that he observed co-workers work more than 8 hours per day and more than 40 hours in a week and surmised that employees at Defendants' other nearby dealerships worked overtime based on the timing of phone calls and the things that employees told him over the phone. Id. at *13. The Court found that although the statements in Plaintiff's declaration constituted evidence that other workers employed by Defendants worked overtime hours, Plaintiff failed to provide any facts that demonstrated that these other workers were not paid overtime wages for their overtime hours. Id. at *14. The Court further determined that Plaintiff also failed to offer any evidence that the alleged policy of withholding overtime pay extended to all Defendants and their dealerships. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action. In addition, since the Court found that Plaintiff was unable to cure the deficiencies following the denial of Plaintiff's first motion for conditional certification, the Court denied the motion with prejudice.

Rodriguez, et al. v. Penske Logistics, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 152379 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 19, 2017). Plaintiff, a truck driver, brought a class action alleging that Defendant's "pay-by-the-mile" compensation policy violated various provisions of the California Labor Code. Id. at *1. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification, which the Court granted. Plaintiff's proposed class consisted of all California-based non-exempt truck driver employees who worked under a piece-rate or pay-by-the-mile compensation policy from September 5, 2010 through to the earlier of: (i) preliminary approval of the Court; or (ii) November 1, 2016. Id. at *2. At the outset, the Court noted that the case must be understood in the context of a change in state law. Plaintiff filed his action in light of state court decisions that held that a failure to pay employees for time spent performing tasks other than those paid on a piece-rate basis violated California law. The Governor then signed California Assembly Bill 1513 ("AB 1513"), which not only codified the law as articulated by California state courts, but also created an affirmative defense for employers. Id. at *4-5. The Court explained that an employer could avail itself of this affirmative defense if it paid employees either: (i) the amount it owes plus interest; or (ii) 4% of the W-2 reported wages of the worker from July 1, 2012 through December 31, 2015. Id. at *5. Because the affirmative defense affected many of Plaintiff's claims, and because the "safe harbor" period substantially overlapped with the putative class period, the adoption of AB 1513 significantly reduced the value of the claims. Id. However, as to class certification, the Court noted that Plaintiff estimated the class included 723 California drivers, which was sufficiently numerous so that joinder was impractical. Id. at *13-14. The Court found that Plaintiff and class counsel sufficiently pursued the action on behalf of the class, and it was persuaded they would adequately protect the interests of the class. Id. at *15-16. As to typicality and commonality, the Court was satisfied that assuming common questions existed, Plaintiff's claims were typical of the class as he and class members were allegedly employed in the same position at roughly the same time. Id. at *17. Further, Plaintiff and class members were allegedly subjected to the same policies regarding compensation, meal and rest periods, and reimbursement for expenses. Id. Furthermore, the Court held that Defendant's policies presented several questions common to the class that predominated over any individualized inquiry. Id. at *18. The Court was also satisfied that a class action was superior to any alternative means of vindicating the individual rights placed in issue by the complaint. Defendant calculated it would cost $775,272 to take advantage of the safe harbor provision for all California drivers, which meant the 723 putative class members would receive an average payment of just over $1,000 each. Id. at *21. The Court opined that this amount would be too small to incentivize individual litigation. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Plaintiff met the requirements of Rule 23(a) and Rule 23(b)(3), and granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Rodriguez, et al. v. RCO Reforesting,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93308 (E.D. Cal. June 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of temporary forestry workers employed pursuant to the H-2B visa program, brought an action asserting various wage & hour and employment law claims under the FLSA and California law. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of their FLSA claims, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant had a policy of not paying Plaintiffs for overtime work and not reimbursing Plaintiffs for their travel and visa costs, as required by the H-2B visa program. Plaintiffs sought to conditionally certify an FLSA collective action defined as "all non-exempt workers employed by Defendant at any time between May 5, 2014 through the present, either under the terms of an H-2B job order or who were engaged in corresponding employment." Id. at *3. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs submitted affidavits and copies of Defendant's H-2B applications for temporary employment for 2013 through 2016, which defined the scope of the H-2B visa workers' job duties. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs asserted that they were not paid overtime for the hours worked over eight in one day, were not paid more than 40 hours per week regardless of how many hours worked, and they were not reimbursed for their visa costs or travel costs from Mexico to the company office. The named Plaintiff Rodriguez additionally declared that he was not paid for time spent traveling from his lodging to the worksite and back to his lodging, which was upwards of three hours each way, further reducing his wages. Plaintiffs also asserted that they were aware that other employees were subjected to the same conditions. Id. at *5. The Court found that Plaintiffs' proposed collective action was overly broad because there were not "substantial allegations that the putative collective action members were subject to a single illegal policy, plan or decision." Id. at *6. The Court explained that the collective action must be limited to individuals who have FLSA claims. The Court noted that Plaintiffs did not allege that Defendant had a policy of never reimbursing travel costs and never paying overtime, yet Plaintiffs' proposed collective action included all H-2B workers and all workers in corresponding employment. Therefore, the Court determined that Plaintiffs proposed collective action would necessarily include workers who had no FLSA claim. Id. The Court held that, at the very least, Plaintiffs must narrow their proposed collective action to non-exempt workers employed by Defendant at any time between May 5, 2014 through the present, either under the terms of an H-2B job order or who were engaged in corresponding employment who either were not paid for overtime or were not reimbursed for their travel and visa costs such that they made less than minimum wage. Id. at *6-7. The Court stated that while Plaintiffs' allegations and affidavits may suffice to conditionally certify a narrower collective action, the allegations did not justify conditionally certifying a collective action composed of all non-exempt H-2B visa workers and those in corresponding employment, regardless of whether they were subjected to FLSA violations. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Salazar, et al. v. McDonald's Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9641 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant crew members at McDonald's franchisees, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants – both the franchisees and McDonald's Corp., the franchisor ("McDonald's") – failed to pay them wages for all hours worked and denied them overtime wages in violation of the California Labor Code. Previously, McDonald's moved for summary judgment on the ground that it did not jointly employ Plaintiffs. The Court granted the motion in part, but allowed Plaintiffs to proceed with their claims against McDonald's under an ostensible agency theory. Plaintiffs subsequently filed a motion for class certification and McDonald's filed a motion to deny class certification and to strike Plaintiffs' representative claims under the Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). The Court granted McDonald's motions and denied Plaintiffs' motion. The Court stated that as a threshold matter, Plaintiffs must show that their claims under the theory of ostensible agency were amenable to class-wide treatment. McDonald's argued that Plaintiffs could not satisfy Rule 23's commonality or predominance requirements. The Court observed that applicable case law authorities describe three requirements necessary before recovery could be had against a principal for the act of an ostensible agent, including: (i) the person dealing with the agent must do so with belief in the agent's authority and this belief must be a reasonable one; (ii) the belief must be generated by some act or neglect of the principal sought to be charged; and (iii) the third person relying the agent's authority must not be guilty of negligence." Id. at *9. As to whether Plaintiffs had actual belief that the franchise was an agent to McDonald's, the Court found that the record showed that crew members did not all receive the same orientation materials, see the same job training videos, or attend the same orientation sessions. Id. at *11. Further, testimony of crew members demonstrated that some class members understood that McDonald's did not employ them, and some did not. Id. Thus, the Court opined that these differences precluded an inference of common belief among class members. As to the second factor of a reasonable, non-negligent belief, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to show how reasonable belief can be established on a class-wide basis, because that belief depended upon information known or available to each individual party. Id. at *13. As to the reliance factor, the Court determined that whether each class member knew, or should have known his or her employer, was necessarily an individual inquiry, and therefore could be established through common questions. Id. at *17. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs could not establish commonality because individual inquiries would be required to establish liability under the theory of ostensible agency and thereby denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. The Court also denied certification under Rule 23(b) because Plaintiffs failed to describe the injunctive relief sought. Id. at 13. Finally, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for certification of their proposed PAGA class because the class was unmanageable. The Court reasoned that although Plaintiffs asserted claims on behalf of hourly, non-exempt, non-managerial workers, they offered no easy way to identify those who actually might be aggrieved under the ostensible agency theory. Id. at *22. The Court opined that the proposed class contained over 1,200 putative class members, all of whom received different orientation, training, hiring documents, and had different understandings of the franchise relationship. Id. The Court thus ruled that Plaintiffs' PAGA claims were unmanageable and it struck the representative claims. Accordingly, the Court granted McDonald's motions and denied Plaintiffs' motion.

Saleh, et al. v. Valbin Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 182184 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 2, 2017). Plaintiff, a former non-exempt role player at a military training facility, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Defendant provided simulation training in fabricated Middle Eastern villages, other terrains, and simulated battlefields featuring native role players. Id. at *2. During rotations lasting between three and 19 days, the role players inhabited the villages and other terrain. Id. Plaintiff alleged that during a rotation, role players were required to be in character 24 hours per day and were not allowed to leave the base for any reason. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. In support of his motion for conditional certification, Plaintiff submitted his own declaration, as well as the declarations of two opt-in Plaintiffs and a copy of a PowerPoint slide deck that Defendant used as part of an employee orientation. Id. at *9. The declarations stated that Defendant's general policies and procedures applied to all role players, that that they were required to remain in character at all times during a training rotation; that they were required to sleep in the fabricated villages, military tents, or similar accommodates with no running water or electricity; they were compensated a maximum of 13 hours per day; they were not paid for all of their overtime hours worked while on rotation; and they were not allowed to leave for any reason. Id. at *10. Defendant argued that Plaintiff failed to meet his burden to show that he was similarly-situated to the other collective action members he sought to represent because role players were divided into two types with three different job descriptions. The Court disagreed, and found that Plaintiff met his burden under the fairly lenient first stage standard. The Court determined that the detailed allegations in the declarations went beyond "boilerplate and legal conclusions without support" that Defendant did not pay overtime and provided a "reasonable basis" for concluding that Defendant's alleged policies applied to all role players. Id. at *16. The Court stated that the mere fact that there were different types of role players did not defeat conditional certification. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Sanchez, et al. v. Capital Contractors, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87585 (N.D. Cal. June 7, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the California Labor Code by improperly classifying them as independent contractors instead of employees, and thereby failed to provide overtime compensation and rest periods. Defendant provided cleaning services to major industrial clients throughout California. Plaintiffs alleged that each of them entered into an independent contractor agreement ("ICA"), under which each agreed to provide certain services to Defendant, including janitorial work. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23, and the Court denied the motion. Plaintiffs sought certification under Rule 23(b)(2) and Rule 23(b)(3). First, as to Rule 23(b)(2), the Court found that Plaintiffs sought a judicial declaration that ICs were employees of Defendant, and corresponding injunctive relief, as well as a judicial order directing Defendant to cease its unlawful practice of classifying ICs as independent contractors and failing to provide the protections afforded to employees under the California Labor Code. Id. at *5-6. The Court noted that a Plaintiff seeking to certify a class under Rule 23(b)(2) must have standing to seek the declaratory and/or injunctive relief sought on behalf of the class. To do so, a Plaintiff "must demonstrate that he is realistically threatened by a repetition of the violation." Id. at *6. The Court stated that Plaintiffs were former employees, and Plaintiffs pointed to no other evidence that they were "realistically threatened" by Defendant's classification decisions and alleged violations of the California Labor Code. Id. The Court found that therefore Plaintiffs had failed to show that any of them had any likelihood of being injured in the future by Defendant's practices. Id. at *7. Therefore, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to show certification under Rule 23(b)(2) was proper. As to Rule 23(b)(3), the Court noted that it provides for certification of a class where "the Court finds that the questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action is superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating the controversy." Id. Plaintiffs sought to establish that the members of the proposed class should have been classified as "employees" of Defendant, and thus Defendant wrongfully failed to provide them with statutory benefits to which employees are entitled under California law, such as overtime pay, meal/rest breaks, reimbursement for necessary expenses, and timely payment of wages upon termination of employment. Id. at *7. The Court stated that even assuming that employment status could be determined on a class-wide basis, Plaintiffs had not shown their claims alleging Defendant's failures to provide overtime pay, meal breaks, and rest breaks were appropriate for determination on a class-wide basis. The Court held that Plaintiffs failed to cite any evidence that could support a finding that Defendant had any uniform policy or practice that had the effect of requiring ICs to work more than eight hours a day or more than 40 hours in a week, thereby entitling them to overtime pay. The Court further determined that Plaintiffs failed to submit any evidence that Defendant had any uniform policy or practice that had the effect of requiring ICs to work for more than five hours a day, thereby entitling them to a meal break, or the effect of requiring them to work for Defendant at least three and a half hours per day, thereby entitling them to a rest break. Id. at *16. In the absence of any such evidence, the Court held that a trier of fact would be required to consider testimony from each class member in order to determine whether he or she worked for Defendant more than eight hours in a day and whether a class member worked for Capital the requisite number of hours to entitle him or her to meal and rest breaks. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Schroeder, et al. v. Envoy Air*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 145335 (C.D. Cal. Aug. 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of airline employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the California Labor Law. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification of several sub-classes pursuant to Rule 23. The Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' motion. Plaintiffs sought to represent several classes and sub-classes of similarly-situated employees, including: (i) a sick leave class; (ii) an overtime sub-class; (iii) a meal and rest break sub-class; (iv) a wage statement sub-class; a living wage ordinance sub-class; and (v) a former employer sub-class. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiffs submitted declarations and exhibits in support of their contention that Defendant had policies common to the class or sub-class as to each of the issues. Id. at *5. As to the sick leave class, Defendant introduced a policy allowing employees to trade shifts and days off (a "shift swap") under certain circumstances. Id. at *9. Defendant's shift swap policy stated that if an employee calls in sick twice within a one year period, the employee's shift swap privileges will be suspended for 30 days, unless a doctor's note is provided. Id. at *10. Plaintiff argued that the policy treated paid sick leave as an absence in violation of § 234 of the Labor Code, and thus was a per se violation of § 233. Plaintiff argued that whether Defendant's shift swap policy was a per se violation of § 233 was a question common to the class, and which predominated over individualized questions for purposes of resolving the claim on a class-wide basis. Id. at *11. The Court concluded that the commonality and predominance requirements were met, and granted certification to the sick leave class. Plaintiffs contended that the overtime sub-class also presented common questions of liability, which predominated over individualized issues because Plaintiffs challenged two policies that were "facially apparent from the wage statements and readily accessible from electronic databases of information." Id. at *13. Plaintiffs contended that Defendant improperly failed to add in applicable bonus payments when calculating employees' overtime rates. Id. at *14. Plaintiffs also contended that Defendant improperly failed to pay employees overtime wages for attending training or company meetings that extended their working day past eight hours, or their workweek past 40 hours. The Court found that whether bonuses should have been included in class members' regular rate of pay was likely to produce common answers across easily identifiable cross sections of the class, and individual issues as to any given class member were unlikely to affect the analysis. Id. at *17-18. However, with respect to attending training and meetings, the Court held that some of the meetings were voluntarily and some were federally mandated, and figuring out which was which would result in individualized liability issues overwhelming any common issues. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court granted the motion in part as to the overtime sub-class. Id. As to the meal and rest break sub-class, Plaintiffs contended that Defendant implemented three policies that violated the Labor Code, including: (i) a policy requiring employees to be "alert" and on-call even during meals and rest breaks; (ii) a policy of denying employees rest breaks until after the first four hours worked; and (iii) a policy of denying employees a third meal break for shifts of 16 hours or longer. The Court concluded that only the third policy was amenable to class treatment. However it determined that Defendant's policy authorized rest breaks every four hours, as required by the Labor Code. Accordingly, the Court denied the motion as to the wage payment sub-class. As to the living wage ordinance sub-class, the Court stated that individualized issues would overwhelm any common issue as to whether the previous payments adequately compensated Plaintiffs. Id. at *33. The Court found that it would need to determine whether each member of the sub-class received all of the compensation to which he or she was entitled under the ordinance. Further, the amount to which each employee was entitled depended on whether the employee received health benefits, and the value of those benefits, which were part of the wage calculation. Id. Finally, the Court determined that the former employee sub-class was derivative of the overtime, meal and rest break, and living wage ordinance sub-classes. Id. at *34. The Court therefore granted certification to the extent that sub-class members were also members of the bonus overtime sub-class and meal and rest break sub-classes; and denied certification to the extent that sub-class members were only members of the training and meetings overtime or living wage ordinance sub-class. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Snipes, et al. v. Dollar Tree Distribution*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 195460 (E.D. Cal. Nov. 27, 2017). Plaintiff, an employee, filed an action alleging that Defendant's uniform time-keeping practices wrongfully excluded compensable time and operated to deprive employees of their legally guaranteed uninterrupted rest and/or meal periods in violation of the California Labor Code. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23, which the Court granted. Plaintiff asserted that non-exempt employees, who were paid in 15-minute increments, could not clock-in more than seven minutes in advance of their scheduled shift, or more than seven minutes after their shifts ended, which resulted in under-payment to employees since they never monetarily benefited from Defendant's automatic practice of rounding to the nearest 15-minute intervals. Plaintiff further alleged that by forcing multiple employees to clock-in and clock-out at a limited number of terminals, rest and meal breaks were compromised as a result of long lines. Id. at *3. Plaintiff also claimed that Defendant's wage statements were inaccurate because they failed to include non-discretionary bonuses when calculating an employee's regular rate of pay. Id. at *4. Plaintiff sought to certify numerous classes and sub-classes. The Court determined that Plaintiff easily established numerosity with 783 potential class members. Id. at *6. The Court also held that Plaintiff's allegations involved questions of law or fact common to the purported classes. Further, given the fact that Plaintiff's claims were predicated on allegedly uniform policies and practices that applied equally to all proposed class members, the Court opined that Plaintiff's claims and injuries were typical of those suffered by the purported classes. Id. at *7. As to adequacy, Plaintiff claimed to seek vindication not only for himself, but also for his fellow employees, and Plaintiff stated that he was ready, willing, and able to accept his role as class representative and would dutifully represent the interests of the class. Id. at *9. The Court accordingly found Plaintiff to be an adequate class representative. The Court stated that Plaintiff's counsel were seasoned litigators with significant experience in wage & hour disputes and class actions, and therefore also met the adequacy of representation requirement. Id. at *10. The Court further found that Plaintiff met the requirements of Rule 23(b). The Court reasoned that if Defendant's wage & hour practices were determined to be unlawful through any of the theories espoused by Plaintiff, the same rationale as to that unlawfulness would apply to each potential class member. Id. at *12. Because this outcome was amenable to determination on a class-wide basis without any particular individualized inquiry, the Court found that common questions predominated. Id. Finally, the Court held that relative to the cost of litigation each proposed member's individual claim was relatively small and therefore adjudication by a class action was the superior method to handle the issues. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff met all requirements necessary for class certification pursuant to Rule 23, and it therefore granted Plaintiff's motion.

Soares, et al. v. Flowers Foods, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 100418 (N.D. Cal. June 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of delivery distributors, brought a class and collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification and the Court denied the motion on the basis that Plaintiff failed to meet the predominance and superiority requirements of Rule 23(b). Defendant's distributors purchased the exclusive right to sell Defendant's products in given geographic territories and are responsible for delivering, displaying, and selling the products in their areas. Id. at *4. The Court found that the nature of the businesses – namely the differences in their operations – would require individual inquiries and therefore common questions did not predominate for purposes of Rule 23(b)(3). While the Court noted that the class was limited to distributors who "personally serviced" their routes, the determination of which distributors did so, and when, was not able to be answered in one fell swoop, since some of the distributors were "absentee" territory owners who never personally serviced their own routes; others always performed their own routes and did not hire helpers, and others hired helpers or employees who performed the routes only some of the time. Id. at *46. The Court found that neither party had records disclosing which distributors "personally serviced" their routes and which did not, let alone when they did so or for how many days or hours. Id. Further, some distributors provided delivery services to other companies currently performing distribution services for Defendant and others drove exclusively for Defendant. Id. at *47. As a result, the Court found trying the case as a class action presented manageability issues given the individual inquiries necessary to establish Defendants' liability for each of the putative class members. For example, the Court would need to hold mini-trials to determine which drivers "personally serviced" their routes, when, and for how many hours and whether they did deliveries for other companies in order to analyze whether a particular driver was engaged in a business distinct from other class members or even whether the Distributor qualified as a class member. Id. at *55-56. The Court opined that there would also need to be individualized inquiries into how to treat distributors who may have owned more than one territory. Because class members have an interest in individually controlling separate actions, as evidenced by the many individual Distributors who have filed their own actions, and trying these claims as a class action created manageability issues, the Court concluded that class-wide resolution was not the superior method of adjudicating Plaintiffs' claims.

Stiller, et al. v. Costco Wholesale Corp.*, 673 Fed. Appx. 783 (9th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of hourly employees, brought a collective action and class action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and California wage & hour laws through the implementation of closing procedures that resulted in unpaid off-the-clock ("OTC") time. Plaintiffs alleged that they and other hourly non-exempt employees were regularly forced against their will to remain locked inside of Defendant's warehouses after clocking-out at the end of their closing shifts during which Defendant's supervisors and managers performed closing activities, such as removing jewelry from cases and emptying cash registers. Id. at 784. The District Court certified Plaintiffs' class claims under Rule 23, and conditionally certified their FLSA claims under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Subsequently, Defendant moved to decertify the collective action and the class action. The District Court found that Plaintiffs failed to show that issues common to the class predominated over individual issues, and it granted Defendant's motion. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Plaintiffs contended that the District Court erred in granting decertification because it required that common questions resolve the liability for every class member. Id. The Ninth Circuit disagreed and opined that the District Court did not impose a "100%" predominance requirement. Id. The Ninth Circuit reasoned that the District Court correctly looked to the three elements of an "off-the-clock claim" under California law. The Ninth Circuit found that Defendant put forward sufficient evidence to show that the individual policies comprising the policy at issue were not implemented and applied uniformly as to all potential class members. The Ninth Circuit held that the District Court properly determined that proving that class members actually performed unpaid work – as required to establish liability – would require class members to present evidence that varied from class member to class member. Id. at 784-85. As such, the Ninth Circuit found that whether class members actually performed unpaid work was not a common question capable of class-wide resolution. The Ninth Circuit therefore concluded that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in ruling that individualized issues would predominate over common issues. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling granting Defendant's motion for decertification.

Thomas, et al. v. Kellogg Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171734 (W.D. Wash. Oct. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them and others similarly-situated and thereby failed to pay all wages in violation of the FLSA. The Court had previously conditionally certified a collective action. Defendant argued that given the recent decision in Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. v. Superior Court of California, 137 S. Ct. 1773 (2017) the Court did not have specific personal jurisdiction over the out-of-state Plaintiffs' claims against it, as it was an out-of-state Defendant. Id. at *2. Defendant sought dismissal of the claims of 821 of the 858 Plaintiffs who had opted-in to the case. Defendant stated that a group of employees had filed a second, similar case in Nevada – Smith v. Kellogg, Case No. 17-CV-1914 (D. Nev.) – seeking similar damages for similar violations in a different, later time period. Id. at *3. Defendant thereby sought decertification of the collective action on the basis that a second collective action was pending in another jurisdiction. Id. Defendant further argued that the collective action should be decertified because Plaintiffs had no expert testimony supporting their claim that their evidence was representative. Plaintiffs argued that Defendant waived its objection to personal jurisdiction by failing to assert such a defense, vigorously litigating for four and a half years, and moving for dismissal only a month before trial. Id. Plaintiffs asserted that Bristol Myers involved only the "straightforward application" of "settled principles" of specific personal jurisdiction, and that it did not purport to be the "game changing," "transformative" opinion that Defendant argued. Id. at *4. The Court agreed with Plaintiffs. Further, the Court stated that Bristol Myers concerned only the "due process limits on the exercise of specific jurisdiction by a state." Id. Therefore the Court found that it was not even clear that Bristol Myers applied. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss the out-of-state opt-ins' claims. The Court also denied Defendant's motion for decertification based on Smith. Finally, the Court stated that Defendant's effort to decertify the collective action based on Plaintiffs' lack of expert testimony relied primarily on the representation of Plaintiffs' attorney that they would identify an expert. Id. at *5. However, the Court found that none of the cases Defendant cited supported the claim that an expert is necessarily required, and further, that it was unclear what evidence Defendant claimed could not be introduced without an expert opinion. Id. Further, the Court noted that Plaintiffs cited numerous cases holding that expert testimony was not necessarily required, so long as Plaintiffs were similarly-situated. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to decertify the collective action based on Plaintiffs' lack of expert testimony.

Torres, et al. v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 60119 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former home mortgage consultants ("HMCs"), brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated several provisions of the California Labor Code by making unlawful deductions from wages, denying overtime wages, and denying meal and rest periods. All HMCs were covered by the home mortgage incentive compensation plan for HMCs (the "compensation plan"). Id. at *2. Pursuant to the compensation plan, HMCs received compensation in the form of: (i) hourly pay (advances on commissions); (ii) commissions, bonuses, and other incentives earned per the plan's terms in excess of advances; and (iii) overtime premiums. Defendant previously moved for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' first, second, fifth, and sixth causes of action. The Court granted the motion and dismissed Plaintiffs' claims that Defendant improperly deducted uncollected fees. Additionally, because Plaintiffs' second (failure to pay overtime), fifth (failure to pay wages at termination or discharge), and sixth (unfair competition) causes of action were derivative of the first cause of action, the Court also granted summary judgment on those claims. Plaintiff subsequently sought to certify a narrower class of "[a]ll California home mortgage consultants who worked for Defendant Wells Fargo who received a meal period premium during the time period when incentive pay was earned from September 15, 2011 to the present." Id. at *3-4. The proposed class was based on Plaintiff's alleged theory that Defendant had a policy and practice of paying missed meal premiums at class members' base rate of pay instead of the regular rate of pay as required under California law. Id. at *3. Since September of 2007, Defendant employed an "automatic California meal/rest period premium pay" procedure under which employees who self-reported that they did not take a compliant meal period automatically received a meal period premium in their next paycheck. Id. Beginning in approximately May of 2012, Defendant paid the meal premiums in any instance when an HMC self-reported that he or she did not take a compliant meal break, regardless of the validity of the claim or the reason for not having an opportunity to take a meal break. Id. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff's theory of liability was not amenable to class treatment because it failed to satisfy the commonality requirement under Rule 23(a) and the predominance requirement under Rule 23(b)(3). Id. at *5. In her motion, Plaintiff identified a single common question of whether Defendant's policy and practice concerning the rate of pay used for missed meal premiums was consistent with the California Labor Code. Defendant argued that the question could not drive the resolution of the action on a class-wide basis because it went only to the measure of damages, and therefore there was no commonality that would allow the Court to determine liability in a single stroke. Id. at *6-7. The Court agreed, and found that in seeking to certify a class based on the alleged under-payment of wage premiums under § 226.7, Plaintiff failed to identify a common question of liability that was "apt to drive the resolution of the litigation." Id. at *7. The Court stated that seeking to be part of a § 226.7 class would necessarily require an individualized inquiry into the underlying question of Defendant's liability as to every class member. Id. at *8. Moreover, the Court held that the necessity of an individualized inquiry into Defendant's failure to provide meal breaks also undermined the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3). Id. at *11. The Court determined that each class member's recovery would depend on factual questions particular to that individual's failure to take a meal period and the reasons for that failure. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Plaintiff did not demonstrate that her theory of recovery involved predominantly common issues that could be adjudicated on a class-wide basis. Id. at *14. Because the Court found that Plaintiff did not meet Rule 23's commonality requirement or that common questions predominated, the Court did not address the Rule 23's remaining requirements. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Wagner, et al. v. County Of Inyo,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 192913 (E.D. Cal. Nov. 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Id. at *1. The parties filed a stipulation agreeing to conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant failed to pay overtime over a three year period because Defendant did not include compensation in lieu of healthcare coverage in the regular rate of pay used to calculate the overtime. Id. The Court examined the pleadings and the record to determine whether to grant the motion for conditional certification. It found that under the lenient first stage of conditional certification, Plaintiffs only need to show that the putative collective action members were together the victims of a single decision, policy, or plan. The Court held that conditional certification of the claims of the collective action members was appropriate because they were the result of a single policy. Id. at *3. The Court explained that notice would apprise potential collective action members of the nature of the claims alleged, the steps they must take to be included in the action, and the consequences of joining. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted conditional certification of the collective action.

Wallace, et al. v. City Of San Jose*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 200190 (S.D. Cal. Dec. 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of firefighters, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant failed to properly pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. The Court had previously granted conditional certification of Plaintiffs' FLSA collective action. Defendant subsequently moved to decertify the collective action, and the Court granted the motion. Plaintiffs' collective action consisted of all current and former employees: (i) employed as a fire recruit, firefighter, fire engineer, fire captain, fire prevention inspector, arson investigator, or battalion chief at any time on or after March 11, 2013 (for willful FLSA violations) or March 11, 2014 (generally); and (ii) who had opted-in or will opt-in on or before April 25, 2017. Id. at *2-3. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden of establishing that the collective action members were similarly-situated under the FLSA. The Court stated that there was no dispute that Plaintiffs had different job titles and duties and worked different types of shifts. Plaintiffs did not dispute these differences, but contended that everyone was similarly-situated because they were "firefighter employees" who worked within the City; reported to the same fire chief; were subject to the same rules, regulations, and operating procedures; were compensated according to the same pay scales; and were subject to being called back to work overtime hours and might also incur FLSA overtime. Id. at *7-8. Plaintiffs argued that any differences were outweighed by these commonalities. Plaintiffs further contended that any variations in shift assignments were already accounted for in the City's payroll system and were simply a matter of calculating individual damages, which was not a basis for decertification. Id. at *9. The Court found that Plaintiffs presented no consistent evidence as to a uniform policy that would result in systematic FLSA violations across the membership of the collective action. Id. at *14. The Court further reasoned that resolution of liability and damages issues would essentially require individualized inquiries as to each opt-in to determine whether they have actually been injured in the way Plaintiffs claimed. The Court also stated that it would need to consider each employee's set of different background facts based on work activities in any given pay period. Thus, the Court concluded that representative testimony would not accurately capture the situation of each individual Plaintiff. Id. at *20. In view of the varied job duties, shifts, and employment settings of Plaintiffs and the collective members, as well as the lack of any evidence that any of the opt-ins actually were under-paid pursuant to Plaintiffs' theory, the Court granted Defendant's motion for decertification.

Zayers, et al. v. Kiewit Infrastructure West Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 183001 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 26, 2017). Plaintiff, a field laborer, filed a class action alleging that Defendant failed to provide or pay for second meal and third rest breaks and off-the-clock work, and that his wage statements were inaccurate in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification, which the Court denied. Plaintiff sought certification of: (i) a class of all current and former non-exempt employees employed by Defendant in the field in the State of California at any time from May 18, 2012 through the date of the certification; and (ii) a waiting time sub-class consisting of all class members who had separated their employment from Defendant from May 18, 2013 through the date of certification. Id. at *2-3. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's theory of liability was not amenable to class-wide treatment because it failed to satisfy the commonality, numerosity, typicality, and adequacy requirements under Rule 23(a), and the predominance requirement under Rule 23(b)(3). Id. at *5-6. Plaintiff argued that there were common questions of law and fact regarding whether Defendant's meal period and rest break policies, off-the-clock policies, and wage statements violated the California Labor Code. As to the meal period claims, Plaintiff argued that Defendant's official second meal period policy was compliant with the law, but in practice a second meal period was not provided to employees. Plaintiff further alleged the "common proof" of Defendant's pay stubs and time records would establish Defendants engaged in such a practice as to all class members. Id. at *6. However, the Court found that Plaintiff's timesheets showed he always received premium payments for late meal breaks, and in his deposition he could not identify a single occasion when he or anyone else missed a meal break altogether or was not given the opportunity to take one. Id. at *8. The Court therefore concluded that whether Defendant failed to give its employees the opportunity to take a second meal break necessarily required an individualized inquiry as to every class member as to whether they took second meal breaks, whether they were denied the opportunity to take them, or whether and why they waived them. Id. at *9. Plaintiff also claimed that Defendant failed to authorize a third rest break when employees worked shifts longer than 10 hours and failed to pay rest period premiums when a third rest break was not permitted. Again, the Court reasoned that even if Plaintiff could prove that a rest break violation did occur as to each and every employee, the question of why the employees did not take a third rest break was an individualized one, and Plaintiff failed to show how that question could be resolved on a class-wide basis. Id. at *12. Plaintiff also argued that Defendant failed to pay for off-the-clock work and stated that foremen only recorded scheduled work time even if the crew started working before their shifts. Id. at *14. However, the Court held that Plaintiff failed to provide evidence that this practice occurred on a class-wide basis and did not even offer evidence that it happened to him. Id. Finally, the Court found that conflicting evidence on Plaintiff's own crew and job-site demonstrated that proving Plaintiff's claims would require an individual assessment of each employee's work habits, timesheets, and pay stubs. Id. at *15. The Court thus concluded that Plaintiff failed to meet the commonality requirement of Rule 23(a). Moreover, the Court opined that the necessity of an individualized inquiry into Defendant's alleged California Labor Code violations also undermined the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3). Id. at *16. Because the Court determined that Plaintiff had not met Rule 23(a)'s commonality requirement or shown that common questions predominate as required by Rule 23(b)(3), the Court declined to address the Rule's remaining requirements. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

(x) Tenth Circuit

Aguila, et al. v. Management & Training Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 122429 (D.N.Mex. Aug. 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of detention officers, alleged that Defendant failed to pay for some of their hours worked on assignment for a prison in violation of the FLSA and the New Mexico Minimum Wage Act ("NMMWA"). Plaintiffs contended they were: (i) required to spend time on-duty inside the prison, without pay, before and/or after their shift, gathering and securing equipment, and passing through prison security areas; and (ii) that Defendant's use of the "rounding" method of time-keeping allegedly caused under-payment in calculating wages. Id. at *7. According to Plaintiffs, of the 170 total detention officers employed at the prison, 10% rotated on and off transport duty. Plaintiffs sought to designate detention officers who were named Plaintiffs or who have opted-in and were assigned to the transport duty post as a sub-group asserting a sub-claim per 29 U.S.C. § 216 (b). The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion. First, the Court noted that it previously denied Plaintiffs' motion to amend the complaint to include missed meal break claims. Id. at *4. The Court concluded that the motion was both untimely, and that amendment would be futile, thus precluding any claim for missed meal breaks. The Court determined that there was no sense in allowing a sub-group for Plaintiffs asserting a claim that did not exist in the lawsuit. Second, the Court noted that even if such a claim had been initially asserted, the Court failed to see how designating a sub-group would allow it to manage the case more efficiently. The Court stated that the issues were not complex, and the differences were too minor to warrant a separate sub-group. Id. at *5. Third, the Court found that creation of a new sub-group would involve further discovery, as discovery would have to be undertaken regarding Defendant's defenses for each individual in the sub-group. The Court had already denied Plaintiffs' motion to amend on other grounds, but the need for further discovery after the deadline had passed also militated against adding a sub-group. Finally, the Court stated that the small size of the sub-group diminished even further any point in designating one, as the group would encompass only nine possible employees. The Court concluded that any factual differences between the claims of those who worked transport duty and missed a meal break and those who remained on shift assignment as detention officers could be resolved by individual handling of damages after liability was established. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a sub-group.

Beltran, et al. v. Interexchange, Inc.*, Case No. 14-CV-3074 (D. Colo. Mar. 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of au pairs, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants conspired to set weekly wages for au pairs below minimum wage in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of their FLSA claims, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants determined that au pairs would be paid $195.75 per week for up to 45 hours of work, or approximately $4.35 per hour. Id. at 3. Plaintiffs further alleged that they routinely worked in excess of 40 hours per week without receiving overtime compensation, they paid fees to Defendants before being permitted to work, Defendants deducted room and board from their wages, and they were required to participate in mandatory training without compensation. Id. Plaintiffs sought certification of 11 collective actions. Id. at 4-5. Defendants asserted several arguments, most of which the Court determined went beyond the lenient burden required for first-stage conditional certification. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs adequately alleged that they were subject to a single decision, policy, or plan that Plaintiffs and others were similarly-situated. Plaintiffs also submitted declarations relating their own experiences securing employment as au pairs and a number of representations made by Defendants concerning compensation policies. Id. at 9. The Court found that the declarations reiterated the allegations in the complaint and referenced the uniformity of the compensation policies, which further established that other au pairs employed by Defendants were similarly-situated. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiffs met their burden to warrant conditional certification, and granted Plaintiffs' motion pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b).

Cavallo, et al. v. Bull Rogers, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 115630 (D.N.Mex. July 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of casting employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Defendant employed non-exempt workers ("NEEs") to provide casting services to Defendant's customers, but failed to track or count hours worked by casting employees ("CEs") when these employees were paid on a quantity of work/piece-rate basis and as a result, under-reported the overtime hours worked by CEs. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs submitted declarations of the named Plaintiff Calvillo and Raytonio Moore. Both stated that Plaintiffs were subjected to the same illegal policies as other NEEs, that other casting employees worked under the same overtime conditions where their hours were either not tracked or miscounted, and that they did not receive pay for the overtime worked. Id. at *9-10. As a result, Plaintiffs alleged that these non-exempt employees were not paid for all overtime hours when paid quantity-based pay and/or they did not receive pay at the legally required rate. Id. at *10. Defendant contended that Plaintiffs' assertion that they were not compensated conflicted with Defendant's practice that casting employees were required to report all hours worked and were paid for all hours worked. Defendant also argued that conditional certification was not appropriate because Plaintiffs failed to offer evidence – other than conclusory allegations – that their alleged experience of not being paid for off-the-clock activities was shared by other employees. Id. at *10-11. However, the Court found that Defendant's contentions went more to the merits of the case rather than to conditional certification, which at the initial stage requires no actual evidence to be presented, but only "substantial allegations" that the putative collective action members were together "victims of a single decision, policy or plan." Id. at *11. Defendant further asserted that Plaintiffs had no knowledge of Defendant's pay practices regarding fellow casting employees during the bulk of the limitations period because they worked for Defendant over two years ago. Id. The Court held that this issue would be taken up in the second stage of the analysis which uses a stricter standard to determine whether Plaintiffs were similarly-situated and would include a review of the disparate factual and employment settings of the individual Plaintiffs. Finally, Defendant argued that conditional certification should be denied because evidentiary hearings for each collective member would be necessary to determine damages. Id. at *11-12. The Court stated that individualized damages had no bearing at the conditional certification stage. The Court reasoned that the "similarly-situated" inquiry under immediate consideration required only a colorable basis showing the putative collective action members were victims of a single decision, policy or plan, and the Court found that Plaintiff satisfied that lenient test. Id. at *12. The Court determined that the putative Plaintiffs worked for the same employer, performed largely similar duties, and their allegations of FLSA violations were derived from the same alleged practices of either not paying for overtime hours worked or miscalculating those hours. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Kuri, et al. v. Addictive Behavioral Change Health Group, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 187005 (D. Kan. Nov. 13, 2017). Plaintiff, an hourly nurse, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff sought to represent a collective action composed of nurses employed on an hourly basis, who worked for Defendant from October 5, 2013 to the present and who alleged they were not paid for all straight time and overtime premiums of all hours worked in excess of 40 hours per workweek. Id. at *3-4. Although Plaintiff did not submit declarations or supporting affidavits with her motion, Defendant did not dispute that her allegations satisfied the low threshold for an order conditionally certifying Plaintiff's claims as a collective action under the FLSA. Id. at *6. Furthermore, the Court found that Plaintiff met the low threshold of providing substantial allegations that she and the putative collective action members were together the victims of a single policy, sufficient to warrant conditional certification. Id. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant engaged in the policy and practice willfully, thereby invoking a three-year statute of limitations. Id. at *7. Therefore, with regard to putative Plaintiffs who would receive notice of the action, the Court applied a three-year statute of limitations period to the putative collective action members. Id. Under the FLSA, the statute of limitations for each Plaintiff runs until the date he or she files a written consent to join the action, unless the limitations period is equitably tolled, and the Court therefore limited the collective action definition to "November 9, 2014 to the present." Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Landry, et al. v. Swire Oilfield Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66497 (D.N.Mex. May 2, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of oilfield laborers, brought a putative collective action pursuant to the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA") alleging wage & hour violations. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs moved to conditionally certify a collective action with respect to two groups consisting of: (i) a salaried group of manual laborers who worked without overtime; and (ii) a fluctuating workweek group of manual laborers who were not paid minimum wage. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant misclassified most Plaintiffs in the salaried group as exempt and this was illegal because the FLSA did not provide an overtime exemption for low-level field employees. Id. at *18. Plaintiffs also asserted that while Defendant paid hourly workers overtime under the fluctuating workweek method, it failed to satisfy the FLSA's requirements, as there was no clear mutual understanding between Defendant and Plaintiffs concerning the fluctuating workweek method and at times the wages paid were below minimum wage. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to conditionally certify the collective action. Defendant objected and argued that the proposed salary group and fluctuating workweek group were not similarly-situated, because Plaintiffs had different job positions and failed to identify a single decision, policy, or plan to violate the collective action members' FLSA rights. Id. at *33. The Court determined that the proposed salary group and fluctuating workweek group were similarly-situated because Plaintiffs made substantial allegations that: (i) the proposed group included employees with similar positions; and (ii) Defendant had a single decision, policy, or plan to not pay the salaried group overtime and to not pay the fluctuating workweek group's minimum wage. Id. at *97, 105. The Court rejected Defendant's assertion that conditional certification was precluded because the putative collective action members' specific job duties differed. Id. at *94. The Court reasoned that at the notice stage, Plaintiffs need only show that their positions were similar, not identical, to the positions held by the putative collective action members. Id. at *95. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that it did not have a single decision, policy, or plan to violate the FLSA rights of the salaried group because some manual laborers were not paid on salary. The Court reasoned that the different pay provisions were immaterial and because Plaintiff alleged that Defendant made a company-wide decision to classify nearly all operators as exempt from the FLSA's overtime requirements, and paid them on a flat salary basis or on a salary basis with a day rate payment, Plaintiffs were similarly-situated. Id. at *98. As to the fluctuating workweek group, Defendant argued that it began transitioning hourly workers to the fluctuating workweek after it had made the other alleged decision, policy, or plan to improperly classify certain positions as exempt. Defendant argued that these various decisions did not amount to a single decision, policy, or plan. Id. at *101. The Court rejected this argument, as Plaintiffs defined two groups that corresponded to each compensation plan and Defendant's argument assumed the existence of only one group. Id. at *102. Finally, Defendant argued that the proposed collective action members were not similarly-situated because certain collective action members had already settled their claims with Defendant. Id. at *106. The Court rejected this argument as a basis for defeating conditional certification, even though employees who had already settled could not recover. Id. at *107. Defendant also requested that the Court limit the scope of the collective action to employees in New Mexico, Texas, Oklahoma, and North Dakota, because Plaintiffs' only declarations were from employees in those states. The Court rejected this argument and ruled that there was a reasonable basis to conclude that the compensation systems applied nationwide, as the declarations were from employees from multiple locations. Id. at *111. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to conditionally certify the collective action. Id. at *125.

McFeeters, et al. v. Brand Plumbing*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19542 (D. Kan. Feb. 10, 2017). Plaintiff, a plumber, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay him and others similarly-situated overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff submitted a sworn declaration in which he stated that Defendant compensated plumbers on an hourly basis. Plaintiff further stated that plumbers frequently worked more than 40 hours a week. Plaintiff contended that Defendant's policy provided that plumbers could not take work trucks home and thus plumbers had to report to Defendant's central business location to pick up and return the truck each day. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant did not pay for the time it took to drive back from the last job of the day to the central location. In addition, Plaintiff stated that Defendant did not fully compensate plumbers for their drive time for jobs outside of Wichita. Id. at *2. Plaintiff moved for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Id. at *2-3. Defendant contended that Plaintiff was, in reality, a "plumber's helper" and not a licensed plumber. Id. at *5. Defendant provided an affidavit that stated that it had employees who are licensed plumbers that are not paid on an hourly basis. Id. at *5-6. Thus, Defendant requested that the proposed class state "plumber's helper" instead of plumber. Id. at *6. Plaintiff contended that although Defendant stated that its owners were plumbers and were not paid on an hourly basis, Defendant did not assert that any other licensed plumber or plumber was not paid on an hourly basis, nor did Defendant point out that the position of plumber was exempt from overtime requirements under the FLSA. Id. The Court determined that at this initial stage of conditional certification, there was no evidence that Defendant distinguished between job duties or pay structures for licensed plumbers, plumbers, or plumber's helpers. Id. The Court therefore revised the class definition to include the individuals that Plaintiff contended were covered and the individuals that Defendant asserted were covered. Accordingly, the Court held that the proposed collective included "plumbers, licensed plumbers, or plumber's helpers." Id. at *7. Defendant further objected to the class definition because it included employees "who were not paid overtime as a consequence of not being credited and compensated for driving time in a company truck." Id. Defendant argued that this definition was overly broad. Defendant requested to define the class as individuals who were not credited or compensated for: (i) the time it took to drive from the last job location to the office; and (ii) the time spent driving to and from job locations outside of Wichita. Id. The Court noted that in Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification, he sought conditional class certification for plumbers, similarly-situated to him, who were not properly compensated with overtime premium for all hours worked due to drive time at the end of the day and drive time for travel outside of Wichita. Id. at *8. Thus, the Court held that Defendant's proposal appeared consistent with Plaintiff's contentions. Accordingly, the Court found it appropriate to include Defendant's limiting language in the class definition. Accordingly, the Court granted conditional certification of the collective action with an amended definition.

Roberts, et al. v. PATCO Electrical Services, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93548 (W.D. Okla. June 19, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of apprentice electricians, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA by not paying overtime compensation until after working 50-hours per week and by deducting hour-long meal periods when they did not receive an hour off of work. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part. Plaintiffs defined the proposed collective action as "all current and former hourly-paid electricians, including journeymen and apprentice electricians as well as all other electricians who were employed by Defendant during the three-year period preceding the filing of the complaint." Id. at *3. Plaintiffs alleged that the proposed collective action members had similar job duties and responsibilities, were required to expend a significant amount of time traveling to their different jobsites and traveling to pick up parts and equipment, and worked schedules similar to and were compensated in a manner similar to Plaintiffs. Id. at *4. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs' allegations regarding the lunch time deductions were clearly not a single policy, plan, or decision that affected all of the members of the putative collective action and that only one of Defendant's supervisors made the decision to use shorter lunch breaks when a specific job required that he do so. Id. at *5. Defendant further argued that Plaintiffs could not show that they were similarly-situated to the members of the putative collective action as defined because Plaintiffs were part of a unique limited group of employees, i.e., apprentice electricians at the Calumet location, and that due to the unique nature of the Calumet facility, Defendant decided to provide a per diem payment/travel time allowance to each of the hourly employees at the Calumet location. Id. at *5-6. The Court found that Plaintiffs had not shown that the other putative collective action members were similarly-situated because they did not demonstrate all current and former hourly-paid electricians, including journeymen and apprentice electricians as well as all other electricians who were employed by Defendant, were together the victims of a single decision, policy, or plan. Id. at *6. The Court reasoned that because of the unique nature of the Calumet facility, Plaintiffs were unable to show the requisite substantial similarity for conditional certification of their proposed collective action. However, the Court held that Plaintiffs did demonstrate that the other apprentice electricians who worked at the Calumet location were similarly-situated. Id. at *6-7. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a modified collective action consisting of all current and former apprentice electricians who worked at the Calumet facility any time from June 24, 2013 to the present.

Sobolewski, et al. v. Boselli & Sons, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170657 (D. Colo. Oct. 16, 2017). Plaintiff, a McDonald's employee, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay for break time in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Magistrate Judge recommended granting. On Rule 72 review, the Court accepted the Magistrate Judge's recommendation. Defendants argued that certification should be provided to hourly employees only at Defendants' Monument, Colorado location, because Plaintiff only worked at that location of Defendants' 12 stores. Defendant therefore asserted that Plaintiff's allegations were insufficient to indicate that employees at the other 11 locations were subject to the same allegedly unlawful policies. Id. at *5. However, the Court noted that Plaintiff's declaration offered in support of his motion for certification specifically stated he "mostly worked at the McDonald's in Monument, Colorado but also worked at three other Boselli McDonald's." Id. Similarly, Plaintiff's declaration specifically stated the matters of which he complained occurred "during the time he worked at McDonald's," which the Court held was sufficient to include the other three McDonald's locations where he was employed. Id. As for the other eight locations, the Court found that Plaintiff was relying on the testimony of Defendant's Rule 30(b)(6) designee that hourly employees at all 12 locations were subject to the same break policy and same computerized time-keeping system. Id. at *6. Defendants asserted the fact that the stores used the same time-keeping system had no bearing on whether all locations should be included for purposes of the conditional certification because Plaintiff's allegations related to management's alleged unlawful actions, not to an error in the time-keeping system itself. Id. The Court disagreed and opined that the testimony showed that one of the violations allegedly occurred at all 12 locations until the time-keeping problem was fixed, i.e., if an employee was clocked-out for 10 minutes they were paid, but if they clocked-out between 10 minutes and 30 minutes they were not paid. Id. at *7. The Court concluded that these allegations were not of "rogue" management decisions limited to some stores, but rather were of the same time-keeping system and policies applicable to all 12 stores. Id. Accordingly, the Court accepted the Magistrate Judge's recommendation granting Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Whitlow, et al. v. Crescent Consulting LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 128742 (W.D. Okla. Aug. 14, 2017). Plaintiff, a drilling consultant, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay him and others similarly-situated overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff alleged that he and other drilling consultants were improperly classified by Defendant as independent contractors, and paid a day rate without overtime for hours worked in excess of 40 in any given workweek. Id. at *5. Plaintiff contended he worked more than 40 hours each week while engaged by Defendant, and that Defendant's failure to compensate him for these hours violated the FLSA. Plaintiff also presented evidence that Defendant retained persons it identified as independent contractors to serve as drilling consultants for third-parties, such as Sandridge Energy and Chesapeake Energy. These individuals were allegedly paid a set day rate, regardless of the number of hours worked in a day, and without regard to whether they worked more than 40 hours in a given workweek. Plaintiff alleged the putative Plaintiffs were subject to a compensation-scheme that violated the FLSA because they were not properly considered exempt from the overtime provisions of the Act, but received no overtime pay. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiff also submitted affidavits from other drilling consultants that supported his contention that they were similarly-situated in that they were paid according to the same structure and performed similar duties on well sites. Id. at *6. The Court found that the allegations and evidence submitted were sufficient to establish that the putative Plaintiffs were similarly-situated so as to permit conditional certification. Defendant contended that conditional certification was inappropriate because the issue of whether any particular Plaintiff was an employee of Defendant, rather than an independent contractor, would require an individualized analysis under the economic realities test. Id. at *6-7. The Court disagreed, and found that Plaintiff sufficiently alleged and presented evidence to support his burden at step one of conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Each of the identified Plaintiffs alleged payment at a day rate, regardless of the number of hours worked in a week, and each putative Plaintiff was engaged by Defendant to serve as drilling consultant and assigned to the jobsite of a client. Id. at *9. Further, the Court noted that putative Plaintiffs described their job duties similarly. The Court therefore rejected Defendant's argument that it should delve into the economic realities test, and granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

(xi) Eleventh Circuit

Adams, et al. v. Gilead Group, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 205294 (M.D. Fla. Nov. 17, 2017). Plaintiff, a field collection agent, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff specifically alleged that Defendants shaved hours off of pay and required him to work off-the-clock. Id. at *2. Plaintiff sought to certify a collective action consisting of all field collection agents who worked for Defendants nationwide from August 1, 2013 to the present, who worked in excess of 40 hours in one or more workweeks, and who were not paid overtime compensation. Id. Defendants argued that certification should be denied because Plaintiff failed to establish that a sufficient number of similarly-situated employees wished to join the action, as only five individuals had expressed a desire to opt-in. Id. at *3. However, Plaintiff pointed to a complaint filed with the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") in Missouri and a lawsuit filed in Texas alleging similar wage & hour violations as evidence that other employees would likely join in the action if it was certified as a collective action. Id. at *3-4. Defendant also argued that the collective action members were not similarly-situated because they provided services to several different cable companies. Plaintiff countered that the proposed collective action needed only to be similar, not identical, and all members were compensated hourly, performed similar duties, and were subject to the same payment policy. Id. at *4. The Court agreed with Plaintiff that the collective action members were similarly-situated. Finally, Defendants argued that its time records proved that Defendant paid field collection agents overtime during the relevant time period. Id. Plaintiff contended that the collective amount of overtime pay from the time records equated to only 53 cents per workweek. Id. at *5. Based on the record, the Court found that Plaintiff met the low burden for conditional certification, and it granted Plaintiff's motion. The Court also stated that Plaintiff averred that the relevant employees who performed similar duties were subject to a national payment policy, and the Court therefore granted conditional certification of a nationwide collective action.

Albert, et al. v. HGS Colibrium,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 67180 (N.D. Ga. May 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of sales representatives ("SRs"), filed a collective and class action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiffs moved for conditional certification, which the Court granted. To support their motion for conditional certification of a collective action, Plaintiffs submitted their individual declarations and the declarations of two opt-in Plaintiffs in support of their motion. Defendant is a technology services company that markets health insurance products. Plaintiffs sold products to customers in Colorado, and claimed that Defendant required all SRs to perform work off-the-clock for which they were not fully compensated. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs also asserted that their duties routinely required them to work more than eight hours per day and over 40 hours per week. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs also stated that they clocked-in at the beginning of their shifts, and their supervisors directed them to log-out each day before eight hours had passed, regardless of whether they had completed their work, and that when they did not log-out and continued to work more than eight hours, managers would change the time records to reflect that they had not worked over 40 hours in a week. Id. Plaintiffs sought to represent a collective action of all persons employed by Defendant as non-exempt sales representatives at its Roswell, Georgia facility who sold or renewed policies for Colorado HealthOp between September 1, 2014 and March 31, 2015, and who were: (i) not paid for all work performed while clocked-in; (ii) were not paid for all work performed while off-the-clock; and (iii) were not compensated for time worked over 40 hours per week at overtime rates. Id. at *3-4. The Court determined that since two individuals have already opted-in to the litigation, Plaintiffs met the requirement of showing that others desired to opt-in. Id. at *6-7. In opposing conditional certification, Defendant argued that a collective action was not appropriate because many SRs never worked 40 hours a week, and liability therefore could not be established on a group-wide basis. Id. at *9-10. Defendant further contended that there were significant differences among the 62 potential members of the collective action, including the number of hours they worked per week, their time-keeping practices and receipt of overtime pay, and that determining liability would require "thousands of highly individualized determinations of each [SR's] daily activities, using a variety of data sources." Id. at *10. The Court found that Defendant's arguments went to the merits of the underlying claims and the suitability of allowing the case ultimately to proceed as a collective action, and were therefore more appropriate for consideration during the second stage of the certification process. Id. The Court determined that the evidence supported Plaintiffs' allegation that the opt-in Plaintiffs and other SRs worked "off-the-clock" hours, Defendant knew they did, and Defendant required them to log-out and continue working or manually reduced their recorded hours. Id. at *11. The Court held that Plaintiffs submitted evidence sufficient to show that Plaintiffs were similarly-situated to members of the proposed collective action. The Court accordingly granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Allen, et al. v. Hartford Fire Insurance Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 136504 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of insurance salespersons, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt employees and thereby denied overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. The Court first noted that in a related action entitled Monserrate v. Hartford Fire Insurance Co., Case No. 14-CV-149 ("Monserrate"), Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant violated the FLSA by: (i) failing to pay its employees overtime compensation for hours worked in excess of 40 hours a week; (ii) failing to maintain accurate records of its employees' work hours; and (iii) inaccurately classifying analysts as exempt from overtime pay despite knowledge that such analysts were non-exempt. Id. at *3-4. In Monserrate, Plaintiffs sought conditional certification of the claims of analysts, which the Court had previously granted. The parties ultimately settled the matter. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs then filed the instant action, which although factually similar to Monserrate, also referenced analysts employed by Defendant in Seminole County, Florida, Connecticut, New York, Georgia, and Minnesota. Id. Defendant argued that the Court should deny Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification because allowing them to use the second action as a vehicle to disseminate a second round of notices to an overlapping group of employees would render the opt-in deadline for collective actions insignificant and would not promote resolution of multiple claims in one proceeding. Id. at *6. The Court disagreed with Defendant that granting Plaintiffs' motion would be at odds with the goal of judicial economy. Id. at *7. The Court reasoned that the purpose of authorizing a § 216(b) class is "to avoid multiple lawsuits where numerous employees have allegedly been harmed by a claimed violation or violations of the FLSA by a particular employer." Id. Thus, "Court authorization of notice [to putative collective action members] serves the legitimate goal of avoiding a multiplicity of duplicative suits." Id. at *8. The Court opined that certification and the issuance of notice to a national class is more likely to reduce the amount of litigation against Defendant, as a collective action would resolve the claims of multiple Plaintiffs in one proceeding. Id. at *8-9. Plaintiffs contended that they were similarly-situated to putative collective action members because they were all: (i) subject to the same wrongful pay provisions by Defendant, who intentionally misclassified them as exempt; and (ii) deprived of overtime compensation to which they were entitled. Id. at *21. The Court noted that Plaintiffs provided 16 viable consent-to-joint notices each indicating that the employees: (i) have been employed as an analyst; and (ii) were not paid overtime compensation for hours worked in excess of 40 hours a week. Id. at *21-22. Based on the foregoing, the Court found that Plaintiffs submitted evidence that significantly advanced their position from the evidence in the record at the time of the Monserrate order, particularly as it related to a finding that analysts nationwide were similarly-situated. The Court thereby found that Plaintiffs demonstrated that they were similarly-situated to putative collective action members with respect to their: (i) job duties; (ii) pay provisions; and (iii) allegations that Defendant violated the FLSA by misclassifying them as exempt employees and denying them overtime compensation. Id. at *24. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

Cedeno, et al. v. Kona Grill, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114618 (M.D. Fla. July 24, 2017). Plaintiff, a restaurant employee, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion to conditionally certify a nationwide collective action of all current and former employees of Defendant after June 1, 2014, who worked overtime but were not paid overtime wages, and who held the positions of sous chef, assistant general manager of restaurant, assistant manager of restaurant, site development manager, lease administrator, development procurement manager, facilities manager, purchasing/facilities coordinator, project designer, manager of architecture, accounts payable manager, accountant, senior manager of tax, manager of IT, senior tax analyst, marketing manager, marketing coordinator, applications system support analyst, recruiter, training manager, and training coordinator. Id. at *2. The Court denied the motion, and found that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate that there were other similarly-situated employees who desired to opt-in to the action. Plaintiff's motion relied heavily on the affidavit of Lisa Ethelbah, Defendant's former human resources manager. According to Ethelbah, audits she performed during her employment reflected that Defendant had misclassified employees as exempt from the FLSA's overtime pay requirements throughout both the corporate office and restaurants. Ethelbah claimed that Plaintiff worked in one of the positions that she had identified as being misclassified as exempt. Id. at *4. However, the Court noted that neither Plaintiff nor Ethelbah stated that they were aware of other employees who desired to opt-in, and no individuals had filed notices of consent to join the lawsuit. Id. at *5. The Court determined that even if Plaintiff had provided sufficient evidence that other employees desired to opt-in this action, Plaintiff failed to establish that the employees were similarly-situated, as Plaintiff's proposed collective action included 21 different job titles that were completely unrelated with respect to their duties, compensation, supervision, location, and exemption classification. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of her FLSA claims.

Goers, et al. v. L.A. Entertainment Group, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2666 (M.D. Fla. Jan. 9, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of entertainers, brought an action alleging that Defendant maintained a policy of misclassifying them as independent contractors and requiring them to work as exotic dancers for up to and in excess of 40 hours per week without compensating them the applicable minimum wage and overtime rates. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant required them to tip certain employees at the end of their shift, including the disc jockey, the manager, and the bouncer. Id. at *5. The Magistrate Judge previously recommended partially granting Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification and found that all entertainers at Defendant's club were similarly-situated and there was a reasonable basis for concluding that other entertainers wished to opt-in to this action. Id. The Magistrate Judge also recommended denying Rule 23 class certification on Plaintiffs' state law claims because Plaintiffs failed to satisfy all of Rule 23's requirements. On Rule 72 review, the Court adopted the Magistrate Judge's recommendations. On Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration of the ruling denying Rule 23 certification based on changes in controlling law, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to meet the adequacy of representation requirement. Rule 23(a)(4) requires that counsel be able to "fairly and adequately" protect the interests of the class. Id. at *10. Accordingly, an adequacy determination turns on: (i) whether any substantial conflicts of interest exist between the representatives and the class; and (ii) whether the representatives will adequately prosecute the action. Id. Further, in determining adequacy of representation for class certification, the Court must consider: (i) the work counsel has done in identifying or investigating potential claims in the action; (ii) counsel's experience in handling class actions, other complex litigation, and the types of claims asserted in the action; (iii) counsel's knowledge of the applicable law; and (iv) the resources' counsel will commit to representing the class. Plaintiffs' attorneys submitted declarations detailing their class experience, which attested that they had "significant experience" in litigating wage & hour class and collective actions. Id. at *11. However, the Court opined that the cases they provided as evidence of that experience were either so new that Plaintiffs' counsel had yet to move for class certification, or the cases had been stayed or dismissed. Id. at *12. The Court further stated that while Plaintiffs' attorneys declared that they had long-standing histories of practice in civil litigation, they did not detail if that experience was in wage & hour claims or other fields. Id. at *13. The Court opined that in the litigation of this matter, Plaintiffs' counsel failed to grasp the concepts underlying the maintenance of a Rule 23 class action. Id. at *14. The Court also found that Plaintiffs' attorneys made no attempt to show that they had the necessary resources to foot the sometimes substantial costs associated with maintaining a sizeable class action matter, or that they had the support to do so while simultaneously managing numerous other active class action cases. Id. at *17. Further, the Court noted that Plaintiffs' counsel demonstrated numerous errors in litigating the matter thus far, including filing a procedurally improper request for class certification and providing three different class definitions. Id. at *20. The Court therefore concluded that the evidence showed that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the adequacy requirement under Rule 23(a)(4) and upheld its previous order denying class certification, despite the change in controlling law.

Gross, et al. v. Pelican Point Seafood,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 122064 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 3, 2017). Plaintiff filed a collective action alleging that Defendant denied him and others similarly-situated overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion to conditionally certify a collective action of current and former hourly-paid laborers who worked at Defendant's location in Pinellas County, Florida between May 22, 2014 and the present; who worked hours for which they were not compensated – in some cases working more than 40 hours per week – without lawful and proper and complete overtime compensation. Id. at *2. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion, finding that his proposed collective action was overly broad. The Court noted that although three individuals filed notices of consent to opt-in to the action, Plaintiff failed to establish that they were similarly-situated. Defendant is a wholesale and retail seafood supplier. In support of its opposition to Plaintiff's motion, Defendant provided the declaration of its President, who stated that employees worked in separate departments, and that Plaintiff worked as the only fish cutter during the relevant time. Id. at *4. In support of his motion, Plaintiff provided a declaration, which stated that he was similarly-situated to "hourly employees who performed labor related work" to the extent that they were not compensated for overtime wages. Id. The Court found that Plaintiff's declaration was insufficient to establish that there were other similarly-situated employees because a collective action of "hourly-paid laborers" would presumably cover nearly every employee, despite the fact that Defendant is comprised of four separate departments and the employees within those departments have different job titles and duties. Id. at *4-5. Moreover, the Court opined that Plaintiff's declaration did not address how the individuals who opted-in to the action were similarly-situated to Plaintiff with respect to their job duties and responsibilities, as Plaintiff was the only fish cutter. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiff's proposed collective was too broad to meet the similarly-situated requirement, and denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Hazel, et al. v. Alimentation Couche-Tard,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 136744 (N.D. Ala. Aug. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of non-exempt store managers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt and thereby failed to pay required overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part. Plaintiffs sought to certify a collective action consisting of all current and formers store managers from June 9, 2013 to the present. Plaintiffs alleged that they worked more than 60 hours a week and that they spent a "vast majority" of their time performing the same tasks as hourly employees, including assisting customers with transactions and performing manual labor by cleaning, stocking, and organizing the store. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs asserted that because Defendant's stores were open 24 hours a day, any of the managers could be required to fill in for an hourly employee at any time. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs also testified that a Market Manager or other executive had authority over the store's budget, payroll, store hours, merchandise selection, and other management tasks, including hiring and termination decisions. In response, Defendant submitted 18 declarations averring that: (i) Market Managers treated store managers differently across different locations; (ii) even when store managers were doing non-management work, they were still responsible for supervising the store; and (iii) store managers are responsible for setting the store's work schedule. Id. at *4. The Court first found that each store had a store manager position and Defendant had a uniform job description for all store managers. Therefore, the Court determined that Plaintiffs and members of the proposed collective action shared the same job title. However, the Court noted that that the substantial majority of potential collective action members did not share a geographical location with Plaintiffs. The Court found that Plaintiffs submitted evidence showing a reasonable basis for concluding she and the collective action members are similarly-situated. The Court opined that named Plaintiff's affidavit testimony established a common theory of store managers spending a substantial amount of their time on non-exempt tasks. Id. at *11. The Court ruled that certification of a collective action limited to store managers in Alabama was appropriate, and thereby granted Plaintiffs' motion in part.

Herrera, et al. v. Mattress Firm, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 157453 (S.D. Fla. Sept. 26, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of delivery drivers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants misclassified drivers as independent contractors and thereby failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court denied. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs' motion should be denied because Plaintiffs did not meet their burden to show members of the proposed collective action were similarly-situated to Plaintiffs or would be interested in joining the lawsuit. Plaintiffs submitted nearly identical declarations in support of their motion for conditional certification. The Court determined that Plaintiffs' declarations did not fully satisfy the Court that the employees in the proposed collective action were indeed subject to a common payroll scheme. Id. at *16. The Court noted that Plaintiffs did not allege in the complaint or in their declarations that other drivers in the putative collective action received a per-delivery rate of pay, as opposed to a per-day rate of pay. Defendants also insisted the Court consider whether the putative collective action members were similarly-situated with respect to the economic realities test that would inevitably apply to determine whether drivers were employees or independent contractors. Id. at *17. The Court explained that in making this determination, it would consider several "economic realities" factors, including: (i) the nature and degree of the alleged employer's control as to the manner in which the work is to be performed; (ii) the alleged employee's investment in equipment or materials required for his task, or his employment of workers; (iii) whether the service rendered requires a special skill; (iv) the degree of permanency and duration of the working relationship; and (v) the extent to which the service rendered is an integral part of the alleged employer's business. Id. at *21. The Court found that only two of the factors were capable of collective treatment. The Court stated that presumably every delivery driver in the action would need a similar skill to complete his or her deliveries, regardless of the individualized circumstances of the employment relationship with Defendant. Id. at *22. Likewise, whether mattress deliveries constituted an integral part of Defendant's business could be addressed without an individualized analysis of each collective action member. Id. However, the Court found that the remaining factors required a case-by-case analysis. First, the nature and degree of the alleged employer's control as to the manner in which the work is to be performed would differ depending on whether a delivery driver was directly employed by Defendant or employed by an intermediary. Id. at *24. Plaintiffs also failed to demonstrate that each employee in the proposed collective action had a similar opportunity for profit or loss or exercised similar investment in materials as some drove their own personal delivery truck and some were provided trucks and the pay rates for delivery would depend on the option elected. Id. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that they were similarly-situated for purposes of conditional certification under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), and denied Plaintiffs' motion.

Lewis-Gursky, et al. v. Citigroup*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31135 (M.D. Fla. Mar. 6, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of hourly technology workers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA by failing to pay overtime compensation. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court denied the motion, finding that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated. Plaintiffs were employed at various positions with Defendant through four different staffing agencies at numerous locations across the country. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs alleged that they and other similarly-situated hourly workers were jointly employed by Defendant and various staffing agencies, and they sought to hold Defendant liable as the joint employer for the unpaid overtime claims under the FLSA. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs claimed that they were subjected to a common scheme of underpayment that applied to all hourly technology workers, regardless of staffing agency, location, or supervisor, in which Defendant required them to work more than 40 hours per week, but prohibited them from entering more than 40 hours on their timesheet. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that the staffing agencies in turn limited pay to 40 hours per week, leading to uncompensated overtime. Plaintiffs' proposed collective action contained all hourly technology workers supplied to Defendant through staffing agencies and paid on an hourly basis between three years prior to the date of the Court's decision on the motion and March 1, 2016. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiffs asserted that despite working at different facilities and business units and under different managers and vendors, the members of the proposed collective action were similarly-situated because the hourly technology employees were subject to the same common billing arrangement, which incentivized the vendors to underpay overtime. Id. at *12. Defendant asserted that even if it uniformly prohibited vendor employees from billing more than 40 hours in a week, Plaintiffs failed to show that this arrangement resulted in vendors underpaying employees. Id. at *13. Defendant claimed that there was no evidence of a common policy between Defendant and the vendors tying hours billed to hours compensated by the vendors. Id. The Court concluded that even if such a common scheme existed, conditional certification was inappropriate in this case because the diversity of the proposed collective action would lead to individual inquiries that would "eviscerate all notions of judicial economy that would otherwise be served by conditional class certification." Id. at *14. The Court stated that although Plaintiffs need not show they held identical positions, they must show that they and the putative collective action members held similar positions. The proposed collective action membership included a diverse group of employees from over 40 vendors with different job titles and different job duties, who worked for multiple affiliates of Defendant at over 60 different locations nationwide. Id. at *14-15. The Court held that collective certification of a group that diverse would result in individualized inquires that "would contravene the basic theory of judicial economy upon which the certification of collective actions is based." Id. at *15. The Court opined that applying joint-employment factors to the proposed collective action would result in unwieldy, as Plaintiff-specific inquiries that would run counter to the principles of judicial economy. Id. at *18. Additionally, the Court noted that the substantial diversity within the proposed collective action would lead to Plaintiff-specific inquiries as to whether or not an individual was exempt from the FLSA based on his or her job duties. Id. at *19. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs did not show a reasonable basis for their claim that the members of the proposed collective action were similarly-situated based on their job requirements and pay provisions. Id. at *23. The proposed collective action encompassed employees from different staffing agencies located in multiple states and offices, with materially different job titles and duties. Id. Therefore, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Molina, et al. v. Ace Homecare, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 133260 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of nurses and home healthcare aides, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them any compensation for two weeks when it shut down its facilities. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part. Plaintiffs sought to certify two collective actions of employees who were allegedly denied minimum wage pay while working for Defendant during the last three years. Id. at *2. In support of their argument that there were other employees who desire to opt-in to the action, Plaintiffs submitted declarations in which they attested that they, "along with hundreds of other people, were terminated as part of a mass shutdown by Defendant." Id. at *3. As such, the Court found that Plaintiffs demonstrated a reasonable basis for crediting the assertion that other aggrieved employees existed in the proposed collective actions. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated to the members of the proposed collective actions because the definitions failed to exclude exempt employees and those working at different facilities. Id. at *5-6. The Court opined that the seven declarations submitted by Plaintiffs each stated that during the last two weeks of their employment they received no compensation whatsoever, and that hundreds of other employees were terminated as part of Defendants' mass facility shutdowns. Id. at *6. The Court therefore held that Plaintiffs' proposed collective action definitions met the lenient notice stage standard that there were similarly-situated employees who desired to opt-in who were subjected to a common policy that allegedly violated the FLSA. However, the Court held that neither the complaint nor Plaintiffs' affidavits sufficiently demonstrated that the scope of the alleged FLSA violations extended beyond the two-week period of alleged non-pay. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court limited conditional certification to employees with minimum wage claims for work performed from February 29, 2016 to March 13, 2016. The Court thereby granted Plaintiffs' motion in part.

Poggi, et al. v. Humana At Home 1, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 179252 (M.D. Fla. Oct. 30, 2017). Plaintiff, a healthcare coordinator, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court denied. Plaintiff contended that: (i) Defendant imposed daily and weekly quotas that could not be met without working overtime; (ii) Defendant used the Verint software to track and increase productivity with respect to the quotas; (iii) the Verint software provided reports to Defendant that showed that employees were working in excess of 40 hours per work; (iv) the Verint data was not used to determine the number of hours that employees should be paid for working; and (i) Defendant had a policy of not paying overtime, despite its knowledge of the overtime hours being worked, as shown by the Verint reports. Id. at *6. In support of the motion for conditional certification, Plaintiff submitted declarations from several opt-in Plaintiffs to corroborate his allegations about Humana's practices. Several opt-in Plaintiffs described an environment wherein they regularly worked more than 40 hours each week and were threatened with termination if they did not meet her daily and weekly quotas. Id. at *7. Defendant argued that Plaintiff had failed to show that others similarly-situated wished to opt-in to the collective action. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's allegations and bare-bones, conclusory statements were not sufficient proof that other potential collective action members were interested in joining the case. The Court opined that even if Plaintiff had demonstrated that others wished to opt-in to the collective action, he failed to prove that the proposed collective action members were similar to him with respect to job responsibilities. Id. at *19. The Court found that the individualized nature of Plaintiff's claims would predominate, and although that standard is more typically used at the second stage of collective action certification, it determined that the issues would not change after discovery was concluded. Id. at *20. The Court opined that the individualized nature of the claims in the use of the Verint reports alone would require individual inquiries into whether an employee was logged-in to the system without actually working. Id. at *21. Additionally, the Court reasoned that healthcare coordinators' daily quotas all differed, and thus representative evidence would not be helpful if employees were not subject to the same quotas, because the necessary time it would take to complete their jobs would differ. Id. at *22. Furthermore, the Court noted that Defendant submitted evidence that the job duties varied based on the manager to whom that the healthcare coordinator reported. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Roberson, et al. v. Restaurant Delivery Developers, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 150591 (M.D. Fla. Sept. 18, 2017). Plaintiff, a restaurant delivery driver, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified drivers as independent contractors and thereby denied them minimum wages and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff asserted that a similarly-situated group of drivers existed across the country and would be interested in joining the collective action. Plaintiff stated that three delivery drivers already opted-in to join the case and four submitted affidavits, attesting that they were subjected to a similar policy of being classified as an independent contractor for their delivery driver duties, not getting paid time-and-a-half for the hours that they work beyond 40 each week, and not receiving minimum wages for all workweeks. Id. at *5. Defendant did not challenge that a group of similarly-situated delivery drivers existed. However, Defendant asserted that Plaintiff could not show that similarly-situated delivery drivers employed by Defendant existed because Defendant never hired Plaintiff or any other delivery driver. Id. at *7. The Court stated that at this stage of the litigation, it would not review the merits of the case, including whether Defendant was Plaintiff's "employer" as defined by the FLSA. Id. Therefore, the Court confined its analysis to whether a group of similarly-situated drivers existed and whether those drivers would be interested in opting-in to the proposed FLSA collective action. Id. at *7-8. The Court held that the evidence and affidavits provided by Plaintiff made the necessary showing as three delivery drivers opted-in, all of whom were classified as independent contractors, and various delivery drivers submitted affidavits averring that other delivery drivers would be interested in joining the action. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action.

Rojas, et al. v. Uber Technologies,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 98716 (S.D. Fla. June 27, 2017). Plaintiff, a driver, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime and minimum wage provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant – an entity which provides transportation services through a mobile phone application – failed to pay its drivers minimum wage for all hours worked as well as overtime premiums for work performed over 40 hours per week. Defendant argued that Plaintiff did not have standing to bring this suit and that he failed to carry his burden of demonstrating that there were other similarly-situated employees who desired to opt-in. Id. at *4. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff did not have standing to bring this suit because he had filed for bankruptcy. Therefore, Defendant argued that Plaintiff could not be a named Plaintiff in a collective action because the matter could only be prosecuted by the trustee of the bankruptcy estate. Id. at *5. Plaintiff asserted that he claimed this lawsuit as exempt from the bankruptcy estate on the schedules filed with the Bankruptcy Court, and that the trustee discharged him from bankruptcy. The Court explained that any property interests, including causes of action, that a debtor holds at the time he begins his bankruptcy action become a part of his bankruptcy estate. Id. at *6. If a cause of action is listed on a bankruptcy schedule, it is considered to be outside of the bankruptcy estate once the bankruptcy case is closed. Id. Therefore, the Court found that since the Plaintiff disclosed the lawsuit on a bankruptcy schedule and the bankruptcy had been discharged, Plaintiff had standing to bring this suit. Id. In support of his assertion that there were other employees who desired to opt-in, Plaintiff relied on the declaration of Michael Colman, an operations specialist, that was filed in another case. Colman's declaration stated that thousands of Defendant's transportation providers had opted-out of one or more "Arbitration Provisions contained in the various agreements in place between Uber and [its subsidiary] Rasier and the transportation providers who use the Uber App." Id. at *7. In addition, Plaintiff relied on the fact that there were two other cases pending in which Plaintiffs sought nationwide relief on behalf of drivers who opted-out of the arbitration provision contained in his or her applicable service agreement with Defendant or one of its subsidiaries. Id. Finally, Plaintiff relied on the fact that one other driver filed a notice of consent to join this lawsuit. The Court determined that beyond just demonstrating that similarly-situated employees existed, Plaintiff must show that there are similarly-situated employees who desired to opt-in. The Court noted that Plaintiff had not submitted a single affidavit from another driver who desired to opt-in, and he failed to prove that he was aware of other drivers who desired to opt-in. Id. at *8. The Court further determined that Plaintiff also failed to demonstrate that any potential opt-in Plaintiffs were similarly-situated. Id. at *10. Defendant provided evidence that during the relevant time period, Defendant and its subsidiaries used 17 different agreements with drivers. Further, Defendant asserted that each utilized entirely different operations, including the pricing structure for each of Defendant's products, differing options among cities due to market-specific factors, and each was managed "in an organizationally and operationally unique way." Id. at *11. The Court thereby found that Plaintiff made no effort to substantiate his allegations that there were other drivers who desired to opt-in or that drivers were similarly-situated to Plaintiff in terms of job requirements and pay provisions. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification.

Schumann, et al. v. Collier Anaesthesia, P.A.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57217 (M.D. Fla. April 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former student registered nurse anesthetists ("SRNAs") of Defendant College, LLC ("Wolford"), brought an action seeking to recover minimum wages and overtime compensation under the FLSA. Id. at *4. As students, Plaintiffs participated as interns in a clinical training program supervised and subsidized by Defendant Collier Anesthesia, P.A. ("Collier"). Although it was undisputed that Plaintiffs knew that the internship was unpaid and that completing it was required to graduate, Plaintiffs claimed that they functioned as "employees" while at the clinical sites. Id. On February 21, 2013, the Court conditionally certified a collective action, and 23 additional Plaintiffs joined the two original Plaintiffs. Defendant subsequently moved to decertify the action, but the Court granted summary judgment in Defendant's favor prior to ruling on the motion. The Eleventh Circuit thereafter vacated the summary judgment order and remanded the case. Defendant again sought decertification of the collective action on the ground that the claims of the 25 Plaintiffs were not substantially similar, that Defendant had different defenses as to each, and that procedural and fairness concerns were not present. Defendant requested that the Court conduct one trial with the two named Plaintiffs, and then 23 separate trials for opt-in Plaintiffs, in order to determine whether each individual's story compelled a finding that he or she was an "employee" during some or all of the SRNA internship program. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs responded that the student/employee inquiry before the Court focused on the internship program as a whole, not on each individual's experience, and that Plaintiffs' experiences were sufficiently similar to justify collective treatment. Id. at *4. The Court denied Defendant's motion for decertification. Defendant argued that it was not possible to collectively analyze the students' internships, since their experiences were not substantially similar as they were members of different classes; some graduated and others did not; they complained about and enjoyed different aspects of the program; they interned at different facilities; and they handled a different number of cases over a different number of total hours. Id. at *6. The Court stated that while true that Plaintiffs had their differences, they were not, on the whole, "legally significant differences." Id. at *8. To the contrary, the Court found that they are relatively de minimis matters when compared to the key factual threads that weaved consistently through the stories of Plaintiffs who were deposed. Plaintiffs claimed they often worked 50 or more hours per week and were scheduled on weekends and holidays. Id. at *8-9. Plaintiffs all asserted deficiencies in their clinical training, resulting from Defendant's alleged desire to save money on paid employees. Id. at *9. The Court held that while Plaintiffs' internship experiences that differed in some respects, few or none of the factual differences were "legally significant" to the question of whether Defendant's SRNA internship program violated the FLSA; they mattered – if at all – only when determining damages. Id. As to the issue of defenses, the Court opined the only defense that may affect certain Plaintiffs differently was the applicable statute of limitations, but that fact did not support decertification. Id. at *10. The Court noted that whether Defendant "willfully" violated the FLSA was a determination to be made on a group-wide basis, rather than individually as to each Plaintiff. Id. at *10-11. The Court stated that a group-wide defense can be "readily and fairly managed" in a collective action by providing the jury with "charts showing the amount of back pay owed for each Plaintiff for both a two-year and a three-year time period" and having the jury select the correct amount. Id. at *11. As to Defendant's claim that the collective action must be decertified based on fairness and procedural considerations, the Court found nothing unfair about collectively litigating the common question of whether the way in which Defendant ran the SRNA clinical internship program at issue turned Plaintiffs into "employees" under the FLSA. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for decertification of Plaintiffs' collective action.

Taylor, et al. v. White Oak Pastures, Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-156 (M.D. Ga. April 20, 2017). Plaintiff, a meat abattoir at Defendant's slaughterhouse, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted. Plaintiff sought to certify a collective action of all current and former red meat abattoirs or employees supporting meat abattoirs. Id. at 2. The Court noted that 10 opt-in Plaintiffs filed consent to join the action, and several opt-in Plaintiffs submitted declarations in support of the motion for conditional certification. The Court thereby determined that a reasonable basis existed to believe that other non-named employees also desired to opt-in to the action. Id. at 4. Plaintiff defined the members of the collective action as red meat abattoirs who worked: (i) on the kill floor; (ii) in the cutting room; (iii) in the grinding room; (iv) in order fulfillment; or (v) on the loading docks. Id. at 5. Plaintiff argued that all red meat employees were similarly-situated because they: (i) were employed by Defendant; (ii) performed jobs relating to the processing of cattle and often did the same jobs in rotating positions; (iii) were paid a straight time hourly wage for all hours worked; (iv) were required to work more than 40 hours per week; and (v) were not properly compensation for overtime work. Id. Defendant argued that the scope of the proposed collective action was overly broad and contained employees whose jobs were outside of Plaintiff's job and were therefore substantially dissimilar to Plaintiff. Id. at 5-6. Plaintiff argued that regardless of assignment, all employees were cross-trained in all jobs and were required to help out on any of the jobs necessary to complete the work. Id. at 6. Additionally, Plaintiff stated that whether working in the abattoir or in support of the abattoir, all employees were paid hourly, regularly worked over 40 hours a week, and were denied overtime compensation. Id. at 6-7. The Court agreed with Plaintiff's arguments, and found that he submitted evidence to suggest that a pattern of FLSA overtime violations existed and that the employees were similarly-situated. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion.

(xii) District Of Columbia Circuit

Galloway, et al. v. Chugach,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 99681 (D.D.C. June 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of residential advisors, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the Court granted in part. Plaintiffs alleged that residential advisors oversee and assist the individuals staying in Defendant's dormitories. Plaintiffs estimated that approximately 20 individuals worked in identical or similar positions, and that "35 to 40 people" may have held that job title since June 2012. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant: (i) required residential advisors to work through meal breaks but deducted one hour's pay per shift regardless of whether the employee actually received a break; (ii) required residential advisors to work 20 to 30 minutes beyond their scheduled shifts without pay while they waited for their replacement; and (iii) required residential advisors "regularly" to work more than five eight-hour shifts per week without paying overtime wages. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs sought to certify a collective action consisting of all persons employed by Defendant as residential advisors at any time since June 23, 2012, whom Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation for all hours worked in excess of 40. Id. at *8. The Court stated that of the three named Plaintiffs, only one submitted a declaration, and that declaration provided only very general information. The Court, however, found that although Plaintiffs' evidence was "minimally sufficient," it was enough to make a showing that similar-situated individuals existed who wished to opt-in to the action. Id. at *9. The Court opined that the declarations submitted might be short on detail, but they were based on personal knowledge, and thus meet the low bar of evidence "beyond pure speculation." Id. The Court determined that the declarations demonstrated that: (i) Defendant employed other residential advisors at the dormitories where Plaintiffs worked; (ii) those residential advisors had similar job responsibilities, by virtue of them having the same title; and (iii) that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation to residential advisors in roughly the same manner that it allegedly failed to pay Plaintiffs. Id. Therefore, given the low bar Plaintiffs faced at the first stage of conditional certification, and given the relatively small and manageable size of their proposed collective action, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. The Court however, ruled that its order was subject to the caveats that: (i) the proposed group of persons to be notified include only employees who work or worked at the Potomac Job Corps dormitories; (ii) the notice needed to be sent only to those employed as residential advisors since July 12, 2014; and (iii) the notice must specify that the collective action will include only those employed as residential advisors within three years of the date the prospective member of the collective action files a written consent to join the action. Accordingly, the Court granted in part Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification.

B. Other Federal Rulings Affecting The Defense Of FLSA Collective Actions

Throughout 2017, federal courts issued a wide variety of rulings on procedural and substantive matters in FLSA collective action litigation. Those rulings included All Writs Act issues in wage & hour class actions; amendments and counterclaims in FLSA collective actions; appeals in wage & hour class actions; application of Twombly pleading standards in FLSA collective actions; arbitration of wage & hour class claims; awards of attorneys' fees and costs in FLSA collective actions; communications with class members in FLSA collective actions; concurrent state law claims in wage & hour class actions; discovery in FLSA collective actions; DOL wage & hour enforcement actions; exemption issues in FLSA collective actions; FLSA collective actions for donning and doffing; foreign worker issues in wage & hour class actions; independent contractor issues in wage & hour class actions; individual executive liability in FLSA collective actions; issues with interns, volunteers, and students under the FLSA; issues with opt-in rights in wage & hour class actions; joint employer, employee status, and employer status issues in FLSA collective actions; liquidated damages in FLSA collective actions; mootness in FLSA collective actions; Motor Carrier Act issues in FLSA collective actions; pay policies and bonuses in FLSA collective actions; preemption and immunity issues in FLSA collective actions; procedural and notice issues in FLSA collective actions; public employee FLSA collective action litigation; record-keeping claims in wage & hour class actions; sanctions in wage & hour class actions; settlement approval issues in wage & hour class actions and collective actions; settlement bar and estoppel issues in wage & hour class actions; statute of limitations issues in wage & hour class action litigation; stays in wage & hour class actions; tip pooling and tip credit claims under the FLSA; tolling issues in wage & hour class actions; training time issues in wage & hour class actions; travel time issues in wage & hour class action litigation; trial and damages issues in FLSA collective actions; venue issues in FLSA collective actions; and willfulness in FLSA collective actions.

(i) All Writs Act Issues In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Brunner, et al. v. Jimmy's Johns,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47241 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of assistant store managers, brought multiple class and collective actions alleging that Defendants misclassified them as exempt employees and denied them overtime compensation. In particular, Plaintiffs alleged that although they worked for franchise businesses, Jimmy John's, as the franchisor, was a joint employer of the assistant store managers and liable for the misclassification decisions of its franchisees. The lawsuits eventually were consolidated in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, and Plaintiffs filed a consolidated class and collective action. Following conditional certification of the collective action claims, the Court entered a series of case management orders that divided the case into three phases, and restricted discovery to joint employer issues. As a result, the Court limited the number of depositions that Plaintiffs' counsel could take relative to owners of franchisee businesses and of Jimmy John's personnel. Immediately before the close of discovery on joint employer issues, Plaintiffs filed 13 additional class and collective actions on behalf of various opt-in Plaintiffs in various federal districts throughout the United States. Jimmy John's sought to enjoin the prosecution of those lawsuits pursuant to the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651(a), which grants the Court power to issue all writs "necessary and appropriate" in aid of its jurisdiction that is "agreeable to the usages and principles of law." In this instance, Defendant contended that the Court should exercise its power to enjoin the parallel federal litigation in order to control and administer the litigation before it, and to protect its pre-trial rulings and discovery orders. Defendant further asserted that this power existed as a necessary component of the Court's inherent power to hear and decide cases, which was conferred on federal judges as one of the equitable powers conferred by the Judiciary Act of 1789. The Court agreed with Defendant and issued the anti-suit injunction. Id. It determined that the 13 lawsuits would frustrate its pre-trial orders and undermine the objectives they were intended to accomplish and that the anti-suit injunction was necessary to maintain the efficient resolution of these consolidated class actions. The Court opined that the 13 lawsuits would have undermined the Court's detailed discovery order because they would allow Plaintiffs to: (i) take discovery on the merits in those other cases before resolution of the joint-employer issue; and (ii) take discovery from franchisees and their employees outside of what was allowed per the discovery order.

Editor's Note: The ruling in In Re Jimmy John's is believed to be the first anti-suit injunction ever entered in the context of a wage & hour class action or FLSA collective action.

In Re Jimmy John's Overtime Litigation,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 25282 (7th Cir. Dec. 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of assistant store managers, brought multiple class and collective actions alleging that Defendants misclassified them as exempt employees and denied them overtime compensation. In particular, Plaintiffs alleged that although they worked for franchise businesses, Jimmy John's, as the franchisor, was a joint employer of the assistant store managers and liable for the misclassification decisions of its franchisees. Following conditional certification of the collective action claims, the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois entered a series of case management orders that divided the case into three phases, and restricted discovery to joint-employer issues. Immediately after the close of discovery on joint-employer issues, Plaintiffs filed 13 additional class and collective actions on behalf of various opt-in Plaintiffs in various federal districts throughout the United States. Jimmy John's sought to enjoin the prosecution of those lawsuits pursuant to the District Court's equitable powers and the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651(a), which grants the District Court the power to issue all writs "necessary and appropriate" in aid of its jurisdiction that is "agreeable to the usages and principles of law." Id. at *12. The District Court determined that the 13 lawsuits would frustrate its pre-trial orders and undermine the objectives they were intended to accomplish and that the anti-suit injunction was necessary to maintain the efficient resolution of these consolidated class actions. Id. at *8. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Seventh Circuit reversed the District Court's decision. Although the Seventh Circuit held that a District Court could, in theory, enjoin parallel federal court litigation under either its inherent equitable powers or the All Writs Act, it determined that the circumstances of this case did not warrant such an injunction under either power. First, the Seventh Circuit ruled that because Jimmy John's was not a party to the lawsuits that were filed against its franchisees, neither those lawsuits, nor the parties, were identical, and it would not be possible to resolve all of the lawsuits in one forum. Id. at *19-21. Second, the Seventh Circuit found that the injunction was not necessary to prevent duplicative rulings because the potential effect of one suit on the other did not justify an injunction. Id. at *22. Third, the Seventh Circuit opined that the injunction was not necessary to protect the District Court's pre-trial orders regarding discovery and notice because the District Court had not mentioned those reasons when it issued the injunction, and because Seventh Circuit precedent would not support the issuance of such an injunction for those reasons in any event. Id. at *23-24. Finally, the Seventh Circuit held that the District Court had abused its discretion when it issued the injunction by failing to consider the traditional injunction factors and failing to make findings of fact and conclusions of law as required by Rule 65. Id. at *29. The Seventh Circuit concluded that Rule 65 and the traditional injunction factors apply to injunctions issued under the All Writs Act, and that Rule 65 applies to anti-suit injunctions. Id. at *30-31. As a result, the Seventh Circuit reversed the District Court's judgment because it had not complied with those rules when it issued the anti-suit injunction. Id. at *32.

(ii) Amendments And Counterclaims In FLSA Collective Actions

Avendano, et al. v. Averus, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57528 (D. Colo. April 14, 2017). Plaintiff, a former employee, filed an action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime requirements of the FLSA and Colorado state law. The Court conditionally certified a collective action of only Colorado employees. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff then filed a motion to conditionally certify another collective action of employees at all other Defendant locations, including those in Illinois, Indiana, Minnesota, Missouri, and Tennessee. Plaintiff also moved to certify a Rule 23 class under Colorado law of employees in Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Minnesota, Missouri, and Tennessee. Id. at *3. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion to conditionally certify a nationwide collective action and granted in part Plaintiff's motion to certify a Rule 23 class. The Court further certified a class of Colorado employees but declined to certify a Rule 23 class of employees in other states because Plaintiff never worked in those states, and therefore did not have standing to bring a class action on behalf of individuals in those states. Id. Plaintiff sought leave to amend his complaint pursuant to Rule 15(a) to add four Plaintiffs and state law claims under the laws of Missouri, Minnesota, Illinois, and Tennessee. Plaintiff filed his motion nearly four months after the deadline to amend pleadings. The Court explained that Rule 15 favors resolving disputes on their merits, which counseled in favor of allowing amendment and permitting Defendant to file appropriate motions to dismiss or for summary judgment. Id. at *4. The Court noted that, in addition to Rule 15, when the deadline for amendment of pleadings as set in the scheduling order has passed, Rule 16(b) applies. Rule 16(b) dictates that a scheduling order deadline "may be modified only for good cause and with the judge's consent." Id. Thus, the Court ruled that the requirements of both rules must be satisfied. Plaintiff argued that he met Rule 16's good cause standard because "new Plaintiffs were all absent class members who only now seek to become named Plaintiffs because, though they were members of the putative class, they are not members of the Colorado-only class certified by the Court." Id. at *5. Plaintiff further argued that "[t]he new Plaintiffs cannot be faulted for waiting for denial of class certification to intervene individually." Id. Defendant argued that amendment was untimely because "Plaintiff was aware of all the facts necessary to assert these state law claims for unpaid wages. He [failed to] identify any new facts or change in the law that demonstrates good cause to request leave to amend the complaint a second time long after the Court's deadline has passed." The Court agreed and found that good cause did not exist where Plaintiff knew of the underlying conduct, but failed to raise corresponding claims. Id. The Court, therefore, concluded that Plaintiff did not meet Rule 16's good cause standard. Id. at *6. The Court held that Plaintiff failed to sufficiently explain the delay in seeking leave to amend and, as a result, it concluded that he had not met the requirements of Rule 16. Because the Court held that Plaintiff did not meet Rule 16's requirements, the Court declined to address Rule 15's requirements and denied Plaintiff's motion.

Conde, et al. v. Open Door Marketing, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95115 (N.D. Cal. June 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of sales representatives, filed suit against Defendants alleging that they were misclassified as independent contractors in violation of the FLSA and California labor laws. Plaintiffs also asserted a claim under the Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for leave to file a fourth amended complaint, seeking to add waiting time penalties, and to amend the proposed class and collective action definitions. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. The Court had previously granted Defendant 20/20's motion to deny class certification, holding that Plaintiffs could not satisfy Rule 23's typicality prerequisite as to a class that included individuals who signed the 20/20 arbitration agreement. Id. at *4. As to individuals who only signed the Open Door arbitration agreement, the Court denied Defendant's motion to deny class certification because 20/20 lacked an interest to enforce or rely on the Open Door agreement. Id. at *5. Second, with respect to Plaintiffs' motion to expand the collective action, the Court permitted notice of the collective action to go to individuals in California who signed arbitration agreements, but not to individuals in Nevada. Plaintiffs' fourth amended complaint modified the proposed class and collective action definitions to be consistent with the Courts' ruling and add the waiting time penalty claims. The Court found that Plaintiffs unduly delayed in adding the waiting time penalty claim, which Plaintiffs acknowledged was "based on the same legal theories as all other claims brought under the California Labor Code, which were asserted in the Third Amended Complaint." Id. at *6. Further, Plaintiffs alleged since the initial pleading that they were not paid minimum wage or overtime under California law, and these claims formed the basis of the waiting time penalty claims. Thus, the Court reasoned that Plaintiffs could have brought their claims for waiting time penalties in their original complaint in September of 2015, yet waited for over a year to do so. Id. at *7. Although the Court held there was undue delay, it still allowed Plaintiffs to amend their complaint to add the waiting time penalties claim and to modify the class and collective action definitions. Id. at *8-9. The Court, therefore, concluded that the delay alone did not warrant denial of Plaintiffs' motion to add these claims because Defendant 20/20 had not identified any prejudice, bad faith, or futility. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion.

Jama, et al. v. GCA Services Group*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 178474 (W.D. Wash. Oct. 27, 2017). Plaintiff, a bus driver, filed a class action alleging that Defendants failed to pay the minimum wage required by SeaTac Municipal Code § 7.45 (the "ordinance") and sought back pay. The Court found, however, that Defendant GCA Services did not fall within the definition of a "transportation employer" and was not subject to the ordinance. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs then requested and were granted leave to amend their complaint to add claims against Avis Budget Car Rental, LLC ("ABCR"), the entity with whom GCA Services contracted, on the theory that ABCR was also their employer under the economic realities test. Plaintiffs filed an amended complaint restating their claims against GCA Services and adding two different entities – Avis Budget Group, Inc., and Avis Rent a Car System, LLC (collectively, "Avis-Budget") – as Defendants. The claims against GCA Services were subsequently dismissed by stipulation of the parties. Plaintiffs subsequently filed a motion to amend their complaint, seeking permission to dismiss the claims against the Avis-Budget Defendants without prejudice, and to add ABCR as the sole Defendant. Id. at *3. The Court found that Plaintiffs unduly delayed in seeking amendment, causing prejudice to Defendants, and that the failure to name the correct Defendant in the prior amendment was unexplained and unjustified. Id. at *4. The original complaint was filed in February 2016. After the Court entered judgment against Plaintiffs, they moved for leave to file an amended complaint adding ABCR as a Defendant under a joint employer theory. The Court noted that Plaintiffs timely filed the amended complaint, but also added two Avis entities that had no contractual relationship with GCA Services, and did not add ABCR as a Defendant. Id. at *5. The Court held that the facts that ABCR was the contracting party and that Plaintiffs had no evidence that the Avis-Budget Defendants arguably employed Plaintiffs were known since the first amended complaint was filed 10 months prior. Id. The Court found that the delay in bringing the motion was significant and unexplained. Id. at *6. The Court further determined that the delay has also caused prejudice. With regards to named Defendants, it forced them to incur unnecessary costs defending a lawsuit and a class certification motion to which they should never have been parties. With regards to ABCR, the delay deprived it of an opportunity to defend the class certification motion. Id. Accordingly, the Court opined that the interests of justice would not be served by granting Plaintiffs' leave to amend. The Court thereby denied Plaintiffs' motion and dismissed the action.

(iii) Appeals In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Ellersick, et al. v. Monro Muffler Brake, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 158063 (W.D.N.Y. Sept. 26, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective and class action alleging that Defendant improperly classified them as exempt from overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The District Court previously granted Defendants' motions to decertify the collective action and to deny class certification. Plaintiffs subsequently moved the District Court to certify an interlocutory appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), and moved for leave to appeal under Rule 23(f). Id. at *1. Plaintiffs sought permission to take an interlocutory appeal regarding the District Court's denial of class certification, while the certification motion pending before the District Court dealt with the decertification of the class. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff requested appellate clarification of the standard for decertification of a collective action, and whether the assertion of the retail sales exemption categorically precluded collective adjudication. Id. at *2. The Second Circuit denied Plaintiff's Rule 23(f) motion, finding that "an immediate appeal is unwarranted." Id. Recognizing that the Second Circuit's decision to deny the Rule 23(f) application did not require the District Court to deny the pending § 1292(b) certification motion, the District Court nonetheless reached the same conclusion, and held that Plaintiffs had not satisfied the high standard for certification of an interlocutory appeal. Id. The District Court determined that Plaintiffs had not satisfied the criteria of § 1292(b). First, the District Court stated that there was not a "substantial ground for difference of opinion" on the issue at hand, as case law authorities that have addressed similar situations and have reached the same conclusion. Id. at *3. Second, the District Court opined that the proposed interlocutory appeal would not advance the ultimate termination of the litigation because any decision on the merits would be delayed by an appeal, and piecemeal appeals that do not "materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation," are strongly discouraged. Id. Further, because the Second Circuit denied Defendants' request for interlocutory appeal under Rule 23(f) regarding the denial of class certification, the District Court found it is highly unlikely that if it were to certify an interlocutory appeal under § 1292(b) that the Second Circuit would exercise its discretion to accept that interlocutory appeal. Accordingly, the District Court denied Plaintiffs' motion.

Ferreras, et al. v. American Airlines,* Case No. 16-CV-2427 (D.N.J. May 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA and the New Jersey Wage & Hour Law ("NJWHL"). Specifically, Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants: (i) paid them straight hourly wages for hours worked in excess of 40 hours in a week as a result of voluntary shift trades with other employees ("shift trade claim"); (ii) required them to perform work before clocking-in and after clocking-out during meal breaks without compensation ("uncompensated time claim"); and (iii) configured time clocks to round down and reduce the amount of time employees were credited with performing work ("rounding down claim"). Id. at 2. The Court previously granted Defendant partial summary judgment pursuant to Rule 56 as to the shift trade claim, and denied summary judgment to Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs sought to take an immediate appeal from the Court's determination concerning the shift trade claim. The Court noted that in order to permit Plaintiffs to pursue an immediate appeal, the Court would need to exercise its discretion to find that the reasoning underlying the order contained a controlling question of law upon which there was a substantial ground for a difference of opinion and that the appeal would materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation. Id. at 3. Plaintiffs argued that there was no cause to delay appeal of the issues related to the shift trade claims because there was no relationship between those claims and Plaintiffs' other claims. Id. at 4. Thus, Plaintiffs asserted that no future developments in the litigation would moot the possibility for review and an appeal of the issue would facilitate resolution of the litigation. Id. The Court found that there was no reason to exercise its discretion to deviate from the ordinary policy of avoiding the facilitation of an immediate appeal that would not materially advance the termination of the litigation. Id. at 5. The Court stated that Plaintiffs would have an opportunity to seek appellate review if they continued in prosecuting their other claims. Further, the Court was not convinced that there was a substantial ground for a difference of opinion regarding the relevant question of law. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion.

Johnson, et al. v. Serenity Transportation, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 117192 (N.D. Cal. July 26, 2017). Plaintiff, a labor contractor, brought a class and collective action alleging that Defendant Serenity Transportation ("Serenity") misclassified him as an independent contractor rather than an employee and therefore denied him the benefits of the FLSA and California law. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff also sued Defendants SCI and the County of Santa Clara under a joint employer theory, arguing that both entities were jointly and severally liable for Serenity's wage & hour violations. The Court granted summary judgment to SCI and the County on the joint employer common law claims and deferred its decision as to whether, as a matter of law, SCI was subject to liability under § 2810 of the California Labor Code. Id. at *2. The Court requested further briefing regarding the exemption for "five or fewer workers supplied by a labor contractor or labor contractors to the client employer at any given time" under § 2810.3. The Court also denied SCI's motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff's § 2810.3 claim. SCI filed a motion to certify for interlocutory appeal the Court's order denying Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to Plaintiff's § 2810.3 claim and to stay further proceedings. Id. Defendants argued that the Court's order met the three requirements for an interlocutory appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), including: (i) the order involved a controlling question of law; (ii) there was substantial ground for differences of opinion; and (iii) an immediate appeal would materially advance the litigation. The Court found that there was no controlling question of law because the questions that SCI sought to have reviewed were mixed questions of law and fact. Id. at *4. The proposed appellate review would require statutory analysis regarding the definitions of "supplied" and "any given time" and application of the statute's words to the actual facts. In such circumstances, the Court stated that it was preferable to review the question on the basis of established trial facts. Id. As to the second factor, the Court determined that SCI also failed to demonstrate that substantial ground for a difference of opinion existed. While Defendants argued that the controlling law had not been addressed by another U.S. District Court in California, the Ninth Circuit specifically had held that such circumstances do not create a substantial ground for a difference of opinion. Id. at *5. Moreover, the Court found that Defendants had not "provided a single case that conflicts" with the Court's construction or application of § 2810.3. Id. at *6. Finally, the Court held that an appeal would not materially advance the litigation because it would do nothing about the claims against Serenity, and therefore would certainly delay the litigation, especially because Defendants were asking the entire case to be stayed in the interim. Id. at *6-7. Accordingly, the Court denied SCI's motion to certify for interlocutory appeal the Court's order denying Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to Plaintiff's § 2810.3 claim and to stay further proceedings.

Scott, et al. v. Chipotle Mexican Grill, Inc., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 156640 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of salaried apprentices, brought a nationwide class and collective action alleging that Defendant did not pay them overtime and spread-of-hours compensation in violation of the FLSA and New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Id. at *22. The Court had previously denied Plaintiffs' motion for Rule 23 class certification and also decertified Plaintiffs' FLSA collective action Id. Plaintiffs sought leave for interlocutory review of the Court's decision pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b). Plaintiffs also requested review from the Second Circuit pursuant to Rule 23(f). Id. at *23. The Second Circuit granted Plaintiffs' request for interlocutory review because "an immediate appeal is warranted." Id. Thereafter, the parties stipulated to stay the action until after the Second Circuit's review of the grant of Plaintiffs' § 1292(b) motion. The Court explained that it could certify a matter for interlocutory appeal when: (i) the order appealed from presents a controlling question of law; (ii) as to which there is a substantial ground for difference of opinion; and (iii) an immediate appeal from the order may materially advance the ultimate termination of litigation. Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs met their burden in demonstrating the § 1292(b) factors. The Court noted that Plaintiffs' § 1292(b) motion centered on whether a conflict existed in the Second Circuit between Rule 23 standards for class certification and § 216(b) standards for certification of a collective action under the FLSA. Id. at *24. Plaintiffs contended that the Court's order reflected the uncertainty in differences between the two standards. The Court disagreed with Plaintiffs' argument that there was a "rift" between the Rule 23 and § 216(b) standards, but it found that Plaintiffs' assertions pointed to controlling questions of law that may have substantial grounds for a difference of opinion. Id. The Court stated that although the Second Circuit will review its Rule 23 class certification decision pursuant to Rule 23(f), the review would not likely encompass the portion of the Court's decision decertifying the § 216(b) collective action. Id. Given that Plaintiffs argued that the Court erred in applying the standards, the Court held that it was proper to grant § 1292(b) relief in order for the Second Circuit to review the entire order. Id. The Court held that review of the entire order would avoid the possibility of conflicting decisions on Plaintiffs' class motions, promote judicial efficiency, and avoid piecemeal appellate litigation. Id. at *24-25. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for interlocutory appeal.

Senne, et al. v. Kansas City Royals Baseball, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 69337 (N.D. Cal. May 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of baseball players, brought an action alleging wage & hour violations pursuant to the FLSA. Plaintiffs sought conditional certification of a collective action. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. Subsequently, on Defendants' motion, the Court decertified the collective action and granted Defendant's motion to exclude Plaintiffs' expert. Id. at *66. Upon Plaintiffs' renewed motion, the Court reversed itself and certified a narrower collective action under the FLSA including those related to Plaintiffs' expert's survey. Id. at *67. The Court granted Defendant's motions to certify the order for appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) on two issues and stayed all matters pending appeal. Id. at *76. The Court concluded that two issues satisfied the requirements of 28 U.S.C. 1292(b) and certified those issues for interlocutory appeal. Id. at *69. The first issue was the Court's reliance on the "continuous workday" rule in support of its conclusion that Plaintiffs' claims could be addressed on collective basis. Id. The second issue was the Court's conclusion that the survey of Plaintiffs' expert was admissible. Id. In concluding that Plaintiffs' FLSA claims could be handled collectively, the Court acknowledged that variations in Plaintiffs' arrival and departure times, work routines, and activities raised difficult questions about whether Plaintiffs could prove the amount and extent of their work on a collective basis. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs would be able to do so, because Plaintiffs' narrowed the proposed collective action to exclude winter work and relied upon the "continuous workday" rule with the survey its expert produced. Id. at *70. The Court found little case law to guide it in deciding whether it could allow Plaintiffs in an FLSA collective action to rely on a survey such as the one that Plaintiffs offered to establish the type and amount of work performed by the collective action. Id. at *71. The Court further found that reasonable minds could differ as to whether Plaintiffs' reliance on the "continuous workday" doctrine and the survey results in support was permissible where players' arrival and departure times varied significantly, and where their arrival and departure times did not necessarily coincide with the time they devoted to team activities. Id. at *70. Further, Defendant asserted a Daubert challenge to the admissibility of the expert's survey. Id. at *72. The Court ruled that many of the problems with the expert's survey went to the weight of the evidence and not its admissibility. Id. However, the Court noted a split in the Ninth Circuit as to the degree of rigor that should be applied in evaluating the admissibility of survey evidence in the class certification context. Under a more rigorous standard, the expert's survey might have been excluded on the basis that it was not sufficiently probative of collective-wide liability and then the FLSA collective action might not have been certified. The Court concluded that these questions involve controlling questions of law as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion. Id. at *72. Because the questions had crucial implications for whether a collective action may be certified, the Court reasoned that an immediate appeal from its order would materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation. Id. The Court also ruled that a stay was warranted because there were serious questions on to the merits and the potential harm to the parties in entering a stay, as opposed to allowing the case to move forward, favored a stay. Id. at *74-75. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motions.

Taylor, et al. v. Pilot Corp.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 11036 (6th Cir. June 19, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of hourly employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant routinely altered time records to avoid paying overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, which the District Court granted. The District Court also denied Defendant's motion for a stay. Defendant appealed both decisions and, on appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling denying Defendant's motion for a stay and declined to consider the District Court's ruling granting Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification because it lacked jurisdiction. The Sixth Circuit stated that it lacked authority to review a conditional certification decision on interlocutory appeal because the statute providing general appellate jurisdiction allows appeals only from a District Court's "final decisions." Id. at *7. The Sixth Circuit noted that a District Court's decision to approve notice to members of a conditionally-certified FLSA collective action is not a final judgment on the merits, and, therefore, the Sixth Circuit cannot hear immediate appeals from conditional certification decisions. Id. Defendant argued that the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") allows immediate appeal over certain interlocutory orders. The FAA allows for an immediate appeal from "[a]n order . . . refusing to stay any action under section 3" of the FAA. Id. The Sixth Circuit concluded that the District Court did not err in denying Defendant's motion for a stay of the proceeding. Id. at *8. Defendant requested a stay "until all arbitrations have been had" as alternative relief to its request that the District Court remove employees with arbitration agreements from the parameters of the conditional certification order. Id. However, the Sixth Circuit determined that no Plaintiff in the litigation had a claim referable to arbitration. Although some opt-in Plaintiffs could have a claim, because they had yet to opt-in to the action, Defendant lacked any entitlement to a stay under the FAA. Id. at *9. Defendant further argued that the denial of its motion to dismiss employees with arbitration agreements from the conditionally certified collective action constituted an appealable order under § 4 of the FAA. Defendant challenged the District Court's conditional certification determination that employees met the FLSA's similarly-situated requirement and thus should receive notice about the action. Id. at *12. The Sixth Circuit found that simply because Defendant called its motion a "motion to dismiss" did not mean that the District Court's rejection of the motion rendered it an appealable order. Id. at *13. Therefore, the Sixth Circuit determined that it had jurisdiction over Defendant's appeal only as to the District Court's denial of the request for a stay. Further, the Sixth Circuit concluded that the District Court did not err in denying Defendant's request for a stay and affirmed the ruling.

Yu, et al. v. Hasaki Restaurant Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 54597 (S.D.N.Y. April 10, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant employees, filed a collective action against Defendant alleging violations of the FLSA. The parties entered into a settlement agreement pursuant to Rule 68. The parties asserted that the settlement did not require judicial approval because the language of Rule 68 provides that "the clerk must…enter judgement." Id. at *5. The Court disagreed, noting a split in the Second Circuit on the issue of whether settlement of an FLSA claim pursuant to Rule 68 requires judicial approval. Id. The Court held that FLSA claims fall within the narrow class of claims that cannot be settled under Rule 68 without approval of the Court or the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL"), in light of the Second Circuit's decision in Cheeks v. Freeport Pancakes House, Inc., F.3d 199

(2d Cir. 2015). Cheeks held that judicial or DOL approval of a FLSA settlement is necessary pursuant to Rule 41, because of the potential for abuse and to promote the purposes of the FLSA. Id. at *4. As to this issue, the Court certified an interlocutory appeal, finding that the order involved a controlling question of law for which there was a substantial ground for difference of opinion. Id. at *16.

(iv) Application Of Twombly Pleading Standards In FLSA Collective Actions

Cooley, et al. v. HRM Of Alabama,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 54840 (N.D. Ala. April 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of healthcare workers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and state labor law by failing to pay Plaintiffs overtime for time that they were required to perform work duties during lunch. Id. at *2. Pursuant to 12(b)(6), Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' three-count complaint based on Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007). The Court granted the motion in part and denied it in part. The Court dismissed count one without prejudice, ruling that Plaintiffs were required to plead factual allegations that they worked more than 40 hours of compensable work in at least one week and the type of compensable work that they were required to perform during lunch. Id. at *15, 19. Count two alleged a breach of an implied contract based upon the employee handbook. The Court dismissed it with prejudice, as Plaintiffs conceded that the signed disclaimers to the handbook precluded an implied contract claim. Id. at *8. The Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss as to count three of the complaint seeking equitable relief under a quantum meruit theory. The Court rejected Defendant's arguments that count three was based upon the same implied contract theory as count two, and therefore should be dismissed as duplicative. Id. at *9. The Court ruled that count three was based upon an implied contract arising out of the parties' dealings and not the employee handbook. Id. The Court also rejected Defendant's argument that the quantum meruit claim was preempted by the FLSA, because equitable relief is only available when there is no other remedy at law. Id. at *9. In rejecting Defendant's argument that the FLSA preempted the quantum meruit claim, the Court ruled that the FLSA does not cover "gap time." Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion in part and denied it in part.

Roth, et al. v. Lifetime Fitness, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66083 (D. Minn. May 1, 2017). Plaintiff, a fitness instructor, brought unjust enrichment claims on an individual and class-wide basis against Defendant. Plaintiff sought to represent a class of spinning, aerobics, and yoga instructors seeking relief from Defendant for time spent preparing for and cleaning up after fitness classes. Defendant moved to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiff failed to plead facts supporting an unjust enrichment claim and that her claim was barred because she had an adequate remedy at law. The Court denied Defendant's motion. Plaintiff alleged that she and the other instructors were required to perform work that preceded and followed each of her fitness classes. Id. at *2. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant only paid group instructors for actual class time, and that it under-paid class members for actual time worked. Plaintiff asserted that she had properly pled the elements of an unjust enrichment claim under Minnesota law, including that she "conferred a benefit upon [Life Time] in the form of uncompensated labor;" and that Defendant "appreciated, knew, and accepted this benefit" in a manner "that it is inequitable for them to retain it without paying class members the full amount of wages due and owing to them for that benefit of uncompensated labor." Id. at *4. Defendant contended that Plaintiff failed to sufficiently plead facts to support an unjust enrichment claim. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff alleged only that she "performed labor for Defendants in exchange for hourly wages." Id. at *6-7. Plaintiff also stated that her pre-class and post-class work was "unpaid." Id. at *7. Defendant contended that these allegations of "hourly" wages and "unpaid" work were conclusory, and the Court should not accept them as true under Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007). Id. However, the Court noted that at this stage of proceedings, it must accept Plaintiff's factual allegations as true, and she alleged she earned "hourly wages." Id. Therefore, in accepting Plaintiff's allegations that she was paid hourly and that she was not compensated for performing some of her job duties, the Court opined Plaintiff had advanced sufficient facts for an inference that she conferred the benefit of performing unpaid work duties and structuring the employment relationship in this way could be considered unjust, i.e., meaning fraudulent, illegal, or a moral wrongdoing similar in nature to fraud. Id. at *7-8. Defendant further argued that Plaintiff's unjust enrichment claim failed because she had an adequate legal remedy, which barred her claim. The Court opined that Minnesota case law authority did not state that a Plaintiff must establish the lack of an adequate remedy at law at the pleadings stage. Id. at *8. Defendant also argued that the facts as pleaded by Plaintiff established that she had an adequate remedy at law under the Ohio Prompt Pay Act ("OPPA"), which requires a corporation doing business in Ohio to "pay all its employees the wages earned by them" by the first and fifteenth of each month. Id. at *9. Plaintiff disputed that the OPPA provided a stand-alone remedy. The Court determined that it was not entirely clear that Plaintiff would have an adequate remedy at law under the OPPA. The Court therefore denied Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's unjust enrichment claim.

Walden, et al. v. State Of Nevada Department Of Corrections,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39657 (D. Nev. Mar. 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of correctional officers, brought a collective and class action on behalf of themselves and all other similarly-situated individuals alleging various causes of action for unpaid wages under both the FLSA and the Nevada Revised Statutes. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant subjected all proposed class members to a common plan, policy, or practice of requiring them to perform various activities "off-the-clock" and without compensation allegedly in violation of the FLSA. Id. at *10-11. Plaintiffs further alleged that they were not paid minimum wage or overtime when accounting for these additional hours worked. Id. at *11. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court granted in part. Invoking Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to state viable FLSA claims because they did not allege that they were paid below the minimum wage for each pay period and that they worked more than 40 hours in any workweek without compensation. Id. at *12. Plaintiffs asserted that they were not compensated for performing the pre-shift and post-shift activities alleged in the complaint. Id. Plaintiffs alleged they were required to work but were not compensated for working "upwards to 30-minutes of compensable work" before, and after, "their regularly scheduled shifts." Id. at *13. Plaintiffs also sought overtime compensation for hours worked in excess of 40 hours in a workweek pursuant to the FLSA. Id. The Court held that Plaintiffs' claims as alleged were insufficient under Twombly to draw the reasonable inference that Defendant failed to comply with the FLSA's minimum wage and overtime requirements. Id. at *14. The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to allege sufficient facts – such as the length of their workweek, the hours they purportedly worked for any given workweek, their regular rate of pay or average rate of pay, and the amount of overtime wages they believe are owed – to assert plausible claims. Id. For example, the Court explained that if Plaintiffs worked a 30-hour workweek, then Defendant's failure to compensate them for an additional hour per workday at the overtime rate would not violate the FLSA because they worked no more than 37 hours, assuming a 7-day workweek. Id. Similarly, if Plaintiffs' hourly rate was significantly above the minimum wage, their hourly rate of pay might still be above the minimum wage when their compensation for the workweek was averaged across their total time worked for the workweek. Absent such additional allegations, the Court stated that Plaintiff failed to state a plausible claim for relief for failure to pay the minimum wage and overtime as required under the FLSA. Id. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' FLSA overtime and minimum wage claims. Id. at *14-15. Because the Court dismissed the FLSA claims, it declined to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the remaining state law claims pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c). The Court therefore granted Defendant's motion to dismiss in part.

(v) Arbitration Of Wage & Hour Class Claims

Armenta, et al. v. Staffworks,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114266 (S.D. Cal. July 21, 2017). Plaintiff, a temporary employee, filed a class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay all wages due in violation of the FLSA and California labor law. Defendant moved to compel arbitration of Plaintiff's claims based on an arbitration agreement she signed as part of her pre-employment paperwork. Defendant also moved to strike Plaintiff's class claims, and stay the action pending the outcome of arbitration. The Court noted that given that employees have the right to pursue employment claims collectively, an agreement violates the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") when employees are: (i) limited to pursuing claims in only one forum; and (ii) prevented from acting in concert in that forum. Id. at *7. The Court stated that in this case, the arbitration agreement at issue limited Plaintiff to pursuing employment claims in only one forum (i.e., arbitration). Id. The Court therefore determined whether the agreement also prevented Plaintiff from acting in concert with other employees in that forum, i.e., participating in class arbitration. Id. Before analyzing whether the agreement allowed employees to act in concert in arbitration, the Court stated that it must consider whether the parties had delegated this determination to the arbitrator. Id. at *8. Although federal policy favors arbitration agreements, the Court noted that the U.S. Supreme Court has made clear that there is an exception to this policy – "the question [of] whether the parties have submitted a particular dispute to arbitration, i.e., the 'question of arbitrability,' is 'an issue for judicial determination [u]nless the parties clearly and unmistakably provide otherwise.'" Id. Here, the Court found that there was no evidence that the parties had "clearly and unmistakably" delegated to the arbitrator the question of arbitrability of class claims, as the agreement contained "no specific language delegating any threshold question of arbitrability to the arbitrator, nor does it contain a reference to any arbitration rules which do so." Id. Therefore, the Court found no clear and unmistakable evidence that the parties intended the arbitrator to decide whether the agreement permitted class arbitration. Id. The Court held that the arbitration agreement Plaintiff signed made no reference to class proceedings. Additionally, neither party submitted evidence that the parties expected or intended class arbitration to be authorized. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court determined that class arbitration was not available because there was no contractual basis for concluding the parties agreed to authorize it. Further, the Court found that by moving to compel individual arbitration and strike Plaintiff's class claims, Defendant was seeking to enforce a construction of the agreement that violated § 8 of the NLRA, because denying Plaintiff the opportunity to pursue class claims would implicate the antithesis of § 7's substantive right to pursue concerted work-related legal claims. Id. at *14. The Court explained that § 7 of the NLRA provided Plaintiff the right to engage in concerted activity, and § 8 forbid Defendant from interfering with this right. Id. at *17. The Court determined that Defendant's attempt to compel arbitration and strike class claims was an attempt to limit Plaintiff to arbitration and prevent her from acting in concert in arbitration. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Court found the arbitration agreement unenforceable, and denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Bey, et al. v. XPO Logistics*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144797 (M.D. Fla. Sept. 7, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration, contending that Plaintiffs submitted to arbitration by signing employment agreements with arbitration agreements. Plaintiffs argued that: (i) Defendant waived its right to arbitrate; and (ii) notwithstanding waiver, the arbitration provision was unenforceable because it was unconscionable under North Carolina law. Id. at *4. The Court began its analysis with Plaintiffs' waiver argument. Plaintiffs contended that Defendant acted inconsistently with the right to arbitrate, as Defendant: (i) filed an answer that failed to raise arbitration as an affirmative defense; (ii) participated in the preparation and filing of a case management report, which indicated that the parties did not agree to arbitration; and (iii) complied with its disclosure obligations under the FLSA and Rule 26. According to Plaintiffs, such conduct prejudiced them by raising their litigation costs, and Defendant thereby waived its right to compel arbitration. Id. at *6-7. The Court noted that not all litigation activities resulted in a waiver, and the Eleventh Circuit has found waiver only in cases with long delays and extensive use of discovery or motion practice prior to a Defendant's assertion of its arbitration right. Id. at *7. Further, any delay must be "coupled with other substantial conduct inconsistent with an intent to arbitrate." Id. at *8. The Court held that Plaintiffs pointed to no other substantial conduct inconsistent with Defendant's intent to arbitrate, and the weight of authority thereby counseled against a finding of substantial participation on this record. Id. at *9. Even if the Court concluded that Defendant's conduct amounted to substantial participation, it stated that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate prejudice. Plaintiffs argue that Defendant's delay in seeking to compel arbitration has raised their litigation costs, but failed to identify what litigation expenses they incurred or the amount. Id. The Court stated that given the limited nature of the proceedings, Plaintiffs could not have expended more than minimal time and resources in prosecuting the action. The Court next turned to whether it could decide the merits of Plaintiffs' unconscionability argument. It determined that it could not. The Court found that when, as here, "an arbitration agreement contains a delegation provision and Plaintiff raises a challenge to the contract as a whole, "the Court may not review his claim" because it has been committed to the power of the arbitrator." Id. at *10. Thus, the Court would have jurisdiction to review a challenge only to the delegation provision specifically. Id. Thus, for the Court to examine the merits of Plaintiffs' unconscionability argument, Plaintiffs must have alleged that the delegation provision specifically – and not just the arbitration provision as a whole – is unconscionable. The Court determined that neither party even mentioned the delegation provision. As Plaintiffs failed to challenge the delegation provision specifically, the Court ruled that it must treat it as valid under § 2 of the Federal Arbitration Act and leave any challenge to the enforceability of the arbitration provision as a whole for the arbitrator. The Court therefore granted Defendant's motion to compel.

CFL Pizza, LLC v. Hammack, et al.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14081 (M.D. Fla. Feb. 1, 2017). Defendant, a delivery driver, alleged that Plaintiff failed to pay minimum wages in violation of the FLSA. In connection with his employment, Defendant signed an arbitration agreement providing for confidential binding arbitration for any claims that arose between Plaintiff and Defendant including, without limitation, any claims "concerning compensation, employment, . . . or termination of employment." Id. at *2. The arbitration agreement further provided that the prevailing employment dispute resolution rules of the American Arbitration Association applied, and that claims subject to arbitration would be brought only in an individual capacity, and not as a representative Plaintiff on behalf of any purported class, collective or consolidated action. Id. Defendant filed a claim with the AAA, individually and on behalf of all other similarly-situated persons, seeking unpaid minimum wages under the FLSA. Plaintiff then filed a lawsuit and asserted that Defendant intended to pursue a collective action with the arbitrator, which effectively amounted to an effort to deprive Plaintiff of its contractual rights under the arbitration agreement. Plaintiff sought an order compelling Defendant to submit his claims to individual arbitration in accordance with the terms provided for in arbitration agreement. Id. at *3. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's petition for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted. Plaintiff argued that the Court, not the arbitrator, should decide whether the class/collective action waiver in the arbitration agreement was enforceable. Id. at *5. Plaintiff further asserted that that whether the class waiver was enforceable was an arbitrability issue for the Court rather than a procedural issue for the arbitrator. The Court found that the issue was for the arbitrator to decide regardless of whether it is a procedural issue or an arbitrability issue. Id. at *6. The Court opined that if it was a procedural question, the decision was for the arbitrator under the long-established default rule. The Court further remarked that even if the issue was a question of arbitrability, it was also for the arbitrator to decide because the parties clearly and unmistakably provided in their arbitration agreement that issues of arbitrability were for the arbitrator. Id. The Court concluded that the parties bargained for the arbitrator's construction of their contract, including the arbitrator's rulings on procedural and arbitrability issues, and therefore the issue of whether Defendant may pursue his claims through class or collective arbitration was for the arbitrator to decide. The Court therefore denied Plaintiff's motion to order Defendant to submit his claims to individual arbitration.

Chen, et al. v. Kyoto Sushi, Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 155853 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 22, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant workers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants violated certain provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Defendants filed a motion to compel arbitration pursuant to an employment agreement that purportedly contained a binding arbitration clause. The Court granted the motion. Defendants argued that the language in the agreement required Plaintiffs to arbitrate their FLSA and NYLL claims on an individual basis. Id. at *4-5. In response, Plaintiffs argued that: (i) the arbitration agreement was unenforceable because it violated federal law; (ii) the arbitration agreement was unconscionable under New York State law; (iii) Plaintiffs signed the arbitration agreement as a result of economic duress; and (iv) the FLSA claims should be collectively certified under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. at *5. The Court determined that Plaintiffs signed the arbitration agreement and thereby bound themselves to its terms. Id. at *7. The Court found that Plaintiffs' claims were within the scope of the arbitration clause because the agreement covered "any claim or cause of action alleging Employee is an employee of employer and/or was improperly or insufficiently paid wages under the Fair Labor Standards Act ('FLSA') or state or local wage & hour law" and subjected any such claims to binding arbitration. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs argued that the arbitration agreement was unenforceable because it barred collective actions in violation of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") and because their rights to pursue a collective action under the FLSA were non-waivable. Id. at *9. The Court disagreed. The Court explained that the Second Circuit has held that the FLSA does not include a "contrary congressional command" that prevents the underlying arbitration agreement from being enforced by its terms. Id. at *11. Plaintiffs also contended that the circumstances surrounding the execution of the agreement made it unconscionable under New York state law. Id. at *11-12. The Court stated that, to establish unconscionability under New York law, there must be a showing that the contract is both procedurally and substantively unconscionable. Id. at *12. As such, the Court ruled that, even if the Court were to assume that Plaintiffs established procedural unconscionability, they did not contend that any part of the agreement was substantively unconscionable, and therefore the agreement could not be unconscionable. Id. at *13. Plaintiffs also claimed that the agreement was unenforceable as the product of economic duress because Defendants threatened to unlawfully withhold pay and terminate Plaintiffs' employment if they did not sign the agreement. Id. The Court opined that the alleged threats to withhold pay or terminate did not rise to the level of economic duress and, while Plaintiffs may have been faced with a difficult choice, "difficult choices do not constitute duress." Id. at *14. Finally, the Court held that Plaintiffs signed the binding valid agreement, and thereby agreed to arbitrate their FLSA claims on an individual basis, so conditional certification of a collective action was not warranted. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to compel arbitration.

Cicero, et al. v. Quality Dining, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 50257 (D.N.J. April 3, 2017). Plaintiff, a server, brought a collective and class action asserted that Defendants' tip pooling and tip credit policies violated the FLSA and the New Jersey Wage & Hour Law ("NJWHL"). Defendants filed a motion to dismiss and sought to enforce the mandatory arbitration agreement and class action waiver Plaintiff signed. Id. at *1. Plaintiff signed an arbitration agreement that stated that "Employee and the Company mutually agree that any and all claims or disputes. . . shall be heard and decided by a neutral arbitrator . . . ." Id. at *2. The agreement also contained a class action waiver limiting the claims to that of the employee. Id. at *3. Plaintiff asserted that the arbitration agreement violated the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"), and was therefore unenforceable. The Court stated that this same issue was presently before both the Third Circuit and the U.S. Supreme Court, and the federal circuits that had ruled on the issue were split. Id. The Court reasoned that in a related action brought by former employees of Defendants' restaurants in Pennsylvania, the Court considered the identical arbitration agreement and held that it did not violate the NLRA. Id. at *3-4. The Court had declined to follow recent out-of-circuit decisions holding such a waiver void under the NLRA and instead considered the holdings of the Fifth Circuit and other case law authorities that enforced class arbitration waivers under the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"). Id. at *4. The Court therefore adopted the reasoning of the Second, Fifth, and Eight Circuits that there is no "inherent conflict" between the FAA and NLRA, particularly in light of the strong public policy considerations underlying the FAA and the general understanding that the NLRA permits and requires arbitration in labor disputes. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss and to compel arbitration.

Doe, et al. v. Swift Transportation Co., Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2410 (D. Ariz. Jan. 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of truck drivers, filed suit against Defendant alleging various labor law claims in terms of their alleged misclassification as independent contractors. Defendant moved to compel arbitration based upon the terms of the employment contract between the parties, which included an arbitration clause. Plaintiffs opposed the motion on the basis that they were employees and not independent contractors, and that they were exempt from arbitration pursuant to the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"). Id. at *3. The FAA exempts "contracts of employment of . . . workers engaged in foreign or interstate commerce." Id. at 3. Initially, the Court concluded that the issue of whether Plaintiffs were employees and exempt from arbitration was a question for the arbitrator. On appeal, that order was reversed on the grounds that the Court must first determine whether the agreement was exempt from the FAA before ruling on a motion to compel arbitration. Id.* At *5. On remand, the Court found that the contract was a contract of employment and Plaintiffs were exempt from arbitration. In making its determination, the Court declined to rule whether it merely had to look at the four corners of the contract or if it should also look to facts outside of the contract as to how the contract operated, because under either scenario the contract operated as an employment contract. Id. at *9. In making its determination the Court considered that the agreed upon work in the contract was at the very core of Defendant's business of delivering freight. The Court also focused the permanent nature of the agreement, as it was automatically extended every year, thereby indicating that the contract was not for a specific project for a limited time. The Court further analyzed the degree of control that Defendant exercised over Plaintiffs in that Defendant had the right to terminate unilaterally without notice and controlled the delivery schedule. Further, per the contract, Plaintiffs were required to "comply with any company policy." Id. at *14. The Court also found that it was significant that under the agreement that Plaintiffs had to use equipment that was compatible with the company equipment and that Plaintiffs all obtained the trucks through a rental agreement/ leasing contract, which was incorporated into their employment agreement. The contract offered cost-advancing equipment leasing agreements whereby Defendant would pay for the equipment by deducting from Plaintiffs' earnings. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs were independent contractors and relied upon the language in the contract stating that Plaintiffs were independent contractors who were not entitled to workers' compensation and that Plaintiffs would have control over the method of means of work daily. The Court rejected the Defendant's assertion that Plaintiffs were not required to work a set number of hours because in practice the drivers needed to drive the same number of hours as Defendant's employee-drivers to satisfy the leasing agreements. The Court found that the lease agreement curtailed any provisions allowing Plaintiffs to operate as a distinct business. Evidence outside of the agreement also suggested that it was not practical for Plaintiffs to work for other carriers because the contract required drivers to return all the materials under Defendant's authority and its licenses before driving for another company. Moreover, Defendant chose Plaintiffs from its employee pool of drivers before entering into the agreements and Plaintiffs never held themselves out as independent contractors. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiffs had contracts of employment and were exempt from arbitration.

Echevarria, et al. v. Aerotek, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1047 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 3, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action against Defendant, a temporary staffing company, alleging violation of the California Labor

Code, Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"), and Unfair Competition Law based upon Defendant's failure to pay temporary employees for time spent attending mandatory meetings. Defendant hired Plaintiff for a temporary position and sent him a welcome email with directions to complete their "on-line onboarding paperwork" and a link to complete the new-hire paperwork on-line. Id. at *1. Among the documents Plaintiff completed as part of the process was a "Mutual Arbitration Agreement." Id. at *2. The agreement provided that all claims between the parties would be resolved in arbitration, and all claims must be brought in a party's individual capacity and may not be brought as a class action. The agreement also provided that Plaintiff's signature and acknowledgment of the agreement was not required for the agreement to be enforced and that once Plaintiff began working he was deemed to have consented and accepted the agreement. Plaintiff electronically signed the "Mutual Arbitration Agreement" and Defendant electronically counter-signed it. Plaintiff worked for one week and then resigned. Subsequently, Plaintiff filed his lawsuit, and Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's class claim, compel arbitration of his individual claim, and stay his claim under the PAGA. The Court denied Defendant's motion. The Court denied the motion to dismiss Plaintiff's class claim on the basis that the class action waiver in the "Mutual Arbitration Agreement" was unenforceable because Plaintiff was not given a meaningful opportunity to opt- out of the agreement. The Court noted that the application failed to inform Plaintiff that he could opt-out of the agreement and the agreement stated that it would be enforced whether or not Plaintiff signed the Mutual Arbitration Agreement. The Court also denied the motion to compel arbitration of Plaintiff's individual claim, reasoning that compelling him to arbitrate his individual claim would effectively preclude him from pursuing his class claim. Accordingly, the Court ruled that the motion to stay the PAGA claim was moot.

Essex, et al. v. Children's Place, Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 198595 (D.N.J. Dec. 4, 2017). Plaintiff, a store manager, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. The Court had previously entered an order that conditionally certified a collective action consisting of store managers. The Court did not address any potential arbitration agreement at the conditional certification stage. Over 200 of the 377 opt-in Plaintiffs signed arbitration agreements with Defendant. Defendant subsequently moved to compel arbitration as to the opt-in Plaintiffs who signed an arbitration agreement. The Court agreed that that the parties entered into a valid arbitration agreement and that the dispute at issue fell within the scope of the arbitration agreement. Id. at *12-13. The agreement applied to "any dispute arising out of or related to Associate's application for employment, employment, or separation of employment with The Children's Place regardless of its date of accrual and survives after the employment relationship terminates." Id. at *13. The Court held that the current suit fell within the scope of this language as it concerned appropriate pay during the time that the relevant opt-in Plaintiffs were employed by Defendant. The opt-in Plaintiffs asserted that they had a right to engage in concerted legal action and that the "class, collective, and representation action waiver" (the "waiver") in the arbitration agreement violated that right. Id. at *14. Plaintiffs further argued that the "opt out right" in the arbitration agreement made the agreement legal. The Court disagreed, and determined that the relevant opt-on Plaintiffs were not required to participate in Defendant's arbitration program as a condition of employment. Defendant's "arbitration agreement announcement" and the arbitration agreement itself expressly stated that signing the agreement not a mandatory condition of employment, and the agreement had a clear "opt out" provision. Id. The Court noted that several Plaintiffs who had opted-in to the lawsuit had opted-out of the arbitration agreement. Accordingly, the Court held that opt-in Plaintiffs who signed the arbitration agreement entered into a valid and enforceable arbitration agreement and that this dispute fell within the scope of the agreement. Id. at *15. Thus, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration as to the relevant opt-in Plaintiffs who did not previously opt-out of arbitration.

Fozard, et al. v. C.R. England, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38537 (N.D. Tex. Mar. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of truck drivers, alleged that Defendant failed to pay overtime in violation of the FLSA and pay for off-the-clock work in violation of Texas' wage statute. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs enrolled in Defendant's truck driving school to gain the training and experience necessary to obtain a commercial driver's license before becoming an employee. Before beginning classes, Plaintiffs signed an arbitration agreement. Plaintiffs subsequently became employed as employee-driver trainees. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration. Plaintiffs contended that Defendant's motion should be denied because Defendant waived its right to enforce an agreement to arbitrate because it substantially invoked litigation as a means of adjudicating the present dispute. Id. The Court noted that the Fifth Circuit follows a two-step procedure in deciding whether to compel arbitration, including: (i) determine whether the parties agreed to arbitrate the dispute in question; and (ii) determine whether any external legal constraints foreclosed arbitration of the dispute. Id. at *3-4. The Court stated that the question of whether an arbitration agreement covered the claims at issue was ordinarily a question for the Court, but where the arbitration agreement contained a delegation clause giving the arbitrator the primary power to rule on the arbitrability of a specific claim, the analysis changed. Id. at *8. The Court explained that here the parties disputed over the presence of a valid delegation clause. Plaintiffs argued that the issue of arbitrability of certain claims was a question for the Court because Defendant had not sufficiently asserted the supremacy of any delegation clause. Defendant responded by pointing to the agreement and its express delegation of authority to the arbitrator to decide questions of arbitrability. Id. at *9. The Court noted that the language of the agreement provided that: “covered claims shall include any and all procedural, substantive and gateway issues, including, without limitation, any dispute between the parties relating to the scope of the arbitrator's powers, the interpretation or enforceability of this agreement or any part thereof, or the arbitrability of any dispute.” Id. at *9-10. The Court therefore found that the parties’ arbitration agreement provided that the arbitrator had authority to resolve disputes regarding the interpretation, scope, and enforceability of the arbitration agreement. Id. at *10. Further, the agreement expressly stated that the arbitrator had the authority to determine the arbitrability of any dispute. Id. The Court held that the clause was a valid and enforceable delegation clause. Defendant further argued that the agreement’s provision entitled "Class Action/Collective Action/And Other Group Proceeding Waivers" waived Plaintiffs' ability to bring their claims as a class or collective action. Id. at *14. The agreement stated that that "parties expressly waive any right to submit, initiate, or participate in any class, collective, consolidated, representative or joint action." Id. The Court reasoned that since the Supreme Court has enforced class and collective action waivers, and because Plaintiffs did not dispute the clause's enforceability, it found that Plaintiffs were barred from bringing their claims as a class or collective action. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant’s motion to compel arbitration.

Freeman, et al. v. Progress Residential Property Manager, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106158 (S.D. Tex. July 10, 2017). Plaintiff, an employee, filed a collective action asserting that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration and a motion to stay the action pending resolution of the motion to compel arbitration. The Court denied Defendant’s motion to compel arbitration and denied the motion to stay as moot. Id. at *1. At the commencement of her employment, Plaintiff signed an agreement to arbitration claims containing the following provision: “This Agreement to arbitrate shall survive the termination of my employment and the expiration of any benefit plan. It can only be revoked by a writing signed by the Company's President/CEO (or, if none, its highest-ranking official), specifically stating an intent to revoke this Agreement.” Id. at *2. Plaintiff argued that the agreement was illusory because Defendant retained the unilateral power to terminate the agreement. Id. Plaintiff further argued that because the provision was illusory, the agreement was unenforceable. Id. Defendant argued that it was up to the arbitrator, and not the Court, to decide whether to enforce the agreement. Id. at *2-3. The Court stated that the entire contract involved the duty to arbitrate, and therefore Plaintiff challenged the agreement as a whole "on the ground that the illegality of one of the contract's provisions renders the whole contract invalid.” Id. at *3-4. The Court determined that it was therefore its duty to decide whether the enforcement provision rendered the agreement unenforceable. The Court concluded that it did because while a mutual agreement to arbitrate provided sufficient consideration, "the agreement is illusory where one party has the unrestrained unilateral authority to terminate its obligation to arbitrate." Id. at *4. The Court found that Defendant alone retained the power to revoke the agreement, and therefore the agreement’s enforcement provision was not supported by consideration and must be considered illusory. The Court therefore denied Defendant’s motion to compel arbitration.

Galvan, et al. v. Michael Kors USA Holdings, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9059 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 19, 2017). Plaintiff, a wholesale inventory clerk, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated various state wage & hour laws. Defendants filed a motion to compel arbitration pursuant to an agreement Plaintiff signed with Defendant Adecco, at the commencement of her employment. Plaintiff claimed that Defendants failed to meet their burden of proof of establishing that a valid arbitration agreement existed between the parties because Defendants could not prove that Plaintiff signed the arbitration agreement. Adecco delivered its Dispute Resolution Agreement to associates through a secure system called US Verify whereby new associates may electronically sign the arbitration agreement. To access the onboarding documents in US Verify, an associate clicks an individualized web link, enters his/her registered email address, and submits personal information such as name, social security number, date of birth and zip code in mandatory fields. Defendants offer the "E-Signature Agreement," which reflects that Plaintiff agreed that "her electronic signature holds the same value as [her] signature." Id. at *10. Plaintiff also signed an "acknowledgement of company form," reflecting that Plaintiff "acknowledged receipt of, and has agreed to read, and hereby accepted" the "Employment Arbitration Rules." Id. at *11. The Court found that Defendants had shown, by a preponderance of the evidence, that Plaintiff signed the arbitration agreement. The Court stated that Defendants offered a detailed explanation of the US Verify system and its inherent security mechanisms to ensure the identity and knowledgeable assent of its new associates, i.e., associates are required to enter personal identifying information, proceed through various agreements one-by-one, confirm that their electronic signature will have the same effect as their signature, and finally, receive a confirmation of the various agreements they have viewed and/or accepted. Id. at *11-12. Plaintiff contended that the arbitration agreement was unconscionable. Plaintiff argued that the arbitration agreement was a contract of adhesion because the agreement's language indicated that it was presented to obtain or continue employment, such that the agreement "surely indicates that Adecco intends to require its employees to sign the agreement." Id. at *15. Defendants contended that Plaintiff had the opportunity to opt-out of the arbitration agreement containing the class action waiver, but chose not to do so. Id. at *16. Plaintiff argued that the opt-out procedure did not effectively provide employees with a meaningful manner to opt-out, and required the employee to "jump though a number of unnecessary hoops to actually opt-out." Id. Defendants explained that the arbitration agreement permitted employees to opt-out by requesting a form through an email link and electronically completing and submitting the form. The Court therefore found no ground to determine that this particular opt-out procedure was burdensome. Id. The Court recognized that Plaintiff, as an employee, was likely in a weaker bargaining position than Adecco and it appeared that Plaintiff had no opportunity to negotiate the terms of the arbitration agreement. Thus, the Court found some degree of procedural unconscionability. However, the record did not show any additional evidence of procedural unconscionability. As to substantive unconscionability, the Court found: (i) that Plaintiff's employment was not contingent upon agreeing to the arbitration agreement; (ii) that the agreement's AAA Rule 9 discovery provision did not overly limit Plaintiff's rights; (iii) that an agreement permitting one party to modify contract terms did not, standing alone, render a contract illusory because the party with that authority may not change the agreement in such a manner as to frustrate the purpose of the contract; (iv) that Plaintiff was not subjected to overly burdensome costs; and (v) Plaintiff was not required to waive class and representative actions because she was given an opportunity to opt-out. Accordingly, the Court concluded that there was insufficient evidence of substantive unconscionability to warrant a finding of invalidity. Id. at *25. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel. Id. at *29.

Garcia, et al. v. Golden Abacus Group,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 90975 (S.D.N.Y. June 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, alleged that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Defendant moved to compel arbitration and requested that the Court dismiss Plaintiff's complaint. The Court denied Defendants' motion. On or about their respective dates of hire, Plaintiffs signed documents including an arbitration agreement (the "agreement"). The agreement provided, in pertinent part, that the following types of disputes would be submitted to arbitration: "[c]laims of unlawful harassment or discrimination," "[c]laims of unfair demotion or reduction in pay," and "[a]ny claims of breach of contract or tort claims arising out of [an employee's] employment or termination with the Company, including, but not limited to, defamation, intentional infliction of emotional distress, intentional interference with contract, or right to privacy." Id. at *2-3. Defendants moved to compel arbitration of Plaintiffs' claims pursuant to the agreement. Plaintiffs argued that the agreement was unenforceable on the grounds of unconscionability, and also that the dispute was outside the scope of the agreement. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs' action was within the scope of the agreement because Plaintiffs' claims could be characterized as sounding in tort, or, in the alternative, as contract claims or claims regarding an unfair reduction in pay. The Court held that Defendant offered no legal authority supporting their tort characterization argument, and that applicable case law authorities routinely declined to apply tort principles to FLSA and NYLL claims. Accordingly, the Court stated that Plaintiffs' action could not properly be characterized as asserting "tort claims" within the meaning of the arbitration provision. Id. at *5. The Court further opined that Defendant's characterization of Plaintiffs' action as a claim for breach of contract was similarly unpersuasive. Plaintiffs asserted violations of statutory obligations. Accordingly, such claims were not "claims of breach of contract" that were within the scope of the agreement. Id. at *6. Finally, the Court found that Plaintiffs' claims could not be characterized as asserting a "reduction in pay." Id. Defendant argued that because Plaintiffs were provided with a pay rate notice stating a rate in compliance with the FLSA and the NYLL, any payment below the statutory requirements would constitute a "reduction." Id. The Court disagreed and held that because the FLSA and the NYLL claims were not contemplated on the face of the parties' agreement, and were not implied in the agreement, the action was outside the scope of the agreement's arbitration clause. Id. at *7-8. The Court therefore concluded that it need not address Plaintiffs' argument that the clause was unenforceable. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Jones, et al. v. Silver Care Operations, LLC*, 857 F.3d 508 (3d Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of nursing assistants, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to properly pay them overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and New Jersey law. Defendant moved to dismiss or to stay the proceedings pending arbitration, citing the arbitration clause in the workers' governing collective bargaining agreement ("CBA"). Id. at 509. The District Court denied the motion to dismiss or to stay pending arbitration. On appeal, Defendant contended that both overtime claims first must be submitted to arbitration for interpretation of the CBA, including the definition of the wage differentials and policies concerning meal breaks. The Third Circuit disagreed and affirmed the District Court's decision. Under the CBA, nursing assistants who were scheduled for eight-hour shifts were entitled to two paid 15-minute breaks and one unpaid 30-minute meal break per shift. Plaintiffs alleged that nursing assistants who worked during the night shifts "rarely, if ever" took an uninterrupted meal break because those shifts were chronically under-staffed. Id. at 511. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' FLSA claim alleging miscalculation of the overtime rate rested upon a dispute over an implicit term of the CBA regarding whether the wage differentials already included a payment for overtime. The Third Circuit held that Plaintiffs' overtime claim was governed by the FLSA, and the statute required it to bypass how the CBA broke down the pay differentials and look only at whether the pay differentials fit into the statutory definition of remuneration that must be included in the calculation of an employee's regular hourly rate of pay. Id. at 514. The Third Circuit further explained that whether the wage differentials should be included in the regular rate of pay depended not on any labels assigned to them by the CBA, but on whether they fit into one of the statutory exclusions. Id. Accordingly, the Third Circuit stated that Plaintiffs' miscalculation of overtime rate claim did not depend on any disputed term of the CBA, and therefore it need not be sent to arbitration. Defendant further contended that Plaintiffs' claim that their meal breaks should have been credited toward hours worked also depended on disputed practices under the CBA, which first had to be resolved by an arbitrator. The Third Circuit concluded that the alleged disputed practices were simply factual disputes, and, therefore arbitration of this claim was also unnecessary. The Third Circuit noted that the FLSA does not define what are compensable work hours. Instead, the U.S. Department of Labor issued a number of regulations providing guidance to employers and employees alike on how it would implement and enforce the law. One such regulation provides that employers need not compensate employees for bona fide meal periods because those are not considered compensable worktime. The Third Circuit stated that Defendant's contentions of the disputed "interpretations" of the CBA were merely factual questions, such as the length of meal breaks, types of interruptions, how they were handled, and whether Plaintiffs ever received compensation due to these interruptions. Id. at 516. The Third Circuit held that, to characterize an essentially factual inquiry as a dispute of practices or custom under the CBA such that arbitration was necessary, would circumvent U.S. Supreme Court precedent that Plaintiffs cannot be compelled to arbitrate their federal statutory claims without a clear and unmistakable waiver. Id. at 516-17. Accordingly, the Third Circuit found that neither of Plaintiffs' FLSA claims depended on disputed interpretations of CBA provisions. Therefore, it affirmed the District Court's ruling denying Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Joseph, et al. v. Quality Dining, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40604 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant servers, brought a suit challenging a particular tip-pooling practice violated the FLSA and the Pennsylvania Minimum Wage Act ("PMWA"). Defendants moved to dismiss on the basis of arbitration agreements signed by Plaintiffs. The Court considered several questions, including which agreement documents actually applied to each lead Plaintiff; whether the Court or the arbitrator should determine the availability of class-based arbitration; if the answer was the Court, whether class arbitration was available; and what to do about numerous opt-in Plaintiffs if the lead Plaintiffs' claims were dismissed in favor of individual arbitration. Id. at *1-2. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss on the basis of signed arbitration agreements. Plaintiffs then filed forms signed by 15 additional individuals consenting to become party Plaintiffs. Id. at *3. The Court stated that it was clear and agreed that the two lead Plaintiffs had valid arbitration agreements, so their claims must be dismissed in favor of arbitration. Id. The Court explained that the presumption that the Court would decide the question of arbitrability could only be overcome if "the parties clearly and unmistakably provide otherwise." Id. at *6-7. The Court found that the language in the arbitration agreement did not clearly and unmistakably delegate the issue of class availability to the arbitrator; therefore, the Court considered the issue itself. Id. at *8. The Court held that the rules incorporated with the arbitration agreement waived the right to proceed as a class. Id. at *9. Specifically, § C4 of rules provided: "Only one Employee may be a party to any particular arbitration unless otherwise agreed by the parties. Each arbitration is limited to the claims of the Employee who is a party to that arbitration and shall not include claims pertaining to any other Employee unless otherwise agreed by the parties." Id. at *10. The Court determined that the rules provided fairly wide power over arbitrability to the arbitrator, but did not clearly and unmistakably give the arbitrator authority to decide the availability of class procedures; therefore, the Court determined that it had the duty to make that determination. The Court held that the agreements and incorporated rules plainly purported to waive class procedures in arbitration. Id. at *19. The Court found that Plaintiffs had to proceed in an individual arbitration. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Judge, et al. v. UniGroup, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 145576 (M.D. Fla. Sept. 8, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of independent contractor drivers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Defendants filed a motion to compel arbitration, and the Court granted the motion in part. Defendants argued that the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") required arbitration of Plaintiffs' claims, that Plaintiffs were not exempt from either the FAA or the Missouri Uniform Arbitration Act, that the arbitration agreements precluded arbitration on a class or collective basis, that Defendants could enforce the arbitration agreements, and that Defendants acted consistently with their purported right to compel arbitration. First, Plaintiffs argued that Defendants could not compel arbitration because § 1 of the FAA exempted transportation employees from compelled arbitration. Id. at *4. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs were independent contractors, and therefore the transportation-worker exemption was inapplicable. The Court found that the independent contractor agreements that Plaintiffs signed stated that Plaintiffs: (i) could determine the method, means, and manner in which they performed their work; (ii) could refuse shipments and refuse to accept loads tendered by an agent; (iii) could vacation at will and self-schedule; (iv) could supply necessary equipment and labor, including hiring employees to assist in satisfying contractual obligations; (v) could cover their own operating and maintenance expenses; and (vi) could retain the option of hauling for competitors provided that they removed agent identifying information from the trucks. Id. at *8. The Court concluded that, because federal law strongly favors arbitration and because the agreements reserved to Plaintiffs the discretion that is characteristic of independent contractors, Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden of establishing that they were exempt employees under § 1 of the FAA. Id. Second, Plaintiffs argued that Defendants could not compel arbitration because Defendants were not parties to the arbitration agreements. The Court explained that a non-party could compel arbitration if the relevant state contract law allowed him to enforce the agreement. Id. at *9. Florida law governed the agreements of the named Plaintiffs Judge and Oliveira; Ohio law governed the agreements of the named Plaintiffs Oliveira and Coffman; Virginia law governed Plaintiff Coffman's agreement; and New Jersey law governed Plaintiff Lesperance's agreement. Id. The Court noted that to compel arbitration under Florida law, the non-party must show both that the signatory relied on the agreement to assert its claims against the non-party and that the scope of the arbitration clause covered the dispute. Id. at *10. The Court determined that the arbitration clause signed by the parties covered any and all disputes arising out of the agreements and that the allegations asserted by Judge and Oliveira that they were employees entitled to relief under the FLSA were intimately founded in and intertwined with the agreements. Id. at *11. The Court, therefore, held that Defendants could compel arbitration under the agreements governed by Florida law. With respect to Ohio, Virginia, and New Jersey, however, the Court found little guidance as to whether non-signatories could compel arbitration, and therefore denied the motion with respect to the remaining named Plaintiffs. Accordingly, the Court granted in part Defendants' motion to compel arbitration.

Lamour, et al. v. Uber Technologies,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29706 (S.D. Fla. Mar. 1, 2017). Plaintiff brought an FLSA collective action against Defendant, a ride sharing company, alleging wage & hour violations. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant misclassified the drivers as independent contractors as opposed to employees. Defendant moved to compel arbitration and strike Plaintiff's collective action pursuant to the parties' arbitration agreement. The agreement required Plaintiff to arbitrate all disputes arising out of the employment relationship unless he had opted-out of the agreement. The agreement further provided that all claims in arbitration be brought individually and not as on a class or collective basis. Plaintiff asserted that the arbitration agreement was unenforceable because it violated the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"). The Magistrate Judge disagreed and recommended that the Court grant Defendant's motions to compel arbitration and strike Plaintiff's collective action claims. At the outset, the Magistrate Judge stated that the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") was enacted to "reverse judicial hostility toward arbitration" and reflected a" liberal policy favoring arbitration". Id. at *2. The arbitration agreement was enforceable because it contained an opt-out clause and Plaintiff reviewed the agreement twice before consenting to the on-line agreement. The Magistrate Judge noted that even in the absence of an opt-out clause, the arbitration provision might still be valid. The Magistrate Judge rejected the view that the right to maintain a collective action was a substantive right, citing binding precedent and the majority of case law authorities that have held that it was a procedural right that may be waived in an arbitration agreement. Further, even if the NLRA did bar mandatory class and collective actions, the opt-out provision rendered the arbitration agreement voluntary. The Magistrate Judge also determined that the arbitration agreement contained a clear and unmistakable delegation clause in which the parties agreed to delegate threshold issues of arbitrability; therefore, the decisions of whether Plaintiff was an employee subject to NLRA and whether the agreement was unconscionable, should be decided by the arbitrator. However, the Magistrate Judge noted that even if he were to decide the unconscionability issue, he would find that the agreement was neither procedurally nor substantively unconscionable. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court grant Defendant's motion to compel arbitration and strike the collective action allegations.

Levy, et al. v. Lytx, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 100529 (S.D. Cal. June 28, 2017). Plaintiff, a former employee, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration pursuant to an agreement Plaintiff signed the day he commenced his employment. The Court granted the motion in part and denied it in part. Plaintiff argued that the agreement was illegal and invalid because Defendant's interpretation of the agreement as precluding class claims violated the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"). Defendant asserted that the agreement neither intended nor authorized class arbitration, on the grounds that the agreement mentioned only two parties to the agreement (the "company" and the "employee") and specifically covered claims that arose from the "employee's employment with the Company." Id. at *8. Plaintiff argued that the agreement incorporated class arbitration by reference to the AAA rules and references to "all parties" and "all claims." Id. The Court examined whether California law or AAA rules governed the determination. Id. at *9-10. The Court noted that the state law provision in the agreement appeared to allocate the question of class availability to the Court; however, the general clause in the agreement did not expressly incorporate the state procedural rules that governed allocation of the arbitrability question between the Court and arbitrators. Id. at *11. The Court found that the agreement neither referenced the California Arbitration Act nor incorporated § 1281.2(b). Id. at *12. Consequently, the Court stated that it would not apply state statutes in determining the allocation of the class availability question, and therefore turned to whether the AAA rules resolved the issue. Id. at *13-14. The Court held that the agreement, entered into in April 2008, incorporated by reference the AAA rules, and further, by agreeing to resolve disputes according to the AAA rules, Plaintiff and Defendant also agreed to follow the AAA Supplementary Rules, which became effective on October 8, 2003. Id. at *14. The Court noted that the AAA Supplementary Rules "shall apply to any dispute arising out of an agreement that provides for arbitration pursuant to any of the rules of the [AAA] where a party submits a dispute to arbitration on behalf of or against a class or purported class" and when "a Court refers a matter pleaded as a class action to the AAA for administration." Id. at *15. The AAA Supplementary Rules further instruct that "the arbitrator shall determine as a threshold matter . . . whether the applicable arbitration clause permits the arbitration to proceed on behalf of or against a class." Id. Consequently, the Court concluded that references to the AAA rules, even without specific reference to the AAA Supplementary Rules, "clearly and unmistakably evidence" the parties' intention to delegate the question of availability of class proceedings to the arbitrator. Id. at *16. Absent further, binding guidance, the Court found that the incorporation of the AAA Supplementary Rules constituted clear and unmistakable evidence that the parties intended to allow the arbitrator, rather than the Court, to determine whether the agreement permits class arbitration. Id. Consequently, the Court granted in part Defendant's motion to compel arbitration on the basis that the parties agreed to arbitrate disputes regarding the availability of class proceedings. Id. at *17. However, the Court denied in part Defendant's motion to compel individual arbitration and further denied Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's class claims because the Court ruled that the arbitrator, not the Court, must determine whether class arbitration is permitted. Id. at *17-18.

Lockard, et al. v. EMY King Of Kansas*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 146944 (D. Kan. Sept. 12, 2017). Plaintiff, a former employee, brought an action alleging that Defendants violated various provisions of the FLSA. Defendants filed a motion to compel arbitration pursuant to an agreement Plaintiff allegedly signed as a condition of his employment. The Court granted Defendants' motion to compel. On Plaintiff's first day of employment, he signed an arbitration agreement. At the outset, the Court noted that under the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"), a Court should compel arbitration if it finds that: (i) a valid arbitration agreement exists between the parties; and (ii) the dispute before it falls within the scope of the agreement. Id. at *8-9. Plaintiff argued that the arbitration agreement was invalid because: (i) the agreement is one part of the employee handbook, which contained a conflicting revocation and modification clause, rendering the agreement illusory; (ii) there was no meeting of the minds as to the arbitration procedures that would apply; and (iii) the arbitration agreement was unenforceable for lack of consideration. Id. at *9-10. Plaintiff asserted that the agreement was illusory based on the provision in the acknowledgement and receipt section of the handbook that any part of the handbook could be modified or revoked by Defendants at any time with or without notice. Id. at *10. Defendants contended that the arbitration agreement was a separate, stand-alone agreement that required a writing signed by both parties in order to modify or revoke. Id. at *10-11. Moreover, Defendant pointed to the acknowledgement of receipt, which included a list of the policies and procedures the employee had read and understood, including the arbitration agreement, and the various subparts of that agreement, including the revocation and modification section. Id. at *11. The Court agreed with Defendant that the arbitration agreement was separate and distinct from the handbook. The Court noted that when Plaintiff signed the handbook's receipt, Plaintiff acknowledged reading and agreed to not only the arbitration agreement, but also the provision within that agreement on revocation and modification. The Court therefore found that the arbitration agreement controlled that question and Defendants could not unilaterally modify or revoke the arbitration agreement, and therefore it was not illusory. Id. The Court stated that under Kansas law, there must be a meeting of the minds on all essential elements of a contract, including a fair understanding between the parties that normally accompanies mutual consent and the evidence must show with reasonable definiteness that the minds of the parties met upon the same matter and agreed upon the terms of the contract. Id. at *12. Plaintiff argued that there could be no meeting of the minds because the arbitration agreement did not set forth any arbitral procedures. Defendants replied that the lack of arbitral procedures in the arbitration agreement did not invalidate the agreement. The Court agreed and found that Plaintiff cited no authority for the proposition that arbitration procedures are essential terms of a contract to arbitrate, for which there must be a meeting of the minds. Id. at *13. The Court held that the arbitration procedures in this case were not essential terms of the contract about which the parties were required to have a meeting of the minds. Finally, Plaintiff argued that the arbitration agreement was invalid for lack of consideration. The Court stated that the arbitration agreement provided that Plaintiff was giving up a right to a jury trial on all claims covered by the agreement and that Defendants agreed to submit any claims against Plaintiff to arbitration. The Court thereby concluded that a valid arbitration agreement existed between the parties. Id. at *15-16. As Plaintiff did not dispute that his FLSA claims were within the scope of the arbitration agreement, the Court granted Defendants' motion to compel arbitration.

Maynard, et al. v. Valley Christian Academy, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 133268 (N.D. Ohio Aug. 21, 2017). Plaintiff, a facilities manager, filed a collective action asserting that Defendant failed to pay for all hours worked and failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA, the Ohio Minimum Fair Wage Standards Act, and the Ohio Prompt Pay Act. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to an agreement Plaintiff signed at the commencement of her employment, which the Court granted. Plaintiff argued that the agreement was unenforceable because: (i) the agreement denied her access to remedies under federal and state law; (ii) the agreement denied her access to legal representation; (iii) the agreement was unconscionable; (iv) Defendant waived its right to arbitration; and (v) Plaintiff did not agree to arbitrate her claims nor did she knowingly agree to waive her right to a trial by jury. Id. at *4-5. First, Plaintiff asserted that the arbitration provision required her to submit to Biblical scripture –"following the Biblical pattern of Matthew 18: 15-17…" – and therefore made the Bible the supreme authority governing every aspect of the conciliation process, which would require her to forfeit her federal rights. Id. at *8. The Court found that the agreement required arbitrators to take into consideration applicable law and Plaintiff failed to explained how Biblical law might conflict with the FLSA. Id. at *9. Plaintiff also sought to invalidate the arbitration clause by arguing that the agreement had the potential to deny her representation by counsel. The Court determined that the agreement clearly stated that the parties were afforded full access to representation during the arbitration phase of conciliation where any legally binding decision would be made. Id. at *15. Plaintiff further argued that the arbitration provision was procedurally unconscionable because Defendant did not explain the terms of the arbitration clause, and Plaintiff pointed to her limited education and lack of computer skills to support this argument. The Court rejected this argument, explaining that Plaintiff had a high-school degree and the entire employment agreement was a mere two-page document. Id. at *18. Further, the Court reasoned that if Plaintiff did not understand the terms after reading the agreement, the onus was on her, not Defendant, to ensure that she did. Id. at *19. Plaintiff also asserted that the employment agreement was a contract of adhesion. Id. at *20. The Court disagreed, finding that while it may be true that Plaintiff had little opportunity to negotiate, there was not "an absence of meaningful choice." Id. at *21. For these reasons, the Court held that the arbitration clause was not procedurally unconscionable. Plaintiff's next argument was that Defendant waived its right to arbitration because by terminating her without first "attempting to resolve differences . . . by following the biblical pattern of Matthew 18:15-17," Defendant acted inconsistently with the requirements of the arbitration clause. Id. at *24. However, the Court noted that Defendant's termination of Plaintiff was not indicative of the existence of any "difference" between the parties. In filing the present lawsuit, the Court opined that it was Plaintiff who acted in a manner inconsistent with the arbitration clause. Id. at *25. Plaintiff's final argument was that she did not agree to arbitrate her claims, and that her waiver of a right to a trial by jury was not knowing or voluntary. Id. The Court reasoned that this argument was largely a rehashing of the unconscionability points, and therefore the Court rejected it as well. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Mcadoo, et al. v. New Line Transportation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34086 (M.D. Fla. Mar. 9, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of owner-operators, asserted that Defendants failed to pay wages in violation of the FLSA and Florida state law. Defendants moved to dismiss and to compel arbitration of all claims pursuant to the arbitration provision in each Plaintiffs' owner-operator agreement. Defendant New Line offered to each Plaintiff an owner-operator agreement, which included an arbitration clause. All Plaintiffs signed them. Nonetheless, Plaintiffs asserted that the arbitration agreement was unconscionable. Plaintiffs also claimed that the owner-operator and sales agreements were sham agreements that purported to sell trucking equipment to Plaintiffs so that Defendants could change their status from employees to independent contractors. The Court found that Plaintiffs' allegations focused on disputed facts relating to an issue in the case, rather than the circumstances surrounding the execution of the agreements. Id. at *6. The Court stated that Plaintiffs' allegations of fraud, therefore, were not a basis for finding procedural or substantive unconscionability in regards to the arbitration agreement. Plaintiffs also did not claim that they could not or did not understand the agreement to arbitrate or that they were denied an opportunity to review the agreements before signing them. Id. at *6-7. The Court therefore determined that the agreements were not procedurally unconscionable. Plaintiffs also pointed to two provisions they contended were substantively unconscionable. First, they focused on the provision requiring that "[t]he parties shall share the cost of arbitration equally," which they asserted was unconscionable because of the disparate impact the cost of arbitration had on them. Id. at *8. The Court held that Plaintiffs' bare claim that the "cost of arbitration would limit or eliminate their ability to redress their rights," was insufficient to establish that an equal cost-splitting provision of an arbitration agreement was substantively unconscionable. Plaintiffs also pointed to the provision allowing Defendants to "forgo arbitration and pursue litigation." Id. Plaintiffs interpreted this clause as "textbook lack of mutuality of obligation" by "[r]equiring the drivers to proceed only in arbitration while allowing New Line to choose." Id. at *9. The Court found that the provision was inapplicable to this case, since Plaintiffs initiated the litigation. Id. The Court opined that the provision allowing Defendant to forgo arbitration, like the cost-splitting provision, did not conclusively demonstrate unfairness. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiffs did not met their burden of establishing that the terms of the arbitration agreement were so unfair or unjust as to be unconscionable. The Court therefore granted Defendants' motion to compel arbitration.

McFaddin, et al. v. E.A. Renfroe & Co.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 20306 (9th Cir. Oct. 17, 2017). Plaintiff, an employee, filed a wage & hour class action asserting violations of the California Labor Law and California's Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration pursuant to an arbitration agreement that Plaintiff had signed. The District Court denied Defendant's motion, finding that the arbitration agreement was unenforceable. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit vacated the District Court's ruling. The Ninth Circuit stated that California law governs the determination of whether the parties' arbitration agreement is unconscionable. Further, the Ninth Circuit found that under California law, "the strong preference is to sever unless the agreement is permeated by unconscionability." Id. at *1. The Ninth Circuit agreed with the District Court that the choice-of-forum provision, the prevailing party provision, and the cost provision portions of the arbitration agreement were unconscionable. Id. at *2. The Ninth Circuit noted that Defendant had stipulated it would not enforce the choice-of-forum provision. The Ninth Circuit held that the prevailing party and cost provisions were severable. Id. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit vacated the District Court's ruling that the entirety of the arbitration agreement was unenforceable. Id. The Ninth Circuit also determined that the District Court did not address whether the arbitration agreement's waiver of class action claims was enforceable and applied to Plaintiff's PAGA claim. The Ninth Circuit therefore also directed the District Court on remand to address that issue before reconsidering whether the agreement remained enforceable.

Moon, et al. v. Breathless Inc.,* 868 F.3d 209 (3d. Cir. 2017). Plaintiff, an exotic dancer, brought a putative class and collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified its exotic dancers as independent contractors, and failed to pay minimum and overtime wages, unemployment, disability, and social security taxes as well as workers' compensation premiums and other mandatory insurance benefits in violation of the FLSA and New Jersey state laws. Id. at 212. Previously, the District Court had denied Defendant's motion to dismiss and ordered the parties to engage in limited discovery on the issue of whether Plaintiff's claims were subject to a valid arbitration agreement. Id. Plaintiff claimed that the purported arbitration agreement was invalid and Plaintiff's claims were outside its scope. Id. The District Court rejected Plaintiff's argument and granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment. The District Court found that Plaintiff failed to establish a genuine issue as the validity or scope of the arbitration provision. On appeal, the Third Circuit reversed and remanded for further proceedings. The Third Circuit stated that it must decide two questions under New Jersey law, including: (i) should a District Court decide whether the parties should submit this issue to arbitration; and (ii) if the parties have contracted to allow a District Court to decide arbitrability, have the parties agreed to arbitrate the claims at issue. Id. at 213. The Third Circuit answered the first question in the affirmative and the second question in the negative. The Third Circuit stated that the arbitration clause failed to mention arbitrability, let alone the venue for deciding it. Further, the Third Circuit determined that Defendant had conceded in District Court that it should determine arbitrability. The Third Circuit explained that under New Jersey law, an arbitration clause must: (i) identify the general substantive area that the arbitration clause covers; (ii) reference the types of claims waived by the provision; and (iii) explain the difference between arbitration and litigation. Id. at 214. The Third Circuit noted that the Supreme Court of New Jersey had interpreted three arbitration clauses to determine whether they covered a particular type of statutory claim. In two of these cases, Garfinkel and Atalese, which resembled the present case, the Supreme Court of New Jersey found that the arbitration clause did not cover Plaintiff's statutory claims. Accordingly, because the arbitration clause here resembled the arbitration clauses in Garfinkel and Atalese, and because the Supreme Court of New Jersey found that the arbitration clauses in Garfinkel and Atalese only applied to contract disputes, the Third Circuit held that the arbitration clause did not cover Plaintiff's statutory claims. Defendant contested the factual similarities and argued that Garfinkel could not govern the instant case because it involved employees, whereas this matter involved an independent contractor. Defendant also asserted that deciding the arbitration question would force the District Court to determine the case's merits. Id. at 217. The Third Circuit determined that Defendant's first argument lacked merit because the Supreme Court of New Jersey has applied Garfinkel to cases outside of the employment context. Defendant's second argument also failed because the District Court found that the arbitration clause did not cover Plaintiff's wage & hour claims without deciding the claims' merits. Id. at 217-18. To answer the arbitrability question, the Third Circuit opined, the District Court must only decide what the arbitration provision says. Accordingly, the Third Circuit reversed the District Court's ruling and found that the arbitration provision did not cover Plaintiff's wage & hour claims. The Third Circuit therefore remanded for further proceedings.

Mumin, et al. v. Uber Technologies*, U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34008 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 8, 2017). Plaintiffs brought two related putative class actions against Defendant, a ride sharing company, alleging wage & hour violations under state law as well as other statutory and common law claims. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to the parties' agreement and sought enforcement of the class action waiver. The Court held that the arbitration provision provided clear and unmistakable evidence that the parties intended to delegate the issue of arbitrability to an arbitrator and that the provision was not unconscionable. Plaintiffs challenged the provision delegating the issue of arbitrability on the grounds that it was unconscionable. The Court rejected the argument because Plaintiffs had 30 days to opt-out of the arbitration provision, yet failed to do so. Therefore, the Court concluded that the agreement to arbitrate the question of arbitrability was not procedurally unconscionable. As such, the Court did not address whether it was substantively unconscionable. The Court also held that the class action waiver was valid and enforceable. Plaintiff asserted that the class action waiver was unenforceable pursuant to the Norris-La Guardia Act, which protects an individual employee's right to engage in "concerted activities for the purpose of . . . mutual aid or protection." Id. at *32. The Court ruled that the Second Circuit had consistently rejected such arguments and had found that class action waivers are enforceable and do not infringe upon employees' substantive rights. Id. at *31. Defendant also moved to dismiss the claims of two Plaintiffs – Plaintiffs Mumin and Ortega – who opted-out of the arbitration agreement. The Court found that both Plaintiffs sufficiently pled claims that Defendant unlawfully retained gratuities and failed to pay minimum wage. The Court rejected Defendant's assertion that the Rule 12(b)(6) heightened standard applied to these claims. It ruled that, because fraud was not an integral part of these claims, a heightened standard did not apply. However, the Court dismissed Mumin's claims of tortious interference with business relations, breach of contract, conversion, promissory estoppel, unjust enrichment, fraud, and intentional misrepresentation. Similarly, Defendant's motion to dismiss Ortega's claims was granted as to tortious interference with business, breach of contract, and conversion. The Court also dismissed Ortega's claims of minimum wage violations based upon incurred expenses, as Ortega's claim based upon incurred expenses was not specific and did not supply facts such that "a simple arithmetical calculation" could be used to determine if there was a violation. Id. at 46. Ortega merely alleged that he paid "hundreds of dollars" each week in expenses. Id. at 46. As such, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss Ortega's minimum wage claim based upon incurred expenses. Defendant's motion to dismiss Ortega's claims for false advertising was denied because the Court rejected the argument that Plaintiff must allege that he personally relied upon the advertisement. Accordingly, Defendant's motion to compel arbitration and to enforce the class action waiver was granted. Defendant's motion to dismiss was granted in part and denied in part as to the claims of Plaintiffs Mumin and Ortega.

Nadeau, et al. v. Equity Residential Properties Management*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 68937 (S.D.N.Y. May 4, 2017). Plaintiff, a customer-support assistant, filed a class action alleging violations of the FLSA and state law. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant regularly required her to respond to text messages and phone calls after work without compensation. Id. at *3. Plaintiff received a text message from her supervisor instructing her to attend a company event outside of work hours and Plaintiff sent a vulgar text in response. Id. Plaintiff received a formal write up, alleging that she violated company policy by communicating with her supervisor by text and using inappropriate language. Id. at *4. Plaintiff filed an arbitration demand pursuant to the parties' arbitration agreement. Id. Defendant terminated Plaintiff and failed to arbitrate the matter. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiff filed a lawsuit and Defendant moved to compel arbitration and stay the matter. Id. at *6. Plaintiff objected to the motion, asserting that Defendant could not compel arbitration as it breached the arbitration agreement by refusing to arbitrate. Id. at *8. Defendant asserted that it did not breach the arbitration agreement because: (i) Plaintiff's demand for arbitration was deficient, as Plaintiff failed to date and sign the demand; and (ii) Plaintiff's demand addressed a claim that was not covered by the agreement. Id. at *9. The Court rejected both arguments. First, the Court noted that Defendant provided no authority that required technical conditions be met to initiate arbitration. The Court ruled that Plaintiff's demand triggered Defendant's obligation to arbitrate. Id. at *10. Second, the Court rejected Defendant's assertion that Plaintiff's demand for arbitration regarding her formal write up was not arbitrable. Id. at *11. The Court rejected this argument on the grounds that the proper forum to challenge the arbitrability of Plaintiff's issues was in arbitration and not in Court. Id. Furthermore, the Court ruled that the claim was arbitrable, as arbitration clauses should be construed as "broadly as possible" and there is a strong federal policy favoring arbitration. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court held that Defendant's refusal to arbitrate constituted a material breach of the agreement and it denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration and stay the matter.

Olivares, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109348 (N.D. Ill. July 14, 2017). Plaintiff filed a five-count amended class action complaint against Uber Technologies, Inc. for violation of the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection Act ("IWPCA"), the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"), and the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration and dismiss the case pursuant to the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"). Plaintiff asserted that Defendant violated both federal and state laws by not providing drivers with salaries that met minimum wage requirements or overtime pay. Plaintiff voluntarily entered into a valid and enforceable arbitration agreement with Rasier, LLC, Defendant's wholly-owned subsidiary. At the time Plaintiff signed up to use Defendant's app to generate leads for potential riders, the applicable agreement was the November 10, 2014 Rasier Software License & Online Services Agreement ("November 2014 Agreement"). In December 2015, Defendant introduced a revised agreement ("December 2015 Agreement"), containing an arbitration provision, delegation provision, and opt-out provision. Id. at *4. Plaintiff voluntarily entered into the November 2014 and December 2015 Agreements and did not opt-out of the arbitration provision. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiff asserted that the arbitration provision was unenforceable because the class action waiver it contained violated § 7 of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"). Defendant argued that a valid, enforceable arbitration agreement existed and that the NLRA did not apply since Plaintiff was an independent contractor, not an employee. Id. at *7. Plaintiff also challenged Defendant's classification of him as an independent contractor and argued that the Court must decide this "threshold question" before it could rule on Defendant's motion. Id. at *7-8. Defendant contended that whether Plaintiff was properly classified as an employee or an independent contractor was for the arbitrator, not the Court, to decide. Id. at *8. The Court explained that a delegation clause can only be enforced if there is clear and unmistakable evidence that the parties have agreed to arbitrate threshold issues. The Court found that here Defendant's delegation clause was clear and unmistakable evidence that when Plaintiff accepted the December 2015 Agreement, he agreed to arbitrate threshold issues. Id. The Court found that the operative delegation clause provided that the arbitration provision applied to all disputes between Plaintiff and Defendant, including any disputes arising out of or related to Plaintiff's relationship with Defendant. Id. at *8-9. Pursuant to that arbitration agreement, from which Plaintiff did not opt-out, the Court held that the arbitrator was responsible for determining the threshold issue of whether Plaintiff was an employee or independent contractor. Id. at *9. The Court noted that it would be essential to first resolve whether Plaintiff was an independent contractor or an employee, as the NLRA only applied to employees. Because the Court held that question was for the arbitrator to decide, it declined to decide at this stage whether the class action waiver violated the NLRA. The Court thereby granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Oliveira, et al. v. New Prime, Inc.,* 857 F.3d 7 (1st Cir. 2017). Plaintiff, a driver, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA by misclassifying drivers as independent contractors and thereby failing to pay minimum wage. Id. at 8. Defendant moved to compel arbitration under the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") and stay the proceedings, asserting that Plaintiff entered into an independent contractor operating agreement with Defendant. Plaintiff contended that the motion to compel arbitration should be denied because it was exempted from the FAA under § 1. Plaintiff further argued that the question of the applicability of the § 1 exemption was one for the District Court, and not an arbitrator, to decide. Id. at 11. Defendant argued that the § 1 exemption did not include independent-contractor agreements and, in any event, the question of whether the § 1 exemption applied was a question of arbitrability that the parties had delegated to the arbitrator. The District Court concluded that the question of the applicability of the § 1 exemption was for it, and not an arbitrator, to decide. The District Court further determined that it could not yet answer that question because: (i) the "contracts of employment" language of the § 1 exemption does not extend to independent contractors; and (ii) discovery was needed on the issue of whether Plaintiff was an employee or an independent contractor before the District Court could decide whether the contract was a contract of employment under the § 1 exemption. Id. at 11-12. The District Court therefore denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration without prejudice and permitted the parties to conduct discovery on Plaintiff's employment status. On appeal, the First Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The First Circuit noted that the appeal raised two questions of first impression in the First Circuit. First, when a District Court is confronted with a motion to compel arbitration under the FAA in a case where the parties have delegated questions of arbitrability to the arbitrator, must the District Court first determine whether the FAA applies or must it grant the motion and let the arbitrator determine the applicability of the Act. Second, whether a provision of the FAA that exempts contracts of employment of transportation workers from the Act's coverage applies to a transportation-worker agreement that establishes or purports to establish an independent-contractor relationship. Id. at 8. As to the first question, the First Circuit was persuaded by Ninth Circuit precedent holding that the issue of whether the § 1 exemption applies presents a question of "whether the FAA confers authority on the District Court to compel arbitration" and not a question of arbitrability. Id. at 12. After concluding that it must decide for itself whether the § 1 exemption applies, the District Court ordered the parties to conduct factual discovery to determine whether Plaintiff was an independent contractor or an employee during the time that the contract was in place. On appeal, both parties challenged this aspect of the District Court's order. Defendant agreed that § 1 does not extend to independent contractors, but argued that discovery on the relationship between the parties was inappropriate because Plaintiff's status as an employee or independent contractor should be decided by the arbitrator. Id. at 18. Plaintiff argued that the phrase "contracts of employment" contained in § 1 means simply "agreements to do work." Id. at 20. The First Circuit agreed and determined that this interpretation was consistent with the ordinary meaning of the phrase at the time Congress enacted the FAA. Id. at 22. The First Circuit found that the combination of the ordinary meaning of the phrase "contracts of employment" and Defendant's concession that Plaintiff is a transportation worker compelled the conclusion that the contract in this case was excluded from the FAA's reach. Id. at 25. Accordingly, the First Circuit held that a transportation-worker agreement that establishes or purports to establish an independent-contractor relationship is a contract of employment under § 1. Id. at 30.

Ortega, et al. v. Uber Technologies,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66658 (E.D.N.Y. May 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, brought an action alleging that Defendant induced them through false advertisements and breached its contracts with Plaintiffs by, among other things, inflating the "service fee" charged to drivers. Id. at *2. Defendant moved to dismiss all of Plaintiffs' claims for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. Defendant separately moved to compel individual arbitration as to all of Plaintiff Martinez's claims on the basis of an arbitration provision contained within the operative service agreement. The Court had previously ordered that Martinez agreed not only to arbitrate his claims against Defendant, but also to "submit to an arbitrator any disputes relating to the interpretation or application of the arbitral clause." Id. at *2-3. The Court also concluded that Plaintiff Ortega had not made out a sufficient claim for breach of contract and dismissed Ortega's breach of contract claim. Plaintiffs filed a motion for reconsideration, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs requested that the Court reconsider its determinations that: (i) Martinez's false advertising claim was subject to arbitration under his contract with Defendant; and (ii) Ortega failed to state a claim for breach of contract. Martinez argued that a contract's arbitration provisions could not be extended to cover disputes that arose prior to contracting. However, in the Court's previous opinion, it concluded not only that Martinez agreed to arbitrate his claims against Defendant, but also that he agreed to delegate the question of arbitrability itself to the arbitrator. Id. at *4. Therefore, whether Martinez's false advertising claims fell inside the scope of the claims covered by the arbitration clause was squarely within the realm of decisions that Martinez delegated to the arbitrator. Id. at *5-6. The Court noted that Martinez presented no new challenge to the validity of this delegation and provided no grounds to revisit the Court's previous order. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration as to Martinez' false advertising claim. Seeking reinstatement of his breach of contract claim, Ortega further argued that the Court overlooked other, potentially relevant iterations of the service agreements, pointing specifically to the April 2015 and December 2015 service agreements. Ortega also argued that the Court's prior order was "based on an incomplete [version of the relevant agreement] submitted by Defendants herein, which lacked the 'City Addendum.'" Id. at *6. The Court opined that, although Ortega correctly noted that the Court's decision did not address two later-in-time iterations of the service agreements, those agreements did not address the underlying issue with Ortega's claim. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs' complaint never identified the agreement that Defendant allegedly breached, an essential allegation in the present case where, as discussed, the alleged "breach" was expressly valid under at least one of the relevant agreements. Id. at *8. The Court stated that Plaintiffs' failure to identify the agreement and terms alleged to have been breached necessitated dismissal of the claim. Id. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs' pointing to the two agreements again without specifying that Defendant had breached those particular agreements did not remedy the pleading failure, and therefore the Court was not persuaded to reconsider its prior decision. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration.

Ortiz, et al. v. Volt Management Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 72403 (N.D. Cal. May 11, 2017). Plaintiff, an employee, filed a putative class action against Defendants for alleged violations of California's wage & labor laws. Defendants filed a motion to compel arbitration and dismiss Plaintiff's claims or, in the alternative, to stay the entire case during the pendency of arbitration proceedings. Id. at *2. Defendant Genco provided Defendant Volt with logistics support for its operations. Plaintiff alleged that Defendants failed to provide all necessary compensation related to shift differentials, non-discretionary bonuses, premium wages for meal and rest periods, overtime wages, time spent clocking-in and clocking-out, and final wages following separation from employment. Id. Additionally, Plaintiff alleged that Defendants failed to provide accurate written wage statements. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff signed a one-page "employment agreement" with Volt, which contained an arbitration agreement stating that any employment and/or employment termination-related disputes and/or disputes would be settled by final and binding arbitration, pursuant to the Federal Arbitration Act, in accordance with the employment rules of the American Arbitration Association ("AAA"). Id. at *3-4. Plaintiff argued that the arbitration agreement was unconscionable and therefore unenforceable. Id. at *7. With respect to the first prong of procedural unconscionability, Plaintiff asserted the contract was adhesive because it was a condition of employment. The Court found that Plaintiff offered no further argument with regard to the adhesive nature of the delegation provision specifically, or the contract generally, nor did he raise any suggestion of "oppression" or "surprise" as to the agreement. Id. at *8. Thus, while the Court acknowledged that some measure of procedural unconscionability existed as a result of the adhesive nature of the employment contract, the degree of such procedural unconscionability was low. Id. at *9. With respect to the second prong, i.e., analyzing whether the agreement was substantively unconscionable, Plaintiff raised three arguments, including: (i) the provision gave Volt the unilateral right to modify the agreement; (ii) the arbitration policy allowed Volt to recover attorneys' fees if it was the prevailing party; and (iii) ambiguity existed as to which rules apply. Id. at *9-10. The Court found that Plaintiff's argument with respect to Volt's right to modify stemmed from the following language: "Volt has the right to change, interpret or cancel any of its rules, policies, benefits, procedures or practices at Volt's discretion, upon reasonable notice where practicable." Id. at *10. The Court determined that the relied-upon language was not contained in the employment agreement but rather in the employee guide. Thus, the Court opined that the arbitration provision itself could not be interpreted to contain a provision allowing Volt to amend, modify, or abrogate any of Plaintiff's rights unilaterally. Id. Similarly, the Court stated that Plaintiff's argument with respect to the right of the arbitrator to award attorneys' fees was also contained in the employee handbook and not in the actual arbitration provision or employment agreement. With respect to the final argument regarding ambiguity, Plaintiff compared the language in the employment agreement, which required the arbitration to be conducted "in accordance with the employment rules of the [AAA]" with the arbitration policy included in the employee handbook, which provided that the arbitration be conducted in accordance with "the applicable rules of the [AAA]." Id. at *11. The Court ruled the distinction did not create a meaningful ambiguity, let alone support a finding of substantive unconscionability. The Court therefore held that Plaintiff failed to make any showing of substantive unconscionability with regard to the arbitration provision generally or the delegation clause specifically. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to compel arbitration.

Ouadani, et al. v. TF Final Mile LLC*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 23493 (1st Cir. Nov. 21, 2017). Plaintiff filed a collective action alleging that Defendant incorrectly classified him as an independent contractor and thereby denied him overtime and minimum wages in violation of the FLSA and state wage & hour laws. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration, which the District Court denied. On appeal, the First Circuit affirmed the Districts Court's ruling. Plaintiff delivered products for Dynamex Operations East, LLC ("Dynamex") and was required to associate with a vendor affiliated with Dynamex, Selwyn, and Birtha Shipping LLC ("SBS"). Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff received his compensation from SBS, which had a written contract with Dynamex. Plaintiff did not have a written contract either with Dynamex or with SBS. Unbeknownst to Plaintiff, Dynamex and SBS entered into an "Independent Contractor Agreement for Transportation Services" (the "Agreement"), which included an arbitration provision. Id. at *3. The agreement required SBS to provide Dynamex with a written agreement from any sub-contractor that SBS utilized attesting that the sub-contractor had agreed to comply with the terms of the Agreement. Id. at *4. SBS did not have Plaintiff execute the written agreement. After commencing his employment, Plaintiff complained to Dynamex that he lacked the independence of a contractor, and that he should be paid as an employee if Dynamex continued to exert the same degree of control over his work. Plaintiff was terminated shortly after he complained. After Plaintiff filed his collective action, Defendant moved to compel arbitration based on the agreement between Dynamex and SBS that contained a mandatory arbitration clause. Id. at *2. In denying Defendant's motion, the District Court reasoned that Plaintiff had never signed the agreement containing the arbitration clause and had no idea that the agreement even existed. On appeal, Dynamex argued that Plaintiff nonetheless should be compelled to arbitrate under federal common law principles of contract and agency. Dynamex asserted that Plaintiff should be bound to arbitrate because he was an "agent" of SBS. Id. at *5. The First Circuit disagreed, finding that, in this context, Plaintiff was not bringing his wage & hour claims as an "agent acting on behalf" of SBS, but rather was bringing his claims against Dynamex on his own behalf and purportedly on behalf of other similarly-situated drivers. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the First Circuit held that the alleged agency relationship between Plaintiff and SBS was irrelevant to the "legal obligation in dispute." Id. at *10. Defendant also asserted that the doctrine of equitable estoppel applied to Plaintiff's claims. The First Circuit explained that equitable estoppel "precludes a party from enjoying rights and benefits under a contract while at the same time avoiding its burdens and obligations." Id. at *11. The First Circuit found that Dynamex's rationales were inapposite because Plaintiff was a non-signatory Plaintiff who was trying to avoid arbitration, not a non-signatory Defendant seeking to compel it. Dynamex also argued that Plaintiff knowingly sought and obtained benefits from the Agreement because he performed the "Contracted Services" pursuant to the Agreement for compensation. Id. The First Circuit disagreed, finding that the benefits of the arbitration clause of the Agreement accrued to the contracting signatories, Dynamex and SBS, not to Plaintiff. Further, Plaintiff could hardly be said to have "embraced" the Agreement when he was unaware of its existence. Id. at *14. The First Circuit reasoned that Plaintiff's claims did not depend on the existence of a right guaranteed in the Agreement between Dynamex and SBS; rather, they were grounded in Plaintiff's relationship with Dynamex. The Court concluded that Dynamex failed to show that the parties to the Agreement intended to provide any legal rights to Plaintiff. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the First Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling denying Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Patel, et al. v. Jack In The Box,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 76581 (S.D. Cal. Jan. 27, 2017). Plaintiff, a restaurant manager, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated various state and federal wage & hour laws. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration based on an dispute resolution agreement that Plaintiff signed (the "agreement"), and the Court granted the motion. Plaintiff asserted various defenses, including that: (i) the agreement's collective action waiver was unenforceable under the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") because it interfered with employees' collective action rights; (ii) the agreement's waiver of representative claims was invalid because it prevented the filing of California Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA") claims; and (iii) the agreement was unconscionable. Id. at *5-6. The Court found that Plaintiff's arguments failed. First, the Court determined that under the NLRA, Plaintiff was a supervisor and, thus, was able to waive his collective action rights. The Court noted that Defendant provided declarations from other managers explaining specific managerial duties that independently established that Plaintiff was a supervisor. Id. at *11. At a minimum, the Court stated that Plaintiff hired employees, managed the staffing of his restaurants, and recommended employees for promotion. Id. at *15. The Court found that these activities each involved independent judgment and the weighing of various factors. Id. at *16. Thus, the Court held that the agreement was not rendered illegal by the NLRA. Because Plaintiff's complaint did not include any PAGA claims, the Court stated that it need not address whether they had been waived. Id. at *6. Finally, the Court held that the agreement was not unconscionable. The Court explained that by signing the agreement's receipt and acknowledgment, Plaintiff acknowledged receiving the agreement and having the opportunity to read it. Id. at *18. Plaintiff also acknowledged that the agreement required "all employment-related disputes involving my legally protected rights to be submitted to an arbitrator rather than a judge and jury in court. Id. The Court further found that the document was short, concise, in plain English, and not deceptive. Moreover, the Court noted that Plaintiff had the option to opt-out of the agreement. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Poublon, et al. v. C.H. Robinson Co.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 1969 (9th Cir. Feb. 3, 2017). Plaintiff, an account manager, brought an action in state court on behalf of herself and other similarly-situated employees, alleging wage & hour violations based upon misclassification of employment status as well as a claim under California's Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). Defendant removed Plaintiff's claims to federal court. Defendant moved to compel arbitration, stay the proceedings, and dismiss the class and representative claims pursuant to the dispute resolution provision contained in the parties' incentive bonus agreement. The District Court denied Defendant's motion, holding that the agreement between the parties was both procedurally and substantively unconscionable under California law. On Defendant's appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed. Plaintiff asserted that the agreement was procedurally unconscionable to a high degree and contained eight substantively unconscionable provisions. The Ninth Circuit disagreed and concluded that even though the agreement was an adhesion contract, there was a low degree of procedural unconscionability. The Ninth Circuit rejected Plaintiff's argument that the dispute resolution provision was oppressive because Defendant failed to provide her with a copy of the American Arbitration Association's rules and Defendant's arbitration procedure, which were incorporated by reference in the dispute resolution provision. Further, there was no evidence that Defendant indicated that Plaintiff would be fired for failing to sign the agreement, but only that Plaintiff would not get a bonus if she failed to sign the agreement. As to substantive unconscionability, the Ninth Circuit agreed with the District Court that the judicial carve-out provision allowing only Defendant to seek out judicial resolution of specific claims was substantively unconscionable. Defendant did not contest the District Court's decision as to the judicial carve-out provision. However, the Ninth Circuit ruled that while the provision was substantively unconscionable, it could be extirpated without affecting the intent of the agreement; therefore, it did not invalidate the agreement. The Ninth Circuit also held that a waiver of representative claims was not substantively unconscionable even though the waiver of Plaintiff's claim under California's Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA") was not enforceable under California law. The Ninth Circuit further ruled that the agreement's venue provision, confidentiality provision, sanctions provision, unilateral modification provision, and limitations on discovery did not render the agreement substantively unconscionable. The Ninth Circuit concluded that severance was appropriate and the agreement was valid and enforceable once the judicial carve-out was extirpated and the waiver of representative claims was limited to non-PAGA claims. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded.

Price, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 83754 (S.D. Ind. June 1, 2017). Plaintiff, a driver, brought an action alleging that Defendant misclassified drivers as independent contractors in violation of the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration with opt-in Plaintiff Ogbonna Anih and to dismiss him from the action. The Court granted the motion in part. Defendant is a technology company that offers a smartphone application to connect riders looking for transportation to drivers. Prior to using Defendant's software to generate leads for riders, potential drivers must enter into a technology services agreement (the "agreement"). Id. at *2. To enter into the agreement, Anih had to sign into Defendant's app and click the appropriate hyperlink. After confirming his acceptance of the agreement, the app automatically transmitted it to Plaintiff's driver portal, where Anih could review it or print it at any time. Id. at *3. The agreement contained an arbitration provision, which provided, in relevant part: "[E]xcept as it otherwise provides, this Arbitration Provision is intended to apply to the resolution of disputes that otherwise would be resolved in a court of law or before any forum other than arbitration, with the exception of proceedings that must be exhausted under applicable law before pursuing a claim in a court of law or in any forum other than arbitration. Except as it otherwise provides, this Arbitration Provision requires all such disputes to be resolved only by an arbitrator through final and binding arbitration on an individual basis only and not by way of court or jury trial, or by way of class, collective, or representative action." Id. Additionally, once a driver accepts the agreement, he still could opt-out of the arbitration provision within 30 days. Anih did not opt-out of the arbitration provision. Anih admitted that he accepted the agreement and did not opt-out of the arbitration provision, but argued that the class action waiver included in the arbitration provision violated the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") and therefore rendered the arbitration provision unenforceable. The Court found that the Seventh Circuit had expressly declined to address the effect of a clear opt-out provision on the validity of a class action waiver. The Court therefore held that the optional waiver in this case was lawful. Id. at *8. The Court stated that Anih had the opportunity to choose to resolve disputes by arbitration or litigation and, by not acting upon the clear, bold-faced language in the arbitration provision, Anih was bound to arbitrate his claims. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration and stayed the matter as to Anih pending resolution of the arbitration proceeding. Id. However, the Court denied the motion to dismiss Anih from the action because the Seventh Circuit has held repeatedly, "the proper course of action when a party seeks to invoke an arbitration clause is to stay the proceedings rather than to dismiss outright." Id. at *10.

Pyle, et al. v. VXI Global Solutions, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 183471 (N.D. Ohio Nov. 6, 2017). Plaintiff, a phone operator at a call center, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Defendants filed a motion to compel arbitration, arguing that Plaintiff signed an arbitration agreement during the course of his employment, in which he agreed to submit any employment claims he might have against Defendants to arbitration. Plaintiff argued that the Sixth Circuit's recent decision in NLRB v. Alternative Entertainment, Inc., 858 F.3d 393 (6th Cir. 2017), rendered the parties' arbitration agreement unenforceable. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff and Defendants mutually agreed to submit any claim related to Plaintiff's employment with Defendants to binding arbitration. Id. at *3. Plaintiff did not dispute that his FLSA claim was covered by the arbitration agreement, nor did he disagree that the arbitration agreement was silent as to the availability of class-wide arbitration. However, Plaintiff maintained that requiring him to proceed to arbitration on an individual basis would be illegal. Id. at *4. The Court noted that the Sixth Circuit applies a four-pronged test to determine whether an unwilling party can be compelled to arbitrate, and there was no question that the facts of this case satisfied the four-prong test. Id. at *5-6. Relying exclusively on Alternative Entertainment, Plaintiff argued that the ruling made compelling individual arbitration illegal. Id. at *7. In Alternative Entertainment, the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB") sought enforcement of its administrative decision that Alternative Entertainment had violated the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") by requiring employees to agree to arbitrate all claims concerning or arising out of their employment individually. Id. at *8. The Court explained that this action gave the Sixth Circuit the opportunity to weigh in on a circuit split over the question of "whether federal law permits employers to require individual arbitration of employees' employment-related claims." Id. The Sixth Circuit adopted the view that arbitration agreements containing express class waivers violate the NLRA. Defendants argued that the Sixth Circuit's decision was distinguishable because, whereas the agreement in Alternative Entertainment contained an explicit waiver of the right to pursue collective arbitration, the agreement here was silent as to the availability of class arbitration. Id. at *10. The Court agreed with Defendants. The Court noted that Alternative Entertainment did not address the issue of arbitration agreements that are silent on the subject of class-wide waivers. Id. Under these circumstances, the Court concluded that the decision in Alternative Entertainment was not intended to apply to arbitration agreements that were silent on the issue of class-wide arbitration, and therefore did not contain an illegal term, such as an express waiver of the right to class-wide arbitration. The Court found that it was undisputed that the arbitration agreement in question made no reference whatsoever to class-wide arbitration, and thus the Court could not infer the availability of such a vehicle based on mere silence. Id. at *11. As a result, the Court concluded that the parties' arbitration clause did not authorize class-wide arbitration and it held that Plaintiff must proceed to arbitration on an individual basis.

Ranieri, et al. v. Banco Santander, S.A.,* 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 45113 (D.N.J. Jan. 25, 2016). Plaintiffs, two former mortgage loan officers, brought a putative class action and collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay the required minimum wage and overtime compensation under the FLSA and the New Jersey Wage & Hour Law. Id. at *1. Defendants moved to compel arbitration, arguing that Plaintiffs were obligated to arbitrate all disputes pursuant to provisions in a series of employment agreements. At the start of their employment, Plaintiffs received an offer of employment that mandated that Plaintiffs execute "the enclosed Mortgage Retail Development Officer Agreement" ("MDO") and all attached exhibits, on or before the first day of work. Id. at *3. The offer letter also attached a copy of the mortgage sales commission plan. The MDO included an arbitration clause that prohibited class, collective, and representative actions against Defendant. Id. Both Plaintiffs signed the MDO on the bottom of the final page under a bolded sentence that read: "I certify, by my signature below, that I have received a copy of the mortgage sales commission plan, which has been provided to me." Id. at *5. Defendants maintained that Plaintiffs agreed to arbitrate pursuant to the MDO that contained the arbitration clause. The Court previously had held that it would not compel arbitration because the agreement was too ambiguously drafted, and ordered further discovery on the question of arbitrability. Defendant subsequently deposed Plaintiffs and they asserted that they did not intend to be bound to the terms of the arbitration clause because they did not read the offer letter or MDO in full. Id. at *7. After discovery, Defendant filed its renewed motion to compel arbitration with supporting documentation and Plaintiffs' deposition testimony, which the Court granted. The Court found that the express, unequivocal language of the MDO, extrinsic evidence that undermined Plaintiffs' claim of ambiguity in the MDO, and Plaintiffs' objective manifestations of intent to contract required grating the motion to compel arbitration. Id. at *8. The Court held that reasonable people reading the MDO would believe that, by signing it, they were agreeing to the terms in the document, including the arbitration clause. The Court opined that Plaintiffs also received and signed the offer letter, which told them they had to "execute" the MDO "on or before your first day of work." Id. at *15. One Plaintiff also received an addendum that again informed her that her that she was bound to all of the MDO's terms. Id. The Court determined that these documents put Plaintiffs on notice that, by signing the MDO agreement, their signatures would bind them to the entire document, not just acknowledge receipt of the commission plan. The Court held that Plaintiffs agreed to arbitrate based on the MDO's express terms and corroborative extrinsic evidence. Id. at *16. The Court further ruled that Plaintiff's FLSA and NJWHL overtime claims fell within the scope of the agreement. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Rimel, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48527 (M.D. Fla. Mar. 31, 2017). Plaintiff, a driver, brought an action alleging that Defendants misclassified drivers as independent contractors, and asserted various violations of Florida state and common law. To access the UberX platform to book passengers, a driver must enter into a "Raiser Software Sublicense & Online Services Agreement" (the "services agreement"). Id. The services agreement contained an arbitration provision and waiver of the right to bring collective or class actions. The services agreement also contained a provision permitting a signor to opt-out of the arbitration provision within 30 days. Based on the services agreement, Defendants filed a motion to compel arbitration and dismiss the case requiring that Plaintiff litigate his individual claims in arbitration. The Magistrate Judge had previously concluded that Plaintiff had accepted the services agreement and failed to opt-out of the arbitration provision within 30 days. The Magistrate Judge further held that: (i) Florida law, not California law, applied to the arbitration provision; (ii) the arbitration provision and the delegation clause were not unconscionable; (iii) the terms of the delegation clause were clear and unmistakable; and (iv) the class action waiver in the arbitration provision should be enforced. As such, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court grant Defendants' motion to compel arbitration. The Magistrate Judge found that, under the rules of severability, Florida law applied to the arbitration provision because the arbitration provision was a separate and distinct contract, isolated from other terms in the services agreement, including the California choice-of-law clause. On Rule 72 review, the Court concluded that the Magistrate Judge correctly determined that Florida law applied to the arbitration provision. Id. at *9. The Court found that the arbitration provision was severable from the services agreement, and therefore concluded that the services agreement's California choice-of-law provision had no effect on the Court's determination of the conscionability of the arbitration provision. Id. at *10. Plaintiff argued that the delegation clause was not clear and unmistakable because it conflicted with the services agreement's forum-selection clause. The Court ruled that the delegation clause clearly and unmistakably delegated questions of arbitrability to the arbitrator. Plaintiff also asserted that the delegation clause was substantively unconscionable because it would subject him to hefty fees. The Court opined that Plaintiff offered no evidence to buttress his conclusory assertion that arbitration would subject him to hefty fees because the arbitration provision provided that "[e]ach party will pay the fees for his … own attorneys," but that "[Defendants] will pay the Arbitrator's and arbitration fees." Id. at *14-15. The Court determined that Plaintiff's argument that the delegation clause was substantively unconscionable lacked merit because Plaintiff may not have to bear any fees or expenses beyond what he would have had to pay to pursue this action in a judicial forum. Plaintiff also contended that the delegation clause was procedurally unconscionable because it was hidden in the services agreement. The Court stated that the opt-out clause was prominently displayed in bold typeface in the services agreement, and the mechanism for opting-out was straightforward and simple to accomplish. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court found that the services agreement was not adhesive or procedurally unconscionable as a matter of law. Plaintiff also argued that the arbitration provision was unconscionable because it ran afoul of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") and Federal Arbitration Act by requiring drivers to resolve all disputes in arbitration "on an individual basis" only and not by way of "class, collective, or representative action." Id. at *16-17. As Plaintiff was not required to arbitrate his claims as a condition of employment, the Court held that Plaintiff had an absolute right to opt-out of the arbitration provision within 30 days from entering into the services agreement. Therefore, the Court noted that the Magistrate Judge correctly found that the arbitration provision was not substantively unconscionable based on the class action waiver. Finally, Plaintiff asserted that because the arbitration provision contained a waiver of claims under the Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA") it was unenforceable on public policy grounds. The Court explained that under the delegation clause, the parties clearly and unmistakably agreed that an arbitrator must resolve all "disputes arising out of or relating to interpretation or application of this Arbitration Provision, including the enforceability, revocability or validity of the Arbitration Provision or any portion of the Arbitration Provision." Id. Accordingly, if California law applied, which it did not, all of Plaintiff's challenges to the terms of the arbitration provision, including the PAGA waivers, would have to be "adjudicated in the first instance by an arbitrator and not in [a judicial forum]." Id. at *18. The Court therefore adopted the Magistrate Judge's report and recommendation and granted Defendants' motion to compel arbitration.

Riveria, et al. v. Saul Chevrolet, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 70960 (N.D. Cal. May 9, 2017). Plaintiff, a service counter salesperson, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant failed to provide meal and rest breaks, and failed to provide minimum wages and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration based on an arbitration agreement that Plaintiff signed when he commenced his employment. Plaintiff argued that arbitration should not be compelled because: (i) it was not a valid contract, (ii) the agreement was unenforceable because it interfered with Plaintiff's right to engage in concerted protected activity under the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"); and (iii) the agreement was both procedurally and substantively unconscionable. Id. at *8-9. The Court found that the agreement was unenforceable because it interfered with Plaintiff's right to engage in concerted protected activity under the NLRA, and therefore the Court denied Defendant's motion. The Court noted that the Ninth Circuit had previously held that a waiver of the right to bring concerted legal claims, i.e., collective or class action claims, in any forum – such as in arbitration agreement – are unenforceable because they violate the right to engage in concerted activity under the NLRA. Id. at *10. The Court noted that the arbitration agreement at issue contained the following language: “an arbitrator will hear only my individual claims and does not have the authority to fashion a proceeding as a class or collective action or to award relief to a group of employees in one proceeding. Thus, the company has the right to defeat any attempt by me to file or join other employees in a class, collective or joint action lawsuit or arbitration.” Id. at *11. The Court held that the agreement thus contained an unenforceable concerted action waiver. The terms of the agreement made arbitration the exclusive forum for resolving disputes, and eliminated the right to proceed in arbitration as "a class or collective action or to award relief to a group of employees in one proceeding.” Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant’s motion to compel arbitration.

Scroggins, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10815 (S.D. Ind. Jan. 26, 2017). Plaintiff, a driver, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants, a gig economy company and its subsidiary, misclassified its drivers as independent contractors rather than employees resulting in the violation of wage payment laws. Prior to using Defendant’s software to generate leads for riders, potential drivers must enter into a Technology Services Agreement (the "Agreement"). To enter the Agreement, drivers had to sign into the Uber app and click the appropriate hyperlink. The Agreement is then presented on the screen and can be reviewed in its entirety by scrolling. There is no time limitation to review the Agreement. To advance past the "Agreement" screen, the driver must first click "YES, I AGREE" and then click "CONFIRM.” Id. at *4. After confirming his acceptance of the Agreement, Plaintiff could review it or print it at any time. The Agreement also contained an arbitration provision. Although the arbitration provision began on page 14 of the Agreement, potential drivers were advised of the provision and their ability to opt-out at the bottom of page one in a paragraph printed in bold caps. Id. The arbitration provision also stated that it was not a mandatory condition of a driver’s contractual relationship with Defendant and provided the option to opt-out within 30 days of signing. Plaintiff did not opt-out of the arbitration provision. Defendant moved to compel arbitration of Plaintiff’s claims. Plaintiff did not dispute that he accepted the Agreement and did not opt-out of the arbitration provision. Rather, Plaintiff argued that the class action waiver included in the arbitration provision violated the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") and the Norris-LaGuardia Act ("NLGA"), and therefore rendered the arbitration provision unenforceable. The Court opined that Plaintiff was able to opt-out of the Arbitration Provision – including the class action waiver – even after he began driving for Uber, and yet he failed to do so. Id. at *7. Plaintiff argued that the NLGA prohibits the enforcement of class action waivers. The Act prohibits two types of agreements, including: (i) one in which a person promises not to join a labor union; and (ii) one in which a person promises to withdraw from a labor union. See 29 U.S.C. § 103. The Court held that an agreement to arbitrate is not covered by the NLGA and therefore it cannot render the class action waiver, or the arbitration provision, unenforceable. Id. at *8. The Court therefore granted Defendant’s motion to compel arbitration and stayed the matter as to Plaintiff’s claims pending the resolution of the arbitration proceeding.

Singh, et al. v. Uber Technologies*, 235 F. Supp. 3d 656 (D.N.J. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of Uber drivers, brought a class action against Defendant claiming that Defendant violated various labor laws. Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint and compel arbitration on the basis that Plaintiffs were bound by an arbitration agreement that the parties executed on-line. Plaintiffs argued that the arbitration agreement was invalid and unenforceable on several grounds. First, Plaintiffs argued that it was invalid because they never received a hard copy of the agreement. The Court rejected this argument outright as having “no basis in law” noting that in the “internet-era,” agreements are often maintained and delivered in electronic format. Id. at 664. In determining that the parties’ hyperlink agreement was valid, the Court found that Plaintiffs were provided reasonably conspicuous notice of the terms of the agreement and they unambiguously assented to these terms. The agreement was written in large, bold, capital text, and stated clearly that it was a voluntary arbitration agreement. The agreement also indicated that Plaintiffs should review the agreement with an attorney before agreeing to its terms and conditions and would suffer no adverse consequences if they chose not to agree. After Plaintiffs first “clicked” to accept the agreement on-line, they were prompted again to confirm that they accepted the agreement. Accordingly, the Court concluded that there was a valid agreement. Plaintiffs further argued that even if there was a valid arbitration agreement, it was unenforceable because the agreement was exempt from the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"). Plaintiffs argued that the Court lacked the authority to compel arbitration because the FAA excludes contracts involving transportation employees from arbitration agreements. Plaintiffs contended that their jobs required them to transport passengers across state lines, and therefore the agreement was unenforceable. The Court rejected this argument, noting that Plaintiffs' argument assumed that Plaintiffs were employees and not independent contractors. However, regardless of Plaintiffs' employment status, the Court ruled that the FAA would govern the parties' arbitration agreement because the FAA's arbitration exclusion only applies to those employees who are engaged in the movement of goods, as opposed to people, in interstate commerce. Accordingly, the FAA exclusion did not apply to this agreement. The Court also rejected Plaintiffs' argument that the agreement violated the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"). The Court noted that the NLRA would only apply if Plaintiffs were deemed to be employees. Regardless, the Court did not need to determine that issue because the Court noted that the arbitration agreement was optional and stated clearly that Plaintiffs would suffer no adverse consequences for not agreeing to it. Accordingly, the Court held that agreement did not violate the NLRA. Finally, Plaintiffs argued that the agreement was unconscionable and unenforceable because of the parties' unequal bargaining power and the cost-sharing provision. The Court rejected both these arguments as being without merit as well. The Court ruled that because of the conspicuous notice and the 30 day opt-out period of the provision, the contract between the parties could not be construed as a contract of adhesion. Plaintiff also argued that the cost-sharing provision, which requires Plaintiffs to share half the cost of arbitrating all claims, rendered the agreement unconscionable because it prevented Plaintiffs from vindicating their statutory rights. The Court also found this argument to be meritless and conclusory as there was nothing to suggest the cost-sharing provision was cost-prohibitive for Plaintiffs. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the case and compelled arbitration.

Smith, et al. v. RGIS LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 166608 (W.D. Pa. Oct. 6, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class and collective action against Defendant alleging overtime violations pursuant to the FLSA and the Pennsylvania Minimum Wage Act ("PMWA"). Id. at *1. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to the parties' agreement, to strike Plaintiff's class and collective action allegations, and to stay the action pending resolution of the arbitration. Id. The Magistrate Judge recommended that Defendant's motions be granted. Id. at *42. Defendant argued that Plaintiff was bound by the mandatory arbitration agreement set forth in its dispute resolution program ("DRP"). Id. at *17. Plaintiff argued that the collective/class action waiver in the DRP was unlawful under the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") and the Norris-LaGuardia Act ("NLA") and, therefore, unenforceable. Id. at *19. Plaintiff argued that the class/collection action waiver violated the NLRA provision granting employees a substantive right to engage in "concerted activity," which included the right to bring a collective action under the FLSA. Id. at *21. Defendant responded that the class/collective action waiver was enforceable because Plaintiff could opt-out without consequences. Id. at *20. The Magistrate Judge agreed, noting that the evidence established that Defendant did not require Plaintiff to accept the collective/class action waiver as a condition of employment or coerce her to accept it in any way. Id. at *26. Plaintiff received an electronic and hard copy of the DRP booklet and a letter on the date of hire informing her that she could submit an opt-out form within 60 days of her hire date. Id. Plaintiff electronically signed an acknowledgement that she understood that she was bound by the DRP unless she opted-out and that the DRP required all employment related claims to be submitted to arbitration on an individual basis. Id. Plaintiff did not submit an exclusion form. Id. at *26. The Magistrate Judge, therefore, determined that Plaintiff was fully informed about the consequences of failing to submit the exclusion form and that she chose not to opt-out. Id. at *27. Further, the Magistrate Judge found no evidence in the record to suggest that Defendant threatened, either expressly or impliedly, to terminate or to retaliate against Plaintiff if she chose to opt-out of the DRP. Id. at *27. To the contrary, Defendant's manager of human resources stated that participation in the DRP was completely voluntary, that an employee's election to participate in or opt-out of the DRP had no negative effect on his or her employment, and that safeguards were in place to ensure the confidentiality of any exclusion forms. Id. The Magistrate Judge concluded that the weight of the relevant authority supported a finding that an arbitration agreement that requires individual arbitration of all employment-related disputes and includes an opt-out provision does not violate the NLRA or the NLA where there is no evidence that Defendant coerced Plaintiff's decision not to opt-out. Id. at *42. Because the opt-out provision was dispositive of the issues presented in the case, the Magistrate Judge did not address whether the phrase "concerted activity" in the NLRA could be interpreted to include FLSA collective actions or whether the right to engage in concerted activities is a substantive or procedural right. Id. at *33. The Magistrate Judge, therefore, recommended that the Court rule that the collective/class action waiver was valid and enforceable, grant Defendant's motion to compel arbitration, and strike Plaintiff's class and collective action allegations. Id. at *43.

Spano, et al. v. v. &J National Enterprises,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 139922 (W.D.N.Y. Aug. 30, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging violations of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiff was an employee of v. & J Employment Services, Inc. ("V&J Employment"), a non-party to this action, where he worked as a pizza delivery driver for a restaurant that Defendants operated. Plaintiff executed an arbitration agreement containing a collective/class action waiver with v. & J Employment. Id. at *4. Defendants filed a counterclaim and sought to compel arbitration of Plaintiff's claims pursuant to the agreement. Plaintiff then filed a charge with the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB") claiming that Defendants had interfered with Plaintiff's rights under § 7 of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"), by including a class/collective action waiver in the agreement and attempting to enforce it. The NLRB began an investigation into the basis of the charge, but stayed the investigation pending a forthcoming decision by the U. S. Supreme Court on the validity of class/collective action waivers in arbitration agreements under the NLRA. Plaintiffs moved to dismiss Defendants' counterclaim for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction and stay the action pending an investigation by the NLRB. Defendants then moved to compel individual arbitration, stay this action, and strike all class/collective actions from the complaint. Specifically, Defendants contended that Plaintiff's FLSA, NYLL, and common law claims must be arbitrated or litigated through arbitration pursuant to the terms of the agreement and that Plaintiff's class allegations should be struck from the complaint due to the waiver in the agreement. Plaintiff then filed a class action arbitration demand and sought to initiate arbitration proceedings before the American Arbitration Association ("AAA"). Plaintiff named Defendants and V&J Employment as the arbitration respondents and the AAA sent correspondence to Defendants, indicating that the demand had been filed and requesting submission of the agreement. Subsequently, Defendants failed to respond to the AAA. The Court determined that Defendants were bound by the arbitration agreement as non-signatories and agreed with Plaintiff's contention that Defendants were estopped from avoiding the agreement because Defendant received a direct benefit from the agreement and had sought to enforce it. However, the Court denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration on the basis that Defendants waived the right to arbitrate. Defendants sought to strike all class/collective actions from the complaint based upon the agreement's class/collective action waiver. The Court opined that the application of existing Second Circuit precedent indicated that the waiver was valid and enforceable, and that Defendants' motion to strike the class/collective allegations from the complaint should be granted. However, the Court deferred entering judgment upon the validity and enforceability of the class/collective action waiver and granted a stay sua sponte because the U. S. Supreme Court had granted certiorari on three consolidated cases to address whether class action waivers in arbitration agreements violated the NLRA. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to stay pending the resolution of the NLRB's investigation. It opined that the Second Circuit had rejected the NLRB's position that class/collective action waivers were unenforceable, and thus, absent a new ruling by the U.S. Supreme Court, the Court would follow Second Circuit precedent and enforce the waiver. Accordingly, the Court stayed the action along with Defendants' motion to strike Plaintiff's collective and class claims pending the resolution of the Supreme Court's decision in the consolidated cases of Ernst & Young, LLP v. Morris, 137 S. Ct. 809 (2017), Epic Systems Corp. v. Lewis, 137 S. Ct. 809 (2017), and NLRB v. Murphy Oil USA, Inc., 137 S. Ct. 809 (2017). Id. at *45.

Sutherland, et al. v. AmeriFirst Financial, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 156835 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 25, 2017). Plaintiff, an executive assistant, filed a lawsuit in California state court alleging various violations of the California Labor Code and seeking statutory penalties pursuant to the California Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). Defendant removed the action on the basis of diversity jurisdiction and then filed a motion to transfer venue and compel arbitration. Defendant contended that Plaintiff signed an arbitration agreement at the commencement of her employment that required "all disputes, claims, questions, or differences" arising from Plaintiff's employment or separation to be resolved by binding arbitration. Defendant argued that all of Plaintiff's causes of action related to, derived from, and arose in connection with her employment relationship with Defendant, and therefore fell squarely within the scope of the arbitration agreement. Plaintiff argued that the arbitration agreement was unenforceable because it was unconscionable and lacked mutuality. The Court held that the arbitration agreement was valid, covered the dispute at issue, and should be enforced. Id. at *11. Defendant contended that the arbitration agreement was valid and enforceable because Plaintiff knowingly and voluntarily agreed to the terms and conditions contained in the employee handbook, which included the arbitration agreement. Plaintiff asserted that the agreement she signed was invalid because: (i) the arbitration clause was adhesive by nature; and (ii) the placement of the arbitration clause within the larger employee handbook led to unfair surprise that rose to the level of unconscionability. Id. at *12. Drawing all reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the Court found Plaintiff's unconscionability arguments unavailing. The Court determined that Plaintiff signed and acknowledged her receipt, understanding of, and agreement to be bound by the employee handbook containing the arbitration agreement and the document entitled "Dispute Resolution Policy Acknowledgement." Id. at 15. Further, looking to the language of the subject documents, the Court found no term that shocked the conscience, contravened public policy, or otherwise impermissibly altered the fundamental duties imposed by law. Accordingly, the Court held that the arbitration agreement was valid. Id.* at *16-17. The Court further opined that the allegations and factual details left little doubt that the matter was covered by the arbitration agreement. Indeed, Plaintiff brought claims alleging wage & hour violations arising from her employment. Id. at *17. The Court noted that, in the arbitration agreement, the parties agreed upon venue in Maricopa County, Arizona. Because § 4 of the Federal Arbitration Act did not permit the Court to compel arbitration outside of the Southern District of California, however, the Court concluded that the appropriate remedy would be to transfer this case to the U.S. District Court for the District of Arizona. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to transfer venue.

Torgerson, et al. v. LLC, International, Inc.*, 277 F. Supp. 3d 1224 (D. Kan. 2017). Plaintiff, a migration analyst, brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendant incorrectly classified all migration analysts as exempt and therefore failed to pay proper overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. The Court had previously concluded that Plaintiff signed an employment agreement that required him to arbitrate any FLSA claims, and granted Defendant's request to stay the case and compel the parties to proceed to arbitration. The Court also previously declined to rule on Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action without prejudice to his right to present the request to an arbitrator. Id. at 1221. Plaintiff subsequently filed a motion for reconsideration of the Court's previous order, asserting: (i) that a recent Tenth Circuit decision presented a change in the controlling law that rendered the parties' arbitration agreement unenforceable; and (ii) that even if the Court declined to reconsider its decision to compel arbitration, Plaintiff requested that the Court grant conditional certification of a collective action because the Court must decide the issue and not the arbitrator. Id. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion for reconsideration. Plaintiff had signed an employee agreement as a condition of his employment, which contained an arbitration agreement stating that: (i) employees would submit to arbitration any controversy or claim arising out of or relating to the agreement; (ii) that all arbitration costs would be paid by the losing party, unless the arbitrators decide such costs should be allocated between the parties in particular proportions; and (iii) that the prevailing party was entitled to reasonable attorneys' fees and costs. Plaintiff argued that the Tenth Circuit had recently held that the effective vindication exception could apply if the filing and administrative fees attached to arbitration were so high as to make access to the forum impracticable. Id. at 1228. Plaintiff asserted that the employment agreement's fee-shifting and cost-shifting provisions exposed him to a substantial risk that he would have to bear the costs and fees of arbitration if his claims failed. Id. The Court, however, found that even if the exception applied, Plaintiff provided no evidence regarding his inability to pay the costs and fees associated with arbitration. Id. at 1230. Without this information, the Court could not decide whether arbitration was prohibitively expensive. Id. Further, the Court opined that the employment agreement was clear that Plaintiff was able to recover attorneys' fees if he was the prevailing party, and that this provision was consistent with the fee-shifting provisions of the FLSA. Id. at 1232. The Court also disagreed that its previous order declining to rule on Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification of a collective action produced manifest injustice. Plaintiff contended that the putative Plaintiffs would lose their right to assert FLSA claims if they did not receive notice and an opportunity to join the lawsuit before the statute of limitations ran on their claims. The Court held that the putative Plaintiffs could stop the statute of limitations from running by filing individual claims, and that opting-in to this lawsuit was not the only mechanism for preserving those claims. Id. at 1234. The Court found that it was inefficient to grant conditional certification before the arbitrator decided that Plaintiffs could proceed on a collective basis, as granting conditional certification and facilitating the notice and setting an opt-in period would impose additional delays. The Court thereby denied Plaintiff's motion for reconsideration.

Valenzuela, et al. v. Crest-Mex Corp*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 122012 (N.D. Tex. Aug. 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of maintenance employees, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Defendants filed a motion to compel arbitration, and the Court granted the motion. Defendant Townsend contended that he provided Plaintiffs with agreements that contained arbitration provisions, both in person and by mail. Id. at *3. Townsend asserted that he told Plaintiffs they would be bound by the agreements if they continued to work and receive pay, that Plaintiffs orally agreed to their terms, and that Plaintiffs continued to work and receive pay. Townsend further contended that he subsequently provided Plaintiffs with updated agreements, to which they again orally agreed, and that Plaintiffs continued to work and receive pay. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs stated that that they did not recall receiving the first agreement, and two Plaintiffs stated that they did not remember seeing the second agreement. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs contended that Townsend failed to prove notice of either agreement by mail because he failed to provide evidence of letters that were properly addressed, stamped, and mailed. Plaintiffs further asserted that they did not receive effective notice of either agreement because, although both agreements contained a written Spanish translation, both stated that the English version controlled, and Townsend did not orally translate the English version into Spanish or submit a certified translation. Id. at *6-7. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs had formed a valid agreement to arbitrate. Under Texas law, an at-will employee who receives notice of an employer's arbitration policy and continues working has accepted that policy as a matter of law. Id. at *7. The Court also considered whether Plaintiffs' claims were within the scope of the agreements. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs' claims were within the scope of both agreements because the first contained a delegation of arbitrability clause, which permitted the arbitrator to decide whether Plaintiffs' claims were within the scope of the agreement, and the second encompassed "all issues at any time including all state and federal laws regarding work, employment, pay, and overtime." Id. at *8. The Court determined that the dispute was within the scope of the agreements. The Court also held that the language of the agreements did not make them procedurally unconscionable because Plaintiffs were provided with Spanish translations, and Plaintiffs did not contend that the translations were inaccurate. Id. at *10-11. Finally, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' claims against all of Defendants must be arbitrated because, by alleging that all Defendants were their employers during the same period of time, and that all Defendants violated the FLSA by withholding overtime pay, Plaintiffs advanced allegations of "substantially interdependent and concerted misconduct by both the non-signatories and one or more of the signatories" to the agreements. Id. at *12-13. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Wulfe, et al. v. Valero Refining Co.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 6764 (9th Cir. April 19, 2017). Plaintiff, a refinery operator, filed a suit alleging several employment-related claims under the California Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). The District Court entered an order compelling arbitration. The arbitrator then entered a partial award, ordering Plaintiff to proceed with his PAGA claim on an individual basis. The District Court subsequently confirmed the partial arbitration award. Id. at *2. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit upheld the District Court's ruling. While this case was pending on appeal, the California Supreme Court and the Ninth Circuit issued opinions holding that pre-dispute agreements to waive the right to bring a representative PAGA claim are unenforceable notwithstanding the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"). Id. The Ninth Circuit explained that when this case was first before it, it affirmed the District Court's order compelling arbitration and also affirmed, in part, the order confirming the arbitration award, but remanded to the District Court to consider the intervening case law concerning the PAGA claim. Id. at *3. The Ninth Circuit directed the District Court to consider in the first instance Plaintiff's argument that, in light of those subsequent decisions, the arbitrator's award should be vacated because she "exceeded [her] powers," or so imperfectly executed them that a mutual, final, and definite award upon the subject matter submitted was not made. Id. On remand, the District Court analyzed the issue and declined to vacate the award. The District Court concluded that intervening law could not provide a basis for vacatur. Section 10 of the FAA permits vacatur "where the arbitrators exceeded their powers." Id. at *3. Plaintiff argued that succeeding judicial decisions rendered the arbitrator's decision in excess of her powers. Id. at *3-4. The Ninth Circuit explained that the issue was not whether, with perfect hindsight, it could conclude that the arbitrator erred; instead, the issue was whether the arbitrator recognized the applicable law and then ignored it, and there was no contention that the arbitrator did so here. Id. at *4. The Ninth Circuit stated that at the time the arbitrator rendered the partial award, the law was unsettled as to whether Plaintiff's PAGA claim should be arbitrated on an individual basis. Further, Plaintiff did not argue or cite any authority to the arbitrator that the agreement requiring individual arbitration of his PAGA claim was unenforceable. Id. The Ninth Circuit determined that failing to correctly predict future judicial decisions did not mean the arbitrator acted in "manifest disregard" of existing law. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision.

(vi) Awards Of Attorneys' Fees And Costs In FLSA Collective Actions

Dobson, et al. v. Timeless Restaurants Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 54912 (N.D. Tex. April 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, filed an action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA. At trial, after seven Plaintiffs were dismissed, a jury awarded the remaining Plaintiffs unpaid wages and the Court awarded an equal amount in liquidated damages for a total award of $87,753.96. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs had two sets of lawyers, the Tran Law Firm and the Glenn Law Firm. Plaintiffs filed a motion for attorneys' fees and costs, which the Court granted in part. The Tran Law Firm requested total fees and expenses of $398,326.90. Id. at *3. The fees were calculated at an hourly rate for partners of $350 to $400 per hour and $125 per hour for legal assistants and paralegals. The Glenn Law Firm requested 199.25 hours at $400 per hour for an amount of $79,700, plus $4,807.11 in litigation costs for a total of $84,507.11. Id. Plaintiffs voluntarily reduced their fees by 25% due to the seven Plaintiffs that were dismissed from the action. Accordingly, Plaintiffs sought $298,745.17 in fees on behalf of the Tran Law Firm and $63,380.33 for the Glenn Law Firm. Plaintiffs contended that the amounts requested on behalf of both law firms were reasonably and necessarily expended for the successful prosecution of their claims. Id. at *5. Defendant asserted the amount of attorneys' fees and costs requested was unreasonable and excessive. The Court noted that while this case had numerous Plaintiffs and several issues under the FLSA, it was not a particularly difficult case in terms of the issues presented, it was over-litigated, and became protracted because of the issue of attorneys' fees and the parties' unwillingness to take reasonable steps to resolve the fee issue. The Court found that Plaintiffs provided affidavits of other attorneys in the area that confirmed that the requested fees were within the normal and customary range based on the experience of Plaintiffs' counsel. Id. at *11. The Court therefore found the rates reasonable. However, the Court noted that the jury's award of $43,876.98 was only 38% of the amount in actual damages Plaintiffs sought at trial. Id. at *12. Had Plaintiffs prevailed on the amount of actual damages sought, they would have been awarded $116,308.37 by the jury, and the Court would have awarded an equal amount in liquidated damages for a total judgment of $232,616.74. Id. at *13. The Court stated that although there is no per se rule of proportionality between the amount of recovery and the amount of attorneys' fees awarded, it believed a further reduction was warranted. Id. at *14-15. Additionally, as Plaintiffs did not file a bill of costs as required under § 1920, the Court declined to permit recovery of any items that were defined as taxable costs. Therefore, the Court did not allow recovery of the $350 filing fee or the $555 sought by both the Tran Law Firm and the Glenn Law Firm for deposition expenses. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees.

In Re FedEx Ground Package System, Inc. Employment Practices Litigation*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 91155 (N.D. Ind. June 12, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a multi-district wage & hour class action litigation alleging numerous state and federal claims. Co-lead counsel for Plaintiffs and FedEx signed onto a settlement agreement purportedly resolving all claims in the New Jersey class action, but only one of the six class representatives signed the agreement. The Court granted settlement approval. Less than a week later, all seven class representatives objected to final approval of the settlement. At the fairness hearing, the Court ruled that none of the class representatives' arguments were sufficient to invalidate the settlement even before reaching the issue of fairness. Id. at *79. However, the Court noted that, at the hearing, the class representatives found an error in the notice to class members as to the average amount of recovery under the settlement agreement and as to whether the class representatives approved the settlement. The class representatives asked that new notice be issued showing the corrected average recovery amount and explaining that the class representatives did not approve of the settlement. Id. at *79-80. The parties stipulated to re-notice the class, the Court approved the new notice form, and the revised notice was sent to class members. Class representatives then requested attorneys' fees and costs for their work on the objection and at the fairness hearing. Id. at *80. Class counsel argued that the class representatives should not be credited for the re-notice. Class counsel stated that they stipulated to re-noticing the class without the Court's order and that they were not obligated to re-notice because the estimated recovery for each class member was correct in the original notice. Id. at *87. The Court ruled that whether the updated notice was required or only done out of "an abundance of caution," the new notice helped provide class members with information that could assist them in deciding whether or how to object. Id. at *88. However, the Court held that class representatives' argument that the settlement agreement was facially invalid because all class representatives opposed it had little basis in law and simply reiterated arguments that came out in assessing the settlement's fairness. Id. The Court concluded that when, as here, the objectors' benefits to the class are meager and their litigation tactics are misleading or needlessly accusatory, a fee award was not appropriate. Id. at *93. The Court found that the new notice did not change the settlement agreement or class counsel's fee award. Accordingly, the Court denied the class representatives' request for fees.

Makaneole, et al. v. SolarWorld Industries America, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 83954 (D. Ore. May 11, 2017). Plaintiff, a temporary worker, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants engaged in a practice of programming an electronic time-keeping system to deduct minutes from hours worked prior to reporting them to payroll for purposes of computing his compensation in violation of Oregon state law. Plaintiff alleged that he was first employed with Defendant Kelly Services, Inc. ("Kelly"), and then by Defendant Randstad US, LP ("Randstad"), and then by Defendant SolarWorld Industries America, Inc. and its affiliates ("SolarWorld Defendants"). Plaintiff alleged that during all three successive periods of employment, SolarWorld engaged in a practice of programming an electronic time-keeping system to deduct minutes from his hours worked prior to reporting them to payroll for purposes of computing his compensation, and that Kelly and Randstad – who were staffing agencies for SolarWorld – used the hours reported to them by SolarWorld following such deductions in calculating Plaintiff's compensation during the periods when he worked for those employers. Id. at *2-3. The Magistrate Judge previously recommended granting summary judgment in Randstad's favor as to Plaintiff's claim against it for failure to pay overtime wages owed, and also recommended that the Court grant summary judgment in Kelly's favor as to all of Plaintiff's claims against it. Id. at *4. Kelly subsequently filed a motion seeking an award of its costs as a prevailing party in the total amount of $2,375.40, pursuant to Rule 54(d). The Magistrate Judge recommended Kelly's request to tax Plaintiff with the expenses listed in its bill of costs should be denied. Id. at *5. Plaintiff argued that Kelly's request to tax him with its costs should be denied because he had limited financial resources as compared to Kelly, because awarding Kelly its costs might have a chilling effect on future class action wage & hour claim litigation, because the issues in the case were close and difficult, and because Plaintiff litigated in good faith. Id. at *6-7. The Court agreed with Plaintiff that to award Kelly its costs would have a significant and undesirable chilling effect on future class action wage & hour claim litigation. Id. at *8-9. The Magistrate Judge stated that if a potential representative of a putative class of wage claimants faced the prospect of being taxed with a Defendant's costs in the event of judgment in favor of Defendant, that prospect can be expected to have a chilling effect on the potential representative's interest in representing the putative class. Id. at *9. The Magistrate Judge therefore recommending denying Kelly's request in the interests of justice to avoid creating a disincentive to bring wage & hour litigation on a class action basis in the future.

Morales, et al. v. MW Bronx,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 165555 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime and the minimum wage in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for default judgment based on Defendant's failure to answer the complaint or otherwise appear in the case. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for default judgment. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs moved for approval of attorneys' fees and reimbursement of expenses in connection with the default judgment. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. Plaintiffs based their fee calculation on a proposed hourly rate of $275 of $350 for the services of three attorneys and $100 for the services of legal support staff members. Id. at *5-6. In support of the rates, Plaintiff submitted evidence of cases in the district in which judges had approved higher hourly rates and information about the legal experience of the attorneys. Id. at *6. Having reviewed the information submitted by Plaintiffs and the hourly rates approved by other judges, the Court found that Plaintiffs' proposed hourly rates were reasonable and fell squarely within the range for attorneys with comparable levels of experience. Plaintiffs further submitted that counsel performed 113.4 hours of work in connection with the case and supported the assertion with contemporaneous time records that included descriptions of the nature of the work performed during those hours. Id. at *7. The Court reviewed the time entries and determined that the work was "relevant and productive, and not duplicative." Id. at *8. Finding no basis for a reduction, the Court concluded that the number of hours expended on the case was both reasonable and properly included as a factor in the lodestar calculation. Id. The Court also reviewed the miscellaneous costs and litigation expenses that Plaintiffs submitted in connection with the legal services that counsel provided. The requested reimbursement figure reflected filing fees and service costs, which were both incidental and necessary to the adequate representation of Plaintiffs. The Court thus held that the request was reasonable and that Plaintiffs were entitled to reimbursement for litigation costs and expenses. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees and costs.

Randolph, et al. v. Powercomm Construction,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 21622 (4th Cir. Oct. 31, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the Maryland Wage & Hour Law ("MWHL"). The District Court conditionally certified a collective action under the FLSA, and 64 additional employees or former employees joined the lawsuit. The District Court dismissed 10 opt-in Plaintiffs after concluding that the statute of limitations barred their claims, but granted the motion for certification of a collective action. Id. at *2. The District Court then approved the parties' settlement of this action for $100,000 and ultimately awarded $183,764 for attorneys' fees. Defendants appealed the ruling, arguing that the District Court abused its discretion by failing to reduce the award to deduct time spent by Plaintiff's counsel pursuing the claims of the 10 dismissed opt-ins. Id. at *3. The Fourth Circuit agreed with Defendants, and reversed and remanded for further proceedings. The District Court cited the general principle that an award need not be reduced for unsuccessful claims that share a common core of facts with successful claims. The Fourth Circuit found that it difficult to imagine how the time-barred claims of the dismissed opt-in Plaintiffs were intertwined with successful claims, other than the two categories of claims sharing the same Defendants and both relating to unpaid wages. Id. at *5. To the extent that the District Court relied on the overall outcome of the litigation to justify not reducing the award for the unsuccessful claims, the Fourth Circuit concluded that the District Court misapplied the fee analysis framework because the relief obtained was more appropriately considered after deducting the time spent by Plaintiff's counsel pursuing unrelated, unsuccessful claims. Id. at *5-6. The Fourth Circuit also addressed the District Court's step three analysis to offer additional guidance on remand. The Fourth Circuit explained that the Supreme Court has recognized that the "most critical factor" in determining a reasonable fee is the degree of success obtained by Plaintiff. Id. at *6. Here, the District Court declined to reduce the fee award based on the results obtained because Plaintiff purportedly received 38% of the claimed damages incurred during the statute of limitations period, and the District Court did not want to discourage Plaintiffs' attorneys from reaching reasonable settlements by reducing the fee award. Although it opined that the latter justification might be persuasive, the Fourth Circuit found that the District Court clearly erred in its characterization of the percentage of claimed damages received by Plaintiff. The Fourth Circuit held that the District Court overlooked the fact that Plaintiff pursued liquidated damages under both the MWHL and the FLSA, resulting in a total alleged damages of $789,916, so when the settlement amount was divided by this figure, Plaintiff only received about 13% of the damages sought. Id. at *8. Therefore, on remand, the Fourth Circuit directed the District Court to reconsider its finding at step three that the relief obtained represented 38% of the relief claimed by Plaintiff for claims that accrued within the statute of limitations. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit vacated and remanded the District Court's ruling.

Ridgeway, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 149440 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of truck drivers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the California Labor Law. Following a trial, the jury returned a verdict in favor of Plaintiffs on four of the 11 causes of action at issue, including performing pre-trip inspections, performing post-trip inspections, taking 10-minute rest breaks, and taking 10-hour lay-overs. Id. at 1. The jury awarded damages of over $55 million. Plaintiffs moved for an award of attorneys' fees of $20,266,670.50 to be paid from the common fund, off-set by an award of fees from Defendant in the same amount through statutory fee-shifting. Plaintiffs further requested $220,149.89 in statutory costs to be paid by Defendant and an additional $1,593,781.44 in expenses from the common fund. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' fee request was unreasonable and, if fees are allowed, Plaintiffs should be awarded no more than a lodestar of $2,831,149.09. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs' counsel submitted declarations and time records showing that they spent over 10,000 hours on the case. Defendant did not argue that the requested hourly rates, standing alone, were unreasonable, but requested that the Court reduce the hourly rates based on what it termed as unreasonable billing practices. In light of the evidence submitted, the Court found that the hourly rates Plaintiffs sought were reasonable, that the time spent on discovery was not needless, that Plaintiffs' counsels' time records were not overly vague, and that their block billing was reasonable. However, the Court reduced travel time expenses by 30%, and subtracted duplicative billing entries and clerical time. Taking into account these deductions – and a 5% reduction Plaintiffs offered to take – bought Plaintiffs' lodestar to $6,491,662.12. Id. at *40. Plaintiffs contended that a multiplier of at least 2.717 was warranted because of: (i) class counsel's contingent risk; (ii) the "exceptional" results obtained; (iii) the novelty, difficulty, and complexity of the case, and class counsel's efficiency; (iv) class counsel's preclusion from other employment; and (v) public interest served by enforcing California's minimum wage laws. Id. at *41-42. Defendant argued that all the factors cited by Plaintiffs were already subsumed within the lodestar calculation, and therefore Plaintiffs should not be entitled to a multiplier The Court found that these factors – in particular the contingent risk, the novelty, difficulty and complexity of the litigation, and the preclusion of other employment – supported a multiplier of 2.0. Accordingly, the Court granted in part Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees and costs of $12,983,324.25.

Stewart, et al. v. San Luis Ambulance, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 21186 (9th Cir. Oct. 25, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay all wages owed in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Defendant appealed the award of attorneys' fees to Plaintiff following the entry of judgment in Plaintiff's favor on her wage & hour claims. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit vacated and remanded the District Court's ruling. The Ninth Circuit found that the District Court erred in failing to properly determine the off-set required to account for the fees paid to the Baltodano and Boren firms for their work as interim class counsel. On remand, the Ninth Circuit directed the District Court that Plaintiff would have the burden of: (i) producing the actual amount of the settlement in a related matter – the Javine action – that was ultimately paid to the Baltodano and Boren firms for their legal work in that matter; and (ii) proving that the amount already paid was insufficient compensation for the work performed. Id. at *2. The Ninth Circuit further determined that the District Court erred when it included all attorneys' fees – including those for claims on which Plaintiff did not ultimately prevail – in its comparison analysis under Rule 68. On remand, the Ninth Circuit instructed the District Court to calculate a reasonable attorneys' fee that it would award Plaintiff for success on claims one and two as of the date of Defendant's first offer of judgment, and as of the date of its second offer of judgment. The Ninth Circuit stated that it must then add $750 in FLSA liability to those values and compare those totals to the $11,000 first offer of judgment and the $20,000 second offer of judgment. Id. If the District Court determined that Plaintiff did not obtain a more favorable judgment, it then must award Defendant post-offer costs. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded the District Court's ruling.

(vii) Communications With Class Members In FLSA Collective Actions

Finder, et al. v. Leprino Foods,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8346 (E.D. Cal. Jan. 20, 2017). Plaintiff, an hourly employee, filed a wage & hour class action alleging California Labor Code violations including failure to provide a second meal break or accurate itemized statements, waiting time violations, violation of the Unfair Business Practices Act, and violation of the Private Attorney General Act. Id. at *2. Defendant filed a motion to limit Plaintiff's class communications, which the Court denied. Defendant argued that the communications of Plaintiff's counsel's with putative class members in a Facebook group were inappropriate and intentionally misleading. Defendant contended that Plaintiff's counsel intended to harass employees and create a disruptive effect on Defendant's organization. Id. at *3. Specifically, Defendant alleged that sometime in October 2016, it received reports from several employees stating that their names, as well as the names of Defendant's supervisors and other putative class members, had been published in several posts in a semi-private Facebook group. Id. at *4. Defendant alleged that the Facebook page named the 27 individuals whose declarations were submitted by Defendant in support of its opposition to class certification, asking those in the group to notify Plaintiff's counsel "if you know anything about the following individuals who are testifying for Leprino." Id. Another post identified a single employee, indicated the department in which she worked, and quoted a portion of her declaration. On the Facebook page, Plaintiff's counsel made comments indicating that the employee's declaration was contrary to hundreds of other employee statements, and asked that Facebook group members contact him with reasons why that employee would provide conflicting information. Id. at *5. Defendant argued that the conduct of Plaintiff's counsel was likely to have a chilling effect on employees who were willing to speak on behalf of Defendant, thereby hampering Defendants' ability to defend against the case. Id. at *6. Plaintiff contended that the private Facebook group was created by a former employee to let other current and former employees know about the case and was an appropriate way to communicate with the putative class. The Court found that the Facebook group was lawfully created by an interested potential class member. Id. at *11. The Court determined that Plaintiff's counsel was only a party to the Facebook page because an employee invited him to join the private Facebook group and he consented to the request, and not because he created the page. Id. at *13. The Count stated that as neither Plaintiff's counsel nor his law firm created the Facebook group, it had little concern that members were being harassed or improperly influenced in their voluntary communications with Plaintiff's counsel. Id. The Court opined that several of the communications of Plaintiff's counsel were directed at uncovering information about potential witnesses for Defendant, which was not improper. Id. at *13-14. The Court found that Plaintiff and his counsel were entitled to speak freely about the lawsuit with any potential class member that contacted them. Id. at *14. While the Court acknowledged that the comments of Plaintiff's counsel consisted of insinuations that cast Defendants and the supporting declarants in a negative light, those comments did not mislead employees about their rights as potential class members. Id. The Court further determined that the comments of Plaintiff's counsel did not create confusion or seek to influence whether class members opt-in or opt-out of the class. Id. at *15. Finally, based on the record, the Court did not find that the comments by Plaintiff's counsel would produce a chilling effect because: (i) the declarants' names and their supporting declarations were already publicly available on the Court's docket; (ii) Plaintiff's counsel already requested that members of the Facebook group refrain from "intimidating" Defendant's witnesses by contacting them; and (iii) the statements were not misleading or abusive. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion requesting that the Court limit the class communications.

Myers, et al. v. Marietta Memorial Hospital*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 60430 (S.D. Ohio April 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former nurses, brought a putative collective action and class action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them overtime compensation and minimum wages in violation of the FLSA and Ohio wage & hour laws. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants "coerced, intimidated, and harassed" potential class members, creating an "atmosphere of fear" such that they were afraid to join the lawsuit. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs filed a motion for a preliminary injunction, and requested an order enjoining Defendants from engaging in further unilateral communications about this lawsuit with potential class members. Id. at *5. The Court stated that when considering a motion for preliminary injunction, it must balance four factors, including: (i) whether the movant has a strong likelihood of success on the merits; (ii) whether the movant would suffer irreparable injury without the injunction; (iii) whether issuance of the injunction would cause substantial harm to others; and (iv) whether the public interest would be served by the issuance of the injunction. Id. at *11-12. The Court held that, at this stage of the litigation, Plaintiffs had established a likelihood of success on the merits on their substantive claims and had established sufficient harm to limit Defendants' unilateral communications with putative class members. Id. at *13. The Court further determined that the evidence also established irreparable harm, because if potential class members were intimidated and afraid to join the lawsuit, they could not vindicate their rights under the FLSA and Ohio law. Id. at *14. Plaintiffs argue that the grant of a preliminary injunction would not substantially harm Defendants, as they did not have an "absolute right to unilaterally investigate the claims in this case," and any information to aid in the preparation of their defense could be gained through the formal discovery process. Id. at *16-17. Defendants argued that an injunction would substantially harm the hospital's ability to conduct business and to defend the lawsuit. The Court disagreed, and stated that Defendants were the county's largest employers, which made it more likely for employees to be aware of what was occurring or what other employees were facing and become intimidated. Hence, this made potential class members particularly vulnerable in light of their reliance on the business relationship with Defendants. Id. at *18-19. The Court also opined that given that the class discovery period was over, Defendants would not suffer harm from a continued injunction until the Court ruled on class certification. Id. at *19. The Court determined that Defendants could continue to investigate their claims through formal discovery after a decision on class certification. Finally, the Court found that protecting both FLSA rights and free speech was in the public interest. By granting an injunction, the Court could protect both parties by only narrowly infringing on Defendants' speech rights, while still ensuring that class members had the opportunity to opt-in to the lawsuit. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction.

(viii) Concurrent State Law Claims In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Bell, et al. v. The Home Depot,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 145120 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 7, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought an action asserting that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' derivative claims for penalties under §§ 203 and 226 of the California Labor Code. The Court had previously granted summary judgment to Defendant on several of Plaintiffs' claims. However, the Court denied the motion for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' claim that Defendant failed to pay all required overtime to employees who worked shifts over eight hours that spanned two workdays by working overnight. Id. at *2. The Court noted that although Defendant did not submit direct evidence of a bona fide business purpose for its initial workday designation, it has presented circumstantial evidence tending to show the company did not design the workday for the purpose of evading overtime wages. Id. at *4. Defendant submitted a declaration from Christina Barnaby, the Director of Human Resources, which stated that Defendant established its workday in the 1980s, that this designation has never changed, that this designation had always applied on a company-wide basis, that the first California store opened in 1985, and that Defendant had never, prior to this litigation, analyzed the impact that its workday definition has on the overtime the company saved or paid. Id. at *7. The Court found the history of company-wide practice relevant because it demonstrated that Defendant defined the workday before it was subject to daily overtime laws in California and maintains the same workday in places that did not regulate daily overtime. Id. at *8. The Court noted that the fact that Defendant had not analyzed the impact of the workday definition on overtime savings or payments further indicated a lack of purposeful design. The Court determined that Plaintiffs had not shown that Defendant's defense was unsupported, unreasonable, or presented in bad faith. Plaintiffs objected to Barnaby's declaration on the grounds of hearsay and lack personal knowledge. The Court was not persuaded that these reasons should require it disregard consideration of her statements. Id. at *9. The Court stated that although the statements concerning the history of the company's workday definition were based, in part, on hearsay, they were also based on her personal knowledge of company policies and practices. In sum, the Court held that although a jury presented with the totality of the evidence might still find Defendant liable on the overtime claim, Defendant presented a good faith defense to such liability. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' §§ 203 and 226 claims.

Bernstein, et al. v. Virgin America, Inc.,* 277 F. Supp. 3d 1049 (N.D. Cal. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of flight attendants, filed a class action against Defendant alleging that Defendant failed to pay for hours worked, before, after, and between flights, overtime and minimum wages, time spent in training, time spent taking mandatory drug tests and completing incident reports, and did not provide accurate wage statements under the California Labor Code and California Industrial Wage Order 9-2001. Plaintiff also filed derivative claims under the California Unfair Competition Law and the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment on three grounds and the Court denied the motion in part and granted it in part. First, Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs should be barred from making wage & hour claims under California law because it would violate the presumption against extraterritorial application and the dormant commerce clause. The Court denied summary judgment on this ground, and rejected Defendant's argument that an employee must work primarily in California to benefit from protections of California law. The Court also rejected Defendant's argument that Plaintiffs could not seek protection of California law for work performed outside the state of California. The Court held that the presumption against extraterritorial application did not apply because the alleged wrongful conduct occurred in California as Defendant's compensation policies at issue were determined in its headquarters in Burbank, California. The Court, however, noted that some conduct – such as failure to provide meal periods and rest breaks – did not originate in California, and as some of these alleged violations occurred outside California, Plaintiffs could not recover for those specific violations. However, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment on the meal and rest break claim because there was evidence that Plaintiffs were deprived of some of these meal periods and breaks in California. Defendant also asserted that if forced to comply with the California Labor Code, it also would have to comply with other states' wage & hour laws, thereby placing an undue burden on interstate commerce in violation of the dormant commerce clause. The Court rejected the premise that Defendant would be required to comply with each states' wage & hour laws, noting that Defendant was subject to California law due to Plaintiffs' ties to California and the compensation policies at issue came from Defendant's headquarters in California. Second, Defendant sought summary judgment on grounds that Plaintiffs' meal and rest break claims were preempted by the Federal Aviation Act ("FAA") and the Airline Deregulation Act. The Court rejected both preemption arguments. The Court opined that the FAA had only one regulation on meal and rest breaks, which was a prohibition of working periods longer than 14 hours and a requirement of a nine-hour rest period between flights. Defendant argued that there were potential conflicts between the FAA's regulations and California's meal and rest break requirements. Defendant asserted that California law requires employees to be relieved of all duties during a 30-minute meal break every five hours and this conflicted with the FAA regulations that do not permit Plaintiff to "forego their responsibilities in flight." Id. at 1064. Defendant also stated that the FAA permitted flight attendants to stay on-duty for up to 14 hours, whereas California law requires a 10-minute rest period for every four hours and a 30-minute meal period every five hours. The Court rejected the assertion that it was physically impossible to comply with both requirements, as Defendants could staff longer flights with additional flight attendants to allow for duty free breaks. The Defendant further argued that the Airline Deregulation Act preempted the California Labor Code. The Court rejected the Defendant's argument that providing breaks as required under California law would prevent the airline from being prepared for take-off and boarding on time because these laws were not significantly related to rates, routes, or services. Finally, Defendant moved for summary judgment on the basis that its policies complied with California law requirements that employers in the transportation industry pay minimum wage "for all hours worked." The Court denied summary judgment on this issue because Defendant's compensation formula did not account for some duties like boarding and deplaning passengers and as Defendant was required to compensate employees for all their time worked "in some way" irrespective of how it calculates compensation. Id. at 1070. Furthermore, the Court denied summary judgment as to the wage statements violation issue because Defendant conceded that its wage statements did not provide an hourly rate of pay as required under California law. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that it complied in good faith, as that is not a defense to violating the requirement. The Court also denied the motion for summary judgment on the overtime issue and break claims because there was evidence that Plaintiffs worked more than eight hours some days. However, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to compensation for all hours worked doing non-flight activities, such as time spent undergoing mandatory drug testing and attending mandatory training because the compensation formula allotted pay for these activities. Additionally, the Court granted summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' claim for business expenses under the California Labor Code because Plaintiffs presented no evidence that they incurred any business expenses relating to their passports as alleged in the complaint. Because the Court did not dismiss all of Plaintiffs' underlying claims for unpaid wages, it also denied summary judgement on the remaining derivative claims and claims under the PAGA.

Berry, et al. v. Transdev, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58398 (W.D. Wash. April 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to provide rest breaks in violation of the Washington Minimum Wage Act ("MWA") and the Industrial Wage Act ("IWA"). Defendant First Transit moved to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Under separate contracts with King County Metro, Defendants Transdev and First Transit collaborated to provide paratransit services for disabled residents. Id. at *2. Transdev was responsible for hiring and deploying the drivers and First Transit developed schedules and routes. Id. at *2-3. Drivers were required to communicate with First Transit to stay apprised of scheduling and route changes. First Transit argued that the claims against it must be dismissed because it was not a joint employer with Transdev. The Court found that the regulatory and common law factors weighed in favor of finding that First Transit was a joint employer. Id. at *12. The Court noted that two of the five regulatory factors support a finding of joint employment because First Transit maintained substantial control over Plaintiffs and regularly supervised their work. Further, the Court opined that five of the eight common law factors also support a finding of joint employment, as Plaintiffs extensively used First Transit's communication equipment; Plaintiffs' work was not specialized; they lacked any opportunity for profit or loss; their relationship with First Transit existed on a permanent basis; and First Transit could not fulfill its contractual obligations unless Plaintiffs performed their integral role of transporting passengers. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs had alleged sufficient facts supporting First Transit's status as a joint employer such that dismissal pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) was not appropriate.

Biasi, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40887 (N.D.N.Y Mar. 22, 2017). Plaintiff, a retail employee, filed a class action against Defendant alleging violations of New York's Hospitality Industry Wage Order ("HIWO"). Specifically, Plaintiff claimed that, because he was required to wear a uniform vest at work, Defendant was required to compensate him with "uniform maintenance pay." Id. at *2. Plaintiff sought damages for unpaid minimum wages for uniform maintenance. Id. Defendant moved for partial summary judgment and to strike portions of Plaintiff's declarations that were submitted in opposition to Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *1. Plaintiff also sought leave to file a third amended complaint. Id. As to summary judgment, Defendant asserted that under the HIWO, Plaintiff must establish that he worked in the deli department at the Wal-Mart store and that it was a "restaurant," as defined in the HIWO. Id. at *12, *15. The Court granted Defendant's motion, ruling that Plaintiff failed to create genuine issues of material fact as to whether the deli department met the definition of a restaurant and whether Plaintiff even worked in the deli and was an employee for purposes of the HIWO. Id. at *35-36. The Court rejected Plaintiff's contention that he needed additional discovery to address these factual arguments. The Court noted that Plaintiff's response did not even mention Rule 56(d) and failed to include an affidavit pursuant to Rule 56(d). Id. at *46. The Court also denied Defendant's motion to strike on the grounds that it was unnecessary to strike facts because the Court had considered and identified the undisputed material facts for purposes of Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *35. Further, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for leave to amend his complaint because the HIWO did not apply to the deli department and any amendment would be futile. Id. at *48. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for partial summary judgment, denied Defendant's motion to strike, and denied Plaintiff's motion to amend his complaint.

Calabrese, et al. v. TGI Friday's, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 181598 (E.D. Pa. Nov. 2, 2017). Plaintiff, a restaurant server, filed a putative collective and class action under the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA"), the Pennsylvania Minimum Wage Act ("PMWA"), and the New Hampshire Minimum Wage Law ("NHMWL"). Plaintiff claimed that: (i) he was not given proper notice of tip credit provisions, as required under the FLSA and the states' laws; and (ii) Defendant violated New Hampshire law by requiring him to participate in a tip pool. Id. at *6. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification of his claims. Defendant moved for summary judgment as to all claims, and the Court granted Defendant's motion in its entirety. Defendant asserted that it was entitled to judgment as a matter of law because the evidence established that Defendant: (i) provided Plaintiff with proper notice of the tip credit provisions; and (ii) did not require Plaintiff to share his tips with other employees in New Hampshire. The Court ruled that Defendant fulfilled its tip credit notice obligations in their entirety at both the New Hampshire and Pennsylvania locations. Id. at *12. In its ruling, the Court pointed to the record that established that it was Defendant's policy to inform all newly-hired tipped employees both verbally and in writing that Defendant would be taking a tip credit. Id. Defendant gave each new employee an employee handbook that explained the tip credit. New hires were required to review the handbook, sign an acknowledgment of receipt and understanding, and to submit to testing on the contents of the handbook. Id. at *14. Furthermore, each restaurant had labor law posters that explained the relevant state and federal laws relating to minimum wage and tip credits that were posted in areas that employees frequented. Id. Further, the evidence established that Plaintiff was notified of the tip credit at orientation and training and Defendant produced a signed copy of Plaintiff's tip credit notification form, training records, and tests. Id. Plaintiff responded that he did not recall hearing the term "tip credit" and had no recollection of being told that Defendant would be taking a tip credit. Id. at *14. Plaintiff admitted that might have been told about the wage component of his pay before he began his employment and he did recall being told that there would be an hourly rate that would be less than the minimum wage. Further, when questioned about whether certain questions from the employee handbook concerning the payment of wages and tips were covered during his training, Plaintiff responded that they were all covered. Id. at *16. The Court concluded that based upon this evidence, Defendant notified Plaintiff that New Hampshire and Pennsylvania were tip credit states and the restaurants would be taking a tip credit against the minimum wage. Accordingly, the Court ruled that summary judgment in favor of Defendant was proper as to all of Plaintiff's tip notice claims. Id. at *17. With respect to Plaintiff's claim that Defendant unlawfully compelled him to participate in a mandatory tip pool in New Hampshire, the Court ruled that Defendant was entitled to summary judgment on this claim as well. Id. at *18. The Court took special notice of the declaration of the general manager that she personally informed all tipped employees, which would have included Plaintiff, that they were not required to share tips with anyone and were entitled to keep all the tips that they received. Id. at *20. The Court pointed to Plaintiff's deposition testimony that he was told that he could keep any tips that he received. Id. While Plaintiff testified that he was strongly encouraged to "tip out" bartenders, he further testified that it was entirely his decision whether to share tips and how much, if anything, to give to bartenders. Id. at *21. The Court concluded that there was no evidence that Defendant required or coerced tip pool participation and at best, Plaintiff may have experienced peer pressure from bartenders to "tip out." Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment in its entirety. At the same time, the Court issued a minute order stating that Plaintiff's motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23 was denied as moot.

Chen, et al. v. MG Wholesale Distributors*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 188533 (E.D.N.Y. Nov. 13, 2017). Plaintiff, a truck loader and driver, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay the minimum wage in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Defendant filed a motion for partial summary judgment, which the Court granted. Plaintiff was paid bi-weekly in cash, with a weekly salary between $588.46 and $600. Plaintiff alleged that he worked 78 to 84 hours per week in his complaint, between 72 and 96 hours each week in the opposition to summary judgment, and "for about twelve hours a day" during his deposition. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiff further contended that "his hours were so high that his average hourly rate fell below [FLSA's] statutory minimum." Id. at *4. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff was promised a minimum weekly salary of $588.46 and that his weekly compensation was the greater of $588.46 or the sum of: (i) an hourly rate for the first 40 hours worked; (ii) overtime in the amount of one and a half times his hourly rate; and (iii) a "bonus hour" at his hourly rate for each day that he worked more than 10 hours in a day. The Court found that using Plaintiff's own testimony about the number of hours he worked – i.e., that he worked 12 hours per day for a total of 72 hours per week or that he worked three early days and three late days for a maximum of 77 hours per week – no jury could find that Plaintiff worked more than 81.17 hours in a given week, which is the minimum number of hours that Plaintiff would had to have worked to be paid less than minimum wage. Id. at *12. Furthermore, the Court determined that Plaintiff admitted that he had no extrinsic evidence of the number of hours he worked from which the Court could find a genuine dispute of material fact. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff's FLSA claims. As a result, the Court declined to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over Plaintiff's state law claims, which it dismissed without prejudice.

Frlekin, et al. v. Apple, Inc.*, 870 F.3d 867 (9th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs brought a wage & hour class action on behalf of current and former non-exempt employees seeking compensation for time spent waiting for and undergoing exit searches pursuant to Defendant's "employee package and bag searches" policy (the "policy"). Id. at *870. Defendant's policy required any employee with a bag to have the bag searched by a manager prior to leaving the store. Employees received no compensation for the time spent waiting for and undergoing exit searches, and they were required to clock-out before undergoing a search. Further, employees who failed to comply with the policy were subject to disciplinary action, up to and including termination. Id. The California Industrial Welfare Commission Wage Order No. 7 provides: "Every employer shall pay to each employee . . . not less than the applicable minimum wage for all hours worked in the payroll period . . . ." and "'hours worked' means the time during which an employee is subject to the control of an employer, and includes all the time the employee is suffered or permitted to work, whether or not required to do so." Id. at *871. The District Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment and ruled that time spent by class members waiting for and undergoing exit searches pursuant to the policy was not compensable as "hours worked" under California law because such time was neither "subject to the control" of the employer nor time during which class members were "suffered or permitted to work." Id. Plaintiffs appealed. Defendant conceded on appeal that employees who brought a bag or package to work and therefore must follow the search procedures were clearly under the "control" of the employer while awaiting, and during, the search. Id. at *871. Defendant nevertheless contended that "control" during the search was insufficient to constitute "hours worked." Id. According to Defendant, the search also must be "required." Id. Because the employees could avoid a search by declining to bring a bag or package to work, the search was not "required." Id. The Ninth Circuit opined that case at issue involved only those employees who voluntarily brought bags to work purely for personal convenience and it was certainly feasible for a person to avoid the search by leaving bags at home. Id. at *872. As a practical matter, many persons routinely carry bags, purses, and satchels to work, for all sorts of reasons, and although not "required," employees may feel that they have little true choice when it came to the search policy. Id. The Ninth Circuit stated that it had little guidance on determining where to draw the line between purely voluntary actions and strictly mandatory actions for purposes of ruling on Plaintiffs' claims. The Ninth Circuit therefore requested that the Supreme Court of California exercise its discretion to decide the certified question of California law dispositive of the appeal, since no clear controlling California precedent existed. Id. The Ninth Circuit accordingly certified the following question of state law to the Supreme Court of California: Is time spent on the employer's premises waiting for, and undergoing, required exit searches of packages or bags voluntarily brought to work purely for personal convenience by employees compensable as "hours worked" within the meaning of California Industrial Welfare Commission Wage Order No. 7?

Gould, et al. v. First Student Management LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 138666 (D.N.H. Aug. 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of bus drivers and driver assistants, brought an action alleging that Defendants' wage payment practices violated state and federal laws. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant subjected them to three illegal payment practices, including: (i) they were not compensated for preliminary and "postliminary" activities that they must perform before and after driving; (ii) failing to pay for time spent on trips that exceed pre-set limits; and (iii) miscounting the hours they worked on charter routes. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs sought damages for straight time and overtime that Defendant failed to pay them in violation of both New Hampshire's wage & hour laws and the FLSA. As to Plaintiffs' straight time claims, Defendant argued that drivers did not sufficiently allege that they had a contract with Defendant that obligated the company to pay the omitted wages. Id. at *7. However, the Court stated that Plaintiffs alleged that they bargained with Defendant to receive certain rates "for all time in service," and they adequately alleged that through a variety of mechanisms Defendant failed to pay them wages due under that arrangement. Id. The Court thereby found that Plaintiffs submitted sufficient evidence to survive a motion to dismiss of the state law straight-time claims. Plaintiffs also brought a claim for straight-time wages under the FLSA, seeking compensation at a regular rate of pay for hours worked under 40 in a week. The Court agreed with Defendant that this claim was not cognizable under the FLSA. The claim asserted by Plaintiffs sought to recover a regular rate of pay for uncompensated hours worked under 40, however the scope was limited to only weeks during which they also worked overtime. Id. Plaintiffs thus distinguished the "overtime gap time" claim from a "pure gap time" claim seeking unpaid straight-time during weeks in which they did not also work overtime. Id. at *8. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs' overtime gap time claim was not cognizable under the FLSA. Id. at *8-9. The Court opined that the plain language of the overtime provision provides an employee a cause of action only for "compensation for his employment in excess of [forty] hours." Id. at *9. Plaintiffs also brought a traditional claim for overtime pay under the FLSA. The Court dismissed the claim, finding that Plaintiffs failed to sufficiently plead that they worked more than 40 hours in any week. Id. at *13. The Court held that to state an overtime violation, Plaintiffs must allege that they "on a regular basis worked in excess of forty hours, when all time is properly counted, and were not paid time and a half for hours worked over forty hours in the given week." Id. at *16. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs did not provide sufficient factual allegations to plausibly infer an overtime violation. Id. at *17. Plaintiffs also brought a claim for overtime under New Hampshire law. The Court noted that the claim was structured in three ways, and each warranted dismissal. Accordingly, the Court granted in part Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Guerrero, et al. v. Haliburton Energy Services*, 231 F. Supp. 3d 797 (E.D. Cal. 2017). Plaintiff, a truck driver, filed a putative class action against Defendant for failure to pay overtime and failure to provide meal and rest breaks, as well as other violations of the California Labor Code ("CLC"). Plaintiff sought damages and injunctive relief. Defendant moved to dismiss several of Plaintiff's claims pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6). Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's claim of failure to pay overtime claim on the basis that Plaintiff's hours were regulated by the U.S. Department of Transportation ("DOT"), and therefore exempt from California's overtime laws. Plaintiff argued that the overtime claim was proper because the assertion of an exemption from California overtime laws is an affirmative defense and Defendant had the burden of demonstrating that the exemption applied to Plaintiff. The Court denied Defendant's motion, finding that Plaintiff's assertion that he was not covered by the DOT exemption was sufficient to survive Defendant's motion to dismiss. Defendant also moved to dismiss Plaintiff's claim that Defendant failed to provide the meal and rest periods required by California law. In addition to alleging that Defendant failed to provide the required meal and rest periods, Plaintiff alleged in the alternative that Defendants' business model was such that employees were routinely forced to work through their rest periods for fear of losing their jobs. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's meal and rest period claims on the basis that these claims lacked the necessary factual support, specifically noting that Plaintiff's subjective perceptions were insufficient to make plausible the allegations that Defendant prevented Plaintiff from taking meal and rest breaks. The Court agreed that Plaintiff's allegations were too vague and conclusory, and dismissed these claims with leave to amend. Plaintiff also asserted that Defendant's failure to pay all straight time and overtime wages earned, failure to provide complaint meal and rest breaks, failure to itemize and keep accurate records, and failure to pay all wages due at the time of termination were unlawful under the California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"). The Court granted Defendant's motion and found that wages do not constitute restitution that is recoverable under UCL. Finally, Defendant moved to strike Plaintiff's request for attorneys' fees on the basis that there was no statute or agreement between the parties that authorized an award of attorneys' fees to a party that prevails on a claim under the CLC. The Court declined to grant the motion to strike, noting that under California Civil Rules of Procedure ("CRCP"), attorneys' fees could be appropriate in this case, but Plaintiff's motion did not mention the CRCP. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's request for attorneys' fees with leave to amend.

Hill, et al. v. Employee Restaurant Group, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 100841 (S.D. W. Va. June 29, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of servers, alleged that Defendants took an unlawful tip credit in violation of the FLSA, failed to inform servers of tip credit provisions of the FLSA, and failed to pay minimum wage. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant failed to pay their former employees all wages owed within the time periods required by the West Virginia Wage Payment and Collection Act ("WVWPCA") following the severance of the employment relationship. Id. at *2. Plaintiff resigned on December 27, 2014 and her next scheduled payday was December 30, 2014. However, Defendant did not pay Plaintiff her final wages until January 13, 2015. Id. at *3. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's WVWPCA claims and argued that the Plaintiff complained about the amount she was paid and not about the timing or manner in which she was paid. Id. at *4. Plaintiff asserted that her factual allegations regarding the timing of her final paycheck supported her WVWPCA claims. Id. The Court found that Plaintiff properly asserted a WVWPCA claim. The Court noted that the version of the WVWPCA in effect at the time of the Plaintiff's resignation provided that "[w]henever an employee quits or resigns, the person, firm or corporation shall pay the employee's wages in full no later than the next regular payday." Id. at *5. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant did not pay her final wages until approximately two weeks after the regular payday following her resignation. Id. Thus, the Court concluded that Plaintiff stated a valid WVWPCA claim, and thereby denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Lawtone-Bowles, et al. v. City Of New York*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 155140 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 22, 2017). Plaintiffs, six Motor Vehicle Operators ("MVOs") employed by the New York City Department of Homeless Services ("DHS"), brought an collective action on behalf of themselves and all others similarly-situated alleging that Defendant failed to comply with various provisions of the FLSA. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant failed to properly compensate them for overtime, incorrectly calculated their overtime rate of pay, and failed to pay overtime compensation in a timely manner. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs fail to plausibly plead an overtime claim with respect to named Plaintiffs Lawtone-Bowles, Alli, Smith, and Brown. Plaintiffs alleged that they were scheduled for five shifts of 8 hours and 30 minutes each week, for which 30 minutes was uncompensated meal time. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs asserted that they "frequently" worked through their unpaid meal periods and "frequently" worked additional time before the official start and end of their scheduled shifts. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs alleged they began working 10 to 30 minutes before their shifts to perform pre-shift activities and performed uncompensated post-shift work activities approximately two to four times per week. Id. Plaintiffs also asserted specific examples of pre-shit and post-shift work. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' allegations were insufficient to state a claim. The Court disagreed, finding that Plaintiffs provided details about the length, frequency, and nature of their pre-shift, post-shift, and lunch-time activities, on top of allegations that Plaintiffs were scheduled to work 40 hours per week. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss as to Lawtone-Bowles, Alli, Smith, and Brown's overtime claims. As to Plaintiffs Predmore and Tobin, the Court noted that, although they failed to cite a specific week when overtime violations occurred, this omission was not fatal because their baseline workweek was already 40 hours. Id. at *15. The Court, therefore, concluded that all Plaintiffs adequately stated claims for uncompensated overtime. Defendant also asserted that Plaintiffs failed plausibly to plead their claim that Defendant miscalculated overtime pay by failing to include the night shift differential. Id. at *16. The applicable collective bargaining agreement specified that Plaintiffs should receive a 10% shift differential for all scheduled hours worked between 6:00 p.m. and 8:00 a.m. with more than one hour of work during those hours. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to plead that their regular rate included hours between 6:00 p.m. and 8:00 a.m. and that they had not alleged that they worked at least a full hour between 6:00 p.m. and 8:00 a.m. so as to qualify for the night shift differential. Id. at *17. The Court found Defendant's concerns valid as to certain Plaintiffs. The Court found no factual allegations specific to Plaintiffs Alli and Predmore that established that they worked hours entitling them to night shift differential pay. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Court dismissed any claims brought on these grounds with respect to Plaintiffs Alli and Predmore. Id. at *18-19. Finally, Plaintiffs alleged that, when they were paid for overtime compensation in cash, Defendant delayed the payment of overtime compensation beyond the next pay period for which Plaintiffs were paid for regular work hours. Defendant pointed to a difference between two groups of Plaintiffs in how their claims were pled. The Court ruled that, whereas Plaintiffs pointed to specific weeks of overtime for Brown and Lawtone-Bowles that were not timely paid, in the absence of similarly specific allegations for the other four named Plaintiffs, their claims were only conclusory. Id. at *20. The Court, therefore, granted the motion to dismiss regarding claims for timely overtime payment for Plaintiffs Alli, Smith, Predmore, and Tobin.

Leone, et al. v. H & B Land, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121348 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 2, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of tow truck drivers, filed a collective action alleging overtime violations under the FLSA. Defendant filed a counterclaim against an individual Plaintiff, alleging that he threatened to report Defendant to the IRS and insurance investigators if Defendant did not settle. Id. at *8. Defendant moved for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' overtime claim and its counterclaim, and the Court denied both motions. Id. at *32. Plaintiffs testified that during their shifts they were required to remain at Defendants' facility between towing calls. Id. at *4. Former and current employees of Defendants offered evidence that Plaintiffs were not required to spend their shifts on Defendants' premises and that they often left and used time for personal purposes. Id. at *6. Defendants asserted that they did not owe Plaintiffs compensation for time spent waiting for towing calls. Id. at *10. The Court ruled that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether their waiting time was compensable. The Court noted the critical inquiry for determining whether the time was compensable was whether the time spent waiting was primarily for the benefit of the employer or employee. Id. at *11. The Court considered the various factors, including: (i) whether the agreement and understanding between the employer and employee indicated that waiting time will be compensated; (ii) whether the employer requested or required that the employee wait; (iii) the extent to which an employee's free will was constrained during waiting time; and (iv) the extent to which the employer benefited from the waiting time. Id. at *11. The Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment because in looking at the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, all factors weighed in favor of Plaintiffs. Id. at *24. Defendants also argued that their claim of extortion should be construed as an abuse of process counterclaim in the form of extortion. Id. at *25. However, because Defendants' motion for summary judgment addressed the abuse of process counterclaim, rather than the pleaded extortion counterclaim, the Court denied the motion for summary judgment on the extortion counterclaim as well. Id. at *32.

Livi, et al. v. Hyatt Hotels Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 183053 (E.D. Pa. Nov. 6, 2017). Plaintiff filed a putative class action alleging violations of the Pennsylvania's Minimum Wage Act ("PMWA") and Wage Payment & Collection Act ("WPCL"), as well as a claim for unjust enrichment. Defendant moved for summary judgment and the Court granted the motion in its entirety. Id. at *2. Plaintiff was a banquet server and was responsible for serving food and beverages to guests at hotel banquets, meetings, and events. Id. at *3. Customers and Defendant executed written contracts for banquet events that contained a service charge provision. Id. at *4. Defendant retained a portion of the service charge and remitted 15% of the cost of food and beverages for each banquet event to banquet servers. Id. at *5. Plaintiff did not receive tips and sometimes worked over 40 hours in a week for which she was not paid 1.5 times her regular hourly wage. Id. at *6. Plaintiff earned $57,000 in total compensation, and the distributions from the service charges constituted $37,500 of the total compensation. Id. As to Plaintiff's unpaid overtime claim, Defendant claimed that Plaintiff was exempt from overtime under the Pennsylvania Code exemption because more than half of her compensation consisted of commissions on goods and services. Id. at *18. Because the PMWA was silent on the definition of commissions, the Court looked to the FLSA and determined that service charges are commissions under federal law. Id. at *26. As such, Defendant met its burden of proving that the more than half of Plaintiff's payments received was a commission, Defendant was exempt from the PMWA's overtime requirements. The Court, therefore, granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment motion as to Plaintiff's overtime claim. Id. at *30. Plaintiff also claimed that Defendant violated § 333.103(d)(2) of the PMWA by retaining a portion of the service charges imposed in banquet contracts. The Court granted summary judgment in favor of Defendant because Plaintiff's wages were more than 1.5 times the minimum wage. Therefore, it was clear that Defendant did not take a "tip credit" to off-set the wage it was required to pay Plaintiff. Id. at *34. As to Plaintiffs WPCL claim, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant violated the statute because Defendant failed to pay Plaintiff wages that it contractually owed her. Plaintiff claimed that she was a third-party beneficiary to the banquet event contracts, and therefore Defendants were subject to a binding legal duty to provide the compensation. Id. at *35. The Court ruled that because it was clear that there was no express intent to benefit the banquet servers in the banquet contracts themselves, Plaintiff was not contractually entitled to compensation from wages. Accordingly, the Court granted summary judgment as to the WPCL claim. Finally, Plaintiff claimed that Defendant was unjustly enriched by the work and efforts of Plaintiff. Id. at *37. The Court granted summary judgment as to this claim as well, opining that because Plaintiff's claims for unpaid overtime and unpaid service charge distributions failed, the unjust enrichment claim failed as well. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment in its entirety.

McCray, et al. v. Marriott Hotel Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41831 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 22, 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay the San Jose minimum wage in compliance with a municipal wage ordinance. A collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") governed Plaintiff's employment, which provided for a waiver of the San Jose minimum wage ordinance. Id. at *1. In addition, the San Jose ordinance provided a waiver for CBAs. Id. The Court stated that in order to determine if Defendant's hourly rate was lawful, it must first assess which law to apply to the dispute. Id. at *1-2. Defendant argued that CBAs were governed by federal law, so federal preemption applied, and the Court should begin its analysis with the provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act ("LMRA"). Plaintiff argued that the complaint was based on violations of municipal law, so the Court must begin its inquiry by interpreting the San Jose minimum wage ordinance. Id. at *2. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that: (i) the LMRA preempted the municipal claims; (ii) Plaintiff failed to exhaust the applicable grievance procedure; (iii) Plaintiff's claims were time-barred; and (iv) Plaintiff's claims failed as a matter of law because the San Jose ordinance expressly permits collectively-bargained waivers of the ordinance. Id. at *3. At the outset, the Court noted that § 301 of the LMRA states that disputes regarding collective bargaining agreements are exclusively governed by federal jurisdiction. Id. Section 301 provides that "[s]uits for violation of contracts between an employer and a labor organization representing employees in an industry affecting commerce as defined in this chapter, or between any such labor organizations, may be brought in any District Court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties." Id. at *4. The Court already concluded that the central question in this case was whether the CBA waiver of state and municipal law was applicable, so federal jurisdiction was therefore appropriate. Id. Because the Court concluded that federal jurisdiction was appropriate, it also found that the LMRA preempted Plaintiff's state law causes of actions. Id. at *5. In doing so, the Court acknowledged that the LMRA requires the Court to start its analysis by looking at applicable federal law and the provisions in the CBA. Id. at *5-6. The Court reasoned that a claim is not preempted if it poses no significant threat to the collective bargaining process and furthers a state interest in protecting the public transcending the employment relationship. Id. at *6. The Court found that all of Plaintiff's claims were related to the amount and process of work pay, which was covered by the CBA. Thus, the Court must construe Plaintiff's claims as breaches of the CBA. Id. The Court therefore also held that Plaintiff must first attempt to exhaust any mandatory or exclusive grievance procedures in the agreement. Plaintiff argued that the union refused to file a grievance on his behalf. Id. at *7. However, the Court opined that Plaintiff did not alleged that the union breached its duty of fair representation and there was no dispute of fact that Plaintiff did not exhaust his contractual remedies under the CBA. Id. Therefore, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Mendoza, et al. v. Nordstrom, Inc.,* 865 F.3d 1261 (9th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retail employees, filed an action alleging that Defendant violated the California Labor Code and Private Attorney Generals Act ("PAGA") by failing to adhere to the "rest day" provision, which provides that "every person employed in any occupation of labor is entitled to one day's rest therefrom in seven." Id. at 1262. The District Court had previously dismissed the action. The District Court held that the employees were not "aggrieved" under the requirements of § 2699.3 of the Labor Code because the employees did not work more than six consecutive days in any one workweek, that the employer did not "cause" Plaintiffs to work more than seven consecutive days inasmuch as there was no coercion, and that Plaintiffs waived their rights under § 551 by accepting additional shifts when they were offered. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Named Plaintiff Mendoza claimed that he worked more than six consecutive days on three occasions but did not work more than six hours on all consecutive days. Defendant did not originally schedule Mendoza to work more than six consecutive days at any time, and he did so after being asked by either his supervisor or a co-worker to fill in for another employee. Id. at 1263. The named Plaintiff Gordon worked more than six consecutive days on one occasion and, on two of those days, worked less than six hours. Id. Noting that "no clear controlling California precedent existed" with respect to the District Court's holdings, the Ninth Circuit certified three questions to the California Supreme Court. Id. at 1264. The first question asked if "the day of rest required by §§ 551 and 552 calculated by the workweek, or does it apply on a rolling basis to any seven-consecutive-day period, and the California Supreme Court responded that "a day of rest is guaranteed for each workweek. Periods of more than six consecutive days of work that stretch across more than one workweek are not per se prohibited." Id. The second question asked if "the section 556 exemption for workers employed six hours or less per day apply so long as an employee works six hours or less on at least one day of the applicable week, or does it apply only when an employee works no more than six hours on each and every day of the week." Id. The California Supreme Court responded that "the exemption for employees working shifts of six hours or less applies only to those who never exceed six hours of work on any day of the workweek. If on any one day an employee works more than six hours, a day of rest must be provided during that workweek, subject to whatever other exceptions might apply." Id. The third question asked "what does it mean for an employer to 'cause' an employee to go without a day of rest (§ 552): force, coerce, pressure, schedule, encourage, reward, permit, or something else," to which the California Supreme Court responded that "an employer causes its employee to go without a day of rest when it induces the employee to forgo rest to which he or she is entitled. An employer is not, however, forbidden from permitting or allowing an employee, fully apprised of the entitlement to rest, independently to choose not to take a day of rest." Id. As a result, the Ninth Circuit found that, because the stipulated facts demonstrated that neither named Plaintiff worked more than six consecutive days in any one workweek, each of their individual claims under §§ 551 and 552 failed. Plaintiffs argued, however, that they should be permitted to have a new PAGA representative who suffered violations of §§ 551 and 552 "step forward" and continue litigating this dispute. Id. The Ninth Circuit stated that, even if aggrieved employees did exist, under the requirements of § 2699.3 of the Labor Code, they would have to exhaust their claims administratively before bringing a PAGA action. Id. at 1265. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling dismissing Plaintiffs' claims.

Reyes, et al. v. Checksmart Financial,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 13442 (9th Cir. July 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a bank teller, filed an action alleging meal and rest break violations and constructive discharge claims in violation of California's Deferred Deposit Transactions Law ("CDDTL"). The District Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to Plaintiff's claims. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's grant of summary judgment to Defendant. Plaintiff alleged that she was required to train tellers to offer the "Manager's Special," a transaction that she alleged violated the CDDTL. Id. at *3. Plaintiff further asserted that she resigned due to the stress of being complicit in Defendant's alleged illegal activities. The Ninth Circuit found that Plaintiff's allegations meet the three requirements for Article III standing, as loss of employment was certainly an "injury-in-fact." Id. Further, the Ninth Circuit stated that if Plaintiff's allegations in her complaint were taken as true, she resigned because of the stress of participating in Defendant's illegal conduct, making her injury "fairly traceable" to Defendant's actions. Id. Finally, her loss of employment was "redressable" with an award of damages. Id. However, the Ninth Circuit found that Plaintiff did not offer any evidence on summary judgment that Defendant did not provide her with meal and rest breaks. Accordingly, Ninth Circuit found that the District Court did not err in granting summary judgment as to Reyes' meal and rest break claims. The Ninth Circuit explained that there are three areas of inquiry to test whether a constructive discharge claim can be proved, including: (i) whether there were intolerable conditions; (ii) whether a reasonable person faced with the allegedly intolerable employer actions or conditions of employment would have no reasonable alternative except to quit; and (iii) whether the employee's resignation was employer-coerced, and not caused by the voluntary action of the employee or by conditions or matters beyond the employer's reasonable control. Id. at *4. The Ninth Circuit stated that Plaintiff failed to allege that her working conditions were intolerable such that any reasonable person faced with such conditions would have no reasonable alternative but to quit. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit found that the District Court correctly granted summary judgment on Plaintiff's constructive discharge claims.

Speer, et al. v. Cerner Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38370 (W.D. Mo. Mar. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of service center analysts, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and the Missouri Minimum Wage Law ("MMWL") by improperly calculating their overtime compensation by using a fluctuating workweek ("FWW") method. Id. at *2. According to the complaint, Defendant's FWW method divided employees' fixed earnings by the number of hours they worked in a given week to arrive at a regular rate and then added one-half of the regular rate as overtime for all hours over 40. Id. Because Plaintiffs and other proposed class members received other payments in addition to their fixed salary, they alleged that the payments invalidated the FWW method, which entitled them to the statutorily prescribed overtime rate of one-and-one-half times their regular hourly rate. Id. at *2-3. In addition, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant systematically paid the inadequate overtime compensation late. Id. The Court had previously granted conditional certification of a FLSA collective action and Rule 23 class certification of Plaintiffs' state law claims. Among the classes certified was a class of all non-exempt persons employed by Defendant in Missouri, at any time since March 5, 2012 through the final judgment in this matter, whose overtime compensation was not paid on the next regular payday for the period in which the overtime work was performed ("late payment of overtime class"). Id. at *3. Defendant subsequently moved for summary judgment as to both the state and federal late-overtime claims alleging that: (i) the FLSA does not prohibit the reasonable and consistent pay schedule under which Defendant paid a portion of its non-exempt employees their overtime; (ii) under the FLSA, Defendant paid all overtime "as soon as practicable" after it issued regular pay; and (iii) under Missouri law, no statute permits a private right of action for the conduct alleged in this Plaintiffs' complaint. Id. at *3-4. The Court denied Defendant's motion. Defendant calculated and submitted employees' overtime information for payment the Friday after the close of next two-week pay period after the period when the overtime occurred. Id. at *5. The Court noted that § 778.106 states that payment may not be delayed for a period longer than is reasonably necessary for the employer to compute and arrange for payment of the amount due and in no event may payment be delayed beyond the next payday after such computation can be made. Id. at *10-11. The Court therefore determined that summary judgement must be denied on this point, as the parties disputed whether the payments were made in a reasonable time. Defendant argued that even if the Court held that § 778.106 created a cause of action under the FLSA, by its express terms it contemplated that overtime payments may be delayed when they cannot be calculated at the same time as regular pay and that they may be made on the subsequent payroll. Id. at *12. Defendant argued that its payment of overtime in the subsequent pay period was reasonable under the circumstances of this case. The Court held that Plaintiffs set forth numerous facts supporting their claim that Defendant could have calculated employees' overtime sooner, but chose not to do so. Id. at *12-13. Therefore, the Court found that questions of material fact remained as to whether Defendant was paying overtime as soon as practicable or convenient under the circumstances. Id. at *13. Finally, Defendant argued that the MMWL was silent as to a private cause of action due to the timing of pay. The Court opined that the MMWL must be interpreted consistently with the FLSA. The Court also found no reason to depart from a prior ruling in this matter, wherein the Court stated that the MMWL would incorporate the timing provisions of § 778.106. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Sydney, et al. v. Time Warner Entertainment-Advance, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44902 (N.D.N.Y Mar. 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, sales representatives for a telecommunications company, brought a collective action against Defendant alleging unpaid overtime compensation pursuant to the FLSA and a class action for violations of the New York Labor Law ("NYLL") alleging unpaid overtime and unpaid commissions. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs also brought individual claims of retaliation. Id. Defendant moved for summary judgment as to all claims. As to the overtime claim, Plaintiffs alleged that they worked between 50 to 70 hours a week in violation of the FLSA and the NYLL. Id. at *2. Defendant asserted that there was no genuine issue of material fact as to Plaintiffs' overtime claims because Plaintiffs were outside salespeople, and therefore exempt from the FLSA and the NYLL overtime requirements. The Court agreed and granted summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' overtime claims, finding that as a matter of law that Plaintiffs were outside salespeople. Id. at *15. The Court considered that most of Plaintiffs' work was conducted off-site for the purpose of obtaining commissions and the majority of their salaries were based upon commission. Id. at *10, 12. The Court also granted summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' unpaid commission claims pursuant to the NYLL. The Court determined that Plaintiffs were not covered under the NYLL breach of contract provision because they were employees and not independent contractors. Id. at *16. Furthermore, pursuant to the NYLL, a commissioned salesperson must be paid in accordance with their employer's plan. Id. at *17. Defendant required that all employees to file any discrepancies regarding their commission within 5 days of the end of the month. Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs allegations where vague and that they failed to state that they filed a discrepancy complaint within the required time-period. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Court found that there was no genuine issue of material fact and granted summary judgment on the unpaid commissions claims. Id. at *18. The Court also granted Defendant summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' retaliation claims under the FLSA and the NYLL. As to the FLSA retaliation claim, Plaintiffs failed to allege facts from which a reasonable jury could find that they engaged in a protected activity. Id. at *23. As to the NYLL claim, the Court found that Plaintiffs made out a prima facie case of retaliation in violation of the NYLL. Id. at *25. However, the Court held that Defendant presented sufficient evidence that it had legitimate, non-discriminatory reasons for terminating both Plaintiffs. Id. at *26. Accordingly, Defendant's motion for summary judgment was granted on Plaintiffs' NYLL retaliation claims.

Tyus, et al. v. Wendy's Of Las Vegas, Inc., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65932 (D. Nev. April 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Nevada Minimum Wage Amendment ("MWA") by paying them less than the minimum wage for hourly work. The parties previously filed cross-motions for summary judgement. In the Court's order on the motion, a question of law interpreting the MWA was certified to the Nevada Supreme Court. Id. at *1. After the question was addressed by the Supreme Court, Plaintiffs filed a renewed motion for class certification, and Defendant filed a renewed motion for summary judgment. The parties also filed a joint motion for certification of another question of law to the Supreme Court and a stipulation requesting the Court to extend the time in which Plaintiffs could respond to Defendant's motion for summary judgment. The Court found no compelling reason to certify the additional questions of law to the Supreme Court. The Court noted that the Supreme Court recently issued controlling authority on the parties' question and as such, sending the same issue for resolution would waste both the parties' and the judicial systems' time, energy, and resources. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court denied the motion for certification a question of law to the Supreme Court.

Zorrilla, et al. v. Carlson Restaurants, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88242 (S.D.N.Y. May 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of tipped employees at TGI Friday's restaurants, filed an action alleging that Defendants violated various provisions of the FLSA and various state laws. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss certain claims, including the: (i) New Jersey tip-pooling claim; (ii) Connecticut uniform claim; (iii) Michigan tip credit claim; and (iv) some of the California Unfair Competition Law claims. Id. at *4-5. Defendants also argued that the statute of limitations barred all of Plaintiffs' California Labor Code claims. Id. at *5. The Court granted Defendants' motion in part and denied it in part. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants violated New Jersey law by distributing a portion of tips to workers who were not food servers or food clearers in violation § 12:56-8.2 of the New Jersey Administrate Code. Id. at *11. Defendants argued that this claim should be dismissed because § 12:56-8.2 does not contain any reference to tip pooling and does not restrict participation in tip pools. The Court held that § 12:56-8.2 does not limit the universe of workers who may pool and split their tips. Id. at *13. The Court, therefore, dismissed the New Jersey tip-pooling claim. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendants required the named Plaintiff Marino to wear a uniform but did not launder or maintain the uniform in violation of Connecticut law. Defendants argued that this claim should be dismissed because Connecticut law does not require employers to pay for the maintenance of uniforms. Id. at *14-15. The Court held that, according to Connecticut law, an employer is not required to pay a set amount for an employee's uniform maintenance; rather, when an employer elects to maintain an employee's apparel, the employer is entitled to take a deduction. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendants required the named Plaintiff Lombard to perform a substantial amount of non-tip producing duties in excess of 20% of his work time and that his compensation was limited to the tipped minimum wage rate in violation of § 408.414d of the Michigan Compiled Law, which permits an employer to take a tip credit only when "the employee receives gratuities in the course of his or her employment." Id. at *17. Defendants argued that this claim should be dismissed because § 408.414d does not place any specific threshold on the amount of time an employee may spend on tasks that do not produce gratuities. The Court held that, under Michigan law, an employee can be said to have "received gratuities in the course of his or her employment," even though not every act that he or she performed generated gratuities. Id. at *18. Applying this interpretation to the alleged facts – that not all of Plaintiffs' labor was tip-producing – the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to allege a violation of § 408.414. The Court, therefore, dismissed the Michigan tip credit claim. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendants violated various California Labor Code provisions. Defendants contended that these claims should be dismissed because they did not employ the sole named Plaintiff from California within three years of Plaintiffs' filing of the fourth amended complaint, and therefore the statute of limitations barred these claims. Id. at *21. Plaintiffs argued that, under Rule 15(c), their claims related back to the first complaint, and therefore their claims were not time-barred. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs' overtime, uniform, and unlawful deduction claims related back to the original pleading, but that their waiting-time claim did not. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss as to the New Jersey tip-pooling claim, the Connecticut uniform claim, the Michigan tip credit claim, and the waiting time California claims, and it denied the motion with respect to the remaining California Labor Code claims. Id. at *33.

(ix) Discovery In FLSA Collective Actions

Harris, et al. v. Best Buy Stores,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 145936 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 8, 2017). Plaintiff, a former employee, filed a collective and class action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA, the California Labor Code, and the Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). Plaintiff filed a motion to compel discovery responses. First, Plaintiff sought responses to three interrogatories seeking the identities and contact information for putative class members and PAGA-aggrieved employees, including names, addresses, phone numbers, and email addresses. Plaintiff argued that she was entitled to the information subject to a protective order. Id. at *6. Defendant argued that Plaintiff was not entitled to the private contact information of more than 10,000 employees simply because she had asserted a PAGA claim and called her case a class action. Id. at *7. However, the Court agreed with Plaintiff that "the disclosure of class members' contact information, such as their names, addresses, telephone numbers, and email addresses, is a common practice in the pre-class certification context." Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff sufficiently established that she required the information sought to substantiate the class allegations. Notwithstanding that conclusion, the Court agreed that Plaintiff was not entitled to the contact information for all putative class members and PAGA-aggrieved employees. Given the large size of the putative class, the Court held that the 500 employees previously offered by Defendant was appropriate. Accordingly, the Court ordered Defendant to produce the name, last known address, phone number, and email address of each member of a randomly-obtained sample. Id. at *9. Second, Plaintiff sought the last dates of employment for putative class members who either resigned or were terminated. The Court ordered Defendant to produce the information to Plaintiff. Id. at *10. Third, Plaintiff requested "all documents relating to the dates their employment was terminated, including time entry records, discharge notices, and searchable electronic documents." Id. Defendant argued that fully responding to these requests would require manually sorting through employee files to locate responsive documents and then taking steps to redact those documents, which would take an estimated 15 to 30 minutes per employee. At this juncture, and in light of all of the other information already produced, the Court concluded that this type of individualized, pre-certification discovery ran afoul of Rule 26's proportionality requirement. The Court, therefore, denied Plaintiff's request to compel those records. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiff's motion to compel.

Kilby, et al. v. CVS Pharmacy, Inc.*, Case No. 09-CV-2057 (S.D. Cal. Dec. 13, 2017). Plaintiff, an employee, filed a class action alleging violations of the California Labor Code. The parties filed a joint motion for a determination of discovery disputes, seeking clarification of the Court's previous discovery order. Id. at 1. Plaintiff also sought sanctions pursuant to Rule 37 for Defendant's failure to comply with the Court's discovery order. The disputed portion of the Court's order stated "identify each clerk/cashier anywhere in the United States who, at any time between June 9, 2008 and the present, used a seat or stool while operating the cash register." Id. at 2. In ruling on the motion, the Court clarified the order, stating that "identify" meant to provide contact information (including name last known address, last known telephone number, and store information), but contrary to Plaintiff's contention, the order did not require Defendant to state the amount of time each individual identified used a seat or stool while operating a cash register. Id. at 3. The Court also noted that any information produced in response to the interrogatory was subject to the protective order governing the exchange of conditional information. Id. The Court additionally determined that to the extent Plaintiff contacted any individual identified in response to the interrogatory, Plaintiff could not request medical information, and could only request information that was relevant to the matters at issue in the case. Id. at 3-4. The Court warned Defendant not to take any steps to interfere with Plaintiff's ability to obtain non-medical information from the specified individuals. Id. at 4. Finally, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for sanctions, but forewarned Defendant that if it did not comply with the discovery order, the Court was apt to impose sanctions. Id.

Kutzback, et al. v. LMS Intellibound, LLC,* Case No. 13-CV-2767 (W.D. Tenn. July 14, 2017). Plaintiff, a loader at Defendants' facility, filed a collective action seeking unpaid wages under the FLSA. Plaintiff previously filed a motion to compel Defendants to respond to Plaintiff's request for production number 49 ("RFP 49"). The Court previously issued an omnibus order and took RFP 49 under advisement, but then noted that the parties resolved the request. Plaintiff advised the Court that the parties had not resolved the request as it pertained to electronically-stored information ("ESI"), and filed a motion for clarification and reconsideration regarding the previously filed motion to compel. Upon review, the Court found that the omnibus order did not rule on the issue of ESI discovery in RFP 49, and therefore it considered Plaintiff's request. Defendants argued that RFP 49 was overbroad and unduly burdensome because it would require them to provide "individual answers regarding more than 3,380 individuals." Id. at 2. Defendants further objected on the grounds that RFP 49 sought information beyond what was allowed by the joint supplemental discovery plan and that it was duplicative of RFP 48. Id. The Court found that Plaintiff's request for "all records" of "electronic correspondence on Defendants' email server, text messages in Defendants' telephones, notes from calls complaining of Defendants' hotline, or any other documents relating to not being compensation for hours worked" was not proportional to the needs of the case. Id. at 3. The Court therefore concluded that RFP 49 was overly broad and unduly burdensome. As a result the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to compel discovery.

Reichert, et al. v. Hoover Foods, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 116218 (N.D. Ga. July 26, 2017). Plaintiff filed a collective action asserting that Defendant failed to pay overtime in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff sought production of a settlement agreement Defendant signed in Love, et al. v. Hoover Foods, Inc., Case No. 15-CV-1269 (M.D. Fla.) ("Love"). Defendant refused to produce the settlement agreement on the basis that it was not relevant to Plaintiff's claims. The Court held a conference with the parties to discuss their discovery dispute, and, at the Court's request, Defendant submitted the settlement agreement for in camera inspection. The Court noted that Plaintiffs in Love filed an FLSA action in Florida asserting minimum wage and overtime violations against Defendant and three other companies. The parties subsequently filed a stipulation of dismissal without prejudice. Id. at *3. The stipulation of dismissal stated: "The Parties have stipulated and certified that Plaintiffs' FLSA claims have been paid in full and have not been compromised. The Parties carefully determined the amount of alleged overtime worked by Plaintiffs Love and Staffa and the full amount of back wages allegedly owed to Plaintiffs Love and Staffa. The settlement entered into amongst the Parties provides for the full and complete payment of all back wages allegedly owed to Plaintiffs Love and Staffa, as well as liquidated damages in an amount equal to each Plaintiff's respective back wages." Id. at *3-4. The Love settlement agreement was not filed on the docket or publicly disclosed. Plaintiff argued that the settlement agreement was relevant because it would show: (i) whether Defendant paid overtime compensation and liquidated damages; (ii) whether the settlement amounts were calculated on the basis of a two or three-year statute of limitations; and (iii) whether Defendant knowingly violated the FLSA. Id. at *4. The Court found that the information sought in Plaintiff's first contention was already available from documents publicly filed in Love. Id. The stipulation of dismissal stated that Defendant paid the Plaintiffs' FLSA claims in Love "in full," including their claims for overtime compensation and liquidated damages. Id. With respect to Plaintiff's second contention, the Court stated that the information Plaintiff sought was not ascertainable from the settlement agreement. With respect to Plaintiff's third contention, the Court noted that the settlement agreement did not show whether Defendant knowingly violated FLSA. Id. Defendant did not concede any liability and represented only that Plaintiffs' claims in Love had been paid "in full" for amounts not less than the FLSA required. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion and held that Defendant need not produce the settlement agreement.

Rodriguez, et al. v. Hermes Landscaping, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171118 (D. Kan. Oct. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of H-2B workers, filed a collective action on behalf of themselves and others similarly-situated alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA and state wage & hour laws. Plaintiffs filed a motion for a protective order regarding the method and location of Plaintiffs' depositions. Plaintiffs contended that immigration restrictions made travel to the United States for depositions difficult. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs further contended they did not have the financial means to travel to the United States and proposed that the depositions occur in Mexico City or by video-conference. Id. Defendant asserted that it would face an undue financial burden if the depositions were to occur in Mexico, and that video depositions would be impractical given the potential length of the depositions, the need for a translator, and the likely number of deposition exhibits. Id. at *2-3. While the Court agreed with Plaintiffs that they should not be required to travel to the United States for their depositions, the Court found Plaintiffs' offer of depositions by video conference to be less than ideal. Id. at *6. While the Court held that changing the place of depositions to Mexico was appropriate, it did not find it proper to shift all the costs of travel to Defendant. The Court determined that if Plaintiffs expected to be suitable class representatives and Plaintiffs' counsel was to be suitable counsel for the collective action, they should expect to bear certain expenses. Id. at *7. The Court therefore granted in part Plaintiffs' motion and ordered that the depositions of three named Plaintiffs be taken in Mexico at one location, during the course of one trip if Plaintiffs paid the reasonable travel expenses (airfare and lodging) for one defense counsel. Id. The Court directed the parties to confer regarding other expenses, such as a Court reporter and translator/interpreter. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for a protective order in part.

Sullivan, et al. v. PJ United, Inc.*, Case No. 13-CV-1275 (N.D. Ala. Dec. 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of deliver drivers, filed an action alleging that Defendant, a franchisee of Papa John's International ("PJI"), violated state and federal wage & hour laws because it under-reimbursed their automobile expense, which cause their pay to fail short of the minimum wage. Plaintiffs served a subpoena on PJI for production of documents, which PJI objected to on relevancy grounds. Subsequently, Plaintiffs filed a motion to enforce the subpoena requiring PJI's custodian of records to attend a deposition and that PJI produce: (i) data reflected in the Checkout Reports for each day the opt-in Plaintiffs worked; and (ii) a list of deliveries made by each opt-in Plaintiff. Id. at 1-2. The Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' motion to enforce the subpoena and denied PJI's motion in opposition and motion to quash. The Court ordered: (i) PJI to produce the Checkout Reports, (ii) Plaintiffs to pre-pay PJI for the cost of compliance with the subpoena, and (iii) Plaintiffs and PJI to make arrangements to schedule the deposition of PJI's custodian of records. The Court was ultimately convinced that Plaintiffs' "entire theory of the case requires the data contained in the Checkout Reports. . . ." and that "Plaintiffs are obviously entitled to the data in some respect." Id. at 17. The Court also noted that the burden on PJI was not as great as it had initially been because approximately 300 members of the class had been dismissed for discovery violations. Id. at 15. The Court also concluded that the franchise business directors' in-person visits were sufficient to find that PJI regularly transacts business in person. Id. at 9. Nevertheless, the Court recognized that PJI faced a significant burden in complying with the subpoena. Accordingly, the Court ordered that Plaintiffs must pre-pay PJI for the cost of complying with the subpoena. Id. at 18. Accordingly, the Court ordered: (i) production of the data in the Checkout Reports for 57 pre-2016 Plaintiffs and produce data for the less than 80 Plaintiffs in the post-2016 time period; (ii) Plaintiffs to contact PJI following the entry the Court's order to jointly develop a schedule for the production of the data contained in the Checkout Reports, as well as an estimate of the costs that PJI will incur finding and downloading the data in the Checkout Reports and organizing that data into a spreadsheet; (iii) PJI must provide within 14 days of the Court's order an itemized list of the costs it expects to incur complying with Plaintiffs' subpoena; (iv) Plaintiffs must tender pre-payment for the costs associated with PJI's compliance with the subpoena (Plaintiffs must pay these costs before PJI must produce the data); (v) after PJI files an itemized list of costs, Plaintiffs then have seven days to tender pre-payment; and (vi) following the expiration of the seven day period, PJI will have 10 days to create the spreadsheet and tender it to Plaintiffs, as well as make arrangements with Plaintiffs for the deposition of PJI's custodian of records.

Velasquez, et al. v. Bimbo Bakeries, USA, Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-2324 (D. Colo. Oct. 19, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of truck drivers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Id. at 2. Plaintiffs maintained that Defendant misclassified them as exempt from the FLSA pursuant to the outside sales exemption. Defendant asserted an affirmative defense that Plaintiffs were outside salespersons and were expected to sell additional product to stores when making deliveries. Id. Plaintiffs requested documents relating to Defendant's defense that Plaintiffs were outside sales employees. Defendant argued that Plaintiff failed to submit formal requests for the information, and that it had no documents concerning drivers' sales activities other than records of daily driver deliveries. Id. The Court ordered Defendant to produce any documents in its possession that were relevant to its outside sales defense. Id. Defendant maintained that it did not have any relevant materials. However, during depositions, Plaintiffs' counsel questioned Defendant's representatives regarding documents Plaintiffs had sought, and found that there were documents available that Defendant failed to produce. Id. at 3. Defendants subsequently responded to Plaintiffs' request and produced documents relevant to its outside sales defense. Id. at 4. Plaintiffs moved to strike Defendant's affirmative defense as a sanction or to issue an order to show cause as to why Defendant failed to produce documents earlier. Id. The Court found that the documents Defendant produced should have been produced earlier as they were within the scope of the Court's order to produce. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for sanctions and awarded reasonable attorneys' fees for time spent obtaining the documents after the Court's order. Id. at 5. The Court further precluded Defendant from using any of the documents produced in trial unless they were first used by Plaintiffs. Id.

(x) DOL Wage & Hour Enforcement Actions

U.S. Department Of Labor v. American Future Systems,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 19991 (3d Cir. Oct. 13, 2017). The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") filed an action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA by failing to pay minimum wage to sales representatives when it only paid the sales representatives for time which they were logged-off their computers if they were logged-off for less than 90 seconds. The DOL argued that this policy violated § 6 of the FLSA because it failed to compensate the sales representatives for breaks of 20 minutes or less. Id. at *4. The DOL sought to recover unpaid compensation and liquidated damages, and a permanent injunction enjoining Defendant from committing future violations. Id. Defendant moved for summary judgment and the DOL also moved for partial summary judgment as to the minimum wage and liquidated damages claims. The District Court denied Defendant's motion and granted the DOL's motion with respect to FLSA minimum wage liability and liquidated damages. Id. at *5. The District Court noted that the DOL had consistently interpreted § 6 of the FLSA to include rest periods of short duration, running from 5 minutes to about 20 minutes, as hours worked. The District Court agreed that § 785.18 of the DOL's regulations created a bright-line rule and concluded that Defendant therefore violated the FLSA by failing to pay its employees for rest breaks of 20 minutes or less. Defendant appealed on the grounds that: (i) time spent logged-off under its flexible break policy did not constitute work; (ii) the District Court erred in finding that the DOL's interpretive regulation – on breaks less than 20 minutes long – was entitled to substantial deference; and (iii) the District Court erred in adopting the bright-line rule embodied § 785.18 rather than using a fact-specific analysis. The Third Circuit rejected Defendant's arguments and affirmed the District Court's decision granting the DOL partial summary judgment as to minimum wage liability and liquidated damages. The Third Circuit ruled that the FLSA required employers to compensate employees for breaks of 20 minutes or less during which they were logged-off their computers and were free of any work-related duties. Further, the Third Circuit ruled that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in awarding liquidated damages as Defendant failed to establish that it acted in good faith and that it had reasonable grounds for believing that it was not violating the FLSA. Defendant argued that it sought the advice of counsel on its policy regarding FLSA compliance, yet refused to disclose to the DOL or the District Court what counsel advised. The District Court concluded that, given Defendant's unwillingness to share what it was told by counsel, it would be illogical to classify such conduct as "good faith." Id. at *24. Accordingly, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision. Id. at *25.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Bland Farms Products & Packing, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 119874 (S.D. Ga. July 31, 2017). The U.S. Department of Labor filed a lawsuit alleging that Defendants' practices of not paying packing-shed workers U.S. wages when they processed onions grown by other farmers violated the FLSA. Defendants contended that the packing-shed employees were exempt from the FLSA under the agriculture exemption. Id. at *5. The Court noted that the overtime requirement of the FLSA does not apply to employees "employed in agriculture." Id. at *13. Agriculture, for purposes of the FLSA, includes among other things, "the cultivation and tillage of the soil, cultivation, growing, and harvesting of any agricultural or horticultural commodities . . . and any practices . . . performed by a farmer or on a farm as an incident to or in conjunction with such farming operations." Id. The Court further explained that the definition of agriculture includes: (i) primary agriculture, which includes typical farming activities like the cultivation and tillage of the soil; and (ii) secondary agriculture, a broader category including "any practices, whether or not themselves farming practices," such as processing crops, that are performed by a farmer or on a farm and are incident to or in conjunction with "such" farming operations. Id. at *14. Secondary practices, therefore, "must relate to the farmer's own farming operations and not to the farming operations of others." Id. Defendants contended that the packing-shed employees were engaged in secondary agriculture. The Court found that this could only be true if Defendants were so intimately involved in the contract growers' operations that they should be considered the farmers of those onions. Id. The Court determined that Defendants were not the farmers of the onions grown by the contract growers, and, thus, the processing of those onions was "incidental to, or in conjunction with, the farming operations," of the contract growers and not Defendants. Id. at *16. The Could held that the agriculture exemption therefore did not apply to the packing-shed employees when they were processing those onions because the employees were not performing secondary-agricultural practices at that time. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Defendants violated the FLSA by not paying their packing-shed employees overtime wages when they processed onions grown by other farmers.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Dominion Granite & Marble, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95917 (E.D. Va. June 21, 2017). The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") filed an action against Defendants alleging that it failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. The DOL asserted that some employees were improperly paid a salary, while others were paid only straight time for hours worked in excess of 40 hours in a week. The DOL further contended that Defendants failed to maintain adequate time-keeping records for hourly employees as required by the FLSA. Id. at *2. Following the DOL's investigation into the alleged violations, Defendants ultimately paid their employees the amounts unlawfully withheld. Id. at *3. The DOL subsequently sought injunctive and declaratory relief. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that the DOL did not sufficiently demonstrate that injunctive relief was warranted or that Defendants were "employers" within the meaning of the FLSA. Defendants contended that the DOL failed to set forth sufficient factual matter to demonstrate that it was entitled to injunctive relief at this initial stage of the proceedings. The Court noted that a motion to dismiss brought under Rule 12(b)(6) only tests whether relief can be granted, not whether it should be granted. Id. at *4. The Court held that the DOL's complaint plainly alleged cognizable claims for failure to pay overtime wages and to keep proper records. Id. at *5. Moreover, nothing in the complaint foreclosed the possibility that injunctive relief could be warranted should the DOL prevail on its FLSA claims. Although Defendants made an effort to comply with the FLSA, the Court stated that current compliance with the FLSA alone, especially when it resulted from scrutiny by the DOL, was not sufficient grounds for denying a prospective injunction. The DOL's complaint alleged that Defendants willfully violated the FLSA over a period of three years by failing both to pay employees overtime wages and to keep adequate records. Id. at *6. Defendants' efforts at compliance came only after Defendants were caught violating the FLSA. The Court also opined that there was no indication that Defendants provided any reliable assurances of future compliance. Id. at *7. The Court therefore stated that it could draw the reasonable inference that "there exists some cognizable danger of recurrent violation, something more than the mere possibility." Id. Defendants further argued that the DOL's complaint failed to plead sufficient factual material to establish that the individual Defendants, Mr. Chao and Mr. Berard, were "employers" subject to the FLSA. Id. at*8. The Court disagreed, and stated that the DOL alleged that Defendant Chao owned the vast majority of Dominion Granite and Marble, LLC, allegedly "supervised and directed the work of all of the employees of the company, and was involved in the hiring, firing, and scheduling of employees." Id. Similarly, Defendant Berard allegedly served as the company's "Operations Manager," and was "involved in the supervision of employees as well as hiring and firing of employees of the company." Id. The Court found that the DOL's assertions were more than sufficient to permit a reasonable inference that Defendants Chao and Berard were "employers" within the meaning of the FLSA. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. DT & C Global Management, LLC*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 21085 (7th Cir. Oct. 25, 2017). The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") and a group of former employees in two consolidated actions alleged that Defendants failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the Illinois Minimum Wage Act ("IMWA"). The District Court entered default judgments against Defendants for failing to comply with various discovery orders. Defendants moved to vacate the judgments, and the District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The Seventh Circuit held that Defendants did not show good cause against entry of the default judgment, did not act quickly in filing motions to vacate, and failed to articulate any meritorious defenses. Id. at *2. Following Defendants' failure to respond to discovery requests, the DOL filed a motion to compel, which the District Court granted. Id. at *3. Following Defendants' failure to comply with the Court's order granting the motion to compel, the DOL moved for sanctions. Defense counsel withdrew from the case, and the District Court ordered Defendants to appear for a hearing. When Defendants failed to appear for the hearing, the District Court struck Defendants' answer, awarded the DOL's attorneys' fees, and entered a default judgment. Id. Defendants moved to vacate the judgment pursuant to Rule 60(b)(1) contending that: (i) Defendants did not receive notices during the last few months of the case; and (ii) Defendant Jansen could not keep in contact with his lawyers because of his poor health. Id. at *4. The District Court denied the motion, ruling that the default was the result of "inattention to the litigation," and Defendants had not shown that they had a legitimate defense. Id. The DOL filed suit against Defendants and against William Lynch, the minority owner and president of Defendant DT & C, alleging the same violations as the employees. The District Court ultimately entered a default judgment in that matter as well. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed both judgments. The Seventh Circuit found that the District Court reasonably concluded that Defendants failed to establish good cause against entry of the default judgment. As to Defendant Jansen's health problems, the Seventh Circuit noted that Jansen's surgeries were in 2011 and 2014, yet he remained inattentive to the cases for all of 2015, well after the surgeries. Id. at *7. The Seventh Circuit similarly rejected Defendants' argument that it did not receive notices of the cases because Jansen moved. The Seventh Circuit stated that, when Jansen moved, he should have notified the District Court of his new address. Finally, the Seventh Circuit agreed with the District Court that Defendants did not take quick action when learning of the default judgments against them because they waited several months to file motions to vacate. Id. at *9. The Seventh Circuit, therefore, affirmed the default judgments entered by the District Court.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. El Tequila, LLC*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 2202 (10th Cir. Feb. 7, 2017). The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") brought an action against Defendant alleging that Defendant failed to pay its employees overtime as required under FLSA. The DOL alleged that Defendant manually altered the electronic time record weekly reports in order to reduce the actual hours shown as worked by employees. Id. at *5. Defendant failed to respond to the DOL's amended complaint in a timely matter. Id. The DOL filed a motion for summary judgment and Defendant then filed a motion to file an out-of-time answer to the complaint the next day on the ground that the failure to answer was a result of a docketing error. Id. at *6. The District Court denied Defendant's motion to file its answer for lack of excusable neglect. As such, the allegation that Defendant manually altered the register time reports to reduce the actual hours shown as worked by employees was accepted as true. The District Court also accepted as true the DOL's allegation that Defendant violated the FLSA's overtime, minimum wage, and record-keeping requirements as Defendant did not respond to these claims in a timely fashion. Id. at *7. The District Court found that Defendant was liable for liquidated damages and enjoined Defendant from violating the FLSA and accepted most of the DOL's back pay calculations because Defendant failed to provide evidence that it paid its employees discretionary bonuses. The District Court denied the DOL's motion for summary judgment with respect to whether Defendant's violations of the FLSA were willful. At trial, the jury subsequently found that Defendant did not willfully violate the FLSA. The District Court then granted the DOL's motion for judgment as a matter of law, holding that no reasonable jury could have arrived at that conclusion that the violation was not willful. The District Court entered a judgment of $2,137,627.44 in favor of the DOL. On appeal, Defendant raised four issues. First, Defendant argued that the DOL should have accounted for discretionary bonuses in calculating overtime wages. Id. at *7. The Tenth Circuit rejected this argument because Defendant relied upon the testimony of its CPA that discretionary bonuses should not be included in the regular rate, not that Defendant in fact paid discretionary bonuses. Defendant also relied upon the employer's affidavit that stated that the DOL was imposing overtime charges on discretionary bonuses. The Tenth Circuit determined that the affidavits were conclusory and insufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact. Second, Defendant asserted on appeal that its failure to timely respond to the amended complaint was due to excusable neglect. Id. at *7. The Tenth Circuit rejected this argument as well, finding that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying Defendant's motion to file an out-of-time answer when Defendant initially claimed a docketing error as the cause. Third, Defendant asserted that the District Court should not have relied upon Defendant's lack of a response to certain issues in granting summary judgment, but instead should have considered lesser sanctions. Id. at *7-8. Id. Specifically, Defendant asserted that it was an improper sanction for the District Court's to rely upon the DOL's allegation that Defendant's managers altered the time record weekly reports. The Tenth Circuit rejected the argument that this was a sanction. Rather, Defendant's failure to respond to the pleading caused it to be deemed admitted pursuant to Rule 8(b)(6). Id. at *13. Finally, Defendant asserted that the District Court erred in granting the DOL's motion for judgment as a matter of law with respect to willfulness. Id. at *8. Because the evidence indicated that the employer took affirmative steps to create the appearance that Defendant complied with the FLSA and adjusted records to a show compliance, a reasonable jury could not conclude that Defendant's violations were negligent. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Tenth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Five M's*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28467 (N.D. Ind. Mar. 1, 2017). The DOL filed an action against Defendants for record-keeping, overtime, and minimum wage violations of the FLSA. The DOL moved for summary judgment and to strike the affidavit of Defendant's payroll manager. The DOL asserted that Defendant failed to maintain sufficient records of their employees' wages & hours worked each workweek for at least two years as required. Defendant admitted that it maintained time-cards for an unknown time, sometimes no longer than six weeks and that there was no policy regarding timesheets. Id. at *6. The Court also found that Defendant's records did not reflect accurately the hours worked based upon DOL's interviews with employees. Accordingly, the Court held that as a matter of law, Defendant had violated FLSA's record-keeping requirements. The DOL also asserted that Defendant often paid some employees less than minimum wage. Defendant paid some technicians using a "book rate" system where they were paid based upon the amount of time it took an average mechanic to perform a specific task, as opposed to the amount of time it actually took. For some employees, this "book rate" of pay resulted in minimum wage violations. Defendant attempted to show compliance by producing an affidavit of its payroll manager. The DOL moved to strike portions of the affidavit, asserting that the affidavit was not based upon personal knowledge and was not based upon actual records of hours worked, and was therefore inadmissible hearsay. The DOL asserted that the records produced merely showed salary and total amounts paid, which the affiant then used to determine how much time it claimed the employees worked. The Court rejected this as "reverse engineering" Id. at *19. The Court also struck portions of the affidavit that were in direct contradiction to the payroll manager's previous deposition testimony and granted summary judgment in favor of the DOL on the minimum wage and overtime violations. Defendant's payroll records reflected that it did not pay some employees overtime for hours worked in excess of 40 per week. The Court also ruled that because Defendant produced no evidence that its conduct was in good faith and reasonable, liquidated damages were appropriate. Defendant had a long history of failure to comply with wage & hour requirements of FLSA and was on notice of the requirements. As such, the Court found that the violations were willful. Accordingly, the Court issued an injunction because of the inadequate assurances that Defendant would comply in the future. The Court granted the DOL's motion for summary judgment for violations of minimum wage, overtime, and record-keeping requirements and required Defendants to pay liquidated damages, as well as uncompensated wages and overtime.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Kazu Construction, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58130 (D. Haw. April 17, 2017). The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") filed an action against Defendant on February 22, 2016, asserting record-keeping and overtime violations of the FLSA. Id. at *2. Defendant moved for summary judgment, and the Court granted Defendant's motion in part and denied it in part. Defendant argued that the FLSA's two-year statute of limitations barred the DOL's claims. Id. at *5. Because the DOL offered evidence that Defendant's violations were willful, the Court found a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the three-year statute of limitations applied. Id. The DOL offered evidence that Defendant knew of its obligation to pay overtime and that employees worked overtime that was not recorded. Further, the DOL introduced evidence that Defendant "banked" the hours, instead of compensating employees for overtime. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment in part, finding a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Defendant's violations were willful and the three-year statute of limitations applied. The Court, however, granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to alleged violations occurring before February 22, 2013, on the grounds that they were barred by the statute of limitations. Id. at *17. The DOL argued that the statute of limitations should be equitably tolled because the DOL informed Defendant's counsel that the DOL would be pursuing equitable tolling and there was a dispute regarding whether employees worked overtime prior to February 22, 2013. Id. at *14. The Court concluded that the equitable tolling doctrine did not apply because the doctrine focuses on Plaintiff's diligence or Defendant's wrongful conduct in preventing Plaintiff from timely asserting a claim. Id. The DOL failed to show that it was diligent because the DOL issued a back wage calculation in 2014, and the DOL knew of the statutory limitations as early as February 2015. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to all claims before February 22, 2013. Id. at *17. The Court also granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to some employees, finding that they qualified as exempt employees and were not entitled to overtime. Id. at *32. Defendant moved for summary judgment as to some employees on the basis that they did not work overtime and were not owed back wages. However, the DOL provided evidence that showed a genuine issue of material fact as to this issue and, therefore, the Court denied Defendant's motion as to such employees. Id. at *35. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment in part and denied it in part.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Manna 2nd Ave. LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 169171 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 12, 2017). The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") brought an action on behalf of a group of pizza chefs alleging that Defendants failed to pay minimum wages and overtime compensation and failed to keep and preserve records in violation of the FLSA. The parties stipulated to several issues, including that none of the pizza chefs were exempt from the FLSA's overtime provisions, that Defendants violated the FLSA's record-keeping requirements, and that Defendants failed to comply with the FLSA's overtime provisions for the period from June 16, 2012, through June 15, 2013. Id. at *5. The Court presided over a non-jury trial on the sole issue of whether Defendants' conduct was willful. The parties did not dispute that many of Defendants' employees worked at more than one location in any given workweek and, when they did so, Defendants did not aggregate their hours. For example, if an employee worked 25 hours at one location and 25 hours at another location during the same workweek, Defendants provided a check for each location and did not provide overtime compensation even though the employee worked more than 40 hours total. Id. at *6. Likewise, when employees performed different jobs during the same week, Defendants did not aggregate their hours for purposes of paying overtime. Two employees testified on behalf of the DOL. Both employees stated that Defendants paid them separately for each restaurant location at which they worked and deliberately switched their assigned locations to avoid paying them overtime. Id. The employees further contended that Defendants paid employees separately for each work assignment and deliberately structured assignments to avoid paying overtime. The DOL also introduced data relating to the employees who worked more than 25 hours in a given workweek during the relevant time period. The Court found that it could draw a strong inference from the data that Defendants' pattern of switching employees' locations and job assignments was the consequence of an intentional effort to limit the hours that those employees worked at any one location during a workweek to avoid paying overtime. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court held that Defendants deliberately structured their payroll to avoid paying overtime by segregating hours according to restaurant location and job function. Id. at *14-15. The Court determined that Defendants' conduct was reckless and willful and subject to a three-year statute of limitations. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court entered judgment in favor of the DOL and against Defendants and granted: (i) $101,532.90 in unpaid overtime wages owed for the period June 16, 2012, through June 15, 2013; (ii) $101,532.90 in liquidated damages for the period June 16, 2012, through June 15, 2013; (iii) $45,101.42 in back wages previously awarded by the Court on summary judgment; (iv) $45,101.42 in liquidated damages previously awarded by the Court on summary judgment; (v) $35,007.68 in overtime wages owed to the non-exempt salaried pizza chefs; (vi) $35,007.68 in liquidated damages owed to the non-exempt salaried pizza chefs; and (vii) an injunction against Defendants, their officers, agents, servants, employees, and those persons in active concert or participation with Defendants from violating the provisions of the FLSA. Id. at *16.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Restaurant Group, Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 89640 (D.N.J. June 12, 2017). The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") brought an action against several Defendants that managed, owned, and operated 17 restaurants in New Jersey and New York. Id. at *2. The DOL alleged that Defendants engaged in various unlawful tip, payroll, and record-keeping practices. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss, arguing: (i) that the DOL's complaint was factually deficient and failed to meet the pleading standards of Rule 8; and (ii) that the DOL was precluded, under the doctrines of res judicata and collateral estoppel, from "relitigating" these claims in light of the New Jersey Department of Labor's (NJDOL") orders of "no violation." Id. at *3. The Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss. The Court found that the DOL's complaint set forth examples and allegations demonstrating that Defendants failed to regularly distribute the entirety of the tip pool to the tipped employees, and kept tip pool money totaling $40,000. Id. at *10. Thus, the Court held that the DOL's complaint set forth plausible violations of § 203(m). Id. at *11. The Court further stated that the DOL sufficiently alleged that Defendants used the pooled tips to pay the wages of non-tipped employees. Id. at *13. Taking the facts as plead in the complaint as true, the Court found that the DOL set forth plausible claims of violations of the FLSA, and therefore it denied Defendants' motion on this basis. Defendants further contended that dismissal was warranted because the DOL was precluded, under the doctrines of res judicata and collateral estoppel, from "relitigating" these claims in light of the NJDOL's orders of "no violation." Id. at *14. The Court disagreed, and concluded that the record reflected that there was no litigation to inform the determinations of the NJDOL and that the DOL was not a party to the proceedings involving the NJDOL. Id. at *16. Further, the evidence purported to be final determinations by the NJDOL were entitled "field report" or "routine inspection." Id. at *16. Given these circumstances, the DOL could not advance any argument or appeal the determination. In addition, the Court found that the determination by the NJDOL did not appear to be a final determination worthy of preclusive effect. Id. at *17. The Court agreed with the DOL that, pursuant to the New Jersey Wage & Hour Law and the New Jersey Uniform Administrative Procedure Rules, the judicial procedure through which a final order is produced was not met. Id. The NJDOL therefore had not acted in a judicial capacity based on the record before the Court. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Saldivar & Associates*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171678 (E.D. Va. Oct. 17, 2017). The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") filed an action against Defendants alleging failure to pay overtime compensation and minimum wages in violation of the FLSA. The DOL filed a motion for default judgment against Defendants. The Magistrate Judge issued a report and recommendation ("Report") recommending that a default judgment be entered against Defendants and that the DOL recover $96,470.43 in back wage compensation and $96,470.43 in liquidated damages. The Court adopted the Report in its entirety. The Court held that the Magistrate Judge correctly determined that the Court had subject-matter jurisdiction over this action pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1331 due to the DOL's claims arising under the FLSA, and that the Court had personal jurisdiction over all Defendants because Defendant R&R Catering was a Virginia corporation, and Defendants Saldivar and Bloxton were Virginia residents. Id. at *2. The Court further found that the Magistrate Judge properly concluded that Defendants paid their employees less than the federal minimum wage, and that Defendants paid their employees at rates less than the required rate of 1.5 times the federal minimum wage for each hour worked in excess of 40 hours per week. Id. The Magistrate Judge also ruled that the FLSA violations were "willful" because Defendants were twice informed of their obligations to pay minimum wages and overtime rates, and the DOL had previously investigated R&R Catering for compliance with the FLSA, revealing multiple violations of §§ 6, 7, and 11 of the FLSA. Id. at *3. Therefore, because Defendants did not show they acted in good faith, the Court held that the Magistrate Judge correctly determined that Defendants must also pay liquidated damages in an amount equal to the amount of unpaid wages pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. The Court opined that the Magistrate Judge properly calculated the amount of unpaid wages as $96,470.43, and the amount of liquidated damages to be equal to the amount of unpaid wages, $96,470.43. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted the DOL motion for default judgment.

U.S. Department Of Labor, et al. v. Westside Drywall*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 37622 (D. Ore. Mar. 14, 2017). The DOL filed an action against Defendants alleging failure to maintain accurate employment records and to pay overtime compensation to piece-rate employees. The DOL alleged that Defendants failed to pay employees overtime compensation when employees worked more than 40 hours a week and failed to maintain, to keep, make available, and preserve records of employees' hours and wages. Id. at *2. The DOL sought back wages on behalf of 100 employees and liquidated damages. Defendants filed a motion for summary judgement as to all of the DOL's claims, which the Court granted in part and denied in part. Id. at *2-3. Defendants argued that there was not a genuine dispute of material fact that Defendants paid overtime to their piece-rate employees, and therefore Defendants asserted that the DOL could not establish a prima facie case against Defendants on that ground. The DOL contended that there was a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether Defendants failed to pay piece-rate employees overtime compensation. Id. at *8. To support this contention, the DOL submitted affidavits from several employees who stated that even though employees regularly worked more than 40 hours a week, they were not paid any additional compensation for those overtime hours, and that Defendants paid employees the same rate regardless of the number of hours they worked. Id. The Court held there was a genuine dispute of material fact from which a fact-finder could conclude Defendants violated the requirements of FLSA to pay overtime compensation to their piece-rate employees, and denied Defendants' motion for summary judgement on that issue. Id. at *9. Defendants contended there was no genuine dispute of material fact that they maintained employee records, and therefore Defendants asserted that the DOL could not prove Defendants violated §§ 11 and 15(a)(5) of the FLSA. Defendants also argued they produced all records of their employees' wages, hours, and other working conditions as requested by DOL during the course of its investigation. The DOL, however, contended that Defendants failed to maintain accurate records of the hours worked by employees as required under the FLSA. The Court agreed there was not any evidence that Defendants' conduct affirmatively prevented any employee from asserting their rights under the FLSA during the period of their employment. Although the record reflected that Defendants told employees they were not eligible for overtime and instructed them not to put more than 40 hours on their timesheets, the Court determined that this conduct did not prove Defendants made it impossible for employees to assert claims under the FLSA. Id. at *12. Indeed, the Court stated that the record reflected that employees knew they were not being paid overtime when their paychecks reflected pay for only 80 hours even when they recorded more hours on their timesheets. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendants' motion for summary judgment.

(xi) Exemption Issues In FLSA Collective Actions

Alston, et al. v. DirectTV, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80938 (D.S.C. May 26, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of cable-provider technicians, filed suit under the FLSA alleging minimum wage and overtime violations. Defendants filed 14 motions for summary judgment. The Court denied the motions in part and reserved decision on the remainder pending a hearing. Id. at *2. Defendants asserted that they were entitled to summary judgment on some of Plaintiffs' claims because there was no genuine dispute that: (i) certain Plaintiffs were properly classified as independent contractors and were not jointly employed by Defendants; (ii) Defendants lacked the requisite knowledge of the hours that Plaintiffs worked; (iii) certain Plaintiffs were subject to the retail or service establishment exemption for overtime wages under 29 U.S.C. § 207(i); (iv) certain Plaintiffs were paid at least the minimum wage; (v) certain Plaintiffs were unable to make the requisite showing of damages; (vi) certain Plaintiffs' claims were barred by the two year statute of limitations in 29 U.S.C. § 255(a); and (vii) certain Plaintiffs were properly paid overtime wages during their employment with MasTec. Id. at *6. The Court declined to rule on Defendants' motion as to joint employment status until after the hearing, finding that the Court first must determine whether a joint employer arrangement existed before determining whether a worker was an employee of a joint employer. Id. at *13. Second, as to Defendants' argument that they lacked actual or constructive knowledge of the Plaintiffs' allegedly uncompensated overtime work, the Court declined to rule until after the hearing. Id. at *14. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' argument that the requirement of actual or constructive knowledge of the employee's uncompensated work hours did not apply to an alleged employer who disavowed the employment relationship and made no attempt to monitor or record an employee's work hours. Id. at *16. Third, Defendants argued that they were exempt from providing overtime compensation pursuant to the FLSA's exemption for qualifying employers of certain employees in a retail or service establishment. Id. at *20. The Court ruled that Defendants' argument failed at the threshold issue of whether they employed Plaintiffs in a retail or service establishment. As a result, the Court denied this aspect of the motion. Id. at *40. Fourth, Defendants argued that they were entitled to summary judgment on all of Plaintiffs' minimum wage claims because, even if Plaintiffs were Defendants' employees, there was no genuine dispute that Plaintiffs were paid more than the minimum wage rate for each of the hours they worked. Id. Plaintiffs argued that the average weekly pay that they approximated did not account for chargebacks and expenses that Defendants deducted from their pay. Id. at *42. The Court agreed with Plaintiffs that Defendants' failure to account for chargebacks and expenses prevented the Court from concluding that there was no genuine dispute of fact as to this defense and denied Defendants' motion as to the minimum wage claims. Fifth, Defendants argued that they were entitled to summary judgment on all claims asserted by some Plaintiffs because Plaintiffs could not establish the amount and extent of their uncompensated work. The Court disagreed, ruling that Plaintiffs provided sufficient evidence to raise a genuine dispute of material fact as to this issue and denied the motion. Sixth, Defendants argued that portions of some Plaintiffs' FLSA claims were barred by the statute of limitations because Plaintiffs failed to establish that Defendants knew of or recklessly disregarded the alleged violations as required for application of the three year statute of limitations. The Court declined to address this argument until after the hearing on the summary judgment motions. Finally, Defendants argued that they were entitled to summary judgment on the overtime wage claims that some Plaintiffs asserted as to employment with MasTec because there was no genuine dispute that MasTec correctly calculated and paid the correct overtime amount. The Court agreed with Defendants that the Plaintiffs at issue did not premise their overtime claims arising from their employment with MasTec on the allegation that they worked hours that were not recorded or counted, and instead argued that they were improperly compensated for hours that in fact were counted and recorded. Id. at *66. However, because there remained a genuine dispute as to what method of calculation should have been applied to Plaintiffs' regular rates and overtime wages, the Court denied Defendants' motions as to Plaintiffs' overtime claims arising from MasTec employment.

Buglak, et al. v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 113742 (E.D. Pa. July 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of mortgage officers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs were exempt from the FLSA's overtime requirements under the "outside sales exemption." Id. at *1. Defendant filed a partial motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff's claims, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs did not have fixed work schedules, as their schedules varied from week to week and they were free to come and go from the office as needed. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs also consistently spent time outside of the office attending open houses and meeting with realtors in order to generate business. Id. At the outset, the Court explained that the FLSA defines an "outside salesman" as an employee whose primary duty is: (i) making sales within the meaning of § 3(k) of the FLSA; or (ii) obtaining orders or contracts for services or for the use of facilities for which a consideration will be paid by the client or customer; and (iii) who is customarily and regularly engaged away from the employer's place or places of business in performing such primary duty. Id. at *5-6. The Court stated that in their depositions, Plaintiffs admitted that their primary responsibility was to sell residential mortgage loans to customers. Based on this, the Court found that Plaintiffs' primary duty was making sales. Id. at *6. The Court further noted that the outside sales exemption requires that the employee be "customarily and regularly" engaged away from the employer's office. Id. at *7. The U.S. Department of Labor's regulations provide that an employee can satisfy the "customarily and regularly" requirement by performing sales-related activity outside the office "one or two hours a day, one or two times a week." Id. The Court opined that Plaintiffs performed sales activity away from the office on more than an occasional basis. The Court noted that Plaintiffs' deposition testimony demonstrated that they regularly worked away from the office, regularly attended open houses, followed up with the realtors, attended closings, and visited customer homes. Id. at *8. The Court held that these customary and regular sales activities exceed the threshold of "one or two hours a day, one or two times a week." Id. at *9. The Court therefore determined that Plaintiffs customarily and regularly performed sales activities away from Defendant's place of business. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs were exempt from the FLSA overtime requirement. As a result, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Chaplin, et al. v. SSA Cooper,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92741 (D.S.C. June 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of stevedores, filed a collective action asserting that Defendant violated the FLSA by misclassifying stevedores as exempt employees. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation by failing to pay "non-discretionary bonuses" as required by Defendant's employment contracts and compensation plans. Id. at *2. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment on all of Plaintiffs' claims, arguing that Plaintiffs were properly classified as executive employees and were therefore exempt from the overtime pay requirements of the FLSA. Id. at *4. The Court first noted that the relevant regulation of the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") defines an "executive" employee as any employee: (i) compensated on a salary basis at a rate of not less than $455 per week; (ii) whose primary duty is management of the enterprise in which the employee is employed or of a customarily recognized department or sub-division thereof; (iii) who customarily and regularly directs the work of two or more other employees; and (iv) who has the authority to hire or fire other employees or whose suggestions and recommendations as to the hiring, firing, advancement, promotion, or any other change of status of other employees are given particular weight. Id. at *6. The Court analyzed stevedores' status as exempt executive employees under the regulation, and found that Defendant failed to establish by clear and convincing evidence that stevedores qualified for the executive exemption. Id. As to the first prong of the test, the Court agreed with Defendant's claim that stevedores earned at least $40,000 per year, significantly exceeding the salary of $455 per week that an employee must receive to qualify as a "bona fide executive." Id. at *8. As to the second prong, the Court noted that the DOL regulation states that, as a rule of thumb, an employee who spends over 50% of his time in management has management as his primary duty. Id. The Court determined that Plaintiff easily met this requirement, as there was plenty of evidence that stevedores spend the majority of their time supervising. Id. at *9. As to the third prong, the Court stated that each stevedore was responsible for overseeing the work of a loading gang of 15 workers, a lashing gang of seven workers, or a gang of seven truck drivers. Id. The Court determined that although the number and types of gangs varied, stevedores were assigned to oversee at least one gang's work, and therefore this prong was also fulfilled. However, the Court held that that a reasonable juror could conclude that Defendant has not proven by "clear and convincing evidence" that that the stevedores' limited authority in recommending hiring and firing met the requirements of the fourth prong. At the very least, the Court noted that there were genuine issues of material fact on the weight that Defendant's management gave to the stevedores' recommendations as well as competing testimony on the stevedores' influence on the hiring and firing decisions that precluded granting Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Therefore, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Clark, et al. v. Royal Transportation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 132804 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 18, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs were exempt from the overtime provisions of the FLSA under the Motor Carrier Act because they were engaged in interstate commerce. Defendant filed a partial motion for summary judgment as to liability, which the Court granted. Defendant provided charter and shuttle passenger service. Although the vast majority of Defendant's routes were intrastate, drivers could be called upon at any time to travel interstate routes. Plaintiff asserted that they were not exempt from the FLSA overtime regulations and that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation for hours worked over 40 in a workweek. Defendant admitted that Plaintiffs were not compensated for overtime hours worked, but argued that summary judgment was appropriate as to liability because Plaintiffs could have reasonably been called upon to drive in interstate commerce and were therefore exempt from overtime compensation. Id. at *9. The Court stated that the Motor Carrier Act exemption has two requirements, including: (i) the employer must be a carrier whose transportation of passengers or property by motor vehicle is subject to jurisdiction under § 204 of the Motor Carrier Act; and (ii) the employee must engage in activities of a character directly affecting the safety of operation of motor vehicles in the transportation on the public highways of passengers or property in interstate or foreign commerce. Id. at *10-11. The Court noted that the parties agreed that Defendant satisfied the exemption's first requirement, as Defendant was a "motor carrier" and operated a passenger transportation service using "motor vehicles" that are "related to the movement of passengers." Id. at *11. However, the parties disputed whether Defendant satisfied the second requirement. Specifically at issue was whether Plaintiffs engaged in activities sufficiently related to interstate commerce so as to bring them within the Motor Carrier Act exemption. Defendant attempted to establish a link to interstate commerce by arguing that: (i) Plaintiffs were capable of driving interstate routes; (ii) Defendant retained discretion to assign interstate routes to Plaintiffs; and (iii) that the Secretary of Transportation had already exercised its jurisdiction over all of Defendant's drivers. Id. After viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the Court concluded that, throughout the course of their employment, Plaintiffs could have been called upon to drive interstate routes. Id. at *12. The Court further stated that Defendant adhered to federal regulations by requiring drivers to possess valid CDLs, to comply with FMCSA drug testing requirements, to submit DOT physical examinations, to conduct pre-trip and post-trip inspections on vehicles, and to fill out daily driving logs. Id. at *13. The Court found that Plaintiffs understood that they these requirements were mandated by federal regulations. Moreover, the Department of Transportation exercised jurisdiction over Defendant's operations as recently as May 2016. Taken together, the Court held that the undisputed facts reinforced a reasonable expectation of traveling in interstate commerce. As such, the Court held that Defendant sufficiently established entitlement to the Motor Carrier Act exemption and granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Dewan, et al. v. M-I, LLC,* 858 F.3d 331 (5th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of mud engineers, filed suit under the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA") alleging overtime violations. Defendants moved for summary judgment and the trial court granted Defendant's motion on the basis that Plaintiffs were exempt from the FLSA's overtime requirements. Id. at 332. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Fifth Circuit reversed and remanded. Id. Plaintiffs worked at oil fields to ensure that drilling mud was performed adequately. Plaintiffs tested the mud either in a lab trailer or on-site and then made their recommendations regarding the mud drilling. Id. at 333. The Fifth Circuit noted that for the FLSA's administrative overtime exemption to apply, the employee must be one: (i) who is compensated on a salary or fee basis at a rate of not less than $455 per week; (ii) whose primary duty is the performance of office or non-manual work directly related to the management or general business operations of the employer or the employer's customers and (iii) whose primary duty includes the exercise of discretion and independent judgment with respect to matters of significance. Id. at 334. It was undisputed that Plaintiffs' compensation was sufficient for the exemption to apply. However, the Fifth Circuit concluded that there were genuine issues of material fact relating to Plaintiffs' primary duties and whether they exercised independent judgment that could not be resolved without making inferences from evidence that were subject to genuine dispute. Id. at 335. Furthermore, the Fifth Circuit ruled that because Defendant sought summary judgment on an affirmative defense, it had the burden of establishing beyond doubt all the essential elements of the defense. The evidence established that Plaintiffs provided recommendations, anticipated the customer's concerns with the drilling mud, and addressed those concerns on Defendant's behalf. Based on this evidence, the District Court found that Plaintiffs performed work that directly related to the general business operations of Defendant. Id. at 336. However, the Fifth Circuit reasoned that that the exemption applies when the employee is involved with administering the business affairs and not with producing the commodity of the business, and supplying the drilling-fluid systems seemed more related to producing the commodities than administering Defendant's business. Id. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit opined that the District Court erred in granting summary judgment on the issue of whether Plaintiffs' work could be classified as office or non-manual work directly related to the Defendant's general business. Id. at 338. Secondly, the Fifth Circuit found that the District Court also erred in its determination that there was no dispute as to whether Plaintiffs exercised discretion and independent judgment with respect to matters of significance. The District Court concluded that the matter of significance over which Plaintiffs exercised discretion and independent judgment was the quality control of the condition of the mud. Id. at 339. However, the Fifth Circuit noted that there was little evidence that Plaintiffs had authority to formulate, affect, interpret, or implement management policies or operating practices. Id. Furthermore, Plaintiffs testified that they lacked such authority. Id. As such, the Fifth Circuit reasoned that a reasonable jury could find that Plaintiffs exercised no discretion as mud engineers and merely applied well-established techniques and procedures. Id. at 340. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit reversed and remanded the decision of the District Court on the grounds that Defendant did not establish its affirmative defense as a matter of law. Id.

Dillow, et al. v. Home Care Network,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27133 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of domestic service employees, brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, which the District Court denied. The action arose due to the U.S. Department of Labor's ("DOL") changes in the FLSA overtime exemptions for domestic care providers. The DOL created a final rule amending the regulations as they related to "companionship services" with an effective date of January 1, 2015. Id. at *3. The new regulations stated that domestic-service workers, such as the named Plaintiff in this case who were employed by third-party agencies, were no longer exempt from the mandatory overtime rules. Id. Subsequently, several third-party employers of domestic workers brought suit against the DOL in District Court, and it concluded that the DOL exceeded its rule-making authority in eliminating the FLSA exemption for home health workers, and vacated the rule. Id. at *3-4. On appeal, the D.C. Court of Appeals reversed the District Court's order. Id. at *4. Following that decision, the DOL issued guidance stating that it would not institute enforcement proceedings for violations of the amended rule until 30 days after the Court of Appeals issued a mandate making its opinion effective, which it did on October 13, 2015. Id. The DOL subsequently indicated that it would not bring enforcement actions for violations of the rule prior to November 12, 2015. Id. The issue now before the District Court was when exactly the regulations became enforceable. Plaintiff contended that the regulations' listed effective date of January 1, 2015, was when they became enforceable, meaning that employers of affected individuals could be liable for all unpaid overtime worked since that date. Id. at *4-5. Defendant contended that, because the regulations were invalidated by the District Court's ruling and were not reinstated before the October 13, 2015 mandate issued by the Court of Appeals, the effective date could not be before the issuance of the mandate. Id. at *5. The District Court held that the regulations in question that had already been issued were valid and enforceable; thus, it did not find any new interpretation of the law that would only apply toward future DOL regulations. In light of the District Court's ruling's retroactive application, it found that the enforceability of the DOL regulations at issue in this case should be applied retroactively as well, and that their effective date was therefore January 1, 2015. Id. at *7-8. Defendant argued that the DOL's decision not to enforce the new regulations until November 12, 2015, should persuade the Court to find that the regulations only applied prospectively from the date of the Court of Appeals' mandate. Id. at *11. The District Court noted that although there was a split in authority regarding this issue, it decided with the growing majority of District Courts that have found that the effective date of the regulations at issue was the effective date for purposes of a private lawsuit. Id. at *12. The District Court found that the DOL had more discretion in choosing when and how to enforce its regulations than a reviewing District Court does; therefore, there the clear retroactive effect of the Court of Appeals' decision required it to find that the new overtime regulations for companionship services were in effect as of January 1, 2015. Id. The District Court thereby denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Fernandez, et al. v. Zoni Language Centers, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 9178 (2d Cir. May 26, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of English language teachers, brought an action alleging that Defendant improperly categorized them as exempt employees and failed to pay them overtime and minimum wage in violation of the FLSA and New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' FLSA claims, which the District Court granted, finding that Plaintiffs failed to state a claim. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Defendant was part of a chain of private, for-profit facilities offering English language instruction. Plaintiffs taught at Defendant's centers and were paid at an hourly rate of $16 to $17 per hour, calculated by reference only to their classroom teaching time. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs alleged that their preparation and grading of student work represented a material part of their worktime and should be compensated in addition to classroom time. Defendant contended that, as "teachers" at an "educational establishment," Plaintiffs were subject to the FLSA's exemption from minimum wage and overtime requirements for persons "employed in a bona fide executive, administrative, or professional capacity." Id. at *4. Plaintiffs conceded that they were "teachers" under the applicable regulation, but disputed Defendant's status as an "educational establishment." Id. The District Court concluded that Defendant was properly characterized as an " educational institution" within the meaning of the U.S. Department of Labor's ("DOL's") exemption regulations. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the District Court dismissed Plaintiffs' FLSA claims and declined to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over their state law claims. The Second Circuit noted that the DOL regulations define "educational establishment" as "an elementary or secondary school system, an institution of higher education or other educational institution." Id. The Second Circuit stated that, in applying the plain-language considerations of the words, Defendant was an "educational institution." Id. Defendant's primary purpose was to provide English-language instruction to students using prescribed books in a traditional classroom environment, and lesson plans included speaking, listening, writing, and reading English, with student progress assessed on mid-term and final examinations. Id. at *9. The Second Circuit held that Plaintiffs therefore were engaged in the transmittal of knowledge to students in much the same way as primary and secondary school teachers. Id. at *11. Additionally, the Second Circuit ruled that Defendant was an accredited learning institution and its teachers had completed a program in teaching English as a second language or had at least one year's experience teaching English as a second language. Id. at *12. The Second Circuit further explained that the DOL's opinion letters confirmed a breadth of subject-matter areas that may be encompassed by an "educational institution," including programs for automobile, diesel, collision repair, motorcycle, and marine technicians, cosmetology schools, and daycare providers. Id. at *14-15. The Second Circuit stated that, although no DOL opinion letters addressed the status of an English language instructor at a stand-alone language instruction facility, it saw no principled ground for differentiating such a facility from those addressed in other DOL opinion letters. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Second Circuit concluded that, because the FLSA bona fide professional exemption applied, Plaintiffs could not state plausible FLSA claims for minimum wage and overtime payments. The Second Circuit therefore affirmed the District Court's ruling dismissing Plaintiffs' FLSA claims.

Guyton, et al. v. Legacy Pressure Control,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7836 (W.D. Tex. Jan. 18, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of operators, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant, an oilfield services company, its president, and its vice-president, failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Operators are responsible for maintaining oilfield pressure control. Operators either worked as part of a two man crew and switched shifts every 12 hours, or as part of a four man crew where each operator was accompanied by a helper for 12 hour shifts. Id. at *2-3. Defendants moved for summary judgment on the grounds that Plaintiffs were exempt from the FLSA overtime regulations under the highly compensated executive ("HCE") exemption. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs moved for summary judgment, arguing that no FLSA exemptions were applicable to Plaintiffs. Id. The Court found that genuine disputes of material fact existed with regard to whether Plaintiffs qualified for the HCE exemption. Id. at *8. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs met the $100,000 threshold of the HCE exemption. Further, Defendants asserted that Plaintiffs trained helpers to become operators, directed their work, and provided feedback regarding helpers' work and whether they should be promoted, Plaintiffs' suggestions and recommendations as to the promotion of helpers to operators was given particular weight, and Plaintiffs exercised significant discretion and judgment while on-site. Id. Plaintiffs contended that the HCE exemption did not apply because they are manual laborers. In addition, Plaintiffs argued that their work was not directly related to the management or general business operations of the company, that they did not exercise discretion and independent judgment with respect to matters of significance, and their recommendations with regard to the promotion of helpers were not given particular weight. Id. at *9-10. The Court held that summary judgment was not appropriate for either party as to the HCE exemption defense because genuine disputes of material fact existed with regard to whether Plaintiffs qualified as manual laborers. Defendants maintained that Plaintiffs' primary duty was controlling and maintaining the pressure of grease injected into the wells so as to prevent blowouts, which was accomplished by visually monitoring gauges and turning a knob to adjust grease levels. Defendants argued that other tasks considered manual labor – i.e., connecting hoses to the skid; filling up the grease unit on a tote; tightening nuts with a wrench, torque wrench, or hammer; moving hoses to keep them from getting tangled on the well head; using hand pumps; torque testing; moving grease around with a forklift or bringing it off the truck; opening and closing the tool trap; and going up in a man lift – only constituted 10% of Plaintiffs' job duties. Id. at *10. Defendants further stated that the other 90% of Plaintiffs' jobs duties, including visually monitoring the gauges and turning knobs, did not qualify as manual labor. Id. The Court opined that Plaintiffs introduced evidence showing that they performed their job duties out in an oilfield, and that their primary duties included operating pressure control equipment, monitoring gauges, supervising the set-up of equipment, and rigging jobs up and down. Id. at *11. The Court further stated that Plaintiffs' evidence showed that they worked with boots, hard hats, coveralls, and tools, and their work outdoors was "hot, dangerous, and sweaty." Id. at *12. With regard to Defendants' argument that Plaintiffs only spent 10% of their time performing manual labor, Plaintiffs alleged that they spent the rest of their time simply waiting to perform manual tasks, and that waiting cannot be considered a primary duty. Id. at *12-13. The Court found that genuine disputes of material fact existed regarding several key issues, including Plaintiffs' primary duties, whether that duty should be considered manual labor, the importance of other tasks performed by Plaintiffs, and how much time was spent performing manual labor. Id. at *13-14. Therefore, the Court denied the parties' motions for summary judgment on the exemption issue.

Jackson, et al. v. Sweet Home Healthcare,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51736 (E.D. Pa. April 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of home health aides and direct care workers, brought an action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors and therefore failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and the Pennsylvania Minimum Wage Act ("PMWA"). Defendant argued that under U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") regulations, Plaintiffs were exempt from the FLSA's protection prior to January 1, 2015. Defendant also asserted that regulations that went into effect on January 1, 2015, that would potentially nullify the prior exemption were invalid and should be struck down. Id. at *3. With respect to their first argument, Defendant pointed to 29 U.S.C.

213(a)(15), which excludes from the FLSA overtime protections "any employee employed in domestic service employment to provide companionship services for individuals who (because of age or infirmity) are unable to care for themselves." Id. at *4-5. Until the new regulations took effect on January 1, 2015, the DOL interpreted the exclusion to include home care workers employed by third-party care providers. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs fell under the scope of this exemption and that the Court should therefore dismiss all of the FLSA claims to the extent they sought overtime compensation prior to January 1, 2015. Plaintiffs countered that FLSA exemptions are affirmative defenses and they had no obligation to plead around an affirmative defense. They argued that, even so, they had pleaded that the exemptions do not apply and that their duties included "household services." The Court noted that unless it is apparent from the face of the complaint that an FLSA exemption applied, granting a motion to dismiss based on an exemption affirmative defense would be inappropriate. Thus, the Court held that even though it appeared that the exemption ultimately may be the subject of some controversy, because it was not clear from the face of the complaint that the exemption applied and because the application of an exemption was an affirmative defense, the Court declined to grant Defendant's motion to dismiss. The Court stated that even if the exemption did apply prior to January 1, 2015, the DOL's regulations mandating overtime pay for companionship service providers employed by third-party agencies went into effect on January 1, 2015 and eliminated that exemption. Id. at *7-8. Defendant also argued that the regulation was invalid, and it asserted that Congress, in 1974, intended the exemptions in the statute to apply to individuals employed by third-party agencies, and that the DOL exceeded its authority in removing that exemption through regulation. Id. at *9. The Court opined that Congress left to the DOL the authority to determine that third-party agency employees belonged within the exemption or that that such personnel did not belong in the exemption. Id. at *10. The Court also stated that the DOL's new regulations passed muster, as the DOL simply recognized a change in the home care industry that made those workers more like professionals with a vocation than casual babysitters. Id. Thus, the Court found that even if Plaintiffs were exempt employees prior to January 1, 2015, Plaintiffs were not exempt employees after January 1, 2015. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion.

LaCurtis, et al. v. Express Medical Transporters,* 856 F.3d 571 (8th Cir. 2017). In this consolidated putative class and collective action, Express Medical Transporters and Hospital Shuttle Service, Inc. ("Defendants") appealed from an order of the District Court denying Defendants' motion for summary judgment and granting partial summary judgment for Plaintiff on the issue of Defendants' liability to pay unpaid overtime under the FLSA. The Eighth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Defendants were licensed interstate motor carriers regulated by the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration ("FMCSA"), a division of the U.S. Department of Transportation ("DOT"). Defendants provided non-emergency medical and student transportation and engaged in interstate commerce. To provide those services, Defendants operated a fleet of vehicles, including several wheelchair-equipped paralift vans. The paralift vans were originally designed and manufactured to carry up to 15 passengers. Id. at 573. Before being placed into service, the vans were redesigned and converted by a third-party company into paralift vans by permanently removing some of the seats to allow the installation of up to two wheelchair positions. Id. at 574. Defendants asserted that modified paralift vans could transport up to two passengers in wheelchairs and up to five additional passengers. Id. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment on the issue of whether the paralift vans were "designed or used to transport more than 8 passengers" for purposes of § 306 of the TCA. Id. Plaintiff urged the District Court to defer to the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") Field Assistance Bulletin No. 2010-2 ("FAB 2010-2"), in which the Deputy Administrator of the Wage & hour Division ("WHD") of the DOL announced that, for enforcement purposes, the WHD would determine whether a vehicle was "designed or used to transport more than 8 passengers" "based on the vehicle's current design and the vehicle capacity as found on the door jamb plate." Id. The WHD stated that if the seating capacity was reduced "to accommodate a wheelchair, [the WHD] will count the resulting capacity plus add 1 for each wheelchair placement." Id. at 575. Defendants argued that the paralift vans that Plaintiff drove were "designed or used to transport more than 8 passengers" based on their original design and as modified to accommodate two wheelchairs, which Defendants argued counted as four seating positions. Id. Defendants alternatively asserted they should not be liable for overtime because they relied in good faith on the results of a 2010 compliance examination conducted by the DOL that indicated Defendants' overtime policies complied with the FLSA. Id. at 576. The Eighth Circuit noted that it must determine whether the vans Plaintiff drove, which were originally designed and manufactured to transport up to 15 passengers, were "designed or used to transport more than 8 passengers (including the driver)" for purposes of § 306(c) of the TCA. Id. at 577.

Reviewing the statutory language in the TCA and giving "some deference" to the WHD interpretation of § 306 in FAB 2010-2, the District Court determined that the paralift vans that Plaintiff operated were not "designed or used to transport more than 8 passengers." Id. at 577-578. As such, the District Court found that Plaintiff was a "covered employee" under the TCA and entitled to overtime pay. Id. at 578. Defendants argued that, in reaching that conclusion, the District Court misinterpreted or ignored the clear statutory language of the TCA and erred in giving deference to the WHD's interpretation of the statutory language. Id. The Eighth Circuit agreed with the District Court that, although originally designed to carry up to 15 passengers, the vans at issue in this case went from the original manufacturer to a third-party manufacturer who redesigned them and converted them into paralift vans capable of safely transporting up to two wheelchairs. To accommodate the wheelchairs, the third-party manufacturer removed some of the seats, altered the roof and doors, and installed wheelchair anchors, ramps, and lifts in accordance with the redesign. When the conversion process was complete, the third-party manufacturer placed new placards on the door pillars to comply with the labeling requirements in § 571.110 S4.3 for tire and loading information. Id. After those substantial modifications, the paralift vans Plaintiff drove could seat no more than seven passengers. In light of the comprehensive redesign and conversion process that the paralift vans underwent before being placed into service, the Eighth Circuit agreed with the District Court that the paralift vans were not "designed or used to transport more than 8 passengers" under TCA § 306(c). Id. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision granting Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment on the issue of liability.

Navarro, et al. v. Encino Motorcars, LLC*, 845 F.3d 925 (9th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of service advisors, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant, an automobile dealership, failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss contending that the position and duties of a service advisor brought Plaintiffs within § 213(b)(10)(A), which establishes an exemption from the FLSA overtime provisions for a salesman, partsman, or mechanic primarily engaged in selling or servicing automobiles. The District Court agreed and granted the motion to dismiss. The Ninth Circuit reversed, giving deference to the U.S. Department of Labor's ("DOL") interpretation of the FLSA. In 1970, the DOL issued an interpretation regulation in which it concluded that service advisors did not fall within the exemption of the FLSA. Id. at 928. Several case law authorities rejected the DOL's interpretation, and in 1978, the DOL issued a new opinion letter interpreting the exemption to include dealership "service advisors" who sell "repair and maintenance services" for vehicles. Id. The DOL issued another regulation in 2011 that excluded service advisors from the exemption under § 213(b)(10)(A). Id. at 928-29. The Ninth Circuit previously relied on the DOL's 2011 regulation to hold that Plaintiffs were eligible for overtime premium pay. On further appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed the decision, holding that the regulation was arbitrary and capricious for lack of even minimal supporting analysis. The Supreme Court vacated the judgment and remanded the action to the Ninth Circuit to reinterpret the statute without giving deference to the DOL's 2011 regulation. Id. at 927. On remand, the Ninth Circuit assumed without deciding that it must give no weight to the agency's interpretation and the regulation, and interpret the statute in the first instance. As a result, the Ninth Circuit determined that under the most natural reading of the FLSA, Congress did not intend to exempt service advisors. The Ninth Circuit noted that, even if the text were ambiguous, the legislative history confirmed that Congress intended to exempt only salesmen selling cars, partsmen servicing cars, and mechanics servicing cars, and did not intend to exempt service advisors. The Ninth Circuit reasoned if it read the exemption's list of job titles more broadly – to encompass all persons whose functional roles meet the dictionary definitions of the terms salesman, partsman, or mechanic – a service advisor could be considered to sell services and would therefore qualify as a "salesman." Id. at 930. However, the Ninth Circuit opined that even assuming that Congress intended a broad interpretation of the term "salesman," not every "salesman" was exempt, as the statute covers only those who are "primarily engaged in selling or servicing automobiles." Id. at 930-31. The Ninth Circuit concluded that the phrase "primarily engaged in selling . . . automobiles" encompassed only those who are actually and primarily occupied in selling cars, and that the phrase "primarily engaged in . . . servicing automobiles" encompassed only those who are actually and primarily occupied in the repair and maintenance of cars. Id. at 933. For these reasons, the Ninth Circuit held that since service advisors met neither definition, they were not exempt under § 213(b)(10)(A) of the FLSA. The Ninth Circuit thereby reversed the order dismissing Plaintiffs' claims for overtime compensation and remanded the action to the District Court for further proceedings.

Perry, et al. v. Randstad General Partner LLC,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 23297 (6th Cir. Nov. 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of staffing managers, filed a collective action under the FLSA alleging that they were misclassified as exempt employees and improperly denied overtime pay. Id. at *4. The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of Defendant, ruling that the Plaintiffs were exempt from the overtime requirements of the FLSA pursuant to the administrative exemption. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed in part and reversed in part. Id. at *57. At the outset, the Sixth Circuit noted that determining an employee's primary duties and whether he or she is covered by the administrative exemption is a fact-intensive inquiry that focuses on the employee's actual day-to-day activities rather than more general job descriptions contained in position descriptions and performance evaluations. Id. at *15. The Sixth Circuit ruled that the District Court properly determined that the primary duties that Plaintiffs exercised as account managers and assistant branch managers involved the exercise of sufficient discretion and independent judgment, such that the administrative exemption to the FLSA applied to those employees. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit affirmed summary judgment in favor of Defendant relative to the time that Plaintiffs worked in such positions. However, the Sixth Circuit determined that the District Court erred in granting summary judgment to Defendant with respect to the time that Plaintiffs worked as staffing consultants and talent acquisition specialists. The Sixth Circuit determined that the record contained evidence showing that, during the time that they held such positions, Plaintiffs performed primary duties that included non-exempt sales activities and routine recruiting tasks. Id. at *48. Further, the Sixth Circuit found that, with respect to the time that Plaintiffs worked as staffing consultants, the District Court erred in finding that the good faith defense precluded liability as a matter of law because the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") opinion letter upon which Defendant relied for its exempt classification specified circumstances and facts that did not apply to Plaintiffs. Id. at *54. The Sixth Circuit held that the DOL opinion letter did not provide a clear answer to Defendant's situation regarding the classification of talent acquisition specialists and staffing consultants. Additionally, Defendant did not show that its reliance was in good faith as a matter of law because Defendant arguably had knowledge that the duties of its employees could vary significantly based on the clients serviced, the market, and the branch manager. Id. at *55. Accordingly, the Court affirmed in part and reversed in part.

Pierce, et al. v. Wyndham Vacation Resorts, Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 165819 (E.D. Tenn. Oct. 6, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of sales representatives, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified sales representatives as exempt and thereby failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment on the grounds that Plaintiffs were exempt from the overtime provisions of the FLSA as highly compensated employees. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs fall within the highly compensated employee exemption because they earned more than $100,000.00 annually and they customarily and regularly performed one or more executive or administrative duties. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant could not claim the exemption pursuant to 29 C.F.R. § 541.601 because no portion of the compensation that Plaintiffs received from Defendant was paid on a salary basis as was required in order for the employer to claim that an employee is an exempt executive. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs argued that even if Defendant was permitted to pay executive employees on a fee basis, Defendant could not establish that they paid Plaintiffs on a fee basis because commissions did not constitute payment on a fee basis. Id. Further, Plaintiffs contended that even if Defendant could establish the compensation requirements, Defendant could not satisfy the streamlined duties test by which highly compensated employees' exempt status may be determined. Id. at *5-6. The Court found that the commissions paid did not constitute a fee basis. The Court held that the FLSA states that the total annual compensation must include at least $455 per week paid on a salary or fee basis and that it may also include commissions. The Court opined that the requirement of $455 per week paid on a salary or fee basis simply meant that at least $23,600 ($455 x 52 weeks) of the $100,000 per year was guaranteed. Id. at *12. The Court found that Plaintiffs were paid commissions only when they produced a sale, and were not paid a salary or fee basis in which Defendant could claim the highly compensated employee exemption. Id. at *22. Because the Court determined that Defendant failed to show Plaintiffs were paid a total annual compensation, the Court reasoned that it was unnecessary to address whether Defendant established the executive exemption duties test. Id. at *23. The Court briefly addressed the issue and determined that Defendant failed to establish that there was no genuine issue of material fact supporting summary judgment on this issue. To the contrary, it appeared to the Court that Defendant did not provide a guaranteed salary and that sales representatives' primary duty was sales, not management. Id. at *24. Further, the Court found that Defendant also had not established that Plaintiffs had the authority to hire or fire or that they "customarily and regularly" directed the work of other employees. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Ristovski, et al. v. Midfield Concession Enters*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 133597 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 22, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of five restaurant employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt employees under the executive exemption of the FLSA and thereby failed to pay overtime compensation. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgement and the Court denied the motion, finding that genuine issues of material fact existed. At the outset, the Court noted that case law authorities determine whether an employee meets the executive exception by applying the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") regulations, which provide various tests, including: (i) the employee is compensated on a salary basis at a rate of not less than $455 per week; (i) whose primary duty is management of the enterprise in which the employee is employed or of a customarily recognized department or sub-division thereof; (iii) who customarily and regularly directs the work of two or more other employees; and (iv) who has the authority to hire or fire other employees or whose suggestions and recommendations as to the hiring, firing, advancement, promotion, or any other change of status of employees are given particular weight. Id. at *16-17. The Court noted that that a fact issue existed as to the fourth element. The Court found that the named Plaintiffs Lewis and Schumacher testified that they had to obtain final approval from their supervisor on hiring and firing decisions, but that their suggestions were given weight. However, the Court opined that there were only two hiring and firing scenarios, and therefore Plaintiffs' input as to the hiring and firing could be characterized either as an "occasional suggestion" or as routine participation. Id. at *21. At the summary judgment stage, the Court determined that those two instances were insufficient to conclusively establish that Defendant relied on Plaintiffs' input often enough that the input was given "particular weight." Id. The Court thereby found that Defendant failed to meet its burden in establishing that Plaintiffs were subject to the FLSA's executive exemption. Accordingly, the Court denied summary judgment as to this defense.

(xii) FLSA Collective Actions For Donning And Doffing

Lyons, et al. v. Conagra Foods Packaged Foods, LLC,* Case No. 12-CV-245 (E.D. Ark. Aug. 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees at a food plant, filed a collective action alleging that they and others similarly-situated were not paid for all time worked in violation of the FLSA and the Arkansas Minimum Wage Act ("AMWA"). Plaintiffs specifically alleged they were not paid for time spent changing clothes and walking between the donning and doffing area before and after shifts, and for time spent checking in and checking out box cutters, knives and Kevlar gloves before and after shifts. Id. at 1. The Court had previously determined that § 203 of the FLSA would apply to Plaintiffs' claims under the AMWA, and it granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' federal claims for time spent donning, doffing, and walking. Id. The Court then set aside the portion of its order finding that § 203 would apply to claims under the AMWA in light of the Arkansas Supreme Court's holding in Gerber Products Co. v. Hewitt, 2016 Ark. 222 (2016), which held that the § 203(o) exception to donning and doffing rules for unionized employees did not apply to AMWA claims. Id. at 2. Subsequently, the Arkansas General Assembly legislatively overruled Gerber on the basis that the Arkansas Supreme Court misinterpreted state law and failed to reflect the legislature's intent. Id. The Court had previously determined that the collective bargaining agreements between Defendant and its Unions historically had excluded compensation for donning and doffing activities by longstanding custom and practice. Therefore, in light of the clarification provided by the Arkansas General Assembly, the Court determined that the Arkansas Supreme Court would abandon its decision in Gerber and interpret the AMWA to hold that § 11-4-205 would protect the sanctity of the collective bargaining agreement. Id. at 4. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs' state law donning, doffing, and walking claims should be dismissed. Id. The Court determined that Plaintiffs' tool time claims also failed as a matter of law because even if the activity of checking the knives in and out from the guard shack was an intrinsic part of Plaintiffs' principal activities, the time spent engaging in these activities was de minimis, and took no longer than a few minutes. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgement.

(xiii) Foreign Worker Issues In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Dorseli, et al. v. Gonzalez*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 158245 (M.D. Fla. Sept. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of migrant and seasonal farm workers, filed an action seeking damages, injunctive relief, and declaratory relief for Defendants' alleged violations of certain provisions of the Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Worker Protection Act ("AWPA"). Defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim, arguing the Plaintiffs failed to set forth sufficient allegations to support individual liability that they were "employers" under the AWPA because Plaintiffs failed to allege that Defendants exercised day-to-day control over Plaintiffs' employment. The Court granted the motion in part and denied it in part. The Court noted that the AWPA expressly defines "employ" as synonymous with the term "employ" in the FLSA, and therefore an entity that employs agricultural workers under the FLSA necessarily employs the workers for the purposes of the AWPA. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants acted as farm labor contractors and that, in exchange for monetary payment, Defendants recruited, transported, and furnished Plaintiffs for employment harvesting corn at various farms, thereby meeting the AWPA definition of employer. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendants had control over their pay, including tax withholdings. The Court held that Defendants cited no authority holding that they could not be held individually liable if they met the definition of agricultural employer under the AWPA, and therefore Plaintiffs' allegations were sufficient. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs asserted the allegations under each count in their complaint only against "Defendants" and did not allege how each Defendant was involved in the wrongdoing. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs responded that Defendants acted in concert to commit the alleged acts, but requested leave to amend if the Court disagreed. Id. The Court noted that Plaintiffs identified each Defendant as a farm labor contractor and asserted that, in exchange for monetary payment, each recruited, transported, and furnished Plaintiffs and other migrant and seasonal workers for employment harvesting corn. The Court concluded that these allegations were sufficient. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendants willfully filed fraudulent information returns in violation of 26 U.S.C. § 74343. Plaintiffs asserted that the W-2 forms filed by Defendants listed only a portion of their actual earnings, which substantially reduced Defendants' obligation for payment of certain taxes and worker's compensation premiums. Id. at *7. The Court explained that there are three elements to a § 7434 claim, including: (i) that Defendants issued information returns; (ii) the information returns were fraudulent; and (iii) Defendants willfully issued the returns. Id. at *7-8. The parties did not dispute the first element, but Defendants sought dismissal on the grounds that Plaintiffs failed to allege facts to show that Defendants fraudulently filed returns or that they could be held personally liable. Id. at *8. In particular, Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to identify which of Defendants' names, if any, were on the W-2 forms, who filed them, or what facts supported the allegation that the conduct was willful. The Court agreed with Defendants. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs alleged in a conclusory fashion that Defendants willfully filed W-2 forms containing fraudulent information regarding Plaintiffs' earnings, but offered little other factual detail. The Court, therefore, dismissed the count with leave to amend. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendants' motion to dismiss.

(xiv) Independent Contractor Issues In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Battle, et al. v. DirecTV,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 148790 (N.D. Ala. Sept. 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of cable installation technicians, brought a claim alleging overtime violations of the FLSA. Defendant moved for summary judgment on the grounds that: (i) Plaintiffs were independent contractors; (ii) even if Plaintiffs were employees, Defendant was not their joint employer; (iii) even if Plaintiffs were employees, Defendant was not liable based on the § 7(i) exemption of the FLSA; and (iv) Plaintiffs failed to present sufficient evidence of their damages. Id. at *6. The Court denied Defendant's motion as to the first three grounds, but granted the motion as to damages, ruling that Plaintiffs failed to present sufficient evidence to support their claim of damages. Id. at *25. There were wide-ranging discrepancies between Plaintiffs' estimates of their own damages in their testimony and discovery responses, and some Plaintiffs could not even explain how they came up with their damage numbers. Id. at *27. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs could not meet their evidentiary burden with bare assertions that they possessed evidence that supported their damages claim, as they must show documents or identify expert witnesses that would allow a jury to reasonably calculate their damages. Id. at *28. Because Plaintiffs failed to establish damages, the Court ruled that summary judgment was appropriate. Id. at *25. The Court denied the motion as to independent contractor status, as Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant controlled work hours, the length of the workweek, requests for time off, the types of work assigned to technicians, as well as the manner and method of work. Id. at *9-10. Defendant controlled the clothing, grooming, and appearance of technicians, and prohibited technicians from performing cable installations for other companies. Id. at *10. The Court ruled that in considering all these factors, it could not find as a matter of law that Plaintiffs were independent contractors. Id. at *15. As to joint employer status, the Court found that in utilizing an economic realities test, genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether Plaintiffs were economically dependent on Defendant. Accordingly, the Court held that summary judgment was not appropriate on the joint employer issue. Id. at *21. The Court also ruled that it could not find, as a matter of law, that Defendant qualified for the § 7(i) exemption because under the 29 U.S.C. § 207(i) exemption of the FLSA, the employer has the burden of establishing some proportionality between the compensation to the employees and the amount charged to the customer. The Court opined that because the customers paid nothing for the satellite cable installation that Plaintiffs performed, Defendant could not meet its burden of showing proportionality by clear and affirmative evidence. Id. at *25.

Braxton, et al. v. Eldorado Lounge, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 178191 (D. Md. Oct. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of exotic dancers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants misclassified dancers as independent contractors and thereby failed to pay minimum wage in violation of the FLSA, the Maryland Wage & Hour Law ("MWHL"), and the Maryland Wage Payment and Collection Law ("MWPCL"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for partial summary judgment as to Defendants' liability and with respect to their affirmative defenses on four issues, including: (i) whether Plaintiffs were employees of Defendants for purposes of the FLSA, MWHL, and MWPCL; (ii) whether Defendants violated the FLSA, MWHL, and MWPCL by failing to pay Plaintiffs a minimum wage; (iii) whether Plaintiffs were entitled to recover damages equal to the minimum wage for each week while employed by Defendants; and (iv) whether Defendants' affirmative defenses could be applied to mitigate or negate the award of wages and damages. Id. at *12. As to the first issue, the Court found that analysis of the undisputed facts and application of the six factors of the economic realities test revealed that as a matter of law, Plaintiffs were employees of Defendants. Id. at *21-22. The Court therefore granted Plaintiffs' motion as to whether they were employees of Defendants. As to the second issue, since Plaintiffs were employees of Defendants, they were entitled to a minimum wage of at least $7.25 an hour if they were employed in an "enterprise engaged in commerce." Id. at *23. However, Defendants argued that they did not meet the $500,000 gross sales threshold required, because although one club exceeded $500,000 in gross sales, the other had not. Id. at *24. The Court reasoned that on the evidence presented, which must be construed in the light most favorable to Defendants, it could not conclude as a matter of law that Defendants were either a unified operation or subject to common control. Id. at *29. Accordingly, the Court denied the motion as to Defendants' violation of the FLSA, since Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that the clubs were collectively an enterprise engaged in commerce. Id. at *30. As to Plaintiffs' state law claims, the Court noted that Plaintiffs asserted that the definition of "commissioned employee" should be borrowed from the FLSA. Plaintiffs argued that by this standard, Defendants were required to prove that Plaintiffs: (i) were employed by a retail or service establishment; (ii) had a regular rate of pay at least 150% of the minimum wage for each hour worked; and (iii) had more than half of their total compensation composed of commissions. Id. at *30-31. The Court disagreed and held that the FLSA's reference to commissions was not equivalent to the MWHL's provision. The Court found that the FLSA only considers commissions in the context of retail and service establishments. Id. at *31. Therefore, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment as to the MWHL claims. In addition, the Court also denied summary judgment as to whether Plaintiffs were entitled to recover wages because it denied the motion with respect to whether Defendants violated the FLSA. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment.

Burrell, et al. v. Toppers International*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58546 (M.D. Ga. April 18, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of entertainers, alleged that Defendant improperly classified them as independent contractors and failed to pay them minimum wage in violation of the FLSA. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs filed a motion for summary judgment, contending that they were employees within the meaning of the FLSA, not independent contractors. The Court granted the motion. The Court noted that, to determine whether an individual falls into the category of covered "employee" or exempted "independent contractor," it must look to the economic reality of the relationship between the alleged employee and alleged employer and whether that relationship demonstrated dependence. Id. at *2. The Court considered six main factors in determining the economic reality of the parties. As to the first factor – the nature and degree of control – the Court determined that Defendant exercised significant control over the manner in which the entertainers' work was performed. Defendant set the entertainers' schedules, fined entertainers if they were late or missed a shift, required mandatory house fees and tip-outs, set minimum prices for dances, and had rules on how entertainers performed on stage. Id. at *3. Based on all of the undisputed facts, the Court found that Defendant exercised significant control over the work of its entertainers, which weighed in favor of finding that the entertainers were employees. Id. As to the second factor – the opportunity for profit or loss – the Court opined that, although the entertainers could negotiate the rate customers paid them for dances, they had limited opportunities to increase their profit. Further, other than the mandatory fees they paid to dance, the entertainers had no risk of loss. In contrast, Defendant had extensive control over the entertainers' opportunity for profit because it controlled the location, facilities, marketing, and inventory of beverages for the club and also had a much bigger risk of loss because it was responsible for all rents, utilities, maintenance, insurance, and advertising for the club. Id. at *4. Thus, the Court concluded this factor weighed in favor of finding that the entertainers were economically dependent on Defendant and therefore its employees. The third factor was "the alleged employee's investment in equipment or materials required for his task, or his employment of workers." Id. Relative to that factor, Defendant was responsible for all investments necessary for the entertainers to do their work, including the facility, stage, marketing, bar, and security, which the Court stated weighed in favor of finding that the entertainers were economically dependent on Defendant and therefore its employees. Id. at *5. The fourth factor was "whether the service rendered requires a special skill." Id. The Court held that it was undisputed that no prior experience or formal training was required to work as an entertainer and therefore this factor also weighed in favor of finding that the entertainers were employees. The fifth factor was "the degree of permanency and duration of the working relationship." Id. The Court reasoned that this factor was neutral because the present record did not indicate whether the entertainers' working relationship with Defendant was exclusive, and it did not establish that the entertainers had a contract with Defendant for a specific term. The sixth factor was "the extent to which the service rendered is an integral part of the alleged employer's business." Id. at *6. Defendant agreed that entertainers were integral to its operation, and the Court therefore found that this factor weighed in favor of finding that entertainers were employees. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs were employees within the meaning of the FLSA. The Court, therefore, granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment on the issue that Defendant's entertainers were employees, not independent contractors.

Carrow, et al. v. Fedex Ground Package Systems,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48536 (D.N.J. Mar. 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of truck drivers, brought an action alleging that Defendant incorrectly classified them as independent contractors in violation of the New Jersey Wage Payment Law ("NJWPL") and the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act ("NJCFA"). Defendant filed a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1) and Rule 12(b)(6), which the Court granted in part. Defendant engaged approximately 300 truck and van drivers in New Jersey. The contract between Defendant and drivers, the Operating Agreement ("OA"), classified drivers as independent contractors. For some agreements, Defendant allegedly required the driver to create a limited liability company or corporation and sign the OA through the business entity. Plaintiffs created corporate entities at Defendant's request. Prior to and after entering into the OAs, Defendant allegedly made several representations regarding the nature of the drivers' jobs, including that drivers could "be their own boss," "grow their own business," and "partner" with Defendant. Id. at *2. The OA stated that drivers were independent contractors, had sole control over their business, and had a proprietary and entrepreneurial interest in the delivery routes. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs contended that, in reality, Defendant treated drivers as employees because it regulated or controlled vehicle appearance, vehicle maintenance, liability insurance, driver reports, driver uniforms, and driver service areas; determined the prices charged for services, route schedules, electronic equipment, forms for paperwork, and approval of substitutes and assistants; and actively monitored how drivers operated their vehicles, carried packages, and completed paperwork. Id. at *3. The Court found that the thrust of Plaintiffs' case was that they and Defendant had an employment relationship, with arguments centered around Defendant's control over Plaintiffs' jobs. Id. at *13-14. The Court noted that the New Jersey appellate case law authorities, however, specifically had held that employment relationships were not governed by the NJCFA. The Court determined that Plaintiffs' fraud allegations were not cognizable under the NJCFA, and must be dismissed. As to Plaintiffs' NJWPL claims, the Court stated that the NJWPL governed "the time and mode of payment of wages due to employees." Id. at *14. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs could not bring a claim under the NJWPL because they were not parties to the OAs. The NJWPL defines "employer" as "any individual, partnership, association, joint stock company, trust, corporation, the administrator or executor of the estate of a deceased individual, or the receiver, trustee, or successor of any of the same, employing any person in this State." Id. at *14-15. The Court opined that the provision did not require an entity to render payment directly to a person to qualify as an employer. Id. at *15. "Employee" in turn is defined as a "person," but a person similarly need not receive wages directly from the employer to constitute an employee. Rather, the Court reasoned that it was "obliged to look behind contractual language to the actual situation – the status in which parties are placed by relationship that exists between them." Id. Thus, the Court determined that it must analyze more than the contract formed between Defendant and the corporate entities formed by Plaintiffs in order to determine whether Plaintiffs were employees. Therefore, the Court declined to dismiss Plaintiffs' NJWPL claim.

Derolf, et al. v. Risinger Brothers Transfer, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 60827 (C.D. Ill. April 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of truck drivers, filed suit against Defendant alleging violations of the FLSA, Internal Revenue Code ("IRC"), Truth in Leasing Act, ("TILA"), as well as several state laws. Defendant moved to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6). The Court granted Defendant's motion as to all federal claims, and therefore did not address the state law claims. Id. at *26. First, Plaintiffs claimed that they were improperly misclassified as independent contractors and were owed unpaid wages under the FLSA. Id. at *3. The Court employed the FLSA's economic reality test and rejected Plaintiffs' claim that they were employees. Id. at *5. The Court determined that the operating agreements indicated that Plaintiffs exercised vast control over how they worked. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs were permitted to contract someone else to drive the trucks and controlled the hours, salaries, training, and hiring of drivers. Id. Plaintiffs made significant investment in their own equipment, leased trucks that had fixed termination dates, and were responsible for their profitability. Id. at *16. Plaintiffs were not exclusively dependent on Defendant since the operating agreement allowed them to work for other carriers and decline work assignments from Defendant. Id. at *11. While Plaintiffs were an integral part of Defendant's business, the Court found that this factor alone did not outweigh all the other factors, weighing heavily in favor of a finding that Plaintiffs were independent contractors and not employees. Id. at *18. Secondly, because the Court concluded that Plaintiffs were independent contractors, it dismissed Plaintiffs' claims that Defendant willfully violated the IRC by filing fraudulent information returns classifying Plaintiffs as independent contractors. Id. The Court noted that regardless, Plaintiffs had not properly pled a violation of the IRC, as the amount of wages stated in the form were correct and it was not a violation of the IRC to improperly classify Plaintiffs' employment status. Id. at *19. Lastly, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claims of violations of the TILA because Plaintiffs failed to allege that they suffered any damages as a result of any alleged violations. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss as to all federal claims.

Hall, et al. v. DirecTV, LLC,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 1320 *(*4th Cir. Jan. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of technicians, filed suit against Defendants alleging wage & hour violations under the FLSA and Maryland law. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants were their joint employers during the relevant period. Plaintiffs worked as technicians for various Defendants, including an intermediary provider, a sub-contractor, or some combination of those entities. Plaintiffs alleged that they regularly worked over 40 hours a week without being compensated and Defendants' failure to provide overtime pay violated the FLSA's overtime and minimum wage requirements. The District Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' complaint pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) on the basis that Plaintiffs failed to adequately allege that Defendant DirecTV was a joint employer. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Fourth Circuit reversed and remanded the District Court's decision on the grounds that Plaintiffs' factual allegations were sufficient to state a claim that Defendant DirecTV was a joint employer. The Fourth Circuit determined that the District Court applied an improper legal test for determining whether entities constituted joint employers for purposes of the FLSA. Instead, the Fourth Circuit applied a two-step analysis for determining whether a Defendant may be held liable for an alleged FLSA violation under a joint employment theory. First, the District Court must determine whether Defendant and one or more additional entities shared, agreed to allocate responsibility for, or otherwise codetermined the key terms and conditions of Plaintiffs' work. Secondly, the District Court must analyze whether a worker was an employee or independent contractor for purposes of the FLSA and this depended in large part upon the answer to the first step. The Fourth Circuit determined that the District Court in this case erred when it considered whether Plaintiffs qualified as employees without first determining whether a joint employment relationship existed between Defendant DirecTV and the other employers. The Court Circuit opined that focusing on the relationship between the employers was essential to accomplishing the FLSA's "remedial and humanitarian" purpose. The Fourth Circuit framed the "fundamental question" guiding the joint employment analysis as "whether two or more persons or entities are 'not completely disassociated' with respect to a worker such that the persons or entities share responsibility for the essential terms and conditions of the worker's employment." Id. at *20. Plaintiffs' principal job duties were to install and repair Defendant DirecTV's equipment. Defendant DirecTV primarily directed and controlled Plaintiffs' work. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant DirecTV was the "primary, if not the only" client of each of the providers who served as Plaintiffs' direct employers and the source of substantially all of income earned. Id. at *24. Defendant DirecTV was the principal and, in many cases, the only client of the lower-level sub-contractors. Defendant

DirecTV – through provider agreements with the other employers – had the authority to direct, control, and supervise nearly every aspect of Plaintiffs' job duties. Defendant DirecTV compelled Plaintiffs to obtain their work schedules and job assignments through its centralized system. Defendant DirecTV also controlled nearly every facet of the technicians' work through its provider agreements. Further, Plaintiffs were required to hold themselves out as representatives of Defendant DirecTV by wearing their uniforms and displaying its logo on their vehicles. As a result, the Fourth Circuit determined that Plaintiffs were properly classified as employees under the FLSA, by focusing on the "'economic realities' of the relationship" between Defendants and Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs were not in business for themselves and were economically dependent upon Defendants. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit reversed and remanded the District Court's decision.

Iontchev, et al. v. AAA Cab Service, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 5326 (9th Cir. Mar. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay timely and minimum wages in violation of the FLSA and Arizona law. The District Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment on all claims, and on appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed. Plaintiffs alleged that they were improperly classified as independent contractors instead of employees. The Ninth Circuit found that clear and convincing evidence proved that Plaintiffs were independent contractors under the FLSA and Arizona law. The Ninth Circuit stated that Plaintiffs' classification was governed by the "economic reality" of their working relationship with Defendant. Thus, to classify Plaintiffs as independent contractors, Defendant must prove that Plaintiffs were not economically dependent on Defendant. The Ninth Circuit determined that the District Court properly applied the six factors of the economic realities test to find: (i) Defendant had relatively little control over the manner in which Plaintiffs performed their work; (ii) Plaintiffs' opportunity for profit or loss depended upon their managerial skill as they paid a flat fee to lease taxicabs, could work as much or as little as they wanted, kept all earnings from passenger fares, were free to provide taxi services away from the airport, could pass out business cards to passengers and develop their own clientele, and could share their taxicabs with authorized relief drivers with whom they personally negotiated the number of hours each driver would use the cab and how they would split up the fuel and lease costs; (iii) Plaintiffs invested in equipment or materials and employed helpers to perform their work; (iv) the services rendered by Plaintiff did not require a special skill; (v) the working relationship was often lengthy; and (vi) the service rendered by Plaintiffs was an integral part of Defendant's business of providing taxicab services at the airport. Id. at *3-4. The Ninth Circuit concluded that Plaintiffs were not economically dependent upon Defendant. Rather, the Ninth Circuit found, as a matter of economic reality, Plaintiffs were in business for themselves when they leased their taxicabs from Defendant and utilized them to earn a profit. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the District Court properly held that, as a matter of law, Plaintiffs were not employees under the FLSA and Arizona law.

Lawson, et al. v. Grubhub, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106291 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a former delivery driver, filed a class action alleging that Defendant misclassified drivers as independent contractors and thereby failed to pay their expenses and failed to pay them minimum wage and overtime compensation in violation of the California Labor Code. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, which the Court denied. The Court found material issues of disputed fact as to whether Plaintiff should have been treated as an employee and, if he was an employee, whether Defendant violated California law. The Court noted that a Plaintiff can establish a prima facie case that a relationship is that of an employer/employee by coming forward with evidence that she provided services for the employer. Id. at *7. The Court stated that, because it was undisputed that Plaintiff provided delivery services to Defendant, the burden was on Defendant to prove that Plaintiff was an independent contractor. Id. at *8. The Court explained that the ultimate determination of Plaintiff's employment status presented a mixed question of law and fact, and therefore Defendant could obtain summary judgment only if it showed that all facts and evidentiary inferences material to the employee/independent contractor determination were undisputed and that a reasonable trier of fact viewing those undisputed facts and inferences could reach the conclusion that Defendant's drivers were independent contractors. Id. at *8-9. First, when evaluating the extent of control, an employer's "right to discharge at will, without cause" is "strong evidence in support of an employment relationship." Id. at *9. Defendant's contract contained an automatic renewal clause and could be terminated by either party with 14 days' notice or upon breach of the agreement. The Court held that such an agreement was an indication of an at-will employment relationship. Id. at *11. Second, whereas Plaintiff could decide when to make himself available for shifts, Defendant's own manager testified that when drivers want to sign up for deliveries, they signed up for blocks of time created by managers. The Court therefore determined that Defendant's argument that drivers were "not obligated to accept any given food order they receive, even if they sign up for a delivery block," was unpersuasive. Id. at *11-12. The Court held that Defendant failed to meet the difficult burden of proving that, drawing all inferences from the evidence in Plaintiff's favor, every reasonable trier of fact would have to find that Defendant did not have the right to exercise all necessary control over the details of Plaintiff's work. Id. at *13. The Court also opined that a reasonable fact-finder could conclude that company oversight as to whether a driver was driving as scheduled and Defendant's complaint feedback system supported a finding of an employment relationship. Id. at *14-15. Drawing all reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor, the Court also stated that a trier of fact could find that drivers were expected to be available to accept deliveries during their blocks and that Defendant's two-step compensation system more closely resembled an employment relationship than a contractor relationship. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Lee, et al. v. www.Urban.com,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 134809 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 23, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of realtors, filed a complaint alleging that Defendants improperly classified them as independent contractors and failed to pay them minimum wages and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for summary judgment on Defendants' liability under the FLSA and on Defendants' affirmative defenses that Plaintiffs were independent contractors and that the outside sales exemption applied. Defendants filed a motion for summary judgment on the applicability of the outside sales exemption. The Court denied both motions, finding that genuine issues of material fact precluded summary judgment. Plaintiffs were realtors who worked for Urban Living selling houses. Their title at Urban Living was "home consultant." Id. at *2. Plaintiffs were paid on a commission basis. Defendants disputed that Plaintiffs worked more than 40 hours per week. Additionally, Defendants argued that Plaintiffs were independent contractors and, alternatively, that Plaintiffs were covered by the outside sales exemption. Plaintiffs asserted that they were employees of Defendant. The Court noted that, to determine if a worker qualifies as an employee for purposes of an FLSA claim, the focus is on the economic realities test, including: (i) the degree of control exercised by the alleged employer; (ii) the extent of the relative investments of the worker and the alleged employer; (iii) the degree to which the worker's opportunity for profit or loss is determined by the alleged employer; (iv) the skill and initiative required in performing the job; and (v) the permanency of the relationship. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiffs presented evidence that Defendants exercised substantial control over the manner in which they performed their work and that home consultants invested only $350 per month as a "desk fee." Id. at *5. Defendants presented evidence that home consultants made their own decisions regarding which properties to show customers and that home consultants could represent customers who chose to purchase homes from a seller other than Defendant. The Court held that the evidence presented by the parties raised a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether Plaintiffs were employees of Defendants, or, instead, worked for Defendants as independent contractors. Id. Further, some Plaintiffs presented evidence that they worked more than 40 hours per week; however, Defendants presented evidence that Plaintiffs did not work in excess of 40 hours per week. Id. at *6. The Court determined that the conflicting evidence in the record raised genuine issues of material fact that precluded summary judgment regarding any liability that Defendants might have under the FLSA. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied the motions for summary judgment.

Martinez, et al. v. Citizen's Taxi Dispatch, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 81344 (N.D. Ill. May 26, 2017). Plaintiff, a taxi cab driver, brought a putative collective and class action alleging that Defendant violated the Fair Labor and Standards Act ("FLSA"), the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"), and the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection Act ("IWPCA") for failure to pay overtime wages and for taking unlawful deductions. Plaintiff also brought an unjust enrichment claim stemming from Defendant's requirement that drivers pay work-related expenses. Id. at *1. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint under Rules 12(b)(1) and 12(b)(6). Id. at *2. The Court granted the motion as to the FLSA and the IWPCA claims, but denied the motion as to the IMWL and unjust enrichment claims. As a condition of employment, Defendant required drivers to sign a contract that characterized them as independent contractors. Id. at 2. However, Defendant controlled the way that the drivers performed their jobs by: (i) requiring them to complete a qualification process and random drug testing; (ii) assigning them a set weekly schedule; (iii) denying them authority to refuse or negotiate their route assignments; (iv) disciplining them for not completing scheduled runs; (v) requiring them to pick up and drop off students at precise times; and (vi) fielding client complaints. Id.* at *3. Defendant also required the drivers to rent its vehicles used to fulfill contracts with school districts, and deducted the weekly rental fee from drivers' paychecks. Id. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's FLSA claim pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1) on the grounds that the FLSA did not apply to Defendant because it is not an enterprise engaged in commerce and that the Court therefore lacked subject-matter jurisdiction to consider the claim. Id. at *4. Defendants also moved to dismiss the FLSA claim under Rule 12(b)(6). The Court treated the motion to dismiss as if it were brought solely under Rule 12(b)(6) because the 12(b)(1) motion indirectly challenged the merits of Plaintiff's FLSA claim. The Court granted the motion to dismiss without prejudice as to the FLSA claim because Plaintiff failed to allege facts in his complaint that supported Plaintiff's claim of enterprise coverage. Id. at *16. As to the IWPCA claim, Defendant argued that the claim should be dismissed because Plaintiff did not plead existence of an agreement to pay wages or terms. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the claim because Plaintiff failed to state a claim under the IPWCA. Id. at *18. As to Plaintiff's unjust enrichment claim, the Court denied Defendant's motion, as Defendant's only argument with respect to this claim was that an unjust enrichment claim must stand or fall with the related FLSA claim. Id. at *18. However, because the facts underlying Plaintiff's unjust enrichment claim pertained to the allegation that Defendant unjustly required Plaintiff to pay aspects of its operating expenses, and did not relate to the unpaid overtime allegations relevant to his FLSA claim, the Court denied the motion to dismiss. Accordingly, the Court denied the Defendant's motion in part and granted it in part.

Mervyn, et al. v. Atlas Van Lines,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 60694 (N.D. Ill. April 20, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging breach of contract and violations of the Truth in Leasing Regulations ("TLR") under the Motor Carrier Act ("MCA"). Plaintiff leased his truck and driving services to Defendants. Defendants moved for summary judgment, and the Court granted Defendants' motion in its entirety. Id. at *22. The TLR required that the parties' lease state the amount to be paid by the authorized carrier for equipment and driver's services and that the amount could be expressed as a percentage of gross revenue or by any other method of compensation mutually agreed upon by the parties to the lease. Id. at *2. Plaintiff alleged that Defendants violated the TLR because it failed to disclose in the lease agreements that two separate and different discounts would be applied to determine two separate line haul amounts, one to be charged to the customer, the actual line haul amount, and the other to be used to calculate Plaintiff's compensation. According to Plaintiff, Defendants applied undisclosed additional discounts to its customers, which were not identified in the lease agreements relative to the actual line haul and accessorial service charges upon which his compensation was supposed to be based. Plaintiff alleged breach of the lease based upon the same argument. Id. at *13. Plaintiff claimed additional violations of the TLR and breach of the lease and contended that the lease provided that the truck operators were supposed to receive 100% of the fuel surcharge, but that they received less than the designated 100% because of the application of an undisclosed discount to the fuel surcharge amount. The Court granted summary judgment because the lease agreement stated that any financial entries that Defendants made on payment documents shall be presumed correct and final if Plaintiff did not dispute them within 30 days after distribution. Id. at *11. Plaintiff did not dispute Defendants' entries within 30 days. Accordingly, the Court ruled that, because Plaintiff did not dispute the entries, they were presumed correct, and Plaintiff could not now challenge their accuracy. The Court also rejected Plaintiff's assertion that the 30-day time period was unreasonably short and unenforceable, opining that it was not the Court's role to make contracts or reform them. Id. at *17. Further, the Court opined that, even without the 30-day bar, it would have concluded that Defendants were entitled to summary judgment on all of Plaintiff's claims because the terms of the lease were such that Plaintiff was not paid less than what he was entitled to pursuant to the contract. Accordingly, because Plaintiff's allegations of violations of the TLR were based upon alleged breach of the lease, and the Court found that there was no breach, the Court granted summary judgment in favor of Defendants as to all of Plaintiff's claims.

Miller, et al. v. Centerfold Entertainment Club,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125945 (W.D. Ark. Aug. 9, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of exotic dancers, brought an action under the FLSA and state law alleging that Defendant failed to pay them minimum wages. Plaintiffs claimed that they were improperly classified as independent contractors. After a bench trial, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs were employees entitled to coverage under the FLSA and that Defendant willfully violated the FLSA. Id. at 32. The Court applied the economic realities test and found that all the of factors weighed in favor of a determination that Plaintiffs were employees. Id. at *18. The Court considered the various factors in rendering its decision, including: (i) the degree of control exercised by Defendant; (ii) the relative investments of the Defendant and Plaintiffs; (iii) the degree to which Plaintiffs had an opportunity for profit and loss; (iv) the skill and initiative required of Plaintiffs; (v) the permanency of the work relationship; and (vi) the extent to which the work Plaintiffs performed was integral to Defendant's business. Id. at *11. The Court found that Defendant exercised significant control over Plaintiffs, such that they were not separate economic entities. Id. at *13. Plaintiffs had no authority to hire, fire, discipline, set prices, or create policies, as Defendant retained this authority exclusively. Defendant required Plaintiffs to work a certain amount of nights per week and to adhere to a stage rotation and routine, and Plaintiffs were not allowed to handle money. Id. The Court found that Defendant's authority to discipline Plaintiffs if they danced elsewhere, were absent or tardy, or worked private parties was indicative of Defendant's control. Id. at *14. The Court also noted that Defendant invested considerably more than Plaintiffs did in the operations of the club. Id. at 14-15. Plaintiffs were only responsible for their own costumes and this did not compare to the amount that Defendant expended in operating the club. Id. at 15. The Court found that the club was structured in a way that Plaintiffs would never have the same opportunity to profit as Defendant, as Plaintiffs had no ownership interest. Id. The Court opined that the degree of skill required of Plaintiffs was minimal, since Plaintiffs received no training and Defendant rarely turned down individuals who applied to be dancers. Id. at 16. Because Plaintiffs worked for the club for extended periods of time, the Court found the permanency factor weighed heavily in favor of employee status. Id. at 17-18. The Court also ruled that Plaintiffs were an integral part of the business. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs were employees of the club and Defendant willfully violated the FLSA by failing to pay Plaintiffs any wages or other form of compensation for their work at the club. Id. at *32. The Court rejected Defendants argument that Plaintiffs' claims were barred by the FLSA's statute of limitations. Id. at *22. The Court ruled that Defendant willfully violated the FLSA because it failed to inform Plaintiffs of the minimum wage law and keep any records regarding Plaintiffs' tenure at the club, including the hours that they worked or the amount of money in tips received. Id. at *20-22. As a result, the Court ruled that the statute of limitations period for each Plaintiff was three years, and the Court awarded Plaintiffs back wages for a three-year period. Id. at *25.

Saleem, et al. v. Corporate Transportation Group*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 6305 (2d Cir. April 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers who owned for-hire vehicle franchises, brought a class action against Defendant alleging wage & hour violations under the FLSA and New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of Defendant on the basis that Plaintiffs were independent contractors and not employees under the FLSA and the NYLL. Plaintiffs appealed the District Court's decision as to the FLSA claim. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed, holding that under the economic reality test, Plaintiffs were independent contractors under the FLSA as a matter of law. Id. at *13. The Second Circuit noted that the District Court properly focused on the totality of the circumstances in determining that Plaintiffs were in business for themselves. Id. at *11. The Second Circuit considered several factors in issuing its ruling. First, the franchise agreements classified Plaintiffs as independent contractors and contained provisions indicative of their independence. Id. at *15-16. Likewise, Defendant exercised minimal control over Plaintiffs, as evidenced by Plaintiffs' ability to work for competing companies and to transport personal clients to develop their own businesses. Id. at *16-17. Further, Plaintiffs invested heavily in their own businesses, and Plaintiffs set their own schedules. Id. at *24. The Second Circuit rejected Plaintiffs' arguments that because Defendant provided a dispatch system, negotiated rates with some clients, and engaged in minor monitoring of the drivers, that they were employees. Id. at *31-32. The Second Circuit concluded that when considering the totality of the circumstances, the economic reality was that Plaintiffs were in business for themselves. Accordingly, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling.

Schwann, et al. v. FedEx Ground Package Systems*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 152601 (D. Mass. Sept. 20, 2017). Plaintiff, a delivery driver, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Massachusetts Independent Contractor Law. Plaintiff moved for summary judgment and requested that the Court find, as a matter of law, that he was an employee of Defendant because it could not meet the second or third prongs of the three-pronged test within the Independent Contractor Law. The First Circuit previously found that the second prong was preempted by federal law. Plaintiff filed supplemental briefing suggesting that the first and third prongs of the Independent Contractor Law were ripe for review. The Court, however, concluded that only the third prong of the Independent Contractor Law was ripe for review. As a condition for working for Defendant, Plaintiff signed an "Operating Agreement" ("OA"), which laid out various stipulations that governed the working relationship and classified Plaintiff as an independent contractor. Defendant required Plaintiff to use his own vehicle for pick up, transportation, and delivery services; however, Defendant could dictate the "identifying colors, logos, numbers, marks and insignia" of the vehicles. Id. at *4-5. Moreover, pursuant to the OA, Plaintiff was forbidden from using his vehicle for any other purposes other than the carriage of Defendant's packages while acting in the service of Defendant. Id. at *5. In structuring the means by which he delivered packages within his route, pursuant to the OA, Plaintiff could deliver his assigned packages himself, hire his own workers to make the deliveries, or structure his delivery system somewhere in between the two. Id. at *13. The Court stated that the third prong of § 148B of the statute required the Court to determine whether an individual performing a service "is customarily engaged in an independently established trade, occupation, profession or business of the same nature as that involved in the service performed." Id. at *11. Plaintiff asserted that he generally was not capable of maintaining separate businesses in an individual capacity, and if he did not hire additional drivers, he would otherwise have been compelled to rely upon Defendant to make ends meet. Plaintiff further asserted that it was legally impossible for him to deliver for both Defendant and another carrier because 49 C.F.R. § 395.3(b)(1) limited him to working a maximum of 60 hours on-duty in a seven-day period, and the amount of packages he received from Defendant regularly required him to work all 60 hours each week. Defendant contended that it was common practice for drivers to swap packages among themselves to increase or decrease their package volume. Id. at *22. Plaintiff also argued that he did not maintain an independent trade or business as required under the third prong because Defendant retained the right to audit and monitor his work performance, such as riding along in his vehicle and performing audits where FedEx personnel would follow him as he performed his work. Id. at *26. The Court noted that, while the ability to directly supervise a worker may suggest an employer-employee relationship, especially when coupled with the employer's ability to terminate the worker at will, Defendant submitted declarations that the audits performed via these "ride alongs" were a mere opportunity for managers to field questions, discuss issues that drivers had about servicing their PSAs, and encourage safe driving habits. Id. at *25-26. The Court found that these reasons, at a minimum, suggested a factual dispute regarding the third prong, which prevented it from granting summary judgment as to that prong. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment.

Shaw, et al. v. Set Enterprises,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65540 (S.D. Fla. Mar. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of exotic dancers, brought an action alleging that Defendant unlawfully misclassified them as independent contractors and denied them minimum and overtime pay in violation of the FLSA and the Florida Minimum Wage Act ("FMWA"). Id. at *2. Defendant required all dancers to sign a Dancer Licensing Agreement (the "Agreement"). Id. at *3. Under the Agreement, Plaintiffs were granted a license to "utilize the stage, other entertainment facilities, and the dressing rooms located within the Club for the performance of exotic dance routines." Id. Defendant also provided bartenders, waitresses, hostesses, security staff, music played by DJs, food and liquor services, and advertising and promotions. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs, in turn, agreed to pay mandatory house fees and tip-outs to Defendant's employees and contractors each shift, as set forth in a schedule attached to the Agreement. The Agreement required Plaintiffs to abide by "Entertainer Rules," which prohibited Plaintiffs from engaging in illegal activity, such as illegal drug use, prostitution, and underage drinking. Id. The rules also instructed Plaintiffs not to walk through the clubs wearing "street clothes," chew gum on stage, bring significant others to the clubs, or frequently ask to leave early, arrive late, or miss shifts. Id. at *4-5. The Court had previously certified a collective action consisting of all current and former dancers who worked for Defendant during the three years preceding the filing of the action. Defendants subsequently moved for summary judgment on the grounds that, among other things, Plaintiffs were not employees under the FLSA. Id. at *6. The Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment. The Court found that Defendants exercised significant control over Plaintiffs. The Court opined that Plaintiffs were required to follow rules that regulated their appearance and behavior, to pay escalating house fees based on the time of their arrival, to sign in for shifts, to follow procedures for stage rotations, and charge minimum fees set by Defendants. The Court also noted that Plaintiffs had virtually no control over the customer volume, hours, food and drink, or overall atmosphere at the Clubs. Id. at *10. The Court determined that, although Plaintiffs could choose their shifts, clients, and dances to perform, such discretion was typical for an exotic dancer and did not, without more, establish that dancers were independent agents. The Court further held that the clubs were primarily responsible for drawing customers to the club and set minimum fees for services, and thereby exhibited significant control over Plaintiffs' opportunity for profit. Id. at *12. The Court found that Defendants' investments in the Clubs clearly and substantially outweighed Plaintiffs' investments. Defendants also did not require Plaintiffs to have the kind of special skill that would bring them outside the FLSA's definition of an employee. Defendants did not require prospective dancers to have any formal training or prior experience. Finally, the Court stated that, without dancers, Defendant's Clubs would be ordinary bars, not strip clubs. The Court held that the totality of the circumstances required a finding that Plaintiffs and the collective action members were employees as defined by the FLSA. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion seeking summary judgment on the issue of employee status.

Sill, et al. v. AVSX Technologies, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39293 (D.S.C. Mar. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of home-security system salespeople, filed suit in state court against Defendant alleging violations of the South Carolina Wage Payment Act ("SCWPA") and the FLSA. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs claimed that they suffered damages in the form of loss of benefits and increased taxes due to their misclassification as independent contractors. Id. Plaintiffs also claimed that Defendant violated the SCWPA by failing to pay Plaintiffs all wages due. Defendant removed the action and moved for summary judgment. At a hearing on Defendant's motion, Plaintiffs admitted that they were not entitled to bring a claim for loss of benefits or a tax increases under the FLSA or state law. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court granted summary judgment on those claims. Id. As to Plaintiffs' claims that Defendant unlawfully withheld "holdbacks" and "overrides" under state law, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment, finding that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Plaintiffs were employees entitled to protection under the SCWPA. Id. at *14. From August 2012 through May 2014, Plaintiffs' contract stated that they were independent contractors. Id. at *3. After that period, Plaintiffs' contract stated that Plaintiffs were employees. Prior to November 2013, Plaintiffs' sales supervisor paid Plaintiffs a bonus from his personal checking account and provided Plaintiffs a 1099 miscellaneous income tax form. After the supervisor left the company in November 2013, Plaintiffs took over as sales team leaders and were given additional supervisory responsibilities. The Court ruled that the language of the contract was not dispositive as to whether Plaintiffs were independent contractors from November 2013 until May 2014. The Court also considered the various factors in determining whether an employer- employee relationship existed, including: (i) direct evidence of the right to, or exercise of, control; (ii) method of payment; (iii) furnishing of equipment; and (iv) right to fire. Id. at *11. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs were independent contractors because they set their own schedules, had no dedicated office space, and determined their own clients and geographic boundaries. Id. at *13. Further, the employment contracts stated that they were independent contractors and would pay their own taxes and not receive benefits. Plaintiffs claimed that they were employees because they were given company shirts, identification, vehicles, cell phones, and iPads. Id. at *14. The Court found that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Plaintiffs were employees after November 2013, and it denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to any claims after November 2013. Id. However, the Court granted summary judgment in favor of Defendant as to all claims prior to November 2013 on the grounds that Plaintiffs were independent contractors. Id. at *19.

(xv) Individual Executive Liability In FLSA Collective Actions

Garcia, et al. v. Village Red Restaurant,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 75172 (S.D.N.Y. May 8, 2017). Plaintiff brought a class and a collective action alleging that Defendants Village Red Restaurant Corp., Christine Serafis, and Nicholas Serafis violated the FLSA and New York Labor Law ("NYLL") by failing to pay overtime and minimum wage and violated the NYLL by failing to provide spread-of-hours pay, wage notices, and wage statements. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgement. Plaintiffs asserted that Ms. Serafis was a joint-employer and Defendant contended that Ms. Serafis was not Plaintiffs' employer. The Court granted Defendants' motion and denied Plaintiffs' motion. Ms. Serafis was the president and sole shareholder of Village Red. Plaintiffs were waiters, servers, countermen, hosts, kitchen helpers, and deliverymen during the relevant period. Defendants contended that Ms. Serafis was not Plaintiffs' employer under the FLSA or the NYLL. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs maintained that Village Red, Mr. Serafis, and Ms. Serafis were their employers under the FLSA and the NYLL. The Court found no doubt that Village Red and Mr. Serafis were Plaintiffs' employers, and that Village Red and Mr. Serafis admitted to their employer status. However, Defendants argued that Ms. Serafis was not an employer because she never participated in the operation of the restaurant and was the president and sole shareholder of the corporate entities only for "estate tax purposes." Id. at *8. Defendants asserted that there was no evidence showing that Ms. Serafis controlled the terms of Plaintiffs' employment and that, therefore, she was not Plaintiffs' employer. Plaintiffs argued that Ms. Serafis was their employer because she was the president and sole shareholder of Village Red, and they asserted that Ms. Serafis' consent to Mr. Serafis' management of the restaurant constituted operational control of the restaurant. Id. at *10. The Court found that although a putative employer need not directly control employees to be liable under the FLSA, some "individual involvement" in a company was generally required, and an individual Defendant must exercise at least "operational control" over the employee's employment. Id. at *11. The Court stated that Plaintiffs provided no facts showing that Ms.

Serafis exercised operational authority over the restaurant or indirectly influenced the employees' terms of employment. Id. The Court found that there was no evidence that Ms. Serafis instructed Mr. Serafis how to run the restaurant, influenced the employees' wages, work hours, or conditions, or affected who was hired or fired. The Court opined that Plaintiffs' evidence showed only that Ms. Serafis was the sole shareholder and president of Village Red and that she executed agreements to ensure that Mr. Serafis could continue to operate the restaurant. Id. at *12. The Court held that the evidence that Plaintiffs offered was insufficient to show a dispute of material fact as to whether Ms. Serafis was Plaintiffs' employer. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion for summary judgment and denied Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgement on the issue of whether Ms. Serafis was Plaintiffs' joint employer.

Landaverde, et al. v. Dave Murray Construction & Design, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 146658 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of construction workers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for partial summary judgment, solely with respect to liability. Defendants opposed the motion on the grounds that there were questions of fact that necessitated a jury trial. Defendant Dave Murray was the sole owner of Dave Murray Construction. The Court explained that to be held liable under the FLSA, a person must be an "employer," which § 3(d) of the statute defines broadly as 'any person acting directly or indirectly in the interest of an employer in relation to an employee." Id. at *2. The Second Circuit has instructed that "the determination of whether an employer-employee relationship exists for purposes of the FLSA should be grounded in economic reality rather than technical concepts." Id. The Court noted that in determining the economic reality of an employment relationship, it should consider "whether the alleged employer: (i) had the power to hire and fire the employees; (ii) supervised and controlled employee work schedules or conditions of employment; (iii) determined the rate and method of payment; and (iv) maintained employment records." Id. at *3. The Court noted that it was undisputed that Murray was the sole owner and operator of Dave Murray Construction, and that Murray was responsible for determining Plaintiffs' rate of pay. Since the evidence demonstrates that there were no other individuals who could be responsible for the operational control of Dave Murray Construction, the Court found that there was no genuine issue of material fact with respect to Murray's individual liability. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment as to liability.

Perkins, et al. v. S&E Flag Cars, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41592 (S.D. Ohio Mar. 22, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, alleged that Defendants failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA, the Ohio Minimum Fair Wage Standards Act, and the Ohio Prompt Pay Act. Defendants Ray Braden and Megan Braden filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court denied. The Bradens asserted that they could not be held liable under the FLSA and the Ohio Wage Act because: (i) Plaintiffs failed to allege sufficient facts to pierce Defendant I & B's corporate veil; and (ii) the Bradens were not Plaintiffs' "employer" under the FLSA and the Ohio Wage Act. Id. at *4. The Court noted that the FLSA defines "[e]mployer" to include "any person acting directly or indirectly in the interest of an employer in relation to an employee." Id. at *5. The Court found no merit in the Bradens' veil piercing argument. Given that the FLSA and the Ohio Wage Act hold certain individuals directly liable as employers, the Court stated that Plaintiffs had no need to pursue the Bradens' liability indirectly through an alter ego or veil piercing theory. Id. The Bradens further contended that the complaint contained insufficient allegations for the Court to plausibly infer that the Bradens were Plaintiffs' employer under the FLSA and the Ohio Wage Act. Specifically, the Bradens asserted that there were insufficient allegations for the Court to plausibly infer that the Bradens had control over significant aspects of I & B's day-to-day functions. Plaintiffs alleged that the Bradens were officers of I & B, that the Bradens jointly employed Plaintiffs along with I & B and the other Defendants, and that the Bradens were responsible for I & B's day-to-day operation and management. Id. at *6. The Bradens also suggested that the allegations regarding their day-to-day control over I & B's operation and management are false. The Court, however, stated that it would not weigh conflicting factual assertions when deciding a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). The Court thereby accepted all of Plaintiffs' factual allegations as true, and plausibly inferred that the Bradens were corporate officers of I & B, had operational control over significant aspects of the corporation's day-to-day functions, and thus were Plaintiffs' employer. Id. at *7. The Court opined that Ray Braden's affidavit supported Plaintiffs' allegations and reinforced the its determination. In his affidavit, Ray Braden acknowledged that he assisted his wife, Megan Braden, "in the operation of I & B Flag Cars, Inc.," that he was "responsible for day-to-day operation and management of I & B," and that he was "solely responsible for the engagement of independent contractors who provided driver escort services to I & B." Id. at *7-8. The Court therefore held that Plaintiffs plausibly alleged that the Bradens were their employer. Accordingly, the Court denied the Bradens' motion to dismiss.

(xvi) Issues With Interns, Volunteers, And Students Under The FLSA

Benjamin, et al. v. B & H Education, Inc*., 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 25672 (9th Cir. Dec. 19, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of cosmetology and hair design students, filed a putative collective action pursuant to the FLSA and a class action under Nevada and California state law, alleging that they were employees of the school and, therefore entitled to compensation. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant exploited them for their unpaid labor by: (i) not paying them for their work in salons; (ii) leaving them unsupervised in the salon; and (iii) requiring them to perform services that they already could do as opposed to services that they needed to learn for their licensing exams. The District Court granted summary judgment for Defendant on Plaintiffs' FLSA and state law claims. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed. Id. at *28. The Ninth Circuit held that under the FLSA's economic reality test, Plaintiffs were not employees for purposes of the FLSA even though they alleged that much of their time was spent on menial and unsupervised work. The Ninth Circuit agreed with case law precedents of other federal circuits that a primary-beneficiary analysis applied in the specific context of student workers because the primary-beneficiary test captured the economic realities concept under the FLSA. In ruling that the Plaintiffs were not employees, the Ninth Circuit applied the test's factors, including the extent to which: (i) the intern and the employer clearly understood that there was no expectation of compensation; (ii) the internship provided training that would be similar to that which would be given in an educational environment, including clinical and other hands-on training; (iii) the internship was tied to the intern's formal educational program by integrated course work or the receipt of academic credit; (iv) the internship accommodated the intern's academic commitments by corresponding to the academic calendar; (v) the internship's duration was limited to the period in which the internship provided the intern with beneficial learning; (vi) the intern's work complemented, rather than displaced, the work of paid employees while providing significant educational benefits to the intern; and (vii) the intern and the employer understood that the internship was conducted without entitlement to a paid job at the conclusion of the internship. Id. After weighing these factors, the Ninth Circuit determined that most, if not all the factors weighed in favor of the District Court's finding that Plaintiffs were students, not employees. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit ruled that Plaintiffs were the primary beneficiaries of their own labors because at the end of their training they would be qualified to practice cosmetology. As a result, it affirmed the District Court's decision granting summary judgment in favor of Defendant on Plaintiffs' FLSA claims. Likewise, the Ninth Circuit also held that Plaintiffs were not employees entitled to be paid under Nevada or California law. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision on the state law claims too. Id. at *28.

Dawson, et al. v. National Collegiate Athletic Association,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64082 (N.D. Cal. April 25, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class and collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay minimum wages and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Defendants moved to dismiss on the grounds that student athletes are not covered under either statute and Plaintiff therefore lacked standing to sue. Plaintiff alleged that Defendants NCAA and the PAC-12 were joint employers of student athletes. The Court stated that as a general matter, it is uncontested that liability in the FLSA context is predicated on the existence of an employer-employee relationship. Defendants argued that Plaintiff was not their "employee" under the FLSA. Id. at *6. On this question, the Court referenced a line of case law authority that the "the long tradition of amateurism in college sports, by definition, shows that student athletes – like all amateur athletes – participate in their sports for reasons wholly unrelated to immediate compensation." Id. at *7. Moreover, the Court explained that the U.S. Department of Labor has indicated that student athletes are not employees under the FLSA. Id. at *10. Section 10b24(a) provides that "students who participate in activities generally recognized as extracurricular are generally not considered to be employees within the meaning of the [FLSA]." Id. at *11. The Court also referenced § 10b03(e), which explains that schools may permit or require students to engage in extracurricular activities like "interscholastic athletics," which are "conducted primarily for the benefit of the participants as a part of the educational opportunities provided to the students by the school or institution, are not work of the kind contemplated by [the FLSA] and do not result in an employer-employee relationship between the student and the school." Id. at *12. The Court therefore determined that there was no legal basis for finding student athletes to be "employees" under the FLSA. Id. at *13-14. The Court held that Plaintiff's FLSA claim must be dismissed. Id. at *15. As to Plaintiff's California Labor Code claims, the Court explained that the California legislature amended § 3352 of the Code to exclude athletic participants as employees. Id. at *16. Because Plaintiff's complaint was based on an untenable legal theory, the Court ruled that any amendment would be futile, and accordingly, granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Wang, et al. v. Hearst Corp*., 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 24789 (2d Cir. Dec. 8, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of unpaid interns, brought an action allegation that Defendant failed to compensate them for their work in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Defendant moved for summary judgment, which the District Court granted on the grounds that Defendant properly classified Plaintiffs as interns. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The Second Circuit determined that at issue was whether the unpaid interns were "employees" of Defendant under the seven factor analysis it set out in Glatt v. Fox Searchlight Pictures, Inc., 811 F.3d 528 (2d Cir. 2016). Glatt established various considerations specific to the context of unpaid internships, including: (i) the extent to which the intern and the employer clearly understood that there is no expectation of compensation; (ii) the extent to which the internship provided training that would be similar to that which would be given in an educational environment; (iii) the extent to which the internship was tied to the intern's formal education program by integrated course work or the receipt of academic credit; (iv) the extent to which the internship accommodated the intern's academic commitments by corresponding to the academic calendar; (v) the extent to which the internship's duration was limited to the period in which the internship provided the intern with beneficial learning; (vi) the extent to which the intern's work complemented, rather than displaced, the work of paid employees while providing significant educational benefits to the intern; and (vii) the extent to which the intern and the employer understand that the internship would be conducted without entitlement to a paid job at the conclusion of the internship. Id. at *6-7. The Second Circuit noted that Plaintiffs conceded that the first and seventh factors clearly favored Defendant. Id. at *7. The Second Circuit found that the second factor regarding training was at the heart of the dispute on appeal. Plaintiffs asserted that the District Court misconstrued this factor by broadening the ambit of "training" to include "practical skills." Id. at *8. However, the Second Circuit noted that its instruction in Glatt explained that a key element of the intern relationship was "the expectation of receiving educational or vocational benefits." Id. at *9. The Second Circuit stated that Glatt clearly contemplated that training opportunities offered to the intern include "products of experiences on the job." Id. The Second Circuit opined that Plaintiffs' assumption was that professions, trades, and arts are or should be just like school, but many useful internships are designed to correct that impression. Id. at *9-10. Plaintiffs argued that the District Court "ignored" evidence that Defendant's internships were a poor substitute for classroom learning. Id. at *10. However, the Second Circuit found that the undisputed facts showed the internships did provide beneficial training. The Second Circuit further stated that the closely related fifth Glatt factor (i.e., valuable duration) also favored Defendant because practical skill may entail practice, and an intern gains familiarity with an industry by day to day professional experience. Id. at *11. The Second Circuit found that the third and fourth factors also favored Defendant. Id. at *12-13. The Second Circuit stated that as to the sixth factor, the District Court had found that it favored Plaintiffs because the interns completed some work regularly performed by paid employees. Id. at *14. The Second Circuit reasoned that this factor alone was not dispositive, as an intern may perform complementary tasks and in doing so confer tangible benefits on supervisors. The Second Circuit concluded that as determining status as an "employee" for the purposes of the FLSA is a question of law, a District Court can strike a balance on the totality of the circumstances to rule for one side or the other. Id. The Second Circuit opined that as the District Court recognized, the internships "involved varying amounts of rote work and could have been more ideally structured to maximize their educational potential," but it concluded that these critiques did not give rise to a material factual dispute. Id. at *14-15. Accordingly, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling.

(xvii) Issues With Opt-In Rights In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Hurt, et al. v. Commerce Energy,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 127104 (N.D. Ohio Aug. 10, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed suit claiming that Defendant failed to pay them minimum wage and overtime. Under an agreement that they reached to determine individual damages of opt-ins who joined the case after the Court granted conditional certification, the parties agreed to give collective action members until April 4, 2017, to complete surveys regarding the hours that they had worked during the overtime pay period. Id. at *1. Of the surveys sent out, 71 were received or postmarked after April 4, 2017. Defendant moved to exclude any surveys received or postmarked after April 4, 2017. The Court granted in part Defendant's motion. First, the Court explained that, to determine whether to permit the parties to evaluate these late-received surveys, it must consider: (i) whether good cause existed for the untimeliness; (ii) prejudice to Defendant; (iii) how late the surveys were; (iv) judicial economy; and (v) the remedial purposes of the FLSA. Id. at *3. Balancing these factors, the Court found that the parties could consider any surveys that were received or postmarked one month or less from the deadline of April 4, 2017. Id. at *4. First, the Court noted that nearly all of the late surveys (64 of 71) were late by less than one month. Further, for 31 of the 71 late surveys, Plaintiffs argued that the recipients could have completed their surveys on time because the surveys did not have postmarks, but were received within one week after the deadline. Id. Second, the Court determined that Defendant was unlikely to experience prejudice because there would be no delay to the proceedings as a result, given that the damages calculation process was still on-going and the parties had not yet exchanged damages calculations for any group of individuals. Finally, the Court held that, because Defendant already was aware of the late surveys, it would will not face any "unfair surprise" by having to consider them. Id. The Court also held that judicial economy supported permitting parties to evaluate the 64 surveys that were late by one month or less. Finally, the Court noted that the remedial purpose of the FLSA supported consideration of these 64 late-filed surveys. The Court, therefore, ordered that the parties consider the 64 surveys postmarked or received on or before May 4, 2017, for purposes of calculating individual damages; however, any surveys postmarked or received after May 4, 2017, would be excluded from the parties' consideration of individual damages. Id. at *5.

In Re Chipotle Mexican Grill, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 8996 (10th Cir. Mar. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Id. at *1. Defendant moved for a writ of mandamus, challenging the District Court's joinder of 10,000 opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. The Tenth Circuit denied the petition and ruled that Defendant was not entitled to mandamus on its claims that the District Court improperly analyzed who was similarly-situated for purposes of FLSA. The District Court applied the :spurious standard" that presumptively allowed workers bringing the same claim, and against the same employer, to join the collective action. Id. at *5. This was proper, the District Court ruled, because Plaintiffs may be severed from the collective action later if joinder proved erroneous. Id. The Tenth Circuit disagreed with Defendant's assertion that the District Court lacked discretion to choose between the various approaches to certification under FLSA. Id. at *6. The Tenth Circuit held that the District Court was not prohibited from following the spurious approach it applied, which was consistent with § 216(b). Id. Accordingly, the Tenth Circuit denied Defendant's petition, ruling that Defendant did not have a "clear and indisputable" right on which to base a request for mandamus relief. Id. Accordingly, the Tenth Circuit denied the Defendant's petition, holding that the District Court's order of joinder of the opt-in Plaintiffs was a not a gross abuse of discretion warranting mandamus.

Morse, et al. v. Alpine Access, Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 160138 (N.D.N.Y. Sept. 26, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants violated various provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The Court had previously denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification and allowed limited discovery so that Defendants would have a reasonable opportunity to test Plaintiffs' allegations. Id. at *2. The parties agreed that Defendants would take the depositions of named Plaintiffs and up to five additional opt-in Plaintiffs. Defendants thereafter sent Plaintiff Sandy Morowitz requests for written discovery and a notice of deposition. Morowitz failed to respond to Defendants' discovery requests, and Plaintiffs' counsel advised that Morowitz would not be available for deposition and intended to withdraw from the litigation. Defendants moved to dismiss Morowitz pursuant to Rule 41(b). After analyzing the factors applicable to sanctions under Rule 41(b), the Magistrate Judge recommended that Morowitz be dismissed from the action. Id. at *4. The Magistrate Judge noted that Morowitz's continuing failure to fulfill her discovery obligations prejudiced Defendants in their ability to mount a timely and cost-effective defense and also prejudiced other Plaintiffs in the action. Id. at *5. Given the open-ended nature of her recalcitrance and the likelihood of future delays if Morowitz remained a Plaintiff, the Magistrate Judge concluded that no sanction short of dismissal would be appropriate. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended that Morowitz be dismissed without prejudice.

Roseman, et al. v. Bloomberg L.P.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5201 (S.D.N.Y. April 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of analytics representatives, brought a putative collective action against Defendant alleging that they were entitled to overtime wages pursuant to the FLSA and state labor laws because they were improperly classified as exempt employees. Defendant moved to dismiss several opt-in Plaintiffs pursuant to Rules 37(b) and 41(b), on the basis that they had ceased to communicate and cooperate with their counsel and failed to comply with a previous discovery order. Id. at *5. The Court denied Defendant's motions. The Court declined to entertain the motion pursuant to Rule 37(b) because the grounds sought for dismissal extended beyond the failure to comply with a discovery order; in addition, it noted that the Second Circuit has endorsed the use of Rule 41(b) where opt-in Plaintiffs have failed to communicate with counsel and comply with discovery. Id. at *4-5. In denying Defendant's Rule 41(b) motion, the Court considered five factors, including: (i) the duration of the failure to comply with the Court's order; (ii) whether Plaintiffs were on notice that failure to comply would result in dismissal; (iii) whether Defendant was likely to be prejudiced by further delay; (iv) balancing the Court's interests in managing docket with Plaintiffs' interest in receiving a fair chance to be heard; and (v) whether the judge had adequately considered a sanction less drastic than dismissal. Id. at *5-6. The Court noted that four out of the five factors weighed in favor of dismissal. Id. at *13. However, the Court declined to dismiss because it was not clear that the Plaintiffs were on notice that dismissal would result if they failed to comply with the discovery order. Id. at *14. Therefore, the Court ordered the non-responsive Plaintiffs to respond to Defendant's discovery requests and file affidavits indicating their intent to remain in the litigation or otherwise face dismissal pursuant to Rule 41(b). Id.

Ruder, et al. v. CWL Investments, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 117584 (D. Ariz. July 27, 2017). Plaintiff, an Assistant Store Manager ("ASM), brought a collective action against Defendant to recover unpaid overtime under the FLSA. Plaintiff was also a member of a conditionally-certified FLSA action pending in Illinois seeking to recover unpaid overtime (the "Jimmy John's action"). Defendant was not a party to the Jimmy John's action. The Court in the Jimmy John's action granted a motion for an anti-suit injunction, barring several of the opt-in Plaintiffs in that case, including Plaintiff, from proceeding with FLSA actions against certain Jimmy John franchisees until otherwise instructed by the Court. Id. at *2. Plaintiff did not file a motion for conditional class certification in his case before the anti-suit injunction was issued. Plaintiff subsequently filed a motion for equitable tolling, and requested that the Court toll the statute of limitations for potential opt-in Plaintiffs. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's motion for equitable tolling sought an advisory opinion from the Court and that, regardless, Plaintiff had not shown that equitable tolling is warranted. Id. at *3. In this case, a decision to equitably toll the statute of limitations would have no effect on the named Plaintiff and the other Plaintiffs who have joined the case. Plaintiff argued that a decision not to grant the motion would directly affect the scope of conditional certification and prejudice potential opt-in Plaintiffs. The Court, however, stated that Plaintiff had not filed a motion for conditional class certification, and it was not certain that such a motion would be granted. Id. at *4. Plaintiff contended that case law authorities had routinely granted motions for equitable tolling to avoid prejudice to potential opt-in members in FLSA cases. The Court noted that although this was true, Plaintiff did not cite a single case that considered whether the Court had jurisdiction to grant equitable tolling to protect potential opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. The Court agreed with Defendant that granting equitable tolling for hypothetical opt-in Plaintiffs would constitute an impermissible advisory opinion. Further, the Court determined that in the current circumstances, it was not clear that equitable tolling would ever be necessary, as conditional class certification may never be granted or, even if it was, that no individuals for whom equitable tolling was necessary will ever opt-in. Id. at *5. Moreover, future opt-in Plaintiffs must show the diligence and extraordinary circumstances required to obtain equitable tolling. The Court reasoned that until it knew the identities and circumstances of those potential Plaintiffs, the Court was unable to find that equitable tolling was warranted. Id. at *6.

(xviii) Joint Employer, Employee Status, And Employer Status Issues In FLSA Collective Actions

Carollo, et al. v. Federal Debt Assistance Association, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 156074 (D. Md. Sept. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former salespersons of Defendant Federal Debt Assistance Association ("FDAA"), alleged that Defendants failed to pay all wages owed in violation of the Maryland Wage Payment and Collection Law ("MWPCL") and the FLSA. The Individual Defendants filed a motion to dismiss, asserting that Plaintiffs failed to show that they were "employers" subject to claims under either the MWPCL or the FLSA. The Individual Defendants asserted that Plaintiffs' complaint failed to contain sufficient factual allegations to support a cause of action against them as "employers" under the either the MWPCL or the FLSA. The Court stated that the "economic reality" test guides the employer status analysis under both statutes Id. at *8. In assessing the economic realities of an employment relationship, the Court considered the totality of the circumstances and four conditions, including whether the employer: (i) had the power to hire and fire the employees; (ii) supervised and controlled employee work schedules or conditions of employment; (iii) determined the rate and method of payment; and (iv) maintained employment records. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs named five individual Defendants and provided varying descriptions of their ownership and control over the employment relationships. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants David Piccione, Vincent Piccione, and Robert Pantoulis are "owners and operators of FDAA." Id. During the Plaintiffs' period of employment, Plaintiffs asserted that these three Defendants had the power to hire, fire, or discipline Plaintiffs; "set the rate and method of compensation;" managed Plaintiffs' work duties and schedules; and "maintained or caused to be maintained all employment records relating to Plaintiffs." Id. at *9-10. Additionally, Plaintiffs' allegations detailed multiple occasions on which these three Defendants directly refused to pay wages. Id. at *10. The Court found that Plaintiffs alleged facts regarding the three Defendants' ownership and control that addressed each of the factors of the economic realities test. The Court found that Plaintiffs made a plausible claim that Defendants Piccione, Piccione, and Pantoulis were "employers" subject to suit under both the MWPCL and the FLSA. Id. at *11. Plaintiffs identified Defendant Nicholas Pantoulis as an "owner and operator" of FDAA, but asserted no facts regarding his control over Plaintiffs' employment. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant Anne Marie Diaz, FDAA's CFO, refused to pay their wages upon request, but did not allege any facts regarding Diaz's control over hiring, firing, work schedules, or employment records. Id. Accordingly, without an alleged ownership interest or control over the employment relationship beyond the payment of wages, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to make out a plausible claim that either Nicholas Pantoulis or Diaz were "employers" subject to suit under either the MWPCL or the FLSA. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss with respect to Defendants David Piccione, Vincent Piccione, and Robert Pantoulis and granted it with respect to Defendants Diaz and Nicholas Pantoulis.

Nicks, et al. v. Koch Foods Co., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73324 (N.D. Ill. May 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of chicken catchers, filed a collective action pursuant to the FLSA alleging overtime and minimum wage violations. Id. at *18. Defendants moved to dismiss on several grounds. First, Defendants moved to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(3) for improper venue and, in the alternative, requested transfer to the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 1404 or 1406. Id. at *2. Second, Defendants moved to dismiss claims against the Alabama, Tennessee, and Georgia Defendants pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) on the ground that those Defendants did not exercise any control over Plaintiffs and did not qualify as Plaintiffs' employer or joint employer under the FLSA. Id. Third, Defendants moved to dismiss all claims against the Alabama, Tennessee, and Georgia Defendants pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1) for lack of standing. Id. The Court denied Defendants' motion in its entirety. Id. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to allege facts that established that a substantial part of the events giving rise to their claims occurred in Illinois because the case involved chicken catching crews working on farms located outside of Illinois and Plaintiffs were paid by entities located outside of Illinois. The Court determined that venue was proper in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois because Plaintiffs alleged that a substantial portion of the activities giving rise to their FLSA claims occurred in the Northern District of Illinois where Defendants allegedly operated and organized their scheme to control their labor force in a uniform manner. Id. at *20. In rendering its decision, the Court reasoned that the test is not whether the majority of activities pertaining to the case were performed in a particular district, but whether a substantial portion of the activities giving rise to the claim occurred in a particular district. Plaintiffs raised a reasonable inference that a substantial portion of the activities giving rise to the claim occurred in Illinois because they alleged that Defendants' COO and CEO were based in Illinois. Id. at *21. Although the Court noted that venue also would be proper in the Southern District of Mississippi because the live-haul crews worked in Mississippi and were paid in Mississippi, after considering both the public and the private interest factors, the Court decided that transfer did not serve the convenience of the parties and witnesses and promote the interests of justice. Id. at *25. The Court, accordingly, denied Defendants' motion to transfer venue. Id. at *38. Defendants also argued that the Court should dismiss Plaintiffs' claims against the Alabama, Tennessee, and Georgia Defendants pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) because Plaintiffs failed to allege that those Defendants exercised any control over Plaintiffs, and they did not qualify under the FLSA as Plaintiffs' employer or joint employer. Id. at *38. Plaintiffs asserted that because Defendants were one company with sham subsidiaries, each entity was subject to alter ego liability and that Plaintiffs' work benefitted all Defendants as joint employers. As a result, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs sufficiently alleged alter ego liability. Id. at *44. Under Illinois law, to establish alter ego liability: (i) there must be such unity of interest and ownership that the separate personalities of the corporation and the individual no longer exist; and (ii) circumstances must be such that adherence to the fiction of separate corporate existence would sanction fraud or promote injustice. Id. at *39. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants utilized a fictional corporate structure with multiple subsidiaries to limit their liability. The Court ruled that allowing Defendants to use a fictional corporate structure to avoid compensating employees fairly under the FLSA would promote injustice, and therefore Plaintiffs satisfied both prongs of the alter ego test. Id. at *46. Lastly, Defendants argued that Plaintiffs lacked standing to assert claims against the Alabama, Tennessee, and Georgia Defendants because Plaintiffs did not work in those states and suffered no injuries in those states. The Court held that because Plaintiffs sufficiently alleged that Defendants operated as a single, integrated entity, Plaintiffs had standing to bring suit against the multiple Defendants that formed the single entity. Id. at *50. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss in its entirety.

Parrott, et al. v. Marriott International, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144277 (E.D. Mich. Sept. 6, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of food managers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt employees and thereby failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6), contending that because the hotels in which Plaintiffs worked were franchised by various companies, it was not Plaintiffs' joint employer. Id. at *2. The Court denied Defendant's motion. The Court first explained that the focus in joint employment cases has been on whether Plaintiffs' alleged joint employer: (i) had the power to hire and fire employees; (ii) supervised and controlled employee work schedules or conditions of employment; (iii) determined the rate and method of payment; and (iv) maintained employment records. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant: (i) treated Plaintiffs like employees by giving all food managers discount room rates at hotels worldwide; (ii) exercised "a substantial degree of supervision over the work of food managers;" (iii) controlled operations through "corporate managers and auditors who review and compel compliance with corporate directives;" (iv) supervised and controlled work schedules for food managers; (v) controlled working conditions by requiring franchises to comply with "workplace rules" and standards by which food and beverage services are to be rendered; (vi) maintained employment records; and (vii) imposed standardized procedures for hiring food managers. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant maintained the ability to end franchise agreements and thereby terminate Food Managers' employment. The Court held that Plaintiffs' allegations pointed directly toward Defendant's personal supervision and employment of Plaintiffs, making Plaintiffs' allegations of Defendant's joint employment sufficient to state a claim. Id. at *9. Accordingly, drawing all reasonable references in Plaintiffs' favor, the Court found they alleged enough facts to support their joint employer theory. The facts alleged suggested that Defendant acted either directly or indirectly in its interest in relation to Plaintiffs, as per the FLSA. Id. at *10. Further, the Court held that the facts alleged suggested that Defendant, through the standards and policies it allegedly imposed upon Plaintiffs, maintained a level of control that could ultimately translate into a joint employment arrangement. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Pope, et al. v. Espeseth Inc.,* 228 F. Supp. 3d 884 (W.D. Wis. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of window cleaners, filed a collective action alleging that their former employers paid them using a commission-based method of compensation that failed to pay them minimum wage and overtime pay, in violation of the FLSA and Wisconsin wage & hour laws. Plaintiffs named as Defendants Espeseth, Inc., a franchisee of Defendant Fish Window Cleaning Services, Inc., and Anthony Espeseth, the franchisee's owner. Plaintiffs alleged that Espeseth, Inc. and Fish were joint employers. Id. at 886. Fish moved for summary judgment, arguing that that it was not Plaintiffs' employer under the FLSA or Wisconsin wage & hour laws. The Court granted Fish's summary judgment motion and dismissed Fish from the case. Espeseth entered into a franchise agreement with Fish in 2004 to open a window cleaning business under the "Fish Window Cleaning" name. Id. at 887. The franchise agreement governing the relationship between Espeseth and Fish stated that Espeseth, as a franchisee, is "an independent business . . . solely responsible for control and management . . . including such matters as hiring and discharging [its] employees" and that Fish, as the franchisor, had "no power, responsibility or liability in respect to employee relations issues including hiring, discharge and discipline, and related matters." Id. at 888. The franchise agreement made clear that "no employee of [Espeseth] will be deemed to be an employee of [Fish] for any purpose whatsoever" and that Espeseth must "set and pay wages, commissions and incentives with no liability on" Fish. Id. at *8. Fish required Espeseth, as a new franchisee, to review training materials including a proposed, but not required, compensation system for paying window cleaners. Id. Espeseth adopted Fish's recommended compensation method with some modifications. Throughout their employment, Plaintiffs received paychecks and tax forms issued by "Espeseth, Inc., d/b/a Fish Window Cleaning." Id. at 889. Fish did not retain any employment records concerning Plaintiffs. At the outset, the Court stated that the FLSA defines an employer as "any person acting directly or indirectly in the interest of an employer in relation to an employee."

Id. Plaintiffs contended that Fish supervised and controlled Espeseth's employee work schedules via the employment manual and training materials. Fish asserted that Espeseth did not have to follow the manual as drafted by Fish, and that Espeseth was free to adapt the manual as he wished. Id. at 890. The Court determined that the record demonstrated that Fish's policies were only recommended, not required. The Court held that a recommendation regarding the method of employee compensation does not, on its own, amount to control over employees' working conditions. Id. at 891. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to adduced evidence that, if presented to a jury, would allow the jury to make a reasoned finding that Fish exercised control over Plaintiffs' working conditions. Id. The Court further ruled that Plaintiffs failed to show that Fish was their employer under the language of the Wisconsin statutes, which required at least as much of a showing of control as the FLSA. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant Fish's motion for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' claims under the FLSA and Wisconsin wage & hour laws and dismissed him from the lawsuit.

Salazar, et al. v. McDonald's Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34886 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 10, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant crew members at McDonald's franchisees, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants – both the franchisees and McDonald's Corp., the franchisor ("McDonald's") – failed to pay them wages for all hours worked and denied them overtime wages in violation of the California Labor Code. Previously, McDonald's had moved for summary judgment on the ground that it did not jointly employ Plaintiffs. The Court granted the motion in part, but allowed Plaintiffs to proceed with their claims against McDonald's under an ostensible agency theory. McDonald's argued that ostensible agency was not a viable predicate on which to impute liability for Plaintiffs' Labor Code claims. On this basis, McDonald's moved for summary judgment a second time. The Court granted Defendant's motion. Id. at *2-3. The Court stated that case law authorities under the Labor Code define the term "employ" with three alternative definitions, including: "(a) to exercise control over the wages, hours or working conditions, or (b) to suffer or permit to work, or (c) to engage, thereby creating a common law employment relationship." Id. at *3. The prior order considered McDonald's status under all three tests and determined that McDonald's was not an "employer" under any applicable test. Id. The Court had previously considered and rejected the argument that the franchise agreement between McDonald's and Haynes, the franchise owner of the restaurants, established a generic right to control the terms and conditions of Plaintiffs' employment. Id. at *3-4. Nevertheless, the Court stated that that, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, a jury could reasonably find McDonald's to be a joint employer by virtue of an ostensible agency relationship. McDonald's argued that it could not be held liable for violations of the California Labor Code because it did not fall within the statutory definition of an "employer." Id. at *4. For purposes of Labor Code violations, the California Industrial Welfare Commission's ("IWC") wage orders "define the employment relationship, and thus who may be liable." Id. Plaintiffs argued that the IWC permitted a finding of liability for Labor Code violations under an ostensible agency theory because it includes the phrase "through an agent." Id. at *6. The Court opined that when read in context, however, that phrase was explicitly limited. The Court noted that the IWC restricted the definition of an "employer" to one who, through an agent, "employs or exercises control over" the workplace environment. Id. at *7. The Court found that because Plaintiffs' interpretation would render this added limitation meaningless, it must be rejected. The Court held that the IWC's decision to limit the scope of agency liability in the context of the Labor Code must be credited. Id. The Court stated that to ignore the IWC's decision to limit the definition of "employer" to those who, through an agent, control workplace conditions would be to rewrite the law. Id. at *10. Moreover, the Court determined that the factual predicate of Plaintiffs' policy argument was that McDonald's could remedy the alleged Labor Code violations, but that argument was previously rejected. Id. at *11. The Court concluded that in light of the plain language of the IWC and relevant principles of statutory interpretation, Plaintiffs' efforts to impose liability on McDonald's for Labor Code violations based on ostensible agency principles must be rejected. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Salinas, et al. v. Commercial Interiors, Inc.,* 848 F.3d 125 (4th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of drywall installers, filed suit against Defendants alleging violations of the FLSA and Maryland law. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant Commercial Interiors, Inc. ("Commercial"), a general contractor, and Defendant J.I. General Contractors, Inc. ("J.I."), a sub-contractor, jointly employed Plaintiffs. Therefore, Plaintiffs alleged that the hours that they worked for both Defendants should be aggregated for purposes of determining compliance with the FLSA and Maryland law. The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of Defendant Commercial, holding that Commercial did not jointly employ the Plaintiffs because the relationship between Defendants was a traditional relationship between a contractor and a sub-contractor and Defendants did not intend to avoid compliance with the FLSA or Maryland law. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Fourth Circuit reversed the District Court's decision. The Fourth Circuit remarked that the legitimacy of a business relationship between putative joint employers and their good faith were not dispositive of whether the entities were joint employers for purposes of the FLSA. The Fourth Circuit reasoned that, because the FLSA is "remedial and humanitarian in purpose, it should be broadly interpreted and applied to effectuate its goals." Id. at 140. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit adopted a new two-factor test for determining whether joint employment exists. The Fourth Circuit emphasized that the relationship between the putative joint employers was critical to determining if joint employment existed and that the ultimate determination of joint employment must be based upon all of the facts of a case. The first factor to consider was whether the entities agreed to share responsibility for the essential terms and conditions of a worker's employment. The Fourth Circuit determined that both Defendants shared responsibility for the terms and conditions of Plaintiffs' employment. In reaching its conclusion, the Fourth Circuit considered that Defendant Commercial actively supervised Plaintiffs daily, provided feedback on their work, and often directed Plaintiffs to supplement their work. Defendant Commercial communicated problems to Defendant J.I.'s supervisors who then translated the information to Plaintiffs. Further, nearly all of Plaintiffs' work was on Defendant Commercial's jobsites, and Commercial provided the tools, materials, and equipment necessary for the work. Commercial communicated its staffing needs to J.I. and then J.I. assigned Plaintiffs to specific jobs. Plaintiffs and J.I.'s supervisors wore equipment and clothing with Commercial's logo while working on Commercial jobsites. Further, J.I.'s supervisors instructed Plaintiffs to tell others that they worked for Commercial. Further, the Fourth Circuit opined that the second factor to be considered was whether the combined influence of the entities over the terms and conditions of the worker's employment rendered the worker an employee and not an independent contractor. The Fourth Circuit found, based upon the undisputed facts, that Plaintiffs were employees and not independent contractors. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit ruled that Defendant Commercial jointly employed Plaintiffs for purposes of the FLSA and Maryland law. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit reversed the District Court's decision.

Sutton, et al. v. Community Health Systems,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 133712 (W.D. Tenn. Aug. 22, 2017). Plaintiff, a paramedic, brought an action on behalf of himself and others similarly-situated, under the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA") against several Defendants alleging minimum wage and overtime violations. Id. at *3. Four Defendants brought a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) on the basis that they were not Plaintiff's employers for purposes of the FLSA. Plaintiff asserted that they were all joint employers. Id. at *4. The Court granted the motion in part and denied it in part. Id. at *19. The Court dismissed Dysenburg Ambulatory and Community Health Systems, Inc. ("CHSI") from the suit, but denied the motion as to CHSPSC and Knoxville HMA. At the outset, the Court noted that the Sixth Circuit has not formulated a specific test for a joint employment relationship in the context of the FLSA. Id. at *8. The Court evaluated joint employment status under the FLSA using three factors from Sixth Circuit labor cases, including: (i) an entity's authority to hire, fire, and discipline; (ii) control of payment; and (iii) supervision of employees. Id. at *12. The Court ruled that Plaintiff's complaint satisfied the factors as to CHSPSC and Knoxville HMA and denied their motions to dismiss. The complaint alleged that Defendants CHSPSC and Knoxville HMA, had the power to hire and fire Plaintiff and supervised Plaintiff by indicating the work assignments to complete and the manner and time in which the work should be performed. Id. at *14. Furthermore, Plaintiff alleged that Defendants controlled the method and rate of pay as well as the number of hours that Plaintiff worked. Id. As to CHSI, because Plaintiff's complaint contained no specific allegations alleging that it was a joint employer, the Court granted the motion to dismiss. Id. at *17. As to Dyersburg Ambulatory, the Court granted its motion to dismiss because it did not exist as a legally incorporated entity. Id. at *19.

Williams, et al. v. Spartan Technologies,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 115838 (S.D. Miss. July 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a cable technician, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime and minimum wage requirements of the FLSA. Defendant contracted with Intec Communications, a cable provider, to provide cable installation and repair services for its Mississippi customers. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant hired him to perform these services and that he was "jointly employed" by Defendant and Intec. Id. at *1. Intec asserted that the complaint failed to allege an employer-employee relationship between Plaintiff and Intec, and it filed a motion dismiss for failure to state a claim, or alternatively, for a more definite statement. Plaintiff sought leave to amend the complaint by adding more detailed facts. Plaintiff's allegations indicated that Intec supervised him, determined his pay rate, and was responsible for maintaining his employment records. Plaintiff asserted that: (i) Intec monitored and critiqued the work of Plaintiff and other similarly-situated employees; (ii) a manager for Intec supervised Plaintiff's work and the work of other cable technicians; (iii) Plaintiff and other similarly-situated cable technicians needed permission from Intec in order to take time off from work; and (iv) Plaintiff and other similarly-situated cable technicians also had to call Intec after completing their last scheduled job for the day to determine if there were any additional jobs that needed to be performed that day. Id. at *4-5. Taken as a whole, the Court found that Plaintiff's allegations posited that Intec was a joint employer with Defendant. Accordingly, the Court denied Intec's motion to dismiss.

Valencia, et al. v. North Star Gas, LTD,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74721 (S.D. Cal. May 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employee, filed a putative class and collective action against Defendants North Star Gas and Peoplease LLC alleging violations of the FLSA and California state law. Plaintiffs allege that Peoplease was "Plaintiffs' co-employer responsible for paying wages, payroll, and employment law compliance," and that Peoplease worked "with North Star to administer human resource services." Id. at *2. Defendants employed Plaintiffs and others to transport propane by driving various routes to and from Defendants' propane supply. Plaintiffs' core contention was that although employees often worked well in excess of eight hours per day and 40 hours per week, due to the length of time necessary to transport propane along certain routes, Defendants failed to pay Plaintiffs any overtime compensation. Id. .at *3. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendants did not adequately compensate drivers for non-productive time and did not provide adequate wage statements. Peoplease filed motion to dismiss, asserting that it was not in an employment relationship with Plaintiffs and thus could not be held liable for violations of the California Labor Code or the FLSA. The Court found that Plaintiffs had not alleged any facts showing that Peoplease had the power or authority to negotiate and set their rates of pay, beyond the mere responsibility to provide Plaintiffs with payment. Id. at *6. Further, the Court stated that Plaintiffs had not alleged any facts showing that Peoplease suffered or permitted them to work. Finally, the Court determined Plaintiffs have not alleged any facts showing that Peoplease created a common law employment relationship with Plaintiffs. Id. at *8. The Court explained that while Plaintiffs' burden at the pleading stage was light, Plaintiffs' allegations did not give rise to a plausible inference that Peoplease had the power to hire and fire Plaintiffs, that Peoplease supervised and controlled Plaintiffs' work schedules or conditions of employment, that Peoplease determined the rate and method of payment, or that Peoplease maintained employment records. Id. at *14. Therefore, the Court found that the totality of the circumstances did not suggest that Peoplease was a joint employer of Plaintiffs in "economic reality." Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Peoplease's motion to dismiss.

(xix) Liquidated Damages In FLSA Collective Actions

Rojas, et al. v. Splendor Landscape Designs Ltd.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 119882 (E.D.N.Y. July 31, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former employees, brought an action asserting that Defendants violated various provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") formally advised Defendants that it had initiated an investigation (the "DOL Investigation") into Defendants' pay practices for the period of 2012 through 2015. Id. at *2. The DOL Investigation concluded that all of Defendants' employees were paid straight time for all hours worked, including those worked over 40 in a workweek. During his deposition, Defendant Hirsch, owner of Defendant Splendor, confirmed that Defendants paid employees at their regular rate of pay for all hours worked and did not pay employees overtime wages for hours worked in excess of 40 in a given week. Id. The DOL Investigation further concluded that Splendor falsified its time and payroll records to make it appear as if employees were paid overtime wages. Plaintiffs moved for partial summary judgment, solely with respect to liability. Defendants opposed the motion on the grounds that there were alleged questions of fact concerning Plaintiffs' credibility. The Court noted that there was no question that Defendants violated the FLSA and the NYLL by failing to pay Plaintiffs overtime compensation for hours worked in excess of 40 per workweek. Id. at *4. Accordingly, the Court found there was no genuine issue of material fact concerning Plaintiffs' claims for failure to pay overtime wages under both the FLSA and the NYLL and granted summary judgment for those claims. The Court further stated that it was undisputed that Defendant Hirsch was the sole owner and operator of Splendor. Since the evidence demonstrated that there were no other individuals who could possibly be responsible for the operational control of Splendor – and since Defendants did not oppose the motion with respect to this claim – the Court found that there was no genuine issue of material fact with respect to Defendant Hirsch's individual liability. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment as to that claim. The Court also determined that it was undisputed that Defendants had been the subject of a DOL investigation on two separate occasions and were found to have violated the FLSA by failing to pay overtime wages. Id. at *7. Hence, the Court ruled that there was no genuine issue of fact here with respect to Defendants' willfulness. The Court also granted Plaintiffs' motion for partial summary judgment with respect to Defendants' willfulness and extended the statute of limitations for the FLSA claims from two years to three. Id. at *8. The Court further held that Plaintiffs were entitled to summary judgment on their liquidated damages claim. Defendants were unable to demonstrate that they acted in good faith to overcome the presumption of liquidated damages based on the fact that they were the subject of a prior DOL investigation, in which they were advised of their violation of the FLSA and directed to pay back wages. Accordingly, the Court found that there was no genuine issue of material fact with respect to Plaintiffs' claim for liquidated damages and granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment is granted with respect to that claim as well.

(xx) Mootness In FLSA Collective Actions

Sanchez, et al. v. Burgers & Cupcakes LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38292 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant workers, brought a putative collective and class action alleging that Defendant violated the overtime and minimum wage requirements of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Defendant made a Rule 68 offer of judgment to the four remaining Plaintiffs in the case to settle all claims against it for $19,200. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs accepted the offer, and submitted notice to the Court regarding the decision to accept Defendant's offer. Id. The Court then solicited the U.S. Department of Labor's ("DOL") view on the application of Rule 68 to putative collective action claims under the FLSA. Id. at *3. The Court opined that ordinarily, FLSA claims only may be settled with the approval of the DOL or after a fairness determination by the Court. The Court noted that FLSA claimants are no more able to "accept" a settlement offer via Rule 68 than they are validly to accept an offer of a private settlement pursuant to Rule 41. Id. at *4. The Court reasoned that the FLSA is a uniquely protective statute intended to "extend the frontiers of social progress by insuring to all able-bodied working men and women a fair day's pay for a fair day's work." Id. at *5. The Court determined that the Second Circuit case law authority requires judicial oversight of FLSA settlements to protect the possible lopsided relationship between employers and employees and the potential for collusive settlements. The Court thereby held that Plaintiffs did not have authority to compromise their claims without judicial oversight or approval of the DOL. Id. at *6. Additionally, in contractual terms, Plaintiffs lacked capacity to enter into a binding agreement with Defendant that was not conditioned on the Court's approval or approval of the DOL. Therefore, the Court directed the Clerk of Court not to enter judgment in the matter and concluded that the parties could submit their settlement for the Court's approval. Id.

(xxi) Motor Carrier Act Issues In FLSA Collective Actions

Connelly, et al. v. Dan Lepke Trucking LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2027 (W.D. Wis. Jan. 6, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and Wisconsin's prevailing wage law. Id. at *2. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants failed to compensate them for work performed before they loaded their trucks for the first time each day and after they unloaded their trucks for the last time each day, and failed to compensate them for overtime work. Id. at *2-3. The Court previously granted the parties' joint motion for conditional certification of a collective action. Defendants filed a motion for summary judgement asserting that Plaintiffs were exempt from FLSA overtime pay based on the motor carrier exemption, which the Court denied. At the outset, the Court noted that the Motor Carrier Act ("MCA") exempts from the FLSA "employees of a motor carrier if "property is transported by the motor carrier between a place in a State and a place in another State." Id. at *3. Defendants employed Plaintiffs as dump truck drivers between 2012 and 2015. Defendants contended that between 2012 and 2015, Plaintiffs transported hundreds of shipments in interstate commerce. Defendants argued that because Plaintiffs were engaged in interstate commerce, the motor carrier exemption applied. Id. at *5. The Court noted that the parties disputed the locations of several of Plaintiffs' key pick up and delivery points. The Court stated that whether these stops fell within one state or another determined whether certain routes were intrastate or interstate. Id. at *6. For example, drivers picked up river sand from a sand pit across the final stretch of the Mississippi River from Lansing, Iowa. Plaintiffs contended that this pit was in Wisconsin, making the trip intrastate and not interstate. Additionally, drivers delivered materials to a dam on the Mississippi River, which Defendants argued was in Minnesota. However, Plaintiffs disagreed and asserted that the dam was on the Wisconsin side of the Mississippi River. Id. at *7. Drivers also delivered materials to two barges on the Mississippi River. Neither party offered any evidence that identified whether the islands were on the Wisconsin or the Iowa side of the river. Id. at *7-8. Further, drivers delivered sand from pick up points in Wisconsin to a facility in Wisconsin, which was an intrastate trip. However, Defendants contended that the sand shipments were immediately carted off to North Dakota and Texas following drop-off and that, as a result, the entire route was one big interstate shipment. Id. at *8. The Court found that Defendants' motion relied on the contention that Plaintiffs transported shipments in interstate commerce during the relevant time period. The Court determined that Defendants relied on "thousands of shipping documents and other records" to support this contention, but did not offer or cite the documents themselves in the motion for summary judgement. Id. at *12. The record included several reports that allegedly documented Defendants' projects and affiliated travel. However, the Court opined that the reports did not explicitly state where employees traveled for a given assignment; instead, the reports merely logged the job number or delivery locations by name. Id. at *14. The Court held that Defendants did not demonstrate that they were entitled to judgment as a matter of law because the record contained genuine disputes of material fact. Id. at *16. The Court found that the parties debated whether certain trips qualified as interstate travel and Plaintiffs adduced evidence that called into question the nature of their alleged "interstate" trips. Id. at *17. The Court therefore concluded that Defendants failed to provide evidence sufficient to establish that Plaintiffs had a more-than-remote chance of being assigned interstate work during the relevant time period. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion for summary judgement based on motor carrier exemption.

Laura, et al. v. J.D. Parker & Sons Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14829 (M.D. Fla. Feb. 2, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of garbage truck drivers, brought an action alleging that they often worked more than 40 hours in a week but were not paid overtime in violation of the FLSA. Defendant moved for summary judgment and argued that it was exempt under the Motor Carrier Act ("MCA"). Plaintiffs cross-moved for summary judgment on the MCA defense and for partial summary judgment on all elements of their claim except for the number of overtime hours, whether Defendant willfully violated the FLSA, and whether Defendant could prove a good faith defense. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion and denied Defendant's motion. Defendant argued that the MCA exemption exempted it from the overtime provision of the FLSA as a matter of law. Plaintiffs disputed whether the Secretary of Transportation had jurisdiction over Defendant because it is only engaged in local, intrastate commerce. Id. at *4-5. The Court stated that it was undisputed that Plaintiffs did not perform services outside Florida and did not transport goods across state lines. Defendant argued, however, that its intrastate transportation constituted a part of interstate commerce because the garbage was taken to a facility that produced clean, renewable energy through the combustion of municipal solid waste, which was then sold to millions of customers in multiple states. Id. at *5. The Court determined that when the continuity of transit of a product or good between its origin and the ultimate destination ceases or is interrupted, the interstate commerce element is not satisfied. Id. at *6. The Court held that the transformation of the garbage into renewable energy substantially changed the form of the garbage before the energy was sold to and used by any out of state consumers. The Court therefore concluded that Defendant's intrastate transportation of garbage did not constitute a "continuous stream of interstate travel" and therefore was not a part of interstate commerce for purposes of the MCA exemption. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court found that Defendant was not exempt from the FLSA under the MCA and denied its motion for summary judgement and granted Plaintiffs' motion as to the applicability of the exemption. The Court also granted Plaintiffs' motion to the extent that Defendant was covered by the FLSA, Plaintiffs were employees of Defendant under the FLSA, and Plaintiffs were entitled to time and a half of their day rate for any overtime hours they prove they worked.

Mozingo, et al. v. Oil States Energy Services,* LLC, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 165195 (W.D. Pa. Oct. 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, filed an action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the Pennsylvania Minimum Wage Act ("PMWA"). Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, contending that Plaintiffs were subject to the Motor Carrier Act exception. The Court granted the motion. Plaintiffs argued that Pennsylvania's Motor Carrier Act exception applies only to "motor carriers," but not "motor private carriers" because the Pennsylvania General Assembly did not use the same language for its exception as Congress used for the analogous federal exception. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs argued that the General Assembly "intentionally" included "employee of motor carrier" as opposed to its federal counterpart's "any employee" to narrow the exception. Id. The Court noted that the crux of the issue was whether the PMWA's use of "any employee of a motor carrier" trumped the statute's further description of those employees as both employees of a motor carrier and employees of a motor private carrier. Id. at *5. The Court reasoned that the statute's reference to "employee of a motor carrier" is governed by its specific reference describing those same employees as employees under the control of the U.S. Secretary of Transportation "under 49 U.S.C. § 3102(b)(1) and (2). Id. The Court found that the General Assembly's choice to specifically identify the provisions for both motor carrier and motor private carrier governed its general use of "any employee of a motor carrier." Id. The Court noted that a "cardinal principle of statutory construction" is "a statute ought, upon the whole, to be so construed that, if it can be prevented, no clause, sentence, or word shall be superfluous, void, or insignificant." Id. at *6-7. The Court opined that focusing only on the statute's phrase "any employee of motor carrier" ignored the further description of employees under the control of the U.S. Secretary of Transportation "under 49 U.S.C. § 3102(b)(1) and (2)," which cover both motor carriers and motor private carriers. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court found that Pennsylvania's Motor Carrier Act exception applied as a matter of law to employees of motor carriers and employees of motor private carriers exempting them from coverage under the PMWA. Id. at *7. The Court stated that the federal Motor Carrier exception also exempted the Fair Labor Standards Act based on the U.S. Secretary of Transportation's jurisdiction under § 31502. Id. at *7-8. Since 2008, the federal Motor Carrier exception allows the Fair Labor Standards Act to cover employees employed by a motor carrier or motor private carrier who works in part as a driver and drives vehicles weighing 10,000 pounds or less. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs argued that this same federal carve out – for those who, in part, drive vehicles weighing less than 10,000 pounds – applied to Pennsylvania's Motor Carrier Exception, meaning that the PMWA applied to Plaintiffs. The Court disagreed and determined that Pennsylvania's Motor Carrier Act exception unambiguously exempts employees under the control of the U.S. Secretary of Transportation as described in § 31502, and it refused to rewrite unambiguous Pennsylvania law to match federal law. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Schilling, et al. v. Schmidt Baking Co*., 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 23257 (4th Cir. Nov. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of sales managers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the Maryland Wage Payment & Collection Law ("MWPCL"). Defendants filed a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6), contending that Plaintiffs were exempt from the FLSA due to the Motor Carrier Act exemption ("MCA"). The District Court granted the motion, and on appeal, the Fourth Circuit reversed and remanded. Plaintiffs were non-exempt salaried employees and frequently worked more than 40 hours in a given week, and were not paid overtime wages for hours worked in excess of 40 hours per week. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs were often expected to deliver items in trucks weighing over 10,000 pounds to grocery stores. Because of the quantity of deliveries and the limited number of drivers, Plaintiffs spent between 65% and 85% of their time each week making deliveries. The type of vehicles Plaintiffs used to make the deliveries varied according to the delivery requirements of a given day, but Plaintiffs used their personal vehicles for between 70% and 90% of the deliveries they made. Each Plaintiffs' personal vehicles weighed less than 10,000 pounds. Id. at *3. The Fourth Circuit first explained that the MCA was amended by the SAFETEALU Technical Corrections Act of 2008 ("TCA"), which, in relevant part, defined a "covered employee" as "an individual:" (i) who is employed by a motor carrier or motor private carrier; (ii) whose work, in whole or in part, is defined, as that of a driver, driver's helper, loader, or mechanic, and affecting the safety of operation of motor vehicles weighing 10,000 pounds or less in transportation on public highways in interstate or foreign commerce; and (iii) who performs duties on motor vehicles weighing 10,000 pounds or less. Id. at *6-7. The Fourth Circuit found the central issue on appeal was whether Plaintiffs were "covered employees" under the TCA, thereby entitling them to overtime compensation under the FLSA. Id. at *7. Defendant argued that because Plaintiffs worked on a mixed fleet, or a fleet consisting of vehicles weighing both more and less than 10,000 pounds, Plaintiffs were subject to the MCA exemption, and therefore were not entitled to overtime compensation. Id. Plaintiffs contended that they qualified for the TCA exception to the MCA exemption because a "covered employee" is an employee who drives small vehicles "in whole or in part," and because Plaintiffs spent 70% to 90% of the time they spent making deliveries driving small vehicles. Id. at *8. The Fourth Circuit agreed with Plaintiffs. The Fourth Circuit stated that the text of the TCA plainly provides that employees working on mixed fleet vehicles are covered by the TCA exception. Id. at *9. Section 306 of the TCA expressly amended the FLSA by providing that overtime compensation would be available to "covered employees" even when the MCA exemption ordinarily would exempt those employees from the FLSA's overtime requirements. Id. at *9-10. The Fourth Circuit further opined that the structure of the TCA exception makes clear that an employee need only work on smaller vehicles "in part" to qualify for overtime compensation, thereby placing drivers of mixed fleets within the FLSA's requirements. The Fourth Circuit found that Plaintiffs easily satisfied the requirements of § 306(c)(2), as they spent the majority of their working hours making deliveries, between 70% and 90% of their delivery trips were made on vehicles indisputably weighing less than 10,000 pounds, the delivery routes included interstate trips on public highways, and none of the vehicles were designed to transport eight or more passengers or were used to transport hazardous materials. Id. at *12-13. Therefore, the Fourth Circuit held that Plaintiffs were "covered employees" under the FLSA during their employment with Defendant, and it reversed and remanded the District Court's ruling dismissing Plaintiffs' FLSA claims.

Underwood, et al. v. KC Transportation, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 165449 (S.D.W.Va. Oct. 4, 2017). Plaintiff, a truck driver, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified her and others similarly-situated as exempt and thereby failed to pay overtime in violation of the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, which the Court denied. Plaintiff alleged that she often worked more than 60 hours per week and was treated as an exempt employee and not paid overtime compensation. Id. at *3. Plaintiff did not drive across state lines, nor did her job duties incorporate an expectation for her to do so. Defendant argued that the complaint should be dismissed because Plaintiff was exempt from the overtime-pay provisions of the FLSA pursuant to the Motor Carrier Act ("MCA") exemption. The Court noted that the MCA exemption covers employees whose activities "affect safety of operation" and who work for a private motor carrier engaged in interstate commerce. Id. The parties disagreed on whether Plaintiff satisfied the interstate-commerce prong of the analysis and, therefore, whether the exemption applied to her, thereby barring her FLSA claim. Id. The Court stated that if it were to consider the affidavit attached to Defendant's motion to dismiss, it would have to convert it to a motion for summary judgment. Id. Given the early stage of the litigation and the probability that discovery would bring out further relevant information, the Court declined to do so. The Court reasoned that Defendant's argument for dismissal rested on its affirmative defense, and it could only dismiss a complaint for failure to state a claim on an affirmative defense if "facts sufficient to rule on an affirmative defense are alleged in the complaint." Id. at *4. In this case, the complaint specifically alleged that Plaintiff was not covered by the MCA exemption. The Court therefore found that it could not grant Defendant's motion to dismiss at this stage of the proceedings. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion.

(xxii) Pay Policies And Bonuses In FLSA Collective Actions

Adams, et al. v. Nature's Expressions Landscaping Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 176427 (E.D. Ky. Oct. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, which the Court granted in part and denied in part. Defendant paid employees a set rate per day, and Plaintiffs alleged that this compensation scheme violated the FLSA because it did not account for overtime hours. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant assigned each employee a daily wage based on his position and duties, and that each employee was required to work a certain number of hours per day, which was divided into "quarter days." Id. at *3. Defendant then rounded the number of hours worked to the nearest quarter day. The Court previously had granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action for all individuals currently or formerly employed by Defendant who were compensated under the day-rate scheme and who worked in excess of 40 hours during any week throughout the course of their employment. Id. at *4. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment and argued that several opt-in Plaintiffs did not meet the criteria to join the collective action or did not have a viable case. Defendant's motion addressed only opt-in Plaintiffs in four categories, including: (i) persons who never worked for Defendant; (ii) persons who opted-in to the lawsuit after the expiration of the opt-in period; (iii) persons who never worked more than 40 hours in any given week for Defendant; and (iv) persons whose employment agreements stated Defendant's policy of straight time and overtime pay. Id. at *6. As to the first group, the Court noted that William "Chad" Austin signed a consent form without a legible printed name. The Court stated that even if it granted Defendant's motion for judgment on Austin's claim, doing so would have no effect, and allowing Austin to join the collective action would not prejudice Defendant since Austin could file a new lawsuit himself. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion as to Austin's claim. As to the second group, the Court stated that the statute of limitations was not at issue and therefore it denied Defendant's motion as to opt-ins it claimed were untimely. As to the third group, the Court granted Defendant's motion as to the three employees for whom it submitted evidence that they did not ever work overtime. Id. at *17. Finally, as to group four, the Court found Defendant claimed it paid a regular rate for the first eight hours, and an overtime rate for hours in excess of eight each day; as such the Court noted that the FLSA and its regulations expressly permit this arrangement. Id. at *26. Although the Court held that NEL's payment scheme did not amount to a "day rate" or "split day," it determined that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether Plaintiffs in group four received proper overtime. Id. at *27. The Court stated that, if Defendant did, in fact, pay employees a premium for hours worked in excess of eight hours per day, then that amount was not a part of the regular rate calculation and Defendant had already paid time-and-a-half creditable as overtime. Id. at *37. However, if Defendant simply pro-rated daily sums and paid the same rate even for hours worked in excess of eight per day, then the total sum of the employees' weekly paychecks was included in the regular rate determination, the employees were entitled to a higher overtime rate, and Defendant did not comply with the overtime requirements. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion as to group four because a genuine issue of material fact existed as to this claim. The Court thereby granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion.

Blakeley, et al. v. Celadon Trucking Services, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84738 (S.D. Ind. June 2, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of truck drivers, alleged that Defendant violated the Indiana Small Loans Act ("ISLA"), the Indiana Consumer Loan Act ("ICLA"), and the Indiana Wage Assignment Act ("IWAA") by providing advances that constituted loans, including transaction fees in excess of 8%, and by securing agreements for assignments exceeding 30 days. Id. at *6. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs regularly requested and received advances from Defendant for personal use and for costs associated with operating their vehicles, in exchange for one-time service fees ranging from $3.50 to $7.50 for each advance. Defendant typically provided the requested advances to its drivers by either loading the funds onto the drivers' fuel cards or by issuing an "express code" that would allow the drivers to obtain cash at truck stations. Id. at *4-5. When the total amount due to a driver for a particular paycheck did not cover the entire amount already advanced to that driver, the remaining amount was reflected as a reduction on the driver's subsequent paychecks until the entire advanced amount could be accounted for based on the policy. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs asserted that the advances provided by Defendant constitute "loans" that violate the ISLA and the ICLA. The ICLA defines a "loan" to include: (i) a debt created "by the lender's payment of or agreement to pay money to the debtor" or to a third-party on the debtor's behalf; (ii) a debt created "by a credit to an account with the lender upon which the debtor is entitled to draw immediately;" (iii) a debt created "pursuant to a lender credit card or similar arrangement," and (iv) "the forbearance of debt arising from a loan." Id. at *6. The Court found that this statutory definition implied that a debt must be created in order for a loan to exist. Id. at *10. The Court held that the advances constituted early payments of wages either earned or to be earned by Plaintiffs for their services rendered to Defendant. Id. The Court further opined that the reductions reflected on Plaintiffs' paychecks for the advances merely acted as an accounting measure for Celadon to ensure that it is not overpaying Plaintiffs for their services. Id. The Court thereby concluded that the advances paid by Celadon to Plaintiffs constituted early payment of compensation, rather than loans that created debts that Plaintiffs must repay; accordingly, the advances were not subject to either the ISLA or the ICLA. Id. at *12. For these reasons, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' ISLA and ICLA claims. However, after consideration of Plaintiffs' IWAA claims, the Court raised, sua sponte, the following questions for briefing: (i) whether any private right of action exists under § 2 of the IWAA; (ii) if so, whether Plaintiffs suffered any harm from Defendant's possible violations of § 2; (iii) whether any private right of action exists under the Indiana Wage Deduction Act; and (iv) if so, whether Plaintiffs suffered any harm from Defendant's possible violations of the IWWA. Therefore, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment of Plaintiff's IWAA claims.

Brunozzi, et al. v. Cable Communications, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 4997 (9th Cir. Mar. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of cable technicians, filed suit against Defendant alleging that it violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA and Oregon's statutory requirement that an employer pay all wages earned and unpaid after terminating an employee. Plaintiff Brunozzi additionally alleged that Defendant violated Oregon's laws prohibiting discrimination against an employee who engaged in whistleblowing and wage-claim discussions. The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of Defendant. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded. First, the Ninth Circuit held that Defendant's diminishing bonus device in its compensation plan violated the FLSA's overtime provision because it miscalculated the regular hourly rate during weeks when the technicians worked overtime and allowed the employer to pay less during those weeks. The effect of the pay plan was that technicians were paid at a reduced hourly rate during weeks when they worked overtime. The Ninth Circuit reversed on the basis that Defendant's practice – that lowered the hourly rate during statutory overtime hours or weeks when statutory overtime was worked – was prohibited under the FLSA. Id. at *12.

Second, the Ninth Circuit reversed the District Court's decision granting summary judgment in favor of Defendant as to Plaintiffs' claims that Defendant failed to pay all wages earned and unpaid at the time of discharge. Id. at *12. Because the pay plan violated the FLSA, the District Court erred when it ruled that these claims failed. Id. Finally, as to Plaintiff Brunozzi's retaliation claim, the Ninth Circuit held that Brunozzi stated a claim because prior to his termination, he complained to his supervisor that Defendant failed to properly compensate him for overtime. The Ninth Circuit held that based on the text, context, and legislative history of Oregon law, the Oregon legislature intended the term "reported" to mean a report of information to either an external or internal authority, and the District Court erred when it interpreted "reported" in the state statute to include reports only to external authorities. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded the District Court's order. Id. at *25.

Chavez, et al. v. Converse, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 169167 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 11, 2017). Plaintiff, a retail sales employee, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant's policy requiring employees to undergo exit inspections prior to leaving the store led employees to be under-paid in violation of the California Labor Code. The Court had previously granted class certification, and the parties subsequently cross-filed motions for summary judgment. Defendant moved for summary judgment on the basis that the de minimis doctrine applied to Plaintiff's claims. Plaintiff moved for partial summary judgment on the issue that by requiring all class members to undergo exit inspections before leaving the premises, the class members were under Defendant's control and should be paid for that time. The Court granted Defendant's motion, finding that the de minimis doctrine applied to Plaintiff's claims and that Defendant met its burden in proving there was no genuine dispute of material fact as to the durations of the exit inspections being de minimis. The Court therefore denied as moot Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment. Defendant submitted a time and motion study by its expert Robert W. Crandall, which considered 436 exit inspections The Crandall Study found that 95.9% of exit inspections took one minute or less, and 99.5% of exit inspections had a wait time of 2 minutes or less. Id. at *6-7. The average time to complete an exit inspection was 7.2 to 11.2 seconds. Id. at *7. The Court stated that this evidence was sufficient to shift the burden to Plaintiff to show that there was a genuine dispute of material fact that the aggregate amount of time is not de minimis. Id. at *30. The Court noted that in response to Defendant's expert report, Plaintiff submitted a report rebutting the Crandall Study and stating that the average time for exit inspections was 144 seconds, or 2 minutes and 24 seconds. Id. at *29. The Court stated that even taking Plaintiff's expert report as true, it would take five daily exits by class members to exceed the aggregate 10-minute mark required for the time to not be considered de minimis. Id. at *30. The Court found that neither party briefed the issue of how often class members exited the premises during rest and meal breaks. However, based on Plaintiff's declarations submitted in support of his claims, the maximum number of times a class member working a full-time shift would have exited in one day was four times, including two rest breaks, one meal break, and at the end of their shift. Id. at *30-31. Employees working part-time shifts would exit twice, both during a rest break and at the end of their shift. Id. at *31. The Court further stated that of Plaintiff's submitted declarations, only 3 out of 24 class members arguably testified that their exit inspection took greater than one minute with regularity. This Court found that this testimony was insufficient to rebut the Crandall Study's finding that the overwhelming majority of exit inspections took less than one minute. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Darden, et al. v. Southwest Arkansas Development, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74963 (W.D. Ark. May 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of patient-transportation providers, filed a collective action alleging violations of the Fair Labor and Standards Act ("FLSA") and state law. Plaintiffs claimed that they were required to include a one-hour uncompensated lunch break in their daily timesheets, but they were not relieved of their work duties for that time. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs asserted that they were required to monitor their work cell phones during meal breaks and were required to pick up clients if a dispatcher called during their breaks. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs also claimed that Defendant maintained a policy that Plaintiffs remain nearby the clients after delivering them to appointment destinations, and they were restricted geographically in where they could take their breaks. Id. at *13. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant required Plaintiffs to contact clients while off-duty to confirm the next day's appointments. Id. at *6. Defendant moved for summary judgment. At the outset, the Court noted that the Eighth Circuit has adopted the "predominately-for-the-benefit-of-the-employer" standard to determine whether meal periods are compensable under the FLSA. Id. at *9. The Court denied Defendant's motion and ruled that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the lunch breaks were for the benefit of the employer. Id. at *30. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs utilized their breaks in any way that they chose and, if they were unable to take a break, they were required to report the failed opportunity to their supervisor so that they could be compensated. Id. at *5. Defendant admitted that Plaintiffs were required to monitor their cell phones during lunch. The Court opined that the fact that Plaintiffs were required to monitor their cell phones during lunch did not necessarily make that time compensable. Id. at *18. However, it was undisputed that dispatchers called Plaintiffs during lunch, and the unknown frequency of the calls created a genuine issue of material fact. Id. Defendant also maintained that Plaintiffs were not required to discontinue lunch breaks to pick up clients. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs were never instructed to contact clients off-duty; however, any off-duty phone calls were de minimis, and therefore non-compensable. Id. at *5. Defendant offered the results of the U.S. Department of Labor's ("DOL") investigation of Defendant's overtime policies that found no overtime violations to establish that there was no genuine issue of material fact. Id. at 29. The Court found the DOL's documents were non-binding and not helpful for purposes summary judgment because they were significantly redacted. Id.* Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Douglas, et al. v. Xerox Business Services, LLC*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 22967 (9th Cir. Nov. 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of call center employees, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA's minimum wage and overtime provisions by paying above minimum wage for some hours and below minimum wage for other hours. The District Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant's pay system, under which Defendant paid workers variable rates for different tasks, violated the FLSA. Although Defendant made up the difference to workers whose weekly per-hour average pay fell below the minimum wage, Plaintiffs contended that the FLSA barred Defendant from paying below minimum wage for a single hour. Plaintiffs asserted that the FLSA measures compliance on an hour-by-hour basis and does not allow averaging over a longer period. Id. at *4. The Ninth Circuit noted that, although the FLSA states that "every employer shall pay to each of his employees who in any workweek is engaged in commerce . . . not less than" the current federal minimum of $7.25, whether Congress meant this to apply to per-hour pay or average hourly pay was unclear. Id. at *5. The Ninth Circuit held that "Congress' use of the per-workweek measure in the overtime provision but not the minimum-wage provision could be read as exclusive," but "it is equally logical to conclude that inclusion of the per-workweek measure in the overtime provision means that the workweek is an acceptable compliance measure for FLSA provisions worded broadly enough to embrace it." Id. at *6. The Ninth Circuit found the U.S. Department of Labor's interpretation of the FLSA instructive, noting that it stated that "the workweek is the standard period of time over which wages may be averaged to determine whether the employer has paid" workers minimum wage. Id. at *8. The Ninth Circuit further noted that the Second, Fourth, Eighth, and D.C. Circuits have adopted the same standard, and no circuits have disagreed. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit concluded that Defendant's payment plan compensated employees for all hours worked by using a workweek average to arrive at the appropriate wage, and the District Court did not err in granting Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Hall, et al. v. Plastipak Holdings, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80580 (E.D. Mich. May 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of non-exempt employees, allege that Defendant violated the FLSA by failing to pay them sufficiently for those hours worked above the 40-hour weekly threshold. Defendants filed a motion for summary judgement, asserting that Plaintiffs admitted during their deposition testimony that the four requirements to allow the use of the fluctuating workweek method of overtime calculation were satisfied. Defendant also argued that Plaintiffs' allegations that their employer would reduce their vacation pay whenever they worked less than 40 hours per week was belied by Plaintiffs' deposition testimony that it only reduced their bank of vacation pay for time that they had requested to take off. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs contended that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether Defendant's pay practices as implemented actually conformed to the fluctuating workweek overtime calculation method, because Plaintiffs were not paid time-and-a-half for overtime hours, and Plaintiffs had to consume vacation or paid-time off during weeks when they worked less than 40 hours. The Court found that Plaintiffs provided no evidence that Defendant paid less than a 0.5 hourly premium for overtime hours. In fact, the Court stated that the undisputed facts were that Defendant greatly exceeded this premium, because it established an employee's "base rate" for calculating the overtime pay base rate by simply dividing the normal weekly salary by 40 hours rather than the larger, total number of hours worked. Id. at *8-9. Defendants therefore paid 1.0 times the calculated hourly base rate. The Court thus determined, since no genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether Defendant's hourly overtime pay practices satisfied the requirements of the FLSA, summary judgment on this claim must be granted. The Court further found that Plaintiffs did not present any evidence for their contention that Defendant impermissibly deducted their vacation time and otherwise did not dispute that, setting aside overtime, they were paid the same amount every week regardless of the hours worked. Id. at *13. As a result, the Court also granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff's vacation time claim.

Hills, et al. v. Entergy Operations*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 14387 (5th Cir. Aug. 9, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of security shift supervisors, alleged that Defendant misclassified them as exempt employees and thereby denied them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. The District Court entered summary judgment that, assuming that Plaintiffs were misclassified, their regular rate of pay would be calculated pursuant to the fluctuating workweek method for the purpose of determining the back pay owed to them. Id. at *1-2. On appeal, the Fifth Circuit found that the District Court's judgment was premature and reversed the order. The Fifth Circuit reviewed two partial summary judgment rulings of the District Court relating to the calculation of back pay if Plaintiffs were ultimately found misclassified at trial. First, the District Court entered summary judgment that the fluctuating workweek method would apply to calculate Plaintiffs' regular rate of pay for the purpose of determining their proper overtime rate of pay. Id. at *4. Second, the District Court entered summary judgment that any back pay awarded to each Plaintiff would be off-set by the amount of discretionary bonuses each was paid. Id. Even though the case was still pending, since the two remedy-related rulings had the combined effect of reducing below zero the maximum possible recovery of Plaintiffs, the Fifth Circuit permitted the appeal. The District Court dismissed the two Plaintiffs as presenting no justiciable case or controversy and entered final judgment against them. Plaintiffs appealed that final judgment. The District Court stayed proceedings as to the remaining Plaintiffs pending the outcome of the appeal. Plaintiffs requested that the Fifth Circuit reverse the fluctuating-workweek-method and bonus off-set summary judgment orders, reverse the final dismissals as to them, and remand their revived claims to be reinstated in the lawsuit. The Fifth Circuit determined that the District Court focused on Plaintiffs' admission that their weekly schedule was to alternate between 36 hours and 48 hours. Id. at *10. The District Court opined that the bi-weekly alternation was "fluctuating" within the meaning of the fluctuating workweek method, and granted of summary judgment that the method applied. Id. at *11. The Fifth Circuit disagreed and concluded that the interpretation was too literal a conception of "fluctuating." Id. The Fifth Circuit stated that a fluctuating workweek method may be applied only where the employee "clearly understands" that her salary is intended to compensate any unlimited amount of hours she might be expected to work in any given week. Id. The Fifth Circuit stated that Plaintiffs here claimed that they agreed only to a weekly work schedule that alternated between two fixed amounts of hours. Id. This bi-weekly alternating, but fixed, schedule was not necessarily "fluctuating" as that term is used in the fluctuating workweek method. Id. The Fifth Circuit found that due to the disputed record of whether Plaintiffs understood themselves to be receiving overtime compensation, the District Court's ruling was premature. The Fifth Circuit determined that the eventual trier of fact would be entitled to review each parties' evidence and determine whether the fluctuating workweek method applied. The Fifth Circuit stated that since it was reversing the District Court's decision, Plaintiffs' claims were viable once more because their base recoveries may be high enough to withstand the bonus off-sets with a net-positive value. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit reversed the District Court's decision granting summary judgment that the fluctuating workweek method applied as a matter of law.

In Re Amazon.com, Inc., Fulfillment Center FLSA Wage & Hour*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 5622 (6th Cir. Mar. 31, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of workers at on-line retail fulfillment center warehouses, filed wage & hour claims alleging overtime violations of the FLSA and Kentucky Wages and Hour Act ("KWHA"). Plaintiffs were required to go through a theft-prevention security screening that took anywhere from 10 to 30 minutes after they "clocked out" and were not paid overtime for time spent undergoing the security checks. Id. at *2-3. Multiple lawsuits alleging the same claims in different districts were consolidated in the District Court and were stayed pending the decision in U.S. Supreme Court in Integrity Staffing Solutions, Inc. v. Busk, 135 S. Ct. 513 (2014). Id. at *4. In Integrity, the Supreme Court held that a security screening after a worker's shift was not compensable under FLSA because it was neither the "principal activity," nor was it "integral and indispensable" to that activity, pursuant to the Portal-to-Portal Act. Id. at *10. Accordingly, Plaintiffs' withdrew their FLSA claim, but maintained that Integrity did not control their KWHA claims because it was a Portal-to-Portal decision and the KWHA did not have a comparable exclusion. Id. at *4. The District Court rejected Plaintiffs' argument, dismissing the KWHA claims pursuant to Rule 12(c). If reasoned that the Portal-to-Portal Act merely amended the FLSA by clarifying what counted as work. Id. at *5. Furthermore, the District Court ruled that the Kentucky Supreme Court would apply Integrity to the KWHA because it referred to federal law when construing KWHA. Id. at *9. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed. In its ruling, the Sixth Circuit reasoned that the KWHA was considered Kentucky's analogue to the FLSA. Id. Furthermore, because the KWHA differed affirmatively from the FLSA in some parts, it was reasonable to assume if the state legislature had intended to exclude the Portal-to-Portal Act, it would have explicitly stated as such. The Sixth Circuit ruled that absent an express departure from the Portal-to Portal Act, the Kentucky Supreme Court would apply federal law. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision.

Manigo, et al. v. Time Warner Cable*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 184046 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of cable dispatchers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay for meal and rest breaks in violation of California Labor Code. The Court denied class certification. Defendant then filed a motion for summary judgment, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs contended that, although Defendant had specific policies in place allowing breaks, the policies were overridden by a de facto policy discouraging timely meal breaks that caused Plaintiffs to miss meal breaks altogether. Id. at *10. The Court found that Plaintiffs' allegations were insufficient because, to support their argument that Defendant failed to relieve them of work duties, Plaintiffs relied heavily on time records, which reflected that Plaintiffs did not take meal breaks within the first five hours of their respective shifts on certain days. Id. at *11. The Court concluded that the records, without more, were insufficient to create a genuine dispute of material fact because they did not indicate why Plaintiffs took breaks late. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to create a triable issue of material fact as to whether Defendant violated the Labor Code by depriving Plaintiffs of an opportunity to take meal breaks or not compensating them for missed meal periods. Id. at *12. The Court further held that Plaintiffs provided only vague and conclusory testimony asserting missed meal breaks, failed to identity any "specific instance" when they did not receive a chance for a break, and failed to demonstrate that they did not take a meal break and were denied compensation. Id. The Court stated that Plaintiffs "uniformly testified" regarding instructions to comply with break schedules and, despite their contentions of "mixed messages" from supervisors, Plaintiffs failed to sufficiently allege they were specifically told to skip breaks. Id. at *13. The Court concluded that the evidence submitted by Plaintiffs demonstrated that dispatchers frequently made subjective personal decisions about when to take breaks based on their perceptions of coverage rather than their schedules despite the fact that they never had responsibility for determining coverage needs. Id. at *14. As for Plaintiffs' overtime claims, the Court found that, based on the evidence submitted, Plaintiffs failed to identify a single specific instance in which they purportedly performed off-the-clock work during a meal or rest break or missed a meal or rest break altogether for which they were not compensated. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court also granted summary judgment on Plaintiffs' overtime claims. Finally, the Court concluded that the remainder of Plaintiffs' claims were derivative of the meal and rest break claims and, therefore, granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment with respect to the remaining claims. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Milien, et al. v. McClure Properties, LTD,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 50321 (M.D. Fla. April 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former employees, brought an action alleging that Defendants' wage payment practices violated state and federal laws. Defendants owned and operated a commercial tomato farm. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants provided them payroll debit cards through a third-party vendor. Once payments were distributed, Plaintiffs accessed their wages from an automatic teller machine ("ATM"), resulting in the assessment of numerous administrative fees. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs contended that the ATM only dispensed certain denominations of currency, often limiting Plaintiffs to disbursements in specific increments. Id. In addition, due to ATM withdrawal limits, Plaintiffs alleged that to receive the full amount of their wages, they were forced to make several withdrawals, and, in turn, to incur more administrative fees. Id. Plaintiff brought five causes of action, including: (i) violation of Fla. Const. § 24, Art. X for unpaid minimum wages; (ii) violation of the Migrant and Season Agricultural Worker Protection Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 1801; (iii) violation of Fla. Stat. §§ 532.01-532.02; (iv) violation of Electronic Funds Transfer Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1693; and (v) for unjust enrichment. Id. at *2-3. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court granted. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs merely filed a shotgun complaint and that they failed to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Id. at *4. In response, Plaintiffs contended that the complaint was not a shotgun pleading because each cause of action was pled in a separate count and arose from the same factual circumstances. Id. The Court stated that pursuant to Rule 8, a party must state its claims or defenses in numbered paragraphs, each limited as far as practicable to a single set of circumstances. Id. at *5. The Court noted that a complaint is considered a shotgun pleading where "it is virtually impossible to know which allegations of fact are intended to support which claims for relief." Id. The Court held that Plaintiffs' complaint plainly constituted a "proverbial shotgun pleading," as it merely incorporated the preceding paragraphs into each subsequent count, and therefore intermingled its claims. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court stated that Plaintiffs' complaint must be dismissed, and granted Defendants' motion.

Murphy, et al. v. First Student Management LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9624 (N.D. Ohio Jan. 24, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of bus drivers and driver assistants, brought a class action alleging that Defendants' wage payment practices violated state and federal laws. Defendants used an Electronic Vehicle Inspection Records ("EVIR") system to maintain inspection records. Id. at *2. Defendants also used EVIR to calculate time "on-the-clock" by recording when bus drivers and assistants clocked-in and clocked-out of the EVIR program at the beginning and end of their routes. However, the EVIR system did not track the time that drivers and assistants worked before or after they logged-in to the EVIR system, and therefore Defendants did not compensate employees for that time. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants violated both the FLSA and Ohio law by failing to pay them for all hours worked and for failing to pay them for overtime. Id. at *4. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court granted in part. Plaintiffs alleged an FLSA claim for unpaid time at their regular rate of pay. The Court noted that there was a split of authority regarding whether a claim for unpaid straight time during weeks in which an employee worked overtime was cognizable under the FLSA, and the Sixth Circuit had yet to address the issue. Id. at *6. The Court stated that the FLSA does not make illegal a failure to pay straight or gap time wages or the overall compensation anticipated by an employee agreement. Id. at *8-9. In addition, the Court found that the relief afforded employees aggrieved by violations of § 206 or § 207 of the FLSA was limited to "the amount of their unpaid minimum wages, or their unpaid overtime compensation, as the case may be, and in an additional equal amount as liquidated damages." Id. at *9. The Court opined that the statute made no mention of relief in the form of unpaid regular wages for a violation of the maximum hours provision. Id. Stated simply, the Court held that the FLSA provides no avenue for the recovery of straight-time pay. Id. Moreover, the Court determined that, although the regulations provided an interpretation of the overtime and minimum wage requirements, they could not create new causes of action for uncompensated straight-time. Accordingly, the Court held that recovery of gap time was not conferred by the FLSA, regardless of whether overtime work is alleged. Id. at *10. Therefore, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' claim for gap time failed as a matter of law and must be dismissed. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' FLSA gap time claim.

Nance, et al. v. May Trucking Co.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 5463 (9th Cir. Mar. 29, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, alleged that Defendant violated the FLSA and Oregon wage & hour laws by instituting: (i) a policy of not paying job applicants for their time during a mandatory, three-day orientation program; (ii) a pay policy during the first few weeks of employment for entry-level drivers; and (ii) a policy to make deductions from drivers' paychecks for fuel costs from excess engine idling. Id. at *1-2. The District Court certified class claims for the first two policies, but not the third, which the named Plaintiff Freeman then continued to challenge individually. On cross-motions for summary judgment, the District Court granted Defendant's motion on the certified claims. After a one-day bench trial, the District Court awarded $200 in damages to Freedman on his individual claim, refused to impose a statutory penalty for willful withholding of wages, denied reconsideration of its decision on class certification, and entered judgment. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit remanded one claim for the District Court to address and affirmed the dismissal of all other claims. The District Court held that drivers who attended orientation were not "employees" under the FLSA and Oregon law, so Defendant was not required to pay them for attending the orientation. The Ninth Circuit agreed, finding that the orientation was Defendant's method for ascertaining its drivers' training and abilities, and not all participants were hired upon the orientation's completion. Therefore, the Ninth Circuit stated that orientation attendees should not be considered "employees" under the FLSA or Oregon law. Id. at *4 Relevant to the pay plan claims, Defendant required entry-level drivers to ride along with experienced drivers for the first few weeks of their employment. Some of the entry-level drivers' time was spent in the sleeper berth of a moving truck, and the drivers argued they were entitled to compensation for this time. The District Court granted summary judgment to Defendant on the claim. The Ninth Circuit affirmed because the District Court properly relied on the authority of federal and state regulations saying drivers are not entitled to compensation for time they are permitted to sleep in the berths of moving trucks. Id.

The Ninth Circuit, however, found that it was unclear whether the District Court considered Plaintiffs' claim that Defendant paid entry-level drivers less than a minimum wage before April 2011. Id. at *5. The Ninth Circuit therefore vacated the judgment in part and remanded to the District Court. As to the idling claims, Defendant charged drivers extra if their trucks idled less than required limits and made deductions if idling times exceeded the limits. The District Court denied class certification of a claim that this policy violated Oregon laws against wage deductions and denied a motion to reconsider. The Ninth Circuit affirmed these decisions as well, finding that to establish liability, each driver would need to show that any deductions were not for his own benefit, and no evidence contradicted the District Court's finding that drivers sometimes idled trucks for their own benefit. Id. at *6. The Ninth Circuit held the District Court's conclusion – that that if class certification were granted, it "would need to examine why each driver incurred charges for additional idling time" – would defeat Plaintiffs' argument that a common question predominated. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling granting summary judgment in part and remanded to the District Court on the issue of whether Defendant paid entry-level drivers minimum wages prior to April 2011.

Rodriquez, et al. v. Nike Retail Services, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 147762 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay for all time spent waiting while for security inspections after they had clocked-out of work and were exiting Defendant's stores in violation of the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, arguing that the time spent checking bags was de minimis. Id. at *2. The Court granted Defendant's motion. Defendant hired an expert to conduct a study of exit inspections, which showed that the average inspection took no more than 18.5 seconds and that 60.5% of all exits required zero wait time. Id. at *9. Rather than submit contradictory evidence in response to Nike's 700 hours of video, which the Court found to be representative of the class period, Plaintiffs relied on an expert declaration to support his allegations. The Court found that Plaintiffs' strategy was "misguided," and it rejected Plaintiffs' "attempt to equate this situation to a battle of experts sufficient to deny summary judgment." Id. at *27. The Court held that "pointing out flaws in the other side's evidence," was not the same as "offering any conflicting evidence for the jury to consider at trial on the relevant claim or defense." Id. Evaluating Defendant's evidence under the de minimis defense, and recognizing that daily periods of up to 10 minutes have been found to be de minimis, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs failed to show that their off-the-clock exit time was close to meeting that threshold. Id. at *33. Although Plaintiffs pointed to testimony from three store managers who estimated that some employees may have had a few inspections with higher wait-times, the Court found that wait-times of two or five minutes were too trivial, irregular, and administratively difficult to capture. Id. at *41. The Court also agreed that repositioning time clocks to the front of the store so that employees could clock-out after the check was not required. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Stein, et al. v. hhgregg, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 19908 (6th Cir. Oct. 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of sales employees, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant, a retail furniture store, utilized a commission-only structure that led to them being pay less than the minimum wage in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant paid a recoverable draw against future commissions in any workweek in which their commission earnings fell short of minimum wage, which was recovered from later paychecks when the commissions were high enough to exceed the minimum wage. The commission policy also required that any "unearned" draw balance be repaid at the time of termination, although the employer never actually sought repayment. Plaintiffs argued that recovery of the draw was actually an unlawful "kick-back" of wages in violation of the FLSA's requirement that minimum wages be paid "free and clear" without condition. Id. at *12. Plaintiffs also alleged that the draw policy led to pressure to work off-the-clock so as to minimize the minimum wage obligations and draw payments. Id. at *27. The District Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit reversed and remanded in part. First, adopting the long-standing position of the U.S. Department of Labor, the Sixth Circuit rejected Plaintiffs' contention that the draw structure violated the FLSA when advanced amounts were recovered during employment. However, the Sixth Circuit stated that with regard to the provision in Defendant's compensation plan requiring that terminated employees repay "unearned" draw balances after termination, Plaintiffs alleged sufficient facts to support a claim that the policy, as written, violated the FLSA by continuing to hold employees liable for draw payments even after termination. Id. at *26. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit reversed the District Court's dismissal of Plaintiff's claims insofar as they alleged that Defendants' policy of holding employees liable upon termination violated the FLSA. Id. at *27. The Sixth Circuit also held that Plaintiffs could bring their off-the-clock and overtime claims based on their theory that Defendant's managers encouraged employees to work off-the-clock in order to reduce or eliminate their commission draw by reducing their reported hours worked and increasing their earned commissions for the workweek. Id. at *32. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit reversed and remanded the District Court's ruling on Defendant's motion to dismiss in part.

Serrano, et al. v. Republic Services*, 227 F. Supp. 3d 768 (S.D. Tex. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of waste services employees, brought a collective action asserting claims under the FLSA for unpaid overtime wages. Plaintiffs specifically alleged that Defendant failed to pay them overtime compensation of one and one-half of their regular rate for all hours in a workweek exceeding 40 hours. Defendants computed employees' regular rate by dividing total compensation for the week by total hours worked in the week. Plaintiffs contended that their total wages must be divided by 40 hours to arrive at the regular rate, rather than divided by total hours worked, which would increase the base rate that Defendants used for overtime calculations. Id. at 769-70. Plaintiffs were paid with a combination of a job per day rate, a piece-rate, and hourly rates throughout the workweek. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants' calculation were erroneous for two reasons, including: (i) the regulations prohibit combining a day rate with other forms of compensation as a matter of law; and (ii) the remuneration paid was not intended to compensate for all hours worked as a matter of fact. Id. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' claims, which the Court granted in part. The Court found that that the default methodology of 29 U.S.C. § 778.109 was appropriate for calculating overtime owed by applying the "all hours worked" denominator as the number of hours "for which such compensation was paid." Id. at 770. Plaintiffs argued that the flat, day rate component of their pay triggered the application of § 778.112 as the governing regulation. Plaintiffs contended therefore that Defendants' pay scheme was unlawful because § 778.112 does not allow other forms of compensation to be blended with the job or day rate. The Court opined that according to the plain language of § 778.112, it applied only when a pay structure – such as a day rate alone – compensated the employee for all hours worked, but if the employer paid other monetary forms of compensation, then § 778.112 would not apply. The Court determined that Plaintiffs received a combination of methods of monetary compensation as part of their wages in addition to any flat sums, and that § 778.112 therefore would not apply because the flat rate was not the only part of compensation. Id. at 771. The Court reasoned that the FLSA does not prohibit particular pay structures; instead, it merely requires that pay structures be properly interpreted for minimum wage and overtime calculations. The Court held that nothing in the language of the FLSA supported a construction that it intended to limit employers' manner of payment, and therefore it granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' claims for an unlawful combined rate pay. Id. The Court further found that Plaintiffs presented deposition testimony in which Defendants admitted that they did not build into the day rate downtime and landfill time. Id. at 772. Thus, the Court held that there was a disputed issue of material fact that precluded summary judgment on that issue. The Court thereby granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Taylor, et al. v. AmSpec, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87212 (S.D. Tex. June 7, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of inspectors, filed a collective action for overtime pay alleging that Defendant improperly calculated their regular rate of pay by excluding payments for work performed on scheduled days off in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs worked as inspectors whose job duties included sampling and measuring fuel shipments. Their duties required them to drive their personal vehicles from one work location to another during the workday. Because Plaintiffs' work hours varied from week to week, depending on when cargo ships came and went, Defendant paid Plaintiffs using the fluctuating workweek method under 29 C.F.R. § 778.114. Plaintiffs regularly worked on scheduled days off and received payments for such work in amounts that varied from $100 to $200, usually in checks separate from their regular paychecks. Id. at *3. The parties disagreed as to whether Defendant properly excluded these payments from Plaintiffs' regular hourly rate in calculating overtime under the fluctuating workweek method. Defendant contended that the payments were reimbursements for mileage and other work-related expenses, and therefore properly excluded. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs contended that the payments were compensation for work they performed and therefore improperly excluded. Id. at *4. Defendant moved for summary judgment on the basis that it properly calculated Plaintiffs' overtime pay by excluding reimbursements for mileage and other work-related expenses from its calculation of the regular rate of pay. Id. at *2. The Court denied the motion. The Court stated that, under the fluctuating workweek payment method, if an employer properly characterizes payments as reasonable reimbursements for expenses, it may properly exclude them from the regular rate of pay in calculating overtime. Id. at *7. If, however, an employer makes payments for work performed on scheduled days off, the employer must include the payments in calculating the regular rate of pay.

Id. Defendant reimbursed inspectors at a rate of $0.30 during normal workdays, before switching to a fixed $36 per diem rate. Defendant contended that, because it reimbursed inspectors at a rate far lower than the IRS standard business mileage rate, it paid the additional amounts that Plaintiffs called "day-off pay" as reasonable travel reimbursements added to the travel reimbursement paid for regular workdays. Id. at *12. The Court concluded that the evidence failed to show, as a matter of law, that Defendant made the payments as a reasonable approximation of work-related expenses. Id. at *12-13. Plaintiffs relied on their deposition testimony and text messages that, if believed, showed that Defendant offered them compensation for working on their days off and that the amounts varied depending on the length of time they worked or the number of tanks they inspected. Id. at *13. Because it found a genuine dispute of material fact regarding whether Defendant made "day-off payments" as a reasonable approximation of work-related expenses, or as payment for Plaintiffs' working on their scheduled days off, the Court concluded that summary judgment was not appropriate and denied Defendant's motion.

Zhang, et al. v. Akami Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 158112 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 26, 2017). Plaintiff, a deliveryman, brought a putative class and collective action alleging violations of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"), breach of implied contract, fraudulent filing of Internal Revenue Service ("IRS") returns, and deceptive acts and practices in violation of New York General Business Law ("GBL"). Plaintiff alleged a systemic practice of Defendants' failure to: (i) pay minimum wages and overtime compensation; (ii) properly record time spent by employees working; (iii) provide time of hire notices, and (iv) provide employees with accurate pay stubs. Plaintiff asserted that Defendants did not maintain, establish, or preserve weekly payroll records, and required Plaintiff to sign papers affirming false hours worked. Plaintiff also contended that Defendants required deliverymen to bear all out-of-pocket costs with respect to their delivery vehicles. Defendants asserted counterclaims for intentional infliction of emotional distress, sexual harassment, and torts on the basis that Plaintiff sent Defendants inappropriate, vulgar, sexual, and harassing messages. Id. at *4. Defendants moved pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) to dismiss several counts of Plaintiff's complaint. Defendants further moved to dismiss Plaintiff's breach of implied contract claims for lack of supplemental jurisdiction. Defendants also moved to dismiss the NYLL claims for lack of supplemental jurisdiction if the Court dismissed the FLSA claims. With respect to Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's GBL claim, the Court ruled that none of the allegations in the complaint supported an assertion that Defendants participated in consumer-oriented conduct and as such, the Court dismissed the GBL claim. The Court also granted Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's claim of fraudulent filing of Internal Revenue Service ("IRS") returns, and ruled that the complaint did not allege that Defendants willfully filed a fraudulent information return, as the complaint merely parroted the statutory requirements. The Court also denied Defendants' motion to dismiss the claims of violations of the FLSA and rejected Defendant's argument that Plaintiffs failed to allege that Defendants were an enterprise engaged in commerce and therefore not subject to liability under the FLSA. The Court rejected Defendants' claim that it did not gross $500,000 annually as they did not raise it in their pleadings and the Court would not consider matters outside the pleadings for purposes of the motion. Id. at 15. The Court likewise denied Defendants motion to dismiss Plaintiff's claims of breach of an implied contract for lack of supplemental jurisdiction. Id. at *21. Plaintiff sought reimbursement of all costs and expenses of bicycles or electric delivery vehicles and alleged that an implied contract that Defendants would compensate Plaintiffs for the costs associated with their delivery vehicles. Defendant asserted that the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction because the underlying facts were insufficiently related to the FLSA claims. Id. at *17. The Court ruled that the FLSA claims and implied contract claims shared a common nucleus of operative facts that warranted the Court's exercise of supplemental jurisdiction. In addition, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion to dismiss Defendants' counterclaims and declined to exercise supplemental jurisdiction as to Defendant's counterclaims. Id. at *22. The gist of Defendants' counterclaims was that Plaintiff sent inappropriate, vulgar, sexual, and improper messages via telephone or electronic messenger service. Defendants attempted to link the inappropriate messages to the alleged minimum wage and overtime violations, asserting that the messages casted doubt on the hours that Plaintiff worked. The Court rejected this argument and found that the facts underlying the FLSA claims and Defendants' counterclaims did not substantially overlap and dismissed the counterclaims without prejudice pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1). Id. at *29. The Court also denied both parties' request to amend their pleadings on the basis that any amendment would be futile.

(xxiii) Preemption And Immunity Issues In FLSA Collective Actions

Azpeitia, et al. v. Tesoro Refining,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114210 (N.D. Cal. July 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of oil refinery operators, brought a putative class action alleging violations of California labor law for failure to provide rest breaks, failure to provide accurate wage statements, and alleged violations of the California Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA") and the California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"). Id. at *3. Defendants moved to dismiss on the basis that Plaintiffs' state law claims were preempted by the Labor-Management Relations Act ("LMRA") because they required interpretation of a collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") and that the derivative claims failed to state a viable claim for relief. Id. at *10. The Court granted the motion to dismiss as to Plaintiffs' UCL claim and Plaintiffs' claim for disgorgement, but denied the motion in all other respects. Id. at *32. The Court found that Plaintiffs' claims of off-duty rest breaks and improper wage statements implicated rights mandated by state law and not the CBA. The Court concluded that, because the rights existed independently of a CBA and were not substantially dependent on the analysis of a CBA, the claims were not preempted by the LMRA. Id. at *13. Defendants also argued that Plaintiffs' claims violated the terms of a collectively bargained class settlement. The Court rejected this defense, ruling that the settlement agreement did not have any terms that needed to be interpreted to resolve Plaintiffs' state law claims. Id. at *16. Defendants also asserted that Plaintiffs failed to exhaust arbitration procedures before filing suit. However, the Court held that the existence of an arbitration clause in a CBA did not necessarily implicate LMRA preemption and, because the claims were based upon rights guaranteed by California law, they did not require interpretation of the CBA. Id. at *20. Defendants also argued that Plaintiffs' derivative claims failed to state a viable claim for relief. Specifically, Defendants asserted that: (i) the wage statements did not need to include the missed rest periods as unearned wages; (ii) the UCL claims could not be predicated on rest break penalties or wage statement violations; (iii) Plaintiffs could not seek disgorgement of profits under the UCL; and (iv) Plaintiffs' PAGA claims failed to state a claim for relief. The Court determined that payments required for missed rest periods should be considered wages and that the UCL claim may be predicated on missed rest periods. Id. at *26. Because Plaintiffs did not object to Defendant's argument that Plaintiffs could not predicate the UCL claims on failure to provide accurate wage statements, the Court considered that claim abandoned and dismissed it. The Court agreed with Defendants that the UCL claim seeking an order of disgorgement of all profits gained by operation of the unfair business practices was improper and dismissed that claim. Id. at *27. Defendants also asserted that Plaintiffs' PAGA claims must be dismissed because Plaintiffs failed to fulfill PAGA's mandatory exhaustion requirements and Plaintiffs were not able to recover additional penalties under PAGA for alleged violations of the California Labor Code. Id. at *28. The Court rejected both arguments and denied the motion to dismiss as to the PAGA claims. Id. at *32. The Court therefore granted the motion to dismiss as to Plaintiffs' UCL claim and disgorgement claim, but denied the motion in all other respects. Id.
