DaSilva, et al. v. Border Transfer Of MA,* 277 F. Supp. 3d 154 (D. Mass. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former delivery drivers, alleged that Defendant improperly classified them as independent contractors instead of employees, and therefore unlawfully deducted certain business expenses from their pay. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss on the basis that Plaintiffs' claims were preempted by the Federal Aviation Administration Authorization Act of 1994 ("FAAAA"), 49 U.S.C. § 14501(c)(1). Defendant provided delivery services for large retail stores such as Sears. Plaintiffs delivered merchandise and their relationship with Defendant was governed by a "Contract Carrier Agreement," which stated that Plaintiffs were independent contractors. Id. at 155. Plaintiffs alleged that they should have been classified as employees because Defendant exercised substantial control over drivers, and drivers did not have the ability to maintain an independently established business. Certain expenses were deducted directly from drivers' compensation, including when Defendant determined that a delivery had been made in an unsatisfactory manner, i.e., when goods or consumer property were damaged. The cost of uniforms was also deducted, as was the cost of paying for a replacement driver when a driver could not complete a delivery. Worker's compensation coverage, cargo insurance, fuel costs, and vehicle maintenance costs were also taken from drivers' compensation. Id. at 156. At the outset, the Court stated that the term "employee" in the Massachusetts wage law is defined by the Massachusetts Independent Contractor Statute as any individual performing any service unless: (i) the individual is free from control and direction in connection with the performance of the service; (ii) the service is performed outside the usual course of the business of the employer; and (iii) the individual is customarily engaged in an independently established trade, occupation, profession, or business of the same nature as that involved in the service performed. Id. at 157. All three prongs must be met for a worker to be an independent contractor rather than an employee. Id. The FAAAA expressly preempts any state law "related to a price, route, or service of any motor carrier . . . or any motor private carrier, broker, or freight forwarder with respect to the transportation of property." Id. The Court opined that under the broad FAAAA preemption standard, a state law is preempted "if it expressly references, or has a significant impact on, carriers' prices, routes, or services." Id. at 158. The Court found that the question before it was whether the Massachusetts wage law claim and the Massachusetts Independent Contractor Statute have a significant impermissible effect on carriers' prices, routes, and services. Id. at 159. The Court determined that Defendant failed to allege any facts that Massachusetts law has a significant impact on the services that Defendant provided to its customers. The Court thus held that the FAAAA did not preempt Plaintiffs' claims under the Massachusetts wage law, and denied Defendant's motion for summary judgement on those claims. Id. at 160. The Court further opined that a party with an adequate remedy at law cannot claim unjust enrichment, and since the Massachusetts wage law claims were available as a statutory remedy that was sufficient to bar unjust enrichment. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss as to Plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claim only.

McKinley, et al. v. Southwest Airlines,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 2962 (9th Cir. Feb. 21, 2017). Plaintiff, a former employee, alleged that Defendant failed to pay overtime wages as required under §§ 510 and 1194 of the California Labor Code. Id. at *2. Defendant filed a Rule 12(b)(1) motion to dismiss and argued that Plaintiff's claims were preempted by the Railway Labor Act ("RLA"). The District Court granted Defendant's motion On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision. The Ninth Circuit stated that a two-step inquiry was appropriate to analyze RLA preemption of state law claims, including: (i) if the asserted cause of action involves a right conferred upon an employee by virtue of state law and not by a collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") then the claim is preempted; however (ii) if the right underlying Plaintiff's state law claims exists independently of the CBA, the District Court must determine if the right is nevertheless substantially dependent on analysis of a collective-bargaining agreement. The Ninth Circuit explained that if there is substantial dependence, the state law claim is preempted by the RLA. Id. The Ninth Circuit found that Plaintiff's complaint referenced multiple provisions of the CBA, including references to "regular rate of pay," "non-discretionary incentive pay," and "shift differential pay." Id. at *3. The Ninth Circuit further stated that the complaint referenced "all remuneration," implicating shift-trade pay, holiday pay, inconvenience shift premiums, and multiple starting time premiums, all of which were matters covered by the CBA. Id. at *3. The Ninth Circuit held that the District Court therefore correctly determined that in order to assess Plaintiff's claim, it would have to examine each form of pay provided by the CBA, determine when that pay was due, and then decide whether the pay should have been included in Plaintiff's regular rate. Id. The Ninth Circuit concluded that the District Court also properly held that since the resolution of the claim required interpretation of the CBA, Plaintiff's claims were preempted. Id. at *3-4.

O'Connor, et al. v. Oakhurst Dairy,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 4392 (1st Cir. Mar. 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of dairy delivery drivers, alleged that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of Maine's wage & hour laws. Id. at *2. Defendant argued that dairy delivery drivers were overtime-exempt under Maine's "Exemption F." Id. at *3. Under Exemption F, Maine's overtime law does not apply to the canning, processing, preserving, freezing, drying, marketing, storing, packing for shipment or distribution of: (i) agricultural produce; (ii) meat and fish products; and (iii) perishable foods. Id. The parties agreed that the drivers were not involved in canning, processing, preserving, freezing, drying, marketing, storing, or packing any food. The issue was whether drivers were engaged in "packing for shipment or distribution." Id. at *4. Plaintiffs argued that this phrase referred to a single activity of "packing," whether the packing be for shipment or for distribution. Id. Plaintiffs asserted that since they did not pack food, Exemption F did not apply to them. Defendant argued that the phrase referred to two different activities, including "packing for shipment" and "distribution." Id. Therefore Defendant contended that since Plaintiffs engaged in the distribution of food, Exemption F applied to them. Id. The District Court ruled that "packing for shipment" and "distribution" were each stand-alone exempt activities under the Maine statute and it granted summary judgment in favor of Defendant. On appeal, the First Circuit reversed and remanded. The First Circuit set out to determine for itself what the contested phrase meant. Because case law authority in Maine had not interpreted Exemption F, the First Circuit looked to the plain language of the statute. The First Circuit found the statute ambiguous, no matter what rules or conventions it applied. Id. at *7-15. The First Circuit therefore turned to the legislative history and statutory purpose to guide its interpretation of the statute. Id. at *18. After providing thorough analysis, the First Circuit concluded that these too were unhelpful in resolving the ambiguity. Id. at *19-24. Finding no other way to resolve the ambiguity, the First Circuit reverted to the default rule of construction under Maine law for ambiguous wage & hour laws, i.e., liberally construe the statute to further the purpose for which it was enacted. Id. at *24. In doing so, the First Circuit stated that it must accept Plaintiffs' narrower construction of the exemption. Therefore, the First Circuit held that the District Court erred in granted Defendant's motion for summary judgement and reversed the ruling.

Oddo, et al. v. Bimbo Bakeries USA, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 75172 (D.N.J. May 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of route sales representatives, filed suit under the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA") and the New Jersey Wage & Hour Law ("NJWHL") alleging overtime violations. Id. at *1. Defendant moved to dismiss, asserting that Plaintiffs' claims were preempted by § 301 of the Labor-Management Relations Act ("LMRA") and that they failed to state a claim. Id. at *2. The Court denied Defendant's motion. First, Defendant asserted that a series of collective bargaining agreements ("CBAs") preempted Plaintiffs' NJWHL and FLSA claims. Defendant argued that the NJWHL claim arose from the CBA, or alternatively, depended upon the Court's interpretation of the CBA. The Court rejected this argument on the basis that merely considering the terms of a collective bargaining agreement to determine rate of pay or damages did not warrant preemption. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the LMRA did not preempt the NJWHL claim. Second, Defendant argued that the FLSA claim was also preempted by the LMRA. Id. at *26. The Court rejected Defendants argument because Plaintiffs' overtime claim rested independently on FLSA statutory rights, as opposed to their contractual rights under the CBA. Accordingly, the Court ruled that no interpretation of the CBA was necessary to adjudicate the FLSA claim, and Plaintiffs could proceed on their FLSA claim without exhausting the administrative and grievance procedures in the CBA. Id. at *31. The Court also denied the motion to dismiss to the extent that it was based upon Defendants' affirmative defense that Plaintiffs were exempt from overtime. Id. at *35. Whether the Plaintiffs fell within an exemption must be determined by the facts brought out in discovery and the issue of exemption did not turn the Court's interpretation of the CBA. The Court also ruled that Plaintiffs stated viable claims for NJWHL and FLSA overtime violations as they pled that they worked compensable overtime in a workweek longer than 40 hours. Id. at *36. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Ortega, et al. v. J. B. Hunt Transportation, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 13864 (9th Cir. July 31, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendant's compensation system violated California's minimum wage, meal break, and rest break laws. The District Court found that the Federal Aviation Administration Authorization Act ("FAAAA") preempted Plaintiffs' claims. The District Court granted Defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings regarding Plaintiffs' meal and rest break claims, and subsequently granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' minimum wage claims. The District Court determined that these laws significantly impacted Defendant's prices, routes, and services, and thus were preempted by the FAAAA. Plaintiff appealed, and the Ninth Circuit vacated and remanded the District Court's ruling. The Ninth Circuit noted that while this case was pending on appeal, it had decided Dilts v. Penske Logistics, LLC, 769 F.3d 637 (9th Cir. 2014), and found that California's meal and rest break laws are not "related to" prices, routes, or services, and therefore are not as a matter of law preempted by the FAAAA. Id. *2-3. The Ninth Circuit held that the Dilts decision thus compelled the conclusion that the District Court erred in granting Defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings on Plaintiffs' meal and rest break claims.

Reagan, et al. v. City Of Hanahan,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 50111 (D.S.C. April 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of firefighters, alleged that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA and the South Carolina Payment of Wages Act ("SCPWA"). Defendant filed a motion to dismiss on the basis that Plaintiffs' SCPWA claims were preempted by the FLSA and should therefore be dismissed. Defendant relied on previous Fourth Circuit precedent that even though the North Carolina state law provided more generous remedies than the FLSA (e.g., a 3-year instead of a 2-year limitations period), the state claims were preempted because Plaintiffs would have to rely on proof of an FLSA violation to prevail on their state law claims. Id. at *4-5. Defendants argued that was the same issue here, because the SCPWA provides more generous recoveries than the FLSA. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs agreed that they could not rely on the SCPWA to seek minimum wages or overtime pay because such claims were preempted by the FLSA, but argued that their SCPWA claims for "unpaid, prevailing wages, over and above the minimum wage" as well as their claims connected to Defendant's "failure to pay those wages when they were due" were not preempted because those state law claims were not duplicative of their FLSA claims. Id. at *6. The Court agreed with Plaintiffs and denied Defendant's motion. The Court stated that applicable case law authorities have frequently found that Plaintiffs' state law wage claims were not preempted by the FLSA when they sought redress for unpaid wages that were above the federal minimum wage. The Court further determined that Plaintiffs' state law claims were not duplicative of their FLSA claims. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' state law claims.

Reagan, et al. v. City Of Hanahan,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 81108 (D.S.C. May 26, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of firefighters, alleged that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA and the South Carolina Payment of Wages Act ("SCPWA"). Plaintiffs previously sought conditional certification of two sub-classes, including: (i) all individuals employed by Defendant in its Fire Department, who were non-exempt employees and who did not receive overtime compensation of at least one and one-half times their regular hourly wage for all overtime hours from three years prior to their joining the lawsuit through July 1, 2015; and (ii) all individuals employed by Defendant in its Fire Department, but were assigned to EMS, who were non-exempt employees and who worked over 40 hours in any given workweek, but who did not receive overtime compensation of at least one and one-half times their regular hourly wage for all overtime hours from July 1, 2015 to the present. Id. at *2-3. The Court granted the motion with respect to the first sub-class and denied as to sub-class two. Plaintiffs now filed a motion for reconsideration following discovery, requesting that the Court conditionally certify sub-class two. Defendant objected to conditional certification of sub-class two on the grounds that the pay plan in place from July 2015 to the present did not violate the law. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' allegations were not sufficient to demonstrate that they were subject to an illegal policy or plan because they are subject to the increased overtime threshold under 29 U.S.C. § 207(k), which applies to employees "in fire protection activities." Id. at *4. Because most Plaintiffs indicated that their duties include(d) fire suppression, Defendant asserted that they are subject to the overtime exemption in § 207(k). Plaintiffs conceded that potential members of sub-class two were, at various times, assigned to a fire truck but that they were also assigned to work on ambulances. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs also conceded that when they were assigned to the fire truck, they had the responsibility to engage in fire suppression. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs argued that potential members of sub-class two only fall under the § 207(k) exemption during the times they were assigned to the fire truck but not during the times they were assigned to the ambulance. Id. at *7-8. The Court stated that allowing potential members of sub-class two to proceed on claims limited to the period of time when they were assigned to the ambulance would defeat the purpose of the § 207(k) exemption, which is to allow employers to adopt work periods longer than seven days for employees, like Plaintiffs, who are responsible for fire suppression. Id. at *8. As the exemption applies an increased overtime threshold to work periods between seven and twenty-eight days, it would not be feasible to calculate an employee's overtime entitlement under the standard 40-hour workweek for the few shifts per month he was assigned to the ambulance and to simultaneously calculate overtime entitlement under the § 207(k) exemption. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration.

Vidrio, et al. v. United Airlines, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40609 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of flights attendants in two consolidated actions, alleged that Defendant provided them with illegal wage statements under § 226 of the California Labor Code. Id. at *2. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgement. Defendant moved for summary judgment on the grounds that § 226 did not apply to Plaintiffs' claims because Plaintiffs and the class members performed the majority of their work outside of California. Id. at *6. Defendant argued that § 226 only governs work performed exclusively or principally in California and, therefore, applying § 226 to the class members' claims would violate the presumption against extraterritorial application of California law. Id. at *6-7. At the outset, the Court noted that, as to California's wage & hour laws, the California Supreme Court has not expressly decided whether the language or purpose of the California Labor Code impliedly suggests an intent to apply those laws to conduct occurring outside the state. Id. at *7. However, the Court stated that the few decisions that have analyzed the extraterritorial application of California's wage & hour laws have tended to focus on the "job situs," i.e., the location where the work is principally performed. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs asked the Court to reject the job situs test and adopt a multi-factor approach based on their interpretation of California Supreme Court precedent. Id. at *10. Specifically, the Court concluded that the California Supreme Court left open the possibility that California employment laws might apply in a situation where California residents working for a California employer temporarily leave "the state during the course of the normal workday, but return to California at the end of the day." Id. at *12-13. Plaintiffs pointed to the facts that Defendant received substantial state subsidies to train flight attendants in California, many of its daily flights departed from or arrived at a California airport, and the wrongful conduct giving rise to liability – i.e., the decisions regarding employee compensation policies – occurred in California. Id. at *13. Nevertheless, the Court found Plaintiffs' argument unpersuasive. The Court determined that Defendant was neither based nor had its headquarters in California. It was also undisputed that United was headquartered in Chicago, Illinois, and had management and administrative offices in Houston, Texas. Thus, the Court held that any potential liability arising from decisions regarding compensation policies, including the format and content of wage statements, could not be said to have "emanated" from California. Id. at *16. Moreover, the Court held that only 18.34% of Defendant's domestic flights and 15.96% of its total flights actually operated in and out of California. Id. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs, therefore, could not assert their claim for improper wage statements under § 226 because, whether it applied the job situs test or a multi-factor approach, the outcome remained the same. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment and denied Plaintiffs' motion.

(xxiv) Procedural And Notice Issues In FLSA Collective Actions

Beauregard, et al. v. Hunter*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38407 (D.N.J. Mar. 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought a collective action alleging that their former employer, RRC Consultants, Inc. ("RCC"), failed to pay them wages during multiple pay periods. Defendant Sivertsen was the Executive Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and a director of RCC. Defendant Smith was a director of RCC. Id. at *2. Due to financial difficulties, RCC failed to pay Plaintiffs during multiple pay periods in 2014 and 2015. Defendants all were involved in making the decisions about whether to continue Plaintiffs' employment and whether to use RCC's funds to pay the wages of Plaintiffs. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants violated the FLSA, the New Jersey Wage & Hour Law ("NJWHL"), and the New Jersey Wage Payment Law ("NJWPL") by making these decisions and by requiring or permitting Plaintiffs to work without pay. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs asserted claims on behalf of: (i) members of a putative collective action under the FLSA; and (ii) members of a putative class action brought pursuant to the NJWHL and the NJWPL. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss and to deny class certification, which the Court denied. Defendants asserted that Plaintiffs' FLSA claim must be dismissed. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to allege a common policy or scheme that violated the FLSA and also failed to allege a plausible claim against Smith and Sivertsen. Defendants further contended that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated, so certification of Plaintiffs' proposed FLSA collective must be denied and Plaintiffs' FLSA claim must be dismissed. Id. at *4. The Court found that Plaintiffs alleged in the complaint that RCC failed to pay Plaintiffs during multiple pay periods in 2014 and 2015 and that all Defendants were involved in making the decisions about whether to continue Plaintiffs' employment and whether to use RCC's funds to pay the wages of Plaintiffs. Id. at *5-6. The Court ruled that, viewing the allegations through the lens of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, it was persuaded that Plaintiffs stated a plausible claim for relief. Id. at *6. Defendants further argued that the Court should not exercise supplemental jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' state law claims. The Court stated that three requirements must be met before it may exercise supplemental jurisdiction, including: (i) the federal claim must have substance sufficient to confer subject-matter jurisdiction on the Court; (ii) the state and federal claims must derive from a common nucleus of operative facts; and (iii) the state and federal claims must be such that they would ordinarily be expected to be tried in one judicial proceeding. Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs' FLSA claims and state law claims brought pursuant to the NJWHL and the NJWPL all derived from Defendants' alleged failure to compensate Plaintiffs. Id. at *7. Finally, Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the requirements of Rule 23 for class certification on their state law claims. The Court noted Defendants had yet to answer Plaintiffs' complaint, and Plaintiffs had not yet moved for class certification. The Court held that it could not conduct a rigorous analysis of issues raised by Defendants, such as potential conflicts of interest between the named Plaintiffs or potential individualized defenses. Therefore, the Court declined to dismiss Plaintiffs' class action claims. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Benson, et al. v. HG Staffing, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 177159 (D. Nev. Mar. 2, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of room attendants formerly employed by Defendants, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants required them to arrive 20 minutes or more prior to their regularly scheduled start time to present themselves to their shift supervisors for room/floor assignments, a uniform inspection, and to retrieve tools necessary to complete their work tasks. Id. at *2. Two related suits preceded the action, including Sargent v. HG Staffing, Case No. 13-CV-453, alleging failure to pay overtime wages for time spending engaging in off-the-clock activities, and Benson v. HG Staffing, Case No. 16-CV-191 ("Benson I"), alleging state law claims, which were premised on many of the same factual allegations as the Sargent action. In Sargent, the Court found that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated as required under the FLSA, decertified the collective action, and the action was still on-going. Id. at *5. In Benson I, the named Plaintiffs eventually accepted offers of judgment from Defendants and the clerk entered final judgment and closed the matter. Plaintiffs in Benson I then filed five separate actions, including the instant action. Defendants moved to dismiss, arguing that because Plaintiffs accepted an offer of judgment in Benson I, the doctrine of res judicata barred the instant claim. Id. at *6. Defendants also contended that all other Plaintiffs' claims should be dismissed because: (i) Plaintiffs failed to sufficiently state a claim for failure to pay overtime; and (ii) issue preclusion barred the collective action due to the decertification of the Sargent collective action. Because Benson was a Plaintiff in both cases and Defendants were the same, the Court stated that the interests were identical between the two cases. Id. at *9. Moreover, the Court explained that it was undisputed that Benson's acceptance of Defendants' offer of judgment resulted in final judgment on the merits. Id. at *10. Finally, the Court held that there was an identity of claims because Benson asserted a claim of failure to pay overtime in violation of Nevada law based in part on the same employer conduct alleged in this action. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss with regarding to Plaintiff Benson. Defendants also argued that Plaintiffs failed to sufficiently state a claim for failure to pay overtime because Plaintiffs had not identified "any one week in which any one Plaintiff was paid less than [the] wage required by the FLSA." Id. at *11. Plaintiffs countered that they had alleged that they all regularly worked 40 hours each week and that Defendants required them to participate in at least 20 minutes of uncompensated work-related activities each and every shift. The Court found that Plaintiffs' details sufficiently stated an FLSA overtime claim. Defendants further argued that issue preclusion barred Plaintiffs from bringing an FLSA collective action because the Court decertified the collective action in Sargent. The Court found that Plaintiffs attempted to form a narrower collective action composed solely of room attendants who all based their overtime claims on the same alleged policy of being required to present themselves to their shift supervisors 20 minutes before their shifts began. Id. at *17. Therefore, the Court held that its decision to decertify the collective action in Sargent action presented the same issue as the prospective certification of this proposed collective action. Moreover, Defendants' argument would result in automatically barring Plaintiffs who opt-in to a collective action that is later decertified from attempting to litigate their claims in the future as a properly-constructed collective action. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss with respect to all remaining Plaintiffs' claims.

Bonke, et al. v. Uber Technologies*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 189388 (D. Ariz. May 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a driver, brought an action on behalf of himself and all others similarly-situated, alleging that Defendant misclassified drivers as independent contractors in violation of the FLSA and state wage & hour laws. Prior to Plaintiff filing his lawsuit, a criminal complaint was filed against Plaintiff where a jury returned a verdict of guilty on three counts of trafficking in stolen property and he was sentenced to 3.25 years of incarceration. Id. at *2. After learning of Plaintiff's conviction, Defendant moved to strike the Rule 23 class allegations due to Plaintiff's inadequacy to serve as a class representative. Plaintiff agreed that he was not an adequate class representative and moved for an order permitting his counsel to substitute a new class representative and leave to file an amended complaint. Id. at *3. Plaintiff's counsel stated that they located "a Plaintiff who has opted-out of arbitration and is interested in joining the action. But he will not do so unless the Court allows him to file his own complaint and resets the discovery deadlines. Otherwise, it makes sense for him to file his own action." Id. at *4. Plaintiff argued that striking the class claims without allowing for substitution was inefficient. The Court disagreed and found that the prospective class representative's demands that the Court allow him to file his own complaint and reset all case management deadlines if substitution was allowed was not more efficient than filing a new complaint. Id. The Court noted that Plaintiff's counsel had over two months to find a substitute class representative, and the availability of substitution of a class representative depended upon the status of the case. The Court stated that Plaintiff had not moved for class certification under Rule 23 or conditional certification under the FLSA, and therefore no class yet existed. The Court concluded that Plaintiff could not simply be a placeholder for months while Plaintiff's counsel tried to find a substitute. Id. at *5. Defendant also moved to dismiss the action because Plaintiff did not intend to proceed. However, the Court held that Plaintiff did not contend that he did not wish to proceed and inappropriateness as a class representative did not make him ineligible to maintain a lawsuit on his own behalf. Id. at *6. The Court thereby granted Defendant's motion to strike the class allegations and denied Plaintiff's motion to substitute class representative.

Cabrera, et al. v. CMG Development LLC*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 22788 (11th Cir. Nov. 14, 2017). Plaintiff, a construction worker, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. The District Court ordered Plaintiff to file a short statement of the claim, setting forth the total amount of alleged unpaid wages, the calculation of such wages, and the nature of the wages, which Plaintiff did within the deadline. Defendant filed a notice of appearance. The District Court then entered an order sua sponte dismissing the action without prejudice stating that Plaintiff "had not filed a return of service." Id. at *3. The District Court dismissed the case sua sponte without prejudice "for failure to serve the complaint in compliance with Rule 4(m)." Id. at *4. Plaintiff subsequently moved to reopen the case and explained that service was effected on February 22, 2016, and he attached supporting documentation to that effect. In addition, Plaintiff noted that counsel for Defendant had filed a notice of appearance on behalf of Defendant within two weeks of the date of the complaint, indicating that Defendant was aware of the lawsuit and that discovery already was underway. Id. The District Court denied the motion. Plaintiff then filed a motion for reconsideration, which the District Court also denied. On appeal, Plaintiff contended the District Court abused its discretion by dismissing the case sua sponte without first notifying him. The Eleventh Circuit agreed and reversed the District Court's ruling. Plaintiff submitted that service was effected and that his only error was failing to file proof of service with the District Court. The Eleventh Circuit stated that the District Court would have learned of this fact, instead of laboring under the misconception that Defendant had not been served, if it had followed the strictures of Rule 4(m), which provide that the District Court may dismiss the action on its own but only after notice to Plaintiff. Id. at *6. Finally, Plaintiff contended that Defendant failed to file an answer or a motion under Rule 12 within the prescribed time limits, and therefore waived the defense of insufficient service of process. Defendant contended there was no error because Plaintiff could not show good cause in failing to file proof of service with the Court. The Eleventh Circuit concluded that the District Court abused its discretion and, by failing to adhere to the procedure set forth in Rule 4(m), deprived Plaintiff of the opportunity to show good cause and sidestepped its duty to consider whether to exercise its discretion to order that service be made within a specified time. Id. at *8-9. Further, the Eleventh Circuit determined that Plaintiff was correct that Defendant never filed an answer or a Rule 12 motion within the specified time limits. The Eleventh Circuit, therefore, held that Defendant failed to timely raise the defense of insufficient service of process and, as a result, waived it. The Eleventh Circuit concluded that the District Court was without discretion to dismiss the action in any event because, as it had previously held, "once a Defendant has waived any objection to insufficient service of process, the District Court may not, either upon Defendant's motion or its own initiative, dismiss on that ground." Id. at *10. As such, the Eleventh Circuit stated the District Court need not consider on remand whether Plaintiff's neglect was excusable or constituted good cause because it was precluded from dismissing the action for insufficient service of process. Id.

Chen, et al. v. Wai ? Café Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121635 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 2, 2017). Plaintiff, a delivery driver, brought a class and collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The case proceeded to a jury trial, during which Defendants sought to introduce documents into evidence to which Plaintiffs objected, including a purported contract between the parties and records indicating additional payments to Plaintiffs. Id. at *3. The District Court deemed the documents to be precluded from admission at trial because Plaintiffs argued they had not been turned over in discovery. Id. The District Court dismissed the FLSA claims because Plaintiffs failed to show that Defendant had gross receipts exceeding $500,000. The District Court retained supplemental jurisdiction over the Plaintiffs' NYLL claims because the case had already been tried and substantial resources had been expended in preparation of trial. Id. at *4. The jury found Defendants liable for minimum wage, overtime, and spread of hours pay. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed the judgment in part and vacated it in part. The Second Circuit found that documents may have been improperly excluded at trial. Plaintiff also argued on appeal that he was entitled to tip and meal allowances in any damage calculations because the NYLL, unlike the FLSA, "imposed no notice requirements before letting an employer take advantage of either allowance" for the relevant time period. Id. at *5. The Second Circuit noted that it was an unsettled question of law whether notices were required, so instructed the District Court to consider those arguments on remand. On remand, the District Court found that Plaintiff had in fact received the documents in question, and Defendant moved for sanctions against Plaintiff based on the allegedly fraudulent representations that Plaintiffs' counsel made to the District Court. The District Court denied the motion, but found that a new trial was warranted based on the documents being barred from the first trial. Id. at *6. Defendant also requested the District Court to decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over Plaintiff's claims and dismiss the case. The District Court found that all of the original jurisdiction claims had been dismissed, and the state law claims raised a novel or complex issue of law. Id. at *9. The District Court held that all factors did not weigh heavily in favor of maintaining jurisdiction. Id. at *11. The District Court stated that neither party would be significantly inconvenienced or prejudiced if Plaintiff re-filed in state court. The District Court further determined that while by proceeding in state court, the parties will all benefit from "a surer-footed reading of applicable law." Id. at *12 Accordingly, the District Court declined to exercise supplemental jurisdiction, and granted Defendants' motion to dismiss without prejudice to refiling in state court.

Delaney, et al. v. FTS International Services, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8144 (M.D. Pa. Jan. 20, 2017). Plaintiff, a supervisor, brought a putative collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay him and similarly-situated individuals overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA, the Pennsylvania Minimum Wage Act ("PMWA"), and the Pennsylvania Wage Payment and Collection Law ("PWPCL"). Id. at *2. Plaintiff asserted that he regularly worked at least 60 hours per week and that his primary duties consisted of performing manual labor tasks, not office or non-manual work directly related to management or general business operations. Plaintiff further alleged that, after January 24, 2016, Defendants reclassified Plaintiff as a non-exempt employee and Defendants began paying Plaintiff an hourly rate plus a weekly, non-discretionary bonus, but failed to use a weighted average incorporating the bonus payments when calculating his overtime rate, which resulted in Defendant paying him less than one and one-half times his regular rate for all hours worked in excess of 40 hours in a workweek. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiff sought conditional certification of a FLSA collective action of all similarly-situated individuals who were allegedly misclassified as exempt from overtime requirements and were subject to Defendants' failure to pay overtime wages, and a class action pursuant to Rule 23 for violations of the Pennsylvania wage laws on behalf of similarly-situated individuals. Id. at *4. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss or strike Plaintiff's collective action allegations or in the alternative, for partial summary judgment with respect to Plaintiff's collective action claims, which the Court granted. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's collective action claims should be dismissed because Plaintiff waived his right to litigate collectively against Defendant when he signed a class and collective action waiver as part of his employee handbook acknowledgement receipt. Id. at *11. Defendant argued that Plaintiff executed a valid waiver of his right to litigate collectively under the FLSA and Pennsylvania wage laws, as the right to litigate collectively is a procedural right subject to waiver. Id. at *14-15. Plaintiff relied on cases from the Ninth and Seventh Circuit, which held that a collective action waiver violates an employee's substantive, statutory right to engage in concerted activity under § 7 of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"). Id. at *16. The Court opined that in the absence of explicit guidance from the Third Circuit on this issue, the Court declined to find that the right to litigate collectively under the FLSA was a substantive right guaranteed by the NLRA and not subject to waiver. Id. at *22. The Court held that the right to proceed collectively under the FLSA is a procedural right subject to waiver, as long as individual employees retained the individual capacity to vindicate their rights. Id. at *22-23. The Court stated that since Plaintiff did not challenge the validity or enforceability of the waiver signed by him on any other basis, the collective action waiver at issue was valid and enforceable. The Court thereby granted Defendant motion for partial summary judgment, and dismissed Plaintiff's class action and collective action allegations.

Fries, et al. v. Residential Home Health, LLC,* Case No. 16-CV-3727 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 23, 2017). Plaintiff, a home health aide, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified her and other similarly-situated workers as exempt employees and thereby failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"). The Court granted Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification under FLSA, but ordered her to filed a second proposed notice. Plaintiff sought to have Defendant produce an importable electronic list of all persons who: (i) worked as home health clinicians in Illinois and Michigan at any point up to three years prior to the entry of the Court's order and who were classified as exempt; (ii) were paid on a hybrid per visit and hourly basis; and (iii) were not paid overtime compensation for time worked over 40 hours per week. Id. at 2. Plaintiffs sought first and last names, last known addresses, email addresses, phone numbers, dates of employment, social security numbers, and dates of birth. Id. Plaintiffs also proposed that notice be sent by first class mail and email and that Defendant post notices in its offices. Id. Finally, Plaintiffs requested a 60-day terms for potential Plaintiffs to opt-in and wished to send a reminder notice 15-days prior to the end of the opt-in period. Defendant argued with several aspects of the proposed noticed. Id. at 3. First, the Court agreed that the scope of the notice should be limited to the period before Defendant began utilizing a new compensation system and not the hybrid approach at issue. Id. As to Defendant's contention that the notice was the deficient because it failed to explain to the putative members of the collective action that they may be responsible for litigation costs should Defendant prevail, the Court agreed and stated that notifying opt-in Plaintiffs of the potential costs would allow them to make a fully informed decision. Id. The Court also agreed with Defendant's contention that the notice should be sent by mail only. The Court further stated that posting notice in Defendant's offices was an unnecessary burden. Id. at 4. Finally, Defendant requested that email addresses, social security numbers, and phone numbers be kept confidential. Id. The Court agreed that email addresses were unnecessary since notice was only being sent via regular mail. However, the Court stated that phone numbers and social security numbers were useful to Plaintiff's counsel, and allowed Plaintiff to obtain this information. Accordingly, the Court requested that Plaintiff filed a second notice consistent with the Court's order.

Hughes, et al. v. Gulf Interstate Field Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1088 (S.D. Ohio Jan. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a motion to sever the claims of named Plaintiffs Thomas Hughes and Desmond McDonald and to stay current proceedings pending appeal of the Court's previous ruling denying conditional certification of a collective action under the FLSA and class certification under Rule 23. The Court had previously granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment on Hughes and McDonald's individual claims and denied the motions for decertification and renewed class certification as moot. The Court notified the parties that it would rule on the motions for decertification and class certification with respect to the remaining class members, and ordered supplemental briefing in light of the named Plaintiffs' dismissal. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs subsequently moved to sever the individual claims of Hughes and McDonald to make the summary judgment against them final and appealable and stay the current proceedings pending such appeal. Plaintiffs argued that severing the individual claims of Hughes and McDonald to allow their appeal of the summary judgment decision was the most efficient method to resolve the claims and issues in this case. The Court determined that the questions in the case concerned whether Defendant met the requirement for Plaintiffs to be considered "highly compensated employees" and therefore that they were exempt from the FLSA overtime provisions. Id. at *3. The Court found that because each Plaintiff earned more than $100,000 annually, they both qualified as highly compensated employees and were exempt. Plaintiffs, however, had argued that Defendant paid them on a day rate basis. The Court stated that the salary basis issue was relevant to its resolution of the decertification and class certification motions. Thus, to the extent that the Court's rulings on decertification and class certification would inevitably rely on its prior determination of the salary basis issue, Plaintiffs argued that an immediate appeal of that issue would more efficiently resolve the issue as to the remaining parties. Id. at *4. The Court found that the resolution of the decertification and class certification motions would likely require the Court to depend on its earlier ruling regarding the salary basis issue. The Court further opined that Plaintiffs would face greater prejudice should the Sixth Circuit reach a different conclusion on the salary basis issue after an appeal. Id. at *7. If such a scenario arose, Plaintiffs would have the difficult task of putting the dispersed FLSA collective action back together again. The Court therefore held that there was no just reason for delay in allowing the grant of summary judgment on the individual claims of Plaintiffs Hughes and McDonald to become final and appealable. Id. The Court thereby granted Plaintiffs' motion to sever the claims of Hughes and McDonald and stay the present proceedings pending a final ruling from the Sixth Circuit upon Plaintiffs' appeal.

Johnson, et al. v. C.H. Robinson International, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 140660 (W.D. Mo. May 9, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of exempt employees, brought a collective action asserting that Defendant illegally misclassified exempt employees and denied them overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the Missouri Minimum Wage Law ("MMWL"). The parties filed five motions, including: (i) Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification, (ii) Defendant's motion to compel arbitration and stay the action pending arbitration; (iii) Defendant's motion to strike Plaintiffs' collective action allegations; (iv) Defendant's motion to stay consideration of Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification; and (v) Plaintiffs' motion to stay consideration of Defendant's motion to compel arbitration pending a ruling on the motion for conditional certification. Id. at *2. Defendant argued that in the interest of judicial economy, the Court should decide the pending motion to dismiss before the motion for conditional certification. Defendants further argued that a stay was appropriate because the collective action definition included employees that were subject to arbitration agreements. Thus, Defendants argued that if the Court granted the motion to compel arbitration, the Court could stay the litigation pending arbitration, and therefore it would make sense to rule on the arbitration motion first. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiffs objected to a stay of the conditional certification motion, and asserted that such a delay would prejudice the claims of collective action members. Plaintiffs asserted that a stay should be entered relative to Defendant's motion to compel arbitration and that motion should be decided after the motion for conditional certification. The Court found that because the conditional certification stage of litigation merely involves notice, there was no reason to stay the motion for certification pending the motion to dismiss. Id. at *8. The Court reasoned that judges routinely grant conditional certification motions despite the existence of arbitration issues. Id. at *9. The Court held that once the identity of the collective action members was determined, it then would consider whether to compel arbitration of certain claims. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to stay consideration of Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification and granted Plaintiffs' motion to stay consideration of Defendant's motion to compel pending a ruling on conditional certification.

Johnson, et al. v. Serenity Transport, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 156804 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a labor contractor, brought a class and collective action alleging that Defendant Serenity Transportation ("Serenity") misclassified him as an independent contractor rather than an employee and therefore denied him the benefits of the FLSA and California law. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff also sued Defendants SCI and the County of Santa Clara under a joint employer theory, arguing that both entities were jointly and severally liable for Serenity's wage & hour violations. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs filed a motion to invalidate releases signed by former and current Serenity drivers and to issue a corrective notice to the FLSA collective action members. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion, finding that Serenity discouraged drivers from participating in the lawsuit, and that the releases contained misleading and inaccurate information. Approximately 30 days into the collective action opt-in period, Serenity began contacting putative class and collective action members in an attempt to secure their exclusion from the litigation. Among other things, Serenity sent its drivers a letter concerning the lawsuit and a "Settlement and Release Agreement" ("Release"). Id. at *4. The Court found that Serenity engaged in ex parte communications that discouraged drivers from participating in the lawsuit and provided the drivers with a misleading and inaccurate release; thus, the Court opined that invalidation of the Releases and curative notice was warranted. The Court noted that the Release encompassed all claims in the lawsuit, including the FLSA claims, but neither the Release nor the letter told the drivers that the settlement of FLSA claims required the Court's approval. Id. at *19. The Court noted that the Release incorrectly stated on whose behalf the claims in this litigation were being brought. Id. at *20. Further, the Court found that the Release told a driver that by signing the Release he agreed to opt-out of the "the on-going Litigation and not participate in future." Id. The Court held that this language, to a lay person, improperly suggested that by signing the Release the driver was precluded from participating as a witness or otherwise participating in the litigation, not just that he will not be a class member. Id. In addition, the Court found that Serenity did not provide the fourth amended complaint, or any version of the complaint, to the drivers when it presented them with the Release. Finally, the Court was troubled by the letter's suggestion that the drivers contact Defendants' counsel. The Court opined that it was one thing to identify Defendants' counsel, but it was another to suggest that a driver contact Defendants' counsel. Id. at *22. The Court held that Defendants' misstatements and omissions required invalidating the Release as to all drivers and sending curative notice to all drivers notifying them that their releases were invalid and re-instating the FLSA opt-in period for a period of 60 days from the sending of new notice. Id. at *23. The Court also ordered that Serenity not have any contact with the drivers about the lawsuit during the renewed opt-in period. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion.

Katz, et al. v. DNC Services Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 195736 (E.D. Pa. Nov. 29, 2017). Plaintiffs, a class of former campaign workers who were hired by several state Democratic parties during the 2016 presidential election, alleged that the state parties colluded with the Democratic National Committee to over work and under-pay field organizers in violation of various federal and state wage & hour laws. Id. at *2. The out-of-state Democratic party Defendants ("Foreign Defendants") sought dismissal of the action on the grounds that the Court could not exercise personal jurisdiction over them. The Court found that: (i) it would be improper to exercise jurisdiction over any one of the Foreign Defendants; and (ii) Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that further jurisdictional discovery would be fruitful. Plaintiffs alleged that they regularly worked upwards of 12 hours in a day on behalf of their respective state party employers, but were only paid a flat monthly rate regardless of the total number of hours worked. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs contended that pursuant to the alter ego theory of personal jurisdiction, the Court should exercise jurisdiction over each Foreign Defendant because Defendant DNC was subject to the jurisdiction of the Court. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs further argued that Foreign Defendants' participation in 2016 presidential campaign activities constituted in-state contacts sufficient to independently support a finding of general personal jurisdiction over each state party. Id. at *5-6. The Foreign Defendants submitted affidavits that collectively established that: (i) the Foreign Defendants were neither corporate parents nor subsidiaries to any other corporate entity; (ii) the Foreign Defendants were each subject to individual state and federal campaign finance requirements; (iii) the Foreign Defendants did not own property, solicit business, advertise, or hire within Pennsylvania; (iv) the Foreign Defendants were self-governing; and (v) the Foreign Defendants did not require any Plaintiff employed as a field organizer to work within Pennsylvania as a condition of employment. Id. at *6. The Court found that that Plaintiffs failed to establish that the Foreign Defendants' contacts with the forum, alone or in the aggregate, were sufficient to support general or specific jurisdiction consistent with constitutional due process. Plaintiffs argued that the Foreign Defendants were the alter egos of Defendant DNC because Defendant DNC "exercised a sufficient amount of operational control" over each state Democratic Party. Id. at *7. The Court disagreed, and determined that Defendant DNC did not exercise the requisite level of control over the Foreign Defendants' day-to-day operations to be considered their alter egos. The Court reasoned that the "corporate fusion" required for a finding of an alter ego relationship also did not exist. Id. at *16. First, Defendant DNC did not own any one of the Foreign Defendants, in whole or in part, and each Foreign Defendant fulfilled tax and campaign finance filing requirements as independent entities. Second, by Plaintiffs' own account, each Foreign Defendant was "responsible for governing" the Democratic Party of its respective state and "raises money, hires staff, and coordinates strategy to support candidates" running for local, state, and national office. Id. at *17. Third, all of Plaintiffs' arguments surrounding the existence of common marketing strategies, logos, trademarks, and information databases were limited to Presidential campaign efforts, not that of state or local elections. Id. The Court therefore found no act by the Foreign Defendants that would constitute purposeful availment sufficient to confer specific jurisdiction. The Court also opined that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the second element of the specific jurisdiction standard, which required a showing that Plaintiffs' claims arose from or related to the Foreign Defendants' instate activities. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Court granted the Foreign Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Lackie, et al. v. U.S. Well Services, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12373 (S.D. Ohio Jan. 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action alleging Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action. The parties subsequently stipulated to conditional certification of the collective action and agreed to language detailing the notice, with the exception of whether the notice should notify putative Plaintiffs of the potential tax consequences associated with opting-in to the action. The parties submitted briefing on the issue and each presented the Court with proposed notices. The proposed collective action consisted of "all current and former hourly employees who were employed by Defendant during the period of December 11, 2012 to March 15, 2015, received per diem payments, and worked more than forty hours in one or more workweeks in which the per diem payments were paid." Id. at *2. The parties further stipulated that counsel for Plaintiffs would serve as lead counsel for the collective action, Plaintiffs would serve as the representative Plaintiffs, and Defendant would provide the names and last known contact information for all putative class members within twenty-one days of the Court's approval of the notice. Id. at *2-3. The Court found that it was necessary to make minor changes to the notice's language concerning the putative Plaintiffs' right to select counsel of their own choosing and lead counsel's proposal to potentially "advance" the litigation expenses incurred by Defendant in the event Plaintiffs did not succeed on their claims and the Court awarded costs to Defendant. Id. at *3. Specifically, the with regard to the tax implications of a fee award, the Court determined that it must strike a balance between the potential in terrorem effect of the language and the desire to provide putative Plaintiffs with sufficient information to allow them to make an informed decision on whether they wish to participate in the litigation. The Court therefore found although that some statement was warranted in the notice, it could not be excessive. Id. at *5. The Court also amended the notice to contain language stating that if an individual chose not to join this lawsuit, the individual would not be affected by any judgment or settlement rendered in this case, and could file a separate own lawsuit. Id. at *7. Finally, the parties agreed to language pertaining to the fee agreement under which lead counsel will represent the putative Plaintiffs. The Court stated that all language in the proposed notice pertaining to the advancement of costs must be stricken and replaced with language stating that Plaintiffs are not required to pay fees unless successful in this action. Id. at *10. The Court thereby granted Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action and approved the notice with modifications as directed.

Lietzbach, et al. v. Atlas Van Lines, Inc.,* Case No. 16-CV-8790 (C.D. Cal. Feb. 22, 2017). Plaintiff, a truck driver, filed a putative class action against Defendant claiming various wage & hour violations under California labor law. Defendant moved to dismiss all claims, transfer venue, and strike Plaintiff's class definition. The Court denied the motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(2) for lack of personal jurisdiction, and denied the motion to transfer venue under Rule 12(b)(3) for improper venue. The Court granted the motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6) except as to the claim under § 204 of the California Labor Code ("CLC"). The Court granted the motion to strike and ordered Plaintiff to amend. The Court ruled that the "minimum contacts" test was satisfied and it did have personal jurisdiction, as Plaintiff was a citizen of California, Defendant was licensed to do business in California, and the alleged violations involved California law. Id. at 4. The Court also noted that the proposed class included all drivers residing in California, and hence California had an interest in addressing violations of its laws that injured its citizens. Id. at 5. The Court ruled that venue was proper because of those same facts. Id. at 6. The Court also denied Defendant's motion to transfer on the basis that even though the action could have been brought in the Southern District of Indiana, the balance of convenience and justice did not weigh in favor of transfer to the Southern District of Indiana. Id. at 7-8. Plaintiff and the entire class of drivers were California residents and the allegations involved violations of California wage & hour laws. Further, California had a strong interest in protecting its citizens and enforcing its laws. The Court dismissed with prejudice Plaintiff's claim of failure to pay all wages owed under the CLC, finding that Plaintiff did not have a private right of action under § 204. The Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss all of Plaintiff's claims on the basis that Plaintiff failed to allege an employment relationship, finding that the allegation that Defendant improperly classified Plaintiff was sufficient to survive the motion to dismiss stage. Id. at 13. Defendant also moved to dismiss Plaintiff's meal and rest claims as Plaintiff alleged no facts in support of this claim. Id. at 15. The Court agreed and ruled that Plaintiff's conclusory allegations were insufficient because Plaintiff failed to explain how the shifts were scheduled to prevent him from taking meal or rest breaks. Id. Similarly, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's overtime claims as he failed to allege any facts to support the claim. Id. at 18. The Court also dismissed Plaintiff's claim for failure to pay all wages upon separation in violation of California law because it was based upon his inadequate meal, rest break, and unpaid wage claims. Id. The Court also dismissed the accurate wage statement claim because the underlying claims were not properly alleged. Id. at 19. The Court dismissed Plaintiff's claim of failure to reimburse business expenses as he failed to allege any expenses that he incurred. Id. at 20. The Court also dismissed Plaintiff's California Unfair Competition Act ("UCL") claim because it was derivative of the insufficiently pled meal period, rest break, unpaid wage, and failure to reimburse claims. Id. The Court also denied Plaintiff's motion to dismiss the class claims for failure to meet the Rule 23 standards. Id. at 21. The Court noted that while Plaintiff barely alleged more than legal conclusions with respect to numerosity, typicality, and adequacy and was unlikely to satisfy Rule 23 requirements, this was an issue to be determined at the class certification stage. Id. Defendant's motion to strike the class was granted and the Court ordered Plaintiff to amend the class definition to clarify the scope of the class to include drivers who resided in California and drove for Defendant. Id. at 22.

Lopes, et al. v. Heso, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 178709 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of hourly electricians and foremen, filed a collective and class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). In lieu of a motion for conditional certification of a collective action, the parties requested that the Court provide rulings on several points, including: (i) whether the recipients of a Court-approved notice should be determined based on a three-year or six-year notice period; (ii) if the proper date for calculating the look back period was the date the complaint was filed or the date notice was issued; (iii) whether Defendants should be required to post notice in conspicuous areas in the workplace; and (iv) if a reminder notice may be sent. Id. at *1-2. As to the first point, the Court noted that the FLSA has a three-year statute of limitations, while the NYLL has a six-year statute of limitations. The Court stated that where Plaintiffs have yet to request Rule 23 certification, a six-year notice period will best serve the Court's interests in judicial economy by more rapidly providing the Court with information about the FLSA opt-in Plaintiffs. Id. at *13. The Court reasoned that the six-year limitation period would aid the parties and the Court in determining whether to certify a Rule 23 class. The Court opined that a six-year notice period further served the interests of judicial economy by only requiring Defendants to make one production of the names of all potential Plaintiffs. Id. The Court also found that it would be appropriate to use the date of the complaint's filing as the look-back date for the statute of limitations, given how often equitable tolling issues emerge in FLSA cases. Id. at *15. The Court therefore ruled for notice to be mailed to all electricians and foremen who worked for Defendants during the six years prior to December 8, 2016, the date of the filing of the complaint. Id. at *16. Defendants objected to Plaintiffs' request that notice of the action be posted in the workplace in addition to being mailed. Id. at *16-17. The Court determined that Defendants failed to articulate convincing reasons to deny Plaintiffs' request for notice posting at the corporate office. Id. at *18. The Court noted that case law authorities regularly find that notice posting requests place a very low burden on Defendants in FLSA collective actions, particularly when compared to other forms of notice. Id. at *19. Finally, with respect to a reminder notice being sent, the Court noted that a frequent objection to reminder notices is that they will convey the appearance that the Court itself is encouraging participation in the lawsuit. Id. at *20. The Court explained that this concern could be addressed by requiring that the reminder notice contain an up-front disclaimer stating that the Court neither encourages nor discourages participation in the lawsuit. Id. at *20-21. The Court held that this approach would be appropriate in this case. Accordingly, the Court ruled on the parties' contested procedural points regarding conditional certification.

Mitchell, et al. v. Federal Express Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 127018 (D. Md. Aug. 10, 2017). Plaintiff, a security specialist for Federal Express, filed suit to recover unpaid wages for overtime in violation of the FLSA and Maryland Wage & Hour Law ("MWHL"). Id. at *3. Defendant moved to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6), and the Court denied the motion. Defendant argued that Plaintiff was exempt from the FLSA's maximum hours' provisions as an "employee of a carrier by air subject to the provisions of Title II of the Railway Labor Act." 29 U.S.C. § 213(b)(3). *Id. at 5 Defendant argued that Courts have found that it qualified as an air carrier. Id. at *6. Plaintiff alleged that most of his work revolved around servicing and maintaining the safety and security needs of employees and customers, and whether his duties were related to Defendant's transportation activities was a question of fact that could not be resolved on a motion to dismiss. Id. The Court agreed and denied the motion, ruling that whether an employee's activities excluded them from the overtime benefits of the FLSA was a question of law, but how employees spent their working time was a question of fact. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied the motion as to the FLSA claims because applicability of the FLSA exemptions required an individualized determination into the work that the employee performed. Id. at *7. Defendant also argued that Plaintiff's MWHL claim was preempted by the Airline Deregulation Act ("ADA"). Id. at *7. The ADA prohibits any state from "enacting or enforcing a law, regulation, or other provision . . . related to a price, route, or service of an air carrier." Id. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's duties were encompassed within the definition of Defendant's services. However, the Court ruled that a determination of how the MWHL's wage & hour requirements related to or affected Defendant's prices, routes, or services were also questions of fact. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss as to Plaintiffs' MWHL claim.

Ndrecaj, et al. v. 4 A Kids LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101537 (S.D.N.Y. June 28, 2017). Plaintiff filed an action asserting violations of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Before Defendants were served, Plaintiff's counsel submitted a letter stating that Plaintiff had requested to withdraw from the case. Plaintiff told his counsel that he wanted to "drop the case" and "just didn't want to go forward with it," but that he would pay all of the fees that had accrued. Id. at *1-2. The letter from Plaintiff's counsel contended that, if the Court were to view Plaintiff's request as a proposed dismissal, the Court should deny that request. Id. at *2. The letter further sought an order "addressing Plaintiff's stance/status in the case" and an expedited initial pretrial conference. Id. The Court issued an order to show cause why this case should not be dismissed for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. The Court noted that, because Plaintiff sought to withdraw before Defendants filed their answer and before any class or collective action certification order, he did not need the Court's approval to withdraw. The Court also ordered briefing on the question of whether the Court continued to have subject-matter jurisdiction over the case given that the only named Plaintiff had withdrawn. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff's counsel submitted a response arguing that the Court should continue to assert jurisdiction over this case. Defendants argued that the Court lacked jurisdiction. The Court ultimately concluded that it lacks subject-matter jurisdiction. Because Plaintiff's voluntary withdrawal occurred well before any collective or class certification order, the Court found that Plaintiff's voluntary withdrawal rendered "the entire action . . . moot." Id. at *4. The Court noted that far from there being a pending certification motion, Defendants in this case have not yet been formerly served. Id. at *7. Plaintiff's counsel contended that the Court should retain jurisdiction in order "to hold Defendants responsible for their" purported violations of the FLSA. Id. at *8. The Court rejected that position. It explained that it was dismissing the action without prejudice for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, and such a dismissal would not impede the FLSA's goal of ensuring "employee protections," as the Defendants may face liability for any FLSA violations they may have committed in another lawsuit filed by either this Plaintiff or by others. Id. at *9. Therefore, because there was no named Plaintiff in this action, the Court dismissed the matter without prejudice for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

Oldershaw, et al. v. Davida Healthcare Partners, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84882 (D. Colo. June 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed an action asserting that Defendant denied them overtime wages for work performed outside of scheduled shift hours, on weekends, and during lunch breaks in violation of the FLSA and the Colorado Wage Claim Act ("CWCA"). The Court bifurcated the FLSA claims from the CWCA claims and directed that the FLSA claims proceed first. The Court explained that there are important distinctions between a FLSA collective action and a Rule 23 class action. The Court explicitly concluded that a named Plaintiff in an FLSA action has no interest in the collective action beyond her individual claim because no separate legal entity is created, which is "fundamentally different from a class action" in which certification creates a "Plaintiff class," which is then represented by the named Plaintiff and Plaintiffs' counsel. However, the Court explained that in an FLSA collective action, every named Plaintiff and opt-in Plaintiff pursues his or her individual claim. The Court noted several logical corollaries to the distinction, including: (i) applicable statute of limitation is calculated differently; (ii) a FLSA collective action acts much like a civil suit with many Plaintiffs who pursue their own claims with possible different counsel, different pre-trial decisions, and different settlement terms; and (iii) in a Rule 23 class action, the representative Plaintiff and class counsel act for the class. Id. at *6-7. The Court therefore concluded that the differences between an FLSA collective action and a Rule 23 class action made the simultaneous consideration of both types of claims unworkable, inconvenient, costly, and potentially prejudicial to some Plaintiffs. Id. at *7. The Court found that these difficulties would be best addressed by bifurcating the FLSA claims from the state law claims, and sequencing their determination. The Court stated that it would begin with the FLSA claims and stay all state law claims until the FLSA claims were resolved. The Court noted that proceeding with the FLSA claims prior to the state law claims accomplished several objectives, including: (i) preserving the rights of the employees with regard to statutes of limitation; (ii) determination of issues with regard to the FLSA claims may have preclusive effect with regard to the state claims; and (iii) the Court had subject-matter jurisdiction as to the FLSA claims. Id. at *18-19. The Court stated that if the parties reached a settlement of both the FLSA and state law claims simultaneously, they could request that the Court entertain the class certification question solely for the purposes of effectuating the settlement. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Court bifurcated the claims and ruled it would proceed on Plaintiff's FLSA claims and stay the state law claims.

Robbins, et al. v. Xto Energy, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 118582 (N.D. Tex. July 28, 2017). Plaintiff filed a collective action against Defendant, his former employer, alleging it failed to pay him and other similarly-situated employees overtime in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff alleged he was responsible for inspecting and operating well equipment and performing other routine duties as assigned. Plaintiff defined the scope of the collective action as current and former frontline oilfield workers, including lease operators, automation technicians, and other production-side workers. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff asserted that he and other collective action members worked in excess of 40 hours per week but were not paid the time and a half rate required by the FLSA. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's alleged overbroad collective action definition and related collective action allegations. Defendant alleged that Plaintiff did not properly allege that this action can be maintained as a collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Plaintiff asserted that workers were required to work in excess of 12 hours a day, seven days a week, for consecutive weeks, in Defendant's oilfields across 15 states. Id. at *3. Plaintiff further alleged that he worked as a lease operator for Defendant "within the last three years and until approximately September 2014." Id. at *4. Plaintiff further claimed he was responsible for inspecting and operating well equipment and performing other route and routine duties as assigned, and that collective action members' duties were to "perform similarly non-exempt duties pursuant to Defendant's own common classification scheme." Id. The Court stated that although the Fifth Circuit has not addressed the issue, many case law authorities in the Fifth Circuit have consistently found an FLSA pleading sufficient when it "puts Defendant on notice as to the relevant date range, as well as the approximate number of hours for which Plaintiff claims [he or she] was under-compensated . . . the FLSA does not require more." Id. However, the Court found that Plaintiff's allegations did not cite the date range when he worked or when the FLSA violations allegedly occurred. Id. at *5. The Court explained that although Plaintiff's complaint asserted that he worked over 12 hours a day for seven days for weeks at a time, he did not state the number of hours for which he was allegedly under-compensated. Id. Further, Plaintiff named 15 states where the Defendant conducts business, but did not state where the alleged FLSA violations occurred. Finally, the Court noted that Plaintiff gave several job titles for members of the collective action, he did not describe their work or state the common attributes between them, and only vaguely asserting that the purported collective action members had duties similar to his own. Id. Overall, the Court held that Plaintiff failed to adequately put Defendant on notice of the characteristics of the members of the purported collective action. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Schilling, et al. v. PGA, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38407 (W.D. Wis. June 19, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA and Wisconsin state labor laws. The Court had previously granted Plaintiffs leave to: (i) add two new Plaintiffs; and (ii) assert a claim that Defendant violated Wisconsin law by computing overtime pay using the rate for the type of work performed during the overtime hours, rather than the often higher average wage rate earned by the employee during that workweek. The Court, however, denied Plaintiffs leave to add a prevailing wage claim and a discrete claim concerning Plaintiff Sinclair. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs filed a motion for reconsideration and a motion for sanctions. At the same time, Defendant filed a motion to strike Plaintiffs' third amended complaint. The Court found no basis to revisit its decision to deny Plaintiffs leave to amend their complaint to add a prevailing wage claim because such a representative claim would require class certification under Rule 23. The Court held that it was simply too late to add that claim to the proposed hybrid FLSA collective action and class action overtime pay claims already at issue. Id. at *4. As such, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration. Defendant also urged the Court to award attorneys' fees in responding to Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs also filed a motion for sanctions, and argued that Defendant's request for fees was unfair and improper. The Court stated that Plaintiffs should have developed their argument in their original motion to amend, rather than simply cite to a state law case precedents in the reconsideration motion without any explanation or analysis as to why a state procedure embraced in that case would govern a class action in a federal lawsuit. Accordingly, the Court declined both Defendant's motion for attorneys' fees and Plaintiffs' motion for sanctions. Finally, in its prior opinion and order granting Plaintiffs leave to amend their complaint in certain respects, the Court had directed Plaintiffs to file a third amended complaint consistent with the rulings by February 23, 2017. Plaintiffs missed that deadline and filed the third amended complaint on March 10, 2017. In response, Defendant filed a motion to strike the third amended complaint as untimely. Id. at *6. The Court found that Defendant was not unfairly prejudiced by the delay, particularly since Plaintiffs' allegations were previously disclosed in the proposed third amended complaint for which the Court already had issued a decision on Plaintiff's motion for leave. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to strike.

Shultz, et al. v. Nomac Drilling, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106564 (W.D. Okla. July 11, 2017). Plaintiff, a rig welder, brought a collective action asserting that Defendants failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Defendants alleged that they had a contractual agreement with ARMS. Welding, Inc. ("ARMS"), in which ARMS agreed to indemnify Defendants against wage claims. The Master Services Agreement ("MSA") called for ARMS to provide welding services, including the requisite labor, to Nomac. The MSA also deemed ARMS an independent contractor and provided that ARMS would indemnify Nomac for any "claims . . . arising out of or in connection with any asserted or established violation of any such laws, orders, rules, or regulations by [ARMS] or its sub-contractors and their respective employees." Id. at *2. Defendants alleged that ARMS had agreed to indemnify them against any FLSA liability and asserted claims against ARMS for breach of contract and indemnification. Plaintiff filed a motion to dismiss Defendants' third-party complaint on the basis that the Court either lacked jurisdiction over the state law claims or that they were not appropriate for public policy reasons. Id. at *3. The Court stated that the first inquiry was whether Plaintiff could move to dismiss these claims at all, as Defendants' claims were against ARMS, and not Plaintiff. The Court noted that the question would be whether parties could move to dismiss claims under Rule 12(b)(6) that were not asserted against them personally. Id. at *4. The Court determined that other case law authorities unanimously had answered "no" when faced with the same inquiry. However, the Court opined that, even if Plaintiff lacked standing to seek dismissal of Defendants' third-party claims for breach of contract and indemnification, the Court must find that it has subject-matter jurisdiction over those claims to proceed. Id. at *5. The Court held that Defendants' claims did little to subvert the FLSA process and, in fact, directly impacted the merits of Plaintiff's overtime wage claim. The Court determined that, if Plaintiff was to recover overtime wages under the FLSA, the Court needed to identify his employer. Id. at *5-6. Defendants insisted that, by the terms of the MSA it entered with ARMS, ARMS was Plaintiff's employer and it had a duty to indemnify Defendants for FLSA violations. Id. at *6. The Court found that this dispute must be resolved before Plaintiff could recover anything. Therefore, the Court held that, given that Defendants' claims for breach of contract and indemnification were intertwined with the merits of Plaintiff's FLSA claim, exercising supplemental jurisdiction over them was appropriate. Id. The Court concluded that Defendants' claims for breach of contract and indemnification stemmed from a common set of facts, i.e., Plaintiff believed he was owed overtime wages under the FLSA, and the MSA purported to transfer any FLSA liability from Defendant to ARMS. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to dismiss.

Swamy, et al. v. Title Source, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 186535 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 10, 2017). Plaintiff, an appraiser, filed a class action alleging that he was misclassified as an exempt employee and therefore Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and state wage & hour laws. Plaintiff sought conditional certification of his FLSA collective action on behalf of all "staff appraisers" who he alleged were misclassified as exempt from overtime pay, and as a result are owed back wages. Id. at *3. Defendant argued that the putative collective action members were not similarly-situated, and conditional certification would therefore be inappropriate. Defendant further argued that the Court should exercise its discretion to deny Plaintiff's motion and reserve this decision for a later date. Id. at *6. Defendant contended that mailing an opt-in notice on federal claims in late November, followed three months later with an opt-out notice in connection with final certification of a class action asserting state law claims (should it be granted) would be confusing to recipients. Id. at *7. Defendant also asserted that this two-step process may result in the pointless expenditure of resources should the class later be decertified. Since Plaintiff was required file a motion for class certification of the state law claims by January 18, 2018, Defendant proposed delaying any collective action certification until that date, at which time "the Court will be able to make a determination about the propriety of collective treatment under both Rule 23 and the FLSA in one fell swoop, based upon a full record." Id. at *8. Plaintiff argued that Defendant's proposed plan was actually designed to further run the clock on FLSA claims for the statute of limitations, thereby diminishing damages that collective action members would be entitled to with each passing week. Id. The Court noted that Defendant, however, agreed to toll the statute of limitations, thereby eliminating Plaintiff's concerns. The Court further held that given the late date at which Plaintiff applied for conditional certification, and its proximity to the last day to seek class certification of his related California labor law claims, the Court found that no conditional certification or opt-in notice is necessary at this time. Accordingly, the Court held Plaintiff's motion for certification of his putative FLSA collective in abeyance.

(xxv) Public Employee FLSA Collective Action Litigation

Aguilar, et al. v. Management & Training Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 175608 (D.N.Mex. Oct. 24, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of correctional workers, filed a putative class and collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay wages and overtime pursuant to the FLSA and the New Mexico Minimum Wage Act ("NMMWA"). Plaintiffs asserted that they should be compensated for various pre-shift and post-shift, including: (i) waiting at the prison, (ii) clearing security, (iii) taking and returning equipment, and (iv) meeting and reporting to other detention officers. Defendant moved for summary judgment and the Court granted the Defendant's motion in its entirety. At the outset, the Court rejected Plaintiffs' claim that that they were entitled to compensation due to Defendant's rounding policy, which Plaintiffs claimed was unlawful. The Court agreed with Defendant that Plaintiffs' rounding policy theory did not apply in this case, because Defendant paid its officers based on their shift schedule, if they clocked-in or clocked-out no more than ten minutes on either side of the scheduled start or stop time. The Court concluded that the practice of rounding could not be reconciled with Defendant's ten-minute adjustment window and simply did not apply. Accordingly, the Court granted summary in favor of Defendant on Plaintiffs' rounding claim. Further, the Court found that the only pre-shift and post-shift activity that was compensable under the FLSA was the officers' pass-down briefings on the post. After the officers arrived at their posts, there was a pass-down or overlap period between the shifts of two to five minutes and the officer going off shift conveyed information about the post to the officer coming on shift. Id. at *38. The Court found that the pass-down briefings were indispensable to Plaintiffs' principal activities, and were therefore compensable under the FLSA. Id. at *39. However, the Court concluded that Defendant was not precluded as a matter of law from asserting the de minimis defense as to the pass-down claims, and that any discrepancy between what Plaintiffs should be paid and their scheduled start and end times was de minimis. Id. at *59. The Court also ruled that the other challenged activities were not compensable as they were not principal activities. The Court held that Plaintiffs' time was not compensable with respect to: (i) metal detector clearance; (ii) obtaining pre-shift assignments; (iii) briefing and paperwork; (iv) collection of keys and equipment; and (v) walking to and from post-shift activities. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant summary judgment with respect to all of Plaintiffs' claims under the FLSA. The Court also ruled that its findings on Plaintiffs' FLSA claims with respect to pre-shift and post-shift activities also applied to Plaintiffs' state law claims. Accordingly, the Court likewise granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' state law claims under the NMMWA.

Alamo, et al. v. United States,* Case No. 15-CV-5149 (Fed. Cir. Mar. 9, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former Army emergency medical technicians and paramedics, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to properly calculate overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgement, which the District Court granted on the grounds that no under-payment occurred. On appeal, the Federal Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Before October of 2012, Plaintiffs were generally scheduled for 24-hours on-duty followed by 48-hours off-duty. After October of 2012, Plaintiffs switched to a schedule consisting of two 48-hour workweeks. Since Plaintiffs worked more than 40 hours in one week, Defendant paid: (i) basic pay under the Federal Employees Pay Act; (ii) stand-by duty premium pay; and (iii) FLSA overtime pay for regularly scheduled overtime. Id. at 2-3. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant under-paid them by using an incorrect formula to calculate the FLSA overtime pay. Id. at 3. The Federal Circuit determined that Plaintiffs stand-by premium pay already compensated for the Plaintiffs' pay. Accordingly, the Federal Circuit found that the additional half-time payment sufficiently fulfilled Defendant's obligation for purposes of the FLSA. Id. at 8. Accordingly, the Federal Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling that granted summary judgment.

Alfaro, et al. v. City Of San Diego,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 90097 (S.D. Cal. June 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of emergency radio operators ("EROs") in the San Diego Fire Department ("SDFD"), filed a collective action asserting that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs alleged that they worked 56 hours per week and were not paid overtime. Plaintiffs contended that they were entitled to overtime pay and that, when they complained about their missing overtime wages, they were dismissed from their positions in retaliation for their complaints. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs alleged that Chief Fennessy, the head of the SDFD, had ultimate decision-making authority over personnel matters. Defendants argued that Chief Fennessy was not a proper Defendant in this action because he was not an "employer" as the term had been applied under the FLSA. Id. at *3. Defendants argued that Chief Fennessy was not an employer because he did not control the "purse strings." Id. at *4. The Court held that the Chief's ability to control the purse strings was not the sole factor in determining whether he was an employer under the FLSA. The Court explained that the FLSA prescribes conduct for employers that involve other issues than overtime pay, and therefore if the definition of employer was solely dependent on power over the purse strings, then many managers would not be liable under the FLSA for violations of these provisions. Id. at *5. The Court noted that if Defendants' argument was accepted, such an outcome would thwart the "broad remedial purposes" of the FLSA. Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs alleged that Chief Fennessy had the ultimate decision-making authority over SDFD personnel matters, and therefore it was a reasonable inference that, by exercising ultimate decision-making authority over personnel matters, Chief Fennessy had the power to hire and fire Plaintiffs, control their work schedules and conditions of employment, and access their employment records. Id. at *6. The Court thus concluded that Plaintiffs alleged enough facts at the motion to dismiss stage to meet three of the four factors of the economic reality test. Id. The Court determined that the thrust of Defendants' argument was that a person could not be liable for failing to pay overtime if he had no power to pay the overtime. The Court noted that could be true but stated that such issue went to the question of liability, not to the definition of employer under the statute. Id. at *7. Regardless, the Court found that, at this early stage, Defendants had not established that Chief Fennessy had no power to facilitate overtime pay. Defendants also argued that there was a factual dispute regarding Plaintiffs' hourly wage rates and that, if Plaintiffs prevailed on their claims, the Court would have to interpret a memorandum of understanding ("MOU") between the parties to compute damages. Defendants, therefore, contended that Plaintiffs were required to exhaust the remedies provided in the MOU prior to initiating their action. Defendants argued that if any portion of Plaintiffs' claims required interpretation of an MOU, then Plaintiffs were required to exhaust their remedies under the MOU prior to initiating this action. Id. at *8-9. The Court disagreed and opined that the key was whether the claims were based on rights arising from the FLSA or from the MOU. The Court held that although it might need to look to the MOU for damages computation, the FLSA created the rights at issue here. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Allen, et al. v. City Of Chicago,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 14230 (7th Cir. Aug. 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of police officers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant wilfully violated the FLSA by not paying them overtime compensation for the time spent performing off-duty work on their Defendant-issued BlackBerry devices. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant maintained an unwritten policy to deny Plaintiffs compensation for this off-duty work they performed. Id. Over the course of more than five years of litigation, the District Court conditionally certified a collective action, denied Defendant's motion to decertify the collective action, and denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Id. at *3-4. Ultimately, the District Court held a bench trial on the threshold issue of whether Defendant maintained an unwritten policy to deny Plaintiffs compensation for off-duty BlackBerry work they performed. After weighing all admissible evidence, the District Court entered judgment in Defendant's favor. Although Plaintiffs established that they performed off-duty work on their BlackBerrys, the District Court found that Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden of showing that Defendant did not compensate them pursuant to any unlawful policy of Defendant or that Defendant suffered or permitted the work to be done without compensation. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit held that the District Court reasonably concluded that requiring the police department to check what they knew of the officers' off-duty work against officers' time slips they approved would be "extremely impractical." Id. at *20. Plaintiffs also contended that the police department discouraged them from seeking overtime payment for off-duty BlackBerry work, which discouraged them from submitting time slips for the work. Id. at *22. Neither the District Court nor the Seventh Circuit were moved by the evidence in support of this argument, as no supervisor ever told any Plaintiffs not to submit time slips for BlackBerry work, and no officer was disciplined for submitting such time slips. Id. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit upheld the District Court's judgment.

Cummings, et al. v. Bussey*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 61332 (D.N.Mex. April 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of workers on government public work projects, filed a lawsuit alleging that Defendant violated their federal rights to procedural and substantive due process pursuant to the Fourteenth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution and 42 U.S.C.§ 1983 by failing to pay wages in accordance with the New Mexico Public Works Minimum Wage Act ("NMPWMWA"). Id. at *11. Plaintiffs claimed that the rate they were paid was less than that required by the NMPWMWA. Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint on the grounds that it was entitled to qualified immunity. Id. at *13. The Court granted Defendant's motion as to Plaintiffs' procedural due process claim, but denied the motion as to the substantive due process claim. The NMPWMWA requires that the state pay workers under contracts for the construction of public works and roads the prevailing minimum wage and establishes the procedure for determining the wages. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant's failure to follow the statutorily-mandated procedure for setting the prevailing wages was a violation of Plaintiffs' right to procedural due process. Id. at *16. However, the Court dismissed the procedural due process claim and ruled that Defendant was entitled to qualified immunity because Plaintiffs failed to allege a constitutional violation. Id. at *18. The Court found that the doctrine of qualified immunity applied because the NMPWMWA provided for a right of appeal to challenge the Defendant's decision on wages and Plaintiffs failed to allege that they were not afforded the opportunity to challenge the rates that Defendant used. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted the motion to dismiss on the procedural due process claim. Id. As to the substantive due process claim, Plaintiffs alleged that the Defendant acted arbitrarily, capriciously, and with deliberate indifference to their rights by failing to set prevailing rates in accordance with the NMPWMWA. Id. at *19. Defendant asserted that it was entitled to qualified immunity because Plaintiffs' rights to be paid wages was not clearly established at the time of the contract. Id. at *21. The Court ruled that the plain language of the NMPWMWA provided a property right that was clearly established at the time of Plaintiffs' alleged deprivations. Id. at *25. Accordingly, Defendant was not entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' substantive due process claim and the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss. In sum, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss in part and denied it in part.

Fidler, et al. v. Twentieth Judicial District Drug Task Force,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74465 (M.D. Tenn. May 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, alleged that Defendant, an intergovernmental agency, violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss for lack of standing, and the Court denied the motion. When Plaintiffs began working for Defendant, they continued to receive their salaries from the state government. Defendant maintained a bank account funded solely by fines and civil forfeitures from drug prosecutions. Plaintiffs' overtime compensation was paid from the bank account. In June 2015, the district attorney closed Defendant, and Plaintiffs either left law enforcement entirely or returned to their previous positons. Id. at *3. As to Plaintiffs' suit, Defendant argued that it was entitled to sovereign immunity under the Eleventh Amendment because it was a State entity. Plaintiffs did not dispute that state entities are entitled to sovereign immunity, but argued that Defendant was a local entity. Id. The Court stated that to determine whether Defendant was a State entity, it must weigh four factors, including: (i) the State's potential liability for a judgment against the entity; (ii) the language by which State statutes refer to the entity and the degree of State control and veto power over the entity's actions; (iii) whether State or local officials appoint the board members of the entity; and (iv) whether the entity's functions fall within the traditional purview of State or local government. Id. at *3-4. The Court found that the State did not have potential liability for a judgment against Defendant because any judgment would be paid from Defendant's bank account. As such, the Court determined that this factor weighed against finding that Defendant was a State entity. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs asserted that the State had no control or veto power over Defendant. The Court also held that neither party identified a State statute that referred to Defendant as either a local or State entity relevant to the current FLSA suit. Id. at *5. Accordingly, because Plaintiffs alleged that the State did not control or have veto power over Defendant, and State law was silent on the issue, the Court held that this factor also weighed against finding that Defendant was a State entity. Id. at *6. The Court therefore denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Hanson, et al. v. Milton Township,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 117610 (N.D. Ill. July 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of deputy assessors, brought an action alleging that they were terminated due to their support of the prior assessor during the April 2013 election in violation of the First Amendment rights; § 1983 equal protection claims based upon age discrimination in violation of the ADEA; and the Illinois Human Rights Act ("IHRA"). Plaintiff also asserted violations of the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection Act ("IWPCA") and the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6). Defendants moved to dismiss the § 1983 equal protection claims based upon age and disability discrimination. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs alleged in that their employment was terminated for political reasons and that such a reason is permissible under the law. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs could not allege inconsistently in another count in the complaint that their employment was terminated due to their age. The Court stated that pursuant to Rule 8(d), a party may plead causes of action in the alternative. Id. at *5. The Court further noted that there was not necessarily any inconsistency since Plaintiffs could assert that their employment was terminated due to political reasons and because of their age and/or disability. The Court found that Plaintiffs alleged sufficient facts at this juncture to state valid equal protection claims based on age and disability discrimination. Id. at *6. Therefore, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' equal protection claims. Defendants also sought to dismiss the IWPCA claims. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs' IWPCA claims were premised on an alleged failure to pay Plaintiffs for unused personal and vacation days and overtime pay. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs failed to allege that the compensation was owed under an employment contract or agreement. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs argued that an employment policy can suffice in certain instances to support an IWPCA claim and that such policy was alleged in this case. Id. Defendants agreed that a formal written employment contract is not always required, but contended that there must be some type of agreement relating to a supporting policy. Id. at *7-8. The Court held that Plaintiffs alleged sufficient facts to plausibly suggest a policy that could support an IWPCA claim. The Court opined that whether there existed a written policy that was sufficient to support an IWPCA claim could be determined by examining the evidence beyond the pleadings. At the summary judgment stage, the Court held that Plaintiffs would have to point to sufficient evidence to support their IWPCA claims. Therefore, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' IWPCA claims. Id. at *8. However, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs failed to allege facts that would plausibly suggest that Plaintiffs were employees of any entity or individual other than the Assessor. Id. at *9. Therefore, Defendants' alternative motion to dismiss the IWPCA claims brought against the Township was granted.

Martin, et al. v. United States*, 2017 U.S. Claims LEXIS 97 (Fed. Cl. Feb. 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current or former government employees, filed a collective action alleging that they were not timely compensated for work performed during the government shutdown, in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiffs worked during the first week of the 2013 shutdown, but were not paid for this work on their regularly scheduled paydays because the government understood the Anti-Deficiency Act ("ADA") to prohibit payment until funds were appropriated for that purpose. Plaintiffs asserted that despite prohibitions in the ADA, which prohibits the government from spending money when specific appropriations are not in place, Defendant was still obligated to pay employees pursuant to the FLSA. Defendant contended that "the shutdown placed two seemingly irreconcilable requirements upon Federal agencies: pay excepted employees on their next regularly scheduled payday, and make no such expenditures in the absence of appropriations for that purpose." Id. at *6-7. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment, and the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion and denied Defendant's motion. Plaintiffs asked the Court to determined: (i) whether the government owed liquidated damages to certain employees for violating the FLSA during the 2013 shutdown; and (ii) whether the government was legally unable to determine overtime pay during the 2013 shutdown for certain employees by their regularly scheduled paydays. Id. at *2-3. Defendant requested the Court to determine: (i) whether the government violated the FLSA by not paying certain employees on their regularly scheduled paydays during the 2013 shutdown; (ii) whether the government owed liquidated damages to certain employees for failing to pay regular wages in violation the FLSA; and (iii) whether the government owed liquidated damages to certain employees for failing to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Id. at *3. The Court was unpersuaded that Defendant could entirely avoid liability based only on the superficial conflict between the FLSA and the ADA. The Court found that Plaintiffs' complaint legally advanced sufficient claims for relief against Defendant for alleged violations of the FLSA. Id. at *12. The Court explained that § 216 states, in relevant part, that "any employer who violates the provisions of section 206 or section 207 of this title shall be liable to the employee … affected in the amount of their unpaid minimum wages, or their unpaid overtime compensation, . . . and in an additional equal amount as liquidated damages." Id. Thus, under the applicable legal framework, together with the undisputed and material facts agreed to by the parties, the Court held that Defendant's failure to timely pay Plaintiffs' wages was a violation of the FLSA. Id. at *13-14. Since the Court found that the ADA did not excuse Defendant's FLSA violations, and to allow Defendant to avoid liability under this exception would amount to an end run around that legal conclusion, the Court determined that Defendant was liable for liquidated damages. Id. at *24. The Court opined that Defendant made no inquiry into how to comply with the FLSA, and instead relied entirely on of the primacy of the ADA. Id. at *26. By its own admission, the government did not consider whether requiring essential, non-exempt employees to work during the government shutdown without timely payment of wages would constitute a violation of the FLSA. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment and denied Defendant's motion.

Milwaukee Police Association, et al. v. Flynn,* 863 F.3d 636 (7th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, the Milwaukee Police Association ("MPA"), the labor organization that represents certain non-supervisory Milwaukee police officers as a party in the collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") with the City, and a group of former police officers ("officers"), filed a class action against Defendants Flynn, the Chief of Police, and the City of Milwaukee alleging a violation of procedural due process pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983, and seeking unpaid wages pursuant to Wis. Stat. § 109.03. The officers alleged that Wis. Stat. § 62.50(11) and (18) provided them with a legal entitlement to employment and "pay and benefits" after the chief discharged them, continuing until the Board of Fire and Police Commissioners (the "Board"), affirmed their discharges from the force. Id. at *637. The officers were discharged and their benefits and pay stopped immediately. Id. at *638. The officers appealed their terminations to the Board, which rejected their appeals and they were permanently discharged. The officers claimed that their employment did not end when they were discharged by the chief because they were entitled to employment until the conclusion of their appeals. The District Court rejected Plaintiffs' claims and granted judgment on the pleadings, finding that under Wisconsin law the former officers were not entitled to employment or pay and benefits between discharge by the chief and affirmation of discharge by the Board. Id. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The Seventh Circuit found that under Wisconsin law, the former officers had no property interest in employment once they were discharged for cause by Defendant Flynn. The Seventh Circuit further determined that the officers were not entitled to wages for the period of time between their discharge and the conclusion of their appeal under Wisconsin law, as they were not employed during this time. Id. The Seventh Circuit explained that the District Court based its order on the statutory interpretation and legislative history of § 62.50, and concluded that the officers had no property interest in employment following discharge, and therefore, were not denied due process or owed additional wages. Id. at *639. The officers suggested that discharge by the chief could not take effect until, and unless, affirmed by the Board after a trial. Id. at *642. The Seventh Circuit disagreed and stated that § 62.50(17) must be read as identifying that a discharged officer has no further recourse after a discharge is sustained by the Board, not as a term distinguishing between the type of discharge effectuated by the chief and sustained by the Board. Id. at *643. The Seventh Circuit therefore concluded that without any property interest in their employment, the officers' procedural due process claim must fail. Id. at *644-645. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling granting Defendants' motion for summary judgment.

Yanko, et al. v. United States*, 869 F.3d 1328 (Fed. Cir. 2017). Plaintiff, a part-time federal employee of the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs, filed a class action alleging that Defendant's "in-lieu-of" holidays policy should be provided to part-time employees. Plaintiff sought to represent a class of all other part-time federal employees who are or were employed by all federal agencies and who were similarly-situated, and were entitled to premium pay for work performed on each day designated as an "in-lieu-of" holiday. Id. at *1329. The Court of Federal Claims rejected Plaintiff's claim. On appeal, the Federal Circuit affirmed the Court of Federal Claims' ruling. By statute and Executive Order, certain employees whose basic workweek of five workdays is Monday through Friday are granted days off "in-lieu-of" holidays for those days. Id. at *1329-1330. Plaintiff's regular workweek consisted of five days, from Sunday through Thursday, with non-workdays on Fridays and Saturdays. Between December 15, 2009, and May 16, 2016, there were eight official public holidays that fell on either a Friday or a Saturday, and because Plaintiff was a part-time employee, he was not credited with an in-lieu-of holiday during the preceding or succeeding workweek for any of those eight days. Id. at *1330. The Federal Circuit explained that it is the longstanding policy of the Office of Personnel Management ("OPM") that part-time employees are not entitled to an in-lieu-of holiday corresponding to a particular holiday when that holiday falls on a non-workday for the part-time employee. That policy is reflected in regulations issued by OPM pursuant to notice-and-comment rule-making. The Court of Federal Claims held that the governing statute and Executive Order do not provide part-time employees such Plaintiff with a right to in-lieu-of holidays when federal holidays fall on days outside the employees' normal workweek. In particular, the Court of Federal Claims concluded that the term "basic workweek," which appears in the statute governing in-lieu-of holidays and in Executive Order No. 11,582, referred only to full-time employees, and not to part-time employees. Id. at *1331. On appeal, Plaintiff challenged that construction of the statute and the Executive Order. The Federal Circuit found that the Court of Federal Claims correctly dismissed Plaintiff's complaint for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted because this case consisted of a pure legal issue of statutory interpretation: i.e., whether part-time federal employees are entitled to in-lieu-of holidays when federal holidays fall on days on which they are not scheduled to work. Id. at *1332. Plaintiff's argument proceeded from his contention that part-time employees were "employees" within the meaning of the pertinent statutes, and that once that proposition was accepted, the in-lieu-of holiday provisions of § 6103(b) and the Executive Order necessarily applied with full force to part-time employees. Id. at *1333. The Federal Circuit noted that under both § 6103(b) and § 3 of Executive Order No. 11,582, in-lieu-of holiday benefits are limited to employees who work a "basic workweek," whether that constitutes Monday through Friday or some period other than Monday through Friday. Id. Referencing 5 U.S.C. § 6101, Defendant argued that the term "basic workweek" referred to the basic 40-hour workweek worked by full-time employees. The Federal Circuit found that nothing in the statute or the Executive Order suggested that the term "basic workweek" applied to part-time employees. The Federal Circuit held that, to the contrary, from as early as the 1945 Pay Act, the term was consistently used in reference to full-time employees. The Federal Circuit determined that reading §§ 6101 and 6103, and Executive Order No. 11,582 as a whole, it was reasonable to interpret the use of the term "basic workweek" to be a shorthand expression for "basic 40-hour workweek," as used in both the text and the heading of § 6101. Id. Accordingly, the Federal Circuit rejected Plaintiff's argument that the text of the statute by itself made clear that the "in-lieu-of" holiday rules applied to part-time employees. Id. at *1334. The Federal Circuit therefore affirmed the Court of Federal Claims' decision dismissing Plaintiff's class action.

Souryavong, et al. v. Lackawanna County*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 18173 (3d Cir. Sept. 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of part-time employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to aggregate their hours worked in different jobs and failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. Defendant did not dispute that it violated the FLSA's overtime provisions at various times from 2008 to 2012. However, Defendant disputed that the violations were willful. Id. at *2. The case went to trial on the issues of willfulness and damages. Id. at *3. At trial, Plaintiffs presented documentary evidence that showed Defendant's failure to pay proper overtime. Defendant thereafter made an oral motion for entry of judgment as a matter of law, arguing that Plaintiffs' evidence was insufficient to create a jury question on willfulness. The District Court granted the motion and directed a verdict that the violations were not willful. Id. The jury awarded $5,588.30 in damages. The District Court then addressed several post-trial motions. Plaintiffs moved for liquidated damages, and Defendant opposed that request on the grounds that liquidated damages were inappropriate because it had operated in good faith and its FLSA violations were inadvertent. Id. at *5. The District Court granted the motion because it found that Defendant had presented no evidence to show that it had taken any affirmative steps to ascertain the FLSA's requirements prior to the overtime violations or had acted in good faith. Id. Plaintiffs also moved for attorneys' and costs, requesting an award of $166,162.50, based on a fee rate of $400 per hour, 367.6 hours of legal work, and additional legal-assistant time and costs. The District Court found that the proper rate was $250 per hour and that only 278.2 hours were compensable, for a lodestar of $69,550, which it deviated downward to a final award of $55,852.85. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiffs appealed on two issues, including: (i) whether the District Court correctly granted judgment as a matter of law on willfulness; and (ii) whether the Court erred in its calculation of attorneys' fees. The Third Circuit concluded that the District Court properly granted judgment as a matter of law on willfulness because the evidence presented at trial did not measure up. Id. at *12. The Third Circuit then examined the fee award and concluded that the District Court followed the lodestar method meticulously, since the District Court calculated the lodestar, identified the factors it thought not subsumed in the lodestar, analyzed those factors in light of the facts of the case, and then decided that a downward deviation from the lodestar was justified. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Third Circuit held that the District Court applied the law correctly. Plaintiffs argued that the District Court should have accepted their proposed rate of $400 per hour because Defendant offered no evidence to contradict their proposed rate. Id. at *16. The Third Circuit disagreed and determined that Defendant had provided an attorney's affidavit stating that attorneys of similar stature in the region were compensated at rates of $260 and $275 per hour, not far from the $250 per hour rate that the District Court applied. Accordingly, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling.

(xxvi) Record-Keeping Claims In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Aguirre, et al. v. Aaron's Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 146710 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 11, 2017). Plaintiff, a store manager, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified store managers and thereby violated various provisions the FLSA and the California Labor Code. In particular, Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant violated the FLSA's record-keeping provisions. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) on the grounds that the FLSA does not provide a private right of action to enforce the record-keeping provisions. Id. At *4. The Court granted the motion. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant failed to pay for all hours worked, failed to pay for overtime at the required rate, and failed to keep accurate records of the hours worked. Id. at *2. In support of its motion, Defendant argued that, as a matter of law, there was no private right of action to enforce the FLSA's record-keeping requirement and that Plaintiff alleged insufficient facts to state a claim for failure to pay for all hours worked. The Court noted that Plaintiff did not address Defendant's argument that the FLSA does not provide a private right of action to enforce the record-keeping provisions set forth in 29 U.S.C. §§ 211(c) and 215(a)(5). The Court agreed with Defendant that the provision does not include a private right of action for record-keeping violations. Further, the Court explained that the record-keeping provisions were enforceable only by injunctive relief to restrain the alleged violation, and Plaintiff had not requested this relief. Id. at *4. Therefore, to the extent the FLSA claim alleged a violation of the record-keeping provisions, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss. Id. at *5. The Court further explained that, to state a claim for violation of the FLSA's minimum wage and overtime provisions under 29 U.S.C. §§ 206 and 207, "at a minimum the Plaintiff must allege at least one workweek when he worked in excess of 40 hours and was not paid for the excess hours in that workweek, or was not paid minimum wages." Id. The Court found that, although Plaintiff alleged that he "would regularly work between eight to twelve hours per day," he did not allege that he worked more than 40 hours in any given week. Id. at *6. The Court further held that Plaintiff failed to allege that he was paid less than his earned regular-time wages. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff failed to state a claim for a violation of the FLSA's minimum wage and overtime provisions. Id. The Court, therefore, granted Defendant's motion to dismiss. However, because it appeared that Plaintiff might be able to amend the FLSA claim, the Court granted Plaintiff leave to amend his complaint.

(xxvii) Sanctions In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Garber, et al. v. Office Of The Commissioner Of Baseball,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27394 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendants violated the minimum wage and overtime requirements of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The parties settled the matter and Sean Hull objected to the proposed settlement ("Hull objection"). Plaintiffs asserted that the Hull objection was frivolous and filed motions for sanctions pursuant to Rule 11 against Hull and his counsel. Id. at *25. Although the Rule 11 motions ultimately were withdrawn by stipulation, the Court held a hearing to consider whether to impose sua sponte Rule 11 sanctions upon Christopher Bandas of Bandas Law Firm, an attorney representing Hull. The Court found that although it had grave concerns about Bandas' conduct in the matter, it would not impose sanctions on Bandas. Hull filed a class settlement objection that was drafted by Bandas. The Hull objection was drafted by Bandas but was filed by local counsel, David Stein of Samuel and Stein, after Stein's associate conducted a "basic review." Id. at *26. After the Court approved the proposed class settlement and awarded attorneys' fees and costs, Plaintiffs filed a Rule 11 motion for sanctions against Bandas, to which Bandas refused to respond. Bandas reasoned that because he had not filed a notice of appearance, he was not before the Court and therefore his conduct was not sanctionable. Id. at *29. The Court stated that Bandas' behavior was, at best, unprofessional, and at worst, an unseemly effort to extract fees from class counsel in exchange for the withdrawal of a meritless objection to the proposed class settlement. Id. at *34-35. The Court determined that the Hull objection, which Bandas drafted, had no merit because it objected to the settlement because it provided no damages when the Court had declined to certify a damages class; it objected to the attorneys' fees award for being "excessive" only because the attorneys failed to secure damages, again ignoring that the Court had declined to certify a damages class; and it proposed a reduced fee award that would have resulted in such a low payout to each of the class members that it would have made little economic sense to distribute it. Id. at *35. The Court stated that though Bandas was substantially involved in all stages of the Hull objection, he refused to enter a notice of appearance in this case, and he refused to sign any of the filings that he himself drafted. Id. at *36. The Court found that numerous other judges throughout the country have publicly excoriated Bandas for the frivolous objections that he has penned and injected into class action settlements. Id. at *37. The Court stated that it joined the other judges throughout the country in finding that Bandas orchestrated the filing of a frivolous objection in an attempt to throw a monkey wrench into the settlement process and to extort a pay-off. Id. at *38. The Court opined that although Bandas' behavior provided strong indicia of his subjective bad faith, it did not have jurisdiction to sanction him, given that he had not filed an appearance in the case and he was not a member of the bar of the Southern District of New York. Therefore, the Court declined to impose Rule 11 sanctions on Bandas.

Li, et al. v. Ichiro Restaurant, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16595 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 6, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant employees, brought an action alleging that Defendants violated minimum wage and overtime requirements of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for sanctions pursuant to Rule 37(b)(2) against Defendant and its attorney, David Yan, for discovery failures. Yan moved to withdraw as counsel for Defendant. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion in part and denied Yan's motion without prejudice. On November 22, 2016, the Court ordered Defendant to respond to Plaintiffs' discovery requests by November 30, 2016, and Defendant failed to do so. Id. at *3. The Court held that sanctions therefore were in order. Plaintiffs did not suggest an appropriate sanction, but advised against a default judgment because it could prejudice them by making it less likely that they could build their merits case against Defendant. Id. The Court stated that it would not recommend a sanction that Plaintiffs did not want, but it would also not fashion a different sanction without guidance from Plaintiffs as to what would be appropriate. The Court ordered the payment of Plaintiffs' reasonable expenses caused by Defendant's failure to participate in discovery, as required by the Rule 37(b)(2)(C). The Court indicated that if Plaintiffs desired a default judgment against Defendant, they could seek it without recourse to Rule 37 in light of Defendant's failure to answer the complaint. Yan asserted that he lost contact with the principal of Defendant at the time that Plaintiffs propounded their discovery and that all subsequent attempts to contact him were unsuccessful. Id. at *4. The Court determined that sanctions were not warranted against Yan because he had neither information nor documents that would allow him to respond to the discovery requests. Moreover, the Court opined that there was no indication that Yan advised or otherwise inspired Defendant to violate the Court's discovery order. With regard to Yan's motion to withdraw as Defendant's counsel, the Court noted that all applications to withdraw must be served upon the attorney's client and upon all other parties. Since there was no evidence that Yan served his motion on Defendant or its principal, the Court denied the motion without prejudice. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiff's motion and denied Yan's motion. The Court also ordered Plaintiffs to submit an application, including attorney time records, outlining the expenses incurred because of Defendant's discovery failures. Id. at *5-6.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Caring First, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 174012 (M.D. Fla. Oct. 20, 2017). On behalf of a group of registered nurses, the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") filed a collective action alleging that Defendants misclassified the nurses as independent contractors and thereby denied them overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. The DOL filed a motion for sanctions alleging that Defendants willfully destroyed, or negligently allowed to be destroyed, payroll records prior to May 2015, despite an on-going investigation by the DOL. Id. at *2. Additionally, the DOL asserted that since May 2015, an administrative employee of Defendants had been deleting payroll records on a weekly basis by writing over them at the end of each workweek. Id. at *2-3. Defendants acknowledged that an employee was writing over the payroll week-to-week, but claimed that the records prior to May 2015 were destroyed by a disgruntled former employee, Karen Reyes. Id. at *3. The Court entered an order denying the motion for sanctions because there was a factual dispute regarding whether Reyes deleted the payroll records and because the DOL had not yet determined what, if any, prejudice it had suffered. However, the Court ordered Defendants to "immediately halt the destruction of any current payroll records" and produce all payroll records to the DOL on a bi-weekly basis. Id. Subsequently, the DOL filed a renewed motion for sanctions pursuant to Rule 37(b), alleging spoliation of payroll records, violation of the Court's orders, and misconduct in discovery. Specifically, the DOL renewed its previous assertion that Defendants intentionally destroyed, or negligently allowed to be destroyed, payroll records from the time the DOL began investigating Defendants until May 2015. Id. at *5-6. The DOL alleged that Defendants continued to willfully destroy payroll records by writing over them until mid-February of 2016. Additionally, the DOL asserted that Defendants and their counsel misrepresented that a spreadsheet (the "master list") was a re-creation of all the destroyed payroll records, but the DOL found that it did not contain all of the information when Defendants disclosed a second list as a trial exhibit containing additional information. Finally, the DOL contended that Defendants and their counsel made misrepresentations regarding the information contained on the nurses' paychecks as well as their ability to obtain copies of the paychecks from their bank. Id. at *6-7. Regarding the weekly deletion of payroll records, the Court found that the DOL made the requisite showing to convince the Court that sanctions were appropriate against Defendants under Rule 37(b). However, the Court determined that the DOL failed to prove that sanctions were warranted based on the other alleged misconduct of Defendants or as to Defendants' counsel. Id. at *7. The Court held that Defendants' conduct deleting payroll records was willful and that the DOL was prejudiced by being unable to confirm the amount of back pay possibly owed. Id. at *8. As a sanction, the Court ordered the production of all nurses' paychecks from Defendants' bank in order to allow the DOL to recalculate potential back wages based on the paychecks. Id. at *10.

(xxviii) Settlement Approval Issues In Wage & Hour Class Actions And Collective Actions

Benedict, et al. v. Hewlett-Packard Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1696 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of technical solutions consultants ("TSCs"), brought an action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as exempt and denied them overtime wages in violation of federal and state labor laws. The Court initially conditionally certified an FLSA collective action, then subsequently granted Defendant's motion to decertify the collective action. The case therefore proceeded only with Plaintiffs' individual claims. As of November 1, 2015, Hewlett-Packard Co. ceased to exist, and separated into two discrete corporate entities. The parties then reached a settlement and filed a joint motion for leave to file the settlement agreements between Defendant and each Plaintiff, which the Court denied. The parties sought to file documents related to the settlement under seal because they contended that disclosure would reveal individually negotiated terms between the parties and highly confidential information about the valuation of Defendant's claims, which related to the removal of Defendant's confidential and proprietary information from its premises. Id. at *8. Moreover, the parties further asserted that given the individual nature of the negotiations, the information contained in the settlement agreements served no general public interest. The Court found that neither of the parties' justifications constituted a compelling reason to file the settlement agreements under seal in their entirety. Id. at *9. The Court determined that the motion to seal the settlement agreements was overly broad in light of the public interests at stake in FLSA actions. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court denied the joint motion to seal entirety of the settlement agreements, without prejudice to the parties filing a more narrowly tailored motion with specified redactions.

Brown, et al. v. Progressions Behavioral Health Services*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 108487 (E.D. Pa. July 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of clinicians and therapists, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors and thereby failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. The parties subsequently reached a settlement and Plaintiffs filed an unopposed motion for settlement approval, which the Court granted. The settlement agreement provided for a total settlement amount of $865,000, of which approximately $542,586.00 would be distributed to the collective action members, with the remaining amount sought by counsel for attorneys' fees representing 33% of the settlement amount, incentive awards for the three collective action representatives, and the claims administrator's fees. Id. at *2-3. The Court noted that members may receive amounts ranging from approximately $500 up to a maximum of $70,000, with an average payout of approximately $10,000. Id. at *3. The Court certified the collective action for settlement purposes, finding that all members were all non-exempt, hourly employees of Defendant, and all were paid the same way and were subject to the same payroll and time-keeping practices. Id. at *7. The Court further noted that Plaintiffs averred that the payments from the settlement fund will "represent a significant recovery of the unpaid wages and overtime compensation that could reasonably have been proven at trial." Id. at *8. The Court determined that the settlement came about after extensive arm's-length negotiations and resolve a bona fide dispute over unpaid compensation and wages. Id. at *12. Plaintiffs also moved for an order awarding attorneys' fees of $285,450, constituting 33% of the settlement amount, and reimbursement of expenses in the amount of $3,714. The Court stated that after reviewing counsels' declaration and billing invoices, the 33% fee was reasonable. The lodestar amount reflected in the invoices was approximately $91,866.24 for 287.06 total hours of work. As a result, the lodestar cross-check in this case was 3.1, which was within the range generally approved in common fund cases. Id. at *18. The Court also found the service awards justified, as Plaintiffs explained that the basis of the service award payments was that the collective action representatives were actively involved in the litigation since it was commenced, they provided the information and documents that formed the basis for the lawsuit, and they were willing to assume the risk associated with being a named Plaintiff in a collective action lawsuit against their current employer. Id. at *19. Finally, the Court determined that the costs requested were reasonable because the majority of the amount requested was for mediation fees. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for settlement approval.

Doe, et al. v. Deja Vu Services, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16661 (E.D. Mich. Feb. 7, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of exotic dancers, filed a class action alleging that Defendants violated the FLSA and the Minimum Wage Law when it misclassified dancers as independent contractors instead of employees, and thereby wrongly deprived them of various benefits under federal and state law. The parties reached a settlement and filed a motion for preliminary settlement approval, which the Court granted. The parties jointly moved for preliminary approval of a class action settlement pursuant to Rule 23 and 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Court found that the attorneys representing the parties presented a comprehensive description of the claims and defenses, a description of the settlement goals and efforts made to achieve those goals by the parties, and a detailed outline of the final settlement terms. Id. at *2-3. The Court remarked that it had experience and familiarity with a prior case involving the same issues and some of the same Defendants, in which the Court presided over a class action settlement and retained ancillary jurisdiction. Id. at *3. The Court found that the Plaintiffs satisfied the elements of Rule 23(a), because: (i) the class was so numerous that joinder of all members was impracticable; (ii) there were questions of law or fact common to the class; (iii) the claims or defenses of the representative parties were typical of the claims or defenses of the class; and (iv) the representative parties would fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class. Id. at *3-4. Additionally, pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3), the Court held that the questions of law or fact common to class members predominated over questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action was superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating the controversy. Id. at *4. The Court also opined that the proposed settlement was a fair, reasonable, and adequate resolution of a bona fide dispute between Defendants and Plaintiffs and all other class members. Accordingly, the Court granted preliminary approval to the settlement and certified a settlement class of all current and former entertainers who worked for Defendants at any time during the class period and the date of the order. Id. at *5. The Court further approved the parties' notice plan and ordered a fairness hearing to rule on final settlement approval. Id. at *7.

Doe, et al. v. Deja Vu Services, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93455 (E.D. Mich. June 19, 2015). Plaintiffs, a group of exotic dancers, filed a class action alleging that Defendants violated the FLSA and state minimum wage laws when it misclassified dancers as independent contractors instead of employees, and thereby wrongly deprived them of various benefits under federal and state law. The parties reached a settlement for $6.55 million and previously filed a motion for preliminary settlement approval, which the Court granted. The Court granted preliminary approval of a class action settlement pursuant to Rule 23 and 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The parties now sought final settlement approval, which the Court granted. The Court held that the proposed class – which consisted of 28,177 members – met all the requirements of Rule 23(a) and Rule 23(b)(3). Id. at *6-7. The Court noted that Plaintiffs certified that notice was provided in accordance with the Court's preliminary approval order.

Further, the Court found that the proposed settlement offered value to the class in the form of cash, rent-credit, or dance-fee payments, and long-term structural changes to Defendants' business practices, all of which directly benefited class members. Id. at *19-20. The Court stated that Plaintiffs' likelihood of success on the merits was not guaranteed; if class members were to continue to litigate, they could receive nothing, and therefore the high risk of continued litigation and the uncertain likelihood of success on the merits weighed heavily in favor of approval. Id. at *21. The Court noted that the case presented complex legal issues because it combined a Rule 23 class action with a FLSA collective action. Id. at *22. Continued litigation would require great expense and be of long duration because Defendants possessed meritorious defenses, and there were unique challenges to obtaining sufficient records to prove class-wide damages. Id. at *22-23. The positive reaction of absent class members also weighed in favor of approval, as only 66 individuals opted-out of the settlement. Finally, the Court found that the settlement served the public interest, as it resolved the parties' disputes and put an end to "potentially long and protracted litigation." Id. at *24. In conclusion, the Court found that the settlement was the result of a bona fide dispute, and the terms established in the settlement were a fair, reasonable, and an adequate resolution of the claims. Id. at *25. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for final settlement approval.

Flood, et al. v. Carlson Restaurants Inc.,* Case No. 14-CV-2740 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed an action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA. The parties reached a settlement, and Plaintiffs filed a motion for preliminary settlement approval. The Court denied the motion, finding that the proposed confidentially provision in the settlement agreement was overbroad. Id. at 2. The Court found that the settlement agreement contained confidentiality and release provisions that were too vaguely worded. The Court stated that Section XVII of the agreement required confidentiality "prior to the filing of the motion for preliminary approval," but recited that any named Plaintiff who breached confidentiality "at any time" shall "forfeit to Defendants the full amount of his or her service payment." Id. at 4. The Court ruled that there was no justification, much less "compelling justification," for the confidentiality provisions. Id. The Court held that absent any reason for such restrictions, and wary that a lack of clarity may undermine the FLSA's core purpose, it could not approve the terms of Section XVII. Id. The Court further determined that the releases in Sections XI-XII of the proposed agreement extended what was "fair and reasonable." Id. at 5. The Court explained that some Plaintiffs would be required to sign a general release waving "any claims or any type arising out of incidents that occurred before the date they sign the general release and waiver, known or unknown, related to anything to do with their employment, or any other time." Id. The Court opined that not only have case law authorities typically rejected such broad releases, but also the Court had already rejected a similarly broad release earlier in this litigation when other named Plaintiffs had resolved their claims. Id. Accordingly, the Court ruled that the releases in Sections XI-XII must be limited to wage & hour claims relating to the existing lawsuit. Id. The Court thereby denied Plaintiffs' motion for preliminary settlement approval without prejudice.

Hart, et al. v. ITC Service Group, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96997 (W.D. Mo. June 23, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of cable installers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant willfully withheld overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. The parties submitted to arbitration and ultimately settled the matter. The parties subsequently filed a joint motion for an order approving the arbitrator's order approving the settlement agreement under seal. At the outset, the Court noted that there is a common law presumption that judicial records are open to the public and that this right to public records creates a presumption in favor of disclosure. However, the Court stated, the right of access is not absolute, and a party may overcome the presumption of openness by showing a compelling need to seal documents. In support of their motion, the parties argued that: (i) a confidentiality provision was part of the proposed settlement; (ii) case law authorities routinely permit FLSA settlements to be filed under seal; and (iii) the parties' interests and public's interest weighed in favor of sealing the settlement documents. Id. at *4. The Court found the arguments unavailing. The Court held that there was no claim that the proposed settlement concerned any highly sensitive matter that would rebut the presumption in favor of openness and justify sealing the record. Id. at *4-5. The Court found that the settlement represented an ordinary FLSA settlement, and thus it should be open to the public. Id. at *5. The Court determined that while sealing the record may encourage one or both parties to settle, the public's access to judicial records is not a bargaining chip the parties may trade away in their settlement negotiations. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' motion for an order approving the settlement.

Hoover, et al. v. Mid-Atlantic Lubes, Inc.*, Case No. 16-CV-64 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay all wages due in violation of the FLSA. The parties ultimately settled the matter and moved for settlement approval. The Court denied the motion. The Court determined that a proposed $6,000 incentive award to the named Plaintiff was not warranted, and when combined with his $1,800 settlement award, he would be receiving 37% of the settlement funds paid by Defendant. Id. at 2. The Court found that this excessive and unduly preferential payment would result in conflict between Plaintiff and members of the collective action. Id. Further, the Court determined that the request of counsel for the named Plaintiff for $175,512 in fees was excessive and troubling in light of the proposed $15,000 settlement fund. The Court noted that Plaintiff's counsel sought almost 12 times the amount that opt-in collective action members would receive in total. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied preliminary settlement approval without prejudice, and ordered the parties to renegotiate the settlement before the Magistrate Judge. Id. at 3.

In Re FedEx Ground Package System, Inc. Employment Practices Litigation*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20478 (N.D. Ind. Feb. 15, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a multi-district consumer class action litigation alleging numerous state and federal claims. Co-lead counsel, FedEx, and two of the seven class representatives, Michael Tofaute and David McMahon, participated in a mediation in February 2016 to resolve the various claims in the New Jersey class action. Tofaute and McMahon alleged that they never agreed to the proposed settlement that arose from the mediation and alleged that co-lead counsel failed to communicate an offer to them that would have shifted attorneys' fees onto FedEx instead of the common fund. Tofaute and McMahon asserted that they rejected it out of hand. Id. at *3. Co-lead counsel and FedEx thus signed onto a settlement agreement purportedly resolving all claims in the New Jersey class action, but only one of the six class representatives signed the agreement. Co-lead counsel submitted a motion for preliminary approval of the New Jersey class action settlement, which the Court granted. Less than a week later, all seven class representatives objected to final approval of the settlement. The Court subsequently invited expedited briefing on the threshold question of whether a valid settlement existed for the Court to assess. The class representatives argued that co-lead counsel could not bind the class to an agreement that all class representatives opposed, that allegedly undervalued the claims, and that was allegedly signed without discussing a proposed fee-shifting arrangement with the class representatives. Id. at *5. The class representatives claimed that co-lead counsel rejected an offer for a fee-shifting arrangement without discussing it with them first. Id. at *5-6. The class representatives argued that "major claims or types of relief sought in the complaint have been omitted from the settlement." Id. at *6. The class representatives also argued that "[c]lass counsel must discuss with the class representatives the terms of any settlement offered to the class." Id. The class representatives claimed that co-lead counsel rejected an offer for a fee-shifting arrangement without discussing it with them first. Id. at *6-7. As a result, the Court considered "the extent of participation in the settlement negotiations by class representatives" and examined "closely any opposition by class representatives to a proposed settlement." Id. at *7. The Court found that none of the class representatives arguments was sufficient to invalidate the settlement before reaching the issue of fairness. Id. The Court stated that it is possible that the likelihood of success on the Consumer Fraud Act claim was minimal. The Court further explained that the class representatives did not have to agree to a settlement for it to be fair and binding on the class. The Court therefore held that the settlement agreement was valid, denied the class representatives' motion to compel, and declined to direct any discovery as to whether the agreement was fair, reasonable, and adequate.

Larrea, et al. v. FPC Coffees Realty Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 69166 (S.D.N.Y. May 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant cooks, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The parties reached a settlement and filed a motion for preliminary settlement approval. The Court denied the motion. The Court addressed five aspects of the proposed settlement agreement, including: (i) the settlement amount; (ii) the release provision; (iii) the confidentiality provision; (iv) the non-disparagement provision; and (v) the attorneys' fees provision. Id. at *3. While the Court found that the proposed settlement amount was fair and reasonable, it concluded that the proposed agreement must be rejected on the basis of the remaining four aspects. Id. at *3-4. Under the proposed settlement agreement, Defendants agreed to pay Plaintiffs the sum of $130,000. The Court stated that the proposed settlement amount represented approximately 43% of Plaintiffs' anticipated maximum recovery, including cumulative liquidated damages, and that the amount was fair and reasonable. The Court found that the amount was significant in light of the legal and evidentiary challenges that Plaintiffs would face in the absence of a settlement. Id. at *5.

However, the Court determined that the proposed confidentiality and release provisions were grossly overbroad. The Court further rejected the proposed non-disparagement agreement. Finally, the Court declined to approve the attorneys' fees provision, as it allocated $52,000, or 40% of the net settlement amount, to Plaintiffs' counsel. Id. at *13. The Court held that in light of the net settlement amount and the records the parties submitted of counsels' work in the action, the amount was unreasonable. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' motion for settlement approval.

Lewis-Ramsey, et al. v. The Evangelical Lutheran Good Samaritan Society,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31259 (S.D. Iowa Jan. 10, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a collective action alleging that Defendants violated the overtime requirements of the FLSA. The parties settled the matter and filed a motion for preliminary settlement approval, which the Court denied. The Court stated that the proposed agreement failed to contain any information upon which to form a conclusion as to the basis as to whether the case should proceed as a collective action on this record. Id. at *10-11. The Court found that after the parties made a record on the certification issue and submitted a renewed motion for approval of the settlement, the Court would be able to reconsider whether to certify the collective action identified in the proposed settlement agreement. The Court further determined the record did not contain information that would allow it to examine the risk that continuing this litigation would present to the proposed collective action members with respect to each of their asserted claims. Id. at *16. If the Court were to assume no outstanding legal or factual disputes remained in the case other than those the parties have identified, it stated that it would still be unable to assess: (i) the basis upon which class counsel calculated the proposed collective action members' damages relating to their alleged under-payment; (ii) the available evidence supporting their claim for damages relating to their alleged non-payment for compensable travel-time hours or the value of estimated their travel-time hours at the proposed rate; or (iii) why the proposed settlement compensated proposed collective action members for their alleged under-payment only through October 13, 2015, rather than November 7, 2015. Id. at *16-17. Thus, the Court opined that it lacked the basic information it needed to determine the value of the settlement payments relative to the value of the proposed collective action members' claims. Id. at *17. The Court also found that the proposed opt-in period of 30-days was insufficient due to the size of the proposed collective action, the length of time that has passed since the beginning of the release period, and the procedure outlined in the proposed settlement agreement for contacting collective action members. Id. at *30. The Court therefore denied the parties' motion for preliminary settlement approval without prejudice and directed the parties to file a renewed motion curing these deficiencies.

Mar, et al. v. NAPA Auto Parts,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2391 (E.D. Cal. Jan. 6, 2017). Plaintiff, an executive management trainee ("EMT"), filed an action alleging that Defendant misclassified EMTs as non-exempt, and therefore denied them statutory protections and wages afforded to hourly employees in violation of the FLSA. After mediation, the parties settled the matter. Ninety-four of Defendants' 100 EMTs opted-in to the settlement. Id. at *2. Under the terms of the agreement, Defendants were required to pay $775,000, disbursed among the 94 opt-in members, and attorneys' fees of 33.3% of the $775,000 ($258,333.33). The remaining funds would be apportioned such that each of the 94 EMTs received $5,236.07. Id. at *3. Named Plaintiff Mar would also receive an enhancement of $7,500 for his time and effort in bringing the case and other opt-in Plaintiffs would receive enhancements of $2,500. Id. Defendant also agreed to reclassify EMTs as non-exempt going forward. Id. The Court stated that in the Ninth Circuit, 25% is considered the "benchmark" for determining whether attorneys' fees are reasonable when they are based on a percentage of the award. Id. Further, if attorneys' fees deviate from the 25% benchmark, "it must be made clear by the District Court how it arrives at the figure ultimately awarded." Id. at *4. The Court found that the parties' disagreement over the application of the FLSA to EMTs was sufficient to establish the existence of a bona fide dispute, making settlement of Plaintiff's claims appropriate. Id. at *5. However, the Court opined that though the total award secured by Plaintiff's counsel on behalf of Plaintiff and the other EMTs who opted-in to the settlement might be fair and reasonable, the attorneys' fees were too high for the Court to grant settlement approval. Id. The Court determined that Plaintiff's counsel sought an award of 33.3% of the fund secured on behalf of the FLSA collective action, which was a significant upward departure from the 25% benchmark for attorneys' fees in the Ninth Circuit and outside the ordinary range of 20% to 30%. Id. Plaintiff justified the high award of attorneys' fees in part based on comparison to a lodestar analysis. While it is appropriate to use the lodestar as a cross-check on the reasonableness of attorneys' fees, the Court stated that the hourly rates provided by Plaintiff's counsel fell outside the norms for the Eastern District of California and therefore did not support an award of 33.3%. In making his lodestar cross-check, Plaintiff's counsel used a rate of $650 per hour for his work as principal of his firm, $350 and $400 per hour for associates, $200 per hour for law clerks and legal assistants, and $150 per hour for administrative support. Id. at *6. The Court found that these rates were higher than rates typically accepted by the Court. The Court determined that Plaintiff failed to provide any explanation for why such high fees were appropriate and provided no evidence that the case was exceptionally difficult or novel. Id. at *7. Thus, the Court concluded that Plaintiff did not show that the requested attorneys' fees were sufficiently fair and reasonable, and therefore denied settlement approval. Id. at *9.

Martinez, et al. v. SJG Foods, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74503 (S.D.N.Y. May 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The parties reached a settlement and filed a motion for preliminary settlement approval, which the Court denied. The Court addressed three aspects of the proposed settlement agreement, including: (i) the release provision; (ii) the confidentiality provision; and (iii) the attorneys' fees provision. The Court found that the release provision in the agreement was too broad to survive judicial scrutiny, as it required Plaintiffs to "unconditionally release and forever discharge" Defendants and any related entities "of all charges, complaints, claims, and liabilities of any kind whatsoever, known or unknown, suspected or unsuspected . . . which each Plaintiff at any time has, had or claimed to have against Defendants relating to their employment with Defendants and regarding events that have occurred as of the Effective Date of this Agreement." Id. at *3-4. The Court also determined that the confidentiality provision contained in the agreement prohibited the parties from disclosing "directly or indirectly, any claims asserted in the lawsuit or any claims of unlawful conduct by Defendants, or any of the terms or conditions of the Agreement, any related negotiations, or the amount or nature of any consideration paid (either specifically or as a range), including the Settlement Amount." Id. at *6. This provision, the Court stated, like the release provision, was overbroad. Moreover, the Court opined that the parties' insistence on the confidentiality was difficult to comprehend as the information had already been disclosed on the public record through ECF filings. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs' counsel also sought approval of $66,000 in attorneys' fees and costs. However, the Court noted that they did not submit contemporaneous billing records documenting, for each attorney, the hours expended and the nature of the work done, and therefore the Court did not have sufficient information to determine if the requested fee amount was fair and reasonable. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' motion for settlement approval.

McAfee, et al. v. East St. Louis Park District,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62676 (S.D. Ill. April 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of police officers, filed an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay proper overtime pay and/or straight time pay and were at times paid less than both the federal and state minimum wage pursuant to the FLSA, the Illinois Wage Collection and Payment Act ("IWCPA"), the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"), and Illinois common law. The parties reached a settlement and the Court granted preliminary approval of the settlement agreement. The parties then filed a motion for attorneys' fees and final settlement approval, which the Court granted. The Court stated that based on the representations made by Plaintiffs' counsel and Defendant's counsel, the FLSA claims arose from similar factual and employment settings. All Plaintiffs were current or former police officers with the East St. Louis Park District Police Department who were entitled to but did not receive minimum wage and overtime pay. Further, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants' policy requiring police officers to volunteer certain shifts in an effort to save costs violated the FLSA and Illinois wage laws. The Court found that fairness and procedural considerations, including the number of Plaintiffs in the case and the effectiveness in allowing them to pool their resources for litigation, also supported collective treatment. Therefore, the Court held that final certification of the FLSA collective action was appropriate. Id. at *6-7. The Court held that counsel met numerous times to negotiate the settlement agreement and participated in a full-day settlement conference, and therefore it was clear the settlement was result of contentious arm's-length negotiations. Id. at *8. Further, no objections were filed to the settlement agreement, and 12 of the 15 total possible members of the settlement class opted-in to the litigation. Therefore, given the parties' representation that they wish to accept the settlement amount after months of negotiations, the amount of settlement weighed against Defendants' inability to withstand a larger judgment, and the complexity, expense, and likely duration of the litigation, the Court concluded that the settlement amount was fair, reasonable, and adequate. Id. at *9-10. The Court further approved incentive awards to the named Plaintiffs, including an award of $212.10 to Plaintiff McAfee, $1,235.20 to Plaintiff Durgins, $5,258.60 to Plaintiff Stewart, and $5,126.03 to Plaintiff Waters. Plaintiffs' counsel sought approval of $27,935.20 in attorneys' fees and costs, or approximately 36% of the total settlement amount. Id. at *11. The Court stated that the attorneys representing Plaintiffs in this case were experienced wage & hour class and collective action litigators and obtained a positive outcome in the case. Plaintiffs' counsel submitted affidavits showing that they actually incurred more than $43,910 in fees and expenses in this case. Id. Taking into account the stage of the litigation, which included discovery, research, and negotiations, the Court considered the discounted amount of $27,935.20 in Plaintiffs' attorneys' fees and costs to be reasonable. Id. at *12. The Court further found the amount reasonable in light of the risk of non-payment that counsel faced, since they took the case on a contingent basis. Accordingly, the Court granted final settlement approval and Plaintiffs' request for an award of attorneys' fees.

McMahon, et al. v. Tuesday Morning, Inc., Case No. 14-CV-5547 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the California Labor Law and the California Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). The parties ultimately settled the matter. Plaintiff filed a motion for preliminary approval of the settlement, and the Court ordered the parties to further meet and confer regarding the motion. Id. at 1. Plaintiff asserted that the maximum verdict value of the PAGA claim was $6.8 million. However, the Court noted that the parties settled the PAGA claim for only $13,333, or only .20% of its possible maximum value. Id. Defendant asserted that the maximum verdict value of the PAGA claim was $3.5 million, or .38% of the total possible value. Id. at 1-2. In light of these issues, the Court indicated that it had concerns about whether the settlement of the PAGA claim was fair, reasonable, and adequate. Id. at 2. The Court noted that the concern was particularly true based on the Court's assessment that the value of the Rule 23 class action settlement also was not "robust" given the risks on the merits. Accordingly, the Court ordered the parties to meet and confer regarding the settlement of the PAGA claim, and submit briefing to the Court why the settlement is fair, reasonable, and adequate.

Prim, et al. v. Ensign United States Drilling, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 136017 (D. Colo. Aug. 24, 2017). Plaintiff, an hourly oilfield employee, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay the correct overtime rate in violation of the FLSA. The parties settled the matter and Plaintiff filed an unopposed motion for settlement approval. The Court denied the motion. At the outset, the Court noted that Plaintiff's motion made no reference to collective action certification, failed to provide any facts demonstrating the similarities of the proposed collective action members, and did not discuss any of the factors the Court should consider in certifying a collective action for purposes of settlement. Id. at *3. The Court stated that while Plaintiff's motion should be denied on these grounds alone, it would address several other defects in the motion and proposed settlement in anticipation of a renewed motion for approval of settlement. Plaintiffs stated that the parties disputed whether collective action members received non-discretionary bonuses that Defendant excluded from its overtime calculations. Id. at *4. Defendant, in contrast, argued that "most, if not all, of the contested bonuses were discretionary in nature and therefore excludable from the … regular rates." Id. The Court found that the parties did not present any description of the bonuses at issue in the case, how they were paid, or what facts underlie the dispute between the parties. Id. The parties also disagreed on whether Plaintiff could satisfy his burden to demonstrate that Defendant acted willfully, which in turn would affect whether Plaintiff could recover compensation for two years or three years. Id. at *5. The Court determined that there was also no description in the motion of the facts in support of or in opposition to a finding that Defendant's conduct was willful. Turning to whether the agreement was fair and reasonable, the Court found that Plaintiff failed to provide any value of the potential recovery. In order to determine whether the value of immediate recovery outweighed a possible future recovery, the Court stated that the parties had to submit this information. Id. at *10. The Court held that it could not approve the settlement without information regarding the number of potential collective action members, the average expected recovery, and the extent to which the settlement represented a compromise of the amounts owed. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for settlement approval.

Ramirez, et al. v. Benito Valley Farms LLC, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 137272 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a seasonal agricultural worker, brought an action alleging that her supervisor, Foreman Alfonso Flores, created a hostile work environment and engaged in discrimination and retaliation directed at Plaintiff. Plaintiff also alleged Defendant failed to comply with its legal duties in the provision of housing because the employee housing in which Plaintiff resided contained serious habitability issues, including inadequate flooring and the presence of rats and flies in violation of the California Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). The parties ultimately reached a settlement, and Defendant agreed to pay $27,500 allocated to civil penalties to resolve the PAGA claims on behalf of 226 claimants and various injunctive relief. The settlement also provided $41,800 for attorneys' fees and costs. The Court approved the settlement agreement. The Court determined that there was no indication that the settlement would be "unjust, arbitrary and oppressive, or confiscatory." Id. at *11. The Court noted that the parties reached a settlement early in the case, and before any motion practice. As such, further litigation would necessitate further expenses and costs for both Plaintiff and Defendant. The Court stated that, given Defendant's weak financial condition, continuing litigation would decrease the amount available for settlement and would financially weaken Defendant. Id. at *13. Thus, further litigation might harm Defendant to such an extent that there would be few resources available for a monetary recovery or for injunctive relief. Id. at *14. The Court held that, although the monetary amount represented only 4.5% of the total estimated possible recovery for the PAGA civil penalties, considering the very early stage of the litigation and Defendant's weak financial condition, the percentage was reasonable. Id. at *15. Additionally, the Court noted that the settlement's injunctive relief provided that Defendant would comply with California wage & hour laws in the future, would join a farm employer association, and would ensure that employees were fully trained to prevent and respond to claims of sexual harassment. Id. at *15-16. For these reasons, the Court found that the proposed settlement was fair and reasonable and promoted the purposes of the PAGA. Therefore, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for settlement approval. The Court also found that an award of $41,800 for attorneys' fees and costs was warranted. Id. at *18. The parties agreed that the lodestar method was the preferable method for measuring attorneys' fees. Plaintiff's counsel provided detailed, contemporaneous billing records that indicated that the hours spent on the litigation were justified. Accordingly, the Court granted approval of the proposed settlement.

Roberts, et al. v. Marshalls Of CA, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 45944 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retail sales employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant's bag check policy violated the California Labor and Business and Professions Code, as well as the Industrial Welfare Commission's ("IWC") wage orders by preventing Plaintiffs from taking their full 30-minute meal or 10-minute rest breaks and failing to pay compensation for missed breaks. The parties ultimately settled the matter, and Plaintiffs moved for preliminary settlement approval. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion. Plaintiff sought to certify a class for settlement purposes consisting of "all current and former non-exempt employees who worked at a T.J. Maxx, Marshalls, or Homegoods branded retail store in the State of California during the class period." Id. at *4. The settlement provided injunctive relief and monetary relief of $8.5 million including $5,525,000 for the net distribution fund. The Court found that Plaintiffs' proposed settlement class failed to satisfy the typicality requirement of Rule 23(a)(3). The Court noted that Plaintiffs asserted they "have held the same positions" as other class members, but they did not describe how their positions were similar. Id. at *19. The Court explained that where Plaintiffs fail to identify their positions relative to the putative classes, case law authorities often are unable to find there are no dissimilarities among the classes that would "impede the generation of common answers apt to drive the resolution of the litigation." Id. at *20. Furthermore, the Court reasoned that under the terms of the settlement, all employees were class members, regardless of their position, but Plaintiffs had not shown that class members were uniformly subject to the security screenings that allegedly give rise to Plaintiffs' claims. The Court stated that Plaintiffs' claims might be typical of those class members who held the same positions or worked the same hours as Plaintiffs, but the Court lacked sufficient information to determine whether this was the case. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs had not met the typicality requirement. Plaintiffs also had not shown that their interests aligned with those of the class, and the Court therefore could not conclude that Plaintiffs satisfied Rule 23(a)(4). Id. at *23. The Court also found the existence of individual issues that precluded certification under Rule 23(b)(3). Id. at *24. First, the Court held that Plaintiffs had not demonstrated their off-the-clock claims applied to both managerial and non-managerial class members, yet both received benefits under the terms of the agreement. Id. at *27. Second, since two of Plaintiffs' causes of action were only relevant to class members who no longer work for Defendants; they would not apply to those class members who were currently employees. The Court found that Plaintiffs did not identify how many class members were former employees who were entitled to recover under these claims versus current employees who were not. Id. at *28. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs failed to meet the requirements of Rule 23. The Court also determined that Plaintiffs did not provide any estimates about Defendants' potential liability because they did not explain how they calculated the estimated damages or state the maximum recovery they could have obtained if parties were to litigate the class action on its merits. Id. at *42. The Court noted that Plaintiffs also failed to estimate how much the injunctive relief was worth. Without such information, the Court opined that it could not determine whether the proposed settlement was reasonable. Id. at *43. Therefore, even if Plaintiffs had met their burden under Rule 23(a) and (b)(3), the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate preliminary approval was otherwise appropriate.

Sanchez, et al. v. Frito-Lay,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 99468 (E.D. Cal. June 27, 2017). Plaintiff, a non-exempt hourly employee, filed an action asserting that Defendant violated various provisions of the California Labor Code. The parties ultimately settled the matter and Plaintiff filed a motion for settlement approval. The Court had denied Plaintiff's motion on two previous occasions, and Plaintiff subsequently filed a third amended motion for preliminary approval of the settlement. The Court noted that in submitting the renewed motion, Plaintiff presented several new facts that called into doubt the valuation of the relevant meal period and rest break claims. Id. at *8-9. The Court stated that these new facts created serious doubts about whether Plaintiff's assumed violation rate was tethered to the experiences of all parties for whom relief was requested. Id. at *12-13. The Court opined that even if Plaintiff's assumed violation rates were accurate, it was unconvinced that the proposed class definition was appropriate or that questions of law or fact were plausibly common to the proposed class. Id. at *13. The Court further noted that Plaintiff presented an entirely new and contradictory theory for arriving at 1.3 violations per week. Id. The Court stated that Plaintiff's counsel now applied this violation rate to each type of violation, and as a result, inappropriately doubled the estimated value of recovery for the claims. Id. at *14. Because the Court was unable to confidently consider Plaintiff's expected recovery balanced against the value of the settlement offer, it held that it could not reasonably conclude that the amended settlement was reasonable or fell "within the range of possible approval." Id. at *17. The parties thereafter requested one final opportunity to address the Court's concerns. The Court granted the parties' request, but advised the parties to carefully review all of the Court's numerous prior rulings in this case and to fully address each of its previously expressed concerns in any potential motion for preliminary settlement approval and conditional class certification. Id. at *17-18.

Sanchez-Rodriguez, et al. v. Jackson's Farming Co. Of Autryville,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5770 (E.D.N.C. Jan. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of H-2A visa migrant workers, filed a putative class action and collective action alleging that Defendants violated various provisions of the FLSA and the North Carolina Wage & Hour Act ("NCWHA"). Plaintiffs sought payment of back wages and liquidated damages based upon Defendant's alleged failure to timely pay weekly wages that were at least the minimum wage rate, to pay all wages when due at the wage rate that was disclosed to Plaintiffs, and to pay for travel time. Id. at *2. The parties previously negotiated a settlement agreement that included class-wide relief. For settlement purposes only, Defendants consented to and joined in the motion for class certification pursuant to the settlement agreement reached between the parties. The parties' settlement requested the certification of a class defined as "all migrant or seasonal agricultural workers who performed temporary or seasonal work in agriculture under the H-2A guest-worker program for Jackson Farming Company of Autryville, William Brent Jackson, or William Rodney Jackson at any time during calendar years 2015 and through September 28, 2016." Id. at *3. The parties sought certification a class under the NCWHA for under-paid wages and liquidated damages. The Court determined that the proposed class included approximately 135 individuals who worked for Defendants during the relevant time period and therefore the class was sufficiently numerous. Id. at *5-6. The Court stated that Plaintiffs and the other putative class members shared common questions of law or fact, including whether Defendant: (i) failed to timely pay the class members weekly wages that were at least the minimum wage rate; (ii) failed to pay all wages when due at the wage rate that was disclosed; (iii) failed to pay for travel time; and (iv) failed to pay all wages due. Id. at *6. Therefore, the Court determined that the commonality requirement was satisfied. The Court found that Plaintiffs' claims and the claims of the putative class members arose from the same alleged practices and course of conduct by Defendants and therefore established typicality. Id. at *7. The Court further held that Plaintiffs shared a common interest with class members in the litigation and possess a personal financial stake in the outcome of this litigation. The Court noted that class counsel was experienced counsel who regularly had been counsel in class action litigation, including class litigation involving claims that are materially similar to those asserted in this case. Id. at *9. The Court also opined that certification of the class was appropriate under Rule 23(b)(3) because the legal and factual issues described in the second amended complaint predominated over any individual issues of law and fact for any named Plaintiff or class member. Id. Finally, the Court concluded that class treatment was superior to other procedures for handling the claims in question because no member of the proposed class had any necessary interest in individually controlling the prosecution of the claims at issue in this litigation and because of the relatively small amount of the wage claims. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification for settlement purposes.

Sandoval, et al. v. Philippe North American Restaurants, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 141480 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 31, 2017). Plaintiff, a group of tipped restaurant employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay minimum wage in violation of the FLSA. The parties ultimately settled the matter and Plaintiffs filed a motion for preliminary settlement approval. Plaintiffs also requested certification of the proposed class, appointment of class counsel, and approval of the proposed class notice. Id. at *4. The Court found that the general release provision contained in the proposed settlement agreement was overbroad, and therefore the motion for preliminary settlement approval must be denied. The Court determined that the release provision imposed almost no limitations on Plaintiffs' waiver of claims and required Plaintiffs to waive virtually any claim, of any type, without regard to whether the claim is related to the wage & hour violations alleged. Id. at *8. The Court further stated that the parties offered no basis for finding that the release provision provided Plaintiffs with any legitimate benefit. Id. As such, Court held that the provision was not reasonable, and Plaintiffs' motion for preliminary settlement approval must be denied without prejudice. Id. at *8-9. Accordingly, as the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for preliminary settlement approval, it also denied without prejudice Plaintiffs' request for certification of the proposed class, appointment of class counsel, and approval of the proposed class notice.

Santinac, et al. v. Worldwide Labor Support Of Illinois, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42394 (S.D. Miss. Mar. 23, 2017). Plaintiff brought a collective action asserting that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA. Plaintiff alleged that he regularly worked over 40 hours a week, but did not receive adequate overtime pay based on Defendant's mischaracterization of a portion of his regular wages as "per diem." Id. at *4. Plaintiff further alleged that all employees were subject to this improper per diem scheme to reduce overtime compensation. The Court conditionally certified a collective action, and approximately 100 individuals opted-in. The parties ultimately reached a settlement and sought preliminary settlement approval, which the Court granted. First, the Court found that the settlement was fair, reasonable and adequate because: (i) no fraud or collusion occurred between counsel for the parties; (ii) further litigation of this matter would have been costly and protracted; (iii) the parties had the opportunity to evaluate the merits of their respective positions; (iv) both liability and damages were strenuously disputed, and the parties detailed numerous issues that would have remained for resolution at trial; (v) each Plaintiff would receive 100% of the overtime he or she could possibly be owed, even after attorneys' fees and costs were deducted; and (vi) the parties and their attorneys agreed that the settlement was a fair and reasonable resolution of a bona fide dispute. Id. at *8-10. As to the attorneys' fees requested, the Court held that 30 hours of the requested 361.57 hours qualified as redundant, excessive, or unproductive time. Id. at *13. The Court therefore reduced the hours expended by that amount, for a total 331.57 hours. Taking into account the nature of the action and the reputation and experience of the lawyers involved, the Court opined that $250 was an appropriate hourly rate for the work performed by each of the three attorneys. Id. at *14. Applying the rate to the 331.57 hours yielded a lodestar of $82,892.50. The Court held that the lodestar of $82,892.50 was adequate, and that adjustment of the lodestar was unnecessary to make the fee award reasonable. Id. at *16. Applying the lodestar cross-check, the Court found that the fees requested resulted in over-compensation, and therefore it reduced the fee award to equal the lodestar amount of $82,892.50, which represented more than 30% of the common fund and was therefore on the upper end of fees awarded in similar cases. Id. at *17. Plaintiffs also sought payment of $3,801.96 in expenses incurred by their attorneys, which the Court held was reasonable. Accordingly, the Court granted the parties' motion for preliminary settlement approval.

Saravia, et al. v. Dynamex, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53892 (N.D. Cal. April 7, 2017). Plaintiff, a delivery driver, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified him as an independent contractor and thereby denied him minimum wage and overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. The parties subsequently settled the matter and requested the Court's approval of the settlement. The settlement required Defendant to pay $500,000 to settle all claims exclusive of attorneys' fees and costs, settlement administration costs, and the service award to the named Plaintiff. Id. at *3. The amount disbursed to each Plaintiff would be a minimum payment of $200, plus a proportion of the total settlement fund after disbursement of the minimum payment, which proportion would be based on each Plaintiff's pro rata share of the total number of overtime hours worked. Id. at *3-4. The result was an average distribution of approximately $4,500 per Plaintiff. The settlement also required Defendant to pay all costs of administering the settlement. Id. at *4. The Court noted that the notice distributed to Plaintiffs underwent several rounds of edits by the Court to ensure it accurately and clearly explained the terms of the settlement agreement and the procedures surrounding the motion for final approval. Id. at *6. The Court noted that the recovery represented a significant discount on the total recovery for the collective action if it had won at trial but there remained a very real risk that the members of the collective action, or the bulk of them, would have received nothing. Id. at *7. In light of those risks, the Court found that the recovery, while modest, constituted fair, reasonable, and adequate consideration for the release of Plaintiffs' claims. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs also sought a service award of $7,500 to the named Plaintiff, Juan Saravia, in addition to his share of the settlement. The Court found that Saravia's contribution did not differ meaningfully from that of the other dozens of Plaintiffs who responded to discovery requests. Id. at *12. Therefore, the Court found that there was no reason to allow Saravia to recover substantially more than other Plaintiffs. However, the Court noted that Saravia initiated the case, participated in three settlement conferences, and provided assistance to counsel from the outset. Id. Accordingly, the Court determined that a service award of $1,000 was appropriate. The Court, therefore, granted the parties' motion for settlement approval.

Sardina, et al. v. Twin Arches Partnership, Ltd.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 113137 (D. Colo. July 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of non-exempt restaurant employees, brought a collective action asserting that Defendant violated the overtime provisions of the FLSA by failing to pay for work in excess of 40 hours in a workweek, for off-the-clock work, and for mandatory work-related activities at the beginning and end of their shifts. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendants failed to maintain records of the hours worked by Plaintiffs. The parties reached a settlement in the matter and filed a joint motion for preliminary settlement approval, which the Court granted. The Court found that the settlement appeared to be fair, reasonable, and adequate. Id. at *5. The Court further stated that the settlement was the product of intensive, arms-length negotiations involving experienced counsel who were well-versed in employment law, class action litigation procedures, and the legal and factual issues of this case. Id. The Court explained that sufficient disputed questions of law and material fact existed that made the outcome of a trial on the merits uncertain, and therefore the settlement would avoid the time and expense of continuing this litigation for an indeterminate period of time, with attendant risks, costs, and delay for both sides. Id. at *5-6. Moreover, the Court found that the value of the proposed settlement appeared reasonable given the possible outcome of protracted and expensive litigation. Id. at *6. The Court also stated that the parties and their attorneys, who were experienced in wage & hour class action litigation, believed that the settlement was fair and adequate. Id. The Court stated that the attorneys' fees requested also appeared to be fair, reasonable, and adequate. The Court thereby granted preliminary settlement approval. The Court then directed counsel to develop a brief proposed form of notice of the settlement to be directed to all members of the collective action.

Thompson, et al. v. Costco Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63504 (S.D. Cal. April 26, 2017). Plaintiff, a former truck driver, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA, the California Labor Code, and the California Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA") by failing to provide meal and rest periods and failing to pay proper compensation. The parties subsequently settled the matter, and Plaintiff filed a motion for preliminary approval of the settlement. The Court denied the motion because the parties failed to distinguish between the payments to the members of the Rule 23 class and the FLSA collective action. Id. at *1. Among other things, the settlement did not have a proper opt-in procedure for the FLSA collective action and would have required Rule 23 class members to release FLSA claims to participate in the settlement of the Rule 23 class claims in exchange for no consideration. Id. at *2. Plaintiff thereafter filed an unopposed renewed motion for preliminary settlement approval, which the Court again denied. First, the Court ruled that, although the renewed motion corrected some of the shortcomings of the original settlement by creating a separate settlement fund for the FLSA collective action and including an appropriate opt-in procedure, the release language was inadequate. Id. The Court stated that the settlement defined the "released claims" by participating class members as including "any claims under federal law and state law" that could have been alleged. Id. The Court determined that, because the FLSA is a federal statute, the provision would mean that participating class members would release FLSA claims regardless of whether they participated in the collective action. Accordingly, the Court explained that the parties must specify that FLSA claims were not included within the definition of released claims. Id. Second, the Court noted that the "release of claims by participating class members" section contained the following sentence: "The Parties stipulate that Costco shall not owe, beyond the amount of the Gross Settlement Fund, any further monies to the Settlement Class or to the State of California based upon the claims made in the Lawsuit during the Settlement Period." Id. at *3. Because the settlement referenced FLSA claims, the Court ruled that the stipulation effectively amounted to a release of those claims by Rule 23 class members, regardless of whether they opted-in to the FLSA collective action. Id. Finally, the Court found that the settlement stated "the procedures adopted under the Agreement will operate as a release of any FLSA claim by those Settlement Class Members who cash, deposit, or endorse settlement checks." Id. However, the Court noted that the only individuals who should be releasing FLSA claims were those who opted-in to the FLSA collective action. Id. at *4. The Court opined that these deficiencies underscored the difficulty of maintaining a Rule 23 class action and an FLSA collective action in the same lawsuit. Id. The Court further noted that while the parties may choose the language to remedy the deficiencies, the easiest way to do so might be to include an express statement in the release that, notwithstanding any other terms in the agreement, that participating class members who did not opt-in to the FLSA collective action did not release any FLSA claims against Defendant. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied the renewed motion for preliminary settlement approval.

Thompson, et al. v. Costco Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 72389 (S.D. Cal. May 11, 2017). Plaintiff, a former truck driver, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA, the California Labor Code, and the California Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA") by failing to provide meal and rest periods and failing to pay proper compensation. The parties subsequently settled the matter, and Plaintiff filed a motion for preliminary approval of the settlement. The Court denied the motion because the parties failed to distinguish between the Rule 23 class and the FLSA collective action. Id. at *1. Among other things, the settlement did not have a proper opt-in procedure for the FLSA collective action and would have required Rule 23 class members to release FLSA claims to participate in the settlement of the Rule 23 class claims in exchange for no consideration. Id. at *2. Plaintiff later filed an unopposed renewed motion for preliminary settlement approval, which the Court again denied. The Court stated that although the renewed motion corrected some of the shortcomings of the original settlement by creating a separate settlement fund for the FLSA collective action and including an appropriate opt-in procedure for the FLSA collective action, the release language was inadequate. Id. Plaintiff thereafter filed a second renewed motion for preliminary settlement approval, which the Court granted. Plaintiff sought preliminary certification of a Rule 23 class containing all current and former fleet drivers employed at a business center or depot operated by Defendant in California from October 17, 2010, through October 4, 2016, and FLSA collective action certification of all current and former fleet drivers employed at a business center or depot in California operated by Defendant from October 17, 2011, through October 4, 2016. Id. at *18. The settlement provided a $2 million gross settlement amount to be paid by Defendant, including $5,000 as an incentive award for Plaintiff; $500,000 to Plaintiff's counsel for fees; $20,000 in reimbursement to Plaintiff's counsel for costs; $10,000 to settlement of PAGA claims; up to $30,000 to the claims administrator for administration costs; 90% of the remainder after the payments as the net Rule 23 class settlement fund (estimated to be $1,320,750); and 10% of the remainder as the net FLSA collective action settlement fund (estimated to be $146,750). Id. Plaintiff's counsel estimated that the 882 class members who also opted-in to the FLSA collective action would receive an average of $1,664 from the gross settlement amount based on the agreed allocation. Plaintiff's counsel argued that the gross settlement amount reflected approximately 10% of the potential exposure and that, based on Defendant's defenses and the hurdles of Plaintiff's case, this settlement was fair, adequate, and reasonable. Id. at *20. The Court stated that the only information available to prove that the estimate was correct was the declaration of Plaintiff's counsel. However, the Court found that Plaintiff's counsel was not a credible witness in light of his previous declaration that the FLSA claims were worth very little to nothing, which was contradicted by a subsequent declaration of his law partner, and by the new settlement itself. Id. at *21. Because the motion did not provide any evidence other than the declaration of Plaintiff's counsel to support the reasonableness of the settlement, the Court lacked any credible evidence to support the settlement amount. Notwithstanding the foregoing, the Court determined that it was appropriate to preliminarily approve the settlement. The Court stated that it would give careful consideration to any objections from class members when determining whether final approval was warranted. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's second unopposed motion for preliminary settlement approval.

Thompson, et al. v. Costco Wholesale Corp*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 142290 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 1, 2017). Plaintiff, a former truck driver, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA, the California Labor Code, and the California Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA") by failing to provide meal and rest periods and failing to pay proper compensation. The parties subsequently settled the matter, and Plaintiff filed a motion for preliminary approval of the settlement. The Court preliminarily approved the settlement, and Plaintiff subsequently filed a motion for final settlement approval. Id. at *3. The proposed settlement included: (i) a gross settlement fund in the amount of $2 million; (ii) a class representative award of $5,000 to Plaintiff; (iii) $10,000 for settlement of the PAGA claims; (iv) $21,000 in class administrator fees; (v) $500,000 to Plaintiff's counsel for fees and $20,000 in costs; (vi) 90% of the remainder, after these payments, as the net Rule 23 class settlement fund (estimated to be $1,320,750); and (vii) 10% of the remainder as the net FLSA collective settlement fund (estimated to be $146,750). Id. at *4. Additionally, Plaintiff estimated that 924 participating class members would receive an average payment of $1,397.73, and the 459 class members who had opted-in to the FLSA collective action would receive a settlement payment of $312.64 based on the agreed upon allocation. Id. The settlement defined the Rule 23 class as "all current and former fleet drivers employed at a Costco business center or depot in California at any time during the period of October 17, 2010, through October 4, 2016." Id. The settlement also sought certification of the FLSA collective action comprised of "all current and former drivers employed at a Costco business center or depot in California at any time during the period of October 17, 2011 and October 4, 2016." Id. at *5. The Court found that the proposed class met all the requirements of Rule 23 and it thereby certified the class for the purposes of settlement. Additionally, because the FLSA collective action satisfied the Rule 23 class certification requirements, the Court held it also satisfied the FLSA's less stringent requirement that the members be "similarly-situated" for the purposed of the settlement under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) Id. at *11-12. Accordingly, the Court conditionally certified the FLSA collective action for purposes of the settlement. As to the settlement, the Court found that the class and collective action members received adequate notice. The Court noted that Defendant had strong defenses to class liability and damages determinations, and there was no guarantee that Plaintiff would prevail. Furthermore, the risk of attaining class/collective certification on any of the claims would be on-going. The Court found these risks weighed in favor of settlement. The Court determined that in light of the risks associated with continuing the litigation, the pay-outs appeared reasonable and weighed in favor of approval of the settlement. The Court opined that class counsel provided a declaration detailing their experience in wage & hour class cases involving workers in the transportation industry. Further, only one class/collective member opted-out of the class and no objections to the settlement had been received. The Court ruled that the parties reached agreement after extensive arms-length negotiations, an all-day mediation before a neutral third-party, and further non-collusive negotiations. Id. at *20. The Court also found that an award of 15% of the common fund was reasonable. Accordingly, the Court awarded attorneys' fees in the amount of $300,000. Id. at *21. The Court also awarded $26,071.99 in costs. Plaintiff requested an incentive award of $5,000. The Court found that awarding the class representative over three times more than what the average class member would receive was excessive, and therefore reduced the award to $2,000. Id. The Court approved that $7,500 from the settlement to be used for payment of civil penalties provided for the PAGA claims to the California Labor & Workforce Development Agency. Finally, the Court approved payment of $21,000 to the claims administrator. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for final settlement approval.

Williams, et al. v. Alimar Security, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13530 (E.D. Mich. Feb. 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of alarm response security officers, brought a putative class action and collective action alleging that Defendants denied them overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. The Court conditionally certified the matter as a collective action and the parties eventually reached a settlement. Plaintiffs thereafter filed a motion for settlement approval and submitted their settlement agreement for in camera review. The Court entered an order denying the motion for approval without prejudice. The parties then filed a revised joint motion for settlement approval, which the Court granted. After reviewing the pleadings and the parties' joint motion, the Court found that the parties' proposed settlement represented a fair and reasonable resolution of a bona fide dispute over FLSA provisions. Id. at *2. The Court stated that there were several genuine disputes at issue, for example: (i) whether the time Plaintiffs spent "on-call" or "waiting to be engaged" constituted working time under the FLSA; and (ii) whether the parties agreed to a fluctuating workweek schedule. Id. at *3. Therefore bona fide issues remained as to the amount of wages, if any, Defendant owed Plaintiffs and the ultimate amount they could recover if they prevailed on the merits. Id. at *4-5. The Court found it reasonable that the proposed settlement agreement provided Plaintiffs half as much as they would receive if the method of damage calculation was adopted by the Court, plus liquidated damages. Id. at *6. The Court also stated that the parties would not have to incur the burden and expense of trial, which favored approving the agreement. The Court opined that both parties faced risks if the Court determined the appropriate calculation of overtime pay, because Court might either identify Plaintiffs as "on-call" or determine that Defendant was liable for damages that exceed the settlement amount. Id. Fourth, the Court determined that the settlement agreement was the product of arm's-length bargaining because the parties reached the settlement during a settlement conference before the Magistrate Judge, after informal discussions and a prior settlement conference. Finally, the Court held that there was no reason to suspect fraud or collusion with regard to the proposed agreement. Id. at *7. After reviewing the time records submitted by Plaintiffs' counsel, the Court concluded that the amount allocated for attorneys' fees was fair and reasonable in light of the result reached in this case, and the total number of hours that Plaintiffs' counsel dedicated to this matter. Accordingly, the Court granted the motion to approve the settlement and for an award of attorneys' fees.

Wilson, et al. v. Maxim Healthcare Services, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95048 (W.D. Mo. June 23, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA. The Court had previously granted the parties' stipulated motion to decertify Plaintiffs' collective action and withdraw their class claims, in which the parties stated that they had reached a global settlement for all Plaintiffs and opt-in Plaintiffs on an individual basis. Plaintiffs then filed a stipulated motion for approval of all Plaintiffs' individual settlement agreements, and for dismissal with prejudice. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs argued that because the settlement agreements involved the settlement and release of claims under the FLSA, the parties must submit their proposed agreements to the Court for its examination and determination as to whether those agreements represent "a fair and reasonable resolution of a bona fide dispute." Id. at *2-3. The Court, however, determined that since Plaintiffs had decertified their collective action and reached settlement agreements on an individual basis, it need not review those agreements for fairness and reasonableness. Id. at *3. The Court thereby declined Plaintiffs' request to submit copies of the 135 individual settlement agreements for in camera review and approval. Id. at *4. The Court held that Plaintiffs remained free to dismiss their wage claims voluntarily pursuant to Rule 41(a) in light of their individual settlement agreements.

Yang, et al. v. Matsuya Quality Japanese, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14823 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 2, 2017). Plaintiff filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA. The parties settled the matter and requested settlement approval. The Court previously had rejected the proposed settlement agreement because it contained a confidentiality provision and a "sweeping" release provision and failed to specify the amount of attorneys' fees. Id. at *2. The parties then filed a revised settlement agreement for the Court's review, and the Court again denied the proposed agreement. First, the Court found that the settlement agreement's release provision was unreasonable. The settlement agreement stated that "Plaintiff . . . release[s] the Defendant . . . from any and all debts, obligations, claims, demands, orders, judgments or causes of action of any kind whatsoever, whether in tort, contract, statute, at common law, or on any other basis . . . whether asserted in the Action or not . . . ." The Court opined that the language constituted an unreasonable and sweeping release that reached far beyond the claims in the action. Id. at *3-4. The Court also held that the settlement agreement's non-disparagement clause was unreasonable because it did not include a carve-out allowing Plaintiff to speak truthfully regarding the case. Id. at *4. The Court thereby denied the parties' joint request to approve the settlement agreement. The Court directed the parties to either: (i) file a revised agreement with a limited release provision and a non-disparagement clause with the appropriate carve-out; (ii) submit a joint letter for in camera inspection that explained why the Court should approve the settlement agreement, either in its present form or with the previously noted modifications; or (3) file a letter indicating their intent to abandon their settlement and continue to litigate this action. Id. at *5.

(xxix) Settlement Bar And Estoppel Issues In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Caraballo, et al. v. United States,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 9334 (Fed. Cir. May 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of federal employees previously certified as a class in Carballo I, filed suit alleging that Defendant breached the parties' settlement agreement and its duty of good faith and fair dealing. Plaintiffs had brought a class action against Defendant alleging that Defendant paid the cost of living adjustment ("COLA") at rates lower than the levels required by law. Id. at *2. The parties eventually entered a settlement agreement that required Defendant to pay $232.5 million to a trustee and mandated that the Office of Personnel Management ("OPM") issue new regulations governing the COLA program. Id. Defendant initially complied with its obligations under the settlement agreement. Id. at *5. However, after Congress enacted the Non-Foreign Area Act of 2009, Defendant reduced COLA by 65% of the locality pay received. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs subsequently filed suit alleging that Defendant breached the settlement agreement and its duty of good faith and fair dealing. Id. at *8. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss asserting that: (i) the District Court lacked jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' claims; (ii) Plaintiffs' claims were barred under the doctrine of res judicata; and (iii) Plaintiffs failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. Id. The District Court granted the motion to dismiss and determined that, although it had jurisdiction and that res judicata did not bar the claims, Plaintiffs failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. Id. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Federal Circuit affirmed. Id. at *22. Defendant argued that the trial court lacked jurisdiction over the suit because the settlement agreement did not provide for monetary damages in the event of a breach. The Federal Circuit disagreed and ruled that Plaintiffs' claim for breach of the settlement agreement, if proven, provided for money damages, and jurisdiction was proper pursuant to the Tucker Act. Id. at *11. The Federal Circuit also rejected Defendant's argument that the District Court's denial of Plaintiffs' motion to amend constituted a final judgment for purposes of res judicata. Because Plaintiffs could not have raised their breach of settlement agreement claims in Caraballo I before they entered the settlement agreement, the Federal Circuit concluded that the District Court's denial of Plaintiffs' motion to amend did not have res judicata effect and did not bar Plaintiffs' suit. Id. at 12. Further, the Federal Circuit ruled that the District Court properly dismissed Plaintiffs' claims that Defendant: (i) breached the express terms of the settlement agreement; and (ii) breached the implied and express covenants of good faith and fair dealing. The Federal Circuit concluded that the OPM was not required to consult the Survey Implementation Committee and the Technical Advisory Committee established pursuant to the settlement agreement and, therefore, did not breach the settlement agreement when it failed to do so. Id.* at *14. The Federal Circuit also found that Defendant did not breach the contract by failing to give notice to the class members that it no longer intended to be bound by the conforming methodology because the OPM provided adequate notice to the class members when it published the 2010 Interim Regulations in the Federal Register. Id. at *19. Moreover, the Federal Circuit ruled that Defendant did not breach the implied and express covenants of good faith and fair dealing by eliminating COLA through the passage of the Non-Foreign AREA Act and implementing the regulations without considering the terms of the settlement agreement because Plaintiffs did not bargain for the COLA regulatory regime to be maintained in perpetuity. Id. at *21. Rather, the Federal Circuit opined that Plaintiffs bargained for a one-time lump sum payment to satisfy back pay claims and for a confirming methodology that OPM was expected but not required to follow pursuant to the settlement agreement. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Federal Circuit affirmed the District Court's order granting Defendant's motion to dismiss.

In Re Walgreens Co. Wage & Hour Litigation*, Case No. 11-CV-7664 (C.D. Cal. June 22, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a punitive class action in state court alleging various violations of the California Labor Code for failure to provide meal and rest periods and accurate itemized wage statements. Id. at 1. Defendant removed the action pursuant to the CAFA and eight additional Plaintiffs filed identical actions, which the Court consolidated. The parties ultimately settled the matter for $23 million. Plaintiff Zamora received a settlement payment and completed a claim form that included a release of claims. Id. at 2. In the release, Zamora covenanted to participate in an subsequent California Labor Code PAGA action against Defendant for penalties. Id. However, Zamora then filed a PAGA action in state court against Defendant. Defendant argued that Zamora released the claims and sought the Court's power to enforce the settlement and release of claims and enjoin Zamora's lawsuit. Id. at 3. The Court granted Defendant's motion. The Court found that the parties did not dispute that Zamora participated in the settlement and signed the release. However, Zamora argued that: (i) her claim for suitable seating was not covering by the release; (ii) that enforcing the release violated public policy; and (iii) the release did not bar her suitable seating claims because she filed the action before the settlement was finalized. Id. at 4. The Court determined that there was no dispute that Zamora could have raised her suitable seating claim alongside the other wage & hour violations, and therefore it could not find that the release that Zamora signed did not encompass the suitable seating claim. Id. at 4-5. The Court opined that a settlement agreement is a mutual agreement between two parties to end litigation. Id. at 5. Further, the Court stated that enforcing a settlement agreed did not in any way prevent Zamora from proceeding collectively with other employees or from receiving compensation for injuries. Id. Finally, the Court held that Zamora signed the settlement release on August 12, 2014, at which time she was bound by the settlement terms. Id. Plaintiff filed her state court lawsuit on August 21, 2014, after signing the settlement release. Accordingly, the Court concluded that because allowing Zamora to proceed in state court would require Defendant to litigate a matter that could have been litigated in the original action, there was substantial justification for enjoining the state court proceeding. Id. at 6.

Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to enforce the settlement and enjoined Zamora from pursuing the action in state court.

Lao, et al. v. H&M Hennes & Mauritz, L.P.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 177135 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a store manager, filed a class action alleging that Defendant failed to provide accurate itemized wage statements and failed to pay minimum wage, overtime wages, and premium pay for missed meal and rest periods in violation of the California Labor Code. Defendant filed a motion for partial summary judgment on Plaintiff's fourth cause of action for meal time violations and sixth cause of action for waiting time claims, on the ground that the claims were barred by the doctrine of res judicata. Plaintiff agreed to dismiss the fourth cause of action without prejudice but opposed the motion as to the waiting time claims. Id. at *1. In an earlier-filed wage & hour class action suit in state court, Suzanne Tran brought suit to challenge Defendant's alleged policy or practice of requiring non-exempt employees to work substantial amounts of time "off-the-clock and without pay, and failing to provide non-exempt employees with meal and rest periods." Id. at *4-5. Tran alleged that she was required to perform numerous tasks both at the beginning and the end of her meal and rest breaks, and therefore she was not provided with 30 minutes of off-duty time for meal breaks or 10 minutes of off-duty time for rest breaks, nor paid one hour of wages for each meal/rest period violation. Accordingly, Tran sought recovery of waiting time penalties as provided under § 203 of the California Labor Code. The Court certified a class in Tran ("Tran class"). Plaintiff in the instant action was a member of the Tran class. Id. at *6. The state court had granted preliminary approval of a settlement in Tran. The settlement notice contained a release provision, which the claims administrator mailed to all class members. Id. at *7. Plaintiff admitted that he received a claim form, but he did not submit a completed form nor did he request to be excluded from the Tran settlement. The Court found that although Tran and Plaintiff's action both involved a Labor Code waiting time cause of action, the causes of action were not based upon the same underlying facts. Id. at *13. The Court explained that Tran was predicated on Defendant's alleged failure to provide meal and rest periods, and did not include allegations regarding security checks, or unpaid wages based on an incorrect regular rate of pay or ATM cards, which were alleged in the instant action. Id. at *14. Moreover, the Court held that the scope of the release in the Tran settlement was tailored to the factual allegations in that complaint to encompass "all claims . . . that were alleged . . . or that could have been alleged based on the facts alleged in the First Amended Complaint. . . ." Id. Further, the Court determined that the claim form notified the class members in Tran that the class action settlement released all claims included in the complaint. The Court found that because the complaint in Tran did not include factual allegations regarding security checks or ATM cards, the resulting settlement and judgment did not preclude Plaintiff's waiting time claim in this case based upon those allegations. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Taste Of Mao,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 107923 (S.D.N.Y. July 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former waiters, delivery workers, and cashiers, alleged that Defendant failed to pay overtime wages in violation of the FLSA. Defendant had previously entered into a settlement supervised by the U.S. Department of Labor (the "DOL settlement") to resolve FLSA-related liabilities. The DOL's investigation, which covered the period from August 2013 to August 2015, found that 19 employees, including four of the five Plaintiffs in this action, were entitled to back wages totaling $38,883.80. Defendant agreed to settle the matter by paying $48,641.21 to the DOL. To ensure that the DOL settlement covered all 19 employees, Defendant asked the DOL to provide an assurance that it "had the authority to represent the employees." Id. at *2. The DOL confirmed its authority to represent and resolve all of the employees' claims. Defendant then paid the DOL, and the DOL mailed WH-60 forms to the employees, notifying them of the settlement. Id. at *3. To receive payment, the employees were required to sign the WH-60 form and return an executed copy to the DOL. Notwithstanding the settlement, five former employees, including one who was not covered by the DOL settlement, commenced their own action and sought damages arising from alleged FLSA violations that exceeded the period covered by the DOL settlement. Defendant contended that the DOL settlement barred their claims. Despite Plaintiffs' decisions not to sign the WH-60 forms and accept their settlement payments, Defendant argued that the funds were still constructively in Plaintiffs' possession because the DOL, as their agent, had not returned any of the settlement monies. Id. at *4. Therefore, Defendant claimed that the non-return of the DOL settlement funds constituted a waiver of Plaintiffs' right to sue. Plaintiffs argued that their decision not to sign the WH-60 forms represented an unequivocal rejection of the DOL settlement, thereby preserving their right to sue. Moreover, Plaintiffs asserted that the relief provided by the DOL settlement was insufficient when compared to the relief they sought in their own action because their action included a former employee who was never covered by the DOL settlement and expanded the time period at issue. The Court noted that waiver requires: (i) that the employee agree to accept payment which the Secretary of Labor determines to be due; and (ii) that there be payment in full, with both elements satisfied independently. Id. at *5. The DOL WH-60 forms contained a clear waiver clause stating that the "amount of back wages, liquidated damages, or other compensation" in the DOL settlement, if accepted, resulted in "waive[r] [of] any right [Plaintiffs] have to bring suit on [their] behalf for the payment of such unpaid minimum wages and/or unpaid overtime compensation for the period of time indicated [in the form] and an equal amount in liquidated damages, plus attorneys' fees and court costs under Section 16(b) of the FLSA." Id. at *6. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs did not execute their WH-60 forms, and therefore none of them could be deemed to have accepted the DOL settlement and waived their right to sue. Id. The Court noted that, while none of the Plaintiffs expressly rejected the DOL settlement, their refusal or failure to sign the WH-60 form was tantamount to a rejection because: (i) the WH-60 form did not provide an option to expressly reject payment; and (ii) the FLSA maintains a provisions stating that the amount "recovered by the Secretary of Labor on behalf of an employee . . . not paid to [such] employee because of inability to do so within a period of three years shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts." Id. at *7-8. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

(xxx) Statute Of Limitations Issues In Wage & Hour Class Action Litigation

Kim, et al. v. Capital Dental Technology,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 162731(N.D. Ill. Oct. 2, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of laboratory technicians, filed a class action alleging overtime violations pursuant to the FLSA and the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"). Defendants moved for partial summary judgment on the basis that: (i) certain claims were barred by the statutes of limitations; (ii) Plaintiffs were only entitled to fluctuating workweek ("FWW") overtime compensation; and (iii) two Plaintiffs were exempt from overtime pursuant to the FLSA's executive employee exemption. Id. at *2. The Court denied Defendants' motion. First, as to Defendants' assertion that the claims were time-barred, Plaintiffs contended that the statute of limitations should be tolled because Defendants failed to post required materials concerning employees' FLSA rights. Plaintiffs submitted declarations that they never saw any posters regarding minimum wage or overtime pay posted inside of Defendants' facility. Plaintiffs argued that because they never saw the required labor posters and Defendants did not otherwise demonstrate that Plaintiffs had acquired general knowledge of their FLSA rights, the limitations period must be tolled for the period during which they were unaware of their rights. The Court agreed and ruled that a reasonable jury could conclude that the required labor posters were not properly displayed and that the statute of limitations should be tolled. Id. at *12. Second, as to Plaintiffs' overtime claims, Defendants asserted that because they utilized a fluctuating workweek overtime compensation method, they were permitted to pay half-time rather than time-and-a-half to certain salaried employees whose hours fluctuated from week to week. Id. at *13. Defendants contended that because Plaintiffs were paid a regular salary every two weeks that generally did not fluctuate based on the hours they worked, Defendants were entitled to summary judgment on the matter of the FWW method's application. Id. at *15. Defendants offered pay stubs and deposition transcripts showing the frequency and method with which Plaintiffs were paid. Plaintiffs countered that Defendants had not established that Plaintiffs' bi-weekly salaries were fixed because Defendant made deductions when Plaintiffs worked fewer than 40 hours. Id. Additionally, Plaintiffs disputed that there was a clear mutual understanding that their bi-weekly salary would compensate them for all straight-time hours worked. The Court agreed that Plaintiffs raised a triable dispute as to how their overtime should be calculated because for the FWW method to apply, Plaintiffs' salary must not be diminished even if their number of hours fell below 40 and several of Plaintiffs' pay stubs showed that they were docked pay for partial-day absences and for absences caused by the employer's lack of work. Finally, Defendants argued that two Plaintiffs were overtime-exempt executive employees and sought summary judgment as to their claims. The Court rejected Defendants' assertion because Defendants failed to establish that either of the employees played a role in making decisions to hire, fire, and promote other employees as required under the FLSA. Id. at *23. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion for summary judgment.

Marrs v. United States*, 2017 U.S. Claims LEXIS 1347 (Fed. Cl. Oct. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current or former government employees, alleged that they were not timely compensated for work performed during a shutdown of the federal government in October 2013, in violation of the FLSA. The Court found that the failure to pay the workers in a timely fashion was indeed a violation of the FLSA. At issue was whether the government's violation of the FLSA was willful under 29 U.S.C. § 255(a), thereby extending the statute of limitations from two years to three years. Id. at *3. Based upon the information received from relevant personnel and review of the relevant documents, the agencies that advised Defendant on the implementation of labor law and policy did not – prior to or during the 2013 government shutdown – consider whether requiring employees designated as "non-exempt" under the FLSA; they also did not consider whether workers "excepted" for purposes of the shutdown to work during the shutdown – without pay or overtime wages on their regularly scheduled paydays for work performed during the first week of the shutdown – would violate the FLSA. Id. at *10. Defendant understood that during a lapse in appropriations the Anti-Deficiency Act prohibited payment of wages for work performed during the 2013 government shutdown until funds had been appropriated. Defendant did not seek a formal legal opinion regarding how to meet its obligations under both the Anti-Deficiency Act ("ADA") and FLSA as to employees designated as "non-exempt" under the FLSA and as "excepted" for purposes of the shutdown who were required to work during the shutdown. Id. Defendant argued, however, that these facts did not rise to the level of a willful FLSA violation. The Court found that the undisputed facts showed that the federal government, as a whole, understood that it could not pay excepted employees during the 2013 shutdown due to the constraints of the ADA. However, the Court ruled that complying with the ADA and not paying excepted employees during the shutdown did not mean that these federal agencies showed a reckless disregard of the FLSA. Id. at *17-18. Instead, the Court held that the agencies' conduct, in the context of the 2013 government shutdown, did not exceed a level of merely negligent or unreasonable conduct vis-à-vis the FLSA. The Court noted that although there was no case directly on point, the Court had previously found that a federal agency did not recklessly disregard the FLSA when it attempted to comply with a particular federal statute and, as a result, neglected its obligations under the FLSA. Thus, the Court determined that although federal agencies may blunder in their interpretation of a federal statute that implicates their responsibilities under the FLSA, they can do so without committing a willful violation of the FLSA. Id. at *18-19.

Marshall, et al. v. Louisiana,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3349 (E.D. La. Jan. 10, 2017). Plaintiff, a former deputy sheriff, filed a putative collective action complaint against the Sheriff and the Law Enforcement District for the Parish of New Orleans ("Defendants"), seeking unpaid wages and overtime under the FLSA. Plaintiff, on behalf of himself and others similarly-situated, sought wages and overtime for time spent less than 30 minutes prior to his shift and for up to 30 minutes after his shift for which he was not paid. The Court had previously conditionally certified the action as a collective action. After notice was sent, 99 individuals opted-in to the action. Defendants filed a motion summary judgment as to individuals who failed to timely file their opt-in notices and/or who worked at a facility not covered by the opt-in collective action. Id. at *3. Defendants contended that the FLSA claims of 13 of the opt-in Plaintiffs were barred by the statute of limitations. Additionally, Defendants contended that six of the opt-in Plaintiffs never worked at one of the eight opt-in facilities within the specified time-frame. Plaintiff did not oppose summary judgment as to the individuals who did not file timely opt-in notices. Id. at *4. However, Plaintiff argued that summary judgment was not appropriate as to the claims of opt-in Plaintiffs Carla Thomas ("Thomas") and Stephanie Hudson ("Hudson") because the evidence showed that they worked in facilities covered by the conditionally certified action during the specified time-frame. Id. at *5. Because genuine disputes as to material issues of fact existed as to the locations of their employment, Plaintiff argued that the Court should deny summary judgment as to the claims of Thomas and Hudson. Id. The Court stated that under the FLSA, a cause of action must be commenced within two years after the cause of action accrued, or within three years if the cause of action arose out of a "willful violation" of FLSA. Id. at *8. Plaintiff did not oppose summary judgment as to "those individuals whose opt-in forms were received more than three years after the last date of work, based on all discovery provided to Plaintiff." Id. Accordingly, the Court granted summary judgment as to the opt-in Plaintiffs whose claims were barred by the statute of limitations. Additionally, Plaintiff did not oppose summary judgment as to the claims of opt-in Plaintiffs who did not work at one of the facilities covered by the conditionally certified collective action during the applicable time period. Therefore, the Court granted summary judgment as to the claims of those opt-in Plaintiffs as well. The Court, however, found that Plaintiff submitted sufficient evidence to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to whether opt-in Plaintiffs Thomas and Hudson worked at facilities covered by the conditionally certified collective action during the applicable time period. Accordingly, the Court denied summary judgment as to the claims of opt-in Plaintiffs Thomas and Hudson. Finally, the Court noted that Plaintiff did not address in his opposition whether summary judgment was appropriate as to the claim of opt-in Plaintiff Carylenna Grant ("Grant"). Id. at *10. The record indicated that Grant did not opt-in to the collective action until more than three years after she worked with Defendants. The Court determined that because the uncontroverted evidence in the record indicated that Grant did not consent to join the litigation until more than three years after her employment, her claim was barred by the statute of limitations. Id. at *11. The Court accordingly granted summary judgment as to Grant's claim too. The Court therefore granted in part and denied in part Defendants' motion for summary judgement.

(xxxi) Stays In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Bankwitz, et al. v. Ecolab, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171786 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, alleged that they were misclassified as exempt employees and therefore wrongfully denied overtime and double-time premiums in violation of the California Labor Code, the Unfair Competition Law, and the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). Defendant moved to compel arbitration of all Plaintiffs' claims except the PAGA claim, or in the alternative to stay this case pending the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling on the enforceability of arbitration agreements like Defendant's arbitration agreement in Morris v. Ernst & Young, LLP, 834 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 2016). The Court denied the motion to compel arbitration and granted the motion to stay the proceedings. In deciding whether to stay a case pending a Supreme Court's future ruling, it considered: (i) the possible damage that may result from granting of a stay; (ii) the hardship or inequity that a party may suffer in being required to go forward; and (iii) the orderly course of justice measured in terms of the simplifying or complicating of issues, proof, and questions of law that could be expected to result from a stay. Id. at *12-13. Plaintiffs argued that the stay would damage them by delaying the relief they were allegedly owed. The Court reasoned that the forthcoming Supreme Court ruling in Morris minimized any potential damage because the stay would be short and not indefinite. Id. at *13. The second factor considered the possible harm from requiring Defendant to litigate while Morris is pending in the Supreme Court. The Court noted that if Morris was overturned, the agreement's class action waiver ultimately may be deemed enforceable, Plaintiffs would be precluded from pursuing class claims in any forum, and the Court would have to refer Plaintiffs' individual claims to arbitration, and only Plaintiffs' PAGA claims would arguably remain in the Court. Id. at *13-14. The Court found that continued litigation on class certification issues might cause unnecessary hardship on Defendant if the class action waiver were ultimately enforced. Further, allowing substantive motion practice on Plaintiffs' individual claims to proceed absent a stay – such as motions to dismiss or motions for summary judgment– might also be prejudicial insofar as it would deprive Defendant of the right to benefit from arbitration of those issues. Id. at *14. However, the Court held that Defendant was unlikely to suffer prejudice from limited discovery on Plaintiffs' individual claims in the interim, since a similar exchange of information would likely need to occur in arbitration as well. The Court further held that allowing discovery of the PAGA representative claims may be premature because if Morris was reversed and arbitration was compelled, there was possibility that the PAGA representative claims might be stayed. Id. at *15. In that event, Defendant would be prejudiced by having to engage in PAGA discovery that might ultimately be mooted depending on the outcome of Plaintiffs' individual arbitration. Given the risk that the PAGA claims might be stayed pending arbitration, and the relatively short stay pending Morris, the Court found that the second factor leaned slightly in favor of granting a stay of the litigation provided Plaintiffs were allowed to proceed with discovery on Plaintiff's individual claims. Id. at *16. The third factor considered whether a stay would simplify or complicate the judicial process. The Court found little value in litigating a class certification motion or undertaking class discovery at this juncture when the Supreme Court's impending ruling might ultimately moot those claims, and therefore the third factor also weighed in favor of granting the stay. However, no matter what the resolution in Morris, the Court noted that Plaintiffs would be entitled to bring their individual claims in some forum and their PAGA claims, and therefore some limited discovery into the individual claims would not involve a potential waste of resources. Id. at *16-17. The Court therefore granted the stay in part with the following conditions: (i) the parties may proceed with individual discovery; (ii) the parties shall undertake preservation of evidence relevant to all claims pursuant to Rule 26(f); and (iii) the parties shall meet and confer regarding a limited discovery plan.

Campanelli, et al. v. Image First Healthcare Laundry Specialists,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106394 (N.D. Cal. July 10, 2017). Plaintiff, a delivery driver, brought a class and collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the California Labor Code. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action as to his FLSA claims under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) and a motion for class certification of his California Labor Code claims pursuant to Rule 23. Defendants filed a motion to stay all class and collective action proceedings until the U.S. Supreme Court issued a decision in Epic Systems Corp. v.

Lewis, Case No. 16-285, and the cases consolidated with Epic including the Ninth Circuit's decision in Morris v. Ernst & Young, LLP, 834 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 2016). The Court noted that Epic would address whether "an agreement that requires an employer and an employee to resolve employment-related disputes through individual arbitration, and waive class and collective proceedings, is enforceable under the Federal Arbitration Act, notwithstanding the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act." Id. at *4. Defendants' motion to stay argued that "virtually all" of the putative class members had signed arbitration agreements that include a concerted action waiver. Id. at *4. Defendants thereby argued that if the Supreme Court overturned the Ninth Circuit's decision in Morris, it was possible that many putative class members would be precluded from participating in a class or collective action. Defendants asserted that the decision in Epic could have a dramatic impact on the size of the putative class/collective action in this case. Id. at *8. Plaintiff argued that Defendants have not shown that any class members were subject to binding arbitration agreements, because Defendants relied on only a "hearsay" declaration that does not attach any signed, dated agreements. Id. at *8-9. Even if Defendants' evidence was accepted, Plaintiff claimed that a stay was inappropriate because any further delay in this case would affect the rights of the putative class. The Court noted that in similar cases, case law authorities had divided over whether to grant stays pending a decision in Epic. However, under the particular circumstances of this case, the Court found that a stay was appropriate because two preliminary legal issues must be resolved before the propriety of class and collective certification can be determined, including: (i) whether the employees of non-party ImageFIRST entities were properly part of the putative class; and (ii) whether the alleged arbitration agreements are enforceable, and if so, how many putative class members signed concerted action waivers. Id. at *10. The Court concluded that it would be inefficient to proceed to the certification stage until these two issues are resolved, and thereby granted Defendants' motion to stay in part. The Court noted that the stay would not be unduly long, as Epic will be heard in the fall of 2017 and decided by early 2018. Id. at *12-13. Moreover the Court determined that the case can continue to proceed in a limited fashion. The Court ordered that while Epic is pending, Plaintiff could obtain discovery on his "joint employer" theory and move for summary judgment on the issue. Id. at *13. The Court found that this would allow it and the parties to therefore have clarity as to which ImageFIRST entities may be considered to be an "employer" for purposes of Plaintiff's FLSA claims. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to stay the proceedings pending the ruling in Epic in part.

Hernandez, et al. v. Sephora,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35758 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 13, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a putative class and collective action alleging that Defendant required employees to perform work without proper compensation in violation of state and federal law. Plaintiffs asserted one claim under the FLSA and nine claims under California state law. Plaintiffs subsequently discovered that there were two prior-filed class actions pending in state court that involved overlapping California state law claims. Plaintiffs, therefore, voluntarily dismissed their California claims and re-filed them in state court. Defendant moved to stay Plaintiffs' remaining FLSA claim. Id. at *2. In Plaintiffs' FLSA claim, they asserted that Defendant made its employees work off-the-clock by requiring them to submit to bag inspections after clocking-out and by requiring them to spend significant time laundering their work uniforms and applying required high levels of makeup during off hours and on breaks. Id. at *3. Defendant argued that the Colorado River doctrine – from Colorado River Water Conservation District v. United States, 424 U.S. 800 (1976), and its progency – required the Court to stay Plaintiffs' FLSA claim pending the resolution of the two state court actions. The Court explained that, under the Colorado River doctrine, considerations of wise judicial administration, giving regard to conservation of judicial resources and comprehensive disposition of litigation, may justify a stay of federal proceedings pending the resolution of concurrent state court proceedings involving the same matter. Id. at *5. The Court noted that the threshold for applying the Colorado River doctrine was whether the relevant federal and state court cases are substantially similar. Id. at *6. Defendant argued that the federal and state cases were substantially similar because they involved the same underlying factual issues, the same Defendant, and overlapping California class members. The Court disagreed and found that the FLSA claim and the state law claims differed in that Plaintiffs brought the FLSA claim on behalf of collective action members nationwide who worked 40 or more hours "on the books" in a given week, while Plaintiffs brought the state law claims on behalf of a putative class of California employees and sought unpaid compensation for all work performed off-the-clock. Id. at *4. The Court determined that, although the state court proceeding could resolve the underlying factual issues pertinent to the FLSA claim, legally those issues would have no impact on the claims of collective action members in 49 states. Id. at *18. Defendant suggested that this supported a partial stay of the California collective action claims alone, but the Court held that such a partial stay would do nothing to conserve judicial resources or avoid unnecessary discovery. Id. at *18-19. The Court concluded that because a stay would do little to serve the purposes of the Colorado River doctrine and would provide Defendant a means of dismissing the potentially meritorious FLSA claims of collective action members in 49 states, a stay was not appropriate. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to stay Plaintiffs' nationwide FLSA claim.

Holmes, et al. v. Kelly Services, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40895 (E.D. Mich. Mar. 22, 2017). Plaintiff, a former call center agent, alleged that Defendants violated the FLSA by failing to compensate her and the other employees at her call center for all of the time they spent working. Id. at *1. Plaintiff filed a motion for conditional certification of a collective action pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). Id. at *2. Defendants asserted that Plaintiff executed an arbitration agreement that: (i) required her to arbitrate her dispute with Defendants; and (ii) prohibited her from participating in a collective action. Id. at *3. According to Defendants, the Supreme Court and the Sixth Circuit were currently considering the enforceability of arbitration agreements, like the one Plaintiff signed, which purport to waive an employee's right to proceed in a collective civil action. Id. at *5. Defendants argued that resolution of the appeals in their favor of their position would prohibit Plaintiff from proceeding with her action and would render the conditional certification motion moot. Id. Defendants therefore requested that the Court stay consideration of the certification motion until after the U.S. Supreme Court and/or Sixth Circuit ruled in the appeals before them. Id. at *5-6. The Court concluded that a stay was not warranted and denied Defendant's motion. First, the Court determined that a stay could unfairly prejudice potential members of the collective action, as the longer the Court delayed in ruling, the more likely it was that contact information for potential members of collective could become stale. Id. at *6. This Court stated that this could make it impossible to inform potential collective action members about the action and their potential claims. Id. at *6-7. Moreover, the Court determined that if potential collective action members were not promptly informed about the lawsuit, they could lose or dispose of documentary evidence that could be useful to the prosecution of their claims. Id. at *7. Defendants asserted that such prejudice was merely speculative and that Plaintiff had not identified any evidence of concrete harm that members of the collective action had suffered or could suffer. Id. The Court stated that the stay Defendants requested could last for months, if not longer, substantially increasing the likelihood that potential members of the collective action could becoming unreachable or that relevant documents could be destroyed. Id. Thus, because any stay the Court entered would be lengthy, the potential for prejudice would be exacerbated. Defendants also argued that potential collective action members would not suffer any prejudice because Defendants were willing to toll the statute of limitations to ensure that no member of the collective action lost the ability to bring a claim after the Court lifted the stay. Id. at *7-8. The Court, however, held that this would not mitigate the risk of unfair prejudice from the loss of contact information or evidence that could result from a lengthy stay. Id. at *8. The Court also found that Defendants would not be unfairly burdened were the Court to deny the motion to stay, as they would only be required to brief the issue of conditional certification. Id. The Court further stated that even if it were to grant the Plaintiff's motion for conditional certification, Defendants found not be unfairly burdened because Defendants would only be required to produce information that Defendants already should have in their possession. Finally, the Court opined that once the membership of the collective action was notified, the Court could then stay the action in its entirety pending the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court and/or Sixth Circuit. Id. at *9. The Court noted that while this procedure would cause some burden to Defendants, it did not believe that the burden was unfair when compared to the prejudice facing the potential members of the collective action. Accordingly, because the cases currently pending before the U.S. Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit addressed the enforceability of arbitration agreements, which went to the merits of Defendants' opposition to Plaintiff's claims, the Court concluded those cases should pose no bar to the Court's initial consideration of Plaintiff's certification motion. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to stay the proceedings.

(xxxii) Tip Pooling And Tip Credit Claims Under The FLSA

Bergstrom, et al. v. Coco Pazzo Of Illinois, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43805 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, brought a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay overtime and minimum wage in violation of the FLSA. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment disputing whether Defendants properly claimed a tip credit. The Court denied the motions. Plaintiffs contended that Defendants failed to provide Plaintiffs proper notice of the tip credit. Id. at *2. Defendants asserted that the FLSA directed its restrictions on the tip credit only to mandatory tip pools and that Defendants' system was voluntary, rendering the requirements inapplicable. Id. Defendants also contended that their notice of the credit was proper and that managers did not participate in the tip pool. Id. Plaintiffs argued that Defendants did not identify any evidence demonstrating that they provided proper notice of the tip credit and that this failure invalidated the tip credit and entitled Plaintiffs to summary judgment. Defendants filed an affidavit from Defendant Weiss, Coco Pazzo's president, stating that he personally informed employees about their pay and the tip pool either during initial interviews or at run-throughs before the employees began active duty. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiffs argued that the Court should disregard the affidavit for purposes of their motion. Plaintiffs contended that a party opposing summary judgment cannot defeat the motion "merely by manufacturing a conflict in his own testimony by submitting an affidavit that contradicts an earlier deposition." Id. at *6. The Court noted that the Seventh Circuit has observed that "an affidavit can be excluded as a sham only where the witness has given clear answers to unambiguous questions which negate the existence of any genuine issue of material fact." Id. at *7. The Court held that the testimony cited by Plaintiffs did not provide clear answers. Id. at *8. The Court explained that questions about the credibility of Weiss' deposition testimony did not provide a basis for striking the similar assertions of his affidavit or for holding as a matter of law that Defendants offered no evidence that it gave notice of the tip credit. Id. The Court, therefore, concluded that Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment should be denied. Defendants asserted that the FLSA's tip-pooling parameters applied only to involuntary tip pooling and that the arrangements among Defendants' employees were entirely voluntary. Id. at *8. The Court, however, noted that Plaintiff Bergstrom testified at her deposition that Defendants told her when she interviewed that the restaurant was a "pool house," and that she took that statement to mean that, if she wanted to work there, she had to participate in the tip pool. Id. at *9. Further, Weiss himself testified at his deposition that, when he referred to the tip pool arrangement as voluntary, he meant that someone who did not like it could discuss it with the other employees or look for work elsewhere. Id. Because the Court could point to such contradictory testimony, it found that a jury question existed, and therefore Defendants were not entitled to judgment as a matter of law on the voluntary nature of the tip pool. Defendants further contended that the floor managers who participated in the pool were "employees" for FLSA purposes rather than managers with sufficient authority to be considered "employers" whose participation invalidated the pool. Id. Defendants argued that managers did not have ultimate decision-making authority to hire, fire, schedule, or determine pay of employees. Id. at *10. However, the Court found that Plaintiffs responded with testimony indicating that managers did have some authority in these areas. The Court, therefore, decided that a genuine issue of material fact remained on whether Defendants' managers were employees for purposes of participating in the tip pool. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' motions for summary judgment.

Eldridge, et al. v. OS Restaurant Services, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 75746 (M.D. Fla. May 18, 2017). Plaintiff, a tipped employee, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the Florida Minimum Wage Act ("FMWA") and the Florida Constitution by unlawfully applying the tip credit against the minimum wage rate paid to him for "side work" tasks in excess of 20% of his total working time. Id. at *2. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court denied. Plaintiff alleged that he spent more than 20% of his workday doing non-tipped activities including bar set up, table set up, and maintenance and janitorial work. Id. at *3. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant should have compensated him for the full minimum wage for the time he spent performing more than 20% of his time on these non-tipped tasks. Id. The Court noted that the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") states that employees who spend more than 20% of their time performing general preparation work or maintenance are not subject to a tip credit for the time spent performing those duties. Id. at *6. Defendant argued that the Court should reject the DOL's 20% rule because it is not binding authority. The Court disagreed and stated that the DOL's 20% rule is highly persuasive authority. The Court further noted that other case law authorities have utilized the 20% rule because it clarifies the ambiguity contained in 29 C.F.R. § 531.56(e) "by delineating how much time a tipped employee can engage in related, non-tip-producing activity before such time must be compensated directly by the employer at the full minimum wage rate." Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Goodson, et al. v. OS Restaurant Services*, LLC, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71923 (M.D. Fla. May 11, 2017). Plaintiff, a tipped restaurant employee, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated overtime and minimum wage provisions of the FLSA, Article X, § 24(c) of the Florida Constitution ("Article X"), the Florida Minimum Wage Act, and the Florida Wage & Hour Law ("FMWA"). Plaintiff alleged that Defendant improperly took a tip credit against Plaintiff's wages while requiring Plaintiff to spend more than 20% of his time in non-tipped work activities. Id. at *2. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, which the Court denied. The Court stated that it must answer the administrative law question of whether the 20% Rule was entitled to deference as a permissible interpretation of the FLSA. Id. at *2-3. The Court explained that case law precedents in other circuits have concluded that the 20% Rule "was reasonable, persuasive, and entitled to deference." Id. at *8. The Court noted that this analysis of the 20% Rule has rarely been criticized, and has been relied on and cited favorably across the country. Id. at *9-10. The Court found that the dual job regulation – that related work must be only "occasional" and constitute only a "part of" a tipped employee's work – provided that employers may not take the tip credit when related work consumes "a substantial amount of time (in excess of 20%)" of the tipped employee's work time. Id. at *12. Given the ambiguity of the tip credit provisions of the FLSA and the formal steps taken in promulgating the tip credit regulations, the Court rejected Defendant's argument that the dual job regulation was not entitled to deference under Chevron U.S.A. Inc. v. NRDC, 467 U.S. 837 (1984). The Court further determined that the 20% Rule was not "clearly erroneous" or inconsistent with the pertinent regulations. Id. at *13. Finally, given the long and largely undisturbed history of the tip credit regulations in general and the dual job regulation in particular, both in the case law authorities and the U.S. Department of Labor, the Court held that the 20% Rule would be entitled to deference, and therefore Defendant's motion must be denied.

Malivuk, et al. v. Ameripark, LLC,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 10261 (11th Cir. June 9, 2017). Plaintiff, a valet driver, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA by appropriating tips from drivers. The District Court dismissed Plaintiff's complaint, finding that Plaintiff did not allege that she was either: (i) paid less than the minimum wage; or (ii) under-compensated for overtime work, which is necessary before a party can plead a private cause of action under § 216 of the FLSA. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit upheld the District Court's ruling. The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") previously promulgated 29 C.F.R. § 531.52, which declared that "[t]ips are the property of the employee whether or not the employer has taken a tip credit under [§ 203(m)] of the FLSA." Id. at *3. The regulation further specified that "[t]he employer is prohibited from using an employee's tips, whether or not it has taken a tip credit, for any reason other than that which is statutorily permitted in [§ 203(m)]: as a credit against its minimum wage obligations to the employee, or in furtherance of a valid tip pool." Id. Plaintiff contended that Defendant violated this regulation, and therefore the FLSA, when it confiscated Plaintiff's tips, even if Defendant did not take the "tip credit" under § 203(m). Id. at *4. The Eleventh Circuit found that, as to whether an employee can utilize § 531.52 to sue an employer, an employee can launch a private action against an employer only when the FLSA authorizes such an action. Id. at *5. The Eleventh Circuit held that there was no statutory authority for a private suit by an employee who claims only that her tips were withheld, but who does not also allege that she received less than the minimum wage, before tips, or that she received less than she was entitled for overtime work. Section 216(b) establishes a private right of action for violations of § 206 and § 207 of the FLSA. Section 207 limits the maximum working hours an employee may work without receiving overtime compensation; here, however, Plaintiff did not assert that she was under-compensated for overtime work. Section 206 requires the payment of a minimum wage, but Plaintiff did not assert that she was paid less than the minimum wage before calculation of tips. Plaintiff's contended that Defendant constructively took a tip credit in violation of § 203(m) because it could use diverted tips to off-set business expenses, such as employee wages. Id. at *7. Alternatively, Plaintiff asserted that even if Defendant's actions did not constitute the taking of a tip credit, its appropriation of employee tips violated the DOL's 2011 regulation protecting an employee's right to those tips even when an employer does not take the tip credit. Id. at *7-8. The Eleventh Circuit rejected Plaintiff's arguments on the grounds that Plaintiff's tip-withholding claim implicated neither § 206 nor § 207, and Plaintiff could not assert a private cause of action under § 216(b). Accordingly, the Eleventh Circuit upheld the District Court's ruling.

Marin, et al. v. Apple-Metro, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 165568 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant servers, brought two actions alleging violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA") and New York Labor Law ("NYLL") that were consolidated. Plaintiffs sought to certify two sub-classes. Plaintiffs also moved for partial summary judgment of the claims of the members of the collective action alleging that: (i) Plaintiffs were not provided with proper wage notices; and (ii) Defendants failed to pay minimum wage. Id. at *68. The Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court certify the two sub-classes subject to modification, and grant in part and deny in part Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment. At the outset, the Magistrate Judge rejected Defendant's argument that the motion for partial summary judgment should be denied because claims for unpaid minimum wages and failure to provide a wage notice statement were not specifically alleged in the complaints. The Court ruled that Defendant's answers raising affirmative defenses to the complaints indicated that it had notice of Plaintiffs' minimum wage and wage notice claims under NYLL. As to Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment on the wage notice forms, Defendants claimed that the motion was premature as they had not taken the depositions of Plaintiffs. The Magistrate Judge rejected this argument, noting that Defendants had sole possession of the wage forms, as well as any additional forms that would demonstrate proper notice of the tip credit, so additional discovery was not needed. Plaintiffs asserted that because the wage notices failed to comply with the NYLL, Defendant was not entitled to take a tip credit. Plaintiffs argued that Defendant's notices established that Plaintiffs were not paid proper minimum wages if Defendants were not entitled to this tip credit. Id. at *72. The Court agreed with Plaintiffs. The Magistrate Judge ruled that summary judgment was appropriate based on Defendants' failure to provide accurate wage notice information as required by the NYLL. The Magistrate Judge reviewed Plaintiffs' wage notices and found that none of the wage notices contained the proper figures for the overtime hourly pay rate in violation of NYLL. Defendants raised the statutory the affirmative defense that they: (i) paid Plaintiffs the proper overtime rate; and (ii) reasonably believed in good faith that they provided the required notice, claiming that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether they could invoke the affirmative defenses. However, because the affirmative defenses became effective after each Plaintiff was hired, the Magistrate Judge concluded that the affirmative defenses did not apply retroactively. The Magistrate Judge also concluded that none of the wage notices produced by Defendants conformed to the requirements of NYLL. However, given that Plaintiffs began employment at different dates, and the NYLL did not provide a remedy for wage notice violations prior to April 9, 2011, four Plaintiffs were unable to recover damages as a matter of law. Plaintiffs who were hired after April 9, 2011, could recover if the wage notice was not proper. Thus, there was a question of fact as to when the notice was provided as to some Plaintiffs as the evidence was insufficient to determine as a matter of law that that some employees received a notice at the time of hire. Hence, summary judgment was not appropriate. However, 36 Plaintiffs were hired after April 9, 2011, and the notice that was provided to each of these Plaintiffs at the time of hire did not contain the proper overtime rate, which established Defendants' liability. Id. at *95. Accordingly, partial summary judgment was proper as to these Plaintiffs. Because Defendant failed to provide proper notice of a tip credit, Defendant forfeited any right to claim the tip credit, and therefore failed to pay Plaintiffs the required minimum wage. Beginning on January 1, 2011, employers seeking to take advantage of a tip credit had to provide the employee, prior to the start of employment, with written notice of the employee's regular hourly pay rate, overtime hourly pay rate, the amount of tip credit, if any, to be taken from the daily rate and that extra pay is required if tips are insufficient to bring the employee up to the minimum wage. Id. at *97. The Court granted partial summary judgment as to the minimum wage claim because Plaintiffs contended that all the information that employers were required to provide to employees to claim a tip credit needed to be in a single written notice. Defendants claimed that it placed posters in a prominent area of their restaurants containing the tip notice. Id. at *103. However, the Court ruled that to claim a tip credit toward the required minimum wage, a tip credit notice must include each individual employee's regular hourly pay rate, overtime hourly pay rate, the amount of the tip credit, if any, to be taken from the basic minimum hourly rate, and the regular payday. The tip credit notice must include personalized information and the Court rejected Defendant's claims of notice via posters, handbooks, and orally at orientation, as none satisfied the notice requirement. Accordingly, because Defendants were not entitled to claim a tip credit, there was no genuine issue of material fact that Plaintiffs, except for four individual Plaintiffs, were paid below minimum wage. Id. at *131. The Magistrate Judge recommended, except for those four Plaintiffs, that the motion for summary judgment on the minimum wage claims be granted. Id. at *132. The Court found that both Plaintiffs' original proposed sub-classes were "fail-safe" classes and the Magistrate Judge modified the classes. In sum, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court grant Plaintiffs' partial motion for summary judgment in part and deny it in part. The Court also recommended that Plaintiffs' request for class certification of the two revised sub-classes be granted.

Marsh, et al. v. J. Alexander's*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 17199 (9th Cir. Sept. 6, 2017). Plaintiff, a restaurant employee, filed a collective action alleging the Defendant failed to pay minimum wage for time spent performing non-tipped work in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff asserted that he was employed in dual occupation capacity and thereby subject to the minimum wage requirements of the FLSA when performing non-tipped work. The District Court dismissed the case, holding that Plaintiff had not alleged a dual occupation and that deference to the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") guidance underpinning his theory of the case was unwarranted. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed. The Ninth Circuit noted that under the FLSA's regulations, an individual employed in dual occupations (one tipped and one not) cannot be paid using the tip credit for hours worked in the non-tipped occupation. The regulations clarify, however, that "such a situation is distinguishable from that of a waitress who spends part of her time cleaning and setting tables, toasting bread, making coffee, and occasionally washing dishes or glasses, as such related duties in an occupation that is a tipped occupation need not by themselves be directed toward producing tips." Id. at *7. The DOL guidance states that the tip credit may not be used if an employee spends over 20% of hours in a workweek performing duties related to the tipped occupation but not themselves tip-generating. The guidance further states that an employer also may not take the tip credit for time spent on duties not related to the tipped occupation because such an employee is "effectively employed in dual jobs." Id. at *9. The Ninth Circuit, however, concluded that the DOL's guidance was both inconsistent with the FLSA regulations and attempted to create a de facto new regulation such that it did not merit deference. Id. at *31. In particular, the Ninth Circuit noted the regulations' focus on dual occupations or jobs as contrasted with the DOL guidance: "instead of providing further guidance on what constitutes a distinct job, [the DOL] takes an entirely different approach; it . . . disallows tip credits on a minute-by-minute basis based on the type and quantity of tasks performed. Because the dual jobs regulation is concerned with when an employee has two jobs, not with differentiating between tasks within a job, the [DOL's] approach is inapposite and inconsistent with the dual jobs regulation." Id. at *29. Moreover, the Ninth Circuit found that the DOL guidance "creates an alternative regulatory approach with new substantive rules . . . [and] 'is de facto a new regulation' masquerading as an interpretation." Id. at *30. Accordingly, the Court affirmed the District Court's ruling dismissing Plaintiff's claims.

Osman, et al. v. Grube, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 105276 (N.D. Ohio July 7, 2017). Plaintiff, a server, brought an action on behalf of herself and those similarly-situated alleging that Defendant required her to perform approximately 40% of her work time performing non-tipped tasked while being paid her tipped wage in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff asserted that Defendants violated the FLSA by taking a tip credit for significant amounts of time she spent performing untipped related and unrelated duties. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, which the Court denied. The Court explained that that the occupation as a whole, rather that the duties performed, governs whether an employee is employed in a dual job. Id. at *7. The regulation does not require an employee to hold two distinct titles to be employed in a "dual job." Id. Instead, the Court stated that the employee must work in two distinct capacities. The Court found that previous case law, U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") opinion letters, and the DOL's Field Operation Handbook all supported a position the "maintenance" duties not performed within the immediate vicinity and time period of tipped duties are "unrelated" duties for which the employer may not take tip credit. Id. at *13. Additionally, the Court determined that these sources also supported the assertion that while preparatory and maintenance duties performed within the same vicinity and time period of tipped duties are "related duties," employers may not take tip credit if they consume a "substantial amount of time." Id. at *14. The Court held that Plaintiff performed "maintenance" – such as taking out trash, dusting, and cleaning bathrooms, restaurant floors, and video games – in addition to untipped preparatory activities such as slicing fruit, setting up the soda machine, rolling silverware, and washing dishes. Id. at *14-15. The Court found that Plaintiff stated that she performed these untipped duties 40% of her work time, considered by the DOL as a "substantial amount of time" in its 1985 opinion letter. Id. at *16. Therefore, the Court held that both the dual jobs and substantial amount of time claims were supported by the facts of the complaint. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Prusin, et al. v. Canton's Pearls, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 183226 (D. Md. Nov. 6, 2017). Plaintiff, a restaurant server, filed an action under the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA"), the Maryland Wage & Hour Law ("MWHL"), and the Maryland Wage Payments and Collection Law ("MWPCL") alleging minimum wage and overtime violations. Id. at *6. Plaintiff moved for partial summary judgment and the Court granted the motion in part and denied it in part. Plaintiff claimed that: (i) he was not given proper notice of tip credit provisions, as required under the FLSA and the MWHL; and (ii) Defendants could not rely upon mandatory gratuities retained by Plaintiff to satisfy the minimum wage and overtime wage under the FLSA. Id. at *6. The Court concluded that Defendants failed to point to any evidence in support of their claim that they provided Plaintiff with notification of the tip credit and failed to sustain their burden that they had provided notice. Id. at *11. Defendants relied upon their display of labor law posters, which the Court found was insufficient to satisfy the notice requirement under the FLSA and the MWHL. Id. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Defendants were not entitled to claim a tip credit as a matter of law. Id. Defendants also argued that the mandatory gratuities received by Plaintiff qualified as service charges and not tips under the FLSA. The Court rejected this argument because the service charge must have been included in Defendants' gross receipts and must have been distributed to the employees. Plaintiff presented dispositive evidence that the mandatory gratuities did not "become part of" Defendants' gross receipts and therefore did not qualify as service charges that may be used to off-set Defendants' minimum wage and overtime pay obligations. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment on his minimum wage claims under the FLSA and the MWHL. Id. at *26. Defendants did not dispute that Plaintiff worked overtime hours and that he was not compensated at a different rate for these hours. Defendants contended, however, that Plaintiff was exempt from the FLSA's overtime wage requirements under the retail or service establishment exemption. The Court rejected this argument because whether Defendants were entitled to the exemption turned entirely on whether the mandatory gratuities that they charged qualified as service charges under the FLSA. If so, then the charges would also qualify as commissions and therefore could entitle Defendants to use the exemption. The Court ruled that the mandatory gratuities did not qualify as service charges under the FLSA and Defendants' were not entitled to an exemption under the FLSA. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment as to the FLSA and the MWHL overtime claims. Id. at *28. The Court also granted Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment on the FLSA and the MWHL claims as to Plaintiff's individual employer, Defendant Hamilton, given the FLSA's expansive definition of an employer. Id. Because there was a genuine dispute of material fact regarding Plaintiff's proper measure of damages, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment as to damages. Id. at *40.

Thomas, et al. v. Bayou Fox, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 82769 (M.D. Ala. May 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of servers, brought a collective action alleging that Defendant, a restaurant, violated the minimum wage requirements of the FLSA by taking a tip credit and requiring a substantial amount of non-tipped work. Id. at *3. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, and the Court denied the motion. Plaintiffs claimed that the non-tipped work they were required to complete was compensated at $2.13 per hour, and that there was no opportunity to earn tips during the time they were performing this work because they were no longer serving customers. Id. Plaintiffs also alleged that they were required to perform additional "side work" while the restaurant was open that included "washing and rolling silverware, sweeping their area, cleaning tables, filling condiments, making tea, refilling ice machines, and running checkout." Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs asserted that they spent more than 20% of their working time performing non-tip-producing activities. Id. at *4. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to adequately plead an FLSA minimum wage claim because Plaintiffs did not allege that their total pay for a workweek divided by the number of hours worked was below the minimum wage of $7.25 per hour. Id. at *5. The Court noted that the U.S. Department of Labor's ("DOL") Field Operations Handbook ("FOH") defines the application of the dual jobs regulation, and states that employers may "take a tip credit for time spent in duties related to the tipped occupation of an employee, even though such duties are not by themselves directed toward producing tips, provided such related duties are incidental to the regular duties of the tipped employees and are generally assigned to the tipped employee." Id. at *8. When a tipped employee spends over 20% of her work hours in related duties, the FOH provides that the employee is entitled to the full minimum wage for those hours. Id. The Court stated that the dual jobs rule was created by the DOL, and its interpretation was thereby controlling unless "plainly erroneous or inconsistent with the regulation." Id. In this case, the Court noted that the DOL's interpretation was neither plainly erroneous nor inconsistent with 29 C.F.R. § 531.56(e). The dual jobs rule in § 531.56(e) indicates that "a waitress who spends part of her time cleaning and setting tables, toasting bread, making coffee and occasionally washing dishes or glasses" was still subject to the tip credit provision of the FLSA. Id. The Court explained that the inclusion of the words "part of her time" and "occasionally" indicated some temporal threshold under which the tip credit may still be invoked. Id. Because Plaintiffs alleged that they spent "in excess of 20% of their working time during a shift or week performing non-tip-producing activities" during which they were paid the tip credit wage, the Court held that Plaintiffs had stated a claim sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion.

Wilkes, et al. v. Benihana, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29127 (S.D. Cal. Feb. 28, 2017). Plaintiff, a former server, brought a class action alleging: (i) conversion; (iii) violation of § 17200 of the California Business & Professions Code; and (iii) for penalties under California's Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). Id. at *2. The dispute stemmed from Defendant's purportedly unlawful tip-pooling policy (the "TP Policy"). Under the TP Policy, Defendant collected all tips left by customers and paid 8.5% of teppan sales to the teppan chef; 4% of sushi sales to the sushi chef; 4.5% of liquor, beer, and wine sales to the bartender; and 1% of teppan and sushi sales to the busser. Id. at *3. Plaintiff alleged that the TP Policy was improper because it allowed Defendant to pay non-servers' wages using servers' tips. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that the TP Policy was mandatory and that Defendant promised a fixed percentage of food and beverage sales to its chefs, bartenders, and bussers; the TP Policy provided for an unlawful "tip credit" and "de facto tip credit" because Defendant could use tips to subsidize the sub-market wages it paid non-servers, thereby lowering its payroll expenses while still attracting and retaining qualified employees; and because of the TP Policy's structure, servers could end up with little or none of each tip, a result that was unfair, unreasonable, and contrary to Defendant's own promise that "tips left by guests should be shared in a manner that is equitable and fair to all team members participating in the guest experience." Id. at *5. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court granted. As to Plaintiff's first cause of action for conversion, the Court first noted that the elements of conversion are: (i) Plaintiff's ownership or right to possession of the property; (ii) Defendant's conversion by a wrongful act or disposition of property rights; and (iii) damages. Id. at *10. The Court found Plaintiff failed to state a claim that Defendant violated § 351, because Plaintiff could not allege an ownership or possessory interest sufficient to support a claim for conversion. Id. at *11. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant's use of the TP Policy violated § 17200 because it violated the California Labor Code. Specifically, Plaintiff argued that the TP Policy was unlawful as a tip credit scheme, a de facto tip credit scheme, and an unfair and inequitable tip-pooling agreement. Id. Defendant argued that the TP Policy was not an unlawful tip credit scheme in either sense, was reasonable and equitable, and did not serve to defraud the public. The Court noted that although Defendant's TP Policy may not be perfect, Plaintiff did not allege that it had ever left him without tips after a shift, and it did not require servers to go into their own pocket for contributions. Id. at *20. The Court determined that absent this sort of obvious unfairness, it was in no better position than Defendant to dictate how the TP Policy should operate, and attempting to do so would implicate serious policy concerns. Id. at *21. The Court held that the statutory touchstone was whether the gratuity had been paid, given to, or left for the employee or employees, and not whether the tip-pooling arrangement received all employees' approval. Id. at *22-23. The Court therefore stated that it should not and would not substitute its judgment for Defendant's business operation in this case. Id. at *23. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiff has failed to state a claim that the TP Policy violates the California Labor Code on the basis of unfairness. Finally, the Court held that Plaintiff's claim for PAGA penalties was derivative of his claim that Defendant violated the California Labor Code and therefore must also be dismissed. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's claims.

(xxxiii) Tolling Issues In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Brown, et al. v. Barnes & Noble*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120177 (S.D.N.Y July 29, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former Café Managers ("CMs"), alleged that Defendant's pay policies violated the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs alleged that they, and others similarly-situated, were misclassified as exempt. Plaintiffs sought recovery of unpaid overtime and other pay. Plaintiffs previously moved for conditional certification of their FLSA claim. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification because Plaintiffs failed to show that CMs nationwide were similarly-situated. This Court further held that to the extent discovery revealed additional evidentiary support for the assertion that CMs nationwide were similarly-situated, Plaintiffs could renew their motion. Plaintiffs subsequently filed a motion for equitable tolling. Plaintiffs argued that they would renew their motion for conditional certification upon completion of discovery and therefore sought to toll the statute of limitations from the date Plaintiffs filed their initial motion for conditional certification on November 22, 2016, to the date the Court would rule on the renewed motion for conditional certification. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs argued that the statute of limitations should be tolled to avoid potential opt-in Plaintiffs' claims from expiring before they receive notice of the lawsuit. Plaintiffs argued that they meet the high standard for equitable tolling because they acted with reasonable diligence to protect the potential opt-in Plaintiffs' FLSA claims and because extraordinary circumstances existed to warrant tolling. The Court found that Plaintiffs had not, however, met their burden of demonstrating extraordinary circumstances warranting equitable tolling. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs offered no allegations or proof from which the Court could conclude that a reasonably prudent potential Plaintiff would not have known of his or her right to be properly classified and receive overtime pay after 40 hours. Further, because Defendant reclassified CMs from exempt to non-exempt and overtime-eligible status in October 2016, potential collective action members were arguably more likely to be on notice of a potential cause of action for past misclassification. Id. at *9. The Court also noted that it did not grant Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification. Therefore, any delay in ruling on the motion did not affect any potential-opt in Plaintiffs' knowledge of the case, as notice was not authorized. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs also argued that Defendant could delay discovery in order to allow the clock to run on potential opt-in Plaintiffs' claims. Id. at *11. The Court observed that it has made no finding that Defendant has intentionally delayed discovery. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs had not shown "rare and exceptional circumstances" preventing potential opt-in Plaintiffs from exercising their rights. Id. The Court therefore denied Plaintiffs' motion for equitable tolling without prejudice to renewal by any future opt-in Plaintiffs.

Coldwell, et al. v. Ritecorp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 68252 (D. Colo. May 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of pest control employees, filed a class and collective action asserting claims under the Fair Labor Standards Act and the Colorado Wage Claim Act. The Court entered a scheduling order outlining a phased discovery approach, during which a ruling on Plaintiffs' motion for conditional certification of a collective action would occur during the second phase. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs filed a motion for equitable tolling, requesting the Court to toll the applicable statute of limitations from the date of the scheduling order until 90 days after potential opt-in Plaintiffs received notice of the lawsuit or the Court denied notice, on the basis that potential opt-in Plaintiffs were exposed to significant prejudice and risk that their claims might expire during discovery. Id. at *3. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs had not demonstrated the extraordinary circumstances necessary to support application of the equitable doctrine of tolling. Id. at *4. The Court agreed with Defendant and found that equitable tolling was not warranted. Plaintiffs asserted that they attempted "to locate and speak with potential opt-in Plaintiffs that may qualify for the proposed collective action," but that "potential opt-in Plaintiffs do not currently have any mechanism to inform the Court of their desire to opt-in or otherwise commence their cause of action outside of filing a completely separate case on their own." Id. at *35-36. Plaintiffs also contended that equitable tolling would not prejudice Defendant because Defendant had been on notice since the beginning of the lawsuit that Plaintiffs were pursuing a collective action. The Court held that Plaintiffs provided no reason to support the propriety of equitable tolling other than possible prejudice associated with the delay between the filing of the complaint and the conditional certification of the action, which most FLSA Plaintiffs experience. Id. at *36. Accordingly, the Court concluded that equitable tolling was not appropriate and denied Plaintiffs' motion.

Coppernoll, et al. v. Hamcor, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64247 (N.D. Cal. April 27, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class and collective action asserting claims under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the California Labor Code, and the California Business and Professions Code. Defendant moved to stay the action and compel arbitration pursuant to the arbitration sections of Plaintiff's job application agreement and employment agreement. The Court denied the motion because both parties agreed that the arbitration terms were unenforceable under Morris v. Ernst & Young, 834 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 2016). Following the Supreme Court's grant of certiorari in Morris, the parties agreed to stay all class and collective claims pending the Supreme Court's ruling in Morris. The Court granted the parties' request, stayed the claims, and ordered the parties to provide an update on Morris by August 16, 2017, or when briefing was completed, whichever occurred first. Plaintiff then requested equitable tolling of the FLSA claims from the date of the Court's order of January 12, 2017, until the Court lifted the stay. The Court considered whether a stay pending Supreme Court review of controlling precedent justified equitably tolling the statute of limitations on the FLSA collective action claims. Id. at *4. The Court determined that the stay would prevent Plaintiff from engaging in class discovery, filing a motion for class certification, or receiving approval to send Court-approved notice of the case to potential collective action members. Id. As such, the Court found that potential members of the collective action were unlikely to receive notice of the pendency of the action until proceedings resumed, at which point their claims might be extinguished. Id. Moreover, the Court surmised that the potential collective action members presumably were subject to the same or similar employment agreement that Plaintiff signed. As the Court explained in a previous order, the collective action waiver in Plaintiff's employment agreement forced all claims to arbitration, at which point they were only permitted to proceed individually. Id. at *5. The Court noted that, while Morris awaited review, the enforceability of Defendant's collective action waiver would be uncertain, and the waiver could impede or dissuade potential claimants from seeking relief in Court. Id. at *6. The Court concluded that, absent tolling, potential collective action members with claims on the verge of being extinguished might have no option but to give up their day in Court and arbitrate individually. Id. at *9. The Court opined that it would be impractical to encourage the filing of numerous individual claims destined to be drawn through the same motion practice as Plaintiff, only to be stayed while waiting for a decision on Morris. The Court, therefore, granted Plaintiff's motion and equitably tolled the statute of limitations on the FLSA collective claims during the stay.

Leiva, et al. v. GBS Towson East*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173678 (D. Md. Oct. 19, 2017). Plaintiff, a group of employees, brought a collective action against Defendants alleging violation of various provisions of the FLSA, the Maryland Wage Payment and Collections Act, and Maryland Wage & Hour Law. Plaintiffs filed a motion to amend the Court's scheduling order, which the Court granted in part. Defendant consented to Plaintiffs' proposed extensions to various deadlines, and the Court granted the consensual motion. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs also proposed that the Court toll the statute of limitations for collective action members who are former employees of the Aberdeen restaurant by three months to account for Defendant Autry's delay in sending notice, allowing them to recover for unpaid wages and damages incurred between three years and three months prior to their opt-in date and the present. Id. at *3. Defendants countered that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that they were entitled to equitable tolling because they did not meet their burden for establishing a basis for the doctrine's application and for a willful FLSA violation that would entitle them to a three year statute of limitations, rather than a two year statute of limitations. Id. at *4. Furthermore, Defendants argued that a blanket tolling request extending the statute of limitations for claims against all Defendants where only Defendant Autry failed to timely produce certain information would be inequitable. Id. The Court noted that equitable tolling was appropriate in two circumstances, including: (i) when Plaintiffs were prevented from asserting their claims by some kind of wrongful conduct on the part of Defendant; and (ii) when extraordinary circumstances beyond Plaintiffs' control made it impossible to file the claims on time. Id. at *5. The Court explained that case law authorities have granted equitable tolling in FLSA cases where potential opt-in Plaintiffs lacked notice of the lawsuit because the employer failed to comply with its notice obligations. However, the Court further noted that case law authorities have denied equitable tolling requests on the grounds that procedural delays were not extraordinary in nature. The Court ruled that although Plaintiffs offered evidence of conduct by Defendant Autry that could support equitable tolling, given the statutory framework and the narrow circumstances under which the Fourth Circuit has permitted equitable tolling, the circumstances in this case were not "extraordinary" enough to support a general tolling of the statute of limitations. Id. at *5-6. Therefore, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion as to tolling the statute of limitations, but without prejudice so that any potential Plaintiffs whose notice was delayed by Defendant Autry's actions may file a future motion for equitable tolling with the Court for its consideration.

(xxxiv) Training Time Issues In Wage & Hour Class Actions

Otico, et al. v. Hawaiian Airlines,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2921 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 9, 2017). Plaintiffs, a trainee, filed an action alleging that Defendant improperly classified her as a trainee instead of an employee during mandatory pre-employment training in violation of the FLSA and California state law. Plaintiff was accepted into a training program to become a customer service representative for Defendant. The program was ten days and consisted almost exclusively of classroom work and tours of Defendant's facilities. Employees of the company taught the trainees about FAA regulations, the computer system, and the way the company operated. Plaintiff did not provide service to Defendant's customer during the training. Plaintiff was required to take a test at the conclusion of the training period. Plaintiff subsequently passed the test, was hired, and worked a short period for Defendant before she quit. Plaintiff alleged that she was an employee under federal and California law during the training period, and that Defendant should therefore have paid her for time spend in training. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant failed to pay her for ten minutes of time she worked on eight separate days after she completed the training program. Id. at *2. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment and the Court granted Defendant's motion as to Plaintiff's training time claims and denied both parties' motions as to Plaintiff's claim that Defendant failed to pay her for all time worked. The Court stated that the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") identified six criteria for deciding whether a worker crosses the line from "trainee" to "employee" within the meaning of the FLSA, including: (i) the training, even though it includes actual operation of the facilities of the employer, is similar to that which would be given in a vocational school; (ii) the training is for the benefit of the trainees; (iii) the trainees do not displace regular employees, but work under close observation; (iv) the employer that provides the training derives no immediate advantage from the activities of the trainees; (v) trainees are not necessarily entitled to a job at the conclusion of the training period; and (vi) trainees are not entitled to wages for the time spent in training. Id. at *3. The Court found that Plaintiff did not engage in the type of "on-the-job" training specified by the DOL, did not actually perform the work of an employee, and her training was comprised almost exclusively classroom instruction and touring of the facilities, which were precursors to performing the work of an employee. Id. at *5. The Court held that no reasonable juror could conclude that Plaintiff was acting as an "employee" when she took her training courses. Id. at *6. The Court opined that Defendant was not directly benefitting from Plaintiff's free labor, or potentially scaling back on the work of its existing employees by using Plaintiff to perform customer service duties. Defendant was using its existing employees to teach Plaintiff how to perform the work, primarily in a classroom setting, and without Plaintiff actually doing any customer service work. Id. The Court found that Defendant received no direct benefit from the training, and instead trainees received the benefit of learning how to do a job they hope to obtain with Defendant. The Court held that Plaintiff therefore, was the "primary beneficiary" of the arrangement. Id. at *7. The Court concluded that it was not clear if Plaintiff's allegation regarding the uncompensated time was fairly included in the complaint or if Plaintiff asserted the claim on behalf of herself or a class. Accordingly, the Court denied the cross-motions for summary judgment on the remaining claim pending further discussion at a case management conference.

(xxxv) Travel Time Issues In Wage & Hour Class Action Litigation

Abell, et al. v. Sky Bridge Resources LLC,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 20642 (6th Cir. Oct. 19 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of information technology consultants, filed suit alleging that Defendant under-compensated them for travel time in violation of their employment contracts, the FLSA, and the Kentucky Wage & Hour Act ("KWHA"). Id. at *2. The District Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, and the Sixth Circuit affirmed in part and reversed in part. Id. First, the Sixth Circuit affirmed summary judgment as to most Plaintiffs' breach of contract claims. The Sixth Circuit rejected Plaintiffs' assertion that their employment agreements required Defendant to pay full wages for travel time. Id. at *9. The Sixth Circuit found that, although travel compensation was a vital part of Plaintiffs' employment relationship with Defendant, the agreements were ambiguous as to compensation for travel time because "hours worked" did not unambiguously include travel time. Id. at *13. The Sixth Circuit rejected Plaintiffs' argument that it could not consider extrinsic evidence and that any ambiguities must be construed against Defendant. Id. at *17. The undisputed extrinsic evidence showed that each Plaintiff worked under Defendant's travel compensation system for months or years. Prior to 2011, Defendant treated travel by car as hours worked for which Defendant paid full wages. Id. at *18. In 2011, Defendant changed its practice and treated travel by car as "hours traveled" for which Defendant paid half wages. Id. at *19. There was no evidence that Plaintiffs complained, that Plaintiffs disputed Defendant's authority to make this change unilaterally, or that Plaintiffs even knew about or relied upon the car-travel compensation policy when they signed their employment agreements. Id. As a result, the Sixth Circuit found powerful evidence that Defendant and Plaintiffs did not intend their employment agreements to provide full-wage compensation for travel time and it concluded that no reasonable jury could conclude that the parties intended the employment agreements to set wages for time spent traveling. Id. The Sixth Circuit, however, reversed the District Court's judgment as to Plaintiff Spaulding's contract claim. Plaintiff Spaulding testified that Defendant told him that it would pay him full hourly wages for travel and that Defendant in fact paid him full hourly wages for a period of time. Id. at *5. The Sixth Circuit, therefore, ruled that a reasonable jury could conclude that Defendant intended "hours worked" in Spaulding's contract to include travel time. Id. at *20. Second, Plaintiffs also argued that the District Court erred in rejecting their FLSA and KWHA claims because fact issues remained regarding whether Defendant required them to perform work while traveling. Id. at *21. Plaintiffs argued that they demonstrated a factual dispute as to what their normal working hours were and as to whether Defendant improperly failed to count work they performed during travel hours toward the 40-hour threshold for overtime under the FLSA and KWHA. Id. As to their FLSA claim, the Sixth Circuit ruled that Plaintiffs failed to raise their claim in the District Court and, therefore, waived it. As to their KWHA claim, however, the Sixth Circuit concluded that Plaintiffs did not waive their claim and it reversed the District Court's order granting summary judgment. Because the employment agreements stated that travel away from home was worktime when it cut across the employee's workday, the Sixth Circuit ruled that some travel time might be considered work time and count toward overtime calculations. Id. at *31. Third, Plaintiffs argued that Defendant violated the KWHA by breaching the employment agreements because Kentucky law prohibits an employer from withholding any part of an employee's agreed wages. Id. at *21, *35. Because it found a factual issue regarding whether Defendant breached its contract with Plaintiff Spaulding, the Sixth Circuit also found a factual issue regarding whether Defendant violated the KWHA on this theory and reversed the District Court's order granting summary judgment as to Spaulding. Id. at *35. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's order in part and reversed it in part.

Alvarado, et al. v. Skelton*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 104274 (M.D. Tenn. July 6, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of citizens of Guatemala working pursuant to the H-2B visa program, alleged that Defendants violated the FLSA by failing to compensate Plaintiffs for all hours worked, including overtime. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs claimed that they regularly worked between 60 and 70 hours per week, but that Defendants compensated them for just 30 to 50 hours per week. Id. at *3. Defendants contended that the additional hours claimed by Plaintiffs erroneously included time that Plaintiffs spent commuting to and from work, as well as time Plaintiffs spent waiting for other crews to finish work before being transported from a jobsite back to Defendants' place of business. Id. at *4. Defendants contended that, although Plaintiffs regularly traveled between one and two hours to a job-site, that travel time should not be included in the calculation of time worked by Plaintiffs. Id. Plaintiffs filed a motion for partial summary judgment on liability as a matter of law with respect to their FLSA claims and common law breach of contract claims, which the Court granted. The Court stated that in an action to recover unpaid overtime compensation under the FLSA, Plaintiffs must prove several elements by a preponderance of the evidence, including: (i) that an employer-employee relationship existed; (ii) that the activities at issue were within the coverage of the FLSA; and (iii) that the employer failed to pay overtime wages as required by law. Id. at *6. Defendants conceded satisfaction of the first two elements, but disputed that they failed to pay overtime wages. Defendants argued that although Plaintiffs' workdays sometimes lasted between 10 and 13 hours, which was longer than nine hours of daily work mentioned in their contract, portions of that time did not constitute "work" covered under the FLSA. Id. at *7. Under the plain meaning of § 254(a) of the Portal-to-Portal Act, the Court concluded that the case turned on whether Plaintiffs were engaging in any work-related activity before arriving at their job-sites. Id. at *10. In support of their motion, Plaintiffs submitted employee declarations, which stated that before being transported to a job-site, they were driven from their trailer to a tool storage site where Defendants kept their landscaping tools so that Plaintiffs could "gather the required tools for that day and load them in the vehicle," and that they were taken back to the tool storage site at the end of the workday "to drop off the tools." Id. at *11. Defendants did not respond to these contentions. Based on these facts, the Court held that Defendants failed to provide sufficient evidence to demonstrate there were no genuine issues of material fact with respect to Plaintiffs' FLSA unpaid overtime claims. Id. The Court found that the uncontroverted evidence showed that the tools loaded and unloaded daily were those required for the day's job, i.e., in other words, in preparation for Plaintiffs' landscaping work, which was the principal activity of the workday. Id. at *11-12. The Court similarly determined that there was no genuine issue of material fact as to Plaintiffs' breach of contract claim. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for partial summary judgment as to liability on Plaintiffs' FLSA claim for unpaid overtime and breach of contract claim for unpaid overtime.

Booher, et al. v. JetBlue Airways Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 204385 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of flight attendants, filed a class action asserting that Defendant's pay policies violated various provisions of the California Labor Code. Following discovery, the parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment and the Court granted in part and denied in part the motions. First, as to Plaintiffs' overtime claims, the Court rejected Defendant's argument that California labor laws did not apply to flight attendants during air travel. Id. at *8. Based on Defendant's flight records, Plaintiffs alleged that they worked a total of 32 days in which they flew only intra-California flights and worked over eight hours. Id. at *10. Defendant argued that because those records did not include in-flight geographic data, Plaintiffs failed to show the time spent flying between California airports actually occurred within the airspace above California, rather than the airspace above federal enclaves or waters. Id. at *11. The Court found the records provided a just and reasonable inference that Plaintiffs did work full days within California in which they were eligible for overtime compensation under California law. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiffs were entitled to damages on their overtime claim. Defendant argued that applying California's overtime law to flight attendants placed an undue burden on Defendant in violation of the dormant commerce clause of the U.S. Constitution. The Court determined that Defendant's argument was precluded by Ninth Circuit law because "California applies its Labor Code equally to work performed in California, whether that work is performed by California residents or by out-of-state residents. There is no plausible dormant commerce clause argument when California has chosen to treat out-of-state residents equally with its own." Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion and denied Defendant's motion with respect to the alleged waiting time penalties. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant's wage statements failed to meet the requirements of § 226 of the California Labor Code, because the statements only listed hours and hourly rates for in-flight time, despite Plaintiffs' on-the-ground duties. Id. at *16. Defendant argued that § 226 did not apply to Plaintiffs, since they principally worked outside of California during the relevant time periods. Id. The Court reasoned that § 226 did not apply because the evidence showed that Plaintiffs worked primarily outside of California, spending 25.4% and 16.8% of their hours working in California, and 80.4% and 90% of their workdays with some work at non-California airports. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion and denied Plaintiffs' motion with respect to Plaintiffs' wage statement claims. Plaintiffs also brought derivative claims under the Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA") based on their underlying overtime and improper wage statement claims. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs' PAGA claims were viable as they related to the overtime claim, but they failed to the extent they related to the wage statements claim. The Court thereby granted in part and denied in part the parties' motions for summary judgment.

Bridges, et al. v. Empire Scaffold, LLC*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 22520 (5th Cir. Nov. 9, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of scaffold workers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay for pre-shift travel time in violation of the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, which the District Court granted. On appeal, the Fifth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Defendant required its employees to take buses from its parking lot to its refinery on a first-come, first-serve basis between 5:00 a.m. and 6:15 a.m. Id. at *2. Defendant's policy was that an employee who missed the last bus at 6:15 a.m. would not be able to work until the next day. The bus ride to the refinery took approximately 20 to 30 minutes. Defendant did not mandate any work prior to 7:00 a.m. Id. at *3. The Fifth Circuit noted that the issue in this case was whether the Portal-to-Portal Act excludes the pre-shift wait time of Plaintiffs from being compensable under the FLSA. The Fifth Circuit noted that the Portal-to-Portal Act exempts employers from liability for claims based on various activities, including: (i) walking, riding, or traveling to and from the actual place of performance of the principal activity or activities which such employee is employed to perform; and (ii) activities which are preliminary to or postliminary to the principal activity or activities, which occur either prior to the time on any particular workday at which such employee commences, or subsequent to the time on any particular workday at which he ceases such principal activity or activities. Id. at *6. The Fifth Circuit agreed with the District Court that the compensability of the pre-shift wait time under the Portal-to-Portal Act turned on whether Plaintiffs' wait time was integral and indispensable to the principal activities that they were employed to perform. Plaintiffs asserted that their principal activities included erecting and dismantling scaffolding, safety meetings, and completing joint safety analysis paperwork. Id. at *9-10. The Fifth Circuit held that Defendant's policy was not to begin such activities until after 7:00 a.m., during the compensated shift time. The Fifth Circuit agreed with the District Court that while reporting to the right location on time at 7:00 a.m. was intrinsic to efficiently implementing the productive work, the time spent waiting for principal activities to begin at 7:00 a.m. was not. Id. at *10. The Fifth Circuit explained that the waiting itself was neither tied to nor necessary to the erection and dismantling of scaffolding, which was the work that Plaintiffs were employed to perform. Accordingly, since Plaintiffs' preliminary wait time was not intrinsic to their principal activities, it was not compensable under the Portal-to-Portal Act. The Fifth Circuit therefore upheld the District Court's decision granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

(xxxvi) Trial And Damages Issues In FLSA Collective Actions

Oman, et al. v. Delta Airlines,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2913 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 6, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of flight attendants, filed an action alleging that Defendant violated § 226 of the California Labor Code by failing to provide flight attendants who worked for any amount of time on the ground in California individualized wage statements disclosing the total hours worked at specific hourly rates. Id. at *2. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment, and the Court granted Defendant's motion and denied Plaintiffs' motion. Defendant contended that Plaintiffs could not be covered by §§ 226 and 204 of the California Labor Code – which provide procedural protections for wages earned under California law – when the vast majority of their work occurred in federal airspace governed by federal regulations and any work on the ground in California was de minimis and incidental to their work as flight attendants in the air. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs asserted that whenever a flight attendant flies into or out of California, their work in that pay period becomes covered by the Labor Code sections, regardless of where the flight attendant resides or is based out of, and regardless of how much time that flight attendant works on the ground in California during that pay period. Id. The Court focused on the purpose of § 226, i.e., to give employees clarity as to how their wages were calculated, so they could verify that their wages were calculated appropriately under California law. Because the undisputed facts showed that Plaintiffs only worked a de minimis amount of time in California (ranging from 2.6% to a high of 14%), and in light of the nature of their work (necessarily working in federal airspace as well as in multiple other jurisdictions but during each pay period and day at issue), the Court concluded that § 226 did not apply to Plaintiffs' claims. Id. at *17. Further, the Court noted that Defendant was not a California-based employer and Plaintiffs explicitly disclaimed any reliance on the residence of the flight attendants, thereby strengthening the Court's conclusion.

Since the Court held that § 226 did not apply to Plaintiffs, it stated that the result for their § 204 claim was the same. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgement and denied Plaintiffs' motion.

(xxxvii) Venue Issues In FLSA Collective Actions

Dunne, et al. v. E.I. Du Pont De Nemours & Co*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 163845 (W.D.N.Y. Oct. 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of workers, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant shortchanged them on overtime wages and failed to pay overtime wages owed to them in a timely matter in violation of the FLSA and New York state wage & hour laws. Defendant submitted that there were currently two other cases in other districts involving Defendant's employees making similar allegations about failure to calculate overtime wages properly and failure to pay overtime wages promptly. Id. at *2. Because one of those cases began before the instant action, and because both of the other cases were seeking certification of a national FLSA collective action for similar claims, Defendant filed motions to transfer this case and to stay the proceedings. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs opposed a transfer and stay, generally on the basis that they were proceeding individually for their FLSA claim and as this case was the only one of the three that contained state law claims. Id. Plaintiffs therefore argued that the instant matter was too different from the other two to qualify for transfer under the "first-filed rule." Id. The Court denied Defendant's motions, finding them premature. The Court noted that the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Texas would likely decide class certification within a month or two in the lawsuit before it. The Court explained that knowing first what will happen with class certification would bring clarity to Plaintiffs' situation here; without committing to any future positions, denial of certification possibly would strengthen Plaintiffs' argument to keep this case here, while a grant of certification possibly would strengthen Defendant's argument to transfer the case. Id. at *22. The Court held that Defendant had not shown such an urgent need to transfer that the issue could not wait a couple of months for guidance from the Eastern District of Texas. Id. at *23. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to transfer venue without prejudice.

Murica, et al. v. A Capital Electric Contractors, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 143089 (D.D.C. Sept. 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a collective action alleging that Defendants failed to pay proper overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA, the D.C. Minimum Wage Revision Act ("DCMWRA"), and the D.C. Wage Payment and Collection Law ("DCWPCL"). Defendants removed the action pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1441, and promptly moved to dismiss for improper venue pursuant to Rule 12(b)(3) and for failure to state a claim pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6). Defendants argued that the Court must dismiss Plaintiffs' complaint on the ground that venue was improper in the District of Columbia in accordance with 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b). Relying on § 1391(b), Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to allege sufficient facts to show that a substantial portion of their uncompensated work occurred in the District of Columbia. The Court found that the provision applies to "civil actions brought in district courts of the United States." However, the action was brought in the D.C. Superior Court and thereafter removed by Defendants. Id. at *6. The Court noted that because this was a removed action, § 1391 had no application, and instead venue was governed by 28 U.S.C. § 1441, which applies to removed actions. Id. That statute "expressly provides that the proper venue of a removed action is 'the district court of the United States for the district and division embracing the place where such action is pending.'" Id. at *6-7. Therefore, applying § 1441(a), venue was exclusively in the Court. Plaintiffs brought their claims in the D.C. Superior Court, and Defendants chose to remove the case. Under those circumstances, § 1441(a) provided Defendants with a single option, i.e., to remove the case to this Court, which constituted "the district and division embracing the place where" Plaintiffs' suit was brought. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss for improper venue. Defendants also moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. Defendants asserted that Plaintiffs have not adequately alleged that they were "employees" of Defendants under the FLSA or the DCMWRA. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to state a claim under the D.C., Maryland, or Virginia wage payment laws because their FLSA and DCMWRA claims failed, and they had not alleged that they sustained "any unpaid wages other than unpaid overtime compensation." Id. The Court disagreed and found that although Plaintiff's evidence was minimal, it was sufficient to state a claim on which relief could be granted, and thus survived a motion to dismiss. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion.

(xxxviii) Willfulness In FLSA Collective Actions

Cuahua, et al. v. Tanaka Japanese Sushi Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 161714 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 29, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of delivery workers, filed a collective action alleging the Defendants failed to pay minimum wage for time spent performing non-tipped work, overtime wages, or spread of hours pay in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The Court issued its findings of fact and conclusions of law on whether Defendants acted in good faith, whether their violation of the labor laws was willful, and the proper measure of damages. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs alleged that they were hired as delivery workers but were required to spend approximately one quarter of their workday performing other tasks such as: cutting vegetables, washing dishes, carrying down and stocking deliveries in the basement, bringing up food items from the basement for the cook, washing the basement with soap and water, washing the kitchen, twisting and tying cardboard boxes, taking out garbage, and bringing down boxes of fish two to three times a week. Id. at *3. The record indicated that Defendant paid Plaintiffs $250 to $300 per week, and Plaintiffs typically worked 60 to 70 hours per week. Id. at *5-7. The Court determined that Defendants clearly violated the FLSA and the NYLL. The Court stated that to the extent Plaintiffs' allegations allowed recovery under both state and federal law, the law providing for the greatest recovery would govern the calculation of damages. Id. at *12. The Court explained that an employer who violates the FLSA's overtime requirements is generally liable to its employee for the employee's "unpaid overtime compensation" as well as "an additional equal amount as liquidated damages." Id. at *13. The Court held that there could be no dispute that Plaintiffs were entitled to unpaid compensation as a result of Defendants' failure to comply with the FLSA and NYLL. However, Defendants argued that because they acted at all times in good faith, liquidated damages should not be imposed. The Court found that Defendants failed to meet their "difficult" burden of showing they acted in good faith. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs were entitled to liquidated damages as well. However, the Court opined that Plaintiffs failed to carry their burden to show that Defendants' actions were willful. The Court stated that Plaintiffs merely alleged in conclusory fashion that Defendants' actions were willful, which was insufficient to meet their burden. Accordingly, the Court held that the statute of limitations for the FLSA claims would be two years. The Court therefore ruled that Plaintiffs established that Defendants violated the FLSA and NYLL, and the violations were not in good faith, thereby entitling Plaintiffs to liquidated damages, but that they were not willful, thereby confining the statute of limitations to two years.

Farrow, et al. v. Ammari Of Louisiana,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 100989 (E.D. La. June 29, 2017). Plaintiff, a waiter, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to pay minimum wages, overtime compensation, and tips in violation of the FLSA. Plaintiff claimed that Defendant willfully violated the FLSA's minimum wage provisions by failing to keep accurate records of hours and tips, failing to inform employees that it would apply a tip credit, and not permitting employees to retain all of the tips they received. Id. at *2-3. Further, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant improperly calculated his overtime pay rate and had a policy of unlawfully deducting wages for mistakes and customer walkouts. Defendant filed a motion for partial summary judgment maintaining that any alleged violation was not willful and, therefore, that Plaintiff's claims should be subject to a two-year statute of limitations. The Court granted the motion in part and denied the motion in part. Plaintiff submitted declarations that stated that Defendant did not want waiters to work more than 40 hours and that Defendant instructed managers to clock-out waiters and have them complete side work off-the-clock. Id. at *9. Plaintiff also suggested that two separate lawsuits filed against Defendant in 2013 – Trammell, et al. v. Ammari of Louisiana, Ltd., Case No. 13-CV-4583, and Scarborough, et al. v. Ammari of Louisiana, Ltd., Case No. 13-CV-6196 – notified Defendant of the FLSA violations Id. at *10. In Trammell, Plaintiffs alleged that they routinely worked more than 40 hours per week without overtime compensation and received less than the federally-mandated minimum wage. In Scarborough, Plaintiffs similarly alleged that they were required to work in excess of 40 hours per week without proper overtime compensation. Id. at *11. Based on this evidence, Plaintiff insisted that Defendant had notice in 2013 of two complaints that its company-wide policy violated the FLSA, but it continued to utilize the policy as late as 2017. Id. at *11-12. Defendant argued that Plaintiff did not assert during his deposition or in his complaint that his claim for a willful violation of the FLSA was based on working off-the-clock. Defendant also insisted that the complaints in Trammell and Scarborough did not provide notice to Defendant of a company-wide policy that violated the FLSA because: (i) neither action resulted in a judgment that Defendant violated the FLSA; (ii) the Trammell Plaintiffs did not allege that they were required to work off-the-clock; and (iii) the Scarborough complaint was the first notice that Defendant received regarding off-the-clock work or improper overtime rates, such mistakes were rectified months earlier, and such actions contradict any allegation that Defendant willfully continued paying an improper overtime rate. Id. at *13. The Court concluded that, because Defendant was notified by employees in 2013 that they believed Defendant's practices violated the FLSA's overtime provisions, and Plaintiff produced recent declarations from employees claiming that they were not properly compensated for overtime work, Plaintiff provided some evidence that Defendant ignored complaints brought to its attention. The Court, therefore, found sufficient evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether Defendant willfully violated the FLSA's overtime provisions. Id. at *14. The Court, however, held that Plaintiff failed to present any evidence to suggest that Defendant willfully made unlawful deductions, failed to maintain records of the tips received, deprived employees of tips earned, failed to provide advance notice of the tip credit, or failed to pay minimum wage. Based on this evidence, the Court concluded that Defendant was entitled to summary judgment that Plaintiff's cause of action for unpaid minimum wage was subject to the two-year statute of limitations.

VI. Significant Class Action Rulings Under The Employee Retirement Income Security Act Of 1974

Class action settlements and decisions in 2017 under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act, 29 U.S.C. § 1001, et seq. ("ERISA"), significantly impacted the direction of ERISA litigation. Among the more closely watched ERISA class actions, courts confronted class certification issues in cases involving challenges to continued employer stock investments in 401(k) defined contribution pension plans and employee stock ownership plans ("ESOP's"). Courts also continued to split on whether Plaintiffs who have received lump sum distributions have standing to sue under ERISA, whether cash balance plans are inherently age-discriminatory, and whether employers may modify retiree health benefits. Plaintiffs also have filed repeated class actions challenging the reasonableness of investment management and other fees against some of the nation's largest 401(k) retirement savings plans.

In terms of geographic distribution, the ERISA certification rulings were as follows:

(ii) Second Circuit

Barnes Group, Inc., et al. v. International Union United Automotive Aerospace & Agricultural Implement Workers Of America*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 59761 (D. Conn. April 19, 2017). Plaintiff negotiated with Defendant over changes to medical benefits for certain retirees who were not covered by a prior class action settlement. Following these negotiations, Defendant determined that it could not implement the changes because it was concerned that its authority to do so was ambiguous. Plaintiff sought a declaratory judgment that the UAW and its affiliated locals had authority to agree to the negotiated changes for affected class members. The parties filed a joint motion to certify a stipulated class for the applicable retirees. The Court granted the motion and certified the class. As to numerosity, the Court held that the class had approximately 640 people, well over the 40-member threshold of impracticable joinder identified by the Second Circuit. The Court also noted that joinder was impracticable because class members lived in 22 different states. As to commonality and typicality, the Court stated that those requirements were met because Plaintiff sought a declaratory judgment that would allow the negotiated changes to apply equally to all class members, and evidence from the class members themselves demonstrated that they were similarly-situated. The Court concluded that the class representatives were adequate because all class members had signed "nearly identical" collective bargaining agreements and all class members had the same interest in protecting against changes to the collective bargaining agreements. As to the Second Circuit's "ascertainability" requirement, the Court opined that the parties could identify the class members from their respective records. Finally, as to Rule 23(b), the Court held that the class could be certified under Rule 23(b)(1)(A) because Plaintiff sought declaratory relief.

Caufield, et al. v. Colgate-Palmolive Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 118022 (S.D.N.Y. July 27, 2017). In this class certification decision, the Court granted certification to a group of pension plan participants and beneficiaries who asserted denial of benefits claims against Defendants based on their allegedly erroneous calculation of benefits. Neither numerosity nor commonality were in dispute. Id. at *9-10. Plaintiffs proposed a class of approximately 1,200 people, whose claims turned on whether Defendants erred in calculating benefits under the plan. Id. Defendants argued against typicality, asserting that the proposed class representative was not adequately motivated to pursue each of the alleged calculation errors, because the complaint focused on one error more than the other three asserted. Id. at *11. The Court rejected this argument, finding that where Defendants determined benefits using a "better of two" formulas approach and the alleged errors impacted each formula differently, the class representative's desire to maximize her benefits would incentivize her to investigate each error. Id. The Court also rejected Defendants' arguments based on the statute of limitations, noting that even though the proposed class representative failed to file suit within 180 days of the administrative denial, they forestalled a limitations claim by pleading a colorable argument for waiver of the limitations period. Id. at *12-13. The Court was also unpersuaded that the proposed class representative was "inadequate" because she could "not understand the case" and "deferred to her lawyer." Id. at *13-14. The Court found that the proposed representative had sufficient general knowledge of the claims. The Court reasoned that a non-lawyer would have difficulty answering questions about the technical issues in the case. Id. at *14. Combined with a lack of a conflict of interest between the proposed representative and the proposed class, the Court ruled that the adequacy requirement was satisfied. Id. Having determined that Rule 23(a) was satisfied, the Court examined certification under Rule 23(b). Defendants argued that the class could only proceed under Rule 23(b)(3) because Plaintiffs sought monetary benefits. The Court disagreed on the grounds that monetary benefits were incidental to the actual relief requested (i.e., determination of the appropriate method for calculating benefits). Id. at *16. The Court opined that certification was appropriate under Rule 23(b)(1)(A) to avoid inconsistent rulings, noting that: "[t]he language of sub-division (b)(1)(A), addressing the risk of 'inconsistent adjudications,' speaks directly to ERISA suits, because Defendants have a statutory obligation, as well as a fiduciary responsibility, to 'treat the members of the class alike.'" Id. at *14-15. Finally, the Court found that the proposed class representative had standing to pursue claims for the entire class because all class members' benefits were determined under the same calculation formulas, and thus all members could claim to be injured by the same calculation errors. Id. at *17-18.

In Re JP Morgan Stable Value Fund ERISA Litigation*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 59264 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 31, 2017*). Plaintiffs, a group of investors, brought a class action alleging that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties and engaged in transactions prohibited by the ERISA. Plaintiffs invested in J.P. Morgan's ("JPM") 401(k) retirement plans, each overseen by a different employer plan sponsor, and allocated a portion of their retirement savings through the plans into Stable Value Funds sold or managed by JPM. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants violated the ERISA by breaching their fiduciary duties when they caused the Stable Value Funds to invest in the Intermediate Bond Fund ("IBF") and the Intermediate Public Bond Fund ("IPBF"). Id. at *3. Plaintiffs' argument rested on their financial losses due to JPM's imprudent investment strategies resulting in a below average decline in market value. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs sought to certify one class and two sub-classes. Plaintiffs' proposed class included all participants and beneficiaries of the ERISA plans that were invested in the Stable Value Fund between January 1, 2009 and December 31, 2010 whose fund under-performed. Id. at *10-11. The first proposed sub-class, the "SAIF sub-class," was limited to plans invested in the JPM Stable Asset Income Fund ("SAIF") and the second sub-class, the "ACSAF sub-class," was limited to those plans invested in the American Century Stable Asset Fund ("ACSAF"). Id. Under Rule 23(a)'s numerosity requirement, both the class and sub-classes included thousands of participants and thus meet numerosity. Defendants attempted to oppose the commonality and typicality requirement by arguing that "the challenged investments predate certain Stable Value Funds" and that the funds must be evaluated on a fund-by-fund basis. Id. at *22-23. The Court was unpersuaded by Defendants' argument and found commonality and typicality were established by a preponderance of the evidence. Id. at *27-28. The Court reasoned that although there were differences in guidelines and risk-return profiles, such differences were irrelevant when the common thread linking the claims were the investments in IBF and IPBF. Id. at *27. As to the adequacy requirement, Defendants acknowledged that the named Plaintiffs each invested in a JPMC Stable Value Fund that was invested in IBF or IPBF during the relevant time period, but argued that the named Plaintiffs were inadequate class representatives because intra-class conflicts existed regarding: (i) the periods that optimized the alleged damages; and (ii) the fact that some putative class members were "winners" and others were "losers." Id. at *28-29. The Court rejected the first argument by relying on Ninth Circuit precedent that established that class certification is not precluded when issues involve periods of differing preferred damages. Id. The Court found that Defendants' second argument was moot because the classes only included participants whose investments under-performed. Id. at *30. Further, Defendants argued against adequacy because of affirmative defenses including statute of limitations and "releases pursuant to a settlement agreement as to certain named Plaintiffs." Id. at *30-31. The Court held that the affirmative defenses raised were not fundamental and could be addressed through sub-classes. Id. at *31. The Court further determined that Plaintiffs met the ascertainability requirement because Plaintiffs calculated damages from the same benchmark. Id. at *34-35. The Court opined that Plaintiffs met the predominance requirement with the theory of liability premised on allegedly imprudent investments common to the putative class members. Defendants also argued that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that causation could be proved on a class-wide basis and instead required a fund-by-fund analysis. The Court reasoned there was a causal link between the alleged breaches of fiduciary duties and the under-performance of the fund related to the objective benchmark. Id. at *42. The Court further held that a single class action was more judicially economical than having 300 plan fiduciaries bring claims. Id. at *45-46. Thus, the Court granted certification of the proposed class and sub-classes.

Meidl, et al. v. Aetna, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 70223 (D. Conn. May 4, 2017). In this ERISA class action, the Court certified a class of more than 1,000 insureds who received transcranial magnetic stimulation ("TMS") therapy for depressive disorders. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant breached its ERISA fiduciary duties by denying claims for TMS coverage based on a clinical policy bulletin that categorized TMS as an experimental procedure. Plaintiffs sought reprocessing of the TMS claims and an order permanently enjoining Defendant from treating TMS as experimental. The Court granted the motion for class certification and certified the class to the extent that it sought an order forcing Defendant to reprocess individual claims for TMS coverage. However, the Court found that the named Plaintiff lacked standing to seek a remedy prohibiting Defendant from denying coverage in the future. The Court stated that the requirements for class action status were met because the proposed class members sought common relief for the same injury, i.e., the reprocessing of their previously denied claims for coverage. That was true even though the class members participated in different health plans and received coverage denials on different dates. The Court found that class certification was appropriate under the requirements of Rule 23(b)(1)(A) because, where all putative class members' plans prohibited coverage for experimental treatments, separate actions challenging the determination that TMS was experimental could lead to inconsistent results. The Court also ruled that class certification was appropriate under Rule 23(b)(2) because injunctive relief ordering Defendant to reprocess the class' TMS claims would be appropriate respecting the class as a whole.

Moreno, et al. v. Deutsche Bank American Holding Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 143208 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 5, 2017). Plaintiffs brought an ERISA class action alleging that through Defendants' administration of the 401(k) plan (the "Plan") at issue, Defendants breached their fiduciary duties and engaged in prohibited transactions through their offering of mutual funds affiliated with the employer, which charged allegedly excessive fees that were collected by the employer's subsidiaries. On Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, the parties did not dispute numerosity of the putative class, which included 32,000 current and former plan participants. Id. at *11. Defendants asserted a lack of commonality due to deviations in participants' investment decisions, but the Court disagreed on the grounds that liability was determined based on the actions of Defendants, not individual investment decisions. Id. at *11-14. The Court also rejected Defendants' assertion that commonality was defeated because some of the named Plaintiffs' claims might be barred by releases and the statute of limitations, since those affirmative defenses did not defeat class certification. The Court found that there were numerous common questions, including whether Defendants' process for assembling and monitoring the investment options was tainted by a conflict of interest or imprudence. Id. at *12. The Court held that typicality was established because Plaintiffs made similar legal arguments arising from the same course of events. Id. at *19. As to adequacy, Defendants argued that Plaintiffs were not adequate class representatives because they did not fully understand the case. Id. at *20. However, the Court found that Plaintiffs' reliance on legal experts for their technical claims was understandable, and it concluded that there was adequate representation as to the class representatives and their counsel. Id. Relative to the Rule 23(b)(1)(B) requirements, the Court noted that because Plaintiffs challenged the investment lineup that the Plan offered to all participants, and the record-keeping fees imposed on the Plan as a whole, Defendants' conduct was uniform as to each participant, and therefore adjudicating Plaintiffs' claims would dispose of the interests of the other participants or substantially impair their ability to protect their interests. Id. at *22. Defendants argued that certification under Rule 23(b)(1)(B) was improper based on the U.S. Supreme Court decisions in LaRue v. DeWolff, Boberg & Associates, Inc., 552 U.S. 248 (2008), and Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 564 U.S. 338 (2011). Id. at *23. The Court noted that although there was a circuit split in the wake of those decisions over whether Rule 23(b)(1)(B) certification was viable for fiduciary breach cases, a majority of circuits allowed certification of such claims under Rule 23(b)(1)(B). As to LaRue, Defendants contended that because LaRue held that participants can assert an individual claim based on "fiduciary breaches that impair the value of plan assets in a participant's individual account," resolution of the named Plaintiffs' claims would not foreclose an opportunity for others to assert their claims. Id. at *24. However, the Court noted that Plaintiffs were not asserting claims based on Defendant's misconduct in relation to their specific account, but rather Defendants' process for selecting and retaining investment options for all plan participants. Id. at *24-25. Further, Defendants argued that under Wal-Mart, class certification was unavailable because individualized monetary claims could only be certified under Rule 23(b)(3). Id. However, the Court found that in contrast to Wal-Mart, Plaintiffs' claims were derivative in nature, not individualized. Id. The Court also observed that case law authorities have regularly certified classes under Rule 23(b)(1)(B) in non-limited fund situations. The Court therefore certified the class under Rule 23(b)(1)(B).

Leber, et al. v. Citigroup 401(k) Plan Investment Committee*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 194293 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 27, 2017). In this action alleging that Defendants – the fiduciaries of Citigroup's 401(k) retirement plan (the "Plan") – breached their duties of prudence and loyalty under the ERISA, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Plaintiffs were three Plan participants who alleged that Defendants engaged in self-dealing and imprudent fiduciary conduct by selecting mutual funds offered and managed by Citigroup's subsidiaries, by failing to monitor the investment options they offered or to remove or replace imprudent options, and by causing the Plan to suffer losses through high fees. Plaintiffs sought to represent a class of all participants who invested in the challenged funds during the applicable statute of limitations period. After dismissing one of the named Plaintiffs on timeliness grounds, the Court found that the two remaining Plaintiffs had standing to assert their claims, despite never having invested in some of the funds at issue. Specifically, the Court found that, under Second Circuit case law authority, individual investment in Plan investment options was not necessary to establish injury-in-fact when suing derivatively on behalf of the Plan. Id. at *17. In addition, the Court opined that Plaintiffs satisfied the Second Circuit's class standing test, as they alleged that they personally suffered an injury-in-fact because of Defendants' conduct, and that the same concerns about that conduct was alleged to have caused injury to the other putative class members. Turning to the requirements of Rule 23(a), the Court found numerosity satisfied based on Plaintiffs' allegation that there were 189,470 participants, thousands of whom invested in the challenged funds. Id. at *30. While the Court found that some of the questions identified by Plaintiffs were inadequate to establish commonality, the Court ultimately held that commonality was satisfied because there were questions about the prudence and loyalty of Defendants' conduct that were capable of class-wide resolution. Id. at *32. In doing so, the Court rejected Defendants' arguments that individual defenses destroyed commonality on the basis that Defendants mistakenly applied the predominance standard of Rule 23(b)(3) to their commonality challenge. Id. at *34. The Court further determined that Plaintiffs established typicality of their claims, because they arose from the same course of events as those of other class members and the claims were based on the same legal arguments. Id. at *38. The Court again rejected Defendants' arguments that Plaintiffs did not invest in all challenged funds, finding that, while Plaintiffs ultimately will have to prove causation and loss in analyses that could yield different results for each fund, the primary disputed areas of law and fact were essentially the same for all class members and were sufficient to satisfy the typicality requirement. Id. at *39. With respect to adequacy, the Court explained that by sticking with the case for over ten years of litigation, Plaintiffs demonstrated that they were committed to pursuing the action, and that no clear conflicts existed between their interests and those of the class. Id. at *43-44. Because Plaintiffs had competent and experienced counsel, the Court found the adequacy requirement to be satisfied. As to the Rule 23(b) factors, the Court held that Defendants' alleged mismanagement of the Plan was the same as to all Plan participants, such that resolution of one of their claims would necessarily affect others. Finding the case appropriate for certification under Rule 23(b)(1)(B), the Court opined that it was unnecessary to consider the alternate arguments advanced by the parties with respect to other sub-sections of Rule 23. Having found that Plaintiffs had standing and the requirements of Rules 23(a) and (b) were satisfied, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Wood, et al. v. Prudential Retirement Insurance & Annuity Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123128 (D. Conn. Aug. 4, 2017). In this putative ERISA class action, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to certify a class of benefit plan participants whose assets were invested in one of two of Defendant's guaranteed income plans. The Defendant's plans guaranteed participants' principals and accumulated interest at crediting rates set by Defendant. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant set the crediting rate below the internal rate of return on invested capital, therefore guaranteeing profits for itself regardless of plan performance. Id. at *2-4. Noting that Defendant did not challenge numerosity, the Court first assessed commonality. Id. at *6. Plaintiff first identified that whether Defendant acted as a plan fiduciary was a common question for all proposed class members, and that this question was capable of common resolution because all of the plan contracts provided for a minimum guarantee. Id. The Court, however, noted that answering the fiduciary question would turn on whether the Defendant's plans provided a reasonable rate of return, and the reasonableness of the return would depend on the individually negotiated terms of the contracts between the benefit plans and Defendant. Id. at *8. Therefore, the proposed common question was not suitable for class-wide resolution. Id. at *9. In addition, the Court considered Plaintiff's arguments for typicality. Plaintiff argued that her claims were typical of the class because she participated in one of the plans at issue and further argued that variations between the benefit plans did not defeat typicality to the extent that they would only affect the allocation of damages among class members rather than the fact of injury. Id. at *11. The Court rejected Plaintiff's position. It reasoned that the terms of the class members' plans were too varied to find in the Plaintiff's favor. Id. at *12. Finally, the Court addressed adequacy, and analyzed whether any conflicts might exist between Plaintiff and the benefit plans she sought to represent. Id. at *14. On the adequacy issue, Defendant argued Plaintiff was unfit to represent the class because she was a benefit plan participant rather than a benefit plan fiduciary. Id. The Court declined to hold that plan participants can never represent the interests of participants in plans of which they are not members, but found that in this case, the interests of the benefit plans may be adverse to the interest of the benefit plan participants. As a result, Plaintiff could not adequately represent the interests of the benefit plans. Id. at *15. The Court also found that Plaintiff could not adequately represent the proposed class because she was no longer a member of her benefit plan, and therefore lacked standing to seek prospective injunctive relief. Id. This fact also defeated adequacy because Plaintiff failed to demonstrate that prospective injunctive relief would "never advance the interests of any class member." Id. at *16. Although not required to do so in light of its negative Rule 23(a) findings, the Court proceeded to address whether the proposed class could satisfy Rule 23(b). Id. at *17. First, the Court determined that certification under Rule 23(b)(1) would be inappropriate because the proposed class would have included thousands of individual retirement plans with varying guaranteed minimums, crediting rates, and fees, "individual adjudications would not necessarily be dispositive of the interests of the other members." Id. at *18. The Court also found the proposed class too diverse for certification under Rule 23(b)(2), reasoning that the Court would not be able to calculate the total amount of Defendant's improper profits for the entire class without individualized assessments of the substance of each plan. Id. at *19. The Court concluded its assessment by finding that the class could not be certified under Rule 23(b)(3) for the same reasons articulated in finding a lack of commonality. Id. at *20. The Court also opined that allowing the class to proceed would require individualized and fact-sensitive inquiries into thousands of plans, making class proceedings unmanageable, and thus inferior to other forms of adjudication Id.

Di Biase, et al. v. SPX Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 162465 (W.D.N.C. Sept. 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retirees, filed suit after the Defendant announced that it was replacing their health care benefits – provided by an ERISA plan established pursuant to a settlement agreement from a prior litigation – with health care reimbursement accounts. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion, finding that while Plaintiffs could establish Rule 23(a)(1)'s numerosity requirement, Plaintiffs could not establish the remaining requirements of Rule 23(a). As to the commonality requirements of Rule 23(a)(2), the Court found that while the lawsuit presented a common question, the question could not be resolved by a common answer. Rather, individual determinations with respect to damages for each class member would need to be made because the retirees had different benefits. The Court concluded for the same reasons that Plaintiffs could not establish typicality, because given the variety of benefits at issue, it was possible that some class members could have contrary interests in the outcome of the suit than others. Finally, as to adequacy of representation, the Court found that Plaintiffs could not establish that their interests were aligned with the rest of the class. Thus, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion and did not consider whether Plaintiffs could establish any of the requirements set forth in Rule 23(b).

Sims, et al. v. BB&T Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 137738 (M.D.N.C. Aug. 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former participants in Defendant's 401(k) Plan (the "Plan"), filed a putative class action alleging that Defendant BB&T and other Defendants breached their fiduciary duties under the ERISA for alleged wrongdoing under the Plan, including charging excessive fees and engaging in prohibited transactions. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the Court granted. Defendants did not contest numerosity of the proposed class, which included anywhere between 30,000 and 67,000 individuals. Id. at *11. As to commonality, the Court found that there were common questions as to whether Defendants were fiduciaries, the scope of the fiduciary duties, whether there was a fiduciary breach, whether Defendants engaged in prohibited transactions, and as to damages. Id. at *12. Defendants argued that commonalty was defeated due to intra-class conflicts, since some class members benefitted from the alleged wrongdoing depending on their investment strategy. Id. However, the Court found that Defendants failed to demonstrate that varying investment strategies created a conflict, much less a fundamental one. The Court observed that there was no indication that the participants who benefited from the alleged imprudent actions would have to forfeit the investment gains resulting from the alleged breaches. The Court also noted that speculative intra-class conflicts did not defeat commonality because the ultimate question would be the extent of the Plan's losses as opposed to individual losses. On the issue of typicality, Defendants argued that named Plaintiffs' claims were atypical of the class claims because the named Plaintiffs did not invest in all of the alleged imprudent funds. The Court rejected this argument, noting that the Fourth Circuit does not require that members of the class have identical factual and legal claims in all respects. Id. at *16. The Court reasoned that typicality was established because the theories of liability were the same among the named Plaintiffs and the class members. Defendants also challenged adequacy of representation, arguing that the named Plaintiffs lacked knowledge of the facts of the case outside of what they learned through their attorneys. Id. at *18. The Court did not consider this a barrier to class certification, noting that the complex nature of the claims required reliance on attorneys and hired experts, which did not make the representatives inadequate. The Court noted, however, that the behavior of the three named Plaintiffs who paid limited attention to the case, including their own interrogatories, did raise concerns. According to the Court, this did not preclude a finding of adequacy of representation because the other Plaintiffs would adequately represent the class. As to adequacy of counsel, Defendants objected to the use of two law firms, asserting that only one firm should be appointed class counsel to prevent duplication of effort. Id. at *19. The Court also stated there was no reason to believe class counsel would not cooperate with each other in effectively dividing the work. Id. Thus, the Court found there was adequate representation. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

West, et al. v. Continental Automotive, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87382 (W.D.N.C. June 7, 2017). In this class action alleging that Defendants violated the ERISA by miscalculating benefits under an employee pension benefit plan for a period of time where Plaintiffs were laid off with recall rights, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Specifically, the Court found that Plaintiffs demonstrated, without objections from Defendants, that their proposed class of approximately 60 members satisfied the numerosity requirement of Rule 23, and that commonality existed because the claims of Plaintiffs and the putative class members "all [arose] under the same statute, 29 U.S.C. § 1001 et seq., and the same plan document." Id. at *3-4. With respect to the commonality requirement, the Court further noted that all class members' claims stemmed from the theory that Defendants violated the ERISA by misinterpreting the terms of the benefit plan and improperly excluding the lay-off period in the vesting and eligibility service calculations. Id. at *4. The Court found that typicality was satisfied because the named Plaintiffs and putative class members presented the same factual allegations, asserted the same legal claims against the Defendants, and sought only injunctive relief. Id. at *4-5. Finally, the Court found Plaintiffs to be adequate class representatives because they demonstrated an absence of conflicts between their interests and the interests of the proposed class and showed a willingness to prosecute the claims, as evidenced by their participation in the discovery process. Id. at *6. In reaching this conclusion, the Court rejected Defendants' argument that Plaintiffs could not meet the typicality and adequacy requirements because individualized inquiries were required to determine whether Plaintiffs had filed benefits claims within the applicable limitations period. Id. at *8. The Court rejected this argument, noting that under Fourth Circuit precedent, the statute of limitations begins to run only when a fiduciary gives a claimant a "clear repudiation" of benefits. Id. Because Defendants failed to present evidence of a clear repudiation, they could not successfully assert arguments based on the timeliness of Plaintiffs' claims. Id. Having found the requirements of Rule 23(a) satisfied, the Court also held that Plaintiffs could maintain a class action under Rule 23(b)(1). The Court specifically found that as the case challenged the computation methodology of plan benefits, individual adjudications of the putative class members' claims could lead to conflicting interpretations of the same benefits plan and impose conflicting standards of conduct on the Defendants. Id. at *8. The Court therefore granted Plaintiffs' motion and certified the proposed class.

(v) Fifth Circuit

Mallory, et al. v. Lease Supervisors, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 70712 (W.D. Tex. Jan. 13, 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action for alleged breaches of fiduciary duty under the ERISA. Plaintiff participated in a 401(k) plan sponsored by his employer and overseen by another company. Participants contributed between 1% and 10% of their eligible pay to the plan. The employer made matching contributions in the form of company stock. Plaintiff alleged the employer breached its fiduciary duties by failing to make timely matching contributions to the plan. Plaintiff moved under Rule 23(b)(2) to certify a class of all persons who were participants or beneficiaries of the plan during the relevant time period and who made or maintained investments in plan funds. The Magistrate Judge denied the motion. The Magistrate Judge first addressed Rule 23(a). The Magistrate Judge concluded that Plaintiff could not establish numerosity because the proposed class consisted of only 23 to 25 people who were easily ascertainable through employment records. The Magistrate Judge also addressed commonality and found common questions of: (i) whether the employer's allegedly untimely contributions breached its fiduciary duties; and (ii) whether the allegedly untimely contributions violated any of the ERISA's other provisions. The Magistrate Judge also found typicality, noting that all members of the proposed class were participants in the plan, and all suffered from the same alleged conduct by the employer. Regarding adequacy of representation, the employer argued that Plaintiff might have an opposing interest to the class because some members might have benefitted from the alleged delay in contributions. The Magistrate Judge rejected this argument as speculative, finding that the employer failed to show that any participant benefitted from the contribution delay. The Magistrate Judge further addressed certification under Rule 23(b)(2), noting that certification under that rule is only appropriate where declaratory or injunctive relief would apply equally to all class members and where any individual monetary damages were incidental to that relief. The Magistrate Judge concluded that Plaintiff failed to make this showing because he sought monetary damages that would require an individualized assessment of each participant's investment portfolio, investment decisions, the duration of participation, and the timing of contributions in relation to lost interest due to the alleged delay. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge held that the monetary damages at issue were not incidental because they did not flow from liability to the class as a whole. The Magistrate Judge therefore recommended that Plaintiff's motion for class certification be denied because Plaintiff failed to meet the numerosity requirement of Rule 23(a)(1) and the requirements of Rule 23(b)(2).

(vi) Sixth Circuit

Wilson, et al. v. Anthem Health Plans Of Kentucky, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 572 (W.D. Ky. Jan. 3, 2017). Plaintiffs sought class certification of all previous and current beneficiaries who participated in Anthem Health Plans of Kentucky, alleging the plan placed unlawful limits on coverage of Applied Behavior Analysis ("ABA") treatment for Autism Spectrum Disorder ("ASD") in violation of the Mental Health Parity and Addiction Equity Act ("MHPAEA") and the ERISA. Id. at *2-3. The Anthem Plan limited "coverage for ASD treatment to 1,000 hours per year for members ages one through their seventh birthday and 20 hours per month for members ages seven through twenty-one." Id. at *4. Plaintiffs alleged an unlawful dollar or hour limit policy on the treatment for ASD, including individuals who were denied coverage or reimbursement of ABA treatment for ASD on the grounds that the policy's dollar or hour limits have been exceeded. The Court determined that Plaintiff successfully established the numerosity requirement with 27 class members. Id. at *12. Plaintiff explained that without certification, "it is highly unlikely that other members would bring their own case or even know about Anthem's illegal benefit caps….and would avoid the filing of separate lawsuits throughout the state." Id. The Court agreed and noted "the core claim for each class member is essentially the same…[and] is 'a substantially more efficient use of judicial resources than joinder of the parties at the onset of the litigation.'" Id. at *15. As to commonality, the Court was persuaded by Plaintiff's position that "whether the MHPAEA preempts the [Kentucky] Autism Mandate and prohibits Anthem's…limits on ABA coverage" is a common issue to the class. Id. at *26. Turning to typicality, Defendants argued that each claim was unique to the individual member's treatment and thus not typical to the class. Id. at *29. Plaintiff contended that Defendant engaged in a "single course of conduct" – to cap "benefits for ABA therapy, a mental health benefit, as a treatment for ASD, a mental health condition" because Defendant "does not place corresponding limits on its coverage of medical benefits, this practice violates MHPAEA." Id. at *31. The Court concluded that the putative members' claim stemmed from the same legal theory typical to the class. Id. For the adequacy requirement, the Court held that Plaintiff had a "clear common interest with members of the proposed class; that is, she had the same benefit limits applied to her expenses for the treatment of ASD applied to her claims as other class members." Id. at *33. At the same time, the Court found that certification under Rule 23(b)(2) was improper because Defendant would have the right to show that cap limitations on other varieties of benefits did not constitute mental health benefits under the MHPAEA. Id. at *38. The Court stated that the inquiry was far too individualized for determining damages and thus not proper for certification under Rule 23(b)(2). Id. As to predominance, the Court determined that Defendant's "highly individualized inquiries" argument was directed toward the merits of Plaintiff's claim, and was therefore inappropriate at the certification stage. Id. at *43. The Court held that Plaintiff successfully alleged a strong unlikelihood for other members to discover or individually vindicate their claims and there are threshold issues common to the class, which served the superiority element. Id. at *47-48. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

In Re Target Corp. Securities Litigation*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120055 (D. Minn. July 31, 2017). The Court dismissed a putative class action brought by Plaintiffs, a group of participants in Target's 401(k) Plan. The plan was funded in part with Target stock. Plaintiffs asserted breaches of the ERISA duties of prudence, loyalty, and monitoring, based on Defendants maintaining the stock in the Plan at the time the stock value fell in connection with the failed launch of Target Canada. Id. at *45. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs had failed to meet their burden to plead a breach of the duty of prudence under Fifth Third Bancorp v. Dudenhoeffer, 134 S. Ct. 2459 (2014). Id. at *47. Specifically, Defendants contended that Plaintiffs failed to plausibly allege suitable alternatives Defendants could have pursued in lieu of keeping the stock in the Plan. Id. Plaintiffs had pleaded several alternatives, including, among others, opting not to include Target stock in the Plan, disclosing relevant non-public information, advising participants to diversity their holdings, and/or resigning as fiduciaries. Id. at *50. However, the Court rejected these premises, stating that a freeze on stock purchases might send a negative signal to the markets. The Court likewise found that a prudent fiduciary could have concluded that these alternatives would do more good than harm, and hence these "alternatives" were not viable. Id. at *52-53. The Court further held that Plaintiffs were impermissibly relying on hindsight when they argued that the fiduciaries should have known that Target Canada was "doomed." Id. at *54-56. The Court likewise dismissed Plaintiffs' claim for breach of the duty of loyalty, finding that Plaintiffs' claims were derivative of their claim for breach of the duty of prudence, and it rejected the proposition that the duty of loyalty imposes a broad duty of disclosure on corporate insiders who act as fiduciaries. Id. at *66. Under the misrepresentation theory, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to plead any non-conclusory allegations that Defendants made improper statements while performing their fiduciary functions. Id. at *68. Finally, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claim for breach of the duty to monitor because Plaintiffs had failed to plead the requisite underlying breach of fiduciary duty. Id. at *70. Absent an underlying breach, there was no failure to monitor.

Wildman, et al. v. American Century Services, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 200574 (W.D. Mo. Dec. 6, 2017). In this action brought by two 401(k) Plan participants alleging that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties and caused the Plan to engage in prohibited transactions in violation of the ERISA, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to certify a class consisting of all participants and beneficiaries of the Plan since June 30, 2010, excluding Defendants, those responsible to the Plan's investment or administrative functions, and members of Defendant Plan sponsor's board of directors. Id. at *4-5. Relative to the requirements of Rule 23(a), the Court found that numerosity was satisfied based on Plaintiffs' uncontested assertion that there were between 2,000 and 2,500 class members. Id. at *9. While characterizing the parties' arguments on the point as "sparse," the Court also found that Plaintiffs met the commonality requirement, "but minimally." Id. The Court criticized Plaintiffs' counsel for failing to identify the common questions in the case, but ultimately found that there were numerous such questions at issue and that answers to them would be common to all class members. Id. at *10-11. After characterizing the test for typicality as "not onerous," the Court also held that Plaintiffs established this requirement because Plaintiffs and the class members were all Plan participants, the alleged breaches were directed at the Plan, and Defendants failed to show that Plaintiffs would need to spend any significant time or effort on individual issues. Id. at *12-13. Noting that Defendants' counsel did not address the adequacy requirement separately from the points raised with respect to typicality, the Court determined that Plaintiffs had satisfied the adequacy requirement because there were no known conflicts of interest with class members, and Plaintiffs asserted that they had an interest in pursuing recovery on behalf of the Plan. Id. at *13. Further, the Court noted that Defendants made no challenge to the adequacy of Plaintiffs' counsel as proposed class counsel, and that they had significant experience serving as lead counsel in class actions under the ERISA. Id. at *13-14. Finally, the Court also concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied the requirements of Rule 23(b)(1) because individual adjudications of the claims presented would establish incompatible standards of conduct for Defendants, thereby rejecting Defendants' argument that certification of a mandatory class was impermissible where Plaintiffs seek monetary relief. Id. at *14. Having found that Plaintiffs satisfied all requirements of Rule 23, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion and certified a class under Rule 23(b)(1).

Cryer, et al. v. Franklin Templeton Resources, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 150683 (N.D. Cal. July 26, 2017). In a putative ERISA class action, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion to certify a class consisting of approximately 5,000 participants of Defendant's 401(k) plan over a 5 year period. Id. at *12. Given the size of the putative class, the Court found numerosity and noted Defendant had not argued to the contrary. As to commonality, Defendant had advanced three main arguments opposing commonality, including: (i) that the case required individualized analysis of participants' choices of funds, the timing of those choices, investment decisions, and the funds' relative performance; (ii) that § 502 (a)(2) claims did not qualify for class certification by default; and (iii) that the determinative question was not whether Plaintiff raised common questions, but whether they were susceptible to common proof. The Court rejected Defendant's arguments. The Court found that the named Plaintiff had identified multiple common questions of law and fact, including that all proposed class members participated in the Plan, their participation was governed by the same written document, and they were presented with the same investment options. The Court also held that the fiduciaries' alleged conflicts of interest affected those investment options, and the allegedly excessive fees, and that the fiduciaries owed the same duty to all participants. Id. at *13. The Court noted that any recovery would be on behalf of the Plan as a whole, and the common focus would be on whether the fiduciaries breached their duties to the Plan by paying excessive fees and making prudent investment decisions. Defendant also argued that the named Plaintiff's claims were not typical of the proposed class, because he had withdrawn from the Plan, and would be "preoccupied with establishing the imprudence of the specific funds in which he invested" and demonstrating his losses. Id. The Court found that the named Plaintiff had sufficiently alleged that both he and the proposed class members were allegedly injured by the same conduct, and that Defendant failed to identify any defenses unique to the named Plaintiff. Id. Thus, the Court held that typicality was satisfied. The Court also rejected Defendant's challenges as to the adequacy of Plaintiff as a class representative, finding that the named Plaintiff's deposition testimony satisfied the relatively low bar of showing a basic understanding of the claims. Id. at *17. Having found the requirements of Rule 23(a) satisfied, the Court considered, under Rule 23(b)(1), whether separate actions would create the risk of "inconsistent or varying adjudications with respect to individual members of the class which would establish incompatible standards of conduct for the party opposing the class." Id. The Court determined that, if each of the thousands of proposed members were permitted to adjudicate their claims individually, there would be a significant risk of inconsistent judgments, which would be inconsistent with the requirement that ERISA fiduciaries treat beneficiaries consistently. Id. For these reasons, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Des Roches, et al. v. California Physicians' Services*, 320 F.R.D. 486 (N.D. Cal. 2017). In this class action, a group of insureds seeking coverage for "residential and intensive outpatient treatment for mental illnesses and substance use disorders" alleged that Defendants breached their ERISA fiduciary duties and improperly denied benefits based on Defendants' use of overly restrictive medical necessity criteria guidelines ("Guidelines"), which were incompatible with generally accepted standards, to evaluate their claims. Id. at 491. Plaintiffs sought injunctive relief ordering Defendants to reform the Guidelines and reprocess their claims. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification and approved the class to seek retrospective injunctive relief, but concluded that Plaintiffs lacked standing to seek prospective injunctive relief where Defendants had discontinued use of the Guidelines. Id. at 511. In considering Plaintiffs' certification motion, the Court assessed whether the proposed class satisfied the requirements of Rule 23(a). Plaintiffs' proposed class exceeded 7,000 members, so the Court found, and Defendants did not contest, that Plaintiffs had established numerosity. Id. at 496. Turning to commonality, Plaintiffs identified as common questions of law and fact: (i) "whether Defendants were ERISA fiduciaries;" (ii) whether the Guidelines conformed to broadly accepted professional standards; (iii) whether Defendants breached their fiduciary duties by creating the Guidelines and applying them to class members' claims; (iv) whether Defendants improperly relied on the Guidelines to deny claims; and (v) whether the class was entitled to relief. Id. at 497. Plaintiffs established that Defendants had applied the Guidelines to all putative class members' claims and that all of the relevant plans contained a "standard definition of 'medical necessity.'" Id. at 498. The Court thus concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied the commonality requirement because resolving all class members' claims turned on whether the Guidelines conformed to generally accepted professional standards for determining medical necessity. Id. at 503. The Court rejected Defendants' arguments that Plaintiffs' claims were not typical of the class because many class members' claims were decided under different versions and varying provisions of the Guidelines. Id. at 504. However, the Court noted that under Ninth Circuit law, when a challenged practice affects all class members, identical injuries between the named Plaintiffs and class members are not required for typicality. Id. Here, Plaintiffs satisfied typicality by identifying Defendants' consideration of claims under the standards provided for in the Guidelines as a common injury. Id. Finally, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied the adequacy requirement. The Court reasoned that no conflicts existed where Plaintiffs, like the other putative class members, sought reprocessing of claims as a remedy. Id. at 505. Finding each prerequisite satisfied, the Court then assessed certification under Rule 23(b). The Court found that individual adjudications of the putative class members' claims presented a risk that different lawsuits would reach different conclusions about what the standard for determining medical necessity should require. Id. at 507. This outcome could put Defendants in a position of trying to comply with conflicting rulings, making certification appropriate under Rule 23(b)(1). Id. The Court also found that Plaintiffs' request for reprocessing, a form of injunctive relief, also made the class appropriate for certification under Rule 23(b)(2), since both within and outside of the ERISA context, "reprocessing" injunctions routinely qualify for certification under Rule 23(b)(2). Id. at 509. Specifically the Court found the Rule 23(b)(2) requirements were met because a reprocessing injunction would apply to the entire class and would not require the Court to individually assess the class members' claims. Id. The Court thus certified the class.

Marshall, et al. v. Northrop Grumman,* Case No. 16-CV-6794 (C.D. Cal. Nov. 2, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of participants in Defendant's employee pension benefits plans, filed a class action alleging that Defendant's Benefits Administration Committees failed to comply with the terms of the Administrative Services Agreements and thereby violated their fiduciary duties to operate the plan solely in the interest of plan participants in violation of the ERISA. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the Court granted. As to the Rule 23(a) elements, the Court noted that the class was sufficiently numerous as there were at least 100,000 active participants in the plan. Id. at 10. Plaintiffs asserted that there were common questions on which all class members' claims depended, including: (i) whether Defendant was a fiduciary; (ii) the extent and nature of the duties Defendant's Committees owed the plan; (iii) whether Defendant's Committees breached their fiduciary duties or engaged in a prohibited transaction; (iv) whether the plan suffered losses from the breaches; (v) how to calculate plan losses; and (vi) what, if any, equitable relief should be imposed. Id. at 11. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs met the commonality requirement because they identified multiple questions of fact and law that were common to all plan participants. Id. at 12. Given that Plaintiffs' complaint specifically alleged plan-wide fiduciary breaches and prohibited transactions, the Court found that Plaintiffs met the typicality requirement. Id. at 14. The Court also held that Plaintiffs were adequate class representatives because they actively participated in discovery, met with counsel, sat for depositions, and monitored the proceedings in the case, and their interests were not atypical of the class. Id. at 18. Plaintiffs sought to certify their class pursuant to Rule 23(b)(1), or in the alternative, Rule 23(b)(3). Id. The Court determined that because the issue was the plan's damages, the determination must be the same for every participant and beneficiary, and forcing class members to adjudicate their claims individually would pose a significant risk of inconsistent judgments. Id. at 19-20. Given that Plaintiffs asserted § 502(a)(2) and (3) claims on behalf of the plan and alleged breaches of fiduciary duty that would, if proven, affect every plan participant, the Court concluded that certification under Rule 23(b)(1) was proper. Id. at 22. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Urakhchin, et al. v. Allianz Asset Management Of America, L.P.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144369 (C.D. Cal. June 15, 2017). Two participants in the Allianz Asset Management of America, L.P., 401(k) Savings and Retirement Plan brought a putative class action alleging breaches of fiduciary duty against Allianz and the plan's investment management committee. Plaintiffs brought suit on behalf of the plan and all similarly-situated participants, alleging that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties by: (i) selecting high-cost Allianz-affiliated investment options to benefit Allianz; (ii) failing to monitor the high fees imposed on participants; (iii) failing to investigate lower-cost investments; and (iv) retaining high-cost investment options. Based on that conduct, Plaintiffs sought relief for breach of the duties of loyalty and prudence, failure to monitor fiduciaries, and equitable relief for ill-gotten proceeds. Plaintiffs moved to certify a class of current and former plan participants. The Court determined that Plaintiffs adequately established standing. The Court agreed that numerosity was met as there were approximately 4,000 participants as of 2016, with another 1,637 who had closed their accounts. With respect to commonality, the Court was persuaded by Plaintiffs' contention that there were common questions of law or fact, including: (i) whether Defendants imprudently selected investment options for the plan; (ii) whether those options charge excessive fees compared to other options; (iii) whether Defendants managed the plan with the requisite skill, care, and prudence; and (iv) whether Defendants' actions constituted a breach of fiduciary duties. The Court found Plaintiffs' claims were typical of the proposed class because of the common allegations that the selected funds were chosen based on whether they would benefit Defendants rather than participants and that selected investment options charged higher fees than those available outside the Allianz family. The Court noted that the fact that participants may have separate accounts, invest in different funds, and obtain different returns on investment did not destroy typicality because the legal arguments to prove Defendants' liability were the same. Similarly, the fact that some participants may have profited from the selected investments options did not defeat typicality. Moreover, while Defendants argued that conflicts existed between class members based on their individualized investment options, the Court found those concerns too speculative. The Court then turned to the adequacy requirement and found that Plaintiffs showed sufficient knowledge of and participation in the case to satisfy the requirement. The Court, however, reserved judgment on whether class counsel should be appointed because Plaintiffs had requested that law firms be appointed, rather than specific attorneys. The Court reserved judgment pending submission of declarations identifying the attorneys who were to serve as class counsel. The Court also found that Plaintiffs satisfied Rule 23(b)(1)(B) because a judgment in one individual action against Defendants in their roles as fiduciaries of the plan would necessarily affect the rights and interests of the other class members. Certification under this provision was proper because Plaintiffs sought injunctive relief and monetary relief for the plan, and not for individual participants. However, in light of the injunctive relief sought, the Court ordered that the class definition be modified. It defined Plaintiffs' proposed class under Rule 23(b)(1)(B) as only one for monetary relief. A sub-class excluding former participants was required to seek injunctive relief because those individuals were not threatened by any future breaches of fiduciary duty. Accordingly, the Court certified both a monetary relief class, and an injunctive relief class, with the latter excluding former plan participants.

Wit, et al. v. United Behavioral Health*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 33998 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 9, 2017). Following an earlier decision granting Plaintiffs' motion to certify three classes in this ERISA class action and related action, the parties filed a joint motion for approval of a notice plan and to amend class definitions to provide an end date for new class members to be added. The Court granted the motion to amend the class definitions consistent with that limitation, and considered the parties' disputes regarding the form of the notices to be mailed to each class member. First, Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant's proposed notice "improperly suggest[ed] that [Plaintiffs] must prove that each class member was owed benefits." Id. at *11. Siding with Plaintiffs, the Court rejected Defendant's argument that the description was critical to the class member's understanding of the claims, finding that the language was potentially confusing and unlikely to aid class members' understanding of the claims, and that Defendant's proposed language regarding actual harm was inconsistent with the Court's certification order, in which the Court found that the harm alleged was procedural in nature and involved the application of faulty guidelines to claims for benefits. Id. at *12. Second, the Court agreed with Plaintiffs that Defendant's attempt to identify the specific remedies sought in each of Plaintiffs' claims was confusing, and was unlikely to be useful to class members. Specifically, Defendant had proposed language informing class members that the reprocessing remedy that Plaintiffs sought could result in fewer benefits than had been previously approved, and that "they may be precluded from asserting other claims that are not being pursued by the class under the doctrine of res judicata." Id. at *16. The Court rejected both arguments, finding that Plaintiffs' proposed description of the reprocessing remedy was clearer and that, under the doctrine of res judicata, adjudication of claims to the class would not preclude subsequent litigation of individual claims. Id. at *18. Finally, the Court considered the parties' dispute over the implications of remaining in the class instead of opting-out. Having certified a hybrid class action without creating separate classes differentiated by remedy sought, the Court denied Plaintiffs' request to modify the basis for certification to remove any ability to opt-out, finding that the reprocessing and surcharge remedies sought provided sound reasons to allow class members to opt-out. Despite Plaintiffs' suggestion that these remedies could be awarded on a class-wide basis, the Court concluded that there may be reasons for a class member to prefer opting-out and pursuing claims relating to the denial of benefits on an individual basis. Id. at *20-21. While the Court, therefore, found that neither the surcharge nor reprocessing remedies were mandatory, it determined, because of "the manageability problems (and potential confusion) that may arise from giving class members multiple options for opting-out of specific remedies, there should be only a single option offered to class members for opting-out of the case as a whole." Id. at *22. The Court therefore ordered the parties to meet and confer regarding a draft notice along the terms in its order.

(xi) Eleventh Circuit

Hoak, et al. v. Plan Administrator Of The Plans Of NCR Corp.*, Case No. 15-CV-3983 (N.D. Ga. Sept. 27, 2017). In this putative ERISA class action, former executives who were participants in Defendant's top hat retirement plans sought class certification to pursue breach of fiduciary duty and benefit denial claims arising out of Defendant's decisions to terminate the plans and pay out participants' benefits as lump sums rather than annuities. Plaintiffs alleged the Plan Administrator inappropriately applied a 5% discount rate to the lump sum payout, which was too high. Plaintiffs also alleged the Plan Administrator illegally interpreted the terms "spouse" and "eligible spouse," resulting in inappropriate denials of benefits claims. The Court granted class certification as to the annuity claim, finding that a sub-class should be certified, but denied class certification for the "spousal" eligibility claims. Id. at *20. Addressing the annuity claim, the Court found each Rule 23(a) prerequisite satisfied. A proposed class of 193 plan participants satisfied numerosity; Plaintiffs established commonality and typicality where the 5% discount rate applied to all of the putative class members' lump sum payments; and because the proposed class members all stood to benefit from the application of a lower discount rate, adequacy was satisfied. The Court held that class certification was appropriate under Rule 23(b)(2) because, when calculating the discount rate, Defendant acted on grounds that apply generally to the class. However, as to the "spousal" eligibility claim, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy numerosity where the record identified only two possible "spouses" who had been denied benefits.

Owens, et al. v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 207454 (N.D. Ga. Sept. 29, 2017). In this putative ERISA class action, a beneficiary of an ERISA life insurance plan asserted that Defendant breached its fiduciary duties by holding life insurance payments in a retained asset account, rather than immediately disbursing those benefits to Plaintiff. Plaintiff alleged that the benefits in the account accrued interest at a rate of 0.50% while Defendant earned a higher rate on that money for its own benefit. Plaintiff alleged that this conduct violated Defendant's duty of loyalty and constituted prohibited transactions under the ERISA. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification, which the Court granted. Plaintiff sought to represent a class of similarly-situated life insurance beneficiaries for whom a retained asset account was set up. The Court determined that Plaintiff's proposed class was ascertainable because it was adequately defined by objective criteria. Plaintiff also proposed an administratively feasible method for determining class members. As to the Rule 23(a) requirements for class certification, the Court found that numerosity was satisfied because Defendant had set up over 400,000 retained asset accounts, making joinder of all potential class members impracticable. The Court determined that the commonality requirement was met because there were questions common to each class member, including those related to Defendant's business practices, Defendant's status as a fiduciary or party in interest under the ERISA, and the amount, if any, in which Defendant was unjustly enriched through its challenged conduct. The Court also opined that typicality was met because Plaintiff's claims arose from the same acts of Defendant and were based on the same legal theory. In analyzing the adequacy prong of Rule 23(a), the Court held that this requirement was satisfied because Plaintiff's interests did not conflict with those of potential class members and because class counsel was qualified and experienced in class actions brought under the ERISA. Finding that the Rule 23(a) requirements were satisfied, the Court evaluated the class claims under Rule 23(b)(3). The Court held that Plaintiff satisfied her burden to show that common issues predominated over any potential individualized issues, including issues involving Defendant's implementation of retained asset accounts across all potential plans. The Court rejected Defendant's arguments that individual issues predominated. In particular, the Court noted that issues of state contractual interpretation would not apply because the ERISA standards were based on federal law. Similarly, there were no individualized issues to be resolved regarding plan-specific summary plan descriptions because those documents could not contradict the common language contained in the plan that Plaintiff challenged. Finally, in addressing Rule 23(b)(3)'s superiority requirement, the Court noted that where predominance is found, it would be difficult to conclude that a class action was not the superior method of adjudicating a dispute. The Court referenced its analysis on the predominance factor and concluded that a class action was the only fair method for adjudicating Plaintiff's claims. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Pledger, et al. v. Reliance Trust Co.,* Case No. 15-CV-4444 (N.D. Ga. Nov. 7, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of participants in and beneficiaries of Defendant Insperity, Inc.'s 401(k) plan, brought a putative class action alleging breach of fiduciary duty and prohibited transactions. The parties stipulated to a class under Rule 23(b)(1) that included "all participants and beneficiaries of the Insperity 401(k) plan from December 22, 2009 through September 30, 2017, excluding Defendants." Id. at 4. The stipulation stated that class certification was appropriate because: (i) members of the class in the thousands made joinder impractical; (ii) common questions of law and fact existed with respect to all members of the class, including whether Defendants were fiduciaries of the Plan with respect to conduct alleged, whether Defendants breached any applicable fiduciary duties or caused prohibited transactions in each respect alleged, and whether the plan suffered losses from the alleged breaches; (iii) Plaintiffs' claims were typical of the claims of the class members; (iv) Plaintiffs were committed to fairly, adequately, and vigorously representing and protecting the interests of the class; and (v) Plaintiffs' class counsel was adequate to represent the class. Id. The parties further stated that certification was appropriate under Rule 23(b)(1) because the prosecution of separate actions would create a risk of inconsistent or varying adjudications. Id. at 5. The Court agreed that the Rule 23 requirements for class certification were satisfied. Accordingly, the Court approved the parties' stipulations and certified the proposed class.

B. Other Federal Rulings Affecting The Defense Of ERISA Class Actions

Throughout 2017, federal courts issued a wide variety of rulings on procedural and substantive matters in ERISA class action litigation. These rulings included administrative fee issues in ERISA class actions; attorneys' fees and costs in ERISA class actions; breach of fiduciary duty issues in ERISA class actions; damages issues in ERISA class actions; discovery issues in ERISA class actions; DOL and PBGC ERISA enforcement litigation; ERISA 401(k) class actions; ERISA class action litigation over retiree/employee benefits; ERISA stock drop class actions; ESOP issues in ERISA class actions; independent contractor issues in ERISA class actions; judgments in ERISA class actions; preemption, procedural, and coverage issues in ERISA class actions; and tolling, statute of limitations, and exhaustion requirements in ERISA class actions.

(i) Administrative Fee Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Chendes, et al. v. Xerox HR Solutions*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 172997 (E.D. Mich. Oct. 19, 2017). Plaintiffs were participants in three Ford Motor Co. 401(k) retirement plans and Defendant provided platform and record-keeping services for the administration of those plans. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant charged excessive fees for investment advice provided by robo-adviser Financial Engines Advisors LLC, a third-party advisor not named as a Defendant in the lawsuit. Specifically, they alleged that Defendant breached its ERISA fiduciary duties, undertook various prohibited transactions in violation of the ERISA, and failed to disclose its fee sharing arrangement under 29 C.F.R. § 2550.408b-2(c). Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's first amended complaint, which the Court granted. The Court found that: (i) Defendant had no discretion over the amount of its own compensation as it related to the participants and thus was not acting as a fiduciary in collecting fees from Financial Engines; and (ii) Defendant was not a fiduciary based on a theory that it exercised control over the agreement between Ford and Financial Engines – which Plaintiffs claimed was a "plan asset" – because the agreement did not amount to a "plan asset" under the ERISA. Because Plaintiff did not plead sufficient facts to show that Defendant was a fiduciary, the Court dismissed the breach of fiduciary duty and prohibited transaction claims without prejudice. The Court also found that there was no private right of action under 29 C.F.R. § 2550.408b-2(c) and dismissed the disclosure claim with prejudice. The Court, however, gave Plaintiffs the opportunity to re-plead their breach of fiduciary duty and prohibited transactions claims.

(ii) Attorneys' Fees And Costs In ERISA Class Actions

Thole, et al. v. U.S. Bank, National Association*, 873 F.3d 617 (8th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, participants in a defined benefit pension plan, appealed the dismissal of their putative class action in which they alleged that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties and caused the plan to engage in prohibited transactions in violation of the ERISA, which resulted in the Plan suffering losses and becoming under-funded. Id. at 621. Defendants' original motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' complaint asserted that Plaintiffs lacked standing to bring the suit, that their claims were time-barred, and that the pleading failed to state a claim for which relief could be granted. Id. Although it found that the Plaintiffs had standing, as participants, to bring suit for the under-funding of Plan, the District Court granted the original motion in part, finding that the fiduciary breach claim, which challenged Defendants' decision to invest 100% of the Plan's assets in equities, was barred by the ERISA's six-year statute of repose. However, the District Court allowed Plaintiffs to proceed with their prohibited transaction claims. Defendants subsequently filed a second motion to dismiss, again asserting that Plaintiffs lacked standing, and arguing that a change in circumstances had caused the Plan to become over-funded. In response to the second motion, the District Court dismissed the action, finding that the over-funding of the Plan had mooted Plaintiffs' claims. The District Court further rejected Plaintiffs' request for attorneys' fees, finding that Plaintiffs had achieved no success on the merits, and that the change in the Plan's circumstances was not a response to the litigation. On appeal, Plaintiffs argued that the District Court erred by: (i) dismissing the case as moot; (ii) dismissing the fiduciary breach claim on statute of limitations and pleading grounds; and (iii) denying their motion for attorneys' fees and costs. The Eighth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision, finding that because of the Plan's over-funded status, there was no actual or imminent injury to the Plan and Plaintiffs' suit was not one for appropriate relief under the ERISA. In reaching this conclusion, the Eighth Circuit rejected Plaintiffs' argument that the issue should be determined as of the commencement of the suit, without regard to subsequent changes in circumstance. The Eighth Circuit also affirmed the District Court's denial of Plaintiffs' request for attorneys' fees, finding that, although Defendants made $311 million dollars in voluntary contributions to the Plan after the suit was commenced, the evidence before the District Court did not support the notion that the contributions were made because of the suit, nor were they made because of an order or in response to an indication that the District Court was likely to grant summary judgment to Plaintiffs. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit affirmed the judgment of the District Court.

Tussey, et al. v. ABB, Inc.*, 850 F.3d 951 (8th Cir. 2017). In this 401(k) fees class action, the Eighth Circuit reversed the District Court's ruling on the amount of damages owed as a result of a breach of fiduciary duty and vacated a corresponding award of attorneys' fees. Although the case originally involved many more claims, at this stage of the litigation, only one remained. Plaintiffs argued that the fiduciaries breached their duty of loyalty by deciding to replace the Vanguard Wellington Fund with investments in Fidelity's Freedom Funds out of a desire to benefit Fidelity or the plan's sponsor. The Eighth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling that the fiduciaries had breached their duties, but reversed the District Court's damages ruling. Id. at *958-59. The Eighth Circuit determined that the District Court had not performed a proper comparison between how the investments in the Freedom Funds had performed and how investments in alternative funds might have performed. The Eighth Circuit remanded the damages question with instructions for the District Court to reconsider that issue for itself, and not based upon a perception that its analysis was constrained by statements in the Eight Circuit's prior opinion in the case. In prior proceedings, the District Court had awarded more than $12.2 million in attorneys' fees for work through trial. Based upon its rulings on the initial remand, it reduced that award by $2.2 million. The District Court also awarded only two thirds of the amount of fees requested for work on the initial appeal, which totaled $900,000. Defendants argued on appeal for the second time that these awards were still too high. While the Eighth Circuit vacated and remanded the fee award for trial work, based on its remand of the underlying damage question, it did consider the fee award for appellate work. Because Defendants did not offer evidence to support alternative fee calculations, the Eight Circuit affirmed the award, finding that it was not an abuse of discretion. Id. at *961-62. Finally, the Eighth Circuit reversed the District Court's ruling that class representative's incentive awards should be paid by Defendants on top of other damages. Instead, the Eighth Circuit ruled that those awards should be paid out of the class' overall recovery. Id. at *962.

Waldbuesser, et al. v. Northrop Grumman Corp.*, Case No. 06-CV-6213 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 24, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former participants in the Northrop Grumman Savings Plan and Financial Security and Savings Program, moved for final approval of a class action settlement, attorneys' fees, reimbursement of expenses, and incentive awards. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motions, approving the settlement in the amount of $16.75 million for approximately 210,000 participants, and ordered payment of $5,583,333 in attorney fees, $1,159,114 in expenses, and $25,000 as an incentive award for the class representatives. The Court reasoned that it "has long been recognized that a private Plaintiff, or his attorney, whose efforts create, discover, increase or preserve a fund to which others also have a claim is entitled to recover from the fund the costs of his litigation, including attorneys' fees." Id. at 2. The Court noted that it had discretion to apply the lodestar method or the percentage-of-the-fund method in calculating a fee award. First, the Court held that an attorneys' fee award of one-third of the settlement fund was appropriate in this case. In making its determination regarding the fee award, the Court considered: "(i) the results obtained for the class; (ii) the effort expended by counsel; (iii) counsel's experience; (iv) the skill of counsel; (v) the complexity of the issues; (vi) the risk of non-payment assumed by counsel; (vii) the reaction of the class; and (viii) comparison with counsel's lodestar." Id. at 3. The Court held that the award was appropriate because: (i) the result obtained for the class was exceptional because the attorneys were able to obtain 40% of the class' net loss, after deducting the amount class counsel requested in fees; (ii) class counsel "expended significant effort on behalf of the class in prosecuting this action" by devoting 26,000 hours of attorney, paralegal, and law clerk time, spending 11 years on the case conducting numerous litigation tasks; (iii) the firm was "highly experienced in representing Plaintiffs in class action litigation, particularly ERISA class actions" due to it investigating and preparing 401(k) fiduciary breach cases for over ten years; (iv) "the prosecution and management of complex national class action requires unique legal skills and abilities;" (v) "ERISA 401(k) fiduciary breach class actions involve complex questions of law that have not been widely litigated to this point;" (vi) the firm assumed a great risk of non-payment and non-reimbursement of expenses by taking the case on a contingent basis; (vii) only 2 of the 300 class members that the firm had been in contact with objected to the firm's request for attorneys' fees; and (viii) it was reasonable even if the lodestar method were to be used in calculating the fees. Id. at 4-9. Second, the Court held that it was reasonable for class counsel to seek reimbursement of expenses in the amount of $1,159,114. The Court reasoned that reimbursement for expenses was proper because the expenses were for depositions, experts and consultants, filings, transcripts, subpoena services, mediation and settlement costs, copies, postage, phone, fax, data development and document organization, research and investigation, travel, lodging, parking, and in trial costs, which "are typically recoverable." Finally, the Court held that an incentive reward in the amount of $25,000 each for the four named Plaintiffs was proper. The Court reasoned that awarding the incentive payment was proper because most factors weighed in favor of doing so. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motions for settlement approval.

(iii) Breach Of Fiduciary Duty Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Hannan, et al. v. Hartford Financial Services*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 7436 (2d Cir. April 25, 2017). Plaintiffs appealed from a District Court judgment dismissing their ERISA claims pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim against Defendants Family Dollar Stores Inc., Family Dollar Stores Inc. Group Insurance Plan ("Plan"), and Plan Administrators (together, "Family Dollar "), and Hartford Financial Services, Inc. ("Hartford"). According to the complaint, Hartford issued a group life insurance policy to Family Dollar Stores Inc. under the Plan. The Plan automatically enrolled all employees in basic life insurance and offered them the option to purchase supplemental life insurance. Plaintiffs alleged in their complaint that they received enrollment materials representing that basic life insurance would be "non-contributory," indicating that Family Dollar would pay all costs, and supplemental life insurance would be "contributory," meaning that employees would be required to contribute toward the cost. Id. at *2. The enrollment materials also stated that all employees would receive basic life insurance "at no cost" and that the optional supplemental life insurance premiums were "surprisingly affordable" and "without high cost." Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs claimed this information materially misled them into thinking supplemental life insurance would be a prudent investment. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties and engaged in a prohibited transaction when they engaged in a "cross-subsidization" scheme to charge supplemental life insurance premiums at prices higher than warranted, that Family Dollar applied part of the employee-paid premiums toward its cost for basic life insurance, that Family Dollar benefited by avoiding the full cost of basic life insurance, that Hartford benefited by receiving the insurance contract, and that employees who bought supplemental life insurance were overcharged for premiums. Id. The District Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claims. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed on the basis that the complaint failed to plausibly allege that Hartford was a fiduciary under the ERISA, that Family Dollar made any fraudulent misrepresentations or omissions, or that Defendants engaged in a prohibited transaction. First, as to whether Hartford was a fiduciary, the Second Circuit reasoned that an "entity that negotiates a contract with an ERISA benefits plan at arm's length and has no other relationship to the plan, for example, is not a fiduciary with respect to the selection of the contract terms governing the plan, . . . because it "has no authority over or responsibility to the plan and presumably is unable to exercise any control over the Plan trustees' decision whether or not, and on what terms, to enter into an agreement with it." Id. at *6. The Second Circuit concluded that Plaintiffs' complaint identified only negotiations conducted by Hartford and did not allege that Hartford had or exercised any discretionary authority over the Plan or its assets, and therefore was insufficient to establish that Hartford was a Plan fiduciary. As a result, the Second Circuit also affirmed the dismissal of the related co-fiduciary claim against Family Dollar. As to the claim of material misrepresentations or omissions against Family Dollar, the Second Circuit concluded that the "non-contributory" statement was not false or misleading because Plaintiffs did not incur any costs for receiving basic life insurance. Id. at *8-9. The Second Circuit also reasoned that Family Dollar's failure to disclose that it would apply part of the employee premiums for supplemental life insurance toward its own cost for basic life insurance was not misleading because the enrollment materials accurately disclosed the cost that employees were required to pay for supplemental life insurance, and there was no obligation to disclose how premium proceeds would be applied. The Second Circuit further concluded that "surprisingly affordable" and "without high cost" statements were not false or misleading because the enrollment materials did not describe the cost of supplemental life insurance as involving favorable or below-market rates. Id. at *9. Finally, the Second Circuit held that the complaint failed to state a prohibited transaction claim against Family Dollar because working to minimize its cost of providing employees with basic and supplemental life insurance did not constitute a transfer for its own benefit or self-dealing.

Henderson, et al. v. Emory University,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 142411 (N.D. Ga. May 10, 2017). Plaintiffs, on behalf of participants and beneficiaries of employer-sponsored retirement plans (the "Plans"), alleged that the Plans' fiduciaries breached their fiduciary duties under the ERISA and engaged in prohibited transactions. Defendants moved to dismiss the six-count complaint. The Court granted the motion in part and dismissed it in part. In Count V, Plaintiffs plead the Plans' investment management fees were excessive and that the selection process for certain investment options was imprudent. Defendants argued the Court should dismiss this claim as the allegations did not evince that the fees were excessive nor that it was imprudent to retain the allegedly underperforming funds. The Court found the allegations that certain plan options charged excessive fees was sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss. The Court also allowed to survive the claim that the selection of funds offered by the Plans' record-keepers was imprudent and flawed, and the claim that the plans imprudently retained under performing funds after periods of underperformance and higher costs compared to similar options. The Court dismissed the claim that it was imprudent for the Plans to maintain 111 investment options, noting that "having too many options does not hurt the Plans' participants, but instead provides them opportunities to choose the investments that they prefer." Id. at *8. Count III alleged that the Plans charged unreasonable administrative fees. The Court denied this portion of the motion. It held that Plaintiffs stated a claim by alleging "the absence of competitive bidding for the record-keeping services was imprudent" and by alleging that Defendants failed "to monitor and mak[e] sure that the record-keepers charged appropriate fees and did not receive overpayments for their services." Id. at *19. Count I challenged the prudence of a specific investment option in the Plans. The Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss this count on timeliness grounds, but only to the extent it raised challenges as to this investment option from over six years before the filing of the lawsuit. The Court allowed to proceed as timely any claim within the past six years that challenged the prudence of the decision to maintain this option in the Plans. The Court last addressed Counts II, IV and VI, which alleged that Defendants acted disloyally and engaged in prohibited transactions by agreeing to "lock-in" certain funds as Plan options. Id. at *20. The Court found the loyalty claims sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss. Defendants argued this claim was time-barred. The Court found this contention premature, noting that at the motion to dismiss stage it could not assess when the alleged prohibited transaction occurred. The Court further held as premature the arguments relating to whether certain actors were parties in interest (except to find that a mutual fund was not a party in interest) and whether certain conduct rose to the level of prohibited transactions. The Court also found premature a decision on whether any prohibited transaction exemptions exempted the challenged conduct.

Jacobs, et al. v. Verizon Communications, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 162703 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 28, 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendants: (i) breached their fiduciary duties in violation of the ERISA by providing 401(k) plans that were overly complex, overly risky, and layered with excessive fees; (ii) failed to monitor investment options offered to participants; and (iii) failed to disclose sufficient information to enable participants to effectively manage their accounts and exercise their rights under the Plans and the ERISA. Defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. Id. at *2-3. Defendants argued that Plaintiff failed to plead facts sufficient to demonstrate that the offered investment choices were imprudent, that the fees for those funds were excessive, or that the disclosures regarding those funds were inadequate. The Court held that Plaintiff's assertion that Defendants breached their fiduciary duty by including "risky" investment options was insufficient to maintain a claim, because the ERISA does not require fiduciaries to include any particular mix of investment vehicles in their plan, and the inclusion of "risky" investment options is not per se imprudent. Id. at *15. Further, the Court held that Plaintiff could not maintain a claim for breach of the duty of prudence because Plaintiff did not allege self-interest and made only hindsight allegations that other funds "fared better" than those offered by Defendants. Id. at *19. However, the Court held that Plaintiff could maintain a claim that Defendants breached their duty to monitor the performance of an investment option ("fund") in the Plan, based on Plaintiff's allegations that: (i) Defendants continued offering "a fund that had wildly under-performed its benchmark over a ten-year period" as a "core asset;" (ii) the fund "also barely surpassed the return of a money market investment, which offered much less risk;" and (iii) the fund featured an expense ratio higher than any other investment option available to participants despite its poor performance. Id. at *25-26. Third, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's claims that Defendants failed to make sufficient disclosures to participants, because an "ERISA fiduciary has no duty to disclose to plan participants information additional to that required" by the ERISA, and Defendants had made all disclosures actually required by the statute and regulations. Id. at *36-37. Finally, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's allegation that the Defendants misrepresented information regarding the record-keeper's compensation on the Plan's Form 5500 annual report. The Court found that Plaintiff lacked standing to bring this claim because Plaintiff had "no legally protected interest" in a plan's Form 5500. Id. at *40. Furthermore, Plaintiff's claim relating to Form 5500 also would not be successful because Plaintiff did not assert "that she relied on the allegedly inaccurate Form 5500." Id. at *42. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's complaint in part, but allowed Plaintiff to proceed with claims regarding Defendants failure to monitor investment options.

Johnson, et al. v. Fujitsu Technology & Business Of America, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73132 (N.D. Cal. April 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former participants in the Fujitsu Group Defined Contribution and 401(k) Plan ("Plan"), filed a class action against the Plan fiduciaries, including its Administrative Committee, Investment Committee, Plan Sponsor Fujitsu Technology and Business of America, Inc. and former Plan Administrator Shepherd Kaplan. Plaintiffs alleged the Plan was the most expensive "mega plan" in the country in 2013 and 2014, with significantly higher record-keeping expenses than similarly-sized plans. Plaintiffs also alleged that Fujitsu received payments of $100,000 per year to oversee the Plan, and that the fiduciaries failed to obtain the least expensive share class of mutual funds offering in the Plan. Plaintiffs further asserted that Fujitsu failed to investigate or consider other lower-priced investment options, and that it was a fiduciary breach for the fiduciaries to retain Shepherd Kaplan to design the Plan's target date funds, which were alleged to be imprudent. Plaintiffs amended their initial complaint, and Defendants moved to dismiss the second amended complaint. The Court denied the motion to dismiss. First, on Defendants' argument that Plaintiffs' claims were time-barred under the ERISA's three-year statute of limitations, the Court found that at this early stage in the case, it could not make a factual finding that Plaintiffs "must or could have known of the transaction at issue on the date of the issuance of the relevant Form 5500." Id. at *8. The Court also rejected Defendants' arguments that Plaintiffs lacked standing to bring claims regarding investment options in which they did not invest; the Court explained that those issues would be resolved in addressing the adequacy of Plaintiffs as class representatives. Regarding Plaintiffs' breach of fiduciary duty and failure to monitor claims against the Plan Sponsor and Committees, the Court opined that Plaintiffs' allegations stated plausible claims for relief. As to the breach of fiduciary duty of prudence and loyalty as to Shepherd Kaplan, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' allegations regarding Plan expenses greatly exceeding those of similar-sized plans were sufficient to state a claim, and the Court declined to limit its liability to the period during which it was named as the Plan Administrator, noting that the complaint alleged that its breaches continued to harm the Plan.

Kelly, et al. v. Johns Hopkins University*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 161547 (D. Md. Sept. 28, 2017). In this putative class action, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant violated the ERISA in connection with its 403(b) pension plan by failing to manage the plan for the exclusive benefit of the participants and beneficiaries. The Court granted in part, and denied in part, Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's claims that Defendant violated §§ 404 and 406 of the ERISA. The Court noted that this case was similar to many cases filed across the country "by the same counsel who bring virtually identical claims to the ones in the instant action." Id. at *2. In its decision, the Court relied on four recently issued decisions, including Henderson v. Emory University, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 142411 (N.D. Ga. May 10, 2017); Clark v. Duke University, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 164370 (M.D.N.C. May 11, 2017); Sacardote v. New York University, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 137115 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 25, 2017); and Sweda v. University of Pennsylvania, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 153958 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 21, 2017). These four cases similarly addressed motions to dismiss in relation to the same issues of university pension plans. First, persuaded by Henderson, Sacerdote, and Swada, the Court held that allegations "that offering Plan participants too many investment options is imprudent" and "that including higher-cost share classes in the Plan, instead of available lower-cost share classes of the same funds, is imprudent" failed to state a claim. Id. Second, relying on Henderson, Sacerdote, and Clark, the Court held that allegations that "a university offering actively managed funds was imprudent" and that a prudent fiduciary "would have chosen fewer record-keepers and run a competitive bidding process for the record-keeping services" were sufficient to constitute claims of a breach of fiduciary duty. Id. at *3-4. Third, by relying on the reasons set forth in Henderson and Clark, the Court held that Plaintiffs could not bring "prohibited transaction claims as to mutual funds included in the Plan." Id. at *4. Fourth, persuaded by reasons set forth in Henderson and Sacerdote, the Court held that "allegations that revenue sharing from a mutual fund is a prohibited transaction under 29 U.S.C. § 1106(a)(1)(D) fail to state a claim." Id. at *4-5.

Pioneer Centres Holding Co. ESOP & Trust, et al. v. Alerus Financial, N.A.*, 858 F.3d 1324 (10th Cir. 2017). In this action stemming from the failure of a proposed sale of stock to an employee stock ownership plan ("Plaintiff" or "the Plan"), the Tenth Circuit affirmed a decision granting summary judgment for Defendant on Plaintiff's breach of fiduciary duty claims under the ERISA. The Plan sponsor, who was not a party to the action, was a company that owned and operated car dealerships. Id. at 1327. In 2009, the company's owners, who also acted as the Plan's trustees, proposed a stock transaction that would make the Plan the 100% owner of the company. Id. Due to the fact that the named trustees' interests were adverse to the Plan's interests relative to the proposed transaction, Defendant was hired to act as a "transactional trustee" to manage the transfer of the owner-trustees' stock to the Plan. Id. The company's dealership agreement prohibited it from making any ownership changes without approval from the manufacturer, who indicated it was unlikely to approve 100% Plan ownership. Id. When one of the owner-trustees subsequently refused to make unqualified representations in the transaction documents, Defendant determined that the Plan should not proceed with the purchase. Id. at 1333. The company later sold the shares it had proposed to sell to the Plan to another party for more than $10 million above what the Plan would have paid, at which point the Plan sued Defendant, in its role as transactional trustee, for breach of fiduciary duty for preventing the original transaction. The District Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, finding that, even if the Plan could prove Defendant breached its fiduciary duties, the Plan could not establish that the breach caused a loss, since there was nothing more than speculative evidence that the manufacturer would have ever approved the proposed deal and allowed the sale to the Plan to be consummated. Id. at 1332. On appeal to the Tenth Circuit, the Plan argued that the District Court erred by requiring the Plan to prove causation, rather than shifting the burden to Defendant and that, even if it properly bore the burden of proving causation, it presented sufficient evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact on that element. Id. The Tenth Circuit rejected the Plan's argument and found that the District Court correctly determined that the Plan, as Plaintiff, bore the burden of proof as to all elements of its prima facie case. Id. at 1335-36. The Tenth Circuit further found that the undisputed evidence in the case demonstrated that the manufacturer consistently opposed any change in the company's ownership structure that gave a majority of control to an ESOP. Id. at 1338. The Tenth Circuit held that, in light of this evidence, no reasonable fact-finder could rule in the Plan's favor. Id. at 1339-40. While the Plan argued that the manufacturer's refusal to approve the transaction would have violated state law, the Tenth Circuit found that the manufacturer maintained its position even after the Plan informed it of the potential illegality, and that the Plan therefore could not rely on an assumption that the manufacturer would have followed the law, and determined that the Plan could not establish that Defendant's actions prevented the transaction. Accordingly, the Tenth Circuit affirmed summary judgment for the Defendant.

Price, et al. v. Strianese*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 165450 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, participants in L-3 Communications Corp.'s retirement savings plan, brought a class action alleging that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties of prudence under the ERISA because they knew or should have known that L-3's share price was artificially inflated, but did nothing to protect participants from the allegedly imprudent investment in the stock. Defendants move to dismiss the complaint pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6), and the Court granted Defendants' motion. It held that Plaintiff failed to plausibly allege that Defendants knew or should have known that the L-3 stock had become an imprudent investment. The Court held further that even if Plaintiffs had adequately alleged that the Defendants knew or should have known that the L-3 stock had become an imprudent investment, Plaintiffs had not alleged a duty of prudence claim because they had failed to plausibly allege "an alternative action that the Defendant could have taken that would have been consistent with the securities laws and that a prudent fiduciary in the same circumstances would not have viewed as more likely to harm the fund than to help it." Id. at *15. The Court stated that this standard is "incredibly difficult to satisfy." Id. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' alleged alternative investments, stating that halting investment in L-3 stock or issuing a corrective disclosure were not plausible because both could further damage the stock price, and that Plaintiffs' alleged hedge was not plausible because Plaintiffs had not identified any actual hedge.

Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe, et al. v. Blue Cross Blue Shield*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109366 (E.D. Mich. July 14, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action asserting that Defendant, the plan's third-party administrator of health benefits, breached its fiduciary duties to the plan by charging hidden fees associated with its management of the plan. On the parties' respective cross-motions for partial summary judgment, the Court noted that the Sixth Circuit's decision in Hi-Lex Controls, Inc. v. Blue Cross Blue Shield of Michigan, 751 F.3d 740 (6th Cir. 2014), conclusively had established Defendant's liability as an ERISA fiduciary for charging hidden fees. Thus, two questions were before the Court, including: (i) whether the plan at issue was governed by the ERISA (if it was, there was no issue as to liability); and (ii) whether Defendant violated its duties to the plan. The Court answered the first question in the negative because the plan was established to provide coverage to tribal members, not employees. Thus, the plan did not meet the definition of an ERISA plan. The Court also concluded that Defendant did not breach any fiduciary duties because the alleged wrongdoing, which centered on negotiation of fees to service providers, was not a fiduciary function. Rather, following Sixth Circuit precedent, the Court held that negotiation of fees constituted a business decision that had an effect on an ERISA plan not subject to fiduciary standards.

Sweda, et al. v. University Of Pennsylvania*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 153958 (E.D. Pa. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of participants and beneficiaries in the University of Pennsylvania Matching Plan, brought a lawsuit against the University of Pennsylvania and its Vice President of Human Resources. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants violated the ERISA when they allegedly breached their fiduciary duty and engaged in prohibited transactions by enabling third-party service providers to collect excessive fees, increased costs by including duplicative investments in the Plan, and retained under performing funds in the Plan." Id. at *2. More specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that: (i) Defendants breached their fiduciary duty by "locking in" Plan investment options into two investment companies; (ii) the administrative services and fees were unreasonably high due to Defendants' failure to seek competitive bids to decrease administrative costs; (ii) the fiduciaries charged unnecessary fees while the portfolio underperformed; and (iv) the plan administrators engaged in prohibited transactions by paying third-party providers and receiving services form the providers. Id. at *3. The Court held that Plaintiffs' allegations were insufficient to support a breach of fiduciary duty claim. First, the Court reasoned that Plaintiffs' allegation that Defendants "locked in" the plan to specific third-party providers was "insufficient to create a plausible inference that this was a breach of fiduciary duty," noting that locking in rates and plans is a common practice used across the business and personal world." Id. at *19. Second, the Court found that the fact that the third-party providers "operated as their own record-keepers" was also insufficient to establish a breach of fiduciary duty. Id. at *21. The Court opined that it was "not inconsistent with lawful, free market behavior in the best interest of those involved, including beneficiaries" for the third-party providers to bundle their services by operating as their own record-keepers. Id. Third, noting that Plaintiffs did not plead that "there was no reasonable alternatives given to plan participants to choose from," the Court held that allegations that "the plan administrators breached their fiduciary duty by allowing record-keepers to charge 'excessive asset based' fees rather than cheaper 'per-participant fees'" were insufficient to maintain a claim. Id. at *22, 24. The Court reasoned that while a fiduciary is required to "discharge his duties with respect to a plan solely in the interest of the participants and beneficiaries as a whole," a Court cannot "second-guess how fiduciaries allocate that cost." Id. at *24. Fourth, the Court determined that allegations that there were unnecessary fees, participant confusion, and poor market performance were insufficient to maintain a claim of breach of fiduciary duty. The Court held that claiming that there were "unnecessary or duplicative" fees was insufficient because Plaintiffs did not plead that "reductions in expenses could be achieved without changing the variety of benefits to participants." Id. at *26. The Court also found that there was no participant confusion because "providing 78 different investment options satisfied the reasonable mix and range of investment options . . . without being unduly overwhelming." Id. at *28. Further, because only seven more funds under performed than what would be expected, which is generally about half of funds, the claim of breach of fiduciary duty did not cross the line "from conceivable to plausible." Id. at *30. Finally, the Court rejected Plaintiffs' argument that the plan administrator payments to the third-party providers and the providers' services constituted "prohibited transactions" under the ERISA because, as a matter of law, the transactions "were not done to benefit other parties at the expense of the plans' participants and beneficiaries but were simply operating expenses necessary to operate the plan on behalf of the plan beneficiaries." Id. at *32-33.

Tracey, et al. v. Massachusetts Institute Of Technology*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 165070 (D. Mass. Oct. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of participants in the MIT Supplemental 401(k) Plan, brought various claims under the ERISA relating to the investment management and record-keeping fees paid to Fidelity Investments, the Plan's record-keeper and primary investment provider. Defendants moved to dismiss. The Court adopted the report and recommendation of the Magistrate Judge, granting the motion in part. Count I alleged that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties of prudence and loyalty by providing investment options for plan participants that charged higher investment management fees than other identical and available options. The Court dismissed Plaintiffs' breach of loyalty claim because it was wholly speculative, since Plaintiffs had not alleged any facts showing that Fidelity and MIT were acting together in selecting investment options. The Court permitted Plaintiffs' claim of breach of the duty of prudence related to investment management fees to proceed. It noted that if identical investment options with lower fees were available but not selected, this would have constituted a breach. Count II alleged that Defendants overpaid Fidelity for record-keeping. The Court dismissed the breach of loyalty component of this claim because Plaintiffs' allegations did not rise above mere speculation. The Court, however, allowed the breach of prudence component to proceed. The Court found Defendants' argument that an ERISA fiduciary need not solicit competitive bids for fees unpersuasive and concluded that Plaintiffs had pled sufficient facts to make this claim plausible. Count III alleged that the overpayment of investment management and record-keeping fees constituted a prohibited transaction under the ERISA. This count involved claims under both § 1106(a)(1)(D) regarding the distribution of plan assets to a party in interest and § 1106(a)(1)(C) regarding the furnishing of good or services to a party in interest. The Court concluded that the 1106(a)(1)(D) claim failed because Plaintiffs had not pled that Defendants subjectively intended to benefit Fidelity as a party-in-interest. The Court denied Defendants' motion with respect to the 1106(a)(1)(C) claim, but only to the extent it related to investments in non-mutual funds. The Court reasoned that § 1002(21)(B) exempts mutual funds from liability under that provision so Count III failed with respect to investments in mutual funds. Finally, Count IV alleged that Defendants breached their duties to monitor other fiduciaries. The Court noted that these claims were derivative of Plaintiffs' other claims.

White, et al. v. Chevron Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 83474 (N.D. Cal. May 31, 2017). In this ERISA class action, participants in the Chevron Employee Savings Investment Plan (the "Plan"), alleged that Defendants breached their ERISA fiduciary duties by failing to select investment options with higher returns and lower fees. Id. at *10. The Court dismissed Plaintiffs' ERISA claims for failure to state a claim. Id. at *71. In analyzing Plaintiffs' breach of the duty of loyalty claim, the Court found that Plaintiffs' complaint contained only "summary and conclusory" allegations that Defendants "imprudently and disloyally" selected specific funds. Id. at *20-21. The Court also dismissed Plaintiffs' claims that Defendants breached the duty of loyalty in connection with selecting Vanguard as the Plan's record-keeper. Id. at *25. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants retained Vanguard as a record-keeper, because Vanguard, a Chevron shareholder, regularly voted in Chevron's favor on shareholder resolutions. Id. at *24. However, the Court found that absent facts showing Plan fiduciaries were aware of Vanguard's voting position, Plaintiffs' allegations were merely speculative. Id. at *25. The Court also considered Plaintiffs' claims that Defendants breached the duty of prudence by investing in a money market fund rather than a stable value fund to satisfy the Plan's low-risk fund requirement. Id. at *28. The Court dismissed this claim, finding that Plaintiffs failed to allege facts showing that Defendants did not adequately evaluate the risks and benefits of selecting the money market fund over other low-risk options. Id. at *29. In addition, the Court discounted facts that related to the performance of money market and stable value funds during the period at issue because Plaintiffs' arguments based on these metrics rested on hindsight. Id. The Court further dismissed Plaintiffs' claims that Defendants breached the duty of prudence by selecting certain higher-cost retail-class funds when lower-cost institutional-class funds were available. Id. at *44. The Court held that the availability of allegedly lower-priced funds alone could not support a breach of the duty or prudence claim. Id. at *45. Plaintiffs' complaint addressed only the availability of lower-priced funds and did not contain allegations that Defendants failed to make their selections through a reasoned decision-making process. Id. at *40, 44. In addition, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' breach of the duty of prudence claims alleging that Defendants' asset-based revenue-sharing arrangement with Vanguard for its record-keeping expenses caused the Plan to pay excessive administrative fees. Id. at *57. The Court determined that Plaintiffs failed to allege facts showing that the "Plan fiduciaries should have anticipated an increase in Plan assets such that asset-based fees should have been abandoned." Id. at *57. The Court also found that the claims related to the administrative fees were time-barred because Plaintiffs received notice of the challenged fee arrangement in February 2012 when Chevron issued a detailed disclosure explaining that the Plan would shift from the revenue-sharing fee to a flat fee arrangement. Id. at *58-60. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claim that Defendants breached the duty of prudence by delaying the removal of an "under-performing fund." Id. at *66.

The Court held that Plaintiffs relied solely on the fund's purportedly poor performance to support their claim, but again failed to allege necessary facts showing that the fiduciaries failed to conduct an adequate investigation when they selected the fund or as they observed its performance. Id. at *64-66. Turning from Plaintiffs' breach of the duty of prudence claims, the Court assessed Plaintiffs' allegations that Defendants violated § 1106 when they engaged Vanguard to serve as record-keeper in 2012. The Court stated that the claim was time-barred by the ERISA's six-year statute of repose and it rejected Plaintiffs' arguments that an on-going duty to monitor applied to § 1106 transactions. Id. at *68-69. The Court reasoned that § 1106 violations occur at a singular point in time and it concluded "it makes no sense to assert a claim of duty to monitor a past occurrence." Id. at *70.

(iv) Damages Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Knowlton, et al. v. Anheuser-Busch Co. Pension Plan,* 849 F.3d 422 (8th Cir. 2017). Former salaried employees of a subsidiary of Anheuser-Busch Co. LLC brought suit against the Anheuser-Busch Co. Pension Plan under § 502(a)(1)(B) of the ERISA, seeking enhanced pension benefits under the terms of the Plan. The Plan stated that an employee would receive enhanced benefits in the form of five years of additional service credit, if within three years of a "change in control," his or her "employment with the Controlled Group is involuntarily terminated." Id. at 425. The parties did not dispute that a "change of control" occurred when Anheuser-Busch combined with or was acquired and became Anheuser-Bucsh InBev, N.V. Id. Shortly thereafter, the new entity sold the subsidiary for which Plaintiffs worked. Plaintiffs submitted claims under the Plan's claim procedures, arguing that the subsidiary sale constituted an involuntary termination from the Controlled Group of Co. and that they were thus entitled to enhanced pension benefits. The plan administrator denied the claims, interpreting the enhanced benefit provision to require an actual break in employment, rather than a change in the owner employing the individual during a period of continuous employment. After Plaintiffs filed suit, the Sixth Circuit issued an opinion in Adams v. Anheuser-Busch Co., 758 F.3d 743 (6th Cir. 2014), a separate case involving the same provision of the Plan.. Based on that opinion, Plaintiffs moved for judgment on the pleadings. Applying the Sixth Circuit's reasoning, the District Court granted the motion, concluding that the administrator abused its discretion in denying Plaintiffs' claims. It ordered the plan administrator to pay enhanced benefits and denied Plaintiffs' request that it calculate and award benefits. The Plan appealed the decision. Plaintiffs cross-appealed the District Court's decisions not to calculate and award benefits owed. Plaintiffs also moved to dismiss the appeal for lack of jurisdiction because the District Court had not issued a final order by calculating benefits owed. The Eighth Circuit found that the District Court had issued a final order because it determined liability and ordered declaratory relief, purporting to address and resolve all issues in the case. The Eighth Circuit then upheld the District Court's finding that the plan administrator abused its discretion in denying Plaintiffs' claim for benefits. It reasoned that the plan administrator could not reasonably have interpreted the enhanced benefit provision to preclude an award of enhanced benefits to Plaintiffs, thereby echoing the Sixth Circuit's analysis. With respect to Plaintiffs' cross-appeal, the Eighth Circuit reversed the District Court, holding that Plaintiffs had made a sufficient request for an actual award of enhanced benefits in addition to a request for declaratory relief. It remanded the case to the District Court with instructions to calculate and award benefits owed, and to reconsider whether discovery should be compelled to assist with the calculation.

(v) Discovery Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Wildman, et al. v. American Century Services*, LLC, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 140666 (W.D. Mo. July 27, 2017). In this putative class action brought under the ERISA by two former participants in an employer sponsored 401(k) plan, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties of loyalty and prudence and acted in their own self-interest by almost exclusively limiting the investment options available to Plan participants to mutual funds offered by the Plan sponsor. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to compel production of reports created under provisions of the Investment Company Act (known as 15(c) reports) which related to the performance, expense, and profitability of certain Plan investment options. Plaintiffs argued that the reports were relevant to Defendants' motive for including the mutual funds as investment options, and that the data contained in them was relevant to calculation of damages by Plaintiffs' expert. Defendants opposed Plaintiffs' motion, arguing that the reports sought were not relevant, that producing the reports would be unduly burdensome, and the request was disproportionate to the needs of the case because the Plan's investment committee did not rely on the reports in making decisions regarding which investment option to include and because Plaintiffs' expert had already been able to calculate damages without the reports. Plaintiff argued that production would not be unduly burdensome because federal law required the reports to be maintained, and that the requests were proportional because Defendants alone had access to the data. Defendants responded that the reports were not their records, but those of the individual mutual funds; that production would require manual review of approximately 72,600 pages of documents, which was expected to take hundreds of hours; and that the funds' performance and fee information was publicly available and already otherwise produced in discovery. Noting that Plaintiffs' motion to compel was more narrowly defined than their original discovery request, the Court found that Plaintiffs had made a threshold showing of relevance under Rule 26, and that Defendants had not sufficiently demonstrated that production would pose an undue burden or be disproportionate to the needs of the case. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to compel, and ordered production of the 15(c) reports.

(vi) DOL And PBGC ERISA Enforcement Litigation

U.S. Department Of Labor v. AEU Benefits LLC,* Case No. 17-CV-7931 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 3, 2017). The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") moved for an ex parte temporary restraining order ("TRO") and preliminary injunction to enjoin Defendants "from causing further harm to the AEU Holdings, LLC Employee Benefit Plan ("AEU Plan") and all welfare plans covered by" the ERISA. Id. at 1. The Court granted the motion and entered a 14-day TRO. Id. at 14. The Court held that granting the TRO was proper because the DOL had "shown a reasonable likelihood of success on the merits of the ERISA claims, irreparable harm absent this injunction, and the balance of harm to the parties and the public interest weighed in favor of an injunction." Id. at 1. Accordingly, the Court ordered that Defendants and "anyone acting on their behalf, including their officers, agents, employees, assigns, subsidiaries, affiliates, service providers, accountants, and attorneys" be removed as and enjoined from acting as fiduciaries, service providers, trustees, and administrators of the AEU Plan or Participating Plans, and be enjoined from moving the AEU Plan's assets or the Participating Plans' assets, except at the direction of an independent fiduciary appointed by the Court. Id. at 2-3. The Court further ordered Defendants to notify the independent fiduciary of trust accounts, bank accounts, and receipts of monies relating to the AEU Plan or the Participating Plans. The Court also enjoined Defendants from disposing any assets of the Participating Plans materials or the AEU Plan, and from destroying or changing the Participating Plans' materials or the AEU Plan's documents, books, records, or electronic files, and to provide these to the independent fiduciary. It also ordered that the independent fiduciary be transitioned into its role as the full fiduciary and successor Trustee and Plan Administrator of the AEU Plan's administration, and having the full authority to act as such. Finally, the Court ordered that the independent fiduciary fully cooperate with the DOL "in the exercise of … enforcement responsibilities under the ERISA." Id. at 10. The Court reasoned that this was proper because the DOL showed that "immediate and irreparable injury, loss, or damage will result to the movant, the Participating Plans and the AEU Plan and their participants . . . before the adverse party can be heard in opposition." Id. at 13. The Court held that the irreparable injury justifying the TRO was "the continued incurrence of unpaid medical claims of the Participating Plans' and the AEU Plan's participants and to prevent the dissipation of the Participating Plans' assets and AEU Plan's assets to service providers and to accounts in Bermuda." Id. The Court decided this was irreparable because the funds were being distributed to both known and unknown sources, including accounts in Bermuda.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Belanger,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71101 (E.D. Pa. May 10, 2017). The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") initiated this action alleging that fiduciaries of various employer-sponsored 401(k) plans breached their ERISA fiduciary duties in administering and managing the plans. Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint. The Court denied Defendants' motion. The DOL alleged that Defendants mixed plan assets with general corporate assets and failed to disclose all fees charged to plan participants in government filings. In moving to dismiss, Defendants argued that the claims were time-barred under the ERISA's six year limitations period, as the initial breaches occurred more than six years before the DOL filed the lawsuit. The Court rejected this argument. The Court found that as the transfer of plan assets from two different plans to a corporate account occurred within six years of the lawsuit's filing, those claims were not time-barred. Likewise, the Court held that the claim that Defendants failed to properly disclose expenses in government filings were timely asserted within six years of the lawsuit's filing.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Preston*, 873 F.3d 877 (11th Cir. 2017). In this interlocutory appeal, the Eleventh Circuit determined that the ERISA's statute of repose was waivable pursuant to an express agreement between the parties. The U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") had brought an action against Defendant, the owner and CEO of TPP Holdings. TPP Holdings established an ESOP to provide retirement income for TPP's employees. Id. at 879. The DOL brought an ERISA action against the Plan's trustee for allegedly breaching his fiduciary duties and engaging in prohibited self-dealing when he knowingly caused the Plan to purchase his own TPP stock at an inflated price. Id. Prior to filing suit, the parties unsuccessfully attempted to negotiate a settlement. While the negotiations were on-going, the parties entered into various tolling agreements. Id. One day before the expiration of the tolling period, but after six years from the date of the alleged wrongdoing, the DOL filed its action. Defendants moved to dismiss on the ground that all claims were foreclosed by the ERISA's statute of repose, which Defendants asserted was not waivable. Id. at 880. The District Court agreed that the tolling agreements were invalid and unenforceable, and subsequently it dismissed the action. Id. On appeal, the DOL asserted "that the District Court's 'categorical' rule that statutes of repose cannot be waived contradicts governing precedent, which instead requires a determination whether the applicable time-bar is 'jurisdictional.'" Id. The Eleventh Circuit held that the ERISA's six-year statute of repose was not jurisdictional because the ERISA does not contain the clear textual indication required to characterize the time-bar limitation as such. Id. at 882. The Eleventh Circuit also held that, contrary to Defendant's argument, there was well-established precedent that statutes of repose are subject to express waiver. As a result, it rejected Defendant's comparison to equitable tolling. Id. at 886. The Eleventh Circuit thus answered the interlocutory appeal in the affirmative, finding that the ERISA's statute of response was waivable by express agreement of the parties.

(vii) ERISA 401(k) Class Actions

Brotherston, et al. v. Putnam Investments, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48223 (D. Mass. Mar. 30, 2017). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant loaded its 401(k) plan exclusively with its own mutual funds, without investigating whether plan participants would be better served by investments managed by unaffiliated companies. On behalf of a class of participants in Defendant's 401(k) plan, Plaintiffs accused Defendant of violating the ERISA's prohibited transaction rules, which bars plan fiduciaries from transacting with interested parties and from handling plan assets for their own benefit. Following a hearing – based on a largely undisputed record where there are minimal factual disputes – on the prohibited transactions claims, the Court ruled that the allegations against Defendant did not constitute a violation of the ERISA's prohibited transaction rules. The Court explained that: (i) management and servicing fees were paid out of mutual fund assets rather than plan assets and therefore the fees did not constitute a plan asset; (ii) comparing Defendant's actively managed mutual fund fees to Vanguard's passively managed index fund fees "compares apples to oranges" and therefore Plaintiffs failed to carry their burden that Defendant's fees were unreasonable; and (iii) as to a number of the investment funds at issue, Plaintiffs' claims were barred by the three-year statute of limitations because all of the relevant information was clearly disclosed in the Plan's enrollment kit and therefore Plaintiffs had actual knowledge of these issues. Id. at *17-18. Accordingly, the Court entered judgment in favor of Defendant.

Brotherston, et al. v. Putnam Investments, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93654 (D. Mass. June 19, 2017). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant acted imprudently and breached its fiduciary duties under the ERISA by putting Defendant-affiliated funds in its 401(k) plan when other large retirement plans on the market did not include these types of funds. Plaintiffs, a class of participants in Defendant's 401(k) plan, alleged that this comparison was evidence that the funds were chosen not for their intrinsic merit, but because they earned fees for Defendant. After a seven-day bench trial, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to identify any specific circumstances in which Defendant put its own interests ahead of Plaintiffs. Specifically, the Court explained that the prudence of the plan's investments should be measured against what a prudent investor would do in Defendant's shoes, and therefore it was irrelevant whether Defendant's competitors invested in Defendant's funds. The Court also concluded that Plaintiffs failed to show how Defendant's allegedly imprudent actions – which included failing to monitor plan investments and remove those that were imprudent – caused Plaintiffs losses. The Court adopted a burden-shifting framework, which mandated that, after an ERISA fiduciary is shown to have breached its duties, the legal burden shifts to the fiduciary to show that the breach was harmless. Under this analysis, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to show a loss in the first instance and that their fiduciary breach claim also failed for this reason. Accordingly, the Court entered judgment in favor of Defendant.

Creamer, et al. v. Starwood Hotels & Resorts Worldwide*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 169115 (C.D. Cal. May 1, 2017). In a putative class action brought on behalf of participants in an employer-sponsored 401(k) plan alleging that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties under the ERISA, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants failed to ensure reasonable record-keeping and administrative fees, failed to offer a stable value fund, failed to follow participants' investment instructions, failed to provide adequate disclosures regarding revenue sharing, and failed to exclude an investment option that allegedly charged excessive fees. The Court dismissed as time-barred the claim relating to the investment option that allegedly charged excessive fees, finding that Plaintiffs had actual knowledge of this claim more than three years prior to filing suit. The Court denied Defendants' statute of limitations defense regarding the remaining claims, as it was not apparent when Plaintiffs learned of these claims. Hence, the Court denied the remainder of the motion. The Court also held that Plaintiffs stated a viable claim that Defendants failed to ensure reasonable record-keeping and administrative fees. The Court, however, ruled that Plaintiff could amend the dismissed claims to attempt to address their deficiencies.

Insinga, et al. v. United Of Omaha Life Insurance Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 178753 (D. Neb. Oct. 26, 2017). Plaintiff, a participant in the Safe Auto Insurance Co. 401(k) Plan, brought a class action against Defendant, United of Omaha Life Insurance Co., which provided investment services under the Plan, alleging that: (i) Defendant breached its fiduciary duty of loyalty by setting a guaranteed interest rate for its own benefit, retaining the spread, and charging excessive fees; and (ii) Defendant engaged in prohibited transactions in its capacity as a party-in-interest. Specifically, Plaintiff alleged Defendant's guaranteed account – which purported to be a conservative retirement investment that safeguards principal and guarantees interest – was a misnomer, because it provided no guaranteed minimum rate of return and Defendant had discretion to change the interest rate unilaterally and did so in a way that allowed it to reap profits that consistently dwarfed the returns received by investors. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant was an ERISA fiduciary because, by setting the contract's monthly interest rate, it had discretion to set its own compensation. Defendant brought a motion to dismiss. The Court dismissed Plaintiff's breach of fiduciary duty claim because it found Defendant was not a fiduciary. The Court concluded that the connection between compensation and setting interest rates was "too attenuated" to give Defendant discretion over its own compensation. Id. at *10-11. In addition, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's prohibited transaction claim. Plaintiff was seeking an accounting for profits that Defendant received from the allegedly prohibited actions and the Court found Plaintiff did not meet the requirements for a constructive trust as an equitable remedy because the money was comingled among Defendant's general funds.

Lorenz, et al. v. Safeway, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35731 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 13, 2017). Plaintiff, on behalf of a proposed class of participants in Safeway's 401(k) plan, alleged that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties by selecting investment options that had higher fees than other available funds and that superior performance did not justify the higher fees, and that Defendants caused the plan record-keeper to receive excessive compensation through a revenue-sharing arrangement. Plaintiff also claimed that the plan's revenue sharing arrangement with the record-keeper constituted a prohibited transaction with the record-keeper under the ERISA. After concluding that Plaintiff had standing to sue because he did not allege merely technical violations of the ERISA, the Court addressed Defendants' arguments that the lawsuit was untimely. The Court found that the breach of fiduciary duty claims were timely because Defendants had an on-going duty to insure that the funds selected for the plan were appropriate. Therefore, the claims were not untimely simply because the funds had been selected more than six years before the suit was filed. Id. at *16. The Court also rejected the argument that mandatory fee disclosures were sufficient to put the Plaintiff on notice of his claim so as to trigger the ERISA's three-year "actual knowledge" statute of limitations. Id. at *17. In contrast, the Court found that the prohibited transaction claim as to the engagement of the record-keeper was untimely because the fee disclosures and other materials issued by the plan administrator put Plaintiff on notice of the fact that the claim was more than three years before he filed suit. Id. at *18-19. Turning to Defendants' argument that the complaint failed to state a plausible breach of fiduciary duty claim, the Court noted that it was not enough to simply allege that the fiduciaries had not offered the least expensive funds available. However, the Court found that Plaintiff offered enough factual support to make it plausible that the fiduciaries' selection process was flawed. Id. at *23-38. With respect to Plaintiff's attack on the revenue sharing compensation of the record-keeper, the Court found sufficient facts to support a plausible claim that the record-keeper received excessive compensation. Id. at *48.

Main, et al. v. American Airlines, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96924 (N.D. Tex. Mar. 31, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action suit under the ERISA alleging that Defendants violated their fiduciary duties of loyalty and prudence. AMR Corp., American Airlines' parent company, created a line of mutual funds that were managed by another subsidiary of AMR Corp. This fund manager was later renamed American Beacon Advisors, Inc. in 2005 and the mutual funds were American Beacon Funds. Id. at *4. AMR Corp. sold American Beacon Advisors, Inc. in 2008 to Lighthouse Holdings, Inc. As a part of this deal, AMR Corp. received an equity stake in Lighthouse Holdings, Inc. Plaintiffs argued that this sale was premised on American Airlines' continued use of American Beacon Funds in the Plan. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties because a prudent fiduciary would not retain the American Beacon Funds since: (i) American Beacon Funds were more expensive than similar alternatives; (ii) American Beacon Funds under performed compared to other similar investments; and (iii) American Beacon Funds were not included in other 401(k) plans. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendants breached their duty of loyalty by not removing the overly expensive and underperforming American Beacon Funds. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court denied in part and granted in part. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs failed to show that they breached the duty of loyalty, as the use of an independent third-party fiduciary established compliance with their fiduciary duty. The Court rejected this argument, holding that it could not say at this stage in the litigation that engaging a third-party fiduciary established that Defendants acted loyally during the entire time period of Plaintiffs' complaint, as such a conclusion would require the Court to draw an impermissible inference against Plaintiffs. Id. at *11-12. Accordingly, the Court refused to dismiss the complaint on this basis. Defendants also argued that none of Plaintiffs' imprudence theories supported a valid claim. First, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants were imprudent by including American Beacon index funds that were more expensive than nearly identical index fund alternatives. The Court noted that other case law authorities had denied motions to dismiss where Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants failed to consider lower-cost funds with identical styles and stocks. Thus, drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Plaintiffs, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs plausibly stated a claim. Plaintiffs also argued that "Defendants breached their duty of prudence by failing to consider low-cost separate accounts and collective trusts as alternatives to mutual funds." Id. at *15. Defendants asserted it was not imprudent to offer mutual funds, instead of separate accounts or collective trusts, in the Plan. The Court agreed, noting the Seventh Circuit has held that offering mutual funds instead of other lower-cost alternatives is not imprudent. Accordingly, the Court held Defendants had not breached their duty of prudence by offering the mutual funds, and granted Defendants' motion to the extent that Count I relied on the argument that Defendants breached their duty of prudence by not considering alternatives to mutual funds. Id. Defendants also argued that Plaintiffs failed to allege sufficient facts to hold Defendants American Airlines, the PBAC, and the BSC liable as fiduciaries. However, the Court found Plaintiffs sufficiently alleged these Defendants were either named fiduciaries or had control over management of the Plan. Accordingly, the Court held that dismissal was inappropriate. Defendants also moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' failure to monitor claim, arguing the Fifth Circuit has never recognized a duty to monitor claim. Id. at *16. The Court disagreed and determined that Plaintiffs adequately alleged sufficient facts to support a duty to monitor claim. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss to the extent that Count I relied on the claim that Defendants were imprudent for not considering low-cost alternatives to mutual funds, and denied it as to all other claims.

Martone, et al. v. Robb*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 122014 (W.D. Tex. Aug. 2, 2017). In this putative ERISA class action, employees of Whole Foods Market asserted that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties by allowing the employees to continue to invest their 401(k) funds in the company's stock fund while the stock was allegedly artificially inflated due to a widespread overpricing scheme that Defendants knew or should have known about. The Court analyzed the relevant pleading requirements for ERISA fiduciary breach claims for stock drop cases established in Fifth Third Bancorp v. Dudenhoeffer, 134 S. Ct. 2459 (2014). Under Dudenhoeffer, a Plaintiff who alleges that a fiduciary acted imprudently by failing to act on non-public information must plausibly allege: (i) an alternative action that Defendant could have taken that would have been consistent with securities laws; and (ii) that a prudent fiduciary in the same circumstances would not have viewed the alternative act as more likely to harm the fund than to help it. On Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's amended complaint, Defendants asserted that Plaintiff failed to meet that pleading standard. As with his original complaint, Plaintiff's amended complaint alleged that Defendants should have taken alternative action through disclosure of the non-public information and by freezing trading of the company stock. Plaintiff added new allegations to cite to investment research to support his allegation that Defendants should have concluded that more harm than good to the plan could not possibly have been done by continuing to let the alleged artificial inflation of the alleged overpricing scheme go undetected. Under Plaintiff's theory, this "reputational damage" increased the longer the fraud continued. Id. at *6. The Court found that Plaintiff's new allegations as to the alternative action pled in the original complaint did not change the fact that the likely outcome of either proposed action was a lowered stock price. Id. As to Plaintiff's allegation that the plan lost more money than it gained during the class period, the Court found that this allegation was insufficient to meet the pleading burden. Id. at *11. Relative to Plaintiff's new allegation that the hedging product that Defendants should have utilized was a low-cost hedging product, the Court concluded that this could have led to public disclosure of the fraud, which could have resulted in a stock drop. Id. at *18-19. Ultimately, the Court concluded that Plaintiff failed to carry his burden of showing a plausible alternative course of action, and granted the motion to dismiss. The Court concluded that amendment would be futile, and denied leave to amend.

Mendenhall, et al. v. Out Of Site Infrastructure, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124341 (E.D. Pa. 2017). In this putative class action, Plaintiff alleged Defendants breached their fiduciary duties to him and to the relevant 401(k) plan participants by failing to pay money into his account. The plan required the sponsor/employer to pay 25% of a participant's compensation into the plan for each year the employee worked for the employer. Participants made no contributions and were 100% vested in the plan at all times. Participants, however, could self-direct their accounts' investments. Defendants filed a motion for judgment on the pleadings, arguing that Plaintiff's claims under § 502(a)(2) of ERISA could not be brought on behalf of the plan because Plaintiff failed to comply with Rule 23 in that Plaintiff pled only a claim for individual relief. Plaintiff argued that § 502(a)(2) allows a litigant to assert claims on behalf of the entire plan and that he could move forward individually with a claim for all plan members. The Court concluded that Plaintiff could not proceed in a representative capacity on behalf of the plan because he failed to allege that he was an adequate representative of absent plan participants. Specifically, the Court noted that Plaintiff did not allege that: (i) he was bringing any claims in a representative capacity; or (ii) that he sought relief on behalf of the plan. The Court also stated that the facts surrounding Plaintiff's employment status, enrollment, disenrollment, and withdrawal of funds could differ substantially from others who were currently enrolled, disenrolled, or have remained in the plan. The Court also expressed concern about the potential for a self-serving settlement because settlement of Plaintiff's claim could divert funds from others with greater or different rights.

Patrico, et al. v. Voya Financial, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95735 (S.D.N.Y. June 20, 2017). In this putative class action brought under the ERISA, Plaintiff was a participant in a 401(k) plan sponsored by a non-Defendant. The sponsor was the named fiduciary, and had contracted with Defendant ("VRA") to provide investment advice services. Id. at *3. Pursuant to the contract with the sponsor, VRA was compensated based on a fixed platform fee per year for each participant, which began at $8 per participant per year and decreased as participation increased, and a management fee based on the value of each participant's account, which began at 50 basis points and declined based on increasing value of the plan assets. Id. Although VRA offered the advice programs, it did not render the advice itself. Rather, VRA employed a non-party sub-contractor to provide the actual investment advice. Id. Plaintiff alleged that VRA breached its fiduciary duties and engaged in self-interested transactions by receiving excessive compensation. Id. at *1. In dismissing the action, the Court found that Plaintiff had not adequately alleged that VRA was a fiduciary. The Court reasoned that when "a service provider has no relationship to an ERISA plan and is negotiating a contract with that plan, the service provider is not an ERISA fiduciary with respect to the terms of the agreement for its compensation." Id. at *7. Because Plaintiff had not alleged that VRA had "requisite control over its compensation," the Court concluded that VRA was not an ERISA fiduciary. Id. at *8. The Court further held that VRA was not a fiduciary with respect to its compensation after the agreement was executed. VRA's compensation was based on the number of plan participants and the total value of the plan assets in the advice program, neither of which were under VRA's control. Id. at *10. The Court also dismissed the prohibited transaction claim because Plaintiff had not alleged that any fiduciary had actual or constructive knowledge of the allegedly excessive compensation. Id. at *12. Although the plan sponsor was a named fiduciary, the complaint did not allege that it had actual or constructive knowledge that the compensation was allegedly excessive. Id. Hence, the Court held that Plaintiff could not sustain an equitable claim for a prohibited transaction against a non-fiduciary. Id.

Pender, et al. v. Bank Of America Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38771 (W.D.N.C. Mar. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees who transferred their 401(k) assets to a cash balance defined benefit plan, filed a class action alleging that through the transfer, Defendant violated the ERISA by depriving participants of a "separate account" feature of their 401(k) plan. Following a week-long bench trial, Defendant prevailed as to Plaintiffs' claims. Plaintiffs sought to recover the difference between the investment earnings they would have received in the 401(k) plan and the earnings that the company credited them with following the transfer of assets to the company's cash balance plan. At issue at trial was whether – after it restored the separate account feature and paid a $10 million fine (as a result of a separate IRS proceeding) – Defendant profited from its transfer strategy. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to establish that Defendant retained any profit as a result of the transfer, and it entered judgment in favor of Defendant. The Court agreed with Defendant that the plan experienced a net investment loss because it had invested more in equities during a period when equity markets were significantly outperformed by fixed-income investments. The plan's heavy concentration in equities during this time compelled a finding that it experienced a loss, not a profit. In issuing this ruling, the Court credited Defendant's expert witness, who said the plan lost $272 million as a result of the transferred assets, over Plaintiffs' expert.

Pledger, et al. v. Reliance Trust Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39745 (N.D. Ga. Mar. 7, 2017). In this 401(k) fee class action against Insperity, a professional employer organization, various related entities, and Reliance, the plan's record-keeper, the Court partially granted Defendants' motion to dismiss. The Court found that Plaintiffs had alleged sufficient facts to make their breach of fiduciary duty and prohibited transaction claims plausible. The Court rejected as premature various arguments that Defendants were not fiduciaries as to certain challenged actions or transactions. The Court found that it was too early at the pleadings stage to determine whether Defendants had acted as fiduciaries. In contrast, the Court granted the motion to dismiss with respect to part of Plaintiffs' challenge to the plan's record-keeping fees, finding that to the extent Plaintiffs sought to challenge the initial selection of the record-keeper, their claim was untimely. The Court also dismissed Plaintiffs' claim alleging that it was improper to select and retain a money market fund of the plan, instead of a stable value fund. The Court opined that Plaintiffs were simply challenging the selection of one fund over another, with no allegation of facts to support that the selection was improper. Id. at *21-22.

Sacerdote, et al. v. New York University*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173599 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 19, 2017). Plaintiff, on behalf of a class of benefit plan participants, alleged that Defendant breached its fiduciary duties under the ERISA by allegedly failing to make prudent investment decisions and failing to monitor the plan. Id. at *3. On Defendant's motion, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's claims. Subsequently, Plaintiff sought reconsideration of the Court's order of dismissal. Id. In denying the motion to reconsider, the Court held that "the inclusion of retail class shares in a plan despite the alleged availability of identical institutional class does not, on its own, support a cognizable prudence claim." Id. at *4. Instead, the Court held that the proper inquiry was whether the inclusion of such shares rendered the mix of options imprudent and, judged against this standard, the Court found the complaint failed to allege sufficient facts to support a plausible claim that the inclusion of retail class shares, rather than specific institutional class shares, breached the duty of prudence under the ERISA. Id. at *9. The Court also rejected Plaintiff's request to reconsider its decision to dismiss the failure to monitor claim. Plaintiff claimed that discovery had uncovered evidence of Defendant's failure to monitor, and thus requested reinstatement of that cause of action. Id. at *12. However, the Court held that the evidence cited was not new, and even if it were, Plaintiff failed to meet his burden of demonstrating that it might reasonably be expected to alter the conclusion reached by the Court. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion.

Terraza, et al. v. Safeway Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35725 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 13, 2017). In this class action, Plaintiffs alleged that the fiduciaries of the Safeway 401(k) plan caused the plan to incur excessive fees, retained imprudent investment options, and did not make adequate disclosures regarding the fees and nature of the investment options. Defendants brought a motion to dismiss, and the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendants' motion. Plaintiffs alleged that the plan incurred excessive record-keeping fees through a revenue sharing agreement and that the investment fees charged were excessive considering the nature of the investments offered. Plaintiffs also alleged that the plan made improper use of collective investment trusts and that the fees and investment options were not adequately explained by the plan fiduciaries. The Court rejected Defendants' argument that the complaint was untimely, finding that Plaintiffs had alleged that the plan offered imprudent investments during the six years prior to the filing of the lawsuit and that the statute of limitations did not run exclusively from when the investments were first offered. Id. at *15-16. The Court also denied Defendants' motion to dismiss claims for breach of the duty of loyalty, since Plaintiffs had plausibly alleged such violations based upon potentially self-interested actions of the plan's trustee. Id. at *19-20. In contrast, the Court was largely unwilling to permit Plaintiffs to proceed with their claim for breach of fiduciary duty based upon a failure to make adequate disclosures. It found that the plan had complied with the ERISA's disclosure regulations, which by their own terms satisfied any disclosure obligation. Id. at *24-34. The Court also agreed with Defendants that the alleged over-concentration of the plan in "opaque" collective trusts did not state a plausible claim because no facts were alleged showing that such funds were in fact imprudent. Id. at *33-34. The Court, however, rejected Defendants' attempt at dismissal of the excessive fee allegations. Although the plan offered 22 different investment options with fees ranging from 0.15% to 1.54%, the Court declined to find that this made the plan's fees inherently prudent. Instead, it found that the complaint alleged sufficient facts to plausibly show that at least certain of the investment options were excessively priced considering their performance. Id. at *47-48. Finally, the Court denied the motion to dismiss as to Plaintiffs' claim that revenue sharing resulted in excessive compensation for the record-keeper. It found that the complaint plausibly alleged that at least certain provisions of the record-keeping agreement may have permitted the record-keeper to receive excessive pay. Id. at *57.

Troudt, et al. v. Oracle Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22194 (D. Colo. Feb. 16, 2017). In this putative class action brought by participants in the Oracle Corp. 401(k) Savings and Investment Plan, Plaintiffs – a group of Plan participants – alleged breaches of the duty of loyalty and prudence based on Oracle's selection and retention of Fidelity Management Trust Co. as the Plan trustee. Plaintiffs alleged that Fidelity's fees were excessive, that Oracle failed to engage in a prudent process to select and retain investment options due to its revenue sharing arrangement with Fidelity, and Oracle failed to monitor Fidelity. Oracle moved to dismiss the entire complaint, and the Magistrate Judge recommended that the motion be denied. The Magistrate Judge concluded that the complaint sufficiently alleged the causes of action, and that it would be improper on a motion to dismiss to perform a highly contextualized analysis that would need to be done in order to determine whether Oracle had in fact breached its fiduciary duties.

Troudt, et al. v. Oracle Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41344 (D. Colo. Mar. 22, 2017). In this putative class action, the Court approved and adopted the Magistrate Judge's recommendation to deny Defendant's motion to dismiss. The Court noted that Count I, a count alleging that the revenue sharing model adopted by the 401(k) plan was reasonable, was too fact intensive to be resolved on a motion to dismiss. The Court explained that to decide this claim, it could not merely look at the total fees paid, but instead had to assess all the factors which informed the fiduciaries' decision to adopt this model. As not all of these factors were known at the complaint stage, the Court found that a decision on this issue was premature. The Court upheld Count II, noting that the complaint set forth sufficient allegations of a fiduciary breach. Defendants had argued this claim should be dismissed as it was solely, and thus impermissibly, based on hindsight. The Court rejected this argument, noting Plaintiffs alleged that two of the funds in the plan had inadequate performance histories to warrant investment in them at all, and a third fund greatly under-performed its benchmark in four out of five years before it was removed from the plan. The Court reasoned that these allegations were sufficient to suggest a lack of prudence in the selection of the first two funds and in the retention of the third. The Court found Count III derivative of Counts I and II, and thus it also was viable. As to Count IV, Defendants contended that the claim failed as the compensation paid to Fidelity was not unreasonable as it fell under an ERISA exemption, revenue sharing is not an asset and thus similarly exempt, and the claim was time-barred. The Court rejected each argument. The Court held that the issue of an ERISA exemption was an affirmative defense that Plaintiff did not have the burden to disprove. The Court further found that the plain language of the ERISA did not support the argument that revenue sharing was not a plan asset, and it finally noted that as Plaintiff pled a lack of actual knowledge, the claim was not time-barred.

(viii) ERISA Class Action Litigation Over Retiree/Employee Benefits

Baleja, et al. v. Northrop Grumman Space And Mission System Corp. Salaried Pension Plan*, Case No. 17-CV-235 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 30, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action against Defendants – Northrop Grumman Space and Mission Systems Corporation Salaried Pension Plan, Northrop Grumman Benefit Plans

Administrative Committee, Northrop Grumman Corporation, and Does 1 through 10 – on behalf of himself and all others similarly-situated requesting relief pursuant to 29 U.S.C. §§ 1132(a), (a)(1)(B), and (a)(3). Plaintiff alleged that he was working for ESL, a subsidiary of TRW, and joined the ESL plan, which was later terminated. After receiving a distribution from the ESL Plan, Plaintiff joined the TRW Plan, which was allegedly later amended by Defendants. When Plaintiff contacted Defendants to redeem his benefits, Defendants allowed him to do so with a reduction in his monthly pension benefits, which Defendants explained was due to the distribution from the ESL Plan acting to off-set his current pension benefits. Plaintiff maintained that he was never advised that his retirement benefits under the Plan would be off-set due to his participation in the ESL Plan or because of the receipt of a distribution. Plaintiff argued that the reduction was in violation of the anti-cutback rule under the ERISA, which provides that "[t]he accrued benefit of a participant under a plan may not be decreased by an amendment of the plan." Id. at 5. The Court dismissed Plaintiff's claim because Plaintiff's assertions – that: (i) he joined a plan after the ESL Plan was terminated; (ii) he thereafter became a participant in the TRW Plan and was guaranteed pension benefits at the age of 65, among other things, pursuant to that Plan; and (iii) Defendants later attempted to amend the plan – were insufficient to maintain a claim. The Court reasoned that without attaching "the original plan, describing its contents (other than the promise that he would receive pension benefits), or alleging the benefits included," the complaint "lacked sufficient allegations regarding the existence and terms" of the unamended plan. Id. at 6. Second, Plaintiff argued that he did not receive "proper notice for plan amendments that reduced the rate of future benefits accruals," in violation of 29 U.S.C. § 154(h), "which prohibits amendment to the plan unless the plan administrator provides notice as required by the ERISA." Id. The Court dismissed Plaintiff's claim with leave to amend because the claim rested "on the premise that there was an earlier plan and Plaintiff had not provided sufficient allegations to suggest the existence of such a plan." Id. Third, Plaintiff argued that because the unamended TRW Plan "did not provide an off-set as great as the ESL off-set" Defendants applied to Plaintiff. Id. at 7. Similarly, the Court dismissed this claim with leave to amend because this claim also relied on "whether there was an earlier plan, which Plaintiff had failed to sufficiently allege." Id. Finally, Plaintiff argued that the summary plan description ("SPD") did not fully disclose the ESL off-set and Defendants did not disclose the off-set in a way that the average person could understand. Pursuant to § 102(a) of the ERISA, the plan administrators are required to provide SPDs, which must be written in a manner to be understood "by the average participation." Id. The Court, however, "without deciding whether the SPD met the disclosure requirement," dismissed Plaintiff's claim, because "this claim, as, similar to earlier claims, was dependent, at least in part, on whether there was an earlier plan." Id. at 8. The Court therefore granted Defendants' motion to dismiss but allowed Plaintiff leave to amend his complaint.

Caufield, et al. v. Colgate-Palmolive Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26287 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 24, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of pension plan participants and beneficiaries, brought suit against their former employer Colgate-Palmolive Co., the retirement plan in which they participated, and the plan's benefit committee. Plaintiffs asserted various claims under the ERISA, including claims for plan benefits, breach of fiduciary duty, failure to provide requested documents, and failure to describe benefits in a summary plan description. Plaintiffs also brought a claim for contempt, alleging that Defendants had violated a prior order approving a class settlement in which Plaintiffs participated. Plaintiffs' claims stemmed from the Residual Annuity Amendment ("RAA") to the plan, which was made in 2005 to correct for under-payments to certain participants who elected lump sum payments. Plaintiffs claimed that additional benefits were due under the RAA and that Defendants failed to provide and actively concealed information regarding the RAA. Defendants moved to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). Defendants argued that the claim for benefits was barred by a previously executed release and settlement agreement. Plaintiffs had previously been parties to a class action lawsuit against the plan in which they challenged the amount of benefits due under another theory of liability. That case settled in 2013, with the Court entering an order approving the settlement in 2014. The settlement agreement excluded any claims "that are based upon, or arise under" the RAA. Id. at *10. The Court found that the settlement release unambiguously excluded Plaintiffs' claims for benefits under the RAA and it denied the motion to dismiss on that count. Defendants further argued that several of Plaintiffs' claims were barred by applicable statutes of limitation. The Court found that Plaintiffs' claims for benefits under the RAA were timely. Those claims could not have accrued earlier than 2011, when Plaintiffs first learned of the RAA's existence in the prior lawsuit. Plaintiffs filed their complaint within six years of that earliest possible accrual date. The Court similarly concluded that, at least at the pleading stage, Plaintiffs' claim for failure to provide a summary plan description also survived. Plaintiffs filed suit more than three years after one named Plaintiff learned of the RAA's existence, which was beyond the relevant limitations period. The Court, however, opined that the complaint contained plausible allegations that the accrual of that claim should be tolled based on Defendants' alleged intentional concealment of the existence of the RAA. Finally, Defendants argued that two counts should be dismissed for failure to state a claim. The first concerned Plaintiffs' claim for failure to provide relevant documents upon request. The Court found that it failed because Defendants produced all relevant documents to Plaintiffs as required by the ERISA's regulations. Defendants also argued that Plaintiffs' claim for contempt failed to state a claim. That count alleged that Defendants violated the Court's 2014 order approving settlement in the prior case. That order prohibited Defendants from asserting that claims under the RAA were released by the settlement agreement. The Court held that the complaint sufficiently alleged the elements of a contempt claim. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss as to each claim.

Felker, et al. v. USW Local 10-901*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 10982 (3d Cir. June 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of mobile workforce employees ("MWF employees"), brought a benefits recovery action under the ERISA against Defendant Sunoco's Marcus Hook Refinery Workers Involuntary Termination Plan (the "Plan"). Id. at *1. The MWF employees were maintenance employees assigned to perform duties at the Marcus Hook Refinery, the Philadelphia Refinery, and two of Sunoco's refineries. In 2012, Sunoco decided to idle the main processing unit of the Marcus Hook Refinery. Sunoco and USW Local 10-901, which represented the MWF employees, thereafter engaged in bargaining and entered into a settlement agreement in February 2012. Pursuant to that agreement, the MWF employees would be "afforded the opportunity to be assigned on a temporary basis to work at the Philadelphia Refinery and work until laid off from such temporary assignment as determined by management." Id. at *2. Additionally, a severance benefit plan (the "Plan") was established to "alleviate financial hardships which may be experienced" by Sunoco employees in connection with the idling of the [Marcus Hook] Refinery." Id. The MWF employees were assigned to the Philadelphia Refinery. In July 2012, Sunoco entered into a contribution agreement to sell the Philadelphia Refinery to Philadelphia Energy Solutions, LLC ("PES"), in which Sunoco was a minority owner. PES and Local 10-1 entered into a memorandum of understanding and agreement ("MOU") and "agree[d] to hire all maintenance employees from the Marcus Hook mobile workforce who have been working temporarily at the Philadelphia Refineries." Id. at *4-5. Sunoco sold its Philadelphia Refinery to PES and the MWF employees were terminated by Sunoco. That same day, PES hired the MWF employees to work at the Philadelphia Refinery pursuant to the terms of the contribution agreement and the MOU. USW Local 10-901 sent a letter to Sunoco's Vice President of Labor Relations seeking severance benefits on behalf of the MWF employees. The Plan Administrator determined that the MWF employees "were not terminated from employment in connection with the idling of the [Marcus Hook Refinery]," and therefore, were not eligible for severance benefits under the Plan. Id. at *5. The MWF employees filed this lawsuit, and the District Court granted summary judgment to the Plan. On appeal, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. First, the Third Circuit found that the MWF employees had a smooth transition to PES employment, and they did not experience any period of unemployment. Id. at *7. The Third Circuit opined that the MWF employees thus suffered no financial hardship in connection with the idling of the Marcus Hook Refinery and were awarded the same or better compensation as a result of the transfer to employment at PES. Further, the Third Circuit noted that the Plan Administrator's interpretation did not render the language in the Plan meaningless, nor did the interpretation conflict with the requirements of the ERISA. The MWF employees argue that there was a structural conflict of interest because benefits would be paid out of Sunoco's assets, and the Plan Administrator was tasked with adjudicating both the initial claim and the appeal. However, the Third Circuit found that as the District Court concluded, there were sufficient safeguards in place to comply with the ERISA requirements, such as the fact that the Plan Administrator understood his fiduciary role and reviewed appeals as if they were new claims. The Plan specified that several categories of employees were ineligible for benefits. The MWF employees argued that they do not fall into any of these categories because there was an explicit exception for "employees who are part of the Mobile Force, as designated by [Sunoco] in its sole discretion, and who are transferred to a position at [Sunoco's] Philadelphia Refinery for a limited period of time." Id. at *8. The Third Circuit found that this argument ignored that the MWF employees' status was converted to permanent assignment and therefore provisions of the Plan applying to employees of the "Philadelphia Refinery for a limited period of time" had no applicability to the MWF employees and were not rendered meaningless by the Plan Administrator's interpretation. Finally, the Third Circuit found that the Administrator's interpretation was consistent with the clear language of the Plan, which was intended to benefit only those negatively affected by the idling of the Marcus Hook Refinery. Id. Accordingly, the Plan Administrator's denial of benefits was not arbitrary or capricious. Therefore, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's order granting summary judgment in favor of the Plan.

Gould, et al. v. University Of Miami*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 151348 (S.D. Fla. Sept. 19, 2017). Plaintiff, a former voluntary faculty member of Defendant, brought this lawsuit pursuant to the ERISA, on behalf of himself and similarly-situated employees. Plaintiff claimed that "the University failed to provide certain ERISA plan benefits" to the voluntary faculty members and "failed to advise those employees that such benefits were available to voluntary faculty members" even though they were paid full-time (40 hour per week) employees. Id. at *3. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint, arguing that "as a voluntary faculty member, he was not eligible to participate in the ERISA plans at issue, save one supplemental retirement plan, in which Plaintiff elected to not participate." Id. The Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss without prejudice. The Court reasoned that Plaintiff's complaint "as drafted is ambiguous and confusing" because "Plaintiff has failed to set forth allegations pertaining to each plan in a manner that makes clear which plans Plaintiff contends that he and other members of the class are entitled to participate." Id. at *18. The Court was thus "unable to determine which facts support which claims and whether Plaintiff has stated any claims upon which relief can be granted" because Plaintiff did not allege any facts about which plans he purportedly should have been offered, and which plans the putative class of participants would have been eligible for. Id. at *18-20. The Court decided it had "inherent authority to require a Plaintiff to file a more definite statement, even if the responding party has not requested such relief." Id. at *20-21. The Court ordered Plaintiff to file a more definite statement, which identified the University benefit plans that Plaintiff claimed he and other similarly-situated employees should have been able to participate in as employees; described other similarly-situated University employees and the ERISA and other benefit plans that those persons claimed they were entitled to participate in as employees; and provided a clear recitation of the relief Plaintiff sought, including whether Plaintiff and other potential class members sought to receive specific benefits under the plans at issue, sought to be enrolled in particular plans, and/or sought to restore losses to the relevant plans. Id. at *23. The Court also allowed leave for Defendant to file another motion to dismiss after Plaintiff filed his amended complaint.

Laurent, et al. v. PricewaterhouseCooper LLP*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 115067 (S.D.N.Y July 24, 2017). Plaintiffs were former employees of Defendant who elected a lump sum distribution of fully vested benefits under Defendant's Retirement Benefit Accumulation Plan ("RBAP"). Plaintiffs argued that Defendant's lump sum calculation, which used the 30-year Treasury rate, resulted in an unlawful forfeiture of their accrued benefits in violation of the ERISA because it undervalued the future interest credits allegedly promised by the RBAP. Specifically, invoking § 502(a)(1)(B) or, in the alternative, § 502(a)(3) of the ERISA, Plaintiffs asked the Court to strike the RBAP's projection rate, the 30-year Treasury rate, and replace it with a rate that the Court determined would have been "the most reasonable projection rate" to estimate future investment credits. Id. at *10. Instead, the Court granted Defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings. Relying on CIGNA Corp. v. Amara, 563 U.S. 421 (2011), the Court concluded that reformation was not permitted as a remedy under § 502(a)(1)(B). Given that Amara and other case law authorities indicated that reformation of a contract is appropriate only in instances of mutual mistake or fraud, the Court concluded that reformation was not permitted as a remedy under § 502(a)(3) because Plaintiff did not allege mistake, fraud, or other inequitable conduct.

Lehman, et al. v. Nelson*, et al., 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 12619 (9th Cir. July 14, 2017). Plaintiff, an electrician, was a participant in a multi-employer pension fund. That plan collected employer contributions for all union-covered work performed in the applicable geographical area. Because electricians often performed work outside their own region, the pension plans for each region entered into reciprocal agreements whereby contributions received for an electrician's work performed outside of his home region would be transferred to his home region's fund. Plaintiff brought a class action against one of the pension funds that was a party to the agreement and that received contributions for Plaintiff's work outside his home region. Plaintiff challenged an amendment made to that plan's trust agreement due to severe under-funding that prohibited the transfer of all contributions. The pension plan thus retained a portion of the contributions that should have been remitted to Plaintiff's home fund under the reciprocal agreement. Plaintiff sought benefits due to him under the terms of the plan (without the amendment) and alleged breaches of fiduciary duty by the plan trustees. The District Court certified a class and granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment on his claim for benefits, finding that the trustees abused their discretion in withholding contributions. The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion on his claims for breach of fiduciary duty because Plaintiff had an adequate remedy through the receipt of benefits due. After subsequent briefing, the District Court applied the summary judgment order to a similar later amendment to the plan. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit held that the District Court erred in entering judgment for Plaintiff with respect to the second plan amendment because the legality of that amendment was not raised in the complaint and not litigated. The Ninth Circuit affirmed summary judgment for Plaintiff on his remaining claim for benefits. The Ninth Circuit found that the trustees abused their discretion in applying the amendment to withhold employer contributions that should have been returned to Plaintiff's home fund because the trustees' interpretation of the amendment was inconsistent with the remainder of the pension plan, the reciprocal agreement as incorporated into the plan, and the ERISA's goals. The Ninth Circuit also addressed the District Court's finding, in the alternative, that the trustees' application of the amendment constituted an abuse of discretion because it violated the ERISA's provision prohibiting a plan in "critical status" from entirely eliminating future benefit accruals. Id. at *40. The Ninth Circuit reversed that ruling because the provision at issue applied only to funds that have declared being in "critical status," but the pension fund had not been. Id.

Medina, et al. v. Catholic Health Initiatives*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 25563 (10th Cir. Dec. 19, 2017). Plaintiff, an employee of Defendant, a non-profit entity created by the Catholic Church that operates hospitals and healthcare facilities in 18 states, filed a class action claiming that Defendant's health plan was not an exempt ERISA church plan and that even if it were, the exemption violated the First Amendment's establishment clause. Id. at *3-4. The District Court rejected these claims, and granted summary judgment for Defendant. On appeal, the Tenth Circuit affirmed. It that Defendant's plan was a church plan and that the exemption did not violate the establishment clause. As to the status of the health plan as a church plan, the Tenth Circuit found that Defendant was sufficiently associated with the Catholic Church, because of its status as a part of the Church in canon law and the resultant "close integration" of Defendant with the Catholic Church. Id. at *13. The Tenth Circuit reasoned that the sub-committee running the plan was an organization with a principal purpose of administering/maintaining the plan and rejected Plaintiff's arguments that the sub-committee could not be an organization and that it did not maintain the plan. As to the final element of the church plan designation, the Tenth Circuit held that the sub-committee was associated with a church because of the sub-committee's bonds with the Catholic Church. The Tenth Circuit stated that that even though some participants were employed by an entity that was a joint venture between the Catholic and Adventist churches, the exemption required only that substantially all of the employees be employed by some church, not the same church, and thus the plan and its employees met all of the elements for the ERISA's exemption. The Tenth Circuit also rejected Plaintiff's establishment clause challenge to the exemption, holding that the exemption has a secular purpose of avoiding potential entanglement with religion, does not advance religion, and does not foster excessive entanglement. Id. at *40. Accordingly, the Tenth Circuit affirmed the District Court's order granting summary judgment in its entirety.

Roe, et al. v. Arch Coal, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 122918 (E.D. Mo. Aug. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees and participants in the company's retirement plan, brought a putative class action on behalf of plan participants and the plan. Plaintiffs brought claims against Defendant Arch Coal, Inc., the plan's retirement committee, and the plan's trustee. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants breached various fiduciary duties under the ERISA by maintaining the plan's investment in Arch Coal stock despite negative public information regarding the company's future and the decline of the coal industry. Plaintiffs brought four counts, which Defendants moved to dismiss. First, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss Count I, which alleged that Defendants breached their duty of loyalty to participants by failing to monitor the plan's investment in Arch Coal stock and by continuing to allow investment in it. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants should have recognized that Arch Coal stock was overvalued based on publicly available information. Plaintiffs failed to allege, however, that special circumstances existed to require Defendants to question the reliability of the stock's market price. Without such allegations, the claim failed. Count II alleged that Defendants breached their duty of loyalty to participants by maintaining the investment in company stock. Their theory relied on the fact that some Defendants' compensation was tied to Arch Coal stock, but the Court dismissed that claim because Plaintiffs were required to allege more than that. The Court explained that Plaintiffs failed to allege that Defendants knowingly misled, deceived, or acted adversely to the interests of plan participants. Count III alleged that Defendants failed to monitor their appointees in administering the plan. The Court noted that this claim was derivative of Plaintiffs' other claims. Because Plaintiff failed to plausibly allege an underlying breach of fiduciary duty, this claim also failed. Finally, Count IV alleged that the trustee, acting as a co-fiduciary or directed trustee, breached its duties of prudence and loyalty to manage the plan's assets. Because Plaintiffs failed to adequately plead a breach of fiduciary duty by the other Defendants, there could be no co-fiduciary liability for the trustee. Further, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to allege sufficient facts showing any breach of fiduciary duty as a directed trustee. It noted that a directed trustee is required to follow instructions from the named fiduciary except when contrary to the ERISA. Plaintiffs alleged no facts showing that a duty to question the named fiduciary's instructions had been triggered. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Count IV as well. As a result, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' complaint in its entirety.

Teets, et al. v. Great-West Life & Annuity Insurance Co.*, Case No. 14-CV-2330 (D. Colo. Dec. 14, 2017). Plaintiff, a California resident, participated in a 401(k) plan that contracted with Defendant for "record-keeping, administrative, and investment services." Id. at 2. Additionally, the plan offered the Great-West Key Guaranteed Portfolio Fund as an investment option, which actually was a fund operated by Defendant (though this option was chosen by the plan trustees). As part of its operation of the fund, Defendant aggregated all contributions into its MLTN portfolio (an internal asset allocation used to track yield on investments with fund contributions), set a credited rate (the guaranteed interest rate for participants in a given quarter), and earned a profit on the margin between the Credited Rate and the actual return on the MLTN portfolio. Id. at 4-5. Plaintiff, on behalf of a class of similarly-situated individuals, brought claims alleging that Defendant breached its fiduciary duties and that even if it was not a plan fiduciary, that it improperly participated in a party-in-interest transaction. The Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgement, though it did not agree as to all legal points raised in the motion. On the breach of fiduciary duty claims, the Court held that Defendant was not a fiduciary, but rejected Defendant's claim that its status as a guaranteed benefit policy ("GBP") foreclosed any fiduciary breach claims. The Court held that the GBP status simply freed Defendant from the requirement to manage its general account solely for the benefit of plan participants (i.e., making prudent investment decisions), but did not free it from other fiduciary responsibilities. Id. at 11-12. Nevertheless, the Court held that because plan participants could reject the credited rate, the fact that Defendant set the rate did not make it a fiduciary. The Court also reasoned that setting the credited rate did not allow Defendant to set its own compensation because Defendant did not have authority to establish fees or authority to approve or disapprove transactions from which it collected a fee. Additionally, because plan participants could withdraw funds, Defendant did not set its own compensation and was not a fiduciary. Id. at 20-21. The Court also granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to the party-in-interest claims. Though the Court did not reach Defendant's argument that Plaintiffs' asserted remedy of disgorgement of profits (claimed to be equivalent to an accounting) sought legal rather than equitable relief, it found that Plaintiffs could not show a violation of the ERISA's party-in-interest provisions. In particular, the Court determined that a non-fiduciary must have "actual or constructive knowledge of the circumstances that rendered the transaction unlawful," rather than the lower fiduciary standard of "actual or constructive knowledge of the facts underlying" a prohibited transaction. Id. at 25-26. Because Plaintiffs could not show that Defendant knew or should have known that the complained-of transaction violated the ERISA, their party-in-interest claims failed. Id. at 27-28. The Court therefore granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

(ix) ERISA Stock Drop Class Actions

In Re BP PLC Securities Litigation*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 33302 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 8, 2017). In the aftermath of the BP oil spill, BP's 401(k) Plan participants brought suit against the Plan fiduciaries alleging breaches of duties of prudence and loyalty by allowing the participants to invest in the BP stock at an artificially inflated price. The participants filed a motion for leave to file an amended complaint, which BP opposed on the basis that the proposed amended complaint failed to state a claim. This motion was made upon remand from the Fifth Circuit, which held that the District Court had erred in granting Plaintiffs' first motion for leave to amend because the proposed amended complaint did not contain sufficient factual allegations to state a claim, and thus, the amendment would be futile. In finding that the proposed amended complaint did not state a claim, the Fifth Circuit clarified the applicable standard announced in Fifth Third Bancorp v. Dudenhoeffer, 134 S. Ct. 2459 (2014), and ordered the District Court to apply that standard. In order to state a claim for breach of the duty of prudence on the basis of inside information, the District Court opined that Plaintiff must "allege an alternative course of action so clearly beneficial that a prudent fiduciary could not conclude that [the action] would be more likely to harm the fund than to help it . . . and offer facts that would support such an allegation." Id. at *75. The participants alleged five alternative courses of action in an attempt to satisfy the Dudenhoeffer standard. The Court dismissed each of the participants' alternative courses of action in turn. Three of the alternative courses of action (i.e., make a public disclosure prior to the oil spill that BP had not fully implemented its safety program, urge BP to make such a disclosure, and direct that all contributions to the Fund be held in cash and publicly disclose this action) rested on the unsupported premise that "a prudent fiduciary would have known that making an early disclosure would avert a massive oil spill and decline in stock price" because the oil spill was inevitable only in hindsight. Id. at *83-84. The other alternative courses of action (i.e., freeze the stock fund pending an investigation after the spill and publicly disclose this action and report the fraud to the DOL and/or SEC) were also insufficient because a prudent fiduciary may have concluded that freezing the fund could cause more harm than good by sending a negative signal, and reporting the fraud to the SEC would only have shifted the question to a different party. On remand, the District Court found that the participants' second motion for leave to file an amended complaint also failed to state a claim, and thus, it denied the participants' motion.

Saumer, et al. v. Cliffs Natural Resources, Inc*., 853 F.3d 855 (6th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of participants in Defendant's ESOP, filed a putative class action alleging breaches of fiduciary duties under the ERISA based on Defendant's decision to maintain plan investments in publicly traded company stock. The District Court dismissed the lawsuit following Defendant's motion to dismiss brought pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6). On appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed. The Sixth Circuit rejected the Plaintiffs' argument that the Defendant should have known that its stock price was artificially inflated due to market conditions. It found Defendant reasonably relied on the stock's market price. Further, the Sixth Circuit stated that Congress allowed for concentrating assets (and thus not diversifying assets) when it authorized creation of ESOPs. The Sixth Circuit also stated that the complaint contained no allegations as to what information Defendant could have gleaned from publically available information about the stock price that would have caused a different investment decision. The Sixth Circuit also rejected Plaintiff's theory that Defendant should have acted differently based on non-public information, finding it to be implausible. The Sixth Circuit agreed with Defendant that it was within its rights to not act on the non-public information because disclosing that information likely would have done even more damage to the price of the stock held in the ESOP.

Tatum, et al. v. RJR Pension Investment Committee*, 855 F.3d 553 (4th Cir. 2017). In this long-running class action under the ERISA, the Fourth Circuit held that the District Court did not commit clear error in finding that Defendants proved by a preponderance of the evidence that a hypothetical prudent fiduciary would have made the same decision to divest the Plan of non-employer Nabisco stock from the plan at the same time that the Plan Administrator did. This class action was brought by an employee who participated in the company's defined contribution pension and benefit plan against a Plan Sponsor, the Plan Administrator and its Investment Committee after they created a separate successor plan when the parent company split from its food and tobacco entities. The successor plan froze participant investments in Nabisco stock funds and divested those investment options within six months. The value of the Nabisco stock funds decreased significantly during that period, but then rebounded after investor Carl Icahn made a bid for the company that was accepted. After a bench trial, the District Court held that the company had breached its fiduciary duty of prudence when it decided to remove Nabisco stock funds from the plan "without undertaking a proper investigation into the prudence of doing so," but that it had met its burden to show that a hypothetical prudent fiduciary "could" have made the same decision. Id. at 557. On appeal, the Fourth Circuit reversed, indicating that Defendants' burden was "to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that a hypothetical prudent fiduciary would have made the same decision." Id. at 558. On remand, the District Court issued another opinion concluding that Defendants had met their burden to show that a hypothetical prudent fiduciary would have divested in the Nabisco funds in the manner and at the time that Defendants did. On a further appeal, the Fourth Circuit affirmed. First, the Fourth Circuit rejected Plaintiff's argument that the District Court focused too much on risk, pointing to the District Court's review of other factors, including value and expected returns, the diversity of the Plan's investments, the requirements contained in the Plan documents, and the timing of the divestment. Second, the Fourth Circuit found that the District Court had adequately considered whether a hypothetical fiduciary would have taken the same action regardless of what was provided in the Plan documents, finding no evidence that the fiduciaries intentionally disregarded Plan language or failed to disclose the divestment to participants. The Fourth Circuit also ruled that the District Court adequately considered the testimony of Plaintiff's expert, and considered the timing of the divestment. The Fourth Circuit rejected Plaintiff's contention that a different legal standard applied to a divestment as compared to an investment decision. In analyzing the ERISA, the Fourth Circuit found no indication that divestment and investment decisions should be reviewed under a different legal standard. Finally, the Fourth Circuit concluded the District Court's decision was consistent with Fifth Third Bancorp v. Dudenhoeffer, 134 S. Ct. 2459 (2014), in determining that a hypothetical prudent fiduciary would have properly relied on the market price of the Nabisco stock as the correct estimate of the stock's present value.

(x) ESOP Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Brundle, et al. v. Wilmington Trust N.A*., 241 F. Supp. 3d 610 (E.D. Va. 2017). Plaintiff, a former employee of Constellis Group, Inc. and a former participant in the company's Employee Stock Ownership Plan ("ESOP"), brought a class action against the ESOP's trustee, Defendant Wilmington Trust N.A., for breach of the ERISA's prohibited transaction provisions based on the creation of the ESOP. Plaintiff alleged that the stock purchase that created the ESOP resulted in an inflated purchase price, thereby harming the ESOP. A trial was held on a number of issues. First, in determining the fair market value of Constellis' stock that the ESOP was going to purchase, Wilmington Trust (via its financial advising firm, Stout Risius and Ross ("SRR")) adopted SRR's valuation that priced the fair market value of the stock quite highly. In adopting this valuation, Wilmington ignored a prior valuation report of the stock that factored in high risk due to the fact that the company's performance was highly dependent on a small number of major government contracts, which resulted in a lower valuation of the stock as compared to SRR's final valuation. The Court determined that a prudent trustee would at least have inquired as to the reasons for the significant difference in value. Second, Wilmington relied on SRR's choice to rely on Constellis management's own projections of its financial viability in determining the purchase price and ignored several red flags in doing so. The Court determined that Wilmington had an obligation to investigate SRR's choice to rely on these projections. Since the ESOP's only asset was its 100% ownership stake in Constellis, this left the ESOP with no external source of money to protect the participants in case the financial projections were inaccurate. Third, Wilmington did not investigate SRR's choice to apply a control premium to one version of its valuation and not to apply a control premium to another version in order to discount the valuation. When Wilmington approved the purchase, it was aware that the ESOP had no power to exercise control over Constellis, and thus, it should have inquired as to SRR's utilization of the control premium. Fourth, Wilmington failed to investigate SRR's consistent rounding up of numbers in its valuation reports. Lastly, the Court considered several pieces of circumstantial evidence of Wilmington's lack of prudence, including its failure to investigate Constellis' motivations for forming an ESOP in the first place, the short time-frame in which it approved the purchase price, the lack of sufficient meetings pertaining to the transaction, and authorizing an opening sale price at a number above the minimum amount per share. The Court held that overall, Wilmington was unable to show that "its reliance on SRR's report was 'reasonably justified' in light of all the circumstances because it has not shown that it thoroughly probed the gaps and internal inconsistencies in that report." Id. at 634. The Court determined Wilmington engaged in a prohibited transaction in violation of § 1106(a) of the ERISA because it did not demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that the ESOP paid no more than adequate consideration when it purchased Constellis' stock. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' party-in-interest claims, which were "not seriously pursued at trial," and held that the loans underlying the claim were "primarily" the benefit of the participants. Id. at 643-45. The Court found that Wilmington did not violate § 1106(b). The Court held there was no evidence Wilmington actually represented both the ESOP and the investment bank retained by Constellis to advise on the creation of the ESOP. The Court also held the $150,000 payment from Constellis was reasonable compensation for Wilmington's service to the Plan. Id. at 644-45. The Court found the ESOP had been damaged in the amount of $29,773,250 (the amount Wilmington agreed to overpay for the stock) and the Court thus entered judgment for Plaintiffs in that amount.

Swain, et al. v. Wilmington Trust, N.A*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 128376 (D. Del. Aug. 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of participants in ISCO Industries' ESOP, filed a class action claiming that Defendant, the ESOP trustee, engaged in a prohibited transaction under § 406(a)-(b) of the ERISA when it purchased 4 million shares of ISCO's common stock for a 25-year note of $98 million, with 2.4% annual interest, resulting in ISCO being fully owned by the ESOP. Id. at *4-5. Only 11 days after the sale, the stock was revalued by an independent appraiser as being worth only $39 million. Id. at *5. Defendant moved to dismiss the claims, alleging that Plaintiffs could not show an injury-in-fact, thus preventing the Court from exercising subject-matter jurisdiction and also arguing that even if Plaintiffs had standing, they failed to state a claim on which relief could be granted. Id. at *2, 6-7. As to the standing argument, the Court agreed with Defendant that Plaintiffs failed to show an injury-in-fact. The Court held that although the stock was purchased at an allegedly inflated price, there was no subsequent sale and thus no economic injury to Plaintiffs as a matter of law. Id. at *12. The Court noted that this ruling was guided by U.S. Supreme Court precedent requiring both an inflated purchase price and subsequent sale; thus, the Court opined that the claims should be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. The Court also noted that any claim of standing based on injunctive/declaratory relief also failed because Plaintiffs did not allege a sufficient threat of future injury. Id. at *12-13. In the alternative, the Court addressed Defendants' arguments that Plaintiffs failed to state a claim for prohibited transactions, holding that Plaintiffs failed to state a claim for impermissible acquisition of an employer security because the stocks purchased were not covered by the relevant statutory section. Id. at *15. Likewise, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to plead sufficient facts to support their claims that Defendant acted on behalf of ISCO (which had adverse interests to the Plan) and failed to plead sufficient facts that Defendant impermissibly received compensation from ISCO. Id. at *17-19. The Court granted the motion as to claims for the impermissible acquisition, i.e., acting on behalf of a party with adverse interests and impermissibly receiving compensation. However, the Court held that that Plaintiffs sufficiently pled their party-in-interest claims, holding that Plaintiffs, "despite not identifying which category ISCO falls into as a party-in-interest, provided sufficient facts to support that ISCO can be identified as such" and further held that discovery might reveal additional party-in-interest sellers. Id. at *16. The Court also rejected Defendant's argument that Plaintiffs were required to show that no exemptions to the prohibited transaction rules applied on the grounds that these were affirmative defenses, not something to be "pleaded around by Plaintiffs." Id. The Court thus denied the motion to dismiss as to the party-in-interest claims.

(xi) Independent Contractor Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Jammal, et al. v. American Family Insurance*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120684 (N.D. Ohio Aug. 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of insurance agents, filed a putative class action alleging violations of the ERISA. Prior to trial, the Court granted a motion to bifurcate to allow an advisory jury to determine whether Plaintiffs were employees or independent contractors for purposes of the ERISA. Id. at *7. Although Defendant claimed that the agents were independent contractors, the advisory jury found by a preponderance of the evidence that Plaintiffs were employees and not independent contractors. Id. at *8. The Court ruled that the jury's determination comported with the weight of the evidence presented at trial. Id. The Court noted that a worker is an employee if the employer retains the right to direct or control the manner and means of work. Id. at *8. The Court stated that various factors are relevant to a determination of whether Defendant retained the right to control, including: (i) the skill required of the employee; (ii) the source of the instrumentalities and tools; (iii) the location of the work; (iv) the duration of the relationship between the parties; (v) whether the hiring party had the right to assign additional projects to the hired party; (vi) the extent of the hired party's discretion over when and how long to work; (vii) the method of payment; (viii) the hired party's role in hiring and paying assistants; (ix) whether the work is part of the regular business of the hiring party; (x) the provision of employee benefits; and (xi) the tax treatment of the hired party. Id. at *8-9. At trial, Plaintiffs presented evidence that they argued was key to showing that they were central to and at the core of Defendant's business. Id. at *10. Defendant taught Plaintiffs everything they needed to know to become licensed, run an agency, and sell insurance. Id. at *11. Further, there was no limit on the duration of the relationship. Id. at *15. Although the agreements indicated that the intent of the parties was that agents be treated as independent contractors, Defendant expected its managers to exercise a high degree of control whenever necessary to achieve compliance with Defendant's goals and standards. Id. at *45. Defendant trained its managers to exercise control over the means and manner of Plaintiffs' sales and duties and reprimanded managers who did not exercise such control. Id. at *64. The Court ruled that the degree of control that managers were encouraged to exercise was inconsistent with independent contractor status and more in line with the level of control a manager would be expected to exert over an employee, thereby supporting a finding that Plaintiffs were more properly classified as employees. Id. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs were employees of Defendant. However, the Court ruled that, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), an interlocutory appeal may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation because: (i) there was evidence supporting both sides; (ii) prior case law had been nearly unanimous in finding that insurance agents generally should be classified as independent contractors; (iii) the repercussions of the findings were far-reaching; and (iv) the resolution of damages would be unusually complicated. Id. at *65. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs were properly classified as employees but authorized the parties to take an interlocutory appeal from its order.

(xii) Judgments In ERISA Class Actions

Moore, et al. v. Navillus Tile, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 160134 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 28, 2017). Following a seven day bench trial, the Court entered judgment in the amount of $76 million against Defendant. Subsequently, Defendant moved to stay the execution of the judgment and for the Court to waive the requirement for it to post a supersedeas bond to guarantee payment of the judgment. Defendant argued that, pursuant to Rule 8(a)(1) and Rule 62(d), "execution of the Judgment will render it insolvent and likely drive it into bankruptcy." Id. at *28. Plaintiffs opposed Defendant's motion, arguing that Defendant "had the resources to post a supersedeas bond" and that there was a "serious risk of its attempting to secret its assets while the appeal is pending, based on the conduct that was proven at the trial." Id. The Court denied Defendant's motion, reasoning that "the bond requirement is not designed to protect the judgment debtor's ability to continue in business; rather, it is designed to minimize or eliminate the risk that it will pay the judgment, only to find that it cannot get the money back pending appeal." Id. at 29. In making its determination, the Court applied a five factor test, in which the Court considered: "(i) the complexity of the collection process; (ii) the amount of time required to obtain a judgment after it is affirmed on appeal; (iii) the degree of confidence that the Court has in the availability of funds to pay the judgment; (iv) whether Defendant's ability to pay the judgment is so plain that the cost of a bond would be a waste of money; and (v) whether Defendant is in such a precarious financial situation that the requirement to post a bond would pace other creditors of Defendant in an insecure position." Id. at *30. First, the Court found that Defendant's statement "that it cannot satisfy the judgment entered against it and cannot obtain a supersedeas bond in the amount of the judgment from any source" was determinative as to factors two, three, and four in favor of requiring imposition of a bond. Id. at *32. Second, the Court determined that the fact that Defendant's net worth "is tied up in hard assets" supported imposing a bond because the Court "can fairly infer that collection of its judgment would be complicated and time consuming." Id. Finally, in regards to the fifth factor, the Court reasoned that Defendant's creditors were not imperiled because of the bond, although they were "without a doubt imperiled" by the judgment itself. Id. at *33. The Court further stated, that even if Defendant proved the fifth factor, that fact would not outweigh the other factors.

Tibble, et al. v. Edison International*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 130806 (C.D. Cal. Aug. 16, 2017). Plaintiffs claimed that executives of an Edison International Inc. 401(k) plan violated their fiduciary duties by selecting more-expensive retail-priced shares versus institutionally priced shares for identical investment options. After a trial, the Court found in favor of Plaintiffs. The decision finding in favor of Plaintiffs was published exactly 10 years after the case was first filed in 2007. Since that time, the case had two trials, multiple trips to the Ninth Circuit, and a significant 2015 U.S. Supreme Court ruling making it harder for 401(k) plan fiduciaries to have lawsuits challenging particular investment funds dismissed as untimely. In finding for Plaintiffs, the Court explained that it was imprudent for Defendant to include 17 mutual funds in its 401(k) plan that could have been obtained at a lower cost. Defendant's breach of duty occurred on the earliest possible date that it could have chosen institutional share classes over retail classes. Because Defendant should have made the switch immediately, the Court opined that damages could be calculated from the day the six year statute of limitations began to run – exactly 16 years before the decision (and exactly 10 years after plan participants filed their original complaint). The parties agreed that damages between 2001 and 2011 were about $7.52 million, and the Court ordered them to calculate damages from 2011 onward by comparing the returns of the disputed funds to the returns of the plan as a whole during that period.

(xiii) Preemption, Procedural, And Coverage Issues In ERISA Class Actions

Advocate Health Care Network, et al. v. Stapleton*, 137 S. Ct. 1652 (2017). This class action under the ERISA addressed the ability of certain organizations that are affiliated with churches, such as not-for-profit hospitals, to sponsor employee welfare benefit plans that are "church plans" per § 3(33) of the ERISA. Church plans are exempt from Title I of the ERISA, including the ERISA's reporting requirements, funding requirements, and fiduciary protections. Hence, maintaining church plan status can decrease the costs associated with administering and maintaining a plan. The lawsuit centered on a church-affiliated not-for-profit organization that operated hospitals and other healthcare facilities. These organizations maintained that their employee welfare benefit plans were church plans, which were established and maintained by the organizations and administered by internal committees appointed by the organizations. Participants in the plans brought multiple lawsuits, arguing that the plans were not church plans because they were not established by a church. The District Courts agreed with the participants, as did the Third, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed in consolidated appeal. The U.S. Supreme Court concluded that, in amending § 3(33) of the ERISA in 1980, Congress ensured that a broad range of plans maintained by church-affiliated organizations could qualify as church plans without needing to determine whether the organizations met the definition of a "church."

Barton, et al. v. Constellium Rolled Products-Ranswood, LLC,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 8357 (4th Cir. May 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retirees, brought a class action against their former employer, alleging that it violated the ERISA when Defendant unilaterally reduced retiree health benefits provided under the collective bargaining agreement. The District Court entered summary judgment for Defendant, holding that the collective bargaining agreement did not provide for vested retiree health benefits. On appeal, the Fourth Circuit affirmed. Plaintiffs argued on appeal that their health benefits were vested for life based on their reading of the collective bargaining agreement and reference to extrinsic evidence outside the collective bargaining agreement. The Fourth Circuit rejected this argument, noting that under ordinary principles of contract law, the contract must unambiguously indicate that the parties intended such vesting. Relying on this maxim, the Fourth Circuit noted that the collective bargaining agreement did not expressly vest the retiree health benefits. In contrast, it limited these benefits to the duration of the agreement. The agreement provided that pension benefits were a lifetime benefit that could not be reduced. The Fourth Circuit held that the express vesting of pension benefits, coupled with the absence of such clear language with respect to health care benefits, underscored the conclusion that the health benefits were not vested. As the language of the collective bargaining agreement was clear, the Fourth Circuit did not consider the extrinsic evidence submitted by Plaintiffs. The Fourth Circuit thus affirmed summary judgment for Defendant.

Pharmaceutical Care Management Association, et al. v. Gerhart*, 852 F.3d 722 (8th Cir. 2017). In 2014, Iowa's legislature enacted Iowa Code § 510B.8, which regulates how pharmacy benefits managers ("PBMs") establish generic drug pricing and requires certain disclosures to network pharmacies and the Iowa Insurance Commissioner. PBMs are third-party administrators for prescription drug benefits for ERISA and non-ERISA health plans. A national trade association that represents PBMs brought an action for declaratory relief seeking a declaration that the law was preempted by the ERISA's express preemption provision, which preempts state laws which "relate to" ERISA plans through a connection with, or a reference to, an ERISA plan. The District Court granted the state's motion to dismiss the complaint, finding that although the law regulated an area of the ERISA's concern for the PBMs, the statute was not preempted. The District Court found that the statute did not have a prohibited connection to the ERISA because the PBMs continued to have sufficient choice and control as to administration of prescription drug benefits. The District Court also found that the statute did not impermissibly reference the ERISA because the existence of ERISA plans was not essential to the statute's operation and the statute did not "act immediately and exclusively" on ERISA plans. Id. at 727-28. Further, any specific references to the ERISA in the definitions section of the statute were too far removed from the statutory provisions at issue to conclude those previsions expressly referenced the ERISA. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit reversed the District Court. The Eighth Circuit observed that a state law has a prohibited "reference to" an ERISA plan when the law: (i) imposes requirements by reference to ERISA-covered programs; (ii) specifically exempts ERISA plans from an otherwise generally applicable statute; or (iii) premises a cause of action on the existence of an ERISA plan. Id. at 728. As an initial matter, the Eighth Circuit noted that when read alone, the statute did not appear on its face to impermissibly reference the ERISA. However, taking into account the statutory definition section of the law, it was apparent that the law specifically exempted certain ERISA plans from its otherwise general application, and thus the law had an improper reference to the ERISA. In addition to this express reference to the ERISA, the law also made an implicit reference to the ERISA through regulation of PBMs who were subject to ERISA regulation, and thus the law necessarily affected ERISA plans. The Eighth Circuit concluded that the law was expressly preempted due to its impermissible reference to the ERISA or ERISA plans. The Eighth Circuit noted that although it did not need to consider whether the law was preempted due to a connection with the ERISA, nevertheless the law had a prohibited connection with the ERISA because it intruded upon matters "central to plan administration and interferes with nationally uniform plan administration" by: (i) requiring PBMs to report their methodology for establishing reimbursement amounts to the state and network pharmacies; (ii) restricting the class of drugs for which the PBMs can establish maximum reimbursement amounts and limiting the sources by which they can get pricing information; and (iii) requiring PBMs to include a provision in their contracts with network pharmacies that allows pharmacies to appeal reimbursement rates and allows for retroactive payment if the rates were applied incorrectly. Id. at 731. Because the duties imposed upon the PBMs were inconsistent with the ERISA's central design, the ERISA's express preemption clause required invalidation of the statute as it applied to the PBMs in their administration and management of prescription drug benefits for ERISA plans. The Eighth Circuit therefore reversed the District Court's decision, and ordered judgment in favor of the PBMs on the issue of express preemption.

Spires, et al. v. Schools*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 190294 (D.S.C. Nov. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of participants in the Piggly Wiggly Carolina Co., Inc. and Greenbax Enterprises Inc. Employee Stock Ownership Plan and Trust (the "Plan"), filed a class action on behalf themselves and all other participants under the ERISA. Plaintiffs moved for leave to proceed without class certification, as a derivative action on behalf of the Plan under Rule 23.1. Plaintiffs also sought to be excused from compliance with the derivative-action pleading requirements of Rule 23.1(b). The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion. Plaintiffs asserted that they should be allowed under § 502(a) of the ERISA to proceed via a derivative action on behalf of plans under Rule 23.1. Plaintiffs noted that other case law authorities have excused such actions from compliance with the pleading requirements of Rule 23.1(b). In opposition, Defendants argued that an ERISA plan lacked standing to sue, that the complaint did not comply with Rule 23.1(b), the relief Plaintiffs sought would unfairly shift the burden of proof to Defendants, and that it would cause unreasonable delay. Id. at *3-4. The Court noted that it was questionable whether, under Fourth Circuit case law, an ERISA plan may bring ERISA claims against plan fiduciaries. The Court, however, stated that it need not reach that issue because Plaintiffs pleaded a class action. The complaint had nearly one hundred references to "class," "class members," and the "class period." Id. at *4. The Court found that the complaint did not meet the pleading requirements for a derivative action under Rule 23.1(b) and Plaintiffs did not attempt to explain why Rule 23.1(b) should not apply. Id. Further, the Court agreed with Defendants' argument that allowing a class action to proceed as a derivative action would unfairly shift to Defendants the burden of proving or disproving the adequacy of named Plaintiffs as representatives of all interested parties. The Court explained that in a class action, Plaintiffs must prove the adequacy of the class; however, in a derivative action, a Defendant has the burden to prove that a Plaintiff could not adequately represent the interests of the shareholders or of the corporation. Id. Therefore, the Court opined that allowing this class action to proceed as a derivative action without amendment of the complaint could make it impossible to ascertain from the complaint exactly what Defendants must prove or rebut to defend themselves. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court stated that recasting the lawsuit as a derivative action would require amendment of the complaint. The Court further noted that amendment of the complaint to base the entire action on a new legal theory would require adjudication of new motions to dismiss. The Court held that it would not return this matter to the pleading stage absent extraordinary circumstances, which Plaintiffs had not demonstrated. Id. The Court therefore denied Plaintiffs' motion to proceed as a derivative action.

(xiv) Tolling, Statute Of Limitations, And Exhaustion Requirements In ERISA Class Actions

Barber, et al. v. Lincoln National Life Insurance Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74005 (W.D. Ky. May 16, 2017). Plaintiff, a participant in an employer-sponsored disability plan, initiated a class action to challenge the plan's ability to off-set his monthly benefit by other sources of income. He brought suit on behalf of two classes of similarly-situated persons. Defendant moved to dismiss, and the Court granted the motion. The Court found that the plan properly off-set Plaintiff's benefit by other sources of income, as the plain text of the plan authorized this off-set. The Court thus dismissed the claim with prejudice. The Court also found that Plaintiff had standing to challenge whether the plan could apply off-sets related to other sources of income before this income was reported for federal income tax purposes. Plaintiff theorized that premature off-setting could result in excessive reductions in benefits. The Court dismissed this argument, since Plaintiff had failed to exhaust his administrative remedies on this claim. The Court concluded that as the 180-day period to exhaust had run, Plaintiff had failed to timely exhaust. The Court thus dismissed the claim with prejudice.

Hitchcock, et al. v. Cumberland University 403(b) DC Plan*, 851 F.3d 552 (6th Cir. 2017). In this class action suit challenging a university's retroactive amendment of its 403(b) plan to make matching contributions discretionary, the Sixth Circuit held that that the ERISA plan participants did not need to exhaust their administrative remedies as to claims for violation of the ERISA's anti-cutback rule and breach of fiduciary duty and were entitled to discovery before responding to a motion to dismiss one additional claim. Plaintiffs were participants in the university's retirement plan. The plan had previously provided for a 5% employer matching contribution. In late 2014, the employer amended the plan, retroactive to January 1, 2013, to provide for a discretionary employer match, and then set the match at 0% for 2013-14 and 2014-15. Id. at 555-56. Plaintiffs sued to recover matching contributions (Count I), alleged that the amendment violated the ERISA's anti-cutback rule (Count II), that proper notice of the amendment was not given (Count III), and that the amendment constituted a breach of fiduciary duty (Count IV). The District Court had ruled that Plaintiffs were required to exhaust their administrative remedies under the plan before filing Counts II and IV and granted Defendants' motion to dismiss on that basis. On appeal, however, the Sixth Circuit noted that these claims focused on the legality of the plan amendment, not on the interpretation of the plan terms themselves. According to the Sixth Circuit, matters of legality are within the expertise of judges, not plan administrators. Therefore, the Court sided with case law precedents of the Third, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, Tenth, and D.C. Circuits in finding that exhaustion of administrative remedies is not required as to claims challenging the legality of plan terms. Id. at 565. The District Court also had dismissed Plaintiffs' improper notice claim, finding that it was not pleaded with adequate specificity and that it failed to state a claim upon which relief had been granted. The Sixth Circuit reversed, holding that Plaintiffs should be allowed an opportunity to request discovery before being required to respond to a motion to dismiss that claim. The Sixth Circuit also directed the District Court to determine if Count III was a legal claim as to which exhaustion of administrative remedies was not required. Id. at 566.

In Re Disney ERISA Litigation*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 61202 (C.D. Cal. April 21, 2017). In this putative class action, Plaintiffs – a group of participants in Walt Disney Company's individual account retirement plan – filed suit against the plan on behalf of all participants whose plan accounts included investments in the Sequoia Fund. Plaintiffs alleged that the plan breached its fiduciary duties to participants under the ERISA by failing to prudently manage and monitor investment options offered to participants. In particular, Plaintiffs alleged that the continued offering of the Sequoia Fund was imprudent because the fund had invested over 25% of its net assets in Valeant Pharmaceuticals International, Inc., the stock price of which declined substantially after concerns about its accounting practices and investment strategies emerged. The original complaint alleged that the plan's failure to monitor and correct Sequoia's concentration of investments in Valeant constituted a breach of fiduciary duty. The Court granted the plan's motion to dismiss the original complaint because, under established U.S. Supreme Court precedent, Valeant's stock price decline alone was insufficient to show a plausible breach of fiduciary duty absent special circumstances that would have required the plan to question the market's valuation of the company. Plaintiffs' amended complaint shifted theories of liability, alleging that Sequoia held itself out to be a "value" fund, but pursued a "growth" strategy by investing in Valeant. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs alleged that a prudent fiduciary should have monitored the fund to ensure that it adhered to its purported investment strategy. The Court granted the plan's motion to dismiss the amended complaint on the basis that Plaintiffs again failed to allege any special circumstances supporting the theory that the plan should have ceased offering the Sequoia Fund as an investment option or should have questioned the market's valuation of Valeant. Plaintiffs also failed to allege any facts showing that the representations made to participants about the Sequoia Fund were so inconsistent with its investment in Valeant that a reasonably prudent investor would have discontinued offering the fund. The Court further noted that the claim was time-barred under the ERISA's three-year statute of limitations. The Court found that under Plaintiffs' new theory of liability, Plaintiffs would have had actual knowledge of the alleged breach when the plan disclosed the Sequoia Fund's decision to invest in Valeant in 2010. At that time, Plaintiffs would have discovered that this investment allegedly contradicted the fund's value strategy. Plaintiffs' action, brought in 2016, was thus brought after the statute of limitations expired. Finally, the Court denied Plaintiffs' request for leave to amend their complaint because Plaintiffs had already been given an opportunity to plead additional facts making their claims plausible and had failed to do so. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the amended complaint with prejudice.

Osberg, et al. v. Foot Locker, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 12041 (2d Cir. July 6, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of plan participants and beneficiaries, sued Defendants and sought equitable relief under the ERISA for violations arising out of Defendants' alleged failure to disclose that a conversion from a defined benefit to a cash balance pension plan would cause "wear-away," meaning that some employees would not accrue additional pension benefits for a period of time. Following a bench trial, the District Court ruled that Defendants' failure to disclose violated §§ 502 and 404(a) of the ERISA. The District Court ordered equitable relief under § 502(a)(3) of the ERISA in the form of plan reformation to conform to the plan participants' reasonably mistaken expectations, which resulted from Defendants' "materially false, misleading, and incomplete disclosures." Id. at *4. On appeal, Defendants challenged four aspects of the District Court's decision. First, Defendants asserted that the District Court erred by awarding relief to plan participants whose claims were time-barred. As to the § 502 claim, Defendants argued that the claims were untimely for class members who received their pay-outs three years before the lawsuit was filed because they had constructive notice of the claimed reduction in benefits. The Second Circuit rejected Defendants' argument, finding that this constructive notice theory would have required a "heroic chain of deductions" for the average plan participant, particularly considering Defendants' "concealment." Id. at *19-20. Defendants also argued that the claims were time-barred because the concealment exception to the general three-year statute of limitations, which extended the statute of limitations to six years, did not apply due to lack of fraud. Id. at *23-24. The Second Circuit disagreed, noting that the exception applied in cases of fraud or concealment, the latter of which was established. Id. at *26-27. Second, Defendants argued that the District Court erred by ordering class-wide relief on the § 404(a) claims without requiring individualized proof of detrimental reliance. The Second Circuit held that under the Supreme Court's decision in CIGNA Corporation v. Amara, 563 U.S. 421, 443 (2011), detrimental reliance was not required for the remedy of reformation. Id. at *28-30. Third, Defendants challenged the District Court's conclusion that a mistake – a prerequisite to reformation – was shown by clear and convincing evidence as to all class members. The Second Circuit disagreed, finding that evidence of a mistake "need not be individualized," and the circumstantial evidence presented was sufficient, particularly in light of the finding of concealment. Id. at *30-32. Fourth, Defendants challenged the formula used by the District Court to calculate damages, arguing that it resulted in a windfall to certain participants who experienced little to no wear-away. Id. at *34. The Second Circuit determined that, while Defendants' arguments were "not completely without theoretical appeal," the District Court's award did not "fall outside the range of 'permissible decisions'" available under the applicable abuse of discretion standard of review. Id. at *35.

Sulyma, et al. v. Intel Corporation Investment Policy Committee*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 49788 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 31, 2017). On behalf of a putative class action, Plaintiff – a former Intel employee – sued fiduciaries of the Intel Corp.'s 401(k) Savings Plan and Intel Retirement Contribution Plan for breaches of fiduciary duty relating to the Plans' investment in hedge funds, private equity, and alternative investments, and inadequate disclosures relating to those investments. Defendants moved for summary judgment on all of Plaintiff's claims, arguing that they were time-barred under the statute of limitations because Plaintiff had actual knowledge of the claims through plan disclosures more than three years before filing suit. For claims that it termed "substantive" imprudence claims, the Court noted that for Plaintiff's claims to be time-barred under the law, Plaintiff need only have "knowledge of the transaction that constituted the alleged violation, not by … knowledge of the law." Id. at *11. Despite Defendants' urging, the Court also refused to adopt a "willful blindness" standard for actual knowledge. Id. at *14. For claims that the Court termed "process" imprudence claims, in which a Plaintiff alleges some infirmity or self-dealing in Defendant's investment decision-making process, the Court reasoned that "actual knowledge of the breach will usually require some knowledge of how the fiduciary selected the investment." Id. at *15. The Court concluded that the Plan disclosures provided to Plaintiff gave him actual knowledge of the alleged breaches more than three years before filing suit, regardless of whether his claims were substantive or process claims. Distinguishing Plaintiff's case from Tibble v. Edison International, 729 F.3d 1110, 1120-21 (9th Cir. 2013), vacated on other grounds, 135 S. Ct. 1823 (2015), the Court noted that even after discovery, Plaintiff had offered only conclusory assertions and no evidence of any infirmity in the decision-making process that led to the selection of the investments at issue. Because there was no genuine dispute of material fact that Plaintiff had actual knowledge of the facts comprising his imprudence claims, as well as knowledge of the disclosures he alleged were unlawfully inadequate, the Court granted summary judgment to Defendants as to those claims. The Court also granted summary judgment to Defendants on Plaintiff's derivative duty to monitor and co-fiduciary liability claims.

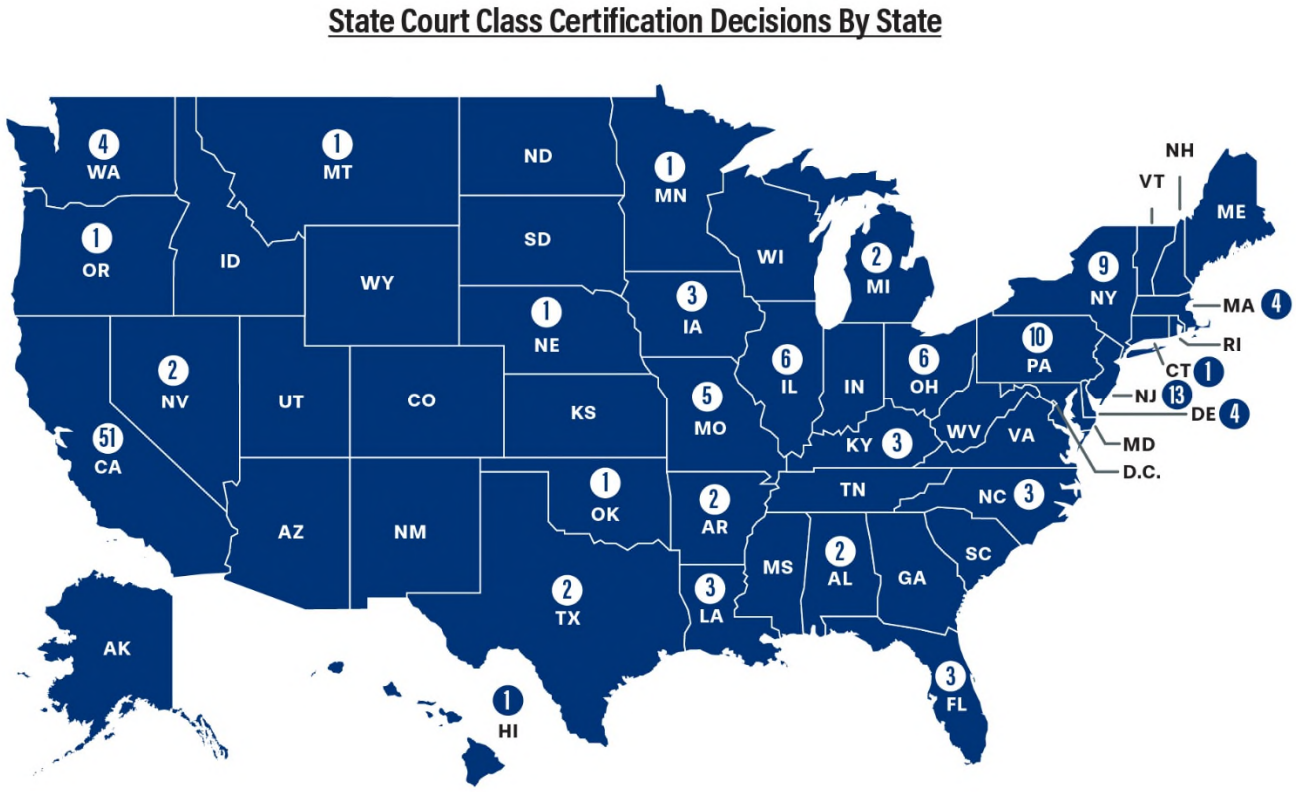
White, et al. v. Chase*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53639 (D. Mass. Jan. 13, 2017). In this class action suit alleging that Defendant had improperly and without proper notice terminated a pension plan in violation of the ERISA, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss based upon the statute of limitations. Plaintiffs pleaded four claims based on the termination of the pension plan, including: (i) that proper notice was not given under 29 U.S.C. § 1054(h); (ii) the amendment effecting the termination was not in writing in violation of 29 U.S.C. § 1102; (iii) the amendment was a breach of fiduciary duty; and (iv) the amendment was made in violation of 29 U.S.C.

§ 1102. The Court had previously found that the first and second claims were timely, after determining that they were more like claims for benefits than claims for breach of fiduciary duty, and based on applying the Massachusetts statute of limitations for breach of contract. Id. at *4-5. Further, the Court had dismissed the third and fourth claims as untimely. Plaintiffs subsequently amended their complaint again, and asserted the first two claims in largely the same fashion as before. Defendant again moved to dismiss by raising the same defenses. The Magistrate Judge rejected Plaintiffs' claims on the grounds that they already had been rejected by the Court as untimely. Id. at *9-10.

VII. Significant State Law Class Action Rulings

Over the last decade, plaintiffs' lawyers have resorted to state court forums on an ever increasing basis to pursue employment-related class action litigation. The civil justice system in each state is obviously different, and the resulting impact on businesses often varies from county to county within certain jurisdictions. Some states and certain counties within those states are viewed by litigants as safe havens for opportunistic class action lawsuits, which position those jurisdictions as launching platforms for dubious claims or novel theories of recovery. Through a variety of factors – including forum shopping, discovery abuse, consolidation and joinder practices, lax evidentiary standards for experts, the absence of limitations on damages, and plaintiff-friendly class certification precedents – those jurisdictions tend to spawn more class action litigation. As reflected by the volume of rulings on class action issues, those jurisdictions in 2017 were clustered in California, Delaware, Florida, Illinois, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Missouri, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Washington. Rulings from California alone resulted in 51 class action decisions of the 144 decisions analyzed in this Chapter.

In terms of class action rulings at the state level, the following map shows those rulings:



Wage & hour claims, in particular, have been filed in state courts at a precipitous rate. The most dominant trend has been a steep rise in the number of class action lawsuits filed in state courts alleging violations of California's overtime laws or the California Labor Code and wage & hour regulations. This trend continued unabated in 2017. The rate of new case filings has continued to grow to the point where multiple class actions are filed in California every day.

The reasons for this trend are varied. First, California's wage & hour laws differ from federal law in subtle yet important ways. This means that an employer might be compliant with federal law, but not California law. Second, California's procedural rules make it easier to file a class action or collective action. In contrast, the Fair Labor Standards Act requires an "opt-in" procedure that is generally less lucrative to plaintiffs than a traditional "opt-out" class action. Third, California's unfair competition law allows claimants to borrow violations of other laws but extend the statute of limitations to four years, which tends to make class actions more lucrative. Fourth, many California Labor Code provisions allow for the recovery of attorneys' fees, creating additional incentives for plaintiffs' counsel to pursue class actions.

This Chapter analyzes reported class action rulings from all state jurisdictions, with an emphasis on the leading Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Illinois, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas, and Washington precedents.

A. Employment Discrimination Rulings

(i) California

Alvarez, et al. v. Bank Of America,* 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 361 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Jan. 19, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of collection associates who were terminated by Defendant, filed suit against Defendant alleging violations of the California Fair Employment and Housing Act ("FEHA") based upon claims of racial discrimination, disparate impact discrimination, and retaliation. The Plaintiffs also claimed intentional infliction of emotional distress as well as tortious terminations. The trial court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to all of Plaintiffs' claims. In a separate hearing, the trial court ordered Plaintiffs to pay Defendant $620,000 in attorneys' fees. On Plaintiffs' consolidated appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's rulings as to summary judgment. However, the Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's decision to award attorneys' fees to Defendant. The evidence presented at the summary judgment hearing was undisputed and established that Plaintiffs were terminated for fraudulent conduct as Plaintiffs admitted to engaging in the fraudulent conduct. Plaintiffs alleged that they were treated differently than Caucasian employees who engaged in the same conduct. Defendant presented undisputed evidence that it investigated all collection associates and conducted a race-neutral investigation into the fraudulent conduct and terminated employees based upon on race-neutral criteria. The Court of Appeal found that Defendant met its burden in showing that Plaintiffs' termination was based on legitimate and non-discriminatory factors and thereby negated a necessary element of Plaintiffs' discrimination claims. Because Plaintiffs failed to present any evidence of intentional discrimination, summary judgment was properly granted. The Court of Appeal also affirmed summary judgment as to the retaliation claim, noting that the protected activity that Plaintiffs alleged in the complaint is not activity protected by the FEHA. There was no evidence that Plaintiffs complained about or reported any alleged discrimination during their employment. Therefore, the Court of Appeal also affirmed summary judgment on the retaliation claim. However, the Court of Appeal found that the trial court abused its discretion in awarding attorneys' fees when it ruled that Plaintiffs' claims were frivolous, as Plaintiffs did not have access to the evidence of Defendant's race-neutral investigation and race-neutral criteria for termination until discovery was conducted. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's order awarding attorneys' fees to Defendant.

Ellis, et al. v. Google*, Case No. CGC-17-561299 (Cal Sup. Ct. Dec. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, three former female employees, filed a putative class action alleging that Defendant "maintained throughout California a 'centrally determined and uniformly applied policy and/or practice of paying its female employees less than male employees for substantially similar work.'" Id. at 2. Plaintiffs also alleged that the U.S. Department of Labor had found, with respect to Google's Mountain View office in 2015, "'systematic compensation disparities against women pretty much across the entire workforce.'" Id. Plaintiffs asserted four causes of action against Defendant based on the alleged disparity, including a California Equal Pay Act claim, a California Labor Code claim, a Business and Professions Code claim, and a claim for a declaratory judgment. Plaintiffs purported to bring these claims on behalf of all female Google employees in California. The Court observed that a class action complaint should be dismissed where, "assuming the truth of the factual allegations in the complaint, there is no reasonable possibility that the requirements for class certification will be satisfied." Id. at 3. The Court discussed the requirements for class certification under California law against that standard, including: "(i) an ascertainable and sufficiently numerous class; (ii) a well-defined community of interest; and (iii) substantial benefits from certification that render proceeding as a class superior to the alternatives." Id. at 4. With respect to the second factor, the Court observed that it has three factors, including "(i) predominant common questions of law or fact; (ii) class representatives with claims or defenses typical of the class; and (iii) class representatives who can adequately represent the class." Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs did not allege sufficient facts to conclude that there was an ascertainable class. Even though Plaintiffs defined the class as "all women employed by Google in California," which on its face was ascertainable, the Court found the definition overbroad because Plaintiffs offered "no means by which only those class members who have claims can be identified from those who should not be included in the class." Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs' allegation that the U.S. Department of Labor "found systemic compensation disparities against women pretty much across the entire workforce" at a Google office in 2015 was insufficient to support the conclusion that "Google implemented a uniform policy of paying all female employees less than male employees for substantially equal or similar work." Id. The Court observed that the complaint did not specify, for example, the specific job classifications to which it pertained, or whether the comparison was made against men who performed substantially similar work under similar working conditions Id. The Court also concluded that Plaintiffs failed to allege that there were common questions of law and fact that predominated over individual issues because Plaintiffs' class was "overbroad," so liability could not be decided for all putative class members in one proceeding. Id. at 5. The Court further opined that Plaintiffs' conclusory allegation that they "performed 'equal work' as their male counterparts" was insufficient to allege that they, in fact, performed equal work, and dismissed their individual claims. Id. at 6.

B. Wage & Hour Rulings

(i) California

Bartoni, et al. v. American Medical Response West*, 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 2899 (Cal. App. 1st Dist. April 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of emergency response workers, alleged that Defendant violated California labor law for failure to provide meal and rest periods and they asserted a representative claim under the Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). Id. at *1. Plaintiffs moved for certification of two classes. The trial court denied class certification and Plaintiffs appealed. Id. The California Court of Appeal declined to decide whether the order denying certification was appealable under the death knell doctrine and treated the appeal as writ of mandate. Id. at *10. At the trial court's request for clarification, Plaintiffs identified eleven alleged unlawful policies in its supplemental brief. Id. at *7. First, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's uniform policy of providing only on-duty meal periods to members of both classes was unlawful. Id. at *6. Second, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's uniform requirement that members of both classes remain on-duty at all times, deprived class members of "off-duty" rest periods, and was unlawful. Id. Lastly, Plaintiffs alleged nine unlawful polices that they characterized as uniform policies and related to the number, duration, and timing of meal and rest periods and were identified in a chart submitted to the trial court as part of Plaintiffs' supplemental briefing. Id. at *7. The Court of Appeal ruled that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying certification with respect to those nine policies because Plaintiffs failed to identify any policy that was uniformly applicable across either class and as individual issues predominated. Id. at *29. These proposed classes included field employees working in 18 different geographic operations with various approaches to meal and rest periods; accordingly, the Court of Appeal reasoned that the trial court properly concluded that individual issues predominated. However, the Court of Appeal vacated the portion of the trial court's order denying class certification for failure to provide off-duty rest periods. The trial court rested its ruling on the conclusion that a meal or rest period during which an employee remains "on-call" – but is not actually interrupted – is properly characterized as an "off-duty" period. Id. at *23. The Court of Appeal ruled that this conclusion was based upon an erroneous legal premise insofar as rest periods are concerned because the California Supreme Court's decision in Augustus v. ABM Security Services, Inc., 385 P.3d 823 (2016), held that on-call time is not off-duty time and cannot be considered a rest period under California law. Id. at *27. As such, the Court of Appeal vacated the order, as it applied to the overarching rest-period policy and it remanded for the trial court to determine whether to certify the overarching rest break claims. Id. at *33.

Betancourt, et al. v. Prudential Overall Supply,* 2017 Cal. App. LEXIS 191 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. Mar. 7, 2017). Plaintiff, an employee, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated § 2698 of the California Labor Code and the Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA") by: (i) failing to pay overtime; (ii) failing to provide meal periods; (iii) failing to provide rest periods; (iv) failing to pay minimum wage; (v) failing to pay timely wages upon termination; (vi) failing to pay timely wages during employment; (vii) failing to complete accurate wage statements; (viii) failing to keep complete and accurate payroll records; and (ix) failing to reimburse necessary business-related expenses and costs. Id. at *2. Defendant moved to compel arbitration of Plaintiff's claims. The trial court denied the motion. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff signed an arbitration agreement, which provided that he would submit to final and binding arbitration of any and all claims and disputes that were related in any way to employment or termination. Id. at *3. The agreement further provided that Plaintiff agreed "to forego any right to bring claims on a representative or class member basis." Id. Defendant argued that all of Plaintiff's claims related to employment and therefore were subject to arbitration pursuant to the agreement. Defendant also asserted that Plaintiff's PAGA claim was not exempt from arbitration because it was not really encompassed by the PAGA. Id. Defendant argued that Plaintiff was attempting to evade arbitration by labeling his wage & hour claims as a PAGA claim. Id. at *4. Plaintiff asserted that there was insufficient evidence of a valid agreement to arbitrate. Plaintiff also contended his complaint only set forth a PAGA claim. Plaintiff also argued that the waiver of his right to bring a representative action under the PAGA was unenforceable because it would violate California-based substantive rights to have its laws enforced. Id. The Court of Appeal found that the trial court correctly denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration because a Defendant cannot rely on a pre-dispute waiver by a private employee to compel arbitration in a PAGA case. Id. at *8. The Court of Appeal stated that since the action was currently a PAGA case, Plaintiff was not bound by the pre-dispute agreement to arbitrate. The Court of Appeal explained that if the California Attorney General filed a lawsuit against Defendant for alleged Labor Code violations, Defendant could not rely on its pre-dispute agreement with Plaintiff to compel arbitration in the State's case. Id. The Court of Appeal held that Plaintiff was suing on behalf of the State, and while a PAGA action might be subject to arbitration, relying on a pre-dispute agreement with a private party could not suffice to compel arbitration of a PAGA claim. Id. at *9. Thus, the Court of Appeal determined that the trial court did not err by denying Defendant's motion.

Cortez, et al. v. Doty Brothers Equipment Co.,* 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 5667 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Aug. 15, 2017). Plaintiff filed a putative class action alleging wage & hour violations of California law and a representative claim under the Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). Id. at *6. Defendant moved to compel arbitration of the individual statutory claims and to dismiss the class claims and representative PAGA claim, asserting that they were unauthorized pursuant to the parties' collective bargaining agreement ("CBA"). Id. at *7. The trial court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration of the individual claims and severed and stayed the PAGA claim. Id. at *2. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal denied Plaintiff's writ of mandate challenging the order to compel arbitration. The parties then agreed to allow the trial court, rather than the arbitrator, to determine arbitrability of the class claims. Id. The trial court ruled that the class claims were unauthorized under the CBA and dismissed them. Id. Plaintiff filed a notice of appeal regarding the order dismissing his class claims and the order compelling arbitration, asserting that that the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to review. The Court of Appeal treated the consolidated appeal as a petition for writ of mandate and considered the merits of the trial court's orders compelling arbitration of Plaintiff's individual claims and dismissing the class claims. Id. at *5. The Court of Appeal granted Plaintiff's petition in part, ruling that the claims for failure to timely pay wages upon separation from employment and unfair competition were not encompassed in the arbitration provision of the CBA. Id. In all other respects, the Court of Appeal denied the petition on the basis that the remaining claims were subject to arbitration and the trial court's dismissal of the class claims was proper because the CBA did not authorize class-wide arbitration. Id. at *25. The Court of Appeal ruled that the question of whether an arbitration agreement authorizes arbitration of class action claims is also a matter of contract interpretation. Absent language in the arbitration provision itself or extrinsic evidence establishing the parties' agreement to arbitrate class-wide claims, only individual claims may be arbitrated. Silence on the issue may not be construed as agreement. Plaintiff did not dispute this interpretation of the CBA or otherwise challenge the trial court's determination that the language of the CBA did not contemplate class-wide arbitration. Id. at *24. Rather, Plaintiff argued that any employer-employee contract that prohibited class-wide arbitration violated the protections for collective action afforded employees under the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"), and therefore was invalid. Plaintiff requested that the Court of Appeal defer ruling on that issue, noting the split of circuits on this issue and because the U.S. Supreme Court had recently granted certiorari in Ernst & Young, LLP v. Morris, 137 S. Ct. 809 (2017), to resolve the issue. The Court of Appeal declined to defer its ruling, reasoning that the California Supreme Court had already decided that the NLRA did not bar parties from excluding class claims from the agreement to arbitrate. Id. at *25. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal and directed the trial court to vacate its order compelling arbitration only as to Plaintiff's two claims that were not encompassed in the arbitration provision of the CBA. Id.

Crawley, et al. v. Airtouch Cellular*, 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 5216 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. July 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retail store managers, filed a putative class action alleging overtime violations as result of Defendant's misclassification of Plaintiffs as exempt from overtime compensation requirements. Id. at *1. The trial court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification and ruled that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the requirements of typicality, predominance, and superiority. Id. at *13. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's decision. Id. at *57. Plaintiffs argued that the trial court erred by concluding that individualized, rather than common issues predominated. Id. at *24. The Court of Appeal rejected Plaintiffs' argument and concluded that substantial evidence supported the trial court's ruling that individual issues predominated. Id. at *26. Plaintiffs argued that they did not qualify for exemptions because many of their tasks were non-managerial and Defendant's policies made it impossible for Plaintiffs to exercise any discretion or independent judgment when completing tasks. Id. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs fell under the administrative and executive exemptions to California minimum wage law. Id. at *18. The regulations governing both exemptions required an examination of the work performed by the employee and the amount of time they spent on such work, in determining whether an employee is primarily engaged in performing exempt duties. Id. at *20. The Court of Appeal ruled that because there was sufficient evidence that Plaintiffs spent different amounts on time on a wide variety of tasks during the workday, individual issues predominated. Defendant presented evidence from employees and experts that the amounts of time on different tasks depended on a variety of factors, including the size and location of the store and the experience level of Plaintiffs' subordinates. Defendant also presented evidence, contrary to Plaintiffs' argument, that Defendant's policies did not deprive Plaintiffs of discretion by requiring them to engage only in non-exempt work. Id. at *29. Defendant presented evidence that Plaintiffs routinely interviewed candidates and made hiring and disciplinary recommendations. Id. at *30. Defendant's evidence tended to show that its policies did not eliminate managerial discretion in the fashion Plaintiffs claimed although Plaintiffs' evidence suggested otherwise. Given this conflict, the Court of Appeal found that the trial court could reasonably conclude that the question of whether Defendant's standardized policies placed Plaintiffs outside of the exemptions depended on an analysis of how each Plaintiff operated, and was not susceptible to common proof. Id. at *34. Plaintiffs also argued that the trial court erred by failing to consider their primary theory that Plaintiffs could not exercise discretion and independent judgment on matters of significance and they performed virtually no exempt tasks. Id. at *35. The Court of Appeal rejected this argument and found that the trial court acknowledged the detailed nature of Defendant's policies and it reasonably concluded that such operational minutia offered little insight into class-wide liability, especially considering that the declarations showed that Plaintiffs handled their time very differently depending upon the nature and level of tasks. The Court of Appeal reasoned that the fact that Defendant had common policies applicable to all Plaintiffs could not alone compel class certification as most duties that Plaintiffs performed were exempt as a matter of law, such as interviewing, hiring, disciplining, training, and directing work. The Court of Appeal ruled that the trial court appropriately weighed the common and individual issues, and reasonably concluded that certification was not proper because Plaintiffs' classification hinged on individualized proof. Id. at *37. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's decision denying certification.

De La Cruz, et al. v. Standard Drywall,* 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 446 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Jan. 23, 2017). Plaintiff, a plasterer, filed a class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay all wages due, failed to provide meal and rest periods, failed to pay wages of terminated or resigned employees, unfair competition, and failed to reimburse business expenses in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiff sought relief on behalf of himself and a putative class consisting of all non-exempt hourly-paid employees currently or formerly employed by Defendant in California during the four years prior to the filing of the complaint through the date of certification. Defendant filed a petition to compel arbitration, asserting that employees worked pursuant to collective bargaining agreements ("CBAs"). Defendant contended that Plaintiff's claims were subject to the arbitration procedures set forth in two CBAs that he submitted to the Court as evidence. Id. at *3. The trial court denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration, finding that there was a dispute as to the threshold issue of whether an enforceable arbitration agreement existed. Id. at *5. The trial court stated that Defendant had the initial burden to show by a preponderance of evidence that there exists an enforceable arbitration agreement between the parties. Id. Defendant pointed to a declaration from another employee to support its contention that it was a party to the two CBAs. However, the trial court found that the cited portions of the declaration provided no evidentiary support for Defendant's argument that it is a party to either of the CBAs. Id. at *7-8. Defendant was not a signatory to either agreement and the declaration did not provide evidence that Defendant was a party to either of the two arbitration agreements on which it sought to rely. Id. at *8. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's decision. Defendant contended that the trial court erred in holding that it had not proven the existence of the agreements and their applicable arbitration provisions by a preponderance of the evidence; erred in shifting the burden of establishing waiver of arbitration to Defendant to prove that it had not waived arbitration; and erred in not granting Defendant a further evidentiary hearing. Id. at *10. The Court of Appeal stated that it was well established that on a petition to compel arbitration, Defendant bore the burden of proving the existence of a valid arbitration agreement by the preponderance of the evidence. The Court of Appeal found that the trial court did not apply a heightened or improper burden of proof and found Defendant's showing to be insufficient. Id. at *12. The Court of Appeal also held that Defendant's claim that the trial court improperly shifted the burden to it to prove that it had not waived arbitration failed, as the trial court properly assigned the burden to Defendant in the first instance to prove the existence of a valid arbitration agreement covering the dispute. Id. at *13. Further, the Court of Appeal opined that if Defendant sought the opportunity to present additional evidence, Defendant did not make an offer of proof as to what additional evidence it could offer at a continued hearing. Id. Since the trial court was not required to speculate that Defendant was capable of presenting additional evidence that would cure the inadequacy, the Court of Appeal reasoned that it did not err in failing to do so. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal determined that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying Defendant's motion to compel, and it thereby affirmed the trial court's judgment.

Espejo, et al. v. The Copley Press, Inc*., 13 Cal. App. 5th 329 (4th Dist. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of newspaper delivery carriers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated California law and committed unfair business practices for its failure to reimburse Plaintiffs for business expenses. The trial court ruled that Plaintiffs were employees and not independent contractors, and thus entitled to recover under the Unfair Competition Law ("UCL") and entered a judgment in favor of Plaintiffs. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the California Court of Appeal ruled that there was substantial evidence that supported the trial court's finding that Plaintiffs were employees, even though their contracts indicated that they were independent contractors. Id. at 344. The trial court found that the contract was an adhesion contract because it was on a "take it or leave it basis." Plaintiffs never negotiated a rate of pay increase, and Defendant unilaterally revised the contract 11 times for its sole benefit. Id. at 335. The Court of Appeal also noted that the trial court identified facts and evidence that supported its finding that Defendant retained sufficient control such that the Plaintiffs were employees. The Court of Appeal ruled that there was no basis to decertify the class on the ground that the class was not adequately represented. Id. at 338. Defendant contended that the trial court erred in awarding the class expenses that Defendant had already reimbursed by paying the carriers enhanced compensation to cover their vehicle expenses and other business expenses. The carriers' invoices did not set forth a lump sum payment that included a means of identifying the amount being paid for labor performed and the amount being paid as reimbursement for business expenses, and the only payment the carriers received was after expenses were deducted. Id. at 350. The Court rejected Defendant's enhanced compensation defense because the language of the business code required an employer to identify the amount of compensation intended to reimburse expenses at or near the time of payment. As such, the trial court properly ordered the newspaper to reimburse the carriers by paying them enhanced compensation to cover expenses. However, there was testimony that with respect to expenses, Plaintiffs did not include any credits or reversals on the invoices when calculating expenses. Therefore, the Court of Appeal ordered that Plaintiffs' award be reduced by the amount of any documented and readily identifiable payments, credits, or reversals that the class members received as expenses. Defendants were not precluded from being credited with the credits and reversals specified on carrier invoices in the calculation of Plaintiffs' monetary award. The Court of Appeal directed the trial court to redetermine the amount of the class award and to reduce the award by the amount of any documented and readily identifiable payments, credits, or reversals in expenses that Defendant established that the class members received. Defendant also argued that the trial court erred in awarding attorneys' fees because Plaintiffs failed to meet the requirements for attorneys' fees under the statute. The Court of Appeal concluded the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it awarded attorneys' fees or in adopting Plaintiffs' lodestar amount. Further, the Court of Appeal rejected Plaintiffs' argument on its appeal that the trial court abused its discretion in its decision not to enhance the lodestar. However, the Court of Appeal remanded with directions for the trial court to reconsider the attorneys' fee award in light of the possible reduction of Plaintiffs' monetary recovery and to determine whether Plaintiffs' limited success required reduction of the fee. Id. at 359. In all other respect, the Court of Appeal affirmed the decision of the trial court. Id. at 361.

Espinoza, et al. v. East West Bank,* 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 3478 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. May 17, 2017). Plaintiff, an assistant branch manager, filed a class action alleging that Defendant misclassified assistant branch managers as exempt in violation of various provisions of the California Labor Code and the California Business and Professions Code. Plaintiff moved for class certification, and the trial court denied the motion. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's ruling. Plaintiff's proposed class was comprised of approximately 172 former and current assistant branch managers who work at Defendant's 98 bank branches in California. Plaintiff asserted that class treatment was appropriate because all assistant branch managers performed the same tasks, were required to follow Defendant's standard policies and procedures, and that Defendant's expectations about the requirements of the assistant branch manager job could be determined on a class-wide basis. Id. at *3. The trial court found that Plaintiff satisfied the requirements of ascertainability, numerosity, typicality, and adequacy of representation, but failed to show common questions of law and fact predominated over individual issues. Id. at *17. The trial court found that Defendant produced evidence indicating while it might be possible to create an exhaustive list of tasks collectively performed by assistant branch managers, each assistant branch manager in fact performed some combination of these tasks in a highly individualized manner. The trial court therefore held that determination as to whether each task performed was properly classified as exempt or non-exempt, would not be dispositive as inquiries would be necessary as to the individual activities of each assistant branch manager. how much time was spent on each task, and how each task was performed. Id. at *17-18. The trial court also found that Plaintiff failed to show a class action was superior to separate lawsuits by individual class members. On appeal, the Court of Appeal found that the parties presented conflicting evidence as to the job duties and the amount of time spent on these tasks. Plaintiff submitted declarations from seven former assistant branch managers who stated they spent between 70% to 95% of their time performing non-managerial tasks, but Defendant presented evidence demonstrating the tasks were not uniform, and the time spent on each activity varied depending on the individual assistant branch manager. Id. at *35. Further, the Court of Appeal noted that there was substantial evidence of other differences in the job duties and time spent on each task. Id. at *36. The Court of Appeal therefore determined that the trial court could reasonably find individual issues predominated because assistant branch managers performed their jobs in a highly individualized manner. The Court of Appeal further concluded that even assuming common issues predominated, the trial court reasonably could have determined that individual issues could not be fairly and efficiently managed within a class setting, and therefore it did not err in finding that Plaintiff failed to meet the superiority requirement. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's ruling denying class certification.

In Re ABM Industries Overtime Cases,* 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 8415 (Cal. App. 1st. Dist. Dec. 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of janitors, filed a consolidated putative class action alleging various claims, including violations California labor laws. Plaintiffs moved for class certification of a general class of workers and various sub-classes of workers allegedly subjected to particular wage & hour violations. The trial court ruled that the report of Plaintiffs' expert was inadmissible and denied Plaintiffs' motion for certification. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed. First, the Court of Appeal concluded that the trial court erred in its determination that: (i) Plaintiffs had not properly established their proposed expert as a qualified expert; and (ii) the information contained in their expert's declaration was not material. The trial court acknowledged that Plaintiffs' expert indicated an expertise in creating, managing, and analyzing large databases, but rejected him as an expert because there was no evidence that he had formal training or degrees that qualified him as an expert to review the time-keeping and payroll data at issue. The Court of Appeal ruled that the trial court abused its discretion when it refused to qualify the expert in database management and analysis based upon his experience. The Court of Appeal found that the trial court's emphasis on formal education and membership in professional organizations was misplaced given the expert's familiarity with numerous, highly complex transactions in that subject matter. Further, the Court of Appeal ruled that the trial court erred when it disregarded Plaintiffs' expert evidence of a common practice. Second, the Court of Appeal held that the trial court erred when it refused to certify the sub-classes because they were not ascertainable, and it determined that the sub-classes were all defined using objective characteristics and common transactional facts that allowed a potential class member to identify himself or herself as having a right to recover pursuant to that sub-class. The Court of Appeal concluded that the class was ascertainable and possible over-inclusiveness in the method proposed for identifying potential class members did not defeat ascertainability. Third, the Court of Appeal opined that Plaintiffs' allegations presented predominantly common questions and the trial court improperly focused on the minutiae of each Plaintiff's individual situation. The Court of Appeal determined that when the merits of the expert's evidence of payroll practices was considered with Plaintiffs' evidence, it was clear that numerous common issues predominated in this matter. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal held that the trial court abused its discretion when it excluded Plaintiffs' expert evidence and refused to grant class certification. As such, the Court of Appeal reversed and remanded the trial court's order.

Kizer, et al. v. Tristar Risk Management,* 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 4457 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. June 26, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of claims examiners, filed a putative class action alleging that Defendant misclassified Plaintiffs as exempt and failed to pay overtime, and committed other wage & hour violations of California law. Id. at *6. The trial court denied Plaintiffs' motion to certify the class. On Plaintiffs appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. Id. at *35. The trial court denied class certification because Plaintiffs failed to show that they worked hours or days that required overtime compensation or that Defendant had a generally applicable policy or practice that required employees to work overtime. Plaintiffs were required to work 7.5 hours per day, but were also offered alternative work schedules that allowed claims examiners to work 8.33 or 8.5 hours a day in exchange for a day off every other week. Id. at *5. The trial court ruled that Plaintiffs failed to show that they could establish Defendant's liability based on proof common to all class members. Id. at *3. On appeal, Plaintiffs contended that the trial court erred because the amount of overtime worked was a damages issue, and the need for individual proof of damages was not a proper basis for denying class certification. Id. at *17. The Court of Appeal ruled that the trial court did not deny certification on this basis and it did not err when it denied the motion because Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the commonality requirement. Id. The Court of Appeal observed that Plaintiffs failed to show that their liability theory could be established on a class-wide basis through common proof as they failed to show that common fact issues existed and predominated. Id. at *20. The Court of Appeal reasoned that typically, in overtime claims, Plaintiffs present evidence of an employer's policy or practice that required the class members to work overtime and Plaintiffs failed to present any evidence of any such policy or practice. Plaintiffs also argued that the trial court erred in refusing class certification on their California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL") claim because the UCL did not require Plaintiff to establish that each class member individually suffered injury, and therefore Plaintiffs were not required to present evidence of the amount of overtime each putative class member worked. Id. at *31. However, the Court of Appeal ruled that the trial court did not deny Plaintiffs' class certification motion on this basis, but rather denied certification because Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the commonality requirement. Id. at *35. The Court of Appeal concluded that substantial evidence supported the trial court's decision that Plaintiffs failed to make that showing. Id. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's decision to deny class certification.

Matam, et al. v. Oracle Corp.*, 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 3087 (Cal. App. 1st Dist. April 28, 2017). Plaintiff, a former technical analyst, filed an action alleging that Defendant's employment practices violated various state wage & hour laws and constituted unfair business practices. Plaintiff's case, both in the trial and appellate courts, turned largely on the reliability of his expert's report. The opinion of Plaintiff's expert was based on a comparison of Defendant's payroll records, internal time records, and time-cards. Id. at *3-4. In comparing those data sets, Plaintiff's expert purported to find a discrepancy between the number of overtime hours technical analysts worked and the number of overtime hours for which Defendant had paid them. In addition, by reviewing the time-cards, the expert purported to uncover that many analysts took shortened or late meal breaks, or missed them altogether. Id. at *6. Plaintiff moved to certify a class, arguing that his claims were subject to common proof through the expert's comparison and analysis of Defendant's records. Defendant opposed Plaintiff's motion to certify, relying on its own expert's report and 42 declarations, 22 of which were from putative class members. Defendant's rebuttal expert report identified significant flaws in the methodology and care used by Plaintiff's expert. Id. at *7. Among other flaws, Plaintiff's expert included on-call, non-worked, and sick time in his time-card numbers, which created significant discrepancies between the purported time worked and the time paid. Id. In addition, Plaintiff's expert misread Defendant's spreadsheets and ignored a $21 million overtime payment that it had made. Id. at *8. Finally, the expert made a number of assumptions about the data he analyzed, but failed to disclose those assumptions in his report. The trial court denied Plaintiff's motion for certification, concluding that Plaintiff's expert report was unreliable based largely on the reasons set forth in Defendant's opposition. Specifically, the trial court found that because Plaintiff relied on his expert's report to establish that three of his claims could be determined by common proof, and because that report was unreliable, he could not establish commonality for those claims. Plaintiff appealed the trial court's ruling on two main grounds. Plaintiff first argued that whether or not his expert's calculations were accurate should not have been considered on his motion for class certification because accuracy of expert reports was a merits question. Second, Plaintiff argued that the trial court improperly weighed the competing declarations submitted by the parties. In evaluating the first question, the California Court of Appeal noted that whether or not common issues predominated over individual ones was often closely tied to the ultimate merits of a claim. Id. at *15. The Court of Appeal also rejected Plaintiff's argument that the opinion of Plaintiff's expert went only to the merits of alleged damages in the case, holding that when a party's expert report serves as its sole support for establishing that common questions predominated, the party has transformed that report into evidence of liability, not damages. The Court of Appeal reasoned that "Plaintiff's only evidence that uncompensated overtime and missed, late, or short meal breaks could be established class-wide with common proof was [his expert's] declaration and his comparison of [two of Oracle's] databases. The issue here is whether Plaintiff can establish that class members worked overtime for which they were not paid or had late, short, or missed meal breaks on a class-wide basis, and this is a question of entitlement to damages, not damages themselves." Id. at *19. The Court of Appeal also found it was within the trial court's discretion to weigh competing declarations from the parties in order to determine whether the requirements for class certification were satisfied, and that doing so was not an improper evaluation of the merits. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the denial of Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Melendez, et al. v. San Francisco Baseball Associates LLC,* 2017 Cal. App. LEXIS 899 (Cal. App. 1st Dist. Oct. 17, 2017). Plaintiff, a security guard, contended that he and other security guards were employed "intermittingly" for specific job assignments (baseball games or other events) and were discharged "at the end of a homestand, at the end of a baseball season, at the end of an inter-season event like a fan fest, college football game, a concert, a series of shows, or other events." Plaintiff asserted that under § 201 of the California Labor Code, he and the putative class members were entitled to but did not receive immediate payment of their final wages upon each such "discharge." Id. at *1. Defendant contended that payment immediately after each such event was not required because under the terms of the collective bargaining agreement ("CBA"), Plaintiff and all such security guards were not intermittent employees, but were "year-round employees who remain employed with the Giants until they resign or are terminated pursuant to the CBA." Id. at *2. Defendant moved to compel arbitration or to dismiss the action under the arbitration provision of the CBA and on the ground that the action was preempted by § 301 of the Labor-Management Relations Act. The trial court denied the motion. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal agreed that the present dispute was not within the scope of the arbitration provision in the CBA, but concluded that arbitration was required by § 301 of the Labor-Management Relations Act. Id. The trial court held that resolution of the controversy did not require interpretation of the CBA, but simply a determination of whether the security guards were discharged within the meaning of § 201 of the Labor Code at the conclusion of an event or series of baseball games. Id. at *9. The trial court observed that the dispute can be resolved without interpretation of "any specific language in the CBA." Id. at *10. The trial court reasoned that none of the provisions in the CBA, such as those "relating to vacations; how employees are assigned work; and so on…have any connection…to whether Plaintiffs here were or were not terminated, the core (if not only) factual issue pertinent to the statutory claims." Id. The Court of Appeal stated that while resolution of the controversy may not turn on the interpretation of any specific language in the CBA, it would not necessarily follow that the meaning of the CBA was irrelevant to the outcome of the dispute. Id. at *11. The parties agreed that the underlying issue was whether Plaintiffs were "discharged" within the meaning of § 201. In order to determine whether the conclusion of a baseball game or season or other event constituted a discharge, the Court of Appeal reasoned that it would be necessary to first determine the terms of employment. Id. The Court of Appeal opined that then it would be essential to determine whether the CBA provided for employment of security guards for only a single game or homestand or season or other event, or whether the agreement contemplated extended employment from season to season, event to event, or year to year, recognizing that not every day will be a day of work. Id. Accordingly, since application of § 201 necessarily "requires the interpretation of the CBA" and "substantially depends upon analysis of its terms," federal preemption principles applied and the Court of Appeal held that the dispute must be resolved pursuant to the grievance procedure and arbitration provisions under the CBA. Id. at *14-15. As a result, the Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's ruling.

Miranda, et al. v. Pacer Cartage, Inc.*, 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 5966 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. Aug. 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of truck drivers, filed a claim with the California Labor Commission alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors, and as such, they were entitled to reimbursement for their business expenses under the California Labor Code ("CLC"). Id. at *1. The Labor Commissioner had found in favor of Plaintiffs and awarded them more than $2,000,000 in expenses and Defendant appealed to the trial court. The trial court rendered judgment in favor of Plaintiffs and ruled that they were independent contractors, and therefore entitled to reimbursement. Id. at *2. On Defendant's appeal to the California Court of Appeal, Defendant argued that: (i) the trial court erred by failing to accept its lump sum reimbursement method that covered both wages and expenses; (ii) the evidence did not support a finding that Plaintiffs were not reimbursed for their expenses; (iii) the trial court failed to make a reasonable approximation of the extent of non-reimbursement; and (iv) the trial court erred in awarding Plaintiffs reimbursement for their truck lease payments. The California Court of Appeal affirmed in part and reversed in part. The Court of Appeal concluded that the trial court erred in awarding Plaintiffs their truck lease payments because it was lawful for an employer to require its employees to provide their own vehicles as a condition of employment. Id. at *37. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal ruled that Plaintiffs were not entitled to reimbursement for their lease payments and reversed the trial court's decision on that basis. However, the Court of Appeal affirmed the rest of the trial court's ruling. Id. at *38.

Moncada, et al. v. Wave Crest Hotels & Resorts LLC,* 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 7443 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. Oct. 31, 2017). Plaintiffs, two hotel employees, filed a class action asserting that Defendant failed to provide employees with timely meal breaks, rest breaks for employees who worked between six and eight hours, and payment for five-minute periods before and after the end of scheduled shifts in violation of state wage & hour laws. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendant failed to properly calculate its employees' base pay for purposes of paying overtime. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification of several sub-classes. The trial court found that with respect to the bulk of the Plaintiffs' claims, Defendant's liability could not be determined on a class-wide basis, and therefore class certification was not appropriate. Id. at *3. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's ruling with respect to Plaintiffs' meal time, rest time, and grace period claims, finding that those claims were not amenable to class treatment because liability could not be determined on a class-wide basis. Id. at *11. With respect to meal time breaks, in which Defendant's express policy complied with the law, the Court of Appeal held that the trial court could reasonably conclude that liability could only be shown by way of individual proof, making class treatment impractical. Id. at *12. As to the rest time claims, the Court of Appeal reasoned that the fact many employees worked between six and eight hours plainly did show they were denied a second break, and conflicting evidence from employees failed to show any common policy. Thus, the Court of Appeal determined that the trial court properly concluded that class treatment was not appropriate because liability would require individual proof. Id. at *15. As for the grace period claims, Plaintiffs argued that by effectively rounding down employee shifts, Defendant was unfairly depriving employees of earned wages. Id. However, the Court of Appeal explained that in order to prove such an "off-the-clock" claim, Plaintiffs would have to rebut the presumption they only began working when their scheduled shifts commenced and ended which they could not do without individual proof of such work. Id. at *15-16. Plaintiffs also argued that because front desk employees received "upsell" bonuses, the bonuses should have been used in calculating their overtime pay. Id. at *16. The trial court had found that neither Plaintiff was a suitable representative for the claim because neither had worked at the front desk and earned the upsell bonuses. The Court of Appeal found that in failing to give Plaintiffs an opportunity to locate a new potential class representative, the trial court abused its discretion. The Court of Appeal stated that until a trial court had given class representatives an opportunity to locate a suitable representative, it could not find that such a representative was unavailable. Id. at *19. Accordingly, as to Plaintiffs' front desk employees claim, the Court of Appeal reversed and remanded with instructions that Plaintiffs be permitted to locate a suitable representative and amend their complaint accordingly.

Ogle, et al. v. Restoration Hardware*, 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 2834 (Cal. App. 3d Dist. April 26, 2017). Plaintiff, a customer service representative, filed a class action alleging that Defendant failed to provide meal periods, failed to pay overtime compensation, failed to provide pay stubs or itemized statements, and failed to timely pay wages in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, and the trial court denied the motion. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's decision. Plaintiff's proposed class definition contained a broad overarching class and six sub-classes. The broader class included "all former and current customer service representatives who worked for Defendant at its call center in Tracy, California, who were paid on an hourly basis during the period June 1, 2007 to the date of the filing of a motion for class certification in this case." Id. at *5. The trial court found that Plaintiff's class was not sufficiently numerous and was not ascertainable. Plaintiff contended that the trial court erred in finding that her overarching class or any of her proposed sub-classes were not ascertainable. In concluding Plaintiff failed to establish the existence of an ascertainable class, the trial court reasoned that Plaintiff's evidence was overly vague and not sufficient to demonstrate the existence of a sufficiently numerous class. The Court of Appeal found that the trial court properly recognized that the umbrella class definition encompassed class members not potentially harmed by Defendant's alleged conduct. As defined, the umbrella class included all current and former customer service representatives even though he or she never took a late first meal period, never worked more than 10 hours, never missed a second meal period, never worked overtime, and never earned a bonus. Id. at *19. While the various sub-class definitions were more narrowly drawn, the Court of Appeal concluded that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding Plaintiff failed to carry her burden of presenting substantial evidence to show the sub-classes were sufficiently numerous to justify class treatment. Id. at *30. The Court of Appeal thus determined that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying class certification on the basis of a lack of ascertainability and numerosity. Id. at *33. As to whether common questions of law existed, the Court of Appeal found that the trial court properly determined that individual questions would predominate over Plaintiff's meal break claims. The Court of Appeal stated that while one may be able to determine on a common basis that the employees' work schedules did not include a second meal break, such evidence, without a more individualized inquiry, was insufficient to establish that Defendant was liable for failing to provide second meal breaks. Id. at *45. Instead, the Court of Appeal determined that the evidence suggested in order to prove Defendant did not provide second meal breaks in violation of the Labor Code, Plaintiff would have to present an analysis day-by-day, and employee-by-employee. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal concluded that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying Plaintiff's motion for class certification, and it affirmed the trial court's decision.

Segovia, et al. v. Chipotle Mexican Grill,* 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 1521 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Mar. 2, 2017). Plaintiff, a non-exempt hourly employee, filed a class action alleging that she and similarly-situated employees were not paid all vacation wages that were earned, were not reimbursed for all work-related mileage expenses, were not paid for off-the-clock work, were not permitted to take legally-mandated meal and rest breaks, were not paid all overtime hours at the correct rate, and were not given accurate and itemized wage statements in violation of the California Labor Code. Id. at *2. The parties settled the matter for a gross settlement amount of $2 million. The settlement provided that the settlement amount for each class member would be based on each individual's pro rata share of the total amount of wages earned by the settlement class members during the class period. Id. at *3. The trial court granted preliminary approval of the settlement, and stated that the settlement appeared on its face to be fair, reasonable, and adequate, and to have been the product of serious, informed, and extensive arm's length negotiations. Id. at *4. The claims administrator sent the settlement notice to the 38,344 class members on the class list. Four class members filed objections to the proposed settlement, and 35 individuals elected to opt-out. The objectors contended that the named Plaintiff had not shown the proposed settlement was fair, reasonable, and adequate; the notice to class members did not comply with due process; and Plaintiff did not meet her burden on class certification. Objector Lopez-Carrillo did not opt-out of the settlement, nor did he seek to intervene in the action. The trial court conducted a final approval and fairness hearing and entered an order overruling the objections of Lopez-Carrillo and the three other objectors, approved the settlement as "fair, reasonable, adequate, and in the public interest," and directed entry of a final judgment. Id. at *5. Lopez-Carrillo appealed and on appeal, the California Court of Appeal upheld the trial court's ruling. Lopez-Carrillo contended that the settlement's FLSA opt-in process did not comport with state or federal law; the trial court abused its discretion in concluding the proposed settlement was fair, reasonable, and adequate; and the trial court erred in granting certification of the settlement class. Id. at *6. Plaintiff and Defendant asserted that the appeal should be dismissed because Lopez-Carrillo lacked standing to appeal. The Court of Appeal noted at the outset that as a general rule, only parties of record may appeal and that the appellant must both have been a "party" and to have been "aggrieved" by the judgment. Id. at *8. The Court of Appeal further stated that it had previously ruled that only a party of record can appeal. Id. at *9. The Court of Appeal held that Lopez-Carrillo, as a non-party to the action, therefore lacked standing to appeal the trial court's decision. The Court of Appeal opined that unnamed class members who disagreed with a proposed settlement were not deprived of appellate recourse as they may move to formally intervene in the action and, if permitted to intervene, then appeal the judgment entered relative to the settlement; alternatively, if denied the right to intervene, they may appeal the order denying intervention. Id. at*13-14. Furthermore, the Court of Appeal determined that if every unnamed class member who objected to a proposed settlement could appeal individually, class action litigation would become unwieldy and unmanageable and the benefits of the class action device would be undermined. Id. at *15. Accordingly, since Lopez-Carrillo was not a party of record, the Court of Appeal concluded that he lacked standing to appeal.

Silva, et al. v. See's Candy Shops, Inc.,* 2017 Cal. App. LEXIS 1159 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. Jan. 5, 2017). Plaintiff filed an action against Defendant alleging wage & hour violations. Plaintiff brought the action in her individual capacity, on behalf of a class of employees, and under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). The trial court certified the Plaintiff's wage & hour claims challenging Defendant's rounding and grace period policies. Defendant rounded time clock punches to the nearest tenth of an hour and also permitted employees to clock-in 10 minutes before and after a shift, but calculated work time minutes from the employees' scheduled start and end times. The trial court dismissed Defendant's affirmative defense that Defendant's rounding policy was lawful. Defendant argued that its employees were fairly and fully compensated and that these policies were consistent with state and federal law. Plaintiff asserted that the rounding policy was unlawful under California law. The trial court initially agreed with Plaintiff and dismissed the affirmative defense. On Defendant's appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed and remanded because an employer is allowed to use a rounding policy if it is "fair and neutral on its face" and "is used in a manner that will not result, over a period of time, in failure to compensate the employees properly." Id. at *2. On remand, the trial court granted summary judgment on all of Plaintiff's claims. On Plaintiff's further appeal, the Court of Appeal ruled that the trial court erred in granting summary judgment as to some of Plaintiff's individual claims, but properly entered summary judgment as to all other claims. The Court of Appeal found that Defendant was entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law on the class claim based upon the rounding policy because this policy was proper under California law and did not result in under-compensation. The Court of Appeal also granted summary judgment on Plaintiff's challenge to the grace period policies because Defendant submitted evidence that employees were not working during the grace period. As Plaintiff offered nothing to negate this evidence, the Court of Appeal affirmed the grant of summary judgment on this claim. The Court of Appeal, however, held that the trial court erred in granting summary judgment as to Plaintiff's individual claims. The trial court adjudicated her individual claims even though Defendant did not move for summary judgment on any individual claims. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff never alleged individual claims in her first and second cause of action, and Plaintiff released the claims in a previous settlement agreement. The California Court of Appeal agreed with Plaintiff that she had sufficiently alleged individual claims in the first two causes of action, which alleged that she did not receive her required rest and meal periods and that the Defendant failed to reimburse her for expenses incurred through performance of job duties. The Court of Appeal held that summary judgment was not properly granted on the issue because they were separate theories from the challenges to the rounding and grace period policies. The Court of Appeals further ruled that summary judgment on the PAGA issues was proper because those claims were challenging the same rounding and grace period policies and Defendant was entitled to judgment on those issues.

Stoetzl, et al. v. State Of California,* 14 Cal. App. 5th 1256 (1st Dist. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of correctional officers, brought coordinated class actions alleging wage & hour violations and that they were improperly denied pay for time they spent under their employer's control before and after their work shifts. Plaintiffs contended that Defendant breached their contracts and violated California's minimum wage law, when it failed to pay them for all hours worked. Id. at 1269. The trial court entered judgment in favor of Defendants on the basis that Plaintiffs' entitlement to overtime pay was controlled by federal law, rather than by California law. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed with respect to the non-union represented employees, and affirmed with respect to the union-represented employees in part. Id. at 1260. The union-represented Plaintiffs entered a memorandum of understanding ("MOU") with Defendant that was approved by the legislature and was enacted into law. The Court of Appeal held that the MOU specified that federal law would apply to preclude compensation for time spent under the employer's control before and after work shifts, and this superseded California's minimum wage law. Id. at 1263. As such, the trial court properly concluded that the FLSA, not California's minimum wage law, governed the claims of union-represented Plaintiffs. The Court of Appeal also held that the trial court properly concluded that the union-represented employees could not establish a breach of common law contract claim for failure to pay overtime, as their compensable time was governed by federal law rather than state law pursuant to the MOU. Id. at 1279. The Court of Appeal ruled that the trial court erred, however, with respect to non-union Plaintiffs because they were entitled to pay for all hours worked under the California law, as the minimum wage provisions were not superseded by the California pay scale manual as Defendant asserted. Id. at 1276. Further, the Court of Appeal concluded that the non-union Plaintiffs could also maintain breach of contract claims based on state common law for failure to pay overtime. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed as to the non-union Plaintiffs' employees minimum wage and overtime claims. The Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's decision that Plaintiffs could not maintain claims under §§ 222 and 223 of the California Labor Code for failure to pay contractual overtime owed under a collective bargaining agreement. Id. at 1277. Because the union-represented Plaintiffs, agreed to have their hours worked measured by federal law and the legislature had approved this arrangement, the Court of Appeal concluded that their causes of action for these violations failed. The Court of Appeal also ruled that the non-union Plaintiffs had no cause of action for these alleged violations, as the statute applied only to parties to a collective bargaining agreement. In sum, the Court of Appeal reversed and remanded in part, and affirmed in part. Id. at 1280.

Turman, et al. v. Superior Court,* 2017 Ca. App. Unpub. LEXIS 7682 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. July 7, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant workers filed a class action alleging wage & hour violations under the California Labor Code and the FLSA, claims under the Unfair Competition law, as well as a claim under the Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"). Plaintiffs challenged four of the trial court's rulings, including: (i) the denial of their revised motion to compel responses to discovery; (ii) the issuance of discovery sanctions against Plaintiffs' counsel; (iii) an order only partially granting Plaintiffs' motion to certify a class action; and (iv) the trial court's determination that Parent and America's Printer were not Koji's alter egos and Parent was not liable to Plaintiffs as a joint employer with regards to Plaintiffs' state law claims. The California Court of Appeal treated Plaintiffs' appeal as a petition for writ of mandate. Id. at *3. The Court of Appeal granted the Plaintiffs' writ of mandate and directed the trial court to vacate the orders. Id. at *48. The Court of Appeal ruled that the trial court erred when it denied Plaintiffs' revised motion to compel further discovery responses and in finding that Plaintiffs failed to engage in further meet and confer efforts. The trial court stated at the hearing on the original motion to compel that no further meet and confer efforts would be required to support Plaintiffs' revised motion to compel. Id. at *29. A different trial court denied the revised motion and was not aware of the original trial court's previous statement and relied on the trial court's minute order that failed to reflect those statements. The Court of Appeal vacated the denial order and ruled that the trial court erred when it denied the motion and sanctioned Plaintiffs' counsel. Secondly, the Court of Appeal ruled that the trial court's denial of class certification on the claims alleged against Parent on a theory of joint employer liability was improper because the trial court's stated reasons did not include any reference to Plaintiffs' failure to prove a community of interests and stated that its reason for denying certification as to Parent was because the putative class members identified Koji as their employer. Id. at *22. Therefore, the Court of Appeal granted the petition for a writ of mandate as to certification of claims against Parent and directed the trial court to vacate its order. The Court of Appeal also ruled that the trial court's findings that Parent and American Printer were not alter egos of Koji must be vacated considering the ruling on the revised motion to compel, because the documents that Plaintiffs sought to compel focused on the alter ego issue. The Court of Appeal declined to decide the matter on the merits and concluded that additional information on that issue might be produced after the revised motion to compel was reconsidered on remand. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal directed the trial court to vacate its alter ego findings. Finally, the Court of Appeal ruled that the trial court erred in concluding that Parent was not liable as a joint employer and directed the trial court to vacate its findings as to Parent's joint employer liability as to the state law claims. The Court of Appeal reasoned that the trial court correctly identified the proper controlling authority, but misapplied the three alternative definitions of employer for purposes of state law claims. In addition, the trial court failed to address whether Parent might be a joint employer under the definitions applicable to Plaintiffs' claims under the unfair competition law, the tip misappropriation statute, and the PAGA. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal directed the trial court to vacate its finding that Parent was not liable as a joint employer with regards to Plaintiffs' state law claims. Id. at *48.

Vaquero, et al. v. Stoneledge Furniture LLC,* 2017 Cal. App. LEXIS 165 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Feb. 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of sales associates, filed a class action alleging causes of action for unfair business practices, failure to provide paid rest periods, and failure to pay all wages owed upon termination in violation of the California Labor Code ("CLC"). Id. at *4. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that the rest-period claim failed as a matter of law because Defendant paid its sales associates a guaranteed minimum for all hours worked, including rest periods. Id. at *5. Defendant also argued that a claim for rest period premium pay was not an action to recover wages under the CLC and that it did not willfully fail to pay wages. Id. Defendant argued that because the class claims failed as a matter of law, the derivative claim for unfair business practices also failed. Id. The trial court granted Defendant's motion, ruling that Defendant's payment system specifically accounted for all hours worked and guaranteed that Plaintiffs would be paid more than the minimum wage hour for those hours and there was no possibility that an employees' rest period time would not be captured in the total amount paid each pay period. Id. at *6. The trial court concluded that by tracking all the hours that its sales associates and employees were present at the facility, including rest periods, Defendant ensured that the compensation it paid its employees via commission would never fail to include payment for the time employees spent taking their mandatory rest periods. Id. at *6. The trial court ruled that all the other claims failed because they were derivative of the rest period claim. Id. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed and remanded, holding that employees paid on commission were entitled to receive separate compensation for rest periods. Id. at *29-30. Keeping track of hours worked, including rest periods, and paying a guaranteed minimum wage as an advance on sales commissions earned in later pay periods, did not satisfy the employer's obligation because the formula it used for determining commissions did not include any component that directly compensated the employees for rest periods. The result was that employees who were paid by commission received the same amount of compensation regardless of whether they took rest periods. Id. at *25. The Court of Appeal held that employers are required to separately compensate employees for rest periods if an employer's compensation plan does not already include a minimum hourly wage for such time. Id. at *15. The Court of Appeal rejected Defendant's argument that because Plaintiffs were commissioned employees, it was not required to pay separately for rest periods, as there was no legislative intent to treat commissioned employees differently or nullify the plain language of the CLC. Id. at *22. Because Defendant's compensation system did not include any component that directly compensated for rest periods, it was unlawful as compensation plans must separately account for and pay for rest periods to comply with California law. Id. at *24. Defendant's commission agreement did not compensate for rest periods taken by sales associates who earned a commission. Id. at *25. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed and remanded the trial court's judgment.

Vasserman, et al. v. Henry Mayo Newhall Memorial Hospital, 2017 Cal. App. LEXIS 90 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Feb. 7, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of nurses, filed a putative class action against Defendant for violations of the California Labor Code ("CLC") and other statutes relating to meal and rest breaks, unpaid wages, and unpaid overtime compensation. Defendant moved to compel arbitration on the grounds that the arbitration clause in the collective bargaining agreement between the California Nurses Association and Defendant required Plaintiffs to arbitrate their claims. The trial court denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration. On Defendant's appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's ruling, noting that the collective bargaining agreement at issue required arbitration of claims arising under the agreement, but it did not include an "explicitly stated, clear, and unmistakable waiver" of the right to a judicial forum for claims based on statutes. Id. at *15. The arbitration clause of the collective bargaining made no mention of the CLC or any other statute, and it did not contain a waiver of a judicial forum. Further, the language in the arbitration clause's compensation and meals and rest period provisions was broad and did not include any explicit language regarding statutory requirements regarding compensation and meals and rest periods. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's decision and awarded costs of appeal to Plaintiffs.

Williams, et al. v. Superior Court, 3 Cal. 5th 531 (Cal. 2017). Plaintiff, a retail worker, brought an action under the Private Attorneys General Act of 2004 ("PAGA"), alleging that Defendant failed to provide her and other aggrieved employees meal or rest periods in violation of California labor law. Plaintiff issued two special interrogatories asking Defendant to supply the name, address, telephone number, and company employment history of each non-exempt California-based employee for the relevant period. Id. at 539. Defendant responded that there were 16,500 employees, but refused to provide their individual information on the basis that the request was overbroad, unduly burdensome, and an invasion of the privacy of third-parties under the California Constitution. Id. Plaintiff moved to compel. Id. The trial court ordered Defendant to provide employee contact information only for the store where Plaintiff worked. The trial court also certified its order for immediate review. Plaintiff sought writ relief and the California Court of Appeal denied the writ. The Court of Appeal held that the Plaintiff failed to establish good cause to justified the discovery sought. In the alternative, the Court of Appeal concluded that because third-party privacy interests were implicated, Plaintiff was required to demonstrate a compelling need for discovery and that the discovery sought was directly relevant and essential to the fair resolution of the underlying lawsuit. On Plaintiff's further appeal, the California Supreme Court reversed and remanded. Defendant asserted that the discovery request was overbroad, unduly burdensome, and that information was private. Id. at 540. At the outset, the Supreme Court noted that in the absence of a contrary order, a civil litigant's right to discovery is broad. Id. at 541. The Supreme Court rejected Defendant's overbreadth argument, ruling that the information sought was sought was within the scope of discovery permitted by the California Code of Civil Procedure. Id. at 543. The Supreme Court opined that the information that Plaintiff sought was reasonably calculated to lead to discovery of admissible evidence because the operative complaint alleged that Defendant employed other non-exempt hourly employees throughout California and the complaint sought relief on behalf of Plaintiff and other aggrieved employees. Furthermore, Defendant failed to make any showing an undue burden that disclosure would impose, and the California discovery statute did not impose a good cause requirement for seeking such information. Furthermore, the privacy concerns did not support a complete bar against disclosure of the information that Plaintiff sought. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the decision of the Court of Appeal. Id. at 559.

(ii) Kentucky

Reesor, et al. v. City Of Audubon Park*, 2017 Ky. App. Unpub. LEXIS 437 (Ky. App. June 16, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a lawsuit in state court asserting claims of wage & hour law violations, breach of contract, and promissory estoppel against the City of Audubon Park, Kentucky. Id. at *1. The trial court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' claims. On appeal, the Kentucky Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's ruling. Plaintiffs were a police officer and a city clerk. Id. at *2. On November 17, 2003, the City's Council passed Municipal Order Number 1 Series 2003 (hereinafter "2003 Municipal Order"), which described a change in retirement benefits. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant owed them wages under the retirement benefits after they voluntarily left their respective positions. Plaintiffs argued "retirement benefits" qualified as "wages" within the meaning of KRS 337.010(1)(c)(1) because "retirement benefits" qualify as "any other similar advantages agreed upon by the employer and the employee or provided to employees as an established policy." Id. at *10. The trial court held that the amounts Plaintiffs claimed Defendant owed them under their retirement agreements did not qualify as "wages" and were consequently not actionable under Kentucky's wage & hour statutes. Id. at *8. The trial court further held that Defendant could not be held liable under theories of breach of contract and promissory estoppel because the retirement agreements were illegal and unenforceable. The Court of Appeals stated that under KRS 337.010(1)(c)1, these general phrases of "wages" immediately follow the lists of items falling into classifications that do not include fringe benefits. Id. at *10. Therefore, the Court of Appeal presumed the General Assembly intended to exclude fringe benefits from the definition of "wages" set forth in KRS 337.010(1)(c)(1). The Court of Appeal found that Plaintiffs' reading of the statute was in error, and the phrase "wages" under the statute was not intended to include retirement benefits. Id. at *11. Plaintiffs also argued their retirement agreements were enforceable contracts or were enforceable through principles of equity. Defendant argued that its agreements were prohibited by statute and Defendant therefore had no authority to enter the agreements; the agreements were therefore void; and, similarly, principles of equity and estoppel could not save the agreements. The trial court agreed with the City, held that the agreements Plaintiffs entered into with the City were accordingly illegal, and, as such, ruled that the agreements were unenforceable in either law or equity. Plaintiffs argued that the trial court erred on this point. The Court of Appeal stated that the agreements that Defendant executed with Plaintiffs provided for systematically determinable benefits based upon a formula that factored prior compensation and years of service to be paid after retirement from a fund in which Plaintiffs had no ownership interest. Id. at *19. Thus, the Court of Appels agreed with the trial court's conclusion that the agreements were prohibited by KRS 65.156(6) and accordingly void. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal held that Plaintiff failed to show that the trial court committed reversible error in granting summary judgment in favor of Defendant regarding their claims.

(iii) Massachusetts

George, et al. v. National Water Main Cleaning Co.*, 477 Mass. 371 (Mass. 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action alleging non-payment of wages in violation of the Massachusetts Wage Act ("MWA"). Id. at 372.

Defendant removed to the U.S. District Court for the District of Massachusetts, the parties subsequently settled, and the District Court granted final approval of the class settlement agreement that resolved all issues except one question of law. Id. The District Court then certified a question for review by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts of whether statutory interest pursuant to Massachusetts General Laws ("MGL") 231, §§ 6B or 6C was available under Massachusetts law when liquidated damages were awarded pursuant to §§ 149 and 150. Id. The Supreme Judicial Court interpreted the gist of the question to be whether the Massachusetts legislature, when it amended § 150 in 2008 to require the award of treble damages on MWA judgments and characterized the award as liquidated damages, intended that pre-judgment interest not be added to any part of such an award because such interest was included within the scope of liquidated damages. Id. at 373. The Supreme Judicial Court answered that statutory pre-judgment interest shall be added by the clerk of court to the amount of lost wages and other benefits awarded as damages pursuant to § 150, but shall not be added to the additional amount of the award arising from the trebling of those damages as liquidated damages. The Supreme Judicial Court concluded that the legislature's characterization of treble damages as liquidated damages in the amendment to § 150, was not intended to produce any change in the award of pre-judgment interest in MWA judgments. Accordingly, pre-judgment interest was still to be added to the amount of lost wages and benefits, and was still not to be added to the trebled portion of the judgment that previously had been punitive damages and was now characterized as liquidated damages. The Supreme Judicial Court acknowledged that the legislative history was silent regarding the legislature's purpose in characterizing treble damages as liquidated damages in the amendment to § 150*. Id.* at 377. The Supreme Judicial Court in answering the certified question inferred that the legislature knew: (i) that the FLSA had characterized the additional equal amount of unpaid minimum wages and unpaid overtime compensation as liquidated damages; (ii) the U.S. Supreme Court had regarded liquidated damages as compensatory in nature rather than punitive; and (iii) the characterization of treble damages as liquidated damages could be used to defend an award of treble damages from the constitutional challenge that such an award was punitive in nature and required a finding that an employer's conduct was outrageous. Id. In sum, the Supreme Judicial Court concluded that the legislature's characterization of treble damages as liquidated damages in the amendment to § 150 was not intended to produce any change in the award of pre-judgment interest in MWA judgments. Accordingly, pre-judgment interest was still to be added to the amount of lost wages and benefits, and was still not to be added to the trebled portion of the judgment that previously had been punitive damages and was now characterized as liquidated damages. Id. at 380.

Malden Police, et al. v. City Of Malden,* 2017 Mass. App. LEXIS 108 (Mass. App. Aug. 11, 2017). Plaintiff, a labor union comprised of 79 police officers, filed suit against Defendant alleging that it owed the officers approximately $410,000 in compensation for the performance of past detail work. Id. at *2. Plaintiff and Defendant were parties to a collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") that governed the paid detail work performed by the officers. Id. at *1. Plaintiff alleged breach of contract, breach of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, promissory estoppel, unjust enrichment, and violation of the Massachusetts Wage Act ("MWA"). Id. at *2. Plaintiff filed a motion for summary judgment and Defendant moved to dismiss the Plaintiff's complaint or, in the alternative, for summary judgment and declaratory judgment. Id. The trial court denied Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, and granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment with respect to the MWA claim and dismissed the remainder of Plaintiff's claims. Id. at *3. First, the trial court ruled that the Plaintiff's claims for breach of contract and breach of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing were governed by the CBA, and therefore those claims were best resolved by the dispute resolution provisions contained in the agreement. Id. The trial court further concluded that promissory estoppel was not a viable claim against Defendant. Id. The trial court also determined that the circumstances of the present dispute did not give rise to a claim of unjust enrichment. Id. Finally, the trial court ruled that, although detail pay constituted wages under the MWA, Plaintiff could not prevail under the Wage Act due to the provisions of the municipal finance law. Id. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Massachusetts Appeals Court reversed and remanded the trial court's granting of summary judgment in favor of the Defendant on the MWA claim and affirmed the trial court's dismissal as to Plaintiff's other claims. Id. at *3. The Appeals Court rejected the Plaintiff's argument that the trial court erred when it considered the merits of the city's motion, rather than deeming it fatally defective because Defendant failed to comply with the rules as to the form of its motion. Id. at *6. While the record was unclear whether the dispute fell within the department's primary jurisdiction or whether the CBA provided for a different manner of dispute resolution, the Appeals Court concluded that the trial court properly dismissed the union's contract-based claims. Id. at *11. The Appeals Court ruled that the trial court properly dismissed Plaintiff's unjust enrichment claim as a Plaintiff is not entitled to recovery on a theory of unjust enrichment where a valid contract defines the obligations of the parties. Id. at *11. The Appeals Court also affirmed the trial court's dismissal of Plaintiff's promissory estoppel claim, as it is an equitable doctrine and where an enforceable contract exists, a claim for promissory estoppel will not lie. Id. at *12. The Appeals Court agreed with the trial court that where the detail work was performed for third-parties the plain language of the municipal finance law governed with respect to detail pay. Id. at *13. However, to the extent that the Defendant hired its own officers as employees to perform detail services, the payment was governed by the MWA. Id. at *14. The Appeals Court remanded to resolve the issues of: (i) what portion of the detail work at issue was performed for third-parties; and (ii) with respect to detail work performed for third-parties, whether the city complied with the requirements of the municipal finance law. Accordingly, the Appeals Court affirmed the trial court's decision in part, and reversed and remanded in part.

Soto, et al. v. Action Emergency Services, Inc.*, 2017 Mass. App. Unpub. LEXIS 779 (Mass. App. Aug. 8, 2017). Plaintiff sought damages from Defendants Action Emergency Services, Inc. and Michael Zaccaria for violations of the Massachusetts Wage Act ("Wage Act"). Zaccaria challenged the jury's verdict that he, as an individual, was jointly and severally liable as Plaintiffs' "employer," which is defined by the Wage Act as "the president or treasurer" of Action Emergency Services, or as an "officer or agent having the management of" Action Emergency Services. Id. at *1. Defendants also challenged the award of $95,150 in attorneys' fees to Plaintiffs. On appeal, the Massachusetts Appeals Court affirmed the verdict. Zaccaria worked for Action Emergency Services as president and treasurer, and he purchased the company in 2014. Zaccaria contended that there was insufficient evidence to support the decision that he was a joint employer of Plaintiffs. The Appeals Court explained that the applicable case law authorities have defined an employer under the Wage Act to include all those who have "directed and participated to a substantial degree in formulating the corporation's policy." Id. at *2. The Appeals Court concluded that there was ample evidence before the jury to support their decision that Zaccaria was an employer of Plaintiffs, including being listed as the company's president in its annual report filed with the Secretary of the Commonwealth in 2013, the testimony of several Plaintiffs indicating that Zaccaria was the company's owner and oversaw payroll and staff management, and evidence of Zaccaria signing four of Plaintiffs' employment contracts. Id. at *3. Defendants also contested the award of $95,150 in attorneys' fees. The Appeals Court found that neither Defendant opposed Plaintiffs' petition for attorneys' fees in the trial court, and as such, any challenge to the judge's award was waived. Id.

(iv) Nevada

Western Cab Company, et al. v. The Eighth Judicial District Court Of The State Of Nevada,* 2017 Nev. LEXIS 16 (Nev. Mar. 16, 2017). In this case, Plaintiff requested the Nevada Supreme Court to consider whether the Nevada Minimum Wage Amendment ("MWA") is federally preempted by either the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") or the Employee Retirement Income Security Act ("ERISA") and whether the MWA is unconstitutionally vague. Id. at *2. The MWA requires employers to pay employees one of two possible wage rates, depending on whether the employer offers qualifying health benefits. Id. at *3. The MWA allows for an exception to both of these requirements, however, if the employer and employees agree to a lower wage in clear and unambiguous terms through collective bargaining. Id. In 2012, Plaintiff began requiring its drivers to pay for fuel directly instead of deducting fuel costs from the drivers' paychecks. A group of drivers filed a complaint against Plaintiff alleging, among other things, that when the fuel costs were considered, drivers' wages fell below the constitutionally mandated minimum. Id. at *4. Plaintiff moved to dismiss the complaint, claiming that not only should fuel costs not be considered when calculating the minimum wage, but also the MWA itself is invalid because it: (i) is preempted by the NLRA; (ii) is preempted by the ERISA; and (iii) is unconstitutionally vague. Id. at *8. The trial court denied Plaintiff's motion on all grounds, and Plaintiff petitioned the Supreme Court for extraordinary writ relief. Plaintiff first claimed that the purpose of the MWA is to help unions and unionized employers compete with non-unionized employers, and therefore, it violated the equitable bargaining process protected by the NLRA, resulting in NLRA preemption. The Supreme Court stated that previous case law precedents dictated that minimum wage laws, such as the MWA, were within a state's police powers. Id. at *9. Moreover, the Supreme Court noted that the MWA allows employers and employees to collectively bargain around the minimum wage requirements. The Supreme Court opined that not only does the MWA not enter a field occupied by the NLRA, but also it explicitly allows the NLRA priority. Id. at *10. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that because the MWA neither intrudes upon collective bargaining nor areas intentionally left unregulated, it is not preempted by the NLRA. Id. Plaintiff also argued that the ERISA was designed to cover the field of employee benefits and, therefore, any state regulation of benefits or anything related thereto was preempted. The Supreme Court stated that ERISA's preemption clause provides that, with limited exceptions, its provisions "shall supersede any and all State laws insofar as they may now or hereafter relate to any employee benefit plan." Id. at *11. State laws do not refer to ERISA plans for the purposes of preemption, however, when they merely "mention[] a covered employee welfare benefit plan" or if the law's "text include [s] the word ERISA." Id. at *12. The Supreme Court held that the MWA does not regulate the type of benefits that an employer must provide to qualify for the lower minimum wage, nor does it require an employer to provide benefits at all. Id. at *14-15. Therefore, the Court held that the ERISA did not preempt the MWA. Finally, Plaintiff argued that the MWA was void for vagueness, since the term "health benefits" is so vague that a person of ordinary intelligence cannot understand what is prohibited. Id. at *16. The Supreme Court found that Plaintiff's argument was unpersuasive because "health benefits" is defined in the text of the MWA itself. Id. Further, the Supreme Court noted that Plaintiff put forth no evidence that determining which employers qualify for the lower-tier minimum wage was enforced arbitrarily or in a discriminatory manner. The Supreme Court therefore determined that the MWA was not preempted by either the NLRA or the ERISA, and was not void for vagueness. Accordingly, the Supreme Court denied Plaintiff's petition for extraordinary relief.

(v) New York

Ahmed, et al. v. Morgans Hotel Group Management, LLC,* 2017 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 638 (N.Y. Feb. 27, 2017). Plaintiff, an employee, filed an action on behalf of himself and others similarly-situated, alleging that Defendants violated § 196-d of the New York Labor Law ("NYLL") and the New York Department of Labor's Hospitality Wage Order 12 NYCRR 146-2.18 and 2.19 (the "Wage Order") by representing their banquet service charges as gratuities, and then failing to pay their employees such gratuities. Id. at *1. Plaintiff also sought recovery of minimum wages allegedly owed to him, and other similarly-situated persons who are presently or were formerly employed by Defendants at hotel and catering venues located in New York. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss the action and Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification. The Court granted Defendants' motion and denied Plaintiff's motion. Defendants provided catered events for clients and employed a staff of numerous service workers to perform food and service related tasks. Plaintiff worked for Defendants as a server's assistant and alleged that Defendants engaged in a policy and practice of charging banquet customers a mandatory 23% "service charge," without disclosing that this service charge was not a gratuity for employees. Id. at *3. Plaintiff alleged that, without such a disclaimer, a reasonable customer would presume that such a charge was, in fact, a gratuity, and that because he and other employees were not paid these "gratuities," Defendants violated the NYLL and the Wage Order. In response to Plaintiff's discovery request, Defendants produced its banquet event order forms for the events that Plaintiff worked. Each of these forms contained clear language stating: "16% of food, beverage & room rental total for the event will be added to your account as gratuity and is fully distributed to service staff assigned to your event. 7% of food, beverage & room rental total for the event will be added to your account as an administrative charge. The administrative charge is not a gratuity and is the property of the Hotel to cover the discretionary costs of your event." Id. at *3-4. Section 196-d of the NYLL prohibits employers from demanding, accepting, or retaining, directly or indirectly, any part of an employee's gratuity or any charge purported to be a gratuity. Id. at *4. The Wage Order states that there is "a rebuttable presumption that any charge in addition to charges for food, beverage, lodging, and other specified materials or services, including but not limited to any charge for 'service' or 'food service,' is a charge purported to be a gratuity." Id. at *7. However, an employer can conclusively rebut this presumption by "demonstrating, by clear and convincing evidence" that it provided notification that was "sufficient to ensure that a reasonable customer would understand that such charge[s] [were] not purported to be a gratuity." Id. The Wage Order provides that when an employer utilizes a combination charge, part of which is for the administration of a banquet, special function, or package deal, and part of which is to be distributed as gratuities to the employees who provided service to the guests, the "gratuity presumption" is rebutted when the employer breaks down in writing the specific percentages or portions of the charge that is for the administration/service, and the portion of the charge that is to be paid as gratuity to the staff. Id. at *8. The Court found that Defendants presented documentary evidence that they did not lead their customers to believe that the "service charge" was a gratuity and, therefore, did not unlawfully withhold the purported gratuities. Id. at *9. Defendants also moved for summary judgment on Plaintiff's minimum wage claim on the ground that Plaintiff's payroll records unequivocally demonstrated that Plaintiff earned an amount equal to or above the minimum wage for his entire employment. Id. at *13. The Court stated that the record showed that Plaintiff earned an amount equal to or above the minimum wage throughout his entire employment. Accordingly, the Court found that the minimum wage cause of action should also be dismissed. Id. at *14. The Court determined that Plaintiff suffered no injury, and there was no basis for any claim against Defendants. The Court therefore found that Plaintiff could not be a class representative, and the action must be dismissed in its entirety.

Andryeyeva, et al. v. New York Health Care, Inc*., 2017 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 6408 (N.Y. App. Div. Sept. 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of home health care attendants for elderly and disabled individuals, filed a class action asserting that Defendant failed to pay minimum wage in violation of the New York Labor Law ("NYLL") and 12 NYCRR 142-2.1(b) (the "Wage Order"). Plaintiffs were paid an hourly rate for 12 daytime hours of their 24-hour shifts and a flat rate for the 12 nighttime hours. Plaintiffs contended that they were entitled to minimum wage for each hour of their 24-hour shifts and that Defendant's payment practice resulted in a regular hourly wage that was below the minimum wage. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs sought certification of 1,063 home attendants who had worked 24-hour shifts for Defendant between December 28, 2007 and March 8, 2013. Id. at *2. The trial court granted the motion, and on appeal, the New York Appellate Division affirmed. Defendants contended that they were not required to pay home attendants for each hour of a 24-hour shift, but were permitted to exclude 8 hours of sleep time and 3 hours of meal time. Id. at *2-3. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs would each be required to prove that they had not been afforded their sleep and meal times during shifts, and in light of the need for such a fact-intensive inquiry as to each member of the putative class, Plaintiffs could not meet the numerosity, commonality, and typicality requirements for class certification. Id. at *3. The Appellate Division noted that the U.S. Department of Labor had issued an opinion letter that advised that "live-in employees," whether or not they are "residential employees," "must be paid not less than for thirteen hours per twenty-four hour period provided that they are afforded at least eight hours for sleep and actually receive five hours of uninterrupted sleep, and that they are afforded three hours for meals." Id. at *4. Defendant also relied on an opinion letter issued by the New York State Department of Labor ("NYDOL"), which interpreted the Wage Order. Thus, the Appellate Division stated that it must determine whether the NYDOL's interpretation of the Wage Order was rational or reasonable insofar as it permitted Defendant's payment practices with respect to non-residential aides. The Appellate Division found that that the NYDOL's interpretation was neither rational nor reasonable, because it conflicted with the plain language of the Wage Order. The Appellate Division noted that Plaintiffs were required to be at the clients' residences and were also required to perform services there if necessary. Id. at *5. To interpret that regulation to mean that Plaintiffs were not, during those nighttime hours, "required to be available for work" simply because it turned out that they were not called upon to perform services was contrary to the plain meaning of "available." Id. Therefore, the Appellate Division determined that to the extent that the members of the proposed class were not "residential" employees who "lived on the premises of the employer," they were entitled to be paid the minimum wage for all 24 hours of their shifts, regardless of whether they were afforded opportunities for sleep and meals. Id. at *5-6. The Appellate Division opined that Defendant's arguments regarding class certification were premised on their contention that the NYDOL's opinion letter was in accord with the Wage Order. Accordingly, inasmuch as the Appellate Division rejected the NYDOL's interpretation of the Wage Order, it ruled that Plaintiffs established the existence of the five prerequisites to class certification. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Appellate Division affirmed the trial court's ruling granting Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Gold, et al. v. New York Life Insurance Co.*, 2017 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 5627 (N.Y. App. Div. July 18, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former insurance agents, brought a class action under New York state law seeking unpaid overtime wages and recovery of improper wage deductions. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment as to three of Plaintiffs' claims, which the trial court granted. Defendant also sought to compel arbitration of Plaintiff Kartal's claims pursuant to the arbitration agreement she signed at the commencement of her employment, which the trial court also granted. On appeal, the New York Appellate Division reversed and held that Plaintiffs were not required to arbitrate their disputes with Defendant because that obligation would run afoul of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"). Under the arbitration agreement, Plaintiffs waived any right to a jury trial and agreed that no claim could be brought or maintained "on a class action, collective action or representative action basis either in court or arbitration." Id. at *5. The provision also provided that if the waiver of class, collective, or representative actions were found to be unenforceable, the class, collective, or representative claim would proceed in court. Id. The Appellate Division noted that New York case law authorities have not squarely addressed the question of whether this type of arbitration provision is enforceable. Id. at *6. Further, the Appellate Division noted the recent split among the federal circuits regarding these types of clauses. Upon consideration of the matter, the Appellate Division concluded that the better view is that arbitration provisions such as the one in Plaintiff's contract, which prohibit class, collective, or representative claims, violated the NLRA, and thus the provisions are unenforceable. The Appellate Division found that the waivers were unenforceable as they interfered with employees' rights under the NLRA to engage in protected concerted activity by depriving them of the ability to bring class or collective actions. In reaching its decision, the Appellate Division weighed "an individual's right to resort to the courts, on the one hand, and this State's preference for enforcing arbitration agreements." Id. at *11. The Appellate Division found there to be "no reason that the [Federal Arbitration Act] policy favoring arbitration should trump the NLRA policy prohibiting employers from preventing collective action by employees." Id. at *12-13. Accordingly, the Appellate Division sided with the Sixth, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits and held "that waiver of collective claims violates the NLRA, and is void and invalid under the FAA's saving clause." Id. at *14.

Shanklin, et al. v. Wilhelmina Models, Inc.,* Case No. 653702/2013 (N.Y. Super. Ct. May 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of models, filed a putative class action against various modeling agencies ("MADs"), alleging violations of the New York Labor Law ("NYLL") for failure to pay for subsequent use and reuse of their images, breach of contract, conversion, unjust enrichment, and breach of the duty of good faith. Id. at 1. Plaintiffs claimed that the agencies collected usage and reuse fees from advertising agencies and companies that used their likenesses on products, but failed to pay Plaintiffs for the work. Defendants moved to dismiss on several grounds. The Court granted Defendants' Elite Model Management Corp. ("Elite") and Major Model Management Inc. ("Major") motions to dismiss as to the NYLL claims on the grounds that the claims were time-barred. Id. at 16, 18. The Court denied the motions to dismiss as to the rest of Defendants. The Court ruled that for the claims to be timely under the six-year statute of limitation of the NYLL, they needed to accrue on or after October 24, 2007. The claims against Defendants Elite and Major related to models that ceased to have any relationship with the agency since 2005. The Court reasoned that only wages were recoverable under the NYLL and the post-termination payments that the models claimed that they were entitled to did not constitute wages if they were contingent upon any factors other than the labor or services that Plaintiffs rendered. Id. at 17. Plaintiffs' claims for fees for usage depended on factors other than each Plaintiff's productivity, such as the decisions of third-party clients to use the images and upon MAD's ability to license such use. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' contentions that the usage fees were essentially commissions that were protected as wages when they were guaranteed and were for a fixed amount that was earned prior to termination of employment. Id. The Court noted that the fees for usage were not specified or guaranteed in the models' contracts, nor was the accrual of such payments certain. The Court opined that these fees were not payments for services, but were like royalty or licensing payments and not covered under the NYLL. The Court also dismissed all claims of conversion, breach of duty of good faith, and unjust enrichment against all Defendants as the claims were either time-barred or were not sufficiently pled.

(vi) Ohio

Dykes, et al. v. Temple Baptist College*, 2017 Ohio App. LEXIS 2699 (Ohio App. 1st Dist. June 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, brought an action alleging that Defendant failed to pay back pay and other damages in violation of Ohio wage laws. The trial court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, and on appeal, the Ohio Court of Appeals affirmed. Plaintiffs claimed that the college, its former president, and Defendant's directors were personally liable for unpaid wages after the college experienced serious financial difficulties and was unable to pay them. Id. at *1. In their capacities as members of the college's board of regents, the directors voted on matters presented to the board by the college's administration, including the college's budget, policies, and procedures and they approved the hiring of some employees, as recommended by the administration. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs each had a written employment contract with the college. The contract did not provide that the directors would personally guarantee the employees' wages. While the directors often acted as advocates for the college and expressed their belief that the financial difficulties were being addressed, there was no evidence that the directors ever personally promised to pay the employees' wages. Id. at *2. The trial court granted the directors' motion for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' claims against them for violations of R.C. 4113.15, Ohio's wage-payment statute. The trial court entered judgment against the college and in favor of Plaintiffs in the amount of $84,416. Id. Plaintiffs claimed that the trial court erred in entering summary judgment in favor of the directors on their claim for back wages under R.C. 4113.15. The Court of Appeals noted that R.C. 4113.15(A) provides that, "Every individual, firm, partnership, association, or corporation doing business in this state shall pay all its employees the wages earned by them" at regular intervals. Id. However, the Court of Appeals explained, the statute does not state that directors of a corporation shall be liable, as "individuals," if the employer fails to pay its employees. Id. Rather, it provides that if an individual is doing business in Ohio, the individual, as the employer, must pay her employees. Plaintiffs maintained that the directors of an employer were liable, under R.C. 4113.15, if the employer failed to pay its employees. Id. Plaintiffs asserted that since the college's directors were acting in the interests of the college in relation to the employees that they too were liable for wages. Id. at *4. The Court of Appeals disagreed, and held that the principle that directors of a corporation are generally not liable for the debts of the corporation "is ingrained in Ohio law." Id. The Court of Appeals stated that even construing the evidence most strongly in Plaintiffs' favor, the directors were entitled to judgment as a matter of law under the clear language of R.C. 1702.55 and 4113.15. Moreover, the Court of Appeals found that Plaintiffs could not establish a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the corporate veil of the college should have been pierced, as they failed to show that the directors' control over the college was so complete that the college had no separate mind of its own. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals upheld the trial court's order granting summary judgment to Defendant.

Konarzewski, et al. v. Ganley*, 2017 Ohio App. LEXIS 2347 (Ohio App. 8th Dist. June 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of car purchasers, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the Ohio Consumer Sales Practices Act ("OCSPA") and the Ohio Retail Installment Sales Act ("RISA") by using certain form documents containing conflicting, misleading, unconscionable, and substantially one-sided terms. After discovery, the parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment. The trial court granted partial summary judgment to Plaintiffs, finding that Defendant's use of the forms violated the OCSPA. Plaintiffs also filed a motion for class certification of their OCSPA claims, which the trial court denied. On appeal, the Ohio Court of Appeal found that the proposed class definition was inconsistent with the limitations on damages under the OCSPA. The Court of Appeal determined that the trial court had abused its discretion by failing to modify the class definition or giving Plaintiffs the opportunity to modify the class definition to conform with the additional requirement of actual damages for class actions brought for violations of the OCSPA. On remand, Plaintiffs provided a modified class definition and the trial court granted class certification for a class of consumers who, from within two years prior to the commencement of the action to the present, purchased a vehicle and did not receive the benefit of the bargain and as a result suffered actual damages. Id. at *4. On further appeal, the Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's decision granting class certification. The Court of Appeal stated that for a class to be certified under Ohio Rule 23(B)(3), the trial court must find: (i) that the questions of law or fact common to the members of the class predominate over any questions affecting only individual members; and (ii) that a class action is superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy. Id. at *6. The Court of Appeal noted that the modified class definition included purchasers who "did not receive the benefit of the bargain and as a result suffered actual damages." Id. at *8. The Court of Appeal opined that the trial court failed to explain how the class could be ascertainable, as individualized determinations would be necessary for determining whether members of the putative class in fact suffered damages. Id. at *8. The Court of Appeal determined that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that they could prove, through common evidence, that all class members were in fact injured by Defendant's use of the alleged misleading forms. The Court of Appeal found that the question of whether a particular purchaser suffered actual damage as a result of the use of the two form documents would turn on individualized facts and evidence. Id. at *10-11. Because resolution of the issue of actual damages would require a case-by-case analysis of each transaction, the Court of Appeal held that common questions of law or fact did not predominate over individualized inquiries. Id. at *12. The Court of Appeal therefore ruled that Plaintiffs failed to make a showing that all class members suffered an injury-in-fact. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal found that the trial court abused its discretion in granting class and reversed the decision.

(vii) Oregon

Al Shaikhli, et al. v. Portland Specialty Baking,* 2017 Ore. Cir. LEXIS 1 (Multnomah County, Ore. Mar. 9, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of factory workers, brought a putative class action alleging wage & hour violations pursuant to Oregon labor law. Defendant moved to dismiss or in the alternative for summary judgment as to four of Plaintiffs claims. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant failed to pay both daily and weekly overtime. Id. at *2. The Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss as to Plaintiffs' overtime claim. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs worked more than 10 hours in a day and more than 40 hours in a workweek and asserted that they were entitled to overtime under the state's overtime statutes. Id. at *2. The two overtime statutes did not specifically address the relationship between the two overtime laws and how overtime should be calculated when an employee works both more than 10 hours in one day and more than 40 hours in one week. Id. The Court agreed with Defendant's interpretation of the overtime laws that an overtime hour must be paid at the rate of time and one-half the regular wage only once in all circumstances and not twice in some circumstances. Id. at *9. Requiring employers to pay the greater of daily or weekly overtime was consistent with both statutes. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss as to the overtime claim. Id. Plaintiffs also claimed that Defendant failed to timely pay wages due upon termination. Id. The Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss on the basis that the conduct of failing to pay daily overtime did not create separate liability for failure to pay upon termination and penalty wages because Plaintiffs could not recover double penalty wages for the same alleged wrong. Id. at *13. Plaintiffs also sought declaratory and injunctive relief to prevent Defendant from requiring or permitting workers from working more than 13 hours in a day. Id. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion as to the declaratory relief claim because there was no present "uncertainty" or "insecurity" pertaining to the question of whether Defendant may require its employees to work more than 13 hours a day. Id. Accordingly, there was no legal basis to issue a declaratory relief. Id. at *14. However, because there was question of fact as to whether any Plaintiff worked more than 13 hours in a workday, the Court denied Defendant's motion as to Plaintiffs' request for an injunction. Id. Plaintiffs also sought declaratory relief that Defendant's attendance policy violated Oregon's sick leave law and an injunction ordering Defendants to remove accrued sick leave absences from its attendance points policy and remove from personnel records any consequences or adverse employment actions taken because of this policy. Id. The Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to these claims, as Plaintiffs presented no evidence that Defendant included protected sick leave absences in its attendance policy. Id. at *17.

Chevalier, et al. v. GNC,* 2017 Pa. Super LEXIS 1092 (Pa. Super. Ct. Dec. 22, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of salaried retail store managers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Pennsylvania Minimum Wage Act ("PMWA") when it miscalculated Plaintiffs' rate of overtime pay. The parties agreed that the PMWA required that Plaintiffs be paid one and one-half of their regular rate, but disagreed over how to calculate the regular rate. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment, which were limited to the issue of whether Defendant's use of the FLSA's fluctuating workweek ("FWW") method to calculate overtime compensation complied with the PMWA. The trial court granted Plaintiffs' motion and denied Defendant's motion. It ruled that Defendant's practice of: (i) using a method of calculating an employee's regular rate by dividing the employee's salary in a given week by the number of hours actually worked in that week, as opposed to 40 hours, violated the PMWA; and (ii) the payment of an overtime premium of only one-half the regular rate violated the PMWA . On Defendant's consolidated appeal, the Pennsylvania Superior Court affirmed in part and reversed in part. Id. at *53. The Superior Court reversed the trial court's decision with respect to Defendant's method of calculating Plaintiffs' regular rate based upon the number of hours actually worked in a week, and held that this method did not violate the PMWA. The Superior Court reasoned that absent legislative or regulatory action, Defendant's calculation of the regular rate for salaried employees comported with Pennsylvania law. It noted that when the PMWA was enacted in 1968, the FLSA permitted employers to calculate the regular rate of salaried employees in such a manner. In addition, the Superior Court affirmed the trial court's decision that Defendant's payment of an overtime premium of only one-half the regular rate violated the PMWA. The Superior Court opined that Pennsylvania had adopted regulations addressing the appropriate multiplier for calculating overtime payments, which explicitly provided that employees shall be paid not less than one and one-half times their regular rate of pay for all hours in excess of 40 hours in a workweek. Accordingly, the Superior Court affirmed the trial court's decision that Defendant's method of paying an overtime premium of one-half the regular rate violated the PMWA . As such, the Superior Court reversed in part and affirmed in part the trial court's decision granting summary judgment.

Glover, et al. v. Udren Law Offices,* 2017 Pa. Super. Unpub LEXIS 4277 (Pa. Super. Ct. Nov. 20, 2017). Plaintiff filed a putative class action against Defendant alleging that it illegally collected excessive fees in connection with mortgage foreclosure actions against homeowners. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant charged her court costs and legal fees in violation of the Pennsylvania Loan Interest and Protection Act ("Act 6") as well as the Pennsylvania Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act ("UTPCPL"). Id. at *6. The trial court dismissed the claims on the basis that Plaintiff's claims against Defendant were barred by prior rulings in a separate case that Plaintiff had filed in federal court against her mortgage lender Wells Fargo. Id. at *9. The Third Circuit had issued an opinion in that case in which it affirmed the entry of summary judgment in favor of Wells Fargo on Plaintiff's Act 6 claim and stated that Plaintiff failed to present evidence on which a reasonable jury could conclude that she was charged attorneys' fees not incurred or permitted under the loan documents or that she paid any fees. Id. Defendant objected to Plaintiff's complaint and argued that it should be dismissed based upon collateral estoppel, given the Third Circuits' determination that Plaintiff had not proven that she paid illegal fees to anyone. Id. at *11. The trial court agreed with Defendant's position. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Pennsylvania Superior Court affirmed the trial court's decision. It found that the elements of collateral estoppel were met as Plaintiff had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the prior action. Id. at *30. Accordingly, the Superior Court affirmed the trial court's decision. Id.

King, et al. v. Albert And Carol Mueller LTD,* Case No. 2014-8688 (Pa. Cmmw. Oct. 24, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of McDonald's restaurant workers, filed a lawsuit alleging that Defendant failed to pay them all wages due in violation of state wage & hour laws. The parties ultimately reached a settlement and the Pennsylvania Court of Common Pleas granted their motion for preliminary settlement approval. The parties subsequently sought final settlement approval, which the Court granted. The Court stated that, for settlement purposes, the proposed class met all the requirements of class certification pursuant to Rule 1701, including numerosity, commonality, typicality, adequacy of representation, predominance, fair and efficient method of adjudication, and manageability. Id. at 4-5. The Court further found that the settlement agreement resulted from extensive arm's length negotiations by and through experienced counsel, with the assistance and oversight of the Court. Id. at 5. The Court held that the settlement was fair, reasonable, and adequate based on the following factors: (i) there was no fraud or collusion underlying the agreement; (ii) the complexity, expense, and uncertainty and likely duration of litigation favored settlement; and (iii) the settlement provided meaningful benefits to the settlement class. Id. at 6. Accordingly, the Court granted final settlement approval.

Thiel, et al. v. Pennsylvania Leadership Charter School,* 2017 Pa. Super. Unpub. LEXIS 4594 (Pa. Super. Ct. Dec. 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of teachers, filed a class action alleging breach of contract and violations of wage payment and collections law due to Defendant's bonus program for teachers. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the trial court denied. On appeal, the Pennsylvania Superior Court affirmed the trial court's ruling. Plaintiffs sought certification of a class consisting of "all individuals who were employed as salaried employees by the Pennsylvania Leadership Charter School for the academic school years from 2008-2009 through 2011-2012 and did not receive a bonus of 10% of their base salary for any of those years within the period of the next academic year." Id. at *2-3. The trial court found that Plaintiffs failed to establish commonality and typicality between their claims and those of the rest of the class. Id. at *3. On appeal, Plaintiffs argued they had sufficiently demonstrated commonality because their claims all arise from Defendant's non-payment of bonuses. Plaintiff indicated that Defendant's CEO, James Hanak, as a representative of the school, explicitly promised them bonuses in their interviews. Id. Plaintiffs conceded that other members of the proposed class could not recall if they were promised such bonuses, and still others were certain no such promises were made. Plaintiffs argued that the oral promises made to some members of the proposed class were unrelated to the central issue of recovery. The Superior Court disagreed. It determined that Plaintiffs' alleged evidence that Hanak guaranteed them bonuses in their interviews could not be used to prove that other putative class members, to whom Hanak did not make such promises, also were owed bonuses. Id. at *6. The Superior Court reasoned that where other class members could not prove reliance or causation in their individual action using the same evidence as Plaintiffs, common question of law and fact did not exist. Id. at *7. Thus, the Superior Court found that the trial court properly denied class certification based on lack of commonality between proposed class members. The Superior Court held that Plaintiffs also failed to meet the typicality requirement. Since bonuses were awarded each school year, even assuming the bonus program during the 2008-2009 school year was identical to that of later years and Defendant was found to owe bonus payments to employees, Plaintiffs acknowledged they did not work at the school during that school year. Id. Thus, Plaintiffs could not recover a bonus for that year even if they were successful at trial, and pursuit of their own claims would not advance those of proposed class members who may be owed bonuses for the 2008-2009 school year. Id. at *7-8. Accordingly, the Superior Court affirmed the trial court's ruling.

Brady, et al. v. Autozone Stores, Inc.*, 188 Wash.2d 576 (Wash. 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action in District Court seeking unpaid wages for meal breaks that Defendant allegedly withheld from employees. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification. After reviewing § 296-126-092 of the Washington Administrative Code ("WAC") and various decisions from Washington state courts, the District Court concluded that employers have met their obligation under the law if they ensured that employees have the opportunity for a meaningful meal break, free from coercion or any other impediment. Id. at *579. The District Court expressly rejected the notion that Washington has adopted a strict liability approach to the taking of meal breaks, and found that class certification would be inappropriate, considering the unique fact scenarios associated with each potential violation of the meal break statute. Accordingly, the District Court denied Brady's motion for class certification. Plaintiff sought appeal of the denial with the Ninth Circuit, which declined Plaintiff's request to appeal the decision. Plaintiff then filed a motion in the District Court, seeking to certify two questions to the Washington Supreme Court, including: (i) is an employer strictly liable under WAC 296-126-092; and (ii) if an employer is not strictly liable under WAC 296-126-092, does the employee carry the burden to prove that his employer did not permit the employee an opportunity to take a meaningful break as required by WAC 296-126-092. Id. at *580. Considering together the noted sub-sections and guidelines, the Washington Supreme Court explained that an employee who works five consecutive hours is entitled to a 30 minute meal break, which may be taken from the second through the fifth hour of his or her shift, but which also may be waived. Id. at *581. Accordingly, the Supreme Court stated that the presence of the waiver option compels the answer to the first certified question to be no, since an employer is not automatically liable if a meal break was missed because the employee may waive the meal break. Id. at *581-582. An employee thereby asserting a meal break violation under WAC 296-126-092 would meet his or her prima facie case by providing evidence that he or she did not receive a timely meal break. Id. at *582. The employer may then rebut this by showing that in fact no violation occurred or a valid waiver existed. Id. Accordingly, the answer to the second certified question was no, for WAC 296-126-092 imposes a mandatory obligation on the employer to provide meal breaks and to ensure those breaks comply with the requirements of WAC 296-126-092. The Supreme Court thereby answered Plaintiff's certified questions.

Hill, et al. v. Garda CL Northwest, Inc.,* 198 Wash. App. 326 (Wash. App. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of armored truck drivers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant denied meal periods and rest breaks to Plaintiffs under Washington's Industrial Welfare Act and the Washington Minimum Wage Act. The trial court awarded Plaintiffs double damages, pre-judgment interest, and attorneys' fees. Defendant appealed the trial court's certification of the class, denial of its motions for summary judgment, grant of Plaintiffs' partial summary judgment motion on liability, award of double damages, award of pre-judgment interest, and use of a lodestar to multiply Plaintiffs' attorney fee award. Id. at 328. On appeal, Defendant contended that the trial court abused its discretion and certified the class without making a clear record of its reasons or considering the appropriate criteria. The Washington Court of Appeals held that the trial court's order was sufficient because it identified the common questions that predominated, whether the drivers were allowed legally sufficient rest or meal breaks and whether they were entitled to compensation for missed breaks, and explained why a class action was superior to individual actions. Id. at 334. Defendant also argued that the trial court erred when it concluded that neither the Federal Aviation Administration Authorization Act ("FAAAA"), nor § 301 of the Labor-Management Relations Act, ("LMRA") preempted the Plaintiffs' claims. The Court of Appeals rejected this argument and held that the FAAAA did not preempt Plaintiffs' claims because complying with Washington law would not have had a significant impact on Defendant's operations if Defendant had sought a variance. Id. at 332. The Court of Appeals further held that § 301 of the LMRA did not preempt Plaintiffs' claims because Plaintiffs' rights were independent and non-negotiable, and it did not have to interpret Plaintiffs' collective bargaining agreements ("CBAs") in order to resolve the issue. Id. Defendant further maintained that the trial court erred when it granted summary judgment in favor of Plaintiffs for Defendant's failure to provide meal periods and rest breaks. Defendant maintained that Plaintiffs waived their right to meal periods when they acknowledged their CBAs that purported to contain waivers. Id. at 335. However, because Plaintiffs could not have waived their meal periods through the CBAs, as it was not an individual choice, the Court of Appeals held that the waivers in the CBAs were not evidence that Plaintiffs waived their rights. Id. at 336. The Court of Appeals rejected Defendant's argument that questions of material fact remained as to whether Plaintiffs could take rest breaks and held that Defendant's own testimony and materials established that there was a policy against taking breaks. Id. at 337. Defendant also argued that the trial court erred by awarding double damages for the missed meal periods because those were not wage violations and Defendant's conduct was not willful. The Court of Appeals held that Washington treats a failure to provide meal periods as withholding wages, but agreed that Defendant's conduct was not willful, as there was a bona fide dispute, and reversed the award of double damages. Id. at 338. Defendant also argued that the trial court should not have awarded pre-judgment interest for any damages for which it awarded double damages. Because pre-judgment interest is not available when Plaintiffs receive punitive damages, such as double damages, the Court of Appeals reversed the award of pre-judgment interest on the rest break damages. Id. at 339. Finally, Defendant contended that the trial court abused its discretion when it applied a 1.5 lodestar multiplier to Plaintiffs' attorney fee award because the case was insufficiently risky. Id. at 340. The Court of Appeals disagreed and found that the multiplier was reasonable given the risks of the case and the fact that Plaintiffs' attorneys took the case on a contingency basis.

C. Rulings In Breach Of Employment Contract/Miscellaneous Workplace Claims

(i) Arkansas

City Of Conway, et al. v. Shumate, Jr.,* 2017 Ark. 36 (2017). Plaintiffs, a group of police officers and firefighters, brought a class action alleging that Defendant breached its contract when it failed to allocate sales-tax revenues to fund their salary increases. Id. at 38. Plaintiffs moved for certification and the trial court granted the motion. On Defendant's interlocutory appeal, the Supreme Court of Arkansas affirmed. Id. at 44. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant provided police and fire employees with packets prior to employment that outlined a pay-grid structure that had been implemented pursuant to resolution that the voters in the City of Conway had passed. Plaintiffs alleged that the pay grid was part of their employment contract and when Defendant stopped funding salary increases, it breached its contract with Plaintiffs. Id. at 39. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff failed to satisfy the requirements of commonality, predominance, typicality, and superiority. On appeal, Defendant argued that: (i) there were no common questions because the mutuality element of a breach-of-contract claim required a meeting of the minds between the parties and a determination of individual issues before reaching any common questions; (ii) the common questions did not predominate because liability could not be established on a class-wide basis, as each Plaintiff had a distinct set of operative facts for their breach-of-contract claim; (iii) the class representatives' claims were atypical from those of the class; and (iv) a class action was not a superior method to adjudicate Plaintiffs' claims. Id. at 41. The Supreme Court ruled that commonality was established because the pay-grid in question became part of all Plaintiffs' employment contracts and whether that contract was breached when Defendant stopped making payment was common to all class members. Further, the inquiry of whether accepting a job was adequate consideration for a pay-grid was the same inquiry for every class member. The Supreme Court further opined that the common questions of whether a sales tax resolution was itself a promise to pay and whether accepting employment was adequate consideration predominated over any individual issues. The Supreme Court ruled that the common questions did predominate because each employee received the same pay-grid and was told that it represented his or her salary. Id. at 48. Thus, the common question of whether the sales-tax resolution was itself a promise to pay, and whether accepting employment was adequate consideration, predominated over any individual issues. Id. The Supreme Court rejected Defendant's argument that the claims of the two class representatives were not typical, as they arose from the same wrong asserted by the class. Id. at 49. Finally, the Supreme Court ruled that class action was superior because it was efficient for both parties to resolve all claims, possibly up to 200, in one forum. Id. at 50. Accordingly, the Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's decision to certify the class.

Industrial Welding Supplies Of Hattiesburg, LLC v. Pinson, et al.*, 2017 Ark. LEXIS 277 (Ark. Nov. 16, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action alleging breach of contract and unjust enrichment based on Defendant Industrial Welding's failure to compensate the employees for earned but unused vacation time after it was acquired by Defendant Airgas. The trial court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. On appeal, Defendants argued that the trial court abused its discretion in granting the motion for class certification because: (i) the employees failed to meet the commonality requirement by presenting proof that common issues of law or fact existed; (ii) common issues of law and fact did not predominate over individual issues; and (iii) a class action was not the superior method of resolving the controversy. Id. at *1-2. On appeal, the Arkansas Supreme Court found that the trial court's ruling failed to comply with the mandatory requirements contained in Rule 23(b) of the Arkansas Rules of Civil Procedure, which states that "[a]n order certifying a class action must define the class and the class claims, issues, or defenses." Id. at *7. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court defined the class as "all persons who were employed by Industrial Welding Supplies of Hattiesburg, LLC on December 31, 2011, were so employed for at least one year prior thereto, and continued to be so employed until Industrial Welding Supplies of Hattiesburg, LLC was acquired by Airgas, LLC on March 31, 2012." Id. The Supreme Court reasoned that this definition failed to define the "class claims, issues, or defenses." Id. The Supreme Court held that the trial court's only finding was the conclusory statement "that Plaintiffs have satisfied all elements of Rule 23 of the Arkansas Rules of Civil Procedure and class certification is appropriate in this case." Id. The Supreme Court explained that although neither party filed a Rule 52 motion for specific findings or challenged the sufficiency of the order on appeal, the trial court's failure to define the class claims, issues, or defenses, as required by Rule 23(b), prevented the Supreme Court from conducting a meaningful review of the order. Id. at *7-8. The Supreme Court reasoned that although its case precedents provide that a trial court is not required to conduct a rigorous analysis before it certifies a case as a class action, this did not mean that there was no standard at all. The Supreme Court opined that the trial court must undertake enough of an analysis to enable a meaningful review of the certification issue on appeal. Id. at *10. The Supreme Court therefore held that the trial court's bare conclusion that "Plaintiffs have satisfied all elements of Rule 23 of the Arkansas Rules of Civil Procedure and class certification is appropriate in this case" was clearly insufficient. Id. at *11. Accordingly, because the trial court's order granting class certification failed to comply with Rule 23(b), the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to enter an order that complied with Rule 23.

(ii) California

Boling, et al. v. Public Employment Relations Board,* 10 Cal. App. 5th 853 (4th Dist. 2017). In this consolidated proceeding of two writs of review, the City of San Diego and a group of citizens challenged a decision of the California Public Employment Relations Board ("PERB"). On appeal, the California Court of Appeal annulled the decision of PERB with a direction to dismiss the complaints. Id. at 895. Voters of the City of San Diego approved a citizen-sponsored initiative, the Citizens Pension Reform Initiative "CPRI", which mandated changes in the pension plan for certain employees of the City. Id. at 856. The PERB determined that the City was obliged to meet and confer with unions pursuant to the provisions of the Meyers-Milias-Brown Act ("MMBA") over the CPRI before placing it on the ballot. Id. The PERB further determined that because the City violated this obligation, the PERB could order "make whole" remedies that compelled the City to disregard the CPRI. Id. The Court of Appeal ruled that the City did not violate the MMBA when it declined to meet and confer with unions before it placed the CPRI on the ballot because the meet-and-confer obligations of the MMBA did not apply to proposed amendments that were placed on the ballot as a result of citizen proponents through the initiative process. Id. at 894. The Court of Appeal concluded that even though the City's mayor and others in the City's government provided support to the proponents to develop and campaign for the CPRI, the PERB erred when it applied agency principles to the support of the mayor and others government actors in regards to the initiative. Id. at 856. The Court of Appeal opined that such support did not transform the initiative into a governing-body-sponsored ballot proposal which required meet-and-confer obligations. Id. at 893. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal ruled that the PERB erred when it found that the Mayor and the City Council committed an unfair labor practice when they declined to meet and confer over the CPRI before it was placed on the ballot. Id.

Doe, et al. v. Google, Inc.,* Case No. CGC-16-556034 (Cal. Super. Ct. Dec. 22, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendant used illegal agreements to restrict freedom of speech and to restrain trade. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs also filed a motion to compel discovery, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs challenged language in Defendant's "Employee and Temporary Workers Adult Content Liability Release," which required employees to agree that if, during the course of their employment they were exposed to sensitive adult content, they would release Defendant from any liability associated with having such material in the workplace, including claims of harassment, hostile work environment, and discrimination. Id. at 1. Defendant argued that the language in the release was limited by the qualifier that exposure to the adult content focused on "part of the employee's essential job function" and that the release operated as an assumption of risk. Id. at 3. The Court disagreed with Defendant and found that the document generally released "any and all liability," which included non-waivable statutory rights such as harassment and discrimination claims, and was therefore contrary to public policy. Id. at 4. The Court therefore determined that the release was unlawful, and accordingly, denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment. The Court also granted Plaintiffs' motion to compel discovery. The Court found that Defendant responded to Plaintiffs' request with several boilerplate objections that were evasive.

Id. at 4-5. The Court further stated that with respect to Defendant's arguments over the burden of complying with the discovery, Defendant only offered conclusory statements that the requests were burdensome because they would require parsing through privileged information. The Court thereby granted Plaintiffs' motion to compel.

Mallano, et al. v. Chiang*, 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 2366 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. April 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retired judges, filed an action alleging that Defendant failed to provide all payments and benefits based on the formula set forth in § 68203 of the California Government Code. Section 68203(a) provided for mandatory annual increases in judicial salaries by an amount equal to a judge's then current salary multiplied by the average percentage salary increase for state employees during that fiscal year. Id. at *3-4. Defendant's costing unit calculated the average percentage salary increase for California state employees. In performing these calculations, Defendant's costing unit did not consider decreases in state employee salaries, although most state employees experienced effective salary decreases during fiscal years 2008-2009, 2009-2010, and 2011-2012 as the result of mandatory furloughs or collectively bargained personal leave programs imposed pursuant to executive orders to address a fiscal emergency the state was experiencing during those years. Id. at *6-7. The mandatory furloughs did not alter an affected state employee's rate of pay, but did effectively reduce the wages or salary earned. Plaintiffs sought declaratory relief that: (i) the salary of each judicial officer in fiscal years 2008-2009 through 2013-2014 was the salary provided pursuant to § 68203; (ii) the salary increases provided for in § 68203 were mandatory and not subject to the discretion or authorization of any state official; and (iii) pension benefits were based on the final judicial salaries calculated according to § 68203. Id. at *8. The trial court certified a class and issued a proposed judgment in favor of Plaintiffs. The trial court stated that the plain meaning of the words "salary increase in § 68203(a), denoted amounts by which a salary is made larger. Thus, salary decreases are not considered part of the definition of 'salary increase." Id. Defendant appealed the judgment. Plaintiffs filed a motion for attorneys' fees, and the trial court granted that motion in part, awarding Plaintiff $659,756 in attorneys' fees. Defendant also appealed the fee order, and the California Court of Appeal consolidated the two appeals. Id. at *9. Defendants contended the phrase "average percentage salary increase for the current fiscal year for California State employees" as used in § 68203 must be construed to include not only salary increases, but also effective salary decreases caused by mandatory furloughs imposed during fiscal years 2008-2009 through 2011-2012. Id. at *13. The Court of Appeal found there was nothing in the legislative history that indicated that the average percentage salary increase for state employees in any given fiscal year was intended to include effective salary decreases as well as increases. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal upheld the trial court's ruling. As to the award for attorneys' fees, Defendants contended that the fee award should be reversed because Plaintiffs did not confer a significant benefit on the general public or a large class of persons and was motivated by personal pecuniary interest. Id. at *27. The Court of Appeal disagreed and held that judges have a vested right to their office for a certain term, and during the time periods relevant to this action, to an annual increase in salary in accordance with the formula prescribed in § 68203. Id. at *28. The Court of Appeal stated that a result of Plaintiffs' lawsuit, more than 3,000 judges, judicial retirees, and their beneficiaries will receive salaries and benefits that were wrongfully withheld. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal upheld the trial court's order granting attorneys' fees.

(iii) Connecticut

Gold, et al. v. Rowland,* 2017 Conn. LEXIS 81 (Conn. April 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retired state employees, brought a class action alleging breach of contract. Plaintiffs were enrolled in an Anthem Insurance group health care plan and asserted that they were entitled to proceeds from the demutualization of Defendant Anthem Insurance, Inc. Id. at *8. They claimed that because they were participants, they were entitled to a share of demutualization proceeds and that Defendants breached their contractual obligations when it distributed the proceeds to the State of Connecticut instead of the Plaintiffs. Id. at *9. The trial court entered a judgment in favor of Defendants. Id. On Plaintiffs' appeal to the Supreme Court of Connecticut, Plaintiffs argued that the trial court incorrectly concluded that the relevant contract provisions were ambiguous and consulted extrinsic evidence. The Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's decision. Id. at *70. Plaintiffs argued that the 1997 articles of incorporation represented the entirety of the relevant agreement and those articles unambiguously provided that Plaintiffs were members of Anthem Insurance who were entitled to a share of the demutualization proceeds. Id. at *24. Plaintiffs further contended that the contract was not ambiguous and that the trial court improperly considered extrinsic evidence of the parties' intent. Id. Defendants contended that the relevant agreement encompassed the articles of incorporation and the other merger documents. Defendants further maintained that the articles, both standing alone and when read in conjunction with the other merger documents, were ambiguous with respect to Plaintiffs' membership status and entitlement to demutualization proceeds. Therefore, Defendants argued that the trial court properly looked to extrinsic evidence to resolve the ambiguity. Id. The Supreme Court agreed with Defendants that the articles and other merger documents were part and parcel of the same transaction and that they were ambiguous as to Plaintiffs' eligibility for membership in Anthem Insurance and their entitlement to a share of the demutualization proceeds. Id. at *25. Accordingly, the Supreme Court ruled that the trial court properly consulted extrinsic evidence and it concluded that the trial court's holding was consistent with Defendant's interpretation of the agreement. As a result, the Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's decision. Id. at *70.

(iv) Hawaii

Kawashima, et al. v. The State Of Hawaii,* 140 Haw. 139 (Haw. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of substitute and part-time teachers ("PTT"), filed two class actions consisting of the Kawashima and Garner classes asserting breaches of contract claims related to wages they claimed that the State owed to them. The two actions were consolidated on appeal to the Supreme Court of Hawaii, which reversed and remanded for an entry of judgment in favor of Defendant. The substitute teachers' compensation was governed by § 302A-624(e) of the Hawaii Revised Statute, which established a pier diem rate. Id. at 143. The part-time teachers' pay was governed by the Department of Education's ("DOE") internal guidelines for School Code Regulation 5203 ("Regulation 5203"), which originally linked the hourly wage of PTTs to the per diem wage paid to substitute teachers under the HRS. Id. The DOE retroactively amended Regulation 5203, stating that the rate of pay for PTTs would be determined by the DOE. Id. at 144. The Garner class included approximately 8,000 substitute teachers, half of whom also worked as PTTs for which they were paid hourly wages. The argued that they were entitled to both per diem back wages and hourly back wages. The Kawashima class included approximately 20,000 PTTs who were paid on an hourly basis. Id. at 142. The state ultimately settled the claims of the Garner class' per diem wage claims of the substitute teachers, but disputed liability as to the payment of hourly wages to the PTTs. The PTTs in both classes alleged that they were owed back wages pursuant to the DOE's School Code Regulation 5203, which linked the hourly pay of PTTs to the per diem wage paid to substitute teachers. Id. at 143. Plaintiffs alleged that the state failed to incorporate Regulation 5203 into their employment contracts. The trial court granted in part and denied in part the Garner class' motion for partial summary judgment, and ruled that the state violated its contractual obligation to pay the substitute teachers per diem wages prescribed by the HRS. The trial court authorized an interlocutory appeal from its summary judgment order. The Hawaii Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's determination that the state violated its contractual obligation to pay the substitute teachers by failing to pay them the per diem rate prescribed by the HRS. On remand the Garner class sought to include the teachers who they argued were also entitled to hourly back wages as PTT's. Similarly, the PTTs in Kawashima argued that their hourly pay rate, pursuant to Regulation 5203, was linked to the substitute teachers per diem pay rate under the HRS. The trial court granted the Kawashima Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment, and ruled that Regulation 5203 had the same force and effect as law and the hourly pay rate for PTTs was linked to the most current per diem pay rate for substitute teachers. The state appealed in both cases and the cases were transferred to the Supreme Court and consolidated for purposes of appeal. On appeal, the state argued that the trial courts erred when they determined that Regulation 5203 was an HRS rule essentially linking the PTTs pay to the statutorily-mandated pay of the substitute teachers. The Supreme Court of Hawaii agreed and ruled that trial court in both Kawashima and Garner erred when they: (i) determined that Regulation 5203 was an HRS rule; and (ii) granted summary judgment in favor of Plaintiffs for their hourly back wages contract claims. The Supreme Court held that Regulation 5203 was not a rule under the HRS, chapter 91, rather it was an internal management policy that the DOE could amend at any time. The policy did not have the force and effect of law and was not incorporated into the teachers' contracts and the state was not liable for any hourly back wages. Id. at 149. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded for an entry of judgment in favor of the state. The Supreme Court affirmed the trial court only to the extent that the trial court determined that Plaintiffs were not entitled to interest under the HRS.

(v) Illinois

Caritas Family Solutions, Inc., et al. v. Dimas,* Case No. 17-CH-112 (Ill. Cir. Ct. July 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of healthcare providers, sought an injunction ordering the State of Illinois Comptroller to pay the entire sums allegedly due to them under their human services contracts, regardless of appropriations, based on claims of impairment of contract, due process, and equal protection violations. Id. at 1. The Illinois Comptroller did not authorize payments on the contracts due to the severe fiscal crisis of the State of Illinois. Plaintiffs argued that Illinois Public Act 99-0524 – which authorized some funding amid appropriations to pay for the State's critical needs – resulted in a permanent impairment of the amounts due to them under contracts and an impairment of their remedies in the Illinois Court of Claims. Id. Plaintiffs also asserted that that Illinois Governor exceeded his powers of office by entering into the contracts and continuing those contracts while simultaneously vetoing the Illinois General Assembly's budget bills. In opposition, Defendants argued that it was unconstitutional to pay Plaintiffs' contracts because there were no appropriations for that purpose. The trial court found that Plaintiffs' claims failed under the controlling precedent from the Illinois Appellate Court in Illinois Collaboration on Youth v. Dimas, 2017 Ill. App. LEXIS 385 (1st Dist. June 15, 2017). In Dimas, the Illinois Appellate Court examined similar issues, where the State conducted operations without a budget, entered into and continued contracts without appropriations, and vetoed appropriation bills that would have provided funding for the contracts. The Illinois Appellate Court affirmed the dismissal of all of the claims. The trial court determined that the result should be no different here. The trial court sympathized with Plaintiffs' plight – the slashing of their budgets, laying-off workers, and the closure of their agencies – because "the Governor and the General Assembly could not act together to take care of the needs of our citizens." Id. at 3. The trial court indicated that Plaintiffs were not entitled to relief, and their "remedy is to lobby the members of the General Assembly …" Id. The trial court acknowledged that Illinois would suffer if Plaintiffs were to lay-off hundreds of workers and withdraw services, and that the breach of hundreds of agreements did not amount to a simple breach of contract. Id. Nonetheless, the trial court found that Dimas controlled the issues in this case, and it therefore dismissed Plaintiffs' claims.

Illinois Collaboration On Youth v. Dimas, et al.,* 2017 Ill. App. LEXIS 162471 (1st. Dist. June 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of social service organizations, filed suit alleging that Defendants violated the Illinois State Constitution when they failed to provide payments to Plaintiffs pursuant to contracts with the State for social services because of an on-going state budget impasse. Plaintiffs' contracts with the State were contingent upon and subject to the availability appropriated of funds. At the time the contracts were executed there were no appropriations for the services. Subsequently, the General Assembly twice passed an appropriation bill to cover Plaintiffs' contracts, but the Governor vetoed the bill each time. Plaintiffs did not receive payments on the contracts, despite providing services and sought an injunction ordering the Illinois Comptroller to pay Plaintiffs the entire sums owed. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants: (i) acted beyond the scope of their legal authority; (ii) unconstitutionally impaired contractual obligations; (iii) denied Plaintiffs equal protection of the laws; and (iv) deprived Plaintiffs of property without due process. Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint on the grounds that it was barred by sovereign immunity and failed to state a valid claim for relief. The trial court granted the motion to dismiss. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Illinois Appellate Court affirmed the trial court's decision. First, the Appellate Court held that Plaintiffs did not have claims to be paid for the services provided under contracts that made payment subject to legislative appropriations because under Article IV, § 9 of the Illinois Constitution the Governor had the authority to veto appropriations bills and was not obligated to approve any or all portions of appropriations bills. The failure of the contingency of sufficient appropriations to occur did not render the Governor's conduct unconstitutional or unlawful. The Appellate Court also held that there was no impairment of contract, as the impairment of contracts clause stated that "no law impairing the obligation of contracts shall be passed." Id. at *13. However, the mere failure to pass a law did not amount to an infringement on the obligation of contracts. The Appellate Court noted that the General Assembly twice passed appropriations bills that would have provided funding for the contracts at issue, and the General Assembly therefore did not breach the contracts clause. The constitutional provision denying the power to pass any law impairing the obligation of a contract applied only to a statute enacted after the making of a contract, and the contacts at issue were made at a time when there were no budget appropriations in place and contained a clause that expressly stated that the contracts were subject to legislative appropriations. The Appellate Court further held that Plaintiffs were not denied equal protection of the law because there were rational reasons for the State to assure appropriations did not outstrip available revenues. Finally, the Appellate Court ruled that there was no due process violation because the contracts were explicitly subject to appropriations, and therefore failure of that contingency to occur did not deprive the Plaintiffs of a property right. Accordingly, the Appellate Court affirmed the trial court's decision to dismiss Plaintiffs' complaint.

(vi) Michigan

Aft Michigan, et al. v. State Of Michigan,* Case No. 154117-19 (Mich. Dec. 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of nearly 275,000 education employees and retirees, filed a class action against Defendant, the State of Michigan, alleging they had pay for retiree health care that had been illegally deducted from their paychecks. They sought the return of those funds. The dispute arose from a 2010 law that, according to Plaintiffs, violated the contract clauses of the U.S. Constitution and the Michigan state Constitution because it substantially impaired their employment contracts by involuntarily docking education workers' wages by 3% to fund retiree medical benefits. The alleged improper deductions were made from July 2010 until September 2012. Previously, the Michigan Court of Appeals awarded $554 million be returned to Plaintiffs from Defendant. On appeal, the Michigan Supreme Court affirmed the decision. The Supreme Court determined that the 2010 law "substantially impaired" Plaintiffs' employment contracts by involuntarily reducing their wages, and that Defendant "failed to demonstrate that this measure was reasonable and necessary to further a legitimate public purpose." Id. at 4. Accordingly, the Supreme Court ruled that the law authorizing the deductions was unconstitutional, and it affirmed the Court of Appeals' decision refunding $554 million to Plaintiffs.

Editor's Note: Aft Michigan affirmed the largest judgment of 2017 in a workplace class action.

Bauserman, et al. v. Unemployment Insurance Agency*, 2017 Mich. App. LEXIS 1154 (Mich. App. July 18, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated their rights to due process when investigating whether Plaintiffs committed fraud in receiving unemployment benefits. Id. at *1. The trial court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment. On appeal, the Michigan Court of Appeals reversed and remanded. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant used an automated decision-making system to detect and adjudicate suspected instances of employment benefit fraud, which deprived claimants of due process and fair and just treatment because it determined guilt without providing notice, without proving guilt, and without affording claimants an opportunity to be heard before penalties were imposed. Id. at *1-2. Defendant argued that the trial court erred in denying its motion for summary judgment because Plaintiffs' claims were not filed in compliance with the governing provision of the Court of Claims Act. The Court of Appeal agreed. The Court of Appeal explained that the relevant statute stated in part that "in all actions for property damage or personal injuries, claimant shall file with the clerk of the court of claims a notice of intention to file a claim or the claim itself within 6 months following the happening of the event giving rise to the cause of action." Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal found that it must determine whether the six months within which Plaintiffs were required to file a notice of intention to file a claim, or the claim itself, began to run: (i) when Defendant issued notices informing Plaintiffs that they were disqualified from receiving unemployment benefits; or (ii) when Defendant seized Plaintiffs' property. The Court of Appeal held that based on previous case law, it was most reasonable to interpret the language so that a party must file "a notice of intention to file a claim or the claim itself within 6 months following the happening of the event giving rise to the cause of action." Id. at *16. The Court of Appeal reasoned that it would follow that Plaintiffs' cause of action accrued when the wrong on which they base their claims was done. The Court of Appeals stated that in a constitutional claim alleging a deprivation of due process, "the alleged wrong upon which Plaintiffs' claims are based was done" when Defendant issued notices informing Plaintiffs of its determination that Plaintiffs had engaged in fraudulent conduct, and they were not given the requisite notice and opportunity to be heard. Id. at *20. The Court of Appeals opined that Plaintiff Bauserman's notices of redetermination regarding his unemployment benefits were dated December 3, 2014, Plaintiff Broe's notices of determination advising him of his disqualification for unemployment benefits were dated July 15, 2014, and Plaintiff Williams' notice of determination/redetermination was dated June 22, 2012. Id. at *23-24. Accordingly, since Plaintiffs did not institute their action until September 9, 2015, their claims were not filed in compliance with the Court of Claims Act, i.e., "within 6 months following the happening of the event giving rise to the cause of action." Id. at *24. The Court of Appeals therefore reversed the trial court's ruling denying Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

(vii) New Jersey

Atlantic Ambulance Corp. v. Cullum, et al.,* 451 N.J. Super. 247 (N.J. App. Div. 2017). Plaintiffs filed counterclaims against Defendant after Defendant filed claims against Plaintiffs for their failure to pay ambulance bills. Plaintiffs asserted class counterclaims of negligence, common law fraud, breach of contract, unjust enrichment, and violations of the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act ("CFA"). Plaintiffs also moved for class certification on behalf of a proposed class who claimed that they were overcharged for ambulance services pursuant to the CFA and breach of contract claims. Id. at 252. The trial court denied the motion for class certification on the basis that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the commonality and typicality requirements. Id. at 253. The trial court also ruled that Plaintiffs did not suffer an ascertainable loss under the CFA because they failed to pay Defendant's bill, and therefore it rejected Plaintiffs' argument that an excessive bill from Defendant was sufficient to prove an ascertainable loss. Id. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the New Jersey Appellate Division affirmed in part and reversed in part. The Appellate Division ruled that the trial court's reasoning was flawed when it determined that Plaintiffs were required to have paid the bill to demonstrate an ascertainable loss. Id. at 254. However, the Appellate Division affirmed the decision to deny class certification on the CFA claim, reasoning that the CFA was inapplicable to ambulance service providers under the learned professional exception to the CFA. Id. at 258. With respect to the two breach of contract claims that Defendant: (i) charged unreasonable rates for ambulance services, and (ii) improperly charged a $14 mileage fee, the Appellate Division agreed that denial of certification was proper to the extent that Plaintiffs challenged the reasonableness of fees charged. The Appellate Division reasoned that as a matter of public policy, trial courts are ill-equipped to determine the reasonable costs of health care. Id. at 260. However, some Plaintiffs were not brought to the hospital and Defendant improperly charged them $14 for one mile of travel. Id. at 261. Because this claim did not violate any policy concerns and merely related to improper billing, the Appellate Division remanded for the trial court to consider whether this class could pursue certification. Id. In sum, the Appellate Division affirmed in part and remanded in part. Id.

In The Matter Of County Of Atlantic,* 230 N.J. 237 (2017). Unions representing public employees entered into a collective negotiating agreement ("CNAs") with Atlantic County. The CNAs stated that while the contracts were in effect, the covered individuals would receive annual salary increases under an automatic increment system and when the CNAs expired, the provisions of the agreement would continue in effect until a successor agreement was negotiated. Prior to the expiration of the CNAs, the County informed the unions that the employees would no longer receive their automatic increase in salary once the CNAs expired. The County acknowledged that its customary practice was to continue the previously negotiated payment scheme, but it maintained that it was no longer reasonable to do so. Id. at 242. The unions filed charges against the County with the Public Employment Relations Commission ("PERC"), claiming that the County had engaged in an unfair labor practice in violation of the New Jersey Employer-Employee Relations Act ("EERA") by refusing to pay the salary increments after each CNA expired. Id. at 243. The hearing examiner found that applicable case law required the application of the "dynamic status quo" doctrine, which the PERC adopted in 1975, and which precluded the County from altering the status quo while engaged in collective negotiations. Id. Given the contract language and the County's history of continuing the payments after the previous CNAs had expired, the hearing officer found that the refusal to pay was a departure from the dynamic status quo and constituted a unilateral change in a mandatory subject of negotiations in violation of the EERA. The County petitioned for review and the PERC disagreed that the contract language required continuation of incremental salary increases after the contract expiration. Id. The PERC found that the dynamic status quo doctrine was impractical and burdensome considering economic conditions and legislative changes and that the County was within its authority to stop applying the salary increment systems in the expired CNAs. As a result, it dismissed the charges. After the PERC's decision in the Atlantic County matter, Bridgewater Township notified the union that it too would stop the salary step increments once the current CNA expired. Id. The union filed a grievance, which the Township denied. The union then submitted the matter to the PERC for arbitration. The PERC held that public employers were no longer required, as a matter of law, to fund automatic advancement on a salary guide after a contract had expired. On the unions consolidated appeal, the New Jersey Appellate Division reversed the PERC's decision. Id. The Appellate Division ruled that the PERC had adopted the dynamic status quo doctrine decades ago, and could not abandon it now. The Appellate Division found that the salary increment system was a term and condition of employment that could not be unilaterally terminated during negotiations for a successor CNA. Bridgewater Township, Atlantic County, and the PERC then appealed to the Supreme Court of New Jersey. It affirmed the Appellate Division's decision. The Supreme Court held that the language of the respective agreements required that the salary step increases remained in place until the parties reached agreement on new CNAs, and that the county and township had committed an unfair labor practice. Accordingly, the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the Appellate Division. Id. at 256.

International Association Of Firefighters, et al. v. Atlantic City,* Case No. L-222-17 (N.J. Super. Ct. Aug. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of firefighters' unions and their members, filed suit against Defendants over a planned reduction-in-force. The Court had previously granted Plaintiffs' request for an injunction against Defendants, which prohibited them from reducing the size of Atlantic City's Fire Department ("ACFD") to 125 firefighters. Id. at 1. The Court held that the dramatic reduction in personnel would compromise public safety, cause irreparable harm, and would not be reasonable under the New Jersey Recovery Act. Id. at 2. The Court ordered the parties to engage in discussions to determine the appropriate size of the reduction, but the parties could not agree. Defendants presented a modified proposal seeking to reduce the ACFD to 148 firefighters. Plaintiffs objected and sought to continue the injunction to prohibit Defendants from reducing the size of the ACFD to 148 firefighters. Plaintiffs also requested the Court to require Defendant to maintain a force of at least 188 firefighters. Id. at 2. The Court denied Defendant's request to set aside the injunction and held that Plaintiffs established by clear and convincing evidence that Defendants' proposal to reduce the size of the ACFD to 148 firefighters would cause irreparable harm in that it would compromise the public safety of residents and visitors. Id. at 25. The Court opined that any reduction below 180 firefighters would compromise public safety. Id. Accordingly, the Court enjoined Defendant from reducing the workforce of the ACFD to below 180 firefighters.

D. Other State Law Rulings Affecting The Defense Of Workplace Class Action Litigation

(i) Alabama

Lawler, et al. v. City Of Birmingham,* 2017 Ala. LEXIS 109 (Ala. Oct. 20, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging claims of securities fraud against Defendant for making false statements regarding its financial condition and its anticipated future performance. Id. at *2. Class counsel negotiated a $310 million settlement and the trial court subsequently approved the settlement, awarding class counsel 40% of the settlement fund, or $124 million, as attorneys' fees. Id. at *3. The trial court gave a deadline for the filing of objections to class counsel's attorneys' fees that was seven days before the attorneys' fee application to the trial court was due. Id. at *4. Numerous class members filed objections to the settlement, arguing that the attorneys' fees requested were excessive and amounted to a windfall for Plaintiffs' counsel. Id. at *8. The trial court overruled the objections and entered an order awarding class counsel the $124 million in attorneys' fees they had requested. Id. at *37. On the objectors' appeal to the Supreme Court of Alabama, it vacated the trial court's order awarding the fees and remanded. The objectors argued that they were denied due process because objections were due before the attorney-fee application was filed, and that the attorneys' fees ultimately awarded were excessive. The objectors also asserted that they were given insufficient information regarding class counsel's time spent on the matter to properly object to the size of the attorneys' fees award. The Supreme Court denied class counsel's motion to dismiss the appeal, rejecting the argument that the objectors lacked standing. Instead, the Supreme Court ruled that a class member who objected in a timely manner to a settlement approval order may appeal without first intervening. Id. at *13. The Supreme Court also rejected class counsel's argument that the appeal should be dismissed based on an untimely objection, as the objectors appeared at the fairness hearing to object. Id. at *20. The Supreme Court agreed with the objectors' argument that a schedule requiring class members to object to the attorneys' fees request of class counsel before the request is formally made served to violate the class members' due process rights. Furthermore, the Supreme Court also agreed that the objectors were entitled to more information from class counsel about the time expended on the case, so as to allow the class members to pose any objections. The Supreme Court rejected class counsel's assertions that the amount of time that counsel expended on this case was irrelevant, ruling that it is a relevant factor that should be considered when determining reasonable attorneys' fees in a class action. Id. at *36. Accordingly, the Supreme Court vacated the trial court's order awarding the attorneys' fees and remanded to the trial court for class counsel to file a new attorneys' fees application with more detailed information regarding the time expended in this case. Id. at *37. The Supreme Court also ruled that the objectors shall be given a reasonable opportunity to review the new application and file any objections with the trial court. Id. at *38.

Taff, et al. v. Caremark RX, LLC*, 2017 Ala. LEXIS 15 (Ala. Feb. 24, 2017). In this case, the trial court in June of 2000 entered a final judgment approving a settlement agreement in Taff v. Caremark, Inc., a class action lawsuit against the corporate predecessor of Defendant. Approximately 16 years later, class counsel moved the trial court to enter an order requiring Defendant to produce for them certain information regarding the members of the class so that class counsel could notify those members of a proposed settlement in a separate class action lawsuit pending against Defendant – Johnson v. Caremark Rx, LLC – in which some of the members of the Taff class might be able to file claims. Id. at *1. The trial court ultimately granted class counsel's request and ordered Defendant to produce the requested information. Defendant petitioned the Alabama Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus directing the trial court to vacate that order, which the Supreme Court granted. Defendant argued that the Supreme Court should grant its mandamus petition because: (i) the trial court lacked jurisdiction to enter the order; and (ii) that the ordered relief was unreasonable and excessively burdensome, and that the trial court exceeded its discretion in ordering it. Id. at *14. The Supreme Court found that the June 2000 final judgment entered by the trial court approved the parties' settlement and resolved all the issues and claims that had been raised in the Taff case. The trial court specifically noted in the June 2000 judgment that it would continue to retain this residual jurisdiction when it stated that "the Court hereby reserves and maintains continuing jurisdiction over all matters relating to the settlement agreement or the consummation of the settlement." Id. at *15. The Supreme Court stated that the question was whether it was within the trial court's residual jurisdiction to issue the order requiring Defendant to produce the requested information. The Supreme Court concluded that it was not, finding that although it was true that the trial court's statement of retained jurisdiction might be read in a manner that would allow the trial court to require Defendant to now disclose the information sought by class counsel, the trial court's residual jurisdiction could not be extended that far. Id. at *16. The Supreme Court found that there was no real dispute directly related to the final judgment entered by the trial court. The Supreme Court determined that neither the terms of the June 2000 final judgment, nor the terms of the settlement agreement itself, nor the requirements of local Rule 23, which governs class action lawsuits in Alabama, nor any statute that has been identified by the parties required Defendant or its predecessors to file with the trial court the information now being requested. Id. at *21-22. The Supreme Court held that the trial court's August 1 order essentially sought to modify or amend that final judgment to impose new obligations upon Defendant. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Supreme Court granted Defendant's request for a writ of mandamus vacating the trial court's order.

(ii) California

Abboud, et al. v. Consolidated Disposal Services,* 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 4753 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. July 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of property owners, filed a putative class action alleging breach of contract, fraud, negligent misrepresentation, unfair business practices, declaratory relief, rescission and unjust enrichment. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant provided inadequate garbage collection and disposal services to the property owners and overcharged for its services in breach of Defendant's contract with the local government. Id. at *2. Plaintiff moved for class certification and the trial court denied the motion. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. Plaintiffs argued that the trial court erred in finding a lack of common proof and in placing too much emphasis on case management issues. The Court of Appeal determined that the record amply supported the trial court's conclusions that Plaintiffs failed to present sufficient proof of the predominance of common issues over individual issues regarding Defendant's liability. Id. at *15. Plaintiff argued that the individualized issues related to damages and were not a sufficient basis to deny certification. Id. The Court of Appeal concluded, however, that the lack of commonality was not limited to damages, as Plaintiffs failed to show how they would use Defendant's records on a class-wide basis to prove that Defendant either overcharged certain customers or failed to service certain customers. Id. at *16. Furthermore, the Court of Appeal reasoned that Plaintiffs' expert did not offer opinions about how liability could be established on a class-wide basis as his declaration was largely conclusory and focused on damages. Id. The Court of Appeal also rejected Plaintiffs argument that the trial court over-emphasized case management issues. Id. at *17. The Court of Appeal concluded that Plaintiffs failed to articulate how the individualized issues could be managed at trial, even though the trial court gave Plaintiff numerous opportunities to present such evidence and even continued the hearing for several months to allow Plaintiffs to gather additional evidence. Id. at *18. The trial court also based its denial of class certification on the lack of evidence of numerosity, as the representative Plaintiffs had unique experiences that supported the trial court's conclusion that Plaintiffs failed to show that there were substantial numbers of property owners who were similarly overcharged or underserviced. Id. at *19. The Court of Appeal denied Plaintiffs' request to take judicial notice of voluminous records that Plaintiffs obtained pursuant to the Public Records Act in support of Plaintiffs' contention that Defendant withheld discovery. Id. at *20. The Court of Appeal determined that it was not proper to take judicial notice of the truth of hearsay statements. Furthermore, Plaintiffs were obligated to undertake discovery and if they believed that Defendant failed to fully and faithfully comply with discovery obligations , Plaintiffs should have sought an appropriate remedy in the trial court. Id. at *20. As such, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's decision.

Burd, et al. v. Barkley Court Reporters, Inc.*, 2017 Cal. App. LEXIS 1050 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Nov. 29, 2017). Plaintiff, an attorney, filed a class action alleging that Defendant charged excessive court reporter fees in violation §§ 69950 and 69954 of the Government Code and the California Unfair Competition Law. Defendant filed a motion for judgment on the pleadings, arguing that the statutory transcription rates set forth in §§ 69950 and 69954 applied only to official reporters employed by the court system, and not to privately retained certified shorthand reporters who served as official reporters pro tempore. Id. at *2. The trial court granted Defendant's motion. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed. The Government Code identifies two categories of persons who may perform the duties of a court reporter in the California court system, including official reporters and official reporters pro tempore. Id. at *4. An official reporter is an employee of the trial court, and an official reporter pro tempore may be either a court employee or a certified shorthand reporter privately retained by a party if an official reporter is not available. Id. at *4-5. The statutes authorizing the trial court to appoint official reporters and official reporters pro tempore are set forth in the Government Code under title 8, chapter 5, article 9 ("article 9"). The Court of Appeal stated that neither § 69950 nor § 69954 distinguished between court reporters employed by the trial court and privately retained court reporters. Id. at *8. The Court of Appeal opined that the plain language of the statutes indicated that the prescribed transcription fees were intended to apply to court reporters generally, and were not limited to court reporters employed by the trial court. Id. at *8-9. The trial court concluded that the statutory scheme of article 9 prescribed fee limits that apply only to court reporters employed by the courts or by local governments, and that the legislature intentionally used the term "official reporter pro tempore" in the statutes to distinguish between privately employed reporters appointed pro tempore and official reporters employed by the trial court. Id. at *9. The trial court noted that although §§ 69950 and 69954 made no reference to official reporters and official reporters pro tempore, the scope of those statutes is delimited by § 69947, which states "except in counties where a statute provides otherwise, the official reporter shall receive for his services the fees prescribed in this article." Id. at *10-11. The trial court ruled that the fact that § 69947 refers only to the "official reporter" is evidence that the Legislature did not intend the fee provisions of article 9 to apply to private reporters acting as official reporters pro tempore. Id. at *11. The Court of Appeal explained that the trial court's construction of §§ 69947, 69950, and 69954 was premised on the assumption that only official reporters were employees of the trial courts and that all official reporters pro tempore were privately retained by the parties. Id. The Court of Appeal found that the trial court's assumption was incorrect, and that the statutes in article 9 that referred to official reporters pro tempore did not distinguish between court reporters employed by the trial courts and those who are privately retained. Therefore, the trial court's reliance on § 69947's reference to "the official reporter" as the basis for concluding that §§ 69950 and 69954 applied only to court reporters employed by the trial court was incorrect. Id. at *12. The Court of Appeal further found that the trial court's interpretation conflicted with that of Court Reporters Board of California, which had interpreted §§ 69950 and 699554 to apply to both official reporters and official reporters pro tempore. Id. at *16. The Court of Appeal determined that the Board's longstanding interpretation was consistent with the plain language of §§ 69950 and 69954, which did not distinguish between privately retained and court-employed official court reporters pro tempore. The Court of Appeal concluded that the plain language of §§ 69950 and 69954 applied statutory transcription rates to official reporters and official reporters pro tempore, whether employed by the trial court or privately retained by a party. The Court of Appeal thus opined that the trial court erred by concluding that the statutory rates applied only to official reporters employed by the court. The Court of Appeal therefore reversed the trial court's decision granting Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Christman v. Apple American Group,* 2017 Cal. Unpub. LEXIS 6866 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Oct. 4, 2017). Plaintiff filed a claim on behalf of herself and other non-exempt employees under the Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA") alleging violations of state labor law. Id. at *1. Defendant sought an order to enforce an arbitration agreement between the parties. Id. at *2. The trial court denied Defendant's motion, ruling that PAGA claims were not subject to arbitration and that Plaintiff's claim could not be split into a non-arbitrable representative claim and an arbitrable individual claim. Id. at *3. On Defendant's appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's PAGA claim was subject to arbitration and that at a minimum, Plaintiff must arbitrate the threshold issues of whether she is an aggrieved employee for purposes of the PAGA. Id. at *4. The Court of Appeal ruled that a pre-dispute arbitration agreement that a Plaintiff has executed as an individual does not subject the PAGA claim to arbitration because the right underlying the claim is subject to the state's control. Id. at *9. Plaintiff executed the agreement as a condition of her employment before she satisfied the statutory requirement of asserting a PAGA claim and until she satisfied those requirements, she was not authorized to assert the PAGA claim as an agent of the state. Id. at *11. The Court of Appeal rejected Defendant's claim that the Federal Arbitration Act governed the agreement because trial courts should employ state law principles regarding the formation of contracts. Id. at *11. The Court of Appeal also rejected Defendant's contention that the agreement required arbitration of Plaintiff's status as an aggrieved employee, since that status as an aggrieved employee could not be subject to arbitration because a representative PAGA claim cannot be split into an arbitrable individual claim and a non-arbitrable representative claim. Id. at *13.

Cosio, et al. v. International Performing Arts Academy LLC,* Case No. CGC-16-551337 (Cal. Super. Ct. Sept. 18, 2017). Plaintiff filed an application for a temporary restraining order ("TRO") and an order to show cause as to why a preliminary injunction should not be issued arising out of alleged improprieties in defense counsel's efforts to gather declarations from putative class members in anticipation of Plaintiff's motion for class certification. Id. at 1. The Court issued the TRO to maintain the status quo and then reviewed further briefing on the issues pertinent to the TRO and injunction. The Court found that Defendant's communications to individuals were calculated to induce the interviewees to believe that the lawsuit was an individual action and that they were merely providing a "statement" containing "feedback" to Defendant, rather than a sworn declaration that would be submitted to the Court. Id. at 5. The Court held that Defendant's deceptive conduct posed a serious and imminent threat to interfere with the fair administration of justice. Id. The Court also noted that in Defendant's communications with individuals, they were not told that the purpose of the interviews was to gather evidence to be used against the Plaintiffs in the current lawsuit. Id. at 7. Although the Court stated that it would not restrain Defendant from future communications with absent class members due to First Amendment concerns, the Court found an injunction was appropriate and ordered that Defendant provide written curative notice to all individuals to whom it had sent draft declarations. The curative notice must state: (i) the matter is a putative class action; (ii) the individual is a potential member of the class that Plaintiff sought to represent; (iii) a description of the claims; and (iv) that the declaration was sought in support of Defendant's opposition to Plaintiff's class certification motion. Id. at 10. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for an injunction on Defendant's communications with class members.

Driscoll, et al. v. Granite Rock Co.,* 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 7456 (Cal. App. 6th Dist. Oct. 31, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of concrete mixer drivers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant failed to provide off-duty meal periods and/or failed to pay Plaintiffs one additional hour of pay for duty-free meal periods in violation of the California Labor Code. The trial court granted class certification as to the claims of approximately 200 concrete drivers. The class action was tried without a jury, and the trial court returned a verdict in favor of Defendant, finding that Defendant did not violate applicable labor laws in its meal period policies. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's ruling. One of the duties of the concrete mixer drivers was to monitor the constant rotation of the truck drum to ensure that the concrete did not harden. Defendant provided its concrete mixer drivers with the option of signing an on-duty meal period agreement which stated: "I understand that I may revoke this Waiver Agreement at any time by providing at least one (1) working day's advance notice to my Manager of my decision." Id. at *4. Defendant informed drivers that if they did not sign an On-Duty Meal Period Agreement and were asked to work through a meal, they would receive one hour of special pay. Id. All concrete drivers acknowledged receiving and reviewing this policy and drivers testified that they understood that they could revoke the On-Duty Meal Period Agreement at any time. The evidence at trial showed that only three drivers revoked their On-Duty Meal Period Agreement, and each of those drivers received an off-duty meal period and special pay. Id. Following trial, the trial court found that "Plaintiffs failed to prove that the drivers were forced, expected, or trained to involuntarily sign [On-Duty Meal Period Agreements] or to miss off-duty meal periods against their will." Id. at *5. On appeal, the Court of Appeal considered all of the evidence presented at trial and concluded that Defendant provided its concrete mixer drivers with an off-duty lunch period that was compliant with the law. The Court of Appeal found that the evidence at trial demonstrated that Defendant's employees received a legally compliant employee handbook that contained information about the availability and right to a 30-minute off-duty meal period, and the concrete mixer drivers acknowledged that they had reviewed the policy. In addition, the evidence showed that Defendant had posted the applicable wage order advising employees of their right to meal periods. Id. at *11-12. The Court of Appeal also stated that there was no evidence at trial that any mixer driver was ever denied an off-duty meal period when he or she requested it. Id. at *12-13. The Court of Appeal further found that because concrete mixer drivers were aware of their rights and exercised those rights in requesting and always receiving off-duty meals when they wanted them, Defendant met its legal obligation with regard to meal periods. Id. at *13. Plaintiffs argued that Defendant's policies actually required employees to waive a minimum labor standard of an off-duty meal period. However, the Court of Appeal noted that the trial court specifically found that the employees were not required to waive an unwaivable right; rather, mixer drivers were given the opportunity to take an off-duty meal period each day, and could freely choose to take or not take such meal period. Plaintiffs also argued for the first time on appeal that Defendant violated applicable labor laws by providing illegal financial incentives to its employees to work through their lunch period. Id. at *17. The Court of Appeal noted that Plaintiffs did not make the argument at trial that Defendant provided illegal financial incentives to induce the mixer drivers to forgo their off-duty meal period, and Defendant therefore did not have notice of the issue, nor did it argue or present evidence specifically addressing the issue. Id. at *17-18. The Court of Appeal therefore determined that Plaintiffs were precluded from raising this argument for the first time on appeal. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's ruling in favor of Defendant.

E.H. Summit, Inc., et al. v. ADP LLC*, 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 7833 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Nov. 14, 2017). Plaintiff, a group of former employees, filed a putative wage & hour class action lawsuit against Defendant Summit, and Summit filed a cross-complaint against Defendants ADP LLC, ADP, Inc., and AD Processing LLC ("ADP"). Summit settled the wage & hour claims brought by its former employee, but Summit's cross-complaint against ADP alleged that ADP was responsible for the asserted employee time calculation errors that were the predicate for the settled claims. Id. at *1. Summit alleged causes of action for breach of written contract, breach of oral contract, and breach of implied-in-fact contract. Summit used ADP for time management solutions for many years, and subsequently agreed with ADP to move to a new time management system using updated software. ADP provided Summit with a "Time & Labor-Management Terms and Conditions" document ("TLM Agreement") that left blank the space on the form agreement that could be used to designate the parties to whom it applied. ADP argued that it had not breached any terms of the TLM Agreement, which was the only valid written contract between the parties; that there was no evidence of an oral or implied contract; and that oral or implied contracts would in any case be barred by the terms of the TLM Agreement. The trial court found the TLM Agreement was a valid contract between Summit and ADP. The trial court further determined there was no evidence of a written, oral, or implied contract between Summit and ADP other than the TLM Agreement, and that an integration clause in the TLM Agreement precluded recognizing an oral or implied contract even if there were evidence of one. Id. at *6. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal concluded that ADP had made a proper prima facie showing that: (i) Summit had no evidence of any contract that imposed on ADP the obligations that Summit alleged that ADP had breached; and (ii) the only valid contract, the TLM Agreement, relieved ADP of those alleged obligations or in fact imposed them on Summit. Id. at *15. The Court of Appeal also determine that Summit failed to provide "substantial responsive evidence" of an oral or implied contract. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's ruling dismissing Summit's claims.

Esparaza, et al. v. KS Industries,* 2017 Cal. App. LEXIS 674 (Cal. App. 5th Dist. Aug. 2, 2017). Plaintiff brought a representative action under California's Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA") alleging violations of the California Labor Code, including failure to: (i) pay minimum and overtime wages; (ii) provide meal periods and rest breaks; (iii) pay wages in a timely matter; (iv) provide accurate wage statements; and (v) reimburse business expenses. Id. at *5. Plaintiff's amended complaint alleged all violations as single count under the PAGA. Id. at *6. Plaintiff sought to recover unpaid wages, civil penalties, interest, and attorneys' fees and costs. Id. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to the parties' agreement and the trial court denied the motion. Id. at *8. Defendant argued that Plaintiff was attempting to circumvent the arbitration agreement by filing a single, non-arbitrable cause of action under the PAGA and fashioning the relief sought as civil penalties under the PAGA. Id. at *7. Plaintiff asserted that a claim for civil penalties under the PAGA is not subject to arbitration and this included the recovery of wages. Id. at *7. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's interpretation of the PAGA conflicted with the requirements of the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") that an arbitration agreement must be enforced for claims seeking victim-specific relief. Id. at *7. On Defendant's appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order insofar as it denied arbitration of the representative claims for civil penalties, but it remanded for further proceedings. Defendant argued that the trial court's failure to order arbitration of some of the claims violated the FAA, as those claims sought individualized relief and were covered by the parties' arbitration agreement. Id. at *12. The Court of Appeal ruled that the FAA required the enforcement of arbitration agreements covering private disputes and the parties' arbitration agreement was worded to cover claims arising from the employment relationship, including Plaintiff's claims for unpaid wages and other types of victim-specific relief. Id. at *20. The State of California was not a party to the agreement, and thus claims brought by it or on its behalf under the PAGA are not subject to arbitration. Pursuant to the FAA, the claims that are private disputes between the Plaintiff and Defendant must be arbitrated and the claims brought on behalf of the State of California do not need to be arbitrated. The rule adopted in Iskanian v. CLS Transportation Los Angeles, LLC, 59 Cal. 4th 348 (2014), defined the boundary between the two types of claims, stating that PAGA representative claims for civil penalties are not subject to arbitration. Id. at *3. The Court of Appeal ruled that for purposes of the Iskanian rule, PAGA representative claims for civil penalties are limited to those where a portion of the recovery is allocated to the Labor and Workforce Development Agency and because claims for unpaid wages based on the Labor Code are not allocated in this manner, they are not exempt from arbitration. Id. at *20. The Court of Appeal concluded that some of the claims that Plaintiff was pursuing were PAGA representative claims seeking civil penalties that were not subject to arbitration. Id. at *25. The Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order denying arbitration of the representative claims for civil penalties and remanded for further proceedings to determine whether Plaintiff sought to recover wages under the Labor Code that were subject to arbitration. Id. at *28.

Garcia, et al. v. Pexco, LLC*, 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 2853 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. April 24, 2017). Plaintiff, an hourly employee, alleged that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA. Real Time Staffing Services, LLC ("Real Time"), a temporary staffing company, hired Plaintiff and assigned him to work for Defendant. As part of the hiring process with Real Time, Plaintiff filled out an employment application that included an arbitration agreement between Plaintiff and Real Time. Defendant was not a signatory to the arbitration agreement. Id. at *1-2. In 2014, Plaintiff filed suit against Real Time and Defendant for violations of the California Labor Code and unfair business practices pertaining to payment of wages during his assignment with Defendant. Real Time and Defendant moved to compel individual arbitration of Plaintiff's claims. The trial court granted the motion to compel arbitration. Plaintiff appealed the order, and contended that Defendant should not be allowed to compel arbitration as a non-signatory. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal disagreed, and upheld the trial court's ruling. The Court of Appeal noted that California law recognizes exceptions to the general rule that allows non-signatories to compel arbitration of a dispute arising out of the scope of the agreement, one of which is equitable estoppel. The Court of Appeal explained that under this exception, "a non-signatory Defendant may invoke an arbitration clause to compel a signatory Plaintiff to arbitrate its claim when the causes of action against the non-signatory are 'intimately founded in and intertwined with' the underlying contract obligations." Id. at *4. Plaintiff argued that equitable estoppel did not apply because his claims against Defendant were not sufficiently "intertwined" with the underlying arbitration agreement. Id. Plaintiff contended that he was not seeking to enforce the terms and conditions of his employment contract containing the arbitration clause, and that he only asserted causes of action based on the Labor Code. Plaintiff alleged that his claims were based on statutory violations, and could not be deemed part of the arbitration agreement. Id. at *4-5. The Court of Appeal found that Plaintiff's argument ignored the fact that a claim "arising out of" a contract does not itself need to be contractual. The Court of Appeal reasoned that Labor Code violations were clearly included as one of the types of disputes covered by the arbitration agreement. Id. at *5. The Court of Appeal determined that Plaintiff's claims against Defendant were rooted in his employment relationship with Real Time, and the governing arbitration agreement expressly included statutory wage & hour claims. Id. at *7. The Court of Appeal held that Plaintiff could not attempt to link Defendant to Real Time to hold it liable for alleged wage & hour claims, while at the same time arguing that the arbitration provision only applied to Real Time and not Defendant. Id. at *8. Therefore, because the arbitration agreement controlled Plaintiff's employment, the Court of Appeal opined that he was equitably estopped from refusing to arbitrate his claims with Defendant. As alleged joint employers, Defendant and Real Time were agents of each other in their dealings with Plaintiff. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal concluded that Defendant was entitled to compel arbitration of Plaintiff's claims against it under the arbitration clause in his contract with Real Time.

Gonzalez, et al. v. City Of Norwalk*, 2017 Cal. App. LEXIS 1071 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Dec. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of residents of the City of Norwalk who paid telephone user taxes through their cellular telephone providers, filed a class action asserting that Defendant's 2007 ordinance violated Propositions 62 and 218, which prohibit local governments from imposing, extending, or increasing taxes without voter approval. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs asserted that when voters approved a utility user tax in 2003, they "specifically voted not to tax services that were exempt from taxation under" § 4251 of the Internal Revenue Code. Thus, Plaintiffs argued eliminating the ordinance's reference to the Internal Revenue Code had the effect of imposing, extending, or increasing taxes within the meaning of Propositions 62 and 218. Id. Defendant demurred, asserting that the 2007 ordinance did not violate Propositions 62 or 218 as a matter of law. The trial court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend and subsequently entered a judgment of dismissal. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. The Court of Appeal found that while the 2007 ordinance made a technical change to the Norwalk Municipal Code, it did not impose, extend or increase the telephone tax. Accordingly, as a matter of law, the 2007 ordinance did not violate Propositions 62 or 218. Proposition 62 requires local governments to seek voter approval of all new general taxes. Proposition 218 added to the California Constitution the requirement that local governments seek voter approval of new general and special taxes. Plaintiffs contended that when the City Council adopted the 2007 ordinance, which deleted sub-section D from § 3.36.060 of the Norwalk Municipal Code, it unlawfully "imposed, extended, or increased a local tax without voter approval" in violation of Propositions 62 and 218. Id. at *4. Prior to 2003, Defendant taxed telephone, electric, and gas utility services at the rate of 5.5%. In 2003, the City Council agreed to allow the voters to ratify the City's continued collection of the utility user tax. The City Council then adopted a resolution that called for the setting of a special election to obtain voter approval of the "continued collection of a utility user tax as a general tax at a rate not to exceed 5.5%." Id. at *26. The Court of Appeal stated that this language suggested that the intent of the initiative was to continue the utility user tax as it then existed, by ratifying a 5.5% tax on all telephone service. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal concluded that the change in the interpretation of federal law did not mean, as Plaintiffs suggested, that Norwalk "had unlawfully been collecting a telephone users tax on services exempt from taxation under … the 2003 tax ordinance passed by the City's voters." The Court of Appeal found that as before 2007, § 3.36.060 (as approved by the voters in 2003) applied a 5.5% utility user tax to all telephone service. After the City Council adopted the 2007 ordinance, § 3.36.060 continued to apply a 5.5% utility user tax to all telephone service. Id. at *28. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal held that the 2007 ordinance did not "impose," "extend," or "increase" a general tax within the meaning of Propositions 62 or 218. Id. The Court of Appeal thereby affirmed the trial court's ruling.

Hefczyc, et al. v. Rady Children's Hospital,* 2017 Cal. App. LEXIS 1016 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. Nov. 17, 2017). Plaintiff, a health care consumer, filed a putative class action and sought declaratory relief to establish that Defendant's form contract that it gave to patients or their guarantors authorized Defendant to only charge the reasonable value of its services. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant was not authorized to bill self-pay patients based on its master list of itemized charge rates or its "Chargemaster" schedule, as it was grossly inflated. Id. at *4. The trial court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification, and concluded that Plaintiff failed to satisfy the requirements of ascertainability, predominance, and superiority. Id. at *9. On Plaintiff's appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. Id. at *45. Plaintiff asserted that the trial court erred in denying class certification because his complaint sought only declaratory relief and the motion for class certification was brought under the equivalent of Federal Rule 23(b)(1)(A) or 23(b)(2). Therefore, Plaintiff contended that he was not required to establish ascertainability, predominance, and superiority. The Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's decision and concluded that Plaintiff's arguments lacked merit. Id. at *11. The Court of Appeal rejected Plaintiff's argument that the trial court should have applied the class certification requirements set forth in Federal Rule 23(b)(1)(A) or 23(b)(2), rather than the requirements set forth in California case law. The Court of Appeal concluded that the authority for class action litigation in California was set forth in § 382 of the Code of Civil Procedure and California case law consistently has held that ascertainability, predominance, and superiority are required to certify a class action in California. Id. at *12. Further, there was no California authority that supported Plaintiffs' contention that ascertainability, predominance, and superiority were not required under Federal Rule 23(b)(1)(A) or 23(b)(2). The Court of Appeal held that the trial court properly required Plaintiff to establish ascertainability, predominance, and superiority. Furthermore, the Court of Appeal opined held that the trial court properly denied class certification on the basis that ascertainability, predominance, and superiority requirements were not satisfied. Defendant submitted an extensive declaration that explained that each patient account's history had to be individually and manually evaluated to determine whether the rates billed were the full Chargemaster amounts or some other amount, as self-pay patients often obtained a variety of different discounts based on their unique circumstances. Id. at *27. Further, patients may have been billed at full Chargemaster rates, and later established that they were covered by insurance or other benefits. Because it would take an individual inquiry into hundreds of thousands of records to even determine whether a patient fell under the class definition, the Court of Appeal concluded that trial court did not abuse its discretion in ruling that the class was not ascertainable. Id. at *32. Further, the Court of Appeal held that individual issues predominated because the trial court would be required to determine whether Plaintiff's Chargemaster rates were reasonable, thereby creating an unmanageable individualized factual inquiry that differed as to each class member. As such, the trial court also properly concluded that a class action was not the superior method for adjudication. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's decision denying class certification. Id. at *45.

Hernandez, et al. v. Ross Stores, Inc.,* Case No. E064026 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. Jan. 3, 2017). Plaintiff, an hourly-paid warehouse employee, filed a representative suit against Defendant under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). Plaintiff claimed that Defendant violated the California Labor Code ("CLC") by failing to pay all appropriate wages, failing to properly itemize hours worked and paid, and failing to pay for overtime. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration pursuant to the parties' arbitration agreement on the issue of whether Plaintiff was an "aggrieved party" under the PAGA. The arbitration agreement stated that it "applies to any disputes, arising out of or relating to the employment relationship between an associate and Ross…" Id. at 2. Defendant asserted that the issue of whether Plaintiff was an aggrieved party was a "dispute" covered under the agreement and any "claim" under the PAGA should be resolved in the trial court after the aggrieved party dispute was resolved. The trial court denied the motion because it found that the PAGA claim was a representative action brought on behalf of the state and did not include individual claims. On Defendant's appeal, the California Court of Appeal of California affirmed. Defendant asserted that under the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") and the California Arbitration Act ("CAA"), an employer and employee have the preemptive right to arbitrate individual "disputes" underlying a PAGA claim, while leaving the PAGA claim to be litigated in the trial court. The Court of Appeal was not persuaded by Defendant's argument that the language of the agreement referring to "disputes" as opposed to "claims" was a crucial distinction, or dispositive as to whether the aggrieved party dispute was subject to the arbitration agreement. Further, the Court of Appeal held that the dispute was not a dispute between an employee and an employer, but instead a representative action that did not involve any individual claims. The Court of Appeal noted that it found no authority supporting Defendant's argument that an employer may compel an employee to arbitrate individual aspects of their PAGA claim, as such requirement would thwart California's public policy of empowering employees to enforce labor laws under the PAGA.

Khaligh, et al. v. Consumertrack,* 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 5378 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Aug. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a representative action under the California Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA") alleging violations of the California Labor Code, including failure to pay required overtime, furnish proper wage statements, and to provide meal and rest periods. Id. at *1. Defendant moved to compel Plaintiffs to arbitrate their claims pursuant to an arbitration agreement. Id. The trial court granted Defendant's motion. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed on the grounds that the arbitration provisions were both procedurally and substantively unconscionable and the trial court erred in enforcing the arbitration agreement. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs' employment was conditional upon accepting the arbitration provisions as part of a pre-printed employment agreement and they had one day within which to accept the offer. The Court of Appeal found that the arbitration agreement was procedurally unconscionable because Defendant offered employment to the Plaintiffs on a "take it or leave it basis" and gave them only a short time to decide whether to sign the agreement. Id. at *7. The Court of Appeal held that the agreement was substantively unconscionable because: (i) it required employees to share arbitration fees and costs on unwaivable statutory claims; (ii) it allowed the employer to seek damages in a trial court while barring employees from doing so; and (iii) it allowed the employer to seek a permanent injunction in a trial court, but not the employee. Id. Because the arbitration provision contained more than one unconscionable term, the Court of Appeal ruled that it was not enforceable. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed and ordered the trial court to vacate its order compelling arbitration. Id.

Lawson, et al. v. ZB, N.A.,* 2017 Cal. App. LEXIS 1132 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. Dec. 19, 2017). Plaintiff brought wage & hour claims under the Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA") and the California Labor Code ("CLC").

Plaintiff asserted that as a representative claimant under the PAGA, she was entitled to recover the penalties imposed under §§ 558(a)(1) and (a)(2) of the CLA for under-payment of wages owed to her and other employees. Defendant moved to compel arbitration of Plaintiff's individual wage claims pursuant to the parties' arbitration agreement. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff waived the right to bring a class action or representative action against it, and therefore she was precluded from asserting lost wage claims on behalf of other employees. Defendant did not ask the trial court to order arbitration of Plaintiff's claims for civil penalties pursuant to § 558. The trial court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration and bifurcated Plaintiff's unpaid wages claim from her claim for the civil penalties. Id. at *4. However, because Plaintiff was acting as a PAGA representative, the trial court ordered that the unpaid wages portion of her claim be arbitrated as a representative claim and not an individual claim. Id. Thereafter, Defendant appealed. The California Court of Appeal consolidated Defendant's appeal and petition for writ of mandate challenging the trial court's order. At the outset, the Court of Appeal determined that it lacked appellate jurisdiction over the trial court's order compelling arbitration and dismissed Defendant's appeal. The Court of Appeal rejected Defendant's argument that preemption under the Federal Arbitration Act applied because prior to enactment of the PAGA, there was no private remedy under § 558 and there was no basis upon which to conclude that recovery under the statute would go to individual employees. Id. at *26. The Court of Appeal held that Plaintiff's claims under § 558 were indivisible claims for civil penalties, and the trial court erred when it: (i) bifurcated the civil penalties and under-paid wages portions of Plaintiff's PAGA claim; and (ii) ordered Plaintiff's unpaid wages claim to be arbitrated as a representative action. Id. at *27. The Court of Appeal opined that in bringing a PAGA action, Plaintiff was not acting on her own behalf, but on behalf of the State, which was not bound by Plaintiff's agreement. The Court of Appeal reasoned that the PAGA claims were outside the scope arbitration agreements pursuant to the statute and allowing arbitration of a PAGA claim would deprive Defendant of the ability to challenge rulings on the merits and thus posed considerable risks for Defendant. The Court of Appeal declined to direct the trial court to modify its order to compel arbitration of Plaintiff's individual unpaid wage claim and instead issued a writ directing the trial court to vacate its order and enter a new order denying Defendant's motion to compel arbitration. Id. at *28.

McGill, et al. v. Citibank,* 2 Cal. 5th 945 (Cal. 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging claims under California's Consumers Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA"), Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), Insurance Code, and false advertising law. Id. at *953. Plaintiff opened a credit card account with Defendant and purchased a credit protector plan in which Defendant agreed to defer or to credit certain amounts on her credit card account if certain qualifying events occurred, such as unemployment. After Plaintiff lost her job she alleged that Defendant did not a handle a claim that she made as required under the plan. Plaintiff sought injunctive relief to prohibit Defendant from continuing to engage in its allegedly illegal and deceptive practices. Id. Plaintiff's credit card agreement contained an arbitration provision. Id. at *952. Defendant moved to compel arbitration and the trial court denied the motion and ruled that agreements to arbitrate claims for public injunctive relief under the CLRA, the UCL, or the false advertising law are not enforceable in California. Id. at *12. On Defendant's appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's decision and held that the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") preempted California law. On further appeal, the California Supreme Court reversed the Court of Appeal's decision. The parties agreed that the arbitration provision purported to preclude Plaintiff from seeking public injunctive relief in any forum. Id. at *956. Accordingly, the Supreme Court considered whether the arbitration provision was valid and enforceable insofar as it purported to waive Plaintiff's right to seek public injunctive relief in any forum. Id. at *957. Defendant argued that the FAA preempted the California rule precluding enforcement of the waiver, because the FAA required enforcement of the arbitration provision as written, regardless of what it said or implied about claims that sought public injunctive relief. The Supreme Court rejected Defendant's argument and held that such a provision was contrary to California public policy and was unenforceable under California law. The Supreme Court further held that California law was not preempted by the FAA and did not require enforcement of the waiver provision. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the Court of Appeal. Id. at *967.

Network Capital Funding Corp., et al. v. Papke*, 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 5034 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. July 21, 2017). Plaintiff filed a declaratory relief action alleging its arbitration agreement with Defendant required him to arbitrate his wage & hour claims on an individual basis rather than the class-wide basis he sought in his pending arbitration proceeding. Defendant petitioned the trial court to compel Plaintiff to submit its declaratory relief claims to arbitration. According to Defendant, the broad language in the parties' arbitration agreement required the arbitrator, not the trial court, to decide whether the agreement authorized class arbitration. The trial court denied Defendant's petition, concluding it must decide whether the arbitration agreement authorized class arbitration, and in doing so found this particular agreement did not allow for class arbitration. Id. at *1-2. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's judgment. The Court of Appeal noted that it had previously affirmed the trial court's order based on: (i) the then existing uniform federal precedent holding that a trial court should decide whether the parties agreed to class arbitration; and (ii) U.S. Supreme Court precedents holding that an agreement to authorize class arbitration may not be inferred from the mere existence of an arbitration agreement, but rather the parties must expressly agree to class arbitration. Id. at *2. The California Supreme Court thereafter granted Defendant's petition for review and eventually remanded the case for reconsideration based on its subsequent decision in Sandquist v. Lebo Automotive, Inc. 1 Cal. 5th 233 (2016). In *Sandquis*t, the Supreme Court addressed whether the trial court or an arbitrator must decide if the parties' arbitration agreement authorized class arbitration. It concluded there is no universal rule allocating the decision to either the trial court or an arbitrator because the allocation of that decision is a matter of agreement between the parties. Accordingly, in each case, who decides whether the parties agreed to class arbitration turns on who the parties assigned that decision to under the terms of their contract. Id. at *2-3. Sandquist interpreted the arbitration agreements in that case as assigning to the arbitrator the decision of whether class arbitration was authorized. In doing so, Sandquist rejected the contention that California law presumes that trial courts rather than arbitrators must decide the availability of class arbitration. Similarly, Sandquist rejected the contention the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") imposes a similar interpretative presumption in favor of trial courts deciding this question. Id. at *3. As a result, the Court of Appeal, in the instant matter, concluded that the arbitration agreement between Defendant and Plaintiff was strikingly similar to the arbitration agreements at issue in Sandquist, and therefore the Supreme Court's reasoning compelled the conclusion the arbitration agreement allocated to the arbitrator the decision of whether Defendant and Plaintiff agreed to class arbitration. Based on that analysis, the Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's order and remanded with directions for the trial court to grant Defendant's petition to compel arbitration.

Noel, et al. v. Thrifty Payless, Inc.*, 17 Cal. App. 5th 1315 (1st Dist. Dec. 4, 2017). Plaintiff, an inflatable swimming pool purchaser, filed a class action alleging Defendant violated the California Consumers Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA") Unfair Competition Law, ("UCL"), and False Advertising Law ("FAL") by selling a pool that he alleged was smaller than the image shown on the box. Id. at *1321. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification, which the trial court denied. The trial court determined that as to the UCL and FAL causes of action, Plaintiff's proposed class – which consisted of more than 20,000 potential members – was not ascertainable. The trial court also refused to certify a class on Plaintiff's CLRA cause of action because it determined that common questions of law or fact did not predominate over individual questions of reliance and causation. Id. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's ruling. As to the UCL and FAL claims, the trial court had found that Plaintiff had presented "no evidence" to establish "what method or methods will be utilized to identify the class members, what records are available, (either from Defendant, the manufacturer, or other entities such as banks or credit institutions), how those records would be obtained, what those records will show, and how burdensome their production would be." Id. at 1323. The trial court also had found "a class action is not superior to numerous individual actions" and "will be no more efficient than individual actions in light of the individual issues that must be presented on the issue of reliance and damages." Id. Due to the stricter proof requirements under the CLRA, the trial court had determined that Plaintiff had not shown a commonality of issues required for the CLRA. The trial court had reasoned that the CLRA requires that all class members must show actual injury in order to recover damages, restitution, and/or injunctive relief, unless the advertisement was materially misleading. Id. The trial court had concluded that unless it found that "the packaging materially misleading as a matter of law, in order to recover under a CLRA claim every class member must prove he/she purchased the pool in reliance on the deceptive advertising." Id. The trial court did not find the packaging materially misleading and therefore found reliance and causation were not predominantly common issues. The Court of Appeal agreed with the trial court that Plaintiff submitted no evidence the class members could readily be identified from Defendant's records. The Court of Appeal reasoned that unless Plaintiff could propose some realistic way of associating names and contact information with the 20,000-plus transactions identified, there remained a serious due process question in certifying a class action. Id. at 1327. The Court of Appeal stated that while Plaintiff was not required to actually identify the 20,000-plus individuals who bought pools, his failure to come up with any means of identifying them was a legitimate basis for denying class certification. Id. at 1328. On this record, the trial court had made no finding that the proposed class was unascertainable on any conceivable set of facts; rather, the class could not be ascertained on the evidentiary showing Plaintiff made. Id. at 1333. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal found that it could not say the trial court's ruling in denying certification in these circumstances was an abuse of discretion. Id. The Court of Appeal also determined that Plaintiff's CLRA cause of action did not predominantly involve common issues, as a number of pool purchasers may have been motivated by the dimensions of the pool rather than by the photo, and accordingly individual determinations would predominate. Id. at 1334. The Court of Appeal therefore affirmed the trial court's ruling.

Quiroz, et al. v. E.A. Renfroe & Co.*, 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 5119 (Cal. App. 3d Dist. July 26, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action in state court on behalf of themselves and other similarly-situated current and former employees alleging that Defendant failed to provide meal and rest breaks, pay overtime, pay final wages in a timely manner, provide accurate wage statements, and for non-payment of wages and an unfair competition law claim in violation of the Private Attorneys General Act of 2004 ("PAGA"). Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration based on agreements Plaintiffs signed during employment orientation, which the trial court denied. The trial court held that the employment agreement was strikingly one-sided with the majority of terms favoring Defendant. The trial court determined the Plaintiffs made a showing of an absence of meaningful choice and unequal bargaining power. Id. at *6. The trial court determined that since the agreement was agreed to from an on-line portal, Plaintiff had no opportunity to discuss the terms of her employment agreement, let alone the arbitration provision, prior to accepting her employment. Id. The trial court held that Defendant negotiated the employment contracts from a significant advantage over those transitory employees, like Plaintiff, who had little to no ability to sufficiently review or negotiate the terms of employment. Id. at *7. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's ruling and remanded for further proceedings. First, the Court of Appeal found that Plaintiff did not dispute the choice-of-law provision and therefore the issue was thus whether the arbitration provision was unconscionable under Alabama law. Id. at *8. Under Alabama law, "an unconscionable contract or contractual provision is defined as a contract or provision such as no man in his senses and not under delusion would make on the one hand, and as no honest and fair man would accept on the other." Id. at *9-10. Plaintiffs argued that the arbitration provision was procedurally unconscionable because Defendant possessed overwhelming bargaining power with regard to the terms of the contract, Plaintiffs lacked an opportunity to negotiate the terms of the contract, and they also lacked a reasonable opportunity to read and understand the terms of the contract. Id. at *11-12. The Court of Appeal disagreed that Plaintiffs established any of the allegations as a matter of Alabama law. Id. at *12. With respect to the absence of a meaningful choice factor, the Court of Appeal found that the trial court's conclusion that the named Plaintiff "was unable to discuss the terms of her employment agreement, let alone the arbitration provision, prior to accepting her employment" was not supported by the evidence. Id. at *13. The named Plaintiff declared that at some point after she applied for the job, she "was presented" with the agreement through its on-line portal, she later received a hard copy that she signed, and Defendant "did not advise" her she was entitled to negotiate the terms. Id. at *14. The Court of Appeal stated that there was no evidence regarding whether the named Plaintiff could have negotiated the terms of the agreement because she did not try. The Court of Appeal further found that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate sufficiently unequal bargaining power under Alabama law to demonstrate procedural unconscionability. Id. at *20. Additionally, the Court of Appeal found no evidence or authority from which it could conclude that Plaintiffs lacked the opportunity to read and understand the terms of the contract. Id. at *22. Since the parties had not fully briefed the impact this ruling would have on Plaintiffs' claims under the PAGA, the Court of Appeal remanded for further proceedings in light of the conclusion that the arbitration agreement was not unconscionable under Alabama law.

Racza, et al. v. J.K. Residential Services, Inc.,* 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 222 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Jan. 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, filed three separate lawsuits alleging wage & hour claims against Defendant. Defendant filed 15 motions to compel arbitration and the trial court denied all of the motions on the basis that Defendant had waived its contractual right to arbitrate. On Defendant's consolidated appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's decisions. The Court of Appeal noted that while there is a strong policy in favor of arbitration, a contractual right to arbitrate may be waived in limited circumstances. Two factors weighed heavily in the Court of Appeal's decision. First, the Court of Appeal found that Defendant had "substantially invoked" litigation as the parties had been preparing for trial well before Defendant notified Plaintiffs of an intent to arbitrate. Id. at *9. Defendant had "actively participated in the discovery process propounding more than a thousand interrogatories in addition to demands for production and causing plaintiffs to waste valuable resources on litigation." Id. at *10. Second, the Court of Appeal determined that Plaintiffs were prejudiced and misled when Defendant demanded a jury trial and then waited a year to move to compel arbitration. The Court of Appeal noted that many Plaintiffs had spent over a year preparing their cases for trial. The Court of Appeal further noted there was no justification for the delay, as most of the motions were filed three months before trial. The Court of Appeal held that Plaintiffs were prejudiced because they were denied the benefit of the efficiency and cost-effectiveness of arbitration and Plaintiffs spent time and money preparing for trial. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed, holding that the trial court did not err when it denied Defendant's motions to compel arbitration.

Rosendez, et al. v. Green,* 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 6845 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. Oct. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant made numerous false claims about SnoreStop, its homeopathic snoring aid, regarding the product's efficacy in violation of California's Consumer Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA") and Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"). The trial court had previously certified Plaintiffs' classes. Defendant subsequently filed a motion for summary judgment, which the trial court granted. The trial court also decertified Plaintiff's class claims. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed and remanded. Although the trial court found the testimony of Defendant's homeopathy expert was not credible and gave the expert report no weight, the trial court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden of proof on both of their causes of action, noting they "proceeded on the theory that there is no scientific basis for the advertised efficacy of SnoreStop," but "provided no evidence of tests to determine the efficacy of SnoreStop." Id. at *2. Plaintiffs contended the trial court should have entered judgment in their favor and awarded them relief because they met their burden of proof on both of their causes of action through expert testimony and other evidence that the trial court improperly ignored. Plaintiffs further asserted the trial court abused its discretion by decertifying the class. The Court of Appeal found that, while the trial court did not expressly reject the testimony of Dr. Lynn Willis, Plaintiffs' expert witness, on the inefficacy of SnoreStop, it did disregard his testimony and mischaracterize parts of it in its decision. For example, the trial court said that the pharmacologist testified about the remedy's individual ingredients, but could not testify about the product as a whole. Id. at *14. The Court of Appeal stated that Dr. Willis testified that each individual active ingredient in SnoreStop would not have an effect on snoring, nor would it shrink swollen tissues that block air passages in the back of the throat. Id. at *26. Dr. Willis further testified that he was not aware of any credible scientific evidence that the combination of ingredients would shrink those tissues and he believed that they would not. Id. at *27. The Court of Appeal further determined that although the trial court had also ruled that Plaintiffs failed to show proof that a clinical study referenced on SnoreStop's label was flawed, in fact Dr. Willis had testified about a number of the study's flaws. Id. The Court of Appeal concluded that Dr. Willis' testimony about the inefficacy and scientific implausibility of homeopathy in general alone was sufficient to satisfy Plaintiffs' burden of proving the inefficacy of SnoreStop as a snoring remedy. Id. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed and remanded the trial court's ruling. The Court of Appeal also reversed the class' decertification order and ordered the trial court to determine damages and restitution and award those to the class.

Rubenstein, et al. v. The Gap,* 14 Cal. App. 5th 870 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. 2017). Plaintiff, a retail clothing purchaser, filed a class action alleging violations of California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), False Advertising Law ("FAL"), and Consumers Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA"). Id. at *2. Plaintiff sought injunctive relief, restitution, damages, exemplary damages, attorneys' fees, and costs. Plaintiff moved for certification of a putative class of purchasers at Defendant's clothing store in California. Defendant demurred to the complaint and the trial court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the California Court of Appeal affirmed. The factual basis of Plaintiff's causes of action were that: (i) Defendant used its brand names in its factory stores located in outlet malls; (ii) Defendant labeled the clothing items it sold with its brand names at the factory stores, even though the clothing was allegedly of lesser quality than clothing it sold in its traditional stores; and (iii) Defendant did not disclose to consumers that factory store items were not sold at traditional stores and were of lesser quality. Id. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff could not establish liability under any of her proposed causes of action because she did not allege a misrepresentation by Defendant or any duty to disclose that clothing sold in factory stores had not been offered for sale in its traditional stores. Defendant contended that Plaintiff's claims rested on the position that it was unlawful for Defendant to use its brand names when selling its own merchandise in factory stores because the brand names implied a certain level of quality that was allegedly lacking. Id. at *5. Defendant also asserted that Plaintiff lacked statutory standing because she failed to allege how the items that she purchased were not of the quality she expected or how the amount she paid exceeded the value that she received. The trial court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend, and concluded that Defendant's labeling of its stores as brand name factory stores did not constitute any actionable misrepresentation about the quality of the products sold at those stores. The trial court found that Plaintiff had not lost money or property because of an alleged violation of the UCL or the FAL, and therefore she lacked statutory standing. The Court of Appeal held that the allegation that Defendant sold lesser-quality clothing items at its factory stores that were never sold at its traditional stores did not state a claim under FAL because, as a matter of law, Defendant's use of its own brand name labels on clothing that it manufactured and sold at its stores was not deceptive, regardless of the quality. Id. at *8. Further, the Court of Appeal ruled that Plaintiff failed to state a claim under the UCL because Defendant's use of its own brand names in factory store names and on factory store clothing labels was not likely to deceive a reasonable consumer as a purchaser was still getting that retailer's item. Id. at *15. The Court of Appeal also held that there was no viable claim under the CLRA because Plaintiff failed to allege any advertising or representation that the retailer made about the characteristics or quality of its factory store merchandise. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's decision. Further because Plaintiff failed to demonstrate how her complaint might be amended, the Court of Appeal concluded that the trial court properly sustained Defendant's demurrer without leave to amend. Id. at *18.

Sanchez, et al. v. McDonald's Restaurants Of California,* Case No. BC499888 (Cal. Super. Ct. April 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them overtime in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs filed a motion for summary judgment as to Defendant's liability for failure to pay overtime wages, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant configured its electronic time-keeping system to attribute all hours worked on a specific shift to the date on which the shift began, rather than on the date the work was actually performed, which resulted in a failure to pay overtime to employees who worked an overnight shift followed by another shift the next day (and equaling more than eight hours in a 24-hour period). Id. at 2. Defendant contended that its method of calculating daily overtime complied or substantially complied with the California Labor Code. The Court explained that § 510 of the Labor Code requires employers to pay overtime of 1 1/2 times the employee's regular rate of pay for "any work in excess of eight hours in one workday (defined as any consecutive 24-hour period)." Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs presented evidence that they worked over eight hours in 24-hour periods without being paid overtime. Id. The Court further noted that Defendant agreed that Plaintiffs worked at least one week during the class period in which they recorded a shift that began on one calendar day and ended the next calendar day followed by a shift that began the same calendar day that the overnight shift ended without being paid overtime. Id. at 3. The Court agreed that Defendant's workday need not be a calendar day, but the problem was that Defendant did not calculate overtime based on that a calendar day time-frame by applying a shift beginning on one day to only that day. Id. at 4. The Court opined that overtime calculations should be based on the amount of work completed by an employee during any single 24-hour period, regardless of whether the employees worked continuously through the day divide. Id. The Court therefore determined that Defendant was liable for overtime pay, and granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment.

Sprunk, et al. v. Prisma LLC,* 14 Cal. App. 5th 785 (2d Dist. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of exotic dancers, filed a class action alleging that they were misclassified as independent contractors and consequently, suffered wage & hour violations. All class members signed contracts which contained an arbitration clause. Id. at 789. Defendant moved to compel arbitration in the named Plaintiff's case. Plaintiff objected and Defendant withdrew its motion for arbitration. The parties proceeded with discovery and Plaintiff moved to certify the class. Defendant objected and argued that class action was not superior to other forms of litigation, because the class members had signed arbitration agreements. The trial court certified the class. Defendant subsequently moved to compel arbitration and asserted that it had not waived its right to compel arbitration. Id. at 791. Defendant asserted that it could not have previously moved for individual arbitration of the claims of the unnamed class members because the putative class members were not parties to the action prior to the time the trial court certified the class. Plaintiffs argued that Defendant had waived the right to arbitrate by actively litigating the case. The trial court denied Defendant's motion and ruled that it had waived its right to compel arbitration. The trial court found that Plaintiffs would be prejudiced by the four-year delay in adjudicating their claims if it were to order arbitration

now. Id. at 792. On Defendant's appeal, the Court of Appeal of California affirmed the trial court's decision on the basis that the four-year delay resulted in the named Plaintiff conducting class-related discovery and preparing and arguing an extensive class certification motion, that never would have been necessary if individual arbitration had been ordered earlier in the case. Id. at 809. The Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's decision denying Defendant's motion to compel arbitration and concluded that the trial court's finding of prejudice was supported by sufficient evidence. Id.

Wan, et al. v. SolarCity Corp.*, 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 14 (Cal. App. 6th Dist. Jan. 3, 2017). Plaintiff, a field energy advisor, brought a representative claim against Defendant under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA") alleging that Defendant failed to pay overtime, provide meal expenses, reimburse business expenses, and pay wages in a timely matter. Plaintiff sought recovery of civil penalties on behalf of himself and other employees. Prior to the Plaintiff commencing employment, the parties entered into a written agreement that included an arbitration agreement, stating in part that "…an employee may seek only in arbitration individual remedies for himself or herself under any applicable private attorney general representative statute, and an arbitrator shall decide whether an employee is an aggrieved person under any private attorney general statute." Id. at *2. The agreement also included a class action waiver stating that "there will be no right or authority for any dispute to be brought, heard or arbitrated as a class or collective action, or in a representative or private attorney general capacity on behalf of a class of persons or the public." Id. at *2. In January 2015, Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration on the issue of whether Plaintiff was an "aggrieved employee" under the PAGA pursuant to the arbitration agreement. Initially, Defendant sought to dismiss the PAGA claims brought on behalf of others on the basis that Plaintiff waived such a claim pursuant to the agreement. Subsequently, Defendant requested that arbitration of the "aggrieved employee" issue proceed first and that judicial proceedings be stayed. In response, Plaintiff argued that he had alleged only a representative claim under the PAGA and not an individual claim; therefore, there were no individual claims to arbitrate. Further, Plaintiff asserted that the waiver of representative claims under the PAGA is void under Iskanian v. CLS Transportation Los Angeles, LLC, 59 Cal. 4th 348 (2015). Plaintiff contended that because the PAGA waiver was void and not severable from the entire arbitration agreement, the agreement was unenforceable. In the alternative, Plaintiff argued that whether he was an "aggrieved employee" under the PAGA was encompassed in the representative claim that was properly brought before the trial court. The trial court denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration, holding that the waiver of Plaintiff's right to bring a PAGA claim was unenforceable. Therefore, Plaintiff could not be compelled to arbitrate the "aggrieved party" issue before pursuing his PAGA claim in the trial court. Defendant appealed, asserting that a portion of Plaintiff's PAGA claim fell within the scope of the parties' arbitration agreement. Id. at *27. Specifically, Defendant asserted that whether Plaintiff qualified as an "aggrieved employee" under the PAGA and has standing to bring a representative PAGA action on behalf of other employees were issues that were subject to arbitration, and if Plaintiff was not an "aggrieved employee," then the PAGA claim on behalf of others would be rendered moot. Defendant also asserted that Plaintiff could only seek individual remedies under the PAGA and not on behalf of others because he had waived remedies on behalf of other employees. The California Court of Appeal rejected Defendant's arguments in whole and affirmed the trial court's decision denying Defendant's motion to compel arbitration. The Court of Appeal held that an employee may not be forced to submit any portion of his representative PAGA claim to arbitration and the "aggrieved person" issue was not dispositive. Further, the Court of Appeal concluded that the PAGA waiver was invalid under Iskanian, and because the waiver was not severable, the entire arbitration agreement was therefore unenforceable.

Woosley, et al. v. State Of California*, 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 7599 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. Nov. 3, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action in 1978 alleging Defendants, the State of California, through the Department of Motor Vehicles and the State Board of Equalization, unconstitutionally collected vehicle license fees and use taxes. The trial court certified two classes and entered judgment for Plaintiffs in the 1980s. After the action was resolved on the merits, the trial court awarded Plaintiffs' counsel more than $23 million in attorneys' fees and costs. In 2010, the California Court of Appeal reversed that fee award because the trial court had not given "any consideration to the lack of success" in the case. Id. at *3. The 2010 decision remanded the matter to the trial court to redetermine attorneys' fees after undertaking such consideration. The trial court subsequently deducted the lodestar figures of Plaintiffs' counsel for lack of success, and reduced the multiplier that had been applied in the prior fee proceeding from 3 to 1.25 for all of Plaintiffs' counsel except attorney Woosley, whose multiplier was eliminated. Id. at *4-5. The trial court separately awarded Plaintiffs' counsel additional attorneys' fees for work on their fee applications. Woosley contested the fee award and appealed. On appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's fee order in two limited respects, including the Busetti firm's award for work done from 1978 to 1985 and the Gansinger firm's award for work on its 1985 fee application; in all other respects, it otherwise affirmed the trial court's decision. The Court of Appeal stated that it must uphold a trial court's order awarding attorneys' fees pursuant to § 1021.5 unless it was convinced the trial court abused its discretion. Id. at *10. The Court of Appeal found that the trial court evaluated the individual billing records and rates of Plaintiffs' counsel, and considered the written and oral arguments of all parties. The Court of Appeal held that the trial court expressly considered whether the fee awards should be reduced for lack of success; deducted hours it found to be unrecoverable, vague, unnecessary, or otherwise inappropriate; and ultimately awarded fees without any enhancement. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal ruled that the trial court appropriately exercised its discretion. The Court of Appeal noted that the trial court expressly recognized that lack of success was a factor to be considered in determining attorneys' fees. Woosley contended the trial court abused its discretion in calculating his lodestar because the trial court: (i) reduced his hours without an adequate basis or explanation; (ii) did not use his actual hourly rate; and (iii) did not enhance his award for risk and delay. The Court of Appeal stated that Defendant specifically identify time entries by Woosley that it objected to and the basis for its objections. Id. at *17. The Court of Appeal noted that the trial court sustained some, but not all, of the State's objections and reduced Woosley's lodestar after independently reviewing his records, and it made certain deductions for time entries it found to be block-billed and vague, inflated, or otherwise unreasonable. Id. at *18. The Court of Appeal determined that the trial court settled on an hourly rate of $400 after considering "the going market rates in the community for the type of case involved" and Woosley's experience and background, which was "primarily in the area of taxation and tax litigation." Id. The Court of Appeal found that the trial court's determination was well within its discretion. Finally, the Court of Appeal concluded the trial court's decision not to enhance Woosley's fee award for risk and delay was not erroneous. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's ruling granting attorneys' fees in part.

Zimmerman, et al. v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A.*, 2017 Cal. App. Unpub. LEXIS 6337 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. Sept. 14, 2017). Plaintiff, an underwriter, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of California's Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"). Defendant terminated Plaintiff's employment in connection to a mass lay-off and provided her with a separation agreement containing a "release of claims." Id. at *2. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment on the issue of whether Plaintiff's claims on behalf of herself and other aggrieved individuals were barred as a matter of law by the agreement and release of claims that Plaintiff signed. Id. at *5. Plaintiff opposed the motion, arguing the release she signed governed only her individual claims, and not representative ones. Id. at *6. The trial court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, finding that as Plaintiff released Defendant from liability for "all claims" as a result of her employment, and her PAGA claims arose out of that same employment, the release she provided barred her from seeking PAGA penalties. Id. at *6. The trial court further ruled that Plaintiff was therefore barred from pursuing PAGA claims in a representative capacity. The trial court noted that under § 2699 of the PAGA, a claim must be brought by an aggrieved employee on behalf of himself or herself and other current or former employees. Since Plaintiff could not assert any PAGA claim on her own behalf, the trial court reasoned that she also could not pursue such a claim in a representative capacity. Id. On Plaintiff's appeal, the California Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's ruling. Relative to the language of the waiver contained in Plaintiff's termination agreement, she contended that it applied only to her individual claims for damages, and was not intended to include a release of PAGA claims. The Court of Appeal explained that it was contrary to public policy for an employment agreement to require employees to waive the right to bring a PAGA action before any dispute arises. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal stated that the issue of waivable and non-waivable PAGA claims turned on whether the employee was aware of the alleged Labor Code violations and intended to resolve that disputed issue as part of the waiver. Therefore, the Court of Appeal found that the enforceability of PAGA waivers would not turn on the parties' intentions or the language of their agreements. Instead, it is an issue governed by public policy, which will override the terms of the parties' agreement. The Court of Appeal opined that in this case, public policy precluded Defendant from extracting PAGA waivers from employees who were unaware that a Labor Code violation has occurred, and in the absence of any existing dispute about it. Id. at *12. The Court of Appeal stated that there was no evidence Plaintiff was aware of the Labor Code violations she alleged as the basis of her PAGA claim – let alone that any dispute had arisen about them – at the time she signed the employment separation agreement containing the general release. Id. at *14. Absent such proof, the Court of Appeal concluded that there was not an enforceable waiver of Plaintiff's right to bring a PAGA claim based on those alleged violations. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's ruling and remanded for further proceedings.

(iii) Delaware

Ford, et al. v. VMware, Inc.,* 2017 Del. Ch. LEXIS 70 (Del. Ch. May 2, 2017). Plaintiff was a minority stockholder of VMware who brought a putative class action, as well as a purported derivative action, for breach of fiduciary duty that arose out of a corporate merger. Id. at *2. Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim and the Delaware Chancery Court granted Defendants' motion. Id. at *5. EMC was the controlling stockholder of VMware. EMC merged with Denali and Denali then acquired all of EMC's interest in VMware. Plaintiff's complaint recounted the negative effects that the EMC-Denali merger had on Defendant VMware and the trading price of its common stock. Id. at *2. At the outset, the Chancery Court noted that Plaintiff failed to connect these diverse allegations to any legal theories and simply incorporated factual allegations into four cursory counts. The Chancery Court concluded that Plaintiff's complaint sought to turn these negative effects into claims for breach of fiduciary duty against: (i) EMC, as VMware's pre-merger controlling stockholder; (ii) individuals affiliated with EMC who served as members of VMware's board of directors; and (iii) Denali and its affiliates, for allegedly aiding and abetting breaches of duty by other Defendants and as the entity that became VMware's controlling stockholder. Id. at *3. The Chancery Court dismissed the complaint because EMC, as the controller, was under no obligation to alienate its shares by spinning off the company and EMC could act in its own interest when determining to retain its property. Further, the Chancery Court reasoned that the "known-looter" theory did not support a claim against members of VMware's board who were also directors of EMC and its subsidiaries, as they could not be held liable for failing to act against EMC. Id. at *27. The Chancery Court concluded that EMC violated no duty when it committed itself contractually to exercise its rights in a manner that furthered its own business objective of merging with Denali. As such, the Chancery Court dismissed Plaintiff's complaint in its entirety.

In Re Wal-Mart Stores Delaware Derivative Litigation,* 2017 Del. Ch. LEXIS 131 (Del. Ch. July 25, 2017). In *Wal-Mart I, Plaintiffs brought a consolidated action, asserting a single breach of fiduciary duty claim against certain Wal-Mart current and former directors and officers and the Delaware Chancery Court dismissed the complaint. Prior to this action, The New York Times published an article that detailed an alleged bribery scheme at Wal-Mart de Mexico, a subsidiary of Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. and the related cover-up. Id. at *6. Shortly thereafter, Wal-Mart stockholders filed multiple derivative suits in Delaware and Arkansas. The District Court dismissed the Arkansas consolidated action under Rule 23.1, for failure to adequately allege demand futility. Id. at *6. In Delaware, Defendants moved to dismiss this action, on the basis that the Arkansas decision collaterally estopped Plaintiffs from alleging demand futility, and that even if they were not collaterally estopped, Plaintiffs failed to adequately plead demand futility under Chancery Court Rule 23.1. Id. at *8. The Chancery Court agreed and granted the motion to dismiss on the basis that the Arkansas decision precluded the Delaware Plaintiffs from relitigating the issue of demand futility. Id. On appeal, the Delaware Supreme Court remanded for the Chancery Court to determine whether a situation – where a dismissal by the District Court in Arkansas of a stockholder's derivative action for failure to plead demand futility is held by the Delaware Chancery Court to preclude subsequent stockholders from pursuing derivative litigation – violated the subsequent stockholders' due process rights. Id. at *2. The Chancery Court answered that preclusion of subsequent stockholders from pursuing derivative litigation did not violate their due process rights, unless the representative Plaintiffs' management of the first derivative action was so grossly deficient as to be apparent to the opposing party or failed to satisfy one of the Restatement's other criteria for determining adequacy of representations. However, the Chancery Court recommended that the Supreme Court adopt the rule that a judgment could not bind the corporation or other stockholders in a derivative action until the action had survived a Rule 23.1 motion to dismiss, or the board of directors had given the Plaintiff authority to proceed by declining to oppose the suit. Accordingly, the Chancery Court recommended that the Supreme Court adopt the rule proposed in In Re EZCORP Inc. Consulting Agreement Derivative Litigation, 130 A.3d 934, 948 (Del. Ch. 2016*)*.. However, if the Supreme Court declined to adopt the new rule, the Chancery Court submitted that it correctly dismissed Plaintiffs' complaint in Wal-Mart I consistent with prevailing authority. Id. at *34.

Sciabacucchi, et al. v. Liberty Broadband Communications*, 2017 Del. Ch. LEXIS 93 (Del. Ch. May 31, 2017). Plaintiff, a stockholder of Charter Communications, Inc. ("Charter"), brought an action against officers and directors of Charter and Liberty Broadband Corp. ("Liberty"), a stockholder of Charter, alleging breach of fiduciary duty. Plaintiff's complaint alleged that Defendants breached their fiduciary duties of loyalty owed to stockholders by unfairly transferring voting and economic power to Liberty. Id. at *3. Defendants moved to dismiss and the Court reserved its ruling pending supplemental briefing. Id. at *86. However, the Court held that Plaintiff adequately pled facts that because the vote was coercive, it did not ratify Defendant's actions. Id. at *11. The vote approved two proposals that Charter submitted to its stockholders not controlled by or affiliated with Defendant Liberty, after Charter's board of directors approved a purchase of Bright House Networks, LLC ("Bright House"), and a merger of Charter with Time Warner Cable ("TWC"). Id. at *40-42. The first proposal was to approve the Bright House and TWC acquisition transactions. The second proposal was to approve Defendant Liberty's $700 million purchase of Charter shares and an agreement granting a proxy to Liberty that increased Liberty's voting power by up to 6% of Charter's outstanding shares. Id. at *43. The Court characterized a structurally-coerced vote as one where facts extraneous to the challenged transaction have driven the vote, and not a determination by the stockholders that the transaction was in the corporate interest. Id. at *6. In reaching the conclusion that the vote on the second proposal was structurally coercive, the Court considered that Charter informed its stockholders that the Bright House and TWC acquisitions covered in the first proposal were expressly conditioned on approval of the Defendant Liberty's transactions covered in the second proposal. Charter's board did not determine that Defendant's shares issuance and proxy agreement were necessary to achieve the Bright House and TWC acquisitions. The proxy materials Charter provided to its stockholders did not state that Liberty's transactions were in the corporate interest and the financial advisor fairness opinion delivered to Charter's board did not address fairness of Liberty's transactions independent of the Bright House and TWC acquisitions. There was no evidence that Liberty's transactions were integral to the acquisition transactions. Id. at *12. Although Liberty provided $5 billion in financing for the TWC acquisition, this contribution was relatively insignificant to the total TWC transaction deal value of $78.7 billion. The Court held that these alleged facts supported an inference that Defendants used the value of the Bright House and TWC transactions to obtain favorable votes on the Liberty transactions to the detriment of Charter. Id. at *52. The Court determined that since the vote on the second proposal was coercive, it did not "cleanse" the alleged breaches of fiduciary duties, so as to subject the actions to review only under the business judgment rule standard, instead of under the entire fairness standard. Id. The Court rejected Defendants' argument that the vote should be treated as ratifying fiduciary actions subject to Liberty's control as a controlling stockholder because Liberty was not a controlling stockholder. Id. at *69. Finally, the Court reserved decision on the motion to dismiss under Chancery Court Rules 12(b)(6) and 23.1, pending supplemental briefing regarding whether Plaintiff's claims were direct or derivative, as each required a different burden of proof. Id. at *86.

Texas Roadhouse Management, et al. v. Delaware Department Of Labor,* 2017 Del. Super. LEXIS 152 (Del. Super. Mar. 30, 2017). The Delaware Department of Labor ("DDOL") sent a letter to several Texas Roadhouse restaurants contending that the restaurant improperly treated hosts and bus persons as tipped employees. Id. at *1. The DDOL alleged that hosts were being paid at an hourly rate of $4.00 and improperly included in a tip pool. The DDOL contended that hosts should receive the minimum wage rate of $7.75 per hour because the hosts were improperly included in a tip pool. The trial court found in favor of the DDOL. On appeal, the Delaware Superior Court reversed the trial court's ruling. The Superior Court noted that the minimum wage provision 19 Del. C. § 902 provides that "every employer shall pay to every employee in any occupation of a rate" that is "not less than $7.75 per hour." Id. at *4. However, the Superior Court explained that there was a statutory exception to this general rule in situations where "gratuities received by employees engaged in occupations in which gratuities customarily constitute part of the remuneration," these gratuities "may be considered wages in an amount equal to the tip credit percentage . . . of the minimum rate." Id. at *5. The trial court found that Texas Roadhouse "did not present any evidence the hostess category of employee would be considered by a customer to receive tips on a regular and customary basis." Id. at *9. The Superior Court found two issues with this holding, including: (i) the parties stipulated that hosts at the Texas Roadhouse restaurants customarily and regularly received more than $30 per month in tips, and the tips combined with their $4.00 hourly rate exceeded the state minimum wage of $7.75; and (ii) the statute does not indicate that the customer determines the tip standard under § 902. Id. at *9-10. The Superior Court held that all that was required under 19 Del. C. § 902(b) for an employer to apply a tip credit to the employee's hourly rate, and consequently pay the employee less than a minimum wage of $7.75 per hour, is that the individual is "engaged in an occupation in which workers customarily and regularly receive more than $30 per month in tips or gratuities." Id. at *10. The Superior Court found that the trial court also improperly focused on Defendant's lack of evidence that "the Delaware Code would include the hostess position as a primary direct service employee and be included in a tip pool." Id. at *11. Section 902(d)(2) provides that "[w]here more than 1 direct service employee provides personal service to the same customer from whom gratuities are received, the employer may require that such employees establish a tip pooling or sharing system not to exceed 15% of the primary direct service employee's gratuities." Id. Thus, the Superior Court determined that a host does not need to be a primary direct service employee to be included in an employer initiated tip pool under § 902(d)(2). Id. at *12. Under the plain reading of the statute, a host need only be considered a direct service employee who provides personal service to the same customer for the employer to require the employee to share tips. The Superior Court stated that Texas Roadhouse hosts performed direct personal services to the guests at the restaurants, and although the hosts may not be the primary direct service employee who received the gratuity from the customer, the hosts' tasks provided personal direct service to the customers. The Superior Court thus found that under 19 Del. C. § 902, the hosts at the Texas Roadhouse restaurants were direct service employees and were properly included in the mandatory tip pool. Accordingly, the Superior Court reversed the trial court's ruling in favor of the DDOL.

(iv) Florida

Florida Department Of Transportation v. Tropical Trailer Leasing, LLC, et al.*, 2017 Fla. App. LEXIS 16153 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. Nov. 6, 2017). Plaintiff sued the Florida Department of Transportation (the "Department") for erroneously interpreting §§ 316.003(21) and 316.1001 of the Florida Statute to authorize the Department to assess tolls against a trailer owner, instead of the owner of the vehicle towing the trailer. Plaintiff asserted that its trailers were not "motor vehicles" within the meaning of § 316.003(21), and that the Department should have charged the vehicle owner the toll pursuant to § 316.1001, because the vehicle owner was the "person" who "used" the toll road. Id. at *1. Plaintiff also asserted that there were approximately 40 other trailer-leasing companies subject to the same unauthorized billing procedures. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification of four sub-classes, which the trial court granted. On appeal, the Florida District Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's ruling. The Department argued that the trial court abused its discretion by certifying broader sub-classes than Plaintiff had requested. The District Court of Appeal agreed that the trial court abused its discretion by expanding the class beyond that pled in Plaintiff's amended complaint. Id. at *1-2. Before filing its motion for class certification, and in response to the Department's motion to strike its initial class as "absurd and grossly overbroad," Plaintiff specifically limited its class definition to exclude trailer owners that also owned the vehicle pulling the trailer. Id. at *7. In its amended motion for class certification, however, Plaintiff proposed sub-classes A, B, and C, which again included all trailer owners, changing the class size from approximately 400 to over 180,000. The trial court certified two sub-classes consisting of the new larger class size. The District Court of Appeal stated that the proper procedural method to expand a class was by moving to amend the complaint, and then moving to certify the newly defined class. Id. at *8. Expanding a class beyond what was pled in the complaint unfairly surprised the Department, because it was not on notice to defend against such a broad class definition. Id. at *11. The District Court of Appeal thus found that the trial court abused its discretion by expanding the scope of the class beyond the class definition proposed in the amended complaint. Accordingly, the District Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's ruling and remanded.

Fraternal Order Of Police, et al. v. City Of Miami,* 2017 Fla. App. LEXIS 18714 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. Dec. 13, 2017). Plaintiff, a public employee union, sought declaratory relief, injunctive relief, and damages against Defendant, alleging that the oral portion of an exam used for promotion to police sergeant was unlawful. Id. at *1-2. The trial court determined that Plaintiff lacked standing to seek damages against Defendant on behalf of the union members. Id. at *1-2. The trial court ordered that, although Plaintiff possessed associational standing to seek declaratory, injunctive, or other prospective relief for its members, it lacked associational standing to recover damages on behalf of the members affected by the allegedly flawed promotion examination. The trial court found that because the determination of the damages sought by Plaintiff would require extensive and individualized discovery to determine whether and to what extent each individual member was damaged, Plaintiff did not have standing to recover damages on their behalf. Id. at *2. On appeal, the Florida District Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's ruling. The District Court of Appeal found that based on abundant federal case law authorities, under federal law a union may not file suit solely in its representational capacity to seek damages on behalf of its members if individualized proof from the union's members would be required in the litigation. Id. at *9. The District Court of Appeal stated the Florida state law "modified" the associational standing doctrine, though it closely resembled its federal counterpart. Id. at *10. The District Court of Appeal determined that the few cases dealing with a union's standing to sue in its representational capacity have only permitted unions to seek declaratory or injunctive relief, and those claims did not require individualized participation from the unions' members. Therefore, while an association may have standing to seek injunctive or declaratory relief on behalf of its members due to the automatic application of the relief to its injured members, an association does not have standing to seek damages on behalf of its members where individual participation from the association's injured members is "indispensable to proper resolution of the cause." Id. at *13-14. The District Court of Appeal explained that disputes about claims for individualized damages are typically not "properly resolved in a group context." Id. at *14. Accordingly, the District Court of Appeal found that, consistent with both federal law and Florida law, a union may not seek damages solely in its representational capacity on behalf of its members when the calculation of those damages would depend on individualized participation from the union members. Id. at *15. The District Court of Appeal thereby affirmed the trial court's ruling.

The Florida Bar v. Hunter, et al.*, Case Nos. SC16-1006 & SC16-1009 (Fla. Jan. 9, 2017). The Florida Bar alleged that Respondents, two Florida attorneys, violated Florida Rules of Professional Conduct 4-1.7 and 4-1.9, governing conflicts of interest. Id. at 1. A referee found that the attorneys were guilty of violating Rule 4-1.7 and recommended that they be admonished. Id. at 56. The attorneys represented a group of flight attendants who had been part of a $300 million class action settlement with tobacco companies. Under the terms of the settlement, the flight attendants received no compensation, but kept their rights to bring individual suits and the tobacco companies agreed to pay $300 million to be used to establish a foundation called the Flight Attendant Medical Research Institute ("FAMRI"), which would sponsor research into cures for diseases cause by cigarette smoking. Id. at 9. Subsequently, the attorneys filed a petition to enforce and administer the mandate after the FAMRI did not respond to a request for an accounting of how the funds were being used. The attorneys asked for an injunction against any more expenditures, and an order disbursing the settlement funds to the flight attendants. Two class members, Blissard and Young, sat on the board of the FAMRI and were listed as Defendants in the petition that the attorneys filed. Blissard and Young filed a motion to disqualify the attorneys on the basis that the relief being sought was materially adverse and prejudicial to the interests of class members. The trial court granted the motion to disqualify and found that the attorneys possessed a conflict of interest and their representation was precluded by Rules 4-1.7 and 4-1.9. The attorneys filed an appeal, and the Florida District Court of Appeal quashed the disqualification order and held that before disqualifying a class member's attorney, the trial court should balance the actual prejudice to the objector with the opponent's interest in continued representation. Id. at 3. The FAMRI, Young, and Blissard subsequently appealed to the Supreme Court of Florida. It rejected the District Court of Appeal's use of the balancing test and held that: (i) the Florida Rules of Professional Conduct provided the standards for determining whether counsel should be disqualified; (ii) the District Court of Appeal lacked the constitutional authority to adopt a new test; and (iii) the trial court had not abused its discretion when it determined that the attorneys violated the Florida Rules of Professional Conduct. Id. at 4. The Supreme Court requested the Florida Bar to investigate whether any Florida Rules of Professional Conduct were violated during the underlying proceedings or during the presentation of this case to the Supreme Court. Id. at 6. The Florida Bar asserted that the attorneys violated Rules 4-1.7 and 4-1.9 because: (i) certain class members who they represented had either objected to the filing or had not given informed consent; and (ii) the petition sought relief materially and directly adverse to the class members' interests. Id. at 2. A consolidated trial took place and the referee determined that the attorneys violated Rule 4-1.7 and recommended that they be admonished. Id. at 56. The referee acknowledged that the attorneys exercised poor judgment, but given the circumstances, an admonishment was the appropriate sanction. Id.

(v) Illinois

Illinois Retail Merchants Association, et al. v. Cook County Department Of Revenue*, Case No. 17-L-50596 (Ill. Cir. Ct. June 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retail stores selling sweetened beverages, filed an emergency motion for a temporary restraining order ("TRO") and preliminary injunction following the county's implementation of a tax on sweetened beverages. The Court noted that a party seeking a temporary restraining order must establish that: (i) a clearly ascertained right in need to protection exists; (ii) there is no adequate remedy at law for the injury; (iii) irreparable harm will occur without the injunction; and (iv) success on the merits is likely. Id. at 1. The Court found that Plaintiffs established a protectable interested in the matter sufficient to establish standing because the retail stores would be required to collect the sweetened beverage tax, which would require them to undertake administrate tasks of implementing new systems to comply with the collection and display requirements of the tax. Id. at 2. The Court noted that Plaintiffs had no adequate remedy at law. The Court also determined that Plaintiffs would be irreparably harmed if the tax goes into effect and is subsequently found unlawful because of the increased administrative and overhead costs they would endure. Id. Finally, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs presented evidence that a fair question exists as to the constitutionality of the sweetened beverage tax. Id. at 3. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for a TRO.

Mims, et al. v. Adecco USA, Inc.*, 2017 Ill. App. Unpub. LEXIS 2311 (Ill. App. 1st Dist. Nov. 9, 2017).
Plaintiff filed a class action lawsuit on behalf of herself and a purported class of similarly-situated laborers alleging that Defendant violated certain state and municipal minimum wage laws. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration of Plaintiff's claims based on an arbitration agreement contained in the parties' dispute resolution agreement. Plaintiffs then filed an unfair labor practice charge against Defendant with the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB"), alleging that the mandatory arbitration provision in the parties' dispute resolution agreement was invalid and unenforceable because it contained an arbitration provision waiving employees' rights to bring a class action lawsuit in violation of §§ 7 and 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"). The trial court denied Defendant's motion. On appeal, the Illinois Appellate Court affirmed the trial court's ruling. Defendant initially contended the trial court did not possess the authority to determine the "gateway" issue of arbitrability and that it erred in finding it possessed such authority. Id. at *4. Defendant maintained that the parties' dispute resolution agreement delegated this authority to the arbitrator rather than the trial court. The Appellate Court disagreed and found that the trial court did not err in this regard. The Appellate Court noted that the primary issue was whether an arbitration provision was invalid and unenforceable in violation of the NLRA if it contained a class action waiver of employees' rights to engage in concerted activities. Id. at *7. The Appellate Court explained that the NLRB has consistently found that §§ 7 and 8(a)(1) of the NLRA preclude enforcement of arbitration provisions that waive employees' rights to pursue employment-related claims on a collective or concerted basis. Id. The Appellate Court determined that the trial court properly determined that the arbitration provision was invalid under § 8(a)(1) of the NLRA because it interfered with employees' rights to engage in concerted activities granted in § 7 of the NLRA. Id. at *8. Defendant alternatively argued that even though the arbitration provision waived employees' rights to engage in concerted activities, the provision should still be held valid and enforceable because the agreement contained an "opt-out" clause giving an employee the right to opt-out of the arbitration provision within 30 days of executing the agreement. Id. at *9. The Appellate Court held that the agreement's 30-day opt-out clause could not save the arbitration provision from invalidation under the NLRA. Id. at *10. The Appellate Court stated that the NLRB has held that opt-out procedures impermissibly interfere with employees' § 7 rights by requiring them to affirmatively take steps prescribed by the employer to retain those rights. The NLRB has determined that a procedure requiring employees to take affirmative steps to opt-out of an arbitration agreement that otherwise waived their § 7 rights impermissibly interfered with the employees' exercise of those rights in violation of § 8(a)(1) of the NLRA. Since the unenforceable arbitration provision was an essential part of the agreement, the Appellate Court stated that the remaining provisions of the agreement were not severable from the unenforceable arbitration provision, and the entire agreement was therefore void and unenforceable. Id. at *13. The Appellate Court therefore determined that the trial court did not err in denying Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Murphy, et al. v. Group O Inc*., 2017 Ill. App. Unpub. LEXIS 1927 (Ill. App. 3d Dist. Sept. 20, 2017).
Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay all wages owed in violation of the Illinois Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"). Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification, and the trial court granted the motion. On appeal, the Illinois Appellate Court reversed the trial court's decision. Defendant argued the trial court abused its discretion and applied improper legal criteria when it: (i) did not conduct a rigorous analysis of the elements required to certify a class action; (ii) failed to recognize that Illinois law does not require that employers pay employees for clocked-in time and does not prohibit automatic meal deduction policies; (iii) found that common issues of fact or law predominated over individual issues, (iv) ruled that the representative parties and counsel would fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class; (v) held that a class action was an appropriate method for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy; and (vi) certified an unascertainable "fail-safe" class. Id. at *1-2. The trial court had certified a class that included "all hourly, non-exempt Group O, Inc. employees who worked at the Joliet, Illinois Caterpillar facility and who were compensated on an hourly basis, and who were denied wages for all hours worked, including overtime wages, to which they were entitled to under Illinois law during the period from February 2009 through December 2013." Id. at *3. Plaintiffs specifically alleged that Defendant failed to pay them legally as a result of an impermissible hourly rounding practices. Plaintiffs claimed they were regularly asked to come in early or stay late, but Defendant had a policy to "round off" hours or edit the putative class members' hours to avoid paying employees the wages they earned. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendant maintained a standard policy and practice of requiring employees to work during their scheduled lunch breaks, but that Defendant's time-keeping system would still automatically deduct 30 minutes of pay. Id. at *4. The Appellate Court agreed with Defendant that the trial court abused its discretion when it concluded that common questions of law and fact would predominate over questions affecting only individual class members. Id. at *13. The Appellate Court stated that in granting Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, the trial court relied entirely upon the fact that all class members were subject to the time-keeping rounding procedure. Id. at *14. However, the Appellate Court determined that the law does not proscribe the rounding of non-work time. Federal regulations specifically provide that a rounding practice "will be accepted, provided that it is used in such a manner that it will not result, over a period of time, in failure to compensate the employees properly for all the time they have actually worked." Id. Thus, the Appellate Court opined that the common issue of law or fact could not be that Defendant's time-keeping system automatically deducted time. Rather, the Appellate Court noted that the issue must be that employees were forced, by Defendant, to work during the time that was automatically deducted. Id. at *15. The Appellate Court stated that Plaintiffs failed to set forth any common policy or scheme that required all class members to work before or after their shifts or during lunch periods without compensation. Accordingly, the Appellate Court concluded that the trial court abused its discretion when it determined that common issues of law or fact would predominate over individual issues, and it reversed the decision.

Rosenbach, et al. v. Six Flags Entertainment Corp*., 2017 Ill. App. LEXIS 812 (2d Dist. Dec. 21, 2017). Plaintiff, as the mother of her minor son, brought a class action on behalf of herself and all others similarly-situated, alleging that Defendants Six Flags Entertainment Corp. ("Six Flags") and Great America LLC ("Great America") violated the Illinois Biometric Information Privacy Act ("BIPA") when her son purchased a season pass for Great America theme park and Defendants fingerprinted him using a biometric scanner without obtaining written consent or disclosing their plan for the collection, storage, use, or destruction of his biometric identifiers or information. Id. at *4. Defendants moved to dismiss on the grounds that Plaintiff was not a "person aggrieved by a violation" of the BIPA as required by the statute in order for a Plaintiff to have a right of action because Plaintiff alleged mere technical violations of the statute. Id. at *5. The trial court denied the motion to dismiss, but later certified two questions for review relating to whether a person aggrieved by a violation of the BIPA must allege some actual harm, including: (i) whether an individual is an aggrieved person under § 20 of the BIPA and may seek statutory damages authorized under the BIPA when the only injury he or she alleges is a violation that a Defendant collected his or her biometric identifiers and/or biometric information without providing him or her the disclosures and obtaining written consent; and (ii) whether an individual is an aggrieved person under § 20 of the BIPA and may seek injunctive relief authorized under the BIPA when the only injury he or she alleges is a violation that a Defendant collected his or her biometric identifiers and/or biometric information without providing him or her the disclosures and obtaining written consent. Id. *7. The Illinois Appellate Court answered both questions in the negative and held that a Plaintiff must allege an actual injury to be "aggrieved" under the BIPA. Id. at *7. In so holding, the Appellate Court analyzed the plain language of the statute and consulted various definitions of "aggrieved," including Black's Law Dictionary, to find that "there must be actual injury, adverse effect, or harm in order for [a] person to be 'aggrieved.'" Id. at *10. The Appellate Court further noted that if the Illinois legislature intended to allow for a private cause of action for every technical violation of the BIPA, it could have omitted the word "aggrieved" and stated that every violation was actionable. Id. at *12. The Appellate Court reasoned that a determination that a technical violation of the statute is actionable would render the word "aggrieved" superfluous. Id. at *13. Therefore, it held that a Plaintiff who alleges only a technical violation of the statute without alleging some injury or adverse effect is not an aggrieved person under § 20 of the BIPA. Accordingly, the Appellate Court concluded that "if a person alleges only a technical violation of the Act without alleging any injury or adverse effect, then he or she is not aggrieved and may not recover under any of the provisions in § 20." Id. *15.

(vi) Iowa

Freeman, et al. v. Grain Processing Corp.,* 895 N.W.2d 105 (Iowa 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of landowners, filed a class action alleging state common law claims based upon theories of negligence, nuisance, and trespass. Plaintiffs lived near a corn wet milling plant and alleged that air pollution from the Defendant's plant interfered with the use and enjoyment of their property. Id. at 109. The trial court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification and divided the class into two sub-classes. On Defendant's appeal, the Supreme Court of Iowa affirmed the trial court's decision granting class certification. Id. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the commonality requirement and that individual issues predominated over common questions of law or fact. Id. at 115. At the outset, the Supreme Court noted that Iowa's rules regarding class certification closely resembled Federal Rule 23. Id. As to commonality, the Supreme Court ruled that there were several common questions of law and fact. Id. at 117. Commonality was satisfied because Defendant engaged in a common course of conduct regarding all class member and almost identical evidence would be required to establish the level and duration of Defendant's emissions, the reasonableness of Defendant's operations, and the causal connections between the injuries suffered and Defendant's liability. Id. The Supreme Court rejected Defendant's argument that commonality was not satisfied because the named Plaintiffs did not suffer the same injury as other class members, reasoning that the trial court resolved this disparity by creating two sub-classes consisting of: (i) members who were in close proximity to the plant; and (ii) members who were in peripheral proximity. Id. at 118. The Supreme Court also ruled that common issues predominated over individual issues. The determination of whether a nuisance existed was capable of being made on a class-wide basis as several of the required elements, were objective common factors. Similarly, the negligence and trespass claims involved common evidence. Accordingly, the Supreme Court ruled that class action the most efficient way to adjudicate these issue, especially due to the complexity of the issues and the necessity of expert testimony. Id. at 122. The Supreme Court disagreed with Defendant's argument that the individual differences among class members was fatal to class certification. The Supreme Court ruled that Defendants would not be denied the opportunity to contest whether individual homeowners suffered injuries or damages because Plaintiffs proposed a formula for damages and Defendant could contest the appropriateness of that formula before the jury. Id. at 123. Finally Defendant argued that class certification offended due process because Defendant had a due process right to raise individual challenges and defenses to claims. Id. at 129. Because Plaintiffs planned to extrapolate harm to surrounding properties from testimony of representative class members, Defendant argued that this would violate due process as it masked individual issues. Defendant asserted that it should be allowed to pursue individual factors that might reduce certain class members' damages, such as the members' knowledge of the air pollution upon moving to the community. Id. However, the Supreme Court reasoned that the trial court did not limit the number of witnesses that Defendant was able to present, nor its exploration of individual defenses. As such, the Supreme Court opined that if individual defenses became unmanageable, the trial court had the discretion to bifurcate the trial, create additional sub-classes, or decertify the class. As such, the Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's class certification order. Id. at 130.

Residents Of Royal View Manor, et al. v. Des Moines Municipal Housing Agency,* 2017 Iowa App. LEXIS 684 (Iowa Ct. App. July 6, 2017). Plaintiffs, 55 tenants of Royal View Manor, filed a lawsuit alleging that Defendant breached warranties of habitability by failing to properly remedy a bed bug infestation in the apartment building. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, and the trial court granted the motion. On appeal, the Iowa Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's decision. Defendant asserted that the trial court erred in certifying the class claims because Plaintiffs failed to prove joinder of all class members was impractical and individual issues predominated over class questions. Royal View Manor is owned and operated by Defendant, which provides housing for low-income individuals. Id. at *3. In 2010, Defendant learned of a bed bug infestation at Royal View Manor and retained a pest-control firm to treat the infestation in individual apartment units based on resident complaints. However over the course of five years, a majority of the apartment units became infested. Plaintiffs filed a lawsuit against Defendant alleging it had breached express, implied, and statutory warranties of habitability. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs sought class certification for "[a]ll tenants of Royal View Manor who were subject to infestation of bed bugs from at least the date of 2007 to present," and estimated that the class could include between 300 and 600 residents. Id. Plaintiffs also sought declaratory and injunctive relief as a class in addition to damages on behalf of themselves and the class. The trial court found Plaintiffs had met the requirements for class certification, but limited the class to "all tenants of Royal View Manor from January 1, 2010, to present." Id. Defendant argued that the trial court abused its discretion in certifying the class because Plaintiffs failed to establish the class was so large that joinder of members would be impractical. Id. at *6. The Court of Appeals found that the number of Plaintiffs already named in the action exceeded the numerosity threshold, and the estimated size of the class was five to ten times larger. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal held that the trial court's determination that joinder was impracticable was neither untenable nor unreasonable. Id. at *7-8. Defendant also asserted that individual issues predominated over class questions. The Court of Appeal found that was a common nucleus of operative fact with regard to Defendant's conduct, which created a basis for its liability. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs alleged a widespread bed bug infestation existed at Royal View Manor for a number of years, which affected the majority of apartment units at some point in time. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendant rented units at Royal View Manor with knowledge of the bed bug infestation while failing to disclose the condition. Id. at *10. Although Defendant argued there were questions concerning whether the infestation affected each class member's individual apartment unit, the Court of Appeal opined that the underlying basis for Plaintiffs' claim was that the bed bug infestation rendered Royal View Manor uninhabitable as a whole, regardless of whether the infestation was present in an individual's apartment unit. Id. at *11-12. The Court of Appeals therefore found that the trial court appropriately considered and weighed the factors before it in determining the class certification would provide a fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's ruling granting class certification.

Wellmark, Inc. v. Iowa District Court For Polk County*, 890 N.W.2d 636 (Iowa Feb. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of chiropractors, brought a class action against Defendant Wellmark, Inc. and its affiliates challenging Wellmark's reimbursement rates and practices for chiropractic services, and sought relief under a variety of insurance statutes. The trial court granted Wellmark's motion for summary judgment. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Iowa Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's ruling. The Supreme Court limited its holding affirming the trial court's decision granting summary judgment and stated that it was not foreclosing a rule of reason claim against Wellmark if it were shown that the anti-competitive consequences of its practices exceeded their pro-competitive benefits. Id. at *8. The Supreme Court stated that it was merely upholding the trial court's decision that Wellmark's arrangements with self-insured and the out-of-state BCBS licensees were not subject to the per se rule. Id. After the procedendo had issued, the trial court allowed Plaintiffs to file a fifth amended petition and proceed with an antitrust claim, even though Plaintiffs had previously stipulated that the antitrust claim was not included in their fourth amended petition. Id. at *15. Defendant subsequently petitioned the Supreme Court for writ of certiorari and the Supreme Court sustained the writ, stating that its prior ruling ended the civil action and the trial court had no power to authorize proceeding with a rule of reason claim after the procedendo had issued. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs argued that the rule of reason analysis survived summary judgment and could still be litigated and pointed to the language in the Supreme Court's decision that indicated that it was not adjudicating a rule of reason claim. Id. at *12. However, the Supreme Court clarified that the language in its ruling was carefully limited for purposes of stare decisis so as not to preclude other Plaintiffs in a new lawsuit from bringing a rule of reason claim against Defendant. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs also argued that Iowa Rule of Civil Procedure 1.271 restricted the trial court from entering summary judgment without giving notice to putative class members. Id. at *12. The Supreme Court held that the trial court had no obligation to notify the putative class members of the pending summary judgment motion or the named Plaintiffs' stipulation abandoning a rule of reason claim. Id. at *21. The Supreme Court ruled that the trial court erred in concluding that due process and Rule 1.271(2) required notice to other chiropractors who were not bound by the summary judgment. Id. at *21. As such, the trial court erred when it allowed the case to proceed as the Supreme Court's decision ended the action between the named parties. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Supreme Court sustained the Defendant's petition for writ of certiorari. Id.

(vii) Kentucky

Bridal Warehouse, Inc. v. Witak*, et al., 2017 Ky. App. Unpub. LEXIS 833 (Ky. App. Nov. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of bridal gown purchasers, filed a class action asserting that Defendant provided "used dresses off the rack" to customers rather than new gowns. Plaintiffs brought claims for fraud, violations of Kentucky's Consumer Protection Act, and breach of contract. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs also alleged that they were induced to pay an extra $20 fee even though Defendant had not ordered gowns directly from the manufacturer. During discovery, Defendant produced records demonstrating that none of the Plaintiffs had received a bridal gown that had been displayed on any of its retail sales floors and that Plaintiffs had indeed received gowns that had been shipped directly from a manufacturer to the warehouse. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification of two sub-classes, which the trial court granted. On appeal, the Kentucky Court of Appeals vacated the trial court's ruling. Plaintiffs first sub-class was defined as any customer who, from December 1, 2008, contracted with Defendant to purchase a wedding gown that Defendant promised to special order directly from the gown's manufacturer, but who instead received a gown either from the retail sales floor inventory of a store or from the warehouse stock. Id. at *13. The second sub-class was defined as any customer who was billed during the period for an undisclosed special order fee or fees. Id. at *13-14. The Court of Appeals found that the trial court abused its discretion by certifying the class because none of named Plaintiffs' claims fairly encompassed either of the proposed sub-class claims. Id. at *19-20. Since the proposed class representatives were not part of either of the sub-classes they purported to represent, the Court of Appeals ruled it would be impossible to conclude that they demonstrated the prerequisites for class certification. Id. at *20. The Court of Appeals held that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that they were promised by Defendant to order a gown specially from the manufacturer, but instead received a gown from the retail sales floor inventory of a store or a gown from the warehouse stock. Id. Similarly, the Court of Appeal opined that none of the Plaintiffs was charged an undisclosed fee. The Court of Appeal reasoned that Plaintiffs' admissions, the documentary evidence, and the testimony of Defendant's representatives excluded Plaintiffs from the proposed sub-classes. Therefore, the Court of Appeal concluded that Plaintiffs failed to show numerosity, commonality, typicality, or adequate representation. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal vacated the trial court's ruling granting class certification.

United Propane Gas, Inc. v. Purcell, et al.,* 2017 Ky. App. LEXIS 523 (Ky. App. Sept. 15, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action on behalf of herself and similarly-situated consumers, alleging that Defendant dishonored thousands of agreements it had entered with its customers. Plaintiff asserted claims under the Kentucky Consumer Protection Act, and for breach of contract, breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and unjust enrichment. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification and the trial court granted the motion. The trial court's order granting certification made no conclusions of fact or law, and certified a class of all residential customers who paid for a 2013-2014 "Pre-Purchase Prebuy Keepfull Gas Supply Agreement" from Defendant. Id. at *4. On appeal, the Kentucky Court of Appeals reversed the trial court's order granting class certification. At the outset, the Court of Appeals noted that Kentucky Rules CR 23.01 and CR 23.02 create a two-step analysis for the trial court to undertake when determining if certification of a class is appropriate. First, the trial court must determine if all four of the requirements set out in CR 23.01 – numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequacy of representation – are present. Id. at *6. If all four are present, the trial court must look to CR 23.02 and determine if one of the three conditions of the rule are present. If all the requirements are met for class certification, the trial court "must determine by order whether to certify the action as a class action." Id. at *7. In that order, the trial court "must define the class and the class claims, issues, or defenses, and must appoint class counsel under CR 23.07." Id. The Court of Appeals determined that the trial court did not engage in the required "rigorous analysis." Id. at *8. The class certification order contained no findings of fact or conclusions of law. Further, the Court of Appeals noted that the order contained no discussion of CR 23.01's prerequisites, had no analysis of the class claims, and did not identify the class allegations and defenses, as required under CR 23.03(2). Id. The Court of Appeals also determined that the order indicated that the class was certified under 23.02(a), (b) and (c), and Plaintiffs conceded that their claims could only be certified as a class under CR 23.02(c). The Court of Appeals stated that the necessity of distinguishing under which sub-part of CR 23.02 the class is certified is more than just a mere formality, for the notice sent to prospective class members differs depending on whether the class is certified under CR 23.02(a), (b), or (c). Id. at *9. The Court of Appeals therefore reversed the trial court's order granting class certification. However, the Court of Appeal stated that it was not expressing an opinion on the propriety of certifying a class as its review was only concerned with issue of whether the trial court performed the proper analysis.

Emigh, et al. v. West Calcasieu Cameron Hospital,* 2017 La. App. LEXIS 2001 (La. App. Nov. 2, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of hospital patients, filed a putative class action against various Defendants, alleging violations of La.R.S. 22:1874, known as the "Balance Billing Act." The trial court granted class certification to Plaintiffs, and on appeal, the Louisiana Court of Appeals affirmed. Defendant asserted that the trial court erred by: (i) finding that Plaintiffs satisfied the requirements of typicality and adequacy of representation set forth in Local Rule 591(A)(3) and (4); and (ii) finding that Plaintiffs could maintain this action as a class action where individualized questions of causation and injury would predominate over common issues. Id. at *4-5. The Court of Appeals stated that testimony and evidence presented by Plaintiffs at the class certification hearing supported their allegations that Defendants acted in violation of the prohibitions set out in the Balance Billing Act. The Court of Appeals found that although each individual Plaintiff may have suffered varying damages as a result of the Defendants' conduct, they all alleged that those damages were the result of the same actions, such that any finding of liability will apply to all of the proposed class members. Id. at *19. As to adequacy, the Court of Appeals found that Defendants failed to produce any evidence to show that the named Plaintiffs' claims were in any way antagonist with each other or with any other potential class members. Given the discretion left to the trial court when deciding whether to certify a class, the Court of Appeals determined that it could not say that the trial court manifestly erred in finding that Plaintiffs could adequately represent the class. Id. at *21-22. As to Defendant's argument that Plaintiffs failed to meet the predominance requirement, the Court of Appeals disagreed and stated that the questions of law and fact common to the class members predominated over the questions affecting only individual members. In addition, the Court of Appeal was convinced that a class action would be the fairest and most efficient way to adjudicate this matter. Id. at *25. The Court of Appeals found that the main issues were Defendants' billing procedures and health insurers' failure to protect its insureds and enrollees from Defendants' practice. Id. The Court of Appeals opined that these were common issues of law and fact between Plaintiffs and the class members. The Court of Appeals therefore found no manifest error in the trial court's factual findings, and concluded that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in certifying the matter as a class action.

Harvey, et al. v. Board Of Commissioners*, 2017 La. App. LEXIS 2450 (La. App. Dec. 22, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action asserting that the Board of Commissioners for the Orleans Levee District was negligent in its design and construction of flood walls that collapsed during and in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, resulting in damages to their respective properties located in the Orleans Parish. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the trial court denied on the grounds that Plaintiffs had failed to produce evidence to support the requirements of commonality and typicality. Id. at *3-4. On appeal, the Louisiana Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order. Plaintiffs argued that the trial court erred in finding that the class lacked commonality because they established at least three undisputed common facts that exist within the putative class, including: (i) that Defendants had a duty to build and/or maintain the levee walls properly; (ii) that the levee walls failed; and (iii) that every one of the members of the proposed class suffered direct and ascertainable damage to some degree as a result of the flooding. Id. at *18. The Court of Appeal held that although the damages in question were alleged to have been caused by the failure of the flood walls following Hurricane Katrina, the evidence presented at the certification hearing showed two Defendants along with at least two other actors whose fault must be considered, and the failure of floodwalls on two canals caused by different conduct by multiple actors that occurred at different times. Id. at *19. Further, it was shown that flooding was possibly caused by different sources that varied depending on the particular location and the particularities of each property, making it difficult if not impossible to quantify each actor's contribution to the flooding at any particular property. Id. The Court of Appeal therefore stated that "a myriad of property-specific facts" made it "difficult if not impossible to quantify each actor's contribution to the flooding at any particular property." Id. The trial court also had found that the superiority requirement had not been met because individual issues predominated. Plaintiffs argued that the trial court erred because "aggrieved persons may be without effective means of redress absent the class action device" and that "the alternatives (including joinder, intervention, consolidation, and the use of a test case) do not sufficiently protect the legal rights of the aggrieved parties." Id. at *22. The Court of Appeals determined that such statements were conclusions without supporting evidence. As such, the Court of Appeals held that Plaintiff failed to show that the trial court abused its discretion in finding a lack of superiority. Id. at *22-23. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's ruling denying class certification.

Lillie, et al. v. Stanford Trust Co.*, 2017 La. App. LEXIS 1983 (La. Ct. App. Nov. 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of individual investors, filed a class action against the Stanford Trust Co. ("Stanford Trust"), SET Investments Co. ("SET"), and the State of Louisiana, Office of Financial Institutions ("OFI") for alleged breaches of fiduciary, statutory, and contractual duties. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the trial court granted. On appeal, the Court of Appeal of Louisiana affirmed. Plaintiffs claimed that Stanford Trust induced them to invest either directly in Stanford International Bank Limited ("SIB") CDs held in trust with Stanford Trust as the trustee or to designate Stanford Trust as the custodian of their IRA accounts, whereby Stanford Trust converted the funds in the IRA accounts to SIB CDs. Id. at *5. With respect to the OFI, Plaintiffs asserted that the agency wrongly allowed the SIB CDs to be marketed and sold to Stanford Trust without proper examination of the risk profile of the CDs or assurance that such information was being disclosed to investors. Plaintiffs further alleged that the OFI failed to disclose the perceived risks to investors who purchased or renewed SIB CDs, or to suspend the sale of the CDs in the state after discovering the risk associated with the CDs. Id. The trial court certified a class of: (i) persons who purchased SIB CDs in Louisiana between January 1, 2007 and February 13, 2009; (ii) persons who renewed any SIB CD in Louisiana between January 1, 2007 and February 13, 2009; and (iii) persons for whom Stanford Trust purchased SIB CDs in Louisiana between January 1, 2007 and February 13, 2009. Id. at *6. Stanford Trust and SET removed the action. Plaintiffs filed a motion to remand the entire action. OFT filed a separate motion with the trial court to sever the claims against it and to remand those claims, citing its immunity from suit under the Eleventh Amendment as the basis for remand. Id. at *9. The trial court granted the motion and the action against OFT proceeded in state court. OFT then appealed the trial court's class certification ruling. OFT argued that Plaintiffs failed to set forth any allegation concerning the elements required to prove the application of fraud on the market theory and Plaintiffs produced no evidence to support the trial court's reliance on the presumption created by that theory. Id. at *10. The Court of Appeal rejected Defendant's argument, finding that a review of the trial court's reasons for judgment showed that the trial court neither relied on nor applied that theory in determining class certification. Id. at *14. OFI also contended that the trial court erred in determining that there were questions of law or fact common to the class. The Court of Appeal noted that while the testimony of Plaintiffs varied as to how they came to invest in the SIB CDs, they all testified that they had no knowledge of the true value of the CDs or the riskiness of the investment. Id. at *22. The Court of Appeal thereby determined that the trial court did not err in finding the common question was that that Plaintiffs all invested in the CDs under a false understanding of the value and safety of the investment, and whether any communication by the OFI of its concerns regarding the risk and value of the CDs, pursuant to its regulatory authority, would have come to the knowledge of Plaintiffs or otherwise impacted the representations made to Plaintiffs. Id. at *23. OFI further contended that the trial court erred in finding that Plaintiffs sufficiently established numerosity. The Court of Appeal stated that the evidence showed that SIB CD accounts were owned by the identified individuals during the relevant time period and therefore they had the potential to be class members, and therefore satisfied numerosity. Id. at *26. The Court of Appeal also rejected the arguments raised by OFI to refute the trial court's finding that Plaintiffs met their burden of establishing the superiority of the class action procedure and the predominance of the issues common to the class. The Court of Appeal found no abuse of the trial court's discretion in certifying a class action and thereby affirmed the trial court's class certification order.

Rodriguez, et al. v. Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority,* 92 Mass. App. 26 (2017). Plaintiff brought an action against Defendant on behalf of a putative class of purchasers of monthly rail passes in January, February, and March of 2015 alleging that Defendant's service disruptions were in breach of its implied contract "to provide timely, reliable commuter rail service." Id. at 27. The trial court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss and concluded that even if Defendant had some form of contractual obligation to its monthly pass holders, "the complaint fails to allege an essential element of a breach of contract claim: an agreement between the parties on a material term of the contract at issue." Id. On appeal, the Massachusetts Court of Appeals affirmed. In the winter of 2015, the Boston area was beset by severe snowstorms with many inches of snowfall. Plaintiff alleged that the intervals between storms left "more than enough time to clear the snow and return to a full commuter rail schedule." Id. at 28. Defendant canceled all commuter rail, subway, and most bus service from 7:00 P.M. on Monday, February 9, through the end of the day on Tuesday, February 10. Defendant then utilized a "winter recovery schedule" with limited service until the snow was adequately removed. Id. The trial court concluded that Defendant had no express contractual obligation to provide normal or regular commuter rail service during and after the record-breaking snow storms in 2015, even though Plaintiff may have expected such rail service. Id. at 29. The trial court reasoned that to create an enforceable contract, there must be agreement between the parties on the material terms of that contract, and the parties must have a present intention to be bound by that agreement. Id. The Court of Appeals agreed with the trial court that the complaint did not set forth the material terms of the claimed contract because it was silent regarding the source of the contractual obligation, the scope of the Defendant's expected performance in these circumstances, and the rights of its customers in the event of a breach. Id. at 30. Moreover, the Court of Appeals opined that the obligation to provide "timely and reliable service" was too indefinite to create an enforceable contract. Id. Even if, as Plaintiff claimed, the terms of the contract were the "normal" or "regular" published schedules, the complaint did not allege that the Defendant intended or agreed to be bound by the regular schedule, and the Court of Appeals concluded it was not reasonable to draw that inference. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals determined that purchase of a monthly pass was not a guarantee of performance according to its published schedule in these extraordinary circumstances. Id. at 31. Because the complaint did not set forth the material terms of the claimed contract with sufficient precision, the Court of Appeals found that the trial court did not error in dismissing the breach of contract claim.

(x) Minnesota

Flores, et al. v. Zorbalas,* 2017 Minn. Dist. LEXIS 6 (Minn. Dist. Ct. Aug. 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of residential renters, filed a putative class action alleging that Defendants were not properly licensed and violated various local housing ordinances and state laws when they failed to properly maintain rental properties and created unsafe and unhealthy living conditions for the class. Id. at *20. Plaintiffs sought injunctive relief and damages. Plaintiffs experienced repeated problems with their units, including broken windows, electrical outlets, and inoperable stoves, as well as problems with roach, bedbug, and rodent infestation that required repeated treatment. Id. at *18. The Court granted Plaintiffs motion to certify the class. At the outset, the Court rejected Defendant's argument that Plaintiffs lacked standing because some of the named Plaintiffs moved out of the units and several testified that their maintenance issues were addressed and resolved. The Court reasoned that there was no requirement that Plaintiffs must have a continuing injury to satisfy standing requirements. Id. at *38. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs had standing because they claimed a concrete injury as the result of having to reside in units rented in the conditions alleged. The Court also ruled that Plaintiffs satisfied Rule 23.01's numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequacy requirements. Id. at *54. The Court determined that Plaintiffs met the requirements of both Rule 23.02(b) and 23.02(c). The Court reasoned that certification of the class was proper under Rule 23.02(b) because it allowed certification where Defendants acted or refused to act on grounds generally applicable to the class and made injunctive relief appropriate with respect to the class. The Court opined that this case represented the ideal occasion for class certification under Rule 23.02(b) because the class sought injunctive relief on grounds common to the class, who were all former or present tenants of Defendants' properties. The Court also ruled that class certification was warranted pursuant to Rule 23.02(c), because: (i) common questions predominated over individual issues; and (ii) class action was superior to other available methods for adjudication of the controversy. Id. at *58. The Court determined that there were many common issues of fact and law applicable to the class because Plaintiffs contended that Defendants deprived every class member of the same rights by the same wrongful conduct. Defendants maintained that common questions of law and fact did not predominate because some of the named Plaintiffs had moved, and some did not rely on express representations regarding Defendant's licensure. The Court found these arguments unavailing because Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants made implicit representations regarding their licensure, and Defendants violated their duty to disclose the true information to the class. These claims were common to the entire class. Similarly, the class representatives testified uniformly that they would not have leased their units from Defendants if they had known Defendants were not validly licensed. Id. at *60. The Court rejected Defendants' assertion regarding the individualized nature of class members' damages and ruled that this did not preclude certification, as proof of individual damages would not predominate over the common issues. Id. at 62. The Court held that class action was the superior method for adjudication of the controversy because class members did not have a substantial interest in controlling individual litigation in this case, for there were few individual issues to be resolved and the class members were individuals with varying claims for damages, ranging from very small to large amounts. Id.* at 65.* Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

(xi) Missouri

Boergert, et al. v. Kelly Services*, 2017 Mo. Cir. LEXIS 82 (Cole County, Mo. Sept. 19, 2017). Plaintiff, an applicant, filed a class action alleging that Defendant's background check form violated the Fair Credit Report Act ("FCRA") and related state laws. The Court previously had dismissed Plaintiff's claims for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. After Plaintiff re-filed, Defendant filed a motion to dismiss and for judgment on the pleadings. The Court granted Defendant's motion, finding that Plaintiff failed to plead an injury-in-fact. The Court stated that even assuming Plaintiff pled an injury-in-fact, his claims failed because his alleged injury did not fall within the zone of interests protected by the FCRA. The Court noted that the FCRA was enacted to reduce the risk that a job applicant unknowingly consents to a background check and to provide an opportunity to address inaccuracies that would result in adverse employment actions. Id. at *1. The Court found it dispositive that Plaintiff did not allege that he unknowingly consented to a background check or that his report was inaccurate. The Court further reasoned that use of federal case law on standing was proper because concurrent jurisdiction of federal statutes "militates in favor of consistency in the legal standards to be applied." Id. at *2. The Court thereby granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Corozzo, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.,* 2017 Mo. App. LEXIS 733 (Mo. Ct. App. July 25, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging willful violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"), claiming that Defendant's disclosure form contained extraneous information, inaccurate and misleading statements, and did not provide "a clear and conspicuous disclosure in writing in a document that consisted solely of the disclosure that a consumer report may be obtained for employment purposes." Id. at *2. The trial court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss on the basis that Plaintiffs lacked Article III standing. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Missouri Court of Appeals affirmed. Id. at *18. Defendant alleged that Plaintiffs did not assert an injury-in-fact because they asserted only a bare procedural violation of the FCRA, and therefore lacked standing pursuant to Spokeo v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540, 1549 (2016). Id. at *11. The Court of Appeals ruled that Plaintiffs did not plead an actual injury, as Plaintiffs merely alleged that Defendant's disclosure form did not comply with the FCRA's requirements because it included extraneous information. Id. at *18. The Court noted that Plaintiffs did not claim that they did not receive or see a disclosure, or that they did not authorize Defendant to obtain their consumer reports. Id. The Court of Appeals therefore affirmed the trial court's decision because Plaintiffs merely alleged "a bare procedural violation, divorced from any concrete harm." Id.

Hurst, et al. v. Nissan North America, Inc*., 2017 Mo. LEXIS 411 (Mo. Oct. 5, 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the Missouri Merchandising Practices Act ("MMPA"), based on alleged misrepresentations concerning the dashboards in certain Nissan Infinity FX vehicles. Id. at *1-2. Following a jury trial, the trial court entered judgment requiring Defendant to pay $2,000 in damages to each class member identified in a claims process and $1.9 million in attorneys' fees. Id. at *2. On appeal, the Missouri Supreme Court reversed the judgment in favor of Plaintiffs and entered judgment in favor of Defendant. Plaintiffs claimed at trial that every class member suffered damage as a result of Nissan's alleged misrepresentations regarding FX vehicles because some included defective dashboards where "bubbling" occurred, which Plaintiffs claimed caused a general "stigma" that decreased the value of all FX vehicles. Id. at *4. On appeal, Defendant argued that the trial court erred in failing to grant its motions for a directed verdict and for judgment notwithstanding the verdict because Plaintiffs failed to make a viable case of misrepresentation under § 407.020.1 of the MMPA. Id. The Court noted that § 407.020.1 provides, in relevant part, that the "use or employment by any person of any . . . misrepresentation . . . of any material fact in connection with the sale or advertisement of any merchandise . . . is declared to be an unlawful practice." Id. at *5-6. Plaintiffs' theory of the case was that Defendant's statements – to the effect that the FX vehicles were "luxury" or "premium" vehicles – were false or misleading because the dashboards were defective, and therefore those statements were actionable "misrepresentations" under § 407.020.1. Id. at *6. Both parties focused their arguments on whether Defendant's statements were actionable or whether they are mere "puffery," i.e., statements that may sound like objective facts but that are merely opinions unsusceptible of proof or refutation. Id. at *6-7. The Supreme Court explained that it was not addressing the question of whether "puffery" is actionable under the MMPA, as opposed to the common law in which such statements generally are not actionable. Id. at *7. The Supreme Court was willing to assume – for purposes of the present case – that, when a manufacturer represents a particular line of vehicles as "luxury" or "premium," those statements are sufficiently factual to leave to a jury the questions of whether those representations were false in a particular case and, if so, whether they were material. Id. at *8. The Supreme Court stated that even assuming Defendant's representations that the FX vehicles were "premium" and "luxury" were factual statements, those statements could not have been false or misleading representations unless there was proof the FX vehicles were constructed with low-end, "economy," or "standard" accoutrements. Id. The Supreme Court found that there was no evidence the dashboards included in the FX vehicles were low-end, "economy," or even "standard" dashboards. Id. Instead, the evidence was that they were luxury dashboards that were defective. Accordingly, the Supreme Court held that there was no evidence from which the jury could find the members of the class reasonably understood Defendant's representation that the FX vehicles were "luxury" and "premium" to mean that every part in those vehicles was entirely free of defects. Id. The Supreme Court therefore reversed the trial court's ruling and entered judgment in favor of Defendant.

Lucas Subway MidMo, Inc., et al. v. Mandatory Poster Agency, Inc.*, 524 S.W.3d 116 (Mo. App. 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Missouri Merchandising Practices Act. The trial court denied Plaintiff's request for class certification and ultimately granted summary judgment to Defendant on all counts. On appeal, the Missouri Court of Appeals reversed and remanded. Plaintiff owned and operated several Subway restaurants in Missouri. Defendant operated a corporate records service that prepares annual minutes for corporations. Defendant marketed its product through direct mail solicitations containing an annual minutes solicitations form ("Form"). Plaintiff purchased corporate minutes from Defendant for $125. The State of Missouri subsequently filed an action against Defendant for various remedies under the Missouri Merchandizing Practices Act ("MMPA"). Defendant was required to alter its solicitations, pay $3,500 in costs and penalties, and send written notice to all of its Missouri customers alerting customers that they have the right to a full refund of any payments made to Defendant if they were "not satisfied" with the corporate minutes they received. Id. at 119. Plaintiff did not request a refund, but filed suit alleging that Defendant: (i) engaged in the unauthorized practice of law; (ii) unlawfully received money from Plaintiff for legal services that it could not provide, and (iii) committed various violations of the MMPA. Plaintiff also sought class certification on behalf of Defendant's other Missouri customers from the time period beginning five years prior thereto. The trial court denied Plaintiff's request for class certification. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, which the trial court granted, finding that Defendant's actions did not constitute the unauthorized practice of law. On appeal, Plaintiff alleged that the trial court erred in determining that Defendant was not conducting the unauthorized practice of law. The Court of Appeal found that the trial court erred in dismissing Plaintiff's claims alleging that Defendant engaged in the unauthorized practice of law. Id. at 125. The Court of Appeals stated that a consumer receiving unlicensed legal aid, whether satisfied or not, has an imputed injury because, to protect the public, Missouri mandates that such aid be given by someone trained in the practice of law and yet their aid came from someone unqualified to offer such services. Id. at 126. The Court of Appeals also held that Plaintiff's proposed class met the requirements for class certification. The Court of Appeals found that the trial court's finding that class certification should be denied because Defendant had offered refunds to the putative class members was erroneous. The Court of Appeals stated that any monies Defendant received for legal work were unjustly held because it was not qualified to offer such a service, and therefore it did not matter whether a customer was satisfied with the legal work. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals reversed and remanded the trial court's order that had granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment and denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

State ex rel. Van Alst, et al. v. Harrell,* 2017 Mo. App. LEXIS 846 (Mo. App. Aug. 29, 2017). Plaintiffs, two former employees, filed an action alleging that Defendants discriminated against them on the basis of their race and age in violation of the Missouri Human Rights Act and failed to pay for all hours worked and for overtime compensation in violation of the Missouri Minimum Wage Law. Defendants moved to compel arbitration pursuant to an acknowledgment form containing an arbitration agreement signed by Plaintiffs at the commencement of their employment. Plaintiffs asserted that the acknowledgment was not a valid agreement to arbitrate because it lacked mutuality, and was not supported by adequate consideration. Id. at *4. The trial court granted Defendants' motion to compel arbitration. Plaintiffs filed a petition for a writ of mandamus or prohibition in the Missouri Court of Appeals, asking that it order the trial court to rescind its order compelling arbitration, and to instead deny the motion. The Court of Appeals issued a preliminary writ and subsequently issued a permanent writ. The Court of Appeals explained that orders granting motions to compel arbitration are not appealable and instead, "a writ of mandamus is an appropriate mechanism to review whether a motion to compel arbitration was improperly sustained." Id. The Court of Appeals noted that Missouri contract law applies to determine whether the parties have entered a valid agreement to arbitrate. Id. at *7. The Court of Appeals found that the acknowledgment stated that Plaintiffs were at-will employees. Further, they were asked to agree to the acknowledgment during the course of their on-going employment with the company, and were required to execute the acknowledgment in order to retain their employment. Defendants argued that the consideration for the acknowledgment was the parties' mutual agreement to arbitrate disputes, and their mutual waiver of the right to pursue claims through the judicial system. Plaintiffs contended that they were the only ones who promised to arbitrate claims and waive judicial remedies. Plaintiffs Van Alst and Shelton argued that their unilateral promises to arbitrate were unenforceable, because no consideration flowed to them in exchange for their promises. Id. at *8. The Court of Appeals stated that the plain language of the acknowledgment contained promises made only by Plaintiffs. The acknowledgment used the first-person singular pronoun "I" seven times, instead of using “we.” Id. The Court of Appeals agreed with Plaintiffs’ argument that "there is no 'I' in 'mutual.'" Id. The Court of Appeals further noted that the acknowledgment ended by specifying that employees must "acknowledge their agreement" to the acknowledgment; however, there was no suggestion that the employer must agree, or document its agreement in any particular fashion. Id. at *9 The Court of Appeals thereby determined that the acknowledgment did not contain mutually binding promises to arbitrate. Accordingly, because the acknowledgment was not supported by adequate consideration, it was not a valid and binding arbitration agreement, and the trial court erred by compelling arbitration based on this unenforceable agreement. The Court of Appeals therefore made permanent the preliminary writ of mandamus previously issued, and directed the trial court to vacate its order compelling arbitration, and to enter an order denying Defendants' motion to compel arbitration.

(xii) Montana

Mitchell, et al. v. Glacier County,* 2017 Mont. LEXIS 649 (Mont. Oct. 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a resident of Glacier County, filed a class action on behalf of herself and other residents, alleging that the County financially mismanaged taxes and the State failed to take legal action against the County. Id. at *1. The trial court dismissed the action on the ground that Plaintiffs did not have standing to sue either the County or the State. On appeal, the Montana Supreme Court affirmed the trial court’s ruling. Plaintiffs owned property and paid property taxes in Glacier County, and had been paying taxes under protest in response to an independent audit of the County's finances, which identified budget deficits in numerous County funds and stated that the County had exceeded its budgetary authority in many of those funds. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs alleged that the County and State failed to comply with budgeting and accounting laws. Plaintiffs asserted that it was foreseeable that the County's residents and taxpayers would be injured as a result of the State's failure to enforce the terms of the Single Audit Act to "insure strict accountability of all revenues received and money spent" by the County. Id. at *4. The trial court found that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that they suffered a concrete injury to their property or to their individual constitutional or statutory rights sufficient to establish standing under Montana law. Id. at *5. The trial court stated that Plaintiffs’ vague, speculative statement that it was foreseeable that the County's residents and taxpayers would be injured was insufficient to establish the injury requirement for standing. The trial court further reasoned that the legal provisions under which Plaintiffs alleged injury – Article VIII, Section 12, of the Montana Constitution and the Single Audit Act – did not establish private rights and did not grant Plaintiffs the right to judicial relief. On appeal, Plaintiffs argued that the State has not fulfilled its fiduciary duty to ensure "strict accountability" under the Constitution and that the State had abdicated its enforcement obligations under the Single Audit Act. Id. at *20. Plaintiffs asserted that these alleged failures violated their rights and granted them standing to sue. The Supreme Court noted that although the Single Audit Act granted the Department authority to take enforcement action against local government entities that fail to comply with their financial duties, it afforded the Department wide latitude in determining when and under what circumstances to take action. Id. at *21. The Supreme Court thus determined that Plaintiffs could not show that their claims against the State asserted a legally cognizable injury to a civil right sufficient to confer standing. The Supreme Court opined that the threshold problem was that Plaintiffs could not show, based on the audit report, that the threat of the County raising property taxes was "actual or imminent," rather than "conjectural or hypothetical.” Id. at *24. Further, the Supreme Court explained that neither the Single Audit Act nor the Local Government Budget Accounting Act contained any express provision granting private rights of action to individuals. The Supreme Court reasoned that even if the County violated one or more provisions of these laws, Plaintiffs failed to show, "at an irreducible minimum," that they had "suffered a past, present, or threatened injury" that "would be alleviated by successfully maintaining the action.” Id. at *25. Without demonstrating a concrete injury, the Supreme Court held that Plaintiffs failed to establish standing. Accordingly, the Supreme Court affirmed the trial court’s ruling dismissing Plaintiffs’ claims.

(xiii) Nebraska

Henn, et al. v. American Family Mutual Insurance Co.,* 2017 Neb. LEXIS 24 (Neb. Feb. 17, 2017). Plaintiff, an insured individual, brought a class action alleging that Defendant wrongfully failed to compensate her and others similarly-situated by depreciating labor costs in the calculation of the actual cash value for loss or damage to a structure or dwelling under its homeowner's insurance policies. Plaintiff asserted claims for breach of contract, unjust enrichment, violation of Nebraska's Consumer Protection Act, fraudulent concealment, and equitable estoppel. The parties agreed that actual cash value was replacement cost minus depreciation, but disagreed as to whether the labor component could be depreciated. Id. at *5. Plaintiff submitted a homeowner's claim under her insurance policy issued by Defendant for hail damage to her home. The insurance policy was a replacement cost policy and provided that for valid claims, an insured could recover "the cost to repair the damaged portion or replace the damaged building, provided repairs to the damaged portion or replacement of the damaged building are completed," or "[i]f at the time of loss, . . . the building is not repaired or replaced, [American Family] will pay the actual cash value at the time of loss of the damaged portion of the building up to the limit applying to the building." Id. at *5-6. After inspecting the storm damage, Defendant provided Plaintiff with a written estimate that explained the calculations for replacement cost value, actual cash value, and depreciation for the claim. Id. at *7. The written estimate defined actual cash value as being "based on the cost to repair or replace the damaged item with an item of like kind and quality, less depreciation." Id. at *8. The estimate further stated that "replacement cost" was the "cost to repair the damaged item with an item of like kind and quality, without deduction for depreciation." Id. The estimate did not show how much it depreciated from building materials as opposed to labor. Id. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, arguing that the policy was unambiguous and that the issues could be resolved as a matter of law. Id. at *9. Plaintiff contended that the term "actual cash value" was ambiguous, that actual cash value should not include depreciation of labor, and that the policy provision should be construed in her favor. Id. The federal district court hearing the case found that resolution of the motion involved a question of law in Nebraska on which there was no controlling precedent in the decisions of the Nebraska Supreme Court. It therefore certified the question to the Nebraska Supreme Court of whether an insurer, in determining the actual cash value of a covered loss, can depreciate the cost of labor when the terms "actual cash value" and "depreciation" were not defined in the policy and the policy does not explicitly state that labor costs will be depreciated. Id. Plaintiff asserted that the language in the policy did not unambiguously allow for labor depreciation and that Defendant's depreciation of labor resulted in under-indemnification of her loss. The Supreme Court stated that it did not see how this distinction could be made under the plain meaning of actual cash value in the policy. The Supreme Court opined that the policy did not state that the insured would receive the actual cash value of the materials and the replacement cost value of the labor. Id. at *24. Since the policy did not distinguish between materials and labor, the Supreme Court declined to read that distinction into the policy. Id. at *25. The Supreme Court determined that payment of the full amount of labor would amount to a pre-payment of benefits to which the insured was not yet entitled. The Supreme Court stated that depreciating the whole was merely one way to arrive at a value that represented the depreciated value of the property to which the insured was entitled. Id. at *26. The Supreme Court accordingly found that payment of actual cash value, which depreciated both materials and labor, did not under-indemnify the insured. Id. The Supreme Court therefore concluded that actual cash value applied to the insured property as a whole and there was no ambiguity in the term "actual cash value." Id. at *27.

(xiv) Nevada

Tesema, et al. v. The Eighth Judicial District Court Of Nevada,* 2017 Nev. Unpub. LEXIS 109 (Nev. Feb. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action. After some discovery, Plaintiffs filed a motion or class certification with the trial court. After the trial court had not ruled on the motion, Plaintiffs petitioned the Nevada Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus. The Supreme Court found that the trial court's delay in resolving Plaintiffs' motion for class certification was preventing Plaintiffs from attempting to bring their action to trial within Local Rule 41(e)'s five-year time-frame. Id. at *1. Accordingly, the Supreme Court granted Plaintiffs' request for relief and directed the trial court to enter an order deciding Plaintiffs' motion for class certification within 15 days from the date of its order. Id. The Supreme Court requested that Plaintiffs notify it if the trial court failed to do so within the allotted time-frame. However, the Supreme Court declined to consider whether to adopt a rule consistent with out-of-state law that would allow for tolling of local Rule 41(e)'s five-year time-frame during the period in which a trial court's inaction prevented a party from bringing an action to trial. Id. at *2. Therefore, the Supreme Court granted Plaintiffs' motion in part and issued a writ of mandamus directing the trial court to decide Plaintiffs' motion for class certification within 15 days from the date of the order.

(xv) New Jersey

Dugan, et al. v. TGI Fridays,* 2017 N.J. LEXIS 975 (N.J. Oct. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of restaurant patrons, filed two putative class actions – the Dugan action and the Bozzi action –alleging that Defendants engaged in unlawful practices with respect to disclosure for prices for beverages in violation of the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act ("CFA") and the Truth in Consumer Contract, Warranty and Notice Act ("TCCWNA"). Id. at *3. Plaintiffs brought a motion for class certification in both cases, which the trial court granted. On Defendants' appeal, the New Jersey Appellate Division reversed. The Appellate Division ruled that Plaintiffs failed to meet Rule 4:32-1's requirement that common issues of fact predominated. Id. at *4. On Plaintiffs' further appeal, the Supreme Court of New Jersey ruled that the Dugan Plaintiffs' price inflation theory was incompatible with the CFA and Plaintiffs had not established predominance with respect the CFA claims. Id. The Dugan Plaintiffs claimed an ascertainable loss and causation on the difference between a "reasonable" price for the beverages and the prices that Defendant charged. Id. However, because New Jersey case law authorities have consistently rejected such "price-inflation" theories, the Supreme Court ruled that the Dugan Plaintiffs failed to establish predominance with respect to their CFA claim and affirmed the Appellate Divisions' decision. Id. at *4. The CFA claim in Bozzi focused on customers, who were charged different prices for beverages of the same brand and volume, during the same visit. Id. at *5. The Supreme Court ruled that the Bozzi Plaintiffs met the requirements for class certification with respect to their CFA claim, if the class was limited as such and remanded the matter to the trial court for certification of a class with a revised definition. Id. at *6. The Supreme Court concluded with respect to the claims based on the TCCWNA that all Plaintiffs failed to satisfy the predominance requirement and it reversed the trial court's class certification determinations in both cases and remanded for a determination of Plaintiffs' individual TCCWNA claims. The Supreme Court opined that in order to obtain a remedy under the TCCWNA, Plaintiff must be an aggrieved consumer who satisfies the elements of the TCCWNA. To be found liable under the TCCWNA, a Defendant must have violated a clearly established legal right or responsibility. Plaintiffs contended that by failing to list prices for beverages on the menus, the restaurants failed to meet their "clearly established" legal responsibilities under N.J.S.A. 56:8-2.5, and when Defendants' employees presented menus without prices to members of the putative TCCWNA class, they offered contracts that violated the statute. The Supreme Court concluded that with respect to the TCCWNA claims, Plaintiffs did not meet the predominance requirement in either appeal because to establish that a Plaintiff was an aggrieved consumer under TCCWNA claim would give rise to a range of individual questions regarding the interaction between the customer and the server. Further, whether Defendants' restaurants violated a "clearly established legal right" raised the specter of disparate results for different members of the class. No case law existed that established that offering food or beverages to customers without listing the prices for those items on their menu violated New Jersey law. As such, the Supreme Court affirmed and modified the Appellate Division's judgment concerning class certification as to the CFA claim in Dugan and remanded the matter to the trial court for the determination of the individual CFA claim. As to Bozzi, the Supreme Court affirmed in part and reversed in part the trial court's class certification order as to the CFA claim, and remanded to the trial court to certify a class with a revised definition. Id. .at *64. As to the TCCWNA claims, the Supreme Court affirmed the Appellate Division's decision denying class certification as to both putative classes, and remanded to determine individual claims pursuant to TCCWNA.

Foti, et al. v. Toyota Motor Sales, USA, Inc.*, Case No. A-5215-15T3 (N.J. App. Div. April 24, 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Truth-in-Consumer Contract, Warranty and Notice Act ("TCCWNA") when it leased her a car and included a warranty notice that misstated consumers' rights under the New Jersey Lemon Law. Id. at 4. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration and Plaintiff cross-moved for partial summary judgment. The trial court granted Defendant's motion, entered an order compelling arbitration, and required Plaintiff to pursue her claims on an individual basis. On appeal, the New Jersey Appellate Division affirmed the trial court's order. As a condition of leasing a new car, Plaintiff signed a written lease agreement that contained a broad arbitration provision that provided that any controversy or claim between Plaintiff and Defendant would be determined by neutral binding arbitration. Id. at 3. Plaintiff argued that the trial court's ruling was in error because: (i) there was no meeting of the minds and therefore no enforceable arbitration agreement; (ii) that as non-signatory to the lease, Defendant was not entitled to enforce the arbitration agreement; (iii) that the agreement did not apply to Plaintiff's claims because issues concerning the warranty were exempt from its terms; (iv) because Plaintiff's complaint was brought as a private attorney general action, it was beyond the scope of the arbitration agreement; and (v) the agreement was unenforceable as to the putative class. Id. at 4-5. The Appellate Division found that the arbitration agreement specifically included Defendant and it rejected her argument that the agreement was "confusing." Id. at 6. The Appellate Division further held that the agreement covered Plaintiff's claims, as it clearly stated that it pertained to "any claims arising from or relating to the lease or related agreements or relationships…including, without limitation, claims in contract, tort, pursuant to statute, regulation or otherwise." Id. at 7. The Appellate Division determined that the Lemon Law required Defendant to provide the notice and was clearly a related agreement that arose from the lease itself. Id. at 7-8. Further, the Appellate Division noted that the U.S. Supreme Court has held that the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") preempted the line of state case law authority that class arbitration waivers in consumer contract were unconscionable. Accordingly the Appellate Division determined that the arbitration agreement's class action waiver applied. Id. at 8. Finally, the Appellate Division found that Plaintiff's assertion that she filed the complaint as a private attorney general action, which was expressly excluded by the arbitration agreement was without merit. The Appellate Division determined that there was no support for this contention, and there was nothing in the arbitration agreement that exempted Plaintiff's individual claims from arbitration. The Appellate Division thereby affirmed the trial court's ruling that granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Gambrell, et al. v. Hess Corp.,* 2017 N.J. Super. Unpub. LEXIS 1328 (N.J. App. Div. June 1, 2017). Plaintiff, a group of consumers who purchased mislabeled gasoline, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the New Jersey Motor Fuel Retail Sales Act and the Truth in Consumer Contract, Warranty and Notice Act. The parties ultimately settled the matter. The settlement required Defendant to provide class members with gift cards totaling $125 to $425. The agreement further provided that class counsel could file an application for attorneys' fees and costs. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs filed a motion for preliminary settlement approval, which the trial court granted. Plaintiffs subsequently sought final approval of the settlement, and filed an application on the award of attorneys' fees in the amount of $310,536.50, with an enhancement of 25% to 50%, and costs of $7,830.53. The trial court granted final approval of the settlement, but reduced the number of hours for which class counsel should be compensated. The trial court also refused to apply a fee enhancement because the case did not involve any novel legal issues, Defendant had conceded liability, and the matter did not involve any issue of significance to the public. Id. at *6. The trial court thereby awarded class counsel $274,576.50 in attorneys' fees, and the full amount of the costs requested, for a total of $282,407.03. Class counsel then filed a supplemental fee application, seeking additional attorneys' fees in the amount of $42,556.50 and costs of $957.51, which were incurred from July 31, 2015 to February 16, 2016. Id. at *7. The trial court denied the supplemental application for attorneys' fees, but awarded class counsel costs in the amount of $957.51. The trial court found that class counsel had already been "generously awarded" more than $282,000 and that the time entries in the supplemental application did not reflect time expended to benefit the class and the settlement. Id. at *7-8. On appeal, Plaintiffs argued that the trial court erred by not granting the application for supplemental attorneys' fees. The New Jersey Appellate Division found that the trial court's denial of the supplemental fee application was not a mistaken exercise of discretion and Plaintiffs' arguments on that issue were without sufficient merit to warrant extended discussion. The Appellate Division opined that class counsel had already been appropriately compensated with the award of fees in the amount of $274,576.50, and additional fees would not be reasonable under the circumstances. The Appellate Division found that the trial court's determination was supported by the record, and it was not inconsistent with the settlement agreement, which expressly recognized that the trial court may only award attorneys' fees that are reasonable. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Appellate Division affirmed the trial court's award of attorneys' fees and costs.

Green, et al. v. Morgan Properties*, 2017 N.J. Super. Unpub. LEXIS 2385 (N.J. App. Div. Sept. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current or former tenants of Defendants' apartment complex, filed a class action alleging that Defendants' practice of charging $400 in attorneys' fees as additional rent violated New Jersey's Consumer Fraud Act. Plaintiffs sought class certification of all tenants "who were charged a legal fee for eviction" from September 1, 2007 until the date of class certification. Id. at *5. The trial court found that Plaintiffs' class failed to meet the requirements of numerosity, commonality, typicality and adequacy of representation under Rule 4:32-1(a)(1) through (4), and that Plaintiffs could not demonstrate under Rule 4:32-1(b)(3) that common questions of law or fact predominated and a class action was superior to other methods for adjudicating the controversy. Id. at *15. On appeal, the New Jersey Appellate Division agreed with the trial court that a proposed class of all tenants who were charged attorneys' fees under the 2007 and 2010 leases was not maintainable. Id. at *16. The Appellate Division thereby narrowed the class definition to a class of tenants who were charged legal fees by Defendants under their leases but did not quit their apartments owing more than those charges. As this number was at least 5,294 tenants, the Appellate Division found that Plaintiffs met the numerosity requirement. Id. at *21. The Appellate Division explained that the central question was whether the $400 fee charged to Plaintiffs was reasonable or unconscionable. The parties conducted extensive fact discovery and engaged experts who prepared comprehensive reports directed entirely to the question of whether the $400 fee in the lease was a reasonable approximation of the fees Defendants could expect to incur in a summary dispossess action or an unconscionable overreach. Id. at *25. Therefore, the Appellate Division opined that evidentiary questions regarding the reliability or admissibility of those opinions and the credibility of the experts could be uniformly applied to all members of the class. Id. The Appellate Division found that a jury may appropriately consider the basis on which the fees were calculated, whether the costs Defendants include in the operating expenses for the legal department were fairly allocated, whether the $400 fee included in the leases was a reasonable approximation of Defendants' expected costs for a summary dispossess action, whether Defendants may base the $400 fee on its collections of fees charged instead of its costs for services performed, and whether those costs are reasonable in comparison to the fees charged by outside lawyers for the same work. Id. at *25-26. If the jury decided the $400 lease charge was unconscionable, it could then decide what lease charge would be reasonable, and then form basis for determining whether individual class members suffered an ascertainable loss. Id. at *26. Weighing the significance of the common questions, the benefit of resolving those questions, as well as at least some individual questions of ascertainable loss, through a class action against alternatives, the Appellate Division was satisfied that the common questions predominated over any questions affecting only individual members. Id. at *27-28. Finally, given the class members' "lack of financial wherewithal," and the relatively low value of the individual claims, the likelihood of any individual tenant challenging the $400 lease charge against Defendants was slim, and therefore class action was the superior form of adjudication. Id. at *28. Accordingly, the Appellate Division concluded that the smaller, more narrowly defined class should be certified. The Appellate Division therefore vacated the order denying class certification and remanded for further proceedings.

Griffoul, et al. v. NRG Residential Solar Solutions, LLC,* Case No. 17-L-1503 (N.J. Super. July 14, 2017). Plaintiff, a property owner installing Defendant's solar panel system, filed a class action alleging that Defendant made misrepresentations and false statements in its lease agreement in violation of the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act ("NJCFA"). Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration and to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims, and the Court denied the motion. The Court explained that the arbitration agreement in Plaintiff's lease provision stated that "any dispute, disagreement, or claim between you and NRG RSS arising out of or in connection with this Lease, or Solar System, which cannot be amicably resolved by the parties shall be submitted to final and binding arbitration." Id. at 6. The Court noted that the agreement lacked an explanation that Plaintiff was waiving his right to seek relief in the court system for breach of his statutory rights, including violations of the NJCFA. Id. The Court also found that the class waiver contained in the arbitration agreement was invalid because when read in the context of the whole provision, it was contradictory. Id. at 7. The class waiver stated that "each party may bring claims against the other party only in its individual capacity and not as a Plaintiff or class member in any purported class or representative proceeding." Id. at 7-8. The Court opined that the provision thereby prevented Plaintiff from bringing any claims in the court system, but the class action waiver appeared to allow Plaintiff to bring claims in his individual capacity. The Court found that the provision was therefore invalid due to its lack of consistency and clarity. Id. at 8. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration or to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint.

JPRC, Inc. v. New Jersey Department Of Labor & Workforce Development,* 2017 N.J. Super. Unpub. LEXIS 1981 (N.J. App. Div. Aug. 4, 2017). Plaintiff appealed from a final administrative decision of the New Jersey Commissioner of the Department of Labor and Workforce Development ("DOL"). The DOL determined that exotic dancers who worked at Defendant's place of business from 2002 to 2005 were employees and assessed Defendant approximately $9,000 for unpaid contributions to the unemployment compensation fund and the State disability benefits fund. Id. at *1. On appeal, the New Jersey Appellate Division affirmed the decision. Prior to 2003, Plaintiff treated dancers as employees. Beginning in 2003, Plaintiff unilaterally restructured its relationship with dancers, in an attempt to avoid having them classified as employees. Id. at *2. Plaintiff stopped paying dancers any wages, and instead began charging them a fee for the right to "perform," and required them to obtain all their compensation from the tips customers gave them and the fees the dancers charged customers for "private dances." Id. The DOL determined that the evidence Plaintiff produced at the hearing failed to satisfy the "ABC" test set forth in N.J.S.A. 43:21-19(i)(6). Id. at *2-3. The ABC test provides that individuals are considered employees when: (i) they have been and will continue to be free from control or direction over the performance of such service, both under his contract of service and in fact; (ii) such service is either outside the usual course of the business for which such service is performed, or that such service is performed outside of all the places of business of the enterprise for which such service is performed; and (iii) such an individual is customarily engaged in an independently established trade, occupation, profession, or business. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff contended that dancers did not perform services "for remuneration" within the meaning of N.J.S.A. 43:21-19(i)(6). The Appellate Division agreed with the DOL that Plaintiff's evidence was insufficient to satisfy its burden of proof as to the ABC test. For example, Plaintiff's advertising belied its claim that the dancers were merely incidental or peripheral to Plaintiff's business of serving food and drink. As the Commissioner noted, the Appellate Division stated that Plaintiff presented little evidence concerning the individual dancers it alleged were independent contractors. Further, the Appellate Division opined that Plaintiff's imposition of a new mode of operation on its existing employees – for the avowed purpose of enabling Plaintiff to avoid paying unemployment taxes – did not demonstrate the dancers' independence as "contractors." Id. at *5. Rather, the Appellate Division ruled that it evinced Plaintiff's control over their working conditions. In summary, the Appellate Division found that the DOL's decision was supported by substantial credible evidence and, accordingly, it affirmed.

Kernahan, et al. v. Home Warranty Administrator Of Florida, Inc.*, Case No. 16-A-1355 (N.J. App. Div. June 23, 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, filed a class action alleging that Defendants violated the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act ("NJCFA") and the New Jersey Truth-in-Consumer Contract, Warranty and Notice Act ("TCCWNA") by misrepresenting the terms of a service agreement it provided her for repair of home appliances. Id. at 2. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants' contracts promised that upon a consumer's request, they would arrange for a service provider to repair or replace the appliances listed in the contract. Plaintiff alleged that the coverage period in the contract listed two different terms, one stating that the coverage period was for three and a half years and one stating that the coverage period began 30 days after acceptance of the application and lasted for one year. Id. at 3. Plaintiff further claimed that the "mediation" section of the agreement failed to advise her that she was waiving her right to file an action in Court. Id. Defendant moved to dismiss, or in the alternative, to compel arbitration of Plaintiff's claims pursuant to a provision in the agreement. The trial court denied Defendants' motion and found that the arbitration agreement "is not written in a clear and straightforward manner and is not satisfactorily distinguished from other contract terms." Id. at 4. On appeal, Defendants argued that the arbitration provision was enforceable. The New Jersey Appellate Division affirmed the trial court's ruling. The Appellate Division stated that an arbitration clause that fails to "clearly and unambiguously signal" to parties that they are surrendering their right to pursue a judicial remedy renders the agreement unenforceable. Id. at 8. The Appellate Division found that here, the language in the agreement failed to contain any waiver language, and simply stated that arbitration is the "exclusive" remedy. Id. at 9. The Appellate Division concluded that this was insufficient. The Appellate Division held that it must be clear to the parties that arbitration is a substitute for the right to seek relief in the Court system, and that by agreeing to the provision, the parties have waived their right to a Court action. Accordingly, the Appellate Division affirmed the trial court's decision denying Defendants' motion to dismiss, or in the alternative, to compel arbitration of Plaintiff's claims.

Moore, et al. v. Capital Title Loans,* 2017 N.J. Super. Unpub. LEXIS 350 (N.J. App. Div. Feb. 13, 2017). Plaintiff, a car loan purchaser, filed a putative class action against Defendant alleging that Defendant breached its contract with Plaintiff. Defendant demanded arbitration in accordance with the arbitration provision in the loan contract. Plaintiff entered into a title loan contract with defendant in Delaware. Under the terms of the agreement, Plaintiff received $3,000 and was charged interest at an annual percentage rate of 180.43%, totaling $457.50, and was required to pay back $3,542.50 one month later. Plaintiff secured the loan using her car as collateral, granting Defendant a security interest in the vehicle. In the event of a dispute, the contract included a binding arbitration provision entitling either party to demand arbitration upon written notice, excluding "any claim of $2,500 or less which is within the jurisdictional limits of a small claims or equivalent court." Id. at *2. Plaintiff ultimately defaulted on the loan, Defendant repossessed Plaintiff's vehicle, and Defendant sent her a notice that she needed to pay $3,085 plus interest totaling $5,048.25, $575 in repossession fees, and a daily storage fee of $25 to have it returned. Id. Plaintiff filed a class action, and sought certification of a class of New Jersey consumers who entered into title loan contracts with Defendant charging interest at a rate greater than 30% per annum and certification of a proposed sub-class of consumers who received notices similar to Plaintiff after their cars were repossessed. Specifically excluded from the proposed class were persons whose combined claims exceeded $2,500. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint and compel arbitration. Plaintiff argued that the arbitration clause expressly excluded "any claim of $2,500 or less which is within the jurisdictional limits of small claims or equivalent court." Id. at *3. Plaintiff asserted that her class action complaint, which sought less than $2,500 per putative class member, was cognizable in small claims court and thus not subject to arbitration. The trial court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint and compel arbitration, concluding that the complaint failed to fit within the jurisdictional limits of the small claims court "because of the putative class action based on allegations of New Jersey statutes." Id. at *5-6. The New Jersey Appellate Division reversed the trial court's decision. The Appellate Division concluded that the contract contained a valid and binding provision for arbitration of disputes. Id. at *7. Therefore, the Appellate Division examined whether the contractual language clearly and unmistakably established that Plaintiff's complaint fell within the scope of the exclusion clause of the arbitration provision. Id. at *8-9. The Appellate Division determined that the clear and unambiguous language of the arbitration agreement stated that under the exclusion clause of the arbitration agreement, arbitration did not apply "[t]o any claim of [$2,500] or less which is within the jurisdictional limits of a small claims or equivalent court so long as there is a right to appeal a decision of the small claims court to a higher court." Id. at *10. The Appellate Division stated that it was clear that the drafter's intention was to exclude from arbitration claims of $2,500 or less that were subject to the jurisdictional limits of a small claims court. The Appellate Division thus held that the arbitration agreement was enforceable and the exclusion provision was unambiguous. Accordingly, the Appellate Division concluded that Plaintiff should be permitted to litigate her individual statutory claims in small claims court rather than in arbitration, and reversed and remanded the trial court's decision.

Sharpe, et al. v. New Meadowlands Racetrack, LLC,* 2017 N.J. Super. Unpub. LEXIS 127 (N.J. App. Div. Jan. 20, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay him and other similarly-situated workers the prevailing wage in accordance with the New Jersey State Building Service Contract Act ("SBSCA"). Plaintiff argued that the SBSCA applied to Defendant because it operated a racetrack on land owned by the New Jersey Sports and Exposition Authority ("NJSEA") through an agreement with that public agency. Defendant argued that the prevailing wage requirements of the SBSCA were not applicable because it was not a contractor or sub-contractor that provided building services on property that the State owned or leased. Defendant asserted that it entered into the lease with the NJSEA to privatize the racetrack and to divest the State of the financial burden associated with the racetrack's operation while preserving jobs in the racing industry, and therefore it was not a contractor or sub-contractor that entered into an agreement with the State to furnish building services, as required for application of the SBSCA. Id. at *2. The trial court determined that Plaintiff was not covered by the SBSCA because the contract between the State and Defendant was not primarily a building services contract, as required for coverage by the statute and regulation. The trial court therefore granted Defendant's motion to dismiss. On appeal, the New Jersey Appellate Division affirmed. Id. at *3. The Appellate Division stated that the New Jersey Department of Labor ("NJDOL") promulgated regulations that gave further definition to the requirements of SBSCA. Under § 12:64-1.3, a "contract" is defined as "those agreements entered into by the State for the principal purpose of furnishing building services." Id. at *3. The Appellate Division held that the contract between NJSEA and Defendant was not for the principal purpose of furnishing building services, but rather to run a racetrack. The Appellate Division found that § 12:64-1.3 was not inconsistent with the SBSCA. Id. The Appellate Division stated that the NJDOL was specifically tasked with the responsibility to provide regulatory standards that guide the application of the SBSCA in order to effectuate the Legislature's intent. Id. at *4. The Appellate Division determined that the NJDOL's definition of a contract as one for the "principal purpose of furnishing building services" further defined the language of the SBSCA, which itself explicitly limited application of the mandate to "employees of contractors and subcontractors furnishing building services." Id. Therefore, the Appellate Division held that the regulation reinforced the SBSCA's application criteria. Accordingly, the Appellate Division affirmed the trial court's ruling and upheld the decision granting Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Stanley, et al. v. Capri Training Center, Inc.,* 2017 N.J. Super. Unpub. LEXIS 2257 (N.J. App. Div. Sept. 12, 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, brought an action alleging that the fees she and other putative class members paid

Defendant for cosmetology services exceeded those permitted under the Cosmetology and Hairstyling Act of 1984 (the "Act") in violation of the Consumer Fraud Act ("CFA"); the Truth-in-Consumer Contract, Warranty and Notice Act ("TCCWNA"); breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing; and unjust enrichment. Id. at *2. Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. The trial court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss. On appeal, the New Jersey Appellate Division reversed the trial court's decision and remanded for further proceedings. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's claims turned on an interpretation of what constituted the "cost of materials" under the Act, and therefore the New Jersey Board of Cosmetology and Hairstyling (the "Board") had exclusive jurisdiction over the claims. Id. at *3. Plaintiff argued that the trial court erred to the extent it determined the Board has exclusive jurisdiction over her claims. Plaintiff contended that the Act did not contain an express grant of exclusive authority to the Board and therefore the trial court had jurisdiction over the asserted causes of action. Id. at *4. Defendant argued that the trial court did not hold that the Board has exclusive jurisdiction, but that in any event, the Act granted the Board exclusive jurisdiction to enforce the Act. The Appellate Division stated that trial courts have uniformly rejected claims that administrative agencies have exclusive jurisdiction over common law and statutory causes of action where there is no express statutory grant of such jurisdiction to the agency. Even where an agency's governing statute expressly provides that an agency has exclusive jurisdiction over certain matters, trial courts have carefully limited the scope of the agency's exclusive jurisdiction and permitted the prosecution of claims of common law and statutory claims in trial courts. Upon review of the record, the Appellate Division found that Act did not include any express grant of exclusive authority to the Board over Plaintiff's statutory and common law claims. The Appellate Division further found the trial court stated there was no private cause of action under the Act. However, the Appellate Division noted that Plaintiff's complaint raised claims under the CFA, TCCWNA, breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and unjust enrichment. The Appellate Division ruled that Plaintiff could assert claims under those statutes and common law doctrines regardless of whether there is a private right of action under the Act. Id. at *13-14. Accordingly, the Appellate Division reversed the trial court's ruling on Defendant's motion to dismiss and remanded for further proceedings.

(xvi) New York

Desrosiers, et al. v. Perry Ellis Menswear, LLC,* Case Nos. 121-122 (N.Y. Dec. 12, 2017). In this consolidated appeal, the New York Court of Appeals addressed the issue of whether the notice provisions of § 908 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules ("CPLR") applied only to certified class actions, or also applied to putative class actions that were settled or discontinued before the class had been certified. The New York Appellate Division had granted Defendants' leave to appeal to the Court of Appeals in the cases of Desrosiers, et al. v. Perry Ellis Menswear, LLC, 139 A.D. 3d 473 (N.Y. App. Div. May 10, 2016), and Vasquez, et al. v. National Security 85 A.D.2d 149 (N.Y. App. Div. May 12, 2016), and certified the question of whether the Appellate Division's orders – requiring that notice based on § 908 should be given to putative class members that the respective cases had been settled – were proper. Id. at 4. The Court of Appeals affirmed the Appellate Division's decision in both cases. Section 908 provides that notice of the proposed dismissal, discontinuance, or compromise of a class action shall be given to all members of the class. Id. at 1. In rendering its decision, the Court of Appeals opined that that the text of § 908 was ambiguous. Defendants asserted that the reference to a class action in § 908 only encompassed a certified class action. Plaintiffs contended the opposite, i.e., that an action is a class action within the meaning of the statute from the moment the complaint containing class allegations was filed. The Court of Appeals concluded that § 908 of the CPLR applied in pre-certification context. Because of this ambiguity, the Court of Appeal looked to the legislative history surrounding the enactment of § 908 and cited to the State Consumer Protection Board's statement that the purpose of the statute was to safeguard the putative class against a "quickie settlement" that primarily benefitted the named Plaintiff without substantially aiding the class. Id. at 6. The Court of Appeal concluded that the only appellate-level decision in New York to address this issue was Avena v. Ford Motor Co., 85 A.D. 2d 149 (N.Y. App. Div. Feb. 25, 1982), which held that § 908 applied to settlements reached before certification, and because Avena had not been overruled and the New York Legislature had not amended § 908 in the decades since Avena was decided, this was persuasive evidence that the Court of Appeal's interpretation of § 908 was correct. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals affirmed the orders of the Appellate Division in both the *Desrosier*s and Vasquez cases.

Editor's Note: The ruling of the New York Court of Appeals in Desrosiers is at odds with the federal rules, as amended in 2003. The current version of Rule 23(e) requires notice of settlement or voluntary dismissal only where a class has been certified. As a result, this will complicate defense strategy for employers facing class actions in New York.

Gordon, et al. v. Verizon Communications, Inc.,* 2017 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 740 (N.Y. App. Div. Feb. 2, 2017). Plaintiff filed a putative class action on behalf of herself and other shareholders against Defendant, Verizon Communications, alleging that the board of directors breached its fiduciary duty to the shareholders by causing Defendant to pay an excessive price for Verizon Wireless stock in a transaction and that Defendant failed to disclose material information in the proxy statements regarding the transaction. Subsequently, the parties engaged in settlement negotiations and reached an agreement. The proposed settlement agreement included certain additional disclosures of the terms of the transaction as well as a corporate governance reform proposal, but it did not include any monetary compensation for the putative class members. Defendant agreed that it would not oppose the request of Plaintiff's counsel for an award of attorneys' fees and expenses that did not exceed $2 million. The trial court preliminarily certified the class action and approved the settlement. The court set a fairness hearing and two objectors offered argument and testimony. After the hearing, the trial court reversed its decision to preliminarily approve the settlement and indicated that it wanted to take a "second look" at the terms of the agreement to determine whether it was in the nest interest of the class members. Id. at *7. On Plaintiff's appeal, the New York Appellate Division reversed and found that approval of the settlement was warranted and remanded the matter for a hearing to determine the appropriate amount of attorneys' fees to be awarded to Plaintiff's counsel. The New York Appellate Division acknowledged that non-monetary settlements have been historically disfavored, but commentators have called for a more balanced approach in evaluating non-monetary class action settlements. In determining that settlement approval was appropriate, the New York Appellate Division considered various factors, including: (i) the likelihood of Plaintiff's success on the merits; (ii) the extent of support from the parties; (iii) the judgment of counsel; (iv) the presence of bargaining in good faith; (v) the nature of the issues of law and fact; and (vi) the best interests of the putative shareholders and the corporation. The New York Appellate Division found that all these factors weighed in favor of settlement approval and it reversed the trial court's decision. The Appellate Division noted that negotiations were presumed to be in good faith as there was no evidence to the contrary. The nature of the issues and law also weighed in favor of the settlement. Accordingly, the New York Appellate Division determined that the settlement should be approved and the benefit to the shareholders warranted an award of attorneys' fees. The Appellate Division remanded for a hearing to determine the appropriate amount of attorneys' fees to be awarded to Plaintiff's counsel that was commensurate with the benefit obtained by the class.

In The Matter Of Buffalo Teachers Federation, Inc., et al. v. New York State Pubic Employee Relations Board,* 2017 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 6841 (N.Y. App. Div. Sept. 29, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of teachers, filed an action asserting that Defendant violated the New York Civil Service Law. Defendant New York State Public Employment Relations Board ("PERB") reversed a determination of the Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ"), who ordered the reinstatement of teachers with back pay, on the grounds that the order was arbitrary and capricious because the determination was inconsistent with Defendant's own precedent. In May 2005, the Buffalo City School District ("District") passed a resolution naming a single health insurance carrier for the District's teachers. Id. at *2. This changed the existing collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") between the District and Plaintiffs, the teachers' bargaining representative. Subsequently, the District explained that it was forced either to make that change to the CBA or to make "massive cuts" in other areas. Id. Plaintiffs filed a class grievance seeking to prevent that change to the CBA. The District then informed 88 teachers by letter that they were to be laid off because the failure to reach an agreement on a single health insurance carrier had forced the District to make budgetary cuts elsewhere. Id. The grievance went to arbitration and the arbitrator concluded that the District had discharged the teachers "wrongfully, in furtherance of its ill-conceived effort to force the Union into submissive acceptance of the unilateral modification" to the CBA. Id. at *3. The arbitrator's award directed the District to reinstate the teachers with back pay. The trial court confirmed the arbitration award. On appeal, however, the New York Appellate Division concluded that "the arbitrator acted in excess of the power granted to him with respect to that part of the award concerning the teachers." Id. The Appellate Division therefore vacated that part of the award with respect to the reinstatement of the teachers. Thereafter, the improper practice charge proceeded on a stipulated record before an ALJ. Id. The ALJ concluded that the discharge of the 88 teachers was "the final step in the pre-conceived scheme designed to pressure [petitioner] to drop the single carrier grievance" and thus violated the statute. Id. at *4. The ALJ ordered the District to reinstate the teachers with back pay. Defendant appealed again and asserted that the July 2005 letters from the District announced the lay-offs as a decision that had already been made and explained the underlying reason for the lay-offs, i.e., the need to cut costs, and thus the discharge of the teachers did not violate the statute. Id. Defendant contended that the determination was arbitrary and capricious inasmuch as it departed from its own precedent in refusing to defer to the arbitration award. The Appellate Division found that although an administrative body acts arbitrarily and capriciously in departing from its own precedent and failing to explain the reasons for the departure, Defendant's determination here was consistent with its own precedent. Notably, the Appellate Division stated that Defendant will defer to an arbitration award only in limited circumstances, and it usually does not do so where the charging party alleges a violation of the New York Civil Service Law. Id. at *5. Moreover, to the extent that the arbitrator made findings with respect to the lay-offs, it was reasonable for Defendant not to defer to the arbitration award because the arbitrator exceeded the scope of his authority and his findings were inconsistent with Defendant's interpretation of the statute. Id. at *5-6. The Appellate Division noted that the District had explained that lay-offs were a cost-cutting measure made necessary by the failure to reach an agreement on health insurance. Based upon its review of the record, the Appellate Division concluded that it was rational for Defendant to determine that the lay-offs were not motivated by an improper purpose. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Appellate Division confirmed the determination of the ALJ.

Jaclyn S., et al. v. The National Football League*, Case No. 804088/2014 (N.Y. Sup. May 18, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of cheerleaders, filed a class action alleging that Defendants misclassified them as independent contractors and thereby denied them minimum wages in violation of the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for partial summary judgement to the extent that, as a matter of law, they were non-exempt employees misclassified as independent contractors and that Defendants Cumulus Radio Co., Stejon Productions Corp., and Stephanie Mateczun were Plaintiffs' joint employers. Id. at 1. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. The Court found that the agreements that cheerleaders were required to sign as a condition of their participation on the team were unenforceable and that Plaintiffs were non-exempt employees misclassified as independent contractors. Id. at 3. The Court, however, denied Plaintiffs' motion for partial summary judgment to the extent that there was a question of fact as to the role of Defendant Buffalo Bills Inc. as an alleged joint employer. The Court ruled that the agreement containing the independent contractor language in question was incorporated at the insistence of other Plaintiffs and not the Bills, and therefore raised a question as to whether the Bills had status as a joint employer. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' partial motion for summary judgment in part.

Onadia, et al. v. City Of New York,* 2017 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 30 (N.Y. Super. Ct. Jan. 9, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of individuals incarcerated by the New York City Department of Correction ("DOC"), filed a putative collective action in state court against Defendant alleging that it routinely and unlawfully maintained custody of Plaintiffs after they were supposed to be released from jail because the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement ("ICE") was investigating them. The putative class was defined as all people that were routinely held by DOC prior to December 21, 2012, based solely on an ICE detainer that either indicated that an investigation had been commenced or failed to indicate a reason for the continued detainment. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to certify the proposed class. Defendant objected on the basis that the definition of the putative class did not satisfy the commonality requirement because the class would include people that were held in custody for various reasons. The Court ruled that the putative class did not serve as an "umbrella" under which all people held past their release date based upon any ICE detainer would be included. Id. at *4. The Court noted that because the class excluded people whose detainer forms indicated that they should be held based upon a warrant for their arrest or a deportation order, common questions of law and fact would predominate. Therefore, the Court ruled that the commonality requirement was satisfied and granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

(xvii) North Carolina

Chambers, et al. v. Moses H. Cone Memorial Hospital,* 2017 NCBC LEXIS 22 (N.C. Super. Ct. May 13, 2017). Plaintiff filed a putative class action against Defendant asserting claims of breach of contract, breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and breach of constructive trust, and sought declaratory judgment, restitution, and injunctive relief. Id. at *4. Plaintiff received an emergency appendectomy at Defendant's hospital and signed a contract agreeing to pay the regular rate for services. Defendant billed Plaintiff for the services that he received, which totaled $14,558.14. Plaintiff asserted that the bill was calculated using Defendant's Chargemaster rates, which he argued were grossly inflated rates. Id. at *9. Plaintiff asserted that he was only obligated to pay the reasonable value of the services for which he was billed, which he claimed was no more than $6,000. Id. Defendant brought a separate collection action against Plaintiff based upon Plaintiff's failure to pay his hospital bill. Id. at *10. Another patient, Robin Hayes, subsequently filed a motion to intervene as a named Plaintiff in the action, and alleged that she too was billed under Chargemaster rates that were much higher than the reasonable value for the services that she received. Id. at *12. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss Plaintiff's claims after it dismissed its collection claims against Plaintiff. The Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss, and ruled that Plaintiff's claims against Defendant were moot because Defendant voluntarily dismissed its collection suit against Plaintiff. Id. at *11. The Court further determined that dismissal was warranted as none of the five mootness exceptions that precluded dismissal applied. Id. at *20. As to Hayes' motion to intervene, the Court ruled that she was not entitled to intervene because she could not intervene as a matter of right as she had no direct interest in the case. Id. at *24. The Court ruled that Hayes' claims were barred by accord and satisfaction because her attorney negotiated and settled with Defendant concerning Defendant's lien in her personal injury case for which she sought medical treatment. Id. In sum, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint and denied Hayes' motion to intervene.

Elliot, et al. v. KB Home North America,* 2017 NCBC LEXIS 38 (N.C. Super. Ct. April 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of homeowners, brought a class action against Defendant alleging breach of contract and violation of building codes, which caused water damage in the homes resulting from Defendant's failure to install a weather resistant barrier in the homes. Id. at *3. The parties eventually entered into a class action settlement. Subsequently, Plaintiffs moved, unopposed, for final approval of the settlement and an award of attorneys' fees pursuant to Rule 23 of the North Carolina Rules of Civil Procedure. The Court certified the classes for settlement, approved the settlement, and granted the attorneys' fees motion. The Court followed a two-step process in determining whether to approve a class action settlement by considering: (i) whether the proposed class satisfied the North Carolina Rule of Civil Procedure 23; and (ii) whether the settlement was fair, reasonable, and adequate. Id. at *5. The Court certified the two classes consisting of previous and current homeowners, finding that they satisfied Rule 23's requirements. Id. at *7. The Court determined that the settlement was fair and reasonable considering the likelihood that the class would prevail should litigation go forward and the class' reaction to the settlement, as only one class member objected. Id. at *13. While Plaintiffs established a likelihood of prevailing at trial, the Court noted that Plaintiffs would be faced with numerous risks that threatened the class if it were to proceed, such as decreased members of homeowners in the class as well as a risk of potential decertification of the class. Id. at *13-14. The Court balanced these risks against the benefits offered to the class and found that the benefits were in line with what they would receive if successful at trial. Id. at *16. The benefits included the option for class members to select a cash-benefit ranging from $6,500 to $17,000 based upon the size of the home or instead to opt for repairs to their homes. Similarly, the class of former homeowners could select between a lump sum cash benefit of $3,250 or the actual documented decrease in sale value of their home. Accordingly, the Court found that the settlement was fair and reasonable. Id. at *17. The Court applied the factors in Rule 1.5 of the Rules of Professional Conduct of the North Carolina Bar prohibiting excessive attorneys' fees and approved the award of fees that Plaintiffs' counsel requested of $1,925,000. Id. at *19. The Court found that the fee request was reasonable, as Plaintiffs' counsel worked over 6,400 hours over a period of eight years that included several appeals. Id. at *21. Plaintiffs' counsel also established their experience, skill, and ability to successfully conduct complex litigation. Id. The Court found that the attorneys' rates of $500 per hour per partners and $250 per associate were reasonable relative to rates charged by attorneys in the local community. Accordingly, the Court approved the Plaintiffs' motion for settlement and award of attorneys' fees.

Miles, et al. v. The Company Store,* Case No. 16-CVS-2346 (N.C. Super. Ct. Nov. 16, 2017). Plaintiff, a customer, filed a class action alleging that Defendant provided a copy of her receipt revealing the first six digits and the final four digits of her credit card number in violation of the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act ("FACTA"). Defendant filed a motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, which the Court granted. Plaintiff claimed that Defendant knowingly, willingly, intentionally, and recklessly violated FACTA's requirements and exposed Plaintiff to an increased risk of identity theft. Plaintiff did not allege that anyone else saw her receipt. Id. at 2. The Court explained that the North Carolina Court of Appeals has identified that the existence of standing most often turns on whether a party has alleged an injury-in-fact. Id. Further, an injury-in-fact is an "invasion of a legally protected interested that is: (i) concrete and particularized; and (ii) actual or imminent." Id. The Court stated that Plaintiff had only alleged that Defendant provided her a copy of her own personal information exceeding federal statutory limits. Since Plaintiff already had access to her own personal information, the Court opined that there was no injurious effect or other personal state in the controversy sufficient to assure a concrete injury-in-fact. Id. at 3. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiff lacked standing to pursue her claims and the Superior Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction. The Court thereby granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

(xviii) Ohio

Eighmey, et al. v. City Of Cleveland,* 2017 Ohio App. LEXIS 1887 (Ohio App. 8th Dist. May 18, 2017). Plaintiff, a citizen, filed a class action alleging that Defendant issued unlawful traffic citations generated by unmarked traffic cameras. The trial court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification. On appeal, the Ohio Court of Appeals reversed the trial court's ruling, finding that Plaintiff could not establish typicality. Plaintiff received a traffic ticket from a mobile traffic camera and paid the ticket. Plaintiff then filed an action asserting that the mobile unit that recorded her traffic violation failed to comply with the notice requirements of § 413.031(g) of the Cleveland Codified Ordinances ("CCO") because the unit contained "no distinguishable markings whatsoever." Id. at *2. Defendant argued that the trial court erred in granting class certification because Plaintiff failed to meet the typicality requirement of Rule 23(A). The Court of Appeals noted that Plaintiff claimed she was injured by having to pay Defendant a fine that was wrongfully generated by an unmarked mobile unit. However, the Court of Appeals found that Plaintiff admitted in her complaint that she voluntarily paid the ticket. The Court of Appeals explained that § 413.031(k) of the COO provides, in relevant part, that "the failure to give notice of appeal or pay the civil penalty within this time period shall constitute a waiver of the right to contest the ticket." Id. at *6. Thus, by paying her ticket, the Court of Appeals determined that Plaintiff waived her right to contest the ticket and she was barred from any recovery. The Court of Appeals explained that Plaintiff would neither benefit from, nor be harmed by, the litigation of other potential class members who might pursue viable claims, and therefore she lacked standing and was unable to represent the class. Plaintiff argued that her claims were not barred for failing to exhaust her administrative remedies because an appeal through the administrative process would have been futile. The Court of Appeals agreed that parties are not required to pursue administrative remedies "if doing so would be a futile or vain act." Id. However, the Court of Appeals held that the administrative proceedings set forth in § 413.031 and R.C. 2506.01, which authorizes appeals of administrative decisions to the common pleas court, provided an adequate remedy at law to aggrieved motorists in receipt of civil traffic violations. Therefore, because an appeal of Plaintiff's civil traffic violation would not have been futile, the Court of Appeals concluded that her failure to pursue the appeal barred her from representing the class. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals reversed the trial court's ruling.

Smith, et al. v. Ohio State University*, Case No. 2015-00919 (Ohio Ct. Cl. Feb. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of job applicants, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") by providing applications with a background check disclosure form that contained extraneous information. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6), and the Ohio Court of Claims granted the motion. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to allege a concrete injury-in-fact. At the outset, the Court of Claims noted that it was not bound by Article III of the Constitution and that it had construed standing more broadly than federal jurisprudence. Id. at 3. Plaintiffs argued that they had statutory standing because the FCRA contains an express grant of statutory standing to "any consumer" to bring an action in "any court of competent jurisdiction" against "any person" who willfully fails to comply with "any requirement" under the FCRA. Id. at 4. Plaintiffs further argued – and submitted case law examples to support their position – that Ohio law specifically recognized statutory standing that may exist in the absence of any concrete injury. Id. The Court of Claims determined that Plaintiffs demonstrated that Ohio law allows statutory standing in the absence of an injury-in-fact. However, the Court of Claims stated that none of the case law Plaintiffs presented related to the issue at hand, i.e., a state court considering whether a Plaintiff has statutory standing based on the alleged violation of a federal statute. Id. at 5. The Court of Claims ruled that it would therefore defer to the U.S. Supreme Court's interpretation of Congress' legislative intent as to the existence of statutory standing under the FCRA in the absence of a concrete injury-in-fact. Id. The Court of Claims held that Plaintiffs had pled no injury-in-fact, nor did they have statutory standing to pursue their claims in the absence of a cognizable injury. Accordingly, the Court of Claims granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Smith, et al. v. Ohio State University,* 2017 Ohio App. LEXIS 5265 (Ohio App. 10th Dist. Dec. 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a facility manager and a housekeeper, filed a class action alleging that Defendant provided a background check disclosure and authorization to each of them that improperly included extraneous information and a liability release in violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Defendant filed a motion to dismiss for lack of standing, which the Ohio Court of Claims granted. On appeal, the Ohio Court of Appeals affirmed. Defendant contended that, as under federal pleading standards, Plaintiffs lacked standing to bring their claims under Ohio state law because they alleged no injury-in-fact resulting from the alleged violations of the FCRA. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs argued that Ohio law recognizes standing, even in the absence of an injury-in-fact, when that standing is conferred by statute. The Court of Claims agreed with Defendant and found that Plaintiffs failed to plead any particularized injury-in-fact and lacked statutory standing to pursue their claims in the absence of a cognizable injury. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs had relied on the concept of "statutory standing" as the basis for the Court of Claims' jurisdiction to hear their FCRA claims against Defendant. Id. Plaintiffs asserted that Ohio case law authorities had consistently found standing to exist where the text of a statute provides a party with a cause of action to sue for a violation of its requirements, even in the absence of an alleged injury-in-fact. The Court of Appeal noted that "statutory standing" in Ohio has been described as the statutory grant of authority to sue. Id. at *5. In addition to standing authorized by "common-law," which requires injury-in-fact, causation, and redressability, "standing may also be conferred by statute." Id. at *7. For a statute to confer standing in the absence of a concrete injury, the statute must "clearly express an intention to abrogate the common-law requirements for standing." Id. The Court of Appeal explained that under this framework, the "common-law" standing requirements must be established unless the party is suing pursuant to a statute that expresses a clear intent to abrogate those requirements. Id. Thus, Ohio and federal law have diverged on the issue of whether a party may have standing to sue in the absence of an injury-in-fact. Id. However, the Court of Appeal found that even though Ohio case law precedents have, in some circumstances, found standing despite no allegation of concrete injury, Plaintiffs failed to cite any case in which an Ohio court has analyzed and found standing to exist on the basis of a federal statute despite the absence of an alleged injury-in-fact. Id. at *8. Accordingly, to the extent the "statutory standing" doctrine constitutes an exception to the traditional principles of standing in Ohio, the Court of Appeals declined to extend that exception to this circumstance involving the application of a federal statute. To find statutory standing in this case, the Court of Appeal stated that it would need to find that Congress intended to abrogate the Ohio common law requirements. Id. at *9. However, there was no indication that Congress intended the pertinent FCRA statute to supplant the traditional requirements of standing under Ohio state law. Further, the Court of Appeals opined that such a finding would be improper as it would permit Congress to affect the parameters of standing under Ohio law, even though it was well-settled that Ohio law determines standing in Ohio state law forums. Id. Finally, the Court of Appeals determined that permitting Congress to abrogate Ohio common law standing principles, even though Congress cannot abrogate essentially the same principles in federal courts, would constitute a significant anomaly. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals found that the trial court correctly determined that Plaintiffs lacked standing to sue Defendant for its alleged violations of FCRA procedural requirements.

Stewart, et al. v. Woods Cove,* 2017 Ohio App. LEXIS 4700 (Ohio. App. 8th Dist. Oct. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of landowners whose property tax delinquencies had been certified by the Treasurer of Cuyahoga County and then sold to Defendant Woods, filed a putative class action and sought relief in the form of a declaratory judgment, permanent injunction, writ of mandamus, and damages. Id. at *2. The trial court dismissed Plaintiff's claims pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. Id. at *7. On Plaintiffs appeal, the Ohio Court of Appeals reversed and remanded. Id. at *14. Plaintiffs argued that the trial court improperly determined that the claims were not ripe for adjudication because foreclosure actions had not yet been filed. The trial court reasoned that the constitutional arguments raised by Plaintiffs could be raised if a foreclosure case was filed, and it agreed with Defendants that Plaintiffs' claims were speculative and premature. The Court of Appeals ruled that when considering the allegations in the complaint as true and construing all reasonable inferences in favor of Plaintiffs, it did not appear that Plaintiffs could prove no set of facts that entitled them to the relief requested. Hence, the Court of Appeals held that the trial court erred in dismissing Plaintiff's claims because Plaintiffs made specific constitutional and statutory challenges to the tax certificate statute and tax certificate sale/purchase agreements, and claimed that they had been damaged by them. The Court of Appeals concluded that the trial court erred in granting Defendants' motions to dismiss in light of the liberal pleading standard that disfavored of motions to dismiss. Id. at *12. Plaintiff also asserted that the trial court erred because it failed to exclude evidence outside of the complaint and failed to provide notice to the parties that it was going to consider such evidence and essentially treated the motions to dismiss as motions for summary judgment. Id. at *10. The Court of Appeals agreed and opined that the trial court erred when, without notice to the parties, it effectively considered factual issues outside the pleadings and improperly determined that no foreclosure actions had been brought against the properties at issue. Id. at *13. In its ruling on the motions to dismiss, the trial court based its determination of the ripeness of Plaintiffs' claims on the factual issue of whether foreclosure actions had been brought against the property owners. The Court of Appeals found that the trial court committed reversible error when it considered factual issues outside the pleadings and improperly determined that no foreclosure actions had been brought against the properties. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals reversed and remanded.

Truel, et al. v. A. Aguirre LLC,* 2017 Okla. LEXIS 108 (Okla. Dec. 19, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of alcoholic beverage consumers, filed complaints alleging that Defendants – a group of restaurants and hospitality businesses – violated § 576(B)(2) of the Oklahoma Beverage Act, which imposed a 13.5% sales tax on mixed alcoholic beverages. Plaintiffs contended that Defendants failed to combine the retail sale price with the tax in their advertised prices and overcharged Plaintiffs by 13.5%. Plaintiffs sought a declaratory judgment that Defendants violated § 576(B)(2). The trial court ruled that § 576(B)(2) required Defendants to include the price of the drink and the 13.5% tax in the advertised prices of mixed beverages. Id. at *5. The trial court thereafter issued an order certifying its rulings on the consolidated cases for immediate interlocutory appeal. On Defendants' interlocutory appeal, the Supreme Court of Oklahoma reversed, remanded, and ordered the trial court to dismiss Plaintiffs' complaints. The Supreme Court held that § 576(B)(2) was solely a tax statute and was not intended to protect consumers from having a tax listed separately from the price of the drink. Id. at 9. The Supreme Court reasoned that there was nothing in the statute that implied that the statute was written for the protection of consumers and under Plaintiffs' theory all retailers would be required to include sales taxes in advertised prices of products. Accordingly, the Supreme Court remanded and ordered the trial court to dismiss Plaintiffs' complaints.

Cardinale, et al. v. R.E. Gas Dev., LLC,* 154 A.3d 1275 (Pa. Super. Ct. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of landowners, filed a putative class action against Defendant alleging that Defendant breached contracts with Plaintiffs. Defendant delivered its standard oil and gas lease to Plaintiffs. All of the standard leases were identical with the exception of the lessors' identities and property identifications, and the amount of pre-paid rental or bonus that was to be paid within 60 days of receipt of the signed lease, subject to Defendant's "inspection, approval of the surface, geology and title" of the land. Id. at 1277. Plaintiffs signed and returned the executed agreements. Plaintiffs allege that Defendant breached the contracts because after the 60 days expired, Defendant rejected the lease agreements and refused to pay Plaintiffs the bonuses or rents due. The trial court denied Plaintiffs' motion to certify a class on the grounds that common questions of law or fact did not predominate over individual questions. The trial court reasoned that the finder of fact would have to analyze each property in question and the circumstances on refusal to pay the bonus in order to determine whether Defendant breached the contracts. On appeal, the Pennsylvania Superior Court ruled that the trial court abused its discretion and vacated the order denying class certification. The Superior Court held that the commonality requirement was satisfied because the common claim of the class was that Defendant "failed to pay the class members the stated 'bonus' within the specified time period and failed to reject the parties' agreement within the allowable deadline." Id. at 1289. The Court noted that Plaintiffs presented evidence that Defendant rejected 97% of the leases after the 60 day period had expired, so for the vast majority of the class, the fact-finder would not have to consider the title, surface, the trial Court's order or geology of the Plaintiffs' property. Accordingly, the Superior Court vacated and remanded.

Dittman, et al. v. UPMC,* 2017 Pa. Super. LEXIS 13 (Pa. Super. Ct. Jan. 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendants failed in their duty to protect their private, highly sensitive, confidential, and personal information such as names, birthdays, social security numbers, and confidential tax information ("confidential personal information"). Plaintiffs contended that their confidential personal information was stolen from Defendants' computer systems, and that a duty of care should be imposed on Defendants to protect the confidential information of its employees. Id. at *2. The trial court sustained Defendants' objections, and dismissed Plaintiffs' complaint. On appeal, the Pennsylvania Superior Court affirmed the trial court's decision. Plaintiffs argued that the trial court erred in finding that Defendant did not owe a duty of reasonable care in its collection and storage of the employees' information and data. Id. at *6. The Superior Court stated that employees and consumers alike derived substantial benefits from efficiencies resulting from the transfer and storage of electronic data. Id. at *7. The Superior Court opined that although breaches of electronically-stored data were a potential risk, this generalized risk does not outweigh the social utility of maintaining electronically-stored information. Id. at *9. The Superior Court held that it was unnecessary to require employers to incur potentially significant costs to increase security measures when there was no true way to prevent data breaches altogether. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs further claimed that the trial court erred when it dismissed their breach of contract claim after finding no implied contract existed between the parties. Specifically, the trial court found that Defendants did not agree to enter into an implied contract to protect Plaintiffs' personal information. The Superior Court agreed, and found that Plaintiffs did not give their information to Defendants for the consideration of its safe-keeping, but instead for employment purposes. Id. at *15. Thus, the Superior Court determined that no consideration supported an implied contract between the parties. Accordingly, the Superior Court held that the trial court did not err in dismissing Plaintiffs' breach of contract claim. The Superior Court therefore upheld the trial court's order dismissing Plaintiffs' complaint.

Hites, et al. v. Pennsylvania Interscholastic Athletic Association,* 2017 Pa. Commw. Unpub. LEXIS 784 (Pa. Cmmw. Oct. 10, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of student athletes, filed a putative class action alleging that Defendant was negligent for failure to adequately implement baseline testing for concussions and educate schools regarding proper concussion protocols. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs sought damages from concussion-related injuries sustained during participation in high school sports that Defendant regulated. Defendant objected on the basis that Plaintiffs' complaint was legally insufficient. The trial court overruled Defendant's preliminary objections as to the negligence count. Id. at *20. On Defendant's interlocutory appeal, the Commonwealth Court of Pennsylvania affirmed. Id. at *2. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff failed to state a claim for which relief could be granted because Plaintiffs: (i) alleged claims that were non-justiciable because of the Safety in Youth Sports Act ("SYSA"); (ii) were barred from recovery because of the inherent risk/no duty rule; (iii) were unable to establish that Defendant owed any duty to Plaintiffs as a matter of public policy; and (iv) failed to plead facts to establish causation. Id. at *20. Defendant asserted that because of the duties imposed by SYSA, Plaintiffs' negligence claims involved non-justiciable issues that were reserved for the legislature. Id. at *46. Defendant argued that the trial court must not usurp the legislature's policy and authority by imposing duties clearly not required by statute. Id. The Commonwealth Court rejected Defendant's argument, noting that the SYSA did not mention Defendant and also provided that the SYSA shall not be construed to limit civil liability on the part of any school entity. Id. at *54. The Commonwealth Court also ruled that the trial court properly concluded that dismissal of Plaintiffs' negligence claims based upon the SYSA would be premature at this stage. Id. at *55-56. Second, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' negligence claims must be dismissed pursuant to the "inherent risk/no duty rule" because the alleged injuries were inherent to the activities in which they occurred. Id. at *58. The Commonwealth Court disagreed. Id. at *64. The inherent risk/no duty rule provides that a Defendant owes no duty of care regarding risks that are common, frequent and inherent in an activity. However, Plaintiffs' claims did not relate to the specific concussions incurred, but rather focused on the consequences suffered because of Defendant's alleged pre-concussion and post-concussion negligent conduct. Id. at *65. Third, Defendant argued that the duties that Plaintiffs alleged could not be imposed on Defendant as a matter of public policy. Id. at *68. Defendant maintained that its relationship to Plaintiffs was significantly more remote than that of families, coaches, trainers, doctors, principals, and the school, and there was greater social utility achieved by having those more directly involved and qualified, ultimately responsible. Id. at *74. Furthermore, Defendant argued that imposing such a duty went against the legislative intent of the SYSA. Id. Defendant asserted that there were other more appropriate means in place to protect athletes and from which to seek recovery for failures to protect athletes. The Commonwealth Court rejected Defendant's position, ruling that it could not be established, at this stage, that as a matter of public policy the duties Plaintiffs alleged may not be imposed on Defendant. Id. at *85. Finally, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs failed to adequately plead proximate cause. The Court ruled that the complaint supported the trial court's determination that Plaintiffs pled sufficient facts to allege that Defendant's pre-concussion and post-concussion acts or omissions were a substantial factor in bringing about the harm that Plaintiffs allegedly suffered. Id. at *93. Accordingly, the Commonwealth Court of Pennsylvania affirmed the decision of the trial court. Id.

Kurach, et al. v. Truck Exchange,* 2017 Phila. Ct. Com. Pl. LEXIS 150 (Pa. Common Pleas Ct. April 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of homeowner's insurance policy owners, filed putative class actions involving identical policies issued by Defendant. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs each sustained homeowner damage that Defendant agreed was reasonably likely to require the services of a general contractor. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs did not carry out the repairs and the amount that Defendant paid did not include the costs of general contractor overhead and profit. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's insurance policies wrongfully excluded general contractor costs from the true meaning and value of "replacement cost," and by excluding general contractor costs from its definition of actual cash value, this ended up meaning replacement cost, minus depreciation and general contractor costs. Plaintiffs argued that this formulation was contrary to Pennsylvania insurance law. The policies provided that actual cash value settlements would not include estimated general contractor fees or charges unless the insured incurred and paid the fees and charges, but only if the law of the insured's state did not require that general contractor fees and charges be paid with the actual cash value settlement. Id. at *11. The Court agreed with Plaintiffs that Pennsylvania law required estimated general contractor overhead and profit to be included in actual cash value payments when the use of a general contractor was reasonably likely to be necessary to repair damage to a home. Id. at *21. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motions for summary judgment on their class claims. Id.

Prince Law Offices, P.C., et al. v. McCausland, Keen & Buckman*, 2017 Pa. Super. Unpub. LEXIS 4617 (Pa. Super. Ct. Dec. 18, 2017). Plaintiff, a law firm, hired Defendants to assist in a class action lawsuit against the City of Philadelphia through an independent contractor fee sharing agreement that included terms of compensation and a provision requiring that disputes be resolved by arbitration in accordance with the rules of the American Arbitration Association. Id. at *1. After the underlying lawsuit was settled, a dispute arose between the parties over the proper allocation of legal fees as a result of the respective law firms' efforts in prosecuting the class action. Id. at *2. The dispute was submitted to arbitration, and the arbitrator entered an award to Defendants that included a portion of the requested attorneys' fees and costs, administrative fees, and arbitrator compensation. Plaintiff filed a petition to vacate the arbitration award and Defendant filed a cross-petition to confirm the arbitration award. The trial court denied the petition to vacate arbitration award and granted the petition to confirm arbitration award. On appeal, the Pennsylvania Superior Court affirmed. The Superior Court explained that "arbitrators are the final judges of both law and fact, and an arbitration award is not subject to reversal for a mistake of either." Id. at *4. Therefore, "the award of an arbitrator is binding and may not be vacated or modified unless it is clearly shown that a party was denied a hearing or that fraud, misconduct, corruption or other irregularity caused the rendition of an unjust, inequitable or unconscionable award." Id. Plaintiff asserted that the arbitrator did not explain the basis of his determination in awarding compensation, attorneys' fees, and costs to Defendants. The Superior Court rejected this argument on the basis that the rules of the AAA provide that "the arbitrator need not render a reasoned award unless the parties request such an award in writing prior to appointment of the arbitrator or unless the arbitrator determines that a reasoned award is appropriate." Id. at *5. Thus, there was no requirement for the arbitrator to provide a reasoned award because the parties had agreed to a standard award plus a calculation of hours and rates. Id. Plaintiff also asserted that the arbitrator did not include calculations in the award to enable the parties to determine whether the award was accurate. The Superior Court determined that the arbitrator's partial final award clearly contained several pages of calculations of each party's billable hours, multiplied by the party's hourly rate, as well as applying a credit for sums already paid. Id. at *7. Plaintiff's final contention was that the arbitrator awarded attorneys' fees to Defendants when they were not successful or justified in their arbitration claim. Id. The Superior Court found that parties' agreement contained no provision requiring total victory. The Superior Court concluded that it could discern no error or abuse of discretion in the trial court's determination and none of Plaintiff's objections identified a fundamental flaw in the process that deprived Plaintiff of a fair hearing. Accordingly, the Superior Court affirmed the trial court's ruling.

United Union of Roofers, Waterproofers, & Allied Workers, Local Union No. 37, et al. v. North Allegheny School District,* 2017 Pa. Commw. Unpub. LEXIS 271 (Pa. Commw. April 18, 2017). Defendant, a school district, appealed an order of the trial court granting a preliminary injunction to Plaintiff, a union, enjoining Defendant from conducting background checks mandated by the Public School Code of 1991 and the Child Protective Services Law on Union members assigned to roofing projects on Defendant's property because they did not show that the workers will have "direct contact with children." Id. at *1. Defendant argued that the trial court erred in granting the preliminary injunction because Plaintiff failed to establish any of the legal prerequisites for injunctive relief. The Pennsylvania Commonwealth Court agreed, and reversed the trial court's ruling. Pursuant to the project manual between Fox Chapel Area School District and the Pennsylvania Roofing Co., each employee of Pennsylvania Roofing Co. was required to obtain criminal background checks as required by § 111 of the School Code, and § 6344 of the Child Protective Services Law prior to beginning projects. As a result of the background checks, 14 Union members were denied clearance to work on roofing projects. Id. at *3. Plaintiff sought a declaratory judgment that: (i) Defendant's members were exempt from the requirements of § 111 of the School Code and § 6344 of the Child Protective Services Law; (ii) the Criminal History Record Information Act prohibited school districts from refusing to employ Union's members based on criminal background checks; and (iii) Defendant's exclusion of Plaintiff's members was a violation of due process. Id. at *4. Plaintiff also sought a preliminary injunction to enjoin Defendant from disqualifying Plaintiff's members from projects based on criminal background checks. Plaintiff alleged that its members were exempt from background checks under Section 111(a.1) of the School Code, 24 P.S. § 1-111(a.1), and Section 6344(a.1) of the Child Protective Services Law, because they did not have "direct contact with children." Id. at *6. The trial court granted a preliminary injunction that: (i) allowed previously disqualified Union members access to Defendant's worksites; and (ii) prohibited Defendant from doing background checks on Union members unless the position applied for involved direct contact with children. In doing so, the trial court largely focused on the level of interaction between Plaintiff's members and children at Defendant's project sites and determined that Plaintiff was likely to succeed on the merits of its declaratory judgment action because its members did not have direct contact with children. Id. at *11. The Commonwealth Court disagreed, and found that by enjoining Defendant from performing the standard background checks, the trial court disturbed the status quo. The Commonwealth Court explained that the aim of a preliminary injunction is to preserve the status quo as it existed before the acts complained of, while a trial court decides on the merits of permanent injunctive or declaratory relief. Id. at *12. The Commonwealth Court stated that since at least 2011. Defendant had been doing background checks on employees of independent contractors required by § 111 of the School Code without ascertaining whether those employees had direct contact with children. Id. at *15-16. Therefore, requiring Defendant "to show a causal connection between any criminal offenses and the position for which employees are to work to justify an exclusion" did not preserve the status quo. Id. at *16. Instead, the injunction instituted a new status quo by revising Defendant's longstanding background check practices. Accordingly, the Commonwealth Court reversed the trial court's ruling granting the preliminary injunction.

Kamel, et al. v. Advocare International L.P.*, 2017 Tex. App. LEXIS 2635 (Tex. App. 5th Dist. Mar. 28, 2017). Plaintiff, a former independent distributer, his attorney, and the attorney's law firm, appealed the trial court's finding that Plaintiffs brought baseless claims against Defendant and ordered them to pay Defendant $3,500 in attorneys' fees as a sanction. Id. at *1. On appeal, the Texas Court of Appeals upheld the trial court's order. Defendant sells nutrition and other health-related products exclusively through independent distributors. Plaintiff Kamel became a distributor with Defendant in March 2013. In late 2013, Defendant blocked Kamel's purchase of 800 boxes of gingerbread bars due to what it contended was suspicious activity and ultimately suspended Kamel's account. In December 2013, Kamel accused another distributor, Aly Gwin, of sending him a text message that made disparaging remarks about his race and national origin. Id. at *2. Gwin informed Defendant about Kamel's accusations and denied sending the text message, and Defendant investigated the matter and found no evidence of the alleged message. The investigation revealed that Gwin's phone did not contain or send the alleged text message. Defendant advised about the results of the examination of Gwin's phone, and Kamel responded that the "results were fabricated" and he had "100% proof that those texts were sent from her number." Id. Ultimately, Kamel refused to assist with Defendant's investigation and said his phone was broken while on vacation. Defendant concluded that Kamel sent the text message to himself and lied about it, and it terminated his distributorship agreement in January 2014. Id. at *3. Subsequently, Defendant suspended the distributorship agreements of 55 distributors due to concerns that the distributors had violated Defendant's policies and procedures by stockpiling products and selling them on eBay. Id. Defendant also filed a petition for pre-suit discovery seeking to depose another distributor and to require him to produce certain documents. Kamel and the other distributor then filed a counter-petition in the same cause number as the petition for pre-suit discovery purporting to represent "[a]ll persons or entities who are Texas citizens and from January 31, 2014 to the present had their distributorships suspended or terminated by AdvoCare for alleged excessive purchases." Id. at *3-4. The class action petition alleged that Defendant breached its contract in connection with Kamel's purchase of the gingerbread bars, "promoted racism" against "distributors with an Egyptian heritage," and "supported by inaction" the racist text message allegedly sent to Kamel by Gwin. Id. at *4. Defendant moved for sanctions against Plaintiffs, contending the allegations were groundless. The trial court held an evidentiary hearing, at which Kamel stated that he did not have "100% proof" of the text message prior to filing the counter-petition. Id. at *5-6. Defense counsel stated that Defendant spent $5,000 on filing the motion for sanctions. The trial court granted Defendant's motion for sanctions in the amount of $3,500. Id. at *6. On appeal, Plaintiff raised three issues, including: (i) that the sanctions order was defective because it did not state with sufficient particularity the reason for the sanction; (ii) that there was insufficient evidence to support a finding of sanctionable conduct; and (iii) that there was no evidence to support the amount of the sanction. Id. at *10-11. As to the first issue, the Texas Court of Appeals found that although Plaintiff filed a motion for new trial in which he argued that the sanctions order was not supported by sufficient evidence, he did not argue that the sanctions order failed to comply with specificity rules. As a result, the Court of Appeals concluded that the issue was not preserved for appellate review. As to whether there was insufficient evidence to support the sanctions order, the Court of Appeals held that the trial court had before it evidence of Defendant's investigation showing Gwin did not send the text message from her phone, Kamel's refusal to cooperate with the investigation, and Kamel's admission that he did not have 100% proof Gwin sent the text message at the time he made that statement. Id. at *11. Based on the evidence, the Court of Appeals found it reasonable that the trial court could have concluded that the allegations of racism against Defendant did not have evidentiary support and were not likely to have evidentiary support after a reasonable opportunity for further investigation and discovery. Id. Finally, as to Plaintiff's argument that "the testimony was too indefinite and insufficient to support the award" of sanctions, the Court of Appeals determined that Defendant presented evidence of $5,000 in attorneys' fees incurred as a result of their sanctionable conduct. The Court of Appeals therefore determined that the trial court's assessment of $3,500 in sanctions was not based on testimony too indefinite or insufficient to support an award. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals upheld the trial court's order granting sanctions.

Redflex Traffic Systems v. Watson, et al.,* 2017 Tex. App. LEXIS 9391 (Tex. App. 2d Dist. Oct. 5, 2017). Plaintiff filed a putative class action on behalf of a group of people who paid a fine under a red-light camera ordinance alleging common law misrepresentation and violations of state and federal law. Id. at *2, 3. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss under the Texas Citizens Protection Act ("TCPA") asserting that Plaintiff's claims against it were in response to the notice of violations it mailed to him and violated his right to exercise free speech and its right to petition. Id. at *10. Plaintiff argued that the TCPA did not apply to his claims because the notice of violation was neither an exercise of the right to free speech nor the right to petition and constituted commercial speech, which was not protected by the TCPA. Id. at *11. The trial court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss and did not give a basis for its ruling. Id. On Defendant's appeal, the Texas Court of Appeals ruled that Plaintiff's claims were exempt from application of the TCPA under the plain language of its commercial-speech exemption. Id. at *15. Therefore, the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's order denying Defendant's motion to dismiss.

(xxii) Washington

Romney, et al. v. Franciscan Medical Group,* 399 P.3d 1220 (Wash. App. Feb. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of medical professionals, filed a putative class action alleging wage violations. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to the parties' agreements. The trial court granted the motion and Plaintiff appealed in Romney v. Franciscan Medical Group, 349 P.3d 32 (2015), asserting that the arbitration agreement was unconscionable. Id. at *1. The Washington Court of Appeals ruled that the agreement was not unconscionable and affirmed the trial court's decision. Id. On remand, the trial court compelled individual arbitration, rather than class arbitration. Id. On Plaintiff's second appeal, the Court of Appeals reversed and remanded. Plaintiff argued that the trial court erred by determining whether the arbitration agreement permitted class arbitration and asserted that this was an issue for the arbitrator to decide. The Court of Appeals disagreed and concluded that this was a threshold issue of arbitrability and was for the trial court to decide. Id. at *4. The Court of Appeals rejected Plaintiff's argument that Washington law required that an arbitrator decide the issue because it was covered by the substantive scope of the arbitration agreement. While the agreement incorporated the American Arbitration Association ("AAA") rules, the AAA rules only applied once a dispute is submitted to arbitration and not when it is pending before the trial court. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals concluded that the trial court did not err in determining whether the agreement permitted class arbitration. Id. Plaintiff also argued that the agreements permitted class arbitration because it was implied by the failure of the parties to exclude it from the agreements. Id. at *9. The Court of Appeals disagreed, and ruled that the agreements did not permit class arbitration because they were silent on the issue and consent to commit to class arbitration could not be inferred from silence. Id. As such, Plaintiff failed to show that Defendant consented to class arbitration. Id. at *13. However, the Court of Appeals agreed that Defendant waived its contractual right to compel individual arbitration. Id. The Court of Appeals ruled that Defendant's motion to compel individual arbitration, rather than class arbitration of Plaintiff's claims, was improperly granted because Defendant waived its right to compel individual arbitration by its inconsistent conduct in the trial court and during the first appeal, and because its delay in asserting the right was prejudicial to Plaintiff. The Court of Appeals pointed to the fact that Defendant did not include any objections to class arbitration in its original motion to compel arbitration and did not mention individual arbitration. Id. at *15. Further, when discovery was addressed while the first appeal was pending, Defendant never hinted that it believed that class arbitration was unavailable under the arbitration agreements. Id. at *16. Instead, Defendant referred repeatedly to the putative class and opposed class discovery on the ground that a class had not been certified. Id. The Court of Appeals reasoned that Plaintiff suffered prejudice in the form of delay and litigation costs. Id. at *20. There was an approximately two-year delay between when Plaintiff brought suit and when Defendant first asserted its right to individual arbitration. As such, the Court of Appeals ruled that Defendant waived its right to object to the putative class proceeding to arbitration, and it reversed and remanded for the trial court to enter an order sending the putative class to a single arbitrator. Id. at *21.

Washington Public Employees Association, et al. v. Washington Center For Childhood Deafness & Hearing Loss,* Case No. 49224-5-II (Wash. App. Oct. 31, 2017). Several unions representing state employees appealed the trial court's order denying their motion for a permanent injunction preventing the state agencies from disclosing information about their employees in response to a public records request by the Freedom Foundation. Id. at 3. On appeal, the Washington Court of Appeals found that the trial court erred by denying the unions' motion for a permanent injunction preventing the release of state employees' names associated with their birthdates. The Court of Appeals explained that for a person named in a record to obtain an injunction preventing disclosure of public records under the Washington Public Records Act ("PRA"), the person must show: (i) the record in question specifically pertains to that person; (ii) an exemption applies; (iii) the disclosure would not be in the public interest; and (iv) disclosure would substantially and irreparably harm that party or a vital government function. Id. at 6. The Court of Appeals found that the purpose of the PRA was not served by the public disclosure of the information sought. The Court of Appeals thus held that although the PRA may allow the disclosure of the information, it does not justify the intrusion into the state employees' constitutionally protected expectation of privacy. Id. at 11. Moreover, the Court of Appeals determined that the public disclosure of birthdates would substantially and irreparably harm the state employees because the information would then be available to anyone, which would invade their constitutionally protected expectation of privacy, and expose them to on-going risk of identity theft and other potential personal harm. Id. at 12. The Court of Appeals found that the unions also had met their burden to satisfy the general requirements of a permanent injunction because: (i) the employees had a clear and equitable right because they have a constitutionally protected expectation of privacy; (ii) there was a well-grounded fear of immediate invasion of that right; and (iii) public disclosure of the information would result in actual and substantial injury. Id. at 12. Accordingly, the Court of Appeals reversed the trial court's order denying the permanent injunction and remanded for further proceedings.

VIII. Rulings On The Class Action Fairness Act

President Bush signed the Class Action Fairness Act ("CAFA") into law on February 18, 2005. The law facilitates removal of class actions from state court to federal court. In addition, it regulates the selection of class counsel, tightens control of attorneys' fees awarded to class counsel, toughens pleading standards, reduces the ability of class counsel to dictate the choice of forum, facilitates interlocutory appeals of class certification rulings, and regulates settlements of class actions. In large part, the CAFA has significantly altered forum-selection and claim-selection strategies of plaintiffs' lawyers in litigating class actions.

The CAFA continues to play a large role in many class actions filed against employers. The CAFA responded to the abuses of state court judges in certifying class action lawsuits involving plaintiffs who filed their claims in states with a reputation for a lack of fairness toward out-of-state defendants. The CAFA modifies the rules for federal court jurisdiction over class actions based on the diversity of citizenship test. Before the CAFA, all named plaintiffs in a class action had to be citizens of states differing from those of all defendants, a situation that typically would not be met in class actions seeking nationwide classes. In addition, there was a minimum monetary threshold of $75,000 to be met by every plaintiff in the case.

With the advent of the CAFA, the rules for diversity jurisdiction have eased, though for class actions only, so that diversity of the parties can be achieved if any class member is a citizen of a different state from any defendant and if the aggregated, not individual, amount-in-controversy for all class members is at least $5 million, and the class involves more than 100 people. As a result, the CAFA relaxes the historic strict standard for diversity jurisdiction to allow defendants to remove what were formerly "non-diverse" state law-based class actions.

The CAFA also has prompted plaintiffs' class action lawyers to file "single-state" class actions in state court to avoid removal under the CAFA. For example, it is increasingly more common for plaintiffs to sue on behalf of "all employees in California" in an effort to plead around the CAFA's provisions triggering federal jurisdiction. Likewise, plaintiffs' class action lawyers are also filing multiple single-state class actions in a staggered fashion to avoid the CAFA.

The CAFA's impact in 2017 was significant. More class actions are being filed in federal courts, and more intrastate class actions are being heard in federal courts through the removal mechanisms under the CAFA. Because the law's provisions are designed to prevent plaintiffs' counsel from keeping class actions in state court that are more appropriately litigated in federal court, the CAFA forecloses the pleading tactic of requesting damages of less than $75,000 per class member (the jurisdictional limit for a federal court to hear a claim involving plaintiffs and defendants of different states) to stymie a defendant from removing the lawsuit to federal court. Over the last year, employers repeatedly invoked the statute to remove class actions filed in state court to federal court. In turn, federal courts addressed several novel issues arising under the CAFA.

The CAFA has had profound effects on considerations underlying case strategy and the structuring of class actions. In this context, the CAFA's impact on workplace class actions is both varied and evolving. Class actions and collective actions under Title VII, the ADEA, the FLSA, and ERISA typically are brought in federal court. The CAFA may have limited impact on strategic decisions in those cases relative to choice of venue in a federal court or state court. Class actions in state law-based wage & hour litigation are another matter. The plaintiffs' bar and defense bar alike continue to confront novel CAFA issues in these types of cases, for the fight over venue is often a key driver of exposure and risk. On the one hand, employers sued in state law wage & hour class actions are increasingly confronted by plaintiffs' lawyers seeking to avoid removal to federal court by various stratagems, including prayers for relief of less than $5 million, the filing of multiple "baby" class claims on behalf of less than 100 plaintiffs, and limiting the scope of the class to residents of one state. On the other hand, defense counsel seeking (often successfully) to dismiss state law claims pursued by plaintiffs with FLSA claims in "hybrid" wage & hour class actions in federal court also argue that judges should not exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the state law claims; in turn, federal courts are increasingly confronted with questions of whether original jurisdiction exists under the CAFA over such hybrid state law claims, and employers also may face a two-front litigation war – one in federal court and the other in state court – depending on resolution of those CAFA issues. These litigation issues are likely to shape class action practice and defense strategy for the foreseeable future.

More than any other jurisdiction, the Ninth Circuit has confronted – and ruled on – more issues under the CAFA than any other federal circuit. This is primarily the result of the high volume of class action litigation in California state courts, and the corresponding removal of those lawsuits to federal courts in California. In this respect, the Ninth Circuit's CAFA jurisprudence has had a significant impact on other circuits, as issues already decided in the Ninth Circuit are confronted by courts in other areas of the country.

In 2017, federal courts decided many CAFA-related cases. This Chapter does not canvas them all, but instead focuses on major appellate cases and a number of noteworthy district court rulings – in both employment and non-employment cases – that interpreted the CAFA.

(i) First Circuit

Doran, et al. v. J.P. Noonan Transportation, Inc.,* 853 F.3d 66 (1st Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of truck drivers, filed a putative class action in state court, raising a variety of statutory and common law claims. Defendants removed the matter to District Court pursuant to the CAFA. The District Court subsequently granted Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to all of Plaintiffs' statutory claims and all but one of Plaintiffs' common law claims. Shortly thereafter, the District Court issued an order in which it determined that "the jurisdictional amount is measured as of the time of removal, and that '[e]vents subsequent to removal that reduce the amount-in-controversy do not divest [the District Court] of CAFA jurisdiction.'" Id. at 68. Accordingly, the District Court concluded that it continued to retain "original jurisdiction over this action" even though its grant of partial summary judgment reduced the amount-in-controversy below $5 million. Id. Following a trial on the named Plaintiff's remaining common law claim, a jury ruled in favor of Defendant. The District Court then stated that the case should be remanded to state court. Id. Plaintiffs agreed with the District Court's suggestion of a remand, because "even though the [District] Court had original jurisdiction at the time the case was removed," the summary judgment ruling divested it of "original jurisdiction." Id. The District Court then remanded the case to state court. Plaintiffs appealed the District Court's order granting Defendants' motion for summary judgment issued before the case was remanded to state court. Id. at 69. The First Circuit noted that Plaintiffs' notice of appeal did not mention or even hint at any attempt to appeal the order. The First Circuit explained that Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure provide that a notice of appeal "must . . . designate the judgment, order or part thereof being appealed." Id. The First Circuit found that it had no basis to review an order not so designated. Plaintiffs' brief explained the order of remand designated in his notice as a "final judgment." Id. Although Plaintiff did not say so, the First Circuit opined that it could infer from Plaintiffs' description that his appeal was an effort to invoke the practice of reading a notice of appeal from the "final judgment" as effectively designating all interlocutory rulings that "merge in the judgment." Id. However, the First Circuit noted that if the order of remand is a final judgment, then it is a final judgment to which Plaintiffs affirmatively acquiesced. The First Circuit stated that if a party consents to a final judgment in order to appeal prior orders leading up to that judgment, the party may appeal those orders so long as it reserves the right to do so. Id. While an "unequivocal" statement of an intent to appeal may serve as sufficient evidence of such a reservation, the First Circuit held that Plaintiffs never voiced any such intention. Id. The First Circuit stated that even if it were to treat the remand order as the equivalent of a "final judgment," then it would be a judgment to which Plaintiffs consented without clearly reserving the right to appeal any ruling that may have merged into that judgment. Id. The First Circuit therefore dismissed Plaintiffs' appeal, without affirming or reversing the District Court's summary judgment ruling.

(ii) Second Circuit

Boyd, et al. v. NYCTL 1996-1 Trust*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 10598 (2d Cir. June 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of residents of New York City, claimed that the way New York City collected debts arising from unpaid water bills violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA") and various state laws. The District Court dismissed the FDCPA claim on summary judgment (Boyd I) and declined to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the state law claims. Plaintiffs next sued a nearly identical group of Defendants ("Boyd II") asserting RICO and state law claims based on the same facts. Plaintiffs asserted jurisdiction both on the basis of their federal RICO claim and the CAFA. The District Court dismissed all their claims pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) on res judicata grounds. Plaintiffs appealed dismissal of the state law claims. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The Second Circuit explained that when there has been a "final judgment on the merits," res judicata prevents a Plaintiff in the initial case from bringing a second lawsuit against the same Defendants arising from the same "transaction, or series of connected transactions" in order to "relitigate issues that were or could have been raised" in the first case. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs did not dispute that the parties in both Boyd cases were the same, or that the claims in both arose from the same set of transactions. Id. Plaintiffs argued that the decision in Boyd I was not a final judgment because dismissal was without prejudice, that Defendants waived their right to argue res judicata, and that the issue of federal jurisdiction under the CAFA could not have been raised in Boyd I. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs argued that Defendants waived their res judicata defense by asking the District Court in Boyd I to dismiss the state law claims for lack of jurisdiction. Id. The Second Circuit opined that it may be that res judicata generally does not apply when Defendants acquiesce to the splitting of claims, but Defendants' motion to dismiss in Boyd I did not constitute acquiescence or waiver. Id. The Second Circuit found that Defendants took the position that Plaintiffs could try to bring their claims in state court, not that they could try again in the District Court. Id. Finally, Plaintiffs argued that they could not have raised CAFA jurisdiction in Boyd I because there was no "reasonable probability" that they could claim at least $5 million in damages, as required by the CAFA. Id. at *4. The Second Circuit disagreed, finding that Plaintiffs' initial complaint in Boyd I alleged that named class members were overcharged by thousands of dollars, that there were thousands of other class members, and that the claims of named Plaintiffs were typical of the claims of the other class members. Id. Accordingly, the Second Circuit held that there was a "reasonable probability" that Plaintiffs' damages totaled at least $5 million, and Plaintiffs could have invoked jurisdiction under the CAFA in Boyd I. Id. Accordingly, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling dismissing Plaintiffs' claims.

Ramirez, et al. v. Oscar De La Renta,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 72781 (S.D.N.Y. May 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of unpaid interns, filed a putative class action against Defendant alleging wage & hour violations of the New York Labor Law. Id. at *2. Defendant removed pursuant to the CAFA and Plaintiff moved to remand. Id. at *3. At the outset, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion, rejecting her argument that Defendant's removal, more than two years after the complaint was filed, was untimely. The Court ruled that the Second Circuit's "bright line rule" for the CAFA's time-requirements was not triggered until Plaintiff served Defendant with a pleading or document from which the amount-in-controversy could be ascertained. Id. at *4. The Court rejected Plaintiff's argument that Defendant failed to apply a "reasonable amount of intelligence" by failing to investigate or review its records to determine the number of interns in the proposed class (approximately 600), as Defendant had no duty to investigate whether the case was removable. Id. at *7. The Court ruled that Defendant had no obligation to look beyond pleadings and other papers from Plaintiff to ascertain removability. Id. at *8. Similarly, the Court rejected Plaintiff's argument that Defendant should have ascertained removability based upon Plaintiff's discovery requests, noting again that it was Plaintiff's duty to provide such information. Id. at *9. The Court also rejected Plaintiff's argument that Defendant should have investigated the amount-in-controversy earlier in litigation, as this ran contrary to the policy of the CAFA to encourage Plaintiffs to estimate damages early in litigation. Id. at *11. The Court ruled that Defendant established the CAFA's jurisdictional minimum of $5 million. Id. The Court rejected Plaintiff's argument that remand was proper under the local controversy and home-state exceptions, as Plaintiff failed to present any evidence that more than two-thirds of the putative class members were citizens of New York. Id. at *21. The Court also rejected Plaintiff's argument that the interest of justice exception applied and warranted remand, as Plaintiff had not established the threshold requirement that one-third of the class were citizens of New York. Id. at *24. The Court ruled that the national interests surrounding the use of unpaid interns in international businesses and the potentially national composition of the proposed class weighed heavily against remand. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to remand.

(iii) Third Circuit

Archavage, et al. v. Professional Account Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 46348 (M.D. Pa. Mar. 29, 2017). Plaintiff brought an action in state court asserting Pennsylvania claims for unfair and deceptive debt collection activities on behalf of himself and other persons similarly-situated under: (i) the Fair Credit Extension Uniformity Act (FCEUA"); (ii) common law fraud; (iii) the Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law; (iv) the Wiretapping and Electronic Surveillance Control Act; and (v) for unjust enrichment. Id. at *1. Defendant removed the action on the basis of subject-matter jurisdiction pursuant to the CAFA. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, which the Court granted. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant conducted collection activity for unpaid medical bills under the guise of being the original creditor, wrongfully cloaking itself with the identity of the creditor and referring to itself as the original creditor. Id. at *2. Plaintiff further alleged that in an attempt to ascertain information about the outstanding hospital bills, Defendant made a telephone call to his workers' compensation carrier's third-party administrator, unlawfully recorded the telephone call, failed to identify herself as a debt collector, falsely claimed that she was calling from the hospital, requested and received the name and contact information of the workers' compensation claims adjuster, and failed to secure the appropriate consent from Plaintiff. Id. at *3. Plaintiff's complaint explicitly stated that the total amount-in-controversy was $5 million or less, and that the members of the class were less than or equal to 100 in number. Id. at *4. Defendant contended that Plaintiff strategically fashioned the pleadings to avoid federal jurisdiction. Defendant maintained that it is a Tennessee corporation with a principal place of business located in Tennessee and that it had no physical presence in Pennsylvania. However, the Court opined that Plaintiff asserted that Defendant "either has its principal place of business in Pennsylvania, or does sufficient business in, or has sufficient minimum contacts with, or intentionally avails itself of the markets of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania through its business operation in Pennsylvania." Id. at *9. Since Defendant admitted in its removal brief that it "has a business office located at c/o Corporation Service Company, 2595 Interstate Drive, Suite 103, Harrisburg, PA 17110," the Court found that Defendant sufficiently proved that it was a corporation organized under the laws of Tennessee. Id. Further, since Defendant failed to submit any proof that Tennessee and not Pennsylvania was its principal place of business, it was left to decide the issue based on Plaintiff's uncontradicted allegation that Defendant's principal place of business was Pennsylvania. Id. at *10. The Court stated that under the circumstances, and resolving all doubts in favor of remand, it therefore found that Defendant failed to prove diversity of citizenship. Id. As to the amount-in-controversy, Defendant submitted that Plaintiff's settlement demand of $45,000 represented the value of Plaintiff's claims and all class members' claims. Id. at *12. However, the Court stated that Defendant previously offered a settlement amount of $8,000 on one occasion and $11,000 on another occasion. The Court found that the offers of settlement multiplied by 100 potential class members fell short of the threshold to invoke federal jurisdiction even if attorneys' fees and punitive damages were added. Therefore, the Court concluded that Defendant could not prove that removal on the basis of amount-in-controversy was warranted. Id. at *13. Finally, Defendant contended that Plaintiff's complaint alleged that Defendant violated the FCEUA, which mirrors the FDCPA, and therefore federal question jurisdiction should be invoked. However, the Court found that Defendant made no argument supporting federal question jurisdiction other than to conclude that the facts as pled by Plaintiff supported federal court jurisdiction based upon diversity of citizenship "and/or" a federal question. Id. at *14. The Court noted that Plaintiff's complaint did not request a ruling on the FDCPA or any other federal law. Accordingly, the Court held that Defendant failed to demonstrate that it had original jurisdiction, and thereby remanded the action.

Ellis, et al. v. Montgomery County,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12128 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of inmates, brought 0061 putative state law class action on behalf of themselves and all others whose arrest records and personal information were made available through the inmate locator maintained by Defendants Montgomery County and the Montgomery County Correctional Facility ("MCCF"), in violation of the Pennsylvania Criminal History Records Information Act ("CHRIA"). Defendants filed a motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, arguing both that Plaintiffs did not have standing to bring the lawsuit and that two mandatory exceptions to CAFA-based jurisdiction – the "home state" exception and the "local controversy" exception – required the Court to decline jurisdiction over this matter. Id. at *3. The Court granted Defendants' motion. The Court found that through discovery, Defendants demonstrated that more than 90% of inmates at the MCCF reported a Pennsylvania address when they were booked. Id. at *20. The Court stated that Defendants need not prove the citizenship of every member of the class with precision; rather, they must only show that was is more likely than not that more than two-thirds of Plaintiffs are citizens of Pennsylvania. Id. at *20-21. Given that there was no evidence to suggest that individuals booked at the MCCF were unusually transient or that the class members who were Pennsylvania residents migrated to other states after their release from the MCCF, the most likely conclusion from Defendants' sample was that the proportion of class members still residing in Pennsylvania after their release from the MCCF approximated the 90% share of the MCCF inmates who reported a Pennsylvania address at their booking. The Court stated that the proposed class consisted of persons booked in a local jail in Pennsylvania located in a suburban county that does not border another state, and Plaintiffs had not provided evidence that Pennsylvania had any major event to cause widespread displacement to other states during the relevant time period. Id. at *22. Considering the record as a whole, the Court found that Defendants showed by a preponderance of the evidence that more than two-thirds of the members of the proposed class were citizens of Pennsylvania. Since it was undisputed that the proposed class exceeded 100 members and that Defendants were citizens of Pennsylvania, the finding that more than two-thirds of the class members were also citizens of Pennsylvania thereby triggered CAFA's home state exception and required the Court to decline jurisdiction. Id. at *23. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Ramirez, et al. v. Vintage Pharmaceuticals,* 852 F.3d 324 (3d Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of 113 birth control users, filed an action in state court asserting that Defendant made packaging errors on pills. Plaintiffs were residents of 28 different states. Plaintiffs' complaint divided the 113 Plaintiffs into three categories based on their state residency. Plaintiffs collectively "requested a jury trial" and "an award of damages in such amount to be determined at trial." Id. at *327. Defendant removed the action as a "mass action" under the CAFA. Plaintiffs sought to remand on the ground that they had not presented a "mass action" within the purview of the CAFA. The District Court ultimately granted the motion to remand, concluding that the "CAFA precludes federal jurisdiction in this matter because Plaintiffs did not propose to try their claims jointly." Id. On appeal, the Third Circuit noted that "claims [that] have been consolidated or coordinated solely for pretrial proceedings" will not qualify as a mass action under the CAFA. Id. at *328. The Third Circuit found that for purposes of determining whether an action qualifies as a mass action, a proposal for a joint trial may be either explicit or implicit. The Third Circuit further explained that here, Plaintiffs gave three explicit indications in the complaint that they proposed a joint trial, including: (i) Plaintiffs "respectfully requested a jury trial" and never multiple or separate trials; (ii) Plaintiffs sought "an award of damages in such amount to be determined at trial;" and (iii) Plaintiffs warned Defendant that if they failed to enter an appearance and file their defenses and objections to Plaintiffs' claims, "a judgment" may be entered against them. Id. at *329. Further, the Third Circuit noted that Plaintiffs specified that their "claims arise out of a common set of operative facts" and that these facts are "common to all counts." Id. The Third Circuit determined that these instances of singular language, taken together, provide strong evidence of a proposal for a joint trial. The Third Circuit found that the structure of Plaintiffs' complaint also implied that they proposed to try all 113 of their claims jointly, and when a single complaint joins more than 100 separate claims involving common questions of law and fact, there is a presumption that those Plaintiffs have implicitly proposed a joint trial. Id. at *330. Finally, the Third Circuit noted that a clear and express statement in the complaint evincing an intent to limit coordination of claims to some sub-set of pre-trial proceedings would effectively shield this action from removal under the CAFA. However, the Third Circuit concluded that the language Plaintiffs ultimately chose to include in their complaint was far from precise or definitive enough to signal their intent to limit coordination to pre-trial matters. The Third Circuit held that Defendant met its burden to prove that Plaintiffs meant to try their claims jointly, and thereby reversed the District Court's order remanding the action.

Truglio, et al. v. Planet Fitness, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 133105 (D.N.J. Aug. 21, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action in state court alleging that Defendants' membership cancellation policy violated the New Jersey Truth-in-Consumer Contract Warranty and Notice Act ("TCCWNA") and various other state law statutes. Defendants removed the matter under the CAFA, asserting that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. The Court then granted Defendants' motion to dismiss all aspects of the claim but Plaintiff's TCCWNA claim. Plaintiff's TCCWNA claim would result in a $100 statutory remedy per class member. The Court subsequently ordered Defendants to show cause whether subject-matter jurisdiction still existed pursuant to the CAFA. Defendants submitted declarations from its legal manager and managing member and operator. Id. at *5. The first declaration stated that there were a total of 71,569 membership agreements for the three Defendant Plant Fitness gyms in New Jersey that were the same as or substantially similar to the agreement signed by Plaintiff in that they contained the same cancellation provision that Plaintiff alleged to be misleading and were signed during the putative class period between September 28, 2009, and September 28, 2015. Id. The second declaration stated that there were a total of 61,749 membership agreements for the nine Defendant Fit To Be Tied-operated New Jersey gyms that were the same or substantially similar to the agreement signed by Plaintiff in that they contained the same cancellation provision that Plaintiff contended to be misleading and were signed during the putative class period between September 28, 2009, and September 28, 2015. Id. at *6. The Court concluded that Defendants established, by a preponderance of the evidence, that they met the CAFA's amount-in-controversy requirement because, based on the combined membership number of 133,318 for the three gyms operated by Defendant Planet Fitness and nine gyms operated by FTBT in New Jersey, an award of $100 in statutory damages to each class member would result in an aggregate award of more than $13 million, thereby exceeding the CAFA's $5 million threshold. Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court held that it had subject-matter jurisdiction over the case pursuant to the CAFA.

Watson, et al. v. Prestige Delivery Systems, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21665 (W.D. Pa. Feb. 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of delivery drivers, filed a class action in state court alleging that Defendant improperly classified drivers as independent contractors in violation of Pennsylvania state labor laws. Plaintiffs moved for class certification of a class including all drivers from September 10, 2006 to the present. After Plaintiffs' motion was granted (and a class was certified of all persons who are or were Pennsylvania residents who worked for Defendant as package pick up and delivery drivers in Pennsylvania for one week or more, and who were designated by Defendant as 'independent contractors' during the period of September 10, 2006 to the present), Defendant sought to remove the case. Id. at *3-4. Defendant asserted that the matter should be removed under the CAFA because the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Plaintiffs argued that Defendant's removal was untimely. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant failed to remove the action within the 30 day period prescribed by 28 U.S.C. § 1446(b). Defendant claimed that it was not on notice that the putative class period ran from 2006 to the present, and thus was not aware that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million, until the final class certification order on November 7, 2016. Id. at *5. The Court stated that the record clearly belied Defendant's claim, because Plaintiffs' motion for remand showed that all iterations of their complaint and motion for class certification defined the class as extending from "September 10, 2006 to the present." Id. at *6. The Court found that these litigation documents put Defendant on notice that the class period extended from 2006 to the present. The Court held that because Defendant knew that Plaintiffs sought to certify a class that covered the period 2006 to the present – and that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million, years before it filed its removal notice – removal was not timely. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to remand.

(iv) Fourth Circuit

Hamilton, et al. v. Raleigh General Hospital, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29377 (S.D.W.Va. Mar. 2, 2017). Plaintiff, a hospital patient, filed an action in state court alleging that Defendant overcharged her and others similarly-situated for copies of medical records in violation of West Virginia law. Defendants removed the action pursuant to the CAFA, asserting that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Plaintiff moved to remand on the basis that: (i) Defendants failed to prove that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million; (ii) that the "home state" or "local controversy" exceptions to the CAFA were applicable, as at least two-thirds of the plaintiff class members were West Virginia residents, Raleigh General is a West Virginia citizen and is the primary Defendant, and the events took place in West Virginia; (iii) that a discretionary CAFA exception should be applied because remand was in the interest of justice; and (iv) that removal was untimely. Id. at *8. Plaintiff's proposed class included all persons who requested copies of their medical records from Defendants and were invoiced for the services provided by Defendants to obtain their medical records in excess of the amount allowed by West Virginia law. Id. at *5. Defendants asserted that they serviced approximately 80,000 requests for records made to health care providers in West Virginia by patients or patients' attorneys and that the statutory penalties associated with the alleged violations, based on the same state-wide records, totaled at least $64 million. Id. at *5-6. Plaintiff argued that the complaint was brought only on behalf of Raleigh General patients who sought records. Id. at *10. Plaintiff also asserted that Defendants' amount-in-controversy calculations included the entirety of fees charged, rather than only the amounts charged in excess of the legally permitted fees, and by failing to distinguish between unlawful and lawful charges, Defendants provided an irrelevant number. Id. at *10-11. The Court found that Plaintiff's proposed class only included individuals or their representatives who sought medical records from Raleigh General during the relevant period and were charged excessive fees. Therefore, the Court concluded that Defendants' averments regarding the total number of medical records requests invoiced in the state could not support a finding that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court found that there was no need to address the remaining arguments presented by Plaintiff in favor of remand. The Court therefore granted Plaintiff's motion to remand.

Scott, et al. v. Cricket Communications,* 865 F.3d 189 (4th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff purchased two cellular phones from Defendant that he alleged were locked and therefore unusable. Plaintiff filed a putative class action in state court alleging that Defendant's actions violated Maryland's express warranties and implied warranties of merchantability and fitness for a particular purpose and the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act ("MMWA"). Plaintiff sought to certify a class of all Maryland citizens who purchased a mobile telephone from Defendant that was locked between July 12, 2013 and March 13, 2014. Id. at 192. Defendant removed the case to the CAFA. Defendant asserted that during the relevant period, customers purchased at least 50,000 handsets that were shipped to and activated in Maryland. Id. Defendant applied a conservative estimate of $200 per phone and asserted that "the total amount-in-controversy is, at a minimum, $10,000,000." Id. Plaintiff moved to remand the case, arguing that Defendant did not satisfy its burden to allege jurisdiction under the CAFA because the class it described in its notice of removal was broader than Plaintiff's defined class. According to Plaintiff, Defendant's assertion that it sold 50,000 phones that were shipped to and activated in Maryland failed to meet the CAFA's requirements because the proposed class only consisted of Maryland citizens who purchased a phone. Id. Defendant's opposition alleged that Defendant's records indicated that between July 12, 2013 and March 13, 2014, customers who listed addresses located in Maryland on their accounts purchased at least 47,760 locked handsets. Id. Using the conservative estimate of $200 per phone, Defendant asserted that the revised amount-in-controversy was $9,552,000, still well above the CAFA's threshold. Id. at 193. Defendant urged the District Court to make the "'reasonable inference" that the vast majority of Defendant's Maryland customers were Maryland citizens. Id. at 194. The District Court declined to do so and granted Plaintiff's motion to remand. The District Court found that, although Defendant sufficiently alleged federal jurisdiction under the CAFA, it failed to prove jurisdiction by a preponderance of the evidence. Although the District Court concluded that Defendant failed to prove federal jurisdiction, it did not make any finding of fact as to the amount-in-controversy. On appeal, Defendant maintained that the evidence showed it was more likely than not that the putative class included more than 100 members and the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Id. The Fourth Circuit stated that whether remand was appropriate turned on whether the District Court had subject matter jurisdiction under the CAFA. Id. at 195. The Fourth Circuit agreed with the District Court that Defendant's initial statement that it sold at least 50,000 telephones that were shipped to and activated in Maryland during the relevant time period was sufficient to allege jurisdiction under the CAFA. However, the Fourth Circuit concluded that although Defendant assertion was broader than the proposed class, that did not, as Plaintiff argued, make the notice of removal "incurably defective." Id. The Fourth Circuit noted that in many removal cases, a Defendant's allegations relied on reasonable estimates, inferences, and deductions; therefore, it found Defendant's evidence was over-inclusive and was not dispositive. The Fourth Circuit opined that a removing Defendant can use over-inclusive evidence to establish the amount-in-controversy so long as the evidence shows it is more likely than not that "a fact-finder might legally conclude that" damages would exceed the jurisdictional amount. Id. at 196. The Fourth Circuit thus ruled that the District Court committed legal error in disregarding Defendant's evidence as over-inclusive, and it therefore declined to engage in appellate review to determine whether Defendant met its burden to prove jurisdiction. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit vacated the District Court's judgment and remanded for reconsideration.

(v) Fifth Circuit

Haynes, et al. v. Valero Marketing & Design,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 59495 (S.D. Tex. April 19, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action arising out of a water contamination event in the City of Corpus Christi, Texas that resulted in a four-day ban on the use of municipal tap water (the "contamination event"). Plaintiffs, a group of Corpus Christi individuals and businesses, filed suit in state court alleging that Defendants' negligent conduct caused the contamination event, and seeking a temporary restraining order and damages. Plaintiffs asserted state law claims against Defendants for negligence, gross negligence, negligence per se, strict liability for ultra-hazardous activity, public and private nuisance, and trespassing. Defendants removed the action, alleging jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' claims under the CAFA on the basis that: (i) it purports to be a class action, (ii) the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5,000,000; (iii) a member of the class of Plaintiffs is a citizen of a different state; (iv) no Defendants are states, state officials, or government entities; and (v) the putative class exceeded 100 members. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs filed a motion to remand contending that the matter fell within the CAFA's local controversy exception. Defendant urged the Court to deny Plaintiffs' motion to remand solely on the basis of its allegation that Plaintiffs "have failed to allege specific facts regarding the conduct of any local Defendant." Id. at *8. Plaintiffs asserted that the allegations in their complaint satisfied Texas' notice pleading standard, and that "the live pleadings" and "extrinsic, publicly available evidence" in this case showed "that Defendants each had a role in the [contamination event]." Id. As to the merits of Plaintiffs' motion to remand, the only element of the "local controversy" exception at issue between the parties was § 1332(d)(4)(A)(i)(II)(bb), which demands that the alleged conduct of at least one local Defendant form a "significant basis of all the claims asserted." Id. at *9. The Court noted that Plaintiffs sued five Defendants, at least two of whom the parties agreed were proper Defendants and Texas citizens, and Ergon, a Mississippi Defendant. Id. The Court stated that if the alleged conduct of at least one proper Defendant with Texas citizenship "forms a significant basis for the claims asserted by the proposed plaintiff class," Plaintiffs therefore satisfied their burden to show that the "local controversy" exception to the CAFA applied. Id. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants' conduct caused the backflow incident at the plant in Corpus Christi. The Court held that this allegation was at the root of Plaintiffs' claims of negligence, gross negligence, negligence per se, strict liability for ultra-hazardous activity, public and private nuisance, and trespassing against Defendants. Id. The Court opined that Plaintiffs' live complaint detailed a series of allegations relating to the operation of Defendants' plant, and satisfied their burden to show that the local Defendants' conduct "forms a significant basis for the[ir] claims" under § 1332(d)(4)(A)(i)(II)(bb) irrespective of any extrinsic evidence. Id. at *10. The Court found that Plaintiffs directly identified the plant as the site of the contamination event, and pled that Defendants' negligent conduct in operation of the plant rendered them liable on a number of common law claims. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to remand.

(vi) Sixth Circuit

Davenport, et al. v. Lockwood, Andrews, & Newman,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 7273 (6th Cir. April 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of residents of Flint, Michigan, filed a putative class action alleging negligence, intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, and unjust enrichment after they were exposed to lead from Flint's public water system. Id. at *2. The Flint River was not treated with corrosion-inhibiting chemicals that led to serious problems with the water. Id. Defendants were hired by Flint to advise with respect to using the Flint River as its water source. Id. Defendant removed the case under the CAFA. Id. The District Court remanded, finding that Plaintiffs met the requirements for the local controversy exception to the CAFA. Id. at *3. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit reversed on the basis that the local controversy exception did not apply to this case. Id. at *13. The parties agreed that the requirements of the first element of the local controversy exception was satisfied, but disputed whether the second element was satisfied. Id. at *6. The second element is satisfied if during the three-year period preceding the filing of that class action, no other class action was filed asserting the same or similar factual allegations against Defendants. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs argued that even though other similar class actions had been filed within the preceding-three years, the legislative intent of the CAFA was that "other class action" not include class actions filed within a single state. Id. at *5. The Sixth Circuit rejected this argument, reasoning that a plain-meaning reading of the text of the CAFA required a finding that the exception did not apply, as similar class actions had been filed. Id. at *7. The Sixth Circuit also found that Congress intended for the CAFA to be read broadly to grant federal jurisdiction, which supported the view that the local controversy exception did not apply. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit reversed the District Court's order remanding the action.

Durham, et al. v. Cincinnati Children's Hospital Medical Center*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17897 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 8, 2017). Plaintiff, a patient, brought a state court action alleging that Defendant used or allowed the use of a biologic medical device called Infuse in manners not specifically approved by the Food and Drug Administration ("FDA"), or "off-label use." Plaintiffs asserted that Plaintiffs' counsel had brought similar claims against Defendant on behalf of 185 known individuals, and that this action was on behalf of all those who have not yet acquired representation but have been affected. Id. at *3. Defendant removed the action on the basis of federal question jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331 and pursuant to the CAFA. Plaintiff filed a motion for remand challenging both bases for jurisdiction. Specifically, Plaintiff argued that the federal law question was not substantial, and that it was not capable of resolution without disrupting the federal-state balance approved by Congress. Id. at *5. The Court agreed with Plaintiff that the federal issues presented in the case were not substantial to a degree that would grant the Court subject-matter jurisdiction. Id. at *6. Defendant also argued that the Court had jurisdiction over the matter pursuant to the CAFA. The Court noted that the CAFA gave it original jurisdiction over any class action in which the putative class consists of more than 100 members and the amount-in-controversy is in excess of $5,000,000. Id. Plaintiff conceded that these jurisdictional requirements were met, but argued that multiple exceptions to jurisdiction contained in CAFA applied. Id. at *9. The Court stated that under the CAFA, it must decline jurisdiction if greater than two-thirds of the members of all proposed classes in the aggregate are citizens of the state in which the action was originally filed and at least one significant Defendant is a citizen of the state in which the action was originally filed. Id. at *10. The Court explained that it must also decline jurisdiction if greater than two-thirds of the members of all proposed classes in the aggregate are citizens of the state in which the action was originally filed and all of the primary Defendants are citizens of that state. Id. The only Defendant in this case was a citizen of Ohio. Further, the Court extrapolated from the available data that less than two-thirds of potential class members in the case were residents of Ohio. Accordingly, neither of the two CAFA exceptions contained in 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(4)(A)-(B) that would require the Court to decline to exercise jurisdiction applied here. Id. at *12. Additionally, the Court opined that despite its holding that the federal issues in the case did not rise to the level required to grant the Court federal question jurisdiction, the need to interpret the FDA regulations weighed in favor of the Court's exercising jurisdiction under the CAFA. Id. at *13. Finally, the fact that a substantial minority of potential Plaintiffs were from states other than Ohio also weighed in favor of the Court accepting jurisdiction. The Court held that this case was not a "local controversy" confined to Ohio; rather it was a multi-state class action with a geographically diverse set of Plaintiffs that had broad implications for future litigation across the country. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to remand.

Roberts, et al. v. Mars Petcare US, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 21926 (6th Cir. Nov. 2, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action in state court alleging that Defendant conspired with other pet food manufacturers, veterinarian clinics, and a retailer to employ a "prescription-authorization" requirement to sell pet food at above market prices in violation of the Tennessee Trade Practices Act. Id. at *2. Defendant removed the action by invoking diversity jurisdiction under the CAFA. Id. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, which the District Court denied. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit reversed the District Court's decision and remanded for further proceedings. The Sixth Circuit stated that under the CAFA, a District Court may hear class actions with minimal diversity, such that only one Plaintiff and one Defendant need be citizens of different states, there are 100 or more class members, and an aggregate amount-in-controversy of at least $5 million. Id. at *3. Defendant is incorporated in Delaware and headquartered in Tennessee, and therefore a citizen of both states. The question before the Sixth Circuit therefore was whether the CAFA grants jurisdiction over a class action brought by a group of Tennessee citizens against a company that is a citizen of both Tennessee and Delaware. If the Sixth Circuit treated Defendant as a citizen of Tennessee and Delaware, the District Court lacked jurisdiction; however, if it treated Defendant as a citizen of Tennessee or Delaware, the District Court had jurisdiction. The Sixth Circuit opined that it must look to the statutory construction of the provision, which states that a corporation is a citizen of the state in which it was incorporated and the state of its principal place of business. Id. at *4. The Sixth Circuit found that since the passage of 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(1) in 1958, case law authorities have considered corporations simultaneously citizens of both states for diversity purposes, and therefore a District Court has no jurisdiction to hear a case between a citizen of a state and a corporation headquartered in the same state under the ordinary grant of diversity jurisdiction in § 1332(a)(1), even if the corporation was incorporated elsewhere. Id. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's complaint defined the putative class as "all persons in the State of Tennessee who purchased Prescription Pet Food" manufactured by Defendant, a category that, standing alone, would include non-Tennessee citizens. Id. at *8. Further, Defendant asserted that Plaintiff's complaint stated only that he was a resident of Tennessee and not a citizen of the state. Id. The Sixth Circuit noted that it must read the complaint as a whole and draw all reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor. The Sixth Circuit stated that the complaint also asserted that "the proposed class is strictly limited to citizens of Tennessee," and sought relief on behalf of "a Tennessee class" and "similarly-situated Tennessee consumers." Id. at *9. The Sixth Circuit found that read as a whole, the complaint necessarily provided that putative class members are Tennessee citizens and that they purchased prescription pet food from Defendant. Finally, the Sixth Circuit held that it could not exercise its power under Rule 19 to join another Defendant to the lawsuit in order to create federal jurisdiction. The Sixth Circuit opined that diversity jurisdiction must exist at the time of removal, and an act of joinder under Rule 19 would itself be an exercise of federal jurisdiction. In the absence of jurisdiction over the existing lawsuit, a District Court would have no power to join another party to the proceeding. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit reversed and remanded the District Court's ruling denying Plaintiff's motion to remand.

(vii) Seventh Circuit

Barnes, et al. v. ARYZTA, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 209018 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 20, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action in state court alleging that Defendant's use of a time clock with a fingerprint scanner violated the Illinois Biometric Information Privacy Act ("BIPA"). Defendant removed the action pursuant to the CAFA. Defendant contended that the time clock at issue did not collect or store an employee's fingerprint or any other biometric identifier or biometric information to establish any statutory liability under the BIPA on behalf of Plaintiff or a purported class. Id. at *2. Defendant further argued that Plaintiff could not succeed on his claims because he had not suffered any injury and was therefore not a "person aggrieved" by a violation of the BIPA, and would not succeed on a claim for negligence under Illinois law. Id. After removal, Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction based on the argument that Plaintiff lacked a concrete injury-in-fact sufficient to confer Article III standing pursuant to the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540 (2016). Id. at *4. Defendant then withdrew the motion. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand the case, which the Court granted. The Court stated that the question at issue was what was the consequence of Defendant raising a Spokeo standing argument in a Rule 12(b)(1) motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction after having removed the case based on the representation that subject-matter jurisdiction existed, and then subsequently withdrawing its Rule 12(b)(1) motion. Id. at *5. Defendant insisted that because the Court had an independent obligation to satisfy itself of the existence of jurisdiction before passing on the merits of a claim, the Court should rule on whether Plaintiff had Article III standing regardless of whether some other threshold matter compelled remand. Id. The Court disagreed, and determined that the jurisdictional issue was "easily and readily" resolved based on the parties' post-removal agreement that federal jurisdiction was lacking. Id. at *7. Defendant asserted that it was not arguing in favor of Plaintiff having an Article III injury sufficient to confer federal jurisdiction but only taking the position that the issue need not be resolved at this time. Id. at *7-8. The Court explained that the problem with Defendant's position was that it negated the basis on which Defendant filed its removal petition because burden of proving federal jurisdiction was on Defendant, the party which removed the case. Id. at *8-9. The Court stated that it would decline to decide whether there was Article III standing because neither party was willing to address the issue. On the one hand, Plaintiff sought remand and therefore did not want to argue he sustained a concrete injury-in-fact because then he would be conceding subject-matter jurisdiction. Id. at *10. Defendant, on the other hand, would likely argue that Plaintiff had not sustained an Article III injury, but had withdrawn any argument to that effect so as to avoid remand. Id. The Court reasoned that the difference between the two parties was that Plaintiff did not have to take a position on the standing issue while Defendant did, because Defendant bore the burden of establishing jurisdiction. Id. Since Defendant did not attempt to persuade the Court that federal jurisdiction existed, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion to remand to state court.

Saskatchewan Mutual Insurance Co. v. CE Design LTE*, et al., 865 F.3d 537 (7th Cir. 2017). Defendant filed a class action in state court against Homegrown Advertising, a former Canadian marketing form, alleging that it sent junk faxes to it in violation of Illinois law and the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). The parties settled that matter for $5 million plus interest and costs. However, Homegrown failed to notify Plaintiff, its insurance company, about the litigation, and instead hired its own counsel in Illinois. Defendant then filed a citation to discover Plaintiff's assets in an effort to recover some or all of the judgment from Plaintiff. The state court entered judgment for Defendant. Defendant also attempted enforcement of the Illinois judgment in Saskatchewan, where Plaintiff is based. The court in Saskatchewan ruled that it had not received sufficient notice of the Illinois judgment and thus that it was unenforceable. Id. at *539. The court in Saskatchewan also awarded Plaintiff costs of $1,000. Plaintiff then filed a motion to enforce the Saskatchewan judgment in the District Court. The District Court found the CAFA inapplicable because the class was a Defendant, and the Seventh Circuit has held that the CAFA only applies to Plaintiff classes. Id. at *540. As for diversity jurisdiction, the District Court concluded that no individual class member could satisfy the $75,000 amount-in-controversy requirement, and none of the exceptions to the general prohibition on aggregating claims applied. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit agreed that the CAFA only applies to a Plaintiff class. However, Plaintiff argued that it was the de facto Defendant and so the CAFA applied by its terms. Plaintiff argued that it was a Defendant in the Saskatchewan action and it was merely enforcing the resulting judgment. The Seventh Circuit found that Plaintiff invoked the District Court's authority, and registration of a judgment (or a stand-alone action on a foreign judgment) is not always a rote administrative task. Id. at *541. The Seventh Circuit stated that a District Court sitting in diversity usually applies recognition and enforcement rules of the state in which it sits. Further, the Seventh Circuit reasoned that comity considerations supported the approach of denying jurisdiction. The Seventh Circuit explained that the CAFA is a jurisdictional statute, and it therefore was inappropriate for the District Court to insert itself into litigation that has been on-going in Illinois and Saskatchewan for a considerable time. Id. at *542. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit affirmed.

Tri-State Water Treatment, Inc. v. Bauer, et al.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 227 (7th Cir. Jan. 5, 2017). Plaintiff/Counterclaim Defendant, a water treatment company, originally filed a small claims collection action against Defendants/Counterclaim Plaintiffs, Michael and Stacey Bauer, in state court alleging that they failed to pay for a water-treatment system installed at their house. The Bauers filed an answer and a multi-state class action counterclaim against Tri-State Water Treatment, Inc. alleging fraud in connection with the sale of its water-treatment system. The Bauers subsequently filed an amended class action counterclaim adding Home Depot USA., Inc. as an additional Counterclaim Defendant. Home Depot filed a notice of removal under the Class Action Fairness Act ("CAFA") asserting that even though it was not an original Defendant in the underlying case, its status as an additional Counterclaim Defendant was sufficient under the CAFA to allow it to remove the case. The Bauers filed a motion to remand, asserting that the CAFA did not permit a Counterclaim Defendant, original or additional, the right to remove the action. The District Court agreed and remanded the case. Home Depot appealed, and the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision. Home Depot argued that any party who joins a case through service of process should be regarded as a Defendant for purposes of the CAFA and permitted to remove the case. The Seventh Circuit disagreed, holding that an additional Counterclaim Defendant is not entitled to remove a class action under the CAFA. In reaching its conclusion, the Seventh Circuit relied upon the plain meaning of "Defendant" and interpreted the modifier "any" in the CAFA as being intended to eliminate the unanimity requirement. The Seventh Circuit noted that its ruling was consistent with the Fourth and Ninth Circuits on this issue.

(viii) Eighth Circuit

Black, et al. v. Bayer Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92268 (E.D. Mo. June 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of 95 Essure permanent birth control users, filed a state court action alleging that they suffered severe injuries and damages from Defendant's failure to warn of the risks, dangers, and adverse events associated with Essure. Id. at *3. Defendants removed the action on the basis of diversity jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a), federal question jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331, and diversity jurisdiction under pursuant to the CAFA. Id. Plaintiffs filed a motion to remand, arguing there was no diversity jurisdiction because their joinder in one action was proper, that no federal question arose from their complaint, and that the CAFA did not confer diversity jurisdiction because there were less than 100 Plaintiffs and there has been no motion to consolidate multiple complaints. Id. at *5. Defendants argued that the Court had diversity jurisdiction because the non-Missouri Plaintiffs' claims were fraudulently misjoined. Id. at *9. However, the Court noted that Plaintiffs' claims were focused on the same product, arose out of the same development, distribution, marketing, and sales practices, and had common issues of law and fact. Id. at *9-10. The Court held that while there would certainly be differences between Plaintiffs' claims, those differences did not render joinder fraudulent. Id. at *10. The Court found that Defendants failed to establish fraudulent joinder, and that it did not have diversity jurisdiction. Further, the Court determined that the federal issues raised in Plaintiffs' complaint, which were based on state law, were not substantial and not capable of resolution without disrupting the federal-state balance contemplated by Congress. Therefore, the Court declined to exercise federal question jurisdiction. Id. at *12. Finally, Defendants argued that although the matter involved only 95 Plaintiffs, it should be considered along with other similar Essure cases to form a single mass action involving more than 100 Plaintiffs. Defendants asserted that these cases were part of the same mass action because the complaints contained the same substantive allegations, alleged the same causes of action, were filed by the same counsel, and were filed in the same jurisdiction. Id. The Court found that the case did not involve the claims of 100 or more persons, and there was no indication in the record it would be consolidated or that Plaintiffs wished to have the case tried jointly with any other case. Id. at *13. The Court therefore concluded that it also lacked jurisdiction under the CAFA. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to remand.

Dammann, et al. v. Progressive Direct Insurance Co.,* 856 F.3d 580 (8th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of insured individuals, filed an action alleging that Defendant sold insurance policies with benefits below the statutory minimum required by Minnesota law. Plaintiffs suffered covered losses and incurred more than $20,100 in medical expenses as a result. Id. at 582. Because their policies included a $100 deductible for medical expense payments and a maximum coverage of $20,000, Plaintiffs each received a payment of $19,900 from Defendant. Id. at 583. Plaintiffs filed suit in Minnesota state court alleging that Defendant's practice of selling policies with deductibles that reduced benefit payments below $20,000 for medical expenses and for economic losses violated Minnesota law. Plaintiffs sought to represent a class of all similarly-situated individuals. Defendant removed the case to pursuant to the CAFA. Plaintiffs then moved to remand on the ground that the CAFA's jurisdictional requirements were not met because the amount-in-controversy did not exceed $5 million. Id. After the District Court denied the motion to remand, Plaintiffs appealed. Plaintiffs argued that the District Court erred when it determined that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Specifically, Plaintiffs argued that the District Court should have restricted its analysis of the amount-in-controversy to what could be recovered by the class of individuals identified in the complaint, i.e., individuals who had actually made claims for covered losses and were paid less than the statutory minimum. Id. According to Defendant, over 600 individuals belonged to the class. When the District Court calculated the amount-in-controversy, however, it relied on premiums collected on all of Defendant's policies which included the challenged deductibles, regardless of whether the policyholders had made claims that led to application of the deductibles. Id. Plaintiffs argued that the evidence provided by Defendant to satisfy the CAFA's amount-in-controversy requirement was over-inclusive because it included all premiums collected on policies with the challenged deductibles, not just the premiums collected from members of the narrowly defined class. Id. The District Court concluded that Defendant carried its burden of establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that the amount-in-controversy exceeded the CAFA's jurisdictional minimum. Id. at 584. The Eighth Circuit explained that after a party seeking to remove has shown the CAFA's jurisdictional minimum by a preponderance of the evidence, "remand is only appropriate if the Plaintiff can establish to a legal certainty that the claim is for less than the requisite amount." Id. The Eighth Circuit concluded that Plaintiffs failed to show that it was legally impossible for them to recover more than $5 million. Id. While Plaintiffs put Defendant's sales practices at issue and sought a refund of their premium payments, they had not offered evidence to establish the amount they collectively paid in premiums. Without such information, the Eighth Circuit stated that it could not determine whether it would be legally impossible for Plaintiffs to recover $5 million. Id. The Eighth Circuit therefore concluded that the District Court properly denied the motion for remand.

Drake, et al. v. Steak N Shake Operations, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 210630 (E.D. Mo. Dec. 22, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former salaried managers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant failed to properly pay them overtime wages in violation of the FLSA and Missouri law. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs were exempt from overtime protections because their primary job duties were executive or administrative. Id. at *1. The Court had previously granted the parties' joint stipulation of conditional certification of a collective action. Plaintiffs subsequently filed a motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23, consisting of "all persons who worked as Defendant Managers at all corporate owned retail restaurants located in the State of Missouri at any time from September 8, 2012 to the present." Id. at *1-2. At the same time, Defendant filed a motion for decertification of the FLSA collective action. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion and denied Defendant's motion. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs were not similarly-situated with respect to the key issues underlying their claims, the experiences of one Plaintiff was not representative of any other and, as such, the claims of the group could not be adjudicated without inquiring into each individual's particular circumstances. Id. at *3. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs' testimony suggested the existence of "a single, FLSA-violating policy" affecting the entire membership of the collective action, as Plaintiffs uniformly testified that their primary job duties were neither managerial nor administrative, that they spent a significant majority of their time doing work nearly identical to hourly production employees, that their work was closely supervised by their superiors, and that their participation in employment matters was rare and limited. Id. at *13. While it noted that Defendant could identify several factual differences in Plaintiffs' employment experiences, considering Plaintiffs' largely uniform description of their actual experiences, the Court opined that the differences Defendant identified did not outweigh the similarities. Id. at *13-14. The Court also found that Defendant's individual defenses were not sufficient to compel decertification. The Court further concluded that proving liability on a collective-wide basis was possible in this case, and the only relevant issue, i.e., Defendant's routine classification of managers as exempt, applied the same to all Plaintiffs. Id. at *17-18. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to decertify the collective action. As to Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, the Court held that Plaintiff met the commonality requirement as the question of whether a manager was exempt was the fundamental legal question at issue, and the jury could resolve all of Plaintiffs' claims in one stroke. Id. at *27. The Court also determined that Plaintiffs met all of the other Rule 23(a) requirements. As to Rule 23(b), the Court ruled that Plaintiffs met the predominance requirement as their claims turned on whether Defendant appropriately classified managers as exempt executive or administrative employees, which in turn depended on a Defendant's manager's primary duties. Id. at *28. The Court stated that Plaintiffs also demonstrated superiority because there was no compelling reason to host numerous individual trials when the central question in all of them was the same. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Hargett, et la. v. Revclaims, LLC,* Case No. 17-1339 (8th Cir. April 14, 2017). Plaintiff was injured in a car accident and received medical treatment at a hospital. The hospital contracted with Defendant to pursue any claim Plaintiff might have against the driver responsible for her injuries, in lieu of collecting from Plaintiff's Arkansas Medicaid insurance. Id. at 3. Plaintiff filed an action in state court asserting that Defendant's practice violated Arkansas law. Defendant removed the suit to the District Court pursuant to the CAFA. Plaintiff moved to remand and contended that the CAFA's local-controversy exception applied to her claims. The District Court granted Plaintiff's motion to remand. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit reversed and remanded. The District Court had found that Plaintiff met all the requirements of the local-controversy exemption with her class defined as "all Arkansas citizens who were Arkansas Medicaid-eligible beneficiaries." Id. at 4. The Eighth Circuit, however, determined that the District Court erred in holding that merely alleging a proposed class of Arkansas residents was sufficient to satisfy 28 U.S.C. § 1334(d)(4). The Eighth Circuit reasoned that Plaintiff could have met her burden by producing evidence or by defining her class to include on Arkansas citizens, but merely alleging residency was not enough. Id. at 5-6.

McKeage, et al. v. TMBC, LLC*, 847 F.3d 992 (8th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action in state court alleging that Defendant's nationwide practice of charging a document fee when selling boats and trailers under form contracts governed by Missouri law was illegal. Plaintiff requested certification of a nationwide class action. The state court certified a class, but limited it to customers whose purchases occurred in Missouri. Id. Plaintiffs sought review from the Missouri Supreme Court, contending that the trial court should have certified a nationwide class. The Missouri Supreme Court agreed, noting that Plaintiffs chose Missouri law for the standardized form contracts it used nationwide. Pursuant to the Missouri Supreme Court's decision, the state trial court then certified a nationwide class. Defendant subsequently removed the action pursuant to the CAFA. After removal, Defendant brought a motion to decertify the class, which the District Court denied. Defendant then filed a motion for summary judgment asserting that: (i) charging a document fee did not amount to unauthorized law because employees did not exercise legal judgment when filling out documents for customers; (ii) some individuals had been improperly identified as customers who signed contracts governed by Missouri law; (iii) that Missouri law should not be applied nationwide to customers who signed contracts with TMBC outside of Missouri; and (iv) that damages should not be calculated based on the entire document fee because portions of the fee went to services that did not constitute an unauthorized law business. Id. at 997. The District Court rejected Defendant's arguments and determined that the class members were properly identified, Defendant's conduct in charging a document fee constituted an unauthorized law business, Missouri law applied to transactions that occurred outside Missouri, and damages should be awarded based on the entire document fee. Id. On appeal, Defendant contended that: (i) the class should not have been certified because individualized proof was required to determine whether each customer's contract contained a Missouri choice-of-law provision; (ii) the District Court misinterpreted Missouri case law regarding the unauthorized law business in granting summary judgment to the class; and (iii) the District Court erred in applying Missouri law to conduct which occurred outside of Missouri. The Eighth Circuit found that the class was ascertainable because the District Court used an intensive file-by-file review process specifically for the purpose of excluding customers whose contracts did not contain the Missouri choice-of-law provision and who therefore did not have rights under Missouri law. Id. In addition to the class being clearly ascertainable, the Eight Circuit found that the commonality and predominance requirements of Rule 23(b) were satisfied because the identified class members were customers that entered into a contract identical or substantially similar to the one entered into by Plaintiffs, and evidence from discovery showed that it was Defendant's corporate policy to require all customers to sign the standard form contract governed by Missouri law. Id. at 999. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit concluded that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in finding that the class met the requirements of Rule 23 and certifying the case as a class action. Defendant also asserted that the District Court misconstrued Missouri law when it concluded that Defendant's practice of charging a document fee constituted unauthorized law business under Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 484.020 and 484.010. Id. at 1000. The Eighth Circuit stated that in situations where the unauthorized charge was separate from the legitimate portions of the parties' transaction, damages may be based upon the entire unauthorized fee, even if some of the documents were not legal in nature. Id. Finally, Defendant argued that the District Court erred in applying Missouri law to sales that occurred outside of Missouri. Id. at 1001. The Eighth Circuit found that the question was whether a corporation headquartered in Missouri could choose that Missouri law govern its conduct in standard form contracts it used nationwide. The Eighth Circuit held that there was nothing inherently unconstitutional about enforcing a corporation's choice to have its contractual duties governed by the law of a particular state. Id. at 1002. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling on the issues Defendant appealed.

Rozo, et al. v. Principal Life Insurance Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 82183 (S.D. Iowa May 12, 2017). The Court certified a class of approximately 41,000 plan participants who invested in a Principal Fixed Income Option ("PFIO") under Defendant's 401(k) plan between 2008 and 2013. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant breached its fiduciary duty of loyalty under the ERISA and engaged in prohibited transactions. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant reaped unreasonable profits from these investments by paying Plaintiffs too small a portion of the returns that Defendant received from the underlying investments. Plan participants invested in the PFIO, which Defendant then invested in various fixed-income securities. These investments produced a return, a part of which Defendant retained and distributed in part to participants. Plaintiffs alleged that: (i) Defendant's discretionary control of how much of the return it retained made it a functional fiduciary over participants' plan assets; and (ii) Defendant violated the ERISA by retaining any of the returns. The proposed class was defined as all participants in and beneficiaries of defined contribution employee pension benefit plans who invested funds in the PFIO contract. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs met the requirements of Rule 23(a), noting that: (i) joinder would be impracticable with 40,999 participants who invested in the PFIO during the class period; (ii) questions of law and fact were common to the entire class, i.e., that the PFIO is a single pool of assets governed by a contract with standardized terms, which were then applied uniformly across the proposed class and Defendant's pricing decisions were applied to the PFIO group as a whole; and (iii) Plaintiffs were typical because they were investors from 2008 to 2013. The Court also found certification appropriate under Rule 23(b)(1). The Court reasoned that the core of the case was Defendant's administration of the PFIO plan, which was governed by a standard contract and applied equally to all plan participants.

Agredano, et al. v. Southwest Water Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 82451 (C.D. Cal. May 30, 2017). Plaintiff, a construction worker, filed an action in state court asserting that Defendant violated various provisions of the California Labor Code. Defendant removed the case pursuant to the CAFA. Defendant asserted that: (i) there was diversity between at least one class member and one Defendant; and (ii) that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Id. at *6. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, and argued that Defendant failed to demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million and that the action fell within the local controversy exemption. Id. at *7. The Court analyzed the amount-in-controversy on a claim-by-claim basis. First, Defendant asserted that Plaintiff put $3,169,729.50 in controversy in alleging meal and rest period violations, by assuming that each putative class member suffered one meal period and one rest period violation five days per week during the relevant time period ("100% violation rate assumption"). Id. at *14. Plaintiff challenged Defendant's 100% violation rate assumption, arguing that his complaint contained no information as to the number of times Plaintiff, or any other class member, clocked-out for a meal period and continued working. Id. at *14-15. The Court found it reasonable to assume a 100% violation rate of the meal period provisions based on the allegations in Plaintiff's complaint, but did not find it reasonable to assume such a rate with respect to rest periods, as Plaintiff failed to offer specific evidence as to rest periods in his complaint. Id. at *15. Therefore, the Court found that Plaintiff placed $1,584,864.75 in controversy with respect to Plaintiff's meal period claim, but denied Defendant's contention that Plaintiff has placed the same $1,584,864.75 in controversy with respect to Plaintiff's rest period claim. Id. at *16. The Court also considered the sufficiency of Defendant's calculations regarding the amounts placed in controversy by Plaintiff's overtime and minimum wage claims. Defendant assumed that Plaintiff placed in controversy one hour of wages for off-the-clock work per shift at California's applicable minimum wage per day and five hours of unpaid overtime per week. Id. at *17. The Court found the assumptions were not warranted because Plaintiff did not allege that he and other putative class members were entitled both to one hour of additional minimum wage payments and to one hour of overtime pay each and every day. Accordingly, the Court determined that figures of $312,539.07 and $1,188,648.56 for Plaintiff's overtime and minimum wage claims were appropriately based on the allegations in the complaint. Id. at *19-20. Plaintiff did not challenge Defendant's calculation of the amount-in-controversy on his claim for waiting time penalties. Therefore, the Court accepted Defendant's estimate of an amount-in-controversy of $124,886 based on the waiting time claim. Finally, Defendant argued that it was entitled to include the anticipated amount of reasonable attorneys' fees spent to litigate this action in the calculation of the amount-in-controversy. Id. at *20. The Court determined that the better view is that attorneys' fees incurred after the date of removal are not properly included because the amount-in-controversy is to be determined as of the date of removal. The Court further stated that Defendant had not provided evidence regarding its anticipated overall fees and the Court would not consider reasonable attorneys' fees in its calculation of the amount-in-controversy. Therefore, the Court concluded that Defendant failed to demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million and therefore remanded the case.

Black, et al. v. T-Mobile USA, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 182109 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 2, 2017). Plaintiff, a senior field technician, filed an action in state court alleging that Defendant denied Plaintiff adequate overtime compensation as well as meal and rest periods in violation of the California Labor Code. Defendant removed the matter, asserting that the amount-in-controversy exceeded the $5 million minimum threshold set out in the CAFA. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, which the Court denied. Plaintiff contended that Defendant failed to satisfy its burden of demonstrating that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Defendant calculated that Plaintiff sought over $6 million in unpaid overtime for technicians' on-call time alone. Id. at *10. In reaching this figure, Defendant assumed that, while on-call, technicians were compensated for an average of 10.68 hours responding to on-call work and 15 hours of overtime per week. Defendant included this compensation in its calculations for the class members' regular rate of pay. Id. at *11. Plaintiff argued that Defendant erroneously extrapolated from information about the named Plaintiff to the class as a whole because Defendant based its assumption that technicians were compensated for 10.68 on-call hours on Plaintiff's own payroll records and based its assumption that class members worked 15 hours of overtime per week on the allegation that the named Plaintiff "typically" worked 40 to 55 hours per week and that his claims were typical of the other putative class members. Id. at *12. The Court concluded that Defendant's extrapolation from Plaintiff's average work schedule was reasonable in light of the other evidence in the record that indicated that Plaintiff and the putative class worked similar schedules. The Court noted that putative class members were all scheduled to work 8 hours per day, 5 days per week, and had the same on-call schedule from Monday at 5:00 p.m. to the following Monday at 7:59 a.m. Id. The Court further found that putative class members were all current or former field technicians, and there were no allegations from which Defendant or the Court should assume that they performed substantially different work. The Court stated that, even if it agreed that Defendant's assumptions about average work time and average overtime hours were flawed, Plaintiff's claim for unpaid overtime still exceeded the $5 million amount-in-controversy requirement. The Court explained that, assuming that Plaintiff was not compensated for any on-call or overtime hours, Plaintiff's regular rate of pay would decrease from $20.01 – in Defendant's calculations – to $16.07. Using this revised figure in Defendant's calculations, Plaintiff was still conservatively seeking over $5 million in unpaid overtime for putative class members' on-call time alone. Id. at *13. The Court also noted that Defendant's conservative calculations assumed a minimum wage of $8.00 and did not account for the increase in minimum wage in 2014 ($9.00), 2016 ($10.00), and 2017 ($10.50). Id. at *14. The Court, therefore, held that Defendant established by a preponderance of the evidence that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million and it denied Plaintiff's motion to remand.

Brinkley, et al. v. Wqh Wvg Monterey Financial Services,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 20668 (9th Cir. Oct. 20, 2017). Plaintiff brought an action in state court against Defendant, alleging: (i) invasion of privacy in violation of California and Washington state law; (ii) unlawful recording of telephone calls under California law; and (iii) violation of § 17200 of the California Business and Professions Code. Defendant removed the action. Plaintiff moved to remand pursuant to the CAFA's home-state controversy exception. The District Court delayed ruling on Plaintiff's motion, and ordered jurisdictional discovery. The Magistrate Judge subsequently ordered Defendant to produce a list of all putative California and Washington class members. Defendant produced a list of over 152,000 individuals who had recorded calls with Defendant between October 15, 2009, and May 6, 2016, and had a California or Washington mailing address. Id. at *4. Plaintiff hired a statistician who analyzed the list and found that a random sampling of the individuals contained no evidence of individuals who were physically located in, but were not residents of, California or Washington when they made or received a phone call with Defendant. Id. at *5. The District Court therefore granted Plaintiff's motion to remand, finding that at least two-thirds of class members were California citizens. Id. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit vacated the ruling and remanded. The Ninth Circuit noted that in order to determine whether two-thirds of class members were California citizens, it must first determine the size of the class as a whole. Id. at *7. Plaintiff's proposed class consisted of all individuals who made or received a telephone call with Defendant "while physically located or residing in California and Washington." Id. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit reasoned that the class included individuals who were physically located in, but were not residents of, California or Washington when they made or received a call with Defendant (the “located in” sub-group). Id. at *7-8. Moreover, the Ninth Circuit stated that Plaintiff’s expert report relied on the data Defendant produced, which contained a list of Defendant’s accounts listing California and Washington street addresses with respect to which accounts telephone calls were recorded between October 15, 2009 and May 6, 2016. However, the list addressed only a portion of the class, i.e., those who were "residing in California and Washington" when they made or received a call with Defendant. The Ninth Circuit observed that the data produced did not address, or contain information about, the size of the "located in" sub-group. Id. at *8. The Ninth Circuit found that Plaintiff did not submit any evidence regarding the "located in" sub-group, and without knowing the size of the sub-group, the size of the entire class was unknown. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit held that it could not determine whether two-thirds of all class members were California citizens. The Ninth Circuit concluded that a Plaintiff could not remand an otherwise valid case under the CAFA when only a portion of the class met the two-thirds citizenship requirement. The Ninth Circuit thereby vacated the ruling and remanded for further proceedings.

Chalian, et al. v. CVS Pharmacy, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 55485 (C.D. Cal. April 11, 2017). Plaintiff, a pharmacist, filed a class action in state court for unpaid wages, failure to pay overtime, failure to provide accurate itemized wage statements, waiting time penalties, and unfair business practices. Id. at *2. Defendants removed the action pursuant to the CAFA, asserting that the parties were diverse and that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, which the Court denied. Plaintiff argued that the removal was untimely because Defendants removed the case more than 30 days after they received the complaint. However, the Court determined that Defendants had to conduct their own investigation to calculate that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. The Court found that Defendants removed in the applicable one year period, and therefore the removal was timely. Defendants argued that there was jurisdiction under the CAFA because the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million and neither Defendant CVS nor Defendant RX Services were California citizens. Id. at *5. In response, Plaintiff insisted that removal was improper under the CAFA because Defendants' calculations of the amount-in-controversy were speculative and Defendant Garfield Beach CVS, LLC, ("Garfield Beach") was a citizen of California. Id. at *6. Defendants offered sufficient evidence that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $15,607,980, and while Defendants’ calculations might not be exact, the Court found them to be reasonable estimates; further, Defendants established by a preponderance of the evidence that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Plaintiff contended the home-state exception to the CAFA’s jurisdiction was met because: (i) more than two-thirds of the proposed class were citizens of California; and (ii) Garfield Beach, a primary Defendant, was a citizen of California. Id. at *7-8. In response, Defendants argued that the primary Defendants included all Defendants and since CVS and RX Services were domiciled in Rhode Island and New York and were not citizens of California, the home exception did not apply. Id. at *8. The Court agreed and reasoned that Defendants CVS and RX Services were primary Defendants because they were the real targets of the suit. The Court held that because CVS was domiciled in Rhode Island and RX Services was domiciled in New York, the primary Defendants were not California citizens and the home-state exception did not apply. Id. at *9. Plaintiff also argued that the local controversy exception applied because: (i) CVS, RX Services and Garfield Beach CVS, LLC, were citizens of California; (iii) Garfield Beach's conduct formed a significant basis of the class members’ claims; (iii) the principle injuries occurred in California; and (iv) no other class actions with similar legal claims had been filed against Defendants. However, the Court found that similar lawsuits had been filed against Defendants within the last three years, 12 times in California, and once each in Massachusetts and New York. The Court further stated that some of the suits involved claims of unpaid wages and overtime for pharmacist training, unfair business practices, conversion, and wage statement claims for pharmacist employees, which were similar or the same as the claims Plaintiff alleged. Id. Therefore, the Court ruled that the local controversy exception did not apply. Accordingly, the Court found that removal was proper and denied Plaintiff’s motion to remand.

Chan Healthcare Group v. Liberty Mutual Fire Insurance Co.*, 844 F.3d 1133 (9th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff filed an action alleging that Defendant’s improper use of a database to set reimbursement amounts violated various Washington statutes. Plaintiff sought a declaratory judgment that the settlement of a related Illinois case was unenforceable in Washington. Plaintiff argued that the Illinois settlement agreement could not be applied to bar Plaintiff’s Washington claim against Defendant consistent with Plaintiff’s due process rights. Id. at 1136. Defendant then removed the case on the ground that Plaintiff had raised a federal due process claim, thereby creating federal question jurisdiction under the CAFA. Plaintiff challenged the timeliness of Defendant's removal and argued that there was no federal question jurisdiction because he did not raise his federal due process claim as an affirmative claim, but instead raised the issue in response to Defendant's assertion of the Illinois settlement as a defense. Id. The District Court granted Plaintiff's motion to remand based solely on the ground that removal was untimely. The District Court explicitly declined to decide whether federal question jurisdiction was present. The District Court also awarded Plaintiff $18,330 in attorneys' fees after finding that Defendant "had no objectively reasonable basis for removal." Id. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit dismissed Defendant's petition for permission to appeal the District Court's remand order and vacated the order granting attorneys' fees. The Ninth Circuit stated that the default rule on remand orders is that "[a]n order remanding a case to the State court from which it was removed is not reviewable on appeal or otherwise." Id. at 1137. The Ninth Circuit considered whether it had jurisdiction to review the District Court's order remanding the action when the asserted basis for jurisdiction was a federal question rather than traditional diversity or the CAFA's minimal diversity jurisdiction. The Ninth Circuit noted that 28 U.S.C. § 1453(b) governs the general procedure for removal, and § 1453(c) provides a limited means for appellate review of remand orders in cases removed under § 1453(b). Id. at 1138. Plaintiff argued that § 1453(c)(1) was limited to diversity actions under the CAFA. Defendant asserted that no CAFA-based limitation applied and that all class actions were covered by this grant of jurisdiction. The Ninth Circuit concluded that CAFA's legislative history supported the conclusion that the limited grant of appellate review was tied to the CAFA's minimal diversity provisions. The Ninth Circuit noted that § 1453(b) included two references linked exclusively to diversity that failed to include provisions specific to federal question jurisdiction, including: (i) sub-section (b) excepts the 1-year limitation under section 1446(c)(1), which applies to diversity cases alone; and (ii) sub-section (b) permits removal without regard to whether any Defendant is a citizen of the state in which the action is brought. Id. at 1139. The Ninth Circuit opined that § 1453(b)'s general focus on diversity cases and failure to carve out exceptions applicable only to federal question cases underscored that it was directed to diversity cases. Id. Finally, the Ninth Circuit noted that § 1453(d) states that it "shall not apply to any class action that solely involves" three enumerated classes of state and federal law claims involving securities and corporate governance. The Ninth Circuit found that § 1453(d) mirrors § 1332(d)(9) of the CAFA, which places those same three categories of claims outside of the CAFA's minimal diversity provision. Id. The overlapping scope of those two provisions assisted the Ninth Circuit in concluding that both statutes operate in the CAFA diversity sphere. The Ninth Circuit further found that the Fifth, Sixth, and Eighth Circuits had ruled that the review provisions of § 1453(c) were limited to class actions brought under the CAFA. Id. at 1140. The Ninth Circuit agreed with those circuits that the focus of § 1453(c)(1) was limited to appeal of remand orders in diversity class actions brought and removed under the CAFA. Id. at *1141. The Ninth Circuit therefore concluded that it lacked jurisdiction to review the District Court's remand order and dismissed Defendant's petition for permission to appeal.

Chen, et al. v. United Talent Agency,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34960 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 10, 2017). Plaintiff, a former employee, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated several provisions of the California Labor Code. Defendant removed the action pursuant to the CAFA's amount-in-controversy requirement. Defendant alleged that based on the causes of action Plaintiffs asserted, the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5,500,000. Id. at *4. Defendant's estimate included $8,400 in allegedly unpaid minimum wages and associated liquidated damages, $819,000 in allegedly unpaid overtime, $2,185,000 in allegedly improper rest breaks and associated penalties, $85,000 in allegedly improperly itemized wage statements and associated penalties, $720,000 in penalties for alleged waiting time pay, $635,000 in separate civil penalties under the Private Attorney General Act ("PAGA"), and $1,113,000 representing attorneys' fees. Id. at *5. The Court stated that as an initial matter, the estimated $635,000 in civil penalties under the PAGA could not be used to reach the CAFA's amount-in-controversy requirement. Id. The Court further found that although attorneys' fees may properly be considered as part of the amount-in-controversy, decisions from within the Ninth Circuit recognized a split in authority "as to whether only attorneys' fees that have accrued at the time of removal should be considered in calculating the amount-in-controversy, or whether the calculation should take into account fees likely to accrue over the life of the case." Id. at *6. The Court therefore concluded that Defendant's reliance on anticipated attorneys' fees was insufficient to satisfy its burden to show that the amount-in-controversy exceeded the jurisdictional minimum. Moreover, the Court held that because Defendant offered no evidence of any pre-removal attorneys' fees accrued by Plaintiffs, the Court had no basis to consider any portion of the asserted $1,113,000 in attorneys' fees to determine the amount-in-controversy. Id. Accordingly, the Court held that Defendant improperly relied on the PAGA's penalties and anticipated but unaccrued attorneys' fees in asserting that this action satisfied CAFA's jurisdictional amount-in-controversy requirement. Therefore, the Court remanded the action for lack of federal subject matter jurisdiction.

Christmas, et al. v. Union Pacific Railroad Co., 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 11724 (9th Cir. June 30, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action in state court alleging that Defendant required employees to work 12-hour shifts in violation of the California Labor Code. Plaintiff then amended his complaint to include four individual Defendants ("Local Defendants"). Defendant removed the action to the District Court pursuant to the CAFA. The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion to remand based on the CAFA's local controversy exception, and granted judgment on the pleadings, with prejudice, to Defendant on preemption grounds. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded with instructions to remand to state court. The parties disputed two factors, including: (i) whether "significant relief" was sought from at least one of the Local Defendants; and (ii) whether the conduct of at least one of the Local Defendants formed a "significant basis" for the claims asserted. Id. at *2-3. The Ninth Circuit held that the District Court erred in finding that "significant relief" "cannot be derived from" the Local Defendants. Id. at *3. The Ninth Circuit explained that to determine if Plaintiff claimed "significant relief" from a Defendant, it must look to the remedies requested by Plaintiffs. Id. Plaintiff's complaint alleged that that under § 606, the Local Defendants were liable for statutory penalties of $100 to $1,000 per violation. Id. Defendant, by contrast, was liable for penalties of $500 to $5,000 per violation. Id. The Ninth Circuit noted that there were four Local Defendants, meaning that the amount sought against the collective group represented 80% of the total penalties for which Defendants could be liable. The Ninth Circuit found that Plaintiff's complaint also sought injunctive relief against Local Defendants, which weighed in favor of "significant relief." Id. The Ninth Circuit therefore held that the relief requested against the Local Defendants was "significant" both comparatively and absolutely. Id. The Ninth Circuit determined that the District Court further erred in finding that the Local Defendants' conduct did not form a "significant basis" for the claims asserted. Id. The Ninth Circuit noted that to determine if the basis for the claims against a Defendant was significant, it must compare the allegations against that Defendant to the allegations made against the other Defendants, looking specifically at that Defendant's "basis" in the context of the overall "claims asserted." Id. at *4. The Ninth Circuit found that the complaint alleged that Local Defendants were "responsible for scheduling hours and days of work." Id. The Ninth Circuit reasoned that this was precisely the conduct that Plaintiffs claimed was illegal. Id. Therefore, the Ninth Circuit explained that even if the conduct of the Local Defendants was controlled by Defendant, and even if they acted solely pursuant to Defendant's policies, the conduct of the Local Defendants "nonetheless remains the conduct of [the Local Defendants], for which [they] may be held liable." Id. Therefore, the Ninth Circuit found that the conduct of the Local Defendants provided a "significant basis" for the claims set forth in Plaintiff's complaint. Id. The Ninth Circuit explained that although District Courts may consider other evidence to make jurisdictional decisions with respect to the CAFA's other provisions, for the purposes of the local controversy exception "the District Court is to look to the complaint rather than to extrinsic evidence." Id. at *4-5. The Ninth Circuit therefore determined that there was no other way to measure the Local Defendants' "significance" without further fact-finding, speculation, or a deep and current knowledge of Defendant's operations, which would ultimately be result in a prohibited mini-trial of the merits. Id. at *5. Accordingly, because the claims against the Local Defendants were "significant" for the purposes of the CAFA's local controversy exception, the Ninth Circuit held that the District Court was required to remand the case to the state court. The Ninth Circuit therefore vacated the order granting Defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings and reversed and remanded.

Crummie, et al. v. Certifiedsafety, Inc., Case No. 17-CV-3892 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 11, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action in state court against Defendant asserting violations of various wage & hour laws on behalf of hourly, non-exempt employees. Defendant removed the action pursuant to the CAFA, contending that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, arguing that Defendant failed to meet its burden to establish that the amount-in-controversy was sufficient. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion, finding that Defendant submitted reasonable estimates of the amount-in-controversy, which Plaintiff failed to rebut. Id. at 1. In support of its notice of removal, Defendant submitted the declaration of its Vice President of Human Resources, who used figures to calculate that the amount-in-controversy was not less than $5,004,030 for waiting time penalties based on the estimate of 684 putative class members. Id. at 4. Defendant further submitted a supplemental declaration stating that additional items of recovery increased the amount to $6,743,912.50 for total unpaid wages, missed meal breaks, missed rest breaks, wage statement claim penalties, and failure to pay minimum wage penalties. Id. Plaintiff argued that Defendant presented no direct evidence to ground its assumptions of a weekly half hour in unpaid overtime and a 50% violation for meal and rest breaks on empirical data. Id. at 5. However, the Court noted that Plaintiff's alternate proposal to assume a 25% violation rate was likewise unattached to any factual evidence. Id. at 6. The Court ruled that Defendant was entitled to make assumptions on the violation rate so long as the assumptions were assumptions, which the Court found was the case here. Id. The Court thereby found that the total amount-in-controversy exceeded the jurisdictional threshold and denied Plaintiff's motion to remand.

Doe, et al. v. First Financial Security Inc.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 9152 (9th Cir. May 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of sales contractors, filed a class action alleging that Defendant failed to pay them sales commissions in violation of the California Labor Code. The District Court dismissed Plaintiffs' complaint with prejudice for failure to establish subject-matter jurisdiction under the CAFA. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded for further proceedings with instructions to grant Plaintiffs leave to amend their complaint. Id. at *1-2. The Ninth Circuit found that the District Court did not err by dismissing the complaint for failure to satisfy the CAFA's amount-in-controversy requirement. The Ninth Circuit noted that Plaintiffs' complaint made no allegations connecting the withheld commissions for the named Plaintiffs' sales network to the claims of the individual class members. Id. at *2. However, the Ninth Circuit found that the District Court abused its discretion by denying Plaintiffs leave to amend for three reasons. First, Ninth Circuit stated that amendment was not futile because the record suggested that, if given leave to amend, Plaintiffs could plausibly allege that: (i) there were approximately 360 sales contractors within the sales network who were eligible to receive commissions; (ii) the withheld commissions to these 360 sales contractors exceed $12 million; (iii) the 360 sales contractors are the same sales contractors as the approximately 360 individual class members in this case; and (iv) therefore, the withheld commissions for the individual class members exceeded $12 million. Id. at *3. Second, the Ninth Circuit found that the District Court dismissed the complaint sua sponte on two grounds not raised by Defendant, including: (i) Plaintiffs' amount-in-controversy allegations were facially deficient; and (ii) Plaintiffs' class action allegations failed to satisfy Local Rule 23-2.2's class definition pleading requirements. Id. Because neither ground was raised by Defendant, the Ninth Circuit held that the District Court should have provided Plaintiffs with leave to amend to correct the alleged deficiencies in their amount-in-controversy and class action allegations. Id. Third, the Ninth Circuit opined that the District Court erred in holding that Plaintiffs' class action allegations failed to satisfy Local Rule 23-2.2's class definition pleading requirements. Local Rule 23-2.2 requires that Plaintiffs in a class action allege "the definition of the proposed class" and "the size (or approximate size) of the proposed class." Id. at *4. Plaintiffs alleged that their class action consisted of former sales contractors who resigned from the company on and after May 10, 2014, including one sub-class consisting of approximately 260 sales contractors who entered into and performed their employment contracts within California, and a second sub-class consisting of approximately 100 sales contractors who entered into and performed their employment contracts outside California. Id. The Ninth Circuit determined that Plaintiffs' allegations appeared sufficient to satisfy Local Rule 23-2.2's class definition pleading requirements. Id. The Ninth Circuit also rejected Defendant's argument that Plaintiffs "repeatedly" failed to allege subject-matter jurisdiction. Id. The Ninth Circuit noted that Plaintiffs filed only two complaints attempting to allege subject-matter jurisdiction under the CAFA, and, the District Court dismissed the second of these two complaints sua sponte on grounds not raised by Defendant. Id. at *4-5. The Ninth Circuit found that Plaintiffs appeared able to cure the deficiencies identified in one of these grounds, and the other ground was legally erroneous. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded for further proceedings.

Dunson, et al. v. Cordis Corp.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 6446 (9th Cir. April 14, 2017). Plaintiff filed a putative class action seeking damages for injuries caused by Defendant's allegedly defective medical device. Plaintiff originally filed the action in state court. Defendant removed the action and seven other lawsuits to District Court, invoking the CAFA's mass action provision as the basis for removal. Each of the eight actions had fewer than 100 Plaintiffs, but together involved more than 100 named Plaintiffs. The parties agreed that the jurisdictional requirements for removal under the CAFA's mass action provision were met, except they disputed whether Plaintiffs' claims had been "proposed to be tried jointly." Id. at *2-3. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs proposed to try their claims jointly when they moved in state court to consolidate the eight actions. In the motion, Plaintiffs requested consolidation of the actions "for all pretrial purposes, including discovery and other proceedings, and the institution of a bellwether-trial process." Id. at *3. Plaintiffs stated that consolidation of the actions "for purposes of pretrial discovery and proceedings, along with the formation of a bellwether-trial process, will avoid unnecessary duplication of evidence and procedures in all of the actions, avoid the risk of inconsistent adjudications, and avoid many of the same witnesses testifying on common issues in all actions, as well as promote judicial economy and convenience." Id. The District Court held that Plaintiffs' consolidation motion did not propose a joint trial of their claims, and therefore the cases could not be removed under the CAFA's mass action provision. Id. at *3-4. Because Defendant asserted no other basis for federal jurisdiction, the District Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to remand. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The Ninth Circuit stated that the question before it was whether Plaintiffs' proposal for a bellwether-trial process amounted to a proposal to try their claims jointly. The Ninth Circuit explained that two types of bellwether-trials can be held when a large number of Plaintiffs assert the same or similar claims against a common Defendant. In the first type, the claims of a representative Plaintiff are tried, and the parties in the other cases agree that they will be bound by the outcome of that trial. Id. at *6. The Ninth Circuit noted that in the second (and far more common) type of bellwether-trial, the claims of a representative Plaintiff are tried, but the outcome of the trial is binding only as to the parties involved in the trial itself. Id. The results of the trial are used in the other cases purely for informational purposes as an aid to settlement. The Ninth Circuit ultimately determined that despite Defendant's contentions, Plaintiffs' references to the avoidance of inconsistent adjudications did not necessarily shed light on which type of bellwether-trial they were proposing. Since Defendant bore the burden of showing that Plaintiffs proposed a joint trial of their claims, the inconclusive nature of Plaintiffs' statements did not meet that burden. Id. at *10. The Ninth Circuit found that Plaintiffs requested consolidation for pre-trial purposes, and because their references to the avoidance of inconsistent adjudications could have been tied to that aspect of their request alone, those references did not necessarily say anything about whether they were proposing a joint trial. The Ninth Circuit determined that Plaintiffs requested consolidation for purposes of pre-trial proceedings, which standing alone, would not trigger removal jurisdiction under the CAFA's mass action provision. Finally, the Ninth Circuit found that Plaintiffs' request for consolidation for purposes of establishing a bellwether-trial process said nothing regarding whether they were referring to a bellwether-trial whose results would have preclusive effect on Plaintiffs in the other cases. The Ninth Circuit therefore held that the District Court correctly concluded that removal jurisdiction did not exist under the CAFA's mass action provision, and the remand order was proper.

Duran, et al. v. Sephora USA,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 128189 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 11, 2017). Plaintiff brought an action in state court and Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's second amended complaint under Rule 12(b)(1), asserting that the Court lacked jurisdiction under the CAFA. In response, Plaintiff filed a motion for leave to amend seeking to add FLSA claims to her complaint. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant's motion to dismiss should be denied because her proposed FLSA claims would give the Court federal question jurisdiction. Plaintiff also argued that she satisfied the CAFA's minimum diversity requirement and that Defendant waived its right to challenge Plaintiff's class claims under the CAFA's local controversy and home-state exceptions. Id. at *2. The Court granted Defendant's motion, finding that the CAFA's home-state controversy exemption applied. The Court also granted Plaintiff's motion for leave to amend her complaint to add the FLSA claims. Defendant contended that Plaintiff's claims failed to meet the CAFA's minimum diversity requirements or fall under one of the CAFA exceptions because more than two thirds of the class had last known residential addresses in California. Id. at *3. Plaintiff argued that the minimum diversity requirement was met, but did not challenge the merits of Defendant's assertion that her claims fell under the local controversy and home-state exceptions to the CAFA, instead arguing that Defendant waived the right to raise these exceptions through delay. At the outset, the Court noted that the home-state controversy exception provides that it "shall decline to exercise jurisdiction under [§ 1332(d)(2) where] two-thirds or more of the members of all proposed Plaintiff classes in the aggregate, and the primary Defendants, are citizens of the State in which the action was originally filed." Id. at *8-9. The Court stated that this exception cleared applied, as Defendant's records demonstrated that over 98% of the putative class members were residents of California. Further, the Court noted that Plaintiff's claims were asserted only against Defendant, a corporation headquartered in California, making Defendant a California citizen because it has its principal place of business in California. Id. at *9. Plaintiff argued that Defendant's home-state controversy exception argument, raised in its motion to dismiss more than 100 days after the initial complaint was filed, was untimely and Defendant thereby waived its right to raise the issue. Id. at *10. The Court noted that typically the Ninth Circuit suggests that motions to remand based on an exception to jurisdiction under the CAFA must be brought in a "reasonable time." Id. at *10-11. Assuming that the "reasonable time" requirement applicable to motions to remand would also apply to a motion to dismiss, the Court found that Defendant complied with this standard. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss. As to Plaintiff's motion for leave to file an amended complaint, Defendant argued that Plaintiff unduly delayed in seeking leave to add a FLSA claim. The Court reasoned that because the case was in its early stages, discovery had not yet begun, the FLSA claims may be meritorious, and the prejudice to Defendant was minimal or non-existent, there was insufficient justification to deny leave to amend. Therefore, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for leave to add a FLSA claim to her complaint.

Franke, et al. v. Anderson Merchandisers,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 119087 (C.D. Cal. July 28, 2017). Plaintiff filed an action in state court alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the California Labor Code. Defendant removed the action pursuant to the CAFA. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand. Defendant contended that the amount-in-controversy was $7,048,712.10. Id. at *3. As to Plaintiff's meal break claims, Defendant calculated the amount-in-controversy by counting the number of days in which an employee's average hours worked per day for a given pay period was five hours or more and then multiplying that number by an assumed 50% rate of violation and the average hourly rate of the putative class members. Id. at *4. For the rest break premium amount, Defendant applied the same methodology, except that it counted the number of days in which an employee's average hours worked per day for a pay period was three-and-a-half hours or more. Id. Plaintiff argued that it was unreasonable for Defendant to assume a 50% violation rate. The Court found that Plaintiff's allegations explicitly described a uniform practice, and failed to include any modifying language to suggest less than uniform violations. Id. at *5. Accordingly, given Plaintiff's broad allegations and failure to provide any rebutting evidence, the Court found that Defendant would be justified in using a 100% violation rate. The Court held that Defendant proved the meal and rest break premium amounts by a preponderance of the evidence. As to Plaintiff's waiting time penalties, the Court noted that an employer's failure to timely pay wages owed pursuant to §§ 201 or 202 results in a penalty of the employee's wages for every day that is late, up to a maximum of 30 days' wages, which Defendant adopted for its damages calculation. Id. at *6. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant failed to pay wages owed to Plaintiff and the putative class members "upon discharge or resignation . . . within any time permissible under California law." Id. at *7. Given the broad and vague allegations, the lack of any allegation that Defendant paid overdue wages to employees within 30 days after they ended employment, and Plaintiff's failure to submit any alternative evidence, the Court found Defendant's estimate appropriate. Id. at *9. As to Plaintiff's minimum wage claims, the Court noted that an employer must pay a penalty of $100 for the first failure to pay an employee minimum wages and $250 for each subsequent failure. Id. at *10. Defendant assumed employees were not paid minimum wages for each pay period, and used a one-year statute of limitations, applying a $100 penalty for 267 initial pay periods and a $250 penalty for 4,479 subsequent pay periods for California-based employees within the one-year limitations period, putting $1,146,450 in controversy. Id. The Court observed that Plaintiff failed to offer any evidence contradicting Defendant's calculations and found Defendant's estimate of minimum wage penalties sufficient in light of Plaintiff's allegations of a uniform policy and systematic scheme of wage abuse, failure to pay minimum wages at all material times, and policies and practices of failing to pay minimum wages. Id. at *11. Defendant also argued that California-based employees received inaccurate pay stubs for all applicable pay periods and that it calculated the amount- in-controversy by applying penalties. Defendant applied a $50 penalty for 267 initial pay periods and a $100 penalty for 4,479 subsequent pay periods for California-based employees within the one-year limitations period, putting $461,250 in controversy. Id. at *12. Plaintiff argued that Defendant did not support its use of a 100% wage statement violation rate with any evidence. The Court determined that Plaintiff failed to submit evidence showing a lower violation rate. The Court opined that coupled with Plaintiff's allegation that "at all material times set forth herein, Defendant failed to provide complete or accurate wage statements to Plaintiff and the other class members," and the lack of alternative evidence, the Court found that Defendant was justified in its use of a 100% violation rate. Id. at *13. Finally, Defendant estimated daily unpaid overtime by determining the number of pay periods in which an employee worked on average 7.9 hours or more per day, assuming one hour of overtime went unpaid for each day in those periods, and multiplying these hours by the overtime rate, which is 1.5 times the average hourly rate of putative class members. The Court found that a reasonable amount of attorneys' fees based on the damages amounts calculated by Defendant brought the amount-in-controversy over the CAFA's requirement for jurisdiction. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to remand.

Hamid, et al. v. Nike Retail Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 90953 (C.D. Cal. June 13, 2017). Plaintiff filed an action in state court asserting that Defendant violated various provisions of the California Labor Code. Defendant removed the case pursuant to the CAFA. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, asserting that the Court must decline to exercise jurisdiction because either the local controversy exception or the home-state controversy exception applied. Id. at *6. Plaintiff initially argued that Defendant failed to prove that the CAFA amount-in-controversy requirement was met. However, the Court found that even if Defendants used a conservative violation rate estimate of 30%, the amount-in-controversy requirement would be met, and that was only taking into account only two of Plaintiff's 14 claims. Id. at *8-9. Accordingly, the Court held that Defendants plausibly alleged that the amount-in-controversy requirement was met. Therefore, the Court concluded that Defendants carried their burden of establishing that the CAFA granted it jurisdiction. The Court also analyzed Plaintiff's arguments that the statutory exceptions to the CAFA applied. As to the local controversy exemption, the Court noted that it must decline to exercise jurisdiction over a class action in which: (i) greater than two-thirds of the members of all proposed Plaintiff classes in the aggregate are citizens of the state in which the action was originally filed; (ii) at least one Defendant is a Defendant from whom significant relief is sought and whose alleged conduct forms a significant basis for the claims asserted by the proposed Plaintiff class; and who is a citizen of the State in which the action was originally filed; (iii) principal injuries resulting from the alleged conduct or any related conduct of each Defendant were incurred in the state in which the action was originally filed; and (iv) during the 3-year period preceding the filing of that class action, no other class action was filed asserting the same or similar factual allegations against any Defendants on behalf of the same or other persons. Id. at *9-10. The Court noted that Plaintiff offered evidence that more than two-thirds of the class members were California citizens. Additionally, it did not appear there are any other class actions arising out these circumstances that have been filed against Defendants in the last three years. Id. at *11. Further, Plaintiff offered evidence that Defendant Lopez, a district director, was a California citizen and therefore a local Defendant. Defendants argued that Plaintiff failed to allege facts to support the argument that class members sought "significant relief" against Lopez or that Lopez's alleged conduct formed a significant basis for the claims asserted by the proposed Plaintiff class. The Court determined that Plaintiff challenged a state-wide policy, which strongly indicated that the state-wide management of Defendant's operations formed the basis of the allegations, and not the actions of any individual district director alone. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiff failed to carry his burden of proving that Lopez's conduct formed a significant basis for the claims asserted. Further, the Court noted that Plaintiff failed to provide the Court with any evidence of how many class members were employed in Lopez's district, and therefore only a very small sub-section of the class might be able to seek recovery from her. Accordingly, the Court opined that Plaintiff had borne his burden of showing that significant relief was sought from Lopez. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Court determined that the local controversy exception did not apply. Plaintiff further argued that the home-state exception applied. However, the Court ruled that there was no dispute that Defendant Nike, an Oregon corporation, was the primary Defendant, and the home-state exception applies only when all of the primary Defendants are citizens of the forum state. Accordingly, the Court found that the home-state exception did not apply. The Court thereby denied Plaintiff's motion to remand.

Henry, et al. v. Century Freight Lines, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 10995 (9th Cir. June 21, 2017). Plaintiff, a truck driver, filed a class action in state court alleging that Defendant misclassified drivers as independent contractors and thereby failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the California Labor Code. Defendant removed the action to the District Court. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, which the District Court granted pursuant to the CAFA. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed the District Court's ruling. Plaintiff sought to represent a class of all those: (i) who worked in California for Defendant; (ii) as a truck driver; (iii) during the four years preceding the complaint's filing; and (iv) who were classified as an independent contractor. Id. at *2. Plaintiff sought reimbursement for all costs and expenses of owning and/or leasing, repairing, maintaining, and fueling the trucks and vehicles driven while conducting work for Defendant in violation of § 2802 of the California Labor Code. Id. In opposing Plaintiff's motion to remand, Defendant provided evidence of the amount that California-resident truck drivers paid in "lease-related payments." Id. In support of remand, Plaintiff argued that lease payments could not be considered for purposes of the amount-in-controversy because they were not recoverable as a matter of law. The Ninth Circuit, however, ruled that in determining the amount-in-controversy, a District Court must accept the allegations contained in the complaint as true and thereby assume the jury will return a verdict in Plaintiff's favor on every claim. Id. The complaint stated multiple times that Plaintiff sought reimbursement for "all costs and expenses of leasing" the trucks. Id. at *4. As such, the Ninth Circuit explained that lease-related payments had been placed into controversy and were properly considered for purposes of the CAFA's jurisdiction. Id. The Ninth Circuit therefore concluded that Defendant produced sufficient evidence to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Id. Defendant provided a declaration from Todd Militzer, its Vice President and Chief Financial Officer, who attested that during the class period, independently-owner truck drivers who provided a California address as his or her primary residence and worked in California paid more than $2,250,000 in lease-related payments and more than $7,450,000 in deductions for fuel. Id. The Ninth Circuit held that Militzer's declaration was sufficient to carry Defendant's burden. The Ninth Circuit thereby reversed and remanded with the instruction to the District Court that Defendant established the CAFA's jurisdictional requirements. Id. at *5.

Hernandez, et al. v. Starbucks Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 108081 (C.D. Cal. July 12, 2017). Plaintiff filed an action in state court alleging claims against Defendants for violation of the California Labor Code, including failure to provide meal breaks and rest breaks, failure to provide minimum wages and overtime wages, failure to timely pay final wages, and failure to provide accurate wage statements. Defendant removed the action pursuant to the CAFA. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, alleging that Defendant failed to meet the burden of proof that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Defendant calculated the amount-in-controversy to be at least $5,118,960, including: (i) $1,152,989 for failure to provide meal breaks; (ii) $1,152,989 for failure to provide rest breaks; (iii) $1,387,170 in unpaid wages and liquidated damages; (iv) $460,480 in waiting time penalties; (v) $323,700 in wage statement penalties; (vi) $98,803 for failure to reimburse business expenses; and (vii) $542,838 in attorneys' fees. Id. at *3-4. Defendant estimated that the amount-in-controversy for Plaintiff's meal break claim was $1,152,989. The Court noted that this calculation was based on the assumption that each class member incurred one meal break violation per shift during the class period. Id. at *5-6. Defendant contended that this assumption was warranted in light of Plaintiff's allegation that pursuant to a "pattern and practice," Defendants "regularly failed to provide meal breaks due to the "uniform administration of corporate policy." Id. at *6. In contrast, Plaintiff presented evidence that she was unable to take an off-duty meal period approximately 70% of the time, or 3 to 4 times per workweek "because of the way the company required store managers to schedule employees." Id. Extrapolating this 70% violation rate for the class, and relying on the data Defendants provided, Plaintiff calculated the amount-in-controversy for her meal break claim to be $807,092 ($1,152,989 x 0.7), which reduced the amount-in-controversy below $5 million. Id. at *7. Plaintiff also contended that Defendants' minimum wage and overtime wage estimates should be reduced because they were derived from Defendants' 100% meal break violation rate. Id. The Court concluded that Defendants failed to demonstrate, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. The Court found that Plaintiff's complaint referred to a "uniform administration of corporate policy," and that the most reasonable reading of Plaintiff's allegations was not that Defendants failed to provide an off-duty meal period on each and every shift, but rather that Defendants had a uniform policy which resulted in class members' inability to take an off-duty meal period on a regular basis. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Defendants' assumption of a 100% violation rate was unreasonable. Id. The Court reasoned that it had no choice but to conclude that Defendants failed to meet its burden of demonstrating by a preponderance of the evidence that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion to remand.

Hernandez, et al. v. Sysco Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10538 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a former employee, brought a class action alleging that Defendants violated several provisions of the California Labor Code. Defendants removed the action pursuant to the CAFA. Plaintiff moved to remand the action under the local controversy exception of the CAFA, and the Court denied the motion. Defendants alleged that removal was proper under the CAFA because the case had more than 100 putative class members, the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5,000,000, and Plaintiff was a citizen of California whereas Defendants were citizens of Delaware and Texas. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff did not dispute that Defendants made a prima facie case of removal under the CAFA and instead he contended that remand was appropriate under the local controversy exception. The Court stated that in establishing that the local controversy provision applied, a party must prove that during the 3-year period preceding the filing of that class action, no other class action was filed asserting the same or similar factual allegations against any Defendants on behalf of the same or other persons. Id. at *3-4. The Court found Defendants offered evidence that a similar class action complaint was filed in San Diego Superior Court in April 2014. Id. at *5. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiff did not meet his burden of showing that the local controversy exception applied because he did not establish that during the three years preceding the filing of this action no other class action was filed asserting the same or similar claims against the same Defendants, as required by the exception. Id. The Court held that since Plaintiff did not demonstrate that each required element of the local controversy exception was satisfied, it must deny Plaintiff's motion for remand. Id. Plaintiff argued that the Court should nonetheless apply the local controversy exception and decline jurisdiction because Defendants did not identify the previous class action in its removal notice. Id. The Court, however, opined that it was Plaintiff's burden to show the local controversy requirement applied, not Defendants' burden to show that it does not. Id. at *6. The Court, accordingly, denied Plaintiff's motion for remand.

In Re Pfizer,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 79714 (N.D. Cal. May 23, 2017). Thousands of women in over 100 cases filed in California state court alleged that the use of Lipitor caused them to suffer from Type II diabetes. Defendant removed the matters pursuant to the CAFA's mass action provision, and the cases were consolidated under a master case number for administrative purposes. Plaintiffs then filed a consolidated motion to remand on the grounds that 100 or more Plaintiffs had not proposed that their cases be tried jointly. Id. at *416. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to remand. Three Plaintiffs filed a petition with the California Judicial Council to have their individual cases coordinated in a Joint Council Coordinated Proceeding ("JCCP"). A group of 21 additional Plaintiffs from eight other state court cases then filed an amended coordination petition, and stated that other cases would be filed, and requested that Plaintiffs from those cases could be added via add-on petitions. Id. at *417. Plaintiffs argued that jurisdiction pursuant to the CAFA's mass action provision did not apply, because only 65 Plaintiffs at most proposed that their cases be jointly tried, as that was the maximum number of Plaintiffs that ever attempted to join the JCCP. Id. at *431. Plaintiffs stated that all other remaining Plaintiffs did nothing more than file actions in state court, and the JCCP could not bind them to Plaintiffs who had not yet been added through an add-on petition or other means. Id. Defendant argued that the JCCP proposed joining other Plaintiffs to the coordinated action by "stating that they would seek to add all subsequent Lipitor claims." Id. at *432. However, the Court found that the JCCP's statements were insufficient to trigger the CAFA's mass action jurisdiction. The Court stated that suggestions or predications were not voluntary affirmations proposing a joint trial on behalf of the remaining Plaintiffs. Id. The Court determined that absent add-on petitions or similar affirmative actions or definitive commitments by the remaining Plaintiffs, they had not proposed a joint trial. Id. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs are free to structure actions to avoid the CAFA's jurisdiction. Id. at *436. The Court also stated that it would not speculate on whether 35 or more Plaintiffs would ever take action in the future to be part of and bound by a proposal for a joint trial. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to remand.

Liberty Mutual Fire Insurance Co., et al. v. EZ FLO International, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 25306 (9th Cir. Dec. 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of 26 insurance companies in their capacity as subrogees of 145 insured homeowners, alleged that Defendant, a manufacturer of supply lines that connects water pipes to plumbing fixtures, produced defective products that allowed water to leak out of the supply lines. Plaintiffs filed their lawsuit in state court, but after they amended their complaint to seek over $5 million in damages allegedly suffered by their 145 insureds, Defendant filed a notice of removal pursuant to the CAFA. Plaintiffs then moved to remand. The District Court granted the motion to remand, holding that it lacked jurisdiction under the CAFA because the amended complaint did not include more than 100 named Plaintiffs. Defendant thereafter appealed to the Ninth Circuit. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's remand order. The Ninth Circuit explained that at issue in the appeal was whether a lawsuit filed by 26 insurance companies, acting as subrogees of their 145 insureds, involved "claims of 100 or more persons" within the meaning of the CAFA. Id. at *4. Citing the U.S. Supreme Court's analysis in Mississippi ex rel. Hood v. AU Optronics Corp., 134 S. Ct. 736 (2014), the Ninth Circuit opined that the U.S. Supreme Court's conclusion that the word "persons" in the phrase "100 or more persons" was synonymous with named Plaintiffs. Id. at *6. Defendant argued that Hood was distinguishable because Plaintiffs in Hood were unnamed, while the insureds here were identified in the case caption by reference to an attached exhibit. The Ninth Circuit rejected this argument, holding that even if the insureds were named in the amended complaint, they were still not named Plaintiffs, as required by Hood. Id. at *8-9. The Ninth Circuit thus concluded that the insureds were not Plaintiffs since they did not file the lawsuit, nor had they filed, served, or been served with any papers in the case. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's remand order, holding that the CAFA's numerosity requirement was not satisfied. Id. at *12.

Lopez, et al. v. Bank Of America,* Case No. 17-CV-2383 (N.D. Cal. July 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a banker, filed a state court class action alleging that Defendant under-paid bankers in violation of the California Labor Code. Defendant removed the matter pursuant to the CAFA. Plaintiff moved to remand, arguing that Defendant could not show that the matter met the amount-in-controversy threshold of $5 million. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff put $8,014,405.49 in controversy with her overtime claims and the portion of the estimated attorneys' fees for the claims. Id. at 1. Additionally, Defendant asserted that Plaintiff's remaining claims put an additional $3,270,367.59 in controversy. The Court found that the limited evidence provided by the parties suggested that the assumptions regarding the overtime claims were unreasonable. Id. at 2. Defendant submitted the declaration of Joseph Bush, a vice president, in support of its notice of removal. The Court held that Bush's declaration did not include any information supporting Defendant's assumption about the alleged number of overtime hours worked. Id. The Court noted that Plaintiff provided some evidence that she did not work as many overtime hours as Defendant assumed because she did not work some weeks and she had vacations. Id. at *2-3. The Court determined that although Plaintiff's declaration was limited to her own experience, it was the only evidence on the alleged violation rate for the overtime claims. Accordingly, the Court found that there was some evidence that the assumption rate used by Defendant was unreasonable. The Court further held that there was a similar lack of evidence supporting Defendant's assumptions about the other claims. Id. at 3. Accordingly, the Court found that Defendant failed to demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that there was more than $5 million in controversy, and granted Plaintiff's motion to remand.

Morgan, et al. v. Childtime Childcare, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 186537 (C.D. Cal. Nov. 10, 2017). Plaintiff filed a putative class action in state court against Defendants. Defendants removed Plaintiff's case, and Plaintiff moved to remand. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion. The parties disputed whether the $5 million threshold for jurisdiction under the CAFA had been met. Defendants claimed that Plaintiff's unpaid overtime claim alone placed $2,226,577.32 in controversy based on an average hourly rate of $12.12 per hour for the 1,615 putative class members who worked a total of 122,474 weeks during the relevant time period. Id. at *7-8. Using the overtime wage of $18.18 times 122,474 workweeks resulted in $2,226,577.32. Id. at *8. Plaintiff argued that it was unreasonable for Defendants to assume that all 1,615 employees worked one hour of unpaid overtime per week. The Court, however, stated that the amount-in-controversy requirement generally is satisfied where Defendants assume a 100% violation rate based on allegations of a uniform illegal practice and where Plaintiff offers no evidence rebutting this violation rate. Id. at *9. The Court concluded that Plaintiff's complaint was broad, did not specify how often the alleged violations occurred, and only alleged that the violations were part of a "uniform policy and systematic scheme of wage abuse" without further qualification. Id. The Court therefore held that, considering the weight of authority supporting use of Defendants' assumed violation rate under these circumstances, it would not require Defendants to use a lower rate. Id. Defendants further contended that Plaintiff's meal period claim and rest period claim each placed $1,484,384.88 at stake using the same calculations. Id. at *9-10. The Court determined that Plaintiff's complaint included little limitation on how often those violations occurred and alleged a "uniform and systematic" scheme of violating employees' right to meal and rest periods. Id. at *10. Therefore, considering the pervasiveness and the daily requirement of meal and rest breaks, the Court held that Defendants were not unreasonable in assuming one meal period and one rest period violation per week per employee. Id. Defendants also placed $2,118,600 in controversy for waiting time claims and $1,773,800 in controversy for wage statement claims. The Court therefore found that Defendants demonstrated that more than $5 million was at stake in this case. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Defendants had sufficiently established the requisite amount-in-controversy under the CAFA and it denied Plaintiff's motion to remand.

Rachner, et al. v. Network Funding, L.P*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 190081 (C.D. Cal. Nov. 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a class action in state court alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the California Labor Code and the California Unfair Competition Law. Defendant removed the action, asserting that the amount-in-controversy for at least one named Plaintiff exceeded the jurisdictional minimum. Defendant based its determination on communications between the parties in preparation for a mediation during which Plaintiffs' counsel stated that he had incurred attorneys' fees of approximately $150,000 "without any lodestar multiplier" and that fees through trial "could be up to $500,000." Id. at *3. Plaintiffs' counsel further contended that Plaintiff Rachner's compensatory damages included: (i) unpaid overtime wages of $35,969.853; (ii) unreimbursed business expenses of $1,040; (iii) waiting time penalties of $22,168.39; and (iv) wage statement penalties of $1,600. Defendant calculated that Rachner would be entitled to additional liquidated damages in the amount of $8,460 for unpaid minimum wages based on his alleged 864 hours of unpaid overtime. Defendant, therefore, calculated Rachner's total damages, exclusive of attorneys' fees, at $69,238.24. Id. at *4. The Court noted that the statutes on which Plaintiffs based their claims provided for the recovery of attorneys' fees and Plaintiffs sought an award of reasonable attorneys' fees. Thus, the Court found that it was clear that attorneys' fees could be included toward the amount-in-controversy. Id. at *9. Defendant produced evidence that Plaintiff Rachner's compensatory claims reasonably could total $69,238.24 and that, at the time of removal, his attorneys' fees exceeded $5,761.76. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Defendant demonstrated by a preponderance of the evidence that the amount-in-controversy for Plaintiff Rachner's claims was likely to exceed $75,000. Id. at *9-10. The Court therefore denied Plaintiffs' motion to remand.

Ramirez-Duenas, et al. v. TF Outdoor LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 61986 (E.D. Cal. April 24, 2017). Plaintiff, an employee, filed a putative class action on behalf of himself and fellow employees alleging various violations of the California Labor Code by Defendant. Plaintiff originally filed the action in state court. Defendant removed the action, contending that it had jurisdiction pursuant to the CAFA because: (i) the matter involved 100 or more putative class members; (ii) minimal diversity existed between the parties; and (iii) the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Id. at *1. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, arguing that the amount-in-controversy did not exceed $5 million. Id. at *2. Plaintiff and the putative class were non-exempt employees who worked in Defendant's warehouse from December 7, 2012 to the present. Defendant estimated Plaintiff's claimed five causes of action resulted in an amount-in-controversy of $5.8 million. One of Plaintiff's claims was that "for at least a portion of the liability period," warehouse employees were paid a "meal period premium payments in increments of one-half one hour" rather than one additional hour of pay as required by the California Labor Code . Id. at *3. Defendant calculated the amount-in-controversy for the meal period claim by assuming that each putative class member was not provided with a compliant meal period at least three times per week. Id. at *3-4. By using that number multiplied by half of hourly minimum wage by the 217 class period, Defendant determined an amount-in-controversy for this claim of $1,852,420. Id. at *4. Plaintiff asserted that the calculation was erroneous because: (i) Defendant assumed a violation rate without any evidence to support its assumption; (ii) Defendant's amount-in-controversy calculation was premised on the total number of possible meal period violations (based on the assumed violation rate) rather than the number of unpaid meal period premiums owed; and (iii) Defendant based its calculation on the present minimum wage, not the then-applicable minimum wage. Id. at *5-6. The Court addressed the first concern only and found that Plaintiff's complaint was devoid of any indication of how frequently Defendant failed to provide him or the class members with a meal break. Id. at *6-7. Defendant contended that it "could reasonably have assumed," based on the allegations of the complaint, "up to two defective meal breaks per day, or ten per five-day workweek." Id. at *8. The Court determined, however, that as no part of Plaintiff's complaint spoke to the frequency of the alleged meal period denials, no reasonable inference could be drawn from the complaint regarding the frequency of meal period denials. Id. The Court stated that applying an assumed 100% violation rate where no underlying facts existed to the support that conclusion – relying exclusively on the reasoning that the complaint did not restrict the violation rate to a rate that is discernably smaller than 100% – improperly shifted the burden of establishing subject-matter jurisdiction to Plaintiff. The Court therefore declined to assume a 100% meal period violation rate based on the allegations of the complaint. The Court ruled that an assumption that meal period violations took place every day was unreasonable as a matter of law. Id. at *12. As Defendant submitted no evidence to establish the frequency of meal period violations, the Court held that it could not accept a 100% violation rate based on the allegations of the complaint and evidence submitted, but no alternative rate was clear. Id. at *13. The Court therefore permitted Defendant to submit supplemental briefing and evidence in support of its assumed three-violations-per-week rate of meal period denial. Id. at *15.

Reyes, et al. v. Carehouse Health,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103764 (C.D. Cal. July 5, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action in state court alleging that Defendant violated several violations of the California Labor Code. Defendant removed the action and one year later, Plaintiff filed a motion to remand. The Court denied Plaintiff's motion. Defendant alleged that the amount-in-controversy exceeded the CAFA's minimum requirement for federal jurisdiction. Defendants offered calculations for Plaintiff's claims for unpaid meal and rest period premiums, unpaid overtime compensation, waiting time penalties, and attorneys' fees in order to reach the jurisdictional threshold. Plaintiff contended that Defendants had not met their burden of establishing the amount-in-controversy under the CAFA because their calculations were based on "unreasonable assumptions" about her claims. Id. at *6. To calculate the amount-in-controversy for Defendants' alleged meal and rest period violations, Defendants assigned a violation rate of one meal break violation and one rest break violation per week per class member. Id. at *6-7. Defendants offered the declaration of Christina Young, the Senior Director of Business Applications for Genesis Curative Services LLC (which provided contracted payroll services to Defendant Southwest), who attested that the putative class members worked a total of 43,829 workweeks during the relevant four-year statutory period at an average hourly rate of pay of $21.27. Id. at *8. Accordingly, Defendants calculated the total amount of missed meal and rest break premiums as $1,864,485.66. Based on the same average hourly pay rate of $21.27, Defendants calculated the average overtime rate for the putative class members as $31.91 per hour. Id. at *10. Assuming one hour of unpaid overtime wages for each putative class member for each workweek during the four-year statutory period, the total amount of unpaid overtime wages amounted to $1,398,583.39. Id. Defendants calculated the total amount of potential waiting time penalties as $1,776,470.40. Id. Finally, for Plaintiff's desired attorneys' fees, Defendants maintained that 25% of recovery was a reasonable amount of fees in a class action such as this one. Id. at *11. Defendants contended that Plaintiff was not entitled to attorneys' fees for her meal and rest break or her waiting time claims, so 25% of her unpaid overtime claims would total $349,645.85 (i.e., 25% of $1,398,583.39 unpaid overtime wage liability). Id. at *11-12. Accordingly, Defendants asserted the total amount-in-controversy was at least $5,389,185.30. Plaintiff countered that Defendants assumed "every single class member suffered a violation under each claim during every single week of their employment." Id. at *12. The Court disagreed and found that Defendants employed reasonable estimates of one violation per week per employee for the meal and rest break and overtime claims. Further, the Court opined that Defendants presented evidence that their calculations were conservative. Id. at *13. At her deposition, Plaintiff estimated that Defendants did not allow her to take rest breaks three or four days per week and did not provide her with meal breaks six days per week. For that reason, the Court found significant that Defendants' estimates were lower than the rates Plaintiff herself previously suggested. The Court therefore determined that Defendants demonstrated that the amount-in-controversy was met by a preponderance of the evidence, and it denied Plaintiff's motion to remand.

Scott, et al. v. Credico (USA) LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 155600 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 22, 2017). Plaintiffs filed an action in state court alleging that Defendants violated the California Labor Code and California Business and Professions Code. Defendants removed the action. Plaintiffs later clarified that the proposed class was limited to those employees jointly employed by Defendants Credico, Sprint/UMC, and Latitude, rather than including those employed by any Defendants. In support of their notice of removal, Defendants estimated the amount-in-controversy for the wage claims (including base pay and overtime) as $1,607,953.70. Defendants also calculated damages $240,600 for § 558 penalties, $593,350 for unpaid wages penalties, $242,710 for meal and rest break premiums, $949,627 for waiting time penalties, and 25% of the total recovery for attorneys' fees. Id. at *5. Defendants thereby estimated the total amount-in-controversy was $7,427,741.87. The Court stated that Defendants had not met their burden to demonstrate that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Defendants presented a calculation of "gross wages" based on the total number of hours worked per week by putative class members, the number of workweeks, and the applicable wage rate (including variations of the minimum wage over time, and overtime versus regular time rates). Id. at *6-7. Defendants acknowledged that they have already paid class members approximately $950,000 as compensation for their work. Id. at *7. The Court noted that the amount in dispute and the wages were for unpaid overtime wages. Accordingly, the amount of unpaid overtime wages in dispute was $657,953.70, not 1,607,953.70. Id. at *8. The Court found that Defendants' uncontested evidence established wages were paid and that Plaintiffs were only seeking to recover unpaid wages, not total gross wages. The Court determined that the revised damages came to $3,801,594. Defendants sought to add attorneys' fees of 25% of recovery. The Court held that because contingency fees based on a common fund recovery are not damages, they should not be counted as part of the amount-in-controversy. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court held that Defendants have not demonstrated, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. The Court therefore granted Plaintiffs' motion to remand.

Vikram, et al. v. First Student Management, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 166396 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 6, 2017). Plaintiff, a bus driver, filed a state court action alleging that Defendant failed to accurately calculate and pay for all time worked in violation of the California Labor Code. Defendant removed the action to the District Court pursuant to the CAFA, asserting that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, arguing that Defendant failed to substantiate its claims that there was diversity of citizenship, more than 100 class members, and that the amount-in-controversy was over $5 million. Id. at *5. Plaintiff challenged Defendant's assertions of diversity of citizenship and the number of class members on the ground that Defendant's removal notice lacked information and evidence. In response, Defendant provided a declaration by its corporate officer which stated that Defendant is a corporation incorporated under Delaware law and headquartered in Ohio. Defendant also provided a declaration stating that per Defendant's time-keeping data and employment/payroll records, there were 5,750 non-exempt employees working as bus drivers in California during the class period. Id. at *7. The Court concluded that based on the declarations, Defendant established by a preponderance of the evidence that the case met the CAFA's diversity and numerosity requirements. Id. at *7-8. As to the amount-in-controversy, Defendant estimated Plaintiff's waiting time penalties claim as $6,160,126.83, wage statement claims as $7,346,550, minimum wage claims as $2,280,685.09, and attorneys' fees as $5,209,829.43. Id. at *8. In support, Defendant relied primarily on a declaration stating that Defendant's "payroll records show that from July 6, 2016 to July 21, 2017, First Student issued 75,301 wage statements to 3,671 non-exempt California bus drivers." Id. at *9-10. Based on these numbers, Defendant calculated the $50 penalty as $183,550 (3,671 initial pay period violations x $50), and the subsequent pay period violations as $7,163,000 (71,630 subsequent pay period violations x $100), for a total of $7,346,550. Id. at *10. Plaintiff argued that Defendant could not assume a 100% violation rate because Plaintiff's complaint alleged that Defendant only issued inaccurate wage statements "from time to time." Id. at *11. The Court stated that while Plaintiff may have pled that the inaccurate wage statements were only issued "from time to time," Plaintiff's wage statement claim stated that "Defendant failed to list the total hours worked by Plaintiff and other California Labor Sub-Class Members each pay period because of Defendant's policy that required California Labor Sub-Class Members to work off-the-clock." Id. at *11-12. The Court determined that this claim then turned to the "mandatory" practice of requiring workers to arrive at a pre-designated time, where they would have to wait in line to retrieve their route assignments and bus keys. Id. at *12. Thus, based on Plaintiff's own allegations, the Court found it was reasonable to assume that every wage statement would be in violation, based on Defendant's "mandatory" practice of requiring workers to arrive at pre-designated times, which resulted in off-the-clock work that would not be reflected in "each" pay period. Id. The Court thereby concluded that Defendant demonstrated by a preponderance of the evidence that the wage statement penalty claim was worth $7,346,550, more than the CAFA's $5 million requirement. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to remand.

Vilitchai, et al. v. Ametek Programmable Power, Inc., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31623 (S.D. Cal. Mar. 6, 2017). Plaintiff filed a complaint in state court asserting unlawful business practices in violation § 17200 of the California Business and Professions Code. Plaintiff alleged that Defendants failed to pay minimum wage, overtime, and wages to cover missed meal and rest breaks. Defendants removed the action based on diversity jurisdiction under the CAFA. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand and argued that Defendants did not sufficiently support the $5 million minimum jurisdictional requirement under the CAFA. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion. Plaintiff argued that Defendants' allegations were erroneous because they rested on the assumption that the class included over 110,000 non-exempt or hourly-paid employees employed in California. Plaintiff offered to amend the complaint to clarify the scope of the putative class to include only those of Defendants' non-exempt or hourly-paid California employees who worked for Defendant Ametek. The Court noted that when the class allegations were read in the context of the complaint as a whole, it was apparent that the putative class included only employees who were placed with Ametek in California. Id. at *4. The Court found that Defendants' assumption that the putative class comprised more than 110,000 members and that the amount-in-controversy therefore exceeded $5 million was unsupported, and thus insufficient to meet Defendants' burden in opposing Plaintiff's motion to remand. Defendants also filed a separate opposition to Plaintiff's motion, arguing that if only its own non-exempt or hourly-paid employees were included in the putative class, the amount-in-controversy still exceeded $5 million. Id. at *6. However, the Court determined that Defendants' calculation was based on the assumption of a 100% violation rate for the meal and rest break violations and a one-hour per week violation rate for the overtime violations. Id. Defendants argued the assumption was based on the allegations in the complaint. As to the meal and rest break violations, Defendants interpreted the complaint to allege a 100% violation rate, i.e., that in every instance of a class member working more than a five-hour shift, Defendants failed to provide for a meal and rest break. Id. at *7-8. The Court opined that although Plaintiff alleged Defendants had a "uniform policy and systematic scheme of wage abuse," such allegations did not support a 100% violation rate. Id. at *8. The Court reasoned that the complaint did not allege class members missed all meal and rest breaks, or even that Defendants failed to compensate them for every meal or rest break which was missed, and therefore the complaint did not support a 100% or any other specific violation rate. Id. The Court therefore found that Defendants failed to provide evidence in support of their assumption that the meal and rest break violations occurred on every shift of five or more hours. Id. at *9. As to overtime, Defendants contended that the complaint alleged that Ametek "failed to pay for any overtime . . . ." Id. However, the Court concluded that the complaint alleged that Defendants failed to pay overtime for "all the hours worked." Id. The Court found the difference between "any" and "all" to be material because whereas the allegation that Defendants did not pay for any overtime would support a 100% violation rate, the allegation that they did not pay for all overtime allowed for a conclusion that Defendants paid for some of the overtime worked. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion to remand.

Young, et al. v. Novartis Pharmaceutical Corp*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170961 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 16, 2017). Plaintiff, an employee, filed a putative class action in state court alleging several violations under the California Labor Code and the California Business and Professions Code. Defendant removed the case pursuant to the CAFA. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, and the Court granted the motion, finding that the amount-in-controversy did not meet the CAFA's threshold of $5 million. Defendant calculated the amount-in-controversy at more than $8 million, including: (i) unpaid overtime wages of $744,242.88; (ii) missed meal and rest break premiums of $4,961,046; (iii) waiting time penalties of $595,929.60; (vi) wage statement penalties of $145,150.00; and (v) attorneys' fees of $1,611,592.12. Id. at *3. The Court stated that even assuming that all the assumptions made for unpaid overtime wages, waiting time penalties, and wage statement penalties were reasonable, the amount-in-controversy for those three counts was only $1,485,322.48. Id. at *6. Therefore, the Court noted that the key issue was the amount-of-controversy attributed to the meal and rest break premiums. The Court opined that in calculating the meal and rest break premiums, Defendant assumed a 100% violation rate. Defendant argued that the assumption was reasonable because Plaintiff alleged that class members were denied meal and rest breaks "at all material times," based on a "uniform policy/practice of wage abuse that involved failing to pay them for . . . missed meal periods and rest breaks," and policies and practices "requiring employees . . . to work through their meal and rest periods without paying them proper compensation." Id. at *7. The Court disagreed and found that Plaintiff's allegations that Defendant engaged in a uniform policy and practice of meal/rest break violations could not support the assumption that the violations happened 100% of the time. The Court held that even if one could infer from such allegations that each time a meal break or rest break was missed, Defendant failed to pay for the meal/rest break premium, the allegations did not show how often an employee missed a meal break or rest break. Id. The Court determined that if it were to assume a more reasonable violation rate of two days a week, the damages for missed meal and rest breaks would amount to $1,984,418.40. Id. at *10. Adding the claims for unpaid overtime wages, waiting time penalties, and wage statement penalties, total damages would equal $3,469,740.88. Id. at *11. Further, the Court found that attorneys' fees may be counted toward the amount-in-controversy only if "an underlying statute authorizes an award of attorneys' fees, either with mandatory or discretionary language." Id. In this case, the Court stated that the only fee-shifting statute was for the wage-statement-penalty claim. The Court reasoned that Defendant failed to present any evidence to support an estimate of attorneys' fees that Plaintiff might recover based on a projected lodestar, nor did Defendant provided any basis for the Court to conclude that a 25% benchmark provided a reasonable proxy for the lodestar estimate. Id. at *12. Therefore, the Court held that Defendant failed to prove by a preponderance of evidence that attorneys' fees should be included in the amount-in-controversy. Further, even if a 25% award were included, the Court stated that the total amount-in-controversy would not reach $5 million. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion to remand.

(x) Tenth Circuit

Speed, et al. v. JMA Energy Co., LLC*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 18968 (10th Cir. Oct. 2, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action in state court alleging that Defendant, an oil and gas producer, violated Oklahoma law by failing to pay interest on delayed payments of revenue from oil and gas production to mineral-interest owners. Defendant removed the case based on the CAFA. Id. at *2. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, arguing it could prove mandatory and discretionary exceptions to the CAFA. After conducting jurisdictional discovery, Plaintiff filed an amended motion to remand. The District Court granted the motion relying on an exception to the CAFA that permits a District Court to decline to exercise jurisdiction over a class action meeting certain citizenship prerequisites "in the interests of justice and looking at the totality of the circumstances" and based on its consideration of six enumerated factors. Id. On appeal, the Tenth Circuit affirmed the District Court's remand order. After Plaintiff moved to remand following Defendant's removal, the District Court permitted the parties to conduct discovery on the jurisdictional issues. Id. at *6. The parties later stipulated that the aggregated claims totaled $5 million, and that more than one-third, but fewer than two-thirds, of the proposed class members were Oklahoma citizens. As a result of this discovery and the stipulation, Plaintiff filed an amended motion to remand, asserting the discretionary exception to jurisdiction under the CAFA, which allows a District Court to decline to exercise jurisdiction over a class action that is otherwise covered by the CAFA based on six enumerated factors, including: (i) whether the claims asserted involve matters of national or interstate interest; (ii) whether the claims asserted will be governed by laws of the state in which the action was originally filed; (iii) whether the class action had been pleaded in a manner that seeks to avoid federal jurisdiction; (iv) whether the action was brought in a forum with a distinct nexus with the class members, the alleged harm, or Defendants; (v) whether the number of citizens of the state in which the action was originally filed in all proposed Plaintiff classes in the aggregate is substantially larger than the number of citizens from any other state, and the citizenship of the other members of the proposed class is dispersed among a substantial number of states; and (vi) whether, during the three-year period preceding the filing of that class action, one or more other class actions asserting the same or similar claims on behalf of the same or other persons have been filed. Id. at *7-8. Addressing each of the six factors, the Tenth Circuit held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in remanding the case. Regarding the first, second, and fifth elements, the Tenth Circuit opined that the claims primarily concerned Oklahoma state interests, Oklahoma laws, and Oklahoma citizens, and therefore the District Court did not abuse its discretion in remanding the case. Id. at *10-21, *30-32. In addressing the third element, the Tenth Circuit ruled that the class action was not pleaded in a manner that sought to avoid federal jurisdiction since Plaintiff proposed a "natural class" that "encompass[ed] all of the people and claims that one would expect to include in a class action." Id. at *21. Regarding the fourth element, the Tenth Circuit opined that there was an ample connection to the forum state, and therefore the District Court did not abuse its discretion on this point. Id. at *28-29. Finally, the Tenth Circuit analyzed the sixth element, which considers whether during the three year period preceding the filing of the class action, one or more other class actions asserting the same or similar claims on behalf of the same or other persons had been filed. Explaining that the District Court found that no other such actions had been filed during the previous three-year period, the Tenth Circuit reasoned that this factor favored remand. Accordingly, the Tenth Circuit concluded that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in ruling that each of the six enumerated factors relative to the discretionary exception to jurisdiction under the CAFA supported remand, and it affirmed the District Court's remand order.

(xi) Eleventh Circuit

Adams, et al. v. International Paper Co*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71693 (S.D. Ala. May 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of 248 individuals who own or occupy residential property located in the Africatown Community in Mobile County, Alabama, filed a class action in state court alleging that Defendants released dioxins, furans and related chemicals, as well as other hazardous and harmful chemicals and pollutants, from Defendant's property into the air, soil, surface water, and/or groundwater of Plaintiffs' properties and/or residences. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs asserted 23 state law claims sounding in theories of negligence, wantonness, trespass, public nuisance, private nuisance, failure to warn, fraud, outrage, strict liability, battery, and assault. Plaintiffs sought compensatory damages for personal injuries and diminution in value of their real properties, as well as punitive damages and injunctive relief. Id. at *6-7. Defendant removed the matter on the basis of federal subject-matter jurisdiction and the diversity provisions of 28 U.S.C. § 1332, reasoning that there was complete diversity of citizenship between Plaintiffs and the only properly-joined Defendant, and that the amount-in-controversy exceeded the sum of $75,000. Plaintiffs then filed an amended complaint substituting a new Defendant, H.O. Weaver & Sons, Inc., and explaining that when Plaintiffs mistakenly named the wrong Defendant and that H.O. Weaver was the entity they had intended to name. H.O. Weaver is an Alabama corporation with its principal place of business in Alabama, and therefore it is an Alabama citizen for diversity purposes, and is non-diverse from Plaintiffs, all or substantially all of whom are likewise Alabama citizens. Id. at *9. Alternatively, Defendants also asserted that the matter should be removed pursuant to the CAFA because it was a mass action, the minimal diversity requirement was satisfied, and the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Plaintiffs asserted that the local controversy exception to the CAFA applied because Plaintiffs and the principal Defendant were premised in Alabama. The Court noted that the CAFA excludes from the definition of "mass action" any civil action in which "all of the claims arise from an event or occurrence in the State in which the action was filed, and that allegedly resulted in injuries in that State or in States contiguous to that State." Id. at *19. The Court explained that the core of the dispute was therefore whether there was an event or occurrence that would place the action outside the scope of the CAFA's mass action provision. Defendant argued that an "event or occurrence" is confined to mean "a truly singular happening," as opposed to "an action for continuing pollution over decades." Id. at *20. However, the Court disagreed, and reasoned that the exception should not be construed so narrowly relative to wrongs occurring at a singular moment in time. The Court also held that Plaintiffs met their burden of showing that declination of jurisdiction was appropriate under the "local controversy" exception to CAFA. Thus, even if this case fell within the statutory definition of a "mass action," remanding the action would remain appropriate under the CAFA pursuant to the "local controversy" exception for declining jurisdiction. Id. at *25. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to remand.

Blevins, et al. v. Aksut,* 849 F.3d 1016 (11th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of patients, filed a state court class action alleging that Defendant falsely informed them that they required heart surgery, and then conducted the unnecessary heart operations on them in violation of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO"). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants operated a racketeering enterprise through which they performed and billed for the unnecessary heart procedures. Id. at 1018. Defendant removed the matter based on federal-question jurisdiction. Plaintiffs moved to remand and argued that the CAFA's local controversy provision prohibited the District Court from exercising jurisdiction. The Magistrate Judge assigned to the case reported and recommended that the District Court deny Plaintiffs' motion to remand because the CAFA was inapplicable. The District Court adopted the Magistrate Judge's recommendation. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The Eleventh Circuit found that it was undisputed that Plaintiffs' complaint alleged that Defendants violated the federal RICO statute and that Defendant removed based on federal-question jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331. Id. at 1019. However, Plaintiffs contended that the CAFA's local controversy provision precluded federal jurisdiction because it requires District Courts to abstain from exercising jurisdiction over all "local" class actions. Id. Plaintiffs further argued that the CAFA assigns jurisdiction over local class actions exclusively to the state courts. The Eleventh Circuit disagreed, and held that § 1332(d)(4) does not affect a District Court's ability to exercise jurisdiction under § 1331. Id. at 1020. The Eleventh Circuit stated that § 1332(d)(4)'s language makes clear that it has no bearing on jurisdiction asserted under § 1331, as it provides that District Courts "shall decline to exercise jurisdiction under paragraph (2)" of § 1332(d). Id. However, it does not preclude the exercise of any other jurisdictional power. The Eleventh Circuit therefore reasoned that when the requirements of federal question jurisdiction are met, a District Court may exercise jurisdiction over class actions, even if they involve only local parties. The Eleventh Circuit opined that nothing in the language of § 1332(d)(4) indicates that Congress intended to divest District Courts of jurisdiction under § 1331. Rather, § 1332(d)(4) prevents District Courts from exercising the jurisdiction that they otherwise possess under that statute, but does not restrict their ability to exercise other forms of jurisdiction. Id. Accordingly, the Eleventh Circuit held that the CAFA's local controversy provision does not require District Courts to abstain from exercising federal-question jurisdiction over local class actions, and nothing in that provision indicates that Congress intended to divest District Courts of federal-question jurisdiction. Id. The Eleventh Circuit thereby affirmed the District Court's denial of Plaintiffs' motion to remand.

Garvin, et al. v. RCI Hospitality Holdings, Inc.*, Case No. 16-CV-25221 (S.D. Fla. Oct. 23, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of exotic dancers, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant misclassified them as independent contractors and thereby failed to pay overtime and minimum wages in violation of the FLSA and Florida wage & hour law. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims, or in the alternative, to compel arbitration. Id. at 2. Plaintiffs voluntarily dismissed their FLSA claims, leaving only the state law claims. The Court analyzed whether it still had original jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' state law claim under the CAFA. Plaintiffs asserted in their complaint that: (i) the class was between 100 and 500 members; (ii) the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5,000,000; and (iii) there was diversity between at least one Plaintiff and/or members of the class and Defendant. Id. at 3. The Court found that based on the allegations in the complaint, it was unable to determine if there was diversity of citizenship. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction.

Hunter, et al. v. City Of Montgomery*, 859 F.3d 1329 (11th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs filed a putative class action contending that Defendants' use of red light traffic violation cameras deprived class members of rights protected by state law and 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Plaintiffs sought a declaration that the red light camera program was unlawful, a judgment requiring Defendants to refund all red light violation fines they had collected as a result of the program, an injunction directing Defendants to stop issuing tickets based on the program, and an award of attorneys' fees. Id. at *1331. Defendants removed the lawsuit to the District Court citing the § 1983 claim, the request for attorneys' fees under § 1988, and diversity jurisdiction under the CAFA. Plaintiffs then amended their complaint to drop the § 1983 claim and eliminated their reliance on § 1988 for attorneys' fees. The District Court ordered supplemental briefing on whether it had subject-matter jurisdiction. Plaintiffs contended that both the CAFA's local controversy exception and its home state exception to the exercise of federal jurisdiction applied. The District Court agreed, finding that both exceptions applied. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed. First, the Eleventh Circuit found that it had jurisdiction to hear the appeal because a remand order based on the CAFA's local controversy exception or home state exception did not fall within either of § 1447(d)'s categories requiring it to decline to exercise jurisdiction. Id. at *1334. Further, the Eleventh Circuit considered whether the home state exception applied. The parties agreed that two-thirds or more of the members of the putative classes were citizens of Alabama, that the City of Montgomery was a citizen of Alabama, and that Defendant Traffic Solutions was not a citizen of Alabama. Id. The Eleventh Circuit therefore determined that the question was whether Traffic Solutions was a "primary Defendant" under the CAFA. Id. at *1335. The Senate Judiciary Committee's report on the CAFA described the meaning of "primary Defendant" as "those Defendants who are the real targets of the lawsuit" – i.e., Defendants that would be expected to incur most of the loss if liability was found. Id. Plaintiffs' only request for monetary relief was a request for refund of all traffic fines collected in connection with the red light camera program. Id. at *1336. The Eleventh Circuit concluded that Plaintiffs sought the monetary relief from the City alone and not from Traffic Solutions, and therefore Traffic Solutions could not be a primary Defendant. Id. Accordingly, because the only primary Defendant was a "citizen of the State in which this action was originally filed," the home state exception to the CAFA's jurisdiction applied. Id. The Eleventh Circuit therefore affirmed the District Court's ruling remanding the matter.

(xii) District Of Columbia Circuit

ALDF, et al. v. Hormel Foods Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51629 (D.D.C April 5, 2017). Plaintiff filed suit against Defendant in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, alleging that Defendant violated the District of Columbia Consumer Protection Procedures Act ("DCCPPA") and mislead consumers with its "Natural Choice" advertising campaign. Plaintiff's Complaint claimed that Defendant's meat products were not natural as the advertising campaign implied. Defendant removed the case, invoking the Court's federal question, diversity, and CAFA jurisdiction. Plaintiff moved to remand the case, asserting that the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion. Defendant maintained that the Court had subject-matter jurisdiction based upon federal question, diversity, and CAFA jurisdiction. Id. at *5. The Court rejected each of Defendant's arguments and remanded the case. Id. First, the Court rejected Defendant's argument that the case raised federal issues and ruled that here was no real conflict between the false advertising claims in this case and the federal laws that Defendant cited, as the laws Defendant cited to related to meat labelling and packaging. Id. at *6. The Court opined that this case was not about the labels or packages on meat products, but instead a national advertising campaign, including magazine advertisements, newspaper inserts, and webpages. Id. at *8. As such, the Court ruled that it lacked federal question jurisdiction because Plaintiff asserted only a single cause of action under District of Columbia law. Second, the Court found that it lacked diversity jurisdiction because Defendant failed to demonstrate that there was $75,000 in controversy in this case. Id. at *12. Defendant asserted that the purported cost of complying with the injunctive relief satisfied the jurisdictional amount. Id. The Court rejected this argument and ruled that the cost of compliance was not a proper measure of the jurisdictional minimum, and as it also was not convinced that Defendant's speculation as to possible attorneys' fees was sufficient to establish jurisdiction. Finally, the Court determined that it lacked jurisdiction under the CAFA because this case was not a proper class action. Id. at *25. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion and remanded the case to state court. Id. at *66.

Bradford, et al. v. George Washington University*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58590 (D.D.C. April 18, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action in state court against Defendant asserting violations of the District of Columbia Consumer Protection Procedures Act (the "Consumer Protection Act"), and claims for unjust enrichment, fraudulent misrepresentation, and negligent misrepresentation. Defendant removed the action pursuant to the CAFA, asserting that the action met the CAFA's amount-in-controversy threshold and that the class contained more than 300 individuals. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, which the Court denied. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs alleged that they each paid over $28,000 in tuition to participate in what they believed would be a specialized on-line education program provided by Defendant. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs contended that the on-line education program, Security and Safety Leadership ("SSL"), was marketed "as substantially identical" to the classroom version, but was not equivalent to the classroom version in actuality. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs argued that Defendant failed to establish both the numerosity and the amount-in-controversy requirements of the CAFA. In support of its notice of removal, Defendant provided the declaration of one of its directors stating that since 2010, at least 248 students paid some tuition for the on-line SSL course, and that the aggregate tuition and fee charges for these 248 students totaled $5,911,464.02. Id. at *10. Of that sum, the 248 students actually paid $4,390,805.99. Plaintiffs challenged this evidence as inadmissible under the Federal Rules of Evidence, arguing that statements in the declaration did not satisfy the business records exception to the prohibition on hearsay and that the statements violated the best evidence rule. Id. The Court disagreed, finding that the declaration provided reliable evidence regarding the number of putative class members and the amount-in-controversy, which were jurisdictional elements the Court need only determine by a preponderance of the evidence standard. Id. at *11. The Court found that while the declaration did not recite the precise language of an exception to the hearsay rule, the Court was persuaded that the information regarding the University's enrollment, tuition, payment, and attendance records would be admissible at trial. Id. at *12. The Court thereby determined that based on the record before it, Defendant established by a preponderance of the evidence that the putative class contained at least 248 Plaintiffs, and therefore the CAFA's numerosity requirement was satisfied. Id. at *14. In addition, given that these students paid over $4 million for the on-line SSL course, and in light of Plaintiffs' request for treble and punitive damages and reasonable attorneys' fees, the Court concluded that Defendant also established by a preponderance of the evidence that the amount-in-controversy exceeded the CAFA's $5 million threshold. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to remand.

IX. Other Federal Rulings Affecting The Defense Of Workplace Class Action Litigation

Throughout 2017, federal courts issued key rulings in class action lawsuits and on Rule 23 issues that significantly impact the defense of workplace class actions. Those rulings included ADA class actions; Alien Tort Statute and trafficking victims class actions; Anti-Injunction Act issues in class actions; appeals in class action litigation; application of tolling principles in class actions; appointment, selection, and removal of lead counsel in class actions; ascertainability under Rule 23; attorneys' fee awards in class actions; bankruptcy issues in class actions; breach of contract class actions; civil rights class actions; class actions involving unions; class definition issues; class-wide proof and class-wide damages in class actions; collateral estoppel, res judicata, and settlement bar concepts under Rule 23; commercial free speech issues in class actions; consolidation issues in class actions; consumer fraud class actions; COBRA class actions; data breach class actions; decertification under Rule 23; default judgments in class actions; discovery issues in class actions; disqualification of counsel in class actions; employee testing issues in class actions; experts in class action litigation; FACTA and FDCPA class actions; Family & Medical Leave Act class actions; FCRA class actions; Federal Tort Claims Act class actions; foreign worker and labor issues class actions; government enforcement litigation; immigration class actions; industrial injury class actions; injunctions in class actions; intervention issues in class actions; issue certification under Rule 23; issues with the Judicial Panel On Multi-District Litigation in class actions; jurisdiction issues in class action litigation; litigation over class action settlement agreements and consent decrees; medical monitoring class actions; mootness issues in class action litigation; multi-party litigation over modification of employee/retirement benefits; non-workplace class action arbitration issues; notice issues in class actions; objectors and opt-out issues in class actions; OFCCP enforcement actions; preemption issues in class actions; preemptive motions to strike or dismiss class allegations; privacy class actions; procedural issues and proof requirements in Rule 23 class actions; public employee class actions; sanctions, contempt, and unethical misconduct in class action litigation; service awards and costs in class actions; settlement administration issues in class actions; settlement approval issues in class actions; settlement enforcement issues in class actions; special masters in class actions; standing issues in class actions; statute of limitations issues in class actions; stays in class action litigation; TCPA class actions; the adequacy of representation requirement for class certification; the cy pres doctrine in class actions; the numerosity requirement for class certification; the predominance requirement for class certification; the typicality requirement for class certification; trial and post-trial issues in class action litigation; venue issues in class actions; WARN class actions; workplace antitrust class actions; and workplace class action arbitration issues.

These rulings of 2017 added to the evolving case law interpreting Rule 23, and significantly impact the defense of workplace class actions.

(i) ADA Class Actions

Brodie, et al. v. Speedway LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 54544 (W.D. Pa. April 7, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of disabled customers, brought a class action alleging violations of Title III of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Specifically, Plaintiffs challenged Defendant's corporate policies and practices, which they contended result in accessibility barriers at its parking facilities in violation of the ADA. Plaintiffs alleged that "Defendant's centralized design, construction, alteration, maintenance and operational policies and practices have systematically and routinely violated the ADA by designing, constructing and altering facilities so that they are not readily accessible and usable, by failing to remove architectural barriers, and by failing to maintain and operate facilities so that the accessible features of Defendant's facilities are maintained" in violation of § 12183(a)(1) and applicable regulations. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiffs further asserted these violations would deter them and similarly-situated individuals from returning to Defendant's facilities and that absent injunctive relief they would be unable to fully access Defendant's facilities in violation of their rights under the ADA. Id. at *5. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court denied. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs lacked standing as to Defendant's locations they have not visited. Defendant further argued that Plaintiffs failed to meet Rule 23's commonality, adequacy of representation, and typicality requirements. Id. at *8. In addition, Defendant asserted that because Plaintiffs lacked individual standing as to the locations they had not visited, Plaintiff Access Now likewise had no standing. Defendant requested that all class allegations be dismissed. The Court noted that as Plaintiff had not filed a motion for class certification, little if any class discovery had been conducted and in the Court's estimation, there had not been the necessary record development as to this issue. Id. at *8-9. Further, the Court found that Plaintiffs alleged sufficient facts to state a claim to relief that was plausible on its face: i.e., that Defendant's centralized ADA accessibility policies were ineffective, and that these policies have allowed, and will allow, architectural barriers to develop and persist at its stores, and deter others similarly-situated from returning. Id. at *10. The Court also determined that Plaintiffs had adequately established standing as to the locations they visited, and Rule 23 would come into play thereafter. The Court opined that Plaintiffs were entitled to proceed to conduct discovery and to develop a record. Id. Further, the Court stated that as pled, whether Defendant's alleged centralized policies were ineffective and discriminatory would be common to all class members. Id. Similarly, the Court noted that Plaintiffs' challenge to this policy and the policy's effect on accessibility at all of Defendant's stores was typical of, and to, all class members. Id. at *11. Finally, the Court held that Defendant's application of its centralized policies and its failure to implement effective accessibility policies was generally applicable to all class members, since a single injunction against Defendant's policy would remediate barriers the policy already had caused and prevent barriers from recurring as a result of the policy's current ineffectiveness. Accordingly, the Court found that the pleadings did not demonstrate that Plaintiffs could not meet the requirements of Rule 23, but rather showed class certification may be appropriate if discovery confirms Plaintiffs' class allegations. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Equal Rights Center, et al. v. Kohl's Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66390 (N.D. Ill. May 2, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of disabled customers, brought a class action alleging violations of Title III of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Plaintiffs contended that Defendant systematically denied customers who use wheelchairs and scooters full and equal enjoyment of their stores across the country. According to Plaintiffs, while Defendant's internal documents relating to store layouts – its "Shopability Standards" – set forth the minimum spacing distance for merchandise racks in its stores and directed employees to enforce those standards, Defendant regularly failed to ensure that the standards were followed. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the Court denied. Plaintiffs sought to certify a class of all people with mobility disabilities who relied on wheeled mobility devices for mobility who, during the 12 months immediately prior to the filing of the complaint, were denied access to the goods, services, facilities, privileges, advantages, or accommodations of any Defendant's stores in the United States on the basis of disability because of the existence of aisles that were too narrow. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs acknowledged that Defendant's written Shopability Standards, "if enforced, would most likely have avoided this lawsuit altogether." Id. at *5. Plaintiffs therefore challenged the daily individual decisions by relevant employees of Defendant in each particular store as to how wide aisles would be and where merchandise racks would be placed. Id. The Court explained that discretionary decisions can be the source of a common claim if they are, for example, the outcome of employment practices or policies controlled by higher-level directors, if all decision-makers exercise discretion in a common way because of a company policy or practice, or if all decision-makers act together as one unit. The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to make this showing, as they did not point to evidence of systemic policies or procedures. Id. at *6. The Court noted that Plaintiffs had not directed the Court to any evidence that Defendant, as a matter of practice or policy, routinely required employees to ignore complaints or disregard its Shopability Standards. Id. at *7. Thus, the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to establish commonality. The Court also ruled that Plaintiffs failed to meet numerosity. Plaintiffs asserted that even assuming that only one half of 1% of the estimated 3.6 million wheelchair users, or 1,800 individuals, have visited Defendant's stores in the United States and experienced difficulties maneuvering the aisles, the numerosity requirement would be satisfied. The Court opined that while Plaintiffs' reliance on statistics regarding the number of wheelchair-using individuals nationwide could be useful if every store were laid out according to a common plan, this was not the case. Plaintiffs specifically asserted that 12 individuals using mobility devices had trouble accessing items in 17 different Kohl's stores based on the narrowness of the aisles. Id. at *10. The Court held that simply because a store may have one or more aisles that are less than 36 inches does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that it was inaccessible to a person using a wheeled mobility device. Id. at *10-11. The Court also found that Plaintiffs failed to meet the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(2), because Plaintiffs had not shown that Defendant refused to act on grounds that applied generally to the class. Moreover, the Court found that Plaintiff's proposed injunction to "bring its policies, practices and procedures into compliance with the ADA" was overbroad. Id. at *12. The Court stated that such injunctive relief would simply require Defendant to obey the law, and should be viewed with caution given the possibility for overbreadth and vagueness. Id. at *12-13. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs also did not indicate how an injunction containing such broad and non-specific language could be enforced given that the layout of over 1,100 stores varied on a daily basis. Id. at *13. The Court therefore denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Glover, et al. v. City Of Laguna Beach,* Case No. 15-CV-1332 (C.D. Cal. June 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, on behalf of themselves and others similarly-situated, brought a class action alleging that Defendant's Alternative Sleeping Location ("ASL"), a homeless shelter, violated the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"), § 5 of the Rehabilitation Act ("RA"), the Eighth Amendment, the Fourteenth Amendment, and §§ 7 and 17 of Article I of the California Constitution. Id. at 1. The parties cross-moved for summary judgement. Plaintiffs moved for summary judgment to establish Defendant's violations of: (i) the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments and the California Constitution; and (ii) Title II of the ADA and § 504 of the RA. Id. Defendant moved for summary judgement on all of Plaintiffs' claims. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion and granted Defendant's motion as to the cruel and unusual punishment claims. Id. at 2. The Court found that there were genuine issues of material facts about whether Plaintiffs were excluded from, discriminated against, or denied benefits from the ASL on the basis of disability. Id. Therefore the Court declined to grant summary judgment on those claims. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion with regard to their claim that Defendant transported individuals to and from the ASL using a van that was not equipped with ramps or lifts. Id. Finally, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' substantive due process claims. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment.

Hizer, et al. v. Pulaski County*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 146138 (N.D. Ind. Sept. 11, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action alleging violation of both the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") and the Rehabilitation Act. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification, which the Court granted. The Pulaski County Courthouse is a three-story building with the floors being connected by a stairway as well as an elevator. The Courthouse's public restrooms are located on the first floor. Id. at *2. Plaintiff alleged that the entrances to the restrooms were not wide enough for a person in a wheelchair to be able to enter them, nor were the stalls in the restrooms large enough for a person with a physical disability to maneuver within them. The Court found that Plaintiff sufficiently alleged standing as Plaintiff suffered from a physical disability and her legal assistant and her involvement on the County's ADA Board required her to visit the Courthouse frequently, and she was therefore repeatedly subjected to embarrassment and an enhanced burden when having to manage the Courthouse's allegedly inaccessible features. The Court then reviewed Plaintiff's motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23. Plaintiff stated that many people with physical disabilities lived in Pulaski County, and the statistics provided to the Court indicated that the number might very well be in excess of 1,000 individuals. Id. at *16. The Court therefore determined that the number of potential class members, as well as the judicial inefficiency of attempting to try a case with so many individual Plaintiffs and future class members, made joinder impracticable. The Court also found that Plaintiff's allegation that the conditions at the Courthouse violated the ADA and Rehabilitation Act "poses a question of law that is common to the class, the determination of which would resolve an issue that is central to the validity of each one of the claims in one stroke." Id. at *18. The Court also held that all putative class members were affected by the accessibility problems at the Courthouse and therefore Plaintiff's claims were typical of the proposed class, insofar as each of those claims were based on the same legal theory that the Courthouse's alleged inaccessibility constituted a violation of the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act. Id. The Court also found that Plaintiff was adequate to represent the interests of the proposed class, as Plaintiff's claims were identical to those of the other members of the class and there was no evidence of any unique defense or circumstance that would cause conflict. The Court further noted that Plaintiff's counsel was skilled and experienced in this type of litigation, and had appeared before the Court in similar circumstances. Id. at *20. As to Rule 23(b), the Court explained that Rule 23(b)(2) covers cases where "the party opposing the class has acted or refused to act on grounds that apply generally to the class, so that final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief is appropriate respecting the class as a whole." Id. at *21. The Court reasoned that Plaintiff was attempting to obtain declaratory and injunctive relief designed to benefit the whole class. Thus, Plaintiff met the Rule 23(b)(2) requirement as to the proposed class. Accordingly, the Court granted class certification to a class comprised of all persons with mobility impairments or other physical disabilities who accessed or attempted to access, or who will access or will attempt to access the Pulaski County Courthouse.

Kurlander, et al. v. Kroenke Arena Co*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 195438 (D. Colo. Aug. 31, 2017). Plaintiff, a deaf individual, filed a class action against Defendant on behalf of herself and all others similarly-situated for violation of Title III of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"). Plaintiff alleged that Defendant, the owner and operator of the Pepsi Center – an indoor arena in Denver, Colorado – discriminated against patrons who are deaf or hard of hearing by failing to offer open captioning on the center hung display or ribbon board displays ("displays") during events when the Displays are used ("display events"). Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff sought injunctive relief and reasonable attorneys' fees and costs. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification, which the Court granted. Plaintiff sought to certify a class of all Pepsi Center patrons who are deaf or hard of hearing and unable to hear using assistive listening devices, who have been, since November 10, 2014, or in the future will be, denied full and equal enjoyment of the goods, services, facilities, advantages, or accommodations of the Pepsi Center based on Defendant's failure to provide open captioning of aural content during non-concert events for which the center-hung display was used. Id. at *3. Plaintiff alleged that, because the "full and equal enjoyment" of the Pepsi Center included all of the aural information provided over the public address system during display events, effective communication for those who cannot hear that information required open captioning. Id. at *5. The Court found that Plaintiff had standing because her injury was the lack of open captioning of aural content at display events, and if she prevailed in this case and Defendant was required to provide open captioning of aural content at display events, her injury would be redressed. Id. at *9. The Court determined that Plaintiff's proposed class definition adequately defined the class and that individual inquiries of each of the class members were not required. Accordingly, the class was sufficiently ascertainable. Id. at *10. As to the Rule 23 requirements, the Court noted that the Pepsi Center seated between 17,000 and 21,000 people and hosts over 200 events per year, with attendance for the 2015-2016 season totaling over 1.276 million. Id. at *14. The Court reasoned that while these figures suggested that the class was numerous and hard to identify, it was more than enough to meet the numerosity requirement. Id. at *15. Further, the Court found that the common question of whether Defendant was required to provide open captioning at display events to those who are deaf and hard of hearing and require open captioning of aural content was a question of fact and law common to the members of the class. Id. at *16. The Court also stated that Plaintiff's claim was typical of the claims of the class, as she also claimed that Defendant violated Title III by failing to provide open captioning of display events. Id. The Court further determined that the named Plaintiff, like the members of the proposed class, sought remedies for the lack of open captioning that posed a barrier to their full and equal enjoyment of events at the Pepsi Center. The Court found that there were no unique facts or defenses relevant to the named Plaintiff's claim that would put her in conflict with the proposed class. The Court also opined that Plaintiff's counsel was experienced in class actions and would adequately represent the interests of Plaintiff and the class. Id. at *17. As to the Rule 23(b) requirements, the Court held that this matter clearly fell within the paradigm for class certification under Rule 23(b)(2) because "the party opposing the class has acted or refused to act on grounds that apply generally to the class, so that final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief is appropriate respecting the class as a whole." Id. at *18. The Court concluded that, based on the record before it and taking into account the class definition, it was appropriate to certify the class under Rule 23(b)(2) because injunctive relief was being requested that would be appropriate respecting the class as a whole. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Markett, et al. v. Five Guys Enterprises, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 115212 (S.D.N.Y. July 21, 2017).
Plaintiff, a blind individual, filed an action on behalf of herself and a nationwide class of similarly-situated individuals, asserting that she could not make a purchase on Defendant's website due to various access barriers. Plaintiff alleged that these access barriers denied her full and equal access to, and enjoyment of, the goods, benefits, and services of Defendant, in violation of Title III of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"), the New York State Human Rights Law, the New York State Civil Rights Law, and the New York City Human Rights Law. Id. at *2. Plaintiff sought declaratory and injunctive relief as well as compensatory damages. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) and 12(b)(1). Defendant argued that the ADA only governs access to the goods and services available at physical facilities, and because Plaintiff only alleged that she was denied access to a non-physical space, i.e., Defendant's website, her complaint failed to state an essential element of her Title III claim. Id. Defendant further stated that it was currently in the process of completing a large-scale website renovation effort that would result in its website being accessible to Plaintiff and other blind and visually impaired individuals. Id. at *3. Defendant thus claimed that Plaintiff's action was moot and must be dismissed for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. The Court noted that to state a claim under Title III, a Plaintiff must allege: (i) that she is disabled within the meaning of the ADA; (ii) that Defendant owns, leases, or operates a place of public accommodation; and (iii) that Defendant discriminated against her by denying her a full and equal opportunity to enjoy the services Defendant provides. Id. at *4. Based on these factors, the Court concluded that Plaintiff has met these three requirements and therefore stated a valid claim under Title III of the ADA. First, Defendant did not dispute that Plaintiff has sufficiently plead that she was disabled within the meaning of the ADA. Second, the Court stated that the text and purposes of the ADA, suggested that Defendant's website was covered under the ADA, either as its own place of public accommodation or as a result of its close relationship as a service of Defendant's restaurants, which indisputably are public accommodations under the statute. Id. at *5. Third, accepting Plaintiff's factual allegations as true, the Court held that Defendant denied Plaintiff a full and equal opportunity to enjoy the services it provides through its website. The Court therefore rejected Defendant's argument that Plaintiff's claims were moot, and denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Mielo, et al. v. Steak 'N Shake Operations Inc., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64051 (W.D. Pa. April 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of paraplegics, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant's compliance policy violated Title III of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") by failing to ensure that their parking lots were fully accessible to and independently usable by individuals who use wheelchairs. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs had difficulty accessing several of Defendant's restaurants because of architectural barriers in the parking facilities, such as excessively sloped parking spaces. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs' investigators found architectural barriers at eight restaurants. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant disregarded its on-going statutory obligation to ensure its parking facilities remain accessible to individuals with disabilities by failing to conduct assessments to determine if barriers existed. Id. at *7-8. Defendant admitted that it had no written policy regarding accessibility of its parking lots and that it relied upon customers' complaints to ensure compliance with the ADA. Id. at *8. The Court rejected Defendant's contention that its maintenance obligations under the ADA were limited to temporary mechanical failures and easily movable obstructions, finding this ran contrary to the purposes of the ADA to ensure that facilities be accessible to and usable by individuals with mobility disabilities. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs moved for certification on behalf of a class consisting of individuals with "qualified mobility disabilities who were or will be denied the full and equal enjoyment of the goods, services, facilities…. of any Steak 'n Shake" because the individual encountered accessibility barriers. Id. at *2. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion, finding all requirements of Rule 23 were met. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that numerosity was not satisfied, finding that the standard may be relaxed in cases where injunctive relief is sought. The Court reasoned that numerosity was satisfied based upon census statistical data concerning the numbers of persons with mobility disabilities. Id. at *14. The Court also rejected Defendant's arguments as to commonality, ruling that Plaintiffs established that Defendant applied the same ADA maintenance policies to all its restaurants and this would produce common questions. Id. at *17. The Court further found that Rule 23(b)(2) was satisfied because Plaintiffs presented evidence that Defendant's compliance policy was ineffective and if Plaintiffs prevailed, an injunction would provide relief to each member of the class. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Nevarez, et al. v. Forty Niners Football Co., LLC, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121030 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, two physically disabled individuals and a non-disabled spouse, filed a class action against Defendants alleging violations of disability discrimination because of architectural barriers in the football stadium under the American With Disabilities Act ("ADA") and California's Unruh Civil Rights Act ("Unruh Act"). Defendants moved to dismiss portions of Plaintiffs' claims pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6). Id. at *11. The Court granted in part and denied in part Defendants' motion. Id. at *32. Plaintiff DeFrancesco was a quadriplegic and required the use of a wheelchair and Plaintiff Priscilla Nevarez ("Mrs. Nevarez'") was the spouse of Plaintiff Abdul Navarez ("Mr. Nevarez"), a physically disabled individual who required the use of a wheelchair. First, Defendants argued that Mrs. Nevarez lacked Article III and statutory standing to bring claims for disability discrimination under the ADA and the Unruh Act. Second, Defendants move to dismiss portions of Plaintiffs' claims for damages under the Unruh Act on the basis that Plaintiffs failed to timely exhaust their state administrative remedies. Defendants moved to dismiss Mrs. Nevarez's claims against Defendants and asserted that Mrs. Nevarez could not allege discrimination claims under the ADA and the Unruh Act because she lacked Article III and statutory standing as she was non-disabled and her associational discrimination claims were inadequate. Defendants also asserted that Mrs. Nevarez was unable to bring an associational discrimination claim simply because she struggled to assist her husband as he navigated the stadium. The Court rejected Defendants' argument on the grounds that Ninth Circuit case law precedents had consistently rejected identical attempts to interpret the ADA's associational discriminations in a narrow fashion. The Court ruled that Mrs. Nevarez had adequately alleged a specific, direct, and separate injury because of her association with Mr. Nevarez, and therefore it denied Defendants' motion to dismiss her ADA claims. Likewise, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss Mrs. Nevarez's Unruh Act claim to the extent Defendants moved to dismiss this claim for failure to adequately allege an ADA claim. Defendants also moved to dismiss portions of the Nevarez's' claims for damages under the Unruh Act and Mr. DeFrancesco's claim under the Unruh Act on the basis that Plaintiffs failed to timely exhaust their state administrative remedies, as required by California law. Id. at *29. The California Tort Claims Act requires that any civil complaint for money damages first be presented to and rejected by the pertinent public entity not later than six months after the accrual of the cause of action. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the Nevarez's' claims for damages under the Unruh Act only as to the claims that were premised on events that were time-barred. Defendants asserted that Mr. DeFrancesco's claim for damages under the Unruh Act claim against Defendants should be dismissed in its entirety for failure to timely exhaust his state administrative remedies because the complaint contained no factual allegations regarding if or when Mr. DeFrancesco submitted a claim. Plaintiffs conceded that the complaint did not contain any factual allegations regarding Mr. DeFrancesco's claim submission and requested leave to amend the complaint in this regard. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss without prejudice as to DeFrancesco's claim under the Unruh Act and granted him leave to amend to the complaint. In sum, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims. Id. at *33.

Ochoa, et al. v. City Of Long Beach,* Case No. 14-CV-4307 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of individuals with mobility disabilities, filed a class action alleging that Defendant failed to maintain accessible sidewalks and pedestrian rights-of-way in violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act. The parties ultimately reached a settlement, which the Court preliminarily approved. The parties subsequently filed a joint motion for final settlement approval, which the Court granted. The Court found that the settlement class of "all persons (including without limitation residents of and visitors to the City) with any mobility disability, who, at any time from July 14, 2014 through the term, have used or will use the pedestrian facilities in the City of Long Beach," met Rule 23's requirements. Id. at 3. The Court further determined that the settlement agreement was fair, reasonable, adequate, and in the best interests of the settlement class as a whole. Id. The Court held that the expenditures the City set forth for improvements to the sidewalks and rights-of-way were proper and reasonably calculated to maintain and ensure accessibility of the pedestrian facilities. Id. The Court noted that in accordance with the settlement agreement, class members released all claims as set forth in the settlement agreement. The Court also determined that Plaintiffs' request for attorneys' fees of $3,364,904 was reasonable and well supported by evidence submitted in support of the motion for attorneys' fees. Id. at 5. Accordingly, the Court granted the parties' joint motion for final settlement approval.

Updike, et al. v. Clackamas County,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19872 (D. Ore. Feb. 13, 2017). Plaintiff, a deaf inmate, brought a putative class action against Defendant alleging violations of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") and § 504 of the Vocational Rehabilitation Act. Plaintiff asserted claims on behalf of himself and other deaf or hard of hearing individuals who have been, are, or will be incarcerated at the Clackamas County jail. Id. at *2. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification, which the Court denied. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant failed to provide hearing-impaired inmates with adequate access to sign language interpreters, which inhibited the ability of inmates to effectively communicate with Clackamas County employees, particularly medical professionals. Id. at *4. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant discriminated against deaf and hard of hearing individuals through its policies and practices and that the discrimination was willful and deliberate. Id. Plaintiff sought both compensatory damages and equitable relief on behalf of the class. The Court noted that Plaintiff proposed to include in his certified class all deaf or hard of hearing people "who will become incarcerated" (or "future deaf or hard of hearing individuals incarcerated") at the Clackamas County Jail. Id. at *19. Future class members necessarily may seek only injunctive relief; they cannot recover money damages for "past injuries" that, by definition, have not yet occurred. Id. at *20. The Court, however, already had dismissed Plaintiff's claims for injunctive relief for lack of standing. The Court therefore modified Plaintiff's proposed class definitions to exclude injunctive relief, as it was unavailable to him. With respect to the revised class definitions, the Court considered Plaintiff's proposed broad class, which was defined as "all deaf or hard of hearing inmates who formerly were or currently are incarcerated in the Clackamas County Jail anytime during the period of April 29, 2013 to the present." Id. at *21. The Court also considered Plaintiff's proposed narrow class, which was defined as "(i) all current [or former] deaf or hard of hearing individuals incarcerated by Clackamas (ii) who require [or required] accommodations, including interpreters or other auxiliary aids or services, to communicate effectively and/or to access programs or services available to individuals incarcerated by Clackamas (iii) anytime during the period of April 29, 2013 to the present." Id. The Court found that Plaintiff produced data indicating that Plaintiff's broad class contained approximately 900 deaf or hard of hearing individuals incarcerated at the Clackamas County jail annually. Id. at *24. Therefore, the Court determined that the broad class met the numerosity requirement. However, the Court determined that Plaintiff's narrow class failed to meet numerosity. Although 40 deaf or hard of hearing were incarcerated at the Clackamas County jail during the class period, Plaintiff had not alleged that each of these 40 individuals actually required any auxiliary aid or other accommodation while incarcerated, including but not limited to an ASL interpreter. Id. at *25. Without such evidence, the Court declined to find more than a handful of people who needed an accommodation that was not provided. Id. at *26. Because numerosity is a threshold requirement for class certification, the Court would not consider the other requirements of class certification as applied to Plaintiff's proposed narrow class definition. The Court determined that Plaintiff failed to show that his broad class definition demonstrated typicality and predominance. Without the ability to seek class-wide injunctive relief, the Court determined that each putative class member would be required to litigate the individualized nature of his or her alleged degree of hearing impairment and precisely what aid or assistance that inmate reasonably needed but was denied by Defendant, as well as whether Defendant acted with deliberate indifference toward each individual putative class member. Id. at *36-37. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

(ii) Alien Tort Statute And Trafficking Victims Class Actions

Adhikari, et al. v. Kellogg Brown & Root,* 845 F.3d 184 (5th Cir. 2017*). Plaintiffs were the family members of a group of Nepali men who were kidnapped and murdered as they traveled to a United States military base, Al Asad, to work for Daod & Partners, a Jordanian corporation that sub-contracted with Defendant, a U.S. military contractor. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs brought causes of action under the Alien Tort Statute ("ATS"), the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act ("TVPRA"), and state tort law. Id. The District Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment on the ATS claims and dismissed the TVPRA claims. Id. at *4. The District Court dismissed the state tort claims as being barred by the statute of limitations and refused to equitably toll the claims. Id. at *46. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Fifth Circuit affirmed. Id. at *4. The deceased were recruited by a Nepal-based company and promised jobs at a hotel in Jordan. Id. Once in Jordan, Plaintiffs' passports were confiscated and they were told that they were being sent to Iraq to work on Al Asad, and would only be paid three-quarters of what they were originally promised. Id. at *5. The Fifth Circuit held that the ATS did not apply extraterritorially, in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum Co., 133 S. Ct. 1659 (2013). Id. at *41. The Fifth Circuit noted that Daod's recruitment, transportation, and alleged detention all occurred in Nepal, Jordan, and Iraq, and the deceased never arrived at Al Asad. Id. at *16. The Fifth Circuit determined that all relevant conduct occurred overseas, and it did not reach the issue of whether the conduct could even be imputed to Defendant. Id. Furthermore, the Fifth Circuit ruled that Plaintiffs failed to establish that the United States controlled Al Asad in 2004, such that it constituted a territory of the United States, noting that a U.S. military base does not constitute de facto territory unless the United States has demonstrated an intent to exercise sovereignty over that base permanently. Id. at *20. The Fifth Circuit also rejected Plaintiffs' argument that Defendant's conduct in the United States, such as domestic payments to Daod, rebutted the presumption against extraterritoriality (as the application of the ATS is determined by the location of the conduct relevant to the ATS' focus). Id. at *21. The Fifth Circuit further concluded that the District Court correctly dismissed the TVPRA claims because: (i) the TVPRA did not apply extraterritorially at the time of the alleged conduct in 2004; and (ii) applying a 2008 amendment to the TVPRA that had the effect of permitting Plaintiffs' extraterritorial claims would have an improper retroactive effect on Defendant. Id. at *4. Fifth Circuit ruled that nothing in the text of the pre-2008 TVPRA or in the text of § 1596 indicated that a Plaintiff could sue for extraterritorial violations of the TVPRA before 2008. Id. at *33. The Fifth Circuit concluded that the District Court was correct in finding that the presumption against retroactivity prevented applying § 1596 to Defendant's conduct; in so holding, it reasoned that the presumption against retroactivity is based on the "unfairness of imposing new burdens on Defendant's after the fact." Id. at *34. Furthermore, the Fifth Circuit held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion when it dismissed the common law tort claims because they were time-barred and it refused to equitably toll Plaintiffs' state law tort claims. Id. at *46. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit affirmed the District Court's order.

(iii) Anti-Injunction Act Issues In Class Actions

Abella Owners' Association, et al. v. MI Windows & Doors, Inc.*, 860 F.3d 218 (4th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff, a California non-profit mutual benefit corporation, sought relief from the enforcement of a final class action judgment entered in this multi-district litigation. In 2012, the Judicial Panel on Multi-District Litigation transferred 18 class actions filed against Defendant in various districts to the U.S. District Court for the District of South Carolina (the "MDL") for consolidated pre-trial proceedings. Plaintiffs sought damages caused by Defendant's manufacture of allegedly defective windows. The parties to the MDL ultimately reached a settlement and the District Court preliminarily approved the settlement and certified a settlement class under Rule 23. The District Court directed the parties to notify class members: (i) of the settlement; (ii) of the option to withdraw from the action; and (iii) of the date of a hearing to determine the fairness, reasonableness, and adequacy of the settlement. Id. at 220. After the opt-out deadline passed, the District Court conducted the fairness hearing and entered a final judgment approving the settlement, enjoining the class members from pursuing other related claims against Defendant, and dismissing the transferred actions. Id. Plaintiff, although it did not opt-out of the settlement, continued to pursue its action against Defendant in California state court. Defendant filed a motion to enforce the class action settlement against Plaintiff and sought an injunction prohibiting it from continuing the California action. Plaintiff contended that the District Court lacked authority to enjoin its prosecution of the state action against Defendant by reason of the Anti-Injunction Act, and that Plaintiff should not be bound by the class action judgment because of the excusable neglect of its counsel in overlooking the opt-out deadline. Id. at 220-221. The District Court rejected Plaintiff's arguments and enjoined Plaintiff from proceeding with its claims. On appeal, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The Fourth Circuit agreed with the District Court's determination that an injunction was justified by the "relitigation exception" of the Anti-Injunction Act. The Fourth Circuit explained that the relitigation exception "was designed to permit a federal court to prevent state litigation of an issue that previously was presented to and decided by the federal court." Id. at 223. Thus, the exception is founded on concepts of res judicata and collateral estoppel, and it permits an injunction where either of these doctrines would preclude the state court action to which the injunction is directed. Id. The Fourth Circuit noted that under the doctrine of res judicata, a judgment on the merits in a prior suit bars a second suit involving their parties or their privies based on the same cause of action. The Fourth Circuit found that all aspects of res judicata were satisfied in this case, and therefore it concluded that the District Court's final judgment approving the class action settlement was claim preclusive with respect to Plaintiff's California claims against Defendant. Id. at 224. The Fourth Circuit also determined that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the neglect of Plaintiff's counsel was not excusable. Id. at 227. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling.

(iv) Appeals In Class Action Litigation

Brown, et al. v. Cinemark United States*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 24749 (9th Cir. Dec. 7, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action alleging that Defendants violated various provisions of the California Labor Code. The matter was consolidated with similar pending actions by the District Court, including one filed by Plaintiff Mario De La Rosa. Defendants moved to dismiss this case for lack of appellate jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, in light of the U.S. Supreme Court decision in Microsoft Corp. v. Baker, 137 S. Ct. 1702 (2017), because Plaintiffs voluntarily settled some of their claims. Id. at *2. The District Court denied Defendants' motion, and on appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The District Court had previously dismissed Plaintiff Brown's direct wage statement claim and denied class certification of Plaintiffs' meal and rest break claims, reporting pay claims, off-the-clock work claims, derivative wage statement claims, and direct wage statement claims. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs' remaining individual claims were set for trial. Defendants filed a motion for summary judgment motion on the remaining claims. The District Court issued a tentative ruling, which proposed granting the motion in part and denying it in part. Id. Subsequently, the parties stipulated to the tentative order and settled all remaining individual claims. Plaintiffs reserved the right to challenge the District Court's judgment denying class certification of the direct wage claim and dismissing Brown's individual direct wage statement claim. Id. Plaintiffs appealed the issues reserved by the settlement. Defendants argued that the Ninth Circuit lacked jurisdiction under Baker to consider an appeal of the District Court's interlocutory judgment because Plaintiffs voluntarily settled the remaining claims. Id. The Ninth Circuit explained that in Baker, the District Court declined to certify Plaintiffs' proposed class, and on appeal discretionary interlocutory review under Rule 23(f) was declined. Id. Rather than pursue their individual claims on the merits, Plaintiffs in Baker voluntarily dismissed their own claims with the express purpose of creating a final judgment for appeal. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs in Baker then appealed only the District Court's interlocutory order striking their class allegations. Id. The Supreme Court held that "the voluntary dismissal essayed by respondents does not qualify as a 'final decision' within the compass of § 1291." Id. at 1707. The Supreme Court explained that this "tactic would undermine § 1291's firm finality principle, designed to guard against piecemeal appeals, and subvert the balanced solution Rule 23(f) put in place for immediate review of class action orders." Id. The Ninth Circuit found that the parties' mutual settlement for consideration here did not raise the same concerns, because Plaintiffs continued litigating their remaining individual claims after the District Court denied class certification. Id. The Ninth Circuit opined that no facts suggested that Plaintiffs engaged in sham tactics to achieve an appealable final judgment, as the resolution of the present case was not a unilateral dismissal of claims, but a mutual settlement for consideration reached by both parties, which expressly preserved certain claims for appeal. Id. at *4-5. The Ninth Circuit held that the situation here was unlike Baker, where Plaintiffs openly intended to sidestep Rule 23(f) when they voluntarily dismissed their claims. Id. at *5. The Ninth Circuit thereby concluded that it had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 to consider the appeal on the merits.

Bynum, et al. v. Maplebear Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 19405 (2d Cir. Oct. 5, 2017). Plaintiff, a former employee, filed an action asserting Defendant misclassified her as an independent contractor and thereby failed to pay overtime compensation in violation of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The District Court had previously granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration and then stayed the case pursuant to § 3 of the Federal Arbitration Act. Id. at *1. Plaintiff subsequently requested the District Court to end the stay and dismiss the action instead so that she could appeal the District Court's ruling. The District Court granted Plaintiff's motion. On appeal, the Second Circuit held that it lacked jurisdiction over the appeal. The Second Circuit stated that the Federal Arbitration Act bars interlocutory appeals from the grant of a motion to compel arbitration. Id. at *2. The Second Circuit determined that Plaintiffs could not circumvent that prohibition by agreeing to dismiss their claims rather than proceed to arbitration. The Second Circuit relied on U.S. Supreme Court precedent, and reasoned that "the voluntary dismissal essayed by respondents does not qualify as a 'final decision' within the compass of § 1291. The tactic would undermine § 1291's firm finality principle, designed to guard against piecemeal appeals, and subvert the balanced solution Rule 23(f) put in place for immediate review of class action orders." Id. at *3. The Second Circuit reasoned that similarly, allowing an immediate appeal would violate the finality rule. Accordingly, the Second Circuit dismissed Plaintiff's appeal for lack of jurisdiction.

Chen-Oster, et al. v. Goldman, Sachs & Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106406 (S.D.N.Y. June 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former female employees, brought a class action alleging that Defendants denied them equal compensation and opportunities for promotion in violation Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Defendants moved to dismiss the claims of Plaintiffs Gamba and De Luis for injunctive and declaratory relief. The Court denied the motion, and Defendants moved to certify for interlocutory appeal two issues raised in the Court's order, including: (i) whether former employees lack standing to seek injunctive or declaratory relief against their former employer; and (ii) whether a former employee who has not alleged unlawful discharge can seek the remedy of reinstatement under Title VII. Id. at *4. In their motions to dismiss, Defendants argued that, pursuant to the Supreme Court's holding in Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 564 U.S. 338 (2011), Gamba and De Luis lacked standing to seek injunctive and declaratory relief for the class because they no longer worked for Defendant. The Court disagreed, holding that a former employee may have standing to sue where she is seeking reinstatement and would face the same allegedly discriminatory policy once reinstated. The Court also concluded that Gamba and De Luis plausibly could seek reinstatement even if they failed to allege unlawful discharge. Id. at *5. At the outset, the Court noted that, pursuant to the three-pronged test set forth in 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), the Court only may certify an order for interlocutory appeal where: (i) the order involves a controlling question of law; (ii) there is substantial ground for difference of opinion; and (iii) an immediate appeal from the order may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation. Id. The Court found that the first prong weighed in favor of an interlocutory appeal, because whether a former employee seeking reinstatement under Title VII had standing to seek injunctive or declaratory relief in a Title VII action was a threshold question that affected the scope of remedies sought in the lawsuit, which would significantly affect the conduct of the action. Id. at *6. Similarly, the Court stated that whether a former employee could seek reinstatement when the party had not alleged a wrongful discharge was a controlling question of law that could alter the conduct of the action. Id. As to the second prong, the Court opined that substantial ground for difference of opinion existed when: (i)

there was conflicting authority on the issue; or (ii) the issue was particularly difficult and was an issue of first impression. Id. at *6-7. The Court noted that there was a substantial ground for difference of opinion on the issue of whether Wal-Mart "categorically foreclosed former employees from seeking injunctive and declaratory relief." Id. at *7. Further, the Court determined that Defendants were correct that case law authorities from other circuits had held contrary to the Second Circuit. The Court also stated that there was substantial disagreement as to whether wrongful discharge was necessary for a claim of reinstatement. Id. Accordingly, the Court held that there was conflicting authority on these issues, which had not been squarely addressed by the Second Circuit since Wal-Mart. As to the third prong, the Court stated that, were the Second Circuit to reverse the order (finding that Plaintiffs lacked standing to bring the Rule 23(b)(2) action), the parties would be saved from the burden of having to go through an extensive discovery process. Id. at *9. Finally, the Court held that, although the parties also would have an opportunity pursuant to Rule 23(f) to seek appellate review following the Court's decision on class certification, immediate interlocutory appeal would remove a cloud of legal uncertainty over these proceedings and significantly affect the parties' bargaining positions, and hasten the termination of this litigation through a possible settlement. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to certify two questions for interlocutory appeal.

Love, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 14261 (11th Cir. Aug. 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of female employees, brought a putative class action against Defendant alleging nationwide sex discrimination under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. After the U.S. Supreme Court reversed the certification of a nationwide gender discrimination class in Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 564 U.S. 338 (2011), members of the putative class in that case filed new, regional class actions against Wal-Mart, including Love v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. Id. at *1-2. The putative class members were able to do so because Wal-Mart tolled the statute of limitations with respect to their filing claims with the EEOC, which is a prerequisite to filing a federal discrimination suit. Id. at *3. However, in the Eleventh Circuit such tolling is limited to individual claims and not class claims. Id. Accordingly, the District Court in Love allowed the individual claims of the named Plaintiffs to proceed, but dismissed the class claims as untimely. Id. Plaintiffs subsequently settled their individual claims with Defendant. Id. The named Plaintiffs and Defendant filed a stipulation of voluntary dismissal under Rule 41(a)(1)(A)(ii). Id. The District Court entered an order acknowledging the stipulated dismissal and dismissing all pending motions as moot. Id. On November 6, 2015, a group of putative class members moved to intervene in the District Court solely to appeal the District Court's dismissal of the class claims. Id. at *4. The District Court denied the motion to intervene on the grounds that the stipulated dismissal stripped the Court of jurisdiction to hear the motion. Id. That same day, 34 days after the filing of the stipulated dismissal, the putative class members appealed both the denial of their motion to intervene and the dismissal of the class claims. Id. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit ruled that it did not have jurisdiction over the putative class members' appeal of the dismissal of the class claims because it was filed more than 30 days after the filing of the parties' stipulated dismissal. Id. In doing so, the Eleventh Circuit rejected the putative class members' argument that only named Plaintiffs' appeal deadline was triggered by the stipulated dismissal and that the putative class members' deadline was not triggered until the District Court's subsequent order on October 23, 2015. Id. at *4-6. The Eleventh Circuit explained that "the plain language of Rule 41(a)(1)(A)(ii) requires that a stipulation filed pursuant to that sub-section is self-executing and dismisses the case upon its becoming effective, i.e., upon filing unless it explicitly conditions its effectiveness on a subsequent occurrence." Id. at *6-7. Without any condition in the stipulation here, the Eleventh Circuit found that the stipulated dismissal was effective upon filing and triggered the putative class members' 30-day deadline under Rule 4 to appeal dismissal of the class claims. Id. at *7. The putative class members' appeal, filed 34 days after the filing of the stipulated dismissal, was therefore untimely. Id. at *8-9. In turn, although the putative class members' appeal of the denial of their motion to intervene was timely filed, such an appeal was moot as the putative class members had intervened solely for the purpose of appealing the dismissal of the class claims. Id. at *9.

Microsoft Corp. v. Baker, et al.*, 137 S. Ct. 1702 (2017). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant's Xbox 360 video game console's optical disc had a design defect and was unable to withstand even the smallest of vibrations, which resulted in scratched discs that were rendered permanently unplayable. The District Court struck Plaintiffs' class allegations based on the denial of class certification in a previously-filed case of the same nature, finding that principles of comity mandated its decision. Plaintiffs petitioned the Ninth Circuit for appellate review of the interlocutory order under Rule 23(f), but the Ninth Circuit declined to exercise jurisdiction. Id. at 1712-13. Rather than pursue their individual claims further, Plaintiffs moved to voluntarily dismiss their claims with prejudice and represented to the District Court that they would appeal the order striking their class allegations thereafter. Id. at 1711. Defendant stipulated to the voluntary dismissal with prejudice, but argued that Plaintiffs would have no right to appeal. The District Court granted the stipulated motion to dismiss. Id. Plaintiffs subsequently appealed the District Court's decision to strike their class allegations. Id. The Ninth Circuit held that it had jurisdiction to entertain the appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, thereby rejecting Defendant's argument that Plaintiffs had impermissibly circumvented Rule 23(f). Id. The Ninth Circuit also reversed the District Court's decision to strike Plaintiffs' class allegations. Id. at 1712. The Ninth Circuit expressed no opinion as to the merits of class certification, but found that comity did not require denial on the pleadings. It held that such a decision would more properly be made on Plaintiffs' eventual motion for class certification. Id. On further appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari to address a circuit split over the question of whether federal courts of appeals "have jurisdiction under [28 U.S.C.] § 1291 and Article III of the Constitution to review an order denying class certification (or . . . an order striking class allegations) after the named Plaintiffs have voluntarily dismissed their claims with prejudice." Id. The Supreme Court unanimously found that the Ninth Circuit had improperly exercised discretion over Plaintiffs' appeal. The Supreme Court ruled that Plaintiffs' voluntary dismissal with prejudice did not transform the District Court's denial of class certification into a final order. Such a tactic, the Supreme Court concluded, impermissibly attempted to subvert the final judgment rule in § 1291 as well as the process that Congress implemented for refining that rule and providing for appeals of interlocutory orders. Id. at 1713. The Supreme Court explained that Plaintiffs' tactic encouraged "protracted litigation and piecemeal appeals" as well as indiscriminate review of interlocutory orders. Id. Indeed, as the Supreme Court pointed out, under Plaintiffs' theory, "the decision whether an immediate appeal will lie resides exclusively" with Plaintiffs because they "need only dismiss [their] claims with prejudice whereupon [they] may appeal the District Court's order denying class certification." Id. at 1713. Thus, if Plaintiffs subsequently had been denied class certification on remand from the Ninth Circuit, they again could have voluntarily dismissed the case and forced an appeal of that decision, thereby circumventing the purpose of Rule 23(f) and, in conjunction, the rule-making process that Congress had bestowed upon the Supreme Court. Id. at 1714-15. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed the Ninth Circuit's ruling.

(v) Application Of Tolling Principles In Class Actions

California Public Employees' Retirement Systems, et al. v. ANZ Security, Inc.*, 137 S. Ct. 2042 (U.S. 2017). Plaintiff, a public pension fund, purchased securities offerings from Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., and alleged that Defendants, a group of financial firms, were liable under the Securities Act of 1933 ("SA") for their participation as underwriters in the transactions. In 2008, a putative class action was filed against Defendants alleging that the registration statements for certain of Lehman's 2007 and 2008 securities offerings included material misstatements or omissions in violation of § 11 of the SA. Id. at 2044. The complaint was filed on behalf of all persons who purchased the identified securities, and therefore Plaintiff was a member of the putative class. In February 2011, more than three years after the relevant securities offerings, Plaintiff filed a separate complaint against Defendants in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, alleging violations identical to those in the class action on Plaintiff's own behalf. Id. The parties reached a proposed settlement in the putative class action, and Plaintiff opted-out of the class. Defendants then moved to dismiss Plaintiff's individual suit, alleging that the § 11 violations were untimely under the 3-year bar in the second sentence of § 13 of the SA. Id. at 2045. Plaintiff asserted that the 3-year period was tolled during the pendency of the class action filing on the basis of American Pipe & Construction Co. v. Utah, 414 U. S. 538 (1974). The District Court disagreed, and the Second Circuit affirmed, holding that American Pipe's tolling principle was inapplicable to the 3-year bar. Id. The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari and on review, it affirmed the Second Circuit's ruling dismissing Plaintiff's claims. The Supreme Court found that the question was whether § 13 permits the filing of an individual complaint more than three years after the relevant securities offering, when a class action complaint was timely filed, and a Plaintiff filing the individual complaint would have been a member of the class but for opting-out of it. Id. at 2048. The Supreme Court ruled that the answer turned on the nature and purpose of the 3-year bar and of the American Pipe tolling rule that Plaintiff sought to invoke. The Supreme Court found that the statute provides in clear terms that "[i]n no event" shall an action be brought more than three years after the securities offering on which it is based, and that view was confirmed by the two-sentence structure of § 13. Id. at 2049. In addition to the 3-year time bar, § 13 contains a 1-year statute of limitations which runs from the time when a Plaintiff discovers (or should have discovered) the securities law violation. The Supreme Court reasoned that the pairing of a shorter statute of limitations and a longer statute of repose is a common feature of statutory time limits, and that the 3-year time bar in § 13 of the SA is a statute of repose, which was designed to protect Defendants against future liability. Id. at 2050. The Supreme Court concluded that the statute displaced the traditional power of the judiciary to modify statutory time limits in the name of equity. Because the American Pipe tolling rule was rooted in those equitable powers, the Supreme Court found that it did not extend the 3-year period. Accordingly, the Supreme Court ruled that Plaintiff's filing was untimely, American Pipe tolling did not apply, and therefore the claim was properly dismissed.

Collins, et al. v. Village Of Palatine*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 23012 (7th Cir. Nov. 16, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action alleging that Defendant's police department issued a parking ticket to him in 2007 that listed personal information in violation of the Driver's Privacy Protection Act ("DPPA"). Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, and the District Court granted the motion. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Since the DPPA's statute of limitations is four years, ordinarily Plaintiff's claims would be time-barred. However, a nearly identical class complaint – entitled Senne v. Village of Palatine – was filed against Defendant in 2010. Because the lawsuit was brought as a class action, the filing of the complaint tolled the DPPA's statute of limitations for everyone in the proposed class. In Senne, the District Court heard argument on Plaintiff's class certification motion but deferred ruling, instead inviting Defendant to file a motion for summary judgment. Defendant filed the motion, and the District Court entered summary judgment for the Defendant and "terminated" the motion for class certification as moot. Id. at *3. The Seventh Circuit affirmed and the U.S. Supreme Court denied certiorari. On the day the Supreme Court denied certiorari, Senne filed a successor class action on behalf of himself and a proposed class as a placeholder to preserve the claims of the class. Id. at *4. Senne's counsel subsequently filed the instant suit naming Plaintiff as the class representative, and dismissed the other complaint. Defendant moved to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiff's claim was time-barred because the statute of limitations resumed when the District Court dismissed Senne. Plaintiff alleged that dismissal on timeliness grounds was inappropriate at the pleadings stage, and even if procedurally proper, the suit was timely because the limitations period was tolled until the Supreme Court denied Senne's petition for certiorari. Plaintiff also moved for class certification. The District Court agreed with Defendant that Plaintiff's claim was time-barred and granted the motion to dismiss. The District Court summarily denied the motion for class certification. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit noted that when a Plaintiff files a complaint on behalf of a proposed class, the statute of limitations for the claim is tolled for each member of the class pursuant to American Pipe & Construction Co. v. Utah, 414 U.S. 538 (1974). However, the Seventh Circuit stated that American Pipe does not address whether tolling continues during the pendency of an appeal after the suit is dismissed or class certification is denied. Id. at *10. The Seventh Circuit reasoned that the question of class certification was never addressed because the District Court: (i) initially dismissed the case with prejudice; and (ii) later entered summary judgment. Id. at *11. The Seventh Circuit held that an uncertified class action is decidedly not a class action once all class claims have been dismissed, and the statute of limitations therefore immediately resumes. The Seventh Circuit accordingly found that the DPPA's four-year statute of limitations on Plaintiff's claim commenced on June 14, 2007, when he discovered that personal information was displayed on his parking ticket, the statute was tolled when Senne filed suit on behalf of a proposed class on August 27, 2010, and it began to run once again when the District Court dismissed the case on September 22, 2010. Id. at *11-12. The Seventh Circuit found that once the claim was dismissed, the tolling rule of American Pipe no longer controlled, and the statute of limitations for Plaintiff's claim immediately resumed. The Seventh Circuit therefore determined that the limitations period expired on July 10, 2011. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling dismissing Plaintiff's claims.

(vi) Appointment, Selection, And Removal Of Lead Counsel In Class Actions

Ollila, et al. v. Babcock & Wilcox Enterprises, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 85042 (W.D.N.C. May 24, 2017). In a putative class action brought under the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act ("PSLRA"), the Arkansas Teacher Retirement System ("ATRS") and the City of Birmingham Retirement and Relief System ("CBRRS") both requested the Court to consolidate the case with a related matter, pursuant to Rule 42(a), and appoint each as lead Plaintiff in the consolidated action. The Court explained that given the complexity of securities class actions, the Court must analyze various factors when appointing a lead Plaintiff, including: (i) the appointment must be made within 90 days after the date on which is notice is published; and (ii) if more than one action on behalf of a class asserting substantially the same claim or claims has been filed, the Court will appoint the most adequate Plaintiff as lead Plaintiff for the consolidated actions. Id. at *3. The Court found that both entities timely filed motions to be appointed lead Plaintiff. The Court noted that with regard to the financial stakes involved, CBRRS alleged a loss of $468,903 on its transactions with Defendant and ATRS alleged a loss of $5,470,011. Id. at *6. The Court stated that it was clear that ARTS had a larger financial stake during the relevant time period, and would therefore have the larger financial interest in the relief sought by the class. Id. at *7. The Court focused on whether the lead Plaintiff could fulfill the requirements of Rule 23 and explained that a presumptive lead Plaintiff need make only a prima facie showing that it could satisfy the typicality and adequacy requirements of Rule 23 to be appointed. Id. The Court determined that ATRS made the requisite showing of typicality and adequacy, since ATRS' claims were based on the same interests and same injuries alleged by other purported class members; i.e., that Defendant's alleged misrepresentations and omissions of fact caused substantial loss to investors like ATRS. Id. With regard to the adequacy requirement, the Court opined that the class representative and the selected attorney were capable of pursuing this litigation and neither had a conflict of interest with other members of the purported class. Id. at *8. The Court held that the interests of ATRS were aligned with those of other investors who lost money in transactions involving this stock. Accordingly, the Court determined that ATRS satisfied the third prong of the lead Plaintiff test, and it should be appointed the lead Plaintiff. The Court also considered whether any rebuttal evidence existed under 15 U.S.C. § 78u-4(a)(3)(B)(iii)(II). The Court stated that no such evidence was before it so as to undermine the adequacy of ATRS as lead Plaintiff or to suggest that it was subject to unique defenses that would render ATRS incapable of pursuing the interests of the putative class. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted ATRS' motion and denied CBRRS' motion.

(vii) Ascertainability Under Rule 23

Briseno, et al. v. ConAgra Foods, Inc.,* 844 F.3d 1121 (9th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant's "100% Natural" label on Wesson oils was false or misleading because oils are made from bioengineered ingredients that Plaintiffs contended were "not natural." Id. at 1123. Plaintiffs filed a putative class action asserting state law claims against Defendant in eleven states, and those cases were consolidated in this action. Plaintiffs subsequently moved to certify 11 classes defined as all persons who reside in the states of California, Colorado, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Nebraska, New York, Ohio, Oregon, South Dakota, or Texas who have purchased Wesson oils within the applicable statute of limitations periods established by the laws of their state of residence through the final disposition of this and any and all related actions. Id. at 1124. The District Court granted class certification, holding that, at the certification stage, it was sufficient that the class was defined by an objective criterion; i.e., whether class members purchased Wesson oils during the class period. Id. Defendant appealed the District Court's ruling, asserting that Plaintiffs could not prove that an administratively feasible method to identify class members because consumers do not generally save grocery receipts and are unlikely to remember details about individual purchases of a low-cost product like cooking oil. Id. at 1125. At the outset, the Ninth Circuit stated that the language of Rule 23 does not impose a freestanding administrative feasibility prerequisite for class certification. It noted that the Third Circuit has imposed this condition, holding that imposing an administrative feasibility requirement mitigates the administrative burdens of trying a Rule 23(b)(3) class action. The Ninth Circuit opined that Rule 23(b)(3) already contained the manageability criterion of the superiority requirement, which had the same purpose, and that adopting a freestanding administrative feasibility requirement instead of assessing manageability as one component of the superiority inquiry would have practical consequences inconsistent with the policies embodied in Rule 23. Id. at 1128. The Third Circuit had also justified its administrative feasibility requirement as necessary to protect absent class members and to shield bona fide claimants from fraudulent claims. Id. The Ninth Circuit noted that an administrative feasibility requirement like that imposed by the Third Circuit would likely bar such actions because consumers generally do not keep receipts or other records of low-cost purchases. Practically speaking, a separate administrative feasibility requirement would protect a purely theoretical interest of absent class members at the expense of any possible recovery for all class members, in precisely those cases that depend most on the class mechanism. Id. at 1129. Finally, the Ninth Circuit reasoned the Third Circuit characterized its administrative feasibility requirement as necessary to protect the due process rights of Defendants "to raise individual challenges and defenses to claims." Id. at 1130. However, the Ninth Circuit found that if the case proceeded past the certification stage, Plaintiffs would carry the burden of proving every element of its claims to prevail on the merits. Id. at 1131. Defendants can oppose the class representatives' showings at every stage. Given these existing opportunities to challenge Plaintiffs' case, it was not clear, the Ninth Circuit stated, why requiring an administratively feasible way to identify all class members at the certification stage was necessary to protect Defendant's due process rights. Id. at 1132. The Ninth Circuit opined that the policy concerns that have motivated the Third Circuit to adopt a separately articulated administrative feasibility requirement are already addressed by Rule 23. The Ninth Circuit therefore joined the case law precedents of the Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Circuits and declined to adopt an administrative feasibility requirement for class certification. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit upheld the District Court's ruling granting class certification.

Hernandez, et al. v. Midland Credit Management,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114735 (N.D. Ill. July 24, 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant, a debt collector, violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices ("FDCPA") by sending him a false and misleading dunning letter. Defendant had previously moved to dismiss on the basis of lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, arguing that the Supreme Court's decision in Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540 (2016), made plain that Plaintiff has not suffered sufficient injury to establish standing in this case. Id. at *1. The Court denied Defendant's motion, finding that Plaintiff's alleged injury was both particularized and concrete. Plaintiff subsequently moved for class certification pursuant to Rule 23, which the Court denied. Defendant contended that Plaintiff's claims were not ascertainable. Defendant's ascertainability challenge focused on the language limiting the class to persons to whom Defendant "sent one or more letters or other communications similarly in the form of the October 5th letter" in the proposed class definition. Id. at *7. Defendant argued that the "other communications" language swept broadly enough to encompass telephone communications with potential class members. Id. The Court agreed and found that as formulated, Plaintiff's class definition included an amorphous group of people who received communications "similarly in the form of the October 5th letter," including potentially phone communications. Id. at *8. The Court determined that the proposed class definition supplied no objective way to decide whether a communication was substantially similar to the October 5th letter. The Court noted that Plaintiff did not propose an alternative class definition or suggest that the Court should attempt to repair his proposed class definition. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification, but permitted Plaintiff leave to redefine the class in an ascertainable fashion.

Jarzyna, et al. v. Home Properties,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73296 (E.D. Pa. May 15, 2017). Plaintiff brought an action on behalf of himself and other similarly-situated former tenants against a residential management company, Defendant Home Properties L.P. ("Home"), and a debt collection agency, Defendant Fair Collections and Outsourcing, Inc. ("FCO"), alleging violations of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA") and state consumer protection laws. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification, which the Court denied on the basis that Plaintiff failed to prove that the class was ascertainable. Plaintiff moved to certify a class of all persons residing in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Maryland, Maine, Florida, Illinois, and Washington, D.C. who, during the period January 1, 2008, through April 8, 2013: (i) had been identified and/or readily identifiable by Home to have been assessed a 30-day notice fee with the balance placed with FCO for collection; and (ii) who had been subject to FCO's standard, common, and uniform policy not to identify itself as a debt collector when leaving messages on cellular or personal phones. Id. at *2. The Court held that Plaintiff failed to identify any methodology for ascertaining the members of the proposed class. In support of his motion, Plaintiff pointed only to Home's verified response identifying 3,274 tenants in Pennsylvania who paid lease breakage fees; however, FCO denied that it was possible to determine exactly who or how many of these 3,274 were charged the 30-day notice fee, let alone how many were provided to FCO for collection. Id. at *15-16. Further, the Court determined that Plaintiff failed to propose a methodology for identifying tenants "who have been subject of FCO's standard, common, and uniform policy not to identify themselves as a debt collector when leaving messages on cellular/personal phones." Id. at *16. The Court stated that, even assuming that there was some method by which Plaintiff could utilize computer software to identify which former tenants were charged the 30-day notice fee, Plaintiff still failed to demonstrate that he could ascertain which of those had their fees sent to FCO for collection and which received non-identifying messages from FCO regarding the collection of those fees. Plaintiff also failed to offer any evidence or testimony indicating that FCO maintained records showing which fees it called for any particular debtor to collect. Id. at *17. Given that Plaintiff failed to meet the threshold requirement for class certification by showing that his proposed class was ascertainable, the Court declined to analyze the other class certification requirements under Rule 23. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Leyse, et al. v. Lifetime Entertainment Services*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 2607 (2d Cir. Feb. 15, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging violations of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification. Plaintiff appealed that order, as well as the District Court's order entering judgment on his individual TCPA claim after Defendant tendered complete relief to him. Defendant appealed the District Court's holding that Plaintiff had standing to bring his claim. Id. at *2. The Second Circuit upheld all of the District Court's decisions. The Second Circuit found that the record established that Defendant left a pre-recorded voice-mail message on an answering device at Plaintiff's home. Id. at *3. The Second Circuit concluded that Plaintiff's receipt of the pre-recorded call constituted more than a bare violation of the TCPA and satisfied the concrete injury requirement for standing. Id. Plaintiff argued that the District Court abused its discretion in denying his motion to certify a class comprised of "all persons to whose residential telephone lines [Defendant] or a third-party acting on its behalf" initiated the challenged pre-recorded message on ascertainability grounds. Id. Plaintiff proposed identifying class members by soliciting individual affidavits certifying receipt of the pre-recorded call accompanied by telephone bills showing subscription to New York City residential telephone service in August 2009. Id. at *4. The Second Circuit held that Plaintiff failed to produce evidence that this method employed objective criteria, was administratively feasible, or permitted ready identification of class members. Id. The Second Circuit found that the District Court correctly concluded that the proposed class was unascertainable because: (i) no list of the called numbers existed; (ii) no such list was likely to emerge; and (iii) proposed class members could not "realistically be expected to recall a brief phone call received six years ago or to retain any concrete documentation" of such receipt. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiff also appealed contending that the District Court erred in entering judgment on his individual claim upon Defendant's depositing with the clerk of court the full amount of damages and costs recoverable under the TCPA, even though Plaintiff had not accepted Defendant's Rule 68 offer of judgment in that amount. Id. at *6. The Second Circuit held that, although a Rule 68 offer for complete relief does not moot a case, it nonetheless may permit a Court to enter a judgment in Plaintiff's favor. Id. The Second Circuit therefore affirmed the District Court's entry of judgment on Plaintiff's individual claim. Accordingly, the Second Circuit upheld the District Court's decisions.

Melgar, et al. v. CSK Auto, Inc.*, 681 Fed. Appx. 605 (9th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retail store managers and assistant managers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant's reimbursement policy violated the California Labor Code. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the District Court granted. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Id. at 607. The Ninth Circuit found that the District Court properly examined whether the lawfulness of Defendant's reimbursement policy would serve to "generate common answers apt to drive the resolution of the litigation." Id. at 606-07. The Ninth Circuit further concluded that the District Court did not abuse its discretion by certifying a purported fail-safe class. The Ninth Circuit explained that a fail-safe class is commonly defined as limiting membership to Plaintiffs described by their theory of liability in the class definition such that the definition presupposes success on the merits. Id. at 607. The Ninth Circuit stated that here, the class definition did not presuppose its success, because the liability standard applied by the District Court required class members to prove more facts to establish liability than were referenced in the class definition. Id. The Ninth Circuit further determined that the District Court did not abuse its discretion by certifying a class with a self-certification process for absent class members. Id. The Ninth Circuit rejected Defendant's contention that the class failed for lack of ascertainability. Id. at *3. The Ninth Circuit noted that it had previously rejected arguments that a self-identifying class was not "administratively feasible" at the certification stage or that a Defendant's due process rights were somehow impaired because a claimant need only "offer a self-serving affidavit as proof of class membership." Id. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling granting class certification on the grounds that the class was clearly ascertainable.

Sandusky Wellness Center, LLC, et al. v. ASD Specialty Healthcare, Inc*., 863 F.3d 460 (6th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by sending an unsolicited fax with a non-compliant opt-out notice. Plaintiff moved for certification of a putative class comprising all 40,343 persons who allegedly received the fax. The fax advertising a drug was sent to 53,502 physicians, but only 40,343, or 75%, of these faxes were successfully transmitted; however, there were no logs to verify who received the faxes. The District Court denied class certification of claims under the TCPA based upon Plaintiff's failure to meet the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3). It reasoned that there were two individualized issues central to the lawsuit, including: (i) class member identity; and (ii) consent to receiving the faxes. The Federal Communications Commission ("FCC") had granted Defendant a retroactive waiver from complying with the Solicited Fax Rule ("SFR"). Accordingly, the District Court determined that common questions of law or fact did not predominate. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Sixth Circuit ruled that the District Court was correct to conclude that individualized questions of consent prevented common questions from predominating under Rule 23(b)(3). Although the District Court credited the FCC's retroactive waiver for the need to distinguish between solicited and unsolicited faxes, the D.C.'s Circuit's intervening decision in Bais Yaakov of Spring Valley v. FCC, 852 F.3d 1078, 1083 (D.C. Cir. 2017), which invalidated the SFR, provided alternative grounds for this differentiation. The Sixth Circuit opined that the District Court's recognition of the difficulty in identifying class members without fax logs and with sole reliance on individual affidavits was equally sufficient to preclude certification, regardless of whether this concern was properly articulated as part of the ascertainability requirement, Rule 23(b)(3) predominance, or Rule 23(b)(3) superiority. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision.

St. Louis Heart Center, et al. v. Vein Centers For Excellence,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103142 (E.D. Mo. July 5, 2017). Plaintiff brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by sending "junk faxes" to it and thousands of others. Id. at *1. The Court had previously certified a class of over 35,000 fax recipients. Defendant now sought summary judgment, or in the alternative, decertification of the class. Defendant hired fax broadcaster Westfax to send out form fax advertisements to thousands of fax numbers belonging to doctors and medical centers. Westfax charged Defendant for the 35,212 successful fax transmissions, but not the many attempted transmissions that did not go through, and did not provide a list of the fax numbers which were successfully sent an advertisement. Id. at *2. Plaintiff alleged that it received multiple fax advertisements from Defendant, including one that was part of a Westfax fax broadcast that went to more than 5,000 cardiologists. Id. at *2-3. Defendant argued that the proposed class could not be ascertained. It asserted that because no class member could prove that they were sent one of the junk faxes, if class members came forward with individual testimony or submitted their own evidence of fax receipt, the Court would be required to hold mini-hearings on the evidence. Id. at *3. Plaintiff contended that the facts demonstrated that Defendant did violate the TCPA, and any issues with identifying the victims of that violation would not equate to inadequate proof of liability. Id. at *5. The Court agreed and found that although the evidence before it did not identify the fax numbers which were successfully sent a junk fax by Defendant, the undisputed evidence showed that Defendant violated the TCPA by sending unsolicited fax advertisements. Id. at *6. The Court stated therefore that granting summary judgment in Defendant's favor could foreclose valid claims brought later by individuals who were sent the junk faxes at issue in this case. Id. Defendant further asserted that the inability to identify potential class members violated Rule 23's class requirements of commonality, predominance, and ascertainability. Plaintiff contended that precise identification of class members was not required at this stage of the litigation and that members should be able to identify themselves in response to notice. Id. at *7. The Court disagreed with Plaintiff and found that the class was not ascertainable. The Court stated that although Plaintiff provided evidence of the number of successfully transmitted junk faxes by Defendant, there was no evidence of exactly which fax numbers were successfully sent a junk fax. Id. at *10. Without fax logs of successful transmissions or other such evidence, the Court determined that the only way potential class members could prove they were "sent" junk faxes, as required by the class definition, was through individual testimony. Id. The Court held that without any generalized class-wide proof of liability, it would be required to conduct "mini-hearings on the merits of each case" in order to identify class members. Id. at *11. The Court therefore found that the class was not ascertainable, and granted Defendant's motion to decertify the class.

(viii) Attorneys' Fee Awards In Class Actions

Aranda, et al. v. Caribbean Cruise Line, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52645 (N.D. Ill. April 18, 2016). Plaintiffs filed suit against Defendants Caribbean Cruise Line, Inc., Vacation Ownership Marketing Tours, Inc., the Berkley Group, Inc., and the Economic Strategy Group and its affiliates ("ESG") for violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Over a million people across the United States received pre-recorded phone calls from ESG or Political Opinions of America requesting participation in various short political surveys. Id. at *2. After roughly four years of litigation, the parties settled on the eve of trial, and the settlement called for Defendants to establish a common fund in an amount no lower than $56 million and no higher than $75 million, from which class members would be paid. Id. *3. Following final approval of the class-wide settlement, Plaintiffs' counsel petitioned for an award of attorneys' fees in an amount equal to one third of the final common fund. The Court granted in part the fee request. The Court held that, although the circumstances of the case warranted a higher fee award than those granted in other TCPA class actions, the award should not be as high as requested. The Court declined to depart from the "sliding-scale structure" used in the Seventh Circuit to award attorneys' fees in class actions. Id. The main question addressed by the Court was whether the fee request should be granted based on the "flat-percentage" approach proposed by Plaintiffs' counsel or the "sliding scale" model often used to award attorneys' fees for class action settlements as outlined in In Re Synthroid Marketing Litigation, 264 F.3d 712, 721 (7th Cir. 2001). Id. *4. The "sliding scale" model consists of breaking class action settlement funds into tiers or bands and awarding class counsel a decreasing percentage of each band. The rationale behind this approach is that "awarding class counsel a decreasing percentage of the higher tiers of recovery enables them to recover the principal costs of litigation from the first bands of the award, while allowing the clients to reap more of the benefit at the margin yet still preserving some incentive for lawyers to strive for these higher awards." Id. at *11. Plaintiffs' counsel argued that an award amounting to one third of the net common fund accurately reflected the result of a hypothetical negotiation between Plaintiffs and their attorneys under a "market based approach." In support, they cited their typical contingency fees in TCPA cases and an expert who opined that the request was less than a standard rate for individual TCPA cases. Plaintiffs' counsel argued that they had generated better-than-average value for the class and should be paid accordingly. Id. *6-7. The Court agreed that the circumstances of the case warranted a higher fee than those granted in other TCPA class actions that had resulted in settlement. Id. *14. However, the Court did not agree that the case was one in which "declining marginal percentages are [not] always best" and, therefore, found that this concern did not provide a reason for class members to deviate from the sliding-scale structure in an ex ante negotiation. Id. *12. Specifically, the Court noted that Plaintiffs' counsel would have had the same or virtually the same incentive to fight for a high award whether they were receiving a flat rate or a sliding-scale rate because, up until the very end, class counsel were fighting to get any recovery for the class. Id. *16. The Court also disagreed that class members would accept a flat rate because of its low inherent value or because of the possibility that counsel could generate a high recovery through aggressive litigation because it was "not clear that the hypothetical class members in this case would be faced with the binary choice between a high-percentage fee with a large recovery, on the one hand, and a sliding-scale fee for a small recovery, on the other." Id. *17. Despite this, the Court was "persuaded that Plaintiffs and their counsel faced materially greater risks in this case than those faced in the other recent TCPA class actions" and, therefore, added at least a 6% premium to the first "band" of recovery on the sliding scale. Id. *25. Ultimately, the Court awarded class counsel 36% of the first $10 million ($3.5 million), 30% of the second $10 million ($3.5 million), 24% of the band from $20 million to $56 million ($8.64 million), and 18% of the remainder. The Court concluded that, if the common fund reached its $76 million ceiling, the Court would increase the fee award, in which case the award would amount to roughly 25.6% of the common fund, i.e., slightly higher than the mean and median recoveries for TCPA cases of similar value. Id. *30-31. Accordingly, the Court granted the motion for attorneys' fees in part.

Cashman, et al. v. Delta-Sonic Car Wash Systems,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14394 (W.D.N.Y. Jan. 31, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, filed an action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA and the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). The parties subsequently settled the matter, and the Court granted preliminary approval of the settlement. Id. at *7. Defendants agreed to create a settlement fund of $800,000 to resolve Plaintiffs' claims. Plaintiffs' counsel filed an application for attorneys' fees in the amount of $320,000, which constituted 40% of the settlement fund. Id. at *19. The Court stated that, although the case involved a relatively large class, the litigation was fairly straightforward, involved a relatively discrete but unsettled legal issue, and generated limited motion practice. Additionally, Plaintiffs' counsel only deposed one individual, and Defendant deposed only two named Plaintiffs. Id. at *20. Plaintiffs' counsel submitted time records in support of their motion for attorneys' fees. Plaintiffs' counsel sought a rate of $350 per hour for attorney time of 691.55 hours and $150 per hour for paralegal time of 32.05 hours. Based on the time records, the total sought for attorney time and paralegal time was $246,593.72 or 30.82% of the total settlement. Id. at *23. Plaintiffs' counsel further requested an enhancement of approximately 30% based on "excellent results as well as the substantial risks incurred by taking this case on a contingency basis." Id. Application of the 1.30 multiplier resulted in the requested fee of $320,000. Plaintiffs argued that the lodestar cross-check justified the requested fee of 40% of the settlement fund. Id. The Court found that hourly rates generally allowed for a case such as this were in the range of $225 to $250 for partner time or senior associate time, $150 to $175 for junior associate time, and $75 for paralegal time. Id. at *24. The Court determined that these hourly rates ($225 to $250 for partner time and $75 for paralegal time) were appropriate rates to be applied in this case. Id. at *25. The Court concluded that these rates were both fair and reasonable given the attorneys' years in practice and the hourly rate employed by comparable attorneys in the locale. Id. at *26. The Court held that, when applying these rates, the new total was $175,291.25. The Court therefore found that the lodestar calculation did not support a percentage of the fund fee of 40% but, would support a cross-checked percentage of 33% of the total settlement, or $264,000. Id. Therefore, the Court granted the request for attorneys' fees and awarded fees in the amount of $264,000.

City Of Antonio, et al. v. Hotels.com, L.P.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58385 (W.D. Tex. April 17, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action for collection of hotel-occupancy taxes pursuant to Chapter 351 of the Texas Tax Code and similar Texas municipal tax codes. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants were statutorily obligated to pay hotel occupancy taxes on the difference between the retail price of the hotel rooms, which consumers paid, and the wholesale price that Defendants paid the hotels for the contractual right to book the rooms. After extensive discovery and motion practice, Plaintiffs obtained a jury verdict in their favor at trial. Id. at *13. Plaintiffs subsequently filed a fee application seeking $43,199,878 in attorneys' fees. Id. at *18. Plaintiffs argued that the Court should calculate the lodestar at $10,799,970 and apply a multiplier of four times the lodestar to account for the remarkable nature of the case. In the alternative, Plaintiffs argued that the Court should award the difference out of the class recovery. Plaintiffs also requested that the Court award them reasonable attorneys' fees for the prospective appeal of the case, and they sought $1,765,195.55 in expenses out of the common fund because such expenses were not recoverable by statute and typically would be billed to paying clients. Defendants opposed the amount of attorneys' fees requested. Id. at *18. Defendants stipulated to the amount of hours expended by Plaintiffs' counsel in the litigation as reasonable; however, Defendants asserted that the requested lodestar should be reduced because a large portion of the paralegal time was non-compensable in that it was clerical and administrative in nature, and the requested hourly rates far exceeded the prevailing rates in the community. Id. Defendants further argued that no enhancement was applicable because any factors that might otherwise justify an enhancement were subsumed within the Court's lodestar analysis. Id. at *19. Finally, Defendants argued that the Court should deny Plaintiffs' request for contingent appellate fees. The Magistrate Judge found that the number of attorney hours spent on the case – that totaled 19,516.83 – was reasonable considering the complex nature of the litigation. However, the Magistrate Judge recommended reducing the paralegal time by 15% to account for clerical, vague, duplicative, and excessive time entries. Id. at *22, *27. The Magistrate Judge also recommended that the Court award Plaintiffs attorneys' fees, to be paid by Defendants, in the amount of $25,014,476.25, an enhancement of 2.5 times the base lodestar. The Magistrate found that a 2.5 multiplier was appropriate due to the extraordinary results obtained and the contingent nature of the case. Id. at *50. Because the enhanced lodestar of $25,014,476.25 represented a reasonable award of attorneys' fees, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court deny Plaintiffs' request for further enhancement of the lodestar from the common fund. Finally, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court deny Plaintiffs' request for contingent appellate fees without prejudice because Plaintiffs failed to provide any evidence as to the number of hours that their counsel was likely to spend on the appeal or any basis on which to determine the reasonableness of the amounts requested. Id. at *53. The Magistrate Judge further recommended that the Court award Plaintiffs' counsel $1,750,858.57 in expenses out of the common fund. Id. at *55.

Cobell, et al. v. Jewell*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 54281 (D.D.C. April 10, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of Native Americans, filed a class action against Defendant, the Secretary of the Interior, alleging that Defendant had mismanaged accounts and land held in trust to benefit certain Native Americans. Plaintiffs sought damages and an order compelling Defendant to reform its trust practices. After many years of litigation, Plaintiffs obtained a settlement in 2009 that brought about trust reform and a significant recovery for Plaintiffs that required congressional approval. After settlement, Plaintiffs' counsel moved for an award of attorneys' fees and costs. Plaintiffs' counsel was awarded $99 million in attorneys' fees. Mark Brown, an attorney who worked on the case from 2000 until 2006, was not included in the motion. Brown petitioned the District Court for his share of the fee award. In his original petition, Brown sought compensation for approximately 11,500 hours, totaling $5.5 million. The Court conducted a five-day hearing and granted Brown the sum of $2,878,612.52. Brown subsequently filed a motion seeking pre-judgment interest on his fee award. The Court found that Brown was entitled to pre-judgment interest of $736,293.88, an amount calculated based on the simple, annual interest rate of 6%. Id. at *6-7. Brown requested pre-judgment interest on his fee award pursuant to § 15-108 and § 15-109 of the D.C.

Code, at an interest rate of 6%, compounded annually, for a total amount of $819,656.21. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs responded to Brown's motion by denying that he was entitled to any pre-judgment interest under the law of the District of Columbia. The Court held that an award of pre-judgment interest pursuant to § 15-109 was appropriate to fully compensate Brown. The Court stated that Brown waited over four years to be paid for his work on this case, during which time he was deprived of the use of a substantial sum of money that he was owed. When he was excluded from his co-counsels' motion for a fee award, he timely commenced suit to collect his fee. The Court opined that District of Columbia law is clear that pre-judgment interest is an equitable remedy used to make a judgment creditor whole, and there was no question that Brown would not be made whole if his fee award did not include pre-judgment interest on the substantial sum that was withheld from him for more than four years. Id. at *11. The Court determined that there was a consensus in District of Columbia case law authority that the rate applicable to pre-judgment interest awarded under § 15-109 in breach of contract actions where the contract specifies no interest rate is that defined in § 28-3302(a). Id. at *18. Plaintiffs contended that Brown should receive no more than the interest actually accrued over the past four years in the settlement account on the fees he was awarded. Id. at *20-21. The Court disagreed and stated that it would not ignore District of Columbia law concerning the proper rate of pre-judgment interest in this matter. Accordingly, the Court awarded Brown pre-judgment interest at the rate of 6% per annum pursuant to § 28-3302. Finally, Brown requested that pre-judgment interest on his fee award be compounded annually, rather than on a simple annual basis. The Court noted that § 28-3302 is silent as to whether interest should be calculated on a simple or compounded basis. Id. at *22. The Court stated that, even assuming that District of Columbia law permitted it the discretion to calculate pre-judgment interest on a compounded basis in an appropriate case, it would not do so because it would result in an award that would make Brown more than whole. Id. at *23. Because the purpose of pre-judgment interest is to make the creditor whole, and no more, the Court held that the award of pre-judgment interest would not be compounded. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Brown's motion for pre-judgment interest.

Cobell, et al. v. Jewell*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12814 (D.D.C. Jan. 31, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of Native Americans, filed a class action against the Defendant, alleging that the Department of the Interior had mismanaged accounts and the land it held in trust to benefit certain Native Americans. Plaintiffs sought damages and an order compelling the government to reform its trust practices. After many years of litigation, Plaintiffs obtained a settlement in 2009 that brought about trust reform and a significant recovery for the Plaintiffs, that required Congressional approval. After settlement, Plaintiffs' counsel moved for an award of attorneys' fees and costs. Plaintiffs' counsel was awarded $99 million in attorneys' fees. Mark Brown, an attorney who worked on the case from 2000 until 2006, was not included in the motion. Brown petitioned the District Court for his share of the fee award. In his original petition, Brown sought compensation for approximately 11,500 hours of time totaling $5.5 million. The District Court conducted a five-day hearing and granted Brown $2,878,612.52 in fees. Brown joined the Plaintiffs' legal team in January 2000 when he moved to Washington, D.C. to work on the case full-time until he left to return to California in 2006. Brown signed two letters indicating an agreement with the named Plaintiff. The letters stated that Brown's customary billing rate was $350 per hour. The engagement letters also contained a provision regarding the withdrawal of any attorney, which stated that if any counsel withdrew they would be entitled to the portion of their fee to which they would otherwise be entitled, taking into account the value of the services rendered and the total fees payable to counsel. Id. at *16 Plaintiffs' counsel allege that, beginning in 2001, Brown's performance deteriorated as well as his relationship with the other members of the legal team. Plaintiffs' counsel argued that Brown was either fired for just cause in 2007 or he withdrew in 2006 without cause, and in either scenario Brown was not entitled to fees. Brown disagreed and asserted that he adequately performed all duties assigned to him. The District Court ruled in favor of Brown and found that he was entitled to an award of reasonable fees. The District Court noted that when an attorney withdraws from representing his client for good cause, he retains a right to compensation for services rendered. The District Court rejected Defendant's assertion that Brown was terminated and instead found that he withdrew for just cause in January 2006. The District Court determined that Brown was entitled to fees pursuant to the engagement letter for the value of his legal services provided. The District Court noted that Brown's withdrawal did not result in any prejudice to his clients who were represented by a capable team of attorneys at the time of his departure. The District Court also found that Brown did not violate any ethical duty owed to Plaintiffs, and was therefore entitled to an award of reasonable fees. The District Court determined Brown's fees by employing the lodestar method, multiplying the total number of hours worked by the attorney's reasonable rate, i.e., the rate in the agreement of $350 per hour. The District Court found that Brown improperly included time in his fee petition for which he had previously been compensated for through interim fee awards and time that was he previously denied compensation for as part of interim fee petitions because the hours were deemed unnecessary, unreasonable, or unsupported. The District Court deducted these hours from his fee award. Furthermore, the District Court reduced the amount of fees that Brown requested by 20% due to Brown's failure to exercise billing judgment for reasonableness and imposing upon the Court the "grunt work" of reviewing 481 pages of records to determine compensable time. Id. at *125 Accordingly, the District Court awarded Brown a total of $2,878,612.52.

Cook, et al. v. Rockwell International Corp.,* Case No. 90-CV-181 (D. Colo. April 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a class of property owners, brought an action alleging that Rocky Flats, a former nuclear weapons facility formerly operated by Dow Chemical Co. and Rockwell International Corp., dispersed plutonium that contaminated 30 square miles of property around the facility. Plaintiffs pursued claims of trespass and nuisance claims under Colorado state law and the federal Price-Anderson Act, passed in 1997, relating to nuclear power and the hazards of radioactive materials. The parties ultimately settled the matter after almost 27 years of litigation. Class counsel then filed a motion pursuant to Rule 23(h) and 54(d) for award of attorneys' fees. Id. at 1. The Court granted the motion. The Court found that the percentage-of-recovery method was appropriate for awarding fees in this matter. Class counsel requested 40% of the settlement fund, or $150 million. Id. at 2. The Court noted that other case law authorities have acknowledged that a 40% fee falls within the acceptable range of fee awards, and none of the other cases in which this was the case even approached the considerable risk, length, and complexity of Plaintiffs' class action. Id. at 3. The Court further determined that a 40% award fee would result in a lodestar multiplier of 2.41, which was also within the range of fees awarded in common fund cases. Id. The Court noted that class counsel filed this case 27 years ago on a completely contingent basis, and given the considerable risk, the legal team should be compensated for their efforts in securing excellent results for the class. Id. at 4. Accordingly, the Court awarded class counsel attorneys' fees of $150 million plus a proportionate shore of the interest on the settlement fund as it accrued.

Dungee, et al. v. Davidson Design & Development, Inc.,* 674 Fed. App'x 153 (3d Cir. 2017). Plaintiff, an investor, brought a class action alleging violations of the Americans Inventors Protection Act of 1999 ("AIPA") and breach of contract. A fee-shifting provision within the AIPA allowed Plaintiff to recover reasonable costs and attorneys' fees as a prevailing party. After the District Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint, the parties mediated the case and reached a settlement agreement. Plaintiff filed a motion for an award of $2 million in attorneys' fees under a percentage-of-recovery calculation. Defendant argued that the lodestar calculation method was more appropriate under the circumstances and the parties agreed that the base lodestar calculation amounted to $257,226.76. The District Court subsequently issued an order granting $1,118,936.40 in attorneys' fees to Plaintiff's counsel. Id. at 155. The District Court reached this figure by applying a 4.35 multiplier to enhance the base lodestar calculation. The District Court explained that it applied the multiplier because case law precedent of the Third Circuit typically applied multipliers up to 15.6 with an average of 4.35. The District Court thereby accepted Plaintiff's assertion, adopted the multiplier of 4.35, and awarded a fee of $1,118,936.40. On appeal, the Third Circuit vacated and remanded the District Court's ruling. At the outset, the Third Circuit found that that the nature of the settlement made it difficult to fashion a precise calculation using the percentage-of-recovery method and, accordingly, it found no error in the District Court's application of the lodestar method. Id. at 156. However, the Third Circuit determined that the lodestar multiplier selected did not represent a reasonable fee for the work of Plaintiff's counsel. Id. The Third Circuit found that, if presented with a "rare" and "exceptional" case, a District Court could tailor the method of enhancing the lodestar to that specific case. Id. However, the party requesting an enhancement to the lodestar carries the burden to show that a multiplier is necessary to reach a fair and reasonable fee award. Id. The Third Circuit opined that the District Court offered no viable explanation for why the simple lodestar calculation would not adequately compensate class counsel, or why this case presented "rare" and "exceptional" circumstances needed to enhance the lodestar. Id. at 157. The Third Circuit determined that the District Court had simply adopted Plaintiff's recommended 4.35 multiplier, understanding it to be the "average" multiplier used in the Third Circuit. Id. The Third Circuit concluded that there was no basis justifying the use of any lodestar multiplier, let alone a multiplier of 4.35. Accordingly, the Third Circuit vacated the District Court's fee order and remanded the action for further proceeding.

Huyer, et al. v. Buckley,* 849 F.3d 395 (8th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action challenging Defendant's practice of automatically ordering and charging fees for property inspections when customers fell behind on their mortgage payments. In 2015, the parties participated in mediation and reached a settlement. The settlement agreement provided that Defendant would pay $25,750,000 in full settlement of all class claims including $3,250,000 to cover the costs of providing notice and administering the settlement. Id. at 397. Class counsel also requested attorneys' fees in the amount of one-third of the total settlement fund. The District Court preliminarily approved the settlement agreement, and more than 2.7 million notices were sent to class members. Three objectors filed objections to the amount of attorneys' fees, arguing that the notice and administration costs did not represent a benefit to the class members, and therefore the Court should calculate attorneys' fees based only on the net settlement fund rather than the total settlement fund. Id. The District Court granted final approval of the class action settlement and awarded $8,583,332.48 to class counsel in attorneys' fees, representing one-third of the total settlement fund. Id. at 397-98. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit affirmed the fee award. The Eighth Circuit found that objectors failed to show that the administrative costs were unjustifiable. Further, the Eighth Circuit noted that, under the terms of the settlement, if the costs of notice and administration did not reach $3,250,000, any remaining funds would be available for distribution to class members. Thus, the Eighth Circuit held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion by basing its fee award on the total settlement fund, which included administrative costs. Id. at 398. The Eighth Circuit also determined that the District Court did not err in concluding that the circumstances of the case justified a large award. The Eighth Circuit reasoned that the fee was justified based on the five relevant factors, including: "(i) the time and work required; (ii) the preclusion of other employment by the attorneys due to acceptance of this case; (iii) the contingent nature of the fee; (iv) the results obtained; and (v) the experience, reputation, and ability of the attorneys." Id. at 399. In evaluating these factors, the Eighth Circuit noted that "this case has been on-going since 2008 and has included extensive motion practice, discovery, and settlement negotiations. Furthermore, all of the attorneys worked on a contingent basis, and most attorneys retained on behalf of the class have relevant experience in class action litigation." Id. The Eighth Circuit also explained that, under the percentage-of-the-benefit method, the award was in line with other awards in the Eighth Circuit, and the District Court verified the reasonableness of its award by cross-checking it against the lodestar method. Id. Accordingly, because the amount of attorneys' fees was not unreasonable, the Eighth Circuit concluded that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in granting Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees.

Huyer, et al. v. Wells Fargo & Company*, Case No. 08-CV-507 (S.D. Iowa Oct. 10, 2017). Two law firms, Scott & Scott and Reese Richman LLP, were appointed as co-lead counsel in a RICO class action against Defendant. The Court had previously certified the class. Id. at 2. Recognizing that sending notice to the class could cost over $1 million, Reese Richman LLP attempted to defray their share of the costs by enlisting another law firm, Finkelstein, Blankship, Frei-Pearson & Garber ("FBFG"), to contribute capital to the notice program. Id. at 3. Reese Richman LLP and FBFG entered into a Joint Prosecution Agreement ("JPA"), which divided up future attorneys' fees and costs. Scott & Scott would receive 50% of the fees and bear 50% of the costs. FBFG and Reese Richman LLP would each receive 25% of the fees and bear 25% of the cost. Id. at 4. The JPA expressly provided that FBFG and Scott & Scott, alone, would bear the costs for the notice program. Id. Therefore, Reese Richman LLP shared a portion of its attorneys' fees with FBFG in exchange for FBFG fronting the capital for the notice program. The dispute at issue arose because the case settled before notice ever went out. Thus, FBFG was never required to contribute capital to the notice program. Id. at 5. Subsequently, the Court granted final approval of the class settlement agreement and awarded approximately $8.5 million in attorneys' fees. Id. at 5-6. FBFG and Reese Richman LLP subsequently fought over the division of the fees. FBFG wanted the full amount to which it claimed it was entitled to under the JPA, regardless of the fact that it did not contribute to the notice program. Id. Reese Richman LLP essentially argued that it did not have to honor the JPA because the class settlement agreement called for allocation of the fees according to co-lead counsel's good faith judgment concerning each counsel's contribution to the case. Id. at 5. FBFG and Reese Richman LLP arbitrated their dispute pursuant to an arbitration clause in the JPA. Id. at 6. The arbitration panel sided with FBFG, finding that the JPA was enforceable and that FBFG was entitled to 50% of the fees awarded to Reese Richman LLP. Id. The panel, however, declined to express an opinion on what effect the class settlement agreement had on the JPA or how counsel must exercise their discretion in dividing the fees. Id. at 7. Instead, the panel stated that it was up to the Court to decide whether or to what extend good faith requires recognition of the Panel's conclusion that Reese Richman LLP had made a valid agreement to share equally with FBFG whatever fees may be awarded by the District Court. Id. Subsequently, FBFG filed a notice of an attorneys' lien in the amount of approximately $2.1 million, and Reese LLP (successor in interest to Reese Richman LLP) brought the dispute back to the District Court. Id. Specifically, Reese LLP asked the Court to issue an order confirming that it was not required to recognize the arbitration decision in fulfilling its duty to allocate attorneys' fees under the class settlement agreement. Id. In this regard, Reese LLP made two primary arguments to set aside the arbitration decision, including: (i) the fee-splitting provision of the JPA was unenforceable under Eighth Circuit law; and (ii) the fee-splitting provision directly conflicted with the terms of the class settlement agreement. Id. at 8. With respect to Reese LLP's first argument, the Court held that it lacked jurisdiction to decide that the fee-splitting provision was unenforceable. Id. at 9-10. Because Reese LLP failed to substantively challenge the enforceability of the fee-splitting provision during arbitration, the Court held that Reese LLP waived those challenges in the Court. Id. at 10. Reese LLP's second argument was likewise rejected. The Court decided that it need not take corrective action "because the [arbitration] award is not inherently in conflict with the [class settlement agreement]." Id. at 11. The Court's noted that there was the lack of "consensus amongst the circuits regarding the extent of the …. Court's power to intercede in these matters . . . ." Id. at 15. "Eight Circuit case law," the Court further explained, "provides no support for the proposition that this Court can unilaterally supersede a valid and enforceable fee-sharing agreement in the circumstances of this case." Id. Accordingly, the Court found that FBFG was entitled to its share of attorneys' fees under the JPA.

In Re Automotive Parts Antitrust Litigation,* Case No. 12-MD-2311 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 10, 2017). The parties in this multi-district litigation involving antitrust claims – and allegations that auto parts makers engaged in bid-rigging and price-fixing on automotive wire harnesses –reached a class action settlement. The Court granted settlement approval and the direct purchaser Plaintiffs filed a motion for attorneys' fees, expenses, and incentive awards to class representatives. Subsequently, the Court granted the motion. The Court stated that it would award fees to direct purchaser Plaintiffs' counsel using the percentage-of-the-fund approach. Id. at 2. Plaintiffs' counsel requested a fee award of 30% of the settlement funds before costs, expenses, and incentive awards were deducted. Id. at 3. The Court found that 30% was well within the range of fee awards made in the Sixth Circuit. The Court stated that it considered six factors in weighing a fee award, including: (i) the value of the benefits rendered to the class; (ii) society's stake in rewarding attorneys who produce such benefits in order to maintain an incentive to others; (iii) whether the services were undertaken on a contingent fee basis; (iv) the value of services on a hourly basis; (v) the complexity of the litigation; and (vi) the professional skill and standing of counsel. Id. The Court found that the settlement fund of over $102 million conferred a substantial cash benefit to members of the class. Id. at 4. The Court also held that Plaintiffs' counsel vigorously and effectively pursued the class members' claims. Id. The Court opined that the results achieved were a clear benefit to the settlement class, and that Plaintiffs' counsel was operating on a contingency fee basis and the complex legal and factual issues in antitrust cases all were factors in favor of the fee award. Id. Further, the lodestar cross-check indicated that the requested fees represented 38% of the lodestar value. The Court therefore determined that an award of 30% of settlements funds was appropriate, after removing costs and $7.5 million for certain future litigation expenses. Id. at 5-6. The Court also found that the class representatives were deserving of service awards in view of the time and effort they expended and the burden and inconveniences they incurred, and it awarded $50,000 to each representative. Id. at 6. Accordingly, the Court granted the direct purchaser Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees.

In Re Lifetime Fitness TCPA Litigation,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 1843 (8th Cir. Feb. 2, 2017). In 2014, four law firms filed four separate class action complaints against Life Time, a fitness center, alleging that Life Time violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by sending unsolicited text-message advertisements to putative class members' cellular telephones. After mediation, the parties entered into a settlement agreement under which Life Time agreed to pay a minimum of $10 million and a maximum of $15 million to settle the TCPA claims, to cover the costs of settlement administration, and to pay attorneys' fees and expenses in the amount awarded by the District Court. Id. at *2. After the claims period closed, class counsel filed a motion for attorneys' fees, requesting an award of $3 million, or 30% of the guaranteed $10 million minimum payment Life Time was required to remit under the settlement agreement. Class counsel attached declarations in support of the requested fee amount, which documented the hours and various billing rates of the individuals who had worked on the lawsuit and which resulted in a lodestar of $687,928.75. The District Court granted preliminary approval of the settlement agreement. The District Court utilized class counsel's requested percentage-of-the-benefit method to calculate the fee amount, and rejected Life Time's argument for application of the lodestar method, and overruled an objection to the fee request. The District Court found that class counsel had "expended substantial time and effort in their able prosecution" of the lawsuit, which ultimately resulted in a good faith settlement that provided a "fair, reasonable, adequate, and certain result" for the class. Id. at *3. The District Court awarded a total sum of $2.8 million in attorneys' fees and expenses. An objector argued that the fee award was excessive. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit upheld the District Court's decision. The Eighth Circuit found that the District Court reviewed the parties' submissions on the attorneys' fee issue, heard extensive argument on the matter, and considered the fees awarded and the methods used to calculate those fees in similar cases. Id. at *5. The District Court engaged in a pointed inquiry into class counsel's requested percentage-of-the-benefit fee amount and Life Time's suggested lodestar and appropriate multipliers and considered in detail arguments from both parties. The District Court also reviewed in camera the itemized daily time records kept by each attorney and other legal professionals who participated in representing the class and ultimately accepted those records as additional evidence that class counsel "expended substantial time and effort in their prosecution of claims on behalf of" the class. Id. at *6. The Eighth Circuit determined that the District Court's analysis was thorough, its findings were amply supported by the record, and it did not abuse its significant discretion by electing to use the percentage-of-the-benefit method to calculate the fee award or by determining that an award of $2.8 million in attorneys' fees and expenses was reasonable. Id. at *7. The Eighth Circuit similarly found that the District Court did not abuse its discretion by including approximately $750,000 in fund administration costs. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit upheld the District Court's decision granting class counsel's motion for attorneys' fees and costs.

In Re Sears, Roebuck and Co. Front-Loading Washer Products Liability Litigation*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 15034 (7th Cir. Aug. 14, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a class action based on two defects in washing machines sold by Sears and Whirlpool, including a control unit defect and a problem of mold. The District Court had previously certified two Plaintiff cases – one consisting of owners of machines manufactured between 2004 and 2006 that had been affected by the control unit defect, and one of owners of machines affected by the mold. Sears settled with both classes and indicated that class members would receive no more than $900,000 from the settlement. Id. at *2. Class counsel subsequently filed their attorneys' fees request and asserted that they incurred $3.16 million in fees. Class counsel further requested the District Court to use a multiplier of 1.9 to account for what they claimed to be their extraordinary effort in the case, amounting to approximately $6 million in requested attorneys' fees. Id. at *3. The District Court, however, concluded that class counsel were entitled to a base fee of $2,726,191 multiplied by 1.75, for a total fee award of $4,770,834. Id. Class counsel asserted that the requested award was warranted because of "the novelty/complexity of the legal issues involved, the degree of success obtained, the public interest advanced by the litigation, the fact that fees were contingent on the outcome of the case, and to a lesser extent the preclusion of certain class counsel from working on other cases." Id. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit concluded that class counsel failed to prove that a reasonable fee would exceed $2.7 million. Id. at *4. The Seventh Circuit found that the pre-multiplier figure sought by class counsel was already three times the damages awarded to the class and therefore no multiplier should be used in the fee calculation. The Seventh Circuit therefore reversed the judgment of the District Court and remanded with directions to award $2.7 million in fees to the class counsel.

In Re Tremont Securities Law, State Law & Insurance Litigation*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 11282 (2d Cir. June 26, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of investors in various hedge funds managed by Defendant Tremont and its affiliates, appealed from a District Court's ruling approving a post-settlement plan to allocate the liquidated assets of certain funds (the "Plan of Allocation" or "POA") and awarding attorneys' fees. The Second Circuit affirmed that District Court's approval of the POA, but vacated and remanded for a reduction of the fee award. Plaintiffs argued that the District Court erred in awarding Plaintiffs' counsel a fee equal to 3% of the settlement, capped at 2.5 times the lodestar of counsel's hourly rate multiplied by hours worked. The Second Circuit noted that, if the Trustee paid approximately $1.45 billion into the Fund Distribution Account ("FDA") as anticipated, this cap likely would be triggered and Plaintiffs' counsel would receive in excess of $40 million. Id. at *16. The Second Circuit determined that the District Court had insufficiently considered the lack of contingency risk, and that factor was generally the most important in determining whether to award a lodestar multiplier. Id. at *18. The District Court identified two risks that Plaintiffs' counsel supposedly faced, and the Second Circuit found that neither risk supported the requested 2.5 lodestar multiplier. Id. at *19. The first identified risk was "in bringing the derivative claims that gave rise to the inclusion of the FDA as part of the investor settlement." Id. The Second Circuit stated that this was not a proper consideration in relation to this particular fee award, because: (i) Plaintiffs' counsel was already compensated for the risk in bringing the derivative claims; (ii) Plaintiffs' counsel requested fees for work completed only after the District Court approved the derivative claims settlement; and (iii) the hundreds of millions of dollars that had been flowing into the FDA were essentially guaranteed by a settlement in the Trustee Litigation, a separate case led by separate counsel (who already took their cut) involving money obtained by the Trustee (who was also being compensated). Id. at *20. The second risk identified by the District Court was the "risk in defending the Plan of Allocation against objectors." Id. at *21. However, the Second Circuit opined that the fee award was not tied to any particular plan of allocation; rather, it was dependent on the size of the settlement (which was a product of the Trustee's efforts) and the lodestar, which would only increase as the number of objections to the POA (and thus the hours spent defending it). Id. Accordingly, the Second Circuit reasoned that there was little (if any) risk in defending the POA against objectors, except for the remote possibility that the District Court would refuse to approve any plan of allocation submitted by Plaintiffs' counsel. Id. Given the lack of contingency risk, the Second Circuit found that a lodestar multiplier cap of 2.5 was unreasonable. Id. at *21. Accordingly, the Second Circuit remanded with instructions that the District Court revise the cap to reflect counsel's limited risk. Id. at *22.

In Re Volkswagen "Clean Diesel" Marketing, Sales Practices, & Products Liability Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39115 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 17, 2017). In this multi-district class action litigation, Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, dealers, securities purchasers, and government agencies, alleged that Volkswagen used software designed to cheat emissions tests and deceive federal and state regulators in nearly 600,000 Volkswagen, Porsche, and Audi-branded turbocharged direct injection ("TDI") diesel engine vehicles sold in the United States. Id. at *719. With regards to the 2.0-liter TDI diesel vehicles, the parties agreed to a class action settlement ("Settlement") of the claims of the consumers, and the Court granted final approval of the Settlement. The Settlement established a funding pool of over $10 billion. Id. at *720. Class counsel subsequently submitted an application for $167 million in attorneys' fees and $8 million in costs, which the Court granted. Applying the relevant factors, the Court found that the Settlement supported class counsel's requested fees in the amount of $167 million and that the request for $8 million in costs was reasonable. Id. at *721. The Court determined that class counsel achieved extraordinary results in a short time-frame for class members and for the public as a whole. Id. at *722. The Court found that the Settlement provided restitution payments to each class member as well as the option for class members to: (i) return their vehicles to Volkswagen for a buy-back, or terminate their leases; or (ii) receive an emissions modification for their vehicles if such modification was approved by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency ("EPA") and the California Air Resources Board ("CARB"). Id. at *723. The Court found that recognizing that there likely would not be 100% consumer participation, the funding pool's value was $8.528 billion and class counsel's $167 million fee request was approximately 1.96% of that value. The Court stated that this was substantially lower than the percentage rates of fee awards in similar cases and well below the Ninth Circuit's 25% benchmark rate. Id. at *731. The Court held that the lodestar cross-check also supported the reasonableness of class counsel's requested fees. Class counsel expended approximately 98,000 hours while litigating and settling the claim and implementing the Settlement and 21,000 hours guiding class members through the settlement process. Id. at *732. Class counsel submitted a blended average hourly billing rate of $529 per hour for all work performed and projected, resulting in a lodestar amount of $63.5 million. The Court determined that the resulting lodestar multiplier was 2.63, which was more than reasonable given the complexities of the case and the extraordinary result achieved for the Class. Id. at *733. Class counsel also sought reimbursement of $8 million in expenses, which the Court held was reasonable and that the reimbursement of such expenses was appropriate. Accordingly, the Court granted the motion for attorneys' fees and costs.

In Re Volkswagen "Clean Diesel" Marketing, Sales Practices, & Products Liability Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62144 (N.D. Cal. April 21, 2017). In this multi-district class action litigation, Plaintiffs – a group of consumers, dealers, securities purchasers, and government agencies – alleged that Volkswagen used software designed to cheat emissions tests and deceive federal and state regulators in nearly 600,000 Volkswagen, Porsche, and Audi-branded turbocharged direct injection ("TDI") diesel engine vehicles sold in the United States. Id. at *797. With regards to the 2.0-liter TDI diesel vehicles, the parties agreed to a class action settlement ("settlement") of the claims of the consumers, and the Court granted final approval of the settlement.

Id. The Court also granted class counsel's motion for attorneys' fees of $167 million and $8 million in costs. Id. at *798. Attorneys who did not serve as class counsel ("Non-Class Counsel") subsequently filed 244 motions for attorneys' fees and costs, which the Court denied. The question at issue was whether the Court should require Volkswagen to pay attorneys' fees and costs to non-class counsel. The Court found that Volkswagen did not agree to pay such fees, and non-class counsel's work did not benefit the class as a whole. The Court stated that the settlement agreement provided that Volkswagen would "pay reasonable attorneys' fees and costs for work performed by class counsel in connection with the action as well as work performed by other attorneys designated by class counsel to perform work in connection with the action." Id. at *804. The Court opined that non-class counsel were not "class counsel," nor did they assert that the fees at issue were for work "designated by class counsel." Id. The Court found that non-class counsel's filing of individual and class complaints prior to the consolidation order for the MDL proceeding did not benefit the class because the cases were consolidated less than three months after the public disclosure of Volkswagen's use of a defeat device, and class counsel was appointed only months later. Consequently, there was little to any pre-trial activity in the cases filed by non-class counsel, and the filings did not materially drive settlement negotiations with Volkswagen. Id. at *804. Further, non-class counsel asserted that, before the appointment of class counsel, they fielded hundreds of phone calls from prospective and actual clients, and consulted with prospective class members about their potential legal claims. The Court determined that although such work required time and effort, it benefited individual class members, not the class as a whole. Id. at *805. Further, in the 244 motions at issue, counsel sought fees for work representing 3,642 class members, which represented only 0.74% of the total class of 490,000. Id. The Court opined that as such a small percentage of class members actually retained non-class counsel, this made it even less likely that non-class counsel's services benefited the class as a whole. Id. As for the time non-class counsel spent advising class members on the terms of the settlement, the Court found that the work was duplicative of that undertaken by class counsel, and therefore did not "confer[] a benefit beyond that conferred by lead counsel." Id. at *806. Finally, the Court held that non-class counsel's requests for fees and costs were also procedurally deficient. In a pre-trial order, the Court explained that all Plaintiffs' attorneys needed to obtain lead counsel's authorization to perform compensable common benefit work. The Court found that non-class counsel had not asserted that they obtained authorization from lead counsel to perform the common benefit work for which they now sought compensation, as required. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Volkswagen was not required to pay non-class counsel's attorneys' fees and costs as a result of the settlement.

In Re Volkswagen "Clean Diesel" Marketing, Sales Practices, & Products Liability Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114353 (N.D. Cal. July 21, 2017). In this multi-district class action litigation, Plaintiffs – a group of consumers, dealers, securities purchasers, and government agencies – alleged that Volkswagen used software designed to cheat emissions tests and deceive federal and state regulators in nearly 600,000 Volkswagen, Porsche, and Audi-branded turbocharged direct injection ("TDI") diesel engine vehicles sold in the United States. Id. at *726. With regards to the 3.0-liter TDI diesel vehicles, the parties agreed to a class action settlement ("settlement") of the claims of the consumers, and the Court granted final approval of the settlement. Id. The settlement required Defendant to provide class members with benefits conservatively valued at $902 million. Class counsel subsequently submitted its application for $121 million in attorneys' fees and $4 million in costs. The Court noted that class counsel achieved extraordinary results for class members and for the public as a whole. The Court also observed that the settlement not only provided class members with significant value, but also class counsel obtained the Settlement swiftly. The Court found that the case was complex and additional litigation posed a risk of delayed payment to class members and, by extension, class counsel. Id. Further, the Court opined that if class counsel had proceeded to litigate Plaintiffs' claims to conclusion, any recovery would likely have come years in the future and at far greater expense. The Court also stated that the settlement provided significant non-monetary relief. The Court found that the requested $121 million in fees amounted to approximately 13.4% of the settlement total, which is well below the Ninth Circuit's 25% benchmark for common fund cases. Id. at *727. Further, the Court stated that class counsel brought this case on a purely contingent basis, agreeing to advance all necessary expenses and knowing that they would receive a fee only if there was a recovery. The Court also determined that of the approximately 88,500 3.0-liter class members, only 0.67% opted-out of the settlement, only 0.036% of the class objected to any aspect of the settlement, and no class members objected to the proposed fee award. Id. at *728. The Court noted that the lodestar cross-check also supported the reasonableness of class counsel's requested fees. Using the submitted hours and average billing rate, the Court found that the lodestar amounted to approximately $60 million, and the resulting lodestar

multiplier was 2.02. The Court opined that the lodestar multiplier was more than reasonable given the complexities of this case, the skill and diligence of class counsel, and the extraordinary results achieved for the class. Id. at *729. As to the requested costs, the Court noted that class counsel sought reimbursement of $4 million in reimbursable expenses, consisting of $3.4 million in costs already incurred and $0.6 million in anticipated future costs associated with implementing the settlement over the next two-and-a-half years. The Court found that these expenses were reasonable and that the reimbursement of such expenses is appropriate. The Court therefore granted class counsel's motion for attorneys' fees and costs relating to the 3.0-liter settlement.

Kleen Products LLC, et al. v. International Paper Co*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 183015 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs asserted class action claims for damages against Defendants resulting from alleged violations of federal antitrust laws. The parties settled the matter for $354 million, and the Court granted preliminary settlement approval. Plaintiffs subsequently filed a motion for final approval of the settlement and for attorneys' fees that sought 30% of the settlement funds. The Court considered eight factors bearing upon whether the settlement was fair, reasonable, and adequate, including: (i) the strength of Plaintiffs' case balanced against the amount offered in settlement; (ii) Defendants' ability to pay; (iii) the complexity, length, and expense of further litigation; (iv) the amount of opposition to the settlement; (v) the presence of collusion in reaching the settlement; (vi) the reaction of class members to the settlement; (vii) the opinion of competent counsel; and (viii) the stage of the proceedings and the amount of discovery completed. The Court concluded that these factors weighed in favor of granting final approval. Id. at *10-11. The Court also found the request for an award of attorneys' fees fair, adequate, and reasonable. Id. at *12. The Court noted that the relevant factors used to determine the reasonableness of a requested fee award in common fund cases are the market rate, fee awards in similar matters, the nature of the case, including the risk of non-recovery, and amount and quality of class counsel's work. Id. at *17. The Court determined that all factors supported awarding the fee request of 30% of the settlement funds. The Court explained that the percentage-of-recovery method is used in the Seventh Circuit, and the requested 30% recovery was well within the range of acceptable fees and less than the 33 1/3% referenced in the settlement agreement. Id. at *18. Further, using the lodestar method as a cross-check, the Court calculated a 1.1 multiplier using class counsel's historical hourly rates. Id. Further, the Court reasoned that class counsel's declarations in support of their request demonstrated that the requested fee percentage was reasonable and within the range of fees sought in non-contingent cases. Id. at *19. The Court also found that the requested 30% was within the range of the market rates approved in other complex antitrust cases, demonstrating the reasonableness of the request. Id. The Court further concluded that the risk of non-payment further justified the requested 30% fee award because antitrust cases are particularly complex and risky. The Court stated that class counsel vigorously represented their clients against substantial motion practice, including motions to dismiss, numerous discovery-related motions, significant opposition to class certification (including related appeals) summary judgment, and motions to exclude expert testimony. Id. at *20. Finally, the Court opined that the amount and quality of the work performed by class counsel justified the requested fee award because class counsel litigated the case for nearly seven years and expended more than 220,000 hours. The Court concluded that class counsel argued the case professionally and effectively at each stage of the litigation and received an outstanding result for the class. Accordingly, the Court granted final settlement approval and approved class counsel's requested 30% fee award.

Puente Arizona, et al. v. Penzone*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 176786 (D. Ariz. Oct. 25, 2017). Following resolution of their class action, Plaintiffs sought attorneys' fees to recover out-of-state hourly rates for three sets of attorneys from the U.C. Irvine School of Law Immigrant Rights Clinic ("UCI IRC"), the National Day Laborer Organizing Network ("NDLON"), and the law firm of Hadsell, Stormer & Renick LLP ("HSR"). Plaintiffs also sought to recover existing hourly rates for three sets of Arizona lawyers, including The ACLU Foundation of Arizona ("ACLU-AZ"), attorney Ray Ybarra Maldonado, and the law firm of Quarles & Brady LLP ("QB"). Id. at *5. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs should be limited to reasonable Arizona rates for all lawyers because they have not shown that it was necessary to use out-of-state counsel. Id. at *5-6. The Court disagreed and found that Plaintiffs submitted persuasive evidence that there were insufficient local counsel with the willingness and requisite "degree of experience, expertise or specialization required to handle properly the case." Id. at *6. However, the Court capped out-of-state attorneys' fees at $750 per hour. Id. The Court concluded that this cap was reasonable given the fact that rates above this level represent premium billing in large legal markets, which was a rate of pay not warranted for counsel who did not take a leading role in this case. Second, the Court reduced the hourly rate charged for U.C. Irvine law students from the requested $200 to $125. Id. The Court viewed $125 per hour as more than reasonable for law students who have not yet graduated from law school or passed the bar exam. The Court awarded lead attorney Lai's requested hourly rate of $565, despite Defendants' argument that her time in practice was insufficient to justify such a rate. Id. at *7-8. The Court opined that Lai acted as the lead attorney in the case and managed the litigation effectively, and it found her hourly rate was comparable to rates charged by lawyers handling sophisticated litigation in Southern California. Id. at *9. The Court also accepted the hourly rates charged by the Arizona-based attorneys. Plaintiffs explained that they reduced several categories of time by 50% and some categories by 75% or more for excessive, redundant, or otherwise unnecessary work. Id. at *10. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs' lack of success warranted a more substantial reduction than Plaintiffs had offered. Id. at *10-11. The Court held that Plaintiffs' voluntary 49% reduction – which was entirely warranted given the duplication of much of their work, the number of Plaintiffs' lawyers that attended hearings, participated in conference calls, and attended depositions, and the number of law student hours incurred in the U.C. Irvine clinical program – failed sufficiently to account for the fact that Plaintiffs lost three of their four claims and prevailed only partially on their fourth. Id. at *11. Rather than attempting an hour-by-hour reduction for the many lawyers and law students who worked on Plaintiffs' case, the Court concluded that a further 25% reduction in the compensable time for all lawyers and law students was required to accurately reflect the mixed success of the case. Id. at *12.

Woburn Retirement System, et al. v. Salix Pharmaceuticals, Ltd.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 132515 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 18, 2017). The Court consolidated two putative securities fraud class actions against Defendant and two of its officers and directors alleging that they materially misled the public by deliberately making false or misrepresentative statements, or by failing to correct such statements. Plaintiffs claimed that Salix's fraudulent actions artificially increased the price of Salix securities. The parties settled the matter and subsequently requested settlement approval. The proposed settlement resolved all claims in the action in exchange for a payment of $210 million to the class members. Id. at *3. The Court granted final approval of the settlement, the plan of allocation, and the application for attorneys' fees and reimbursement of litigation expenses. Class counsel requested a fee award of 21.24% of the settlement fund of $210 million, or $44,609,218. Class counsel also requested reimbursement of litigation expenses in the amount of $1,983,708.41. Id. at *13. The Court stated that class counsel submitted detailed time records demonstrating over 34,000 hours of work done by the three firms. The Court determined that class counsel investigated the facts, moved to be appointed lead Plaintiffs' counsel, submitted amended pleadings, successfully defended the motion to dismiss, conducted discovery, took ten fact witness depositions, consulted experts, moved for class certification, and ultimately negotiated a favorable settlement for their clients. Id. at *15. The Court noted that the lodestar value of the work was $14,185,499.25. Class counsel request a fee equivalent to 21.24% of the net settlement fund, which reflected a lodestar multiplier of approximately 3.14. Id. Class counsel contended that this percentage and this multiplier were within the range of reasonable percentages and multipliers approved in the Second Circuit. Id. at *15-16. Although a lodestar multiplier of 3.14 for a settlement of $210 million is high, the Court found that it was still within the range of lodestar multipliers approved in the Second Circuit. The Court opined that investigating and litigating the action was complex and required expert consultation; which reinforced the reasonableness of the requested fees. Id. at *16. The lead Plaintiff also faced substantial hurdles to recovery, as they needed to prove scienter, loss causation, and damages, and agreed to litigate on a contingency basis. Id. at *17. The Court also found that the high quality of representation warranted the requested fee award. Finally, the Court noted that for a settlement in the hundreds of millions of dollars, a request of over 20% was substantial; however, because the percentage was within the range of what is reasonably granted in the Second Circuit, and the lodestar multiplier was reasonable, the Court approved class counsel's fee request.

(ix) Bankruptcy Issues In Class Actions

Adler, et al. v. Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc.,* 855 F.3d 459 (2d Cir. 2017). Claimants were a group of employees that held restrictive stock units that they received as compensatory awards when they worked at Lehman Brothers. Claimants filed proofs of claim in Lehman Brothers' bankruptcy proceeding and sought cash payments in an amount reflecting the face value of the restricted stock units because the restrictive stock units had not vested at the time of the bankruptcy filing and were rendered worthless. Lehman Brothers filed omnibus objections to these claims, and the Bankruptcy Court sustained the objections on the ground that the claims were subordinate to the claims of general creditors pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 510(b) because Claimants' claims arose from the purchase or sale of securities. On its review, the District Court affirmed the Bankruptcy Court's decision. On Claimants' further appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision. The District Court concluded that the claims at issue must be subordinated pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 510(b) because, within the meaning of that statute: (i) the restricted stock units were securities; (ii) Claimants acquired them in a purchase; and (iii) the claims for damages arose from that purchase or the asserted rescission. The Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision and held that the employees' claims were subordinated pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 510(b) because the restrictive stock units were securities under § 101(49)(xiv) and bore the hallmarks of interests commonly known as securities. Further, the employees purchased them by agreeing to receive them, in lieu of cash, in exchange for a portion of their labor, and the claims arose from a securities transaction. The Second Circuit reasoned that Claimants took on the risk and return expectations of shareholders rather than creditors by agreeing to be paid a portion of their compensation in restrictive stock units. Claimants were bound by the choice that they made to trade the relative safety of cash compensation for the upside potential of shareholder status, as well as the risk of loss that accompanied that status. Accordingly, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision.

In Re Peregrine Financial Group, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 14601 (7th Cir. Aug. 7, 2017). This decision involved a consolidated appeal from judgments entered by the Bankruptcy Court and affirmed by the District Court in favor of Defendant Ira Bodenstein, the Chapter 7 trustee of the estate of Peregrine Financial Group ("Peregrine"). Id. at *2. Peregrine was a registered futures commissions merchant ("FCM") and a registered forex dealer member of the National Futures Association. In addition to futures, Peregrine dealt in retail foreign currency transactions ("retail forex") and spot metal transactions. Plaintiffs were investors who executed retail forex and spot metal contracts with Peregrine. Id. In July 2012, the Commodity Futures Trading Commission notified Russell L. Wasendorf, Peregrine's Chief Executive Officer and the Chairman of the Board, that Peregrine's accounts were going to be electronically monitored. Id. at *2-3. Wasendorf attempted suicide the next day, after submitting a statement admitting to embezzling millions of dollars over a 20-year period. Wasendorf was subsequently arrested and pled guilty to four criminal charges, including admitting that he embezzled and misappropriated nearly $200 million from Peregrine's segregated customer futures accounts. Id. at *3. As a result of the loss, Peregrine filed for bankruptcy and Bodenstein was appointed as trustee. Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code governs the bankruptcy of a futures commissions merchant such as Peregrine, and provides for the distribution of "customer property" in priority to all other claims. Id. "Customer property" is defined as including funds received in connection with a commodity contract, which in turn is defined in § 761(4) of the Bankruptcy Code. Id. Bodenstein excluded Plaintiffs from the priority distribution based on his determination that forex and spot metal transactions did not constitute "commodity contracts" as so defined. Id. The Secured Leverage Plaintiffs then filed an adversary complaint against Bodenstein challenging his decision. Id. at *4. After that adversary proceeding was terminated, another group of customers (the "Miller Plaintiffs"), filed a class action adversary proceeding against Bodenstein alleging fraud, breach of fiduciary duty, unjust enrichment, and conversion, and seeking the imposition of a constructive trust. Id. The Bankruptcy Court dismissed the action as untimely. On appeal, Plaintiffs challenged the decisions of the Bankruptcy Court and the District Court. The Secured Leverage Plaintiffs asserted that: (i) their funds were held in a resulting trust and therefore were not included in the bankruptcy estate; (ii) the forex and spot metal contracts constituted commodity contracts under 11 U.S.C. § 761(4)(F)(i); and (iii) the Bankruptcy Court erred in precluding the expert testimony of Martin Doyle. Id. The Miller Plaintiffs argued: (i) that the District Court erred in holding that the Miller Plaintiffs' claim was untimely and did not constitute an amended claim; and (ii) that a constructive trust was a proper remedy. Id. at *4-5. The Seventh Circuit concluded that the District Court properly resolved all of the challenges, and that nothing argued in the appellate briefs led it to disagree with the District Court's analysis. Id. at *5. Therefore, because the Seventh Circuit agreed with the reasoning and conclusions of the District Court as to all of the issues raised on appeal. The Seventh Circuit adopted the District Court's opinion set forth at Secure Leverage Group, Inc. v. Bodenstein, 558 B.R. 226, 231 (N.D. Ill. 2016), and affirmed the District Court's orders.

(x) Breach Of Contract Class Actions

Cafferty, Clobes, Meriwether & Sprengel, LLP, et al. v. XO Communication Services, LLC*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 4096 (7th Cir. Mar. 8, 2017). Plaintiff, a law firm, sought individual and class relief against Defendant, a large provider of telecommunications services. Plaintiff's contract with Defendant provided that the contract would be automatically renewed at the end of the customer's current service term "for a similar term and at the same rates" set forth in the contract. Id. at *1. A customer who did not want to renew was required to so notify Defendant at least 30 days prior to the expiration date in the contract; if it failed to do so, the contract would renew automatically. Id. at *1-2. The contract also provided that Defendant would notify the customer of the automatic-renewal feature of the contract, thus reminding the customer that if it decided not to renew the contract it would have to notify Defendant at least 30 days before expiration. The contract further stated that if the customer terminated the contract after the deadline it would have to pay Defendant a termination fee. Plaintiff's contract with Defendant had an initial term of three years and renewed automatically three times. Id. at *3. Shortly after the third renewal began, Plaintiff wanted to terminate the contract because it was moving to a different location. Pursuant to its contract, Defendant sought a termination fee. Plaintiff alleged breach of contract, violation of Illinois consumer protection statutes, unjust enrichment, and unconscionability. Plaintiff filed a motion to amend its third complaint, which the District Court denied and it entered judgment in favor of Defendant. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the ruling and dismissal of Plaintiff's claims. The Seventh Circuit stated that all of Plaintiff's claims pivoted on its contention that Defendant's monthly reminders of the automatic-renewal feature of the contract should have included the date of the automatic renewal, or that Defendant should have otherwise notified Plaintiff of the renewal date before the contract renewed. The Seventh Circuit held that because Plaintiff, having failed to keep track of the renewal date, terminated the contract after the contract had been renewed, it thereby violated the terms of the contract and was required to pay the termination fee. The Seventh Circuit opined that Plaintiff lost track of the terms of the contact, and failed to terminate it before the renewal took effect. Id. at *4. The Seventh Circuit determined that Plaintiff's argument came down to a baseless assertion that the renewal clause in the contract "assigned responsibility to Defendant to track customers' renewal dates and to give them fair warning that the window of opportunity to avoid renewal of their agreements was closing." Id. The Seventh Circuit stated that the renewal clause did not say that and did not have to, since every customer was informed that the contract automatically renewed at the end of the customer's term of service unless that renewal was cancelled by the customer at least 30 days before the end of the term. Id. at *5. The Seventh Circuit opined that Plaintiff claim on appeal that it had not been heard was inaccurate, as ultimately it had multiple options to do so, i.e., it could have filed a motion, expanded its arguments at the hearing, or raised its procedural concerns with the District Court, and failed to do so. Id. at *6. The Seventh Circuit stated that given the insufficiency of the first and second amended complaints, the denial of leave to file a third amended complaint was proper, and it affirmed the District Court's decision dismissing the litigation.

D'Apuzzo, P.A., et al. v. United States*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 156270 (S.D. Fla. Sept. 25, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action lawsuit against the United States government alleging that the Federal Judiciary's Public Access to Court Electronic Records ("PACER") system improperly charged users for "judicial opinions" in violation of the contract between Defendant and PACER users. Id. at *1. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiff lacked subject-matter jurisdiction, or that Plaintiff failed to state a claim on which relief could be granted. The Court found that Plaintiff proved subject-matter jurisdiction as at the present stage of the case, as Plaintiff was required only to assert "no more than a non-frivolous allegation of a contract with the government." Id. at *5. Further, on a motion to dismiss, the Court was required to accept all of Plaintiff's allegations as true in determining whether a Plaintiff has stated a claim for which relief could be granted. Therefore, the Court determined that Plaintiff had sufficiently alleged that a valid contract with Defendant underlied his claims and that the Court had subject-matter jurisdiction over those claims. Plaintiff claimed that the alleged PACER contract and the attendant fee schedule beared the hallmarks of "clickwrap" contracts that are routinely formed over the Internet. Id. at *9. Defendant argued that the PACER system and fee schedule did not contain an offer to contract and that the "judicial opinions provision" was insufficiently definite. Id. at *9-10. Plaintiff argued that Defendant's clickwrap agreement set forth the obligations of the parties to the contract, requiring users to pay a 10 cent per page fee for access to documents other than judicial opinions. In return, Defendant provided access to electronic records and would provide access to judicial opinions free of charge. Id. at *10. Defendant claimed that these provisions did not create a contract between the parties. The Court stated that this type of conclusion would require the Court to interpret the agreement, which the Court declined to do at the motion to dismiss stage. Id. at *11. The Court therefore found that Plaintiff sufficiently pleaded the four elements of a claim for breach of contract. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion is denied as to the breach of contract claims. Defendant further argued that Plaintiff's breach of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing claim should be dismissed. The Court disagreed, and stated that the implied covenant was not duplicative of Plaintiff's express contract claims, which alleged that the overcharges themselves violated the PACER contract's express terms. Id. at *13. Defendant also argued that the Court should dismiss Plaintiff's illegal exaction claims because he failed to allege that the fees he paid for judicial opinions were improperly paid. Id. at *14. The Court again disagreed, stating that the entire premise of Plaintiff's case was that he was improperly charged a fee to access judicial opinions that should have been provided free of charge. Id. at *15. Therefore, the Court found that Plaintiff sufficiently alleged that Defendant illegally overcharged him contrary to PACER's governing statutes and policies, and his complaint stated a claim for illegal exaction. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Dawson, et al. v. Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97235 (D.D.C. June 23, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of supervisors, filed a class action alleging that Defendant's Policy/Instruction 7.5.1 (the "Policy"), constituted a contract mandating that they would be paid at an amount equal to or greater than 5% of direct reports and that Defendant breached the alleged contract by refusing to pay Plaintiffs according to the 5% differential. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, which the Court granted. Defendant's Policy stated that it was "structured to address base salary adjustments using two distinct approaches: (a) comprehensive salary review and (b) individual salary adjustments." Id. at *2. The Policy further stated that "compression occurs when a supervisor or manager experiences less than a 5% higher pay differential between their salary and that of their highest paid direct reporting subordinate. Compression analyses are performed to monitor pay differentials and detect instances of compression based on annual review and analysis." Id. at *3. Plaintiffs argued that the Policy represented the parties' agreement that supervisors, such as Plaintiffs, were entitled to the 5% pay differential following an annual review. Id. at *4. Upon review of the Policy, the Court found that that its clear language demonstrated that it did not create a contract that mandated the 5% pay differential. Id. at *8. First, the Court noted that the Policy plainly stated that Defendant's comprehensive review "approach" examined several factors, not only a compression event, but also "equity, performance, salary ranges, and appropriately related comprehensive salary adjustments." Id. at *9. The Court found that this language did not constitute a promise by Defendant to maintain a 5% pay differential between supervisors and their highest paid direct reports, it merely set forth the manner in which Defendant conducted comprehensive salary reviews. Id. at *10. Further, the Court observed that the Policy further stated that salary adjustments fell within the General Manager's discretion and were "subject to budgetary conditions," "fiscal considerations," and "circumstances deemed to be in the best interests of" Defendant. Id. Even assuming the existence of a contract, the Court found that Plaintiffs' suggested interpretation of the Policy would require Defendant to meet the 5% pay differential obligation even if it were fiscally impossible to do so, which clearly contradicted the Policy's plain language reserving decisions regarding salary adjustments to the General Manager and made them "subject to budgetary conditions." Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to carry their burden to establish that a valid and enforceable contract was created between them and Defendant, because the Policy did not show that Defendant intended to be bound by the 5% pay differential as Plaintiffs claimed. The Court therefore granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Dulberg, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120008 (N.D. Cal. July 31, 2017). Plaintiff, a driver, filed a motion alleging breach of contract in relation Defendant allegedly charging higher rates to its passengers but not using the higher rates in calculating compensation for its drivers pursuant to their percentage-based fee agreement. Plaintiff contended that the standardized agreement with Defendant entitled him to higher compensation as a result of Defendant's higher rates for passengers. Defendant contended that it could raise its rates for passengers by instituting a more aggressive pricing regime while forcing drivers to accept the same compensation they would have received under the old pricing regime and keeping the difference. Id. at *2. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, which the Court denied. Under the parties' driver agreement, Plaintiff could charge to passengers: (i) the fare; (ii) Defendant's booking fee; and (iii) any applicable tolls, taxes, or fees for each ride. Id. at *5. Defendant collected the amounts from passengers on Plaintiff's behalf. Additionally, under the agreement, Plaintiff owed to Defendant: (i) a service fee equal to 20% of each UberX ride and 28% of each UberSelect ride; and (ii) Uber's booking fee. Id. at *6. Defendant withheld these before remitting anything to Plaintiff. Defendant's policy subsequently changed from calculating the price for each ride after the ride to calculating the price upfront before the ride. Id. at *7. The Court found that the driver agreement comprehensively regulated distribution of all payments collected from Defendant's passengers. Since the driver agreement contemplated only one "fare" consisting of a base amount plus applicable time and distance amounts, it must follow that the "fare" defined in the driver agreement corresponded exactly to the base amount plus applicable time and distance amounts included in Defendant's "upfront pricing" policy. Id. at *13. The Court found that the amended complaint plausibly alleged that, after shifting to "upfront pricing," Defendant had to calculate fares for drivers under the driver agreement using the same aggressively estimated time and distance amounts that it used for charging passengers, but continued to use actual time and distance amounts to calculate fares and shortchanged its drivers under the driver agreement, while retaining more money for itself. Id. at *14. At this stage, the Court found that Plaintiff's allegations were sufficient to survive dismissal. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Hopkins, et al. v. United States Bancorp*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 131140 (S.D. Ohio Aug. 17, 2017). Plaintiff, on behalf of a group of hourly employees, brought an action alleging that Defendants entered into a compensation agreement with Plaintiff and the class members whereby Defendants agreed to compensate them an hourly wage for every hour worked, yet failed to do so. The Court had previously found that Plaintiff failed to identify or describe with specificity the circumstances under which any alleged contractual agreement was formed. The Court ordered Plaintiff to file an amended complaint identifying the contract that formed the basis of his claims. In an amended complaint, Plaintiff stated that, following his initial job interview, he was orally offered a job from a manager stating that the position was an "hourly position starting at approximately $15 per hour, plus benefits." Id. at *2. Plaintiff then received an offer letter where his salary was listed as "$32,614.40 annually, $15.68 hourly." Id. at *3. The letter explicitly stated that it did not create a contract of employment and that Plaintiff would be an at-will employee and that "the terms of [his] employment, compensation or benefits may change at any time, without advance notice or consent." Id. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court granted. The Court concluded that there was no contract reached between the parties. The Court noted that a binding contract exists only if its terms are definite and certain. The Court held that the terms of the alleged agreement were too indefinite to be the basis of a binding contract. The Court found that Plaintiff's offer letter, which expressly disavowed the creation of a contract, could not itself be the basis for any alleged contract to pay Plaintiff hourly. Further, the Court determined that Plaintiff's lowest salary during his tenure with Defendant was $15.68 per hour at the time he was hired; which salary increased several times to a high of $19.60 per hour. Id. at *6. Therefore, the Court found that Defendant more than adequately compensated Plaintiff even if the oral agreement alleged by Plaintiff was considered a binding contract. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Turping, et al. v. United States*, 2017 U.S. Claims LEXIS 1155 (Fed. Cl. Sept. 22, 2017). Plaintiffs were a group of retired employees from one particular location that was managed by sub-contractors of the U. S. Department of Energy ("DOE"). Plaintiffs all participated in a multi-employer pension plan established by the DOE, but paid for by the sub-contractors. The plan promised that employees would be entitled to their entire term of service with the site, regardless of which sub-contractor managed it. In 1996, one sub-contractor decided that it would not credit prior service under the plan. Plaintiffs alleged damages for breach of an implied-in-fact contract under the Tucker Act, or in the alternative, that the DOE's actions were an "uncompensated taking under the Fifth Amendment for which they are entitled to just compensation." Id. at *8. The government argued that Plaintiffs' breach of contract claim should be dismissed because there was neither evidence of an implied-in-fact contract nor an uncompensated taking where the alleged deprivation of retirement benefits was not an action "authorized" by the government. Id. at *15. After determining that Plaintiffs' claims were timely, that the Court had jurisdiction over the claims, and that there was no taking claim, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' remaining claims. The Court held that the allegations were insufficient to establish that the DOE entered into an implied-in-fact contract with Plaintiffs. Proving that there was an implied-in-fact contract "requires the Court to find that 'surrounding circumstances' show: (i) mutuality of intent to contract; (ii) consideration; (iii) lack of ambiguity in offer and acceptance; and (iv) actual authority on the part of the government representative to bind the government in contract," which may be "inferred . . . from the conduct of the parties showing, in the light of the surrounding circumstances, there was tacit understanding." Id. at *32. The Court reasoned that for there to be an implied-in-fact contract, "there must be an objective manifestation of voluntary, mutual assent," which it did not find here. Id. First, the Court held that the plan did "not evidence any DOE intent to contract with Plaintiffs, because DOE was not a party to the [plan]" and the allegation that the "DOE has actually controlled the terms, administration, and operation of the [plan]" was merely conclusory. Id. at *34. Second, the Court found that the following were not evidence of the DOE's intent: (i) a solicitation "conveyed by the DOE to potential bidders" because it was an offer to bidders, and not intent to contract with Plaintiffs; (ii) regulations by the DOE because "regulatory proclamations are insufficient to create contractual obligations;" (iii) a conclusory statement by Plaintiffs that there were "other actions and policies of the government and agents acting on behalf of the government;" and (iv) the offer letter by the new sub-contractor that would manage the plan to the DOE. Id. at *35-36.

(xi) Civil Rights Class Actions

Lippert, et al. v. Bandwin,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64687 (N.D. Ill. April 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of detainees, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment because of systemic deficiencies in the health care it provided to detainees. Plaintiffs sought injunctive relief to address the alleged violations. Id. at *3. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for certification of a class of prisoners in Defendant's custody with serious medical or dental needs. Id. at *4. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that Plaintiffs lacked standing because Defendant did not maintain a master list of inmates with serious medical or dental needs and therefore, the class was not ascertainable. Id. at *8. The Court noted that Defendant had lists indicating which inmates requested treatment and it could check individual files. The Court also rejected Defendant's argument that Plaintiffs lacked standing because they had all received proper medical treatment, ruling that the Eighth Amendment protects against risks of future harms and Plaintiffs "need not await a tragic event." Id. at *7. The Court further found that the commonality requirement was met and rejected Defendant's argument that it was not satisfied because Plaintiffs did not suffer from Defendant's policies. Id. at *11. The Court agreed with Plaintiffs that their expert report – that showed several systemic deficiencies exposed inmates to a substantial risk of harm – was enough to satisfy the commonality requirement. Id. at *14. The Court reasoned that Plaintiffs satisfied the typicality requirement even though Plaintiffs alleged a wide variety of serious medical and dental issues, as Rule 23 only requires that the claims be typical and not identical. Id. at *23. The Court ruled that certification was proper under Rule 23(b)(2) because if Plaintiffs prevailed, injunctive relief would benefit all members of the class. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Mays, et al. v. Synder,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14274 (E.D. Mich. Feb. 2, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of citizens of Flint, Michigan, brought a class action against the Governor of Michigan, the State of Michigan, the City of Flint, and various others, alleging that Defendants caused a public health crisis by exposing Plaintiffs to contaminated drinking water. Plaintiffs asserted claims based on substantive due process relative to a state created danger; substantive due process due to violation of their bodily integrity; equal protection based upon race; and equal protection based upon wealth pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983; conspiracy pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1985; and violation of the public service provisions of the Elliott-Larsen Civil Rights Act. Id. at *5. Defendants filed motions to dismiss each of Plaintiffs' claims, and the Court granted the motions. The Court noted that in another case involving Flint water contamination, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs' constitutional claims brought pursuant to § 1983 were precluded by the Safe Drinking Water Act ("SDWA"). Id. at *6. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs' § 1983 claims were not viable, and therefore Plaintiffs lacked a federal cause of action. Plaintiffs argued that their § 1983 claims were not precluded. The Court opined that the SDWA "establishes an elaborate enforcement scheme" with respect to safe drinking water. Id. at *9. The Court opined that allowing parallel § 1983 claims to proceed would "circumvent" the SDWA's procedures and would be "inconsistent with Congress' carefully tailored scheme." Id. at *10. The Court stated that the elaborate enforcement scheme of the SDWA led it to conclude that § 1983 claims seeking to remedy unsafe drinking water would be illogical. Id. The Court held that without viable constitutional claims, Plaintiffs' conspiracy claim under § 1985 based upon the same conduct also must fail. The Court therefore dismissed Plaintiffs' §§ 1983 and 1985 claims. The Court declined to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' remaining state law claim. The Court reasoned that if the federal claims are dismissed before trial, the state claims should be dismissed as well. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motions to dismiss and it dismissed Plaintiffs' complaint with prejudice.

Valenzuela, et al. v. Ducey, 2*017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10993 (D. Ariz. Jan. 26, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of deferred action recipients seeking driver's licenses, brought a class action against the Governor of Arizona alleging that Arizona's policy of denying driver's licenses to certain deferred action recipients violated the supremacy and equal protection clauses of the U.S. Constitution Id. at *1-2. The District Court and the Ninth Circuit previously held that this policy violated the Constitution with respect to individuals who receive deferred action through the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals ("DACA") program. Accordingly, Plaintiffs requested that the District Court to consider the constitutionality of Executive Order 2012-06 and Arizona Department of Transportation's ("ADOT") Motor Vehicle Division ("MVD") Policy 16.1.4 with respect to individuals who received deferred action outside the DACA program and individuals with deferred enforced departure. Plaintiffs filed motions for a preliminary injunction and class certification, and Defendants filed a motion to dismiss or, in the alternative, for judgment on the pleadings Id. at *2. The District Court denied the motion for class certification and directed the parties to conduct discovery before filing renewed briefs on the matter. The District Court also denied Defendants' motion to dismiss and Plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction. Id. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs lacked standing and the District Court therefore lacked jurisdiction over their claims. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs were eligible for Arizona driver's licenses under existing policies and currently had the ability to obtain them. Id. at *8. Defendant asserted that without an identifiable injury, there was no live case or controversy as required by Article III of the Constitution. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants had a policy of denying driver's licenses to deferred action recipients who presented Employment Authorization Documents (“EADs”) coded (c)(14) or (a)(11). Id. at *9. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendants denied licenses to four of the named Plaintiffs. The District Court found that it was undisputed that other non-citizens, including individuals with EADs coded differently, may obtain licenses simply by presenting their EADs. The District Court thus determined that Plaintiffs were treated differently from other non-citizens who hold EADs. Id. The District Court held that denial of equal treatment – recognizing the authorized presence of some non-citizens based on their EADs, but not of others – was an injury sufficient to establish Article III standing. Id. at *10. Defendants also argued that the claims were barred by sovereign immunity because they did not issue Executive Order 2012-06 and that the failure to rescind the order was not sufficient to establish a connection between Defendants and ADOT's policy. The Court opined that this stage, the record was insufficient to find that Governor Ducey and Executive Order 2012-06 did not have a direct connection to the challenged ADOT policy. Id. at *18-19. The Court thereby denied the motion to dismiss with regard to this issue. The Court further found that the current record was insufficient to make a fair determination of whether a preliminary injunction was warranted. Id. at *19. Because Plaintiffs sought a preliminary injunction granting class-wide relief, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction and direct the parties to conduct discovery before filing renewed motions for class certification and a preliminary injunction.

(xii) Class Actions Involving Unions

Beckhart, et al. v. Jefferson County Public Schools Board Of Education*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 150704 (W.D. Ky. Sept. 18, 2017). Plaintiffs, the Jefferson County Board of Education and the Jefferson County Association of Educational Support Personnel American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees on behalf of Local 4011, entered into a collective bargaining agreement ("CBA"), under which Defendants, the American Federal of State, County and Municipal Employees, AFL-CIO ("AFSCME"), AFSCME Indiana-Kentucky Organizing Committee 962 ("Council 962"), and the Jefferson County Association of Educational Support Personnel, AFSCME, Local 4011 ("Local 4011") could collect a "fair share fee" from non-members employed in the Jefferson County Public Schools ("JCPS"). Id. at *3. Plaintiffs asserted that the CBA and its enforcement were violations of their rights to free speech and association protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. Id. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs’ proposed class consisted of all union non-member employees who, at any time since September 23, 2014, are or were employed in the Job Family 1A job classification and salary schedule for Jefferson County Public Schools and are, were, or will be required to pay a compulsory fee to Defendants Local 4011, Council 962, and/or AFSCME pursuant to a compulsory unionism agreement between the Unions and the Board. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs estimated the proposed class included approximately 900 non-members, and therefore the Court found that Plaintiffs met the numerosity requirement. Id. at *6. The Court held that the commonality requirement was met because each potential class member was employed by the JCPS, had and/or will continue to have union fees deducted from his or her wages, and that Defendants failed to comply with the constitutional requirements relating to the withholding of funds. Id. at *11. The Court also determined that typicality existed because all of the claims of the proposed class members were virtually the same and derived from the same fee deducted from each class member's paycheck during the relevant time period and involved the same notice provided by Defendants. Id. at *12. The Court found Plaintiffs to be adequate class representatives because Plaintiffs' views were not antagonistic to the proposed class. Id. at *28. Based on the claims asserted by Plaintiffs and the facts outlined in the complaint, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied the requirements for class certification pursuant to Rule 23(a). The Court stated that the present dispute clearly fell under Rule 23(b)(2) because while Plaintiffs did seek recovery of the fees paid under allegedly deficient notices, the main thrust of this action was a determination of whether the notices provided by the JCPS complied with applicable notice requirements. Id. at *30. The Court further noted that case law precedents supported certification of the proposed classes pursuant to Rule 23(b)(2). Id. at *31. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Demetris, et al. v. Transport Workers Union Of America*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 8876 (9th Cir. May 22, 2017). Plaintiffs in two consolidated class actions alleged that Defendant breached the duty of fair representation in its decision to distribute the proceeds of a bankruptcy settlement to all of its members unevenly in violation of the Railway Labor Act. American Airlines, Inc., and American Eagle Airlines, Inc. ("American") filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy in November of 2011. As part of its reorganization process, American sought to reject and to renegotiate its collective bargaining agreements. Defendant represented mechanics, fleet service workers, and other laborers at American. After a series of negotiations, Defendant agreed to new collective bargaining agreements that drastically cut pension and medical benefits for its members, but American agreed to raises in base pay for members as well as to a 401(k) program incorporating employer contributions. Id. at *3. American also provided Defendant an additional 1.7% of the equity given to unsecured creditors, bringing Defendant's total stake to 4.8%. In order to prevent mandatory lay-offs, Defendant and American also negotiated an "early separation" program whereby more senior members could choose voluntarily to leave American in exchange for lump-sum cash payments. Id. at *5. Depending on seniority and contractual protections, members who chose to participate in early separation could leave with between $5,000 and $22,500 in addition to regular severance pay, unused vacation pay, and an additional two-weeks' compensation. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs, a group of workers who chose early separation, alleged that Defendant breached its duty of fair representation by excluding them from the bulk of the equity distribution. Plaintiffs alleged that they opted for early separation, and therefore did not receive a share of the equity. The District Court had previously dismissed the two actions, finding the allegations implausible. Plaintiffs appealed, arguing that the District Court erred in dismissing their duty of fair representation claims because Defendant's equity distribution scheme was: (i) arbitrary; (ii) discriminatory; and (iii) made in bad faith. Id. at *7. The Ninth Circuit upheld the District Court's decision. Plaintiffs contended that Defendant made a wholly irrational decision because the contractual concessions exchanged for the equity affected their rights just as much, if not more, than members who chose to continue working at American. The Ninth Circuit stated that Defendant approved of the final distribution plan through successive votes in both the committee charged with creating the distribution methodology and the union's governing council. The Ninth Circuit noted that this accorded with the District Court's finding, based on the pleadings, that Defendant gave careful consideration to its distribution plan, and therefore it could not deem Defendant's conduct wholly irrational. Plaintiffs further argued that Defendant discriminated against them because of their lack of political power. The Ninth Circuit held that the pleadings lacked facts from which it could plausibly infer that Defendant discriminated against them on the basis of raw political power. Id. at *12. Plaintiffs' bad faith allegations included claims: (i) that Defendant intentionally delayed disclosing the equity distribution plan until after the deadline for choosing early separation; and (ii) that Defendant manipulated internal decision-making procedures to ensure that equity went only to active members. Id. at *14. Regarding Plaintiffs' allegation of bad faith, the Ninth Circuit found the claims implausible, as Plaintiffs had not alleged that Defendant had already formed its plan for the equity before the deadline for choosing early separation. Id. at *15. The Ninth Circuit noted that after assuring membership that the equity would be distributed to them in due course, Defendant explicitly told those contemplating early separation that "the equity piece is very much undetermined at this point" and that it could not say, one way or another, what role the equity should play in retirement planning. Id. at *16. As a result, the Ninth Circuit found that the District Court did not err when it dismissed Plaintiffs' allegations that Defendant violated its duty of fair representation through conduct that was arbitrary, discriminatory, or done in bad faith. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision dismissing Plaintiffs' claims.

Donohue, et al. v. Madison*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 57319 (N.D.N.Y. April 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of union-tollway workers, filed a putative class action against Defendants New York State Thruway Authority and New York State Canal Corp. alleging that a reduction-in-force ("RIF"), which resulted in the termination of 198 union-represented employees, violated their constitutional rights. Id. at *6. First, Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants targeted Plaintiffs for inclusion in the RIF because of their union affiliation in violation of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. Second, Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants retaliated against Plaintiffs for engaging in union activities in violation of the First Amendment. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment. With respect to Plaintiffs' targeting claim, the Court denied summary judgment. The Court noted that, because conditioning public employment on union membership inhibits protected association, heightened scrutiny requirements apply to employment decisions based on union membership. Id. at *18. The Court, therefore, held that it must determine whether Defendants narrowly tailored the RIF to advance the compelling governmental interest of reducing the long-term costs of state government. Id. The Court found genuine disputes of material fact regarding several issues that precluded summary judgment, including whether the state fiscal crises required the lay-offs and whether neutral lay-offs would have achieved similar savings. Id. at *22. With respect to Plaintiffs' retaliation claim, the Court granted summary judgment in favor of Defendants. The Court noted that Plaintiffs had not alleged that they expressed any views protected by the First Amendment, but rather that Defendants retaliated against them because they refused Defendants' proposed concessions. Id. at *24. Finally, the Court referred Plaintiffs' motion for class certification to the Magistrate Judge for proposed findings of fact and recommendations for disposition.

Riffey, et al. v. Rauner,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 19868 (7th Cir. Oct. 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of health care assistants, alleged that Defendant owed them a refund of the fair-share fees they paid to a union for collective bargaining representation. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the District Court denied. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Illinois, through its Department of Human Services Home Services Program, pays personal home health care assistants to deliver care to elderly and disabled persons in the state. Id. at *2. Under Illinois law, the assistants were considered public employees for purposes of collective bargaining, and the state was authorized to engage in collective bargaining with an exclusive representative of home care and health workers. Since 2003, SEIU Healthcare Illinois & Indiana (the "Union") had been the exclusive representative required to represent all public employees, whether or not they were members of the Union. Id. at *3. Under the terms of its collective bargaining agreement with the state, the Union was entitled to collect limited fees from workers who chose not to join the Union in order to help cover the cost of certain activities. Principally, the fees were for the collective bargaining representation the Union furnished to everyone. These fees were known as "fair-share fees," and were automatically deducted from the pay of assistants who were not Union members. Id. Plaintiffs objected to the fair-share arrangement and contended that the involuntary deduction and collection of the fair-share fees violated their First Amendment rights and entitled them to relief pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Plaintiffs sought certification of a class of all non-union member assistants from whom fair-share fees were collected from April 2008 until June 30, 2014, when the state stopped the fair-share deductions. The District Court determined that class certification was inappropriate because the class definition was overly broad in light of evidence that a substantial number of class members did not object to the fees and could not have suffered an injury, the named Plaintiffs were not adequate representatives, individual questions regarding damages predominated over common ones, the class faced serious manageability issues, and a class action was not a superior method of resolving the issue. Id. at *4-5. Subsequently, the parties stipulated to a judgment permanently enjoining the future collection of fair-share fees and awarding money damages to the named Plaintiffs. The District Court entered final judgment, and Plaintiffs appealed. The Seventh Circuit stated that, although the named Plaintiffs objected to the collection of the fair-share fees and to collective bargaining representation, it had no way of knowing whether or how many of the remaining class members shared that opposition. Id. at *13. The Seventh Circuit also found that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in finding that there were serious intra-class conflicts of interest in Plaintiffs' proposed class and that the proposed representatives could not fairly and adequately protect all prospective members. The Seventh Circuit noted that the District Court requested Plaintiffs to suggest a more tailored class, but they did not do so. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit held that the proposed class representatives failed the adequacy requirement of Rule 23(a)(4). The Seventh Circuit also agreed with the District Court that the question of whether and what amount of damages were owed for many, if not most, of the proposed class members could be resolved only after a highly individualized inquiry. Id. at *17-18. The Seventh Circuit determined that it would require examination of not only each person's support (or lack thereof) for the Union, but also to what extent the non-supporters were actually injured. The Seventh Circuit ruled that this meant not only that individual questions predominated at this stage of the litigation, but also that it would be difficult to manage the litigation as a class. The Seventh Circuit also found that Plaintiffs offered no plan to make class-wide determinations about support for the collective bargaining representation. Id. at *18. The Seventh Circuit therefore affirmed the District Court's ruling and concluded that the District Court was well within the bounds of its discretion to deny Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Valdez, et al. v. Airline Pilots Association, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9263 (W.D. Tenn. Jan. 9, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of Federal Express pilots, brought a putative class action against Defendant, the Airline Pilots Association ("APA"), the official bargaining representative for Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant breached its duty of fair representation by making misrepresentations to Plaintiffs relating to the collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") when ratifying the agreement between Federal Express and the APA. Plaintiffs moved to certify their class claims and Defendant opposed the motion on the basis that Plaintiffs did not meet the Rule 23(a) requirements of commonality, typicality, and adequacy. Defendant also objected to class certification on the grounds that Plaintiffs did not meet the Rule 23(b)(3) requirements of predominance and superiority. The Court denied class certification and ruled that the named Plaintiffs did not satisfy the adequacy requirement, as well as the predominance and superiority requirements. The Court determined that the named Plaintiffs did not adequately represent the class because of the four named Plaintiffs, three voted to reject the CBA and one voted to ratify the agreement. Id. at *18. The proposed class consisted of 2,098 pilots who voted to ratify and 1,559 pilots who voted to reject the CBA. The Court determined that the pilots who voted to ratify may be content with some of the terms and have a conflict with those who voted against the CBA. Id. at *20. The Court reasoned that the named Plaintiffs did not adequately represent the class because they appeared to have potential conflicts of interest with other class members as the class members all had varying economic interests in the CBA. The Court also ruled that the proposed class did not satisfy the predominance requirement because an issue central to the case was whether each class member relied upon the misrepresentations, and if so, what damages were caused by such reliance. Id. at *24. The Court noted that questions that related to each individual member of the class would predominate over common questions and that the time saved by a class action would be relatively insignificant. The Court also determined that the superiority requirement was not satisfied because the class members' votes were secret and the Court would have to conduct numerous individual inquiries, thereby making management of the class difficult. Id. at *31-32. In its ruling that the superiority requirement was not met, the Court also considered the fact that the complaint contemplated damages of $25,000 per pilot, which it deemed was not an insignificant amount that would necessitate certification of a class (because class members would have their own economic incentive to bring their own lawsuits). Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

(xiii) Class Definition Issues

Dewhurst, et al. v. Century Aluminum Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 77877 (S.D. W.Va. May 23, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retirees, filed a class action alleging the Defendant's decision to unilaterally modify or cancel medical benefits that it provided to retirees, spouses, surviving spouses, and dependents of retirees contravened the applicable collective bargaining agreements ("CBA") in violation of the Labor-Management Relations Act ("LMRA") and the Employment Retirement Income Security Act ("ERISA"). The Court had previously certified a class consisting of approximately 437 individuals. The same day the Court certified the class, it also denied Plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction, finding that Plaintiffs were not likely to succeed on the merits of their claims. Plaintiffs appealed, and the order was affirmed. The Court subsequently granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, finding that the language in the applicable CBAs provided that the retirees' healthcare benefits only remained in effect for the terms of those agreements, and that those benefits did not vest beyond the terms of the agreements. Id. at *4. After Plaintiffs appealed the Court's summary judgment order, the parties settled the matter. The parties then filed a joint motion for modification of the class definition for settlement purposes Id. at *5. The parties sought to amend the class certification order by changing the definition of the class and additionally to change the class to a Rule 23(b)(1)(A) and/or Rule 23(b)(2) non-opt out class. Id. at *7-8. The parties asserted that the class certification order should be amended despite the entry of the judgment order because the limited remand order remanded the case for settlement approval proceedings pursuant to Rule 23, which included modification of the class certification order. Id. at *8-9. The Court found that there were a number of unusual circumstances present in this case that warrant amendment of the class certification order after the entry of the judgment order. For example, the Court stated that the parties agreed to settle Plaintiffs' claims after more than seven years of litigation, despite the Court's grant of summary judgment in Defendants' favor. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court opined that what appeared to be the all but certain outcome of this case, together with the parties' cooperation in reaching a $23 million settlement after more than seven years of litigation, constituted highly unusual circumstances that warranted the modification of the class definition. Id. at *12-13. The Court therefore found that the modification of the class definition from the one contained in the class certification order was appropriate in order to facilitate the settlement between the parties and include additional persons affected by Defendants' decision to modify the health benefits of its retirees. The Court additionally held that the requirements of Rule 23(a) continued to be satisfied by the new definition. Id. at *13. The Court thereby amended the class definition and directed that the class be certified as a Rule 23(b)(1)(A) and (b)(2) non-opt out class. Id. at *14-15.

National Veterans Legal Services Program, et al. v. United States,* 235 F. Supp. 3d 32 (D.D.C. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of organizations and individuals who paid fees to obtain records through the Public Access to Court Electronic Records system ("PACER"), alleged that PACER's fee schedule was higher than necessary to cover the costs of operating PACER and therefore violated the E-Government Act of 2002. PACER is an on-line electronic records system provided by the Federal Judiciary that allows public access to case and docket information from federal courts. Plaintiffs regularly paid fees to use PACER, and did not ask for exemptions from PACER fees, because they could not represent to a Court that they were unable to pay the fees. Plaintiffs moved to certify a class of all individuals and entities who paid fees for the use of PACER within the past six years, excluding class counsel and agencies of the federal government. Id. at 35. The proposed class representatives were three non-profit legal advocacy organizations, including the National Veterans Legal Services Program, the National Consumer Law Center, and the Alliance for Justice. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion and certified the class under Rule 23(b)(3). Defendant argued that: (i) Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that they satisfied the numerosity requirement, because they did not establish the number of users who raised their concerns with the PACER Service Center or the number of potential Plaintiffs who were non-profit organizations; (ii) the class representatives failed the typicality and adequacy requirements, because their non-profit status made them eligible to request fee exemptions, which not all class members could do; and (iii) individual questions predominated. Id. at 37. The Court determined that it was necessary to make two minor modifications to the proposed class definition before analyzing the requirements of Rule 23. The class definition that Plaintiffs produced had defined the class in terms of those "who have paid fees for the use of PACER within the past six years." Id. at 38-39. The Court found that the language was unclear when it is no longer associated with the dated complaint. Thus, the Court substituted the actual dates for the six-year period ending on the date of the complaint. Second, rather than stating that the definition excluded "class counsel," the Court stated that it excluded "class counsel in this case." Id. at 39. Therefore, Plaintiffs' modified class definition would be "all individuals and entities who have paid fees for the use of PACER between April 21, 2010, and April 21, 2016, excluding class counsel in this case and federal government entities." Id. The Court opined that Plaintiffs satisfied the typicality requirement because hundreds of thousands of Plaintiffs paid the alleged excessive fees. Id. at 40. Although the parties did not present precise data about the size of the class, the Court held that there was no question that the class satisfied the numerosity requirement. Id. The Court further determined that Plaintiffs met the adequacy requirement because Plaintiffs and all class members were challenging the PACER fee schedule on the theory that it violated the E-Government Act by generating revenue that exceeded the costs of providing PACER. Id. at 42. The Court also concluded that Plaintiffs met the predominance requirement because if Plaintiffs prevailed on their common legal theory that the Judiciary was required to set a lower rate that corresponded to PACER's funding needs, Defendant would be liable to any class member who paid the illegal higher rate. Id. at 44. Finally, the Court found that allowing this action to proceed as a class action was superior to requiring individual actions, both for reasons of efficiency and to enable individuals to pursue small claims. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification under Rule 23(b).

(xiv) Class-Wide Proof And Class-Wide Damages In Class Actions

Golan, et al. v. Veritas Entertainment, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144501 (E.D. Mo. Sept. 7, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging violations of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants engaged in an advertising campaign for a movie that included telephone calls to approximately four million residential telephone numbers throughout the United States. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs asserted they received telephone calls with a pre-recorded voice to their residential telephone numbers, without their consent. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants violated § 227(b)(1)(B) of the TCPA, which prohibits persons from initiating calls to residential telephone lines using a pre-recorded voice to deliver a message without the called party's prior express consent. Following a jury trial, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for judgment as a matter of law against Defendants but did not determine damages. Id. The Court noted that the TCPA states that a Plaintiff may recover either the actual monetary loss from a violation or $500 in damages for each violation, whichever is greater. Evidence in the case proved there were 3,242,493 calls placed in violation of the TCPA. Applying $500 per violation would result in a damages award of $1,621,246,500. Defendants asked the Court to reduce the amount of damages to $324,249, or $0.10 per call, arguing that the excessive damages award would violate the Constitution. Id. In support, Defendants cited three TCPA cases where damages were reduced. Plaintiffs argued that there was no constitutional basis for a reduction of statutory damages, and even if there were, damages should not be reduced in this case. Id. at *3. The Court's review of the applicable case law indicated that the TCPA's statutory damages clause was constitutional, but that a specific damages award may be unconstitutional if it is "so severe and oppressive as to be wholly disproportioned to the offense and obviously unreasonable." Id. at *9. The Court thereby applied this standard and considered whether the amount of damages prescribed by the statute was so severe and oppressive as to be wholly disproportionate to the offense and obviously unreasonable. Id. The Court concluded that a damages award of $1.6 billion was obviously unreasonable and wholly disproportionate to the offense. Id. at *10. The Court therefore awarded Plaintiffs $32,424,930, or $10.00 per call. The Court determined that the awarded damages reflected the severity of the offense, a six-day telemarketing campaign that placed 3.2 million telephone calls, as well as respecting the purposes of the TCPA to have a deterrent effect and to account for unquantifiable losses including the invasions of privacy, unwanted interruptions and disruptions at home, and the wasted time spent answering unwanted solicitation calls or unwanted voice messages. Id. at *10-11. The Court further stated that the amount took into account the significant time and expense needed to notify the class and to distribute the damages to the class. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' request for a reduction in damages.

In Re Dial Complete Marketing And Sales Practices Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44383 (D.N.H. Mar. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, filed a consolidated multi-district class action suit alleging that Defendant made misrepresentations regarding its soap when it claimed that it "kills 99.9% of germs." Id. at *4. Plaintiffs' asserted four causes of action, including: (i) violation of the consumer protection laws of each state; (ii) breach of express warranty; (iii) breach of implied warranty; and (iv) unjust enrichment. Id. at *6. The Court had originally denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3) because Plaintiffs did not satisfy the requirement that common questions of law and fact predominate, as they failed to provide sufficient detail as to whether damages could be adequately calculated on a class-wide basis. Id. at *6. The Court granted Plaintiffs leave to amend their complaint. The Court opined that to satisfy the predominance requirement, Plaintiffs must present a reliable damages calculation model that was consistent with their theory of liability. Id. Plaintiffs' theory of liability was that they were induced to rely upon false representations when making decisions to purchase the product and were deprived of a measurable monetary portion of the benefit-of-the bargain that they struck with Defendant. Id. at *21. Damages were measured by the difference between what each Plaintiff paid and the value of what they received. Id. Defendant asserted that the opinion of Plaintiffs' expert was unreliable and it moved to strike their expert's report. Id. at *15. The Court rejected this argument, finding the report admissible under Rule 702, as the expert was qualified and the testimony rested on a reliable foundation. Id. Defendant further argued that the proposed methodology was fundamentally flawed and incapable of measuring only damages attributable to Plaintiffs' theory of liability. Id. at *17. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs' model did not measure any change in market price, but only changes in consumer demand. The Court disagreed and held that because Plaintiffs' means to calculate class-wide damages appeared reliable to establish the full extent of damages on a class-wide basis, the model satisfied the demands of Rule 23. Id. at *32. The Court noted that at the class certification stage, damages need not be calculated to a "mathematical certainty." Id. at *33. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Krauker, et al. v. Dish Network, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 77163 (M.D.N.C. May 22, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action seeking damages against Defendant alleging that its agent, Satellite Systems Network ("SSN"), made more than 50,000 telemarketing calls on behalf of Defendant in 2010 and 2011 to phone numbers on the National Do Not Call Registry ("Registry") in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Id. at *2. A jury found for Plaintiff on the issue of liability and awarded Plaintiffs statutory damages in the amount of $400 per call. Id. at *6. After the verdict, the Court found that Defendant willfully and knowingly violated the TCPA and that treble damages were appropriate. Id. at *34. The Court noted that while a finding of willfulness does not require bad faith, it does require that the caller "have reason to know, or should have known" that the conduct would violate the statute. Id. at *26. The Court ruled that Defendant knew that SSN had a history of TCPA violations and still allowed SSN to make marketing calls to sell Defendant's services. The Court found it significant that in 2009, Defendant entered into a compliance agreement with 46 state attorneys general that it would enforce TCPA compliance, paid a $6,000,000 fine, and yet it still failed to monitor SSN's compliance with telemarketing laws. Id. at *19. At trial, Plaintiffs established that Defendant received numerous complaints about SSN and was aware of lawsuits against SSN and that SSN was not scrubbing its call lists against the Registry. Id. at *28. Further, SSN knew that it was using lists that had not been scrubbed to remove numbers on the Registry and it called Plaintiffs repeatedly, even though it knew they were on the Registry and had requested not to receive any more calls. Id. at *34. Defendant knew that SSN had a long history of violations of both the TCPA and Defendant's rules related to TCPA compliance. In its ruling, the Court opined that Defendant easily could have discovered the full extent of the violations with a minimal monitoring effort. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Defendant's conduct was willful and treble damages were appropriate because of the need to deter Defendant from future violations and the need to give appropriate weight to the scope of the violations. Id. at *34. The Court increased the damages from $400 per call to $1,200 per call.

Editor's Note: The judgment of $60 million upheld in Krauker is believed to be the largest TCPA judgment ever.

(xv) Collateral Estoppel, Res judicata, And Settlement Bar Concepts Under Rule 23

Amalfitano, et al. v. Google, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 4293 (9th Cir. Mar. 10, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action against Defendant in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York alleging that Defendant violated the Stored Communications Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 2701-2712. Defendant sought to transfer the action to the Northern District of California, which was granted. The District Court subsequently dismissed the case without leave to amend the purported class action on res judicata grounds. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision. The District Court determined that Plaintiff's identical claims had been resolved fully by the settlement of a 2010 class action lawsuit entitled In Re Google Buzz Privacy Litigation, No. 10-CV-672 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 17, 2010) ("Buzz Class Action"). Id. at *2. Plaintiff was a member of the Buzz Class Action settlement class, and did not timely opt-out of the settlement. The District Court found that res judicata therefore applied, and Plaintiff was bound by the Buzz Class Action settlement, which constituted a final judgment on the merits. Id. The Ninth Circuit agreed and ruled that Plaintiff might have contested his inclusion in the settlement class by filing a motion before the District Court in the Buzz Class Action pursuant to Rule 60(b), but he did not demonstrate the "grave miscarriage of justice" that would permit him to file an independent action challenging the final judgment. Id. at *3.

In Re Flonase Antitrust Litigation*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 26385 (3d Cir. Dec. 22, 2017). GlaxoSmithKline ("GSK") sought to enforce a settlement agreement and enjoin the State of Louisiana from bringing allegedly released claims against GSK in Louisiana state court. Purchasers of Flonase, a brand name prescription drug, filed a class action against GSK in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania alleging that: (i) GSK filed a sham citizens' petition with the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to delay introduction of a generic version of Flonase; and (ii) this forced the purchases to pay more for Flonase than they would have if the generic version were available. Id. at *5. The District Court approved notice of the settlement to class members and even though the State of Louisiana was an indirect Flonase purchaser and qualified as a potential class member, it did not receive the approved notice. Instead, it received a Class Action Fairness Act ("CAFA") notice. The District Court approved the final settlement and an order which permanently enjoined all members of the settlement class, including Louisiana, from bringing released claims against GSK even in Louisiana state court. Subsequently, the State of Louisiana brought claims against GSK in Louisiana state court alleging violations of Louisiana's antitrust laws. In an ancillary class action suit, GSK filed a motion to enforce the settlement agreement against Louisiana Attorney General on the grounds that Louisiana violated the settlement agreement. GSK sought to enjoin Louisiana from pursuing its own claims on the basis that it was bound by the settlement with Flonase purchasers. The District Court denied GSK's motion and held that: (i) the Eleventh Amendment covered the enforcement action; and (ii) GSK failed to show that Louisiana had waived its sovereign immunity and consented to the District Court's jurisdiction, as the receipt of the CAFA notice was insufficient to establish that the State was aware that it was a class member and voluntarily chose to have its claims resolved. Before the District Court ruled on its motion to enforce the settlement, GSK moved for relief from the judgment pursuant to Rule 60(b)(2) because of newly discovered evidence that a third-party had allegedly submitted a settlement claim on behalf of Louisiana. The District Court also denied this motion and GSK appealed the District Court's rulings on both motions. On Defendant's consolidated appeal, the Third Circuit affirmed the orders of the District Court. The Third Circuit rejected GSK's argument that the District Court had authority to require Louisiana's Attorney General to abide by the settlement agreement, which included a release of future claims over its activity. The Third Circuit opined that such a holding would violate the State's sovereign immunity under the Eleventh Amendment. The Third Circuit held that the: (i) Eleventh Amendment applied to the settlement agreement and enforcement action; (ii) GSK could not avoid the Eleventh Amendment's prohibition by asserting that the State of Louisiana waived its sovereign immunity; and (iii) the District Court did not abuse its discretion when it denied Defendant's Rule 60(b) motion. Accordingly, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's orders.

Morgan, et al. v. Yellowjacket Oilfield Services, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 89359 (S.D. Tex. June 12, 2017). Plaintiff alleged that Defendant failed to pay overtimes wages in violation of the FLSA. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment asserting that Plaintiff previously settled and released his FLSA claim in connection with another case against it that was a collective action. Id. at *2. Plaintiff claimed he worked 40 to 60 hours of unpaid overtime as a mixing plant operator. Another co-worker Jonathan Juarez had filed a FLSA lawsuit against Defendant as a collective action. While Juarez was pending, Plaintiff filed this case in his individual capacity only. The parties in Juarez filed a motion for a stipulated judgment based upon a settlement agreement, which the Court approved. Pursuant to the Juarez agreement, a settlement class was formed that included Plaintiff within its scope. Id. Defendant alleged that Plaintiff submitted a settlement claim form, which Plaintiff denied. Defendant informed Plaintiff's counsel that it had received a Juarez claim form purportedly signed by him and it was taking the position that Plaintiff had agreed to settle his claim. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiff's counsel requested that all further communication to Plaintiff be done through counsel, and Defendant indicated that it would direct further communications to Plaintiff's counsel. However, Defendant then sent a settlement check in the amount of $1,058.10 directly to Plaintiff, bypassing his counsel. The back of the check stated that, by accepting payment, the recipient accepted the settlement terms and agreed to waive and release all claims against Defendant. Id. at *5. It was undisputed that Plaintiff endorsed the check and cashed it. Id. at *6. Plaintiff's counsel learned that Defendant had sent Plaintiff a Juarez settlement check in a manner contrary to his instructions regarding this pending litigation. Id. Plaintiff asserted that he cashed the settlement check under the mistaken impression that it was coming from his own attorney, it was his because it bore his name, and that he did not know that he was giving up any claims he had asserted in his lawsuit. The Court found that because Plaintiff's alleged participation in the Juarez collective action case came after the filing of his own individual case, the individual case governed based on the first-filed rule and the rule against claim-splitting. Id. at *7. The Court explained that under the first-to-file rule, Plaintiff's individual action required a discretionary determination by the Court whether Plaintiff's claim in the Juarez case could proceed and govern his claim. Id. at *8. The Court noted that in a claim-splitting scenario, the second suit would be barred if it involved the same parties and same transaction or series of transactions. Id. at *9-10. The Court further stated that both rules as to the first-to-file doctrine and claim-splitting recognized that jurisdiction attached in the first case. Plaintiff therefore invoked his due process rights, including the right to be represented by counsel of his choice. Id. at *10. By including Plaintiff in the Juarez settlement class, the Court held that Defendant defied the Court's jurisdiction and ignored Plaintiff's selection of counsel. In effect, the Court determined that Defendant replaced Plaintiff's selected counsel in his own case with class counsel in Juarez for purposes of claiming that the settlement complied with the FLSA's requirement that settlements be supervised. The Court held that conduct that interfered with the Court's jurisdiction and the parties' due process rights in the case cannot be permitted, and thereby denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Ross, et al. v. Lockheed Martin,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 118373 (D.D.C. July 28, 2017). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of employment discrimination that was manifest in its performance appraisal system. After the parties negotiated a settlement that included a $22.8 million settlement fund and changes to Defendant's performance appraisal process, Plaintiffs moved for preliminary certification of the proposed class and preliminary approval of the settlement agreement. The Court denied the motions, holding that Plaintiffs failed to establish the commonality prerequisite for Rule 23 class certification and that the proposed settlement agreement terms were improperly broad. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant engaged in race discrimination against its African-American employees through the operation of the performance appraisal system that the company used to evaluate its employees. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs alleged that over the course of a three-year period between January 2013 and February 2016, Defendant's performance appraisal system produced a disparate impact in performance ratings, and consequently in the promotions, compensation, and retention of salaried African-American employees below the level of Vice President. Plaintiffs, who alleged that they were injured by the performance appraisal system, sought to certify a class of nearly all current and former African-American employees below the rank of Vice President who were evaluated pursuant to the performance appraisal system during the relevant three-year period. The putative class contained over 5,500 members who worked in over 40 states. Id. at *8, *9, *17. On the same day as they filed their complaint, Plaintiffs moved for both preliminary certification of the proposed class for settlement purposes under Rule 23(a) and (b), and preliminary approval of the settlement agreement under Rule 23(e). The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for preliminary certification of the proposed class for settlement purposes and preliminary approval of the settlement agreement. Regarding Plaintiffs' motion for preliminary certification of the proposed class for settlement purposes, Plaintiffs argued that their proposed class satisfied the commonality requirement set forth in Rule 23(a)(2) because each member of the class was subject to the same performance evaluation system. The Court rejected this argument, noting that "[u]nfortunately for Plaintiffs, the Supreme Court's landmark decision in Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 564 U.S. 338 (2011), spoke directly to what is required in order to satisfy the commonality criterion in the context of an employment discrimination class action, and its reasoning makes abundantly clear that the commonality criterion is not satisfied under the circumstances presented in this case." Id. at *32. Applying Wal-Mart, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to identify a "testing procedure or other company-wide evaluation procedure that can be charged with bias." Id. at *37-38. The Court opined that Plaintiffs' contention that the company-wide evaluation procedures often resulted in ratings that were poorly correlated with job performance, however plausible, did not supply an account of how those procedures themselves resulted in the racially disparate outcomes that Plaintiffs observed in Lockheed's overall workforce. Drawing a comparison to Wal-Mart, the Court further found that Plaintiffs did not provide "significant proof" that Defendant "operated under a general policy of discrimination." Id. at *39. Accordingly, "[w]ith neither an account of how the common features of the performance appraisal system led to racially disparate outcomes (other than by enabling discretionary decisions by individual supervisors), nor statistical evidence of a kind and degree sufficient to show that the practice in question has caused race discrimination, Plaintiffs cannot assure [the] Court that class members will actually share a common answer to the crucial question why was I disfavored." Id. at *43. As such, the Court held that the putative class did not meet the commonality requirement of Rule 23(a). Turning to the proposed settlement agreement, the Court held that the terms of the agreement were sufficiently problematic such that the agreement could not be approved. First, the Court held that there was a gross imbalance between the claims that were actually at issue in this case and the claims that the class members who might participate in the settlement would be required to release, including all race discrimination claims. Id. at *46. The Court also expressed various concerns regarding the opt-out procedure and the amount of information absent class members would receive. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that the proposed Settlement Agreement was sufficiently "fair, reasonable, and adequate" to satisfy the standard for preliminary approval. Id. at *51.

Sansoe, et al. v. Ford Motor Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 148617 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, purchasers of Defendant's trucks, brought an action asserting that Defendant violated the Song-Beverly Consumer Warranty Act ("Song-Beverly Act") and the California Consumers Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA") and the California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"). Plaintiffs asserted that they had numerous problems with their trucks. Defendant ultimately offered a vehicle refund or a replacement vehicle, subject to conditions including that Plaintiffs would be responsible for any missing equipment, abnormal wear, or collision damage. Id. at *2. Plaintiff accepted Defendant's offer, and relinquished the trucks to Defendant in exchange for payment. Plaintiffs then filed this action alleging that Defendant deducted charges for repairs for abnormal wear and tear from the refunded amount, because the Song-Beverly Act allows for a statutory mileage deduction but not for a deduction for abnormal wear. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs asserted that the same actions constituted unfair and unlawful acts and practices under the CLRA and unfair competition under the UCL. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment. The Court found that Plaintiffs' CLRA claim failed because the challenged conduct occurred after the sale of the vehicles, and thus could not have constituted deceptive acts that were intended to or did result "in the sale or lease of goods or services to a consumer." Id. at *4. The Court held that Plaintiffs' UCL claim failed because it sought restitution and injunctive relief, and Plaintiffs had an adequate remedy at law. However, there is no right to equitable relief or an equitable remedy where there is an adequate remedy at law. Plaintiffs had an adequate remedy at law under the Song-Beverly Act. Id. at *4-5. Finally, with regard to the Song-Beverly Act claim, the Court determined that it was undisputed that there were executed and performed settlement agreements. The Court noted that settlement agreements are presumptively valid. Plaintiffs wanted the Court to sever two portions of the fully executed agreements – the release, and the condition that Plaintiffs pay the cost of repairs for abnormal wear and tear – and declare those portions unconscionable and unenforceable. Id. at *7. However, the Court found that Plaintiffs cited no case law authority granting partial enforcement of a settlement agreement, and the cases Plaintiffs relied on in support of their argument regarding severance did not involve fully executed and performed settlement agreements, but rather arbitration provisions in employment contracts, which case law authorities have found easily severable on the basis that they were "collateral agreements." Id. The Court opined that neither the settlement agreements themselves nor the challenged provisions were unconscionable. Id. The Court noted that they were not procedurally unconscionable because Plaintiffs were represented by counsel during the negotiation of the settlements, and both had a meaningful choice as to whether to accept Defendant's settlement offer or refuse it and file a civil lawsuit to achieve the relief they were seeking. Further, the agreements were not substantively unconscionable because they were freely-negotiated and did not lead to "overly harsh" or "one-sided" results. Id. More importantly, the challenged provisions were not severable from the fully executed settlement agreements, and Plaintiffs cited no authority that would permit the Court to sever portions of a fully executed and performed contract. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment and denied Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment.

Smallwood, et al. v. Yates,* 235 F. Supp. 3d 280 (D.D.C. 2017). Plaintiffs brought a class action seeking declaratory and equitable relief under § 706 of the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA") based on a settlement agreement between a class of Native American farmers and the U.S. Department of Agriculture ("USDA"). Id. at 281. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss Plaintiff's claims and Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification. The Court granted Defendant's motion and denied Plaintiff's motion as moot. On November 24, 1999, a class of Native American ranchers and farmers filed a class action lawsuit entitled Keepseagle v. Veneman, Case No. 99-CV- 03119, against the USDA, alleging discrimination in the USDA's administration of the farm loan program. Id. at 282. The Court certified the case as a class action pursuant to Rule 23(b)(2). Plaintiff was a member of the Keepseagle class. In 2011, the parties in Keepseagle reached a class-wide settlement agreement, which the Court approved. The settlement agreement stated that class members could choose between two claim tracks to request a settlement award, including: (i) track A claimants were eligible to receive a maximum payment of $50,000; and (ii) track B claimants were eligible to receive a maximum payment of $250,000. Plaintiff received a settlement under the terms of the settlement agreement. The settlement agreement also contained a cy pres provision, which provided that a claims administrator would direct any leftover funds to the cy pres fund. In December 2015, class counsel filed a motion to modify the settlement agreement. Plaintiff subsequently filed this action alleging that the cy pres provisions in the original settlement agreement, which authorized payments to non-class members, violated the Appropriations Clause of the U.S. Constitution and 31 U.S.C. § 1304 (the "Judgment Fund statute"). Defendants argued that Plaintiff failed to establish an injury-in-fact because he had no legally protected interest in the undistributed Keepseagle settlement funds, because the settlement agreement explicitly limited Plaintiff's payment to the amount he received through the claims process. Therefore, Defendants asserted that because Plaintiff retained no legal interest in the settlement fund, the prospective use of that fund for cy pres payments did not cause him any legal injury. Id. at 285. Plaintiff argued that he established injury-in-fact because the Court must assume the merits of Plaintiff's legal arguments, i.e., that the cy pres provisions were unconstitutional and unenforceable, and that assumption invoked the settlement agreement's severability clause. Id. at 286. The Court found that even if the cy pres provisions in Keepseagle were eliminated for purposes of the Court's standing analysis, the express terms of the settlement agreement still limited Plaintiff's property interest to the monetary caps set forth under the settlement terms. Id. at 287. Accordingly, the Court held that because Plaintiff extinguished his legal claim by participating in the claims process and received an award as set forth in the agreement, Plaintiff had no legal interest that faced imminent invasion. Id. at 288. Thus, the Court ruled that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate an injury-in-fact. The Court stated that without demonstrating standing, the Court lacked the requisite subject-matter jurisdiction to consider the merits of Plaintiff's claims. The Court concluded that it must dismiss with prejudice Plaintiff's complaint for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss and denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

T.P., et al. v. Walt Disney Parks & Resorts U.S., Inc.,* Case No. 15-CV-5346 (C.D. Cal. April 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of families who visited Defendant's theme parks, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") and §§ 51 and 54 of the California Civil Code, and committed various common law claims. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant's disability accommodation program failed to sufficiently accommodate minor Plaintiffs who suffered from cognitive disabilities. Id. at 2. The case initially contained claims of 27 Plaintiff families and was transferred to the District Court in Florida which sua sponte dismissed the non-statutory claims of 13 Plaintiffs and retained jurisdiction over their ADA and California Civil Code claims. Subsequent to the Florida Court's order, the 13 families re-filed their dismissed common law tort and contract claims in this matter and added the claims of 14 additional families. Id. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment on the claims brought by the overlapping Plaintiffs, which the Court granted. The Florida Court had held that Defendant's disability program did not violate the ADA or the California Civil Code because it provided sufficient accommodations to Plaintiffs and those with similar cognitive disabilities. Id. The Court thereby determined that collateral estoppel applied to bar relitigation of the issue of whether Defendant's existing accommodations failed to accommodate Plaintiffs. The Court further determined that the preclusive effect of the Florida Court's decision applied equally to the minors' parents. Therefore, the Court held that consistent with the findings, because Plaintiffs' common law claims were predicated on their contention that Defendant violated the ADA and the Civil Code, there was no basis for Plaintiffs to succeed on those claims. Id. at 3. The Court explained that all the requirement to foreclose relitigation of an issue under collateral estoppel were met, including that: (i) the issue at stake must be identical to the one alleged in the prior litigation; (ii) the issue must have been actually litigated in the prior litigation; and (iii) the determination of the issue in the prior litigation must have been a critical and necessary part of the judgment of the earlier action. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for judgement on the pleadings.

(xvi) Commercial Free Speech Issues In Class Actions

Expressions Hair Design, et al. v. Schneiderman,* 137 S. Ct. 1144 (2017). Plaintiffs, five New York businesses and their owners who wish to impose surcharges for credit card use, filed a class action against state officials, asserting that § 518 of the New York General Business Law violated the First Amendment by regulating how they communicate their prices, and that it was unconstitutionally vague. Id. at 1145. Section 518 provides that "no seller in any sales transaction may impose a surcharge on a holder who elects to use a credit card in lieu of payment by cash, check, or similar means." Id. The District Court ruled in favor of Plaintiffs and on appeal, the Second Circuit vacated the judgment with instructions to dismiss. The Second Circuit concluded that in the context of single-sticker pricing – where merchants post one price and would like to charge more to customers who pay by credit card – the law required that the sticker price be the same as the price charged to credit card users, and therefore the law regulated a relationship between two prices. Id. Relying on U.S. Supreme Court precedent holding that price regulation alone regulates conduct, and not speech, the Second Circuit concluded that § 518 did not violate the First Amendment. Id. On writ of certiorari, the Supreme Court accepted the case for review. The Supreme Court unanimously decided the preliminary issue that § 518 regulates speech rather than conduct and remanded the constitutionality determination back to the Second Circuit. The Supreme Court found that § 518 regulates the relationship between "(i) the seller's sticker price; and (ii) the price the seller charges to credit card customers," requiring that these two amounts be equal. Id. at 1150. The Supreme Court thus determined that § 518 is not like a typical price regulation because it tells merchants nothing about the amount they are allowed to collect from a cash or credit card payer; instead, it simply regulates how sellers may communicate their prices. Id. at 1151. Accordingly, while the Supreme Court agreed with the Second Circuit that § 518 regulates a relationship between a sticker price and the price charged to credit card users, it rejected the notion that § 518 is nothing more than a price regulation. In regulating the communication of prices rather than prices themselves, the Supreme Court concluded that § 518 regulates speech. The Supreme Court did not opine on the First Amendment question and therefore remanded the First Amendment question to the Second Circuit consistent with the decision that § 518 regulates speech.

(xvii) Consolidation Issues In Class Actions

Bellweather Community Credit Union, et al. v. Chipotle Mexican Grill*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 142626 (D. Colo. Sept. 1, 2017). The parties filed a joint motion for consolidation, which the Court granted. The Court noted that Rule 42(a) provides that "[i]f actions before the Court involve a common question of law or fact, the Court may . . . consolidate the actions . . . ." Id. at *2. The purpose of Rule 42(a) is "to give the Court broad discretion to decide how cases on its docket are to be tried so that the business of the Court may be dispatched with expedition and economy while providing justice to the parties." Id. The Court found that the same group of attorneys filed two substantially similar cases in the Court on behalf of two different Plaintiffs, including this case, and Alcoa Community Federal Credit Union v. Chipotle Mexican Grill, Inc., Case No. 17-CV-1283. Although the details of each case were slightly different, the Court determined that both "actions are substantively identical and are in the same stage of litigation." Id. The Court stated that both actions: (i) were brought by payment-card-issuing financial institutions against Defendant; (ii) were brought as a putative class action seeking to certify the same class of financial institutions; (iii) alleged the same legal claims for negligence, negligence per se, and declaratory/injunctive relief; and (iv) arose out of the same occurrence, i.e., a data breach involving payment card information at Chipotle restaurants during the approximate period of March 2017 to the present. Id. at *3. Further the Court determined that all parties agreed that the matter should be consolidated. Accordingly, the Court granted the motion for consolidation.

Jones, et al. v. Waffle House, Inc.*, Case No. 15-CV-1637 (M.D. Fla. Oct. 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a job applicant, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants' practice in procuring background checks on job applicants violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). A group of Interveners filed a motion to intervene and consolidate. The Court granted Interveners' motion to intervene in Jones, et al. v. Waffle House, Case No. 15-CV-1637 (M.D. Fla. 2015). At the same time, the Court denied Interveners' motion to consolidate the Jones action with Holt, et al. v. Waffle House, Case No. 17-CV-693 (M.D. Fla. 2017). Id. at 2. The Court directed the parties to filed a voluntary dismissal in the Holt action. The Court noted that Defendants preserved the right to assert arguments regarding the additional claims in the Holt action that were not asserted in the Jones action and specifically reserved the right to contest the relation back of the statute of limitations to claims not asserted in Jones. Id. The Court directed Plaintiffs to file a consolidation complaint. The Court further directed the parties to meet and confer prior to filing a proposed case management report or a joint motion to modify the case management and scheduled order in Jones. Accordingly, the Court granted Interveners' motion to intervene in the Jones action.

McKinney, et al. v. Cohen,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 85205 (S.D.N.Y. May 9, 2017). Plaintiff brought a shareholder derivative action on behalf of Defendant Resource Capital Corp. Plaintiffs Dave Sherek ("Sherek") and Robert H. Spiegel ("Spiegel") commenced another class action arising from the same set of facts and alleging substantially overlapping causes of action as the first action. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs in both actions conferred and agreed that all claims arose out of a refusal by the Company's Board of Directors to prosecute the claims asserted in demands made by Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs agreed that in an effort to assure consistent rulings and decisions and the avoidance of unnecessary duplication of effort, they stipulated to consolidate the actions. Id. at *6. The Court approved the stipulation and ordered Plaintiffs to file a consolidated complaint within 60 days of the order. Id. at *7. The Court also ordered that the law firms of Johnson & Weaver, LLP and Profy Promisloff & Ciarlanto, P.C. were to serve as co-lead counsel for Plaintiffs in the consolidated action.

(xviii) Consumer Fraud Class Actions

Mednick, et al. v. Precor, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92629 (N.D. Ill. June 16, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a consumer fraud class action alleging that Defendant deceptively marketed and sold treadmills incorporating a heart rate technology that Defendant knew did not accurately measure heart rates. In granting Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, the Court certified the class for the purposes of determining liability only, and reserved issues related to damages to individual hearings. Id. at *2. Defendant moved the Court to reconsider the certification order and the Court denied Defendant's motion. In their original motion for class certification, Plaintiffs sought to certify both a nationwide class to pursue a federal warranty claim and a multi-state class to recover under the consumer protection laws of 10 different states. Plaintiffs identified the class members as those who bought Defendant's exercise equipment that contained the touch sensor technology, or 20 models of treadmills, elliptical machines, and stationary bikes. The Court refused to certify such a broad class and ruled that Plaintiffs had not satisfied Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement. Id. at *22. The Court was concerned that Plaintiffs' breach-of-warranty action, coupled with a claim of fraud, posed serious problems about choice-of-law, the manageability of the suit, and hence, the propriety of class certification. Plaintiffs then narrowed the scope of their case to satisfy Rule 23(b)(3) and dropped the warranty claim, reduced the number of states for which they pursued the consumer fraud claims from ten to five, and decreased the products they alleged to be deceptively marketed to just the treadmills. The Court found that this narrower class satisfied the requirements of Rule 23 and it certified the class. The Court construed Defendant's motion to reconsider as a motion to alter or amend a judgment under Rule 59(e) or a motion for relief from a final order under Rule 60(b), because the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure did not provide for a motion to reconsider. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that certification was precluded because the touch sensors performed differently for different individuals depending upon their individual physiology and the heart rate system that they used. Id. at *9. The Court found that neither the physiological differences nor the variations between the touch sensor systems defeated the class claims because most Plaintiffs experienced inaccurate heart rate readings and this meant that Defendant could not rely on individual differences to account for the differences in performance. Defendant also argued that Plaintiffs' damages model precluded certification because class members were not deprived of all value as set forth in the damage theories of Plaintiffs' damage theory expert. The Court rejected this argument because Defendant did not cite any binding authority that held that if a damages expert advocates for a full refund damages model – on the theory that class members received no value from the product – class certification should be denied when a partial refund model may be more appropriate. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion and reaffirmed its finding that certification was proper. Id. at *27.

Mendez, et al. v. Avis Budget Group, Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 190730 (D.N.J. Nov. 17, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action on behalf of himself and others similarly-situated seeking to recover damages for all individuals who rented vehicles from Defendants that were equipped with, and charged for use of, an electronic system to pay tolls known as "e-Toll." Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification, which the Court granted. Plaintiff alleged that before, during, and after his rental of a vehicle from Defendants, he was not advised that the vehicle: (i) could be equipped with an e-Toll device; and (ii) was pre-enrolled and activated for e-Toll. Plaintiff further alleged that he was not informed that, when he rented a vehicle that was equipped with an e-Toll device, he would be obligated to pay more than the actual toll charge incurred and be charged at a non-discounted rate. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff sought to certify a nationwide class of all United States residents who: (i) rented an Avis or Budget vehicle in the United States during the class period; and (ii) in connection with that rental, paid Avis or Budget or their agent for their use of e-Toll. Id. at *5. The Court noted that the class was sufficiently numerous because it contained hundreds of individuals and, when dealing with such a large class, joinder was impracticable. Id. at *14. The Court found that Plaintiff met the commonality requirement because there were many questions common to the class. The Court also determined that the common questions capable of class-wide resolution predominated because the factual and legal thread of all claims was the alleged omission or non-disclosure of the e-Toll fees and up-charging. Id. at *15-16. Moreover, the Court held that no "individualized proof of 'highly case-specific factual issues'" would be required. Id. at *17. The Court reasoned that the typicality requirement of Rule 23 was met because the legal theory that formed the basis of Plaintiff's claims was typical of the claims asserted by the class members. Id. at *17-18. Specifically, Plaintiff averred that Defendants breached the rental contract when they failed to make various e-Toll disclosures and caused Plaintiff to be subjected to fees and upcharges about which he was unaware, and all class members asserted the same claim. Id. at *18. As to adequacy, the Court noted that class counsel were more than adequate representatives of the class based on the personal and law firm resumes submitted in support of the class certification motion. Id. at *19. The Court noted that class counsel had demonstrated their diligent and competent representation throughout the matter as it proceeded through discovery. Id. at *19-20. Additionally, the Court concluded that named Plaintiff was an appropriate class representative because his interests were not antagonistic to the rest of the class members and he had expressed his willingness to represent them. Id. at *20. Finally, the Court opined that class resolution would be a superior method of adjudication because the financial loss to most of the class members was relatively small, and it was unlikely that class members would have the resources to pursue successful litigation on their own because the cost of litigating separate actions would be far more than the amount each individual class member could recover. Id. at *21-22. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Mulder, et al. v. Kohl's Department Stores,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 13546 (1st Cir. July 26, 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action asserting that Defendant practiced deceptive labeling and marketing of products. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant used price tags listing both purchase prices and significantly higher "comparison prices." Id. at *1. Plaintiff alleged that the comparison prices were entirely fictional and were selected by Defendant to mislead unsuspecting consumers about the quality of its products. Id. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the District Court granted. On appeal, the First Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The District Court held that Plaintiff failed to adequately plead a legally cognizable injury under Chapter 93A of Massachusetts law, and it further denied her requests to certify several Chapter 93A questions to the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court ("SJC") and for leave to file a second amended complaint. The District Court also dismissed Plaintiff's common law claims. On appeal, Plaintiff challenged the dismissal of her Chapter 93A claim and her common law claims for fraud, breach of contract, and unjust enrichment. In dismissing Plaintiff's claims, the District Court noted that this case involved allegations "substantially identical" to those made against another retailer in Shaulis v. Nordstrom Inc., 120 F. Supp. 3d 40 (D. Mass. 2015). Plaintiffs appealed in both cases, and their appeals were joined for oral argument. Id. at *4. The First Circuit discerned no relevant factual or legal distinctions between the two cases, applied its opinion in Shaulis, and affirmed dismissal of Plaintiff's Chapter 93A claim for damages and injunctive relief and her common law claims for fraud, breach of contract, and unjust enrichment. Id. at *4-5. The First Circuit therefore found that the only remaining issue was Plaintiff's challenge to the District Court's denial of her motion for leave to file a second amended complaint. Plaintiff sought leave to amend to add new allegations that she was "induced" to travel to Defendant's store by false advertising and that she suffered a resulting economic injury in the form of travel expenses incurred by driving ten miles from her home to the store. The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion to amend her complaint because of undue delay and because her proposed amendments to the complaint would have been futile. Id. at *6. With respect to delay, as the District Court noted, Plaintiff did not move for leave to amend after Defendant filed its motion to dismiss and instead opposed the motion, filed a sur-reply, opposed the motion again at oral argument, and then filed a third memorandum in opposition to Defendant's motion. The First Circuit, therefore, concluded that the District Court acted within its discretion in denying leave to amend for undue burden. The First Circuit also held that the District Court likewise acted within its discretion by denying Plaintiff's motion for leave to amend as futile. The District Court opined that the proposed second amended complaint failed to state a claim sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss. Id. The First Circuit held that Plaintiff's claim that she was "induced" to travel to Defendant by its "advertising in general" and its "reputation" of "amazing prices" was too vague to satisfy Rule 9(b), which required Plaintiffs to specifically plead "the time, place, and content of an alleged false representation." Id. at *8. Accordingly, the First Circuit affirmed the District Court's order granting Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Shaulis, et al. v. Nordstrom, Inc.,* 865 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. July 26, 2017). Plaintiff, a retail consumer, filed a class action when she bought a sweater at Defendant's store with a labeled purchase price of $49.97 with a higher "compare at" price of $218. Id. at 2. Plaintiff alleged common law claims of fraud, breach of contract, unjust enrichment, and violations of Massachusetts Consumer Protection Act ("MCPA"), and sought monetary and injunctive relief. Id. at 4. Plaintiff claimed that the listed "compare at" price was deceptive in that Defendant never sold the sweater for $218. The District Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss, and on Plaintiff's appeal, the First Circuit affirmed. The District Court determined that Defendant's alleged pricing scheme constituted an unfair or deceptive practice under the MCPA and that Plaintiff had adequately alleged that Defendant's deception caused an identifiable harm in that she was directly induced to make a purchase she would not have made. However, the District Court held that Defendant failed to allege a legally cognizable injury for purposes of the MCPA because Plaintiff's subjective belief that she did not receive a good value was not enough to establish the existence of an injury under the MCPA. The First Circuit agreed and held that Plaintiff's theory was flawed because she failed to allege an injury as required under the MCPA and merged the alleged deception with the injury. Id. at 11. Plaintiff's purchase-as-injury claim collapsed the required distinction between deception and injury by attempting to plead an assertion about her disappointed expectations of value in place of the required allegation of real economic loss. Likewise, the First Circuit held that Plaintiff was not entitled to injunctive relief under MCPA because she had not alleged an injury. Id. at 14. The First Circuit held that Plaintiff's remaining common law claims for fraud, unjust enrichment, and breach of contract all failed as well. Plaintiff's fraudulent misrepresentation claim failed for the same reason as her MCPA claim failed, she had not alleged an actionable injury caused by Defendant's allegedly false statement. With respect to Plaintiff's breach of contract claim, the First Circuit found no allegations in the complaint that the sales contract itself was breached, as the agreement between Plaintiff and Defendant was nothing more than a straightforward, everyday sales contract for the purchase of a sweater, and Defendant fulfilled its contractual obligations by charging the agreed price in exchange for ownership of the sweater. Further, Plaintiff's claim for unjust enrichment also failed because a party with an adequate remedy at law cannot claim unjust enrichment. The First Circuit rejected Plaintiff's contention that, if her other claims were dismissed, she had no adequate remedy. The First Circuit opined that this argument misapprehended the law, as it was the availability of a remedy at law, and not the viability of that remedy that prohibited a claim for unjust enrichment. The First Circuit also ruled that the District Court did not err when it denied Plaintiff's motion for reconsideration and for leave to amend as Plaintiff had not made the necessary showing of newly discovered evidence or a manifest error of law to warrant reconsideration. Accordingly, the First Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision. Id. at 17.

Sud, et al. v. Costco Wholesale Corp*., 229 F. Supp. 3d 1075 (N.D. Cal. 2017). Plaintiffs filed a putative class action against Defendants, Costco and C.P. Food Products Inc. ("CP"), claiming several violations of California law. Each of the claims were based on allegations that Defendants sold and supplied prawns farmed in Thailand, and that the supply chain was tainted by slavery, human trafficking, and other illegal labor practices. Defendant CP filed a motion to dismiss asserting that Plaintiffs lacked Article III standing under Rule 12(b)(1). Defendant CP asserted that Plaintiffs did not allege that Defendant CP supplied the prawns that they purchased. Accordingly, Plaintiffs failed to allege facts to establish that they had Article III standing to pursue a claim against Defendant CP. The Court granted the motion to dismiss. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendant Costco was liable for false advertising because it published a "Disclosure Regarding Human Trafficking and Anti-Slavery" on its website and advertised that it had a supplier code of conduct prohibiting such labor abuses. The claims were based upon allegations that the disclosures were misleading. The Court also dismissed these claims. Defendant Costco asserted that Plaintiffs failed to allege that they relied upon any of Costco's statements. The Court agreed, noting that Plaintiffs did not allege that they relied upon the information or that they even read the disclosure before purchasing prawns from Defendant. Plaintiffs also did not allege with any particularity that they relied upon Defendant Costco's advertisements. Accordingly, the motion to dismiss based upon false statements was granted. Plaintiffs also alleged that because Defendant Costco made representations about excluding slave labor from its chain of supply, it had a duty to accurately disclose to consumers that slavery, forced labor, and human trafficking tainted Costco's supply chain. Defendant Costco also moved to dismiss these claims on the basis that it did not have a duty to disclose this information. The Court agreed and noted that while the labor practices alleged were "horrific," they did not constitute a safety risk to consumers or constitute a product defect. The Court noted that there is a need for a "bright-line limitation" on a duty to disclose, as it is difficult to anticipate what information consumers find material in purchasing decisions. The Court found that there was no duty to disclose in this case. Accordingly, the Court dismissed all of Plaintiffs' claims.

(xix) COBRA Class Actions

Vazquez, et al. v. Marriott International, Inc.,* Case No. 17-CV-116 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a housekeeper, filed a class action alleging that Defendant failed to provide her with a proper Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1985 ("COBRA") notice of rights of healthcare coverage following her termination in violation of the ERISA. Id. at 1. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiff: (i) lacked standing for failure to allege an injury-in-fact; and (ii) failed to exhaust her administrative remedies. The Court denied Defendant's motion. Plaintiff alleged that both her and her husband lost healthcare coverage for two months, incurred significant medical expenses, and still had unpaid bills. Id. at 2. Defendant argued that Plaintiff failed to allege any harm resulting from the alleged deficient COBRA notice and that Plaintiff's loss of insurance coverage occurred because she was unable to afford it, not because of any alleged deficiency. Id. at 3. Plaintiff, however, contended that she suffered the loss of insurance coverage due to the deficient notice and that she obtained sufficient medical bills. Id. The Court found that these allegations were sufficient to state of plausible claim of injury-in-fact and therefore to confer standing for Plaintiff's COBRA claim. Id. at 4. Defendant also contended that Plaintiff failed to exhaust her administrative remedies. Plaintiff argued that there were no available administrative remedies for failure to give adequate notice, and therefore exhaustion would be futile. Id. The Court noted that as Defendant offered no available alternative remedy, its defense had no basis. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

(xx) Data Breach Class Actions

Beck, et al. v. McDonald*, 848 F.3d 262 (4th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of veterans, brought two separate putative class action suits against Defendant, a health care center, alleging data breach violations pursuant to the Privacy Act of 1974 and the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA"). Plaintiffs alleged that they suffered an injury-in-fact after a lap-top computer and pathology reports containing personal data were stolen. Id. at 267. Plaintiffs sought to establish Article III standing based on the harm from the increased risk of future identity theft and the cost of measures to protect against identity theft. The District Court dismissed the claims for lack of Article III standing. On Plaintiffs' consolidated appeal, the Fourth Circuit affirmed. Id. at 277. The Fourth Circuit ruled that the District Court properly concluded that Plaintiffs failed to establish a non-speculative, imminent, injury-in-fact for purposes of Article III standing. The Fourth Circuit noted that other circuits are divided on whether an increased risk of future identity theft may establish Article III standing. Id. at 273. The Fourth Circuit opined that a threatened injury, rather than an actual injury, may satisfy Article III standing requirements, but not all threatened injuries constitute an injury-in-fact. The Fourth Circuit opined that Plaintiffs failed to show any threatened harm of future identity theft, as there was no evidence that any of personal information from the breaches had been misused. Id. at 274. Therefore, the allegations were too speculative to constitute an injury-in-fact. Id. The Fourth Circuit also rejected Plaintiffs claims that emotional distress and fear of financial theft were adverse effects for purposes of Article III. Because the fear of identity theft was too speculative, any costs that Plaintiffs incurred to guard against identity theft did not constitute an injury-in-fact. Id. at 276. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision that Plaintiffs lacked Article III standing.

Community Bank Of Trenton, et al. v. Schnuk Markets, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66014 (S.D. Ill. May 1, 2017). Plaintiff, a group of banks, filed a class action against Defendant grocery stores after there was a data breach involving credit card processing. Plaintiffs claimed that stolen data was used in fraudulent transactions because of data not being properly encrypted and stored. Id. at *5. Defendant did not notify the public of the breach until 16 days after learning of the breach. Id. at *6. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' amended seven-count complaint. The Court dismissed all counts of the complaint with prejudice. Id. at *23. Plaintiffs made a claim of gross negligence under Missouri law. Id. at *7. The Court ruled that Missouri's data breach law does not provide a civil remedy and merely gives authority to the Attorney General to prosecute violations for failure to notify of data breaches. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the gross negligence claim, and declined to create a remedy where the Missouri legislature had failed to do so. Id. The Court also dismissed Plaintiffs' negligence claim, as they failed to identify any duty that Defendant had violated. Id. at *12. Third, the Court dismissed the breach of implied contract claim as there was no evidence that a contractual relationship existed between the parties or that any violation occurred. Id. at *15. Further, the Court dismissed the breach of contract third-party beneficiary claim because the Plaintiff failed to establish that they were more than an incidental beneficiary. Id. at *16. The Court ruled that there was no direct benefit intended to Plaintiffs resulting from the contractual relationship between the merchant and the credit card companies. The fact that Plaintiffs received fees was incidental. The Court likewise dismissed the violation of the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act as the allegations were too "threadbare." Id. at *21. In addition, the Court dismissed the unjust enrichment claim because Plaintiff's allegation did not establish that Defendant made more from accepting credit cards after the breach than it would have made had it accepted only cash. Id. at *22. Finally, because the Court dismissed the substantive claims in Plaintiffs' complaint, it did not rule on the injunctive relief that Plaintiff' sought. Id. at *22. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' complaint with prejudice.

DolmageI, et al. v. Combined Insurance Co. Of America*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 67555 (6th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff, an insured individual, filed a class action against Defendant alleging breach of contract for failing to keep her personally identifiable information ("PII") private. Upon securing life insurance with Defendant, Defendant provided Plaintiff its "privacy pledge" detailed some of the safeguards that Defendant had in place to secure private information. However, Defendant's on-line portal Enrolltek was hacked, and Plaintiff and thousands of other individuals' PII was hacked. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23, which the Court denied on the grounds that Plaintiff could not establish commonality, typicality, predominance, or superiority. Plaintiff asserted that several issues were common to all class members, including whether Defendant's privacy pledge was part of the insurance agreements between Defendant and class members, whether Defendant violated the privacy pledge when Enrolltek posted class members' PII on the internet, and whether class members suffered harm by having their information available on the internet. Id. at *10. Although the Court agreed that it was one single action by Defendant that allegedly caused the class members' injury, the Court stated that one of the key issues in this case was whether the privacy pledge was part of the contract between Defendant and putative class members and, if so, what duties it imposed on Defendant. Id. at *11. The Court held that it was unclear how this issue could be resolved on a class-wide basis, because the proposed class covered individuals living in 30 or more states. Accordingly, the Court would have to apply the laws of multiple states to determine whether the privacy pledge was enforceable. Id. at *16. The Court, therefore, concluded that certification of a nationwide class would be improper. Further, the Court found that Plaintiff's claims were not typical of the class because Plaintiff claimed actual damages as a result of the data breach, whereas the vast majority of class members never reported becoming victims of identity theft. Id. at *27. The Court opined that issues pertaining to the theft of Plaintiff's data by third-parties, particularly whether it was caused by the data breach and what damages she suffered as a result, were therefore not "typical" of the claims of most class members. Id. at *28. The Court also found that Plaintiff failed to meet the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3). Plaintiff argued that the common issues of contract formation and breach were class-wide issues that predominated. Defendant asserted that the individual issues overwhelmed any common issues, considering that both enforceability of the contract and damages would need to be determined on an individual basis. The Court agreed with Defendant because the issues in this case would require individualized damages inquiries for each class member. Id. at *31. In addition, the contract and insurance laws of multiple states governed the merits of class members' claims. The Court held that certifying a class under these circumstances was not the superior method of adjudicating the claims and instead would be entirely unmanageable. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Dugas, et al. v. Starwood Hotels,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102335 (S.D. Cal. June 28, 2017). Plaintiff, on behalf of a group of current and former customers, brought an action asserting that Defendant violated the California Customer Records Act and the California Unfair Competition Law when malware installed on its computer systems targeted customer information. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant knew or should have known the value of the information it was storing and that such information made it a high-profile target. The Court had previously granted Defendant's motion to dismiss, and Plaintiff filed a second amended complaint asserting jurisdiction under the Class Action Fairness Act ("CAFA"). The Court issued an order to show cause why the action should not be dismissed for lack of subject- matter jurisdiction, and it ultimately dismissed Plaintiff's second amended complaint. The Court's order to show cause noted three deficiencies in Plaintiff's second amended complaint, including: (i) whether the amount-in-controversy exceeded the CAFA's jurisdictional threshold; (ii) that the facts alleged in the second amended complaint prevented the Court from determining whether it must decline to assert jurisdiction under the CAFA by way of the mandatory "local controversy" exception; and (iii) whether two-thirds of the proposed class were "citizens of the State in which the action was originally filed," given that Plaintiff's proposed class would seek relief only for violations of California law. Id. at *3-4. The Court noted that Plaintiff failed to respond to the deficiencies in its pleading or address the Court's concerns regarding whether it has original jurisdiction under the CAFA and whether it otherwise must decline to exercise such jurisdiction under § 1332(d)(4)(A). The Court determined that Plaintiff failed to explain its allegations concerning the CAFA's jurisdictional minimum. Plaintiff alleged that hundreds of thousands of customer records were stolen during the data breach, and even if conservatively valuing this at exactly 100,000 individuals, to reach the amount-in-controversy, the value of the breach per user would need to exceed just $50. Id. at *6. The Court concluded that Plaintiff's statement, however, did not adequately respond to the Court's observation that the second amended complaint's silence as to the restitution sought, in light of the California causes of action brought, failed to plausibly allege that the CAFA's jurisdictional minimum was met. Id. at *7. Second, the Court held that Plaintiff's response failed to provide the information required to assess whether it must decline to assert jurisdiction under the CAFA by way of the "local controversy" exception because Plaintiff's response did not adequately allege the citizenship of Defendants. According to the record, two of the Defendants were LPs and LLCs, and therefore for jurisdiction purposes were "citizens of every state of which its owners/members are citizens." Id. at *8. The Court determined that Plaintiff, therefore, failed to properly assert the citizenship of two of the Defendants and, as such, the Court could not determine whether the second prong of the mandatory "local controversy" exception to the CAFA applied. Id. at *9. The Court noted that Plaintiff's response also failed to address the first prong of the "local controversy exception," which inquiries into whether two-thirds, or more, of the individuals in the proposed class were California citizens. Id. The Court noted in the order to show cause that the proposed class could not be as broad as Plaintiff alleged because Plaintiff asserted only California causes of action. In sum, the Court found that Plaintiff did not make a plausible showing that the CAFA's jurisdictional bar had been met. The Court also concluded that it could not assess whether it must, irrespective of the jurisdictional minimum, decline to assert jurisdiction under the CAFA pursuant to the mandatory "local controversy" exception because Plaintiff failed to properly allege the citizenship of two Defendants and had not specified the citizenship of the proposed class. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's second amended complaint.

Enslin, et al. v. Coca-Cola, et al.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 49920 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 31, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging claims of breach of contract and unjust enrichment when he was a victim of fraud after Defendant discovered that an employee had removed laptop computers from the workplace containing personal information of some 74,000 employees. Id. at *2. Defendant moved for summary judgment and Plaintiff moved for partial summary judgment and class certification. Id. at *5-6. The Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment and denied Plaintiff's motions. Id. at*40. The Court rejected Defendant's assertion that Plaintiff's claims were preempted by collective bargaining agreements ("CBAs") pursuant to the Labor-Management Relations Act ("LMRA"). The Court ruled that because his claims did not substantially depend upon interpretation of the collective bargaining agreements, they were not preempted by the LMRA. Id. at *17. However, in granting Defendant's motion for summary judgment, the Court ruled that Defendant and Plaintiff had not entered into a contract, either express or implied, to safeguard his personal information. Id. at *40. The Court rejected Plaintiff's assertion that the agreement to safeguard Plaintiff's personal information was contained in three overlapping documents, including: (i) Plaintiff's employment application; (ii) Defendant's code of conduct; and (iii) Defendant's information technology policies. Id. at *33. The Court ruled that Defendant's information technology policies limited the scope of responsibilities to advising employees of personnel files, collecting data for employment purposes, and allowing employees and those authorized to access the personal information. Accordingly, Defendant did not take on additional responsibilities to safeguard the personal information. Id. at *34. Further, the "safeguarding company assets" clause in the code of conduct applied to employees' duties to keep Defendant's property safe and was an obligation on the part of employees and not of Defendant. Id. at *35. The Court also rejected the claim that there was an implied contract to safeguard information as Defendant's responsibilities were explicit in the code of conduct. Id. at *40. Accordingly, the Court granted summary judgment in Defendant's favor and denied the Plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment and for class certification. The Court also denied Plaintiff's motion to amend his complaint to add claims pursuant to the FLSA, the Pennsylvania Wage Payment and Collection Law, and the Drivers' Privacy Protection Act, ruling the motion to amend was untimely as fact and certification discovery had already closed. Id. at *43.

In Re Anthem, Inc. Data Breach Litigation,* Case No. 15-MD-2617 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of individuals subject to a data breach, filed a class action alleging that their personally identified information was leaked due to Defendant's conduct. The parties ultimately settled the matter after two years of litigation and Plaintiffs filed a motion for preliminary settlement approval. The Court granted the motion. The Court stated that it reviewed the proposed settlement agreement, Plaintiffs' motion papers and briefs, and counsel's declarations. Id. at 2. The Court determined that the settlement agreement appeared to be the result of good faith, informed, non-collusive negotiations conducted with the assistance of a former judge over the course of nearly three months. Id. The Court further observed that the settlement agreement was the result of more than two years of litigation, two rounds of motions to dismiss, extensive fact and expert discovery, and briefing on Plaintiffs' motion for class certification and the parties' motion to exclude expert testimony. Id. The Court found that the settlement agreement terms did not improperly grant preferential treatment to any individual or segment of the settlement class and fell within the range of possible approval as fair, reasonable and adequate. Id. The Court thereby granted Plaintiffs' preliminary approval to the settlement. The Court certified for purposes of settlement a class defined as "all individuals whose personal information as maintained on Anthem's Enterprise Data Warehouse and are in included in Anthem's Member Impact Database and/or received a notice relating to the data breach." Id. The Court found that the settlement class satisfied the requirements of Rule 23 (a) as: (i) it was comprised of approximately 79 million individuals; (ii) questions or law or fact were common to the settlement class; (iii) the representative class members' claims were typical of those in the settlement class; and (iv) the settlement class representatives would fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class. Id. at 2-3. The Court also determined that the settlement class satisfied the requirement of Rule 23(b)(3) because: (i) questions of law or fact common to the settlement class predominated over individual questions; and (ii) class action litigation was superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the matter. Id. at 3. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion.

In Re Barnes & Noble Pin Pad Litigation*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97161 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 3, 2016). Plaintiffs, a group of customers, brought a putative data breach class action after hackers obtained personal identifying information ("PII") belonging to Defendant's customers. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant failed to secure their personal financial data and failed to provide timely notice of the data breach. After the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' original complaint for lack of Article III standing, Plaintiffs filed a first amended complaint. Defendant moved to dismiss again and argued that Plaintiffs failed to adequately allege injury-in-fact for purposes of Article III standing. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs' allegations – that they incurred injuries in the course of protecting themselves from a substantial risk of fraudulent charges – were sufficient to establish Article III standing. The Court denied the motion to dismiss on the basis of lack of Article III standing. The Court, however, found that Plaintiffs had failed to state a claim for relief. Plaintiffs subsequently filed their second amended complaint, which Defendant again moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. Plaintiffs' original complaint alleged five causes of action, including: (i) breach of implied contract; (ii) violation of the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act ("ICFA"); (iii) invasion of privacy; (iv) violation of §§ 1798.80 of the California Civil Code; and (v) violation of California's Unfair Competition Act ("UCL"). Plaintiffs sought damages for unauthorized disclosure of their PII, loss of privacy, expenses incurred attempting to mitigate the increased risk of identity theft or fraud, time lost mitigating the increased risk of identity theft or fraud, an increased risk of identity theft, deprivation of the value of Plaintiffs' PII, and anxiety and emotional distress. Id. at *4. In their second amended complaint, Plaintiffs alleged that Plaintiff Dieffenbach's bank account was put on hold, that she could not use her debit card until a new one was delivered, that she had to spend time with police and bank employees, that she had to use minutes from her cell phone plan to speak with bank employees, that she lost the value of her PII, and that she suffered emotional distress. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs further alleged that Plaintiff Winstead lost the value of her PII, could not use her credit card until a new one was delivered, and had to renew her credit monitoring service to protect against any further fraud. In its prior decision, the Court dismissed the breach of contract, ICFA, invasion of privacy, and UCL claims because Plaintiffs failed to show that they had any redressable injuries. Id. at *5-6. Because Plaintiffs' § 1798 claim was predicated on the theory that that Defendant provided untimely notice of the security breach, the Court dismissed that claim for failure to plead causation between the alleged violation and any alleged injuries. Id. at *6. Defendant argued that the changes made in the second amended complaint still failed to address any of the Court's concerns and that, consequently, the second amended complaint should be dismissed. The Court had previously ruled that, in order to state a claim based upon breach of contract, the ICFA, or the UCL, Plaintiffs had to allege economic or out-of-pocket damages caused by the data breach. The Court found that Plaintiffs' alleged injuries to the value of their PII, their time spent with bank and police employees, and any emotional distress they might have suffered were not injuries sufficient to state a claim. Id. at *7. The Court further determined that Plaintiffs' temporary inability to use their bank accounts was also insufficient to state a claim, because the temporary inability to use a bank account was not a monetary injury in itself, and Plaintiffs had not set forth any allegations about how they suffered monetary injury due to the inconvenience of not being able to access their accounts. Id. at *7-8. As for Dieffenbach's allegations that she lost cell phone minutes in speaking to bank employees, the Court found that the cost was de minimis and too attenuated to Defendant's conduct to qualify as a redressable injury. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss with prejudice, and concluded that any further opportunities for amendment would be futile.

In Re Premera Blue Cross Customer Data Security Breach Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18322 (D. Ore. Feb. 9, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of healthcare consumers, brought a putative class action against Defendant alleging various state common law and statutory claims after Defendant disclosed that its computer network had been breached. Plaintiffs alleged that after discovering the breach, Defendant unreasonably delayed in notifying Plaintiffs. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' complaint on multiple grounds. The Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion to dismiss. Defendant moved to dismiss the affirmative misrepresentation claims on the grounds that the allegations of fraud did not "sound in fraud" as required by Rule 9(b). Plaintiffs argued that, because their misrepresentation claim was brought under the state Consumer Protection Act ("CPA") and merely alleged that the conduct was deceptive and unfair, it did not "sound in fraud" and was not subject to Rule 9(b). Defendant argued that the claims should be dismissed because there was no allegation that Plaintiffs read and relied upon the allegedly false or misleading statements and Plaintiffs, therefore, failed to allege causation. The Court rejected this argument and denied Defendant's motion, holding that, because the CPA's purpose was intended to ease the burden ordinarily applicable in cases of fraud, proof of reliance was not required. Plaintiffs further alleged that two of Defendant's policy booklets – the "preferred" and the "bronze" booklet – both contained affirmative misrepresentations. The Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss as to Defendant's preferred policy booklet. The preferred booklet stated, "[w]e protect your privacy by making sure your information stays confidential. We have a company confidentiality policy and we require all employees to sign it." Id. at *12. The Court found that this statement was a sufficiently specific representation and denied the motion to dismiss under Rule 9(b). The Court, however, dismissed Plaintiffs' fraud-based claims alleging active concealment and affirmative misrepresentations as to Defendant's bronze policy booklet. The bronze policy stated, "[t]o safeguard your privacy, we take care to ensure that your information remains confidential by having a company confidentiality policy and by requiring all employees to sign it." Id. at *12. The Court dismissed the claim because Plaintiffs failed to allege that Defendant did not have such a policy and that Defendant failed to require its employees to sign such policy. Finally, Defendant moved to dismiss claims of two named Plaintiffs on the basis that the claims were preempted by the Employee Retirement Income Security Act. The Court denied the motion finding that complete preemption did not apply in this case.

In Re SuperValu, Inc. Customer Data Security Breach Litigation*, 870 F.3d 763 (8th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs were a group of customers whose financial information was allegedly accessed and stolen following a data breach at Defendants' grocery stores. The District Court dismissed Plaintiffs' complaint under Rule 12(b)(1), concluding that Plaintiffs failed to allege facts establishing Article III standing. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded for further proceedings. Id. at 765. Plaintiffs asserted that hackers gained access to Defendants' network because Defendants failed to take adequate measures to protect customers' card information. As a result of the breaches, Plaintiffs' information was allegedly stolen, subjecting Plaintiffs "to an imminent and real possibility of identity theft." Id. Specifically, Plaintiffs contended that the hackers could use their card information to siphon money from their current accounts, make unauthorized credit or debit card charges, open new accounts, or sell the information to others who intended to commit fraud. Id. at 766-67. Plaintiff Holmes used his credit card at a store that was affected by the data breaches and alleged that he subsequently noticed a fraudulent charge on his credit card statement and immediately cancelled his credit card. Id. at 767. The District Court concluded that, because the complaint alleged only an "isolated single instance of an unauthorized charge" suffered by Plaintiff Holmes, there was insufficient evidence of misuse of Plaintiffs' card information connected to Defendants' data breaches to "plausibly suggest that the hackers had succeeded in stealing the data and were willing and able to use it for future theft or fraud." Id. On appeal, Plaintiffs argued that they sufficiently had alleged an injury-in-fact because the theft of their card information in the data breaches at Defendants' stores created a substantial risk that they would suffer identity theft in the future. In addition, Plaintiff Holmes specifically argued that his allegations of actual misuse of his card information were sufficient to allege a present injury-in-fact causally connected to Defendants' careless security practices. Id. at 768. The Eighth Circuit noted that the allegedly stolen card information did not include any personally identifying information, such as social security numbers, birth dates, or driver's license numbers, and did not plausibly support the contention that consumers affected by a data breach face a substantial risk of credit or debit card fraud. Although the complaint's allegations of future injury were insufficient, the Eighth Circuit found that Plaintiff Holmes had alleged a present injury-in-fact to support his standing. The misuse of Holmes' card information was credit card fraud and therefore a form of identity theft. Defendants challenged the sufficiency of Holmes' allegations, alleging that his theory of actual injury "is not properly before the Court because it is not alleged in the complaint." Id. at 772. Contrary to Defendants' contention, the Eighth Circuit explained that "it is unnecessary to set out a legal theory for Plaintiff's claim for relief" in his complaint. Id. Second, Defendants argued that Holmes had not sufficiently alleged that his injury was fairly traceable to Defendants' data breaches. The Eighth Circuit disagreed and found that Plaintiffs had stated a "causal connection" between the deficiencies in Defendants' security system and the theft and misuse of customers' card information. Id. The Eighth Circuit therefore concluded that the District Court erred in holding that Holmes' standing was dependent on the standing of other named Plaintiffs and unnamed class members, because standing must be assessed individually. Accordingly, because the complaint contained sufficient allegations to demonstrate that Holmes suffered an injury-in-fact, fairly traceable to Defendants' security practices, and likely to be redressed by a favorable judgment, Holmes had standing under Article III. The Eighth Circuit therefore affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded to the District Court for further proceedings.

Sackin, et al. v. Transperfect Global, Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 164933 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action against Defendant stemming from a data breach of Defendant's computer systems that disclosed Plaintiffs' sensitive personally identifiable information ("PII") to hackers. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs alleged five causes of action, including: (i) common law and statutory negligence; (ii) breach of express contract; (iii) breach of implied contract; (iv) unjust enrichment; and (v) violations of 203-d of the New York Labor Law ("NYLL"). Defendant filed a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1) and Rule 12(b)(6). The Court denied the Rule 12(b)(1) motion and granted the Rule 12(b)(6) motion in part by dismissing Plaintiffs' claim of breach of express contract. The Court found that Plaintiffs had standing because the complaint alleged that Plaintiffs reasonably incurred the cost identity theft prevention services after being subjected to the data breach. Plaintiffs thereby sufficiently alleged an injury-in-fact, both regarding the risk of identity theft and remedial measures taken after the data breach. As the allegations of the risk of identity theft and related mitigating expenses were sufficient to allege injury-in-fact and thereby confer standing, the Court concluded that it had subject-matter jurisdiction. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss based on Rule 12(b)(1). The Court explained that under New York law, in order to recover on a claim for negligence, a Plaintiff must show: (i) the existence of a duty on Defendant's part as to Plaintiff; (ii) a breach of this duty; and (iii) injury to a Plaintiff as a result thereof. Id. at *11. The Court held that Plaintiffs sufficiently alleged that Defendant breached a duty owed to Plaintiffs under both common law and negligence per se principles, and that Plaintiffs suffered injury as a result. Id. at *12. Further, the Court found that Plaintiffs' complaint alleged a cognizable legal duty, i.e., that Defendants had a duty to safeguard Plaintiffs' PII and the class members' PII. Id. at *13. Likewise, the Court determined that the complaint also sufficiently alleged that Defendant violated its duty to take reasonable steps to protect its employees' PII, thereby alleging a breach of a statutory duty. Id. at *14. The Court also explained that the NYLL makes it illegal for an employer to "communicate an employee's personal identifying information to the general public." Id. Accordingly, the Court determined that the NYLL claims could not be dismissed. As to breach of contract, the Court stated that under New York law, a breach of contract claim requires: (i) the existence of an agreement; (ii) adequate performance of the contract by Plaintiff; (iii) breach of contract by a Defendant; and (iv) damages." Id. at *16. The Court held that Plaintiffs failed to allege a sufficient claim for breach of express contract because they failed to allege any facts to support the conclusion that Defendant expressly contracted to protect employees' PII, and did not describe any express agreement to that effect Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the breach of express contract cause of action. However, the Court found that Plaintiffs' claim of unjust enrichment was sufficiently pled because Defendant received the benefits of Plaintiffs' labor, Defendant was enriched at Plaintiffs' expense when it chose to cut costs by not implementing security measures to protect Plaintiffs' PII, and it would be inequitable and unconscionable to allow Defendant to retain the money it saved by shirking data-security measures, while leaving Plaintiffs to suffer the consequences. Id. at *20-21. The Court therefore granted Defendant's motion as to the breach of express contract claims and denied it in all other respects.

Whalen, et al. v. Michael's Stores,* 689 Fed. App'x 89 (2d Cir. 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated § 349 of the New York General Business Law when her credit card information was exposed following at data breach of one of Defendant's stores. The District Court dismissed Plaintiff's claims for lack of standing, concluding that she had failed to allege a cognizable injury. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Plaintiff made purchases with her credit card at Defendant's store. Plaintiff's credit card was then used for payment to a gym in Ecuador for a charge of $398.16 and for payment to a concert ticket company in Ecuador for a charge of $1,320. Plaintiff subsequently cancelled her card. Plaintiff did not allege that any fraudulent charges were actually incurred on the card, or that, before the cancellation, she was in any way liable on account of these presentations. Id. at 90. Defendant subsequently issued a press release saying that there had been a possible data breach of its system, apparently involving theft of customers' credit card and debit card data. Id. After an investigation, Defendant confirmed the existence and scope of the data breach, and extended an offer of 12 months of identity protection and credit monitoring services to affected customers. The District Court held that the allegations in the complaint did not suffice to establish Article III standing for Plaintiff to pursue her claims, because she neither alleged that she incurred any actual charges on her credit card, nor that she had spent time or money monitoring her credit. Id. Plaintiff asserted: (i) her credit card information was stolen and used twice in attempted fraudulent purchases; (ii) she faced a risk of future identity fraud; and (iii) she had lost time and money resolving the attempted fraudulent charges and monitoring her credit. Id. The Second Circuit found that Plaintiff failed to allege a particularized and concrete injury suffered from the attempted fraudulent purchases, because she never was either asked to pay, nor did she pay, any fraudulent charge. Id. The Second Circuit further stated that Plaintiff did not allege how she could plausibly face a threat of future fraud, because her stolen credit card was promptly cancelled after the breach and no other personally identifying information was alleged to have been stolen. Id. at 91. Finally, the Second Circuit held that Plaintiff pled no specifics regarding any time or effort that she spent monitoring her credit. Id. Accordingly, the Second Circuit found that Plaintiff alleged no injury that would satisfy the constitutional standing requirements of Article III, and that the District Court did not err in dismissing her claims.

(xxi) Decertification Under Rule 23

Brodsky, et al. v. Humanadental Insurance Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 137608 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 28, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action alleging that Defendants improperly sent faxes in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). The Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification. After discovery, Defendant moved to decertify the class and to stay proceedings and Plaintiff moved for an order approving his proposed class notice. Id. at *2. The Court granted Defendant's motion to decertify the class and denied Plaintiff's motion as moot. After the Court certified the class, the Federal Communications Commission ("FCC") issued Defendant a retroactive waiver from the Solicited Fax Rule ("SFR"). A panel of judges in the D.C. Circuit in Bais Yaakov of Spring Valley v. FCC, 852 F.3d 1078, 1083 (D.C. Cir. 2017), struck down the FCC's SFR, which required both unsolicited and solicited faxes to include opt-out notices with certain language. Bais Yaakov held that the SFR was unlawful to the extent that it required opt-out notices on solicited faxes. Defendant contended that the waiver and the Bais Yaakov decision implicated additional individual questions that defeated superiority and predominance, and that Plaintiff's present class must be decertified. Id. at *11. The Court agreed and decertified the class. Id. at *20. The Court reasoned that because Plaintiff claim was that Defendant's faxes did not comply with the TCPA's opt-out notice requirement, this case theory was no longer viable because now the TCPA did not impose an opt-out notice requirement on solicited faxes, i.e., the obligation that was created by the SFR was no longer operable because of the waiver. The Court opined that for it to determine whether any putative member of the proposed class had a TCPA claim, the Court would be required to determine whether that proposed class member solicited the faxes it received. Accordingly, the Court held that individual consent issues defeated predominance and superiority, such that class treatment was no longer warranted under Rule 23. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to decertify the class and to stay proceedings. The Court also denied Plaintiff's motion for an order approving class notice as moot. Id. at *27.

In Re Processed Egg Products Antitrust Litigation*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 128549 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 14, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendants conspired to decrease the supply of eggs. Plaintiffs further alleged that this supply conspiracy limited, fixed, raised, stabilized, or maintained the price of eggs, which caused purchasers to pay more for eggs than they would have otherwise paid. Defendants filed a motion requesting the Court to reverse its decision certifying a class of shell egg direct purchasers. Defendants mounted three main challenges centered on purported limitations of the models by Plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Gordon Rausser, including that: (i) post-2008 data should not be included in Dr. Rausser's model because the Court's order cut the class period off at December 31, 2008; (ii) that there were alleged inconsistencies between Dr. Rausser's class reports and merits reports; and (iii) that Dr. Rausser failed to account for individual factors, thereby rendering his results meaningless. Id. at *10. The Court disagreed with Defendant, and declined to decertify the class. The Court stated that it had already addressed and dispensed of the majority of Defendants' arguments at various stages of the litigation. The Court noted that the only new issues was whether cutting off the class period on December 31, 2008 called into question its prior class certification order. Defendants also challenged the Court's prior finding that Plaintiffs satisfied Rule 23(b)'s predominance requirement. Id. at *11. Defendants asserted that applying an overcharge regression that incorporated post-2008 data to the class period provided a regression 3.6% lower between September 2000 and December 2008 than the benchmark period. Id. at *12. Defendants asserted that the "disappearance" of the overcharge from September 2000 to December 2008 demonstrated that Plaintiffs could no longer show that class members suffered an antitrust injury or damages using common proof. Id. Plaintiffs argued, and the Court agreed, that removing all post-2008 data from Dr. Rausser's model was unnecessary. When it set the class cut-off date, the Court recognized that "the UEP Certification program continued through 2013 and included the same types of instrumentalities as are alleged to have characterized the conspiracy pre-2008." Id. The Court therefore found that there was evidence for a jury to consider that the same allegedly conspiratorial conduct that occurred pre-2008 also occurred after 2008. Id. at *13. The Court stated that the basis on which it cut off the class period in 2008 was simply that Dr. Rausser's model could not parse out conduct that was legal in some states from conduct that was illegal in other states after 2008. Id. Defendant also asserted that the purported inconsistencies between Dr. Rausser's overcharge regression and his egg production model showed a disconnect between the impact and damages model and Plaintiffs' theory of the case, thereby undermining predominance. The Court opined that it had already accepted Dr. Rausser's overcharge regression and egg production modeling, and would not revisit any of its prior conclusions, particularly because these arguments could have been raised, or in some manner were raised, prior to the Court's order issuing class certification. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion for decertification.

Lambert, et al. v. Nutraceutical Corporation,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 17923 (9th Cir. Sept. 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of dietary supplement purchasers, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), False Advertising Law ("FAL"), and Consumer Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA"). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant falsely marketed its product as having beneficial health and aphrodisiac properties and being scientifically formulated to improve virility even though none of the ingredients in it provided such benefits. The Court previously certified a class based on Plaintiffs' proposal of calculating damages using a full-refund damages model theory that relied on Defendant's sales numbers and an average retail price for the supplement. Defendant argued that its sales data by itself could not be used to calculate damages under Plaintiffs' full refund model, and therefore moved for decertification of the class. The District Court agreed and granted Defendant's motion. Plaintiffs sought reconsideration and to appeal pursuant to Rule 23(f), and asserted that the District Court erred in not considering the alternative proposed damages model. The District Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration, finding that Plaintiffs' proposed alternative still did not remedy the inability to calculate restitution for damages. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed the District Court's ruling decertifying the class. Id. at *1. The Ninth Circuit found that the District Court abused its discretion in decertifying the class on the basis of Plaintiffs' inability to prove restitution damages because the damages model matched Plaintiffs' theory of liability, and Plaintiffs had shown that the damages model was supportable on evidence that could be introduced at trial. Id. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded the District Court's ruling decertifying the class.

Suchanek, et al. v. Sturm Foods, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 138016 (S.D. Ill. Aug. 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of coffee purchasers, filed a class action under the consumer protection statutes of eight states. Plaintiffs and Defendants moved to exclude the opposing parties' damages expert pursuant to Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993), and Rule 702 of the Federal Rules of Evidence. Defendants also moved to decertify the class. Id. at *2. The Court denied the parties' motions to exclude as well as Defendants' motion to decertify the class. First, Defendants challenged the reliability of the retail damages model and price premium model of Plaintiffs' experts. Id. at *13. The retail damages model, which provided consumers with a full refund of the purchase price of the coffee, was based on the notion that the product was worthless to consumers and that they would not have purchased the coffee if not for the deceptive packaging. Defendants argued that the retail damages model was legally and factually insufficient. The Court concluded that Defendants' criticisms regarding the retail damages model did not provide any grounds for finding the experts' opinion unreliable and inadmissible. Id. at *21. Likewise, the Court found that purported deficiencies that Defendant identified in the price premium model went to the weight and credibility of the expert's opinion, and not its admissibility. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to exclude Plaintiffs' expert report on damages. Id. As to Plaintiffs' motion to exclude, the Court determined that Plaintiffs failed to convince the Court that Defendants' expert's opinions and analysis were so unreliable that they were inadmissible under Daubert and Rule 702. Id. at *30. Consequently, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to exclude the expert's testimony. In their motion to decertify the class, Defendants challenged whether Plaintiffs satisfied Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement. Defendants asserted that neither of Plaintiffs' models was adequate for measuring damages on a class-wide basis because neither model provided a measure of damages attributable only to the alleged misconduct and that could be calculated on a class-wide basis. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs did not have a valid way to measure damages on a class-wide basis; therefore, individualized proof would be necessary to determine each class member's damages, and as a result, decertification was required. Id. at *41. At the outset, the Court noted that even if Defendants established that neither damages model was valid and Plaintiffs were left without a way to measure damages on a class-wide basis, decertification was still not required, as individualized assessments of damages did not preclude class certification entirely. Id. at *42. In sum, the Court concluded that the retail damages model and the price premium damages model were both acceptable methods for calculating damages across the entire class. Consequently, the Court held that the predominance requirement was satisfied and it denied Defendants' motion to decertify. Id. at *61.

(xxii) Default Judgments In Class Actions

Hancock, et al. v. A&R Flag Car Service,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 136187 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 24, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, filed collective and class action against Defendants for unpaid overtime compensation, unpaid minimum wage compensation, and unlawful deductions, alleging violations of the FLSA, the Pennsylvania Minimum Wage Act ("PMWA"), the Pennsylvania Wage Payment and Collection Law ("PWPCL"), and Pennsylvania's common law. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs operated what are called "flag cars" that "escorted" over-sized wide load trucks on the highway. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs asserted that they regularly worked more than 40 hours per week and were paid $0.85 per mile for the miles that they drove while escorting oversized loads, $10 per hour for time spent sitting during delays, and approximately $25 and $55 per day for trips which required them to stay overnight in motels. Id. Plaintiffs filed the action on November 13, 2013. A summons was returned and filed on January 2, 2014, indicating that service had been accepted by authorized agent John Flagler on behalf of Defendant A&R. A summons was returned and filed on January 2, 2014, indicating that Defendant Flagler had been personally served on December 19, 2013. Id. at *3. Rule 12(a)(1)(A)(i) required Defendant to file a responsive pleading with the Court within 21 days after being served with the summons and complaint, i.e., by January 9, 2014. Id. at *3-4. On February 4, 2014, because Defendants did not file an answer, Plaintiffs requested the Clerk of Court to enter a default against Defendants pursuant to Rule 55(a). Id. at *4. Plaintiffs subsequently filed an application for default judgment against Defendants pursuant to Rule 55(b). The Court ordered Defendants to show cause on or before June 16, 2014, as to why the Court should not grant the relief sought in Plaintiffs' application. Defendants did not respond, and the Court entered a default judgment in favor of Plaintiffs for an amount of $70,894.20. Plaintiffs filed a motion to compel post-judgment discovery, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs also filed a motion for sanctions against Defendants for failure to comply with the Court's order. Defendants did not respond and the Court ultimately granted Plaintiffs' motion for sanctions, and found Defendants to be in contempt for failure to comply with its order. Id. at *5-6. The Court ordered Defendants to pay attorneys' fees and costs of $1,125 to Plaintiffs on October 26, 2015, and to provide full, complete, and verified responses to Plaintiffs' discovery. Subsequently, Plaintiffs filed a second motion for sanctions, asking that the Court issue a bench warrant for the arrest of Defendant Flagler as president of Defendant A&R, which the Court denied. Id. at *6. Almost two months later, defense counsel entered his appearance on behalf of Defendants, filed a motion to set aside the default judgment against Defendants, and also filed a response to Plaintiffs' second motion for sanctions. Id. at *6-7. The Court stated that Defendants repeatedly chose to forgo participation in the action and failed to submit responsive pleadings to Plaintiffs' complaint and motions, ignored several orders of the Court, and refused to participate in post-judgment discovery. Id. at *16-17. The Court held that Defendants willfully disregarded repeated communications from Plaintiffs and the Court, and acted in bad faith and with callous disregard of their responsibility to defend the action. The Court found that Defendants were given many opportunities to respond to Plaintiffs, and to come to Court to show cause why a default judgment should not be entered against them, and why they should not be held in contempt. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to set aside and vacate the entry of a default judgment.

(xxiii) Discovery Issues In Class Actions

Broyles, et al. v. Convergent Outsourcing, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 79151 (W.D. Wash. May 23, 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, alleged that Defendant accessed her credit report, despite knowing that her debts had been discharged in bankruptcy, in violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Plaintiff sent Defendant a deposition notice communicating her intent to depose its in-house counsel and litigation support specialist. Defendant moved to quash Plaintiff's notice of deposition and requested a protective order precluding the depositions of the identified individuals. Plaintiff moved to compel discovery and for Defendant to provide additional information in response to interrogatories, requests for admission ("RFAs"), and requests for production of documents ("RFPs"). Id. at *3. Plaintiff contended that deposing Defendant's in-house counsel, Timothy Collins, was necessary because he anticipated that Defendant would raise an "advice of counsel" defense. Id. at *4. The Court disagreed and found that, as Defendant noted in its response, it neither pled advice of counsel as an affirmative defense nor otherwise put the defense at issue. Therefore, the Court held that Plaintiff's speculation that Defendant might raise the defense was an insufficient basis for permitting a deposition of Collins about the advice he rendered to his client, particularly given the plainly privileged nature of that advice. Id. at *5. Plaintiff's primary argument for deposing Defendant's litigation support specialist, Alisia Stephens, was that she waived attorney-client privilege through discussions with Plaintiff's counsel. The Court stated that, even if this contention had merit, Plaintiff must show that the information in Stephens' possession was unattainable elsewhere and that the information was crucial to her case. Because Plaintiff failed to do so, the Court also granted Defendant's motion to quash the deposition notice and request for a protective order. Id. at *6. As to Plaintiff's motion to compel, as a threshold matter, Plaintiff contended that Defendant objected on the basis of privilege, yet failed to produce a privilege log. Id. at *7. Having reviewed Defendant's responses to Plaintiff's discovery requests, the Court found that Defendant withheld information on the basis of privilege. Accordingly, the Court ordered Defendant to either produce a privilege log that complied with Rule 26 or withdraw its objections. Id. at *8. Plaintiff also moved to compel information through broader responses to interrogatories, RFAs, and RFPs. Defendant contended that it need not comply with this discovery because Plaintiff failed to make a prima facie showing under Rule 23. The Court noted that Plaintiff alleged that her proposed class consisted of "at least thousands of members," that the class was united by the common issue of Defendant obtaining a class member's consumer report despite knowing that the class member's debt had been extinguished, that the claims were typical across the class, and that the class action procedure was adequate because her interests were aligned with those of the class members. Id. at *10. The Court found that Plaintiff's allegations were sufficient to state a prima facie showing under Rule 23. Accordingly, the Court concluded that limited pre-certification discovery was warranted and it denied in part and granted in part Plaintiff's motion to compel. Specifically, the Court limited the overbroad categories and requests that asked for personal information of class members' bankruptcy proceedings, and it granted the motion to compel as to issues relevant to class certification.

City Of Pontiac General Employees' Retirement Systems v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., et al.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 72516 (W.D. Ark. May 11, 2017). Plaintiff, an investor, brought a putative securities fraud class action against Defendants based on a media report, according to which certain company officials at Wal-Mart's Mexican subsidiary allegedly paid bribes to obtain permits for new stores in Mexico. Plaintiff issued a deposition notice for C. Douglas McMillon, Wal-Mart's President and Chief Executive Officer. Ten days before the deposition was to take place, Defendant filed a motion seeking a protective order prohibiting the deposition of McMillon. Defendant asserted that deposing McMillon would create an undue burden on him by running afoul of the "apex doctrine" applicable to senior officials' depositions. Id. at *1. The Court noted that the apex doctrine has been discussed in case authorities in Arkansas when resolving discovery disputes, but there was no controlling authority that directed the Court on how to apply the doctrine. The Court explained that the apex doctrine "protects high-level corporate officials from deposition unless: (i) the executive has unique or special knowledge of the facts at issue; and (ii) other less burdensome avenues for obtaining the information sought have been exhausted." Id. at *2. The Court recognized that taking the deposition of a high-level corporate executive has the potential for abuse, and it must balance the competing interests of allowing discovery and protecting the parties and deponents from undue burden." Id. at *4. The Court stated that McMillon had certified the accuracy and completeness of statements describing on-going investigative activities and risk assessment related to the alleged bribery scheme. Id. at *5. McMillon was one of only four individuals who had signed certifications related to the alleged bribery scheme. McMillon was listed by Wal-Mart as a custodian whose records were likely to contain documents relevant to this case. Wal-Mart also identified McMillon as an employee who received or provided information, documents, and other input regarding the statements at issue in this case. McMillon sent or received over 100 different communications about the article published in The New York Times, the Mexican government's potential responses to bribery allegations in Mexico, and Wal-Mart's public statement concerning the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act in Mexico. Given McMillon's direct and personal involvement in the acts and issues in this case, the Court held that McMillon had unique knowledge of relevant issues in the litigation. Id. at *6. Moreover, the Court stated that Defendant provided no support for a finding of undue burden. Id. at *7. Additionally, the Court noted that Plaintiff offered to minimize the inconvenience to McMillon by limiting the allotted time for the deposition and scheduling the deposition at a time and place that was most convenient for McMillon. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's request for a protective order.

Craft v. S.C. State Plastering, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4510 (D.S.C. Jan. 12, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendant caused construction defects when building new houses in its Sun City development. Defendants served subpoenas seeking production of documents and recordings related to town hall meetings that Plaintiffs' counsel conducted in advance of litigation. Plaintiffs move to quash the subpoenas on the grounds that, with the exception of two PowerPoint presentations, the requested materials did not exist. As for the presentations, Plaintiffs asserted that their counsel prepared them for the express purpose of giving legal advice to individuals seeking to become class members and were therefore protected by attorney-client privilege. Additionally, Plaintiffs claimed that the presentations were covered by the work-product doctrine because they were prepared in anticipation of related state court litigation. Id. at *3. Defendants disagreed about the existence of the requested materials and about whether any privilege applied to them. As to the missing materials, the Court stated that Plaintiffs were strongly encouraged to thoroughly search for the requested materials and for information that could lead to those materials. Id. at *4. As for whether the two existing presentations were privileged or protected, Defendants argued that Plaintiffs' counsel gave presentations at town hall meetings that were expressly open to the public and to the media. Because those meetings and their website were open to the public, Defendants contended that the requested materials could not be attorney-client privileged or protected under the work product doctrine. Id. Based on the evidence Defendants presented about the meetings, as well as the paucity of evidence to the contrary presented by Plaintiffs, the Court opined that the presentations were not communicated in confidence, and therefore were not protected by the attorney-client privilege. Id. at *5. Further, the Court stated that assuming, without deciding, that the presentations were subject to work product protection, any work product protection was waived when Plaintiffs' counsel decided to give the presentations at meetings that were open to the public. Id. at *6-7. The Court found that the public nature of the meetings, and the media attention paid to them, created a significant likelihood that Defendants might obtain the presentations, thereby waiving work product protection. Id. at *7. Moreover, Defendants informed the Court that they were permitted to send a court reporter to one of the meetings at which Plaintiffs' counsel made the presentations. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that any work product protection applicable to the presentations previously had been waived. The Court therefore denied Plaintiffs' motion to quash Defendant's subpoenas.

D'Apuzzo, et al. v. United States*, Case No. 16-CV-62769 (S.D. Fla. April 11, 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, asserted that the Public Access to Court Electronic Records ("PACER") system charged users to access written opinions that should be free of charge pursuant to PACER's fee schedule. Defendant moved to stay discovery pending the Court's decision on Defendant's motion to dismiss. The Court granted the motion to stay. Defendant argued that it raised several facial challenges to Plaintiff's complaint and that discovery would be overly burdensome and costly. Id. at 1. Defendant asserted that discovery would inevitably entail a determination of whether PACER's system included written opinions that had not been classified as such and whether users had been charged for access to those misclassified documents. Id. Defendant submitted an affidavit of Wendall Skidgel, Jr. the Senior Attorney for the Administrative Office of the United States Courts ("AO"). Skidgel averred that the AO would have to develop software to search the "hundreds of millions of pages" to locate documents that might constitute written opinions. Id. Skidgel stated that the AO then would need to develop software that could match those records against the "2.2 to 2.4 billion PACER billing transaction records" to determine whether PACER users incurred charges for the documents. Id. Skidgel estimated that the analysis could cost in excess of $500,000. Id. at 2. Plaintiff did not provide any affidavits in response and stated that Defendant could respond to interrogatories or requests for admission in lieu of document production. Id. The Court, however, noted that Plaintiff failed to explain how Defendant could accurately and truthfully answer interrogatories or requests for admission without first conducting the database research. Id. The Court, therefore, found that Defendant made a specific and unrefuted showing that it would suffer prejudice and undue burden should discovery proceed. The Court, therefore, granted Defendant's motion to stay discovery pending the Court's decision on the motion to dismiss.

Hapka, et al. v. CareCentrix, Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 113824 (D. Kan. Aug. 7, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action asserting a claim for common law negligence. Plaintiff alleged that wage and tax statements belonging to her and other employees of Defendant were stolen from Defendant by an unknown third-party. Plaintiff contended that Defendant "owed a duty to Plaintiff and the class to exercise reasonable care in obtaining, securing, safeguarding, deleting and protecting Plaintiff and class members' personal and tax information within its control from being compromised, lost, stolen, accessed and misused by unauthorized persons." Id. at *1-2. A fraudulent tax return was subsequently filed in Plaintiff's name. Plaintiff, therefore, further contended that she continued to be at a heightened risk for tax fraud and identity theft. Id. at *2. The Court had previously denied Defendant's motion to dismiss, finding that Plaintiff had sufficiently plead duty, breach, and causation. Id. Defendant requested permission to send a questionnaire to putative class members. Plaintiff contended that the questionnaire was misleading and would result in unfair prejudice. At the outset, the Court noted that discovery requests to absent class members were "generally disfavored." Id. at *3. In considering the propriety of such requests, Courts look to whether the information sought is necessary for trial preparation and whether the discovery requests made to class members were designed to be a tactic to take undue advantage of or otherwise limit the number of class members. Id. Defendant contended that, in order to test Plaintiff's claim that her experiences were substantially similar to those of a large class of people, it must first know what that class of people experienced. Id. Defendant also argued that, while Plaintiff feared an increased risk of encountering some unknown problem sometime in the future as a result of the identity theft, it needed to determine whether anyone else in the class shared Plaintiff's fear. Id. Plaintiff responded that "such an individualized damages inquiry was unnecessary and irrelevant to a trial of class-wide issues," particularly where Plaintiff intended "to show class-wide injury through the use of expert testimony." Id. at *4. Defendant asserted that it must be allowed to conduct discovery into whether the injuries and damages suffered by putative class members were similar to that suffered by the proposed class. Id. at *4-5. The Court held that Defendant's contention that it was "necessary" to take discovery at this stage in the proceedings regarding the damages of all putative class members was unfounded. Id. at *5. The Court ruled that Defendant failed to establish the necessity of receiving the requested information, particularly at this stage of the proceedings. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion.

Hardy, et al. v. Equitable Life Assurance Society Of The United States*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 10600 (2d Cir. June 15, 2017). Interveners Time, Inc. ("Time") and the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press appealed an order from the District Court denying their request to unseal several documents on the docket of a class action. Id. at *1. On appeal, the Second Circuit vacated the order of the District Court and remanded so it could balance the presumptions of public access to court documents against countervailing interests. Id. at *1-2. In 1983, a member of a demolition-workers union filed a class action against various parties involved in demolishing the Bonwit Teller building. In 1998, the class members settled with various Defendants, and the District Court approved the settlement. Id. at *2. The District Court sealed four documents, including: (i) a transcript of a conference on October 26, 1998; (ii) Plaintiffs' brief filed on November 9, 1998; (iii) the District Court's order approving the settlement dated December 30, 1998; and (iv) the District Court's order approving the settlement dated February 9, 1999. Id. The Second Circuit noted that two of the documents requested to be unsealed – the transcript and the brief – had been destroyed pursuant to the District Court's standard document retention policies, and, therefore, it refrained from ruling on the unsealing request as it pertained to those documents. Id. The Second Circuit explained that both the common law and the First Amendment created presumptions that certain types of documents should be publicly available. The Second Circuit opined that both applied to the two District Court orders but that the presumptions of access did not automatically mean that the documents should be unsealed. Id. at *3. The Second Circuit therefore remanded the case to the District Court for a determination as to whether countervailing interests overcame the two presumptions. Id. The Second Circuit held that the common law presumption of access attaches to "judicial documents," and judicial documents are those that are "relevant to the performance of the judicial function and useful in the judicial process." Id. The Second Circuit concluded that the District Court's orders in this case were judicial documents, and that the common law presumption therefore attached. Id. at *3-4. The Second Circuit stated that the next analytical step would be to determine the strength of the presumption as it applied to these documents. The Second Circuit held that interests such as protection of on-going investigations, safety of witnesses, national security, and trade secrets may be sufficient to defeat the presumption, and it would leave it for the District Court to identify any interest in favor of secrecy sufficient to defeat the presumption that court orders be open to the public. Id. at *4. The Second Circuit noted that the First Amendment also created a presumption of public access that likewise attached to the District Court's orders; however, it also may be overcome by competing values. On remand, the Second Circuit directed the District Court to consider whether any interests could overcome the common law and First Amendment presumptions of access to the two District Court orders. Id. The Second Circuit further instructed that any decision that the documents should remain sealed must be supported by "specific, on the record findings" and must explain why sealing was "essential to preserve higher values and is narrowly tailored to serve that interest." Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Second Circuit vacated the District Court's order and remanded for further proceedings.

In Re Anthem Inc. Data Breach Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23486 (D.D.C. Feb. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a multi-district consolidated class action against Defendant, a health insurance provider and its affiliates, after the sensitive information of 80 million customers was compromised. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant: (i) failed to adequately protect its data systems; (ii) failed to disclose to customers that it did not have adequate security practices; and (iii) failed to timely notify customers of the data breach. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs subpoenaed documents from the United States Office of Personnel Management ("OPM"), the agency responsible for negotiating and administering the federal government's health insurance contracts with Defendant. Id. at *2. The subpoenaed records related to audits of Defendant's informational technology systems that the OPM conducted before and after the cyberattack. The OPM released a portion of the documents requested, but withheld audit work papers, meeting write-ups, and emails on the basis that they were privileged under the deliberative process and/or law enforcement privileges. Id. Plaintiffs filed a motion to compel the OPM to disclose the withheld records. Id. The Court granted the motion in part and denied it in part. After an in-camera review of the documents, the Court held that most of the withheld documents were protected by the deliberative process privilege, and some of the documents contained only factual information, and therefore were not protected under either privilege. Id. at *3. The Court concluded that all withheld emails were subject to the deliberative process privilege because they were pre-decisional and deliberative. Id. at *17. The emails encompassed a wide range of suggestions, opinions, productive disagreements, and preliminary conclusions involving revisions to the OPM's standard federal contracts and recommendations for modifications to Defendant's contract that were uniformly deliberative. The Court further determined that only a portion of the audit work papers and meeting write-ups were subject to the deliberative process privilege. Id. at *17. The Court ruled that two reports, which contained only factual information, were not deliberative and, therefore, were not protected by the privilege. However, the Court agreed with the OPM that Plaintiffs did not sufficiently establish that their need to use the documents protected by the deliberative process privilege outweighed the government's interests in withholding those documents. Accordingly, the Court determined that the OPM was not required to produce those privileged documents. Because the Court concluded that several audit work papers, two meeting write-ups, and portions of three other meeting write-ups were not subject to the deliberative process privilege, the Court considered the OPM's secondary argument that those materials were protected from disclosure under the law enforcement privilege. Plaintiffs maintained that the privilege did not apply to the audit work papers and meeting write-ups because the materials were not created for and did not otherwise relate to an on-going criminal investigation. Id. at *32. The Court ruled that, even assuming the law enforcement privilege applied, the balance of interests warranted disclosure because the work papers and meeting write-ups did not pertain to an on-going criminal or civil investigation. Id. at *33. In sum, the Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' motion to compel. Id. at *36.

In Re Broiler Chicken Antitrust Litigation*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73219 (N.D. Ill. April 21, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a motion to compel and a request for leave to issue preservation subpoenas to halt destruction of critical data by non-parties. Plaintiffs asked the Court to: (i) grant leave for the End-User Plaintiffs to serve document preservation subpoenas on some of Defendants' customers; and (ii) order Defendants to produce certain information to the End-User Plaintiffs that they needed to prepare and serve the subpoenas. Id. at *13. The Court denied the motion without prejudice. The End-User Plaintiffs sought leave to serve hundreds or more of Defendants' customers with document preservation subpoenas that required preservation of large amounts of transaction-level data for potentially thousands of products spanning roughly a decade. Plaintiffs further requested Defendants to produce: "for each year, each of your customer's names, phone number(s), and address(es); the UPC, SKU, product number, or other unique purchaser-specific identifier, and associated product description for each type of Broiler sold to each customer, and respective unit sales to each customer."

Id. at *14. Defendants argued that producing the information and allowing the End-User Plaintiffs to serve document preservation subpoenas on their customers would be extremely burdensome on them and their customers, and would likely require the disclosure of confidential information about their businesses and their customers. Id. at *15. The Court stated that it did not find the End-User Plaintiffs' broad requests proportional to the needs of the case and consistent with efficiency and judicial economy. Id. at *18. As an initial matter, the Court explained that Defendants had filed motions to dismiss and, although the Court could deny those motions in their entirety, if those motions were granted in their entirety, the discovery that the End-User Plaintiffs ultimately requested from Defendants' customers would be moot. Id. at *19. Further, even if the motions were granted only in part, the Court's ruling still could limit the scope of the case in terms of the claims asserted, the years involved, the states covered, the products implicated, and the number of Defendants remaining in the case. Further, the Court was not convinced that, even if the motions to dismiss did not narrow the case, the End-User Plaintiffs had sufficiently shown that there was a substantial risk that Defendants' customers would destroy information necessary to their case before the Court ruled on Defendants' motions to dismiss or that the risk that would occur outweighed the burden on Defendants and the third-parties presented by Plaintiffs' very broad early discovery requests and the broad subpoenas they proposed to serve on third-parties. Id. at *21. Accordingly, the Court held that, although there may be a need to increase the likelihood that relevant information in the hands of Defendants' customers was not destroyed before formal discovery began, the End-User Plaintiffs had not carried their burden to show that the broad document preservation subpoenas that they wanted to serve were proportional to the needs of the case and consistent with judicial efficiency and economy. Id. at *29. Accordingly, the Court denied the End-User Plaintiffs' motion to compel.

In Re Cook Medical Inc. Filters, Marketing, Sales Practices & Products Liability Litigation*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 149915 (N.D. Ind. Sept. 15, 2017). In a products liability action regarding an implanted filter, Plaintiff sought damages including pain and suffering, loss of enjoyment of life, and continuing medical care. The matter was part of a larger MDL and the first bellweather trial set. Defendants filed a motion to compel several discovery items. Defendants sought as a sanction a blanket waiver of objections to their first interrogatories and first requests for production due to Plaintiff's delayed response and failure to produce a privilege log. Id. at *2-3. The Court found that a waiver of all objections was not warranted because waiver of all objection is generally reserved as a sanction only for unjustified delays. In this instance, the Court determined that Plaintiff's delay was only 11 days and was caused in part by office closures due to a hurricane. The Court held that under these circumstances, such a harsh sanction would be unjust. Id. at *3. The Court further determined that the lack of a privilege log did not justify waiver of all privileges. The Court stated that a blanket waiver is not an appropriate sanction when the party seeking protection makes a good faith showing that the requested material is privileged. Defendants also moved for an order to compel responses and a privilege log for interrogatory numbers eight and 20 and requests for production numbers two, 12, 20, 27-30, and 37, which covered various topics. Plaintiff objected on privilege grounds and contended that she did not provide responses or a privilege log for those discovery requests because they were so broad that Plaintiff could not tell what Defendants wanted, and that they would require Plaintiff to log everything. The Court found that Plaintiff's assertion that Defendants made providing a privilege log impossible by defining "you" to include Plaintiff, her attorneys, and her representatives was not persuasive because half of the interrogatories and requests in question did not contain the word "you." Id. at *4. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff must respond to Defendants' interrogatories and requests for production and provide a privilege log within 14 days. Finally, the Court limited the requests as to Plaintiff's social media postings and ruled that Plaintiff need not turn over any screen shots of private social media pages. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendants' motion to compel.

In Re Volkswagen "Clean Diesel" Marketing, Sales Practices, & Products Liability Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 150427 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 15, 2017). In this multi-district class action litigation, Plaintiffs – a group of consumers, dealers, securities purchasers, and government agencies – alleged that Volkswagen used software designed to cheat emissions tests and deceive federal and state regulators in nearly 600,000 Volkswagen, Porsche, and Audi-branded turbocharged direct injection ("TDI") diesel engine vehicles sold in the United States. Shortly after the litigation began, the parties, including Volkswagen and the U.S. Department of Justice, agreed to the terms of a stipulated protective order, which facilitated the production of confidential and highly confidential discovery material ("protected material.") Id. at *303. Volkswagen then shared nearly 25 million pages of documents with the DOJ (the "discovery material"), and the DOJ used those documents to prosecute claims against Volkswagen based on the emissions fraud. The DOJ also shared these documents with its Civil Division, which investigated whether Volkswagen violated certain U.S. customs laws and other federal laws. Id. at *304. Counsel for the DOJ then informed Volkswagen that the Civil Division intended to provide the discovery material to a German law firm ("GSK") to use in the German securities action against Volkswagen, and that GSK might file some of the discovery material with the German court overseeing that litigation. Id. Volkswagen argued that the protective order did not authorize the Civil Division to share the discovery material with GSK. Id. at *305. The Court found that the default rule under the protective order was that discovery material could not be disclosed to counsel who planned to use the material in foreign litigation against Volkswagen. Id. The Court opined that Volkswagen's participation in the MDL proceeding did not obligate it to produce discovery in other proceedings, let alone foreign proceedings. The DOJ argued that the Civil Division obtained discovery material by following the procedures laid out, as Volkswagen originally provided the discovery material to the DOJ, counsel for the DOJ then notified Volkswagen that it intended to share the material with the Civil Division pursuant to § 13.7. Id. at *309. The Civil Division asserted that it therefore had authority to share the discovery material with GSK pursuant to § 13.7, because by doing so it would be "using that material in accordance with the agency's applicable statutes, rules and regulations." Id. at *310. The Court noted that nothing in § 13.7 directly addressed disclosure to foreign counsel. Id. at *313. The Court stated that it was clear that the parties contemplated that the protective order did not permit the discovery material to be disclosed to Plaintiffs in domestic securities actions. Id. at *314. As a result, the Court determined that it seemed almost inconceivable that Volkswagen would have been willing to permit the discovery material to be used by Plaintiffs in foreign securities litigation. The Court concluded that if the DOJ and Volkswagen had intended for the United States to be able to use the MDL discovery material in any proceeding – foreign or domestic – they easily could have said so. Id. at *315. The Court accordingly found that it was clear parties did not mutually intend for the order to permit the DOJ to share discovery material with foreign counsel in securities litigation against Volkswagen in Germany. Accordingly, the Court denied the DOJ's motion.

In Re Volkswagen "Clean Diesel" Marketing, Sales Practices & Products Liability Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173165 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 18, 2017). In this multi-district class action litigation, Plaintiffs – a group of consumers, dealers, securities purchasers, and government agencies – alleged that Volkswagen used software designed to cheat emissions tests and deceive federal and state regulators in nearly 600,000 Volkswagen, Porsche, and Audi-branded turbocharged direct injection ("TDI") diesel engine vehicles sold in the United States. Volkswagen subsequently settled the emissions-fraud claims brought by a consolidated class of consumers. Id. at *669. In litigating those claims, Volkswagen produced more than 20 million pages of documents with class counsel ("MDL Production"). Plaintiffs in on-going shareholder litigation against Volkswagen ("ADR Plaintiffs") sought access to the entire MDL Production. Id. Volkswagen refused, and ADR Plaintiffs sought an order to compel Volkswagen to make the MDL Production available. The Court denied the motion to compel. The Court noted that the size of the MDL Production was substantial and although it might include documents relevant to whether Volkswagen violated federal securities laws, the repository also included irrelevant documents. Id. at *670. The Court found that the ADR Plaintiffs must comply with Rule 34(b) and serve Volkswagen with requests for production. The Court also determined that Volkswagen must then produce the requested documents or "state with specificity the groups for objecting to the request." Id. The Court concluded that the ADR Plaintiffs were not entitled to complete access of the MDL Production simply because there may be an overlap between their claims and those in the consolidated consumer class action. Accordingly, the Court denied the ADR Plaintiff's motion to compel.

Mann, et al. v. City Of Chicago*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 146029 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 8, 2017). Plaintiffs sued Chicago police officers and the City of Chicago (the "City") alleging that Defendants wrongfully arrested, detained, and prosecuted them and that they were abused at the Chicago Police Department's ("CPD") "off the books" detention center located at the intersection of South Homan Street and West Filmore Avenue in Chicago ("Homan Square"). Id. at *2. Plaintiffs filed a motion to compel Defendants to include certain custodians from the Mayor's office in their email search, including Mayor Emanuel and ten members of his senior staff. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs' request was burdensome and that Plaintiffs failed to provide any grounds to believe that the proposed custodians were involved with the CPD's policies and practices at Homan Square. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs argued that communications within, from, and to the Mayor's Office regarding Homan Square were relevant to the issues of notice, ratification, cover-up, and deliberate indifference. Id. at *7. In light of the allegations in the complaint, the Court agreed that these communications were relevant for purposes of discovery. The City argued that Plaintiffs' request for additional custodians lacked a "factual basis." Id. at *8. The City specifically took issue with Plaintiffs' assertion that the Mayor was a "policy-maker" for the City. Id. The City asserted that Plaintiffs "do not contend that the Mayor or his aides created or influenced any CPD policies at Homan Square" and Plaintiffs' only attempt to link the Mayor to Homan Square was a "double hearsay statement" in an April 2015 newspaper article which the Plaintiffs had "no evidence to support." Id. The Court determined that the City's arguments imposed too high a burden on Plaintiffs. On summary judgment or at trial, Plaintiffs would have to provide evidence that "the unlawful practice was so pervasive that acquiescence on the part of policy-makers was apparent and amounted to a policy decision" or that a policy-making official responsible for final government policy on the police practices at issue directed the particular conduct that caused Plaintiffs' harm. Id. at *9. However, the Court opined that, at this stage of discovery, Plaintiffs did not have to establish that the Mayor was a policy-maker or had final authority on the police practices at issue or that there was a "nexus" between the custodians of the emails and CPD's alleged activities at Homan Square. Id. at *10. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs did not have to provide evidence of the Mayor's connection to Homan Square in order to get discovery potentially showing (or not showing) the Mayor's connection or his staff's connection to Homan Square. Id. at *12. The Court held that Plaintiffs were entitled to discover, among other things, whether the Mayor or his high ranking staff made non-public statements or were involved in non-public communications about Homan Square. The City argued that it would be "burdened with the time and expense of searching the email boxes of nine additional custodians." Id. at *14. However, the Court found that the City did not offer any specifics or even a rough estimate about the burden. The Court stated that it was mindful that every additional custodian increased the risk of duplication of emails and the time and resources necessary to review emails. Therefore, the Court rejected Plaintiffs' request for the emails of Forest Claypool, Adam Collins, Joan Coogan, and Eileen Mitchell because of their short tenure. Id. at *16. However, the Court ordered Defendants to include Mayor Rahm Emanuel, Joe Deal, Kelly Quinn, Lisa Schrader, and Shannon Breymaier as custodians in their email search.

Palombaro, et al. v. Emery Federal Credit Union*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6365 (S.D. Ohio Jan. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated that Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act ("RESPA") by receiving cash and/or sham marketing services for referrals of business to Genuine Title, LLC, a title services company. Defendant moved to compel Plaintiffs' responses to several interrogatories, and the Court granted the motion in part. First, Defendant argued that several Plaintiffs waived all objections to the interrogatories by failing to serve timely objections to them. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs argued that the delay in serving discovery responses should be excused because Plaintiffs made good faith attempts at compliance and provided their responses timely or within one week. Further, Plaintiffs asserted that the delay was minor and the delayed responses were "nearly identical" to those that were timely. Id. at *9. The Court determined that Plaintiffs' delay in responding was minimal as all objections were filed within one week of the deadline. The Court opined that the delay constituted only a minor technical violation of the discovery rules and did not justify waiver of the objections in this case. The Court further found that Plaintiffs had advised Defendant before the deadline expired that they were finalizing their answers and would provide them to Defendant "promptly upon their receipt." Id. at *12. Finally, the Court held that Plaintiffs' objections raised serious issues implicating the attorney work product doctrine in answering Defendant's interrogatories, and it would therefore be inequitable to waive Plaintiffs' objections. Id. at *12-13. Based on the foregoing, the Court declined to find that Plaintiffs waived their objections to the interrogatories. As to Defendant's motion to compel interrogatories 11, 12, and 13, the Court found that Plaintiffs' objections under the work-product doctrine were well-taken. The Court stated that Rule 26(b)(3) provides work-product protection to documents and tangible things prepared in anticipation of litigation or for trial by or for an attorney. Id. at *17. The Court stated that Defendant requested Plaintiffs to describe how they planned to "establish" that alleged referral payments and fee-splitting payments would be tied to each putative class member for purposes of the anticipated class certification motion, and how they planned to "ascertain" the diligence taken by each putative class member to investigate their RESPA claims. Id. at *20. The Court found that Defendant's questions did not seek underlying facts that would shed light on the class certification issues, but rather were focused on Plaintiffs' legal strategy. Therefore, the Court denied Defendant's motion to compel as to interrogatories 11, 12, and 13. In interrogatory 15, Defendant asked Plaintiffs to describe "the putative class you seek to represent," including whether the putative class included individuals who: (i) are currently aware of their alleged rights to prosecute a claim against Defendant; (ii) received a communication from Plaintiffs' counsel; (iii) were not referred to Genuine Title; or (iv) were referred to Genuine Title by an employee of Defendant who did not receive a kickback or split fee in exchange for the referral. Id. at *22. The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to respond to the question of whether they sought to represent a class that will include class members who were not referred to Genuine Title or who were referred to Genuine Title by an Emery employee who did not receive a kickback or split fee. Id. at *24. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion in part as to interrogatory 15, and ordered Plaintiffs to amend their responses to provide answers to the remaining questions. The Court stated that in interrogatory 16, Defendant requested Plaintiff's trial plan. The Court found that there was no requirement that Plaintiffs submit a formal trial plan for purposes of class certification and thereby it denied Defendant's motion to compel with regard to the trial plan. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion to compel.

Washtenaw County Employees' Retirement System, et al. v. Walgreen Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64688 (N.D. Ill. April 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of stockholders, alleged that Defendant made material misrepresentations and omitted material facts concerning its pharmacy business in violation of §§ 10(b) and 20(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. The Court had previously bifurcated class certification and merits discovery. Plaintiff filed a motion to compel Defendant to produce documents in response to Plaintiffs' document request. Id. at *2. The Court found that Plaintiff had not met his burden to demonstrate the relevance of the particular discovery requests to class certification. The discovery at issue requested Defendant's internal documents that: (i) Defendant considered prior to making certain announcements in public statements; (ii) supported Defendant's public statements in SEC filings or in the press in 2013-2014 or that were prepared for various Board meetings regarding four specified topics; and (iii) the causes of changes in the price of common stock between March 25, 2014, and August 8, 2014, listing specified dates. Id. at *3. Plaintiff asserted that the information was relevant because Defendant might argue, in response to Plaintiff's motion for class certification: (i) truth-on-the-market and loss causation; and (ii) that the class period should end on June 24, 2014. Id. Regarding the first issue, the Court stated that Defendant represented that it would not argue materiality and loss causation in response to the class certification motion. Defendant also stipulated that it would not rely on any of the non-public information that was the subject of Plaintiff's motion to compel to respond to the motion for class certification. The Court concluded that none of the discovery requests at issue impacted the question of class certification. In most standard securities fraud class actions, the class period coincides with "the period during which Defendants' fraud was allegedly alive in the market." Id. at *5. Thus, the Court explained, the only documents relevant to the class certification decision involved information that was publicly available in the market. Id. at *5-6. Therefore, the Court determined that the internal Walgreens documents would not assist the Court in finding when Defendant's alleged fraud was alive in the market. Id. at *6. Similarly, the Court held that questions of typicality, adequacy, predominance, and superiority were not affected by internal information that was not otherwise disseminated to the investing public. Therefore, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to compel.

(xxiv) Disqualification Of Counsel In Class Actions

Wade, et al. v. The Barton Law Group,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1006 (E.D. Mo. Jan. 4, 2017). In this class action, Defendant filed a motion to disqualify Plaintiffs' counsel. The Court determined the behavior that Plaintiffs' counsel had exhibited during the litigation was unacceptable and concerning in this and other similar cases involving Defendant.. The Court opined that the disqualification of a party's counsel of choice is an extreme measure and should be imposed only when "absolutely necessary." Id. at *1. The Court, therefore, found that disqualification of Plaintiffs' counsel would be inappropriate, and instead it imposed certain protective measures to ensure that the case progressed in an orderly and professional manner. Id. at *2. The Court held that all future communications between the parties must be in writing, any communication from Plaintiffs' counsel to Defendant be directed to Defendant's counsel, and that depositions be conducted in a designated location by making arrangements with the Office of the Clerk of Court or by telephone at the discretion of Defendant's counsel. Id. The Court also directed that Defendant would be permitted to participate by telephone in third-party depositions, and in the event the parties engaged in mediation, the mediation would be conducted in the Court's chambers. Id. The Court thereby denied Defendant's motion for disqualification of Plaintiffs' counsel.

(xxv) Employee Testing Issues In Class Actions

Arndt, et al. v. City Of Colorado Springs*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 107772 (D. Colo. July 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of female police officers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant's use of a physical fitness test to determine continuation of employment as Colorado Springs police officers had a disparate impact on women officers over 40 years of age in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. The parties then filed motions in limine under Rule 702 challenging the opinions in reports and deposition testimony of several experts that were submitted under Rule 26(a)(2)(B). After reviewing the papers filed on those motions, the Court proceeded with the bench trial and permitted the witnesses to testify; the Court considered the objections in determining the credibility of those witnesses. After consideration of the evidence submitted at trial and the written and oral arguments of counsel, the Court made findings of fact and conclusions of law required by Rule 52. Defendant contracted with Human Performance Systems, Inc. ("HPS") to develop a physical abilities test to evaluate all of its officers for fitness for duty. Defendant then adopted a four-part physical abilities test ("PAT"), comprised of a one-minute sit-up test; a one-minute push-up test; an agility run; and a running test known as a BEEP test. Id. at *4. The first year in use, 421 of 467 men passed, for a passing rate of 90.5%, and 40 of 67 women passed the practice test, for a passing rate of 59.7%. Id. at *4-5. Defendant then issued General Order 1915, stating that all police officers were required to participate in the PAT test and "any employee who does not meet the Minimum Performance Standard will be placed on light duty and on a Performance Improvement Plan (PIP) until he/she can successfully complete the process." Id. at *5. The Court explained that a Plaintiff claiming disparate impact discrimination must establish that an identifiable employment practice or policy caused a significant disparate impact on a protected group. If a Plaintiff makes that showing, the burden shifts to the employer "to demonstrate that the challenged practice is job-related for the position in question and consistent with business necessity." Id. at *6. The Court found that Plaintiffs identified a specific employment practice, i.e., the requirement to meet the minimum performance standard or be placed on light duty. Id. The Court further held that the evidence presented at trial supported the conclusion that the PAT disparately impacted women. The Court determined that Plaintiffs' evidence of disparate impact was sufficient to consider whether Defendant's defense of business justification was proven, and therefore it looked to the validity of the PAT. Id. at *15-16. The Court stated that the evidence did not show that the PAT tested an officer's ability to perform the minimum amount of physical activity necessary to effectively and safely perform their job. Id. at *18. The Court looked to Plaintiff's expert testimony from Dr. Arthur Weltman, a professor of kinesiology and exercise physiology, who concluded that there was insufficient validity evidence to support use of the PAT. Id. at *21-22. Dr. Weltman opined that the push-up test, the sit-up test, and the BEEP test did not measure the physical abilities that the PAT purported to assess with accuracy. The HPS' job analysis ranked physical abilities required for the job and identified muscle strength as the highest, but according to Dr. Weltman, the one-minute sit-up and push-up tests measured muscle endurance rather than muscle strength. Id. at *22. Dr. Weltman therefore stated that that those tests were not appropriate for assessing a person's ability to perform tasks for which muscle strength is the most significant physical ability. Most significantly, the Court found that the evidence presented at trial revealed that the scoring system and cut-off score selected by HPS were meaningless. Accordingly, the Court ruled that the Colorado Springs Police Department's employment policy of using the PAT as the exclusive standard for determining whether an incumbent officer was fit for regular duty violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.

Smith, et al. v. City Of Boston,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 116637 (D. Mass. July 26, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former African-American police officers, brought an action alleging that Defendant's exam for promotion from sergeant to lieutenant discriminated against minority candidates in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. In its prior ruling of Smith v. City of Boston, 144 F. Supp. 3d 177, 180-81 (D. Mass. 2015) ("Smith I"), the District Court agreed with Plaintiffs after a bench trial, holding that the "lieutenants' exam had a racially disparate impact and was insufficiently job-related to survive the Plaintiffs' challenge." Id. at *5. In a different case entitled Lopez v. City of Lawrence, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124139 (D. Mass. Sept. 5, 2014) ("Lopez I"), a group of African-American and Hispanic patrolmen challenged the civil service exam for promotion from patrolman to sergeant, also claiming disparate impact discrimination. The District Court in Lopez I rejected Plaintiffs' claim after a bench trial. The District Court reasoned that, although the sergeants' exam "imposed a significantly disparate impact on minority applicants," Defendants established that the exam was nevertheless justified by business necessity. Id. at *48, 60-61. Plaintiffs appealed in Lopez, and the First Circuit issued a ruling affirming the District Court's decision in Lopez I entitled Lopez v. City of Lawrence, 823 F.3d 102 (1st Cir. 2016), cert. denied, 137 S. Ct. 1088 (2017) ("Lopez II"). The First Circuit concluded that the sergeants' exam had a significant disparate impact on racial minorities, and that the District Court did not clearly err in concluding that business necessity nevertheless justified the exam. In light of the First Circuit's order, the District Court revisited its earlier ruling in Smith I. Defendant argued that Lopez II compelled the District Court to reach a different conclusion on the issue of business necessity, and to consider whether there existed an equal or better exam that identified the best candidates for the lieutenant position, which had a less disparate impact on racial minorities. Defendant argued that the District Court used the wrong legal standard to evaluate the exam's validity. It argued that Lopez II required the District Court to determine the exam's validity by utilizing a "better than random selection" standard, not the "representative sample test" established by the EEOC's Uniform Guidelines on Employee Selection Procedures ("Guidelines"). Id. at *15. In its earlier analysis, the District Court reasoned that the Guidelines "provide a sensible way of evaluating whether a given test . . . measures an important work characteristic, and whether the outcomes of that test are actually correlated with the characteristic measured." Id. at *11. Using the Guidelines, and relying on expert testimony, the District Court determined that the exam results were not predictive of or correlated with the important work behaviors of police lieutenants. Id. Lopez II, according to the District Court, did not require a different conclusion. Indeed, the District Court stated that the "First Circuit certainly did not ban the use of the Uniform Guidelines' representative sample test." Id. at *15-16. Such a ban, the District Court observed, would be "surprising" because they come from the EEOC and "are due an appropriate degree of deference." Id. at *16. Second, Defendant argued that the District Court should reconsider its rejection of the education and experience ("E&E") component of the lieutenants' exam. Because the First Circuit found in Lopez II that the E&E component of the sergeants' exam was useful to assess qualities important to a sergeant's daily work, Defendant argued that the District Court should not have excluded the E&E component from its validity analysis of the lieutenants' exam. The District Court was unpersuaded, noting that it did consider the E&E in its ruling, but held that the "E&E did not rescue an otherwise invalid written exam." Id. at *21. The holding in Lopez II did not change the District Court's opinion given the variations between the two cases. The District Court: "(1) relied on expert testimony that the E&E component failed to differentiate among candidates or demonstrate the [knowledge, skills, and abilities] necessary in a lieutenant; (2) had no evidence that incumbent lieutenants performed better on the written exam; and (3) had no evidence to show that the E&E component was valid on its own." Id. at *21-22. Accordingly, unlike the evidence at issue in Lopez II regarding the sergeants' exam, the evidence before the District Court did "not establish that the E&E measured qualities important to a lieutenant's daily responsibilities." Id. at *22. Defendant further asserted that, in light of Lopez II, the District Court "inappropriately applied a heightened validity requirement for rank ordering" and that "rank ordering furthers [the City's] interest in eliminating patronage and intentional racism." Id. The District Court disagreed and reasoned that "[w]here a selection procedure not only has a disparate impact on a pass-fail basis, but also compounds that effect through use of rank ordering, each hiring decision carries an increased risk of a discriminatory result." Id. at *24. In that case, the District Court held that it "did not err in applying a heightened validity requirement for rank ordering," and the First Circuit's decision in Lopez II did not compel a contrary conclusion. Id. The District Court stated that the evidence before it did not support an inference that candidates who performed better on the lieutenants' exam would be better performers on the job. Id. at *25. Defendant also challenged the District Court's finding of liability without first addressing whether an equally valid, less discriminatory alternative test existed to identify successful candidates for the lieutenant position. Specifically, Defendant argued that the District Court could not reject Defendant's justification for the lieutenants' exam absent "some showing that there exists an available alternative with less disparate impact that serves [the City's] legitimate needs." Id. at *26. The District Court again disagreed and held that the First Circuit's ruling in Lopez II did not change the burden-shifting framework that applies to the analysis of disparate impact cases. Id. If Plaintiffs proved that a test has a significant disparate impact, and Defendant then failed to prove that the test was job- related and consistent with business necessity, "then Defendant loses, regardless of Plaintiffs' showing of an alternative." Id. Accordingly, the District Court did not change its previous ruling in favor of Plaintiffs.

(xxvi) Experts In Class Action Litigation

Bryd, et al. v. Aaron's Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41030 (W.D. Pa. May 22, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of individuals who leased and then purchased computers from Defendants, brought a putative class action alleging that the Defendants secretly installed software called "PC Rental Agent" and collected thousands of webcam photos, screen shots, and keystroke logs in violation of the Electronic Communications Privacy Act ("ECPA"). Plaintiffs had previously filed a motion for class certification including an expert report from Dr. Micah Sherr ("Original Sherr Report"). The Court denied the motion, which was reversed and remanded on appeal for further consideration. Plaintiffs subsequently filed a renewed motion for class certification including the Original Sherr Report as an exhibit in support of the motion for class certification. Defendant filed an opposition and continued to rely upon its previously filed expert report ("Rubin Report"). Thereafter, Plaintiffs submitted a reply brief including a new expert report ("New Sherr Report"). Id. at *5. Defendant filed a new motion to strike, arguing that the report was improper rebuttal testimony, and the Court granted the motion. Defendant argued the New Sherr Report went beyond the permissible purpose of rebuttal evidence and attempted to advance new theories and methodologies to account for deficiencies in Plaintiffs' original rebuttal expert report as it pertained to their Rule 23(b)(3) predominance argument. Id. Plaintiffs claimed that it was not their burden at this stage of the proceedings to prove more than a common proof for each and every class member. However, Plaintiffs included a new rebuttal report that refuted Defendants' previous arguments and would prove that a liability analysis could be completed on a common class-wide basis rather than an individualized analysis. Id. at *10-11. The New Sherr Report concluded that Dr. Sherr was able to create a software system that could identify most instances of communications that the PCRA software captured contemporaneously with its transmissions with very few false positives. The Court found that there was no claim in the Original Sherr Report that software existed that could identify violations of the ECPA in a common fashion that precluded individualized analysis. Id. at *13-14. The Court held that the New Sherr Report's parameters were an indication that Plaintiffs attempted to create a new theory or methodology for their Rule 23(b)(3) argument. After reading the New Sherr Report's parameters, the Court found Plaintiffs' argument unpersuasive that the New Sherr Report was merely elaborating and expanding upon opinions consistent with Plaintiffs' previous arguments. Therefore, the Court determined that Plaintiffs were attempting to establish a new theory and methodology in pursuit of class certification. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to strike.

Dover, et al. v. British Airways,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 86709 (E.D.N.Y. June 5, 2017). Plaintiffs filed an action alleging that Defendant used fuel surcharges to maximize revenues rather than recover unanticipated fuel costs. The parties filed cross-motions to exclude expert testimony pursuant to Rule 702. The Court denied the motions except the motion to strike Dr. Andrew Hildreth's report and expert testimony, ruling that it must conduct an evidentiary hearing to consider more fully the admissibility of the report. Robert Kokonis, a previous airline budgeting and forecasting manager, submitted an expert report on behalf of Plaintiff opining that it would have been feasible for Defendant either to operate without using a fuel surcharge, accounting for fluctuations in the fuel markets through fare adjustments alone, or to impose a fuel surcharge calculated automatically and directly related to the cost of fuel. Id. at *4. Defendant asserted that Kokonis was unqualified because he had not previously testified as an expert witness, lacked industry-specific certifications and education, and had never worked on an airline's frequent flyer, fuel surcharge, or revenue management programs. Id. at *5. The Court found that Kokonis' airline industry experience, however, plainly qualified him to offer expert opinions in this case. Defendant also argued that Kokonis' testimony was irrelevant and unreliable. The Court disagreed and noted that the central question in this case was whether British Airways breached a contract, and if so, whether and to what extent Plaintiffs were damaged. Id. The Court opined that Kokonis' opinions plainly related to those questions. Jonathan Arnold, an economist, prepared three reports for use in this case, including opinions: (i) that the fuel charges did not bear a "close relationship" to the airline's fuel costs and were not fuel surcharges at all "as a matter of economics;" (ii) that Defendant used an irrelevant figure as a baseline in setting the charge over time, (iii) that these actions resulted in economic harm to the members of the class, and (iv) that damages to the class under several alternative assumptions varied from $143 million to $161 million. Id. at *8. Defendant argued that Arnold's proposed testimony was irrelevant principally because the contract in question did not expressly require that fuel surcharges be determined "as a matter of economics." Id. at *9. The Court held that Arnold's opinion that the charges were not fuel surcharges as a matter of economics "`tend[s] to make the existence of [a] fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable . . . ,'" i.e., namely whether Defendant breached the contract. Id. Defendant also challenged Arnold's calculation models. However, the Court found that Arnold's methodology was a reasonable and sufficiently reliable method of assessing the relationship between the charge and fuel prices. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs also moved to exclude the testimony of Daniel Kasper on the grounds that he did not prepare his report. The Court, however, noted that Kasper testified at his deposition that he prepared the report, and the Court could not infer that the report was not the product of his own research and analysis simply because he spent less time preparing the report than other experts in this case. Id. at *12. Plaintiffs also challenged the report and testimony of Andrew Hildreth, an econometrician. Plaintiffs contended that several regressions that Hildreth ran were afflicted by a fundamental error that rendered their results meaningless as a matter of statistics. Id. at *14. The Court concluded that it could not decide, however, whether Hildreth's testimony was admissible based solely on the parties' submissions. Given the complexity of the issues presented in the parties' submissions and the duty of the Court to discharge its gatekeeping function, the Court found that an evidentiary hearing was warranted to consider more fully the admissibility of Hildreth's testimony.

In Re National Hockey League Players' Concussion Injury Litigation*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24881 (D. Minn. Feb. 21, 2017). In this multi-district class action litigation brought by former NHL players seeking to hold Defendant responsible for the pathological, debilitating effects of brain injuries caused by concussive and sub-concussive impacts sustained during their careers, the Court denied Defendant's request to compel production of an annotated bibliography compiled by Plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Stephen Casper, and referenced in Dr. Casper's expert report. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs opposed the production of the annotated bibliography, and argued that the information compiled in the document constituted a rough draft for a section of Dr. Casper's report and was therefore protected work product. Id. Pursuant to the Court's request, Plaintiffs provided a copy of the annotated bibliography for in camera review, along with a copy of Dr. Casper's expert report. Id. The Court explained that Rule 26(b)(4)(B) "protects drafts of any report or disclosure . . . regardless of the form in which the draft is recorded." Id. In finding that the expert's underlying documents constituted a draft, the Court reasoned that the documents were in fact created for use in an expert report, that the expert anticipated that the document would form a part of the report being drafted, and that the underlying information was in fact inserted in the draft report. Id. at *5. Based on its in camera review of the annotated bibliography, the Court confirmed that it was prepared by Dr. Casper, who anticipated that it would form a part of the report that he was drafting, as the document was referenced in his report. Id. at *8. In addition, the Court opined that the underlying information was included in the report, the report was been submitted in the litigation, and the document applied to Dr. Casper's own development of the opinions presented in his report. Id. The Court therefore concluded that the information was protected work product, and denied Defendant's motion to compel.

In Re National Hockey League Players' Concussion Injury Litigation*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 115164 (D. Minn. July 25, 2017). In this multi-district class action litigation brought by former NHL players seeking to hold Defendant responsible for the pathological, debilitating effects of brain injuries caused by concussive and sub-concussive impacts sustained during their careers, Plaintiff moved to exclude Defendant's experts for purposes of Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. The Court granted in part and denied in part the motion. Defendants disclosed a total of 19 experts in support of their opposition to Plaintiffs' class certification motion and in support of the NHL's contemporaneously filed motions to exclude the testimony of 3 of Plaintiffs' experts. Plaintiffs raised concerns about the number of experts Defendant had disclosed. In particular, Plaintiffs argued that Defendant's disclosure of 19 experts was disproportionate to their own disclosure of five, and "the number of experts that were filed in connection with the class certification motion are cumulative and duplicative in many respects." Id. at *4. Plaintiffs argued that an unspecified number of Defendant's expert declarations should be excluded because the Court should not be burdened or inconvenienced with the task of sorting through 19 expert reports at the class certification stage. Framing their arguments around thirteen class certification "issues," Plaintiffs asked the Court to determine that Defendant's 19 expert declarations were cumulative or not relevant in the context of a motion for class certification; to require Defendant to designate one expert on each of the 13 class certification issues; and to exclude such portions of Defendant's expert declarations that do not fall within those parameters. Id. at *6. Defendant argued that its expert opinions were not cumulative, but even if they were, Plaintiffs' motion was premature because concerns about cumulative evidence related to the presentation of evidence to a jury at trial, not to a Court's ruling on class certification. Id. Defendant also argued that Plaintiffs' proposed rule that only one expert be allowed to speak on any issue was both prejudicial and impracticable because it would mean that Defendant and Plaintiffs would have to submit new expert declarations. Moreover, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs themselves offered multiple experts on a range of issues. Finally, even if some of Defendant's expert opinions related to merits issues, Defendant argued this offered no justification to strike because class and merits issues often overlap for purposes of the Court's rigorous class certification analysis. The Court found insufficient overlap to warrant limiting the experts or excluding all or part of Defendant's expert declarations for purposes of class certification. Id. at *11. To the extent there was overlap, the Court held that Plaintiffs' burden to rebut duplicative opinions was outweighed by the burden Defendant would face if required to revise its expert declarations and opinions. Id. at *12. However, the Court noted that Defendant did not identify or rely upon Drs. Norman, Funk, or Neale, and therefore it granted Plaintiffs' motion to exclude only to the extent that it was not necessary for Plaintiffs to rebut Drs. Norman, Funk, or Neale for purposes of class certification. In all other respects, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion.

(xxvii) FACTA And FDCPA Class Actions

Crupar-Weinmann, et al. v. Paris Baguette America, Inc.*, 861 F.3d 76 (2d Cir. 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act ("FACTA") by issuing a sales receipt containing her credit card expiration date. Id. at 78. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's claims, and the District Court granted the motion on the ground that Plaintiff lacked standing to bring a FACTA claim. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Plaintiff challenged the District Court's dismissal of her complaint on the basis that she did not plead a concrete injury-in-fact sufficient to establish Article III standing to bring suit against Defendant. Id. at 79. The Second Circuit stated that it previously applied Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540 (2016), to a similar action and recognized that "an alleged procedural violation can by itself manifest concrete injury where Congress conferred the procedural right to protect a Plaintiff's concrete interests and where the procedural violation presents a 'risk of real harm' to that concrete interest." Id. at 80. The Second Circuit noted, however, that even where Congress has accorded procedural rights to protect a concrete interest, a Plaintiff may fail to demonstrate concrete injury where violation of the procedure at issue presented no material risk of harm to that underlying interest. Id. The Second Circuit determined that the central inquiry was whether the particular bare procedural violation presented a material risk of harm to the underlying concrete interest Congress sought to protect. Id. Therefore, the Second Circuit opined that the key inquiry here was whether Defendant's alleged bare procedural violation – printing Plaintiff's credit card expiration date on her receipt – presented a material risk of harm to the underlying concrete interest Congress sought to protect in passing the FACTA. The Second Circuit noted that Congress clarified the FACTA in the Credit and Debit Card Receipt Clarification Act of 2007 ("Clarification Act"), stating that "[e]xperts in the field agree that proper truncation of the card number, . . . regardless of the inclusion of the expiration date, prevents a potential fraudster from perpetrating identity theft or credit card fraud." Id. at 31. The Second Circuit held that the language included in the Clarification Act made clear that Congress did not think that the inclusion of a credit card expiration date on a receipt increases the risk of material harm of identity theft. Id. Plaintiff asserted that the Clarification Act maintained the FACTA's prohibition on printing credit card expiration dates on receipts, which reflected Congressional belief that such action does pose a material risk of harm. The Second Circuit disagreed, and found that Congress expressly observed that the inclusion of expiration dates did not raise a material risk of identity theft. Id. The Second Circuit concluded that Congress was clear when stating that "[t]he purpose of this Act is to ensure that consumers suffering from any actual harm to their credit or identity are protected while simultaneously limiting abusive lawsuits that do not protect consumers but only result in increased cost to business and potentially increased prices to consumers." Id. at 81-82. The Second Circuit opined that Plaintiff failed to alleged that Defendant's bare procedural violation of the FACTA posed a material risk of harm to her. Accordingly, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling.

Dickens, et al. v. GC Services,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 16095 (11th Cir. Aug. 23, 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant, a debt collector, sent him and putative class members a collection letter that violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices ("FDCPA"). Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification, and the District Court denied the motion. In addition, the District Court awarded Plaintiff $1 in statutory damages. Plaintiff argued that the District Court erroneously deprived him of a jury trial on statutory damages. Plaintiff further argued that the District Court abused its discretion by determining that he was an inadequate class representative and that a class action was not the superior method of adjudicating the putative class' claims. Id. at *1-2. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit vacated the District Court's damages determination and denial of class certification and remanded for further proceedings. Id. at *2. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant's letter to him failed to include "a statement that if the consumer notifies the debt collector in writing within [a] thirty-day period that the debt, or any portion thereof, is disputed, the debt collector will obtain verification of the debt or a copy of a judgment against the consumer," in violation of the FDCPA. Id. at *3. Plaintiff sought to certify a class of all persons with a Florida address, to whom Defendant mailed an initial debt collection communication that stated: (i) "if you do dispute all or any portion of this debt within 30 days of receiving this letter, we will obtain verification of the debt from our client and send it to you," and/or (ii) "if within 30 days of receiving this letter you request the name and address of the original creditor, we will provide it to you in the event it differs from our client;" (iii) in the one year prior to the complaint; (iv) in connection with the collection of a consumer debt. Id. at *4. The District Court concluded that Plaintiff failed to meet Rule 23(a)'s adequacy requirement, because he sought only statutory damages, while some class members may have suffered actual damages. Id. at *6. The District Court further concluded that Plaintiff failed to satisfy Rule 23(b)(3)'s superiority requirement because the cost of administering a class action would likely dwarf the nominal statutory damages to which the class would be entitled. Id. at *7. The Eleventh Circuit found that the District Court abused its discretion in concluding that Plaintiff was an inadequate class representative. Id. at *8. As an initial matter, the Eleventh Circuit stated that the District Court's stated reason for finding Plaintiff inadequate – that he sought only statutory damages – was error because these circumstances created no substantial conflict of interest. The District Court concluded that absent class members likely suffered only statutory damages and no actual damages, yet it used the remote possibility that some class members may have suffered actual damages as a reason to deem Plaintiff inadequate. The Eleventh Circuit also found that the District Court's holding contradicted its admonition that minor conflicts alone are insufficient to deem a class representative inadequate. Id. at *20. Further, the Eleventh Circuit held that any conflict between Plaintiff and class members who have suffered actual damages was especially minimal given that in the rare circumstance in which a class member suffered actual damages, the class member could simply opt-out of the class and pursue litigation on his own. Id. at *22. The Eleventh Circuit therefore vacated the District Court's denial of class certification and remand this case to the District Court for a new class certification determination employing the proper legal standards and considering the factors it identified.

Flaum, et al. v. Doctor's Associates, Inc., Case No. 16-CV-61198 (S.D. Fla. Mar. 22, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action on behalf of over 2.6 million class members alleging that Defendant, which does business as a Subway franchisee, violated the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act ("FACTA") by issuing sales receipts that displayed the full credit card expiration date. Id. at 2. The parties subsequently reached a settlement and Plaintiff filed a motion for preliminary settlement approval, which the Court granted. Id. at 1. The Court found that the agreement was entered into only after extensive arm's-length negotiations by experienced counsel and following on-going mediation efforts presided over by a professional mediator. Id. The Court further determined that the settlement embodied in the settlement agreement was sufficiently within the range of reasonableness. Id. The Court stated that in making this determination, it considered the current posture of the litigation and the risks and benefits to the parties involved in both settlement of the claims and continuation of the litigation. Id. at 1-2. The Court also granted Plaintiff leave to amend his complaint to add Jason Alan, a Plaintiff in a related class action, as an additional named Plaintiff in this matter for purposes of settlement. Id. at 2. The Court found that Plaintiff's proposed settlement class met Rule 23's requirements as the class: (i) was so numerous that joinder of all members was impractical; (ii) there were questions of law or fact common to all members of the settlement class; (iii) the claims on Plaintiff were typical of the claims of the other members of the settlement class; (iv) Plaintiff would fairly and adequately protect the interests of the settlement class; (v) common questions of law and fact predominated over individual questions; (vi) the settlement class was ascertainable; (vii) and resolution of the claims by nationwide settlement was superior to other available methods of litigation. Id. at 3. The Court also approved Plaintiff's proposed forms of notice, including the summary notice, the full notice for the settlement website, the publication notice, the parties' proposed press release, and the settlement claim forms. Id. at 4. The Court further ordered that costs for preparing and disseminating the notice will be paid from the settlement fund. Id. The Court also scheduled a final approval hearing. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for preliminary settlement approval.

Editor's Note: The nearly $31 million settlement in Flaum is the largest ever FACTA settlement in history.

Gesten, et al. v. Burger King Corp., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 158173 (S.D. Fla. Sept. 28, 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, filed a class action alleging that Defendant printed transaction receipts revealed more than the last five digits of a consumer's debit or credit card number in violation of the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act ("FACTA"). Defendant filed a motion to dismiss the complaint for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. Plaintiff argued that the disclosure of one's private information is a concrete harm that has long been recognized by Courts, and that the FACTA recognizes a right of privacy not to have credit card account information exposed. Id. at *19. The Court held that Plaintiff failed to show that any disclosure of his private information actually occurred. Since Plaintiff asserted that he took possession of the receipt at the time of the transaction, the "heightened risk of identity theft" alleged in Plaintiff's complaint was a risk that had not, and could not, materialize. Id. at *19-20. Although Plaintiff alleged that the information was disclosed to Defendant's employees, this "disclosure" was no different than the "disclosure" that happens any time a consumer uses a credit card to pay for a transaction. Id. at *20. The Court found that this disclosure was not the type of harm that Congress identified in enacting the FACTA. Moreover, the Court noted that the additional digits of Plaintiff's account number that were displayed were digits that identify only the issuer of the card. Therefore, the Court held that Plaintiff had not alleged that any additional private financial information was displayed beyond that included in the last five digits of his credit card account number, nor had he alleged that such information was disclosed to anyone other than the employees who handled his transaction. Accordingly, the Court determined that Plaintiff lacked standing to pursue a FACTA claim absent an allegation of actual harm or a material risk of harm. Id. at *21. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Hernandez, et al. v. Midland Credit Management,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 108512 (N.D. Ill. July 13, 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant, a debt collector, violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices ("FDCPA") by sending him a false and misleading dunning letter. Defendant moved to dismiss on the basis of lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, arguing that the Supreme Court's decision in Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540, 1547 (2016), made plain that Plaintiff had not suffered sufficient injury to establish standing in this case. Id. at *1. The Court denied Defendant's motion. Spokeo concerned the first of standing's elements, i.e., the requirement of injury-in-fact. To establish injury-in-fact, Spokeo held that a Plaintiff must show that he suffered an invasion of a legally protected interest that is both concrete and particularized, and actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical. To be particularized, an injury must affect Plaintiff in a personal and individual way. Id. at *3. To be concrete, an injury "must actually exist," and be real and not abstract. Id. The Court found that here, the injury alleged was both particularized and concrete. Id. at *4. The Court stated that the injury was particularized because the allegedly improper dunning letter was sent directly to Plaintiff in violation of his rights. Further, the Court determined that the alleged injury was concrete based on 15 U.S.C.§ 1692(a), in which Congress articulated its findings that "[t]here is abundant evidence of the use of abusive, deceptive, and unfair debt collection practices by many debt collectors." Id. Such practices "contribute to the number of personal bankruptcies, to marital instability, to the loss of jobs, and to invasions of individual privacy." Id. The Court reasoned that an injury is adequately concrete as long as there is some "appreciable risk of harm" to a Plaintiff. Id. The Court noted that in § 1692(b), Congress explicitly found that "[e]xisting laws and procedures for redressing these injuries are inadequate to protect consumers." Id. at *5. The Court noted that Defendant allegedly provided Plaintiff with false information, putting him at risk of falling victim to all the ills detailed in § 1692. The Court stated that the fact that Plaintiff sought the assistance of counsel rather than responding to Defendant's allegedly improper notice did not obviate the risk that Plaintiff or others could easily respond to such an inadequate notice to their detriment. Id. Having considered Congress' findings in § 1692, the relationship of the trickery targeted by the FDCPA to intangible harms that have historically conferred standing to sue, and the risk of harm to consumers who receive inaccurate or inadequate collection letters from debt collectors, the Court concluded that Plaintiff had standing to sue, and thus it denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Katz, et al. v. Donna Karen International, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48368 (S.D.N.Y. May 17, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act ("FACTA") by issuing a sales receipt containing her credit card number. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff alleged that she made two purchases from Defendant and received receipts that contained the first six and last four digits of her credit card number, which violated FACTA's truncation requirement that allows no more than the last five digits of a card number to be printed. Id. at *3. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss arguing that Plaintiff lacked Article III standing in light of Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540 (2016). Defendant argued that Plaintiff failed to allege an injury-in-fact. The Court found that Defendants' issuance of two partially-truncated receipts, without any allegations of stolen identity or that a third-party had access to the receipts, did not cause Plaintiff any actual harm, nor did the receipts present a "material risk of harm to [the] underlying interest" created and identified by FACTA, which was the prevention of identity theft. Id. at *9. The Court also determined that Plaintiff alleged only a "bare procedural violation" of FACTA, "divorced from any concrete harm." Id. at *10. The Court held that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate an injury-in-fact, and therefore Plaintiff had no constitutional standing. Plaintiff contended that the FACTA conferred a substantive "truncation right," the violation of which created a present concrete injury that automatically created Article III standing. Id. at *10-11. Defendant disagreed, and asserted that Plaintiff erroneously read the FACTA as "an electronic receipt privacy statute, not an identity theft prevention statute." Id. at *11. Defendant also argued that Plaintiff failed to allege any actual concrete harm to himself. The Court noted that the substantive "truncation right" alleged by Plaintiff was irreconcilable with the holding in Spokeo that not all statutory violations confer Article III standing. Id. Moreover, the Court explained that there was no evidence that Congress, in enacting the FACTA, intended to create for consumers a substantive right to receive a redacted copy of their credit card receipt; rather, the truncation requirement was a means to the end goal of identity theft prevention. Id. at *12. The Court determined that as Plaintiff did not allege any facts showing that he experienced identity theft, he failed to present an injury-in-fact. The Court found that Plaintiff failed to allege that anyone aside from the store employees who handed Plaintiff the receipt, Plaintiff, and his lawyer ever saw either receipt; or that his identity or other financial information was stolen or lost; or even that the risk of such events was imminent. Id. at *12-13. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss on the basis that Plaintiff failed to establish Article III standing.

Koby, et al. v. Helmuth,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 1317 (9th Cir. Jan. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendant, a debt collector, violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices ("FDCPA") by leaving automated voice-mail messages that failed to disclose that it was a debt collector and that the purpose of the call was to collect a debt. The parties engaged in settlement discussions with the assistance of a Magistrate Judge and consented to have the Magistrate Judge conduct all further proceedings. While litigation was pending, Defendant voluntarily changed its automated voice-mail messages to disclose that the calls were for collecting a debt and were from a debt collector. The parties reached an agreement and sought certification of a nationwide settlement class of 4 million people pursuant to Rule 23(b)(2).. Id. at *5. Because the class would be certified under Rule 23(b)(2), the parties agreed that no notice would be sent to the four million class members and no one would be permitted to opt-out of the class. Id. at *5-6. The class consisted of everyone in the United States who received calls from Defendant between April 2008 and August 2011, where Defendant failed to disclose that it was a debt collector and that the purpose of the call was to collect a debt. Id. at *6. The Magistrate Judge approved a settlement agreement whereby each of three named Plaintiffs would receive $1,000. Id. Defendant agreed to an injunction requiring it to continue to use the new voice-mail message for a period of two years. In exchange, the class waived their right to any future class claims against Defendant. Id. at *7. The four million unnamed class members received no monetary compensation under the agreement. A class member that was the class representative in another class action against Defendant – based upon essentially the same allegations – appealed to the Ninth Circuit. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit determined that the Magistrate Judge abused her discretion by approving the settlement as fair, reasonable, and adequate under Rule 23(e)(2). Id. at *17 -18. The Ninth Circuit ruled that the settlement should not have been approved because there was no evidence that the settlement afforded any value to the class members, as the class members were required to give up their right to seek damages in future class actions in exchange for "worthless" injunctive relief. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded.

Paci, et al. v. Costco Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 48368 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 30, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act ("FACTA") by issuing a sales receipt containing her credit card number. Id. at *1-2. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment, and the Court declined to rule on the motions because it found that Plaintiff lacked Article III standing. Id. at *1. Plaintiff initially received a receipt from Defendant that complied with FACTA. Defendant required customers to display a receipt for all transactions as they were leaving the store. Plaintiff misplaced her receipt and therefore went to a customer service area to obtain a duplicate receipt. Id. at *2. A supervisor then printed out a document that displayed the first six digits and the last four digits of Plaintiff's American Express card, which she had used to purchase her groceries that evening. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's violation of the FACTA was willful. Plaintiff argued that she was entitled to summary judgment because Defendant knowingly violated the FACTA. Defendant asserted that it was entitled to summary judgment because it did not violate the FACTA. Defendant also argued that, even if it did violate the FACTA, Plaintiff suffered no harm as a result of that violation, and therefore she lacked Article III standing to sue. Id. at *4. The Court noted that to establish Article III standing, a Plaintiff must show: (i) she has suffered an injury-in-fact that is concrete and particularized and actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical; (ii) the injury is fairly traceable to the challenged action of Defendant; and (iii) it is likely, as opposed to merely speculative, that the injury will be redressed by a favorable decision. Id. Defendant asserted that it was not enough to prove a technical FACTA violation; rather, to have standing, a Plaintiff must also have suffered some independent harm caused by the violation. Defendant argued that Plaintiff suffered no such harm. Id. at *5. The Court found that there was no question that Plaintiff failed to make the requisite showing to establish standing. Id. at *6-7. The Court stated that even assuming that Defendant violated the FACTA, Plaintiff did not show that the violation caused her any harm. Id. at *7. The Court held that Plaintiff failed to articulate any harm caused by the printing of the extra digits on her receipt, as she did not testify that the change in her receipt-handling routine cost her anything in terms of time, expense, or emotional distress; there was no evidence that her identity was ever at risk of being stolen; and nothing to show that she ever even fretted about her identity being stolen as a result of the alleged FACTA violation. Id. at *8-9. Because Plaintiff failed to offer any evidence to support a finding of actual harm, the Court found that she lacked standing to sue. The Court therefore dismissed the case for lack of jurisdiction.

Smith, et al. v. GC Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110046 (S.D. Ind. July 17, 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant, a debt collector, sent her and putative class members collection letters that violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices ("FDCPA"). Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification, which the Court granted. Defendant sent Plaintiff a form collection letter, which stated: "As of the date of this letter, our records show you owe a balance of $3,095.00 to Synchrony Bank. If you dispute this balance or the validity of this debt, please let us know in writing. If you do not dispute this debt in writing within 30 days after you receive this letter, we will assume this debt is valid. However, if you do dispute all or any portion of this debt in writing within 30 days of receiving this letter, we will obtain verification of the debt from our client and send it to you. Or, if within 30 days of receiving this letter you request in writing the name and address of the original creditor, we will provide it to you in the event it differs from our client, Synchrony Bank." Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant violated the FDCPA by wrongfully informing Plaintiff that disputes must be in writing when, in fact, an oral dispute is valid. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant's statement that any dispute of the debt must be in writing was false, deceptive, and misleading, and unfair and unconscionable. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff sought to represent a class of persons similarly-situated in Indiana from whom Defendant attempted to collect a delinquent consumer debt allegedly owed for a Synchrony Bank/Sam's Club account, via the same form collection letter that Defendant sent to Plaintiff, from one year before the date of the initial complaint to the present. Id. at *3. Defendant argued that Plaintiff lacked Article III standing in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540 (2016). Defendant further argued that Plaintiff failed to propose an ascertainable class. Lastly, Defendant argued that Plaintiff could not establish any of the factors listed in Rule 23(a) or (b). As to standing, the Court found that Plaintiff alleged a concrete injury-in-fact sufficient for Article III standing by alleging a violation of the FDCPA. Id. at *4-5. As to ascertainability, the Court ruled that Plaintiff's class definition was clear and objective because it was based on the same form debt collection letter received by all putative class members, and therefore the class was ascertainable. Id. at *5. Further, the Court determined that Plaintiff met the requirements of Rule 23. The proposed class consisted of 118 individuals, which satisfied numerosity. The Court noted that Plaintiff's FDCPA claims were based on the same form debt collection letter, and therefore whether the letter violated the FDCPA was a common question of law. The Court stated that Plaintiff's injury and the putative class members' injuries arose out of the same violative conduct, and therefore her claims were typical of the class she sought to represent. The Court also found that Plaintiff, who was sent the same form collection letter as the individuals she sought to represent, was an adequate representative for the class. Id. at *9. Finally, because the key issue in this case – i.e., whether the subject letter violated the FDCPA – was identical as to each putative class member, the Court concluded that Plaintiff satisfied the requirements of Rule 23(b)(3). Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

(xxviii) Family & Medical Leave Act Class Actions

Antoine, et al. v. Amick Farms, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1942 (D.Md. Jan. 6, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of farm laborers, sued Defendant individually and collectively, alleging termination and violations involving the Family and Medical Leave Act of 1993 ("FMLA"). The Court granted Defendant' s motion to dismiss count III of Plaintiffs' collective action, the only claim brought on behalf of Plaintiffs individually and collectively. The Plaintiffs were not literate in English and count III of their claims arose out of Defendant's failure to post or provide notice of their rights under the FMLA in the language in which they were literate. The FMLA requires that an employer provide employees general notice of their rights under the FMLA in a language in which the employees are literate where a significant portion of the employer's workforce is composed of workers who are not literate in English. Further, if the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") determines that an employer willfully fails to post such a notice, the employer is subject to a fine of up to $100 a day. Defendant moved to dismiss the claim on the grounds that there was no private right of action that arose out of Defendant's failure to provide the general notice in Plaintiffs' language. The Court agreed that the penalty for violation of the general posting requirement is limited to the DOL imposing a civil monetary penalty as provided in the statute and dismissed the Plaintiffs' collective claim under the FMLA.

Carrel, et al. v. MedPro Group, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62969 (N.D. Ind. April 26, 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action under the Family & Medical Leave Act ("FMLA") alleging that she was docked earned paid time off ("PTO") and that Defendant failed to pay her unused PTO upon the termination of her employment. Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's short-term leave policy violated the FMLA because each employee was provided PTO at the beginning of the year according to Defendant's PTO policy, and thus PTO was unlawfully "docked" whenever an employee took FMLA leave. Id. at *2. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification under Rule 23 seeking certification of a class defined as "all current and former [Defendant] employees who took FMLA leave at any point since March 29, 2013[.]" Id. at *5. The Court granted Plaintiff's motion. First, the Court rejected Defendant's argument that class certification under Rule 23 was the wrong mechanism for an FMLA class, and that the alleged class-wide violations of the FMLA must be treated as a collective action under the Fair Labor Standards Act instead. Id. *6. Although the Seventh Circuit has not weighed in on the applicability of Rule 23 to FMLA actions, the Court noted that other case law authorities have held that "class violations of the FMLA must be treated as opt-out actions pursuant to Rule 23 because the statutory language of the FMLA § 2617(a)(2) does not incorporate the additional language in the FLSA expressly requiring that Plaintiffs affirmatively consent to join the action by opting-in." Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court held that "Rule 23 is the correct mechanism by which to proceed with the analysis" of the Plaintiff's class certification motion. Id. at *8. Second, the Court determined that the requirements of Rule 23(a) had been satisfied. Specifically, the Court found that commonality was satisfied because "Plaintiff and the putative class members were all employees who were subject to the same uniformly applied PTO policy." Id. at *12. Therefore, "[w]hether the Defendant's PTO policy violated the FMLA presents a common question of law." Id. The Court noted that how Defendant's policy individually impacted each member of the class was an issue relating to the merits and did not defeat commonality. Id. at *15. Finally, the Court noted that certification under Rule 23(b)(3) was appropriate. In so holding, the Court found that the Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance factor was satisfied because "causation issues, which here are actually issues concerning what damages, if any, each class member has actually suffered pursuant to the PTO policy applied in his/her own case, will not predominate over common liability issues." Id. at *22. Therefore, it did not matter to the Court's inquiry "how much PTO each employee used or would have used." Id. at *23. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Wilkinson, et al. v. Greater Dayton Regional Transit Authority*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 131643 (S.D. Ohio Aug. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Family & Medical Leave Act ("FMLA"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification of current and former employees of Defendant who were "eligible" within the meaning of 29 U.S.C. § 2611(2)(A), and who applied for, and were denied, disciplined, terminated or otherwise had their rights under the FMLA interfered with or who were retaliated against for their exercise of rights under the FMLA. Plaintiff also sought to certify five sub-classes. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant – in response to what it perceived as "rampant absenteeism" among its employees – implemented more stringent policies regarding appropriate verification for use of sick leave and FMLA leave. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant's requirements were more onerous than what was allowed under the FMLA and its regulations, and were designed to discourage employees from taking lawful, protected FMLA leave. Plaintiffs further alleged that Defendant retaliated against employees who attempt to exercise their rights under the FMLA, by subjecting them to discipline, suspension, and termination, and by harassing and intimidating them. Id. at *4. Defendant argued that, as former employees, Plaintiffs lacked standing under Article III to pursue prospective injunctive relief on behalf of the class. The Court agreed and found that Plaintiffs could not seek or obtain prospective injunctive or declaratory relief; however, their claims for money damages and other relief were not moot, and the Court, in the interest of justice, could exercise its discretion to grant leave to substitute current employees as Plaintiffs for the class and sub-classes. Id. at *17-18. Accordingly, the Court examined whether the putative class and sub-classes met the requirements of Rule 23. The Court held that Plaintiffs' proposed class and four of the five proposed sub-classes were impermissible fail-safe classes. Id. at *23. The Court explained that the classes were defined by legal conclusions, i.e., the denial and restraint of FMLA rights, which could only be resolved by adjudications on the merits, i.e., whether the putative class members' FMLA rights were actually restrained or violated by Defendant. Id. at *23. The Court stated that sub-class three, however, covered current and former employees who "were required to obtain re-certification for intermittent FMLA leave within the 12 month period where the healthcare provider set forth a minimum period of time in the original medical certification and the condition forming the basis of FMLA leave has not changed." Id. at *24. The Court noted that members of this class qualified if they meet the factual criteria contained therein, regardless of whether Defendant's alleged conduct actually violated the FMLA. However, the Court determined that the plain language of the proposed sub-class and the governing FMLA regulation compelled it to conclude that common issues did not predominate with respect to the claims of the putative sub-class members. The Court held that since FMLA regulations permit an employer to require re-certification every 30 days unless the initial certification was for a longer duration, even if Defendant required re-certification for all 47 putative sub-class members during a 12-month period, those actions by themselves would not constitute violations of the FMLA. Id. at *27. Therefore, only by examining all of the pertinent facts and circumstances involved in each individual Plaintiff's situation could the Court determine whether a violation of the FMLA occurred. Id. at *28. Accordingly, the Court found that sub-class three could not meet the requirements of Rule 23 and therefore it denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

(xxix) FCRA Class Actions

Bultemeyer, et al. v. CenturyLink, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 25831 (D. Ariz. Feb. 15, 2016). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") by using or obtaining Plaintiff's consumer report. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment, and the Court dismissed the case for lack of standing and denied the summary judgment motions as moot. Plaintiff alleged that she visited Defendant's website to determine if she could get a better price for high-speed internet services. As part of the process, Plaintiff clicked on a page indicating that she agreed to Defendant's terms and conditions. When it came to the final step in procuring service from the website for submitting payment information, Plaintiff decided that she did not want to continue and closed out of the webpage. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff argued that, because she did not place the order, she did not initiate a business transaction with Defendant. Plaintiff further alleged that Defendant obtained her credit report without a permissible purpose as described in the FCRA. Id. at *3. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff initiated a business transaction and that it had a permissible business purpose to obtain her credit report. Id. at *5. The Court stated that Plaintiff did not claim any damages other than the statutory violation, i.e., that Defendant obtained her credit report without a permissible business purpose. Id. at *6. The Court further noted that Plaintiff did not allege that the pulling of the credit report injured her credit score or that Defendant disseminated any information in her credit report to a third-party. Id. The Court therefore determined that Plaintiff alleged that Defendant violated a substantive privacy right rather than a bare procedural violation, and so the issue was whether the violation of the FCRA is a bare procedural violation that does not rise to the level of a de facto injury-in-fact, or whether a violation of § 1681b itself constitutes an injury-in-fact. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiff argued that she was not claiming a bare procedural violation, but rather was alleging a violation of a substantive privacy right created by Congress, and the substantive privacy right gave her standing. Id. at *7. The Court held that regardless of the harm being procedural or substantive, the violation must be accompanied by an injury-in-fact to create Article III standing. Id. at *8. The Court stated that even assuming Defendant violated the FCRA by running her credit report without a permissible business purpose, Defendant did nothing with the information that would harm Plaintiff and therefore no injury occurred. The Court determined that absent disclosure to a third-party or an identifiable harm from the statutory violation, there was no privacy violation. Id. at *11. The Court concluded that Plaintiff failed to identify any concrete injury-in-fact and therefore lacked Article III standing. According, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's action.

Dreher, et al. v. Experian Information Solutions,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 8358 (4th Cir. May 11, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action alleging Defendant violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") when Defendant purposefully listed a defunct credit card company as the source of information on Plaintiff's credit report, rather than the name of credit card company's servicer. Id. at *2. The District Court granted Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment on the basis that Defendant willfully violated the FCRA. Id. at *7. The District Court found that the FCRA created a statutory right to receive the sources of information on a credit report and when Defendant failed to accurately report those sources, it violated this right, thereby creating an injury-in-fact. Id. Defendant filed an interlocutory appeal and the Fourth Circuit stayed the appeal pending the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540 (2016). Id. at *8. On further appeal, the Fourth Circuit reversed, ruling that Plaintiff failed to establish an injury-in-fact resulting from the error on his credit report. The Fourth Circuit rejected Plaintiff's argument that any technical violation of the FCRA sufficed as an injury-in-fact. Instead, the Fourth Circuit ruled that Plaintiff lacked Article III standing because Plaintiff failed to allege a concrete injury stemming from the incorrect information listed on his credit report. Id. at *16. The Fourth Circuit noted that an informational injury of this type can constitute an Article III injury-in-fact if Plaintiff establishes that he suffered a real harm with an adverse effect. Id. at *14. Relying upon Spokeo, the Fourth Circuit ruled that a statutory violation without a concrete and adverse effect does not confer standing. Id. at *17. Therefore, the Fourth Circuit held that because Plaintiff was not adversely affected by the error on his credit report and suffered no real harm, let alone the harm that Congress sought to prevent in enacting the FCRA, he lacked Article III standing. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit reversed the District Court's decision and remanded with instructions to dismiss the case.

Groshek, et al. v. Time Warner Cable, Inc.*, 865 F.3d 884 (7th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff, a job applicant, filed a class action asserting that Defendants obtained credit reports for employment purposes that did not comply with the requirements of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Plaintiff submitted 562 job applications to various employers, including Defendants. Defendants' applications allegedly included a disclosure and authorization form informing him that a consumer report may be procured in making the employment decision; the form also contained other information, such as a liability release. After Plaintiff submitted the job application, along with the signed disclosure and authorization form, Defendants requested and obtained a consumer report on him from a third-party. Id. at 886. Plaintiff alleged that Defendants' disclosure form did not contain a stand-alone disclosure and therefore violated the FCRA. Defendants moved to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, arguing that Plaintiff lacked Article III standing because he did not suffer a concrete injury. Plaintiff responded that he suffered concrete informational and privacy injuries. Id. The District Court granted Defendants' motion. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The Seventh Circuit noted that to establish injury-in-fact, pursuant to Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540, 1548 (2016), Plaintiff must show that he "suffered 'an invasion of a legally protected interest' that is 'concrete and particularized' and 'actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical.'" Id. The Seventh Circuit noted that Plaintiff did not allege that Defendants failed to provide him with a disclosure that informed him that a consumer report may be obtained for employment purposes. Id. at 887. Further, Plaintiff's complaint contained no allegation that any of the additional information caused him to not understand the consent he was giving; no allegation that he would not have provided consent but for the extraneous information on the form; no allegation that additional information caused him to be confused; and no allegation that he was unaware that a consumer report would be procured. Id. Instead, the Seventh Circuit explained that Plaintiff simply alleged that Defendant's disclosure form contained extraneous information. The Seventh Circuit stated that Plaintiff's alleged statutory violation was therefore completely removed from any concrete harm or appreciable risk of harm. The Seventh Circuit found that Congress did not enact § 1681b(b)(2)(A)(i) to protect job applicants from disclosures that do not satisfy the requirements of that section; rather, it did so to decrease the risk that a job applicant would unknowingly consent to allowing a prospective employer to procure a consumer report. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiff also failed to demonstrate that he suffered a concrete informational injury. Id. at 888. Plaintiff further alleged that, as a result of Defendants' failure to provide him with a compliant disclosure, Defendants failed to obtain a valid authorization from him to procure a consumer report in violation of § 1681b(b)(2)(A)(ii). The Seventh Circuit found that Plaintiff's allegations were conclusory, and failed to state a viable claim. Id. at 889. Because Plaintiff admitted that he signed the disclosure and authorization form, the Seventh Circuit held that Plaintiff did not suffer a concrete privacy injury. Id. The Seventh Circuit concluded that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate that he suffered a concrete injury, and therefore lacked Article III standing. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling.

Hargrett, et al. v. Amazon.com,* 235 F. Supp. 3d 1320 (M.D. Fla. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of applicants for employment, filed a consolidated class action against Defendant alleging violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant violated the FCRA because the background disclosure was part of the on-line application form. Second, Plaintiffs alleged that the background check disclosure form violated the FCRA because it contained extraneous information in violation of the statute's stand-alone requirement. Plaintiff alleged that the disclosure contained five pages of "eye-straining, tiny typeface writing" that included a liability release and additional information regarding the rights and laws under different states. Id. at 1326. Plaintiffs did not allege that they suffered any actual damages from the forms. However, they asserted that the violation was willful and sought statutory damages. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss on the grounds that the Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction and that Plaintiffs failed to state a claim pursuant to Rules 12(b)(1) and 12(b)(6). Defendant contended that Plaintiffs lacked Article III standing because they did not suffer a concrete injury. The Court disagreed, ruling that an actual or threatened injury may exist when statutes like the FCRA create legal rights. Therefore, Plaintiffs had sufficiently alleged Article III standing. The Court also ruled that Plaintiffs had sufficiently alleged that the violation was willful. The Court noted that Defendant had been engaged in "high-stakes" FCRA class action litigation for nearly a year before this lawsuit was brought and it was illogical for Defendant to argue that it was unaware of its obligations under the FCRA. Id. at 1328. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

In Re Horizon Healthcare Services Inc. Data Breach Litigation*, 846 F.3d 625 (3d Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of healthcare consumers, filed a putative class action against Defendant when laptops containing personal information regarding Plaintiffs were stolen from Defendant's headquarters. Plaintiffs allege willful and negligent violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") as well as violations of state law. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant inadequately protected their sensitive and personal information. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' lawsuit under Rule 12(b)(1) on the basis that Plaintiffs lacked Article III standing because they had not claimed a cognizable injury. The District Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss. On Plaintiffs' appeal, the Third Circuit vacated and remanded. Defendant asserted that because Plaintiffs failed to allege that any personal information was used to their detriment, the complaint was deficient on its face, since Plaintiffs suffered no injury. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant violated its responsibilities under the FCRA because Defendant failed in its responsibilities to keep Plaintiffs' personal information confidential. Plaintiffs further alleged that the violation of their statutory rights under the FCRA gave rise to a cognizable injury for purposes of Article III standing. The Third Circuit agreed and concluded that a violation of the FCRA does gives rise to an injury sufficient for purposes of Article III standing. The Third Circuit noted that when it comes to laws that protect privacy, an unlawful disclosure of private information constitutes "a clear de facto injury." Id. at 640. The Third Circuit held that when Congress enacted the FCRA, it established that the unauthorized dissemination of personal information caused an injury in and of itself, even without evidence that Plaintiffs' private information was used improperly. As such, Plaintiffs had in fact suffered a cognizable injury and the District Court erred when it dismissed the complaint. Accordingly, the Third Circuit reversed and remanded the District Court's decision.

In Re Michaels Stores, Inc. FCRA Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9310 (D.N.J. Jan. 24, 2017). Plaintiffs in three consolidated class actions alleged that Defendants' disclosure of its intent to obtain the background checks was insufficient and therefore violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Plaintiffs applied for employment at Michaels Stores, Inc. ("Michaels") through an on-line employment application. One section of the on-line application form disclosed that Michaels would be obtaining background checks on the applicants and required applicants to authorize and consent to those checks. Id. at *3. Michaels obtained background checks, which it used in making hiring decisions. All Plaintiffs were hired by Michaels. Id. at *4. Michaels filed motions to dismiss the operative complaints in the three actions for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. Michaels challenged Plaintiffs' standing, and asserted that the complaints failed to allege an injury-in-fact. Id. at *5. As a result, the Court stayed the action pending the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in the then-pending case of Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins. The Court found that Plaintiffs here, like Robins, had alleged a bare procedural violation of the FCRA. In particular, Plaintiffs alleged a violation of the stand-alone disclosure requirement, which requires that the employer's intent to obtain a background check be disclosed conspicuously in a dedicated, stand-alone document. Id. at *11. After the decision came down in Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540 (2016), the parties submitted supplemental briefing. Plaintiffs argued that the alleged FCRA violations caused them two types of concrete harm, including: (i) informational injury; and (ii) invasion of privacy. Id. at *12-13. Plaintiffs contended that they suffered an informational injury because they were deprived of disclosure "in the manner prescribed by law," i.e., as a stand-alone document. Id. at *14. The Court stated that Plaintiffs did not even allege that they suffered the harm addressed by Congress' promulgation of the stand-alone disclosure rule, i.e., that an applicant's failure to understand that he or she was authorizing an employer background check. The Court found that Plaintiffs did not allege that they did not see the disclosure, or were distracted from it, and therefore the allegations amount to no more than a bare procedural violation of the stand-alone requirement. Id. at *22. Plaintiffs also contended that, by violating the stand-alone disclosure requirement, Michaels invaded their privacy when procuring consumer reports, contrary to the FCRA. The Court determined that the procedural/substantive distinction would lose all meaning if the Court were to find that Plaintiffs have a substantive right to be free of every procedural violation. Id. at *25. The Court thereby concluded that Plaintiffs failed to allege facts which, if true, would establish that they individually possess Article III standing. Id. at *27. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' complaints with prejudice for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

In Re Michaels Stores, Inc. FCRA Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 105952 (D.N.J. July 7, 2017). Plaintiffs in three consolidated class actions alleged that Defendants' disclosure of its intent to obtain the background checks was insufficient and therefore violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Plaintiffs applied for employment at Michaels Stores, Inc. ("Michaels") through an on-line employment application. One section of the on-line application form disclosed that Michaels would be obtaining background checks on the applicants and required applicants to authorize and consent to those checks. Id. at *3. Michaels obtained background checks, which it used in making hiring decisions. All Plaintiffs were hired by Michaels. Id. Michaels filed motions to dismiss, and the Court ultimately granted the motions. Defendant filed a motion for reconsideration in Bercut v. Michaels Stores, Inc., Case No. 15-CV-5504 (the "Bercut action"), one of the MDL's subsidiary cases. Because the Bercut action, unlike the others, was originally filed in state court but removed, the Court ordered that it be remanded to state court. Id. The Court also stayed the Bercut action pending possible appeal of the decision by either party. Plaintiffs in two other actions then filed appeals with the Third Circuit, which did not encompass the Bercut action. Neither party appealed the Court's decision in the Bercut action, and thus it was remanded to state court. Defendant subsequently filed a motion for reconsideration of the Court's order vacating the stay, which permitted the earlier-ordered remand of the Bercut action to proceed. Defendant argued that the stay should remain in place pending the other cases' appeal to the Third Circuit. The Court noted that it previously stated that if no amended complaint was filed within 30 days, the stay of remand would be dissolved and the case would be remanded. Id. at *5. The Court explained that 30 days went by without an amended complaint, and another week went by before it filed the order vacating the stay. The Court then closed the file and mailed a certified copy of the order and docket to the state court. Id. at *6. The Court opined that once that had occurred, it did not have jurisdiction and therefore could not vacate a remand order. Id. The Court held that, despite fair warning, Defendant failed to seek to forestall remand until it was too late. Id. at *7. Further, the Court concluded that Supreme Court authority already established that the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction over this case and the related cases. The Court found that if state standing doctrines or state causes of action diverged from federal ones, the case might appropriately proceed in state court on some basis The Court therefore determined that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction and denied Defendant's motion for reconsideration.

Long, et al. v. Southwestern Pennsylvania Transportation Authority,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51731 (E.D. Pa. April 5, 2017). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant used an improper disclosure format to inform them that it planned to run a background check on them in violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Defendant moved to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1), and the Court granted the motion. Defendant is a public transit authority organized under the laws of the Pennsylvania with its headquarters in Philadelphia. Plaintiffs were Philadelphia residents who applied and interviewed for positions with Defendant between 2014 and 2016. Plaintiffs asserted that they completed forms disclosing prior drug-related convictions and authorizing Defendant to conduct background checks. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs claimed that the forms did not comply with the FCRA's stand-alone disclosure requirement. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that the forms contained extraneous language, including language inquiring about their educational history, employment history, probation or parole status, and job suitability. Id. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant did not provide Plaintiffs with a copy of their consumer reports or a summary of their rights under the FCRA before revoking or denying their employment offers. Id. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' FCRA claims for lack of standing on the grounds that Plaintiffs failed to pled facts that demonstrated that Plaintiffs suffered a concrete and particularized injury as a consequence of Defendant's purported FCRA violations. The Court noted that to establish an injury-in-fact, a Plaintiff must demonstrate that he has suffered harm "which is (a) [particularized and concrete] . . . and (b) actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical." Id. at *9. The Court found that Plaintiffs' allegations amounted to bare procedural violations without concrete harm. Id. at *10. However, the Court opined that Plaintiffs failed to allege any specific, identifiable trifle of injury or allege that they were harmed in any non-abstract way as a consequence of Defendant's purported FCRA violations. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant denied jobs to Plaintiffs based on their criminal history, which Plaintiffs had disclosed prior to Defendant procuring their background checks. Id. at *12. Additionally, the Court noted that Plaintiffs did not allege that their reports were inaccurate in any way. Taking all of Plaintiffs' allegations as true, the Court determined that Defendant's purported FCRA violations did not cause the type of harm to Plaintiffs, or present any material risk of harm, that would give rise to a de facto injury. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiffs did not met their burden of establishing that they suffered an injury-in-fact that would enable them to assert viable claims under the FCRA. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Miller, et al. v. TransUnion LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7622 (M.D. Pa. Jan. 18, 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants violated § 1681g(a) of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") when it provided him with a misleading and confusing on-line personal credit report that failed to clearly and accurately disclose all information in his file. Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant provided him with a report that could be read to suggest that his name came up as a possible match on a list maintained by the U.S. Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control ("OFAC") of terrorists, drug traffickers, money launderers, and other enemies of the United States. Id. at *2. Plaintiff sought to represent a class of more than 13,000 other consumers that had disclosures that were deficient in the same way. Defendant opposed Plaintiff's motion for class certification, and challenged his ability to bring claims at all, arguing that he had not suffered a sufficiently "concrete" injury necessary for standing under Article III. Id. at *9-10. The Magistrate Judge first determined that Plaintiff's § 1681g(a) claim stated something more than a "bare procedural violation." Id. at *18. The Magistrate Judge found that it was not difficult to appreciate how the dissemination of the confusing OFAC disclosure could be a concrete harm, since it could cause emotional distress for the recipient, particularly as it could be complicated by the uncertainty as to whether Defendant was reporting the recipient as a match to the OFAC database, and because of a perceived inability to dispute the disclosure. Id. at *19. The Magistrate Judge thereby recommended that the Court conclude that Plaintiff had standing to sue under Article III. The Magistrate Judge also analyzed Plaintiff's class certification motion. First, with respect to numerosity, the Magistrate Judge stated that it was undisputed that the proposed class exceeded 13,000 individuals. Id. at *24. Since there was no real dispute between the parties that the scope of the potential class satisfied the numerosity requirement in Rule 23(a), the Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court find that the class was so numerous that joinder of all members would be impracticable. Id. The Magistrate Judge opined that Plaintiff had established commonality, since there were questions of fact and law that were common to the class that would predominate over any questions that affected only individual class members. Id. at *24. The Magistrate Judge held that Plaintiff also satisfied the typicality requirement because he made a showing that each member of the putative class was subject to the same improper form disclosure regarding the OFAC list alerts, and Plaintiff's claims and those of the class members thus arose from the same alleged course of conduct and theory of liability. Id. at *28. The Magistrate Judge found no issues with respect to the qualifications, experience, and suitability of Plaintiff's counsel, and their past experience in class action litigation, including past certifications and engagements that included trial of class actions through verdict. Id. at *30. The Magistrate Judge further stated that a common issue gave rise to the claims of all class members, and recommended that the Court find that common issues predominated over individual issues. Id. at *31. The Magistrate Judge also held that class action was a superior method of fairly and efficiently adjudicating the claims because of the large number of Plaintiffs and because the likely recovery on an individual basis may be relatively low, which could have the effect of discouraging scattered individual suits, despite a large number of consumers having potential claims. Id. at *32. Accordingly, the Magistrate Judge recommended that the Court grant Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Moore, et al. v. Rite Aid HDQTS Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 209908 (E.D. Penn. Dec. 21, 2017). Plaintiff filed a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") in its use of LEXISNexis Screening Solutions, Inc.' ("LEXISNexis") employment screening services. Plaintiff moved for class certification pursuant to Rule 23 and Defendant moved to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1). The Court granted

Defendant's motion to dismiss and denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification. Plaintiff was an applicant for employment and Defendant made a conditional offer of employment pending the results of a LEXISNexis' background check. Id. at *2. LEXISNexis automatically mailed pre-adverse action notices to applicants who were labeled non-competitive based upon the results of their background check. After Plaintiff was adjudicated non-competitive, LEXISNexis mailed her a pre-adverse action notice and informed her that she had five business days within which to provide mitigating information, or otherwise the offer of employment would be terminated. Plaintiff contacted Defendant and supplied mitigating facts prior to the expiration of the five days. Subsequently, she received a rejection notice dated five business days after the date of the pre-adverse action notice. Plaintiff's first complaint named LEXISNexis as a co-Defendant. Plaintiff settled with LEXISNexis and then dismissed it from the action. Plaintiff subsequently filed an amended class action complaint naming only Defendant and alleged that LEXISNexis was acting on behalf of Defendant as its agent. Plaintiff asserted that LEXISNexis' adjudication of an applicant as non-competitive was an adverse action taken prior to the mailing of the pre-adverse action notices because LEXISNexis uniformly mailed adverse action notices exactly five days after mailing the pre-adverse action notices. Defendant moved to dismiss on the grounds that Plaintiff: (i) lacked standing to challenge Defendant's failure to adhere to the five days referenced in the pre-adverse action notice because she discussed her background report with Defendant; and (ii) released Defendant from any claims that were premised on LEXISNexis' conduct. The Court agreed with the defense arguments and determined that Plaintiff did not suffer a concrete harm because Plaintiff contacted Defendant within the five-day period and took full advantage of her procedural rights under the FCRA and any procedural violation of the FCRA was insufficient to establish a concrete harm. The Court further held that Plaintiff's remaining claims rested on the fact that Defendant acted through its agent LEXISNexis and pursuant to Pennsylvania law, Plaintiff released Defendant as the principal because she released its agent, LEXISNexis for the same conduct. Id. at *40. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss and denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification as moot. Id. at *47.

Pedro, et al. v. Equifax,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 16167 (11th Cir. Aug. 24, 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, filed a class action alleging that Defendants violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Plaintiff was listed as an authorized user on her parents' credit card account, which later went into default. Defendant TransUnion LLC, a consumer reporting agency, listed the delinquent account on Plaintiff's credit report with a notation that she was an authorized user of the account. TransUnion also included the account when calculating Plaintiff's credit score, which caused her credit score to fall. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant failed to "follow reasonable procedures to assure maximum possible accuracy of the information concerning the individual about whom the report relates" in violation of the FCRA. Id. at *2. The District Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss for failing to allege a plausible claim for relief. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision, finding that was not objectively unreasonable for TransUnion to interpret § 1681e(b) of the FCRA to permit it to report an account for which a consumer is an authorized user. Id. at *3. The Eleventh Circuit explained that Plaintiff had standing because she alleged that she suffered an injury-in-fact that was both concrete and particular because the harm caused by the alleged violation affected her personally. Id. at *7. To that end, the Eleventh Circuit noted that Plaintiff's credit score dropped 100 points as a result of the challenged conduct. Because Plaintiff alleged that she suffered an injury-in-fact, the Eleventh Circuit stated that she had standing to bring her claims. Id. at *8. The Eleventh Circuit opined that to establish that TransUnion willfully failed to comply with § 1681e(b), Plaintiff must establish that TransUnion either knowingly or recklessly violated that section. The Eleventh Circuit explained that an agency recklessly violates the FCRA if it takes an action that "is not only a violation under a reasonable reading of the statute's terms, but shows that the company ran a risk of violating the law substantially greater than the risk associated with a reading that was merely careless." Id. at *9. A consumer reporting agency that adopts a reading of the Act that is "not objectively unreasonable" based on the text of the Act, judicial precedent, or guidance from administrative agencies "falls well short of raising the 'unjustifiably high risk' of violating the statute necessary for reckless liability." Id. Relative to the record before it, the Eleventh Circuit held that TransUnion adopted an interpretation of the Act that was objectively reasonable. TransUnion could have reasonably interpreted the Act to permit it to report that Plaintiff was an authorized user on her parents' credit card account because it could have understood the standard of "maximum possible accuracy," 15 U.S.C. § 1681e(b), to require only that TransUnion report information that is technically accurate. Id. at *12. The Eleventh Circuit opined that Defendant's interpretation was not objectively unreasonable because it had a "foundation in the statutory text and a sufficiently convincing justification." Id. Further, the Eleventh Circuit found that Plaintiff cited no judicial precedent or agency guidance that stated that reporting information about accounts for which a consumer is an authorized user fails to meet the standard of maximum possible accuracy. Because TransUnion adopted an interpretation of the Act that was not objectively unreasonable, the Eleventh Circuit found that it did not willfully violate the FCRA. Accordingly, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling granting Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Ramirez, et al. v. Trans Union, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 184560 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 7, 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") through its OFAC name screen alert. The OFAC name screen alert or OFAC alert is a service that Trans Union provides to its customers, which identifies persons whose names match individuals on the United States government's list of terrorists, drug traffickers, and others with whom Americans are prohibited from doing business. Id. at *1-2. After a jury returned a verdict in Plaintiff's favor and awarded statutory and punitive damages of more than $60 million, Defendant moved for judgment as matter of law, or in the alternative, for new trial. Defendant also requested the awarded damages be reduced. The Court denied Defendant's motion. The Court found that the jury's verdict was supported by substantial evidence and there was no basis to set aside the award of statutory and punitive damages. Id. at *8. The Court stated that the trial record included substantial evidence from which a jury could have reached its verdict, and it therefore denied Defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law. As to the motion for a new trial, Defendant maintained that Plaintiff's counsel made inflammable statements during trial. The Court noted that to the extent Defendant took exception to the remarks of Plaintiff's counsel, defense counsel should have objected and sought appropriate relief from the Court. Further, in evaluating the likelihood of prejudice from the comments, the Court considered "the totality of circumstances, including the nature of the comments, their frequency, their possible relevancy to the real issues before the jury, the manner in which the parties and the Court treated the comments, the strength of the case, and the verdict itself." Id. at *9. The Court found that Defendant made no such comparable showing here. Accordingly, the Court also denied Defendant's motion for a new trial. In addition, the Court held that substantial evidence supported the jury's conclusion that Defendant willfully violated 15 U.S.C. §§ 1681e(b), 1681g(a), and 1681g(c), and that the award was proportionate to the harm shown by the trial evidence. Therefore, the Court found no basis to set aside the statutory damages award. The Court noted that the FCRA also allows punitive damages for willful non-compliance with its provisions in such amount "as the Court may allow." Here, the jury awarded punitive damages of $6,353.08 per class member, which amounted to a total award of more than $50 million. Id. at *20. The Court opined that Defendant offered no support for the proposition that because the class received statutory damages they should not also receive punitive damages despite the express statutory statement that statutory and punitive damages are available for willful violations. Id. at *21. Accordingly, the Court also denied Defendant's request to reduce the damages award.

Rosario, et al. v. Starbucks Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 177159 (W.D. Wash. Oct. 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a job applicant, filed a class action alleging that Defendant took adverse employment action against him before providing him with a copy of his background report and a summary of his rights as an applicant in violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Plaintiff applied and interviewed for a barista position and received a conditional offer of employment, pending the results of a background check completed by Accurate Background ("Accurate"), a third-party screening service. Id. at *2. Defendant received Plaintiff's background report from Accurate, which included inaccurate criminal record information that had been attributed to Plaintiff's adoptive brother. Defendant then removed Plaintiff from hiring consideration based on the background report. Accurate sent Plaintiff a letter on behalf of Defendant, informing him that his background check did not meet Defendant's requirements and that he could appeal the decision. The letter also stated that if Plaintiff's appeal was successful, his offer of employment would be reinstituted. Id. at *3. Plaintiff called Accurate and disputed the results of his background check, and the report was corrected shortly after. Id. However, Defendant did not reinstitute Plaintiff's job offer. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss for lack of standing and failure to state a claim. The Court denied the motion. Defendant argued that Plaintiff lacked Article III standing because he failed to allege facts demonstrating that he suffered an injury. Plaintiff asserted that he lost his job opportunity when Defendant adopted Accurate's adjudication of his job application before he was able to obtain a correction of his background report. The Court found that assuming the truth of the complaint's factual allegations and crediting all reasonable inferences arising from those allegations, it was plausible that Plaintiff did not have an opportunity to contest Accurate's adjudication before he was removed from hiring consideration. The Court reasoned that this was not a "mere procedural violation" as Defendant contended, but a concrete injury sufficient to establish Article III standing. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss to the extent that it requested that the Court dismiss Plaintiff's claims due to lack of standing. Defendant also argued that Plaintiff has not sufficiently pled that it took adverse action against him prior to when Accurate sent Plaintiff a letter indicating that his background check did not meet Defendant's requirements for hiring. Id. at *9. However, Plaintiff contended that adverse action actually occurred when Accurate adjudicated his application for employment based on Defendant's hiring requirements and when Defendant "adopted" that adjudication. Id. at *10. The Court ruled that adoption of an adjudication that Plaintiff was ineligible for employment was a decision for employment purposes that adversely affected Plaintiff. Accordingly, the Court also denied Defendant's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim.

Saltzberg, et al. v. Home Depot, USA, Inc., Case No. 17-CV-5798 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 18, 2017). Plaintiff, a job applicant, filed a class action on behalf of herself and all those similarly-situated, alleging that Defendant violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") by failing to make proper disclosures and failing to obtain proper authorization when running a background check. Plaintiff sought employment with Lifetime Solutions, a service provider for Defendant. In connection with her employment application, Plaintiff completed Defendant's standard background check forms. Defendant conducted a background check and Plaintiff was subsequently hired. Plaintiff asserted that although Defendant's background check was two pages long, it constituted one document, and therefore the inclusion of the liability release provision on the page with the disclosure violated the FCRA's requirement that the disclosures be on a separate document. Id. at 2. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiff failed to sufficiently allege Article III standing. Id. at 3. The Court found that Plaintiff failed to plead even general allegations of an injury in her complaint. The Court explained that merely asserting a violation of the FCRA was insufficient to confer standing without connecting it to a concrete injury. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1).

Stephens, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., Case No. 16-CV-62723 (S.D. Fla. Oct. 23, 2017). Plaintiff, a job applicant, filed a class action alleging that Defendant's background check process violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Plaintiff applied for a job with Defendant and received a conditional offer of employment, pending the results of a successful background check. Defendant sent Plaintiff's application to Sterling Infosystems, a credit reporting service, which ran the background check and found two prior felony convictions. Sterling sent Plaintiff a letter advising him that his report likely would have an adverse impact on Plaintiff's ability to obtain employment with Defendant, included a copy of the report, and instructed Plaintiff to contact Sterling if the report was inaccurate. Id. at 2. Plaintiff did not contact Sterling because the report was accurate. Id. Defendant subsequently sent Plaintiff an adverse-action letter. Id. at 3. Plaintiff argued that Defendant violated the FCRA when it failed to provide him with a pre-adverse-action notice of his unfavorable consumer report and failed to provide him with an opportunity to challenge the report. Id. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiff lacked standing because he failed to establish a concrete injury. The Court agreed, and determined that Plaintiff failed to allege a sufficient degree of risk to satisfy the concreteness requirement of standing. Id. at 5. The Court held that Plaintiff only identified bare procedural violations of the FCRA – delayed notice and opportunity to challenge – that carried no material risk of harm because Plaintiff ultimately received both notice of the unfavorable consumer report and an opportunity to challenge the report. Id. at 7. Accordingly, the Court found that the alleged procedural violations posed no threat to the FCRA's purpose of ensuring fair and accurate consumer reporting. Id. As a result, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

Syed, et al. v. M-1, LLC, 846 F.3d 1034 (9th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action on behalf of himself and similarly-situated individuals alleging that Defendant violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Id. at 1037. Plaintiff applied for a job with Defendant in 2011. Defendant provided Syed with a document labeled "Pre-Employment Disclosure Release." Id. at 1038. The release informed Plaintiff that his credit history and other information could be collected and used as a basis for the employment decision, authorized Defendant to procure Plaintiff's consumer report, and stipulated that, by signing the document, Plaintiff was waiving his rights to sue Defendant and its agents for violations of the FCRA. Id. at 1039. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's inclusion of the liability waiver violated the FCRA's requirement that the disclosure document consist "solely" of the disclosure. Id. Plaintiff sought statutory damages pursuant to § 1681n(a)(1)(A), punitive damages pursuant to § 1681n(a)(2), and attorneys' fees and costs pursuant to § 1681n(a)(3). The District Court dismissed Plaintiff's complaint for failure to state a claim, reasoning that Plaintiff had not sufficiently plead willfulness. At the outset, the Ninth Circuit found that Plaintiff established Article III standing because he alleged more than a "bare procedural violation." Id. The Ninth Circuit then stated that neither the Supreme Court nor any other circuits had previously addressed whether a prospective employer could satisfy § 1681b(b)(2)(A) by providing a disclosure on a document that also includes a liability waiver. Id. The Ninth Circuit explained that the District Court also avoided the interpretive question, holding only that Defendant's view that it had not violated the FCRA, whether correct or not, was "not objectively unreasonable," and that Defendant therefore could not be held liable for statutory or punitive damages. Id. at 1040. The Ninth Circuit concluded that Defendant's inclusion of the liability waiver violated the plain text of the FCRA. Id. In considering whether that violation was willful, the Ninth Circuit held that § 1681b(b)(2)(A) unambiguously requires that a document consists "solely of the disclosure." Id. at 1041. The Ninth Circuit found that the statute's explicit language could not be interpreted as permitting the inclusion of a liability waiver. Id. at 1043. The Ninth Circuit opined that Defendant's inclusion of a liability waiver in the statutorily mandated disclosure document did not comply with any reasonable interpretation of § 1681b(b)(2)(A), and therefore Defendant's interpretation was "objectively unreasonable." Id. at 1045. The Ninth Circuit reasoned that 15 U.S.C. § 1681b(b)(2)(A)(i) creates a right to information by requiring prospective employers to inform job applicants that they intend to procure their consumer reports as part of the employment application process. Further, the authorization requirement within § 1681b(b)(2)(A)(ii) creates a right to privacy by enabling applicants to withhold permission to obtain the report from the prospective employer, and thereby causing a concrete injury when applicants are deprived of their ability to meaningfully authorize the credit check. The Ninth Circuit concluded that by providing a private cause of action for violations of § 1681b(b)(2)(A), Congress recognized the harm such violations cause, and thus articulating a "chain[ ] of causation that will give rise to a case or controversy." Id. at 1047. The Ninth Circuit ruled that Defendant willfully violated the FCRA by procuring Plaintiff's consumer report without providing a disclosure "in a document that consist[ed] solely of the disclosure." Id. at 1048. Therefore, the Ninth Circuit held that the District Court erred in dismissing Plaintiff's complaint, and reversed and remanded the decision for further proceedings.

Tyus, et al. v. United States Postal Service,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 94665 (E.D. Wis. June 20, 2017). Plaintiff, an employee, filed a class action asserting that Defendant performed a criminal background check that violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Plaintiff applied for security clearance to work at Defendant, which contracted with General Information Services Inc. ("GIS") to perform criminal background checks on job seekers. Defendant procured Plaintiff's criminal background report from GIS and provided Plaintiff with a copy, telling him that if "you believe the report to be inaccurate or incomplete, please fax the completed disclosure/ dispute form to GIS within five (5) business days from the date of this letter." Id. at *2. Plaintiff alleged that the report contained several inaccuracies, but before the five days to address the inaccuracies expired, Defendant informed Plaintiff that, based on the GIS report, it had denied Plaintiff's request for a security clearance. Defendant moved to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1) and 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. The Court denied the motion. The Court found that Plaintiff alleged more than a mere procedural violation. Plaintiff's complaint asserted a number of inaccuracies in the GIS report that collectively portrayed Plaintiff in a negative light. Id. at *9. The Court noted that it was fair to infer that the inaccuracies increased the chances that Plaintiff would be denied a security clearance. The Court held that had Plaintiff been given a reasonable opportunity to address those inaccuracies, it might have resulted in a different decision by Defendant as to whether to grant Plaintiff security clearance. The Court concluded that Plaintiff alleged a plausible claim that he suffered an injury-in-fact that was fairly traceable to Defendant's alleged violation of the FCRA. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Vera, et al. v. Mondelez Global LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38328 (N.D. Ill. Mar 17, 2017). Plaintiff alleged that Defendant used an improper disclosure format to inform him that it planned to run a background check on his personal history before hiring him in violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Defendant moved to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1), and the Court granted the motion. Plaintiff applied on-line for a job with Defendant. As part of the application process, the website displayed a statement related to the general topic of background checks (the "Statement"). Id. at *2. Plaintiff alleged that the Statement misstated his rights under the FCRA, and included various other information about his rights and Defendant's obligations should he be hired. Id. at *3. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's Statement violated the FCRA's stand-alone disclosure requirement. Id. Defendant argued that the Court did not have subject-matter jurisdiction over Plaintiff's claim because he failed to allege an injury-in-fact. Defendant asserted that even if Plaintiff alleged that Defendant failed to comply with the stand-alone disclosure requirement in § 1681b, Plaintiff failed to allege that he was harmed by that failure. Id. at *3-4. The Court found that Plaintiff did not allege that Defendant's Statement failed to disclose the fact that it sought to procure a background check report about him as part of his employment application, nor did Plaintiff allege that he denied Defendant the opportunity to conduct an investigation. Id. at *5-6. The Court determined that the question was whether a violation of the stand-alone aspect of the disclosure requirement was sufficient on its own to establish constitutional harm for Article III standing purposes. Id. at *6. Defendant contended that the stand-alone requirement is a bare procedural requirement akin to the FCRA procedural violation at issue in Spokeo v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540 (2016), which the Supreme Court held did not establish constitutional harm in and of itself. Id. In Spokeo, the Supreme Court addressed § 1681e of the FCRA, which requires "[e]very consumer reporting agency [to] maintain reasonable procedures designed to avoid [improper or incorrect disclosure of personal information] and to limit the furnishing of consumer reports to [certain permitted circumstances]." Id. at *9. The Court reasoned that Congress imposed the stand-alone obligation on employers to decrease the risk that prospective employees would be unaware that they were granting prospective employers access to their private information, and to increase their opportunity to challenge any errors in the report. Id. The Court explained that a failure to comply with the procedures might cause the statutorily identified harm, i.e., inaccurate and unauthorized reporting, but a procedural violation would not necessarily cause that harm, so the procedural violation by itself was not an injury-in-fact. Id. Moreover, the Court found that Plaintiff did not allege that he suffered the harm Congress intended the FCRA to prevent, as Plaintiff did not allege that Defendant failed to disclose that it intended to run a background check nor did he allege that he denied Defendant permission to do so. Id. at *10-11. The Court held that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate that he suffered an injury-in-fact, and it therefore it did not have subject-matter jurisdiction. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Wilson, et al. v. CoreLogic Saferent,* LLC, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 162928 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 29, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action alleging Defendant violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") when it providing his prospective landlord with a background report including a previous conviction that had been vacated. Id. at *1. Defendant moved for partial summary judgment on two of Plaintiff's claims, and Plaintiff moved for class certification. The Court denied both motions. The FCRA provides that "whenever a consumer reporting agency prepares a consumer report it shall follow reasonable procedures to assure maximum possible accuracy of the information concerning the individual about whom the report relates." Id. at *7. The Court noted that the elements of a negligence claim under this provision are: "(i) inaccuracy; (ii) failure to follow reasonable procedures; (iii) actual damages and (iv) causation." Id. Defendant contended that it was entitled to summary judgment on the question of whether it followed "reasonable procedures." Id. The Court concluded, however, that summary judgment was not appropriate because a genuine factual dispute existed as to the reasonableness of Defendant's procedures. Id. at *7-8. Defendant asserted that its procedures were reasonable as a matter of law because it relied on records obtained from the New York Department of Corrections ("NYDOC"), a governmental agency tasked with collecting, maintaining, and analyzing the "criminal history" data of incarcerated persons. Id. at *8. In response, Plaintiff pointed to evidence of the NYDOC's unreliability, which he claimed was sufficient to permit a jury to conclude that Defendant's reliance on the agency was unreasonable. Id. at *9. Plaintiff offered evidence that the NYDOC generally updated its database only quarterly, and sometimes only every six months. Id. Finally, Plaintiff maintained that the NYDOC was responsible for statistical data relating only to individuals under its jurisdiction –i.e., incarcerated individuals – while the statutory authority to maintain criminal history record information, i.e., information relating to "arrest and disposition data," was vested in the New York State Division of Criminal Justice Service. Id. at *9. The Court concluded that the reasonableness of Defendant's procedures was not "beyond question." Id. Further, the Court noted that to accept Defendant's argument – that reliance on information obtained from a governmental agency, regardless of context, categorically insulates a credit reporting agency from liability – would severely undermine the FCRA's remedial purpose. Id. The Court found that a fact-finder should decide whether Defendant failed to employ reasonable procedures to ensure maximum possible accuracy when it reported inaccurate criminal history information about Plaintiff without consulting any judicial records. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for partial summary judgment. Plaintiff sought to certify a class of consumers who were the subject of a consumer report prepared by Defendant who subsequently disputed that the report contained one or more items of criminal or public record information that had been expunged, vacated, sealed, dismissed, or otherwise removed from the public record. Id. at *15. The Court found that Plaintiff failed to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the proposed class would meet the numerosity requirement of Rule 23(a)(1). Id. at *16-17. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

(xxx) Federal Tort Claims Act Class Actions

Pieper, et al. v. United States*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 20796 (4th Cir. Oct. 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of current and former residents of Frederick, filed a lawsuit contending that the United States Army was negligent both in its initial disposal of toxic materials and in its failure to fully correct the resulting contamination in violation of the Federal Tort Claims Act ("FTCA"). Plaintiffs alleged that they and their family members had contracted (or feared contracting) cancer, autoimmune disorders, and other diseases from exposure to this waste. Id. at *4. Defendant moved to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1), arguing that the District Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction to hear the case because the suit was barred under the discretionary function exception to the FTCA. The District Court concluded that the Plaintiffs could not meet their burden to prove that the District Court had subject-matter jurisdiction. Id. On appeal, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The District Court explained that the FTCA effects only a "limited waiver" of the federal government's sovereign immunity from suit. Id. Through the FTCA, the government has allowed itself to be sued for some tort claims, but not all, and the statute identifies several exceptions to its waiver of immunity. Id. Specifically, under 28 U.S.C. § 2680(a), the United States retains its immunity from suit as to any claim "based upon the exercise or performance or the failure to exercise or perform a discretionary function or duty on the part of a federal agency or an employee of the Government, whether or not the discretion involved be abused." Id. at *5. The District Court recognized, because waivers of sovereign immunity must be strictly construed, an FTCA Plaintiff bears the burden of proving that the government conduct in question does not fall within the discretionary function exception. The District Court considered Plaintiffs' documents, and determined that the direction they provided was neither mandatory nor specific enough to bind the Army. Regarding the Executive Orders issued by President Richard Nixon, the District Court held that any duties imposed by the orders were pitched at a high level of generality and gave the Army no "specified instructions that it was compelled to follow." Id. at *9. As to the Fort Detrick Regulation 385-1, the District Court found that it too was neither "mandatory nor sufficiently specific to bind the Army," and also noted that the very conduct Plaintiffs challenged – the disposal of potentially contaminated materials in Area B – was expressly contemplated by the regulation itself. Id. On appeal, the Fourth Circuit agreed with the District Court that the Army's waste disposal and remediation practices at Fort Detrick fell squarely within the discretionary function exception to the FTCA. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling dismissing Plaintiffs' claims.

(xxxi) Foreign Worker And Labor Issues Class Actions

Trickey, et al. v. Brolick*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 107951 (S.D.N.Y. July 11, 2017). Plaintiff, a shareholder of Wendy's, brought a derivative action on behalf of Wendy's against 10 of the company's 11 members of the Board of Directors (the "Board"). Plaintiff alleged that the Board breached its fiduciary duty to the company by declining to cause Wendy's to join an industry alliance between farms and food retailers called the Fair Food Program ("FFP"). Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court granted. The FFP is an "alliance among farmers, farm workers, major restaurant chains, and retail food companies that ensures humane wages and working conditions" for farm workers. Id. at *2-3. Defendants sought dismissal on the ground that Plaintiff to plead either that he made a pre-suit demand on Wendy's Board that it file a breach of fiduciary duty lawsuit based on Wendy's failure to join the FFP, or the futility of such a demand, as required by Rule 23.1. Id. at *5. Plaintiff conceded that he never made a demand upon the Board. However, Plaintiff argued that a demand would have been futile, as revealed by the fact that he did not receive documents in response to his books and records request The Court found that Plaintiff failed to make any factual allegations shedding light on the Board's ostensible decision not to participate in the FFP. Id. at *11. Further, the Court held that Plaintiff's complaint was devoid of particularized factual allegations that any Defendants "acted in bad faith or were not adequately informed" when making that decision. Id. at *12. Given its threadbare pleadings as to these ingredients, the Court stated that the complaint effectively disabled it from finding that the Board's decision not to participate in the program was reached through an irrational process or one employed other than in a "good faith effort to advance corporate interests." Id. at *17. The Court also determined that the complaint was silent as to the data before the Board or the Board's reasons for not deciding to decline participation in the FFP program. With such centrally relevant information missing, the Court found it impossible to conclude that the Board's decision was outside the wide bounds of defensible business judgment. To the contrary, the Court noted that Plaintiff provided facially defensible justification for Wendy's not to participate because doing so imposed a price premium. Id. at *17-18. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim.

Zuniga, et al. v. Masse Contracting,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 191376 (E.D. La. Nov. 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, two workers from Honduras, brought claims under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act ("TVPA"), the Louisiana Victims of Human Trafficking Act ("LVHTA"), and the FLSA. Plaintiffs also brought claims for a civil rights conspiracy under 42 U.S.C. § 1985(3), race discrimination under 42 U.S.C. § 1981, and state law tort claims. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants recruited them in Honduras under a visa program to be welders in the United States and after paying for the visa and arriving in the United States, they were trafficked to work as general laborers. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants deducted housing and transportation costs from their pay, which brought their pay below minimum wage and that they were paid separately by sub-contractors to avoid overtime pay. Defendants moved to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6). The Court dismissed Plaintiffs' state law tort claims. Id. at *7. Defendants asserted that Plaintiffs' claims of workplace injury were barred because the Louisiana Worker's Compensation Law ("LWCL") was their exclusive remedy for workplace injuries. The Court agreed and ruled that Plaintiffs' claims for physical injuries and fear of contracting mesothelioma did not fall within the intentional tort exception of the LWCL and were therefore barred by the LWCL's exclusivity provision. Id. Second, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' FLSA claims because Plaintiffs did not allege: (i) a date range for which worked; (ii) an approximation of the hours for which they were not compensated: or (iii) any instance in which they were not paid overtime. Plaintiffs' complaint alleged that they were paid minimum wage and failed to allege which Defendant they considered to be their employer and whether that entity was subject to the provisions of the FLSA. The Court held that these allegations were insufficient to put Defendants on notice regarding Plaintiffs' FLSA claims, and therefore it dismissed the claims. Id. at *9. Third, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claims for a civil rights conspiracy under 42 U.S.C. § 1985 because conclusory allegations of conspiracy, absent any reference to material facts, failed to state a substantial claim of federal conspiracy. The Court opined that the essence of a conspiracy is an understanding or agreement between the conspirators, and Plaintiffs' complaint did not include any allegations regarding any agreement between Defendants to join in a conspiracy. Plaintiffs' conclusory allegations that Defendants formed a conspiracy to solicit individuals of Hispanic descent to use them in an illegal forced labor scheme lacked the requisite specificity to support a conspiracy claim. Id. at *11. Fourth, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1981 as to their national origin discrimination claim and determined that this was not a cognizable claim under § 1981. However, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs' allegations that they were targeted because of their Hispanic descent were sufficient to state a claim for racial discrimination under § 1981, and it denied Defendants' motion as to those claims. Id. at *12. Fifth, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' TVPA claims because Plaintiffs' complaint did not contain any allegations of force, threats, restraint, or fear that they believed they would suffer retribution of any kind for their failure to perform labor, as such was a necessary element of the TVPA. Id. at *13. Sixth, the Court dismissed the Plaintiffs' claims under the LVHTA and concluded that Plaintiffs' claims that they were solicited as part of a legal work program under false pretenses did not rise to the level of "fraud, force, or coercion" as defined in the LVHTA. Id. at *15. Finally, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claims against Defendant Craig Masse as Plaintiffs did not allege any acts taken personally by him or that he was affiliated with any of the Defendant entities. Accordingly, the Court dismissed all of Plaintiffs' claims against all Defendants with prejudice, except Plaintiffs' claim for race discrimination under 42 U.S.C. § 1981. Id. at *16.

(xxxii) Government Enforcement Litigation

AARP v. EEOC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 208965 (D.D.C. Dec. 20, 2017). Plaintiff, the American Association for Retired Persons ("AARP"), filed an action alleging that the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission's ("EEOC") decision to promulgate regulations for wellness plans went against Congressional intent by forcing employees to disclose personal information under the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") and spousal information under the Genetic Information Non-Discrimination Act ("GINA"). The Court found that the EEOC failed to adequately explain its decision to construe the term "voluntary" in the ADA and the GINA to permit the 30% incentive level adopted in both the ADA rule and the GINA rule on wellness plans. Id. at *2. However, in light of the potential for disruption if the Court vacated the challenged rules in the middle of a plan year, the Court remanded without vacatur "for the present." Id. Plaintiff subsequently filed a motion to reconsider, and requested that the Court vacate the rules or issue an order barring enforcement of the rules. Alternatively, Plaintiff requested the Court to vacate the rules, but only apply the order to health plans that start at least six months after the order is issued. While the Court agreed with the EEOC that vacating the rules in 2018 would be too disruptive for employers and employees, it held that vacatur was the usual solution when an agency fails to provide a reasoned explanation for its regulations . Accordingly, the Court vacated the challenged portions of the rules, with an effective date of January 1, 2019. The Court found that there was significant evidence in the record that employers need to know the regulatory incentive structure for the following year by June or July at the latest, so as to have enough time to develop their wellness plans. Id. at *7. The Court reasoned that it could not simply assume that employers would be able to justify their wellness plans "on the fly" or that employees would be able to handle a shift in their health care plans on such short notice. Id. at *8. However, the Court noted that moving further into the future the balancing test begins to shift toward vacatur. Id. at *9. The Court found that the EEOC's arguments against Plaintiff's motion revolve around the harm that employers and employees would face if the Court were to vacate the rules weeks before the 2018 wellness plans came into effect. The Court therefore found that given that the EEOC had suggested that businesses need six months' lead time to adjust to a change in the regulatory scheme, and longest lead time for which any commenter asked during the EEOC's notice-and-comment process was 12 months, the Court reasoned that vacating the order as of January 1, 2019 would avoid any substantial disruptive effect; in effect, this would give the EEOC over a year "to come up with interim or new permanent rules by the time" that the vacatur would become effective. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion to alter or amend judgment.

National Federation Of Independent Businesses, et al. v. U.S. Department Of Labor,* Case No. 16-CV-066 (N.D. Tex. Jan. 18, 2017). In this Department of Labor dispute, the Court granted Plaintiff and Intervener-Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment and denied the motion for summary judgment of the U.S. Department of Labor (DOL), holding that the regulation at issue – as to changes to the DOL overtime rules – was unlawful and issued a nationwide injunction preventing the implementation of the rule. The Court ordered the parties to file additional briefing concerning their entitlement to attorneys' fees. Id. at 2. Intervener-Plaintiffs filed a response indicating that they sought reimbursement only for expenses in the amount of $3,457,25. Plaintiffs sought reimbursements as prevailing parties under the Equal Access to Justice Act ("EAJA"). Plaintiffs contended that they engaged in 1,800.8 hours of reimbursable work and proposed three different fee amounts to determine their recovery. Id. Plaintiffs further sought to recover $12,133.69 in costs and $5,727.31 in expert fees. Id. at 2-3. The Court found that Plaintiffs' claimed time should be reduced by 175 hours for work done by paralegals and law students. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs should be awarded attorneys' fees for 1,625.8 hours of compensable work with a rate of $193.01 per hour. Id. at 3. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for attorneys' fees and costs.

United States v. Pennsylvania,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 163484 (M.D. Pa. Oct. 2, 2017). The U.S. Department of Justice ("DOJ") alleged that Defendant engaged in a pattern or practice of unlawful discrimination because its use of physical fitness tests to screen and select applicants for entry- level trooper positions had an unlawful disparate impact on female applicants who were hired at significantly lower rates than male applicants. Id. at *8. Specifically, the DOJ challenged Defendant's use of the 2003 and 2009 Physical Readiness Tests ("PRT") to screen and select applicants for trooper positions. The Court granted the DOJ's motion for summary judgment and denied Defendant's motion. Defendant moved for summary judgment on the grounds that: (1) disparate impact claims are not cognizable under 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-6(a); (2) Title VII on its face prohibits different employment standards based on sex; and (3) the DOJ failed to establish the last element of its burden by suggesting the adoption of gender-based fitness tests as an alternative selection device to the PRT. Id. at *14. The DOJ moved for partial summary judgment and asserted that it had satisfied the first prong of the Title VII burden-shifting framework by showing that women passed the 2003 PRT and 2009 PRT at statistically significant lower rates than men. Defendant's principal argument was that Title VII disparate impact claims were not within the jurisdiction of the Court under § 707(a) because of the U.S. Supreme Court's recent opinion in Texas Department of Housing & Community Affairs v. Inclusive Communities Project, Inc., 135 S. Ct. 2507 (2015), which, according to Defendant, set forth the proper analysis to interpret statutes that purported to create a cause of action for disparate impact. The Court rejected Defendant's argument and concluded that Inclusive Communities was not supervening new law that affected the Court's jurisdiction over Title VII disparate impact cases. Id. at *17. As such, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment. The DOJ argued that it was entitled to partial summary judgment because it established prong one of Title VII's three-prong burden shifting test. Id. at *18. Specifically, the DOJ asserted that it proved through statistical evidence that Defendant's use of the 2003 PRT and 2009 PRT had a disparate impact on women. The Court agreed that there was no genuine issue of material fact regarding the first prong of the disparate impact analysis. Id. at *33. The DOJ's expert provided a comprehensive analysis of data showing that women passed the 2003 PRT and 2009 PRT at statistically significantly lower rates than men. Id. The Court ruled that, because the DOJ met its prima facie burden, Defendant could only defend this showing of disparate impact if it demonstrated actual reasons that the 2003 PRT and 2009 PRT were important to the trooper position. Id. at *35. The Court ruled that Defendant presented no compelling evidence or argument regarding the business necessity of the 2003 PRT and 2009 PRT. Id. at *36. Accordingly, the Court granted the DOJ's motion for partial summary judgment and denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

(xxxiii) Immigration Class Actions

Macy, et al. v. U.S. Citizenship & Immigration Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 386672 (D. Ore. Mar. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action pursuant to the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA") against Defendant alleging that Defendant improperly administered its H-1B specialty occupation non-immigrant, visa-worker program in violation of federal law. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment and granted Defendants' motion for summary judgment. Under the APA, an agency action must be upheld on review unless it is "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law." Id. at *2. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants failed to process H-1B visa petitions in the manner that Congress required. Defendants' regulation – 8 C.F.R. § 214.2(h)(8)(ii)(B) – permitted a random computer-generated selection process for H-1B petitions and required that petitions not processed within a given year's statutory cap be returned. Plaintiffs asserted that this procedure conflicted with the unambiguous command of Congress in 8 U.S.C. § 1184(g)(3) that H-1B visas be issued in the order in which the petitions were filed. Plaintiffs challenged two aspects of the procedure used by Defendants in processing H-1B visas. Plaintiffs first disputed the practice that Defendants rejected and returned petitions after enough petitions had been received to meet the statutory cap, and asserted that Defendants should have created an on-going waiting list and processed all petitions in order when the next visa opportunity became available, even if that meant waiting until the next fiscal year. Second, Plaintiffs disputed Defendants' practice of using a random computer-generated selection process, instead of processing all petitions in the order in which they were filed. Id. at *18. The Court rejected Plaintiffs argument and ruled that § 1184(g)(3) did not unambiguously require a waiting list for H-1B petitions. Accordingly, Defendants' interpretation was entitled to deference and must be upheld unless it was unreasonable. Id. at *29. The Court ruled that given the significant deference owed to an agency's interpretation when a statute was silent or ambiguous, Defendants' refusal to implement a waiting list in the H-1B visa context was not unreasonable. Id. at *35. Thus, the Court ruled that the practice was valid. Plaintiffs also argued that the random computer-generated selection process permitted in 8 C.F.R. § 214.2(h)(8)(ii)(B) violated the requirement in § 1184(g)(3) that petitions be processed in the order in which they were filed. Plaintiffs noted that § 1184(g) did not contain any provision allowing for random processing, in contrast to § 1153(e)(2), which provided that those visas shall be issued "strictly in a random order." Id. at *38. Plaintiffs argued that this process was arbitrary and unfair because it could result in some persons never receiving a visa, while other persons might receive a visa in the first year that their petition was filed. The Court also rejected this argument because Plaintiffs' assertion relied upon their contention that Defendant must implement a waiting list, since the Court determined that Defendant's decision not to implement a waiting list was reasonable. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment and granted Defendants' motion for summary judgment. Id. at *45.

Nio, et al. v. Department Of Homeland Security,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 178200 (D.D.C. Oct. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of non-citizens serving in the U.S. Army's Selected Reserve, filed a putative class action challenging the U.S. Department of Homeland Security's ("DHS") decision to: (i) await the Department of Defense's ("DOD's) completion of the enhanced security screening of Military Accessions Vital to the National Interest ("MAVNI") enlistees prior to their shipment to basic training or active-duty service; and (ii) the Department of Defense's ("DOD's") October 13, 2017 guidance that required the recall and decertification of U.S. Citizen and Immigration Service ("USCIS") Form N-426, necessary for a MAVNI's naturalization application. Plaintiffs sought to enjoin the DOD and the DHS from invalidating Plaintiffs' existing N-426s based upon the October 13, 2017 guidance that revoked form N-426, which certified a member's honorable service and was necessary for a MAVNI naturalization application, an expedited path to citizenship. Plaintiffs also sought to certify a class, under Rule 23(b)(1) or (2), consisting of all persons who: (i) enlisted in the selected reserve; (ii) had served honorably in the military through participation in at least one selected reserve drill period or in an active-duty status; (iii) had received a Form N-426 certifying their honorable service; (iv) had submitted N-400 applications for Naturalization to USCIS, and (v)were subjected to the DHS/USCIS security screening requirement and Section III of DOD's recent guidance regarding N-426s. The Court granted a preliminary injunction and Plaintiffs' motion to certify the class with a modified class definition. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs' proposed class satisfied Rule 23(a)'s requirements of numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequacy. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that commonality was not satisfied because of numerous individual circumstances of the service members. The Court reasoned that it was not adjudicating naturalization applications or making individual N-426 determinations, but rather merely deciding whether DHS could postpone naturalization applications and whether the DOD could apply the October 13 guidance. The Court concluded that factual variations among the class did not defeat the commonality requirement, so long as a single aspect or feature of the claim was common to all proposed class members. The Court ruled that class certification was appropriate under Rule 23(b)(1)(A). It held that because Defendants failed to respond to Plaintiffs' argument that the Court should certify the proposed class under Rule 23(b)(1)(A), Defendants had conceded that class certification was appropriate under Rule 23(b)(1)(A). The Court was also satisfied that Plaintiffs' proposed class met the requirements of Rule 23(b)(2). Defendants objected to certification under Rule 23(b)(2) because of the individualized determinations about an enlistee's fitness. The Court rejected this argument because Plaintiffs only challenged the application of standardized policies that generally applied to the class. The Court held that enjoining these broad policies or declaring them unlawful was appropriate relief under Rule 23(b)(2). In sum, the Court preliminarily enjoined Defendants from implementing the DOD's October 13 guidance. However, the Court limited the class to those who enlisted before October 13, 2017. Id. at *16.

Rojas, et al. v. Johnson, et al.,* Case No. 16-CV-1024 (W.D. Wash. Jan. 10, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of asylum-seekers, filed a putative class action against Defendants seeking declaratory and injunctive relief alleging violations of their statutory and due process rights under 8 U.S.C. § 1158(a)(2)(B) and the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants failed to provide them with notice of the statutory requirement that an asylum-seeker must apply for asylum within one year of arrival in the United States. Plaintiffs further claimed that Defendants failed to provide a mechanism that ensured that Plaintiffs were able to comply with the statute. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification over Defendants' objection. Defendants asserted that the numerosity requirement was not satisfied because Plaintiffs lacked standing. Defendants asserted that because Plaintiffs could not demonstrate an actual injury, they lacked standing. Defendant maintained that Plaintiffs' alleged injuries were speculative as their asylum applications might not be denied. The Court disagreed and found that the Plaintiffs had sufficiently alleged an injury as they were challenging their statutory right to notice and to apply for asylum, as opposed to any past or future denial. The Court noted that because Plaintiffs missed the one-year filing deadline, they were now prejudiced as they had to rely upon the discretion of an immigration judge to find that their late filings were justified. The Court rejected Defendants' arguments as to commonality, typicality and adequacy, noting that Plaintiffs were challenging their right to notice and a procedure to ensure they were afforded the opportunity to comply with a statutory right. Plaintiffs also argued that their putative class satisfied Rule 23(b)(2) because Defendants "acted or refused to act on grounds that apply generally to the class, so that final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief is appropriate respecting the class as a whole." Id. at 8. Defendants asserted that Plaintiffs failed to meet the Rule 23(b)(2) standards because Defendants had not failed or refused to act. The Court disagreed because Defendants had not presented a system where the putative class members were guaranteed notice of the filing deadline or a mechanism to ensure an opportunity to file timely applications. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Saravia, et al. v. Sessions,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 192905 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, three unaccompanied minors who were alleged to have entered the United States without authorization, filed a complaint and petition for a writ of habeas corpus seeking declaratory and injunctive relief. Id. at *19. One of the minors, A.H., moved to provisionally certify a class of similarly-situated minors in conjunction with his motion for a preliminary injunction. The Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss as to minors F.E. and J.G. based on improper venue. As to A.H., the Court exercised its discretion to adjudicate the declaratory and injunctive relief claims under the doctrine of pendent venue. Id. at *21. The Court provisionally certified, for the limited purpose of issuing a preliminary injunction, a class of non-citizen minors who: (1) came to the country as unaccompanied minors; (2) were previously detained in the custody of the Office of Refugee Resettlement ("ORR") and then released to a sponsor; and (3) had been or would be rearrested by the U.S. Department of Homeland Security ("DHS") based on a removability warrant on or after April 1, 2017, on allegations of gang affiliation. Id. at *67. The Court determined that numerosity was satisfied because the evidence suggested that at least 15 sponsored minors had been detained based on gang affiliation. The Court noted that although this was not an especially large number of undocumented minors, there was evidence that more class members would be added. Id. at *68. Further, given the characteristics of the members of the proposed class, joinder of all class members was impracticable. The Court ruled that commonality was satisfied because the procedural due process claims for which A.H. sought class-wide preliminary injunctive relief were amenable to common answers. A.H. had shown that there was a common policy or practice of rearresting sponsored minors using removability warrants, on the basis of suspected gang affiliation, and then transferring the minors to ORR custody. Id. at *71. The question of whether the DHS and ORR policies violated class members' rights in a systematic way was common to all class members, and the answer would be the same for all class members. As such, commonality was satisfied. The government did not dispute that A.H.'s claims were typical of the class because, like all of the proposed class members, A.H. was rearrested by Immigration and Customs Enforcement after he was placed in a secure facility by the ORR based on alleged gang affiliation. The Court ruled that adequacy was satisfied. The government did not dispute that A.H. and his counsel adequately represented the class members' interests and there was no reason to believe that A.H.'s interests, or those of his counsel, conflicted with those of proposed class members. The Court also ruled that the requirements of Rule 23(b)(2) were satisfied because A.H. demonstrated that the government acted or refused to act on grounds that applied generally to the class such that preliminary injunctive relief was appropriate as to the class. Id. at *74. Accordingly, the Court granted the motion for a preliminary injunction on behalf of a class of non-citizen minors to remedy the government's likely violation of the class members' procedural due process rights. The government was ordered to provide A.H. and all other non-citizen minors previously released to a sponsor who were rearrested and were currently in federal custody based on allegations of gang affiliation with a hearing before an immigration judge within nine days. Id. at *76.

Sultaliev, et al. v. Rodriguez*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106670 (D. Mass. July 10, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of conditional permanent residents who filed Form I-751 petitions for permanent resident status, filed a class action alleging that Defendants – officials of the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services ("USCIS") – unlawfully failed to process and decide their I-751 petitions within a reasonable time period in violation of agency regulations, 8 C.F.R. 216.4(b)(1), and the Administrative Procedure Act. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs were conditional permanent residents who resided in Massachusetts. Pursuant to the Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA"), a foreign national married to a United States citizen for less than two years can apply for status as a conditional lawful permanent resident. Id. In order to remove the conditional status, the married foreign national must file an I-751 petition 90 days before the two-year anniversary of the granting of such conditional status and have personal interviews with an officer of the Department of Homeland Security within 90 days. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs filed I-751 petitions with the Vermont Service Center, but did not have personal interviews scheduled even though their applications had been pending for more than 90 days. Id. at *3. Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction and for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. Defendants argued that the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction. Defendants pointed to the fact that 8 U.S.C. § 1186a(d)(3) gives the Secretary of Homeland Security (the "Secretary") discretion to "waive the deadline for . . . an interview or the requirement for . . . an interview" when appropriate. Id. at *6. Thus, according to Defendants, because it is within the Secretary's discretion to waive the 90-day window, the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction over the suit pursuant to 8 U.S.C. § 1252(a)(2)(B)(ii). Id. The Court agreed that, if the Secretary made such a determination, the Court would not have jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' claims, but here the Secretary had taken no action whatsoever on Plaintiffs' applications. The Court found that inaction was not within the Secretary's discretion and, therefore, it concluded that it had subject-matter jurisdiction. The Court further explained that, to have standing, Plaintiffs must allege an injury-in-fact that is "concrete and particularized." Id. at *7. Plaintiffs alleged that, without valid permanent resident status, foreign nationals are often denied employment, student loans, and other benefits, and refused permission to board planes to the United States. Id. The Court stated that Plaintiffs had not provided any facts suggesting that they had suffered such harms. The Court determined that Plaintiffs' conclusory assertion that they had been "adversely affected or aggrieved" was insufficient to show a concrete and particularized injury necessary to establish standing. Id. Because the Court concluded that Plaintiffs lacked standing, it declined to consider whether Plaintiffs stated a claim upon which relief could be granted. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss for lack of standing.

(xxxiv) Industrial Injury Class Actions

Aregood, Jr., et al. v. Givaudan Flavors Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173045 (S.D. Ind. Oct. 18, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action alleging that they were injured because of Defendant's defective design of butter flavors sold to Plaintiffs' employer ConAgra Snack Foods Group ("ConAgra"). Plaintiffs worked in various capacities at a ConAgra microwave popcorn packaging facility. Plaintiffs alleged that their exposure to butter flavors that contained diacetyl – which were sold to ConAgra by Defendant – caused them to develop respiratory injuries. The Court had previously granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to the majority of Plaintiffs' claims, and the only remaining claim was brought under the Indiana Products Liability Act ("IPLA"). The Court noted that claims under the IPLA have five elements, including: (i) harm; (ii) to a foreseeable user or consumer; (iii) by a product that was sold "in a defective condition unreasonably dangerous to any user or consumer;" (iv) by a Defendant that was in the business of selling the product; and (v) the product reached the user or consumer without alteration. Id. at *9-10. A Plaintiff may satisfy the third element by showing a design defect, a manufacturing defect, or a failure to warn. With respect to a design defect claim, a Plaintiff must also show a breach of the duty of care or negligence. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs argued that there was a question of fact as to whether or not Defendants' butter flavors were defectively designed because Plaintiffs' experts opined that butter flavors that contained diacetyl caused lung diseases, and Defendants' expert testified that diacetyl-free butter flavors were available and used by some popcorn makers as early since 1989. Id. However, the Court held that under Indiana law, to show a defective design, Plaintiffs '"must compare the costs and benefits of alternative designs' and 'show that another design not only could have prevented the injury but also was cost-effective under general negligence principles.'" Id. at *10-11. The Court determined that Plaintiffs provided no expert testimony on the costs and benefits of a diacetyl-free butter flavor or that the diacetyl-free butter flavors that existed prior to 2007 were cost-effective alternatives under general negligence principles. Id. at *11. The Court further stated that costs and benefits of diacetyl-free butter flavors, or their cost effectiveness, is not common knowledge. Further, the Court opined that the fact that a diacetyl-free alternative existed was not enough; Plaintiffs must also present evidence that the diacetyl-free butter flavors' risks, benefits, and costs were favorable. Id. In the absence of such evidence, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden to prove that Defendant failed to exercise reasonable care under the circumstances as required by the IPLA. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion for summary judgment.

(xxxv) Injunctions In Class Actions

Bahamas Surgery Center, et al. v. Kimberly-Clark Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73778 (C.D. Cal. May 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers of medical gowns, alleged that Defendants concealed material information relating to a defect in their MicroCool Gowns and that, as a result, Plaintiffs and the class overpaid for the gowns. The jury returned a verdict in favor of Plaintiffs against Defendants Kimberly-Clark Corp. and Halyard Health, Inc. based on the claim of concealment. The jury awarded Plaintiffs and the class $3,889,327 in compensatory damages, pre-judgment interest, and $350 million in punitive damages against Kimberly-Clark. The jury also awarded Plaintiffs and the class $261,445 in compensatory damages, pre-judgment interest, and $100 million in punitive damages against Halyard Health. Plaintiff also brought an equitable claim against Defendants under California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"). Having found for Plaintiffs, the Court stated that the jury must have implicitly found that Plaintiffs proved by a preponderance of the evidence that Defendants intentionally failed to disclose material facts to Plaintiffs and/or actively concealed material facts from Plaintiffs relating to the MicroCool Gowns of which Plaintiffs were unaware, and which led them to suffer harm. Id. at *4. Given the sheer size of the jury's verdict and the evidence presented at trial, one of the implicit findings of the jury also included, at the very least, a determination that Defendants concealed information regarding a defect in the MicroCool Gown, and that the defect was material to whether the MicroCool Gown deserved the rating that Defendants used to market the gown. Id. at *5. In light of the evidence presented by the parties at trial and the jury's implicit findings, the Court found that Plaintiffs proved by a preponderance of the evidence that Defendants' failure to disclose material information to, or active concealment of such information from, Plaintiffs relating to the MicroCool Gown's defective sleeve seam constituted a fraudulent business practice that was likely to deceive the reasonable consumer. Id. at *6. Since Plaintiffs' UCL claim was based on the same underlying facts as the legal claim decided by the jury, the Court determined that it followed from the jury's implicit determinations on the legal claim that Plaintiffs satisfied their burden of establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that Defendants engaged in a fraudulent business practice (i.e., concealment of material information pertaining to the MicroCool Gown) likely to deceive the public and reasonable consumers. Plaintiffs contended that monetary damages would not adequately notify class members regarding the material information that Defendants concealed. Id. at *10. However, the Court stated the Plaintiffs failed to satisfy their burden to show that class members would likely suffer irreparable harm. The Court found because there was no evidence that anyone had suffered physical harm while wearing a MicroCool Gown as a result of a strikethrough or a torn sleeve, the Court could not presume that class members likely would suffer such harm due to future MicroCool Gown use. Id. at *11. Plaintiffs also requested that Defendants be enjoined from issuing statements seeking to "contradict, undercut, or otherwise minimize the findings of the Court or the injunctive relief awarded." Id. The Court found this relief was not necessary to address the class members' harm, which was economic in nature. Therefore, although the Court determined that Plaintiffs satisfied the elements for a UCL claim based on fraudulent concealment, Plaintiffs' request for restitution and injunctive relief should be denied.

Edge, et al. v. City Of Everett*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 199181 (W.D. Wash. Dec. 4, 2017). Plaintiffs, the owner and employees of "bikini barista stands" – drive-through stands where baristas serve coffee to customers while wearing bikinis – challenged the constitutionality of two ordinances enacted by Defendant. Id. at *1. The ordinance restricted dress city-wide, and prohibited exposure of "more than one-half of the part of the female breast located below the top of the areola," "the genitals, anus, bottom one-half of the anal cleft, or any portion of the areola or nipple of the female breast." Id. at *2. The dress code ordinance required "bikini baristas" and employees of similar facilities to wear clothing that covers "the upper and lower body (breast/pectorals, stomach, back below the shoulder blades, buttocks, top three inches of the legs below the buttocks, pubic area and genitals)." Id. Plaintiffs claimed they wore bikinis to express personal and political messages, including messages of "freedom, empowerment, openness, acceptance, approachability, vulnerability, and individuality." Id. at *5. Plaintiffs moved for a preliminary injunction to prevent Defendant from enforcing the city ordinances, which the Court granted. Defendant contended the ordinances were needed to "prevent dangerous and unlawful conduct" inherent to bikini barista stands, including "flashing, explicit shows, sexual contact in exchange for money and public masturbation," as well as "prostitution, lewd conduct, drug use, sexual exploitation and sexual assault." Id. Defendant further contended that "the minimalistic nature of the clothing" worn by bikini baristas lent itself to this conduct because baristas could quickly and easily remove or adjust their bikinis to engage in sexual contact with customers. Id. at *5-6. Defendant argued that its existing laws were insufficient, and that the ordinances would allow it to more readily impose penalties on stand owners who permit employees to engage in such conduct. Id. at *6. The Court found that the city-wide ordinance and the dress code ordinance were void for vagueness under the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court stated that the term "bottom one-half of the anal cleft" was not well-defined or reasonably understandable, and the ordinances otherwise failed to provide clear guidance and raise risks of arbitrary enforcement. Id. The Court opined that the ordinances created dangers of arbitrary enforcement, because they would require law enforcement to engage in a "highly fact-specific analysis" and leave determinations of compliance "to the subjective judgment of the officer." Id. at *8. For example, the Court opined that to determine whether the "top three inches of legs below the buttocks" are exposed in violation of the dress code ordinance, an officer must identify precisely where the buttocks end and the legs begin. Id. at *9. Therefore, the Court held that Plaintiffs were likely to prevail on their claims that the ordinances were void for vagueness in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Id. at *10. The Court also held that the dress code ordinance violated Plaintiffs' right to free expression under the First Amendment. Id. at *2-3. The Court noted that while some customers viewed the bikinis as "sexualized," to others they conveyed particularized values, beliefs, ideas, and opinions as to body confidence and freedom of choice. Id. at *10-11. Moreover, the Court reasoned that, in certain scenarios, bikinis could convey the very type of political speech that lies at the core of the First Amendment. Id. at *11. Therefore, the Court found that Plaintiffs had demonstrated that they were entitled to a preliminary injunction based upon their claims that the city-wide ordinance and the dress code ordinance were unconstitutional under the Fourteenth and First Amendments. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction.

International Union, et al. v. Consol Energy,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38698 (S.D. W. Va. Mar. 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retired coal miners and their union, filed a motion for preliminary injunction to prevent Defendant from unilaterally terminating Plaintiffs' health insurance plan. Id. at *2. The Court granted several of Defendants' motions to dismiss, ruling that there was no personal jurisdiction over Defendants Helvetia, Island Creek, Laurel Run, and CONSOL Amonate. However, the Court ruled that Defendant Consul Energy waived its personal jurisdiction and venue defenses, and it was the agent of Defendants' subsidiaries and the real party in interest that was subject to the Court's power to issue an injunction. Id. at *9. At the same time, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction. Id. at *27. At the outset, the Court noted that in the case of a preliminary injunction, the evidentiary standard applied in determining whether a Plaintiff has established all four necessary elements is substantially relaxed, given that the purpose of a preliminary injunction is merely to preserve the relative positions of the parties until a determination on the merits can be held. Id. at *16. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs satisfied each of the necessary factors to obtain a preliminary injunction. Id. at *26. First, Plaintiffs would suffer irreparable harm in the absence of an injunction. The Court opined that the nature of the harm at issue in this case was of critical importance. Defendants were threatening to terminate employer plan group insurance benefits and if they succeeded, then retirees may be left without health coverage. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs would be irreparably harmed if the Court refused to preserve the status quo with a preliminary injunction. Second, because of the policy favoring arbitration in labor disputes and the longstanding obligation of coal companies to provide medical care for the union's members, Plaintiffs were likely to succeed on the merits. Id. Third, the balance of equities clearly tipped in favor of Plaintiffs because in the absence of an injunction, their medical benefits might be lost. The Court reasoned that even if Defendant ultimately prevailed and was entitled to cancel or change benefits, it could still do so after the matter was concluded. Fourth, an injunction was in the public interest because of the desire throughout society to provide medical benefits for the sick and the injured. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction. Id. at *27.

Puente Arizona, et al. v. Arpaio,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44517 (D. Ariz. Mar. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action challenging Defendants' application of Arizona's identity theft and forgery statutes to unauthorized aliens who committed fraud in obtaining employment. Plaintiffs sought declaratory relief and/or permanent injunctions against the Maricopa County Sheriff's Office ("MCSO") and Maricopa County Attorney Office ("MCAO"). The Court concluded that federal law preempted the state government's practices and Congress clearly and manifestly intended to prohibit the use of the Form I-9 and documents submitted as part of the I-9 employment verification process for state law enforcement purposes. Id. at *26. The Court issued a permanent injunction against the MCSO and declaratory relief as to the MCAO. The Court found that Plaintiffs met their burden for a permanent injunction against the MCSO and satisfied the required factors: (i) that they had suffered an irreparable injury; (ii) that remedies available at law, such as monetary damages, were inadequate to compensate for that injury; (iii) that, considering the balance of hardships between the Plaintiffs and Defendant, a remedy in equity was warranted; and (iv) that the public interest was not disserved by a permanent injunction. The Court granted Plaintiffs' request for a permanent injunction against the MCSO, as the office had engaged in the practice for over seven years, and it ruled that the Sheriff was permanently enjoined from employing or relying on the Form I-9 and any other documents or information submitted to an employer solely as part of the federal employment verification process for purposes of investigating or prosecuting violations of Arizona identity theft and forgery statutes. The Court further granted Plaintiffs' request for declaratory relief as to the MCAO and denied its request for injunction against the MCAO. The Court ruled that an injunction against the MCAO was not necessary and Plaintiffs failed to establish that Plaintiffs faced a present or imminent risk of likely irreparable harm from I-9 related investigations or prosecutions by the MCAO because the MCAO had made a good faith attempt to comply with the law. Id. at *29. The Court entered declaratory relief as to the MCAO and opined that declaratory relief would eliminate any risk of irreparable harm to Plaintiffs. The Court declared that under the supremacy clause of the U.S. Constitution and the Immigration Reform and Control Act, Defendants were preempted from employing or relying on the Form I-9 and any other documents or information submitted to an employer solely as part of the federal employment verification process for purposes of investigating or prosecuting violations of Arizona forgery or identity theft statutes. Id. at *51.

(xxxvi) Intervention Issues In Class Actions

Harrington, et al. v. Sessions*, 863 F.3d 861 (D.C. Cir. 2017). In 2008, U.S. Marshal David Grogan filed a putative class action in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia against the U.S. Marshals Service (the "Marshals") alleging racial discrimination under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. By 2013, Plaintiff Herman Brewer ("Plaintiff") was the sole Plaintiff representing the putative class. Id. at 865. Plaintiff retired from the Marshals a few months before discovery closed. Id. After discovery closed, Plaintiff filed: (i) a motion to amend the complaint to substitute four additional Plaintiffs as class representatives; and (ii) a Rule 23 motion for class certification. Id. at 866. The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion to substitute new Plaintiffs, finding that Plaintiff had not diligently pursued the substitution. Id. The District Court also denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification. Id. The District Court found that, because Plaintiff had retired and was no longer an employee of the Marshals, Plaintiff could not adequately represent a class predominantly seeking injunctive relief. Id. The District Court also held that Plaintiff's individual claims for monetary relief were not typical of the class-wide claims for injunctive relief and, as such, did not provide a basis to certify a class either. Id. Finally, the District Court refused to certify a narrower class seeking damages only, since doing so constituted "claim splitting" and jeopardized class members' ability to subsequently pursue other claims in the face of potential res judicata arguments. Id. Plaintiff appealed under Rule 23(f) for interlocutory review of the denial of class certification. Id. However, during the pendency of the petition, Plaintiff settled his individual claims and filed a stipulation of dismissal under Rule 41(a)(1)(A)(ii). Id. at 867. On the same day Plaintiff filed the stipulated dismissal, three current and one former African-American employee of the Marshals (the "Interveners") moved to intervene in District Court to appeal its denial of class certification and moved to intervene in the D.C. Circuit to pursue the Rule 23(f) petition filed by Plaintiff. Id. While their motion to intervene in the District Court was still pending, the Interveners filed a notice of appeal from: (i) Plaintiff's stipulated dismissal; (ii) the order denying class certification; and (iii) the "effective" denial of their motion to intervene insofar as the District Court had not decided their motion to intervene within the time Interveners believed they had to file a notice of appeal (i.e., within 60 days of Plaintiff's stipulated dismissal). Id. Thereafter, the District Court dismissed the Interveners' motion to intervene based on the rationale that the Interveners' notice of appeal stripped the District Court of jurisdiction to rule on the motion. Id. On the Interveners' motion, Plaintiff's Rule 23(f) petition and the Interveners' appeal were consolidated before the D.C. Circuit. Id. The D.C. Circuit first addressed whether it had jurisdiction. Id. at 868. The stipulated dismissal of Plaintiff's claims removed any live Article III case or controversy from the District Court and the D.C. Circuit. The D.C. Circuit found that it had jurisdiction over the Interveners' motion to intervene in the Rule 23(f) petition. Id. The D.C. Circuit explained that a stipulated dismissal and a Court-ordered dismissal are no different in their jurisdictional effect, for both eliminate a live case or controversy. Id. at 869. As such, the D.C. Circuit found that it had jurisdiction to entertain any motion after a stipulated dismissal that it could entertain after a dismissal. The D.C. Circuit explained that it is well-established that, even in the absence of a live controversy, jurisdiction is retained to hear motions to intervene for purposes of appealing dismissed claims, as long as the Intervener has an Article III interest sufficient to pursue the appeal. Id. at 870. Moreover, the D.C. Circuit asserted that it is similarly well-established that absent class members may have a sufficient Article III interest to appeal the denial of class certification even if the named Plaintiff does not appeal. Id. The D.C. Circuit reasoned that, because the absence of an Article III controversy did not preclude it from hearing a motion to intervene for purposes of appealing and because an appellate court has jurisdiction to hear an absent Plaintiff's appeal from the denial of class certification, it had jurisdiction under Rule 23(f) to hear the Interveners' motion to intervene. Id. at 871. In finding such jurisdiction, the D.C. Circuit distinguished the recent U.S. Supreme Court decision of Microsoft Corp. v. Baker, 137 S. Ct. 1702, 1712-13 (2017), wherein the Supreme Court held that a Plaintiff's voluntary dismissal of his claims, subsequent to an appellate court's denial of his Rule 23(f) petition, did not create a final, appealable order. Id. The D.C. Circuit explained that, unlike Baker, the issue here involved only a petition for review under Rule 23(f), not an appeal from a final order. Id. Furthermore, equitable considerations present in Baker, where the Plaintiff had orchestrated guaranteed appellate review of his Rule 23 claims through voluntary dismissal, were not present here. Id. As to the motion to intervene, the D.C. Circuit stated that it could address the motion to intervene in the first instance on appeal primarily for purposes of judicial economy. Id. The D.C. Circuit found that the Interveners easily met the criteria for intervention as a matter of right under Rule 24(a)(2). Id. at 872. Nonetheless, the D.C. Circuit rejected the Interveners' Rule 23(f) request and declined to review the District Court's denial of class certification. Id. at 874. It found that the Interveners failed to show that any special circumstances warranted such review. Id. Finally, the D.C. Circuit dismissed the Interveners' appeal from final judgment in the case below, restoring the District Court's jurisdiction over the case. Id. at 875. It ordered that, on remand, the District Court should allow reasonable time for the Interveners to file both a motion to substitute a new class representative and a renewed motion for class certification. Id.

Smith, et al. v. Seeco, Inc.*, Case No. 14-CV-435 (E.D. Ark. June 23, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of royalty owners, filed a class action alleging that Defendants under-paid royalties due to them. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the Court granted. Intervener Charter Land Co. LLC ("Charter") subsequently filed an emergency motion to intervene for purposes of decertifying the class. Id. at 1. The Court found that Charter's motion was untimely. The Court stated that certification was granted over a year prior and the same argument Charter brought to the Court was already made by other Intervener, and already rejected by a jury. The Court noted that Charter's position on decertification focused on a preliminarily approved settlement and the adequacy of class counsel. Id. at 3. The Court found that Charter's argument was not persuasive, as class counsel's adequacy has been repeatedly affirmed in pre-trial motions filed before and during trial. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Charter's motion to intervene.

Technology Training Associates, et al. v. Buccaneers Limited Partnership*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 21205 (11th Cir. Oct. 26, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a complaint on behalf of a putative class, alleging that Defendant was responsible for unsolicited faxes that violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act. Id. at *1-2. In 2009 and 2010 Defendant, through a fax broadcaster, sent out three sets of faxes advertising tickets to see Tampa Bay Buccaneers football games. Cin-Q, which had received at least one of those faxes, brought suit on behalf of a putative class alleging that Defendant had sent unsolicited faxes to more than 180,000 recipients and that the class was entitled to $500 per violation in statutory damages. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs in the Cin-Q matter were represented by the law firm of Anderson & Wanca. While the class certification motion was pending, an attorney at that firm, David Oppenheim, left and joined another firm called Bock Hatch. There Oppenheim took part in an email discussion with partner Phil Bock about the Cin-Q case. Oppenheim told Bock that Plaintiffs' counsel wanted to get a record breaking settlement in that matter of over $75 million. Id. at *3. Bock then filed the instant matter, and the parties filed an unopposed motion for preliminary approval of class action settlement of up to $19.5 million in damages. Id. at *4-5. After the complaint and the motion for preliminary approval of the settlement were filed, the Court in the Cin-Q matter stayed consideration of the class certification motion in that case. In the wake of those developments, Plaintiffs moved to intervene in this case under Rule 24(a)(2), for intervention as of right, and Rule 24(b)(2), for permissive intervention. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs in Cin-Q contended that this case was an example of a "reverse auction," in which a Defendant picked out a Plaintiff with weaker claims and weaker counsel in an effort to negotiate a more favorable class settlement. Id. at *6. The District Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to intervene. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit reversed and remanded. The Eleventh Circuit explained that District Courts should granted a motion to intervene when: (i) the application to intervene is timely; (ii) there is an interest relating to the property or transaction that is the subject of the action; (iii) disposition of the action, as a practical matter, may impede or impair their ability to protect that interest; and (iv) their interest is represented inadequately by the existing parties to the suit. The District Court concluded that Plaintiffs did not satisfy the third prong. The District Court explained that Rule 23 already provides procedural protections, such as the right to object at a "fairness hearing," and it noted that it could award attorneys' fees out of the settlement fund to the movants' counsel. In light of those facts, the District Court concluded that the movants' ability to protect their interests would not be "impeded or impaired" if intervention were denied. Id. The Eleventh Circuit found that under that logic class members could never intervene in a class action because they would always have recourse to Rule 23 procedural protections and therefore would always fail to satisfy the third prong. The Eleventh Circuit held that the risk that movants would be bound by an unsatisfactory class action settlement satisfied Rule 24(a)(2)'s third prong. The Eleventh Circuit ruled that it was clear from the record that during the negotiations the interests of the named Plaintiffs and of Bock Hatch were aligned with those of Defendant and adverse to the movants' interests. Accordingly, the Eleventh Circuit found that Plaintiffs met the Rule 24(a)(2)'s requirements, and therefore remanded the case with instructions for the District Court to grant the movants' motion to intervene.

(xxxvii) Issue Certification Under Rule 23

In Re Simply Orange Juice Marketing And Sales,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114805 (W.D. Mo. July 24, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of orange juice consumers, filed a multi-state putative class action alleging that Defendants failed to disclose its use of added flavors in its products, which was inconsistent with federal labeling regulations, and that consumers were deceived into paying a price premium for these products. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs moved to certify classes of purchasers of the orange juice products under: (i) Rule 23(b)(3) for damages and relief; and (ii) Rule 23(b)(2) for injunctive relief. Plaintiffs alternatively sought certification under Rule 23(c)(4) on the issue of whether the added flavoring substances were flavors that required disclosure and whether Defendant's omissions were unlawful. Defendant denied that it added flavoring that must be disclosed under the federal regulations, and claimed that the add-backs it used were 100% made from orange products. Defendant further argued that it did not consistently use add-backs all year round with respect to one of its product at issue, and because it did not always use add backs, tens of thousands of consumers suffered no injury and therefore lacked Article III standing. The Court rejected Defendant's standing argument and found that the purchasers all had standing to sue, as every container of one type of Defendants' orange juices contained the add-back. Further, the discovery established that most of the time, purchasers of both types of juices would be received drinks that included add-backs because for certain years, nearly every container sold included the flavoring. Id. at *14. Defendant argued that the proposed classes were not ascertainable because the inconsistent use of add-back defeated ascertainability. However, the Court found that Plaintiffs had sufficiently asserted that they were injured through a price premium charged by Defendant, and moreover, the odds were that most class members had purchased an orange juice product containing add-backs. Accordingly, the Court found that the proposed classes were ascertainable. Id. at *17. The Court likewise ruled that Rule 23(a)'s numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequacy requirements were met. The Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to certify the class under Rule 23(b)(2), as the named Plaintiffs lacked Article III standing to pursue claims for injunctive relief, because none of the Plaintiffs alleged that they intended to purchase Defendant's orange juice in the future. Id. at *25. The Court found that with respect to Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement, there were central issues in the action that were common to the class, such as: (i) whether the orange juice products contained added flavors not permitted by federal law; (ii) whether the orange juice products omitted disclosure of added flavors as required by federal labeling laws; (iii) whether the orange juice products conformed to the representations on the labels of the products; (iv) whether the orange juice products omitted material information from the products' labels; (v) whether Defendants warranted that the orange juice products conformed to the label representations; and (vi) whether Defendant breached these warranties. The Court, however, was not convinced that Plaintiffs established that common issues predominated with respect to certain elements of Plaintiffs' underlying state law claims, such as requirements relative to proof on the elements of reliance, materiality, and/or causation. Id. at *28. Accordingly, the Court certified an issues class under Rule 23(c)(4), so as to determine the common questions that predominated that issues class. The Court found that Plaintiffs demonstrated superiority under Rule 23(b)(3) and 23(c)(4). Accordingly, the Court found that three classes should be certified and for each of these classes, the Court certified an issues class under Rule 23(c)(4) to determine the questions that were common to the class. Id. at *34.

Mednick, et al. v. Precor, Inc.,* 320 F.R.D. 140 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of exercise equipment consumers, filed a putative class action alleging violations of the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Practices Act ("ICFA") and the equivalent consumer protection laws of California, Missouri, New Jersey, and New York. Id. at *143. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant deceptively marketed and sold treadmills with a heart rate technology that Defendant knew did not accurately measure the heart rates of users. Id. After the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, Plaintiffs renewed their motion to certify and narrowed the proposed class to include consumers who purchased the treadmills and were residents of California, Illinois, Missouri, New Jersey, and New York. Id. at *142. The Court certified the class for the purposes of determining liability, and reserved issues related to damages for individual hearings. Id. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs satisfied the numerosity and superiority requirements. Id. at *147. Defendant did not object to the adequacy of Plaintiffs' attorneys to act as class counsel. The Court also concluded that typicality was satisfied because, even if some consumers did not run on their treadmills, they still paid for treadmills that incorporated heart rate monitors that had been advertised to work. With respect to commonality, the Court ruled that the common question of whether Defendant engaged in representations or omissions that were likely to deceive a reasonable consumer was a question capable of class-wide proof, since the reasonable person standard called for an objective analysis. Defendant objected and asserted that the question could not establish commonality for two reasons, including: (i) Plaintiffs did not view any of Defendant's promotional materials before making their treadmill purchases; and (ii) Defendant published disclaimers regarding the touch sensor's performance. Id. at *148-49. The Court rejected both arguments. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs' injuries could be proximately caused by the graphics on the treadmills themselves and Defendant's material omissions. The Court also concluded that the effect of the disclaimers was properly left to the merits stage of the case and the disclaimers did not resolve the common question of whether Defendant engaged in representations or omissions that were likely to deceive a reasonable consumer. Id. at *152. Defendant argued that individual issues predominated because the consumer fraud statutes varied materially from state to state. The Court held that certification of a single class was inappropriate as to the issue of damages because the states differed in what they allowed an individual to recover under their consumer fraud statutes and the Court reserved damages issues for individualized hearings. Id. at *153. The Court rejected Defendant's argument as to predominance and held that the consumer protection statutes of California, Illinois, Missouri, New York, and New Jersey shared sufficient common characteristics that class certification as to the issue of liability was appropriate. The Court concluded that even though allowable recoveries differed across the states, the Court would manage the variations as it confined the issue of damages to individualized hearings. Id. at *157. The Court was persuaded that the differences among the states were manageable. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Plaintiffs' renewed motion for class certification. Id.

Navelski, et al. v. International Paper Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 77509 (N.D. Fla. May 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of property owners, filed a putative class action alleging that a dam on Defendant's paper mill property collapsed during a heavy thunderstorm, causing flooding and damage to their properties. Plaintiffs filed a motion for issue certification, and the Court granted class certification of a liability-only class. Defendant then filed a motion for reconsideration of the Court's previous order. The Court stated that Defendant's arguments against the certification of a liability-only class either could have been presented earlier or were insufficient to establish that the Court's decision on class certification was clearly erroneous or manifestly unjust. Id. at *3. The Court explained that there are three major grounds that justify reconsideration, including: (i) an intervening change in the controlling law; (ii) the discovery of new evidence that was not available when the original motion was decided; or (iii) the need to correct clear error or prevent manifest injustice. Id. Defendant argued that the class certification decision should be reconsidered because the Court erred in failing to take a position on the relative merits of the parties' conflicting expert testimony on causation. Id. at *4. The Court found Defendant's argument flawed because it misapprehended the extent to which the Court may evaluate the merits of Plaintiffs' claims in deciding whether the requirements for class certification have been met. Id. at *4-5. The Court stated that neither the substantive merits of Plaintiffs' claims nor the conflicting expert conclusions about whether the dam failure caused the flooding were material to the question of whether the Rule 23 prerequisite of predominance was satisfied. Id. at *5. The Court held that the conflict between the experts' conclusions related exclusively to the merits of Plaintiffs' claims, and not to whether common questions predominated. Id. at *7. Therefore, the Court opined that it should not resolve the dispute in order to certify a class with respect to causation. Id. at *8. The Court determined that if the evidence presented at the liability trial leads the jury to conclude that the dam failure did not cause any of the flooding in the neighborhoods, or that it caused some but not all of the flooding, then Plaintiffs will have failed to carry their burden. Id. at *13-14. The Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs had shown that Rule 23 was satisfied and that certification of a liability-only class was appropriate. The Court further noted that a bifurcated class action was superior to other available methods for the fair and effective adjudication of this matter as separate trials would reduce jury confusion, avoid undue prejudice to both sides, expedite the date of the liability trial and possibly avoid additional expenses if damages discovery and trials become unnecessary. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for reconsideration of its class certification order.

Rahman, et al. v. Mott's LLP*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 11965 (9th Cir. July 5, 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, alleged that use of the statement "No Sugar Added" on Mott's 100% Apple Juice did not comply with applicable Food and Drug Administration regulations and, by extension, California's Sherman Law and Unfair Competition Law. Plaintiff asserted that he met the requirements for both an injunction class under Rule 23(b)(2) and a damages class under Rule 23(b)(3); he sought certification under Rule 23(c)(4) with respect to liability issues only. Id. at *2. The District Court was unconvinced that Plaintiff met that burden through his motion for class certification and stated that certification of an issues class must materially advance resolution of the entire case. Accordingly, the District Court requested that Plaintiff provide supplemental briefing as to how damages would be resolved if the liability issues were certified and why certifying a liability-only class would materially advance the litigation. Id. Plaintiff supplied the supplemental briefing, and the District Court found that Plaintiff "failed to articulate why a bifurcated proceeding would be more efficient or desirable" and was "vague as to whether he intends to later certify a damages class, allow class members to individually pursue damages, or ha[d] some other undisclosed plan for resolving this case." Id. The District Court therefore denied Plaintiff's motion to certify a Rule 23(c)(4) class. Id. at *3. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The Ninth Circuit noted that after providing ample opportunity to Plaintiff to establish that certification of a liability-only class would materially advance the litigation, the District Court concluded that Plaintiff failed to show that certification of a liability-only class was "appropriate" under Rule 23(c)(4). Id. at *4. The Ninth Circuit found that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying Plaintiff motion to certify a liability-only class. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling.

Valenzuela, et al. v. Union Pacific Railroad Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 59605 (D. Ariz. April 19, 2017). Plaintiffs, owners of real property adjacent to a railroad right-of-way operated by Defendant, brought this trespass action claiming the land under the right-of-way was not Defendant's property. Plaintiffs sought to certify a class of "all landowners who . . . own or have owned land in fee adjoining and underlying the railroad easement granted under the General Right of Way Act of 1875 under which the pipeline is located within the State of Arizona." Id. at *5. The Court denied the motion, concluding that "the property-specific issues in this case prevent the named Plaintiffs from being typical or adequate, and will result in individual issues predominating." Id. The Court found several issues to be common to all alleged class members, including: (i) whether the railroad lacked sufficient property interests in the subsurface of its right-of-way under the 1875 Act to convey property rights in the subsurface to the pipeline; (ii) whether the commercial pipeline underneath the railroad's right-of-way was a railroad purpose; and (iii) whether Defendant knew or had reason to know that the railroad did not possess a sufficient ownership interest in the subsurface underneath its right-of-way to grant easements or other property rights to the pipeline. Id. at *5-6. Although these issues were not sufficiently predominant to certify the class under Rule 23(b)(2) or (3), Plaintiffs argued that the Court should resolve these questions in an issue class under Rule 23(c)(4). The Court found that Plaintiffs failed to show that the three common issues were "the centerpiece of this case," and that their resolution would "materially advance the litigation." Id. at *9. The Court explained that issue classes are most often used to "accurately and efficiently resolve the question of liability, while leaving the potentially difficult issue of individualized damage assessments for a later day." Id. at *10. The Court held that every claim Plaintiffs asserted would require proof that an individual Plaintiff owns or owned the land beneath the railroad right-of-way, which would require a detailed examination of the title and ownership history of each class member's property back to 1875. Id. at *12. The Court found that these types of issues would need to be resolved in every individual case, even if the three common issues had been decided class-wide. Id. at *15. The Court concluded that although certification of an issue class could resolve three common issues, resolution of those issues would not materially advance the resolution of the overall dispute between the parties. Id. at *17. The Court determined that a party seeking certification of an issue class under Rule 23(c)(4) has the burden of demonstrating why the issue class is "appropriate," i.e., how litigating certain issues on a class-wide basis rather than individually will move the litigation forward in a significant and efficient manner. Id. at *21. Because Plaintiffs had not done so, the Court denied certification of an issue class pursuant to Rule 23(c)(4).

(xxxviii) Issues With The Judicial Panel On Multi-District Litigation In Class Actions

In Re Frye Festival Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121973 (JPML Aug. 2, 2017). In this multi-district class action litigation, Plaintiffs in one action – the Herlihy case – moved under 28 U.S.C. § 1407 to centralize the litigation in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York. The litigation currently consisted of six actions pending in four districts, arising from the cancellation of a music festival originally scheduled to take place in the Bahamas in the spring of 2017. Id. at *1. Defendants in this litigation were entities and individuals allegedly responsible for organizing and promoting the Festival. Plaintiffs in four actions supported centralization, and variously suggested the Southern District of New York, the Southern District of Florida, and the District of New Jersey. Plaintiff in the Central District of California action opposed centralization, but requested his district if centralization was granted. Id. One Defendant, Matte Projects, LLC, responded and supported centralization in the Southern District of New York. Id. at *1-2. The Court concluded that centralization was not necessary for the convenience of the parties and witnesses or to further the just and efficient conduct of the litigation. Id. at *2. The Court noted that there were only six actions pending in four districts and a correspondingly limited number of involved Plaintiffs' counsel. Additionally, the Court found that the common Defendants had not entered an appearance in any action or in the Panel proceedings, and default proceedings against them had commenced in two actions Moreover, the Court stated that the only Defendants that have appeared to date were sued solely in the Reel action, and thus required little, if any, coordination with the other actions. Id. at *3. In these circumstances, the Court held that informal cooperation among the parties should be sufficient to minimize duplicative pre-trial proceedings and the risk of inconsistent pre-trial rulings. Accordingly, the Court denied the motions for consolidation.

In Re National Prescription Opiate Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 200501 (JPML Dec. 6, 2017). Plaintiffs in 46 actions concerning the alleged improper marketing of and distribution of various opiate medications moved under 28 U.S.C. § 1407 to centralize pre-trial proceedings in the Southern District of Ohio or in the Southern District of Illinois. The Judicial Panel on Multi-District Litigation (the "Panel") granted Plaintiffs motion to centralize pre-trial proceedings in the Southern District of Ohio. Since Plaintiffs had filed their motion, the parties notified the Panel of 115 potentially related actions. Plaintiffs had varying different opinions on transfer. Plaintiffs in over 40 actions or potential tag-along actions supported centralization. Id. at *1. Plaintiffs in 15 actions or potential tag-along actions opposed centralization altogether or opposed transfer of their action. Third-party payor Plaintiffs in an Eastern District of Pennsylvania potential tag-along action (the Philadelphia Teachers Health and Welfare Fund case) opposed centralization of third-party payor actions. Id. at *2. Plaintiff City of Everett – with a case in the Western District of Washington – opposed centralization and, alternatively, requested exclusion of its case. Id. Tag-along Plaintiff City of Chicago from the Northern District of Illinois asked the Panel to defer transfer of its action until document discovery was completed. Id. Defendants' positions on centralization also varied considerably, as the major distributor Defendants, which reportedly distributed over 80% of the drugs at issue and who were Defendants in most cases, supported centralization in the Southern District of West Virginia and requested that the Panel either delay issuing its transfer order or delay transfer of their cases until their motions to dismiss were decided. Id. Defendant distributor Miami-Luken also supported centralization in the Southern District of West Virginia. Multiple manufacturer Defendants support centralization in the Southern District of New York or the Northern District of Illinois; Defendant Malinckrodt, LLC, took no position on centralization but supported the same districts. Id. at *3. The Teva Defendants suggest centralization in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania or the manufacturers' preferred districts. The physician Defendants in three Ohio actions, who were alleged to be "key opinion leaders" paid by the manufacturing Defendants, did not oppose centralization in the Southern District of Ohio. Id. Defendants in several other Southern District of West Virginia cases opposed centralization, and many requested exclusion of the claims against them from the MDL. Further, Defendant Pfizer, Inc., opposed centralization and requested that the Panel exclude any claims against it from the MDL. The Panel reasoned that the parties acknowledged that any number of the proposed transferee districts would be suitable for this nationwide litigation. Id. at *7. The Panel found that that the actions all involved common questions of fact, and that centralization in the Northern District of Ohio would serve the convenience of the parties and witnesses and promote the just and efficient conduct of the litigation. Id. The Court noted that Ohio had a strong factual connection to this litigation, given that it experienced a significant rise in the number of opioid-related overdoses in the past several years and expended significant sums in dealing with the effects of the opioid epidemic. Id. at *8. The Northern District of Ohio also presented a geographically central and accessible forum that was relatively close to Defendants' various headquarters in New York, Connecticut, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Id. Accordingly, the Court transferred the actions to the Northern District of Ohio for pre-trial proceedings.

In Re Uber Technologies, Inc. Wage & Hour Litigation*, 2017 NLRB LEXIS 314 (NLRB June 13, 2017). The National Labor Relations Board ("Board") brought an action alleging that Defendant's maintenance and enforcement of its Dispute Resolution Agreement ("Agreement") violated § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by: (i) requiring employees to waive their right to pursue employment-related claims through class or collective actions; and (ii) because employees would reasonably understand it to prohibit them from filing unfair labor practice charges and/or otherwise access the Board. Id. at *2. Since January 29, 2016, Defendant had required its software engineers to execute the Agreement as a condition of their employment. The parties stipulated that the sole issue before the Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") was whether the Agreement violated § 8(a)(1) because employees would reasonably believe that it would prohibit them from filing Board charges. The ALJ found that Defendant's Agreement was ambiguous when read as a whole from the perspective of an employee attempting to discern whether, by signing it, he was waiving his right to filing a charge. The ALJ stated that essentially, the Agreement played "cat-and-mouse" with the reasonable employee-reader by referencing filing Board charges and accessing the Board without asserting, in plain and understandable language, that the Agreement does not impede on those § 7 rights. Id. at *12-13. The ALJ found that the Agreement's language on its face extended protection from retaliation only to those who file group or collective charges, leaving the reader to ponder what repercussions might befall an individual charge filer. Id. at *18. Secondly, the language stated in no uncertain terms that filing charges would be futile in any event, because Defendant may "lawfully" enforce the Agreement to seek dismissal of any claim filed. Id. at *20. The ALJ found that the language effectively nullified whatever limited comfort the anti-retaliation might provide. Accordingly, considering the Agreement as a whole, the ALJ concluded that the Agreement was not written in a manner reasonably calculated to assure employees that their right to file Board charges was unaffected. Accordingly, the ALJ found that the Agreement violated § 8(a)(1) because employees would reasonably believe that it interfered with this right.

(xxxix) Jurisdiction Issues In Class Action Litigation

Ali, et al. v. DLG Development Corp*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 174813 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 23, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action in state court alleging state law claims against Defendants Dale Construction, DLG Development Corp., Evette Smith, David Gross, and Eric Smith. Plaintiff later joined the Philadelphia Housing Authority ("PHA") as a Defendant. Plaintiff subsequently filed a motion for class certification alleging for the first time that his prior state law claims relied on the Davis-Bacon Act. Id. at *3. Defendants removed the action based on federal question jurisdiction. Plaintiff filed a motion to remand, which the Court granted. Plaintiff argued that his state law claims, which are premised on a violation of the Davis-Bacon Act, did not confer federal question jurisdiction. The Court explained that federal jurisdiction will lie over a state law claim if the federal issue is: (i) necessarily raised; (ii) actually disputed; (iii) substantial; and (iv) capable of resolution without disrupting the federal-state balance approved by Congress. Id. at *8. The Court found that based on Plaintiff's motion for class certification, it was apparent that the main allegation was that Defendants did not play Plaintiff the prevailing wage that he was owed under the Davis-Bacon Act. Defendants argued that the Davis-Bacon Act violation was properly remediated, thereby eliminating its liability. Thus, the Court found that the federal issue was disputed. The Court noted that Supreme Court case law suggested three factors to consider to determine if a federal issue is substantial, including: (i) whether the issue will have broad impact on the federal government; (ii) whether the issue presents a pure legal question; and (iii) whether federal law underlying the issue provides for a federal cause of action. Id. at *9. The Court held that there was no broad impact on the federal government because the Davis-Bacon issue did not directly affect actions taken by federal actors. The resolution of the question at issue would impact Defendants, but nothing about the decision would have a direct impact on prior actions taken by federal actors. Further, the Court stated that the determination of a Davis-Bacon Act violation is fact-bound and situation-specific, providing a strong argument against federal jurisdiction. Lastly, the Court reasoned that a lack of a private right of action under federal law is further evidence against federal jurisdiction. Id. at *14. Since the Davis-Bacon Act does not provide for a private right of action, the Court noted that the absence of that right provides evidence that Congress did not intend to grant federal jurisdiction to state law claims that include a Davis-Bacon issue. Id. at *15. The Court therefore found that since the federal issue was not substantial, it was unnecessary to consider the fourth prong of the analysis to determine federal jurisdiction. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion to remand.

Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., et al. v. Superior Court Of California*, 137 S. Ct. 1773 (2017). In this action, 86 California residents and 592 non-residents from 33 other states sued Bristol-Myers in California state court, asserting California state law claims for product liability, negligent representation, and misleading advertising. Id. at 1778. Plaintiffs alleged that the company's drug, Plavix, damaged their health. Id. In contrast to the California residents, the non-resident Plaintiffs did not allege that they obtained Plavix in California, nor did they claim that they were injured by Plavix or treated for their injuries in California. Id. After Bristol-Myers challenged personal jurisdiction with respect to the non-residents' claims in the trial court and the California Court of Appeal, the California Supreme Court held that specific jurisdiction existed. Id. Although the California Supreme Court determined that general jurisdiction was lacking, it nonetheless found that specific jurisdiction existed under its "sliding scale" approach. Id. Under this approach, the more wide-ranging Defendants' forum contacts, the greater the connection between the forum contacts and the claim. Id. Because of Bristol-Myers' extensive contacts with California, the California Supreme Court required less direct connection between the company's forum activities and the non-residents' claims than otherwise might be required. Particularly important to the California Supreme Court's determination that specific jurisdiction existed was that the claims of the California residents and the claims of the non-residents were similar. Bristol-Myers then secured review by the U.S. Supreme Court on a petition for certiorari. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed, and held that the California Supreme Court failed to identify an adequate link between the State of California and the 592 non-resident Plaintiffs to support specific jurisdiction. After explaining that specific jurisdiction requires an "affiliation between the forum and the underlying controversy," the U.S. Supreme Court noted that the "sliding scale" approach relaxes this requirement and "resembles a loose and spurious form of general jurisdiction." Id. at 1781. The U.S. Supreme Court further explained that "[t]he mere fact that other Plaintiffs were prescribed, obtained, and ingested Plavix in California – and allegedly sustained the same injuries as did the non-residents – does not allow the State to assert specific jurisdiction over the non-residents' claims." Id. Importantly, the U.S. Supreme Court emphasized "what is needed – and what is missing here – is a connection between the forum and the specific claims (i.e., the non-residents' claims) at issue." Id. Accordingly, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed and remanded the California Supreme Court's ruling.

Jordan, et al. v. Bayer Corp., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109206 (E.D. Mo. July 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of users of the medical device Essure, brought an action asserting that they sustained injuries as a result of using Essure, which is manufactured and sold by Defendants. Plaintiffs asserted various claims for Missouri products liability violations under Mo. Rev. Stat. § 537.760 and violation of the Missouri Merchandising Practices Act. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss, arguing lack of personal jurisdiction over the out-of-state Plaintiffs' claims. Id. at *3. Defendants jointly removed the action to District Court on the basis of diversity jurisdiction and federal question jurisdiction. Plaintiffs filed a motion to remand. Defendant Bayer Corp. was a citizen of New Jersey and Indiana; Bayer Healthcare LLC was a citizen of Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Germany, and the Netherlands; Bayer Essure, Inc. and Bayer Healthcare Pharmaceuticals, Inc., were citizens of Delaware and New Jersey; and Bayer A.G. was a German corporation. Despite the lack of complete diversity on the face of the complaint, Defendants argued that they properly removed this case. Specifically, Defendants contended that removal was proper because the diversity-destroying Plaintiffs were misjoined, jurisdiction was proper under the CAFA, and Plaintiffs pled violations of federal law, thus invoking federal question jurisdiction. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs countered that all of the claims were properly joined, and the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction over this action in the absence of complete diversity of the parties. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs also contested Defendants' assertion that federal question jurisdiction existed. Plaintiffs urged the Court to refrain from ruling on Defendants' motions and rule on the remand motion first. Id. at *6. The Court noted that with one exception in this case, the non-Missouri Plaintiffs did not allege that they acquired the Essure device from a Missouri source or that they were injured or treated in Missouri; thus, all the conduct giving rise to the non-residents' claims occurred elsewhere. Id. at *10. Moreover, Defendants did not develop, manufacture, label, package, or create a marketing strategy for Essure in Missouri. The Court held that the general exercise of business activities in the state cannot create an adequate link between the claims and the Missouri forum. Id. With respect to non-Missouri Plaintiffs, the Court reasoned that there could be no personal jurisdiction as to their claims because there was no "connection between the forum and the specific claims at issue." Id. at *11. The Court therefore determined that there was no personal jurisdiction as to the claims of the non-Missouri Plaintiffs. As a result, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for remand. The Court also denied Defendants' motion to dismiss, and ordered the remaining Plaintiffs to file an amended complaint.

(xl) Litigation Over Class Action Settlement Agreements And Consent Decrees

Doe, et al. v. Briley*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 26795 (6th Cir. Dec. 27, 2017). In 1973, the District Court entered a consent decree ("the 1973 Decree") to resolve a class action filed by Plaintiff limiting the state of Tennessee, the Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County, and various city and county officials ("Metro") from using information about arrests not resulting in a trial or conviction when considering applications for employment. Id. at *1. In 2016, the District Court vacated the 1973 Decree, decertified the class action, and dismissed the case. Plaintiff appealed and Metro moved to dismiss the appeal because there was no class representative or other party with standing to pursue the appeal. Id. The District Court determined that Doe, the named Plaintiff and class representative in this action, did not have standing to pursue an appeal because Doe's whereabouts were unknown, his counsel had no way to contact him, and Plaintiff's counsel had been litigating the action for more than a decade without a class representative. Id. at *2. The District Court concluded that given Doe's complete absence, he did not have a personal stake in the outcome sufficient to establish standing to pursue an appeal. Id. at *2-3. The Sixth Circuit agreed with the District Court. The Sixth Circuit determined that counsel for the class lacked standing to pursue an appeal because counsel failed to cite any authority supporting continued litigation of a class action in the absence of a class representative. Id. at *3. The Sixth Circuit also found that Jane Roe, an individual who moved the District Court to be added as a named Plaintiff and class representative and to individually enforce the 1973 Decree, lacked standing because she did not have a personal stake in the outcome of the appeal. The Sixth Circuit explained that the 1973 Decree prohibited Metro from using any information regarding any arrests which did not result in a trial or conviction when considering applicants for employment. Id. Although Roe was arrested on qualifying charges that were dismissed without a trial or conviction, her arrest was expunged. As a result, the Sixth Circuit reasoned that even if she applied for Metro employment and her records were requested, her arrest would not be revealed. The Sixth Circuit further opined that a class representatives could not acquire standing through unnamed class members. Id. Thus, the Sixth Circuit concluded that Roe could not confer that standing on Doe. Id. at *3-4. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling granting Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Ligas, et al. v. Norwood,* Case No. 05-CV-4331 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of individuals with developmental disabilities living in intermediate care facilities ("ICF-DDs") who want to live in community integration living arrangements ("CILAs"), alleged that Defendants, the Illinois Department of Healthcare and Family Service and the Illinois Department of Human Services, were in violation of a consent decree by failing to providing resources of sufficient quality, scope, and variety to provide community-integrated care to the highest degree. Id. at 1. In support of their contentions, Plaintiff presented a report by an expert economist, Dr. Powers, declarations from ICF-DD and CILA providers, and representatives of developmentally disabled individuals. Id. at 2. The evidence demonstrated that the actual costs of operating CILA and ICF-DD facilities had increased substantially since the entry of the consent decree and that the wages of direct support professionals ("DSPs") had stagnated, thereby causing a staffing crisis that was inhibiting care and negatively impacting the individuals protected by the consent decree. Id. Dr. Powers estimated that a 25% wage increase for DSPs would reduce turnover by one-third. Id. Defendants asserted that the provision of service had not been reduced and that it remained in substantial compliance. Further, Defendants contended that the state budget allocated an additional $53.4 million to services for the following year. Id. Defendants asserted that a 25% increase was not feasible given the State's $14 billion budget deficit due to two years of being in a budget impasse. Id. At the hearing on the motion, the Court monitor reported that Defendants were not in compliance with the consent decree. Id. The Monitor stated that the budget impasse of the previous two years resulted in a reduction of services to Plaintiffs due to rising costs and frozen funding. Further, the Monitor referred to a State working group that had been established in 2014 to address this issue. Id. at 3. The Court stated that reaching a mutual agreeable, long-term place accounting for resources of the State and needs of those with development disabilities would benefit from a revival of the State working group to devise a creative solutions. Id. Accordingly, the Court found that Defendants were not in compliance with the consent decree, and directed the State to devise a place to address the issues causing the reduction in services and to bring the State into substantial compliance.

Memisovski, et al. v. Maram*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124843 (N.D. Ill. June 30, 2017). The parties were signatories to a consent decree that resolved prior litigation over access to healthcare benefits. The Court previously granted Plaintiffs' motion for relief to enforce the Court's order requiring payment of Medicaid, finding that "minimally funding the obligations of the decrees while fully funding other obligations fails to comply not only with the consent decrees, but also with this Court's previous orders." Id. at *5. The Court therefore directed the parties to negotiate to achieve substantial compliance with the consent decree and previous orders in this case. Id. at *6. In light of the urgency of Plaintiff class members' needs on one hand and, on the other hand, the continuing financial distress of Illinois arising from the failure of the executive and legislative branches of its constitutional government to enact a budget and appropriation that matches revenue with expenditures and, in order to enforce substantial compliance with the consent decrees, the Court concluded that the state failed to fund the Medicaid programs in a manner sufficient to meet the federal mandates embodied in the consent decree and previous orders. Id. at *7. The Court stated that the failure to adequately fund the Medicaid program and timely pay its healthcare providers resulted in deprivation of access to healthcare for the Medicaid beneficiaries, in violation of the consent decree and federal law. The Court ordered that to rectify the funding failures and the problems they have created and to restore sufficient, federally-mandated access to health care, the state must fully to fund the Medicaid program and timely pay claims submitted in the ordinary course of business. Id. at *16. In addition, the state must pay a significant portion of the backlog of bills over a reasonable period of time. The Court therefore held that Defendants shall fund payments in the amount of $586 million dollars each month on behalf of providers of services in the Medicaid-funded programs involved in these cases. Id. at *17. Additionally, in 2018 Defendants shall cause to be paid an additional $2 billion toward reducing the backlog of unpaid vouchers that have been submitted for Medicaid services in these cases. The Court further required Defendants to file a monthly report with the Court reflecting payments made in compliance with this order.

(xli) Medical Monitoring Class Actions

Blanyar, et al. v. Genova Products*, 861 F.3d 426 (3d Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, challenged the District Court's decision to dismiss their putative class action for medical monitoring as barred by the applicable two year statute of limitations. While acknowledging that their exposure to the alleged toxic substances upon which they based their medical monitoring claims ended more than two years before commencing this litigation, Plaintiffs contended that the limitations period should have been tolled by the discovery rule and should not have begun to run until they discovered the toxicity of the substances present in the workplace, a discovery they claimed was first made less than two years before they filed their action. Id. at *429. Plaintiffs claimed to have discovered previously unavailable material safety and data sheets ("MSDSs") that revealed that, while working for Defendant, they were exposed to carcinogens and other toxic chemicals linked to various diseases or conditions. Id. While none of the members of the putative class suffered an injury or illness linked to the substances used at Defendant's plant, Plaintiffs asserted that they were entitled to medical monitoring because they are at increased risk of illness. Id. The District Court concluded that the discovery rule did not apply to Plaintiffs' action because information concerning the dangers of the chemicals to which Plaintiffs were exposed had been widely available for decades before they filed their complaint. Id. On appeal, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The Third Circuit explained that in medical monitoring cases, injury occurs when a Plaintiff is "placed at a significantly increased risk of contracting a serious latent disease." Id. at *431. Because Defendant's facility closed in 2012, no member of the putative class could have been exposed to any chemical as a result of Defendant's alleged negligence within two years of the filing of their complaint. Plaintiffs therefore argued that the statute was tolled because they were unable to discover the existence of their claim until they received the MSDSs. Id. The Third Circuit stated that the discovery rule tolls the statute of limitations during the period of a Plaintiff's complete inability, due to facts and circumstances not within his control, to discover an injury despite the exercise of due diligence. Id. at *432. Thus, for the discovery rule to apply, Plaintiffs must not have known, and reasonably could not have discovered, the dangers of exposure prior to May 2013, or two years before the filing of their complaint. Id. The Third Circuit found that Plaintiffs own complaint recognized the extent to which the substances they identify had been "well-studied and well-documented in medical literature from around the world." Id. The Third Circuit reasoned that Plaintiffs thereby knew, or in the exercise of reasonable diligence should have known, that they worked with and were being exposed to potentially dangerous chemicals. Id. Considering the wide availability of information documenting the risks of exposure to these substances in medical literature, the Third Circuit agreed with the District Court that Plaintiffs were on inquiry notice well before May 2013 that their work at Defendant's facility may have placed them at a significantly increased risk of contracting a serious latent disease. Id. at *433. The Third Circuit therefore found that Plaintiffs exercised no reasonable due diligence with regard to their claims, and the discovery rule therefore did not apply. Accordingly, because the statute of limitations for a medical monitoring claim was clearly passed, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling dismissing Plaintiffs' complaint.

(xlii) Mootness Issues In Class Action Litigation

Conrad, et al. v. Boiron, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 16180 (7th Cir. Aug. 24, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action against Defendant for deceptive marketing. Defendant made homeopathic products, including an over-the-counter flu remedy called Oscillococcinum ("Oscillo") that retailed for between $12 and $20, which Plaintiff purchased. Purchasers of Oscillo and other products previously filed a class action against Defendant in California over its deceptive marketing and the parties agreed to a broad settlement that covered over 200 products (including Oscillo) purchased between January 1, 2000 and July 27, 2012. Id. at *2. The settlement required Defendant to: (i) pay refunds to past buyers; (ii) revise its labels to make them accurate; and (iii) let future unhappy customers request refunds within 14 days of purchase. Id. at *3. Plaintiff opted-out of the settlement and ultimately filed the instant action. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the District Court granted, finding that Plaintiff was an inadequate class representative because his suit would provide little benefit beyond Defendant's existing refund guarantee. Id. at *4-5. The District Court further denied class certification, leaving Plaintiff with only his individual claim. The District Court then granted Defendant's Rule 67 motion to deposit $5,025, more than Plaintiff could recover at trial, with the Court in order to moot his claim. Id. at *5. Defendant deposited the funds, and the District Court dismissed the case as moot. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit reversed, and found that an unaccepted offer could not moot a claim. The Seventh Circuit opined that although Defendant requested the District Court to hold the funds, at some point a Plaintiff's stubborn refusal to accept a generous settlement offer could not be taken as the legal equivalent of acceptance; further, it was aware of no such doctrine, and it would not adopt such an ill-defined rule. Id. at *7. The Seventh Circuit noted that the U.S. Supreme Court has recognized "the deep-rooted historic tradition that everyone should have his own day in court." Id. at *11. The Seventh Circuit reasoned that the this did not mean that every person will use that day in court in a way that is economically rational, and some will invoke the aid of the courts for impermissible purposes. The Seventh Circuit noted that sometime negative-value cases are rational, if the party hopes to establish an important principle through the case. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit reversed and remanded the District Court's ruling.

Fulton Dental, LLC, et al. v. Bisco, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 10839 (7th Cir. June 20, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by sending an unsolicited facsimile. Defendant presented Plaintiff with a Rule 68 offer of judgment, which it refused. Defendant then tendered an offer pursuant to Rule 67, which allows a party to submit payment to the District Court, and which it claimed provided all of the individual relief Plaintiff could expect. The District Court concluded that Defendant's offer was enough to moot Plaintiff's individual claim and to disqualify it from serving as a class representative, and dismissed the action. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit found that this order was premature and it remanded back to the District Court for further proceedings. Violations of the TCPA can be redressed with statutory damages of $500 per negligent violation, or $1,500 per willful violation. Plaintiff sought statutory damages for two alleged TCPA violations, injunctive relief banning future violations, and certification of a class of all those who had similarly received faxes from Defendant. Id. at *3. After Plaintiff declined Defendant's Rule 68 offer of judgment, Defendant moved for leave to deposit $3,600 with the District Court under Rule 67. This sum represented what Defendant regarded as the maximum possible damages Plaintiff could receive, plus $595 for fees and costs. Id. Plaintiff opposed the motion on the ground that this was not a proper use of Rule 67 and that the simple deposit of funds could not moot the case. Id. at *4. The District Court granted the motion, and treated the Rule 67 deposit of funds as the equivalent of giving the money directly to Plaintiff, and treated Defendant's offer to submit to the injunction as the equivalent of a commitment that it already had stopped sending the offending faxes. Id. The Seventh Circuit stated that a decision that a certain amount of damages should be paid and that an injunction should be entered is quintessentially a ruling on the merits of a case. The Seventh Circuit found that Defendant's contention that depositing the funds to the District Court would moot the case, overlooked the fact that once the case was moot, the District Court lacked power to enter any judgment on the merits. Id. at *5. The Seventh Circuit determined that mootness was therefore not the correct legal concept for the course of events in this matter. The Seventh Circuit opined that on its face, Rule 67 is a procedural mechanism that allows a party to use the District Court as an escrow agent. Further, from a broader perspective, the Seventh Circuit stated that it saw no principled distinction between attempting to force a settlement on an unwilling party through Rule 68, and attempting to force a settlement on an unwilling party through Rule 67. Id. at *9. In either case, all that exists is an unaccepted contract offer, and as the U.S. Supreme Court has previously recognized, an unaccepted offer is not binding on the offeree. Id. at *10. The Seventh Circuit concluded that an unaccepted offer to settle a case, accompanied by a payment intended to provide full compensation into the registry of the court under Rule 67, is no different in principle from an offer of settlement made under Rule 68. Id. at *13. The Seventh Circuit also stated that it could not determine as a matter of law that the unaccepted offer was sufficient to compensate Plaintiff for its loss of the opportunity to represent the putative class. Id. at *14. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit reversed and remanded the District Court's ruling for further proceedings.

Geismann, et al. v. ZocDoc, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 4150 (2d Cir. Mar. 9, 2017). Plaintiff, a Missouri corporation, alleged that Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") when it sent Plaintiff two unsolicited facsimiles. Plaintiff requested between $500.00 and $1,500.00 in damages for each TCPA violation, an injunction prohibiting Defendant from sending similar faxes in the future, and costs. Defendant made Plaintiff a Rule 68 offer of judgment for: (i) $6,000, plus reasonable attorneys' fees, in satisfaction of Plaintiff's individual claims; and (ii) an injunction prohibiting Defendant from engaging in the alleged statutory violations in the future. Plaintiff rejected the offer but indicated that it would be willing to accept it if Defendant would extend the same offer to all members of the putative class action. Defendant declined. Defendant requested leave to deposit a check in the amount of $6,100 payable to the clerk of the District Court in satisfaction of judgment. The District Court granted the request, and reasoned that the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Campbell-Ewald Co. v. Gomez, 136 S. Ct. 663 (2016), favored "deposit of judgments with the Court" in these circumstances. Id. at *5. Defendant subsequently moved to dismiss the complaint, primarily on the ground that its offer of judgment mooted the action. Id. at *5-6. The District Court granted Defendant's motion. On appeal, the Second Circuit reversed and remanded. Plaintiff argued that the District Court erred in dismissing its complaint for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction because Defendant's offer of monetary damages did not provide complete relief as to Plaintiff's individual claims and the individual and putative class claims were therefore not moot. Alternatively, Plaintiff asserted that even if the offer was complete as to its individual claims, an individual judgment did not render moot a putative class claim, at least when a class-certification motion was pending. The Second Circuit held that in light of Campbell-Ewald, Plaintiff's claims were not moot. Campbell-Ewald held that an "unaccepted settlement offer – like any unaccepted contract offer – is a legal nullity, with no operative effect." Id. at *9. Defendant attempted to distinguish Campbell-Ewald by arguing that the District Court entered judgment in this case, giving effect to the unaccepted offer. Id. at *13. The Second Circuit was unpersuaded by Defendant's argument, and stated that the judgment should not have been entered in the first place. Defendant also argued that Campbell-Ewald was distinguishable because Plaintiff was not left "empty-handed." Id. The Second Circuit again disagreed and found that Plaintiff was not compensated in satisfaction of its claim, which would require, at a minimum, its acceptance of a valid offer. Id. at *13-14. The Second Circuit concluded that the District Court should not have entered judgment on the basis of Defendant's offer, nor should it have dismissed Plaintiff's action. The Second Circuit therefore ruled that Defendant's Rule 68 offer of judgement did not moot Plaintiff's claims, and it reversed and remanded the case to the District Court for further proceedings.

Laurens, et al. v. Volvo Cars Of North America, LLC*, 868 F.3d 622 (7th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a married couple purchasing a car, filed a class action alleging that Defendant misled them into purchasing a hybrid vehicle for a premium price. Plaintiffs learned after purchasing the vehicle that Defendant's representation that the car would go 25 miles without being charged was inaccurate, and in actuality the car battery would run out after only eight miles. Plaintiffs sought damages equal to the premium paid for the hybrid model ($20,000), the cost of the charging station ($2,700), injunctive relief, punitive damages, and attorneys' fees. Id. at 624. Defendant sent named Plaintiff Xavier's wife Khadija, the titleholder on the car, a letter that offered "immediately" to give Khadija "a full refund upon return of the vehicle if you are not satisfied with it for any reason" and to "arrange to pick up your vehicle at your home." Id. Defendant then moved to dismiss Plaintiff Xavier's lawsuit on the theory that he lacked standing; arguing that Khadija, as the titleholder, was the only person with any possible injury, and she was not at that moment a party to the lawsuit. Before the District Court ruled on the motion, Plaintiffs added Khadija to the complaint. Defendant responded with a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(1) and contended that Khadija also lacked standing because its letter had offered complete relief for her before she filed suit. Id. The District Court agreed with Defendant, finding that Xavier had never suffered an Article III injury, and that Defendant's offer had redressed Khadija's injury before she became a party. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit reversed the District Court's ruling and remanded for further proceedings. The Seventh Circuit opined that if forcing a contract on an unwilling party was unacceptable under the judicially supervised procedures of Rule 68 and Rule 67, it saw no reason why an impersonal note offering a refund should have such a powerful effect. Id. at *627. The Seventh Circuit further stated that it made no difference if Defendant's offer preceded Khadija's joining the lawsuit. The Seventh Circuit held that that unaccepted contract offers are nullities; and as settlement proposals are contract offers, unaccepted settlement proposals are nullities, regardless of whether or not a lawsuit was filed. Id. at *628. The Seventh Circuit reasoned that since Khadija did not accept Defendant's offer, her injury-in-fact from Defendant's alleged misrepresentations remained unredressed. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit reversed the District Court's ruling granting Defendant's motion to dismiss, and remanded the case.

Medici, et al. v. City Of Chicago,* 856 F.3d 530 (7th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of patrol officers with the Chicago Police Department (the "CPD"), brought an action alleging that the City of Chicago infringed on their First Amendment rights in violation of 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Plaintiffs claimed that the CPD changed its uniform policy, requiring the on-duty officers representing the CPD, whether in uniform, conservative business attire, or casual dress, to cover any tattoos on the hands, face, neck, and other areas not covered by clothing, with skin tone adhesive bandages or tattoo covers (the "Tattoo Policy"). Id. at 532. Plaintiff sought a declaratory judgment that the Tattoo Policy violated the First Amendment. The City moved to dismiss the complaint, which the District Court granted on two grounds, including: (i) that the wearing of the tattoos was a "personal expression" rather than an effort at communicating with the public on matters of public concern, and hence was not protected by the First Amendment; and (ii) that the challenged order would promote uniformity and professionalism. Plaintiffs appealed the District Court's ruling. Id. However, the police union then filed a grievance against the City claiming that the tattoo order violated the union's collective bargaining agreement with the City, which had issued the order without bargaining over the issue with the union as it should have done because the order affected the police officers' working conditions. Id. The grievance was referred to arbitration and the arbitrator ruled that the tattoo order violated the collective bargaining agreement because of the absence of any bargaining over the order, and the City would therefore have to revoke the order and compensate the officers for any costs incurred by them in complying with it. Id. The City revoked the order and moved to dismiss the Plaintiffs' appeal as moot on the ground that as a result of the arbitration Plaintiffs had obtained the relief they had sought. After the arbitration, the City agreed to reimburse its police officers for money they had spent to comply with the now-invalidated policy, so any direct financial loss Plaintiffs suffered had been remedied. Id. The Seventh Circuit stated that vacatur is in order when mootness occurs through the unilateral action of the party who prevailed in the District Court. Id. at 533. The Seventh Circuit found that was the case here as the unilateral action of the City, which prevailed in the District Court, decided not to appeal the arbitration award obtained by Plaintiffs. Vacating a judgment when the appeal from it is moot (i.e., moot here because Plaintiffs prevailed as a result of the arbitration) would save Plaintiffs from having a binding judgment against them on an issue they can no longer appeal because of mootness. Id. The City contended that the mootness came about through Plaintiffs' act of filing the grievance, and was therefore not their own unilateral act. Id. The Seventh Circuit determined that the City elected not to appeal the arbitration award, and therefore remanded the decision to the District Court with instructions to vacate its judgment as moot.

Wright, et al. v. Calumet City, Illinois*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 2823 (7th Cir. Feb. 17, 2017). Plaintiff, an arrested and incarcerated individual, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated his Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights by failing to provide him with a judicial determination of probable cause within 48 hours of his arrest. The day after Plaintiff filed the complaint, after being detained approximately 72 hours, Plaintiff was presented for a bond hearing and a judge made a finding of probable cause to detain him. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant had a policy or practice authorizing its officers to detain persons arrested without a warrant for up to 72 hours before permitting the arrestee to appear before a judge, and sought to pursue both an individual claim and class claims. Id. at *2. Plaintiff sought certification of two classes pursuant to Rule 23(b)(2) and Rule 23(b)(3). Id. at *2-3. The District Court determined that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate that the classes were sufficiently numerous to satisfy Rule 23(a)(1). Id. at *3. Defendant then made a Rule 68 offer of judgment, which Plaintiff accepted. Plaintiff subsequently appealed the District Court's denial of the class certification. The Seventh Circuit found that Plaintiff was not an aggrieved person with a personal stake in the case or controversy as is required under Article III of the Constitution, and therefore dismissed the appeal for lack of jurisdiction. The Seventh Circuit held that the language of the Rule 68 offer that Plaintiff accepted provided $5,000 to Plaintiff to resolve "all claims brought under this lawsuit." Id. at *5. The Seventh Circuit found that a plain reading of that language instructed that the settlement involved Plaintiff's individual and class claims. Moreover, the Seventh Circuit stated that the Rule 68 offer that distinguished between the individual and class claims in the ensuing sentence, determining that attorneys' fees would be included only for the individual claim and not for the class claim upon which Plaintiff had received no measure of success. Id. at *13. The Seventh Circuit opined that the distinction for purposes of ascertaining attorneys' fees, but not for identifying the claims that are included in the judgment, further affirmed that the offer of judgment resolved both the individual and the class claims. Id. at *14.

Plaintiff argued that he had an on-going interest because he did not obtain attorneys' fees for the class claim. The Seventh Circuit disagreed and determined that in accepting without qualification the Rule 68 offer, Plaintiff accepted the offer as satisfaction of all of the relief that he sought in the District Court. Id. at *17. The Seventh Circuit therefore ruled that Plaintiff lacked a personal stake in the claim as required under Article III. Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit dismissed Plaintiff's appeal for lack of jurisdiction.

(xliii) Multi-Party Litigation Over Modification Of Employee/Retirement Benefits

Board Of Trustees Of The Bay Area Roofers, et al. v. Gudgel Roofing*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40833 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of multi-employer employee benefits plans, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Labor-Management Relations Act and the ERISA when it failed to pay employer contributions as required. Plaintiffs received contributions from individuals who are parties to a collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") that existed between Local 81 of the United Union of Roofers, Waterproofers, and Allied Workers, AFL-CIO ("Local 81"), and the Associated Roofing Contractors of the Bay Area Counties, Inc. Id. at *2. Under the CBA, employers were bound to certain trust agreements (hereinafter, "Trust Agreements") which obligated employers "to make timely contributions" to certain trust funds. Under the Trust Agreements and applicable collection policies, "payments received later than the last day of the month following the month in which the hours were worked are delinquent and liquidated damages shall be assessed on all delinquent contributions to the Trust Funds along with interest." Id. at *3. Since approximately 2004, Defendant had requested apprentices from Local 81. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant failed to make contributions for certain months. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, and the Court denied the motion. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' complaint did not state a claim because the complaint failed to allege sufficient facts to establish that Defendant was bound to the CBA between Local 81 and the Associated Roofing Contractors such that Defendant owed contributions to Plaintiffs under the CBA and Trust Agreements. Id. at *6-7. Plaintiffs argued that Defendant had bound itself to the CBA by its conduct. Plaintiffs attached to their opposition a declaration and several exhibits, which Plaintiffs stated showed that Defendant's intent to be bound by the CBA and Trust Agreements. Id. at *7-8. The Court stated that the Ninth Circuit has recognized that a party who is not a signatory to a CBA "can adopt a labor agreement by their conduct." Id. at *12. In determining whether an employer had bound itself to a CBA by its conduct, case law authorities have considered a variety of factors, including the payment of union wages, the remission of union dues, the payment of fringe benefit contributions, the existence of other agreements evidencing assent, and the submission of the employer to union jurisdiction, such as that created by grievance procedures. Id. at *13. The Court determined that Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant requested and received apprentices from Local 81, that Defendant paid union wages and fringe benefit contributions for those apprentices, that Defendant "accepted" language purporting to bind Defendant to the CBA, and that Defendant regularly submitted monthly employer reports to Plaintiffs that contained language that "all contributions due under the Trust Agreement have been included." Id. at *18. Thus, the Court found that Plaintiff alleged facts that plausibly suggested that Defendant manifested an intent to be bound by the CBA and Trust Agreements. Defendant also asserted that dismissal was proper because Plaintiffs had not adequately alleged that Defendant was bound by the CBA during the time periods for which Plaintiffs sought relief. The Court stated that Plaintiffs attached specific monthly transmittals submitted by Defendant and specific apprentice referral forms that Defendant allegedly accepted on specific dates. The Court held that these facts suggested that Defendant was bound to the CBA for the months in question. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs had stated valid claims for relief based on Defendant's failure to comply with the CBA's and Trust Agreements' contribution requirements for apprentices dispatched to Defendant from Local 81. The Court therefore denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Cole, et al. v. Meritor, Inc.*, 855 F.3d 695 (6th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs asserted claims under § 301 of the Labor-Management Relations Act and the Employee Retirement Income Security Act ("ERISA") based on Defendant's alleged unilateral reduction of benefits and increase in out-of-pocket expenses for retirees in 2003. Defendant subsequently made an announcement that would have eliminated all healthcare benefits for the affected groups. Plaintiffs filed a motion for a preliminary injunction to force Defendant to continue providing those benefits, and the District Court granted the motion. Id. at *697. The District Court found that "the contracting parties' intention to provide lifetime retiree health coverage" was expressed in the "explicit language" of the parties' collective bargaining agreements ("CBAs") and confirmed by prior precedent and a multitude of extrinsic evidence. Id. at *697-698. As a result, the District Court permanently enjoined Defendant from altering or canceling retiree healthcare benefits. The Sixth Circuit affirmed, citing then-binding precedent for the proposition that "general durational provisions only refer to the length of the CBAs and not the period of time contemplated for retiree benefits. Absent specific durational language referring to retiree benefits themselves, … the general durational language says nothing about those retiree benefits." Id. at *698. Defendant filed a motion for rehearing, which was held in abeyance for eight years while the parties attempted to settle their dispute. During the intervening eight years, a sea change in the applicable law occurred, and various U.S. Supreme Court decisions held that a series of CBAs materially indistinguishable from the CBA in the instant action did not provide the retirees with lifetime healthcare benefits. The Sixth Circuit subsequently granted Defendant's motion for rehearing, and reversed and remanded the District Court's ruling. The Sixth Circuit found that Defendant guaranteed healthcare benefits only until the expiration of the final CBA, and nothing more. The Sixth Circuit noted that this result was in line with the ordinary principles of contract law, which dictate that "contractual obligations will cease, in the ordinary course, upon termination of the bargaining agreement." Id. at *698. The Sixth Circuit explained that the 1968 CBA and every subsequent CBA provided that retiree healthcare benefits "shall be continued." Id. at *700. All of the CBAs included a general durational clause that terminated the agreement after three years. The Sixth Circuit reasoned that it must "assume that the explicit guarantee of lifetime benefits in some provisions and not others means something." Id. at 701. The Sixth Circuit determined that the "shall be continued" language was not sufficient to vest the retirees with healthcare benefits for life. The Sixth Circuit held that the language in the 2000 CBA, as interpreted by the ordinary principles of contract law, was unambiguous and that the CBAs between the parties made commitments for the three-year terms of the CBAs, and not commitments for life. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit granted Defendant's petition for rehearing, reversed the District Court's ruling, and remanded for further proceedings.

Di Biase, et al. v. SPX Corp.*, 872 F.3d 224 (4th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs brought a class action for declaratory relief against Defendant alleging violation of settlement agreements regarding health benefits. As a result of two class action lawsuits filed by the union alleging that Defendant violated its members' right to lifetime health benefits, Defendant and the union executed two settlement agreements. Id. at *227. Pursuant to the settlement agreements, Defendant agreed to provide health care benefits to retirees and surviving spouses for life. Id. Subsequently, Defendant changed the structure of the benefits and decided to fund a Health Retirement Account ("HRA") for each member, in which Defendant would place $5,000 each year in the HRA to pay for that individual's health and prescribing drug coverage. Id. at *228. Each individual would then use his or her HRA to buy his or her own insurance policy in the individual Medicare market. Id. Plaintiffs sought a preliminary injunction restraining Defendant from terminating the group plan and instituting the HRA structure, which the District Court denied. The District Court observed that the changeover to the HRA structure took effect on January 1, 2015; therefore, the change that Plaintiffs sought to prohibit had already occurred. Id. The Court remarked that any injunction would have to order Defendant to revert to the group plan in order to return to the last uncontested status between the parties. Id. at *229. On appeal, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Plaintiffs maintained that the District Court abused its discretion by failing to grant the preliminary injunction. Defendant countered that the motion was moot and that Plaintiffs had not established any of the four criteria necessary to grant a preliminary injunction. Id. The Fourth Circuit found that Plaintiffs' motion was not mooted by implementation of the HRA, and that a motion for a preliminary injunction filed before the act to be enjoined had occurred, and subsequently intended to restore the status quo once it had been disturbed, was not moot. Id. at *230. The Fourth Circuit further considered whether the District Court properly found that Plaintiffs had not established a likelihood of success on the merits of the underlying healthcare coverage dispute. The outcome of the underlying case turned on whether the creation of the HRA accounts satisfied the "substantially equivalent" provisions of each of the settlement agreements. The Fourth Circuit agreed with the District Court's conclusion that the evidentiary record was not sufficiently developed to make such a fact-sensitive inquiry. Id. Plaintiffs asserted that the record established that making a sum of money available through an HRA to use for reimbursement of certain expenses was not "coverage" and, therefore, implementation of the HRA approach to providing healthcare benefits constituted a breach of the settlement agreement. Id. at *234. Although the settlement agreements did not require that coverage be provided through a group health plan, Plaintiffs asserted that "coverage" and "plan" had specific meanings that were inconsistent with the structure of an HRA. However, the Fourth Circuit held that the terms "coverage" and "plan" were not defined in the settlement agreements, and Plaintiffs cited only non-binding case law from other circuits to suggest that the meaning of "coverage" did not include HRA plans. Id. The Fourth Circuit therefore ruled that more facts were needed to determine whether HRAs in general, based upon their structure, as well as the specific terms of the HRAs that Defendant established for its retirees, provided substantially equivalent healthcare benefits in accordance with terms of the settlement agreements. Id. at *235. Further, the Fourth Circuit considered whether Plaintiffs demonstrated that they were likely to suffer irreparable harm without a preliminary injunction. The Fourth Circuit concluded that Plaintiffs failed to provide evidence that anyone suffered any potential irreparable harm or that any such harm was imminent. The Fourth Circuit looked to whether Plaintiffs demonstrated that an injunction was in the public interest. The Fourth Circuit stated that, given the administrative challenges and confusion for the retirees, the fact that Plaintiffs had not demonstrated a likelihood of success on the merits or irreparable harm, the balance of equities and the public interest were better served by allowing the underlying litigation to proceed to a decision on the merits. Id. at *235-236. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling denying Plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction.

Fletcher, et al. v. Honeywell International*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28324 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retirees and their spouses, filed suit against Defendant alleging that Defendant promised to provide Plaintiffs lifetime healthcare benefits and that the proposed termination of those benefits violated the terms of a long series of collective bargaining agreements ("CBA"). Defendant did not contest that it promised to provide lifetime healthcare benefits to surviving spouses and dependents, but denied that it promised lifetime healthcare benefits to the retirees themselves. Plaintiffs sought injunctive relief to enforce Defendant's alleged promises under the Labor-Management Relations Act ("LMRA") and the Employee Retirement Income Security Act ("ERISA"). The Court held that Plaintiffs satisfied their burden of proving that Defendant agreed to provide lifetime healthcare benefits to its retirees. Defendant asserted that it did not agree to provide lifetime retiree healthcare benefits and, because the right to retiree healthcare benefits was not vested, any obligation to provide such benefits ended when the last CBA expired. Plaintiffs argued that Defendant could not unilaterally terminate benefits because they had vested. There was no specific language in the CBA stating that Defendant agreed to provide lifetime healthcare benefits to its retirees, but Plaintiffs maintained that Defendant's promise to provide lifetime retiree healthcare benefits was implicit in the retiree healthcare provisions of the 2000-2003 CBA. Defendant maintained that the Court could not infer such a promise from the language of the CBA and should limit Defendant's obligations to the precise terms of the agreement because the absence of specific language providing for lifetime healthcare benefits for retirees was determinative. The Court ruled that it was not required to find a "clear statement" that Defendant agreed to provide lifetime retiree healthcare benefits because it could draw implications and inferences from language contained in the CBA. Moreover, because the Court found the contract language to be ambiguous, it looked to extrinsic evidence to determine what the parties' intent was when they drafted the agreement. The union negotiators did not submit any proposal asking Defendant to provide healthcare benefits for the lifetime of the retirees. Defendant argued that the union negotiators did not make such a request because they knew that any such request would be rejected. Conversely, Plaintiffs argued that the union negotiators did not ask for lifetime healthcare benefits for retirees at the CBA because that benefit had already vested. The Court found the fact that Defendant continued to provide coverage to retirees after the CBA had expired provided strong support for the finding that Defendant had agreed to provide lifetime retiree healthcare benefits. The Court noted that numerous case law authorities have held that, when a company continued to pay for healthcare benefits after it was no longer obligated to do so, this suggested that the parties intended the benefits to be vested. Defendant offered no explanation as to why it continued to provide retiree healthcare benefits after the CBA expired. Accordingly, the Court ruled in favor of Plaintiffs and permanently enjoined Defendant from terminating healthcare benefits of Plaintiffs.

IUE-CWA, et al. v. General Electric Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 118846 (N.D. Ohio July 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of unions and retirees, filed a putative class action arising out of Defendant's changes to retirees' benefits plans. Plaintiffs claimed that union-represented employees who retired prior to the 2015 collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") had a vested, post-collective CBA right to unalterable, lifetime post-65 health benefits under the benefit plans and the CBA in effect at the time of their respective retirements. Plaintiffs also claimed that Defendant's decision to replace the benefit plans with an alternative set of health benefits for post-65 retirees was a breach of fiduciary duty. Further, independent of the change in benefits, Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant acted unlawfully when it changed the organizational structure of the Medicare A Plan and the drug plan while those plans were still in effect. The Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6). As part of the CBAs, Defendant reserved its right to amend, suspend, or terminate each of the benefit plans in whole or in part, at any time without limitation, except for certain specified restrictions. Defendant and the unions entered a new CBA every three or four years from 1973 to 2015. At issue was Defendant's decision to replace the one-size-fits-all benefit plans with an alternative arrangement that provided retirees with access to the same types of coverage in a manner that could be more tailored to retirees' individualized preferences. Plaintiffs asserted that in its pre-2015 CBAs, Defendant contractually committed to provide unalterable medical benefits for life to union retirees and Defendant unambiguously promised to continue the benefit plans. However, the Court determined that each of the benefit plans clearly and expressly reserved Defendant's right to amend or terminate the plans at any time for any reason, subject only to the limited restrictions on amendment imposed by the CBA. The Court reasoned that unless restricted from doing so by the CBAs, Defendant had the right to amend or terminate the plans as it deemed appropriate. The Court concluded that because the benefit plans at issue were subject to express reservation of rights provisions that authorized Defendant to amend or terminate the plan at any time, Plaintiffs' benefits were not vested. Accordingly, the Court dismissed this claim. Second, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant's plan to terminate the retiree benefit plans constituted a breach of fiduciary duty in violation of § 404 of the ERISA, 29 U.S.C. § 1104. However, the Court reasoned that Plaintiffs offered no opposition to Defendant's argument that it did not breach a fiduciary duty by replacing the benefit plans with an alternative set of post-65 health benefits. The Court concluded that because Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden in opposing dismissal on their breach of fiduciary duty claim, Plaintiffs had abandoned this claim and waived any argument concerning dismissal of such claim. Accordingly, the Court dismissed this claim. Finally, Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant acted unlawfully when it unilaterally transferred the drug plan and the Medicare A Plan to a separate retiree-only plan. Defendant argued without opposition that this ancillary claim was moot if the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' primary claims challenging the termination of the post-65 benefit plans at issue. Id. at *37. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs also did not identify any possible injury that would warrant monetary or equitable relief for this claim as the restructuring did not affect substantive benefits. Accordingly, the Court dismissed this claim. In sum, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' complaint in its entirety. Id.

Kirkendall, et al. v. Halliburton, Inc., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 161257 (W.D.N.Y. Sept. 29, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, alleged that Defendants improperly denied them early retirement benefits and breached their fiduciary duties. In Count I of the complaint, Plaintiffs sought a declaratory judgment as to whether they are entitled to early retirement benefits; in Count II, Plaintiffs alleged that they were entitled to have their employment benefits correctly determined; and in Count IV, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant Halliburton, Inc. breached its fiduciary duties of loyalty and prudence by choosing the incorrect date to determine benefits for Plaintiffs. Id. at *2. Defendants filed a motion for summary judgment on Counts I, II, and IV, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs filed a motion for summary judgement on Counts I and II, which the Court denied. Dresser Industries, Inc. ("Dresser") established Defendant Dresser Industries, Inc. Consolidated Salaried Retirement Plan ("DICON"). Plaintiffs were Dresser employees and enrolled in DICON. DICON participants had to satisfy the several requirements to qualify for early retirement benefits, including: (i) the participant's severance from service date ("SSD"), or the date they quit, retired, or were discharged, must occur after they turn 55-years-old but before age 65; and (ii) the participant had to a participate in DICON on May 1, 1986, and have 10 years or more of vesting service. Id. at *2-3. Defendant Halliburton, Inc. ("Halliburton") acquired Dresser. Dresser was thus a wholly-owned subsidiary of Halliburton and remained a partner in the Dresser Rand Co. ("DR"). After Defendant Halliburton acquired Dresser, Halliburton adopted DICON and unanimously ratified a decision to deny employees the ability to "grow in" to early retirement benefits under DICON after the sale. HBC subsequently interpreted DICON to define "DR" as the partnership between Dresser and Ingersoll as long as Dresser had an interest in DR. Under that interpretation, once Dresser no longer had an interest in DR, "DR" no longer existed for purposes of DICON and Plaintiffs could not "grow in" to their early retirement benefits after Halliburton sold Dresser's interest. Id. at *5. Accordingly, Defendant deemed that Plaintiffs and similarly-situated DR employees ceased service with DR as of December 30, 1999. Therefore, any DR employees who did not meet the requirements for early retirement benefits as of December 30, 1999, could not "grow in" to early retirement benefits even though their employment with DR continued under Ingersoll's ownership. Id. The Court found that both Defendants and Plaintiffs offered rational, conflicting interpretations of the DICON provisions, and therefore Defendants' interpretation must control. Plaintiffs' benefit claim hinged on whether Defendants correctly interpreted DICON to disallow Plaintiffs to "grow in" to their early retirement benefits after Halliburton sold Dresser's interest in DR to Ingersoll in 1999. Under Plaintiffs' interpretation, DICON declared DR to be a partnership under New York law. Under New York law, a partnership "continues until the winding up of partnership affairs is completed." Id. at *14. Thus, until DR completed the winding up of its affairs, DR continued and its employees participating in DICON were able to "grow in" to their early retirement benefits. Id. Defendant's interpretation was that participants in DICON may "grow in" to early retirement rights by accruing vesting service, including by working for a "related entity." Id. at *15. Once Halliburton sold Dresser's interest in DR to Ingersoll in 1999, in Defendant's version, Dresser no longer had a substantial ownership interest – either direct or indirect – in DR. Accordingly, both Defendants and Plaintiffs offered rational, conflicting interpretations of the DICON's provisions, and so Defendants' interpretation must control. The Court also found that Defendant Halliburton was entitled to summary judgment on Plaintiffs' breach of fiduciary duty claim because it was undisputed that Halliburton did not act as a fiduciary when it allegedly caused DICON to determine Plaintiffs' early retirement benefits based on the wrong termination date. Id. at *15-16. The Court stated that Plaintiffs failed to provide specific facts or evidence "showing that there is a genuine issue for trial" that would prevent Halliburton from being entitled to summary judgment. Id. at *16. Finally, the Court found that Defendants were entitled to summary judgment on Plaintiffs' declaratory judgment claim. The Court stated that Plaintiffs sought monetary damages, attempting to work around the ERISA's express remedies and should therefore be dismissed. Id. at *17.

Reese, et al. v. CNH Industries N.V.*, 854 F.3d 877 (6th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees of Defendant who retired between 1994 and 2004, filed a class action seeking a declaration that they were entitled to lifetime healthcare benefits, an injunction requiring Defendant to "maintain the level of retiree health care benefits currently in effect," and damages for injuries the retirees might sustain if the benefits were terminated. Id. at 879. This matter was complicated by a change in the law, and in light of M & G Polymers USA, LLC v. Tackett, 135 S. Ct. 926 (2015), which abrogated the Sixth Circuit's Yard Man line of cases (stemming from International Union v. Yard-Man, Inc., 716 F.2d 1476 (6th Cir. 1983), and its progeny), the District Court had to revisit the question of whether Plaintiffs had a vested right to lifetime healthcare benefits. Id. The District Court ultimately found that they did. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit found that the parties collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") was ambiguous, and because the extrinsic evidence indicated that parties intended for the healthcare benefits to vest for life, it affirmed the District Court's vesting determination. The Sixth Circuit, however, remanded to the District Court because it failed to properly weigh the costs and the benefits of the proposed plan. Id. Ultimately, the Sixth Circuit faced two questions: "Did [CNH] in the 1998 CBA agree to provide healthcare benefits to retirees and their spouses for life? And, if so, does the scope of this promise permit CNH to alter these benefits in the future?" Id. In Reese, et al. v. CNH Industries, N.V., 574 F.3d 315 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Reese I"), the Sixth Circuit answered both questions in the affirmative, but remanded to the District Court so that it could determine "how and in what circumstances CNH may alter [the healthcare benefits] . . . ." Id. at 880. The District Court found that Defendant could not unilaterally make changes to the scope of Plaintiffs' healthcare benefits, which was in conflict with the Sixth Circuit's commands in Reese I. In another appeal in Reese, et al. v. CNH Industries, N.V., 694 F.3d 681 (6th Cir. 2012) ("Reese II"), the Sixth Circuit remanded to the District Court again, this time with a list of seven factors to consider when making its reasonableness-of-the-proposed-plan determination and with clear instructions that Defendant could make unilateral changes to the plan. Id. While on the second remand, the Supreme Court decided Tackett, and the District Court was required to reconsider whether Plaintiffs had a vested right to lifetime healthcare benefits. Initially, the District Court found that Plaintiffs did not. However, on Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration, the District Court reversed and found not only that Plaintiffs' rights were vested even after Tackett, but also that Defendant's proposed changes were unreasonable. Id. Defendant appealed yet again, and the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling, but remanded for further consideration. The Sixth Circuit noted that the District Court focused heavily on cost-shifting provided in the proposed plan, as many of the Reese II factors dealt with changes in costs for the parties. However, the Sixth Circuit opined that the District Court made several mistakes when focusing on the costs. The Sixth Circuit therefore found that on remand, the District Court should reconsider the factors presented in Reese II, with special attention on the increased benefits to Plaintiffs, including benefits created by progress in medical procedures and prescriptions. Id. at 886. The Sixth Circuit stated that the District Court should also consider how much of the cost to Medicare-eligible retirees will be borne by the federal government or others. Id. at 887. Finally, the Sixth Circuit directed the District Court to reconsider whether the proposed plan was reasonable in light of the plans offered at similar companies, i.e., large manufacturing corporations with union representation. Id. at 888. The Sixth Circuit held that the District Court also should look to the individual terms proposed and determine, if not reasonable on the whole, whether individual pieces of the plan were reasonable. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's finding that Plaintiffs' right to lifetime healthcare benefits vested, but it remanded so that the District Court could reconsider the reasonableness of Defendant's proposed plan in light of Reese I and Reese II.

Thompson, et al. v. American Airlines, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 130377 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retired flight attendants, filed suit alleging breach of contract, promissory estoppel, negligent misrepresentation, and intentional misrepresentation against Defendant for altering their priority boarding status following retirement. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, and the Court granted the motion in part. Plaintiffs claimed that, through Defendant's company policy, it promised that retirees, and certain qualifying employees, who left the company would receive the same travel benefits they had enjoyed immediately prior to separation from the company. Id. at *2. Following a merger between Defendant and US Airways, Plaintiffs alleged that their priority boarding status changed and that the change was contrary to many statements that Defendant made reaffirming that the merger would not affect Plaintiffs' travel benefits, including their boarding priority status. Id. at *4. The Court addressed each of Plaintiffs' claims, beginning with the assertion that Defendant breached a contract with them to provide the same flight priority benefits for life. The Court noted that, in order to state a clam for breach of contract in Illinois, Plaintiffs must allege: (i) the existence of a valid and enforceable contract; (ii) substantial performance by Plaintiff; (iii) a breach by Defendant; and (iv) resulting damages. Id. at *5-6. The Court held that Defendant's policy contained clear enough language that employees and retirees meeting certain eligibility requirements would have believed that an offer had been made for them to receive specific travel benefits. The policy stated that these benefits would be made "for . . . life." Id. at *7. Therefore, the Court held that Plaintiffs sufficiently alleged the existence of a contract to meet the first element of their breach of contract claim. The Court then considered whether Plaintiffs sufficiently alleged a breach of the travel promises. Defendant argued that the policy contained unambiguous language that allowed Defendant to change Plaintiffs' travel privileges at any time. Id. at *9. The Court rejected Defendant's position because the language to which Defendant pointed would render the words "for . . . life" meaningless. Id. at *10. Because the doctrine of illusory promises provides that Courts should avoid construing contracts to render promises illusory, the Court opined that it should give the words "for . . . life" meaning. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiffs adequately stated a claim for breach of contract. The Court also considered whether Plaintiffs stated a claim for promissory estoppel. The Court noted that Plaintiffs must allege that: (i) Defendant made an unambiguous promise to Plaintiffs; (ii) Plaintiffs relied the promise; (ii) Plaintiffs' reliance was expected and foreseeable by Defendant; and (iv) Plaintiffs relied on the promise to their detriment. Id. at *12-13. The Court found that Plaintiffs' complaint contained sufficient facts to state a claim for promissory estoppel because Plaintiffs asserted that Plaintiffs relied on Defendant's promise of lifetime travel benefits when they took early retirement or separation packages. Id. at *13. Further, Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant intended Plaintiffs to rely on the promise, or it was at least foreseeable that Plaintiffs would rely on it. The Court then turned to Plaintiffs' misrepresentation claims. To state a claim of intentional misrepresentation, Plaintiffs must allege: (i) a false statement of material fact; (ii) known or believed to be false by the person making it; (iii) an intent to induce Plaintiffs to act; (iv) action by Plaintiffs in justifiable reliance on the truth of the statement; and (v) damage to Plaintiffs resulting from such reliance. Id. at *14. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs failed to meet the level of specificity required by Rule 9(b). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant promised Plaintiffs that they would receive in retirement D2 travel benefits for life; however, Plaintiffs did not identify who made the representations or when precisely they were made, which failed to satisfy the heightened standard of Rule 9(b). Id. at *15. The Court, therefore, concluded that Plaintiffs failed to state a claim for intentional misrepresentation. Negligent misrepresentation has similar elements except that Defendant need not know that the statement was false. Id. at *16. Defendant argued for dismissal of this claim based on the policy's language that demonstrated that reliance on the "for life" provision was not reasonable or justifiable. Id. However, the Court explained that reasonable reliance was usually a question of fact, and therefore not appropriate for resolution on a motion to dismiss. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiffs sufficiently alleged negligent misrepresentation. The Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss in part and denied it in part.

Watkins, et al. v. Honeywell International, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 22359 (6th Cir. Nov. 8, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action on behalf of nearly 1,000 retirees and their spouses and dependents alleging that Defendant violated the Labor-Management Relations Act and the Employee Retirement Income Security Act when Defendant notified them that it was terminating their healthcare benefits. Id. at *2-3. Defendant's employees were part of the United Automobile, Aerospace, and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (the "UAW"). Defendant and the UAW engaged in collective bargaining and came to an arrangement that expired in 2011 where Defendant agreed to pay for healthcare benefits for employees and retirees. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendants wrote to retirees (or their surviving spouses) that their healthcare "will continue during your retirement" and is "for your lifetime." Id. at *3. In actuality, the collective bargaining agreement stated that " this Agreement shall continue in full force and effect until 11:59 PM, October 31, 2011." Id. Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant "promised lifetime healthcare coverage and benefits for retirees and their spouses, eligible dependents, and surviving spouses," and Defendant had breached this agreement by ending its healthcare contributions. Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). The District Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss. The District Court found that the text of the final collective bargaining agreement was clear and expressed an unambiguous intent and agreement that the benefits were not for life. Id. at *8. Finding the contract unambiguous, the District Court did not consider any of Plaintiffs' extrinsic evidence. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit reviewed Plaintiffs' evidence and found that it did not show that "for the duration of this Agreement" contained a patent ambiguity that "clearly appears on the face of a document, arising from the language itself." Id. at *19. The Sixth Circuit stated that Plaintiffs did not argue that "for the duration of this Agreement" was unclear; instead, they pointed back to the caps, the use of the word "continue," the early termination mechanisms, and the tying of healthcare and pension together to argue that the contract was ambiguous. The Sixth Circuit rejected these arguments, and further opined that the arguments said nothing about whether the phrase "for the duration of this Agreement" might not mean what it says. Id. at *20. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling granting Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Zino, Jr. v. Whirlpool Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 117905 (N.D. Ohio July 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retirees, filed a class action alleging that Defendants breached its agreement to provide Plaintiffs with vested healthcare benefits. At phase one of the trial, the Court granted summary judgment in favor of Plaintiffs, and ruled that Defendants had agreed to provide Plaintiffs in certain sub-classes with vested healthcare benefits. Defendants moved the Court to reconsider its prior rulings considering the Sixth Circuit's recent decision in Gallo v. Moen Inc., 813 F.3d 265 (6th Cir. 2016). Defendants argued that under Gallo, the plain language of the parties' contracts unambiguously precluded vested retiree benefits, and the Court erred by using extrinsic evidence to evaluate the contracts. Alternatively, Defendants contended that even if the extrinsic evidence were proper, evidence from the second phase of trial, and additional evidence not presented at trial, demonstrated that the Court's rulings were in error. At the outset, the Court noted that the Federal Rules of Procedure do not provide for motions to reconsider; however, it treated Defendant's motion as motion to alter or amend judgment pursuant to Rule 59(e). Id. at *8. Defendants argued that the Gallo decision precluded a finding of ambiguity in this case as the language in the agreements were similar. Id. at *9. Defendants asserted that the plain language of the contracts, the general durational clause, the reservation of rights clause, and contrasting pension plan language all supported its contention that there was no ambiguity in the agreements. Id. at *10. The Court rejected each argument. Defendants contended that the parties' contractual provisions regarding retiree healthcare benefits were unambiguous and did not convey an intent to vest retiree healthcare benefits as the language used in this case was no more binding than that used in Gallo. Accordingly, Defendant asserted that Gallo mandated that the Court find no ambiguity. The Court found that Defendant misread Gallo and it rejected Defendant's assertion that Gallo created a bright-line rule, as the Sixth Circuit cautioned in Gallo that its decision did not create a clear-statement rule, and that ordinary principles of contract law still must be applied. Id. at *11. The Court rejected Defendants' approach in comparing individual phrases of each contract with language in the Gallo contract, because Defendant failed to consider the context of the language within the agreements. Id. at *14. The Court found no basis to alter or reconsider its ruling that there was sufficient ambiguity in the contract language to permit the use of extrinsic evidence in the Court's analysis. Id. at *20. The Court also rejected Defendant's alternative argument that extrinsic evidence weighed against vesting and denied Defendant's motion to reconsider of alter the judgment. Finally, the Court denied Defendant's motion to strike Plaintiff's declarant submitted for phase two of the trial as the Court's trial ruling provided for inclusion of such information and any prejudice to Defendant was minimal. Id. at *24.

(xliv) Non-Workplace Class Action Arbitration Issues

Ambulatory Surgical Center Of Somerset, et al. v. Allstate Fire Casualty Insurance Co*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 165021 (D.N.J. Oct. 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, an injured individual and a hospital, filed a class action seeking liability and damages on behalf of individuals insured by Defendant who had sustained injuries in automobile accidents and were entitled to medical benefits pursuant to New Jersey law and of ambulatory surgical facilities that performed procedures for which Defendant refused payment. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs also sought a declaratory judgment that Defendant must pay for those procedures and asserted related contract claims and violations of the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act. Id. Defendant moved to compel arbitration and to stay proceedings. The Court denied the motion, and Defendant moved for reconsideration of the Court's decision. Subsequently, the Court granted Defendant's motion for reconsideration. Plaintiffs' case dealt with New Jersey's "deemer statute," which extends New Jersey Personal Injury Protection ("PIP") coverage to out-of-state insureds who were injured in-state or utilized in-state care. Id. at *4. Defendant argued that the Court should reconsider the breadth of the deemer statute and whether the deemer statute incorporates PIP's dispute resolution provision. Id. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendant was not entitled to relief pursuant to the reconsideration standard because he merely put forth the same case law that the Court relied on in its initial opinion in support of an alternative outcome. Id. The Court noted that while Defendant repeated some of the same arguments, the Court determined that it overlooked important law related to the legislative history of PIP amendments. Id. The Court reasoned that it did not consider the underlying purpose of the amendments, nor the effect of this purpose on the breadth of the deemer statute. The Court therefore found that reconsideration was justified to avoid any potential injustice that might result. Id. at *5. The Court stated that review of deemer statute case law suggest that the deemer statute converts out-of-state policies into PIP policies in their entirety. Id. at *6. The Court found that the combination of the liberal treatment of the deemer statute by New Jersey case law authorities and the underlying purpose of the arbitration provision – designed to encourage more dispute resolution by expanding the class of parties who can compel arbitration – together implied that the deemer statute should incorporate PIP's amended dispute resolution provision. Id. Therefore, pursuant to the deemer statute, the Court held that an insurance company can compel an out-of-state claimant to arbitrate. Id. The Court opined that its original holding was misplaced. Id. at *9. The Court found that the PIP's dispute resolution provision was amended to empower any party to a dispute to compel arbitration, including insurance companies. Id. Therefore, because the deemer statute treated Plaintiff's insurance policy as though it were a New Jersey policy, including the arbitration provision, the statutory notice of arbitration was enough to justify compelling arbitration. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for reconsideration.

Burcham, et al. v. Ford Motor Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 98393 (S.D. Ill. June 23, 2017). Plaintiff filed a one-count putative class action alleging that Defendant failed to release security interests on purchased vehicles pursuant to Illinois law at 625 ILCS 5/3-205. Id. at *1. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration, asserting that Plaintiff consented to arbitrate any claims, disputes, or controversies related to the purchase contract of his pre-owned 2006 Ford Fusion SE. Defendant argued that the claim should be arbitrated because it fell within the scope of the retail installment contract's arbitration provision. Plaintiff argued that his cause of action – the enforcement of a security interest – was expressly excluded from the arbitration clause within the contract. Id. at *2. Plaintiff contended that the legal dispute was premised on enforcement of security interest in his vehicle, and therefore, the motion to compel arbitration should be denied because the arbitration clause excluded this dispute. Defendant argued that the delegation provision within the contract enforced arbitration of "claims regarding the interpretation, scope, or validity of the arbitration provision, or arbitrability of any issue." Id. Defendant further asserted that the delegation provision must be imposed because Plaintiff neglected to raise a direct challenge to the provision. Id. at *3-4. Defendant maintained that each statutory element required to compel arbitration under the Federal Arbitration Act had been satisfied, including: (i) the existence of a written arbitration agreement set forth in the contract; (ii) Plaintiff's claim for alleged violation of 625 ILCS 5/3-205 fell within the scope of the written arbitration agreement; and (iii) Plaintiff refused to arbitrate his claim, which was inferred by the filing of his complaint against Defendant. Id. at *4. The Court agreed with Defendant with respect to existence of the delegation provision. The Court held that unless a delegation provision was challenged, the Court must treat it as valid and enforceable, "leaving any challenge to the validity of the Agreement as a whole for the arbitrator." Id. at *7-8. The Court reasoned that Plaintiff's response to the motion to compel failed to address the delegation provision, much less specifically challenge its legality. Id. at *8. Therefore, since the delegation clause in the arbitration agreement was unambiguous in both declaring and requiring parties to arbitrate claims regarding the interpretation, scope, or validity of the arbitration clause, or arbitrability of any issue, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Catamaran Corp., et al. v. Towncrest Pharmacy*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 13689 (8th Cir. July 27, 2017). Plaintiff, a pharmacy benefit manager, contracts with entities that sponsor, administer, or otherwise participate in prescription drug benefit plans. Among the services Plaintiff provides is reimbursing pharmacies who furnish prescription drugs to individuals covered by such a plan. Defendants were four pharmacies that had agreements with Plaintiff for reimbursements. After a dispute arose between the parties, Plaintiff filed a declaratory judgment action under 28 U.S.C. § 2201 and the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") in District Court. Plaintiff asserted that Defendants were subject to two agreements containing arbitration agreements. Plaintiff sought declaratory relief and an injunction preventing Defendants from proceeding with class arbitration. Plaintiff moved for summary judgment, arguing that the relevant agreements did not permit the pharmacies to proceed to arbitration as a class. Plaintiff contended that each pharmacy must engage in individual, bilateral arbitration proceedings. The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment. The District Court viewed the issue before it as twofold: (i) whether the availability of class arbitration is a substantive or a procedural question; and (ii) whether the agreements clearly and unmistakably commit the class arbitration question to an arbitrator. Id. at *3-4. On the first question, the District Court recognized that the Eighth Circuit has yet to decide the issue. As to the second question, relying on Eighth Circuit precedent analyzing bilateral arbitration, the District Court held that the agreements' reference to AAA rules was a clear and unmistakable commitment for an arbitrator to decide whether the agreements contemplated class arbitration. Id. at *4. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit reversed and remanded. The Eighth Circuit stated that it must first determine whether the question of class arbitration was substantive in nature, and therefore one for the District Court to decide absent clear and unmistakable language to the contrary, or procedural in nature and presumably for an arbitrator to decide. Id. at *6. The Eighth Circuit stated that although the Supreme Court has not definitively ruled on the issue, recent cases have strongly hinted at the Supreme Court's ultimate conclusion that the question of class arbitration is substantive in nature and requires judicial determination. Id. at *7. To that end, the Eighth Circuit identified a number of fundamental differences between bilateral and class arbitration suggesting that the question of whether an agreement permits class arbitration is reserved for judges to decide. First, the Eighth Circuit noted that the benefits of arbitration are substantially lessened in a class arbitration proceeding because class arbitration requires the kind of procedural formality seen in class action litigation. Id. at *8. Second, confidentiality is lost or becomes more difficult because class arbitration requires procedural formalities similar to class action suits. Id. at *8-9. Third, the Eighth Circuit noted that class arbitration brings the bet-the-company stakes of class action litigation into the realm of arbitration without the safety net of multilayered judicial review. Fourth, class arbitration raises important due process concerns because an arbitrator's award no longer purports to bind just the parties to a single arbitration agreement, but adjudicates the rights of absent parties as well. Id. at *9. After considering all of these fundamental differences, the Eighth Circuit concluded that the question of class arbitration belongs with the courts as a substantive question of arbitrability. However, the Eighth Circuit determined that even though it presumed the question of class arbitration lies with the courts, parties to an agreement may nonetheless commit the question to an arbitrator. The Eighth Circuit found that in looking at the parties' agreements, there was no mention of class arbitration. Id. at *10. The Eighth Circuit stated that when dealing with class arbitration, there must be clear and unmistakable evidence of an agreement to arbitrate the particular question of class arbitration. Because the agreements here failed to delegate the particular issue of class arbitration, the Eighth Circuit concluded that the question fell to the District Court. Id. at *11. Accordingly, because the District Court erred in concluding that the question of class arbitration was procedural rather than substantive, the Eighth Circuit reversed the District Court's order denying Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment and remanded for further proceedings.

Chamberlain, et al. v. LG Electronics U.S.A., Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 117968 (C.D. Cal. June 29, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of cellular telephone purchasers, alleged that the phones contained a defect that caused them to reboot interminably, rendering them inoperable and not fit for any use. Plaintiff asserted claims on behalf of a national class, a California sub-class, a Washington sub-class, a Florida sub-class, and an Illinois sub-class for breach of implied warranty, violations of the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act, violations of the Song-Beverly Consumer Warranty Act, violations of California's Unfair Competition Law, violations of Washington's Consumer Protection Act, violations of Florida's Deceptive and Unfair Trade Practices Act, violations of Illinois' Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act, and for unjust enrichment. Id. at *2-3. The named Plaintiffs were citizens of seven states, including California, Florida, New York, Washington, Texas, Tennessee, and Illinois. Defendants argued that the arbitration clause contained in the phone box was binding and therefore prohibited Plaintiffs' class claims from proceeding. Plaintiffs conceded that five of eight named Plaintiffs' claims must be arbitrated because the phone boxes stated that an arbitration clause could be found inside. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel as to those five Plaintiffs' claims. Id. at *6. With respect to the three remaining named Plaintiffs, Plaintiffs asserted that as to the remaining three Plaintiffs, no arbitration agreement was formed between Defendants and those Plaintiffs. In addition, Plaintiffs argued that the three Plaintiffs were not suing on the contract with the arbitration provision because they were not alleging breach of express warranty. The three relevant Plaintiffs purchased their phones in New York, Washington, and Florida. Each submitted nearly identical declarations stating that a phone salesman removed the phone from its box, activated it, and handed the phone to them while placing the phone's box and associated paperwork in a bag that was also given to them. Id. at *7. Plaintiff contended that they did not look at that paperwork when they got home or at any point until filing their instant lawsuit. The Court found that the state-specific law of each Plaintiff's' state of purchase recognized that shrink-wrap or "in-the-box" agreements, such as Defendants' agreements, were accepted through silence or inaction. Id. at *14-15. The Court determined that the agreements, which could be found inside the box of the product, gave Plaintiffs 30 days to return the product or opt-out of the arbitration clause. Id. at *15. Plaintiffs chose to keep the phones without opting-out. As a result, the Court agreed with Defendants that Plaintiffs assented to the agreement found inside the box, including the arbitration clause. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to compel arbitration and dismissed Plaintiffs' claims without prejudice.

Chesapeake Appalachia, et al. v. Scout Petroleum*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64718 (W.D. Pa. April 28, 2017). Plaintiff entered into various oil & gas leases with landowners in several northeastern Pennsylvania counties to explore for, and produce natural gas from, the landowners' property. The leases consisted of a basic boilerplate form contract, often together with an individually negotiated addendum. Defendant purchased the rights to certain leases from certain landowners and received royalties from Plaintiff on the gas produced from the mineral estates. Id. at *2. The parties contested the calculation of royalties. Defendant sought to commence a class arbitration against Plaintiff on behalf of themselves, together with a putative class of thousands of landowners. The leases at issue contained an arbitration provision stating that: "in the event of a disagreement between Lessor and Lessee concerning this Lease, performance thereunder, or damages caused by Lessee's operations, the resolution of all such disputes shall be determined by arbitration in accordance with the rules of the American Arbitration Association. All fees and costs associated with the arbitration shall be borne equally by Lessor and Lessee." Id. at *5-6. Plaintiff asserted that the lease term did not provide for class arbitration, only individual arbitration. Plaintiff filed the instant action and motion for summary judgement seeking to have the Court declare that class arbitration was not available under the leases. Id. at *6. At the outset, the Court noted that this exact issue was recently decided based on identical language from Plaintiff's leases, as Chesapeake Appalachia, L.L.C. v. Ostroski, 199 F. Supp. 3d 912 (M.D. Pa. 2016), ruled that the lease language at issue did not permit class arbitration. In Ostroski, the Court granted summary judgment in Plaintiff's favor and declared that the lease with identical language to the leases in the matter at hand did not permit class arbitration. Because the plain language of the arbitration clause in the Lease was silent as to class arbitration, the Court found that the lease did not allow Defendants to compel it. Id. at *7. Defendant contended that although class arbitration was not explicitly mentioned in the clause, it was implicitly assumed. Id. at *8. The Court determined that the contracts at issue clearly allowed for arbitration; but what the plain language of the leases allowed was individual or bi-lateral arbitration, not a class arbitration. Id. at *12-13. The Court held that the language was written in the singular, which indicated individual or bi-lateral arbitration, i.e., "in the event of a disagreement between lessor and lessee concerning this lease." Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment.

Cubria, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 37721 (W.D. Tex. Mar. 6, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, filed a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"), by robo-texting riders without the riders' express consent. Plaintiff created an account through her cell phone using the Uber App. At the time Plaintiff created her account, the process involved three steps, including: (i) entering an email address, cell phone number, and password; (ii) entering her first and last name; and (iii) entering credit card information to pay for ride requests. Id. at *3. Below the entry field for the credit card information were the words "By creating an Uber account, you agree to the Terms of Service & Privacy Policy." Id. The words "Terms of Service & Privacy Policy" featured bold text inside a box outline. Id. The box was a clickable button, which if clicked, would take the user to a page with two hyperlinks, one for Defendant's terms and conditions and another for its privacy policy. Id. Subsequently, Plaintiff used Defendant's services over 300 times. Id. The terms and conditions also contained an arbitration agreement. Defendant moved to compel arbitration, and the Court granted the motion. Defendant argued that the question of arbitrability was for the arbitrator to decide. Id. at *6. Plaintiff responded she never agreed to arbitration, the arbitration agreement did not include a clear and unmistakable delegation of arbitrability to the arbitrator rather than the Court, the claims were outside the scope of the arbitration clause, and the arbitration clause was unconscionable. Id. The Court found that Plaintiff agreed to the arbitration clause and that the clause contained a clear and unmistakable intent to delegate arbitrability to an arbitrator. Id. at *7. The Court found that the delegation provision was severable from the remainder of the arbitration clause, and therefore the issues of whether the parties' dispute fell within the scope of the arbitration clause or whether the arbitration clause was unconscionable were reserved for the arbitrator. Id. The Court stated that the process through which Plaintiff established her account with Defendant put her on reasonable notice that the act of signing up for Defendant's services bound her to the arbitration agreement in the terms and conditions. Id. at *12. Further, the Court found that Plaintiff's argument that she did not have reasonable notice of or manifest assent to the terms and conditions was unpersuasive, especially because Plaintiff accessed Defendant's services over 300 times and therefore confirmed her agreement to the terms and conditions that many times as well. Id. at *13. The Court ruled that the agreement contained clear and unmistakable language providing that Plaintiff and Defendant intended to delegate the power to decide arbitrability to an arbitrator. Id. at *14-15. The Court concluded the parties clearly and unmistakably agreed to arbitrate arbitrability, including whether the parties' dispute was within the arbitration clause's scope and whether the arbitration clause was unconscionable. The Court therefore granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration and stayed the case.

Dang, et al. v. Samsung Electronics Co., Ltd.*, 673 Fed. Appx. 779 (9th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff, a customer, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants repeatedly infringed the patents of its chief competitor, Apple Inc., and as a result, the resale value of Defendants' products was much less than the prices consumers actually paid, thereby resulting in injury and damages to the consumers. Defendants moved to compel arbitration pursuant to an arbitration provision contained in an "Information Booklet" that Plaintiff received when he purchased his Galaxy SIII from Defendant. The District Court granted Defendant's motion because of a "shrink-wrap agreement" enclosed with Plaintiff's Smartphone that mandated arbitration and dismissal of class claims under California law. Plaintiff did not dispute that it was a valid or enforceable agreement, but argued that the contractual nature of the agreement was not obvious enough for him to have accepted it through his purchase. The District Court granted Defendants' motion to compel arbitration. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded the District Court's order. The Ninth Circuit found that the District Court erred in granting Defendant's motion to compel arbitration because Plaintiff and Defendant did not form an agreement to arbitrate under California law. Id. at 779-80. The Ninth Circuit determined that Plaintiff did not expressly agree to the arbitration provision contained in the "Standard Limited Warranty," which was included in the brochure entitled "Important Information for the Samsung SPH-L710" contained in the Galaxy SIII box. Id. at 780. The Ninth Circuit further opined that Plaintiff also did not accept Defendant's offer by failing to opt-out of the arbitration provision because an offeree's silence does not constitute acceptance under California law, and the inclusion of an arbitration provision in a product box is not an exception to this general rule. Id. Moreover, the Ninth Circuit ruled that even if Plaintiff could be bound in certain circumstances by the failure to opt-out of terms included in a product box under California law, no contract was formed because Defendant did not provide Plaintiff with adequate notice that the information brochure contained an offer to enter into a bilateral contract. Id. Although the back of the Galaxy SIII box gave Plaintiff notice that the box contained a "warranty disclaimer associated with SAFE," the Ninth Circuit reasoned that a seller's offer of a warranty did not create a binding bilateral contract with a buyer. Id. The Ninth Circuit also held that Plaintiff did not concede that he formed an agreement to arbitrate with Defendant in his complaint. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the District Court erred in granting Defendant's motion to compel arbitration, and reversed and remanded the order.

Dillon, et al. v. BMO Harris Bank N.A.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 8281 (4th Cir. May 10, 2017). Plaintiff brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO") when it used its role within a network of financial institutions to conduct and participate in the collection of unlawful payday loans. Id. at *2. Defendant sought to enforce an arbitration agreement for the loan at issue, which was entered into by Plaintiff and Plains Lending, LLC ("Great Plains"), a lender. The District Court held that the arbitration agreement was unenforceable, and denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration. On appeal, the Fourth Circuit also found that the arbitration agreement was unenforceable, and affirmed the District Court's order denying Defendant's motion. The Great Plains arbitration agreement stated that "this agreement to arbitration is made pursuant to a transaction involving the Indian Commerce Clause of the Constitution of the United States of America, and shall be governed by the law of the Otoe-Missouia Tribe of Indians." Id. at *11. The agreement further stated that "neither this Agreement nor the Lender is subject to the laws of any state of the United States." Id. The Fourth Circuit found that that the provisions in the Great Plains agreement implicitly stated that the arbitrator shall not allow for the application of any law other than tribal law. The Fourth Circuit held that terms in the arbitration agreement were an unambiguous attempt to apply tribal law to the exclusion of federal and state law. Id. Because the effect of the arbitration agreement was unambiguous in the context of the whole contract, the Fourth Circuit concluded that the arbitration agreement functioned as a prospective waiver of federal statutory rights, and therefore was unenforceable as a matter of law. Id. at *12-13. The Fourth Circuit further determined that the Great Plains agreement contained unenforceable choice-of-law provisions, which were not severable from the broader arbitration agreement and therefore rendered the entire arbitration agreement unenforceable. Accordingly, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the District Court's order denying Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Forby, et al. v. One Technologies, LP*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106237 (N.D. Tex. July 10, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action against Defendants alleging claims for violations of the Illinois Consumer Fraud Act ("ICFA") and unjust enrichment. Specifically, Plaintiff contended that Defendants' website led consumers to believe they are signing up for a free credit report; however, once consumers sign up, they are enrolled in a credit monitoring service for which they were charged $29.95 per month. Id. at *2. Defendants moved to dismiss or transfer the case. In its motion, Defendants contended that the parties entered into a valid contract that required their dispute to be resolved by arbitration in Dallas, Texas. The Court transferred action to the Northern District of Texas pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a). Id. at *3. Defendants then moved to dismiss Plaintiff's claims pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted, which the Court denied with respect to Plaintiff's ICFA claim and granted as to all other claims. Id. at *4. Almost 13 months after the case was transferred to the Northern District of Texas, Defendants moved to compel arbitration. The Court found the arbitration agreement was enforceable as Plaintiff did not dispute that she assented to the terms and conditions on the Defendants' website, which contained the arbitration provision at issue. Id. at *6-7. Accordingly, there did not appear to be any dispute over the existence of a valid arbitration clause or whether the parties' dispute fell within that clause. Id. at *7. Plaintiff contended that Defendants invoked the judicial process when they sought to adjudicate the merits of Plaintiff's claims by filing a stand-alone Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. Id. at *8. Defendants countered that they had not substantially invoked the judicial process, and even if they did, Plaintiff failed to establish any resulting prejudice. The Court determined that Defendants substantially invoked the judicial process by: (i) filing a substantive motion to dismiss; (ii) seeking and partially obtaining dismissal with prejudice of Plaintiff's claims; (iii) waiting until after the Court's ruling on the motion to dismiss in moving to compel arbitration; and (iv) waiting almost 13 months after the transfer of the case to compel arbitration. Id. at *10. However, the Court agreed with Defendants that Plaintiff failed to establish prejudice to her legal position, as she primarily relied on conclusory statements to support her position. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Defendants had not waived their right to compel arbitration. The Court therefore granted Defendants' motion to compel arbitration

G.G., et al. v. Valve Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 50640 (W.D. Wash. April 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of on-line gamblers on the website Steam, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Washington Consumer Protection Act and the Washington Gambling Act of 1973, by linking on-line accounts to third-party websites. Plaintiffs were minor children who signed Defendant's "Steam Subscriber Agreement" ("SSA") and their parents who did not sign the SSA. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration pursuant to the SSA. Plaintiffs opposed the motion, arguing that: (i) the SSA was unenforceable based on contract defenses; (ii)

Defendant could not enforce the SSA against minor Plaintiffs; (iii) Defendant could not enforce the SSA against the non-signatory parent Plaintiffs; and (iv) Plaintiffs' claims were not subject to the SSA. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs also claimed that the arbitration agreement was procedurally unconscionable because it is a contract of adhesion. Id. at *6. The Court noted that the fact that an agreement is an adhesion contract does not necessarily render it procedurally unconscionable. Id. The Court concluded that the key provisions of the arbitration agreement were conspicuous and each party had an opportunity to understand the terms, and therefore it was not procedural unconscionability. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs also argued the arbitration agreement was substantively unconscionable because: (i) it would require Plaintiffs to front the costs of arbitration but be reimbursed later; and (ii) Defendant allowed the gambling sites to target minor children. Id. The Court found that the requirement that Plaintiffs pay the upfront costs of arbitration, but then be reimbursed after, was not so overly harsh as to render the agreement substantively unconscionable. Id. Further, the Court held that Plaintiffs' assertions about Defendant's allegedly illegal conduct dealt with the merits of case, not whether the terms of the arbitration agreement were substantively unconscionable. Id. Therefore, the Court rules that the agreement was not substantively unconscionable. Plaintiffs further contended that Defendant could not enforce the arbitration clause against Plaintiffs who are minor children. Under Washington law, contracts with minors are valid unless the minor disaffirms the contract within a reasonable time after attaining the age of majority. The Court determined that Plaintiffs' continued use was contingent on accepting the SSA and its agreement to arbitrate; therefore, Plaintiffs only disaffirmed the SSA in name, but not in practice, because they continue to receive benefits from the SSA by their continued use of Defendant's products. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court held that the arbitration agreement with minor Plaintiffs was valid. Plaintiffs also maintained that the arbitration agreement did not apply to parent Plaintiffs who did not sign the SAA. The Court stated that although the parents of Plaintiffs did not sign the arbitration agreement, they have a close relationship to the minor Plaintiffs as their parents. Id. at *10. Moreover, the parents did not allege any facts to establish personal claims. Instead, their claims existed solely through the SSA, which gave the minor Plaintiffs license to use Steam. Id. Plaintiffs also contended that their claims should be excluded from arbitration because they dealt with Defendant's alleged failure to prevent unauthorized use by third-party bots. Id. at *12. However, the Court determined that the arbitration exclusion applied to unauthorized use by only subscribers, as the exclusion and de facto definition of unauthorized use explicitly stated. Id. at *12-13. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Henson, et al. v. United States District Of Northern California*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 17104 (9th Cir. Sept. 5, 2017). Plaintiff, a cellular and data subscriber, alleged that Defendant Verizon ("Verizon") utilized a third-party, Defendant Turn, Inc. ("Turn") for targeted advertising and employed the use of "zombie" cookies, claiming that Turn: (i) engaged in deceptive business practices in violation of § 349 of the New York General Business Law, and (ii) committed trespass to chattels by intentionally interfering with the use and enjoyment of Verizon subscribers' mobile devices. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiff alleged that Turn collected data about Verizon users without their knowledge, used that data to create profiles that it marked with its own identifier ("Turn ID"), stored those Turn IDs on users' mobile web browsers, and auctioned off users' collected data so that advertisers could place targeted advertisements on their mobile phones. Turn moved to dismiss Plaintiff's claims and sought to compel arbitration by invoking the arbitration provision in the customer agreement between Plaintiffs and Verizon. Turn asked the District Court to compel arbitration under the doctrine of equitable estoppel because it provided a service to Plaintiffs that was closely connected to the Verizon wireless service. The District Court granted Turn's motion to compel arbitration under New York's equitable estoppel doctrine and stayed the action. Plaintiffs filed a writ of mandamus to vacate the District Court's order compelling arbitration. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit analyzed whether a writ of mandamus was warranted by weighing the Bauman factors – from Bauman v. U.S. District Court, 557 F.2d 650, 654-55 (9th Cir. 1977) – including: (i) whether the petitioner has other adequate means, such as a direct appeal, to attain the relief he or she desires; (ii) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way not correctable on appeal; (iii) whether the District Court's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (iv) whether the District Court's order makes an "oft-repeated error," or "manifests a persistent disregard of the federal rules;" and (v) whether the District Court's order raises new and important problems, or legal issues of first impression. Id. at *6. The Ninth Circuit stated that a petitioner need not satisfy all five factors at once, and here the majority of the Bauman factors weighed heavily in favor of granting the writ. Id. First, the Ninth Circuit determined that an order staying proceedings and compelling arbitration is not a final decision that is subject to ordinary appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, and therefore because a "contemporaneous ordinary appeal" is unavailable, the first Bauman factor supported issuance of the writ. Id. at *6-7. Second, the Ninth Circuit found that the customer agreement did not allow Plaintiff to arbitrate his dispute in a representative capacity or on behalf of a class. Id. at *7. The Ninth Circuit stated that if Plaintiff won the arbitration, then his individual claims would be rendered moot because they would fully be satisfied, and Plaintiff would lose his status as class representative because he would no longer have a concrete stake in the controversy. Until the arbitration award was actually vacated by order of the District Court, Henson could represent only himself and would thus have no legal or ethical obligation to refuse the offer. Third, the Ninth Circuit found that the District Court committed clear error by applying New York's equitable estoppel doctrine, rather than California law, and by failing to apply California law correctly. Id. at *8. Because the Ninth Circuit held that there was a definite and firm conviction that a mistake had been committed, the third Bauman factor strongly favored granting the writ. The Ninth Circuit stated that Plaintiff's claims against Turn were not based on the customer agreement, and that New York's consumer protection statute allowed Plaintiff to sue Turn for its allegedly deceptive acts and practices regardless of whether Plaintiff signed a customer agreement with Verizon. Id. at *13-14. The Ninth Circuit reasoned that the fourth and fifth Bauman factors weighed against granting mandamus relief. However, because the first three Bauman factors strongly favored mandamus relief, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the balance of factors favored issuing the writ. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit vacated the District Court's ruling order granting Turn's motion to stay the action and compel arbitration.

Hoover, et al. v. Sears Holding Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 91081 (D.N.J. June 14, 2017). Plaintiff brought an action asserting that Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act by calling Plaintiff's cellular telephone with approximately sixty-eight automated, promotional telemarketing text messages without his prior written consent. Id. at *1. Defendant alleged that Plaintiff consented to "Shop Your Way" automated advertisement messages from K-Mart, and this authorized Defendant's messages, as they are related companies. Id. at *2. Defendant moved to compel arbitration and to stay the matter pending arbitration. Defendant alleged that Plaintiff entered into a contract with Defendant at a K-Mart store to receive Shop Your Way text messages and that contract included an agreement to arbitrate. Plaintiff argued that the agreement was an illusory contract and therefore unenforceable and that there was no reasonable notice and therefore no mutual assent to the arbitration clause. Id. The Court noted that the "Membership Terms and Conditions" for Shop Your Way Program clearly included issues relating to automated text messages from both K-Mart and Defendant's stores. Id. at *3. Therefore, the Court found that the dispute fell within the arbitration clause. The Court explained that the issue, therefore, was whether there was an agreement to arbitrate, and whether Plaintiff received sufficient notice of the arbitration provision to be bound by it. Id. at *3-4. It was undisputed that Plaintiff signed up for Shop Your Way text messages at a K-Mart store. The sign up screen stated, "I agree to get SYWR text messages 10msgs/mo + confirmation of opt-out. I asked for/agree to SYWR Terms. Msg+Data rates may apply. CONFIRM YOUR MOBILE #." Id. at *4. Plaintiff selected, "YES I agree and # is correct." Id. at *5. The Court thereby held that Defendant presented a clear offer, which explicitly and succinctly included terms by reference. Further, Plaintiff had the opportunity to obtain the terms, and had notice that he was agreeing to terms. Plaintiff then accepted the contract terms and the arbitration clause. Id. at *5. The Court noted that contractual terms must be "reasonably conspicuous" in order to be binding. Id. The Court determined that the arbitration provision was contained as a separate sub-title clearly indicated in bold font in the agreement, and the waiver of a right to trial was in bold and all caps. The Court found that the agreement thereby constituted reasonable notice. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court held that an arbitration agreement existed and granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

In Re Wholesale Grocery Products Antitrust Litigation*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 3744 (8th Cir. Mar. 1, 2017). A number of retail grocers sued two large wholesale grocers, alleging that the wholesalers' contract to exchange retailer supply agreements constituted market allocation in violation of the Sherman Act. The retailers formed two putative classes consisting of the Midwest class and the New England class. Each class had an arbitration sub-class of retailers who had arbitration agreements with their current wholesaler. Each arbitration sub-class sued only its previous wholesaler, with which it no longer had a current arbitration agreement. The District Court dismissed the arbitration sub-classes from the case on the theory that the previous wholesalers, as "non-signatory" Defendants, could compel the retailers to arbitrate based on equitable estoppel. Id. at *2. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit reversed and remanded for the District Court to consider the wholesalers' alternate theory that the non-signatory Defendants could compel arbitration because they were successors-in-interest to the signatory Defendants. The District Court rejected the successors-in-interest theory, as well as the wholesalers' third alternate theory that they could directly enforce their previous arbitration agreements because some of the conduct at issue occurred when the previous agreements were still in effect. Id. at *2-3. On a subsequent appeal, the Eighth Circuit upheld the District Court's order. First, the wholesalers argued that even if they could not directly enforce the arbitration agreements they assigned, they could enforce them as non-signatories under a "close relationship" theory. Id. at *7. The Eighth Circuit found that as assignors, the "non-signatory" Defendants were predecessors-in-interest to their assignees, not successors-in-interest. Id. at *8. The Eighth Circuit stated that there was no authority supporting the proposition that a predecessor-in-interest bore a sufficiently close relationship to a successor-in-interest such that the predecessor-in-interest could compel arbitration under an agreement to which only the successor-in-interest was a signatory. Id. Second, the wholesalers asserted they could compel arbitration under the agreements to which they were once signatories "because Plaintiffs' claims are based on an alleged conspiracy that occurred when the original arbitration agreements were in effect between the arbitration Plaintiffs and their former suppliers." Id. at *9. The Eighth Circuit held that here the agreements between the wholesalers and the retailers did not expire or terminate; instead, the wholesalers expressly agreed to "convey, assign, transfer and deliver" to each other "all of [their] right, title and interest" in the underlying supply and arbitration agreements. Id. at *10. The Eighth Circuit found no reason to extend a presumption about what rights and obligations the parties to a contract might have intended to keep after the contract expired, to a situation where a party had affirmatively given up everything it had under the contract. Id. at *11. The Eighth Circuit therefore affirmed the decision of the District Court.

James, et al. v. Global Tellink Corp.*, 852 F.3d 262 (3d Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of inmates, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act, the Federal Communications Act ("FCA"), the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment, and various New Jersey state laws by charging unconscionable fees for prison phone services. The District Court had previously denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration. On appeal, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision. Defendant provides telecommunications services that enable inmates at state and local correctional facilities to call family, friends, attorneys, and other approved persons outside the prisons. Id. at 264. Users sign up for an account and deposit funds either through Defendant's website or through an automated telephone service that uses an interactive voice-response system with standardized scripts and prompts. Id. People who create an account through the website are shown a copy of Defendant's terms of use and must click a button that says "Accept" to complete the process. Id. However, unlike web users, those who set up accounts by telephone are not required to indicate their assent to the terms of use. Defendant informed telephone users each time they set up or deposited funds in their accounts that its service was governed by terms of use available on its website. However, users were not required to visit the website or demonstrate acceptance of the terms of use through any affirmative act. Nor were they notified by the automated telephone service that their use of GTL's service would constitute assent to the terms of use. Defendant asserted that some of the Plaintiffs' claims were subject to binding arbitration and moved to compel arbitration. The District Court denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration with respect to Plaintiffs who opened accounts by telephone. The District Court found that, although Plaintiffs were notified that Defendant's service was "governed by the terms of use," they were not informed that "use of the service alone constituted an acceptance of these terms." Id. at 265. On appeal, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs manifested assent by using its services after being repeatedly informed that their accounts were governed by its terms of use. In support of its argument, Defendant relied on several case law authorities finding assent to contract terms through use of a product or service. The Third Circuit stated that in those cases, the purchasers manifested assent through the affirmative act of signing contracts that contained arbitration provisions, which was not the case here. Id. at 266. The Third Circuit determined that because Plaintiffs never received Defendant's terms of use, and were never informed that merely using Defendant's telephone service would constitute assent to those terms, they did not accept the terms of use or the arbitration provision contained therein. Id. at 267-68. Accordingly, the Third Circuit held that the District Court properly determined that Plaintiffs could not be required to arbitrate their claims and affirmed the decision denying Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Johnson, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.,* Case No. 16-CV-5468 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, a consumer, filed an action alleging that Defendant sent him unsolicited text messages in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Defendant moved to compel Plaintiff to arbitrate his claims pursuant to the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"). Plaintiff denied that he formed an agreement with Defendant.

Plaintiff downloaded Defendant's application to his cell phone and approximately three years later Defendant sent Plaintiff an autodialed text message. Id. at 1. Defendant submitted a declaration from a senior software engineer, Vincent Mi, in support of its position that an arbitration agreement existed. Id. at 3. Mi, however, neither described the process as it existed three years prior when Plaintiff downloaded the application, and did not represent that the process was the same as it was now. Id. Further, the Court found that it would be unreasonable to infer that the process was the same in 2013 as it was now, because in another document filed in a different case, Defendant submitted a declaration from Mi that described a substantially different process. Id. The Court thus determined that it would not rely on Mi's representations in order to compel arbitration at this stage. Id. at 4. The Court therefore held that Defendant failed to support its motion with the facts necessary to make a determination as to whether there was a reasonable notice of the terms, as well as assent to those terms. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Leidel, et al. v. Coinbase, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 83833 (S.D. Fla. June 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a class action against Defendant – a digital currency wallet and on-line platform where merchants and consumer can buy, sell, transfer and store their digital currency – asserting claims for aiding and abetting breach of fiduciary duty; aiding and abetting conversion; negligence; and unjust enrichment. Plaintiffs were similarly-situated users of Project Investors, Inc. d/b/a Cryptsy, a cryptocurrency and money service business. Cryptsy was owned, operated, and directed by Paul Vernon. Cryptsy and Vernon each had an account at Coinbase. Id. at *2. Unbeknownst to Plaintiffs, Cryptsy and Vernon were stealing from user accounts and liquidating the currency through Cryptsy and Vernon's accounts with Defendant. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant knew or should have known that Plaintiffs' assets were being liquidated through its exchange. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs signed an arbitration agreement stating that: "for claims for injunctive or equitable relief or claims regarding intellectual property rights . . . any dispute arising under this Agreement shall be finally settled on an individual basis in accordance with the American Arbitration Association's rules for arbitration of consumer-related disputes." Id. at *3. Defendant moved to compel arbitration of Plaintiffs' claims, as a non-signatory under the doctrine of equitable estoppel. Alternatively, Defendant requested that the Court stay the litigation pending the resolution of the arbitration. The Court stated that arbitration may be compelled against non-signatories to an arbitration agreement if, "assent [is] shown by the acts or performance of the party." Id. at *5. The Court further noted that a non-signatory can be estopped "from claiming the benefits of a contract while simultaneously attempting to avoid the burdens that contract imposes." Id. Defendant alleged that Plaintiffs' claims were based upon the assertion that when Defendant agreed to open the accounts, Defendant took on a duty to Plaintiffs and other Cryptsy account holders to oversee the activities of Cryptsy and Vernon with regard to the accounts. Therefore, Defendant asserted that because Plaintiffs' claims were based upon the accounts established pursuant to the user agreement, Plaintiffs must arbitrate their claims under the principles of equitable estoppel. Id. The Court disagreed and found that Plaintiffs received no benefits from the agreement entered into between Cryptsy/Vernon and Defendant, and Plaintiffs were not asserting any rights or benefits under the agreement. Id. at *6. Moreover, the Court held that Plaintiffs' claims were not derivative of the receiver's claims, and Plaintiffs were directly harmed. Furthermore, the Court stated that the contract entered into between Cryptsy/Vernon and Defendant had nothing to do with the alleged wrongful conduct, and therefore any indirect benefits Plaintiffs received did not arise from the contract, but from the regulatory scheme under which Defendant operated. Id. at *6. The Court therefore found that a contractually-imposed arbitration requirement would not apply to such a claim. As to Defendant's request that the case be stayed pending the arbitration of the receiver's claims, the Court held that the "the outcome of the non-arbitrable claims" would not "depend on the arbitrator's decision" and the claims brought by Plaintiffs were independent of the claims brought by the receiver. Id. at *8. The Court thereby denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Mallh, et al. v. Showtime Networks Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 184471 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 7, 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action asserting claims for breach of contract, consumer fraud and/or unconscionable or unfair practices, violations of New York General Business Law §§ 349 and 350, and unjust enrichment resulting from purchasing a live stream of a boxing match from Defendant that he was unable to view due to technical failures. Defendant moved to compel arbitration, or in the alternative, to dismiss the complaint in part and/or to strike the class allegations. The Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration. When purchasing the live stream, Plaintiff was required to agree to Defendant's terms of use ("TOU") by clicking on an on-line box which transferred purchasers to a purchase page, on which buyers were required to check boxes to indicate that they read and agreed to the TOU. Id. at *2-3. The purchase page contained an arbitration agreement and class action waiver requiring Plaintiff to arbitrate his disputes with Defendant on an individual basis or file an individual action in small claims court. Id. at *3. The Court stated that Plaintiff did not dispute that he checked a box indicating that he had read and agreed to the TOU, nor did the parties dispute that the TOU contained an arbitration clause and class action waiver that covered Plaintiff's claims. Id. at *10. Plaintiff argued that the website did not give him sufficient notice of the arbitration clause and the waiver of his rights to pursue a class action. Specifically, Plaintiff argued that he did not have adequate notice of the obligation to arbitrate disputes with Defendant on an individual basis because: (i) the website was cluttered and the arbitration clause and class action waiver are "buried" behind three hyperlinks; (ii) the hyperlinks to the TOU, privacy policy, and video services policy were in grey text and hard to see against the black background of the website; (iii) Plaintiff was compelled to check a single box at the point of purchase indicating his agreement with four different policies; (iv) the arbitration clause and class action waiver did not appear until the fifteenth page of the TOU; and (v) the text of the arbitration clause and, in particular, the class action waiver were no more conspicuous than any other paragraph of the TOU. Id. at *10-11. The Court found Plaintiff's arguments unavailing and determined that: (i) the website was not cluttered; (ii) the arbitration clause and class action waiver were not buried behind the hyperlinks; (iii) fact that the TOU was available only by hyperlink did not preclude a finding that the arbitration clause and class action waiver were reasonably conspicuous; and (iv) once the user accessed the TOU, the arbitration clause and class action waiver were reasonably conspicuous. Id. at *11-12. The Court further determined that Plaintiff's manifestation of assent was unambiguous as a matter of law, as Plaintiff did not dispute that he affirmatively clicked on a box agreeing to the TOU. Because notice of the arbitration clause and class action waiver were reasonably conspicuous and Plaintiff unambiguously manifested assent, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

McLellan, et al. v. Fitbit, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 168370 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant misled consumers about the accuracy and reliability of the heart rate monitoring functionality in its wearable devices. Defendant moved to compel arbitration for 12 named Plaintiffs who signed a terms of service agreement ("TOS") containing an arbitration provision. Defendant also moved to stay or dismiss the claims of Plaintiff Robb Dunn, who opted-out of the arbitration provision. Id. at *3. In essential part, the TOS stated that "any dispute . . . arising out of . . . the Fitbit Service, or any other Fitbit products or services" will be resolved through arbitration pursuant to AAA rules. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs contended that that the delegation clause in the arbitration agreement was unenforceable. Plaintiffs argued that the fact that they were not "sophisticated" cast doubt on the clarity of the agreement, as case law authorities have held elsewhere that an arbitration agreement can be enforced only for sophisticated parties such as law firms or banks. Id. at *7-8. However, the Court found that the majority of the federal circuits that hold that incorporation of the AAA rules constitutes clear and unmistakable evidence of the parties' intent do so without explicitly limiting that holding to sophisticated parties or to commercial contracts. The Court noted that California law, which governed the TOS and Plaintiffs' consumer claims, does not make a categorical distinction between "sophisticated" and "unsophisticated" parties for purposes of enforcing an incorporated delegation clause. Id. at *8. The Court further stated that the sophistication distinction was not intended to prevent arbitration agreements from applying to consumer contracts. Id. The Court conclude that it was well-established under California law that a "contract may validly include the provisions of a document not physically a part of the basic contract" so long as the reference is "clear and unequivocal," "called to the attention of the other party and he must consent thereto," and the terms are "known or easily available to the contracting parties." Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel as to the 12 Plaintiffs who had signed arbitration agreements. However, the Court denied Defendant's motion for a stay as to the remaining Plaintiff's claims, finding that Defendant had not shown that the outcome of the arbitration proceedings would have any effect on the Court's consideration of the remaining Plaintiff's claims. Id. at *17.

Norcia, et al. v. Samsung Telecommunications America,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 991 (9th Cir. Jan. 19, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, filed a class action against Defendant alleging that Defendant made misrepresentations as to the performance of the Galaxy S4 phone. Defendant moved to compel arbitration on the grounds that an arbitration provision in the warranty brochure in the Galaxy S4 box was binding on Plaintiffs. The District Court denied Defendant's motion. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision. The Ninth Circuit rejected Defendant's assertion that the product and warranty information brochure contained in the Galaxy S4 box created a binding contract to arbitrate the claims between Plaintiffs and Defendant. There was no dispute that Plaintiffs did not expressly consent to any agreement in the brochures. The Ninth Circuit held that Defendant failed to demonstrate the applicability of any exception to the general California rule that an offeree's silence does not constitute consent and that the brochure was not enforceable as a binding contract. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff agreed to arbitrate his claims by signing a customer agreement with Verizon Wireless. The Ninth Circuit rejected this argument because Defendant was neither a signatory to the agreement nor a third-party beneficiary of the agreement. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling to deny Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

Rahmany, et al. v. T-Mobile USA, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9638 (W.D. Wash. Jan. 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, two cell phone customers, activated cellular telephone contracts with Defendant T-Mobile ("T-Mobile"). Plaintiffs alleged that they received an unsolicited text message from Defendant advertising Defendant Subway's ("Subway") sandwiches in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Plaintiffs signed contracts with Defendant that required arbitration of any and all claims or disputes related to the agreement, Defendant's privacy policy, and Defendant's services, equipment, devices or products. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs then voluntarily dismissed Defendant T-Mobile, and all claims alleged against T-Mobile and Subway remained in the case. Id. at *3. Subway filed a motion to compel arbitration, arguing that it should be allowed to enforce the arbitration provisions of the agreement between T-Mobile and Plaintiffs. At the outset, the Court stated that whether Subway was able compel arbitration was based on three questions, including: (i) whether Plaintiffs' claims fell within the scope of the arbitration agreements; (ii) whether the arbitration agreements were procedurally and substantively unconscionable; and (iii) whether Subway was entitled to enforce those arbitration agreements under a theory of equitable estoppel. Id. The Court found that since Plaintiffs based their claims on the allegation that T-Mobile sent a text message to Plaintiffs' cellular phones as part of a T-Mobile promotion, Plaintiffs' claims related to T-Mobile's services and devices and therefore fell within the scope of the arbitration agreements. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs argued that the agreement was procedurally unconscionable because the terms and conditions were incorporated by reference. The Court opined that when Plaintiffs signed the agreement, they acknowledged that it included the terms and conditions. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiffs did not met their burden of proving the arbitration agreement was unconscionable. The Court further determined that a non-signatory may enforce an arbitration agreement: (i) when a signatory must rely on the terms of the written agreement in asserting its claims against the non-signatory or the claims are intimately founded in and intertwined with the underlying contract; or (ii) when the signatory alleges substantially interdependent and concerted misconduct by the non-signatory and another signatory and the allegations of interdependent misconduct are founded in or intimately connected with the obligations of the underlying agreement. Id. at *5-6. Although only one element is necessary, the Court found that both were satisfied. Plaintiffs' complaint asserted claims against Subway based on a text sent by T-Mobile. The Court held that because Plaintiffs' claims rest on T-Mobile's alleged conduct, they could not be resolved without analyzing the conduct of T-Mobile. Plaintiffs also alleged that T-Mobile and Subway colluded to violate the TCPA by sending customers a text message offering a free Subway sandwich. The Court determined that Plaintiffs' allegations were intimately connected with the underlying agreement because, under the terms and conditions, Plaintiffs agreed to be contacted "by T-Mobile or anyone calling on its behalf, for any and all purposes, at any telephone number." Id. at *7. The Court reasoned that it would need to examine the terms and conditions to determine the viability of Plaintiffs' TCPA claims. Id. Accordingly, the Court held that Subway could enforce the arbitration agreement between Plaintiffs and T-Mobile, and it granted Subway's motion to compel arbitration.

Roberts, et al. v. AT&T Mobility LLC*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 24946 (9th Cir. Dec. 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant falsely advertised its mobile services plan as unlimited in violation of statutory and common law consumer protection laws and certain state false advertising laws. Defendant moved to compel arbitration in light of the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in AT&T Mobility LLC v. Concepcion 563 U.S. 333 (2011), that the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") preempted state law deeming an arbitration provision unconscionable. Plaintiffs opposed arbitration on First Amendment grounds. The District Court granted Defendant's motion. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Plaintiffs contracted with Defendant for wireless data service plans and their contracts included arbitration agreements. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant falsely advertised that its mobile service customers could use "unlimited data," but actually intentionally slowed down customers' data speeds once reaching "secret data usage caps" between two and five gigabytes. Id. Plaintiffs argued that forcing arbitration would violate the petition clause of the First Amendment, as they "did not knowingly and voluntarily give up their right to have a court adjudicate their claims," and could not "bring their claims in small claims court." Id. at *5. The District Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration, holding that, as a threshold matter, there was no state action and thus it did not reach Plaintiffs' constitutional challenge. Id. The District Court rejected Plaintiffs' main arguments, concluding that: (i) judicial enforcement alone does not automatically establish state action; and (ii) there was insufficient "encouragement" to attribute Defendant's conduct to the government. Id. at *6. The Ninth Circuit agreed and first stated that Defendant's conduct must be fairly attributable to the State, and Plaintiffs could not convert Defendant into a State actor simply by framing their FAA challenge as "direct." Id. at *10. The Ninth Circuit found that if every private right were transformed into a governmental action just by raising a direct constitutional challenge, "the distinction between private and governmental action would be obliterated." Id. Plaintiffs further argued "that requiring private actors to be State actors as a prerequisite to challenging permissive statutes would immunize many such statutes from constitutional scrutiny, including the FAA." Id. at *21. The Ninth Circuit rejected this argument, and concluded that Defendant's conduct was not attributable to the State, and there was not a "sufficiently close nexus between the State and the challenged action of Defendant." Id. The Ninth Circuit concluded that "private parties do not face constitutional litigation whenever they seek to rely on some [statute] governing their interactions with the community surrounding them." Id. at *22. Accordingly, because there was no state action, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling compelling arbitration.

Shore, et al. v. Johnson & Bell*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 25612 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 22, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of clients of Defendant, a law firm, brought an action alleging that Defendant's information-technology infrastructure was compromised and that Plaintiffs' confidential information was exposed because of those vulnerabilities. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs filed a related complaint in arbitration as well as a demand for class arbitration. Defendant filed a motion to compel individual arbitration and enjoin the class arbitration. Plaintiffs had signed a client engagement letter, which set out the terms of the legal representation and included an arbitration clause stating that "[a]lthough we do not expect that any dispute between us will arise, in the unlikely event of any dispute under this agreement, including a dispute regarding the amount of fees or the quality of our services, such dispute shall be determined through binding arbitration with the mediation/arbitration services of JAMS." Id. at *2. Defendant argued that whether or not Plaintiffs may proceed to class arbitration was a gateway question for the Court to decide and not the arbitrator, and that the client engagement letter did not provide for class arbitration. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs argued that, even if class arbitrability was presumptively a question for the Court, the parties had agreed to arbitrate questions of arbitrability. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs claimed that the selection of JAMS as a forum implied that the parties accepted the governance of any dispute under JAMS rules. The Court found that the arbitration clause did not specify that JAMS rules applied or that they were incorporated by reference. Id. at *7. Defendant further asserted that the client engagement letter's arbitration clause did not authorize class arbitration. Id. at *8. The Court agreed and determined that the client engagement letter's arbitration clause did not explicitly or implicitly agree to the use of class arbitration. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel individual arbitration and to enjoin class arbitration.

Stevens-Bratton, et al. v. Trugreen*, 675 Fed. Appx. 563 (6th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a former lawn service customer, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") when it used an automatic telephone dialing system to call her. Defendant provided lawn care services to Plaintiff from May 15, 2013 until May 15, 2014, when Plaintiff terminated the agreement with Defendant. Plaintiff's agreement with Defendant included three provisions at issue, including: (i) a provision stating that if Plaintiff provided Defendant her cell phone number, Defendant could contact the number using an automatic telephone dialing system or pre-recorded or artificial voice to discuss the account and lawn care services or future services; (ii) an provision stating that any claim, dispute, or controversy between them would be resolved by neutral binding arbitration; and (iii) a class action waiver stating that claims must be brought in the parties' individual capacity. Id. at 565. In January of 2015, Plaintiff received over 10 telemarketing calls on her cell phone from Defendant. Despite Plaintiff's requests that Defendant stop calling her, the calls continued. Plaintiff sought class certification, or in the alternative, a stay of certification briefing pending discovery. Id. at 566. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss and compel arbitration, or in the alternative, to stay the litigation. The District Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification, granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration, and dismissed

Plaintiff's claims. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit reversed the District Court's judgment compelling arbitration, vacated the judgment denying class certification, and remanded for further proceedings. Plaintiff argued that the agreement's arbitration clause did not apply to her TCPA claim concerning the legality of the telemarketing calls because the agreement expired before she received the calls. Id. at 567. The Sixth Circuit found that a majority of the material events of the dispute occurred after the agreement expired. The Sixth Circuit noted that the District Court had found that the agreement allowed Defendant to call Plaintiff about "possible future services" and thus the right to call her accrued or vested under the agreement. Id. at 568. The Sixth Circuit opined that the right to call a phone number does not accumulate over time and is revocable by that person at any point. The Sixth Circuit remarked that it must read the provision regarding "possible future services" with the interpretation that favored Plaintiff and concerned Plaintiff's account with Defendant before the contract expired. Id. at 569. Thus, the Sixth Circuit determined that Defendant's disputed right to call Plaintiff could not survive expiration under the contract under normal principles of contract interpretation. The Sixth Circuit thereby concluded that Plaintiff's TCPA claims did not arise under the contract and thus the District Court's judgment compelling arbitration was erroneous. Id. The Sixth Circuit further observed that the District Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification on the basis that the claim was arbitrable. The Sixth Circuit found that since the District Court did not make findings of fact or conclusions of law regarding the merits of Plaintiff's motion for class certification, there was no record to review regarding application of the class action waiver. The Sixth Circuit held that because it reversed and remanded the District Court's order granting the motion to compel arbitration and dismissing Plaintiff's claims, it also must vacate the District Court's order denying the motion for class certification, and remand for further proceedings.

White, et al. v. Sonoco, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 17098 (3d Cir. Sept. 5, 2017). Plaintiff, a rewards credit cardholder, filed a putative class action alleging claims of fraud. Id. at *1. Plaintiff obtained a rewards credit card that Citibank issued as part of Defendant's promotional reward program. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant did not apply a 5 cent per gallon discount on all fuel purchases that cardholders made at Defendant's store as was represented in Defendant's promotional materials. Id. at *3. Plaintiff did not bring claims against Citibank. Id. Defendant moved to compel arbitration based upon an arbitration clause in the credit card agreement between Plaintiff and Citibank. It was undisputed that Defendant was not a signatory to the agreement and was not mentioned in the agreement. Id. at *4. The District Court denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration. Id. at *6. Defendant appealed, and the Third Circuit affirmed. Id. at *22. Defendant argued that equitable estoppel prevented Plaintiff from refusing to arbitrate and contended that a non-party to an arbitration agreement may compel arbitration pursuant to § 3 of the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") if the relevant state law allows a non-signatory to enforce an arbitration clause against a signatory. Id. at *9. Defendant asserted that South Dakota contract law applied and Plaintiff argued that Florida law applied. The Third Circuit concluded that the result would be the same under either state's law and Plaintiff could not be forced to arbitrate under principles of equitable estoppel. Id. at *10. The Third Circuit held that principles of equitable estoppel did not apply because there was no alleged concerted conduct on the part of Defendant and Citibank and the claims asserted against Defendant did not rely on any terms in the card agreement. Id. at *14-15. Defendant also argued that: (i) its reward program's promotional materials and the card agreement must be read together as an integrated whole contract; and (ii) the arbitration clause required that Plaintiff arbitrate against connected entities and Defendant was a connected entity. Id. at *16. The Third Circuit rejected both arguments, reasoning that Defendant's own representatives stated that the promotional materials were merely an invitation for Plaintiff to apply. Id. at *17. Further, Defendant advanced no legal basis to suggest that the promotional materials were integrated into the card agreement. Id. at *17. Lastly, the Third Circuit reasoned that the agreement did not provide for a third-party to elect arbitration and that Defendant confused the nature of the claims covered by the clause with the question of who could compel arbitration. Id. at *19. As such, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision to deny Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

(xlv) Notice Issues In Class Actions

Arkansas Teacher Retirement System, et al. v. State Street Bank & Trust Co.*, Case No. 11-CV-10230 (D. Mass. May 2, 2017). In this class action, the Court considered submissions of Labaton Sucharow LLP concerning the notice to be sent to class members regarding developments since the Court ordered payment of over $75 million as reasonable attorneys' fees, expenses, and service awards. Id. at 1-2. The Court proposed that notice be sent to class members informing them of the issues that have emerged since the appointment of the Special Master and the scope of the Special Master's duties. Id. at 2. The Court also proposed that any objections by class members to the awards made previously be filed after the Special Master issued his Report and Recommendation rather than within 45 days of the service of the notice. Id. The Court ordered Plaintiffs' counsel to file memoranda on these issues and the proposals within three days. Id.

(xlvi) Objectors And Opt-Out Issues In Class Actions

Aranda, et al. v. Caribbean Cruise Line, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135755 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 24, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a suit against Defendants and its affiliates for violation of the TCPA. Over a million people across the United States received pre-recorded phone calls from Defendant requesting participation in various short political surveys. After roughly four years of litigation, the parties settled on the eve of trial, and the settlement required Defendants to establish a common fund in an amount no lower than $56 million and no higher than $75 million. Following final approval of the class-wide settlement, Plaintiffs' counsel petitioned for an award of attorneys' fees in amount equal to one-third of the final common fund total. The Court granted in part the fee request. The Court declined to depart from the "sliding-scale structure" used in the Seventh Circuit to award attorneys' fees in class actions. Id. at *2. Freedom Home Care, Inc., a member of the class, filed an objection to class counsel's fee request. The Court ultimately granted Plaintiffs' fee petition, but awarded a lower amount than class counsel requested, in part because of the concerns both Freedom Home Care and Defendants raised. Freedom Home Care then moved for an award of attorneys' fees in the amount of $59,410 to compensate its lawyers for their work in opposing class counsel's fee request. Plaintiffs and Defendants both opposed Freedom Home Care's request, and argued that Freedom Home Care's objection did not materially benefit the class because the arguments in the objection were not significantly different from those that Defendants made in response to the fee petition. Plaintiffs and Defendants also maintained that, even if Freedom Home Care were entitled to a fee award of some amount, it failed to provide adequate documentary support for the amount it requested. Id. at *3. In addition to requesting a fee for its counsel, Freedom Home Care argued that it was entitled to an incentive award in the amount of $1,000 for agreeing to represent the interests of the class as an objecting class member. Id. at *4. The Court noted that Freedom Home Care knew or reasonably should have known that Defendants would be raising the very same argument it intended to make regarding its original fee award. Thus, the Court found that the interests of the class would have been protected whether or not Freedom Home Care objected. The Court determined that, in reality, Defendants were especially well equipped to respond to class counsel's petition because they had participated in the litigation since the beginning and could speak from experience about the value of class counsel's services and the reasonableness of their fee request. Id. at *7. Given the background, the Court found no legitimate basis to compensate Freedom Home Care's counsel. The Court also noted that principles of restitution did not require the class members to pay for services they would not have bargained for when they were already going to receive them for free from Defendants. Freedom Home Care emphasized that it was the only party to propose applying a sliding scale to the whole fund, including attorneys' fees but excluding administration and notice costs, which was the approach the Court adopted. Id. at *12. Freedom Home Care contended that it should get credit for being the only party that proposed the fee structure the Court ultimately adopted. The Court stated that it would have arrived at that structure whether or not Freedom Home Care proposed it. Accordingly, the Court denied Freedom Home Care's request for attorneys' fees. Finally, because the objector's counsel did not provide a material benefit to the class, the Court denied the requested incentive award.

Farber, et al. v. Crestwood Midstream Partners, L.P.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 12765 (5th Cir. July 17, 2016). In this consolidated lawsuit stemming from a merger between Crestwood Midstream Partners LP ("Midstream") and Crestwood Equity Partners LP ("Equity"), the District Court approved a zero-dollar class action settlement and award of attorneys' fees. Isaac Aron, a Midstream unitholder and the class representative, alleged that Midstream's directors breached their fiduciary duties in approving the merger and that Equity's preliminary proxy statement omitted material information in violation of federal securities laws and Securities and Exchange Commission ("SEC") rules. David Duggan, a class member, objected to the settlement and appealed the District Court's order approving the settlement. On appeal, the Fifth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. Midstream and Equity entered into a merger agreement in which Midstream would become a wholly-owned subsidiary of Equity and Midstream's unitholders would receive 2.75 common units of Equity for each unit of Midstream that they owned. Lawrence Farber, a Midstream unitholder, filed a putative class action against 16 named Defendants, asserting that: (i) Midstream's directors breached their fiduciary duties by attempting to sell Midstream by means of an unfair process and for an unfair price; and (ii) Equity aided and abetted such breaches. Id. at *4. The parties eventually reached a proposed settlement. Midstream and Equity agreed to: (i) disclose financial projections that they omitted from the proxy statement; (ii) allow Aron to conduct discovery to confirm that the proposed settlement was fair, adequate, and reasonable and to terminate the settlement if he determined that it was not fair; and (iii) not oppose Aron's application for an award of attorneys' fees and expenses not to exceed $575,000, which Midstream or its successor-in-interest or their respective insurers would pay. Id. at *6. No objections were filed prior to the deadline to object to the settlement; however, Duggan filed an objection approximately two weeks past the deadline. Id. at *7. Duggan stated that, although the notice was dated June 21, 2016, he did not receive it until "sometime in August" and he was unable to file the objection timely because he had to go on "a long-planned European vacation." Id. at *10. The District Court conducted the fairness hearing focused on Duggan's objection. The District Court concluded that the attorneys' fees were fair and warranted and approved the class action settlement, granted certification of the settlement class, awarded attorneys' fees and expenses of $575,000, and entered final judgment. Id. at *11. On appeal, Duggan contended that the Fifth Circuit had jurisdiction to hear the merits of his appeal, because he had Article III standing and that the untimeliness of his objection to the settlement did not constitute a waiver of his right to appeal. Id. The Fifth Circuit, however, held that it lacked jurisdiction over the appeal because Duggan, a non-party and non-Intervener, waived his right to appeal by filing an untimely, procedurally deficient objection. Id. at *13-14. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit upheld the District Court's ruling granting settlement approval and attorneys' fees.

In Re Lidoderm Antitrust Litigation*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 129357 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 14, 2017). End Payor Plaintiffs' class counsel ("EPP class counsel") requested the Court to enter a set-aside order requiring Defendants to place 12.5% of any judgment or settlement secured from Defendants by opt-out EPPs into an escrow account. EPP class counsel would then negotiate with EPP opt-out counsel and seek the Court's approval of a payment to EPP class counsel out of that escrow fund to reimburse EPP class counsel for their "common" work and expenditures that benefitted the EPP opt-outs. Id. at *37. Defendants opposed a set-aside order, arguing that there was little precedent for set-aside orders in antitrust class action cases and that EPP class counsel's interests in securing adequate compensation for their work and costs was protected by their ability to seek fees and costs under Rule 23(h). Id. at *37-38. Defendants also argued that a set-aside order was premature because it was unknown how many opt-outs there would be or the eventual opt-outs' stake in the litigation. Finally, Defendants opposed the size of the set aside, arguing that set-asides more typically fall in the 3% to 6% range. Id. at *38. The Court granted EPP class counsel's request. The Court first found that set aside orders are entered prior to any recovery, so long as the litigation has been "significantly advanced." Id. at *39. This litigation had been significantly advanced such that an order would be appropriate. Defendants argued that a set-aside was unnecessary because EPP class counsel would be able to negotiate separately with any opt-outs. The Court stated that the more orderly and efficient course would be to set up one mechanism for the Court to resolve EPP class counsel's entitlement to compensation for common fund work performed. Id. at *41-42. The Court also rejected Defendants' argument that the imposition of a set-aside order might deter settlements because it imposed a "tax." Id. at *42. The Court explained that establishing a set maximum percentage from the outset would provide clarity and certainty to the negotiating parties as to the most EPP class counsel could seek from any opt-out settlements or judgments. Accordingly, the Court entered the set-aside order.

Muransky, et al. v. Godiva Chocolatier, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2482 (S.D. Fla. Jan. 9, 2016). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a class action alleging that Defendant willfully printed credit and debit card transaction receipts that included more than the last 5 digits of the card number in violation of the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act ("FACTA"). The parties settled the matter for $6.3 million and the Court granted settlement approval. Two objectors, James Price and Eric Alan Isaacson, filed an appeal. Plaintiffs requested that the Court require the objectors to post an appeal bond pursuant to Rule 7 and 8. Id. at *3. Specifically, Plaintiffs requested that the Court require the objectors to post an appeal bond of $115,934, broken down as: (i) $10,000 in estimated Rule 39 appeal costs under Rule 7; (ii) $31,594 in estimated additional administration costs under Rule 7; and (iii) $74,340 in interest on the funds to be distributed that will be delayed as a result the objectors' appeal. Id. at *2. The Magistrate Judge previously recommended that Plaintiffs' motion be granted in part and denied in part, and that the Court require that the objectors be jointly and severally responsible for posting an appellate cost bond of $2,500. Isaacson filed Rule 72 objections to the Magistrate Judge's recommendation, which the Court denied. Isaacson asserted two objections as to the recommendation. First, he argued that the Magistrate Judge incorrectly relied on the "deferential review" that the Eleventh Circuit offers to District Courts' approvals of class action settlements in her determination that the objectors' likelihood of success on appeal "is not great." Id. at *3-4. While Isaacson conceded that the Eleventh Circuit reviews orders approving class action settlements for abuse of discretion, he asserted that his likelihood of success on appeal was actually "rather strong" and "extremely likely," as he raised several legal issues on appeal that were subject to de novo review. Id. at *4. The Court opined that regardless of what level of deference the Eleventh Circuit affords to the Court's final approval of the class action settlement, the imposition of a $2,500 cost bond to the objectors was entirely reasonable. Id. Second, Isaacson contended that, in the event the Court imposed a cost bond, the Court should apportion the bond amount between the objectors at $1,250 each. However, the Court found that the Magistrate Judge's recommendation of a joint and several cost bond in the amount of $2,500 to be reasonable. The Court noted that if the cost bond was set at $1,250 and only one of the objectors posted bond, the objector could still proceed on every issue on appeal, yet the costs Plaintiffs would incur would not be reduced by half. Id. at *5. The Court therefore adopted the Magistrate Judge's recommendation and ordered the objectors to pay a $2,500 joint bond.

OFCCP v. Google,* 2017 OFCCP LEXIS 8 (OFCCP July 14, 2017). The Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs ("OFCCP"), the agency of the U.S. Department of Labor charged with auditing government contractors to determine whether they are compliant with certain contractually-imposed anti-discrimination and affirmative action obligations, audited Defendant in relation to gender-based pay discrimination. Defendant produced extensive documentation and made employees available to the OFCCP for interviews for purposes of the audit. Id. at *4. The amount of information involved made this the largest on-going audit in the OFCCP's Pacific Region and one of the largest that the OFCCP had ever conducted. The process halted when the OFCCP requested a large amount of additional information and materials. Defendant agreed to produce some of what the OFCCP requested and objected to the remainder. Defendant's objections related to the OFCCP's requests to produce: (i) an additional "snapshot" of data regarding Defendant's employees as of a moment frozen in time; (ii) employees' personal contact information; and (iii) employees' salary and job history data. The Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") recommended an order that required Defendant to provide only some of the information that the OFCCP sought. Id. at *5. As to the OFCCP's request for a snapshot for September 1, 2014 (a year earlier than the first snapshot that Defendant produced pursuant to the OFCCP's original request), the OFCCP argued that an additional snapshot was relevant because it would show whether a possible adverse impact violation existed over time, not just on the single day reflected on the September 1, 2015 snapshot that Defendant originally provided. Id. at *64. However, the OFCCP's request went beyond its original request and asked Defendant to supplement the snapshot with much more data, including categories regarding name, date of birth, bonus earned, bonus period covered, campus hire or industry, whether the employee had a competing offer, country of citizenship, secondary country of citizenship, visa, visa type, and place of birth, and any factors related to compensation. Id. at 15. In all, Defendant produced 844,560 compensation data points for the 21,114 employees on the snapshot for September 1, 2015. The Administrative Law Judge found that much of the information requested to be irrelevant and burdensome and excluded some of the data categories such as employee's date of birth and locality information as being unduly burdensome. *Id. at *70. As to the personal employee contact information that the OFCCP requested for 25,000 employees, the ALJ concluded that this was unreasonable and recommended an order that the OFCCP submit to Defendant names of 5,000 employees for which Defendant must provide the personal contact information. Finally, the OFCCP sought the salary history and job history for each of the 25,000 employees, going back to each employee's hire date. The ALJ found this request to be unenforceable, based upon its lack of relevance and the burden that the request imposed upon Defendant, and denied the request for such information. In sum, the ALJ recommended an order that Defendant be required to produce a limited snapshot for September 1, 2014, personal contact information for no more than 5,000 employees, and denied the all the OFCCP's requests for employees' salary and job histories.

U.S. Department Of Labor v. Google Inc.,* 2017 OFCCP LEXIS 10 (OFCCP May 2, 2017). The Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs ("OFCCP"), audited Defendant to evaluate and review its compliance with non-discrimination and affirmative action requirements. Id. at *1. Defendant moved to dismiss the action and asserted that: (i) the OFCCP had reached a determination that Google was in violation of the Executive Order; (ii) the OFCCP could not have reached this determination unless it had completed its compliance review; and (iii) the OFCCP was not entitled to additional information from Defendant because its compliance review was complete. Id. at *2. The Regional Solicitor who represented the OFCCP answered questions from a reporter and an article published on the internet that day formed the basis for Defendant's motion to dismiss. The Regional Solicitor gave a statement to the press indicating that the OFCCP found systemic compensation disparities against women in Defendant's workforce and needed to understand the reason for that disparity. Id. at *3. The article also attributed information to the Regional Director that concluded the Department found pay disparities in a 2015 snapshot of salaries and officials needed earlier compensation data to evaluate the root of the problem. Defendant contended that the comments to the press revealed that the OFCCP had completed the compliance review; otherwise, it could not assert that it had compelling evidence of discrimination Defendant asserted that the OFCCP was seeking extensive additional information not to complete an investigation – that in fact it had already completed – but to enhance its preparation for upcoming litigation on the merits. Defendant asserted that the OFCCP wanted to use the broad investigative authority it is accorded in compliance reviews to circumvent the more constrained access it would receive in formal discovery. Id. at *8. The Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") denied Defendant's motion to dismiss and concluded that the OFCCP had not completed its compliance review. Id. at *10. The ALJ opined that a finding of a wage disparity that correlated to gender, standing alone, was not legally sufficient to entitle the OFCCP to a remedy for a violation and a showing of a wage disparity on one particular date, without more, could not be generalized to cover the two-year scope of the OFCCP's investigation. Further, the Director testified that the investigation had revealed widespread pay disparities by gender, but that the OFCCP lacked sufficient information to determine the cause. The ALJ opined that the implication of the testimony was that only with additional information and further analysis could the OFCCP conclude whether Defendant was in violation of the Executive Order. The ALJ gave more weight to the testimony of the Director under oath than it did to the statements to the media. Accordingly, the ALJ concluded that the OFCCP had not completed its investigation and Defendant's argument for dismissal failed. Id. at *18. The ALJ further found that there was no ethical violation as the statement did not have the substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing the proceeding, although the ALJ questioned the propriety of the Department's extrajudicial statements while a matter was pending. Id. at *23.

(xlviii) Preemption Issues In Class Actions

Ballard, et al. v. American Airlines,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 206948 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 18, 2017). Plaintiff, an aviation maintenance technician, filed a class action on behalf of himself and all others similarly-situated claiming breach of oral contract, estoppel, fraud, unjust enrichment, and negligent misrepresentation. Defendant moved to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1) and 12(b)(6), arguing that Plaintiff's claims were preempted under the Railway Labor Act ("RLA"). The Court granted Defendant's motion. Plaintiff applied to work with Defendant after he learned of Defendant's "Hiring Program," which offered years-of-service credit and top-of-scale pay rates for new hires. Id. at *2. Defendant told Plaintiff during an employment interview that he would have to join the labor union representing Defendant's employees if hired. Plaintiff accepted the position, began working for Defendant, and became a member of the union. Defendant subsequently informed the union that it was discontinuing the Hiring Program under which Plaintiff was hired. Id. at *3. As a result of the decision, employees (like Plaintiff) who had not met their years of service prior to the discontinuation date had to work additional years before they could achieve the top-of-scale pay promised under the Hiring Program. Id. at *4. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's refusal to honor the benefits it agreed to under the Hiring Program constituted a breach of contract. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's claims were preempted under the RLA and thus Plaintiff failed to state a claim. Id. at *4-5. At the outset, the Court noted that the RLA requires air carriers to negotiate "rates of pay, rules, and working conditions" with their employees' collective bargaining representatives, and accordingly, the entire collective bargaining process was governed by federal law through the RLA. Id. Further, where the collective bargaining process was governed by federal law through the RLA, Defendant asserted that claims arising under the bargaining process were subject to preemption. Id. at *5. Plaintiff argued that his claims arose not from any collective bargaining agreement ("CBA"), but from an individual oral agreement made before Plaintiff was hired and before Plaintiff became a union member. Id. at *6. The Court found that the CBA extinguished any individual agreements when Plaintiff became a union-represented employee and received the collectively bargained rights in the CBA. Id. at *8. Accordingly, preemption applied and any claim Plaintiff may have had relating to the terms of his employment must be pursued within the procedures established in the CBA. Id. at *9. Further, Plaintiff's state law claims of estoppel, fraud, unjust enrichment, and negligent misrepresentation claims all arose from the collective bargaining negotiations memorialized in the CBA and thus were also preempted. The Court therefore granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Schiesser, et al. v. Ford Motor Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53180 (N.D. Ill. April 6, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action against Defendant alleging that certain Ford vehicles had a defect that allows harmful exhaust gases to enter the passenger compartment of the vehicles. The Court had previously dismissed Plaintiff's first amended complaint. In his second amended complaint ("SAC"), Plaintiff brought claims for breach of express warranty and common law fraud, as well as for violations of the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act, the Illinois Uniform Deceptive Trade Practices Act ("UDTPA"), and the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act ("ICFA"). Defendant moved to dismiss the SAC pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6), and the Court granted the motion. Plaintiff purchased a model year 2013 Ford Explorer, which came with a 3-year or 36,000 mile warranty. Id. at *5. Plaintiff began noticing exhaust odor in August 2015, but as the needed repair was no longer under warranty, Plaintiff decided not to incur the cost of repair. The Court explained that to state a claim for breach of express warranty, Plaintiff "must allege the terms of the warranty, the failure of some warranted part, a demand upon Defendant to perform under the warranty's terms, a failure by Defendant to do so, compliance with the terms of the warranty by Plaintiff, and damages measured by the terms of the warranty." Id. at *6. Plaintiff argued that the warranty was unconscionable because Defendant knew of the defect at the time of sale, making any limitation on the warranty unconscionable. However, the Court found that Plaintiff's SAC contained no allegations that Defendant knew of the defect at the time Plaintiff purchased his vehicle. Id. at *7. Therefore, because Plaintiff did not seek to have a problem repaired within the time period or mileage limitation stated in the warranty, the Court dismissed his breach of express warranty claim. The Court further ruled that because Plaintiff's state law warranty claim failed, he also could not make out a claim under the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act. Defendant argued that the Court should dismiss the UDTPA claim because federal law preempts Plaintiff's requested injunctive relief. In the SAC, Plaintiff requested injunctive relief to require Defendant to "develop a fix to the dangerous defect, and develop a common fund to provide that fix to Plaintiff and all Class Members." Id. at *11. Defendant argued that the National Highway Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act (the "Safety Act"), preempted the requested relief. The Court found that a nationwide recall would conflict directly with and frustrate the Safety Act. The Court stated that while the Safety Act does not expressly provide that only the Secretary of Transportation may order a motor vehicle recall, "the comprehensive nature of the federal administrative scheme" indicated Congress' intent that only the Secretary of Transportation do so. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court determined that the Safety Act preempted Plaintiff's UDTPA claim. Finally, as to Plaintiff's ICFA claim, the Court found that Plaintiff failed to allege that he saw or heard any allegedly deceptive communications prior to purchasing the vehicle. Therefore, the Court determined that Plaintiff's claims should be dismissed in their entirety, and it granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

(xlix) Preemptive Motions To Strike Or Dismiss Class Allegations

Ahmed, et al. v. HSBC Bank United States, N.A*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 183912 (C.D. Cal. Nov. 6, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action alleging that Defendants violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Defendants move to strike the class allegations pursuant to Rule 12(f) on the grounds that: (i) recent Ninth Circuit decisions precluded the possibility that a "class can possibly be maintained on the face of the pleadings" for this type of TCPA case; (ii) TCPA claims based on whether individual class members consented are not appropriate for class determination; and (iii) Plaintiffs lacked standing to represent class members who received calls directly from Defendant. As an initial matter, Defendants did not cite to any relevant binding authority in support of their motion. Id. at *6. Defendants also argued that the Court should strike Plaintiff's class allegations because the proposed class was an improper fail-safe class. However, the Court found that case law authorities have rejected such arguments with respect to class definitions similar to Plaintiffs' class definitions. Id. at *7. Finally, Defendants contended that Plaintiff did not have standing to represent class members who received calls directly from Defendant HSBC because Plaintiff only received calls from Defendant PHH Mortgage Corp. Id. at *8. The Court held that Defendants failed to explain the basis for the standing argument or cite to applicable case law authorities. The Court explained that a request to find that Plaintiff did not have standing did not fall within the scope of Rule 12(f). Id. The Court stated that given the lack of obvious defects in Plaintiff's class definitions and the infrequency of striking class allegations prior to motions for class certification, it denied Defendants' motion under Rule 12(f).

Alpha Pet Tech Inc., et al. v. LaGasse LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 182499 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 3, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a consolidated putative class action alleging that Defendants sent unsolicited fax advertisements in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Defendants moved to deny class certification and for judgment on the pleadings pursuant to Rule 12(c). The Court granted Defendants' motion to deny certification, but denied Defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings. The central basis of both motions was a recent change in the law in which a panel of the D.C. Circuit in Bais Yaakov of Spring Valley v. FCC, 852 F.3d 1078, 1083 (D.C. Cir. 2017), struck down the Federal Communications Commission's ("FCC") solicited fax rule ("SFR") which required both unsolicited and solicited faxes to include opt-out notices with certain language. The D.C. Circuit held in Bais Yaakov that the SFR was unlawful to the extent that it required opt-out notices on solicited faxes because the language of the TCPA reached only unsolicited fax advertisements, and the FCC did not have the authority to promulgate a rule regarding solicited faxes. Id. at *4. Defendants asserted that Plaintiffs were unable to show that the proposed classes met Rule 23's requirements considering the individualized consent issues resulting from the decision in Bais Yaakov. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' assertions that Bais Yaakov was not governing law in the Seventh Circuit, and that individualized consent issues did not defeat class certification. Id. at *7. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' assertion that Bais Yaakov was not binding in the Seventh Circuit and concluded that because the Judicial Panel on Multi-District Litigation ("JPML") consolidated several petitions from multiple circuits challenging the SFR to be heard in the D.C. Circuit, it became the sole forum for addressing the validity of the FCC's rule. Id. at *8. The Court determined that the cases which Plaintiffs cited for general, inter-circuit stare decisis principles were irrelevant, because Bais Yaakov did not arise through a standard appeal. The Court also rejected Plaintiffs assertion that Bais Yaakov did not strike down the FCC's SFR and reasoned that the D.C. Circuit was clear and unequivocal in that the SFR was unlawful to the extent that it required opt-out notices on solicited faxes. Id. at *9. Further, the Court ruled that certification was not proper given the individualized consent issues as context-dependent questions regarding consent precluded certification under Rule 23(b)(3) on predominance or superiority grounds. As such, the Court granted Defendants' motion to deny certification of the class. The Court, however, denied Defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings pursuant to Rule 12(c). The Court determined that Defendants' motion sought judgment on the pleadings only as to Plaintiffs claims that related to fax advertisements sent with prior express permission, and did not relate to faxes sent without prior express permission. The Court denied the motion because it was procedurally improper for it to award judgment on the pleadings on just part of a claim. Id. at *25. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to deny certification and denied Defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings. Id. at *27.

Campbell, et al. v. Chadbourne & Parke LLP*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 91289 (S.D.N.Y. June 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of law firm partners, alleged that Defendant, their law firm, subjected them to pay discrimination, wrongful termination, and retaliation in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, the FLSA, the Equal Pay Act ("EPA"), and the District of Columbia Human Rights Act ("DCHRA"). Defendants filed a motion for summary judgment, arguing that they were entitled to relief on the basis of whether Plaintiffs were "employees" within the meaning of the law. Because of Plaintiffs' status as partners at the firm and according to the terms of the operative partnership agreement, Defendants contended that Plaintiffs could not be considered "employees" under the relevant statutes. Id. at *4. The Court explained that whether Plaintiffs were considered "employees" under the relevant statutes involved analysis under the six "Clackamas factors," adopted by the U.S. Supreme Court in Clackamas Gastroenterology Associates, P.C. v. Wells, 538 U.S. 440, 449-50 (2003), including: (i) whether the organization can hire or fire the individual or set the rules and regulations of the individual's work; (ii) whether and, if so, to what extent the organization supervises the individual's work; (iii) whether the individual reports to someone higher in the organization; (iv) whether and, if so, to what extent the individual is able to influence the organization; (v) whether the parties intended that the individual be an employee, as expressed in written agreements or contracts; and (vi) whether the individual shares in the profits, losses, and liabilities of the organization. Id. at *5-6. Defendants argued that the title "partner" and the terms of the operative partnership agreement automatically foreclosed the possibility that Plaintiffs could be considered employees. However the Court opined that the Supreme Court has made clear that "[t]he mere fact that a person has a particular title – such as partner, director, or vice president – should not necessarily be used to determine whether he or she is an employee or a proprietor," and "the mere existence of a document styled," for example, as an "employment agreement," or a partnership agreement, does not necessarily answer the question. Id. at *6. As such, the Court found that ordering discovery on these factors was appropriate. Plaintiffs submitted affidavits by their counsel and the named Plaintiffs Campbell and Johnson, identifying areas of discovery necessary to adequately respond to Defendants' factual representations under each Clackamas factor. Id. at *7. For example, Plaintiffs contested Defendants' representation that its hiring, firing, and status-change of partners was determined by the partners generally; rather, Plaintiffs argued that discovery would show that a sub-committee of partners exercised unilateral control over these decisions. Id. Plaintiffs also contested any individual partner's degree of control, autonomy, and access to profits, and argued that discovery would reveal that the firm's Management Committee alone wielded that authority. As a result, the Court concluded that summary judgment was not appropriate at this time and denied Defendants' motion without prejudice to renewal, following limited discovery. Id. at *8. Defendants also sought to dismiss Plaintiffs' class and collective action allegations. Plaintiffs asserted that the motion was premature, as Defendants' arguments were not raised in opposition to a motion for class or collective action certification. Id. The Court found that Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' class and collective action allegations relied upon the Rule 23 factors that would be analyzed and addressed by the Court in the course of deciding a motion for class or collective action certification, and thereby Defendant's motion did not warrant early consideration. Moreover, the Court held that because all members of the putative class or collective action have the same (or substantially similar) employment status as the named Plaintiffs, the success or failure of the class and collective action allegations hinged fundamentally on the analysis on which the Court directed for discovery. Id. at *10.

Grant, et al. v. New York Times Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 149403 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, two employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendants subjected them to employment discrimination and equal pay violations under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Equal Pay Act ("EPA"), the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967, ("ADEA"), the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA"), § 1981 of the Civil Rights Act ("§ 1981"), the New York Equal Pay Law ("EPL"), the New York City Human Rights Law ("NYCHRL"), and the New York State Human Rights Law ("NYSHRL"). Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants discriminated against them because of their race, age, gender, and for Plaintiff Walker, her disability. Defendants moved to dismiss the Title VII gender discrimination claims, the Equal Pay Act claims, and the corresponding state and city law claims and moved to strike Plaintiffs' class claims. The Court found that Plaintiffs' complaint did not allege sufficient factual circumstances from which gender-based discrimination could be inferred. Similarly, the Court determined that Plaintiffs submitted insufficient factual allegation of the skill, effort, responsibility and working conditions of those males to whom their pay was compared to nudge the equal pay claim over the line of plausibility. Id. at *15-16. Plaintiffs also brought claims under the EPL, which the Court noted should be analyzed using the same standards used to consider a federal EPA claim. Thus, the Court held that the outcome of Plaintiffs' NYSHRL and EPL discrimination claims followed that of their Title VII and EPA claims. Therefore, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs' NYSHRL gender discrimination and EPL claims were also insufficient. The Court found no facts, arguments, or theories advanced with respect to Plaintiffs' NYCHRL claim different from those advanced in support of the other gender and equal pay claims. The Court stated that nothing in the complaint plausibly demonstrated that Plaintiffs were discriminated against because of their gender, or that any of the conduct alleged in the complaint was motivated by gender-based animus. Id. at *23. Therefore, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claims under the NYCHRL insofar as they alleged discrimination or a denial of equal pay based on gender. Defendants also moved to strike Plaintiffs' class claims under Rules 23(b)(1) and 23(b)(2), arguing that they failed "as a matter of law" and that if the putative class were to be certified at all, it could only be pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3). Id. The Court noted that generally "motions to strike class allegations . . . are . . . disfavored because they require a reviewing Court to preemptively terminate the class aspects of . . . litigation, solely on the basis of what is alleged in the complaint, and before Plaintiffs are permitted to complete the discovery to which they would otherwise be entitled on questions relevant to class certification." Id. at *24. The Court therefore determined that Defendants' motion to strike Plaintiffs' class allegations was premature, and should be addressed at the class certification stage. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to strike without prejudice to Defendants' right to oppose certification on these same grounds.

Muir, et al. v. Nature's Bounty,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 159679 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 28, 2017). Plaintiff filed a putative class action alleging claims of breach of warranty, consumer fraud, and unjust enrichment on the basis that he purchased Defendant's supplement, which was falsely labeled as containing an anti-depressant ingredient when it did not contain the claimed amount of the ingredient. Id. at *2. Plaintiff filed suit on behalf of himself and three classes of purchasers, including: (i) a nationwide class of every consumer who purchased the supplement within the last four years; (ii) Illinois purchasers; and (iii) a class of purchasers in multiple states that had similar consumer fraud statutes. Defendant moved to dismiss on the basis that Plaintiff failed to state a claim and lacked standing to assert consumer fraud claims under the laws of states where he did not suffer an injury. The Court granted Defendant's motion in part and denied it in part. The Court dismissed Plaintiff's breach of warranty claims, nationwide class allegations, and multi-state class allegations, and denied Defendant's motion as to all other claims. The Court ruled that Plaintiff's breach of warranty claim failed because he failed to give timely notice of the claim before to bringing suit as required by the Uniform Commercial Code ("UCC"). The Court rejected Plaintiff's argument that an exception to the notice rule applied because Defendant had actual knowledge of the defect. The Court determined that the actual knowledge exception did not apply as it was extremely narrow and required a manufacturer to be apprised of the trouble with the product that a particular consumer purchased. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the breach of warranty claim. The Court denied Defendant's motion as to the Illinois Consumer Fraud Act ("ICFA") claim. Plaintiff contended that Defendant failed to disclose a known defect in its product and Defendant asserted that the "simple breach" exception defeated Plaintiff's ICFA claim. Defendant maintained that it was not liable even if it knowingly failed to disclose a defect, if the defect was the subject of an express warranty. The Court disagreed with Defendant's assertion because if adopted, this logic would have the undesirable result of a manufacturer avoiding ICFA liability by expressly guaranteeing that a product did not have a defect of which Defendant was aware. Further, because the Court did not dismiss Plaintiff's ICFA claim and the unjust enrichment claim was tied to that claim, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss as to the unjust enrichment claim. The Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss the nationwide class allegations because there were presumably many consumers who bought the supplement outside of Illinois and saw the misrepresentation in their home states. The Court reasoned that for consumers who lived and purchased the product outside of Illinois, the transaction had nothing to do with Illinois and Plaintiff could not maintain a nationwide class under the law of Illinois. Id. at *27. The Court also dismissed the claims as to the multi-state class. Id. at *32. Plaintiff sought to bring claims for consumers in a select group of states with consumer fraud laws that he asserted were "similar" to the ICFA. Plaintiff contended that instead of applying Illinois law to these consumers, each state's law would apply to the resident consumers. Defendant objected on the basis that Plaintiff did not have standing to bring claims under the laws of states in which he did not reside and did not purchase the product. The Court agreed with Defendant that Plaintiff lacked standing and determined that the question of Plaintiff's standing was properly addressed before class certification. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's claims as to the multi-state class.

Perrero, et al. v. Walt Disney Parks And Resorts U.S., Inc., Case No. 16-CV-2144 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 10, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former American-born and American employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendant discriminated against them on the basis of their race and national origin in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. Defendant terminated 250 employees in its IT department when it decided to outsource the positions to Indian national origin workers. Plaintiffs were required to train the new employees and alleged that Defendant was "curt and unprofessional" to them during the training and that the new employees received preferential treatment. Id. at 2. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court granted. Defendant alleged that the entire action should be dismissed because Plaintiffs failed to state a plausible claim for discrimination and that several of Plaintiffs' individual claims should be dismissed for failure to exhaust administrative remedies. Id. at 3. The parties did not dispute that Plaintiffs failed to timely file charges of discrimination, but Plaintiffs argued that the single-filing rule should apply, which would allow those individuals to "piggy-back" off the timely filed claims of other Plaintiffs. Id. The Court explained that a Plaintiff may rely on the EEOC charge of another Plaintiff if several conditions were met, including: (i) the charge being relied upon must be timely and not otherwise defective; and (ii) the individual claims of the filings and non-filing Plaintiffs must have arisen out of similar discriminatory treatment in the same time-frame. Id. at 3-4. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs could not meet the second prong of the test because it applied on to non-filing Plaintiffs, and since the Plaintiffs filed charges but failed to timely file suit. Id. at 4. The Court noted that the Eleventh Circuit has held that claimants that filed an EEOC charge but then failed to timely file suit after receiving his or her right-to-sue letter would not be permitted to piggy-back under the single-filing rule. Id. Accordingly, the Court applied the same reasoning and dismissed the claims of individual Plaintiffs. As to Defendant's assertion that Plaintiff failed to plead sufficient facts to state plausible claims for relief under Title VII, the Court found it was unable to discern from the complaint the legal theory being asserted by Plaintiffs. Id. at 4-5. The Court stated that the complaint asserted several legal theories with different elements that must be pleaded and proved. Id. at 5. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' complaint but provided an opportunity to amend so that the Court could evaluated all potentially applicable theories to determine which, if any, Plaintiffs could successfully plead. Id. at 6.

Santangelo, et al. v. Comcast Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 200935 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 6, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action on behalf of himself and four putative classes, alleging that Defendant conducted an unauthorized credit check that caused a drop in his credit score in violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") and the Illinois Consumer Fraud Act ("ICFA"). Plaintiff also asserted state law claims for breach of contract and unjust enrichment. Defendant has moved to strike Plaintiff's class allegations. The Court granted Defendant's motion insofar as it sought to require Plaintiff to amend his proposed classes to exclude individuals who did not opt-out of the arbitration provision contained in Defendant's subscriber agreement. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiff proposed four classes, including an FCRA class, and ICFA class, a breach of contract class, and an unjust enrichment class, each composed of "all natural persons residing in the United States or its Territories, who were the subject of a consumer report obtained by Comcast during the ordering process, after Comcast collected the credit inquiry deposit from the consumer." Id. at *3-4. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's proposed classes failed to satisfy Rule 23(a) because Plaintiff was neither typical of the classes he sought to represent, nor adequate to protect the interests of the classes. The Court noted that each of Plaintiff's proposed classes included subscribers who were bound by the arbitration provision, and Plaintiff himself was not bound to the provision. The Court found that the enforceability of the arbitration provision, including its limitations sub-provision, was sufficiently "arguable" to challenge the ability of Plaintiff, who was not bound by the arbitration provision, to adequately represent the interests of the individuals in the four classes who were bound to the agreement. Id. at *9-10. The Court reasoned that by virtue of the fact that he successfully opted-out of the arbitration provision, Plaintiff would be unable to assert, in any credible fashion, a number of arguments that would potentially undermine the provision's enforceability, including that subscribers somehow felt compelled to accept the arbitration provision or that it was not sufficiently noticeable to warrant enforcement. Id. at *13. For these reasons, the Court concluded that Plaintiff was inadequate to represent the interests of the putative classes as currently defined in the complaint. The Court therefore granted Defendant's motion to strike the class allegations. The Court concluded that to the extent that Plaintiff wished to pursue this action on a class-wide basis, he must amend the proposed class definitions in a manner consistent with the Court's order before filing a motion for class certification. Id. at *13-14.

Sloan, et al. v. 1st American Auto Sales Training,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58476 (C.D. Cal. April 17, 2017). Plaintiff, a sales trainee, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants violated the False Advertising Law ("FAL") set forth in § 17500 of the California Business and Professions Code and the Unfair Competition Law ("UCL") set forth in § 17200 of the California Business and Professions Code. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1) and Rule 12(b)(6), and the Court denied Defendants' motion. Defendants advertised a three-day automotive sales training course on-line, which Plaintiff alleged was misleading and deceptive because they were charged $695 for the course, did not receive national certification as promised, and were not offered employment at the course's conclusion despite promises of "guaranteed" positions. Id. at *2. Defendants contended that Plaintiff failed to establish the requisite amount-in-controversy for jurisdiction under the CAFA. The Court examined whether Plaintiff alleged in good faith that the amount-in-controversy exceeded $5 million. Plaintiff alleged that the aggregate total of the class members' claims was "in excess of $5,000,000 . . . exclusive of interests and costs." Id. at *6. Plaintiff's alleged damages consisted of actual damages, punitive damages, and attorneys' fees. To meet the amount-in-controversy requirement and exceed the $5 million threshold, 7,195 class members would need to have taken the $695 course. Id. at *7. The Court noted that this number was consistent with Plaintiff's allegation that the "proposed class is composed of thousands of persons." Id. at *8. The Court further opined that the 7,195 figure could be dramatically reduced once punitive damages and attorneys' fees were included. Ultimately, the Court found that the prospect of thousands of class members was not so unbelievable as to fall outside the bounds of good faith. Id. The Court therefore turned to whether Defendants had shown to a legal certainty that Plaintiff could not meet the amount-in-controversy requirement. The Court determined that Defendants' sole argument was that the three-year statute of limitations period relevant to the alleged claims precluded a class of thousands. Id. The Court noted that this was more of a factual argument than a legal one, and, although it made Plaintiff's proposed class size less likely, it did not prove to a legal certainty that the value of Plaintiff's claims was $5 million or less. Id. at *8-9. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1). Defendants also moved to dismiss based on Plaintiff's failure to state a claim. Defendants argued that the class lacked predominance under Rule 23(b)(3). Plaintiff asserted that Defendants' motion was premature because the class definition could be amended before certification and because the parties had yet to undertake discovery. The Court stated that a motion to dismiss class claims is rarely appropriate "before discovery commences." Id. at *9. Because discovery had yet to begin, the Court explained that Defendants must make a compelling argument for dismissal and it concluded that they failed to do so. First, Defendants argued that some class members might have suffered less damages than others, and therefore predominance could not be met. The Court ruled that Defendants alluded to factual scenarios that had no basis in the allegations or in the evidence before the Court. Id. at *10. Defendants also asserted that the action should be dismissed because individual inquiries would have to be made into whether each class member received a binding offer of employment and which advertisements each class member viewed. The Court found Defendants' contention unpersuasive because Plaintiff specifically had alleged that all class members' claims arose from the identical, false, affirmative written advertisements guaranteeing a job to which class members responded when attending and paying for training. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss. Id. at *11-12.

Spencer, et al. v. Comcast Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22790 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 17, 2017). Plaintiff, a telecommunications operator, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant discriminated against him on the basis of his race during the course of his employment. Plaintiff asserted claims alleging retaliation based on race, individual disparate treatment, systemic disparate treatment, failure to promote, and hostile work environment. Plaintiff also claimed that Defendant engaged in actions that had a systemic disparate impact upon African-Americans in violation of Title VII. Id. at *5. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss Plaintiff's disparate impact claim for failing to exhaust his administrative remedies, and the Court granted the motion. In March 2015, Plaintiff received his annual review, which stated that he needed improvement in communication, motivation, inter-personal skills, and organizing his thoughts. Id. at *3. Plaintiff filed an internal complaint of racial discrimination in the workplace. Plaintiff's managers scheduled a meeting with Plaintiff to discuss his allegations. Defendant discharged Plaintiff 11 days later for hanging up the phone on a customer. Plaintiff filed a charge with the EEOC alleging that he was discriminated against based on his race and skin color. Id. at *4. Defendant argued that Plaintiff was barred from bringing a systemic disparate impact claim because Plaintiff failed to exhaust his administrative remedies with the EEOC. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff did not raise any disparate impact claim or class action allegations in his discrimination charge with the EEOC and solely alleged a discrete act of intentional discrimination. Id. at *8. Plaintiff contended that he put the EEOC on notice that it needed to investigate whether Defendant's employment practices had a disparate impact on African-Americans. Plaintiff asserted that, although the four corners of the discrimination charge itself did not contain a disparate impact claim, the additional supporting documentation that he provided to the EEOC placed the EEOC on notice of the need for further investigation. Id. at *10. The Court held that Plaintiff's allegations raised a claim that he was discharged because of his race and color, but not a claim of disparate impact. Id. at *14. The Court concluded that, because Plaintiff did not mention other similarly-situated employees within his charge, or make reference to any facially-neutral policy, Plaintiff did not allege a systemic disparate impact claim. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff did not exhaust his administrative remedies with respect to his claim of systemic disparate impact. The Court therefore granted Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's systemic disparate impact claim.

(l) Privacy Class Actions

Cole, et al. v. Gene By Gene, Ltd.*, Case No. 14-CV-4 (D. Alaska July 28, 2017). Plaintiff filed a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Alaska Genetic Privacy Act when it allegedly disclosed his genetic testing information on a public website. Plaintiff purchased a DNA testing kit from Defendant's website. After testing, participants could sign up for "projects" or on-line forums run by third-party independent volunteers called project administrators. Id. at 2. Plaintiff signed up for nine projects and understood that the project administrators would have access to his name, contact information, and testing kit number. Id. at *2-3. However, Plaintiff alleged that when he signed up for the projects, he was not informed that some project administrators had separate websites, or that his full DNA test results would be disclosed on those sites. Id. at 3. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification, which the Court denied on the ground that Plaintiff failed to meet the Rule 23(b) requirements of predominance or superiority. Plaintiff's proposed class consisted of all individuals who purchased a DNA test from Defendant and who executed a release form and joined a project from May 13, 2012 and August 1, 2016, while residing in the state of Alaska. Id. The Court found that there were significant aspects of the case that would require individualized proof that weighed against a finding that common questions predominated. For example, the Court noted that whether each proposed class member gave informed and written consent to disclosure could depend on several individualized determinations, including whether the customer signed a release form, the language of the form, and the information provided to the customer about potential disclosures of the genetic information. Id. at 9. The Court held that the individualized proof that would be required to establish each customer's consent, together with the proof needed to demonstrate Defendant's disclosure of each customer's test results, supported a finding that individual questions predominated over common questions, as both consent and disclosure are key elements of the Genetic Privacy Act. Id. at 10. The Court also opined that individual damages would also defeat class certification, as approximately 900 proposed class members sustained actual damages, but Plaintiff failed to present any method for measuring such damages. Id. at 11. The Court also determined that Plaintiff failed to meet the superiority requirement because: (i) Plaintiff's claim alone was sufficient to make an individual lawsuit economical; (ii) there was no indication that class action would achieve great economy of time, effort, or expense; (iii) no other cases of the same nature existed in the district; and (iv) the relative complexities in the case. Id. at 13-15. The Court ruled that a class action was not the superior method for adjudicating the dispute. The Court therefore denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Dunkin, et al. v. Appriss, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 112155 (N.D. Ind. July 18, 2017). Plaintiffs, two car accident victims, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Driver's Privacy Protection Act ("DPPA") when it sold copies of accident reports containing personal information to third-parties for solicitation purposes and without their consent. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs sought liquidated damages in the amount of $2,500 each. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgement, which the Court granted. The Court explained that Congress enacted the DPPA to prevent "stalkers and criminals from utilizing motor vehicle records to acquire information about their victims," and to stop "the States' common practice of selling personal information to businesses engaged in direct marketing and solicitation. Id. at *9-10. The DPPA provides that a "motor vehicle record" is "any record that "pertains" to a motor vehicle operator's permit, motor vehicle title, motor vehicle registration, or identification card issued by a department of motor vehicles." Id. at *10. The Court held that the name, address, and driver's license number written down or scanned from a driver's license handed over by the license-holder was not "personal information, from a motor vehicle record," protected by the DPPA. Id. The first issue was whether the driver's license itself is a "motor vehicle record." Id. at *11-12. If so, the disclosure of personal information from it would fall under the statute. Id. at *12-13. The Court noted that the word "pertains," as used in the DPPA, meant "to belong as a part, member, accessory, or product." Id. at *13. The Court held that a driver's license is not a part, member, accessory, or product of a motor vehicle operator's permit; rather, it is a motor vehicle operator's permit. Id. Plaintiffs contended that the word "pertains" was intentionally expansive. However, the Court determined that such an expansive reading would pull conduct into the Act's orbit well beyond what Congress intended to govern. Id. The Court therefore held that a driver's license itself was not the relevant "motor vehicle record." Id. at *14. Plaintiffs argued that the DPPA protects information on driver's licenses only when that information is disclosed involuntarily. Id. at *17. They argued that, because Indiana law requires disclosure of a driver's license to the police after an accident, they did disclose it voluntarily, so therefore it remained under the DPPA's protection. Id. at *18. The Court found no basis for using voluntariness to determine DPPA coverage, as no language in the statute alluded to that distinction. The Court concluded that when the holder of a driver's license hands over personal information to an entity other than a DMV, even when that information is printed onto a driver's license, the DPPA does not protect it. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

In Re Facebook Internet Tracking Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102464 (N.D. Cal. June 30, 2017). In this consolidated multi-district class action brought by and on behalf of individuals with active Facebook accounts seeking more than $15 billion in damages and injunctive relief for Defendant's purported tracking of their on-line activities, the Court had previously granted Defendant's motion to dismiss on the grounds that Plaintiffs failed to articulate a cognizable basis for standing pursuant to Article III. Plaintiffs filed an amended complaint and Defendant again moved to dismiss. The Court granted Defendant's motion. In their amended complaint, Plaintiffs claimed that Facebook's use of "tracking" or "persistent" cookies to track and transmit a user's browsing history without the user's consent after the user logged-off of Facebook violated numerous state and federal laws, including the Federal Wiretap Act, the Stored Communications Act ("SCA"), the Computer Crime Law ("CCL"), and the Invasion of Privacy Act ("IPA"), as well as constituting fraud, larceny, breach of contract, and breach of good faith and fair dealing. Id. at *15-16. Plaintiffs also raised common law claims that Facebook's tracking practices amounted to an invasion of privacy, intrusion upon seclusion, trespass to chattels, and conversion. Id. at *16. In seeking dismissal, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs lacked standing to pursue all claims. Although Plaintiffs asserted that the information Defendant collected from its tracking activities was valuable, Defendant argued that they did not allege that anyone was willing to pay for their personal information or that its purported conduct lessened the value of that information or affected its marketability. First, because economic injury was not a prerequisite for Plaintiffs' Federal Wiretap Act, SCA, or IPA claims, the Court found that the allegations alone were sufficient to establish standing as to those claims. Id. at *18-19. The Court had previously found that Plaintiffs did not establish a "realistic economic harm or loss that is attributable to Facebook's alleged conduct." Id. at *19. Although Plaintiffs' personal web browsing information might have "some degree of intrinsic value," this Court held that Plaintiffs failed to show, "for the purposes of Article III standing, that they personally lost the opportunity to sell their information or that the value of their information was somehow diminished after it was collected by Facebook." Id. The Court noted that the amended complaint contained no new facts that established economic harm or loss, not did it establish that Defendant intended to permanently deprive Plaintiffs of property of any sort. Id. at *21. As such, the Court found that Plaintiffs lacked Article III standing to pursue their claims for trespass to chattels, violations of the CDAFA, fraud, and larceny. Id. Plaintiffs also alleged that Defendant committed privacy tort violations by collecting URLs of pages that Plaintiffs visited and by using persistent cookies to associate Plaintiffs' identities with their web browsing histories. Id. at *21-22. The Court determined that Plaintiffs need not show actual loss to establish standing for common law claims of invasion of privacy and intrusion upon seclusion. Plaintiffs further added claims for breach of contract and breach of the duty of good faith and fair dealing. The Court found that Plaintiffs had standing to pursue their claims for breach of contract and breach of the duty of good faith and fair dealing because actual damages are not required to establish standing for contractual claims. Id. at *22-23. The Court then reviewed the sufficiency of each of those claims and held that Plaintiffs failed to state an actionable Wiretap Act claim because they failed to plead that Facebook intercepted the "contents" of an electronic communication. Id. at *24. The Court further dismissed the SCA claims as deficient, because the SCA only applies to information that is temporarily stored "incident to [the] transmission" of a communication; it does not apply to information in local storage on a user's computer. Id. at *27. The Court also ruled that Plaintiffs had not established that they had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the URLs of the pages they visited because Plaintiffs could have taken steps to keep their browsing histories private. Id. at *29. Finally, the Court held that Plaintiffs' claim for breach of the duty of good faith and fair dealing also failed, because Plaintiffs had not identified the terms of the agreement that imposed a duty on Defendant not to engage in the tracking activity at issue. Id. at *30. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss with leave to amend only the breach of contract and breach of the duty of good faith and fair dealing claims.

In Re Facebook Internet Tracking Litigation*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 190819 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 17, 2017).
Plaintiffs pursued a consolidated, multi-district class action on behalf of individuals with active Facebook accounts and sought more than $15 billion in damages and injunctive relief for Defendant's purported tracking of their on-line activities. The Court had previously granted Defendant's motion to dismiss on the grounds that Plaintiffs failed to articulate a cognizable basis for standing pursuant to Article III. Plaintiffs filed an amended complaint, and Defendant again moved to dismiss. The Court granted Defendant's motion with leave to amend the breach of contract and breach of the duty of good faith and fair dealing claims. Plaintiffs timely filed their third amended complaint and Defendant again moved to dismiss under Rules 12(b)(6) and 15(c). The Court granted Defendant's motion again. Plaintiffs alleged that each of them entered into a contract with Facebook that consisted of: (i) Facebook's Statement of Rights and Responsibilities ("SRR"); (ii) Facebook's privacy policy; and (iii) relevant pages from Facebook's help center. Id. at *15. According to Plaintiffs, Facebook promised in the contract that it would not track the web browsing activity of logged-out Facebook users on third-party websites, and Facebook broke that promise by collecting data about logged-out users' browsing activity and using cookies to connect that activity to users' identities. Id. at *15-16. The Court explained that, to state a claim for breach of contract, Plaintiffs must allege that: (i) they entered into a contract with Facebook; (ii) Plaintiffs performed or were excused from performance under the contract; (iii) Facebook breached the contract; and (iv) Plaintiffs suffered damages from the breach. Id. at *16. Plaintiffs argued that the language in Facebook's data use policy

"implicitly promises to the average user that Facebook will not receive [a user-identifying] cookie when the user is not logged-in." Id. at *17. However, the Court noted that the SRR that Plaintiffs identified as a contract did not use the term "data use policy" and did not contain any reference to the data use policy. As such, because the SRR did not "clearly and unequivocally" reference it, the Court concluded that the SRR did not incorporate the data use policy. Id. at *20. Plaintiffs also argued that certain help center pages were incorporated by reference into the privacy policy and that the privacy policy, in turn, was incorporated into the SRR. Id. at *21. The Court stated that, even if it assumed that the privacy policy was incorporated into the SRR, Plaintiffs' argument failed because the help center pages were not incorporated into the privacy policy. Id. at *22. Plaintiffs also argued that the help center in its entirety was incorporated into the privacy policy because the privacy policy linked to some of its pages. The Court concluded that Plaintiffs' argument that the privacy policy "directed" users to help center pages "without exclusion" was at odds with the third amended complaint, wherein Plaintiffs alleged that the privacy policy linked to some help center pages but not to the help center pages containing Facebook's promises not to track logged-out users. Id. at *23. The Court thus found this relationship too attenuated to support Plaintiffs' position that the entire help center was incorporated into the privacy policy. Id. Accordingly, the Court ruled that Plaintiffs' breach of contract claim must be dismissed. Further, because Plaintiffs' claim for a violation of the duty of good faith and fair dealing must rest "upon the existence of some specific contractual obligation," the Court also found that Plaintiffs had not identified contractual provisions that prohibited Facebook from tracking logged-out users in the manner Plaintiffs alleged. Id. at *24. The Court therefore determined that Plaintiffs' claim for breach of the duty of good faith and fair dealing must also be dismissed.

Ingalls, et al. v. Spotify USA, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110817 (N.D. Cal. July 17, 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, filed an unfair competition class action alleging violations of California's Automatic Renewal Law ("ARL") and various sections of the California Business and Professions Code. Plaintiff claimed that when using Defendant's subscription streaming music service, Defendant allegedly: (i) failed to present automatic renewal terms in a clear and conspicuous manner in visual proximity to the request for consent to the offer; (ii) failed to obtain consumers' affirmative consent for automatic renewal; and (iii) failed to provide an acknowledgment that included its automatic renewal terms in a manner capable of being retained by the consumer. Id. at *4. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, which the Court granted in part and denied in part. The Court found that the ARL itself did not provide a civil remedy. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion as to Plaintiff's direct ARL claim. Defendant also contended that Plaintiff lacked standing to bring his claim. The Court determined that Plaintiff paid $29.97 to Defendant, and thus made a prima facie showing of injury. Id. at *7-8. Defendant further argued that even had the disclosures been presented in a more conspicuous manner, it would have made no difference because Plaintiff admitted that, in most instances, he did not read disclosures for subscription services. Id. at *8. Further, Defendant stated that Plaintiff was a sophisticated consumer who owned his own on-line business, and was therefore aware of how on-line disclosures worked. Defendant contended that if there were more prominent warnings, Plaintiff would have subscribed to the service and would not have cancelled before the trial period ended, and therefore Defendant's failure to strictly comply with the ARL did not cause Plaintiff's loss. Id. at *11. The Court determined that viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, it was possible a reasonable fact-finder could determine that, had the terms been more prominently presented, Plaintiff would have read them and cancelled his subscription before the paid period began. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to Plaintiff's § 17602(a)(1) allegations. Id. at *12. Defendant further asserted that Plaintiff's failure to read its disclosures proved that he lacked standing to pursue his § 17602(a)(2) claim. The Court ruled that assuming there was not affirmative consent, as Plaintiff alleged, a failure to read terms on a sign-up page did not show lack of causation. Id. at *13. The Court therefore denied Defendant's motion as to Plaintiff's § 17602(a)(2) allegations. In addition, the Court stated that Defendant's motion did not specifically address the adequacy of the disclosures in the confirmation email, or whether Plaintiff read the confirmation email. Id. at *13-14. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion with request to Plaintiff's § 17602(a)(3) allegations. Id. at *14. As to injunctive relief, the Court explained that to establish standing, a Plaintiff must generally show "a sufficient likelihood that he will again be wronged in a similar way." Id. at *14-15. Defendant argued that Plaintiff could not show a likelihood of future injury since he now knew about the automatic renewal policies, and had indicated that he did not have any current plans to sign up again. Id. at *15. However, the Court noted that Plaintiff indicated that he would consider purchasing the service again if an injunction were issued in this action. Id. at *16. Accordingly, Plaintiff could very well be harmed by a future iteration of Defendant's service if it was not required to conform its disclosures to the law. Hence, the Court found it premature to decide whether Plaintiff was entitled to injunctive relief. Thus, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion.

Santana, et al. v. Take Two Interactive Software,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 23446 (2d Cir. Nov. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant violated the Illinois Biometric Privacy Act ("BIPA"), which prohibits companies from collecting employees' biometric information until the company notifies the employee in writing that the information is being collected. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant's NBA 2K15 and NBA 2K16 video games contained a feature called "MyPlayer" that allows gamers to create a personalized basketball player that has a realistic 3-D rendition of the gamer's face. The 3-D mapping process used cameras to capture a scan of the gamer's facial geometry to disseminate a realistic rendition of the gamer's face; this device required gamers to hold their faces within 6 to 12 inches of the camera and slowly turn their heads during the scanning process. Id. *2-3. To use the feature, gamers had to agree to terms and conditions acknowledging that the face scan will be visible and may be recorded during gameplay and requires gamers to "agree and consent to such uses." Id. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant: (i) collected their biometric data without their informed consent; (ii) disseminated their biometric data to others during game play without their informed consent; (iii) failed to inform them in writing of the specific purpose and length of term for which their biometric data would be stored; (iv) failed to make publicly available a retention schedule and guidelines for permanently destroying Plaintiffs' biometric data; and (v) failed to store, transmit, or protect from disclosure Plaintiffs' biometric data by using a reasonable standard of care or in a manner that is at least as protective as the manner in which it stored, transmitted, and protected other confidential and sensitive information. Id. *4. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims for lack of Article III standing and for failure to state a cause of action under the statute. The District Court granted the motion on both grounds and dismissed the action with prejudice. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision insofar as it held that Plaintiffs lacked Article III standing, but vacated the decision in part insofar as it held that Plaintiffs lacked a statutory cause of action as "aggrieved" parties. Id. at *6. In regards to Article III standing, the Second Circuit held that "none of the alleged procedural violations raised a material risk of harm" to Plaintiffs arising out of the use, collection, or disclosure of an individual's biometric data. Id. at *7. In reaching this conclusion, the Second Circuit noted that no reasonable person would believe that the feature of the game at issue was anything other than a facial scan and Plaintiffs did "not plausibly assert (beyond a mere conclusory allegation) that they would have withheld their consent had Defendant included additional language in its consent disclaimer." Id. at *8. The Second Circuit found that Plaintiffs' alleged violations of the BIPA's notice provisions similarly failed to raise a material risk of harm because Plaintiffs did not allege that Defendant had not or would not destroy their biometric data within the period specified by the statute, nor did Plaintiffs allege that Defendant lacked such protocols or that its policies were inadequate. Accordingly the Second Circuit reasoned that there was "no material risk that Defendant's procedural violations have resulted in Plaintiffs' biometric data being used or disclosed without their consent." Id. at *9. Finally, the Second Circuit was not persuaded by Plaintiffs attempts to "manufacture an injury" by alleging that they would be deterred from using biometric technology in the future because "Plaintiffs' fear, without more, was insufficient to confer Article III injury-in-fact." Id. at *11. Despite this ruling, the Second Circuit remanded to the District Court with the instruction that the District Court enter a dismissal without prejudice. Id. at *12. The Second Circuit held that since the statutory standing arguments were based on differing constructions of the term "aggrieved party" as used in the BIPA, the District Court's resolution of the issue was a judgment on the merits that could not be properly addressed absent subject-matter jurisdiction. Id. The Second Circuit found that the District Court was therefore without power to dismiss the complaint with prejudice for failure to state a cause of action under the statute. Id. at *13.

(li) Procedural Issues And Proof Requirements In Rule 23 Class Actions

Albert D. Seeno Construction Co., et al. v. Aspen Insurance UK Ltd*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 147646 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 12, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action in state court alleging: (i) breach of contract; (ii) breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing; (iii) four claims for declaratory relief; (iv) unfair, unlawful, and fraudulent business practices pursuant to § 17200 of the California Business and Professions Code; and (v) unfair, deceptive, untrue, and/or misleading advertising pursuant to § 17200 of the California Business and Professions Code relating to Defendant's alleged refusal to defend Plaintiffs in lawsuits against them. Id. at *2. Defendant moved to strike various paragraphs and language in the complaint containing Plaintiffs' class allegations. Id. at *5-6. Defendant contended that the allegations were deficient because Plaintiffs did not allege that the case could be certified pursuant to Rule 23. Id. at *6. Defendant noted that complaint did not set forth a definition of the proposed class, nor did the complaint plead the Rule 23 requirements for class certification such as commonality, typicality, adequacy, superiority, and predominance. Id. Defendant also argued that Plaintiffs could not satisfy the Rule 23 requirements because every insurance policy was customized to address the needs of the individual insured, and therefore that individual issues would predominate. Id. Plaintiffs responded that Defendant failed to demonstrate that Rule 23 applied to Plaintiffs' § 17200 claims, which Plaintiffs stated they were bringing as representative claims under state law, and not class claims under Rule 23. Id. Plaintiffs also contended that Defendant's arguments regarding the propriety of class certification were premature, and that the Court should consider such matters in connection with a motion for class certification and not in a motion to strike. Id. at *7. In light of Plaintiffs' clarification that the complaint sought to assert representative claims under § 17200, the Court denied Defendant's motion to strike Plaintiffs' class allegations.

American Trucking Association Inc., et al. v. New York Truway Authority*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30496 (S.D.N.Y Feb. 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of interstate truck drivers, filed suit against Defendant claiming that its use of tollway revenue collected from Plaintiffs to fund the New York State Canal Corporation ("NYSCC") violated the dormant commerce clause. Plaintiffs sought injunctive relief as well as refunds for paid tolls. After extensive discovery, both parties moved for summary judgment on the issue of liability. The Court granted summary judgment in favor of Plaintiffs, ruling that Defendant's practice of funding the NYSCC with tolls collected in the thruway violated the dormant commerce clause. Accordingly, the Court granted injunctive relief. However, at that time, neither the parties nor the Court were aware that in 1991 Congress had enacted the Intermodal Surface Transportation Efficiency Act ("ISTEA") that specifically authorized Defendant to use tollway receipts to fund the NYSCC. Subsequently, the Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint pursuant to Rules 12(b)(1), 12(b)(6), and 12(c), alleging that the Court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction and that Plaintiffs failed to state a cognizable claim for relief. The Court ruled that it did have subject-matter jurisdiction over the matter. However, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim pursuant to Rule 12(c) because Congress had authorized the Defendant to use toll revenues to fund the NYSCC. Therefore, there was no violation of the dormant commerce clause. Plaintiffs argued that "congressional authorization" was an affirmative defense and Defendant had waived this defense by not pleading it as such. The Court disagreed and ruled that Defendants raised the defense of failure to state a claim in its original pleadings, Defendant preserved its right to move for judgment on the pleadings. The Court also ruled that because Defendant did not know of the 1991 congressional authorization, it could not have waived its rights. While the Court noted that Defendant "should have known" about the congressional authorization, this did not constitute a waiver. Id. at *23. The Court ruled that Plaintiffs' claim was barred because Congress had specifically authorized the use of tolls for such purposes. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss and vacated its previous order as to the parties' motions for summary judgment.

Doe, et al. v. NFL Enterprises,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24991 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 22, 2017). Plaintiff, a former cheerleader, brought a class action alleging that Defendant and its member clubs conspired to eliminate competition for recruiting cheerleaders and to keep cheerleaders' wages below market value. Id. at *2. Plaintiff filed a motion for permission to continue the action under a pseudonym and alleged that she would be subject to harassment, injury, ridicule, or personal embarrassment if forced to maintain the action under her legal name Id. Plaintiff contended that cheerleaders needed anonymity "to prevent overzealous fans from stalking or otherwise inappropriately contacting" them, and to protect them from "social stigmatization" on account of their revealing uniforms. Id. at *3. Additionally, Plaintiff did not want her true name to be associated with this lawsuit because "former cheerleaders who have filed complaints against the NFL and various NFL teams have been subject to vicious on-line attacks and harassment, and even stalking" Id. Plaintiff provided declarations of two other former cheerleaders who claimed that they were subjected to harassing calls, stalking, and name-calling after they filed lawsuits against Defendant. Id. at *3-4. The Court held that the judicial system belongs to the people, and the public and press have a right to see how the judicial system was being used. Id. at *5. The Court opined that this consideration counseled in favor of requiring the true names of those suing others. Further, the Court stated that Plaintiff failed to show that public disclosure of her identity presented a substantial risk of harm. Id. at *5-6. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to proceed under a pseudonym.

Glasser, et al. v. Hilton Grand Vacations Co*., LLC, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 157690 (M.D. Fla. Sept. 26, 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant used an automated dialing system to place automated or pre-recorded telemarketing calls to her cellular telephone to encourage the purchase of its promotional vacation packages and timeshares without express written consent in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Plaintiff filed a renewed motion for leave to file under seal an unredacted version of her motion for class certification. The Court had denied Plaintiff's previous motion without prejudice for failing to show good cause. Id. at *1. The Court noted that Plaintiff's renewed motion contained additional information from Defendant claiming that the redacted information was "confidential." Id. The Court reasoned that Plaintiff sought to file its motion under seal to preserve the interest Defendant asserted under the parties' confidentiality agreement. The Court found that as the true party in interest, Defendant had not shown good cause to file under seal the redacted portions of Plaintiff's motion. Defendant claimed confidentiality as to the name of the automatic telephone dialing system, the number of telemarketing calls, the number of cellular telephone numbers called, the number of calls placed to Plaintiffs cellular telephone, and the class definition. Id. at *2. The Court stated that the parties' mutual agreement to keep documents confidential or to seal materials was "immaterial" to a Court's decision regarding the public's right of access. Id. at *3. Further, the right to file a document under seal does not automatically follow a confidentiality designation during discovery. Id. Accordingly, the Court directed Defendant to show good cause why each redacted portion of Plaintiff's class certification motion should be filed under seal.

Gordon, et al. v. New West Health Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10414 (D. Mont. Jan. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, an employee and his wife, brought a class action alleging that Defendant had a common policy and practice of systematically denying substance abuse and mental health treatment in violation of the Paul Wellstone and Pete Domenici Mental Health Parity and Addiction Equity Act of 2008 (the "Federal Parity Act") and Montana state laws. Plaintiffs allege further that Defendant uniformly employed the use of impermissible criteria for treating addiction cases in violation of state and federal parity laws. Plaintiffs were insured for healthcare under Defendant's plan in 2010 and 2011. Plaintiffs made a claim to Defendant on behalf of their minor son. Defendant's policy provided criteria for what it considered to be medically necessary treatment. Plaintiff's physician recommended inpatient detoxification therapy, but Defendant denied the claim based upon its determination that inpatient detoxification was not medically necessary. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs asked for reconsideration of the denial and Defendant refused. In their lawsuit, Plaintiffs sought an injunction that would order Defendant to reopen and properly adjust class members' claims for alcohol, mental illness, and drug addiction benefits using criteria that passed muster under the Federal Parity Act. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs further requested that the Court order Defendant to reimburse the members of the class for the money that they paid for such benefits that Defendant should have paid, and to disgorge any money that Defendant earned from the profits that it obtained from its unlawful conduct. Plaintiffs moved for class certification under Rule 23(b)(2), which the Court denied. Plaintiffs claimed that final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief was appropriate for the class as a whole. Defendant argued that it no longer provided claims administration for any plans using the benefits booklet to which Plaintiffs referred and it no longer administered any commercial health insurance plans. Id. at *7. Defendant further asserted that its decision to stop providing claims administration using the benefits booklet, or for commercial clients in general, rendered Plaintiffs' claims for prospective class relief moot. Id. Defendant contended that Plaintiffs lacked standing to seek prospective relief, because neither Plaintiffs nor their son were currently covered individuals under any plan for which Defendant provided claims administration. Id. at *7-8. The Court stated that Rule 23(b)(2) certification is inappropriate when the majority of the class does not face future harm. Id. The Court determined that Plaintiffs no longer received benefits under Defendant's health plan and therefore they lacked standing to certify a Rule 23(b)(2) class. The Court found that Plaintiffs' proposed class met the numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequacy requirements. Id. at *13-17. Therefore, since the Court ruled that Plaintiffs met the requirements of Rule 23(a), it permitted Plaintiffs to amend their complaint to include a claim for class certification under Rule 23(b)(3). Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion to certify a class under Rule 23(b)(2).

Hayes, et al. v. Magnachip Semiconductor Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18032 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 8, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of stock purchasers, brought a class action alleging that Defendants issued false and misleading statements regarding its business and financial results in violation of the Securities Exchange Act. Plaintiffs previously had filed a motion for class certification of a class of all stock purchasers from February 1, 2012 to February 12, 2015. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, but limited the class period to February 1, 2012 through March 11, 2014. Subsequently, Plaintiffs filed a second motion for class certification of stock purchasers between March 12, 2014 and February 12, 2015, which was the time period that was removed from the class definition by the Court in its prior order. Defendants moved to strike Plaintiff's motion. The Court determined that Plaintiffs' second motion for class certification did not comply with the Court's previous order. Plaintiffs argued that Rule 23(c)(1)(C) provides that "[a]n order that grants or denies class certification may be altered or amended before final judgment." Id. at *5. However, the Court found that Plaintiffs cited no authority supporting their theory that Rule 23(c)(1)(C) allowed Plaintiffs to file a second class certification motion because they received an unfavorable ruling on their first one. Id. at *5-6. The Court opined that Rule 23(c)(1)(C) applies where "subsequent developments" warrant revisiting a class certification decision. Id. at *6. The Court held that there were no "subsequent developments" that justified Plaintiffs' second motion for class certification. Id. at *7. Moreover, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to identify a case where the Court's ruling on one motion qualified as a subsequent development justifying the filing of a second motion. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to strike Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

In Re Pella Corp. Architect And Designer Series Windows Marketing, Sales Practices And Products Liability Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114223 (D.S.C. July 21, 2017). Plaintiffs in this consolidated multi-district litigation were owners of certain Pella Architect Series and Designer Series Windows manufactured between 1997 and 2007 (the "Windows"). Plaintiffs alleged that the Windows suffered from a common design defect and that defect was exacerbated by the use of inadequate, or inadequately applied, wood treatment and preservative. Plaintiffs filed a number of class action complaints in separate jurisdictions based on these allegations, which the Court considered for coordinated or consolidated pre-trial proceedings. Plaintiffs moved for class certification in three cases. One of these cases was dismissed before the Court could rule on class certification, leaving only Romig v. Pella Corp., Case No. 14-CV-433 ("Romig") and Naparala v. Pella Corp., Case No. 14-CV-3465 ("Naparala"). Subsequently, the Court issued orders denying class certification in both Romig and Naparala. Id. at *3-4. The Court held that individual issues predominated over the common defect issue under Rule 23(b)(3) and Rule 23(b)(2), and even if the class could escape the predominance inquiry by seeking certification on just the defect issue, certification was still inappropriate under the superiority requirement of Rule 23(b)(3). Id. at *4. Defendant subsequently filed a motion arguing that the principles set forth in the Court's class certification orders should be applied to all remaining class actions in the MDL. Defendant sought an order denying class certification in all remaining cases. The Court denied the motion. At the outset, the Court noted that Defendant's request did not arise under any Federal Rule of Civil Procedure or other established body of law. The Court stated that it, therefore, was faced with an initial question of whether the requested relief was even available, and if so, what standards should guide its decision to grant or withhold it. Id. Plaintiffs argued that such relief unconstitutionally would deprive them of their right to procedural due process. Id. at *4-5. Defendant asserted that its request came from the principles of stare decisis, rather than issue preclusion or res judicata which might raise due process concerns. Id. at *5. However, the Court concluded that the concept of stare decisis presupposes a determination that an issue has been previously decided in prior litigation. Id. at *5-6. Because stare decisis involves a reapplication, rather than an extension, of a prior ruling, the Court stated that it necessarily creates a new ruling, suggesting that the parties should be given a full opportunity to address the reapplication of the old rule to new facts. Id. at *6. Further, the Court opined that, while deciding all remaining class certification questions in one fell swoop would provide some benefits to judicial economy, these benefits should not be overstated. For example, the Court noted that if the rationale laid down in the Romig and Naparala orders would clearly dispose of any subsequent class certification motions, then it should not be particularly difficult for Defendant to brief, or for the Court to resolve, such motions. Id. at *6-7. Alternatively, if these questions were not easily resolved, that suggested the Court should not be denying class certification without a full briefing in each individual case. Id. at *7. The Court ruled that, to the extent such relief could be available, it should only be granted in rare circumstances and only after a Defendant had made an exceptionally strong showing that future motions for class certification would be futile. Id. Turning to the substance of Defendant's arguments, the Court held that there were many ways in which the remaining cases in the MDL might be distinguished from Romig and Naparala. The Court held that, because some potential arguments had not been fully explored, it would be imprudent – if not unconstitutional – to deny the remaining Plaintiffs the opportunity to advance such arguments. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to deny class certification.

Millman, et al. v. United Technologies Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 189638 (N.D. Ind. Nov. 16, 2017). Plaintiff brought an action on behalf of herself and all others similarly-situated against various Defendants, alleging that Defendants improperly disposed and dumped hazardous chemicals into the groundwater in Andrews, Indiana. Id. at *2. Defendant L.D. Williams made an offer of judgment, and filed a Rule 12(f) motion to strike Plaintiff's first amended complaint. At the same time, Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification. The Magistrate Judge subsequently granted Plaintiff's motion for leave to file a third amended complaint, which Plaintiff filed the same day. Accordingly, the Court found that Defendant's motion to strike Plaintiff's first amended complaint was moot, as the complaint has since been amended twice. Id. at *3. The Court explained that the law in the Seventh Circuit used to be that when a Plaintiff received an offer of judgment for full relief requested, the claim became moot, and mooting a would-be class representative could head off the specter of a larger case. Plaintiffs typically avoided this result by filing a "place-holder" motion for class certification, which the Court found was the case here. Id. The Court noted that the pendency of this place-holder motion would serve to protect a putative class from attempts to buy off the named Plaintiff. Id. The Court explained that the premature filing of a motion for class certification was no longer necessary to prevent buy-offs because Defendant's offer of compensation did not moot the litigation or otherwise end the Article III case or controversy. Id. at *4. The Court further reasoned that filing a motion that the parties were not yet ready to support or defend, and the Court was not yet able to rule upon, would not promote the efficient administration of justice. Id. The Court concluded that Plaintiff's motion was filed prior to the third amended complaint and the parties were still in the process of discovery and filing their respective answers. Id. The Court therefore denied Plaintiff's class certification as premature.

RJF Chiropractic Center, et al. v. BSN Medical Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 167949 (W.D.N.C. Oct. 11, 2017). Plaintiff alleged that Defendants sent an unsolicited advertisement in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Plaintiff asserted that Defendants' unsolicited faxes caused damages to recipients by invading their privacy and consuming paper, toner, and time. Id. at *1. Plaintiff filed a motion for certification of a class of all persons who received an advertisement from Defendants. Id. at *2-3. The Court denied the motion. Plaintiff stated that the proposed class contained more than 40 members who share a common questions of law and fact and that common questions derived from Defendants' "standardized conduct" of "faxing a single advertisement form to persons on a list generated by Defendants and/or a third-party, which did not obtain prior express invitation or permission to send Defendants' advertisement by fax." Id. at *3. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs "motion should be denied because it was premature, unsupported, and in violation of the Federal and Local Rules." Id. Defendants argued that Rule 23 has a higher standard requiring affirmative demonstrations by Plaintiff to prove that the prerequisites of class have been fulfilled. Furthermore, Defendants pointed to the Court's Local Rules, asserting that they do not allow "placeholder" motions such as the one Plaintiff filed. Id. at *4. The Court found that it need not begin to analyze whether Plaintiff's motion met the requirements for class certification, because its motion never intended to satisfy Rule 23. The Court held that Plaintiff's motion seemed to be a tactical motion aimed to prevent Defendants from offering individual named Plaintiffs relief while giving nothing to the class. The Court stated that by filing a vague placeholder motion to certify a class simultaneously with their complaint, Plaintiff attempted to defeat Defendants' strategy. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion on the grounds that it was an obsolete procedural tactic. Id. at *6-7. The Court reasoned that Plaintiff's complaint faced no threat of becoming moot if Defendants attempted to pick-off Plaintiff as long as Plaintiff did not accept the offer. Id. at *7. The Court determined that Rule 23 requires that a Plaintiff prove affirmatively that there are facts showing sufficiently numerous parties, common questions of law or fact, and all other requirements of the Rule. The Court opined that Plaintiff's placeholder motion was little more than another form of the complaint. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Robertson, et al. v. The Republic Of Nicaragua,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 98599 (N.D. Cal. June 26, 2017). Plaintiff, a Reverend, brought an action alleging that the Nicaraguan government committed numerous human rights abuses against the Miskitu people, a Native American ethnic group, over the last 200 years, including the unlawful seizure of Miskitu territory without just compensation. Plaintiff further alleged that the Nicaraguan government engaged in torture and genocide in violation of international law, and exterminated the Miskitu people and their inherent right to their natural resources, lands, waters, forests, farms, and livestock by selling their land to other foreign nations. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff alleged multiple violations of international and federal law, and brought claims for conversion, unjust enrichment, and accounting on behalf of herself and a class of eight named, unrepresented Plaintiffs. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court granted. As an initial matter, the Court dismissed all class claims, stating that Plaintiff could not maintain a purported class action, or bring claims on behalf of the other unrepresented Plaintiffs. Id. at *5. Defendant asserted that Plaintiff's complaint presented issues that were not justiciable. Id. at *7. The Court agreed with Defendant that the core of Plaintiff's complaint indeed was "not the redress of particular alleged wrongs inflicted upon individuals, but rather a request to adjudicate nearly 200 years of relations between the Miskitu people and various sovereign governments as well as the corresponding impacts on the territorial integrity of the present-day Republic of Nicaragua." Id. at *10. The Court stated that Plaintiff did not identify the legal basis on which it could make such a determination. Id. at *11. The Court held therefore, that deciding this case would therefore require it to "engage in decision-making on the basis of policy rather than law." Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff's claims posed a political question over which the Court did not have jurisdiction. The Court therefore granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Shabotinsky, et al. v. Deutsche Lufthana*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44052 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 27, 2017). Plaintiff, an airline passenger, brought a putative class action against Defendant pursuant to Article 19 of the Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules for International Carriage by Air ("Montreal Convention"). Id. at *2. The Montreal Convention provides that an airline carrier is liable for damage caused by delay in the carriage by air of passengers. Id. at *3. Count I of the complaint alleged that Plaintiff suffered damages because of his flight's delay when it was cancelled and he was rebooked on another flight departing four hours later than the original flight. Id. at *2. Plaintiff claimed that he incurred out-of-pocket expenses for food, refreshments, medications, and telecommunication services due to the delay and that he missed the event for which he was traveling. Id. Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint pursuant to Rules 8(a) and 12(b)(6) and moved for Rule 11 sanctions. The Court granted the motion to dismiss in part and denied it in part. The Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 8(a) for failure to provide "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Id. at *4. While the Court agreed with Defendant that the 35-page complaint could be more concise, it denied the motion because the Court found that it still provided Defendant with fair notice of Plaintiff's claims. Id. Defendant also moved to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) on the grounds that Plaintiff's claims were not covered by the Montreal Convention. Id. at *5. Defendant argued that count I of the complaint should be dismissed for failure to state a claim because the Convention does not cover matters occurring prior to departure and only applies after the passenger presents to travel. The Court rejected this argument. Id. The Court, however, dismissed counts II and III of the complaint, which alleged that Defendant failed to "meaningfully consider" Plaintiff's pre-suit settlement offers; the Court ruled that these claims were based upon a non-existent legal requirement. Id. at *13. Plaintiff's counsel proposed two classes. Id. at *14. The Court dismissed all class claims relating to the class that encompassed all of Defendant's international flights since 2014. Id. at *17. The Court found that the class would encompass disparate claims involving hundreds of flights and was not maintainable. Id. at *18. The Court, while skeptical of the viability of the other class, did not dismiss Plaintiff's claim as to that class. Id. at *22. The Court instructed Plaintiff's counsel to file a motion for class certification within 90 days. Id. Defendant's motion for Rule 11 sanctions was denied as the Court ruled that it could "not say, at this time" that Plaintiff's counsel lacked any good faith basis for asserting his claims. Id.

(lii) Public Employee Class Actions

AFSCME , et al. v. Charter County Of Wayne*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 12692 (6th Cir. July 14, 2017). Plaintiffs, the American Federation of State, County, & Municipal Employees Council 25 and its affiliated local unions ("AFSCME"), filed a class action alleging that their due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment had been violated by Defendants' unilateral changes to pension benefit levels and refusal to submit to arbitration. The District Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claims, finding that they failed to assert a protected property interest under the due process clause. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants violated rights under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, which provides that no state shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." Id. at *12. The District Court noted that due process has both procedural and substantive components. Plaintiff asserted violations of procedural due process, and the District Court explained that to establish a claim for violation of procedural due process, "a Plaintiff must show that: (i) it had a life, liberty, or property interest protected by the due process clause; (ii) it was deprived of this protected interest; and (iii) the state did not afford it adequate procedural rights." Id. Plaintiff asserted two property interests to serve as the basis of its due process allegations, including: (i) a guaranteed right to accrue pension benefits at a 2.5% level until 2020; and (ii) the right to submit issues to arbitration under Act 312. Id. at *13. The District Court rejected both of these arguments, finding that as pled in the complaint and its exhibits, these did not constitute property interests protected by the due process clause. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit agreed with the District Court that Plaintiffs only offered the arbitration process itself, provided for in the collective bargaining agreement ("CBA"), as a property interest to support their claims. Id. at *17-18. The Sixth Circuit further determined that Plaintiffs had not pointed to any case law finding that the arbitration process, or a similar grievance resolution process, can itself be a property interest protected by the due process clause. Rather, arbitration is a procedural process that may be due to a Plaintiff in order to protect some other property interest. Here, the Sixth Circuit found that Plaintiffs were not clear what underlying benefits or rights in the CBA they sought to arbitrate. Further, Plaintiffs did not allege or indicate what these grievances were, how they related to the claims in this case, or how they were constitutionally protected property interests. Id. at *19. The Sixth Circuit found that Plaintiffs' allegations of a right to arbitration were insufficient to establish a constitutionally protected property interest. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit ruled that because Plaintiffs had not shown that they had a protected property interest, their due process claim must fail. The Sixth Circuit therefore affirmed the District Court's ruling dismissing Plaintiffs' claims.

(liii) Sanctions, Contempt, And Unethical Misconduct In Class Action Litigation

Adams, et al. v. United Services Automobile Association,* 863 F.3d 1069 (8th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action in state court claiming that Defendant, an insurer, improperly applied depreciation when adjusting claims for structural losses under its homeowners insurance policies. After Defendant removed the action, the parties notified the District Court that they had reached agreement on almost all material terms and moved to stay the action pending mediation. Id. at 1073. Later, the parties filed a stipulation of dismissal because the terms of settlement included dismissal of the action and refiling in state court. Plaintiffs subsequently re-filed the action in state court, together with a motion for preliminary approval of class settlement. On August 26, 2015, the state court certified the settlement class and preliminarily approved the settlement agreement. Id. at 1074. On December 14, 2015, the District Court learned that the case had been re-filed in state court. The District Court entered a show cause order directing counsel of record to show cause as to how their filings in the District Court – including the removal, request for stay, and stipulation of dismissal – were not made for "any improper purpose." Id. In particular, the District Court identified the improper purpose of mid-litigation forum shopping, wasting resources by using the District Court's jurisdiction as leverage in negotiations for a settlement that would be pursued before a state court, and procedural "gamesmanship." Id. at 1075. After a hearing, the District Court imposed sanctions against the 16 attorneys of record for abuse of judicial process. The District Court held that filing the stipulation of dismissal was a violation of Rule 11. The Court also concluded that, although Rules 41 and 23 allow for dismissal of a putative class action by stipulation, Rule 11 still might be violated if that stipulation of dismissal has an improper purpose. Id. The attorneys argued that, because the Class Action Fairness Act ("CAFA) does not expressly prohibit dismissal of a putative class action from the District Court and refiling of that same action in state court for certification and settlement approval, their actions in dismissing the case for the purpose of refiling in state court for certification and settlement approval could not be improper. Id. at 1079. The District Court found the attorneys' argument unavailing because its concern was not on the procedural mechanism adopted for dismissal, but on the use of the procedural mechanism for an improper purpose. Id. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit reversed the District Court's ruling. The Eighth Circuit found that Rule 41(a)(1) does not require judicial approval or review as a prerequisite to dismissal; in fact, the dismissal is effective upon filing, with no action required by the District Court. Id. at 1080. The Eighth Circuit held that the reason for the dismissal is irrelevant under Rule 41(a)(1). Id. Therefore, the Eighth Circuit ruled that the District Court erred in concluding that the 16 attorneys engaged in sanctionable conduct by stipulating to a dismissal under Rule 41(a)(1) for the purpose of forum shopping and avoiding an adverse result. Id. at 1081. Further, the Eighth Circuit noted that: (i) when no class has been certified, voluntary dismissal of a putative class action is governed by Rule 41; and (ii) the CAFA did not affect the 2003 amendment to Rule 23. The Eighth Circuit, accordingly, concluded that a reasonable lawyer would have a colorable legal argument that a stipulation of voluntary dismissal under Rule 41(a)(1)(A)(ii) was permissible in a case in which the class had not yet been certified. Id. at 1083. The Eighth Circuit therefore determined that case law precedent necessitated a holding that counsel did not violate Rule 41(a)(1) in stipulating to the dismissal of the action and that counsel had at least a colorable legal argument that the District Court's approval was not needed under Rule 23(e) to voluntarily dismiss the claims of the putative class. As a result, the Eighth Circuit held that the District Court abused its discretion in finding that counsel acted with an improper purpose under Rule 11 and abused the judicial process by stipulating to the dismissal of the class action for the purpose of seeking a more favorable forum and avoiding an adverse decision.

Arkansas Teacher Retirement System, et al. v. State Street Bank, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16545 (D. Mass. Feb. 6, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a class action against Defendant alleging that it overcharged customers in certain foreign exchange transactions. The Court approved a $300 million settlement and applied the common fund method to determine the award of attorneys' fees. Id. at *4. The Court awarded $74,541,250 in attorneys' fees to Plaintiffs' counsel and $1,257,697.94 in expenses. Id. The award represented about 25% of the common fund. Id. The Court employed the lodestar method to test the reasonableness of the fees requested and the nine law firms representing Plaintiffs stated that their total lodestar was $41,323,895.75. After an article was published in the Boston Globe criticizing the award of attorneys' fees, the Court decided to exercise its authority to refer issues related to the amount of the attorneys' fees and the values of the services pursuant to a special master. The article reported that the staff attorneys involved in this case were typically paid between $25 to $40 an hour for document review. Id. at *8. However, in calculating the lodestar, Plaintiffs' counsel represented to the Court that the regular hourly billing rates for the staff attorneys were between $325 and $425. The Court questioned whether the hours reportedly worked by Plaintiffs' attorneys were actually worked. In a letter to the Court, Plaintiffs' counsel admitted inadvertent errors that resulted in duplicative billing of staff attorney time in the fee petitions. Id. at *7. Plaintiffs' counsel maintained that after the duplicative time was deducted from the $41.32 million combined lodestar, it resulted in a reduced combined lodestar of about $4 million. However, Plaintiffs' counsel asserted that a 2.00 multiplier, as opposed to a 1.8 multiplier that was used in the award, was still reasonable for cross-check purposes in common fund cases and that the fees awarded by the Court were justified by the $300 million settlement obtained and fees awarded in comparable cases. Id. at *19. The Court noted that the letter did not address whether the reported lodestar was based upon what Plaintiffs' counsel typically charged paying clients for the type of work done by the staff attorneys in this case or the reliability of the previous representations to the Court regarding the number of hours each attorney worked on this case. Id. at *8. The Court proposed to appoint a former Judge as a special master to investigate and prepare a report for the Court so that it could determine whether the original award of attorneys' fees was reasonable and whether there was any misconduct warranting sanctions. The Court ordered Plaintiffs' counsel to file a memorandum on whether they objected to the appointment of a special master and set a hearing to address the appointment.

Ayer, et al. v. Frontier Communication Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 146640 (C.D. Cal. Sept. 5, 2017). Plaintiff Ayer filed a putative class action against Defendant. The Court noted that although seeking to represent a putative class, Plaintiff violated Local Rule 23-3 by failing to file a motion for class certification within 90 days of serving Defendant, or seeking relief from that deadline. The Court therefore issued an order to show cause requiring briefing on why the class allegations should not be stricken from Plaintiff's operative complaint for failure to comply with Local Rule 23-3. Two weeks later, Plaintiff Taylor filed a new complaint against Defendant and shared over 50 identical, or substantially identical, paragraphs of allegations. Id. at *2. At the time Plaintiff Taylor filed, Plaintiffs' counsel represented that there were no related cases previously filed in the same district. Defendant filed a notice of related case, and the Court issued an order transferring Taylor's case to the Court's docket as a related case pursuant to Local Rule 83-1.3.3. Id. at *3. The Court ordered the parties to show cause as to whether Plaintiffs' counsel should be sanctioned for representing on the Taylor submission that no related cases had previously been filed. Id. at *4. Local Rule 83-1.3.1 provides that at the time a civil action (including a notice of removal or bankruptcy appeal) is filed, or as soon as known thereafter, the attorney shall file and serve on all parties who have appeared a notice of related cases, stating whether any action previously filed or currently pending and the action being filed appear: (i) to arise from the same or a closely related transaction, happening, or event; or (ii) to call for determination of the same or substantially related or similar questions of law and fact; or (iii) for other reasons would entail substantial duplication of labor if heard by different judges; or (iv) to involve the same patent, trademark, or copyright, and one of the factors identified above in a, b or c was present. Id. at *8. Comparing the two complaints, the Court opined that that they arose "from the same or a closely related transaction, happening or event;" "call for determination of the same or substantially related or similar questions of law and fact;" and "for other reasons would entail substantial duplication of labor if heard by different judges." Id. at *8-9. The Court held that Defendants identified the similarities between the two complaints, and any suggestion by Plaintiffs' counsel that the cases were not related was belied by the pleadings and proposed class definitions. Id. at *9. The Court found that because the claims in Ayer and Taylor were related within the meaning of Local Rule 83-1.3.1, Plaintiffs' counsel should have designated Taylor as related to Ayer. The Court noted that the omission appeared to be an effort to avoid having Taylor transferred to the Court, where there was a pending order to show cause why the class allegations should not be stricken from Plaintiff Ayer's complaint. Id. at *9. The Court stated that it did not condone efforts to evade the requirements of the Local Rules and General Order 14-03. The Court also determined that this was not the first time that Plaintiffs' counsel had violated Local Rule 83-1.3.1. Id. at *10. The Court had previously sanctioned Plaintiffs' counsel for misrepresenting that no related cases had been filed, despite Plaintiffs' counsel's direct involvement in a related class action. The Court imposed a $1,000 monetary sanction, but allowed Plaintiffs' counsel to satisfy the sanction by donating $750 in books or holiday presents to the children at local public schools within a five mile radius of the Courthouse. The Court found that the failure to identify Taylor as a related case by Plaintiffs' counsel was at a minimum grossly negligent, and at worst willful. Accordingly, the Court concluded that a $2,500 monetary sanction was appropriate for the repeated violations of the Local Rules by Plaintiffs' counsel.

Enslin, et al. v. The Coca-Cola Co.,* Case No. 14-CV-6476 (E.D. Pa. May 9, 2017). Plaintiff filed a Rule 37 motion for sanctions alleging that Defendants improperly withheld information from him during discovery in this class action. Plaintiff requested that Defendants produce copies of an employee handbook as it existed during Plaintiff's employment with the company from 2001 to 2007. Defendants produced the information from the 1990s and from 2008, but asserted that after a reasonable search it was unable to find the relevant policies. Id. at 1. Defendant submitted a certification from Defendants' counsel stating the details of the search for the documents. The Court concluded that Defendants had made a reasonable search for materials responsive to Plaintiff's request, and denied the motion for sanctions. Id. at 2. Plaintiff subsequently found the relevant policies available on-line through a database hosted by the "Internet Archive," a non-profit organization that has the goal of "archiving the web." Id. Plaintiff filed a motion for reconsideration, and the Court denied the motion. The Court found that the obligation to produce documents during discovery extends only to documents that are in a party's "possession, custody, or control." Id. at 3. The Court stated that the Internet Archive was not in Defendants' possession, custody, or control, and therefore they had no obligation to search a publicly available internet database to help locate documents to support Plaintiff's claims. Id. The Court further held that simply because some of the documents were preserved in a public database, that fact did not cast doubt on Defendants' assertion that they were unable to locate copies of the documents from files that actually were in their possession, custody, or control. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for sanctions.

Fish, et al. v. Kobach*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103369 (D. Kan. July 5, 2017). Defendant, the Kansas Secretary of State, filed a motion requesting the Court reconsider an order which directed Defendant to sit for a limited deposition, and to pay $1,000 as a sanction for making material misrepresentations to the Court. Id. at *2. Because the reconsideration request was based only on new arguments that could have been raised in Defendant's earlier briefs, the Court denied the motion. The Court noted that Local Rule 7.3(b) permits a party to file a motion to reconsider a non-dispositive order, but requires that any such motion "be based on: (i) an intervening change in controlling law; (ii) the availability of new evidence; or (iii) the need to correct clear error or prevent manifest injustice." Id. at *3. Defendant premised his motion on the third consideration, asserting that reconsideration was necessary "to prevent manifest injustice because the Court may have misapprehended the party's position with respect to the deposition matter, and because the Court may have misapprehended the facts with regard to the brief matter. Id. at *4. Defendant asserted, for the first time, that if he sat for a deposition he may be precluded from acting as counsel at trial under Rule 3.7(a) of the Kansas Rules of Professional Conduct, which states "a lawyer shall not act as advocate at a trial in which the lawyer is likely to be a necessary witness except where: (i) the testimony relates to an uncontested issue; (ii) the testimony relates to the nature and value of legal services rendered in the case; or (iii) disqualification of the lawyer would work substantial hardship on the client." Id. at *4-5. Defendant conceded he did not discuss this "specific ethical problem" in his response to Plaintiffs' motion for sanctions. Id. at *5. The Court explained that it would not grant reconsideration based on "new arguments or supporting facts that could have been presented originally." Id. Plaintiffs stated that they did not seek disqualification of Defendant as counsel at trial under Rule 3.7.9. Thus, the Court determined that Defendant failed to show that manifest injustice would result if reconsideration of the deposition order was not granted. Id. Defendant also argued the sanction imposed based on the Court's finding that Defendant made patently misleading representations to the Court was manifestly unjust because "there was no intent to deceive." Id. at *5-6. For the first time, Defendant asserted the misrepresentations made in his response to Plaintiffs' motion to compel were due to "last-minute editing to meet page limitations; which led to the deletion of language that more fully explained the point Defendant was making." Id. at *6. The Court rejected this explanation on the ground that this argument for reconsideration again suffered from the fact that Defendant could have, but did not, raise it earlier. The Court therefore declined to grant reconsideration based on this explanation. Id. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's request for reconsideration.

In Re Bank Of American Corp. Securities Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 140750 (E.D. Mo. July 26, 2017). A class representative filed a motion to compel former class counsel to transfer the case files in this matter to new class counsel, Frank Tomlinson. Id. at *7. Previously, the NationsBank classes were represented by Martin M. Green, Joe D. Jacobson, and Jonathan F. Andres of Green Jacobson, P.C. The firm was no longer in existence and the individual attorneys' representation of the class was terminated. Id. Prior to appointing Tomlinson as new class counsel, the Court found that Green, Jacobson, and Andres, individually, had an ethical and legal obligation to retain the files of their former clients. Id. at *7-8. The Court additionally ruled that upon the appointment of new class counsel, Green, Jacobson, and Andres would "have the duty to transfer the safeguarded files in their custody to the new class counsel." Id. at *8. Tomlinson stated that he never received complete case files. In response to the motion, Jacobson explained that "approximately 40 boxes" of case files were "now located at the former offices of Green Jacobson, P.C.," that the "paper files are not in [his] possession or control" and that he "has nothing left to produce." Id. The Court found that Jacobson's contention was belied by the fact that, as former counsel, he had an on-going duty to safeguard the case files. Id. The Court held that Jacobson offered no explanation why the files were not transferred to Tomlinson, nor did he offer any explanation as to why not having the physical possession of the files absolved him of the duty to see that they were promptly transferred. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted the class representative's motion to compel.

In Re Engle Cases,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 172678 (M.D. Fla. Oct. 18, 2017). Two attorneys filed approximately 3,700 complaints in the state and federal courts of Florida alleging personal injury, wrongful death, and loss-of-consortium claims related to cigarette smoking. Id. at *10. This followed the ruling in Engle v. Liggett Group, Inc., 945 So.2d 1246 (Fla. 2006), where the Florida Supreme Court decertified a class of Florida smokers after a jury verdict in their favor, and required that class members file their own individual lawsuits; however, the Florida Supreme Court determined that the original jury's findings should have preclusive effect in future individual lawsuits (so class members would not have to establish Defendants' negligence or that their cigarettes were defective or caused certain diseases). Id. at *16. The Engle class consisted of Florida citizens and residents and their survivors, who suffered or died from diseases and medical conditions caused by their addiction to cigarettes and ultimately ended in settlement of $100 million. Id. at *58. After the Court sent questionnaires directly to the named Plaintiffs over their attorneys' objections, it discovered that many Plaintiffs never authorized the attorneys to file suit and dozens did not meet the basic requirements for maintaining a claim (such as never having smoked). Over 500 personal injury claims were filed on behalf of Plaintiffs who had died well before counsel filed the complaints. The attorneys insisted to the Court that that they could certify in accordance with Rule 11 that the complaints were viable. The Court found that the attorneys' conduct was obstructive, deceptive, and caused the Court to appoint a Special Master and initiate Rule 11 sanctions proceedings. The Special Master found that the attorneys' conduct was willful and reckless and burdened the Court for years, and cost the Court and Defendants significant additional resources. The Court stopped short of requiring a disgorgement of all fees that attorneys received, as the Special Master recommended, and imposed a lesser monetary sanction that it found served as an adequate deterrent, and which reflected the seriousness of the attorneys' behavior. The Court opined that on "the rare occasion when attorneys undermine" the judicial process, "there must be consequences [and] this is one of those rare occasions." Id. at *8. As a result, the Court sanctioned both attorneys' firms $9,164,404.12 and issued a public reprimand. The Court acknowledged that the penalty was significant and possibly unprecedented, but characterized the actions of the firms and their respective principals, equally unprecedented. The Court referred the matters to the Florida State Bar for an investigation into whether the attorneys violated any other provisions of the Florida Rules of Professional Conduct by filing and maintaining frivolous and factually baseless lawsuits and making false statements of fact or law to the Court.

Lawson, et al. v. Grubhub, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 137165 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 25, 2017). Defendant filed a motion for sanctions alleging that Plaintiff publicly filed documents designated "confidential" pursuant to the parties' stipulated protection order. Id. at *1. The Court granted the motion, finding that counsel knew the documents were designated confidential but nonetheless filed them publicly to make the deadline for filing Plaintiff's opposition to Defendant's motion for summary judgement. Id. The parties stipulated protective order protected material designated by the parties as "Confidential" or "Attorney's Eyes Only." Id. at *2. Plaintiff's counsel filed Plaintiff's opposition to Defendant's motion for summary judgment without redaction or sealing confidential materials referenced within the pleading, even though it contained seven exhibits that Defendant produced that it had designated as "Confidential." Id. Plaintiff's counsel asserted that he filed the un-redacted documents because he began experiencing several computer issues and was unable to file the documents with redactions. Id. The Court found that Plaintiff's counsel willfully violated the stipulated protective order. The Court held that Plaintiff's counsel was more concerned with making the filing deadline than complying with the order. Id. at *3. The Court determined that there was no excuse for the conduct of Plaintiff's counsel and therefore sanctions were warranted. The Court found it appropriate for Plaintiff to be held responsible for the fees that Defendant incurred in fixing the error of Plaintiff's counsel, including fees in bringing the motion for sanctions. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for sanctions.

O'Connor, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 141095 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 31, 2017). Plaintiffs brought two class actions alleging that Defendant misclassified its drivers as independent contractors and thereby failed to pay them business expenses as required by § 2802 of the California Labor Code and failed to remit to drivers the full gratuity paid by customers in violation of § 351 of the California Labor Code. Defendant moved for sanctions against class counsel based on an email solicitation to class members. Defendant argued that the email solicitation reflected an improper use of information covered by the protective order in this matter and included misleading statements in violation of the California Rules of Professional Conduct. The protective order covered "all documents or information . . . which, in good faith, [the] designating Party . . . believes could place it at a competitive disadvantage if disclosed to anyone other than the receiving Party's counsel of record in this litigation because such documents or information contain commercially sensitive information, proprietary information, or trade secrets, the disclosure of which is likely to cause irreparable harm or significant injury to the competitive position of the designating Party." Id. at *6. Class counsel subsequently sent an email to 240,000 class members indicating that they were part of the on-going litigation, and that Defendant was fighting to decertify the class and compel arbitration. Class counsel described how to continue to pursue individual claims with their law firm in the event that the Court enforced Defendant's arbitration clause or decertified the class. Id. at *10-12. The Court found that the protective order explicitly stated that designated material may only be used "for purposes that are specifically related to the conduct of this litigation." Id. at *18. The Court stated that, on its face, class counsel's email did not comply with this limitation. The Court noted that had class counsel simply advised class members about the pending appeal and its potential impact on this case and on their rights, class counsel would have been well within the scope of the protective order. However, the Court determined that class counsel attempted to solicit class members as clients in separate arbitration proceedings that would be initiated outside of this litigation. Id. at *19. Accordingly, the Court found that class counsel violated the protective order by using the protected class list to solicit retainer agreements for individual arbitration proceedings outside of this litigation (in the event the class was decertified). Id. at *20. Further, the Court concluded that the email was misleading, as it stated a reasonable reader could infer that "only drivers who sign up" with class counsel would recover any money. Id. at *22. Additionally, the Court noted that contrary to what class counsel's email suggested, class members were not obligated to "sign up now" to "stay a part of our case." Id. at *23. Defendant requested that class counsel be disqualified, and the Court stated that although it would not disqualify class counsel at this time, it would not allow the violation to go uncorrected. The Court held that the sanction most appropriate to these circumstances is that which most directly addresses the harm the violation caused\. Accordingly, the Court directed class counsel to issue corrective notice to the class, pending approval by the Court.

Pickles, et al. v. Kate Spade & Co.,* Case No. 15-CV-5329 (N.D. Cal. May 2, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant's representations in outlet stores deceived reasonable consumers into believing they were purchasing merchandise at a significant savings, when in fact they were receiving inferior products at an inflated price. During discovery, Plaintiffs' counsel failed to take the requisite Rule 30(b)(6) deposition necessary for filing a motion for class certification by the Court's deadline. The Court ordered Plaintiffs' counsel to show cause as to why they did not conduct the necessary deposition. Plaintiffs' counsel asserted that they did not realize the certification filing date was impending. At the hearing on Plaintiffs' response to the Court's order to show cause, the Court found Plaintiffs' counsel failed to prosecute the case diligently. The Court ordered Plaintiffs' counsel to pay: (i) defense counsels' fees and costs incurred in opposing Plaintiff's ex parte motion, including the time and expense incurred in traveling to and attending the order to show cause hearing; and (ii) $500 to the Court.

Robinson, et al. v. The Chef's Warehouse,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93339 (N.D. Cal. June 16, 2017). In this class action in which Plaintiffs alleged wage & hour violations, Defendant filed a motion for sanctions pursuant to Rule 30(d)(2) against Plaintiffs' counsel, Michael Hoffman ("Hoffman"), for his conduct at the deposition of the named Plaintiff Sharon Robinson. Id. at *3. The Court imposed monetary sanctions on Hoffman, but declined to preclude him from taking further depositions in the case based upon his co-counsel's representations that Hoffman was the only counsel at his firm capable of taking deposition. Id. at *4. The Court ordered that all depositions conducted or defended by Hoffman take place at the Oakland Courthouse where courthouse security would be present. Id. The day after the hearing, and after a media source published an article about the Court's order, defense counsel received a threatening anonymous voice-mail. Id. Defendant brought a motion to reconsider the Court's decision to permit Hoffman to take and defend depositions in the matter. Id. at *5. At the hearing, Defendant introduced newly discovered evidence including: (i) the threatening voice-mail left for defense counsel; (ii) evidence of Hoffman's prior misconduct, including incidents of sexual battery; and (iii) evidence that Hoffman's co-counsel were competent to take and defend depositions in this matter. Id. at *7. The Court granted Defendant's motion and precluded Hoffman from taking, defending, or being present at any depositions in this lawsuit. Id. at *32. The Court also referred Hoffman to the State Bar of California's Committee on Professional Responsibility and Conduct and ordered Hoffman to pay $9,487.50 in sanctions to Defendant. Id.

Rockman Co. (USA), Inc., et al. v. Nong Shim Co*., 229 F. Supp. 3d 1109 (N.D. Cal. 2017). In this class action, Plaintiffs filed a motion for sanctions against Defendants Nongshim and Ottogi for the alleged spoliation of evidence following the inception of an investigation in June 2008 by the Korean Fair Trade Commission ("KFTC") into allegations of price-fixing in the Korean Ramen Noodle market. Defendants opposed the motion, arguing that an obligation to preserve documents relevant to the antitrust claims arose only after the inception of the litigation in 2013, and that, if any documents were destroyed, that destruction occurred without any intent on the part of Defendants to deny Plaintiffs access to them in litigation. Id. at 1111. The Court determined that, although Nongshim and Ottogi may have had a duty not to interfere with or impede the KFTC's investigation, assuming the scope of that investigation was known by Defendants and that investigation imposed an affirmative duty to preserve evidence relevant to that investigation (matters that were very much in dispute), that duty ran to the KFTC and did not translate into a duty to preserve evidence that could be enforced through an award of sanctions by a Court in the United States. Id. at 1112. The KFTC conducted an on-site investigation at Nongshim. Plaintiffs alleged that Nongshim had adequate notice that price-fixing was the focus of the KFTC investigation in June 2008 and that Nongshim, therefore, was on notice of the government's investigation into price collusion in the ramen market. Id. at 1113. Plaintiffs asserted that the document preservation policy in place at Nongshim in June 2008 required retention of KFTC-related documents for 10 years, but Defendants did not begin preserving documents until 2013. Plaintiffs sought a range of sanctions against Nongshim and Ottogi, including: (i) terminating sanctions (striking the answers of Defendants and entering default); or (ii) monetary sanctions to compensate Plaintiffs for costs that Plaintiffs incurred because of the alleged spoliation. Id. at 1122. The Court found that the main issue was whether a duty to preserve information enforceable by Plaintiffs arose when the KFTC started its investigation in Korea. Defendants did not dispute that documents relevant to the antitrust theories asserted by Plaintiffs were destroyed in 2008. Thereafter, however, Defendants argued they were under no obligation to preserve those documents until the first lawsuit was filed in the United States. Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs cited no authority that would impose a duty of preservation on Defendants enforceable by a Court in the United States when a foreign government agency investigates alleged price collusion in its own domestic market and no complaints or lawsuits have been filed in the United States. Id. at 1123. Further, Plaintiffs failed to identify any authority that would allow Plaintiffs to move for sanctions in lawsuits pending in the United States based on Defendants' alleged violation of duties under Korean law to preserve documents in light of a government investigation in Korea. The Court concluded that there was no litigation initiated by the government, and no evidence of complaints from potential litigants in the United States regarding the eventually challenged conduct. Id. at 1125. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for sanctions.

Royal Park Investments, et al. v. U.S. Bank N.A*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173427 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 19, 2017). In this class action, Defendant moved pursuant to Rule 37(b) to preclude Plaintiff from introducing proof of damages as a sanction for failing to comply with a discovery order. Defendant also sought an order precluding Plaintiff from serving as a class representative. Defendant argued that Plaintiff's claims should be dismissed because it failed to produce documents (the "assignor documents") within the possession of entities (the "assignors") from which Plaintiff had taken assignment of the claims it asserts arising out of Defendant's obligations as trustee in connection with trust certificates (the "certificates") consisting of residential mortgage backed securities that the assignors transferred to Plaintiff. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiff opposed the motion and sought an award of the attorneys' fees incurred in connection with litigating this dispute. The Court denied both motions. The Court noted that the issue was whether Plaintiff failed to produce information so necessary that Defendant had suffered prejudice warranting preclusion. Id. at *3. The Court found that the information gap from the missing documents was not enough to provide a basis for sanctions. The Court stated that it was not apparent how the data for these certificates differed from that available for the others which, according to Defendant's expert Dr. James, was also inconsistent, but which was adequate for him to conduct an analysis. Id. at *12-13. The Court found that Plaintiff did appear to have produced final impairment figures through the end of 2008. Further, after 2009, according to the terms of the transfer to Plaintiff, the Court stated that any change in value would be to the benefit or detriment of Plaintiff. Id. at *13. Defendant also contended that without additional valuation documents, it could not ascertain the cause for the loss of value of the certificates. The Court held that although Defendant demonstrated a reasonable basis for seeking information about when the certificates lost value, it failed to explain how information exclusively in the possession of Plaintiff or the assignors would shed light on why any such losses occurred. Id. at *14. Defendant also contended that many of the documents that Plaintiff produced could not be authenticated. The Court opined that the solution for the problem rested with the Court's application of evidentiary principles at trial, not with the imposition of a preclusion order. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for sanctions. The Court also denied Defendant's motion preclude Plaintiff from serving as class representative, and found that even if there were a basis for such relief, it would be inappropriate grant it while a motion for class certification was pending before the Court. Id. The Court also denied Plaintiff's request for attorneys' fees on the basis that the production of the assignor documents was incomplete and while there was not a sufficient basis for sanctions, Plaintiff must share the responsibility for the costs generated.

Toney, et al. v. Quality Resources, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103293 (N.D. Ill. July 5, 2017). Plaintiffs filed an action alleging that Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act. Defendant Cheryl Mercuris ("Mercuris") filed a motion for sanctions against Plaintiff, which the Court denied. Mercuris contended that Plaintiff's allegations were not warranted by existing law and lacked evidentiary support, and therefore sanctions were appropriate. Id. at *2. The Court found that Mercuris had the prospect of personal liability based on her conduct, as the sole stockholder, chief executive officer, and controller of the activities of Defendant. The Court noted that the key to evaluating a Plaintiff's pleading was whether it stated a "claim for relief" rather than the state law concept of a "cause of action" that necessitated the identification of a theory of recovery. Id. at *4. The Court explained that it was not a matter of whether Plaintiff identified a right or wrong theory of recovery, but whether Plaintiff advanced a claim that met the "plausibility" requirement. Id. at *4-5. The Court stated that Plaintiff's allegations clearly met that standard. Mercuris asserted that that the Florida statutes relied on by Plaintiff applied only to dissolved corporations, while Defendant had not been dissolved. The Court determined that although Mercuris was correct, Defendant was stripped of all assets when Mercuris shut it down and terminated all of its employees without notice. Id. at *5. The Court therefore opined that the challenged counts could stay in place until it is determined whether or not the Florida case law authorities have recognized de facto corporate dissolutions in that context. Id. The Court held that Plaintiff's claim for relief based on the substantive allegations in the complaint readily qualified in terms of plausibility and therefore could result in the imposition of individual liability on the part of Mercuris. Accordingly, the Court denied the motion for sanctions.

Wick, et al. v. Twilio Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 25724 (W.D. Wash. Feb. 23, 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") and other Washington statutes by employing certain marketing practices. Plaintiff saw an advertisement for a free sample of a nutritional supplement. Plaintiff followed the link to the website of the supplier and entered his contact information but then discovered no free samples remained. Id. at *2. Plaintiff subsequently received a phone call and a text message encouraging him to divulge his credit card information and complete a transaction. The Court dismissed the complaint and found that Plaintiff had consented to receive calls and messages related to customer service. Id. The Court reasoned that knowingly giving one's phone number to another provided express consent for that party to call with messages that do not amount to advertisement or telemarketing. Id. at *3. Plaintiff filed a second amended complaint two weeks after the dismissal. Defendant moved for sanctions under Rule 11 and argued that the complaint was frivolous because it added no relevant facts to the dismissed complaint and advanced the same legal theory. Plaintiff's response to Defendant's motion included a request for attorneys' fees should he prevail on the Rule 11 motion. Plaintiff asserted that no clear authority foreclosed his new complaint and that the changes reflected in the second amended complaint were well-grounded in existing law, or the good faith extension of the law. Id. at *4. The Court determined that Plaintiff's second amended complaint made allegations that differed in material ways from the dismissed complaint. For instance, the Court noted that Plaintiff added allegations that the call and text message were intended to encourage Plaintiff to purchase a product. Plaintiff also alleged that the free sample was part of an auto-ship program by which the recipient's credit card is authorized to be charged a fee every month until cancelled by the recipient. Id. The Court found that regardless of whether the new facts would change the result of a motion to dismiss, it could not conclude the second amended complaint was legally or factually unsupportable. Id. at *5. Defendant argued that sanctions were appropriate because the additional facts and information in the amended complaint were irrelevant and the claims were materially identical to those in the other complaints. However, the Court noted that Plaintiff offered two declarations by academic figures in support of the opposition to sanctions. The Court was therefore satisfied that Plaintiff's amended complaint went through a sufficiently rigorous inquiry to avoid Rule 11 sanctions. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for sanctions. Plaintiff sought attorneys' fees as the prevailing party in the event the Court denied the motion. Id. at *7. The Court held that in light of the limited use of Rule 11, the availability of other methods for dismissing defective claims, and the new factual material alleged in the amended complaint, it would hold Plaintiff's request for attorneys' fees in abeyance pending the outcome of a motion to dismiss. Id. at *7-8.

Zagami, et al. v. Cellceutix Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 466682 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 29, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of shareholders, filed a class action alleging securities fraud. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court granted. Shortly thereafter Defendant moved for mandatory review under the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act ("PSLRA"), and sought a finding that the lawsuit amounted to abusive litigation and requested that the Court impose sanctions pursuant to Rule 11. The Court denied Defendants' motion for sanctions. Id. at *30. A short seller of Defendant's stock posted an article entitled the "Mako Research Report" on the internet that contended that Defendant was a sham company and purported to identify and explain the falsity of Defendant' representations and omissions of material fact in Defendant's public statements about its proposed drug products. Id. at *3. A few hours after the "Mako Research Report" was posted, Plaintiffs' counsel issued an "Equity Alert" news release, which stated that the named Plaintiff in this action authorized the filing of a securities class action complaint that day, but no complaint was in fact filed that day. Plaintiffs' counsel ultimately filed a class action complaint against Defendant that alleged violations of the Securities Exchange Act and relied heavily on the "Mako Research Report." The Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, and ruled that Defendant's statements in its public disclosures were appropriate and correct. With respect to Defendant's subsequent motion for sanctions, the Court denied the motion on the grounds that Plaintiffs' claims did not amount to abusive litigation. The Court ruled that the conduct of Plaintiffs' counsel was not unreasonable in bringing the claims and that the solicitation of purchasers of Defendant's securities, standing alone, did not render the litigation abusive. Id. at *38. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motions for sanctions.

(liv) Service Awards And Costs In Class Actions

Bailes, et al. v. Lineage Logistics, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 86180 (D. Kan. June 6, 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action asserting that Defendant violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). The parties

settled the matter for a total of $149,205, including: (i) attorneys' fees and costs of $49,237; (ii) settlement administrator costs of $16,500; (iii) a $5,000 incentive award for the named Plaintiff; and (iv) $78,468 to be divided equally among the 2,931 class members. Id. at *2. The parties filed a joint motion for preliminary settlement approval. The Court denied the motion, finding that Plaintiff provided insufficient information for approval. The Court found two characteristics of Plaintiff's proposed incentive award presented substantial concerns about the overall fairness of the proposed settlement. Id. at *7. The Court determined that under the proposed settlement, Plaintiff's total recovery was about 185 times greater than the recovery of the class members, represented 3.35% of the total cost of the settlement, and almost 6% of the $83,568 to be paid to Plaintiff and the class members. Id. The Court found that an incentive award of this dimension threatened the overall fairness of the proposed settlement. The Court noted that it apprised counsel of its concern at a fairness hearing. Plaintiff's counsel responded by representing that Plaintiff had served as a closely involved class representative, calling about once every other week to check on the case's progress. Id. at *8. However, the Court found that the evidence submitted did not persuade it that Plaintiff should receive nearly 6% of the total settlement devoted to class recovery. Id. at *9. The Court further stated that a settlement agreement that requires it to award Plaintiff a $5,000 incentive award could not be a fair, reasonable, and adequate settlement. Id. at *10. The Court determined that it does not mean it would approve no incentive award, but not one of the magnitude requested. The Court held that if the parties decided to reformulate the proposed settlement to make any incentive award discretionary, it would consider granting an award that comported with applicable case law precedent. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' motion for preliminary settlement approval.

Gundrum, et al. v. Cleveland Integrity Services,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 130255 (N.D. Okla. Aug. 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of pipeline inspectors, filed a collective action alleging that Defendant violated the FLSA by failing to pay overtime compensation for hours worked over 40 in a workweek. The parties ultimately settled the matter and filed a motion for preliminary settlement approval. The Court granted the motion and preliminarily approved the settlement. The settlement agreement provided for $4.5 million to be paid by Defendant. Id. at *4. Additionally, Defendant agreed to pay: (i) service awards of $20,000 to each of the two named Plaintiffs; (ii) service awards of $2,500 to each of five individuals who had consented in writing to participate as Plaintiffs in this case ("Opt-In Plaintiffs"); (iii) attorneys' fees of up to one-third of the settlement amount; (iv) reimbursement of costs to class counsel, anticipated not to exceed $25,000; (v) payment for the settlement administrator's services; and (vi) Defendant's share of payroll taxes applicable to any amount of the funds attributable to wages. Id. In analyzing the motion for settlement approval, the Court found that a bona fide dispute existed. Id. at *8. The Court stated that Plaintiffs contended that Defendant's practice of paying its pipeline inspectors a day rate without paying overtime compensation violated the FLSA and contended they have strong arguments for conditional certification of a collective action and Rule 23 class action. Defendant argued that its compensation practices complied with the FLSA and asserted several defenses that it contended would partially or entirely defeat Plaintiffs' claims. The Court held that the parties' positions on these issues indicate that a bona fide dispute existed between the parties, each of which faced substantial risk if the litigation were to proceed. Id. at *9. The Court also found that the settlement agreement provided substantial benefits to class members and suggested a reasonable compromise was made given the risks to both sides. Id. at *10. The negotiation efforts and the experience of Plaintiffs' counsel also led the Court to determine that the settlement agreement was fair and adequate. Id. at *11. The Court noted that the service awards of $20,000 each to be paid to named Plaintiffs were substantially higher than service awards in many other FLSA settlements. Id. However, the Court found that Plaintiffs agreed to grant broader general releases to Defendant in addition to releasing their claims under the FLSA. Plaintiffs' motion detailed the efforts Plaintiffs made to assist counsel in the litigation and the personal risk incurred as to their employment prospects by participating as representatives in this case. Id. Plaintiffs also represented that they have been unable to find work in the pipeline inspection industry, in which Plaintiffs believed hiring was largely based on word of mouth and reputation. Id. at *11-12. Therefore, the Court held that Plaintiffs demonstrated that they undertook personal risks by representing the proposed collective action members in this case. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court determined that the service awards appeared to fall within reasonable bounds. The Court also opined that the proposed attorneys' fees in the settlement agreement satisfied the requirements for preliminary approval. Accordingly, the Court found that the settlement agreement was fair, reasonable, and adequate, and granted preliminary approval.

Melito, et al. v. American Eagle Outfitters, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 146343 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 11, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action alleging that Defendants violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). The parties ultimately settled the matter and filed a motion for preliminary settlement approval. The Court conditionally certified a settlement class, preliminarily approved the class action settlement, approved the notice plan, and scheduled a final approval hearing. The Court subsequently granted final settlement approval. The proposed settlement consisted of a $14.5 million common fund for: (i) settlement class members' claims; (ii) settlement administration expenses of approximately $665,580.46; (iii) incentive awards to the four class representatives in the amount of $10,000 each; (iv) attorneys' fees in the amount of $4,832,850 (which approximated 33% of the settlement fund); and (v) costs in the amount of $110,732.71. Id. at *4-5. The Court found that the settlement was fair and reasonable. However, the Court declined to grant $10,000 service awards to the four class representatives. Plaintiffs argued that the award of $10,000 to each of the four class representatives was warranted on the basis that the representatives "thoroughly responded to multiple sets of written discovery and sat for depositions, requiring them to set aside work and personal obligations (and in some cases requiring them to travel out-of-state)." Id. at *42. Plaintiffs also asserted that the representatives "were willing and able to prosecute this case by assisting with the drafting of the complaints, providing information regarding their interactions with AEO, responding to written discovery, sitting for depositions, and testifying at trial." Id. at *43. The Court noted that although other final approval orders may have awarded $10,000 in service awards to class representatives, an award of $10,000 to each representative in this case would be excessive, particularly in light of the fact that the settlement resulted in a pay-out of only approximately $232 to each class member. Id. To the extent that the class representatives incurred any expenses in furtherance of this litigation, the Court stated that is would not be opposed to reimbursing those expenses. However, the Court found that Plaintiffs had not provided any documentation of the class representatives' expenses. In addition, Plaintiffs had neither provided documentation of the time or effort that each representative expended in furtherance of this case nor identified any personal risks or burdens incurred by the representatives. Id. Plaintiffs offered that each class representative searched for and produced documents, assisted in the preparation of interrogatory responses concerning their claims, and provided seven to eight hours of deposition testimony. Id. at *44. Based on these facts, the Court concluded that an incentive award of $2,500 to each of the class representatives – which represented a recovery of more than 10 times what class members received and reflected ample compensation for the limited time they invested – was fair and reasonable. Id. The Court also granted attorneys' fees of 30% of the settlement amount and awarded costs. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for final settlement approval with reductions to the requested service awards.

(lv) Settlement Administration Issues In Class Actions

Claimant Id. 100212278, et al. v. BP Exploration & Products, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 2380 (5th Cir. Feb. 9, 2017). In this case, Plaintiff challenged Defendant's obligations under the Deepwater Horizon economic and property damages settlement agreement. Plaintiff, an automotive parts provider, sought to obtain compensation under the settlement agreement as a tourism business. The Court Supervised Settlement Program ("CSSP") and the Appeal Panel determined that Plaintiff's stores were not a tourism businesses and denied the claims for failure to satisfy the causation requirement. Exhibit 2 to the parties' settlement agreement listed 41 North American Industry Classification System codes ("NAICS codes") identifying various categories of businesses that qualified as tourism businesses. Id. at *3. Plaintiff claimed that it fell under NAICS code 452990 ("All Other General Merchandise Stores"), which was listed in Exhibit 2. Id. The CSSP determined that Plaintiff's stores were not tourism businesses and that the appropriate NAICS code for each of the stores was 441310 (Automotive Parts and Accessories Stores), a code not listed in Exhibit 2. Id. at *4. The Appeal Panel affirmed the CSSP's determination. The Appeal Panel noted that the store in question advertised itself as an auto-parts store and that it did not fit the NAICS definition of "All Other General Merchandise Stores" because its auto parts line of products predominated over other product lines. Id. at *4-5. Plaintiff appealed the decision of the Appeal Panel to the District Court, which denied discretionary review. Plaintiff then appealed to the Fifth Circuit. Plaintiff asserted that it was engaged in "accommodating or catering to the needs or wants of persons traveling to, or staying in, places outside their home community." Id. at *7. Plaintiff relied on two pieces of evidence. First, Plaintiff's website displayed a list of automotive products that drivers should consider replacing before long trips. Second, Plaintiff's stores carried storage and cargo equipment primarily used by vacationers. Defendant contended that the Appeal Panel correctly determined there was insufficient evidence to show that any of the specific stores in question qualified as a tourism business. Id. at *8. The Fifth Circuit stated that none of Plaintiff's stores offered evidence regarding its actual sales of cargo equipment or sales of products on the website's list and none offered evidence of sales to non-local customers as contemplated by the settlement agreement. The Appeal Panel had expressly considered the possibility that although the stores were not located in tourist areas, they might incidentally serve some tourists while pursuing their primary business as sellers of automotive parts and accessories. Notwithstanding this possibility, it determined that the totality of the circumstances did not show the stores to be tourism businesses. The Fifth Circuit found that Plaintiff failed to demonstrated that the Appeal Panel's conclusion was an abuse of discretion. The Fifth Circuit also explained that Plaintiff did not dispute that its stores advertised themselves as auto-parts stores. Moreover, the Fifth Circuit concluded that the settlement agreement directed that "the NAICS code shown on an Entity Claimant's 2010 tax return" should be considered in determining the appropriate NAICS code, and Plaintiff used code 441310 on its 2010 tax return. Id. at *9. The Fifth Circuit ruled that Plaintiff itself stated on appeal that it was an automotive parts provider. Thus, the Fifth Circuit determined that it was not an abuse of discretion to classify the stores under NAICS code 441310 as automotive parts and accessories stores. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit affirmed the Appeal Panel's decision that Plaintiff was not a tourist business, and not entitled to any settlement proceeds from the class action settlement.

In Re Deepwater Horizon Lake Eugenie Land & Development*, 858 F.3d 298 (5th Cir. 2017). Following a settlement of class actions that provided a mechanism for presenting and processing claims for business losses caused by the April 2010 Deepwater Horizon disaster in the Gulf of Mexico, the Fifth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling that the settlement agreement did not require those submitting claims for certain business losses to provide evidence of causation. The District Court approved a policy adopted by the claims administrator ("Policy 495") to administer the claims. Policy 495 consisted of five methodologies pursuant to which the claims administrator is to calculate claimant compensation, including one annual variable margin methodology ("AVMM") and four industry-specific methodologies ("ISMs"). Class counsel challenged all five. The Fifth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision as to the AVMM and reversed as to the ISMs. The settlement agreement reimbursed claimants for economic losses related to the BP oil spill. The settlement agreement grants each claimant the right to choose his or her compensation period, so long as it consists of three or more consecutive months between May and December 2010. The compensation period constituted the post-spill period, which was then subtracted from the same pre-spill period, in order to deduce the damages owed. The AVMM required the claims administrator to match all unmatched profit and loss statements. This means that prior to calculating damages, the claims administrator must ensure that costs are registered in the same month as corresponding revenue, regardless of when those costs were incurred. The Fifth Circuit found that class counsel had not presented evidence sufficient to find that the District Court's approval of the AVMM constituted clear error. Id. at 302. The Fifth Circuit stated that settlement agreement granted each claimant the right to choose his or her compensation period, and if claims administrator was permitted to remove revenue from the compensation period, and spread it throughout the non-compensation months, the claimant's choice no longer mattered. Id. at 303. The Fifth Circuit determined that was not the agreement that the parties entered into and it declined to re-write the Settlement agreement under the guise of contractual interpretation. Id. at 304. However, the Fifth Circuit found that ISMs infringe upon the right of claimants to choose their compensation period The Fifth Circuit explained that the ISMs required the claims administrator to move or otherwise reallocate revenue in violation of the settlement agreement. Id. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit affirmed in part and reversed in part the District Court's decision and remanded for further proceedings.

Van, et al. v. Ford Motor Co.,* Case No. 14-CV-8708 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 18, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendant subjected them to sexual harassment, gender, and race discrimination in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. During the pendency of the case, the EEOC began investigating discrimination and harassment charges against Defendant. The EEOC and Defendant then participated in a conciliation and entered into a conciliation agreement. Defendant subsequently filed a motion to deny class certification, arguing that the conciliation agreement mooted much of the relief that Plaintiffs sought. Id. at 2. Plaintiffs filed an emergency motion to stay the publication of the notices from the conciliation agreement between the EEOC and Defendant. The Court noted that the issuance of a stay requires fulfillment of the same requirements as a preliminary injunction, and therefore Plaintiffs must show that: (i) they have some likelihood of success on the merits; (ii) there is no adequate remedy at law; and (iii) they will suffer irreparable harm if they Court denies the request. Id. The Court acknowledged the seriousness of the allegations at issues, but stated that Plaintiffs failed to show that they met the requirements for injunctive relief. Id. at 2-3. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion.

(lvi) Settlement Approval Issues In Class Actions

Caligiuri, et al. v. Symantec Corp.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 7538 (8th Cir. April 28, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought a class action alleging that Defendant failed to disclose that consumers could use various free alternatives to re-download their computer software. The parties reached a settlement and filed a motion for preliminary settlement approval. The District Court approved the motion. Plaintiffs appealed the District Court's order, and on appeal, the Eighth Circuit upheld the decision of the District Court. The settlement agreement provided that Defendant would pay $60 million into a total settlement fund. Id. at *4. Class members who submitted an approved claim form would receive reimbursement from the net settlement fund, which consisted of the total settlement fund after subtracting attorneys' fees and expenses, administrative costs, and any amount of service awards per named Plaintiff. Id. at *4-5. If any funds remained after distribution to approved claimants, the remaining funds would be distributed cy pres to the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a non-profit digital rights group. Id. at *5. The District Court preliminarily approved the settlement and appointed a settlement administrator. In addition, class counsel filed a motion for attorneys' fees, expenses, and service awards. Id. at *6. Class counsel requested an award of attorneys' fees of one-third of the total settlement fund, or $20 million, as well as reimbursement for $738,605.19 in litigation expenses. Id. at *7. Class counsels' motion also requested service awards of $10,000 to each of the two named Plaintiffs. Two objectors contended that the District Court could not have determined the fairness, reasonableness, and adequacy of the settlement without knowing the exact settlement amounts. The Eighth Circuit stated that even though exact amounts were not submitted to the District Court, estimates were submitted, and as such, the District Court was entitled to rely on the estimates provided by the settlement administrator when deciding whether to approve the settlement, and there was no indication that the District Court failed to consider that information. Id. at *9. Further, the Eighth Circuit found that there was no requirement for the District Court to know the final amount received by the class before approving a settlement. Id. The Eighth Circuit noted that, according to class counsel, each approved claimant would receive approximately $49.82 per purchase, an amount still well in excess of what each claimant paid. Id. at *11. The objectors also argued that the District Court abused its discretion by calculating attorneys' fees based on the total settlement fund because that fund included administrative costs, which did not constitute a benefit to the class. Id. at *11-12. The objectors also contended that the total amount of the fee award was unreasonable. The Eighth Circuit disagreed and stated that the District Court did not err in concluding that the circumstances of this case justified a large award. The Eighth Circuit also found that the District Court verified the reasonableness of the award by cross-checking it against the lodestar method and found that the fees were well within the range of reasonableness. Id. at *14. The objectors also argued that the District Court abused its discretion by failing to ensure that the cy pres recipient would utilize any remaining funds to benefit the class. The Eighth Circuit explained that it does not require cy pres recipients to use funds for the direct benefit of the class. Rather, cy pres distributions simply "must be for the next best use for indirect class benefit, and for uses consistent with the nature of the underlying action and with the judicial function." Id. at *15. Finally, the objectors argued that the District Court abused its discretion in awarding service awards of $10,000 to each named Plaintiff because the awards were excessive and unfair to the class. The Eighth Circuit determined that District Courts regularly had granted service awards of $10,000 or greater. Id. at *17. The Eighth Circuit noted that named Plaintiffs "participated in interviews, assisted with discovery, were deposed, participated in conferences, and met with attorneys throughout the litigation process that lasted five years." Id. at *18. Further, the Eighth Circuit opined that their efforts "resulted in a settlement that will benefit all class members." Id. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit held that the District Court did not err in granting the parties' motion for settlement agreement.

Demarco, et al. v. Avalonbay Communities,* Case No. 16-CV-628 (D.N.J. Mar. 13, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of apartment residents, filed a class action seeking to recover damages resulting from a fire at Defendant's apartment complex. The parties ultimately settled the matter and Plaintiffs filed a motion for preliminary settlement approval and class certification for settlement purposes. Id. at 2. Counsel representing different Plaintiffs in a related state court action filed a motion asserting objections to the relief being sought. The Court rejected counsel's objections and granted Plaintiffs' motion. Counsel argued that the claims resolution process was insufficient and failed to redress the injuries suffered by the potential class members. Id. at 3. The Court disagreed, finding that potential class members were not required to be a part of the settlement because they had to the option to be excluded for any reason. Id. at 4. Counsel further argued that approval of the class action for settlement purposes would prejudice the rights of Plaintiffs who were currently prosecuting individual lawsuits in state court because they had, in effect, already prospectively opted-out of the proposed class action. Id. The Court rejected this argument, stating that there was nothing prejudicial about requiring an individual to send a notice requesting to opt-out of the class action. Counsel also argued that Plaintiffs failed to meet the numerosity requirement. The Court again disagreed, finding the it was purely speculative as to how many Plaintiffs would opt-out of the class action. Id. at 5. Finally, counsel objected to the opt-out procedures and objections. The Court rejected this position on the grounds that the procedures were neither onerous or unusual. Id. at 7. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to preliminary certify the matter as a class action for settlement purposes.

Elder, et al. v. Hilton Worldwide Holdings, Inc., Case No. 16-CV-278 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 10, 2017). Plaintiff, a timeshare owner, brought a class action alleging that Defendant provided 10,000 prospective timeshare customers with vouchers it refused to accept at certain properties. Plaintiff alleged that he agreed to participate in Defendant's timeshare presentation on the promise of a future deeply-discounted stay at one of Defendant's hotels, but when he tried to use his voucher, he was told his certificate was valid only for a stay at certain properties. The parties subsequently settled the matter and Plaintiff filed a motion for preliminary approval of the settlement. The Court stated that it needed additional briefing to consider the motion. Because the settlement did not compensate the class in cash, but rather in new vouchers, the Court determined that it did not have enough information regarding the amount of recovery that class members would receive. Id. at 1. The Court held that Plaintiff should state the amount of money he believed a jury would have awarded had he prevailed at trial and the monetary value of the coupon settlement, given that: (i) the coupons could not be used as cash; and (ii) some class members would not use the coupons. Id. at 2. The Court further stated that Plaintiff must include a justification for compensating class members with new vouchers instead of money. The Court opined that as Plaintiff's complaint alleged that many class members suffered out-of-pocket damages by spending money they would not have otherwise spent based on Defendant's allegedly misleading representations, a coupon settlement would not remedy those injuries. Id. The Court also determined that Plaintiff must explain why the new certificates are still only applicable at certain properties for a limited period, despite Plaintiff's claims that the original vouchers were misleading. Accordingly, the Court ordered Plaintiff to providing additional briefing regarding his proposed settlement agreement.

Haar, et al. v. Dairy Farmers Of America, Inc., 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 6561 (2d Cir. April 18, 2017). Several Plaintiffs in this antitrust class action appealed the District Court's order granting settlement approval. Plaintiffs were class representatives of one sub-class and opposed the settlement, arguing that class counsel colluded with Defendants, that class members had been coerced into supporting the settlement, and that the case should proceed to trial. Id. at *2-3. Upon review of the record, the Second Circuit affirmed, finding no error in the District Court's decision to approve the class action settlement. With respect to Plaintiffs' claim of collusion, the Second Circuit found that counsel's willingness to negotiate in good faith toward a settlement with Defendants did not amount to collusion. Id. at *3. The Second Circuit stated that the District Court conducted a lengthy hearing reviewing the attorneys' conduct of negotiations and found that there was no evidence of impropriety. The Second Circuit explained that a District Court's findings of fact in connection with a settlement agreement in a class action lawsuit must be accepted unless they are clearly erroneous. Id. The Second Circuit reviewed the record and found no reason to overrule the District Court's finding. Plaintiffs further argued that Defendants use of representatives, to whom its farms sold their milk, to solicit the letters of support for the settlement was coercion. The Second Circuit opined that the tactic could be questionable, but even if the letters favoring the settlement were disregarded, there was clear evidence of substantial class member support for the settlement. Id. Further, the Second Circuit determined that the District Court's analysis of the terms of the settlement, which included substantial equitable remedies, was a reasonable compromise of the case, based on experienced counsel's reasonable conclusion that the benefits of the settlement, taken against the risks of proceeding to trial, outweighed the chances of obtaining a better result by litigating the case to conclusion. Id. at *4. The Second Circuit stated that by their nature, settlements are compromises that do not provide either side with all that they might have hoped to obtain in litigation. Id. As a result, the Second Circuit concluded that the order of settlement approval was well within the considerable discretion accorded to District Courts in reviewing class settlements. Id. at *5. Accordingly, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's order granting settlement approval.

Hillson, et al. v. Kelly Services, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8699 (E.D. Mich. Jan. 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of applicants for employment, filed a putative class action against Defendant alleging violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Plaintiffs allege that when they applied for employment, Defendant gave them a background check disclosure form indicating that Defendant would run a consumer report on them to assess their employability that included additional information in violation of the FCRA's requirement that the disclosure be in a stand-alone document. After discovery, the parties agreed to a class-wide settlement. Plaintiffs filed a motion to preliminarily certify the class for settlement purposes and approve the proposed settlement agreement. Defendant did not oppose Plaintiffs' motion. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion to preliminarily certify the class and approve the proposed settlement. Plaintiffs alleged that there were 220,000 individuals who received the disclosure form when they applied for jobs with Defendant. The class was divided into two groups, including those who received favorable ratings from the background search and those who received unfavorable ratings. The proposed terms of the settlement agreement were that Defendant would create a settlement fund of $6,749,000. The agreement included incentive awards for the named Plaintiffs of $2,500 and potential class members who received an unfavorable rating would receive about $41 and those who received a favorable rating would receive about $14. Plaintiffs proposed that up to 33% of the settlement fund – approximately $2,250,000 – would go to Plaintiffs' attorneys' fees, which the Court found was is in the "ballpark" of a reasonable award. Id. at *7. However, the Court indicated that Plaintiffs should address in their fee motion why the loadstar method should not be utilized because the settlement was based upon an alleged statutory violation. The Court preliminarily found that the settlement was reached in a procedurally fair manner because the history of the case indicated non-collusive negotiation as the parties engaged in discovery as well as two mediation sessions before retired federal judges. The Court also found after a review of the case that the settlement was reached in a substantively fair manner because even assuming success at trial, the award at trial would be around $100 per class member. The Court noted that the inclusion of the waiver and disclaimer might have been inconsistent with the language of the stand-alone disclosure requirement as Plaintiff had alleged. However, it was also arguable that it was consistent with the purpose of that provision. Further at trial Plaintiff would have to show a willful violation of the FCRA. Accordingly, the Court preliminarily found the proposed settlement was fair. The Court also ruled that Plaintiffs met the certification requirements for Rule 23 purposes. However, the Court expressed concern as to whether Plaintiffs suffered a "concrete" injury because Plaintiffs did not claim that they did not understand the disclosure and acknowledged that they suffered no actual damages based upon the wording of Defendant's forms. However, the Court refused to fully weigh in on this issue as Defendant's did not object and the Court found that Plaintiffs did suffer at least a modicum of a risk of harm. Accordingly, the Court preliminarily certified the class for purposes of settlement.

Hillson, et al. v. Kelly Services, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 127717 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a class of applicants for temporary employment, entered into a settlement agreement with Defendant based upon allegations that Defendant violated the stand-alone disclosure provisions of the Fair Credit Reporting Act. ("FCRA"). Id. at *2. The parties reached a settlement agreement that the Court preliminarily approved, without addressing three of the key fairness factors. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs petitioned the Court for attorneys' fees and representative service payments and the Court addressed the three fairness factors, and granted final approval of the settlement agreement. Id. at *5. The Court found that the reaction of the class members to the proposed settlement indicated that the settlement was fair, but it adjusted the attorneys' fees and class representative payments to satisfy the fairness factors, and certified the class for purposes of settlement. Id. at *5, 22. The Court determined that it would award attorneys' fees from the common fund. Id. at *7. The Court determined that the percentage-of-recovery approach was the proper common-fund method for establishing fees. Id. at *7. The Court considered various factors in determining that the percentage of the fund was a reasonable award, including: (i) the results counsel achieved for the class; (ii) the risks that counsel bore; and (iii) the quality of counsel's work considering the complexity of the case. Id. at *9. The Court found that the results that counsel achieved for the class were good, as the gross recovery was in line with the average per-class-member recovery in other settlements of stand-alone disclosure claims. Id. Second, Plaintiffs' counsel took on considerable, but not extraordinary, risks in the case, such as facing challenges in establishing that Defendant willfully violated the FCRA, as well as putting 950 hours into litigation and incurring $40,000 in costs. Id. at *11. The Court noted that the quality of work of Plaintiffs' counsel in this case was high, but the case was not very complex. Id. at *11. The Court found that the percentage-of-recovery awarded in other cases was critical and focused on case law from the Ninth Circuit where 25% of the fund is considered a benchmark. Id. at *12, 13.

The Court ruled that 25% of the settlement fund was a good starting point for what was reasonable, and then considered the collective weight of the percentage-of-recovery factors. However, the Court reasoned that because the case was not too complex, a slightly lower percentage-of-recovery was warranted. The Court ruled that the results in this case were good, class counsel undertook considerable risk in prosecuting the case, and the quality of counsel's representation was high. The Court determined that these factors suggested that a higher percentage-of-recovery would be appropriate. The Court opined that consideration of these factors suggested that counsel's request of attorneys' fees award of 25% of the settlement fund, or $1,687,250, was reasonable. Id. at *14. However, when the Court employed a lodestar cross-check of $370,000, it suggested that the amount requested was too high. Id. The amount requested resulted in a multiplier of approximately 4.56 and 25% of the settlement fund, which would mean counsel would receive over four-and-a-half times their hourly rate. Id. at *15. The Court ruled that a multiplier of 4 would adequately account for the risk counsel took in the case and while counsel achieved good results for the class, a multiplier higher than 4 would be reserved for exceptionally good results. Id. at *16. Accordingly, the Court awarded Plaintiffs' counsel the sum of $1,454,206.52 in attorneys' fees. Id. at *16. Plaintiffs also requested that the Court award each of the named Plaintiffs the sum of $2,500 as service awards. Id. at *18. The Court expressed concern regarding the size of the service awards, because had the class representatives brought their own individual lawsuits, it would have yielded them $100, and as compared to other class members' recovery, the amount requested as service awards was too high. Id. at *21. Accordingly, the Court awarded the representative Plaintiffs the sum of $1,200 each for their services in this case. Id. at *22.

In Re Target Corp. Customer Data Security Breach Litigation,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 1767 (8th Cir. Feb. 1, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retail customers, filed a class action against Defendant after it suffered a security breach that compromised the payment data and personal information of Plaintiffs. The parties settled and the District Court preliminarily certified a settlement class defined as "all persons in the United States whose credit or debit card information was compromised as a result of the data breach." Id. at *3. The District Court preliminarily approved the parties' proposed settlement agreement that included a $10 million settlement fund for the class. Under the agreement, class members with documented losses were compensated from the fund first, and the remaining balance was to be distributed equally among class members with undocumented losses. Class members who suffered no loss received nothing. Between the preliminary and final orders certifying the class, Lief Olsen, a class member, objected to the settlement, alleging inadequate compensation and excessive attorneys' fees. Olsen was one of the members of the class who could show no loss. Olsen objected before final settlement approval order on the basis that the class should not be certified because it failed to satisfy Rule 23(a). Olsen argued that there was an intra-class conflict because no named Plaintiff was a member of the sub-class that could show no monetary loss. The District Court overruled Olsen's objection and issued an order approving final certification of the settlement in an order stating "…the Court certified a settlement class in the preliminary approval order, and will not revisit that determination here." Id. at *10. On Olsen's appeal, the Eighth Circuit held that the District Court abused its discretion in failing to "rigorously analyze" that certification was proper after Olsen raised challenges to the certification. The Eighth Circuit noted that the District Court should have addressed Olson's objections and determined whether an intra-class conflict existed and whether it prevented the class representatives from "fairly and adequately protecting the interests of all the class members." Id. at *10. Because the District Court did not conduct a meaningful analysis of class certification, the Eighth Circuit remanded back to the District Court with instructions to conduct a rigorous analysis of Rule 23(a) certification prerequisites. The District Court also imposed a $49,156 appeal bond under Rule 7 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure, which Plaintiffs also challenged on appeal. Only $2,284 of the bond reflected the direct costs of appeal and the remaining $46, 872 was to cover the "financial harm the class will suffer as a result of the delay caused by the appeal". Id. at *10. Defendants asserted that Rule 7 does allow appeal bonds to include delay-based administrative costs. Plaintiffs argued that such costs could not be included because no applicable statute or federal rule allows for recovery of such costs. Considering this as a matter of first impression, the Eighth Circuit agreed with Plaintiffs and held that the "costs on appeal" for Rule 7 purposes include only those costs that the prevailing party can recover under a specific rule or statute. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit reversed and remanded for the District Court to reduce the Rule 7 bond to reflect only the costs that Defendants could recover should they succeed in any issues on appeal.

In Re Uber FCRA Litigation,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101552 (N.D. Cal. June 29, 2017). Plaintiffs in these consolidated cases brought putative class actions alleging that they were denied employment or were terminated on the basis of information contained in background checks that Uber procured in violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") and related state laws. The parties settled the matter and Plaintiff filed a motion for preliminary approval of the settlement agreement. The Court granted the motion. In exchange for Plaintiffs' release of claims, Uber agreed to pay $7.5 million into a settlement fund, to be used to pay class members who submit timely claim forms. Id. at *5. The settlement class was defined as "all persons who were subject to a background check and/or consumer report request by Uber before January 3, 2015." Id. at *6. According to Uber, there were 1,025,954 potential class members. Id. The Court determined that the settlement class met the requirements for class certification under Rule 23. Numerosity was plainly met with over 1,000,000 potential class members. Because all members of the putative class were, by definition, subject to Uber's background checks, and because Plaintiffs alleged that Uber systematically failed to comply with the FCRA's notification requirements, all class members suffered the same deprivation of their rights under the statute and thus commonality was also met. Id. at *10-11. The Court further found that Plaintiffs met the typicality requirement, as the claims of the named Plaintiffs were the same as those brought on behalf of the class as a whole. The was also no evidence of any conflicts of interest between the named Plaintiffs and their counsel and the rest of the class, and the adequacy requirement was therefore met. The Court held that predominance was satisfied because all of Plaintiffs' claims arose from allegations of Uber's systemic practices and policies, and accordingly, liability could be determined on a class-wide basis. Id. at *13. The Court determined that a class action was superior to other methods for adjudicating the controversy, since individual actions would involve relatively small claims for damages, and thus "would prove uneconomic for potential Plaintiffs," since "litigation costs would dwarf potential recovery." Id. The Court found that the settlement amount was a significant discount from the possible recovery in the case. If Plaintiffs proved willful violations at trial with over 1 million class members, Uber's liability on the FCRA claims would be between $100 million and $1 billion. However, the Court determined that there were substantial risks involved in proceeding with litigation that weighed in favor of a significant discount, including: (i) 40% of the class members were subject to arbitration provisions that the Ninth Circuit had held to be enforceable; and (ii) Plaintiffs explained that discovery has revealed their case to be significantly weaker than they had believed at the outset of the litigation, since Uber had generally complied with its obligations under FCRA. Id. at *18-19. In light of these substantial risks and obstacles, and in light of the inevitable expense of litigating a large, complex case through trial, the Court reasoned that a substantial settlement discount was warranted. Id. at *22. The Court also found that the parties' settlement was the product of an arm's length negotiation, over the course of several months and included two in-person sessions with a mediator. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the settlement was sufficiently in the range of reasonableness, and it granted the motion for preliminary settlement approval.

JWD Automotive, Inc., et al. v. DJM Advisory Group, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 104171 (M.D. Fla. July 6, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by sending Plaintiff unsolicited commercial advertisements by facsimile machine. Plaintiff alleged that these faxes caused Plaintiff and others to lose paper and toner, occupied their phone lines and fax machines, and violated their privacy interests. The parties agreed to settle and subsequently requested an order preliminarily approving the settlement agreement. Plaintiff also sought leave to amend the settlement agreement to increase the number of potential class members from 359,000 to 488,424. Id. at *2. Plaintiff asserted that based on an investigation and an analysis of Defendants' call records, Defendants may have attempted to send faxes to approximately 488,424 unique fax numbers and that this likely resulted in the successful delivery of facsimile advertisements to approximately 359,000 recipients. Id. at *3. The Court denied the request to amend the settlement agreement because unlike the 359,000 class members whose statutorily-protected right to be free from intrusive junk faxes was allegedly violated by a successful fax transmission, none of the 130,000 new class members to whom the attempted transmission failed appeared to have suffered any concrete harm, as required to confer Article III standing. Id. at *4. The Court also denied the request for preliminary settlement approval. The Court stated that while the settlement agreement defined the class as "[a]ll persons who were sent one or more facsimiles December 21, 2011 to the present" and further stated that "[c]laiming class members shall be paid their pro rata share of the Settlement Fund, up to and no more than $500.00 per fax," the proposed proof of claim form did not allow class members who received more than one fax at the same fax number to so indicate. Id. at *5. As a result, the Court noted that some class members may be prevented from recovering their true pro rata share of the settlement fund. Id. at *5-6. The Court ruled that the parties must amend the agreement to either resolve this discrepancy or explain to the Court why there was, in fact, no discrepancy. Id. at *6. With respect to the approximately $1.167 million in attorneys' fees the parties agreed that Plaintiff's counsel could recover, the Court noted that this sum equaled 33.3% of the total $3.5 million settlement fund, and thus exceeded the 20% to 25% "benchmark" that the Eleventh Circuit has recognized as presumptively reasonable. Id. at *7. The Court stated that it would not approve an attorneys' fees award of that amount. Accordingly, the Court denied the parties' request to preliminary approve the settlement agreement with prejudice.

Kaufman, et al. v. American Express Travel Related Services Co., Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 24698 (7th Cir. Dec. 7, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a class action against Defendant asserting claims for breach of contract, unjust enrichment, and statutory fraud in regards to Defendant's sale of general-use, prepaid gift cards. Approximately two years after Plaintiffs filed the class action, the parties negotiated a class settlement and sought the District Court's approval of a settlement agreement that would resolve the litigation. Almost seven years later, after multiple amended motions for approval and three rounds of notice to the class, the District Court granted final approval of the settlement. Thereafter, two Interveners ("Interveners") appealed the approval of the settlement. The Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's approval of the settlement agreement. Id. at *27. The settlement agreement provided that Plaintiffs' attorneys would receive $1,950,000 from the settlement, while class members would receive approximately $1,800,000. Id. at *12. On appeal, the Interveners alleged that the District Court erred: (i) by not requiring the filing of briefs in support of the settlement prior to the deadline to object to the settlement; (ii) in determining that Defendant's arbitration appeal posed a risk to the class' success; (iii) in approving the settlement given the breadth of the release; and (iv) in not awarding most, if not all, of the attorneys' fees to the Interveners' counsel. The Seventh Circuit rejected the Interveners' arguments. First, it held that there is no requirement for the filing of briefs in support of a settlement agreement. Id. at *15. Second, the Seventh Circuit found that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that a pending appeal concerning an arbitration provision was a significant potential bar to the success of the class claims in this action. Id. at *20. Third, the Seventh Circuit held that the release language in the settlement agreement was not overly broad, as Interveners had argued, since there was no admissible evidence that additional purported claims existed, and further, that the total size of the class was unknown. Id. at *22-23. Fourth, noting that the District Court had dealt with the parties and their counsel for nearly seven years, the Seventh Circuit opined that the District Court was in the best position to determine which parties and attorneys had contributed to the settlement and in what proportions, and therefore the District Court did not abuse its discretion. Id. at *26. Accordingly, while acknowledging that the District Court "did not approve a perfect settlement," the Seventh Circuit held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion, and therefore it affirmed the District Court's approval of the settlement. Id. at *27.

Lucas, et al. v. Vee Pak, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 209872 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 20, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of African-American laborers, brought a putative class action against four companies alleging race discrimination in hiring and job placements in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and 42 U.S.C. § 1981. The Defendants including Vee Pak, a manufacturing facility, and three temporary services providers who supplied laborers to Vee Pak, including Alternative Staffing, Inc. ("ASI"), Staffing Network, Inc., and MVP Staffing. After discovery, Plaintiffs reached a settlement with ASI, and moved for preliminary approval of their proposed partial class action settlement and for certification of the proposed ASI settlement class. The Court amended the proposed class definition and granted preliminary certification to the ASI class settlement. However, noting that because Plaintiffs did not provide sufficient information about the settlement agreement's proposed plan of allocation, the Court was unable to rule on the motion for preliminary approval; as a result, it directed Plaintiffs to supplement their motion. First, the Court analyzed the ASI class definition, which included the term "otherwise eligible to work at Vee Pak," but did not define or set forth the criteria for determining eligibility to work at Vee Pak. Id. at *12. The Court opined that because the proposed class definition did not define or explain the meaning of "otherwise eligible," it failed to identify "a particular group" that was harmed, and was therefore too vague to be ascertainable. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court amended the class definition to eliminate the "otherwise eligible" term. Id. at *14. Second, the Court held that the numerosity requirement was satisfied since there were approximately 2,000 individuals in the ASI class. Id. at *15. Third, the Court found that Plaintiffs' allegation that ASI engaged in a discriminatory practice of steering African-American laborers away from Vee

Pak assignments because of their race satisfied the commonality requirement. Id. at *16. Fourth, the Court held that the typicality requirement was met since the claims of the class representatives for the ASI class and the class members' claims were based on the same legal theory, i.e., race discrimination in violation of § 1981. Id. at *19. Fifth, the Court found that the adequacy requirement was satisfied since there was no evidence of a conflict between the class representative for the ASI class and the class members' interests. Id. at *21. Relative to the Rule 23(b)(3) requirements, the Court held that Plaintiffs satisfied the predominance requirement by alleging a company-wide practice by ASI that affected all class members — steering African-American laborers away from Vee Pak assignments — due to their race. Id. at *22. The Court also held that the superiority requirement was satisfied since the ASI class members' claims involved the same alleged standardized practice by ASI, and because Plaintiffs estimated there could be approximately 2,000 class members. Id. at *23. Accordingly, the Court found that the amended ASI class definition met the Rule 23 requirements for certification, and it preliminarily certified the ASI class. Id. at *24. As to the motion for preliminary approval of the settlement, the Court opined that the settlement agreement provided very little information regarding the allocation of settlement funds. Id. at *40. Further, the Court noted that the settlement agreement did not explain the expected terms of the "plan for distribution of the funds." Id. at *40-41. The Court noted that it could not determine what information, if any, a class member would be required to provide on the claim form, whether a substantive review of that information would take place, and what such a review would entail. Id. at *41. As such, the Court held that while all other factors weighed in favor of preliminary approval, the lack of information regarding the claims process and the plan of allocation prevented the Court from assessing whether the proceeds of the settlement agreement would be allocated fairly among class members. Id. at *44. Accordingly, the Court amended the proposed class definition and granted preliminary certification of the ASI class, and directed Plaintiffs to supplement their motion for settlement approval on allocation issues. Id. at *49.

Matera, et al. v. Google, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 37370 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 15, 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Electronic Communications Privacy Act (the "Wiretap Act") and California's Invasion of Privacy Act ("CIPA") in its operation of Gmail by intentionally intercepting emails in order to create user profiles that provided targeted advertising. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's terms of service ("TOS") and privacy policy made no mention of such practice, and thus Defendant failed to legally obtain the consent of Gmail users to these practices. Id. at *2. The parties subsequently reached a settlement. Plaintiff filed a motion for preliminary settlement approval, which the Court denied. The Court found that the parties' class action settlement for which they sought preliminary approval failed to require Defendant to amend its TOS or privacy policy to disclose the necessary information. The settlement provided for an injunction, a release of class claims, and a request for $2.2 million in attorneys' fees. Id. at *3. The Court determined that the proposed injunctive relief notice was difficult to understand and did not clearly disclose the fact that Defendant intercepted, scanned, and analyzed the content of emails sent by non-Gmail users to Gmail users for the purpose of creating user profiles of the Gmail users to create targeted advertising for the Gmail users. Id. at *4. Moreover, the Court stated that the notice did not clearly disclose the technical changes the settlement required. At the preliminary approval hearing, the parties explained that the injunction would prohibit Defendant from scanning in transit email for the sole purpose of collecting advertising data, but would allow Defendant to scan incoming in transit email for the "dual purpose" of: (i) detecting spam and malware; and (ii) obtaining information that would be "later used for advertising purposes." Id. at *5. However, the Court held that the "dual purpose" was not clearly disclosed in the notice to class members. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for preliminary approval. The Court found that the notice to class members, which was the only form of disclosure that class members would receive under the settlement, was inadequate.

(lvii) Settlement Enforcement Issues In Class Actions

Gascho, et al. v. Global Fitness Holdings, LLC*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 22881 (6th Cir. Nov. 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of gym members, filed a class action alleging that Defendant misrepresented the terms of its gym memberships. The parties ultimately settled the litigation and Defendant agreed to pay: (i) $1.3 million to the class members, (ii) class counsels' fees; and (iii) the claims administrator's fees and costs. Id. at *2. Some of the class members objected to the settlement. After a fairness hearing, the District Court approved the agreement and ordered the parties to implement its terms. However, several objectors appealed. After a subsequent appeal to the Sixth Circuit and after filing a writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court, Defendant was nearly broke. The payment owed to class members had been placed in escrow under the terms of the settlement agreement, but no provisions had been made for the fees for class counsel and the claims administrator. Id. at *3. Defendant notified the District Court it was out of money and could not meet its remaining obligations under the agreement. Id. Plaintiffs requested that the District Court hold Defendant in civil contempt. The District Court did so and ordered Defendant to pay the full amount owed to class counsel and the claims administrator, as well as statutory interest. Id. at *3-4. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit reversed the District Court's ruling. The Sixth Circuit stated that it was undisputed that Defendant violated a definite and specific order of the District Court by failing to pay class counsel and the claims administrator. Id. at *5. The Sixth Circuit determined that the question therefore was when the District Court's order to pay class counsel and the claims administrator became definite and specific. The settlement agreement provided that Defendant's obligation to pay would not become effective until the agreement was "fully and finally affirmed by the highest court" from which any party sought review. Id. The Sixth Circuit reasoned that while the District Court's command was specific – that Defendant had to pay – it was not definite because the timing of the payments depended on whether either party appealed. Id. at *6. Since the objecting class members did appeal to both the Sixth Circuit and to the U.S. Supreme Court, the decision only became final on March 21, 2017, after the time to request a rehearing expired. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit held that until the order was "fully and finally affirmed," it was not definite, and it remained possible that attorneys' fees could be reduced or the order reversed altogether. Id. at *7. The Sixth Circuit thereby found that Defendant did not knowingly violate a clear and specific command of the District Court until Defendant's relevant payment obligations under the order became effective on March 21, 2017, and the District Court erred in considering any of Defendant's conduct from before that date. Id. at *7. As such, the Sixth Circuit reversed and remanded so the District Court could consider whether the evidence after March 21, 2017 was sufficient to support a contempt finding. Id.

Trustees Of The Operating Engineers Pension Trust, et al. v. Smith-Emery Co*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8276 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 19, 2017). Plaintiffs initiated a class action to collect trust fund contributions from Defendant under the ERISA. The parties ultimately settled the matter and signed a memorandum of understanding ("MOU") that provided the following: (i) a $1.6 million total settlement amount; (ii) 5% interest on the settlement amount; (iii) a 10-year payment period; (iv) an audit period between April 2015 through September 30, 2016, for testing and inspection on post-installed anchor bolt, clerical errors, and other items "consistent w/ 2010-2015 audit;" (v) a 90-day period to cure with interest on the principal to continue to accrue during any cure period; and (vi) monthly payment terms including 120 total payments at $16,970.48 per month. Id. at *4-5. After Defendant allegedly breached, Plaintiffs filed a motion for enforcement of the settlement and for entry of judgment. Plaintiffs argued that the MOU was an enforceable settlement agreement and requested the Court to enforce the MOU according to its terms, find that Defendant had breached the MOU by failing to make monthly payments, and enter judgment according to the stipulated judgment amounts in the MOU. Id. at *11. In response, Defendant argued that the MOU was unenforceable because it was uncertain or silent as to the material terms. Specifically, Defendant argued that the MOU did not include: (i) an explanation of the process surrounding any audit of Defendant's payments during the period from April 2015 to September 30, 2016, and the dispute resolution process that would govern the audit; (ii) the terms of a release; and (iii) a confidentiality provision. Id. at *12. The Court found that the MOU provided for an audit of Defendant's trust payments during the period between April 2015 to September 30, 2016, "consistent with the 2010-2015 audit." Id. at *14. The Court ruled that the term was sufficiently unambiguous to render the MOU enforceable. Id. at *15. Defendant also argued that the MOU lacked any release provisions and therefore was unenforceable. In response, Plaintiffs argued that "[b]y virtue of stipulating to judgments, one is agreeing to a release upon satisfaction of each judgment." Id. at *15-16. The Court agreed and held that a release of the claims that were or could have been asserted in both actions was implicit in the terms of the MOU. Defendant further argued that "still another absent material term is the degree of confidentiality of the alleged settlement." Id. at *18. However, the Court found that Defendant cited no authority for its contention that a confidentiality term is always a material term to a settlement agreement or that the parties must agree on confidentiality in order to settle an action. The Court ruled that Defendant's preference for confidentiality did not make the MOU's terms unenforceable and that a confidentiality provision was not so necessary as to render the settlement agreement a nullity. Id. at *19. Ultimately, the Court concluded that the MOU contained provisions for a total settlement amount, a payment schedule, and an implicit release of all claims upon payment of the total settlement amount, and Defendant did not demonstrate that the parties objectively manifested a desire for further negotiations regarding omitted and material terms. Id. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the MOU was enforceable and granted Plaintiffs' motion for enforcement of the settlement.

(lviii) Special Masters In Class Actions

Arkansas Teacher Retirement System, et al. v. State Street Bank & Trust Co.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66660 (D. Mass. May 2, 2017). The Court appointed a Special Master in this class action pursuant to Rule 53. Among other things, the Special Master was directed to investigate the accuracy and reliability of the representations made by Plaintiffs' counsel in their successful request for an award of more than $75 million in attorneys' fees and expenses, the reasonableness of the award, and whether the award should be reduced. Id. at *5-6. The Court authorized the Special Master to retain other individuals and organizations to assist him. The Special Master retained William Sinnott as his counsel. After the Special Master spoke and corresponded with Plaintiffs' counsel, Sinnott engaged John Toothman to assist the Special Master and him in the performance of their duties because of Toothman's experience in matters concerning the reasonableness of attorneys' fees in class actions. Id. at *6. Three of the eight firms that represented class members objected to the retention of Toothman. The Special Master denied their objection. The objecting counsel appealed the decision, and the Court upheld the Special Master's decision denying the objection. The Court found that the Special Master did not make an error of fact or law in retaining Toothman. Id. at *7. The Court noted that the Special Master wrote that "Toothman will be generally responsible for providing consulting services to assist the Special Master and his counsel in fulfilling [their] duties." Id. at *11. The Special Master further characterized Toothman's services as "akin to that of a technical advisor retained to educate and guide the Special Master and his counsel." Id. at *12. The Court noted that it gave the Special Master the discretion to "retain any firm, organization, or individual he deems necessary to assist him in the performance of his duties." Id. at *14. The Court found that the Special Master did not abuse his discretion in deciding that employing Toothman would help his counsel and him "perform [their] assigned duties fairly and efficiently." Id. at *14-15. More specifically, the Court concluded that the Special Master properly determined that Toothman was eligible to perform his defined and limited functions because his prior experience and the opinions he expressed as an expert witness did not manifest a disqualifying bias. The Court noted that the Special Master reasonably concluded that an individual with experience and specialized knowledge would be valuable in organizing the investigation and analyzing voluminous evidence and therefore would contribute to the informed and efficient discharge of the Special Master's duties. Id. at *16. The Court stated that the Special Master correctly concluded that Toothman was qualified to serve in that capacity. Accordingly, the Court denied the objection to the Special Master's decision.

J.F., et al. v. Abbott Laboratories*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52098 (S.D. Ill. April 5, 2017). Plaintiffs in this matter were a group of minors suing in multi-district class actions. The Court appointed a Special Master pursuant to Rule 53. The Court held that the Special Master's initial duties would be to evaluate the parties' objections to deposition designations and make recommendations and reports to the Court on these objections. Id. at *9. The Court also stated that it also reserved the right to expand the Special Master's duties to include: (i) evaluating any motions in limine and providing the Court with formal and informal recommended rulings on those motions; (ii) evaluating any other motions the parties may file, and providing the Court with formal and informal recommended rulings on those motions; (iii) providing periodic status reports to the Court; (v) making formal or informal recommendations and reports to the parties; (v) making recommendations and reports to the Court, regarding any matter pertinent to these duties; (vi) communicating and meeting with the parties and attorneys as needs may arise in order to permit the full and efficient performance of these duties; and (vi) employing staff as may be necessary to assist the Special Master in performing his duties. Id. at *10. The Court also stated that the Special Master may have any of the following additional duties: (i) assist with preparation for attorney conferences (including formulating agendas), court scheduling, and case management; (ii) assist with legal analysis of the parties' motions or other submissions, whether made before, during, or after trials, and make recommended findings of fact and conclusions of law; (iii) assist with responses to media inquiries: (iv) direct, supervise, monitor, and report upon implementation and compliance with the Court's orders, and make findings and recommendations on remedial action if required; (v) interpret any agreements reached by the parties; (vi) propose structures and strategies for attorneys' fee issues and fee settlement negotiations, review fee applications, and evaluate the parties' individual claims for fees; (vii) administer, allocate, and distribute funds and other relief, as may become necessary; (viii) adjudicate eligibility and entitlement to funds and other relief; and (ix) monitor compliance with structural injunctions. Id. at *11. The Court stated that the parties must make readily available to the Special Master any and all individuals, information, documents, materials, programs, files, databases, services, facilities and premises under their control, which the Special Master may require to perform his duties. Id. at*16. Additionally, the Court ordered that all parties must make readily available to the Special Master any and all facilities, files, databases, computer programs and documents necessary to fulfill the Special Master's functions. Id. at *17. Accordingly, the Court appointed a Special Master to the case pursuant to Rule 53.

In Re Johnson & Johnson Talcum Powder Products Marketing, Sales Practices And Products Liability Litigation*, Case No. 16-MD-2738 (D.N.J. Sept. 11, 2017). In this multi-district litigation, the Court appointed a Special Master pursuant to Rule 53. The Court ordered that the Special Master should proceed with all reasonable diligence to resolve discovery disputes. The Court further stated that the Special Master should maintain a record of the evidence considered in making or recommending findings or fact on the basis of the evidence. Id. at 2. The Court stated that the Special Master may communicate ex parte with the Court at his discretion, could not communicate ex parte with any attorney on substantive matters without providing notice and giving the other party the opportunity to object. Id. Further, a record must be kept of all ex parte communications. Id. at 3. Any objections to reports or orders filed by the Special Master must be filed within 14 days of the order. The Court held that it would review the findings of the Special Master according to the standards set forth in Rule 53(f)(3). Id. The Court stated that the Special Master will receive $700 per hour for his service. Id. at 3-4. The Court also ordered that any submissions related to any discovery motion authorized by the Special Master would be submitted directly to him in email format. Id. at 4. Further, the Court ordered that the Special Master would able to conduct informal procedures for resolving discovery disputes, including in-person or telephone conferences, meet and confers, submission of letters rather than briefs, or any other chosen method. Id. at 5. Accordingly, the Court appointed a Special Master pursuant to Rule 53.

In Re National Football League Players' Concussion Injury Litigation*, Case No. 12-MD-2323 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 14, 2017). In this multi-district class action litigation brought by former NHL players seeking to hold Defendant responsible for the pathological, debilitating effects of brain injuries caused by concussive and sub-concussive impacts sustained during their careers, the Court appointed Professor William Rubenstein as a special master to assist with complex issues relating to attorneys' fees. Id. at 1. Several parties requested: (i) clarification of the expert's role; (ii) argued against the appointment of a special master or for delay in the appointment; (iii) suggested alternative experts; and/or (iv) raised questions about Professor Rubenstein's potential conflicts. Id. The Court noted that there were three fee issues currently for review, and requested that Professor Rubenstein provide his expert opinion on: (i) whether the Court had the authority to and should order a cap on the percentage that any class member would be obligated to pay his attorney and if so, what that cap should be and how it should be implemented; and (ii) the reasonableness of requiring class members to contribute a portion of their recoveries to a common benefit fund, whether 5% was an appropriate portion, and whether the process will result in counsel being over-compensated. Id. at 2. The Court stated that it would decide the reasonableness of class counsels' fee request for $112.5 million based on the special master's report. Id. Accordingly, the Court appointed Professor Rubenstein as a special master on attorneys' fees.

Williams, et al. v. BASF Catalysts*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 154772 (D.N.J. Sept. 21, 2017). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants and their attorneys conspired to prevent thousands of litigants who claimed injuries due to asbestos exposure from attaining fair tort recoveries. Plaintiffs alleged that BASF's predecessor, Engelhard Corp. ("Engelhard"), with the help of its attorneys, destroyed or hid tests and reports that documented the presence of asbestos in Engelhard's talc. Id. at *3-4. The Court determined that the assistance of a Special Master in the case was necessary because the action involved very voluminous and complex issues of discovery. The Court stated that it was particularly necessary in this case because of the Court's findings regarding the potential waiver of the attorney-client privilege as it pertained to the underlying asbestos actions and the thousands of files related thereto, which might require individual analysis by the Court. Id. at *5. The Court ultimately appointed retired Justice Roberto A. Rivera-Soto as Special Master. Id. at *6. Defendants objected to the appointment of Special Master Rivera-Soto. Defendants asserted that Special Master Rivera-Soto could not serve as Special Master in this case because he was once a partner at Fox Rothschild LLP, one of the law firms representing Plaintiffs (the "Fox Rothschild objection"). Id. Additionally, Defendants pointed to the fact that Special Master Rivera-Soto's current law firm, Ballard Spahr, LLP, was being represented by Williams & Connolly, LLP in an unrelated matter in Pennsylvania (the "Williams & Connolly objection"). Accordingly, Defendants believed that Special Master Rivera-Soto's involvement was inappropriate due to his conflicts of interest. Id. at *7. Special Master Rivera-Soto replied to Defendants' objections and noted that the Fox Rothschild objection carried no weight, since his last involvement with the firm was 13 years ago. Id. Special Master Rivera-Soto explained that, during his tenure with the Supreme Court of New Jersey, he had recused himself from all Fox Rothschild cases. Id. As to the Williams & Connolly objection, Special Master Rivera-Soto first noted that the law firm of Williams & Connolly did not appear on his conflicts search because the law firm was not listed on the docket sheet. Special Master Rivera-Soto also stated that he was unaware that Ballard Spahr had retained Williams & Connolly to represent it until it was brought to his attention and that he had no involvement in the Pennsylvania action. Id. at *7-8. Special Master Rivera-Soto, therefore, asserted that there was no conflict and his impartiality would not be impacted. Id. at *8. The Court rejected both of Defendants' objections to the appointment of Special Master Rivera-Soto. As to the Fox Rothschild objection, the Court found that the period of time that had lapsed since Special Master Rivera-Soto had any involvement with Fox Rothschild was more than sufficient to assure impartiality and negate any appearance of impropriety. Id. at *9. The Court was also unpersuaded by the Williams & Connolly objection, especially because Williams & Connolly's representation of Ballard Spahr had ceased. The Court held that Williams & Connolly's representation of Ballard Spahr had no impact or relation to its representation of Defendants in this action. Ballard Spahr had no interactions with any of the parties in this case, nor would the firm's interest be materially adverse to the parties herein. Id. at *10. Accordingly, the Court found that Special Master Rivera-Soto had no conflict of interest that would prohibit him from serving as an impartial and effective Special Master.

(lix) Standing Issues In Class Actions

A.D., et al. v. Kevin Washburn*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38060 (D. Ariz. Mar. 16, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of children of Indian decent and pre-adoptive foster parents of non-Indian decent, filed a putative class action alleging that parts of the Indian Child Welfare Act ("ICWA") violated the U.S. Constitution and federal law, by requiring state courts to treat Indian children differently than non-Indian children in state child-custody proceedings. Plaintiffs filed a seven count complaint alleging various violations of the U.S. Constitution, including, among other things, equal protection and substantive due process violations. Plaintiffs sought declaratory and injunctive relief. Id. at *5. The ICWA was enacted in response to an increasing number of adoptions of Indian children by non-Indian families and was intended to promote the "best interests of Indian children" and establish minimum federal standards for the removal of Indian children from their families and encouraged placement of such children in foster or adoptive homes that reflected the Indian culture. Id. at *6. The ICWA included provisions to transfer cases from state to tribal court when Indian children or parents were involved, contained higher standards of proof for removal of children of Indian decent and terminating their parent's rights, and placed preferences on placement with foster parents of Indian decent. Id. at *17-27. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' complaint for lack of Article III standing. Id. at *14. The Court dismissed all counts of the complaint, ruling that Plaintiffs lacked standing as they failed to allege facts showing that Plaintiffs suffered any concrete and particularized injury, actual or imminent, that was traceable to the ICWA. Id. at *31. The Court noted that Plaintiffs must assert a particularized injury as opposed to a hypothetical concern. The Court noted that legal questions that Plaintiffs were seeking to adjudicate would be remediable in state court once a child or interested adult was in fact injured. Id. at *32-33. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the complaint for lack of standing.

Attias, et al. v. First Care*, 865 F.3d 620 (D.C. Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs brought an action alleging that Defendant violated numerous state laws by failing to safeguard the personal information of approximately 1.1 million policyholders following a data breach in May 2015. Id. at *623. The District Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss on the grounds that, absent facts demonstrating a substantial risk that stolen data had been or would be misused in a harmful manner, merely having personal information stolen in a data breach was insufficient to establish standing. Id. On appeal, the D. C. Circuit reversed and remanded, finding that the District Court gave the complaint an unduly narrow reading. The District Court did not read the complaint to allege the theft of social security numbers or credit card numbers and ruled that "Plaintiffs have not suggested, let alone demonstrated, how the hackers could steal their identities without access to their social security or credit card numbers." Id. at *625. The District Court found missing the requirement that Plaintiffs' injury be "actual or imminent." Id. The D.C. Circuit opined that the principle question was whether Plaintiffs plausibly alleged a risk of future injury that was substantial enough to create Article III standing. The D.C. Circuit concluded that Plaintiffs had done so because there was no doubt that identity theft would constitute a concrete and particularized injury. The remaining question, the D.C. Circuit noted, was whether the complaint plausibly alleged that Plaintiffs faced a substantial risk of identity theft as a result of Defendant's alleged negligence in the data breach. The District Court determined that Plaintiffs had not demonstrated a sufficiently substantial risk of future harm stemming from the breach to establish standing, in part, because they had "not suggested, let alone demonstrated, how the hackers could steal their identities without access to their social security or credit card numbers." Id. at *626. However, the D.C. Circuit held that the complaint alleged that hackers would have had access to social security and credit card numbers because Defendant collected and stored its customers' personal identification information, personal health information, and other sensitive information ("PII/PHI/sensitive information"). Id. at *627. The complaint further stated that the cyber-attack allowed access to personal and sensitive information of Plaintiffs. Id. at *627-628. Therefore, the D.C. Circuit found that Plaintiffs, in the complaint, alleged that Defendant collected and stored PII/PHI/sensitive information, a category of information that includes credit card and social security numbers; that PII/PHI/sensitive information was stolen in the breach; and that the data "accessed on Defendant's servers" placed Plaintiffs at a high risk of financial fraud. Id. at *628. Next, the D.C. Circuit stated that the alleged injury-in-fact must also be "fairly traceable to the challenged conduct of Defendant." Id. at *629. Defendant contended that Plaintiffs' injury was fairly traceable only to the data thief. However, the D.C. Circuit found that Article III standing does not require that Defendant be the most immediate cause, or even a proximate cause, of Plaintiffs' injuries; rather, it requires only that injuries be "fairly traceable" to Defendant. Id. The D.C. Circuit assumed, for purposes of the standing analysis, that Plaintiffs would prevail on the merits of their claim that Defendant failed to properly secure their data and thereby subjected them to a substantial risk of identity theft. Id. at *630. Accordingly, the D.C. Circuit concluded that their injury-in-fact was fairly traceable to Defendant. The D.C. Circuit therefore reversed the District Court's order dismissing the action for lack of standing and remanded for further proceedings.

Brinker, et al. v. Normandin's*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 61312 (N.D. Cal. April 21, 2017). Plaintiffs allege that Defendants violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by placing automated calls to Plaintiffs' phones. Defendants moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' complaint for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction The Court granted the motion on the basis that Plaintiffs lacked standing because they failed to allege a concrete injury. Plaintiffs filed a motion for reconsideration, which the Court granted. Following the grant of Defendants' motion to dismiss, the Ninth Circuit issued its opinion in Van Patten v. Vertical Fitness Group, LLC, 847 F.3d 1037 (9th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs asserted that Van Patten required a finding that Plaintiffs' injuries were sufficiently concrete to confer standing. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiff in Van Patten received two automated text messages from a gym where he had been a member. He claimed that the messages violated the TCPA. Id. at *4. Defendants contended that Van Patten did not establish a concrete injury-in-fact necessary to pursue his TCPA claim in light of Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540 (2016). Id. at *4-5. The Ninth Circuit acknowledged that "Article III standing requires a concrete injury even in the context of a statutory violation" and that a Plaintiff could not "allege a bare procedural violation, divorced from any concrete harm, and satisfy the injury-in-fact requirement of Article III." Id. at *5. Nonetheless, the Ninth Circuit decided that "a violation" –any violation – "of the TCPA is a concrete, de facto injury." The Court therefore found that under Van Patten, Plaintiffs had alleged sufficient facts to confer standing. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants placed unsolicited, automated calls to their phones in violation of the TCPA. Id. The Court held that after Van Patten, Plaintiffs allegations were sufficient to show that they suffered a concrete injury. Id. at *5-6. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration.

Cole, et al. v. Gene By Gene, Ltd*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101761 (D. Alaska June 30, 2017). Plaintiff filed a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the Alaska Genetic Privacy Act when it allegedly disclosed his genetic testing information on a public website. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court denied. Plaintiff purchased a DNA testing kit from Defendant's website. After testing, participants could sign up for "projects" or on-line forums run by third-party, independent volunteers called project administrators. Id. at *2. Plaintiff signed up for nine projects and understood that the project administrators would have access to his name, contact information, and testing kit number. Id. at *2-3. However, Plaintiff alleged that when he signed up for the projects, he was not informed that some project administrators had separate websites, and nor was he informed that his full DNA test results would be disclosed on those sites. Id. at *3. Defendant moved to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1) on the ground that since Plaintiff only sought statutory damages under the Genetic Privacy Act, he failed to demonstrate the requisite injury-in-fact for Article III standing. When evaluating whether a statutory violation constitutes an injury-in-fact, the Court stated it that must consider two factors: (i) whether the alleged intangible harm caused by the statutory violation bears a "close relationship to a harm that has traditionally been regarded as providing a basis for a lawsuit in English or American courts," and (ii) congressional judgment in establishing the statutory right. Id. at *7-8. The Court noted that Alaska's Genetic Privacy Act recognizes an exclusive property interest in one's DNA, and prohibits the unauthorized disclosure of DNA information. The Court found that the statutory entitlements bore a close relationship to the common law torts of conversion of property and invasion of privacy, which have each historically provided a basis for a lawsuit in the American judicial system. Id. at *8. Accordingly, the Court determined that Plaintiff's alleged injury was closely related to torts that have been recognized in both federal and Alaska state courts, and therefore met the first factor for standing. As to the second factor regarding congressional judgment, the Court noted that three considerations favored finding that the statute granted persons in Plaintiff's position a right to judicial relief, including: (i) the provision of a private right of action; (ii) the availability of statutory damages; and (iii) the substantive nature of the statutory right. Id. at *8-9. The Court found that each of the considerations weighed in favor of Article III standing. First, the Court explained, Alaska's Genetic Privacy Act explicitly granted a private right of action to those aggrieved by a violation of the Act. Second, the Genetic Privacy Act expressly provides for the recovery of statutory damages in addition to any actual damages suffered. Third, the Act creates a property interest in one's DNA and the results of any DNA analysis. The Court opined that by creating such an interest, the Alaska legislature did more than mandate specific procedural requirements; instead, it created a substantive right. Accordingly, the unauthorized disclosure of an individual's DNA constitutes a concrete harm that satisfies the injury-in-fact requirement under Article III. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court concluded that although Plaintiff's alleged injury may not have resulted in tangible economic or physical harm, the injury was sufficiently "concrete" so as to confer Article III standing. Id. Therefore, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Cowen, et al. v. Larry & Lenny's,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 169929 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 12, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, filed a class action alleging that Defendant's labels on its Complete Cookie product provided false and misleading nutritional information in violation of the Illinois Consumer Fraud Act and the Pennsylvania Consumer Protection Law. Plaintiffs also brought claims for breach of express warranty, breach of implied warranty, negligent misrepresentation, intentional misrepresentation, and unjust enrichment. Plaintiffs alleged that Complete Cookies' labels: (i) overstated protein content; (ii) understated the content of calories, carbohydrates, fats, and sugars; (iii) and miscalculated, and therefore overstated, the percent daily value of protein. Id. at *3. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss on several grounds, which the Court granted in part. First, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs lacked standing for any variety of the Complete Cookie that they did not purchase. Second, Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs could not maintain a national or multi-state class, and those claims should be denied or stricken. Finally, Defendant argued that Plaintiffs' claims failed to satisfy the particularity requirements of Rule 9(b). Defendant argued that Plaintiffs lacked Article III standing to bring claims for varieties of the Complete Cookie they did not purchase. Plaintiffs asserted that the defense was premature prior to the class certification stage, and Plaintiffs may bring claims for products that are substantially similar to those they did purchase. Id. at *6-7. The Court disagreed, finding that "a named Plaintiff cannot acquire standing to sue by bringing his action on behalf of others who suffered injury which would have afforded them standing had they been named Plaintiffs," because "a person cannot predicate standing on injury which he does not share." Id. at *7. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Plaintiffs' claims as to the products they did not purchase. Defendant also argued that Plaintiffs' multi-state and national class claims should be dismissed or stricken because Plaintiffs could not satisfy Rule 23's elements of typicality and predominance. Id. at *8-9. The Court noted that two of the three Plaintiffs alleged that they resided in states other than Illinois and that they purchased the Complete Cookie in their home states. Id. at *9. Thus, under Illinois choice-of-law rules, the laws of the states where each Plaintiff resided would govern the claims alleged in the complaint. The Court agreed that applying the warranty, unjust enrichment, and misrepresentation laws of 50 different states, or even the five states that comprised the multi-state class, was unmanageable on a class-wide basis because those states' laws conflict in material ways. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion on these grounds and struck all claims pled on behalf of the multi-state and national classes. Id. at *11-12. Defendant also argued that Plaintiffs' complaint should be dismissed for failure to comply with Rule 9(b). Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs' complaint was deficient by only supplying the label of one variation of the Complete Cookie and not explicitly alleging that the labels for the other variations are the same or sufficiently similar. Id. at *12. The Court declined to adopt Defendant's hyper-technical interpretation of Rule 9(b). Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Eike, et al. v. Allergan, Inc.*, 850 F.3d 315 (7th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants packaged and sold eye drops in plastic bottles that produced a drop that was too large for the eye, thereby losing some of the medication and forcing Plaintiffs to spend more money on medication in violation of the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act ("ICFA") and the Missouri Merchandising Practices Act ("MMPA"). Id. at *1. According to an ophthalmologist put forward as an expert for Plaintiffs, any drop larger than an average of 5 to 15 microliters was larger than the capacity of the eye and provided more medication than necessary. Seeking money damages and injunctive relief and proposing seven total classes divided between Illinois and Missouri, Plaintiffs moved for class certification. The District Court granted class certification on the grounds that Plaintiffs satisfied Rule 23 requirements. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit held that Plaintiffs lacked standing and remanded to the District Court to dismiss the claims. Plaintiffs' claim was that Defendants' eye drops were unnecessarily large because each eye drop exceeded 16 microliters (equal to .1% of a tablespoon). Plaintiffs contended that the optimal size of an eye drop for treatment of glaucoma is 16 microliters. Therefore, Plaintiffs sought the difference between the price per drop of the eye drops at their present size, and the presumably lower price if the drops were smaller, multiplied by the number of drops that have been bought by the members of the class; that total constituted the damages the class was seeking. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs argued that the price of the eye drops was excessive because a smaller drop, costing less to produce and to package, could be sold at a lower price yet still cover the producers' costs, and therefore the only benefit of the larger drop is to the producers' profits. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs further alleged that the large eye drops had a higher risk of side effects and were more likely to be used up faster. Id. The Seventh Circuit stated that it was essentially tasked to decide a case based on dissatisfaction with a product made by multiple firms or with its price. Id. at *4. The Seventh Circuit determined that the only eye drops sold by Defendants for the treatment of glaucoma are larger than 16 microliters. Id. at *5. Defendant offered explanations for the size of the drops, including that since each eye drop consisted mostly of inactive ingredients, the active pharmaceutical ingredient that treats the glaucoma was only about 1% of the drop, and only 1% to 7% of the ingredient crossed the cornea into the eye itself. Id. at *5-6. Defendant asserted that the amount of fluid the eye can hold without overflowing varies from person to person often exceeded 16 microliters. The smaller the drop, therefore, the weaker its likely therapeutic effect for patients whose eyes could have absorbed a larger drop. In addition, Defendant contended that elderly patients, patients with unsteady hands, and patients who already have serious eye problems often had trouble getting eye drops into their eyes, and the smaller the drop the higher likelihood of missing. Id. at *6. The Seventh Circuit opined that Defendants' large eye drops were approved by the Food and Drug Administration ("FDA"), and matters regarding the effectiveness and price must be taken up with the FDA. The Seventh Circuit stated that the District Court can review a determination by the FDA, but it cannot bypass the agency and make its own evaluation of the safety and efficacy of an unconventionally-sized eye drops for treatment of glaucoma. Id. at *6-7. The Seventh Circuit found that even supposing a smaller eye drop would be more effective and cheaper than the ones manufactured by Defendant, the class members would still have no cause of action, because a party cannot sue a company simply alleging that a product could be better. Id. at*7. The Seventh Circuit reasoned that the fact that a seller does not sell the product that a consumer wants, or at the price a consumer would like to pay, is not an actionable injury. Id. The Seventh Circuit therefore determined that Plaintiffs lacked standing, reversed the District Court's decision, and ordered it to dismiss the case for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

Ferrer, et al. v. CareFirst, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110304 (D.D.C. July 17, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of female employees enrolled in Defendant's healthcare plans, brought an action asserting that the Affordable Care Act ("ACA") mandated coverage for lactation services as a no-cost preventive service, and that Defendant therefore must either offer in-network providers for lactation services or, in the absence of in-network providers, cover the full cost of out-of-network services. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant had no in-network providers for lactation services, so Plaintiffs had to go out of network for those services. Id. Defendant contended that there was nothing improper about requiring an insured to share the costs of out-of-network healthcare services. Defendant stated that although the ACA mandated coverage for lactation services, it did not require an insurer to cover the complete costs of such services when the insured uses an out-of-network provider. Defendant filed a Rule 12(b)(1) motion to dismiss, asserting that Plaintiffs lacked standing because they did not suffer an injury-in-fact. The Court noted that as a general matter, a Plaintiff's standing to pursue claims rests on the theory of injury presented in the complaint and the facts alleged in support of the claim. Id. at *3. A Plaintiff can augment a pleading with an affidavit that contains specific facts to support standing, but a Defendant was "barred at this stage of the proceedings from attacking the claims made in the complaint." Id. at *4. The Court found that Defendant's motion to dismiss for lack of standing was premised entirely on evidence outside the record, including an affidavit submitted by an employee of Defendant. The Court held that Defendant's reliance on the affidavit was improper at this stage of the litigation. Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Court determined that Defendant's motion was fundamentally flawed because it did precisely what it cannot do with respect to the merits of the case. Id. The Court then conducted a standing inquiry considering only those facts alleged in the complaint. The Court stated that Plaintiffs' complaint easily established standing at the motion to dismiss stage. Id. at *7. The Court found that Defendant's alleged denial of full coverage resulted in each Plaintiff having to pay hundreds of dollars out of pocket for lactation services, thereby meeting the injury-in-fact requirement. Additionally, the Court noted that Plaintiffs satisfied the element of causation, because they alleged that Defendant's refusal to pay the full cost of out-of-network lactation services, when it offers no in-network providers, violated the ACA and gave rise to their economic harm. Id. at *7-8. Finally, the Court reasoned that Plaintiffs' alleged injuries could be redressed by a monetary award, thus satisfying the third requirement of standing. Accordingly, the Court held that Plaintiffs' complaint set forth sufficient facts that plausibly established standing for each Plaintiff. Id. at *8. The Court therefore denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Finkelman, et al. v. National Football League,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 25356 (3d Cir. Dec. 15, 2017). Plaintiff filed a putative class action alleging that Defendant violated the New Jersey Ticket Law ("NJTL") when it withheld more than 5% of the available tickets for the Super Bowl from the general public. On Defendant's motion to dismiss, the District Court ruled that Plaintiff lacked Article III standing. On Plaintiff's appeal, the Third Circuit reversed. Defendant had a policy of withholding approximately 99% of the Super Bowl tickets from the general public and selling the remaining 1% to fans through a lottery system. Plaintiff did not enter the lottery and purchased two tickets with a face value of $800 each on the secondary market for $2,000 per ticket. Id. at *4. The NJTL made it unlawful for a person to withhold more than 5% of tickets from the general public. On Plaintiff's first appeal, the Third Circuit held that Plaintiff lacked Article III standing because Plaintiff failed to: (i) establish a causal connection between Defendant's actions and any injury suffered because Plaintiff failed to enter the lottery to buy face-value tickets; and (ii) sufficiently plead enough facts to demonstrate that Defendant's withholding of tickets increased the price that Plaintiff paid for tickets on the secondary market. Id. at *7. The District Court granted Plaintiff leave to amend his complaint, and Plaintiff subsequently alleged that an economist, specializing in sports and ticketing, concluded that Defendant's withholding of tickets resulted in fewer tickets being available on the secondary market and thus resulted in higher prices for those tickets that were available. Id. at *8. The District Court again granted Defendant's motion to dismiss and ruled that Plaintiff lacked standing because he did not enter the ticket lottery and the additional facts Plaintiff alleged regarding causation were conclusory. Id. at *9. On Plaintiff's second appeal, the Third Circuit disagreed and ruled that Plaintiff's amended complaint offered specific factual allegations that supported his theory that Defendant's ticket withholding caused a series of events that ultimately raised ticket prices on the secondary market. Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that the insiders to whom Defendant provided tickets were more likely to re-sell those tickets to third-party brokers, who in turn were more likely to charge higher prices. Conversely, Plaintiff alleged that if more tickets were available to fans, the fans were more likely to sell through direct fan-to- fan sales and the prices would likely be lower. The Third Circuit held that Plaintiff had established standing because he had alleged sufficient factual allegations to show that Defendant's ticket withholding raised the price that Plaintiff paid for tickets on the secondary market. Accordingly, the Third Circuit reversed the decision of the District Court. Id. at *18.

Gubala, et al. v. Time Warner Cable*, 846 F.3d 909 (9th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff, a cable television consumer, subscribed to Defendant's services in 2004, at which time he provided Defendant with his date of birth, home address, home and work telephone numbers, social security number, and credit card information. In 2006, Plaintiff cancelled his subscription and in 2014, he learned that all the information he had given Defendant when he subscribed a decade earlier remained in Defendant's possession. Plaintiff sought injunctive relief for alleged violations of § 551(e) of the Cable Communications Policy Act, which provides that a cable operator "shall destroy personally identifiable information if the information is no longer necessary for the purpose for which it was collected and there are no pending requests or orders for access to such information [either by a cable subscriber, seeking access to his own information] . . . or pursuant to a court order." Id. at 910. The District Court found that Plaintiff lacked standing and dismissed the lawsuit. The District Court also ruled that even if Plaintiff had standing, he failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision. The Seventh Circuit noted that the only allegation Plaintiff asserted was that Defendant's retention of the information, on its own, violated a privacy right or caused Plaintiff to suffer a financial loss. Id. at 910-11. The Seventh Circuit held that Plaintiff did not present evidence of having been "aggrieved" by Defendant's violation of § 551(e), and no allegation or evidence that in the decade since he subscribed to Time Warner's residential services any of the personal information that he supplied to the company had leaked and caused financial or other injury to him or had even been at risk of being leaked. The Seventh Circuit also addressed Plaintiff's contention that a violation of § 551(e) constituted a violation of a right of privacy. The Seventh Circuit reasoned that while violations of rights of privacy are actionable, there was no indication of any violation of Plaintiff's privacy because there was no allegation that Defendant released, or allowed anyone to disseminate, Plaintiff's personal information. The Seventh Circuit determined that if Plaintiff had reason to believe that Defendant intended to release the information or could not be trusted to retain it, Plaintiff would have grounds for obtaining injunctive relief; but he did not allege such a risk. Id. at 912. The Seventh Circuit determined that the absence of any evidence of any concrete injury inflicted or likely to be inflicted on Plaintiff as a consequence of Defendant's continued retention of his personal information precluded the relief sought. The Seventh Circuit therefore affirmed the District Court's judgment dismissing Plaintiff's claims for lack of standing.

Hossfeld, et al. v. Compass Bank,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 182571 (N.D. Ala. Nov. 3, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action alleging that Defendant placed unsolicited automatically dialed calls to his cellular telephone in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act of 1991 ("TCPA"). Defendant filed a motion to dismiss for lack of standing. The Court denied Defendant's motion. Defendant argued that: (i) Plaintiff has not suffered a concrete and particularized injury-in-fact, thereby precluding subject-matter jurisdiction; and (ii) even assuming Plaintiff had suffered an injury-in-fact, the injury was not traceable to any alleged violation of the TCPA and would occur anytime Plaintiff received a phone call. Id. at *3. Plaintiff asserted that the two calls he received were a nuisance, which briefly deprived him of the use of his phone, invaded his personal privacy, and wasted his time. Id. at *10. Additionally, Plaintiff asserted that he experienced a reduction in his cellular battery life as a result of Defendants' calls. Id. The Court found that Plaintiff asserted a personal connection to the harm claimed that was sufficient to establish this prong of the standing requirements. The Court stated that the two unsolicited calls described were made to Plaintiff's personal cell phone number and impacted him personally. Id. at *11. Defendant contended that Plaintiff suffered, at most, a de minimis injury which fell below a persistent pattern of invasive, unsolicited calling that the TCPA was designed to cover. The Court disagreed, and found that Plaintiff's allegations of at least one unauthorized phone call showed a sufficiently concrete injury. The Court held that the contact fell squarely within the scope of what the TCPA makes unlawful under § 227(b)(1)(A)(iii), i.e., a non-emergency call made to Plaintiff's cell phone number without his permission using an automatic telephone dialing system. Id. at *16. Defendant further contended that even if Plaintiff fulfilled the particularity and concreteness standards, he still lacked standing because he could not show that his injury was traceable to the challenged conduct of Defendant. Id. at *28. The Court again disagreed, and determined that the use of the auto dialer to call Plaintiff's cell phone number was the direct source that led to his claimed injury. Thus, the Court concluded that Plaintiff's intrusion injury was fairly traceable to Defendant's alleged violation of the TCPA's automated-dialing provision. Id. at *29. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

John, et al. v. Whole Foods Market*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 9770 (2d Cir. June 2, 2017). Plaintiff filed a putative class action alleging that New York City grocery stores operated by Defendant systematically overstated the weights of pre-packaged food products and overcharged customers as a result in violation of the New York Business Law. The District Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint for lack of Article III standing because he failed to allege a sufficient injury-in-fact. Id. at *1. On appeal, the Second Circuit concluded that Plaintiff plausibly alleged an injury-in-fact, and vacated and remanded for further proceedings. Id. at *2. Plaintiff included with his complaint a press release of the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs (the "DCA") entitled "Department of Consumer Affairs Investigation Uncovers Systemic Overcharging for Pre-packaged Foods at City's Whole Foods." Id. at *3. The press release announced the DCA's investigation of overcharging by Defendant and its preliminary findings that Defendant's New York City stores "routinely overstated the weights of its pre-packaged products, including meats, dairy and baked goods." Id. The DCA's investigation leading up to the press release took place from the Fall 2014 to the Winter of 2015, the same period in which Plaintiff allegedly made monthly purchases and which included the two stores that Plaintiff patronized. The District Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint pursuant to Rules 12(b)(1) and 12(b)(6), holding that Plaintiff lacked Article III standing because he failed to plausibly allege that he was overcharged by Defendant for a specific purchase. The District Court explained that, even if Plaintiff had standing, it would grant Defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. The Second Circuit observed that to satisfy the "'irreducible constitutional minimum' of standing," a Plaintiff "must have: (i) suffered an injury-in-fact; (ii) that is fairly traceable to the challenged conduct of Defendant; and (iii) that is likely to be redressed by a favorable judicial decision." Id. at *6. The Second Circuit opined that the critical basis for Plaintiff's claim that he was overcharged was the DCA's press release announcement that 89% of Defendant's pre-packaged products tested by the DCA were mislabeled, and the press release's conclusion that the mislabeling was "systematic" and "routine." Id. at *9. The Second Circuit found that when considered together, the press release and Plaintiff's monthly purchases provided a plausible basis to conclude that Plaintiff overpaid for items during the period alleged in the complaint. Id. The Second Circuit explained that when a Defendant asserts a "facial" challenge to standing, District Courts should continue to draw from the pleadings all reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor and presume that "general allegations embrace those specific facts that are necessary to support the claim.'" Id. at *9-10. The Second Circuit found that the District Court did not draw all reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor. The District Court was also troubled by the absence of allegations describing the DCA's methodology, but the Second Circuit noted that at the pleading stage, Plaintiff need not prove the accuracy of the DCA's findings or the rigor of its methodology; instead, he need only generally allege facts that, accepted as true, make his alleged injury plausible. Id. at *10. The Second Circuit determined that Plaintiff's complaint thus satisfied the "low threshold" required to plead injury-in-fact. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Second Circuit held that Plaintiff plausibly alleged that he suffered an injury-in-fact by pleading both the frequency of his purchases and the systematic overcharging of pre-packaged foods at the stores he patronized. Id. at *12. Therefore, the Second Circuit vacated and remanded the District Court's ruling dismissing Plaintiff's complaint for lack of standing.

Medellin v. Ikea U.S.A. W., Inc.*, 672 Fed. Appx. 782 (9th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff, a customer, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated California's Song-Beverly Credit Card Act by asking customers to provide their ZIP codes during credit card transactions. The District Court had certified a class comprised of individuals from whom a ZIP code was requested and recorded in conjunction with a credit card transaction. Subsequently, Defendant moved for decertification of the class, which the District Court granted. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit determined that Plaintiff lacked standing to pursue her claims in the District Court. The Ninth Circuit ruled that Plaintiff conceded that she alleged only a bare procedural violation of the statute and suffered no other cognizable harm. Id. at 783. The Ninth Circuit held that in accordance with the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540 (2016), a Plaintiff cannot "allege a bare procedural violation, divorced from any concrete harm, and satisfy the injury-in-fact requirement of Article III." Id. Therefore, the Ninth Circuit concluded that Plaintiff lacked standing. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit vacated the District Court's judgment and remanded with instructions that the District Court dismiss the action without prejudice for lack of standing.

Perlin, et al. v. Time Inc*., 237 F. Supp. 3d 623 (E.D. Mich. 2017). Plaintiff, a subscriber of People magazine, filed a putative class action against Defendant alleging that Defendant violated Michigan's Video Rental Privacy Act ("VRPA") and was unjustly enriched when Defendant sold her personal information. Defendant moved to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) on the basis that Defendant lacked both statutory standing and Article III standing. Id. at 627. Defendant also asserted that Plaintiff's unjust enrichment count failed to state a claim because Plaintiff suffered no monetary loss. The Court denied Defendant's motion. Id. at 644. The Court rejected Defendant's argument that the recent VRPA amendment – requiring that actual damages be pled – applied retroactively. Id. at 629. The Court determined that retroactive application was not appropriate because the express language of the amendment did not indicate a legislative intent that the amendment was to be applied retroactively. Id. Further, because retroactive application would impair Plaintiff's substantive and vested rights under the VRPA, the Court declined to apply the amendment retroactively. Id. at 637. The Court also held that Plaintiff had Article III standing, as a violation of the VRPA was sufficient to satisfy the injury-in-fact requirement. Id. at 637. The Court relied upon the plain language and legislative history of the VRPA and concluded that the statute was intended to protect consumers from disclosure of their personal information and created a right to privacy. Id. at 640. The Court concluded that even if a violation caused a harm that was not tangible, it still resulted in a real and concrete injury. Id. at 642. Thus, the Court ruled that Plaintiff had standing under the VRPA and Article III. Id. The Court also rejected Defendant's argument that Plaintiff must allege a monetary loss to properly state a claim for unjust enrichment, as monetary loss was not an element of the claim under state law. Id. at 643. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Perry, et al. v. CNN*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 7416 (11th Cir. April 27, 2017). Plaintiff alleged that Defendant violated the Video Privacy Protection Act ("VPPA") by tracking mobile application users' location and viewing activity without their consent. The District Court held that Plaintiff failed to state a claim under both laws because he was not a statutory "consumer" and the information at issue was not "personally identifiable information." Id. at *2. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit upheld the District Court's ruling. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's proprietary App (the "CNN App") was available for download on mobile devices, including on Apple, Inc.'s ("Apple") iPhone. Through the CNN App, users can get breaking news alerts, follow stories, and watch video clips and coverage of live events. The CNN App never seeks the user's consent to disclose the user's personal data to any third-parties. Id. Plaintiff alleged that the CNN App, without a user's knowledge, both tracked the user's views of news articles, and videos and also collected a record of the viewing activity. Id. at *3. Defendant then sent the collected record of viewing activity to a company called Bango, a third-party company that conducts data analytics. Id. Bango is ultimately then able to compile personal information, including the user's name, location, phone number, email address, and payment information, and it can attribute this information to a single user across different devices and platforms. Id. Defendant argued that Plaintiff failed to allege a legally cognizable injury in the light of the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540 (2016), because Plaintiff's alleged violation of a statutory right was not sufficiently concrete. The Eleventh Circuit disagreed, and stated that "the violation of a procedural right granted by statute can be sufficient in some circumstances to constitute injury-in-fact" so that "a Plaintiff in such a case need not allege any additional harm beyond the one Congress has identified." Id. at *6. Accordingly, the Eleventh Circuit stated that Plaintiff satisfied the concreteness requirement of Article III standing, as he alleged a violation of the VPPA for a wrongful disclosure. Id. at *7. However, the Eleventh Circuit found that the District Court did not err in dismissing Plaintiff's claims because he failed to state a claim under the VPPA. The Eleventh Circuit explained that the VPPA prohibits "[a] video tape service provider [from] knowingly disclos[ing], to any person, personally identifiable information concerning any consumer of such provider." Id. at *9. The statute defines "consumer" as "any renter, purchaser, or subscriber of goods or services from a video tape service provider." Id. In interpreting the term "subscriber," the Eleventh Circuit stated that it has previously held that the term requires an "on-going commitment or relationship between the user and the entity which owns and operates the App." Id. at *10. The Eleventh Circuit thus held that Plaintiff was not a subscriber because he had no on-going commitment or relationship with Defendant. Id. at *10-11. Accordingly, the Eleventh Circuit upheld the District Court's ruling dismissing Plaintiff's claims for failure to state a claim.

Robins, et al. v. Spokeo, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 15211 (9th Cir. Aug. 15, 2017). Plaintiff brought an action alleging that Defendant willfully violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") by publishing inaccurate personal information about him. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's database showed inaccurate information about him, such as that he had a greater level of education and more professional experience than he had, that he was financially better off than he actually was, and that he was married (he was not) with children (he did not have any). Plaintiff alleged that Defendant, as a consumer reporting agency, failed to "follow reasonable procedures to assure maximum possible accuracy of the information concerning" Plaintiff, and that its violation of § 1681e(b) of the FCRA was "willful." Plaintiff sought statutory damages of between $100 and $1,000 for himself, as well as for each member of a putative nationwide class. The issue of whether Plaintiff had standing to sue for the alleged statutory violation made its way to the U.S. Supreme Court, which in 2016 explained that "an invasion of a legally protected interest" that is both "concrete and particularized" is required to establish standing. Id. at *6. To be concrete, the alleged injury must "actually exist" and must be "real" and not "abstract." Id. Because the Ninth Circuit had not completed both parts of the standing analysis, the Supreme Court remanded the case for further review. On remand, the Ninth Circuit reaffirmed the threshold principle that "even when a statute has allegedly been violated, Article III requires such violation to have caused some real – as opposed to purely legal – harm to Plaintiff." Id. at *8. The Ninth Circuit explained that intangible harms, such as restrictions on First Amendment freedoms and harm to one's reputation, can be concrete enough for standing, although this is a "murky area." Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit stated that Plaintiff could not simply point to a statutory cause of action to establish an injury-in-fact. Turning to its standing analysis of Plaintiff's particular allegations, the Ninth Circuit conducted a two-step inquiry, including: (i) whether the statutory provisions at issue were established to protect Plaintiff's concrete interests (as opposed to purely procedural rights); and, if so, (ii) whether the specific procedural violations alleged in the case actually harmed, or presented a material risk of harm to, such interests. Id. at *11. First, the Ninth Circuit cited a long history of protections against dissemination of false information about individuals that underlies the FCRA, including common law protections against defamation and libel, to find that the interests protected by the FCRA are real and concrete. The harm alleged in the case, the Ninth Circuit concluded, "has a close relationship to a harm that has traditionally been regarded as providing a basis for a lawsuit," even if it is not the exact historical harm itself. Id. at *15. In the second step, the Ninth Circuit reasoned that, in many cases, "a Plaintiff will not be able to show a concrete injury simply by alleging that a consumer-reporting agency failed to comply with one of the FCRA's procedures." Id. at *17. The statute may be violated, but the violation alone is not enough. Here, however, Plaintiff pointed to multiple examples of information (e.g., his education level) that might be relevant to a prospective employer. The Ninth Circuit noted that it must look at the nature of the inaccuracy as part of its analysis. Even if the inaccuracy has a debatable negative impact (e.g., a greater level of education could make a Plaintiff deemed to be overqualified and passed over for a job), the information is nevertheless relevant, and its dissemination is not simply a technical statutory violation. The Ninth Circuit determined that the injury alleged in this case was not speculative because the dissemination of information already had occurred. The dissemination was the harm, and further alleged harm, such as being able to point to an actual missed job, was not required. The Ninth Circuit, therefore, ruled that Plaintiff had standing to pursue his claims.

South Carolina Clean Air Initiative, et al. v. Harbor Freight*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 77047 (D.S.C. May 16, 2017). Plaintiff filed a putative class action alleging Defendant violated several provisions of the Clean Air Act (the "Act"). The Act includes a citizen suit provision that allows citizens to request injunctive relief and civil penalties, payable to the United States Treasury, for the violation of any "emission standard or limitation" under the Act. Id. at *1-2. Specially, Plaintiff alleged that Defendant violated several provisions relating to the emissions control system ("ECS") warranty and offered an inadequate ECS warranty. Defendant is a tool and equipment discount retailer selling numerous products with small engines, including the Predator 2 cycle recreational gas generator specifically involved in this action. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss asserting that Plaintiff lacked standing because it alleged only statutory violations and not any concrete, particularized injury. Plaintiff argued that the alleged violations were substantive, not procedural, violations of the Act, and even if the violations were deemed procedural, Defendant had caused both concrete and particularized injuries. Id. at *5. Specifically, Plaintiff argued that Defendant committed an "informational injury" by failing to provide the warranty information required by the Act. Id. at *6. In regard to a particularized injury, Plaintiff contended that its injuries were particularized from every single citizen in the country because it held a defective warranty. Id. As to the concrete element, Plaintiff argued that the alleged ECS warranty violations were an "invasion of a legally protected interest sufficient to support standing" and the concrete harm had already occurred. Id. at *10. The Court held that Plaintiff's only allegations were statutory violations, as Plaintiff did not allege that the generator it purchased was defective, required any repairs, or exceeded any permissible emissions levels. Id. at *11-12. The Court therefore found that Plaintiff alleged mere violations of the Act, and had not alleged an injury-in-fact. While the Court did not suggest that a failure by a Defendant to comply with a statutory method of disclosure or other statutory requirements can never rise to the level of an injury sufficient to confer standing, it found that more must be alleged than in Plaintiff's complaint. Accordingly, the Court determined that Plaintiff lacked standing, and granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Susinno, et al. v. Work Out World Inc*., 862 F.3d 346 (3d Cir. 2017). In this class action, Plaintiff alleged that she received an unsolicited pre-recorded telephone call and voice-mail to her cellular phone in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Id. at *348. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment. The District Court granted the motion, finding that: (i) a single solicitation was not "the type of case that Congress was trying to protect people against;" and (ii) Plaintiff's receipt of the call and voice-mail caused her no concrete injury. Id. On appeal, the Third Circuit reversed and remanded the District Court's ruling. The Third Circuit found that Plaintiff's appeal posed two distinct questions, including: (i) does the TCPA prohibit the conduct alleged by Plaintiff; and (ii) if it does, was the harm alleged sufficiently concrete for Plaintiff to have standing to sue under Article III. Id. Defendant argued that the TCPA does not prohibit a single pre-recorded call to a cell phone if the phone's owner was not charged for the call. Plaintiff disagreed, and claimed that it does. Defendant asserted that when Congress prohibited pre-recorded calls to cell phones in the TCPA, it primarily was concerned with the cost of those calls. Id. at *349. The Third Circuit stated that § 227(b)(2)(C) of the TCPA provides that the Federal Communications Commission ("FCC"): may, by rule or order, exempt from the requirements of paragraph (b)(1)(A)(iii) of this sub-section calls to a telephone number assigned to a cellular telephone service that are not charged to the called party, subject to such conditions as the Commission may prescribe as necessary in the interest of the privacy rights the law is intended to protect. Id. The Third Circuit opined that if it were the case that cell phone calls not charged to the recipient were not covered by the general prohibition, there would have been no need for Congress to grant the FCC discretion to exempt some of those calls. Id. at *350. Accordingly, the Third Circuit held that the TCPA provided Plaintiff a cause of action for the conduct she alleged. The Third Circuit examined whether Plaintiff alleged a sufficiently concrete injury to establish constitutional standing to sue. Id. The Third Circuit noted that it previously had held that if one sues under a statute alleging the very injury the statute is intended to prevent, and the injury "has a close relationship to a harm . . . traditionally . . . providing a basis for a lawsuit in English or American courts," a concrete injury has been pleaded. Id. The Third Circuit therefore found that that all intangible injuries that meet this standard are concrete. Consistent with this legal standard, the Third Circuit held that the TCPA provided Plaintiff with a cause of action, and that her injury satisfied the concreteness requirement for constitutional standing. Id. Accordingly, the Third Circuit vacated the District Court's order dismissing her case and remanded for further proceedings.

Tanner-Brown, et al. v. Zinke*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 25070 (D.C. Cir. Dec. 12, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action asserting that the U.S. Department of the Interior ("DOI") must account for oil and gas revenues that may have been due a century ago to Black Freedmen members of formerly slaveholding Indian tribes. Id. at *1. Plaintiff Tanner-Brown's claimed interest in the case arose through her grandfather, George Curls, the son of former Cherokee slaves who owned 60 acres of land in Nowata County, Oklahoma. Plaintiff, the Harvest Institute Freedman Federation ("Federation"), sought redress as an organization that has "conducted research" and "provided financing and required legal resources, including counsel, to advocate on behalf of Freedmen." Id. at *2. A 1908 statute lifted restrictions on Freedmen buying and selling land allotments, and created conditions under which speculators swindled many of the new landowners. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs contended that the protections spelled out in the 1908 Act gave the DOI a fiduciary duty to monitor and control any leasing activity on minor Freedmen's allotments, and specifically to keep records of any oil and gas royalties derived therefrom. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs alleged that the DOI failed to abide by its fiduciary responsibilities and therefore owed an accounting to Tanner-Brown and other similarly-situated descendants. Id. The District Court held that both Tanner-Brown and the Federation lacked standing, and dismissed the claims. On appeal, the D.C. Circuit affirmed the decision, finding that the District Court correctly held that Tanner-Brown failed to allege an injury-in-fact because: (i) any injury Curls might have suffered did not confer standing on Tanner-Brown; and (ii) Tanner-Brown failed to allege that Curls suffered harm from the DOI's alleged accounting failures. Id. at *4-5. The D.C. Circuit determined that Tanner-Brown could not establish her standing to seek the particular relief at issue under her stated legal theory. Even when read generously, the D.C. Circuit found that the complaint and the submissions Tanner-Brown incorporated by reference did not identify any facts to support her theory that her grandfather was owed but not afforded an accounting. Finally, even assuming her grandfather suffered a concrete injury, Tanner-Brown failed to allege how she was thereby injured. Id. at *8. The D.C. Circuit also held that the Federation lacked standing. The D.C. Circuit reasoned that whether any Federation member had individual standing followed Tanner-Brown's claim of injury, because the complaint identified no other member or interest and made only conclusory assertions about other members' standing. Id. at *9. The D.C. Circuit also reasoned that the Federation offered only generalized assertions that suit would not require the participation of its individual members. The D.C. Circuit held that such conclusory pleadings could not establish standing. Accordingly, the D.C. Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling dismissing the claims for lack of standing.

Valdez et al. v. National Security Association*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4133 (D. Utah Jan. 10, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of individuals who lived or worked in Salt Lake City during the Salt Lake City Winter Olympic Games, filed suit against Defendants claiming that they violated their constitutional, statutory, and common law rights by conducting a warrantless surveillance program and sought declaratory and injunctive relief. Plaintiffs asserted that their email, text messages, and telephone communications were intercepted when Defendants unlawfully intercepted and stored their electronic communications. Defendants moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' complaint pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure on the basis that Plaintiffs failed to allege facts sufficient to establish Article III standing. Defendant asserted that Plaintiffs had not plausibly alleged that their communications were subject to National Security Association ("NSA") surveillance and that Plaintiffs also failed to plausibly allege that Defendants retained the communications. The Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss, ruling that Plaintiffs met their burden of establishing standing under Article III of the U.S. Constitution. Rule 8(a)(1) requires only that a complaint contain "a short and plain statement of the grounds for the Court's jurisdiction." Id. at *12. The Court rejected Defendants' argument that it must assess the plausibility of the facts alleged in ruling on Defendants' motion. Instead, the Court held that it is sufficient to just generally allege the facts establishing standing at the pleading stage. To establish standing under Article III, Plaintiffs must allege that they have suffered an injury-in-fact, that there is a causal connection between the injury and the conduct in question, and that the injury is likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. The Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss because the allegations in the Plaintiffs' complaint were sufficient as they were not "legal conclusions, bare assertions of the elements of standing, or sufficiently fantastic on their face as to defy reality." Id. at *27. Therefore, the Court held that it was required to accept Plaintiffs' allegations as true when assessing Defendants' motion to dismiss. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Vilcek, et al. v. Uber USA, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 113845 (E.D. Mo. July 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendants' direct, unlawful competition with the drivers interfered with their present and expected future business relationship with current prospective customers. Plaintiffs asserted a claim of tortious interference. Defendants had previously moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs filed an amended complaint, and Defendants again moved to dismiss. The St. Louis Metropolitan Taxicab Commission ("MTC") regulates taxis, drivers, and the taxicab companies operating in St. Louis City and County, and the governing procedures were stated in MTC's Vehicle For Hire Code ("Taxi Code"). Id. at *2. Under the Taxi Code, individuals may not operate a taxicab without first obtaining an MTC driver's license. Id. at *2-3. In September 2015, the MTC voted to allow Uber to operate in St. Louis City and County, but directed that the Uber drivers be fingerprinted and possess a Class E Missouri chauffeur's license, i.e., the same as all other taxicab drivers. Uber, however, disregarded the MTC's authority and rules and requirements, and launched its services in St. Louis City and County using drivers who did not comply with the Taxi Code licensing requirements for taxicab drivers. Id. at *3. Uber's entry into the taxicab business in St. Louis City and County was in violation of the MTC's rules, and the Taxi Code, and since then, Plaintiffs and the members of the class experienced decreases in revenue of 30% to 40% compared to the comparable time period in 2014 resulting from a decrease in passenger calls. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs alleged that when Uber began operating its ride sharing service in St. Louis City and County, its drivers became direct competitors with Plaintiffs and the class, and that this competition was unlawful because it was in violation of the Taxi Code and the MTC's regulations, as well as in violation of the statute creating and enabling the MTC. The Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs have failed to sufficiently allege a tortious interference claim. The Court noted that under Missouri law, a claim of tortuous interference with a contract or valid business expectancy required several elements, including: (i) a contract or valid business expectancy; (ii) Defendant's knowledge of the contract or relationship; (iii) intentional interference by Defendant inducing or causing a breach; (iv) absence of justification; and (v) damages resulting from Defendant's conduct. Id. at *9-10. The Court stated that a business expectancy is a "probable future business relationship that gives rise to a reasonable expectancy of financial benefit." Id. at *10. Further, the business expectancy must be "reasonable and valid" and not show just a "mere hope of establishing a business relationship." Id. The Court explained that a regular course of similar prior dealings suggested a valid business expectancy, and liability could not be predicated on "speculation, conjecture, or guesswork" and essential facts cannot be inferred without a "substantial evidentiary basis." Id. at *11. The Court found that Plaintiffs' amended complaint failed to satisfy the business expectancy element of a claim for tortious interference. Rather than setting out a valid and reasonable business expectancy in obtaining customers for their taxi business, the Court reasoned that Plaintiffs' claims were based on the mere hope that they will have customers for their taxis in the future. The allegations of a regular course of similar prior dealings with specific customers with whom it could be said Defendants interfered were merely vague references to passengers; there were no specific customers set out, nor any facts to establish that any "regular" customers indeed exist. Id. As there were no concrete allegations giving rise to a reasonable and valid business relationship, the Court held that Plaintiffs' allegations were nothing more than speculation, conjecture, and guesswork without a substantial evidentiary basis. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss.

White Glove Staffing, Inc., et al. v. Methodist Hospitals Of Dallas*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 144706 (N.D. Tex. Sept. 7, 2017). Plaintiff, a staffing company, brought suit against Defendants alleging employment discrimination and retaliation in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Texas Commission on Human Rights Act ("TCHRA"), and 42 U.S.C. § 1981. Defendants moved to dismiss arguing that Plaintiff lacked standing to bring such discrimination and retaliation claims. The Court granted Defendants' motion. Plaintiff began contract negotiations to provide servers, prep cooks, dishwashers, and set-up crews for Defendants. During these negotiations, Defendants allegedly informed Plaintiff that the head chef preferred Hispanic employees. Id. at *2. Plaintiff then provided Defendants an African-American prep cook, Carolyn Clay. After a few days, Defendants asked Plaintiff to send someone else. Plaintiff could not find another prep cook on short notice and sent Clay back to Defendants the following day. Defendants subsequently told Clay to go home and ultimately ceased contract negotiations with Plaintiff. First, the Court held that Plaintiff lacked standing to bring a claim pursuant to Title VII because Plaintiff and Defendants did not have an employer-employee relationship. Id. at *5. The Court found that, instead, Plaintiff and Defendants were negotiating a contract under which Plaintiff would act as an independent contractor. Id. at *5-6. As an independent contractor, Plaintiff did not have an employment relationship with Defendants, and therefore lacked standing to bring Title VII discrimination and retaliation claims. Id. at *6. Second, the Court noted that, with wording similar to Title VII, the TCHRA prohibits an employer from refusing to hire an individual or from discriminating against an individual in a manner that affects the individual's compensation or benefits based on the individual's race. Under the TCHRA, for both discrimination and retaliation claims, Plaintiff must have sought an employment relationship with Defendants. The Court determined that, because federal cases guide the interpretation of the TCHRA, an independent contractor is not an employee under the TCHRA. Id. at *6-7. The Court therefore concluded that the parties did not have an employment relationship sufficient to give Plaintiff standing under the TCHRA. Id. at *7. Third, § 1981 protects an individual's right to make and enforce contracts free from discrimination. To successfully plead claims under § 1981, Plaintiff must show that: (i) he or she is a member of a racial minority; (ii) Defendants had an intent to discriminate on the basis of race; and (iii) the discrimination concerned one or more of the activities enumerated in the statute. Id. at *7-8. The Court held that because Plaintiff was a corporation without a racial identity, it was not a member of a racial minority. As a result, the Court concluded that Plaintiff did not have standing to bring a discrimination claim under § 1981. Plaintiff argued that, even if it did not have standing as the direct target of discrimination, it should have standing derived from its non-Hispanic employees who would have filled the staffing positions with Defendants. The Court found that Plaintiff failed to cite any case law authorities supporting the notion that an employer could bring a § 1981 discrimination claim based on its relationship with minority employees. Id. at *9. The Court therefore granted Defendants' Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss Plaintiff's claims.

(lx) Statute Of Limitations Issues In Class Actions

Evans, et al. v. Arizona Cardinals Football Club,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51736 (N.D. Cal. May 15, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of retired football players, brought an action against football clubs in the National Football League alleging that each club concealed facts concerning medication given to Plaintiffs, concealed the illegality of their actions, and intentionally misrepresented that they cared about and prioritized Plaintiffs' health and safety. Id. at *15. Plaintiffs' first theory of liability was that "the Clubs concealed material facts relating to the medications." Id. Plaintiffs alleged at length that the clubs dispensed medication to them without making legally required disclosures, i.e., about side effects, risks, or appropriate directions. The Court found that even if Plaintiffs' insinuation that they suffered from an unusual array of such ailments proved true, Plaintiffs were carefully chosen from a pool of over a thousand putative class members. The Court stated that they should not be mistaken for a representative sample indicating some causal nexus between use of medication in the NFL and subsequent "internal organ" problems. Id. at *17. The Court opined that even assuming that Plaintiffs and their various ailments were a representative sample of the overall population of NFL retirees, that alone would still be insufficient to plead causation. Statistically, in any population as large as NFL retirees, some incidence of tumors and other organ-related ailments is to be expected, so the mere presence of such ailments did not speak to etiology. Id. at *20. The Court reasoned that additional factual allegations were required to indicate causation. The Court further noted that Plaintiffs' second amended complaint claimed that musculoskeletal injuries sustained in the NFL can cause obesity and related "internal" ailments, further undermining any suggestion that the mere presence of such ailments among NFL retirees implied etiology tracing back to excessive use of medication. Id. at *21-22. The Court therefore held that the second amended complaint failed to plead allegations showing causation as to any suggested theory of liability based on "internal organ claims." Id. at *22. Plaintiffs' second theory of liability was that "the Clubs concealed material facts relating to . . . the illegality of their scheme" Id. Plaintiffs alleged that the clubs' handling and distribution of controlled substances violated various laws and regulations and that the clubs knew their actions were illegal and took steps to conceal those illegal actions. Id. at *22-23. The Court determined that Plaintiffs failed to allege that this concealment would have made them behave differently had they known that a club's actions violated some law or regulation. Id. at *23. Therefore, Plaintiffs also did not properly plead any claim for relief based on a club's alleged concealment of the illegality of their scheme. Plaintiffs' third theory of liability was that: (i) the clubs represented that they cared about and prioritized players' health and safety but acted to the contrary; (ii) Plaintiffs took medication and continued playing while injured in reliance on the clubs' fraudulent conduct, and (iii) Plaintiffs suffered their alleged damages as a result. Id. Defendants also move for summary judgment as to most claims surviving dismissal on the basis that those claims were time-barred. Both sides agree that Maryland law applied, and that the applicable limitations period was three years. Id. at *29. Plaintiffs filed this action in May 2015, and therefore the Court stated that their claims were time-barred unless they accrued after May 2012. The Court found that with two exceptions, Plaintiffs' claims were time-barred, as they were predicated on damages supposedly attributable to musculoskeletal injuries sustained prior to 2012. Id. at *30.

(lxi) Stays In Class Action Litigation

Collins, et al. v. NPC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 176926 (S.D. Ill. Oct. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of delivery drivers for Pizza Hut restaurants, filed a collective and class action alleging that Defendant under-reimbursed its delivery drivers for vehicular wear and tear, gas, and other driving-related expenses, effectively paying drivers well below the minimum wage in violation of the FLSA and various state wage & hour laws. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs moved to conditionally certify a collective of all drivers. Id. at *3. Defendant moved to compel individual arbitration pursuant to an arbitration agreement signed by each named Plaintiff, or in the alternative, to stay all proceedings until the U.S. Supreme Court decided the legality of the class action waivers contained in the arbitration agreements. Id. at *4. The arbitration agreement signed by Plaintiffs required them to use binding individual arbitration for any claims and expressly prohibited Plaintiffs from acting on behalf of or as a part of any purported class, collective, representative, or consolidated action. Id. The Seventh Circuit held in Lewis v. Epic Systems Corp., 823 F.3d 1147 (7th Cir. 2016), that mandatory arbitration provisions precluding employees from seeking any class, collective, or representative remedies to wage & hour disputes are unenforceable because they interfere with employees' rights to engage in concerted activity under the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"). The Ninth Circuit held likewise in Morris v. Ernst & Young, LLP, 834 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 2016). The Second, Fifth, and Eighth Circuits have all held, however, that employee arbitration agreements containing class waivers are enforceable in Sutherland v. Ernst & Young LLP, 726 F.3d 290 (2d Cir. 2013), NLRB v. Murphy Oil USA, Inc., 808 F.3d 1013 (5th Cir. 2015), and Cellular Sales of Missouri, LLC v. NLRB, 824 F.3d 772 (8th Cir. 2016). Id. at *5. The Supreme Court granted the petition for certiorari in Lewis and consolidated the case with Morris and Murphy Oil. Defendants argued that because the Supreme Court's decision in Lewis would have a direct impact on this case, an immediate stay would simplify the issues in question, streamline the proceedings, and thus reduce the burden of litigation on the parties and the Court. Id. at *6-7. Defendant asserted that a stay would preserve both the resources of the Court and the parties in briefing, arguing, and determining pending and future motions. The Court agreed and held that a stay would simplify the issues in question, streamline the trial, and reduce the burden of litigation. Id. at *7. The Court stated that conditionally certifying a collective action and permitting class discovery, only to later decertify the collective action a few months later (if the Supreme Court reversed the Seventh Circuit in Lewis) would defeat the purpose of judicial economy. Id. at *8. The Court opined that the ruling in Lewis would have a direct impact on the issues in the case. Accordingly, the Court found that staying the case was "reasonable and prudent." Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for a stay pending the Supreme Court's ruling in Lewis.

Gesten, et al. v. Burger King,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 154733 (S.D. Fla. Sept. 22, 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, filed a class action alleging that Defendant printed transaction receipts revealed more than the last five digits of a consumer's debit or credit card number in violation of the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act ("FACTA"). Defendant filed a motion to dismiss the complaint for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. Defendant then moved to stay the proceedings pending resolution of the motion to dismiss. Defendant argued that resolution of the motion to dismiss could dispose of the entire matter, and Plaintiff served "overly broad, burdensome, and unnecessary discovery requests that would force Defendant to expend considerable time and resources." Id. at *2. At the outset, the Court stated that to evaluate the likelihood that a dismissal motion would be granted, it must take a "preliminary peek" at the merits of the motion. The Court explained that it must weigh "the harm produced by a delay in discovery" against "the likely costs and burdens of proceeding with discovery." Id. at *3. Upon review of the current record, the Court stated that there was such a strong likelihood that the motion to dismiss would be granted and that it outweighed Plaintiff's need to conduct discovery and the potential case management and scheduling problems that could result from a stay. Id. at *4. The Court noted that at the same time that Defendant requested the stay, Defendant also requested a 30-day extension of time to respond to Plaintiff's discovery requests. Defendant then filed an unopposed motion to extend all scheduling order deadlines by 30 days. Id. at *5. The Court granted the motion to extend all deadlines, which relieved some of the burden on Defendant while the Court considered the motion to dismiss. The Court opined that if Defendant had legitimate concerns that Plaintiff's discovery requests were overly broad, burdensome, or unnecessary, Defendant should raise the issue in the appropriate manner before the Magistrate Judge. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion for a stay pending a ruling on Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Metter, et al. v. Uber Technologies, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58481 (M.D. Fla. Oct. 25, 2017). Plaintiff, a rider, filed a class action alleging that Defendant's cancellations fees were arbitrarily imposed against riders who were not informed in advance of contracting for a ride that such fees, including the specific amount of the fees, may be automatically charged to their credit cards. Id. at *2. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration, claiming Plaintiff agreed to Defendant's terms of service, which mandated arbitration of the dispute. Plaintiff argued that Defendant's motion to compel arbitration should be denied because he never agreed to Defendant's terms and conditions, which were the source of the arbitration provision Defendant sought to invoke. Id. at *6. When Plaintiff registered his on-line account, he was required to click "REGISTER" to complete his sign-up process on a page displaying the alert: "BY CREATING AN UBER ACCOUNT, YOU AGREE TO THE TERMS OF SERVICE & PRIVACY POLICY." Id. The alert is a clickable hyperlink to Defendant's terms of service, which contain the arbitration provision. Defendant argued that Plaintiff affirmatively assented to its terms of service by clicking "REGISTER" in the face of the alert. Id. at *7. Plaintiff alleged that a pop-up keypad enabling him to enter his credit card information blocked the terms of service alert, preventing him from seeing it and thereby preventing him from assenting to the terms of service. Id. at *8. Defendant did not dispute that such an obstruction occurred, but it argued that the obstruction was irrelevant because Plaintiff could have seen the alert when he first reached the payment and registration screen, before he began entering his credit card information, and that the alert itself would have been visible to Plaintiff while the pop-up keypad was visible had Plaintiff scrolled down to the bottom of the screen. Id. at *8-9. The Court found Defendant's assertions were not sufficient to obviate any dispute of fact as to whether Plaintiff was on notice of Defendant's terms of service and thereby assented to them. Id. at *9. Given the functioning of the Defendant's app's registration process, and the reasonable doubts and inferences that must be drawn in Plaintiff's favor, the Court held that Plaintiff's declaration that he never saw the terms of service alert was credible and consistent with the functioning of the app. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiff raised a genuine issue of material fact concerning his notice of, and assent to, Defendant's terms of service. The Court concluded that it would be improper to conclude as a matter of law that Plaintiff had actual notice of Defendant's terms of service, or that he was on notice of the terms of service and affirmatively assented to them. Therefore, the Court denied Defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

(lxii) TCPA Class Actions

Blow, et al. v. Bijora, Inc.*, 855 F.3d 793 (7th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff brought a class action under the TCPA alleging that Defendant used an automated dialer to send mass marketing text messages to cellular telephones with Illinois area codes. The Court had previously granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification, and the parties subsequently filed cross-motions for summary judgment. The District Court ultimately granted summary judgment in favor of Defendant after concluding that Plaintiff had failed to demonstrate that Defendant used an automatic telephone dialing system in violation of the TCPA. Id. at 794. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the judgment of the District Court, although on different grounds. The Seventh Circuit reviewed an argument from Defendant that was not discussed in the District Court, namely that Defendant was entitled to summary judgment independent of the auto dialer question because Plaintiff consented to the text messages. The Seventh Circuit noted that the TCPA's prohibition on using an auto dialer applies only "absent the express consent" of the recipient. Id. at 803. The Seventh Circuit explained that the Federal Communications Commission ("FCC") stated in its 1992 Order that "persons who knowingly release their phone number have in effect given their invitation or permission to be called at the number which they have given, absent instructions to the contrary." Id. In elaborating, the FCC explained that "telemarketers will not violate our rules by calling a number which was provided as one at which the called party wishes to be reached." Id. The Seventh Circuit held that the record demonstrated that Plaintiff gave her cell phone number to Defendant on several different occasions, she signed up for a "frequent buyer card," and she had a "VIP" Card and an "CLIENT LIST" card with her name and cell phone number. Id. Both cards contained the following disclaimer: "Information provided to Akira is used solely for providing you with exclusive information and special offers." Id. The record also contained notes reflecting Plaintiff's request for a sales associate to call her when a pair of shoes arrived back in stock. Finally, the record established that Plaintiff texted Defendant in order to opt-in to Defendant's text program. Id. Defendant sent Plaintiff numerous texts, which had a disclaimer and instructions on how to unsubscribe. Plaintiff never followed the instructions to unsubscribe in these texts or otherwise attempted to opt-out of receiving texts from Akira. Id. at 804. Plaintiff argued that she never consented to Defendant's texts because she "provided her phone number to [Defendant] to receive discounts," but not to receive "mass marketing text messages." Id. The Seventh Circuit was unpersuaded that there was a distinction of legal significance between the two in terms of Plaintiff's consent. The Seventh Circuit opined that Plaintiff's attempt to parse her consent to accept some promotional information from Defendant while rejecting "mass marketing" texts construed "consent" too narrowly. Id. The Seventh Circuit therefore found that Plaintiff consented to the message, where she admittedly provided her cell phone number not on a generic form, but specifically in order to receive discounts. Id. The Seventh Circuit therefore concluded that Plaintiff provided prior express consent for the text messages, and granted Defendant's motion for summary judgement on her claims.

Cordoba, et al. v. DirecTV, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125486 (N.D. Ga. July 12, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action against Defendant pursuant to the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") alleging that Defendant made unsolicited calls marketing its products and services to people who placed their phone numbers on a national do not call ("NDNC") list as well as an internal do not call ("IDNC") list. Plaintiff moved for certification of two classes, and the Court granted Plaintiff's motion. Defendant also moved for leave to amend its answer to include an established business relationship ("EBR") affirmative defense. Id. at *15. Defendant argued that that the IDNC class lacked Article III standing because Plaintiff did not allege that the class members requested to be placed on Defendant's IDNC list and, therefore, they did not suffer an injury-in-fact. Id. at *21. The Court rejected this argument and concluded that Plaintiff had alleged a sufficiently particularized and concrete injury-in-fact – i.e., the invasion of privacy caused by the unwanted calls – to confer Article III standing on the IDNC class members. The Court noted that a majority of case law authorities have held that the mere receipt of telemarketing calls in violation of the TCPA constitutes a sufficient harm for purposes of Article III standing. Id. at *25. The Court ruled that the proposed class was ascertainable and rejected Defendant's argument that it was not ascertainable because Plaintiff could not adequately identify those class members who received calls for purposes of selling Defendant's services. The Court opined that certification should not be precluded because the list was over-inclusive, and Defendant should not be immunized from class liability because of its failure to keep adequate records in violation of the TCPA. Id. at *34. Defendant also argued that Plaintiff's proposed classes were not ascertainable because some class members were Defendant's customers who were subject to arbitration agreements or had an EBR with Defendant. The Court agreed with Plaintiff that the EBR was an affirmative defense for which Defendant had the burden of proof, and it remained an open question whether Defendant's customers could participate as class members. Id. at *36. The Court also rejected Defendant's argument that the class was not ascertainable because Plaintiff had not attempted to ascertain which of the telephone numbers belonged to residential or business subscribers, as the TCPA section at issue only prohibited calls to residential numbers. The Court concluded that the record did not indicate that there were many calls to businesses or that they were difficult to identify. Id. at *39. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification and granted Defendant leave to amend its answer. Id. at *49.

Dolemba, et al. v. Kelly Services, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13508 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 31, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging violations of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") and the Illinois Consumer Fraud Act ("ICFA"). Plaintiff alleged that Defendant violated the TCPA and ICFA by calling her cellular telephone using an automatic telephone dialing system ("ATDS") without her express consent. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiff's claims and strike the class allegations, and the Court granted the motion to dismiss and dismissed the class allegation as moot. In 2016, Plaintiff received a call on her cellular phone from Defendant using an ATDS. Plaintiff did not answer the call, and Defendant left a voice-mail message that solicited individuals for employment as machine operators. Plaintiff had previously applied for employment with Defendant in March 2007, and indicated interest in positions using office skills. In signing the application, Plaintiff provided her cell phone number and authorized Defendant to collect, use, store, transfer, and purge the personal information provided for employment-related purposes. Id. at *2. Plaintiff did not receive any communications from Defendant between the end of 2007 and February 2016. Id. at *3. Defendant argued that Plaintiff provided her cellular phone number to Defendant in her employment application and, in the same application, expressly consented to Kelly using that phone number for "employment-related purposes." Id. at *4-5. Plaintiff did not dispute that she provided her cellular number to Defendant in her employment application, but she argued that the call she received exceeded the scope of her consent and that her consent expired long before she received the call in 2016. Id. at *5. The Court held that since Plaintiff did not have further communications with Defendant after consenting to receive employment-related communications, her consent remained valid at the time she received the automated call. Id. at *6. The Court found that the call Plaintiff received clearly related to an employment opportunity. The Court stated that although the opportunity was not specifically tailored to the exact job interests Plaintiff indicated in her application, it still fell within the broad consent that she gave to Defendant to use her cellular phone number to contact her generally for employment-related purposes regardless of whether that job matched her job interests. Id. at *7. Therefore, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's TCPA claims. Plaintiff also alleged that Defendant engaged in unfair acts and practices by making the allegedly unauthorized robo-call to her cellular phone, in violation of §§ 2 and 2Z of ICFA. The Court stated that it already concluded that Plaintiff consented to receive phone calls from Defendant, meaning that no TCPA violation occurred. The Court also opined that receiving one pre-recorded message did not rise to the level of an oppressive practice. The Court held that Plaintiff's claims that she suffered damages such as "loss of time and loss of battery life" were so negligible from an economic standpoint as to render any damages unquantifiable. Id. at *11. The Court therefore also dismissed Plaintiff's ICFA claims. Finally, the Court stated that since it dismissed Plaintiff's claims, it declined address Defendant's arguments regarding the propriety of a class action, and dismissed the motion as moot.

Editor's Note: The ruling in Dolemba is believe to be the first TCPA class action brought against an employer for recruiting and hiring activities.

G.M. Sign, Inc., et al. v. Stealth Security Systems,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 132178 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 18, 2017). Plaintiff, a sign company, brought a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by sending unsolicited faxes. Defendant had contracted with Profax to send out faxes to a given list of customers twice in 2006, once to a group of 21,291 fax numbers and successfully received by 13,518 and a second to 50,267 fax numbers, of which 37,215 were successful. Id. at *2. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23(b) of "all persons who were successfully sent a fax advertisement from March 2006 through October 2006" that advertised the security services of "Security Alert specializing in all your security needs" for whom Defendant, Stealth Security Systems, Inc. "cannot prove evidence of prior express permission or invitation for the sending of such faxes." Id. at *3. Defendant contended that Plaintiff's proposed class failed the implicit requirement of ascertainability because Plaintiff was not a member of the proposed class, there was no objective method of identifying potential class members, and the proposed class was not definite. Id. at *4. The Court found Defendant's first contention frivolous as Plaintiff's corporate designee testified in a deposition that the company received the fax at issue. Defendant contended that the class was not ascertainable because there was no objective means of identifying members of the class. The Court stated that the Seventh Circuit has previously found that the ascertainability inquiry goes to "the adequacy of the class definition itself," not to "whether, given an adequate class definition, it would be difficult to identify particular members of the class." Id. at *5. A class definition satisfies the "objective criteria" standard if it is based on non-subjective criteria that identify a particular group, harmed during a particular time-frame, in a particular location, in a particular way. The Court found that Plaintiff's class definition met the standard as it defined the putative class as the group of persons who received during a specific time period fax transmissions from a specific party relating to specific services, without vagueness or subjectivity. Id. To the extent that Stealth argued that the proposed class was not ascertainable because there was no objective means of actually determining whether someone was a class member, that was not a basis to deny class certification. The Court noted that there was a list of over 1,700 individuals who in response to Stealth's fax advertisement requested not to be contacted. Id. at *6. The Court stated that even if no one beyond those individuals was ever identified, this was more than adequate, as classes as small as 40 people are sufficient to warrant class adjudication. Id. Finally, Defendant also objected to the class definition as non-ascertainable because it defined a "fail-safe" class. The Court found that as proposed, Plaintiff's class definition constituted a fail-safe class, for class membership would be predicated on Defendant's liability. Id. at *8. The Court opined that it could remove the phrase "for whom Defendant, Stealth Security Systems, Inc. cannot prove evidence of prior express permission or invitation for the sending of such faxes" from the class definition to remedy the problem. Id. at *9. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification subject to the modified class definition.

Golan, et al. v. Veritas Entertainment, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6684 (E.D. Mo. Jan. 18, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging violations of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Plaintiffs alleged that Defendants engaged in an advertising campaign for a movie which included telephone calls to approximately four million residential telephone numbers throughout the United States. Id. at *3. Plaintiffs asserted they received two telephone calls with a pre-recorded voice to their residential telephone number, without their consent. Plaintiffs claimed that Defendants violated § 227(b)(1)(B) of the TCPA, which prohibits persons from initiating calls to residential telephone lines using a pre-recorded voice to deliver a message without the called party's prior express consent. Plaintiffs sought to certify a class of all persons in the United States to whom Defendants initiated one or more telephone calls using a pre-recorded voice as part of the movie campaign. Id. The Court found that Plaintiffs established numerosity, as they provided deposition transcripts from Defendants that stated that Defendants called four million residential telephone numbers as part of the campaign. Id. at *7. Defendants argued that determining if a class member consented was an individual inquiry and could not be determined on a class-wide basis. The Court, however, noted that Plaintiffs submitted evidence showing that the issue could be resolved on a class-wide basis, including deposition testimony stating that none of the four million individuals called had consented to receiving future calls about movies for commercial purposes. Id. at *9-10. The Court further determined that there was no evidence that class members consented in other ways so as to require an individualized analysis. Id. at *10. Defendants also asserted that Plaintiffs could not prove injury with class-wide proof. Defendants contended that Plaintiffs could not establish a concrete injury, and therefore did not have standing because their injury was a bare procedural violation. Id. at *11. The Court reasoned that unwanted calls caused a risk of injury due to interruption, distraction, and invasion of privacy, which were concrete injuries and not just bare procedural violations. Id. at *13. The Court therefore held that Plaintiffs had standing to pursue their claims. The Court also found that common questions of law and fact predominated over individual questions. Common questions included whether Defendants initiated the phone calls using an artificial or pre-recorded voice to deliver a message to residential telephone lines for commercial purposes, if Defendants knowingly and willingly violated the TCPA, if these calls constituted "telephone solicitation," if Plaintiffs were entitled to damages, the amount of damages, and if Plaintiffs were entitled to injunctive relief. Id. at *14. Defendants argued that Plaintiffs' experiences were not typical of the class. Defendants asserted that other class members may have consented to the calls, been at home at the time the calls were made, answered the phone, and suffered a concrete injury-in-fact, unlike Plaintiffs. The Court rejected Defendants' points, and ruled that the class members did not have to have the same exact experience and course of conduct as the named Plaintiffs to establish typicality. Id. at *15. The Court also stated that Plaintiffs' previously relationship with counsel did not create a conflict of interest, as Plaintiffs' counsel were respected attorneys who had handled litigation of this magnitude in the past. The Court therefore ruled that Plaintiffs and their counsel were adequate representatives of the class. Id. at *17. Finally, as to superiority, the Court found that it was clear that a class action was the superior method of adjudication, as it would be efficient, conserve judicial resources, and allow for consistent rulings for all class members. Id. at *18. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Holtzman, et al. v. Turza*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 22799 (7th Cir. Nov. 14, 2017). In this almost a decade old class action alleging violations of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act, the Seventh Circuit held that the class prevailed on the merits but remanded for further proceedings concerning the remedy. The District Court had found that class counsel was entitled to a third of each class member's award as a contingent fee, but only if the class member collected the recovery ($500 per unauthorized fax), and that any remainder went back to Defendant. Id. at *1. The District Court then approved a mailing to class members asking each whether he or she wanted to claim the recovery (with a non-response implying consent) and to update any details necessary to ensure that checks reached the correct addresses. Defendant appealed again, arguing that the notice should have directed each class member to verify, under penalty of perjury, that he or she: (i) used a particular fax number from 2006 through 2008; (ii) received at that number a "Daily Plan-It" from Defendant; (iii) had not authorized Defendant to send the faxes; and (iv) agreed to the retention of class counsel and payment of the one-third contingent fee. Id. at *2. The Seventh Circuit noted that Defendant's first three requests concerning the notice essentially disputed the decision it already reached in 2013 holding: (i) that the record established to what telephone number the faxes had been sent and what the faxes contained; (ii) whose fax numbers those were was established from electronic records and did not depend on personal recollection; (iii) that it did not matter whether any class member remembered receiving the "Daily Plan-It;" and (iv) that any given recipient's consent was irrelevant because the faxes omitted the opt-out notice required by law. Id. at *2-3. The Seventh Circuit noted that Defendant's fourth requests implicitly disagreed with its decision in 2016, which concluded that class counsel was entitled to receive a third of the award to any class member who claims the money. To the extent Defendant contended that the ethics rules of Illinois precluded such a result, the Seventh Circuit found it just a form of disagreement with its 2016 decision, and further, was inconsistent with previous case law holding that federal rather than state law supplied the procedures used to administer class actions in federal court. Id. at *3. The Seventh Circuit thereby affirmed the District Court's ruling.

Katz, et al. v. American Honda Motor Co., Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 116191 (C.D. Cal. June 29, 2017). Plaintiff, a consumer, brought an action alleging that Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by placing automated telephone calls to his cellular phone after he purchased a new car. Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification, which the Court denied. Plaintiff's proposed class consisted of all individuals in the United Stated whose cellphone numbers were called by or on behalf of Defendant between October 16, 2013 and the present. Id. at *3-4. The Court first noted that Plaintiff met the numerosity requirement because Plaintiff submitted evidence of call logs demonstrating Defendant made calls to approximately 1.6 million telephone numbers between June 2011 and July 2016. Id. at *4. The Court also found that common questions of law or fact existed that were capable of class-wide resolution, including: (i) if Defendant placed calls to the class members' cellphone numbers; (ii) if the calling system Defendant's vendor used to place the calls was an automatic telephone dialing system under the TCPA; and (iii) if the telephone calls made constituted "telemarketing" under the TCPA. Id. at *5. Therefore, the Court ruled that Plaintiff met commonality. However, the Court determined that Plaintiff failed to meet the typicality requirement. The Court noted that Plaintiff did not provide prior express written consent to receive calls from Defendant. Defendant, however, offered evidence of prior express written consent by some putative class members, and therefore Plaintiff's claims were not typical to those of the class he sought to represent. Id. As to Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement, the Court opined that Defendants offered evidence demonstrating: (i) approximately 225,138 customers leased vehicles from Defendant from October 2013 to the present; (ii) there were different versions of lease agreements used by car dealers during the class period with different language regarding a customer's consent to receiving calls; (iii) the "vast majority" of 2015 lease agreements signed by customers were in paper form and housed in regional offices located throughout the United States; and (iv) only a "small percentage" of the 2015 lease agreements had been scanned and were electronically available, but even those agreements available electronically would need to be individually reviewed to determine which version of the agreement was signed by the customer. Id. at *8. The Court held that the evidence demonstrated that it would be required to make individualized inquiries – such as whether each class member signed a 2015 lease agreement, which version of the 2015 lease agreement was used, whether the language in the agreement included the requirements for prior express written consent, when the lease agreement was signed, and when calls were received – in order to determine whether each class member gave prior express written consent before receiving calls from Defendants. Id. at *8-9. Moreover, the Court opined that Plaintiff failed to demonstrate consent could be established through class-wide proof. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

Legg, et al. v. TPZ Insurance Agency*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 131020 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 15, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a class action under the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") alleging that Defendant placing unsolicited "advertising robo-calls" and telemarketing calls to Plaintiffs' cellular phones. Defendant moved to strike Plaintiffs' class allegations and Plaintiffs moved to certify moved for class certification. The Court granted Defendant's motion and denied Plaintiffs' motion. Defendant, through its subsidiaries, offered consumers various services related to pet adoption and pet insurance. Once service offered by Defendant in conjunction with pet adoptions was an initial 30-day free gift of pet health insurance. The 30-day free gift was offered to pet adopters at Defendant's partner animal shelters. The shelters used software provided by Defendant to gather information from adopters during the adoption process for the purpose of providing the 30-day free gift. To receive the free gift, the adopter must provide a valid email address and "opt-in" to receiving communications from Defendants via email. Id. at *3. During the adoption process, the adopters fill out paper work providing the shelter with their name, address, email address, and telephone numbers. The paperwork provided that unless they opt-out they may be sent information and special offers by mail or email regarding products or services that may be of interest, and that their personal information may be shared with third-parties so those third-parties may "contact you by mail or email for their own marketing purposes." Id. at *5. Plaintiffs proposed certification of two classes, including: (i) an "advertisement class" of all persons in the United States who Defendant called on their cell phone using an artificial or pre-recorded voice message where the person did not provide signed express written consent to receive automated pre-recorded calls from October 16, 2013 to the present; and (ii) a "robo-call" class of all persons in the United States who Defendant called on their cell phone using an artificial or pre-recorded voice message where the recipient did not give prior express consent to Defendants to receive automated calls from October 16, 2013 to the present. Id. at *5. The Court found that Plaintiffs met the requirements of Rule 23(a). However, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to meet the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3). Defendant argued that during the adoption process, adopters agreed to receive communications from Defendant and expected to receive such communications by phone in addition to email. Thus, Defendant argued that the question centered around what happened during each individual adoption process. Id. at *10. The Court noted that if an adopter expressly agreed and expected to receive calls from Defendant, and did receive those calls, the adopter had not been injured in any way, even if Defendant technically violated a procedural requirement of the TCPA. Id. at *11. The Court determined that the evidence showed that the trial in this case would be consumed and overwhelmed by testimony from each individual class member, and the shelter employee who assisted that member in the adoption process, to analyze whether the class member consented to receive the calls in question. Id. at *12-13. In short, the Court reasoned that the trial would involve hundreds, if not thousands, of mini-trials on the issue of consent alone. Given the evidence presented by Defendant, the Court held that Plaintiffs failed to establish that common questions predominated. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for class certification and granted Defendant's motion to strike the class allegations.

Mejia, et al. v. Time Warner Cable, Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120445 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 1, 2017). Plaintiffs in two consolidated cases filed class actions alleging that Defendant improperly placed unsolicited telephone calls to cellular phones in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Plaintiff Mejia alleged that Defendant called her repeatedly using an auto-dialer. Mejia petitioned the Court to join her case with a lawsuit filed separately by Plaintiffs Hunter and Villa, in which they claimed to have received and answered several of Defendant's calls despite requesting that Defendant stop calling them. Plaintiffs alleged that they were connected to a live representative after a pause, and therefore that an auto-dialer was used to make the calls. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that Plaintiffs failed to put forward sufficient proof that Defendant violated the TCPA by calling them with an auto-dialer or by playing an artificial or pre-recorded voice during unsolicited calls. The Court was also presiding over a related case, which alleged that Plaintiff Johnson received calls from Defendant made using an interactive voice response calling system that violated the TCPA. Defendant moved for judgment on the pleadings in both cases, arguing that recent amendments to the TCPA creating exemptions for government-sent messages regarding debts, while punishing private companies that send similar messages, had created a law that favors certain speakers, content and viewpoints in violation of the First Amendment. Id. at *34. The Court rejected Defendant's contentions that the law violated the First Amendment. The Court stated that the TCPA held up to strict scrutiny because it serves the government's interest in protecting the privacy rights of telephone subscribers and was narrowly tailored to achieve that interest. Id. at *44. The Court opined that the narrow exception, and the provision as a whole, were well-designed to further the interests that Congress sought to pursue with the TCPA. Id. at *48-49. However, the Court granted Defendant's motion with respect to the first calls placed to Plaintiffs Hunter and Villa, holding that Plaintiffs did not establish that the calls they received from Defendant were made for telemarketing purposes. However, the Court rejected Defendant's arguments that Plaintiffs lacked standing and that it was immune from liability because it was trying to reach its customers. The Court also denied Plaintiffs' motion for partial summary judgment, and rejected the position that an interactive voice response system the company used when placing calls constituted an auto-dialer under the TCPA. Accordingly, the Court granted in part and denied in part Defendant's motion and it denied Plaintiffs' motion.

Reyes, et al. v. Lincoln Automotive Financial Services*, 861 F.3d 51 (2d Cir. 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action alleging Defendant violated the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA") by repeatedly calling him after he defaulted on his car lease after he revoked his consent to be called. The District Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment, on the basis that: (i) the evidence of consent revocation was insufficient; and (ii) the TCPA does not permit revocation when consent is provided as consideration in a binding contract. Id. at 53. As a condition of his lease agreement with Defendant, Plaintiff consented to be contacted by Defendant using manual calling methods, pre-recorded or artificial voice messages, text messages, emails, and/or automatic telephone dialing systems. Id. At some point after the lease was finalized, Plaintiff stopped making his required payments, and as a result, on multiple occasions Defendant called Plaintiff in an attempt to cure his default. Plaintiff asserted that he mailed a letter to Defendant in which he wrote: "I would also like to request in writing that no telephone contact be made by your office to my cell phone." Id. at 54. Defendant contended that it never received Plaintiff's letter, or any other request to cease its calls and therefore it continued calling him. On appeal, Plaintiff contended: (i) that he introduced sufficient evidence to create a triable issue of fact as to whether he placed Defendant on notice of his revocation of consent; and (ii) that the TCPA, construed in light of its broad remedial purpose to protect consumers from unwanted phone calls, permits a party to revoke consent to be called, even if that consent was given as part of a contractual agreement. Id. at 54-55. As a preliminary matter, the Second Circuit agreed with Plaintiff that the District Court's finding that he did not revoke his consent to be contacted by telephone was improper on summary judgment. The Second Circuit stated that a genuine issue of material fact was in dispute and Plaintiff raised a jury question. Id. However, the Second Circuit agreed with the District Court that the TCPA did not permit Plaintiff to unilaterally revoke his consent. Id. at 55. The Second Circuit stated that Plaintiff's consent to be contacted by telephone was not provided gratuitously; it was included as an express provision of a contract to lease an automobile from Defendant. Id. at 57. Under such circumstances, the Second Circuit explained that "consent" is not revocable. Id. The Second Circuit noted that the common law is clear that consent to another's actions can "become irrevocable" when it is provided in a legally binding agreement. Id. Plaintiff argued that his consent to be contacted was revocable because that consent was not an "essential term" of his lease agreement with Defendant. Id. The Second Circuit disagreed and opined that in contract law, "essential terms" are those terms that are necessary in order to lend an agreement sufficient detail to be enforceable, but a contractual term does not need to be "essential" in order to be enforced as part of a binding agreement. Id. at 58. The Second Circuit found that a party who has agreed to a particular term in a valid contract cannot later renege on that term or unilaterally declare it to no longer apply simply because the contract could have been formed without it. Id. The Second Circuit concluded that it was well-established at the time that Congress drafted the TCPA that consent becomes irrevocable when it is integrated into a binding contract, and it found no indication in the statute's text that Congress intended to deviate from this common law principle in its use of the word "consent." Id. Accordingly, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision dismissing Plaintiff's claims.

Telephone Science Corp., et al. v. Asset Recovery Solutions*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1637 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 5, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action against Defendant for violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Plaintiff operated a service called "Nomorobo," which it designed to help consumers avoid incoming computerized telephone calls, calls made with either an automatic telephone dialing system ("ATDS"), or with a prerecorded or artificial voice. Id. at *2. In order to provide the Nomorobo service to consumers, Plaintiff maintained a honeypot group of telephone numbers, from which Plaintiff gathered data related to inbound calls. Nomorobo analyzed calls placed to Plaintiff's honeypot numbers using a specialized algorithm, and then either blocked or allowed an end-user call based on its data analysis. Id. Individuals and businesses subscribe to Nomorobo's call-blocking services for a fee. Id. at *3. According to Plaintiff, around March 2014, Defendant began calling telephone numbers in the honeypot using a predictive dialer. Plaintiff alleged that, between March 2014 and February 2016, Defendant placed approximately 12,240 calls to Plaintiff's honeypot numbers, of which 747 were answered. The Court previously had granted Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint with prejudice, for failure to satisfy the zone-of-interests test under 47 U.S.C. § 227(b) of the TCPA. Plaintiff subsequently filed a post-judgement motion for an order: (i) to alter the Court's opinion pursuant to Rule 59(e); and (ii) to grant Plaintiffs leave to file an amended complaint pursuant to Rule 15(a)(2). The Court denied Plaintiff's motion. The Court read 47 U.S.C. § 227(b)(1)(A)(iii) "as guarding against the receipt of, and payment for, unwelcome robo-calls," particularly those which "threaten public safety and inappropriately shift marketing costs from sellers to consumers." Id. at *4. The Court had held that Plaintiff's interests fell outside of this zone of interests. In particular, the Court had observed that the sole reason Plaintiff subscribe "to 'thousands' of honeypot numbers is to gather a 'large quantity' of data in order to 'detect high frequency robo-calling patterns' and to 'distinguish' between callers for its Nomorobo customer-service offerings." Id. at *5. Plaintiff asserted that Defendant's robo-calls served no useful purpose to Plaintiff and therefore, were unwanted and a nuisance. Plaintiff further alleged that the continued calls had an adverse effect on Plaintiff's business and interstate commerce in general. Id. at *14. Ultimately, that Court determined that even accepting these allegations as true and drawing all reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor, as a telecommunications service provider interested in commercial data collection for customer-service offerings, Plaintiff did not fall "within the class of Plaintiffs whom Congress has authorized to sue" under the TCPA. Id. The Court held that Plaintiff's supplemental allegations did not change its prior recognition that the only reason for the volume of calls to Plaintiff was due to the nature of Plaintiff's business, which was providing telecommunications services. Id. Furthermore, as the Court had previously held, Plaintiff's alleged damages – the per-minute charges incurred when answering known robo-calls in May 2015 – were not of the vexatious and intrusive nuisance nature sought to be redressed by Congress in enacting the TCPA, but rather were indirect, economic, and inherent to its business. Id. at *15. Accordingly, the Court denied Plaintiff's motion to alter its prior opinion pursuant to Rule 59(e) and to grant leave to file an amended complaint pursuant to Rule 15(a)(2).

The Backer Law Firm, et al. v. Costco*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 107981 (W.D. Mo. April 27, 2017). Plaintiff, a law firm, filed an action alleging that Defendant sent an unsolicited facsimile in violation of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"). Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23, and sought to certify a class of all persons or entities to whom Defendant sent one or more facsimiles promoting its products, services, or memberships between April 2, 2011 and April 2, 2015. Id. at *2. Defendant argued that Plaintiff had not proven that every class member actually received an unsolicited fax advertisement to demonstrate class-wide standing. Id. at *5. However, the Court stated that the plain language of the TCPA merely prohibits the "use [of] any telephone facsimile machine, computer, or other device to send, to a telephone facsimile machine, an unsolicited advertisement." Id. at *6. In support of class certification, Plaintiff provided a list (the "class list") of approximately 1,552 persons and/or entities to whom Plaintiff contended Defendant sent one or more advertisement faxes between April 2, 2011, and April 2, 2015. Id. at *7. The class list was distilled from a report of at least 10,000 entries ("MAP list"), generated to capture all entries referencing "faxes and faxing" associated with Defendant locations between April 2, 2011, and January 20, 2016. Id. at *7-8. The Court found that Plaintiff demonstrated that the class was ascertainable by using "objective criteria" to determine the membership of the proposed class by having pared down the MAP list and by producing the class list, which allowed the class to be ascertained with certainty. Id. at *9. The Court held that Plaintiff demonstrated that the putative class faced common questions of law and fact relating to Defendant's compliance with the TCPA, the determination of the truth or falsity of which would lead to the class-wide resolution of the matter. Id. at *11. The Court stated that, as to typicality, it was satisfied that Plaintiff's claims had the same characteristics as the claims of the class at large, because the complaint was premised on the transmission of unsolicited fax advertisements by Defendant, which was the same course of conduct at issue for all members of the proposed class. Id. at *12. The Court also determined that the adequacy requirement was met because Plaintiff had the same interest and injury of TCPA violations as the class, had no currently discernable interests antagonistic to the interests of other class members, and was being represented by competent class counsel. Id. at *14. The Court further found that Plaintiff met the requirements of Rule 23(b). As to predominance, the Court noted that whether Defendant violated the TCPA by transmitting unsolicited fax advertisements to the class was a common question that predominated over any inquiries affecting only individual members raised by Defendant, such as the exact times at which the faxes were sent, which employee sent the faxes, and which machine was used to send the faxes. Id. at *15-16. Moreover, the Court concluded that class treatment was a superior form of adjudication in this matter, as individual treatment of all 1,552 potential claims that involved common issues presented by all members would be unrealistic and unnecessarily repetitive. Id. at *17-18. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification

(lxiii) The Adequacy Of Representation Requirement For Class Certification

Henderson, et al. v. Bank Of New York Mellon*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 156021 (D. Mass. Sept. 25, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action alleging that Defendant, the trustee for thousands of trusts, breached its fiduciary duties to its trust beneficiaries by imprudently investing trust assets in poorly performing proprietary and affiliated investment vehicles and by charging unauthorized fees for the preparation of tax returns. Id. at *1-2. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, and Defendant moved to strike named Plaintiff Ashby Henderson on the basis of inadequacy. Id. at *2. Defendant argued that Henderson did not meet the adequacy requirement of Rule 23(a)(4) because: (i) she did not have a sufficient understanding of the case to protect the interests of the class; and (ii) rather than meaningfully participating in the case, Henderson had abdicated control of the case to Brian McTigue, a lawyer who Defendant argued was unfit to represent the interests of the class. Id. at *5. Defendant further argued that Henderson's reliance on McTigue created a conflict with the class because the Court already had refused to appoint McTigue as class counsel. Id. The Court stated that, in actions such as this one involving complex financial matters, a named Plaintiff is not required to have expert knowledge of the details of the case and may properly place a great deal of reliance on counsel. Id. The Court found that Henderson demonstrated sufficient knowledge of her claims to serve as class representative because at her deposition she was able to explain the essential nature of her claims, at least to the extent that is reasonable to expect from a layperson class representative in a complex financial case. Id. at *6. Defendant further argued that Henderson was inadequate because she failed to attend or call in to the parties' mediation. Id. at *7. The Court, however, determined that the evidence in the record showed that the mediator permitted Henderson to participate by phone. Id. at *7-8. Plaintiffs' counsel represented to the Court that Henderson was available by phone and that she conferred with counsel telephonically multiple times during the course of the mediation. The Court also concluded that Henderson had not ceded control of the litigation to McTigue. The Court was previously made aware of discord among Plaintiffs' counsel that resulted in McTigue firing the other Plaintiffs' counsel. The Court denied McTigue's motion to be appointed interim lead class counsel upon finding that his conduct during the litigation was "deeply disturbing," "contumacious," and "uncivil." Id. at *8. Plaintiffs' counsel came to an agreement whereby Bailey & Glasser LLP and the Howard Law Firm would serve as interim co-lead counsel and McTigue's firm would serve on an executive committee under the direction of the co-lead counsel. The Court confirmed that Henderson understood that, even if McTigue served as her contact person, the whole team of Plaintiffs' lawyers were representing the putative class. Id. Defendant claimed that, notwithstanding this formal arrangement, Henderson continued to rely solely on McTigue while ignoring other Plaintiffs' counsel. The Court found that the arrangement was not problematic so long as Henderson understood that she was being represented by the whole team of interim class counsel. Id. at *10. Moreover, Henderson testified that she worked with other Plaintiffs' counsel in preparation for her deposition. In sum, the Court held that Henderson demonstrated adequate knowledge of the case to serve as class representative, that she has not ceded control of the case to unfit class counsel, and that her interests did not conflict with the interests of the class. Id. at *11. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendant's motion.

Kurtz, et al. v. Kimberly-Clark Corp.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27388 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, groups of consumers in three related class actions, alleged that the moist toilet wipes sold by the retailer Defendants, produced by the manufacturer Defendants, and marked "flushable" were defective in labelling because they were not really flushable. Id. at *1. Plaintiff filed three related class actions, including the Kurtz action, the Belfiore action, and the Honigman action. Plaintiffs in the Honigman action had not moved for class certification. Plaintiff in the Belfiore action moved to certify a class of everyone who purchased Charmin Freshmates, a flushable wipes product, in New York. Plaintiff in the Kurtz action based his complaint on separate claims under New Jersey and New York state law. On the Court's suggestion that the same Plaintiff could not represent a New York class and a New Jersey class, Plaintiff in Kurtz agreed not to seek certification of a New Jersey class. Id. at *3. The Court therefore considered Plaintiff's motions to certify a nationwide class and two New York sub-classes of everyone who purchased the Kimberly-Clark flushable wipes product and the Kirkland Signature flushable wipes product in New York. The Court noted that it indicated at a previous hearing that classes based on New York purchasers and on New York law claims would be certified. Id. at *6. However, the Court denied certification of a national class. The Court held that Plaintiff failed to demonstrated the financial or other capacity to adequately represent a national class of consumers who purchased flushable wipes manufactured by Defendants. Id. at *7. Plaintiff had expressed reluctance to conduct a scientific survey of consumers to determine a reasonable consumer's understanding of the term "flushable." Id. The Court opined that conducting such a survey on a national scale would be costly. Id. The Court determined that limiting certification to two New York sub-classes and denying certification of a nationwide class was appropriate as the events underlying his claim took place in New York and discovery was largely confined to New York. Additionally, class discovery conducted beyond the New York branch was very limited. Id. The Court therefore certified three classes – one in the Belfiore action and two in the Kurtz action – each of which involved different Defendants and a different product, but all of which relied on New York law and purchases in New York.

Mooradian, et al. v. FCA US, LLC,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 205877 (N.D. Ohio Dec. 14, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a putative class action alleging defects in Defendant's automobiles relating to casting sand used in the engine parts that allegedly seeped into the vehicles' radiators and created a sludge, which resulted in heating and cooling issues. Defendant moved for sanctions for spoliation of evidence. The Court granted the motion in part. During discovery, Defendant requested that a putative class representative produce his vehicle at an authorized dealership of Plaintiffs' choice for inspection. After that request, the named Plaintiff White, one of the class representatives, took his vehicle to an unauthorized automobile service location and had the coolant in his radiator flushed upon his counsel's request and without notice to Defendant; a video was taken of the process. White received two unlabeled, unsealed jugs of liquid that purportedly came from his radiator. Thereafter, White left the jugs in his car during a 12-hour work shift and later in the breezeway of his mother's house for about three weeks. He then picked them up and brought them to his deposition. White also received several low-quality videos that purported to show his vehicle being serviced. Neither White and his counsel, nor any representative of Defendant observed the making of the videos. The Court found that the factors for imposing sanctions for spoliation of evidence were satisfied because: (i) White had control over the evidence; (ii) the evidence was destroyed with a culpable state of mind; and (iii) the destroyed evidence was relevant to the party's claim or defense. At the outset, the Court noted that the motion for sanctions concerned perhaps the most important piece of evidence in the case. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' arguments against sanctions, including that: (i) Defendant's request for inspection was ambiguous; (ii) Defendant had extracted fluid from the radiator of another Plaintiff's vehicle; and (iii) White did not destroy or alter evidence. The Court determined that sanctions were appropriate even though the Court noted that it could not determine if the spoliation was a product of maliciousness or simply incompetence. Id. at *8. The Court further ruled that White's actions made him an atypical member of the class and gave Defendant numerous defenses against him that would not apply to the class as a whole. As such, the Court disqualified White from serving as a class representative, but declined to decide whether he could later participate as a class member if a class was certified. In addition, the Court prohibited Plaintiffs from supporting their motion for class certification with any evidence stemming from the liquid drained from White's vehicle, or any work done on that vehicle during the service at issue. The Court also barred Plaintiffs from using such evidence in dispositive motions or at trial. Finally, the Court declined to disqualify the Plaintiff's counsel from acting as class counsel, but opined that Defendant could raise counsel's potential disqualification again at the class certification stage. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for sanctions in part, and disqualified White from serving as a class representative. Id. at *10.

(lxiv) The Cy Pres Doctrine In Class Actions

Dial Corp, et al. v. News Corp.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 196637 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 20, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action accusing Defendant of antitrust violations by working to shut would-be rivals out of the market for in-store advertising services like coupon dispensers and shopping cart advertisements. The parties ultimately settled the matter and the Court authorized the distribution of a $250 million settlement fund. Lead counsel issued all claimant checks and $1.97 in accrued interest remained undistributed. The Court noted that this sum was "so miniscule that attempting to distribute it among class claimants pro rata would be akin to splitting the atom." Id.

at *5. The Court noted that the efforts of lead counsel and the claims administrator to shepherd the distribution process offered a paradigm for smooth and efficient claims administration. The Court stated that if only all class action settlements could end on such a high note, the nettlesome problems inherent with cy pres distributions might disappear. Id. This Court commended lead counsel and authorized the claims administrator "to keep the change." Id.

Mateo-Evangelio, et al. v. Triple J Produce, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135580 (E.D.N.C. Aug. 24, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of packing house employees, filed a class and collective action alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the FLSA, the North Carolina Wage & Hour Act ("NCWHA") and the Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Worker Protection Act ("AWPA"). The parties ultimately settled the matter and resolved all claims. The settlement agreement provided for payments totaling $328,920 to the named Plaintiffs and class members based on the class action and collective action claims asserted in the complaint. The Court granted final approval of the settlement and final class notice. Notice was send to 306 potential class members. Only four claims had been submitted at that time for the FLSA fund, three claims had been submitted for the NCWHA fund, and 21 claims had been submitted for the AWPA fund, of which 11 had been determined "invalid" by the class action settlement administrator. Id. at *6. Plaintiffs subsequently filed a motion for cy pres award of AWPA funds and Defendant filed a motion for reversion of the remaining FLSA and NCWHA funds. The Court granted Plaintiffs' motion in part and denied Defendant's motion. The Court first noted that to the extent there were any remaining NCWHA and FLSA settlement funds upon filing of joint final report of the parties, it directed such funds be distributed in the aggregate with the remaining AWPA funds, upon final accounting of valid claims, to the designated cy pres recipient. Id. at *7. The Court stated that given the statutory provisions at issue in the AWPA class claims, the statute reflects more particularly an objective in those provisions to ensure that farm workers are employed and paid in accordance with statutory wage, record-keeping, and disclosure requirements. The Court explained that a cy pres recipient in this instance should be an organization whose interests and purposes align with farm worker interests in receiving correct wages and disclosures that are the subject of the lawsuit, and with the purposes of the AWPA in protecting those interests of farm workers. Id. at *11. The Court found that Plaintiffs' proposal of the Student Action With Farm Workers of Duke University ("SAF") was the best match to have interests and purposes closer than the others to the lawsuit, farm workers, and the AWPA. Id. at *12. Accordingly, the Court granted that all unclaimed funds be paid to the SAF. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion regarding designation of cy pres recipient in part, and denied Defendants' motion.

(lxv) The Numerosity Requirement For Class Certification

Mulvania, et al. v. Sheriff Of Rock Island County*, 850 F.3d 849 (7th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff brought an action against Defendants, alleging that four male correctional officers assaulted her as she was being booked into the jail on investigation of domestic violence charges, in violation of her Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. Plaintiff further alleged that the assault induced a seizure that required her to be hospitalized. Plaintiff amended her complaint three times, and eventually brought class claims to challenge Defendant's policy of requiring incoming female detainees to remove non-white underwear and underwire bras. Plaintiff filed a motion to certify the proposed class, which the Court denied. Plaintiff appealed the ruling and argued that the District Court erred when concluded that she failed to meet the predominance and numerosity requirements of Rule 23. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit agreed that the District Court incorrectly applied the predominance requirement, but found no error in its ruling on numerosity. Id. at 858. The District Court concluded that common issues did not predominate in the underwear claim because the damages would vary for individual class members based on factors such as how long a detainee was deprived of her underwear, whether she was on her menstrual cycle or pregnant, and other considerations. Id. at 859. The Seventh Circuit stated that case law authorities in every circuit have uniformly held that the Rule 23(b)(3) predominance requirement could be satisfied despite the need to make individualized damage determinations. The Seventh Circuit found that in cases like this, where damages must be assessed individually, a District Court may "bifurcate the case into a liability phase and a damages phase." Id. The Seventh Circuit held that the District Court therefore erred when it ruled that class certification was precluded based on the need for damages to be assessed individually. However, the Seventh Circuit found that the error was harmless because Plaintiff's proposed class did not meet the numerosity requirement and therefore class certification was properly denied. Plaintiff estimated that the class would have 41 members. The Seventh Circuit noted that the District Court had identified several problems with Plaintiff's calculation and overall numerosity argument, yet Plaintiffs failed to address most of these problems on appeal. Id. at 860. First, Plaintiff did not address the impracticability of joinder in the amended motion in support of class certification. Second, Plaintiff did not explain critical ambiguities in how the potential class size was calculated. Third, the District Court disagreed with Plaintiff's class start date of November 15, 2008, which was two years before Plaintiff's first complaint. Id. Plaintiffs addressed only the third issue on appeal. The District Court calculated that a class of 29 members existed based on a class start date of April 24, 2010, two years before Plaintiff filed the third amended complaint (which first alleged the underwear class claims). Id. Plaintiff argued that this class start date was incorrect because, under Rule 15(c), the third amended complaint "related back" to the initial complaint filed on November 15, 2010. Id. However, the Seventh Circuit noted that Plaintiff cited no authority that supported this argument. The Seventh Circuit therefore determined that the District Court did not err by basing its start date for the numerosity calculation on the third amended complaint, which was when the underwear class allegations were first introduced. The Seventh Circuit held that Plaintiff's proposed class did not met the numerosity requirement of Rule 23(a). Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling denying class certification.

(lxvi) The Predominance Requirement For Class Certification

In Re Class 8 Transmission Indirect Purchaser Litigation*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 2328 (3d Cir. Feb. 9, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a putative antitrust class action alleging a conspiracy among manufacturers of heavy-duty trucks and a supplier of transmissions to maintain the supplier's monopoly in the heavy-duty truck transmissions market. Plaintiffs alleged that this conspiracy resulted in their paying artificially inflated prices for trucks that contained the transmissions at issue. Id. at *2-3. After Plaintiffs moved for class certification, the District Court found that Plaintiffs failed to meet the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3). On appeal, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Plaintiffs alleged that manufacturers of Class 8 trucks took orders from customers to build trucks customized to the customers' needs and then purchased component parts from suppliers. Plaintiffs were four manufacturers of Class 8 trucks and Eaton Corp., the primary supplier of Class 8 transmissions. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs were "indirect" purchasers of Class 8 transmissions, as they purchased trucks containing Eaton transmissions from authorized agents or dealers of the truck manufacturers. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs alleged that the truck manufacturers conspired among themselves and with Eaton to secure Eaton's monopoly in the Class 8 truck transmission market by entering individually into long-term agreements with Eaton in 2000 to 2001. Plaintiffs asserted that, as a result of the agreements and market competition foreclosure, they paid supra-competitive prices for Class 8 trucks and the transmissions. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs moved for class certification, and the District Court concluded that Plaintiffs failed to establish the threshold Rule 23(b)(3) predominance requirement that common evidence could prove that all or nearly all of the proposed class members (i.e., indirect purchasers) had paid a higher price than they would have absent the alleged conspiracy. The District Court stated that Plaintiffs needed to demonstrate that common evidence could prove that: (i) Eaton overcharged the truck manufacturers for Class 8 transmissions; (ii) the truck manufacturers passed on this overcharge to direct purchasers; and (iii) direct purchasers passed on the overcharge to Plaintiffs. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs primarily relied on the expert report and testimony of Dr. Russell Lamb, an economist, who analyzed each requirement through regressions. Id. at *9. Plaintiffs argued that the District Court abused its discretion by faulting their expert economist's class-wide impact analysis for excluding certain data and failing to consider their expert's revised rebuttal report that included additional data. The District Court found that Dr. Lamb's regression did not test class-wide impact because it was based solely on a portion of line haul transmission sales data, excluding performance transmission sales, and excluded data from two truck manufacturers, whose sales comprised over 40% of the line haul trucks. Id. at *10. The District Court determined that the other regression analysis was based on less than 1% of total truck sales from only California. Id. at *11. The District Court therefore concluded that Plaintiffs failed to show that common issues predominated as to the entirely of the class that Plaintiffs sought to certify. The Third Circuit agreed and stated that, if Plaintiffs were seeking to certify a class across several states covering hundreds of thousands of sales, the District Court properly concluded that Dr. Lamb's analysis was insufficient to demonstrate class-wide impact. Id. at *11-12. The Third Circuit concluded that the District Court conducted a rigorous analysis of Plaintiffs' theory of class-wide impact and all the available evidence, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in its analysis. Id. at *12. The Third Circuit therefore upheld the District Court's denial of class certification.

Landeros, et al. v. Pinnacle Recovery, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 9419 (11th Cir. May 30, 2017). Plaintiffs, individually and on behalf of all similarly-situated individuals, filed a complaint against Defendant alleging violations of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA"). Plaintiffs asserted that Defendant attempted to collect a debt through a false, misleading, or deceptive communication. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification of a proposed class of all persons in the United States who received a form collection letter from Defendant. Id. at *2. Following discovery, the parties settled, and thereafter sought the District Court's approval of a class action settlement and proposed class certification under Rule 23(b)(3). The District Court denied the motion for preliminary certification of the class. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's order. The FDCPA prohibits a debt collector from using "any false, deceptive, or misleading representation or means in connection with the collection of any debt." Id. at *5. The Sixth Circuit stated that the District Court properly determined that Plaintiffs did not satisfy the predominance requirement in Rule 23. The Sixth Circuit concluded from the record that the District Court correctly declined to certify the class because whether the contents of the letter were false, deceptive, or misleading turned to the unique factual circumstances of each individual who received the letter. Furthermore, Defendant's letter made no unqualified or incomplete statement about what the law required. The Sixth Circuit stated that a determination about whether the contents of Defendant's letter violated the FDCPA was not possible without an inquiry into the factual circumstances of each recipient's indebtedness and the intentions of Defendant as to that particular recipient. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit found that the District Court properly denied class certification because the predominance requirement was not met. Plaintiffs urged the application of the "least sophisticated consumer" standard in order to salvage their FDCPA class action claim and negate the individualized inquiry. Id. at *8. Plaintiffs contended that under this standard, the least sophisticated consumer would be deceived by the letter regardless of the factual circumstances applicable to each recipient of the letter and that the District Court erred by not employing this standard. The District Court found that this standard did not apply in this case because whether the letter was false or misleading turned on the factual circumstances particular to each recipient. The Sixth Circuit agreed that the least sophisticated consumer standard did not apply because the consumer's sophistication here was irrelevant, as the merits of Plaintiffs' FDCPA claims did not turn on the sophistication of the person who read the letter. Rather, the Sixth Circuit explained that the merits of the claims depended on the objective factual circumstances unique to each recipient's indebtedness. Thus, the potential falsity or tendency to deceive depended solely upon objective facts or the intentions of Defendant, which varied from class member to class member. Id. at *10. As such, the Sixth Circuit held that the least sophisticated consumer standard did not apply in this case. Accordingly, the Sixth Circuit found that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the parties' joint motion for class certification and mooting their joint motion for approval of a settlement agreement. Id. at *10-11.

Slade, et al. v. Progressive Insurance Co.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 8229 (5th Cir. May 9, 2017). Plaintiff, an insured of Defendant, alleged that Defendant improperly calculated the value of total loss vehicles in Plaintiff's insurance policy. The District Court had previously certified a class of insured individuals asserting common law fraud claims. On appeal, the Fifth Circuit reversed the District Court's ruling. Id. at *1-2. The Fifth Circuit stated that it has held consistently that "a fraud class action cannot be certified when individual reliance will be an issue." Id. at *12. The Fifth Circuit reasoned that fraud actions that require proof of individual reliance cannot be certified as Rule 23(b)(3) class actions because individual, rather than common, issues will predominate. Id. at *13. The Fifth Circuit determined that Plaintiff's class claim was a common law fraud claim, which requires proof of reliance under Louisiana law. The Fifth Circuit concluded that showing reliance would necessitate individual inquiries because Defendant's loss-payout process allowed claimants to individually negotiate their claims. Because Plaintiff failed to show that class issues predominated, the Fifth Circuit held that Plaintiff's common law fraud claim should not have been certified.

Webb, et al. v. Exxon Mobil Corp.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 8433 (8th Cir. May 11, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of landowners, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant damaged their properties by failing to maintain Defendant's pipeline. The District Court initially certified Plaintiffs' class claims. After some discovery, the District Court decertified the class, finding that Plaintiffs failed to meet the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3). Approximately 70 years ago, Defendant entered into a series of easement contracts with landowners in Texas, Arkansas, Illinois, and Missouri for the purpose of constructing a pipeline that would transport oil from Texas to Illinois. Decades later, the successors-in-interest to those easement contracts alleged that Defendant breached the easement contracts by failing to reasonably operate, maintain, and repair the pipeline. Plaintiffs asserted that they were entitled to rescind the easements and force Defendant to remove the pipeline or replace it or, alternatively, that they were entitled to recover damages resulting from the breach of contract and diminished value of their properties. Id. at *4. Defendant argued that the Pipeline Safety Act ("PSA") preempted Plaintiffs' claims and that the class was not ascertainable because identifying its members would require individual title searches of thousands of parcels of land. Id. at *5. The District Court initially disagreed. The District Court concluded that the PSA did not preempt Plaintiffs' claims because Plaintiffs sought to enforce private easement agreements and it certified a narrowed class of individuals "who currently own real property subject to an easement for the Pegasus Pipeline and who have pipeline physically crossing their property." Id. at *6. After additional discovery, Defendant moved for reconsideration of the District Court's class certification decision and for summary judgment on the grounds that Plaintiffs could not prove breach of the easement contracts because Defendants did not owe any affirmative duty of maintenance or repair under Arkansas law. Id. The District Court granted Defendant's motion. The District Court ruled that class certification was improper, that the PSA preempted Plaintiffs' claims, and that Plaintiffs' claims otherwise failed under Arkansas law. Id. at *6. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit affirmed. The Eighth Circuit held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in decertifying the class because, even if it assumed that Plaintiffs could demonstrate commonality, Plaintiffs could not demonstrate predominance. The Eighth Circuit reasoned that, although Plaintiffs could assert all of the pipe was bad, demonstrating breach was far more complicated and required consideration of several individualized issues, including evaluation of each property's unique features and conditions, the presence of groundwater, possible mitigating factors, and complicated assessments of diminution in value. These considerations were unique to each class member's property and complicated any class-wide resolution. The Eighth Circuit, therefore, concluded that individual issues predominated over common issues. Id. at *11. Further, the Eighth Circuit noted that, although the easements may be similar or identical, the proposed class would join claims arising out of the contract, property, and tort law of four states, i.e., Arkansas, Illinois, Texas, and Missouri. Id. The Eighth Circuit, therefore, concluded that proceeding as a class action was not the preferable method of adjudication because it "would potentially invite the application of multiple conflicting state laws." Id. at *11-12. The Eighth Circuit also agreed that summary judgment was appropriate as to Plaintiff's claims for breach of easement contracts under Arkansas law because no express contractual provisions imposed duties of maintenance or repair and no such duty could be implied. Id. at *12-17. Accordingly, the Eighth Circuit affirmed the District Court's orders that decertified the class actions claims and granted summary judgment.

(lxvii) The Typicality Requirement For Class Certification

Corcoran, et al. v. CVS Health*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 143327 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 5, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a putative class action alleging Defendants knowingly overcharged millions of insured patients by submitting falsely inflated drug prices to pharmacy benefit managers ("PBMs") and third-party payor insurance providers ("TPPs"), which resulted in higher co-payment obligations for Plaintiffs. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs raised claims under the laws of 11 states: (i) each state's statutory laws proscribing unfair and deceptive acts and practices ("UDAP"); and (ii) common law claims for fraud, negligent misrepresentation and unjust enrichment. After the initial denial claims of their motion for class certification, Plaintiffs filed a renewed motion for class certification, which significantly narrowed the classes and issues that they sought to certify. Plaintiffs sought to certify 11 state classes composed of individuals who "have filled prescriptions for generic drugs at CVS pharmacies using coverage provided by their TPP plans." Id. at *3. Defendants' HSP program provided discounted pricing on hundreds of generic prescription medications. Plaintiffs alleged that the price Defendants charged under the HSP program for the HSP generics was the true U&C price for those drugs. However, Defendants continued to submit to insurance amounts higher than the HSP price for all HSP generics (rather than the HSP program price) as the U&C price to TPPs and PBMs. Id. at *8. As a result, in some instances, Plaintiffs alleged they paid co-payments that exceeded the HSP price or the "true U&C price." Defendants asserted that Plaintiffs could not meet the typicality requirement of Rule 23. Defendants argued that each class representative was atypical with respect to other potential class members whose claims were adjudicated by a different PBM. For instance, Plaintiff Clark was the sole representative of the California class, and he claimed that he was overcharged on purchases adjudicated by PBM Caremark. Defendants explained that Clark would be atypical of other California class members whose claims were adjudicated by PBMs ExpressScripts, Medco, MedImpact, or Optum. Id. at *15-16. The Court agreed, and stated that the classes must necessarily be limited in scope to the PBMs, which adjudicated the class representative's claims. However, the Court held that the necessary limits would not require denial of Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Rather, to the extent that the proposed classes satisfied the remaining requirements for class certification, the Court narrowed each class to the specific PBMs, which adjudicated the claims of the class representatives. Id. at *17. The Court also determined that Defendants offered evidence demonstrating that the named Plaintiffs for the Arizona and New York class members had no transactions adjudicated by any of the five PBMs at issue for purposes of class certification Accordingly, the Court found that neither was typical of the classes which they sought to represent and denied class certification as to the Arizona and New York classes. The Court thereby granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification in part.

Morrow, et al. v. City Of San Diego*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 86041 (N.D. Cal. June 5, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendant prosecuted only residents in low to moderate income neighborhoods pursuant to the it's "CDBG Pro-active Code Enforcement Project" Id. at *3. Plaintiffs claimed Defendants only investigated and prosecuted code violations "reactively," but with respect to certain census tracts only, Defendants investigated and prosecuted these code violations "pro-actively." Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs alleged that by targeting residents for pro-active enforcement only in certain census tracts, Defendant denied Plaintiffs and all the members of the putative class equal protection of the laws. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the Court denied. In response to Plaintiffs' motion, Defendant submitted the declaration of Michael Richmond, the Deputy Director for the Code Enforcement Division, who stated that the code enforcement related to grading violations in Plaintiffs' lots and others' lots, enforcement of which was not ever funded by the CDBG Pro-active Code Enforcement Project. Id. at *5. The Court found that Plaintiffs therefore could not meet the typicality requirement of Rule 23. The Court stated that Plaintiffs sought to certify a class of individuals subjected to the CDBG Pro-active Code Enforcement Project, but Defendant had raised questions as to whether the named Plaintiffs were subjected to this Project. Richmond submitted a declaration that Plaintiffs' zoning problems were never the result of any pro-active code enforcement. In response, Plaintiffs offered no evidence to contradict the declaration. Id. at *8-9. The Court held that because Plaintiffs necessarily would have unique factual circumstances that would require them to meet defenses that are not typical of other potential class members, their claims were not typical. As a result, the Court denied the motion for class certification.

(lxviii) Trial And Post-Trial Issues In Class Action Litigation

Barfield, et al. v. Sho-Me Power Electric Cooperative,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 160694 (D.N.H. Mar. 27, 2017). Following a jury trial in this class action, judgment was entered on the jury's verdict for $129,211,337 in actual damages and $1,300,000 in punitive damages. Pursuant to Rule 59(d), the Court vacated the judgment and sua sponte ordered a new trial. The Court noted that Rule 59(d) provides, "no later than 28 days after the entry of judgment, the Court, on its own, may order a new trial for any reason that would justify granting one on a party's motion." Id. at *2. The Court concluded that the amount of damages awarded by the jury was against the weight of the evidence. The jury was required to determine the fair market rental value of the easement that Plaintiffs could obtain from a third-party. Plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Kilpatrick, presented evidence that the fair market rental value of the easement would be $129,211,337. Id. at *3. The jury relied on the expert evidence to reach a verdict in exactly the same amount. However, Defendants presented evidence, including their actual records, to show costs the Defendants incurred to operate their commercial telecommunications company. Id. The Court noted that the costs were nearly equal to the income purportedly earned by Defendants. The Court stated that although there could be a dispute about the allocation of costs between Defendants and the actual amount of profits Defendants in fact earned, even when viewed in the light most favorable to the verdict, the record did not support a finding that a third-party or Defendants would be willing to rent an easement from Plaintiffs in excess of $129 million, absent a profit sufficiently clear to off-set not only the $129 million in rent, but also to off-set the reasonable operating costs of their telecommunications company. Id. at *4. Accordingly, the Court found that the damages award did not make sense as a whole, and ruled that the verdict could not stand. The Court therefore vacated the judgement of over $130 million and ordered a new trial.

(lxix) Venue Issues In Class Actions

Panitch, et al. v. Quaker Oats Co.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51737 (E.D. Pa. April 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of consumers, brought five putative class actions alleging that the "100% Natural" labels on certain Defendant products were false and misleading because the oats contained detectable quantities of the herbicide glyphosate. Id. at *2. Plaintiffs in other cases – the Jaffee, Daly, and Cooper cases – agreed to transfer their cases to the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois for consolidation. The cases were consolidated with another pending case – the Gibson case – and on August 11, 2016, Plaintiffs filed their consolidated amended complaint. Defendant removed another pending case – the Kinn case – to the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Washington, but then moved to transfer Kinn to the Northern District of Illinois. The Court granted Defendant's motion to transfer. All the earlier-filed cases were pending in the Northern District of Illinois in one consolidated proceeding. Id. at *3-4. Plaintiffs Oren Panitch, Gina Davis, and Margie Rizika filed a new complaint and brought claims on behalf of the nationwide putative class for breach of express warranty, breach of implied warranty, unjust enrichment, negligent misrepresentation, and injunctive relief. Defendant moved to transfer this case to the Northern District of Illinois under both the "first-filed rule" and 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) or, in the alternative, to stay the case pending the resolution of Gibson. The Court found that Plaintiffs' complaint was substantially identical to the consolidated amended complaint in Gibson, with many paragraphs copied verbatim. The factual allegations underlying the claims were the same as in Gibson. The Court found that in both cases, the named Plaintiffs allege that the same Defendant (Quaker Oats) made the same claims (e.g., "100% Natural," "100% Natural Whole Grain," and "heart healthy,") respecting the same three products (Quaker Oats Old-Fashioned, Quaker Oats Quick 1-Minute, and Quaker Steel Cut Oats) across the same geographic region (nationwide), and that these claims misled the public for the same reason (products "are not 100% natural, but instead contain the chemical glyphosate"). Id. at *9-10. The Court stated that Plaintiffs here and in Gibson sought to represent identical nationwide classes of all persons "who have purchased the Products, for personal use, and not for resale, within any applicable limitations period until Notice is provided to the class." Id. at *10. The Court held that Plaintiffs filed their complaint months after the other six actions were initiated and after four of those actions had been consolidated in Illinois. In these circumstances, the Court opined that Plaintiffs appeared to be forum shopping, and Defendant's desire to litigate in one forum all the identical class claims filed against it was entirely understandable. Id. at *13. The Court therefore found that sound judicial administration and comity weighed strongly in favor of transfer under the first-filed rule. The Court also determined that all factors weighed strongly in favor of transfer. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to transfer venue to the Northern District of Illinois.

Pontrelli, et al. v. Monavie, Inc*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 178824 (D.N.J. Oct. 27, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action alleging that Defendants' claims regarding its products did not provide the health benefits purported in their advertising in violation of the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act. Following dispositive motion practice, and prior to the close of discovery and class certification briefing, the Court entered an agreed order staying the case pending settlement negotiations in a companion action involving Defendant's marketing of its juice products – a case entitled Harbut v. MonaVie, Inc., Case 12-CV-1983 (C.D. Cal.) ("Harbut"), then pending in the Central District of California. Plaintiff and the class representative in Harbut moved before the U.S. Judicial Panel on Multi-District Litigation ("MDL Panel") under 28 U.S.C. § 1407 to authorize an MDL in the District of Utah where an important declaratory judgment action – entitled Starr Indemnity & Liability Co. v. MonaVie, Inc. Inc., Case No. 14-CV-393 (D. Utah) ("Starr") – was pending. Id. at *3. Defendant then filed a motion to withdraw stating that its assets "were foreclosed upon" and that it was "no longer in business." Id. at *4. The Court granted the motion. Plaintiff then moved to transfer venue to the District of Utah. Subsequent to the filing of the instant motion, the Central District of California transferred Harbut to the District of Utah. Plaintiff argued that MonaVie's foreclosure and total lack of funds made the case nearly impossible to resolve in the District of New Jersey because the only assets from which Defendants could pay anything were insurance policies, which were the subject of the Starr litigation in Utah. Id. at *5. Plaintiff contended that a disposition in Starr would have a direct implication on the instant case to the extent it determined whether the policies were available to pay for the defense, and settlement or judgment in this case. Id. Plaintiff also contended that the majority of MonaVie's now former employees who Plaintiff sought to depose, and who may be called to testify at trial, were based in Utah. Id. at *6. Plaintiff maintained that transfer would reduce the cost of litigation for MonaVie, which was headquartered in Utah, as well as make it more convenient for the parties. Finally, Plaintiff noted that she has moved to intervene in Starr in an effort to prevent the entry of a declaratory judgment by default against MonaVie and hoping to preserve insurance policies at issue to satisfy any judgment or pay for counsel in this case. The Court found that the interests of justice would be better served by transfer of the case to the District of Utah given that any remnants of MonaVie were in Utah. Id. at *8-9. The Court held that in light of the factually similar Harbut action recently having been transferred to Utah, and given that Starr was also pending in Utah, transfer would likely promote judicial efficiency, conserve judicial resources, and eliminate expense if all three matters are litigated there. Id. at *9. In sum, upon consideration of the totality of the circumstances, the Court concluded that the District of Utah was the most appropriate forum for litigation of this case. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion to transfer venue.

Preston, et al. v. American Honda Motor Co*., 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 181635 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 2, 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action against Defendant alleging breach of express warranty, breach of implied warranty, violation of the Magnusson-Moss Act, and violation of the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act (the "ICFA"). Defendant filed a motion to dismiss or, in the alternative, to transfer venue to the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California. Plaintiff alleged that Defendant's manufacture of Accords with soy-based wiring and subsequent failure to cover repairs violated state and federal warranty laws. Plaintiffs in two related cases had filed class action lawsuits in the Central District of California, both of which were subsequently dismissed without prejudice. The Court found the case suitable for transfer because the Central District of California was familiar with the facts and law underlying the case, and therefore better situated to decide Defendant's motion to dismiss. To transfer an action to another venue, the Court must find that: (i) venue was proper in the district where the case was brought; (ii) venue and jurisdiction were proper in the transferee district; (iii) the transferee district was more convenient for both the parties and witnesses; and (iv) transfer would serve the interest of justice. The Court determined that the first three factors were relatively neutral. Defendant argued that the fourth factor – the interests of justice – favored transferring the case. The Court noted that a decision to transfer venue under § 1404(a) relies heavily on the interests of justice, which "may be determinative in a particular case, even if the convenience of the parties and witnesses might call for a different result." Id. at *18. In determining which venue was more likely to effectuate swift administration of justice, the Court considered: (i) ensuring a speedy trial; (ii) trying related litigation together; (iii) the relationship of communities to the litigation; and (iv) having the trial before a judge who was familiar with the applicable law. First, the Court found that it took almost 75% as long for cases to proceed from filing to disposition and twice as long for cases to proceed from filing to trial in the Northern District of Illinois than in the Central District of California. Id. at *18-19. As such, the possibility for a speedier trial counseled in favor of transferring the case. Id. at *19. The Court further stated that judicial economy counseled in favor of relying on the Central District of California's greater familiarity with the factual and discovery issues implicated by Plaintiff's claims. Id. at *20. Further, the Court opined that, because California was the situs of material events, and Illinois had no greater interest than California in adjudicating the litigation, this factor also favored transfer of the case. Id. at *23. The Court therefore held that the interests of justice clearly favored transferring the case to the Central District of California. The Court determined that the Central District of California could more speedily resolve the dispute, was vastly more familiar with the facts of the case, and had at least as compelling an interest in adjudicating this litigation. Id. at *24. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to transfer venue.

(lxx) WARN Class Actions

Bystry, et al. v. Royal Oak Industries,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 155425 (W.D. Mich. Sept. 22, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of terminated employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendant terminated a group of over 200 employees without providing 60-days' notice or pay as required by the WARN Act. Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23, which the Court granted. First, the Court noted that the estimated class size was approximately 200 members, and joinder was therefore impracticable. Moreover, the Court stated that the members of the proposed class had limited financial resources and the size of their individual claims made individual suits financially unfeasible (e.g., Plaintiff asserted a claim of less than $8,000 not including benefits). Id. at *5-6. The Court determined that Plaintiff met the commonality requirement, as Plaintiff alleged that he and the other class members were terminated as part of a common plan stemming from Defendant's decision to terminate the putative class members. Id. at *6. Additionally, the factual and legal questions stemmed from a common core of facts regarding Defendant's actions and a common core of legal issues regarding every class member's rights under the WARN Act. Id. at *7. The Court also found that Plaintiff suffered the same type of injury as the rest of the class and his claims had the "same essential characteristics as the claims of the class at large." Id. Further, the terminations of Plaintiff and the putative class members resulted from the same course of events, and they all allegedly suffered the same type of injury as a result of Defendant's alleged failure to comply with the WARN Act. Id. at *7-8. Therefore, Plaintiffs also satisfied typicality. The Court opined that the circumstances of Plaintiff's employment and termination rendered his interests the same as those of putative class members, because all must prove that they were entitled to and not given adequate notice of their terminations and all must show that Defendant was not protected by the WARN's statutory exceptions. Id. at *8. Further, the Court noted that the record established that Plaintiff's counsel were well-qualified and experienced, and there was no doubt that they would vigorously prosecute the interests of the class. Id. at *8-9. As to Rule 23(b)(3), the Court found that Plaintiffs met the predominance requirement because there were common liability issues under the WARN Act as to all class members. Id. at *9. Further, the Court opined that a class action was the superior method of resolving the WARN dispute because many of the claims were quite small, making individual lawsuits impracticable. Further, the Court held that it was in the interest of judicial economy to consolidate as many as 200 potential claims into a single action, which would allow the common questions of law and fact to be consistently and efficiently determined. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Carlberg, et al. v. Guam Industrial Services*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 33466 (D. Guam Mar. 7, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act ("WARN Act"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification, which the Court granted. Plaintiffs were former full-time employees of Guam Shipyard and worked at a ship repair facility in Guam. A Military Sealift Command ("MSC") provided notice that it intended to issue a ship repair solicitation under which the repair facility would be provided as government furnished property. Plaintiffs allege that Defendant failed to "inform, warn, discuss, or otherwise communicate to Plaintiffs that their continued employment was at risk due to the issuance of the solicitation." Id. at *10. MSC awarded the solicitation number to another facility rather than Defendant, and Plaintiffs subsequently received written notices advising them that they were terminated effective immediately. Id. Plaintiffs asserted that most non-essential personnel did not receive that day's wage and were given approximately one hour to remove their personal belongings from the premises. As to the Rule 23 requirements, Defendants did not challenge that Plaintiffs met the numerosity requirement. The Court found that Plaintiffs' claims presented numerous common questions of law and fact, including whether each putative class member could show that Guam Shipyard was subject to the WARN Act, that each class member was employed by Guam Shipyard, that they were terminated in connection with a mass lay-off without proper notice and without cause, and that Guam Shipyard failed to pay the required 60-days of wages and benefits. Id. at *14-15. Additionally, the Court determined that the Plaintiffs' common legal and factual issues were typical of the putative class members' WARN Act claims against Guam Shipyard because they shared identical claims under the WARN Act against the same employer, as well as the same alleged termination date, and the same alleged lack of 60-day advance notice required under the WARN Act. Id. at *15-16. The Court found Plaintiffs to be adequate representatives and class counsel to be adequate in terms of their representation. Id. at *16. The Court also held that, based upon the class definition and the terminated employees list, the proposed class was ascertainable. As to the Rule 23(b) requirements, the Court reasoned that common questions of fact predominated because there were identical issues for each employee allegedly terminated by Guam Shipyard without notice as to the damages suffered by each member of the proposed class. Id. at *17. Moreover, the Court noted that each proposed class member would be defined under the same statutorily defined compensation scheme under the WARN Act. As Defendant did not argue that Plaintiffs' WARN Act claims failed the superiority inquiry, all factors for superiority weighed in Plaintiffs' favor; based on the record, the Court held that class certification was superior to other methods available for adjudicating the proposed class claims. Id. at *24. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Czyzewski, et al. v. Jevic Holding Co.*, 137 S. Ct. 973 (2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former truck drivers, alleged that Defendant terminated them without providing the proper notice required under the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act ("WARN"). A private equity firm, Sun Capital Partners ("Sun"), purchased Defendant in a leveraged buy-out using monies borrowed from third-party CIT Group ("CIT"). In the buy-out, both Sun and CIT used Defendant's stock as collateral to finance the purchase. Two years after the buy-out, Defendant declared Chapter 11 bankruptcy. Immediately prior to filing for bankruptcy, Defendant informed its employees that it was terminating their employment without the notice required under WARN. Plaintiffs filed a lawsuit, and the Bankruptcy Court entered a $12.4 million judgment in their favor. Id. at 980. The Bankruptcy Court determined that $8.3 million of the $12.4 million was owed for priority wage claims. Id. Plaintiffs argued that Sun was also liable for this judgment as a joint employer with Defendant. The Bankruptcy Court ultimately found that Sun was not their employer. During the bankruptcy, other unsecured creditors sued Sun and CIT, arguing that they were the beneficiaries of preferential transfers of Defendant's assets. Id. at 981.

While this lawsuit was pending, Defendant's assets were depleted to $1.7 million in cash, subject to a lien by Sun, and the preferential transfer lawsuit. Id. Sun, CIT, Defendant, and the other unsecured creditors decided to settle the fraudulent transfer lawsuit. At the time the case was settled, Plaintiffs' joint employer case was still pending, so Sun insisted that any settlement could not include a payment to the Plaintiffs or their counsel, as Sun feared Plaintiffs' counsel would use the payments to fund litigation against Sun. Id. Under the settlement agreement, CIT agreed to pay $2 million to cover the legal fees and administrative expenses of the other unsecured creditors, while giving Defendant's remaining $1.7 million to pay taxes, administrative expenses, and pro rata distributions to the other unsecured creditors. Id. Pursuant to the settlement, Defendant agreed to dismiss its Chapter 11 Bankruptcy Case. Sun, CIT, Defendant, and the unsecured creditors petitioned the Bankruptcy Court to approve the settlement and dismiss the Chapter 11 case. Id. Plaintiffs opposed, arguing that the settlement violated the normal priority rules by giving other unsecured creditors priority over the WARN creditors. Id. While the Bankruptcy Court agreed that the settlement violated standard priority rules, it found that because it was dismissing the Chapter 11 case rather than approving a Chapter 11 plan, it did not have to follow the priority rules contained in Chapter 11. Id. at 982. It found authority to do so in Chapter 11's dismissal provision, § 349(b)(1), which provides that, with dismissal, parties are restored to the status quo ante unless a bankruptcy judge, "for cause, orders otherwise." Id. Further, the Bankruptcy Court ruled that, regardless of the settlement, Plaintiffs would not receive any distributions, while the settlement left the other unsecured creditors in a better position than they would be absent the settlement. On appeal, both the District Court and Third Circuit agreed. Id. Plaintiffs sought certiorari, which the U.S. Supreme Court granted. The Supreme Court reversed the decision. The Supreme Court began its analysis by considering Defendant's argument that Plaintiffs lacked standing because they would not have recovered anything if the settlement was not approved. The Supreme Court found this argument relied on two questionable propositions, including: (i) that without violation of the ordinary priority rules, there would be no settlement and; (ii) that the fraudulent conveyance lawsuit had no value. Id. at 983. With respect to the first argument, the Supreme Court found it unpersuasive given that Sun ultimately won on the joint employer issue. Id. With respect to the second, the Supreme Court found the assumption – that the fraudulent conveyance lawsuit had no value – inherently flawed, as the claim was settled for $3.7 million. Id. The Supreme Court thus concluded that Plaintiffs had something to lose if the settlement was approved, and therefore had standing to challenge it. Id. The Supreme Court then turned to the question of whether a Bankruptcy Court can dismiss a Chapter 11 plan in a way that does not follow the ordinary priority rules without the affected creditors' consent. Id. First, the Supreme Court observed that the distribution scheme contained in the Bankruptcy Code is "fundamental to the Bankruptcy Code's operation," and that one would expect more than "statutory silence" to authorize departures from the scheme. Id. at 983-84. Second, the Supreme Court concluded that § 349(b)(1) of Chapter 11, in providing that the parties are restored to the status quo ante in a dismissal unless a bankruptcy judge, "for cause, orders otherwise," only allows a bankruptcy judge to "make appropriate orders to protect rights acquired in reliance on the bankruptcy case," which approval of the settlement did not do. Id. at 984. Finally, the Supreme Court reasoned that the consequences of allowing a departure from the normal distribution scheme were "potentially serious," including "changing the bargaining power of different classes of creditors" and "risks of collusion." Id. at 986-87. For these reasons, the Supreme Court reversed the Bankruptcy Court's settlement approval order allowing payment to general unsecured creditors while overlooking Plaintiffs' claims.

Elkins, et al. v. Mail Transportation Services, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 171309 (M.D. Pa. Oct. 2, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action alleging that Defendants failed to provide 60 days advance notice of a plant closing or mass lay-off in violation of the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act ("WARN Act"). Plaintiff filed a motion for class certification, which the Court granted with Defendants' requested modifications. Plaintiffs sought to certify a class of all former employees of Defendants who: (i) worked anytime in September through December 2015, but were not paid their earned wages and accrued vacation leave balances when Defendants stopped their trucking operations in October 2015; and/or (ii) whose employment was terminated in October or November 2015 without 60 days advance written notice satisfying the requirements of the WARN Act. Id. at *2. Defendants did object to class certification, but requested that Plaintiff's class definition be altered in various ways, including: (i) to define the class as former employees of BJ Trucking, not all Defendants; (ii) to replace the term "terminated" with the phrase "terminated without cause" to accordance with the WARN Act more precisely; and (iii) to replace the language "satisfying the requirements of" the WARN Act with language that tracked its requirements more granularly. Id. at *3. The Court found that Plaintiff's proposed class met the requirements of Rule 23(a), as the class contained over 100 members; the members suffered the same alleged injuries; Plaintiff alleged that his co-workers were subject to the same policies as he was and suffered the same harm he suffered; Plaintiff would fairly and adequately represent the class; and his counsel was competent to undertake the litigation. Id. at *5. The Court held that Plaintiff's proposed class also met the requirements of Rule 23(b)(3). Defendants admitted that the employees in question were not paid for the relevant pay periods and that they were given less than 60 days' notice of the plant closing. The Court opined that liability hinged on a number of issues surrounding Defendants' status under the WARN Act and state law, and these questions were common to all employees. Id. Finally, the Court determined that proceeding with a class action was superior to bringing individual lawsuits, because the employees' injuries were so similar, and their interest in individually controlling the prosecution of separate actions was weak. Id. at *6. The Court also was unaware of any lawsuits filed against Defendants that involve the same injuries, and the Court was unaware of any special difficulties of managing this class action. Id. at *7. At the same time, the Court accepted Defendants' changes to Plaintiff's proposed class definition. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiff's motion for class certification with Defendants' requested modification.

Garner, et al. v. Behrman Bros. IV, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93184 (S.D.N.Y. June 16, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a putative class action against Defendants seeking recovery of unpaid wages and benefits under the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act ("WARN Act"). Defendants filed a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) and 12(b)(7), which the Court denied. Plaintiffs were "nominally employed" by Atherotech, Inc. and Atherotech Holdings, Inc. (collectively, "Atherotech"), and worked at Atherotech facilities until the facilities closed in 2016. After a failed attempt at a sale, Defendants decided to shut down Atherotech and have Atherotech file for bankruptcy. Id. at *4. Plaintiffs alleged that they were not given 60 days advance written notice and did not receive wages and other employee benefits covering the 60-day period after termination. The Court explained that to survive a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6), a complaint must plead "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Id. Defendant argued that Plaintiffs did not state a claim because they failed to allege sufficient facts as to the third, fourth, and fifth factors of liability under the WARN Act (unity of personnel policies, dependency of operations, and de facto control). Id. at *10. Defendants claimed that Plaintiffs' pleadings as to these three elements were conclusory and therefore insufficient to allege that Defendant was a "single employer" with Atherotech. Id. at *11. The Court stated that viewing the factors established by the U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") together, the Court found that Plaintiffs' complaint alleged "facts which, if true, would permit a jury to find Defendant liable for violation of the WARN Act notice provisions." Id. at *12. The Court found that four of the five factors, under the facts alleged, favored liability, including the de facto control factor. Id. Accordingly, the Court found that Plaintiffs' allegations would support a jury finding of Defendant's liability for WARN Act violations, and therefore denied Defendant's motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). Further, the Court explained that a party may seek dismissal under Rule 12(b)(7) for failure to join a necessary party under Rule 19. Id. at *19. Rule 12(b)(7) requires a Court to "dismiss an action where a party was not joined only if: (i) an absent party is required; (ii) it is not feasible to join the absent party; and (iii) it is determined 'in equity and good conscience' that the action should not proceed among the existing parties." Id. at *20. Defendant challenged Plaintiffs' failure to join Atherotech, which Defendant contended was a necessary and indispensable party under Rule 19. Id. at *22. The Court disagreed, holding that Defendant itself was alleged to have violated the WARN Act through its own conduct, i.e., its own decisions to shut down Atherotech, to fire Atherotech's employees, and not to give those employees proper notice. Id. The Court determined that Defendant cited no authority that, in such a context, Atherotech was a necessary party. Accordingly, the Court denied Defendants' motion to dismiss.

May, et al. v. Blackhawk Mining, LLC*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 50295 (E.D. Ky. April 3, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, alleged that Defendant terminated them and approximately 200 others without providing the proper notice required under the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act ("WARN Act"). Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification pursuant to Rule 23, which the Court granted. First, the Court determined that the class was sufficiently numerous with approximately 200 members. Id. at *4. The Court also found that Plaintiffs met the commonality requirement because they claimed that they and other potential class members were terminated as part of a common plan stemming from Defendants' decision to idle operations at the relevant mining complex and that Defendants would be liable as a "single employer" under the WARN Act. The Court agreed with Plaintiffs that the factual and legal questions stemmed from a common core of facts regarding Defendants' actions and legal issues regarding every class member's rights. Id. at *5. Plaintiffs and the potential class members allegedly suffered injury beginning on or about December 11, 2015, when they lost their jobs without 60 days' notice and were not compensated due to a violation of the WARN Act by Defendants. Id. at *9. The Court also opined that Plaintiffs would fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class. Id. at *10. The Court determined that the circumstances of Plaintiffs' employment and terminations rendered their interests the same as those of putative class members because all must prove that they were entitled to and not given adequate notice and all must show that Defendants are a single employer and are not protected by WARN Act's statutory exceptions. The Court stated that Plaintiffs' counsel and proposed class counsel spent time investigating the facts, continued to investigate the matter since filing this case, and briefed the Court with respect to various matters. Id. Plaintiffs' counsel also cited its prior certification as class counsel in WARN Act matters and had demonstrated extensive experience in WARN Act class action litigation. Finally, the Court determined that Plaintiffs met the requirements of Rule 23(b)(3). There was no allegation or suggestion that any of the potential class members were treated differently with respect to the issues in the case. Further, the Court found that class certification was the superior method of resolving this dispute under the WARN Act because many of the claims were small, making individual lawsuits impracticable. Id. at *12. Plaintiffs' claims and the proposed class claims would not be economically viable if brought independently and therefore the class claims were superior to adjudication individually. The Court explained that it was in the interest of judicial economy and efficiency to consolidate as many as 200 claims into a single action that would permit resolution of common questions of law and fact to be determined all at once. Id. at *13. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Meadows, et al. v. Latshaw Drilling Co., L.L.C.,* 866 F.3d 307 (5th Cir. 2017). Defendant terminated Plaintiff, an oil drilling rig worker, and 397 other employees when a decrease in oil prices depressed demand for its services. Id. at *308. Plaintiff filed a class action on behalf of himself and others similarly-situated, alleging that Defendant conducted a plant closing or mass lay-off without providing advanced notice in violation of the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act ("WARN Act"). Plaintiff moved for class certification, and Defendant moved for summary judgment. Before ruling on Plaintiff's class certification motion, the District Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment. On appeal, the Fifth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Id. at *309. Defendant conducted its business by contracting with third-parties, known as operators, to drill wells on lands the operators have leased. Defendant had 39 drilling rigs, which it had used in project locations spread across Texas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Arkansas, and Kansas. Id. at *310. As oil prices began to drop, fewer operators requested Defendant's services. Defendant therefore started stacking its drilling rigs, and, without advanced written notice, began laying-off its employees. Over approximately six months, Defendant laid off 398 employees. Defendant moved for summary judgment on the basis that each drilling rig, each yard, and its corporate office were separate sites of employment that could not be treated collectively as one single site of employment under the WARN Act. Id. Because these sites each had less than 50 employees, Defendant claimed that neither a plant closing nor a mass lay-off could have occurred. The District Court granted Defendant's motion, concluding that Plaintiff had failed to raise a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether there had been an employment loss for at least 50 people within the requisite period at a single site of employment as required by the WARN Act. Id. at *311. On appeal, Plaintiff requested the Fifth Circuit to consider whether Defendant's drilling rigs could be aggregated as a single site of employment as defined by 20 C.F.R. § 639.3(i)(3) and whether the District Court entered summary judgment on a ground not raised in Defendant's summary judgment briefing. The Fifth Circuit found that Plaintiff failed to argue the merits of his main arguments of whether drilling rigs are operational units within a single site of employment within the meaning of 20 C.F.R. § 639.3(b) with respect to his plant closing theory, whether Defendant's employees are out-stationed employees within the meaning of 20 C.F.R. § 639.3(i)(6), or whether Defendant was a "truly unusual organizational situation" within the meaning of 20 C.F.R. § 639.3(i)(8). Id. at *312. Instead, Plaintiff asserted that he "could have presented evidence" to the District Court regarding these theories. Because Plaintiff also failed to present evidence or brief the application of these theories on appeal, the Fifth Circuit held that it would not overturn the District Court's judgment that Plaintiff did not present a genuine dispute of material fact with respect to these aspects of the case. Id. at *314. Accordingly the Fifth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling granting summary judgment to Defendant.

Mercer, et al. v. Patterson-UTI Drilling Co., LLC*, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 26768 (5th Cir. Dec. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former oil rig employees, filed a class action alleging that Defendant violated the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act ("WARN Act") by terminating their employment without providing them with 60 days' advance written notice. Plaintiffs asserted that the drilling rigs within each of Defendant's eight operational area should be considered a "single site of employment" for purposes of the WARN Act because the drilling rigs satisfied the "reasonable geographic proximity" test under 20 C.F.R. § 639.3(i)(3). Id. at *4. Plaintiffs argued in the alternative that each operational area should be treated as a single site of employment under three other U.S. Department of Labor ("DOL") regulations. Defendant sought summary judgment, and argued that Plaintiffs could not prevail on their WARN Act claims because an employer is only required to provide advanced notice under the WARN Act before a "mass lay-off" or "plant closing," as those terms are defined in the statute. Id. The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of Defendant, concluding that there was "no basis to aggregate the drilling sites to form a single site of employment" and that "none of the exceptions apply." Id. The District Court also awarded costs to Defendant. On appeal, the Fifth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. Plaintiffs argued that they created a genuine issue of material fact because they presented evidence showing that Defendant's employees could drive to another drilling rig and back "within a short time period" and could "see other rigs in the [operational area] from the rig on which they were working." Id. at *10. The Fifth Circuit, however, stated that without offering evidence of the distance between any relevant grouping of drilling rigs, Plaintiffs failed to create a genuine issue of material fact that the drilling rigs were within reasonable geographic proximity. Id. Plaintiffs also asserted that the District Court erred in granting summary judgment on two alternative theories of liability pled by Plaintiffs but not briefed in Defendant's motion for summary judgment. The Fifth Circuit held that Defendant's motion focused on the argument that neither a mass lay-off nor a plant closing had occurred because Plaintiffs' employment losses were not a part of an employment loss of 50 or more people at a single site of employment. Id. at *11. Thus, the Fifth Circuit concluded that it was not erroneous for the District Court to grant summary judgment on Plaintiffs' alternative theories of liability because Defendant's briefing should have put Plaintiffs on notice to come forward with all of their evidence and arguments. Id. Finally, Plaintiffs contended that the District Court abused its discretion in awarding costs to Defendant because the WARN Act is a remedial statute. The Fifth Circuit explained that the WARN Act was not the basis for the award of costs; instead, the basis was Rule 54(d)(1). Id. at *12. The Fifth Circuit reasoned that Plaintiffs failed to cite any case supporting their position that a District Court abuses its discretion when it awards costs to a party under Rule 54(d)(1). Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling.

Molina, et al. v. Ace Homecare, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 151039 (M.D. Fla. Sept. 18, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of nurses and home healthcare aides, filed a class action alleging that Defendant shut down its facilities without paying compensation or providing at least 60 days' advance notice in violation of the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act ("WARN Act"). Plaintiffs sought certification of a class of all employees in Florida who were not given a minimum of 60 days' written notice of termination and whose employment was terminated as a result of a "mass lay-off" or "plant closing." Id. at *2. Defendant did not contest class certification, and the Court found that class certification was appropriate under Rule 23. Id. at *5. The Court noted that all of the potential 400 class members were terminated in April 2016 without notice, pay, and other employee benefits as part of plant shutdowns. Id. at *5-6. The Court held that Plaintiffs were entitled to receive appropriate notice under the WARN Act and did not. Id. at *6. The Court found that the class was sufficiently numerous; that joinder of all members would be impracticable; there were questions of fact and law common to the class; the claims of the class representative were typical of the claims of the unnamed members; and the named representative was able to represent the interests of the class adequately and fairly. Id. The Court also stated that questions of law or fact common to class members predominated over any questions affecting only individual members, and a class action was superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating the controversy. Accordingly, the Court granted Plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Ross, et al. v. Catalina Restaurant Group Inc.*, Case No. 15-CV-2626 (C.D. Cal. Feb. 15, 2017). Plaintiffs filed a putative class action against Defendant alleging that Defendant violated the WARN Act and California's WARN Act ("CWA") when it failed to provide 60 days' notice of impending lay-offs at its restaurants. Defendant moved for summary judgment on the basis that the terminations at issue did not meet the minimum 50-employee requirement to invoke the WARN Act. Id. at 5. The Court granted Defendant's motion. Defendant operated restaurants in California, Nevada, and Arizona and maintained a headquarters in California. Id. at 3. Defendant closed 75 units across California, Nevada, and Arizona in one month. Id. at 3. Each unit employed between nine and 41 employees. Id. at 3. In the same month, Defendant also laid off 46 people from its corporate headquarters. Plaintiffs did not contest that each closure affected less than 50 employees, but maintained that there was a triable issue of fact of whether the groups of units could be aggregated to constitute a "single site of employment." Id. at 5. The Court did not determine whether some units were geographically close enough to constitute one site. Id. at 8. Instead, the Court considered whether the units shared staff and equipment in determining that the units could not be aggregated to constitute a single site of employment. Id. Defendant submitted evidence that each unit had a separate budget and an individual manager who oversaw the daily operations of their unit. Id. The units did not share staff, inventory, or equipment. Id. However, when one unit was short on labor or inventory it could purchase the labor or inventory from another unit in emergencies. Id. The costs would come out of the purchasing unit's budget and each unit could decline purchase requests. Defendant stated that less than 2% of total labor performed was purchased from another unit. Id. Plaintiffs presented declarations of employees and attempted to establish that Defendant shared staff and inventory enough to constitute a single site of employment. Id. The Court ruled that no reasonable jury could find that the units were a single site of employment because the evidence submitted by Plaintiffs did not contradict Defendant's assertion that inventory and staff were shared only in emergencies. Id. at 9. The Court noted that each unit was responsible for its own budget and the work done by employees at a site other than their home site was less than 2% of the work performed. Id. Further, Plaintiffs failed to establish that there were rotations between two or more specific sites that could be combined to constitute a single site of employment. Id. at 10. Plaintiffs conceded that corporate headquarters did not lay-off 50 people and could not be aggregated with any unit to create a single site of employment. Id. at 10. Furthermore, because the CWA does not allow for aggregation to reach the 50-employee threshold, Plaintiffs' CWA claim failed. Id. at 11. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion for summary judgment.

(lxxi) Workplace Antitrust Class Actions

Buy-Low Market v. Palacios, et al*., 2017 NLRB LEXIS 25 (NLRB Feb. 3, 2017). Nesked Palacios, a worker of Buy-Low Markets, brought a class action alleging wage & hour violations under state law. The employer moved to compel arbitration of Palacios' wage & hour claim on an individual basis pursuant to the parties' arbitration agreement. The trial court granted the motion to compel and dismissed the class action. Thereafter, Palacios filed a charge with the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB") alleging that the employer violated § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act ("Act") by maintaining and enforcing the arbitration agreement. The administrative law judge ("ALJ") found that the employer violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act, which the NLRB affirmed. The employer asserted that the agreement was not unlawful because signing the agreement was not a mandatory condition of employment. The NLRB rejected this argument on the basis that Palacios signed the agreement on or about his first day of employment and because the agreement did not clarify whether it was mandatory or optional. The NLRB noted that it would be unlikely that an employee would refuse to sign an agreement on the first day of employment. In addition, the NLRB held that pursuant to D.R. Horton, Inc., 357 NLRB No. 184 (2012), and Murphy Oil USA, Inc., 361 NLRB No. 72 (2014), an employer violates the Act if it forces employees to waive their § 7 rights, even if the agreement is voluntary. The employer asserted that the agreement did not expressly preclude class or collective actions and therefore was not unlawful. The NLRB rejected this argument and concluded that an employer cannot have it both ways and argue that a class or collective action is not expressly precluded after it argued in another forum that the agreement did not explicitly permit a collective or class action. The ALJ found that in practice the agreement required employees to relinquish their right to file class and collective actions. On this basis, the NLRB affirmed the judgment of the ALJ that the agreement was unlawful.

Frost, et al. v. LG Electronics, Inc.*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 61262 (N.D. Cal. April 21, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of former employees, alleged that Defendants engaged in an unlawful conspiracy to fix and suppress compensation for their employees, and thereby violated § 1 of the Sherman Act, the Cartwright Act, § 16720 of the California Business & Professions Code, and the New Jersey Antitrust Act. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court granted. The Court found that the complaint failed to adequately allege an actionable conspiracy because the allegations were vague and lodged against all Defendants as a group. Id. at *3. First, Plaintiffs relied on the allegations that Defendant LG and Defendant Samsung entities were operated by a

"chaebol," or "a collective of formally independent firms under the single common administrative and financial control of one family." Id. However, the Court stated that Plaintiffs' assertions failed to allege the role "each Defendant played in the alleged harm" so that one could make a plausible inference that there was unlawful agreement between the relevant parties. Id. at *4. The Court explained that the existence of a "chaebol" does not automatically provide sufficient pleading of a conspiracy among the member subsidiary companies. Id. Plaintiffs further relied on allegations from a recruiter's statement, an India Times article, and an email from a finance manager. The Court opined that while notable, these allegations did not "answer the basic questions: who, did what, to whom (or with whom), where, and when." Id. The Court stated that it was mindful that adequately pleading a conspiracy claim against a particular corporate Defendant does not require detailed Defendant-by-Defendant allegations, but the allegations must still be sufficient to "draw a plausible conclusion that the individual Defendant joined the conspiracy and played some role." Id. at *5. In contrast, the Court found that here the complaint lacked sufficient facts to support specific collusive conduct by any specific actors and whether the alleged violations occurred in the United States. Id. Additional factual allegations would be necessary to support a "plausible conclusion that the individual Defendant joined the conspiracy and played some role." Id. Plaintiffs requested leave to conduct jurisdictional discovery. The Court found that that it was not a foregone conclusion that discovery would be futile, as Plaintiffs provided a general outline of topics on which they sought discovery from the LG Defendants. The Court found Plaintiffs' proposal reasonable and stated that they could elicit information as to whether there was specific jurisdiction over LG Electronics and LG Display. Accordingly, the Court directed Plaintiffs and LG Defendants to meet and confer on the specifics of a plan for jurisdictional discovery. Id.

Kelsey K., et al. v. NFL Enterprises, LLC*, 254 F. Supp. 3d 1140 (N.D. Cal. 2017). Plaintiff brought a putative class action for violations of the Sherman Act and the Cartwright Act against the National Football League and 27 of its member teams. Id. at *1143. Plaintiff asserted that Defendants conspired "to fix and suppress the compensation of" and "to eliminate competition among them for" cheerleaders. Id. Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which the Court granted. The Court noted that to state an antitrust claim, Plaintiff must plead not only "ultimate facts, such as conspiracy, and legal conclusions," i.e., that Defendants agreed not to compete with each other or entered into an agreement to prevent competition, but also "the necessary evidentiary facts to support those conclusions." Id. at 1144. Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations." Further, a § 1 claim requires: (i) a contract, combination, or conspiracy; (ii) intended to unreasonably restrain or harm trade; (iii) that actually injures competition; and (iv) harms a Plaintiff via the anti-competitive conduct. Id. The Court concluded that Plaintiff failed to state a plausible claim under § 1 of the Sherman Act. The Court held that Plaintiff only made allegations of parallel conduct and conclusory allegations of conspiracy. Id. at 1145. The Court held that parallel conduct alone does not suggest a conspiracy, and a conclusory allegation of agreement at some unidentified point does not supply facts adequate to show illegality. Id. at 1146. The Court ruled that the wage-related allegations of Plaintiff's complaint barely showed minimal parallel conduct and failed to show plus factors that would support an inference of conspiracy. Id. at 1147. Further, the Court found that in failing to plead factual allegations of parallel conduct with plus factors sufficient to show a conspiracy, the complaint also failed to plead the necessary element of injury to Plaintiff herself. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Plaintiff failed to state a claim for relief under § 1 of the Sherman Act because it did not allege facts supporting a plausible inference that Defendants entered into any agreement or conspiracy to unlawfully restrain trade, or facts showing that Plaintiff herself suffered any harm as a result of Defendants' anti-competitive conduct. Id. at 1148. The Court opined that Plaintiff's federal and state law antitrust claims were predicated on the same allegations of conspiracy and therefore Plaintiff also failed to plausibly allege conspiracy under the Cartwright Act for the same reasons that it failed to do so under the Sherman Act. Id. at 1149. The Court therefore granted Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Miranda, et al. v. Selig,* 860 F.3d 1237 (9th Cir. 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of minor league baseball players, alleged that Defendants, the Office of the Commissioner of Baseball, Major League Baseball ("MLB") and 30 baseball club franchises, violated federal antitrust laws by restraining horizontal competition between and among" the MLB franchises and artificially and illegally depressing minor league salaries. Id. at 1239. Plaintiffs asserted that they each played minor league baseball between 2010 and 2012, and while employed as minor league players, the class representatives worked an average of 50 to 60 hours per week and earned less than $10,000 per year. Id. Defendants filed a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6), arguing that the business of baseball has long been exempt from federal antitrust laws, and Congress specifically declined to take minor league baseball out of the scope of the exemption. Id. The District Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The Ninth Circuit noted that the Supreme Court first exempted the business of baseball from federal antitrust laws almost a century ago when it held that the business of baseball does not constitute "trade or commerce among the several States," and therefore is not bound by antitrust laws because the "business is giving exhibitions of baseball, which are purely state affairs." Id. at 1240. Further, the Ninth Circuit noted that in 1998, Congress passed the Curt Flood Act, which explicitly maintained the baseball exemption for anything related to the employment of minor league baseball players and the relationship between organized professional major and minor league baseball. Id. at 1242. Plaintiffs argued that the baseball exemption did not apply to minor league baseball because previous case law did not decide the issue of "whether major league baseball and its constituent clubs could conspire to fix the salaries paid to minor league players." Id. However, the Ninth Circuit opined the Defendants' farming structure belied the claim that major and minor league baseball were separate and distinct in a meaningful way because minor league baseball players are employed and paid by MLB, and MLB employs minor league players with the hope that some of them will develop into major league players. Id. Therefore, Ninth Circuit held that the employment of minor league players was precisely the type of activity that falls within the antitrust exemption for the business of baseball. In light of Supreme Court precedent, and the Curt Flood Act, the Ninth Circuit determined that minor league baseball came squarely within the nearly century-old business-of-baseball exemption from federal antitrust laws. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit upheld the District Court's ruling granting Defendants' motion to dismiss.

NY Independent Contactors Alliance, Inc., et al. v. Consolidated Edison Co. Of New York*, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27381 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 27, 2017). Plaintiffs, a union and an association of contractors, alleged that Defendant entered into anti-competitive agreements with Plaintiff union's rival, Local 1010, and Local 1010's umbrella organization, LIUNA, to help Local 1010 monopolize utility asphalt patch-paving work for Defendant, in violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. Defendant moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims, and the Court granted the motion. According to the complaint, in 2014 Defendant revised its contract terms to require contractors from whom it purchased utility asphalt patch-paving work to employ only workers who belonged to a union affiliated with the Building & Construction Trades Council of Greater New York ("BCTC"), to the extent such labor was available (the "Provision"). Id. at *2. Plaintiffs alleged that the BCTC denied membership to Local 175, but had accorded membership to Local 1010 and therefore the Provision had the effect of denying Defendant's work to Local 175 members and contractors who were temporarily required by their collective bargaining agreements to employ Local 175 members on Defendant's jobs. Id. at *2-3. Plaintiffs claimed that this change resulted from an anti-competitive agreement among Defendant, LIUNA, and Local 1010 to allow Local 1010 to monopolize Con Ed's asphalt patch-paving work, which Plaintiffs claimed would decrease the number of contractors bidding on Defendant's work, could raise Defendant's costs (by eliminating competition between Local 175 and Local 1010), and could lower the quality of work performed for Defendant. The Court determined that the complaint offered no evidence of an agreement. The Court thus considered whether there were plausible grounds to infer an agreement. The Court explained that a complaint alleging an anti-competitive agreement must state "plausible grounds to infer an agreement." Id. at *9. The Court stated that the plausibility of Defendant entering into an agreement that would raise costs and lower the quality of services it received was very low and the complaint did not contain an explanation for why Defendant would enter into such an implausible agreement. Further, the Court found that even if such an agreement were plausible, the likelihood of a diminution in competition was highly speculative because any rise in costs would be temporary, lasting only as long as the contractor's agreement with Local 175, and it was speculative as to whether the contractor's costs would be passed on to Defendant. Id. at *10. Plaintiffs' claim that Defendant's action would diminish competition among unions was similarly speculative, because the Provision left contractors free to use the services of any union that was affiliated with the BCTC, and free to use unions not affiliated with the BCTC when there were not enough workers affiliated with the BCTC. Furthermore, the Court stated that nothing prohibited workers from forming one or more new unions that affiliated with the BCTC and thus would be able to compete with Local 1010. Id. at *10-11. Therefore, the Court found it highly implausible that Defendant adopted the Provision to foreclose competition, gain a competitive advantage, or destroy a competitor, and thus there was no § 2 violation. For the same reasons, Plaintiffs' § 1 claim that the Provision was an anti-competitive exertion of monopoly power failed the same plausibility test. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to dismiss.

Wyckoff, et al. v. Office Of The Commissioner Of Baseball,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 16728 (2d Cir. Aug. 31, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of professional baseball scouts, brought an action against Defendants, the current and former Commissioners of Major League Baseball, the Office of the Commissioner, and the baseball clubs that comprise Major League Baseball (the "Franchises"), alleging violations under the Sherman Act and New York's Donnelly Act, and minimum wage, overtime, and record-keeping violations under the FLSA. Plaintiffs alleged primarily that Defendants conspired to decrease competition in the labor market for professional baseball scouts. The District Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed. Plaintiffs argued that the District Court erred by ignoring factual allegations indicating that the claims of professional baseball scouts fall outside professional baseball's long-recognized exemption from antitrust regulation. Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits "[e]very contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce." Id. at *3. Since 1922, however, the U.S. Supreme Court has recognized a judicially created exemption from antitrust regulation for the business of baseball. The District Court applied this precedent to exempt from antitrust regulation certain claims brought by professional baseball umpires against the American League. Id. In 1998, Congress passed the Curt Flood Act, which created an exception to baseball's antitrust exemption for major league baseball players. The Act stated that this exception applied only to major league baseball players and not to others "employed in the business of organized professional baseball." Id. at *3-4. In light of the binding precedent from the Supreme Court and the limited exception created by Congress in the Curt Flood Act, the Second Circuit refused Plaintiffs' invitation to adopt a narrower reading of baseball's antitrust exemption. Id. at *4. Accordingly, because it was bound by that precedent, the Second Circuit held that Defendants' conduct in this case was insulated from antitrust scrutiny. Further, the Second Circuit noted that Plaintiffs' own allegations foreclosed their argument that they were not involved in the business of baseball, as their complaint stated that professional baseball scouts "assess baseball players and project the players' abilities to perform at the major league level, and they present that information to the Franchises." Id. Plaintiffs acknowledged that this information was "important and valuable to the Franchises," because it "guide[s] the Franchises' decisions on how to rank players to be acquired" through free agency, the amateur draft, and other player acquisition means. Plaintiffs further acknowledged that because the Franchises "place importance on the acquisition and development of baseball players, . . . a scout who is good at evaluating baseball players has great value." Id. at *4-5. Therefore, the Second Circuit found that based on Plaintiffs' allegations, the District Court properly concluded that professional baseball scouts are involved in the business of baseball and, therefore, the complained-of conduct failed to state a claim for which relief can be granted under existing precedent. The Second Circuit therefore affirmed the District Court's order dismissing the case.

(lxxii) Workplace Class Action Arbitration Issues

Ayon, et al. v. Camino Real Foods, Inc.*, Case No. 1220057012 (JAMS Dec. 11, 2017). Plaintiff, an hourly employee, filed a class action on behalf of himself and a putative class of employees alleging that Defendant violated various provisions of the California Labor Code. Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration based on an agreement Plaintiff signed when he applied for employment with Defendant. Id. at 2. The arbitration agreement did not explicitly address class arbitration to resolve disputes between the parties. Id. The Court granted Defendant's motion to compel individual arbitration of Plaintiff's claims, and to dismiss the class action allegations. Id. at 3. Plaintiff appealed. While the appeal was pending, the California Supreme Court issued its decision in Sandquist v. Lebo Automotive, 1 Cal.5th 233, 248 (2016), holding that "as a matter of state contract law, the parties' arbitration provisions allocate the decision on the availability of class arbitration to the arbitrator." Id. In light of Sandquist, the parties stipulated to dismiss the appeal and to submit Plaintiff's claims to arbitration to have the arbitrator decide the threshold issue of whether the arbitration agreement authorized class arbitration. Id. Before the arbitrator, Plaintiff argued that that expansive language used in the arbitration agreement could only be construed to permit class arbitration. Id. at 4. The arbitrator found that case law authorities have rejected this contention, and that when an agreement to arbitrate included the terms "any claim, dispute, or controversy," those terms were limited to claims, disputes, or controversies between Plaintiff and Defendant. Id. Plaintiff further argued that because class claims were not expressly excluded, Defendant must have intended for the agreement to include class claims. Id. Plaintiff pointed to the fact that Defendant expressly excluded claims brought under the National Labor Relations Act, worker's compensation claims, and unemployment insurance in support of their argument. However, the arbitrator held that case law authorities have expressly found these types of claims beyond the reach of private arbitration as they are governed by their own adjudicatory systems. Id. Finally, Plaintiff asserted that any ambiguities in a contract should be construed against the drafter. The arbitrator stated that the arbitration agreement was not ambiguous, as it stated unequivocally that it applied to all disputes between Plaintiff and Defendant. Id. at *4-5. The arbitrator further concluded that case law precedents have not found an implicit agreement of authorize class action arbitration when interpreting nearly identical language. Id. at 5. Accordingly, the arbitrator agreed with Defendant that the arbitration agreement did not permit class-wide arbitration.

Convergys Corp. v. NLRB*, 866 F.3d 635 (5th Cir. 2017). The National Labor Relations Board (the "Board") determined that Convergys violated the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") both by requiring job applicants to sign a class and collective action waiver and by subsequently seeking to enforce the waiver. Convergys sought review of the Board's determination, arguing that it conflicted with Fifth Circuit binding case law. The Fifth Circuit granted Convergys' petition for review and denied the Board's cross-application for enforcement. Id. at *636. An Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") recommended a finding that Convergys violated § 8(a)(1) of the NLRA, relying on the Board's prior decision in D. R. Horton, Inc., 357 NLRB 2277 (2012). The ALJ's reliance on this decision was subsequently undermined by the Fifth Circuit's denial of enforcement in D. R. Horton, Inc. v. NLRB, 737 F.3d 344 (5th Cir. 2013) ("Horton"). Id. at *637. Nevertheless, the Board adopted the ALJ's opinion. The Board sought to distinguish Horton and to rely instead on other Board decisions recognizing a broad "right of employees to join together to improve their terms and conditions of employment through litigation." Id. The Board ordered Convergys to cease and desist from requiring applicants to sign a waiver, to cease and desist from enforcing the waiver, and to take steps to ensure all applicants and current and former employees knew the waiver was no longer in force. Id. Convergys petitioned for review of the Board's decision, and the Board submitted a cross-application for enforcement of its order. The Fifth Circuit stated that it had already had rejected the Board's position that § 7 guarantees a right to participate in class or collective actions, holding that the use of a class or collective action is a procedure rather than a substantive right. The Fifth Circuit stated that, despite the Fifth Circuit's decision in Horton and similar rulings by a majority of the circuits that had considered the issue, the Board persistently had clung to its view that § 7 guarantees a substantive right to participate in class and collective actions, and it persistently had declined to enforce Board orders based on this disregard of the law. Id. at *637. The Fifth Circuit explained that the Board's argument ignored the contrary holding of Horton that "the use of class action procedures . . . is not a substantive right." Id. at *638. Moreover, the Board's assertion that the waiver in Horton was permissible only because the FAA overrode the NLRA contradicted the determination in Horton that the statutes were not in conflict. Id. Finally, the Board's suggestion that Horton was distinguishable because the FAA empowers arbitration agreements to waive rights that other agreements cannot waive was contrary to Supreme Court precedent, which held in AT&T Mobility LLC v. Concepcion, 563 U.S. 333, 339 (2011), that the FAA placed arbitration agreements "on an equal footing with other contracts." Id. at *639. For all these reasons, the Fifth Circuit concluded that Horton precluded the Board's position. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit held that the Board's position that § 7 guarantees a substantive right of employees to participate in class and collective actions against their employers was contrary to binding precedent. Id. at *640.

In Re CBRE, Inc. And Thoma, et al.*, 2017 NLRB LEXIS 574 (NLRB Nov. 24, 2017). Steve Thoma, the charging party, filed an action with the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB") asserting that Respondent, his employer, violated § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the "Act") by maintaining an arbitration agreement that contained language that employees would reasonably believe infringed upon their rights to file unfair labor practice charges with the NLRB. The parties filed a joint motion and stipulation of facts with the NLRB and stipulated that the following issues be resolved: (i) whether Respondent violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act by maintaining an arbitration agreement that employees would reasonably conclude prohibits or restricts their right to file unfair labor practice charges with the NLRB; (ii) whether the language in Thoma's initial unfair labor practice charge constituted an admission that the arbitration agreement excludes claims seeking to enforce rights under the Act, and whether such an admission should be binding notwithstanding the amended charge; (iii) whether the Federal Arbitration Act (FAA), 9 U.S.C. §§ 1-16, controlled enforcement of the arbitration agreement; and (iv) whether the complaint was barred by § 10(b) of the Act. Id. at *3. The Administrative Law

Judge ("ALJ") found that the language in Respondent's arbitration agreement violated § 8(a)(1) as employees would reasonably read the agreement to require arbitration of all employment related claims, including alleged violations of the Act. Id. at *7. Respondent argued that there was no violation, and that the language in the original charge was an admission by Thoma "that the arbitration agreement excludes claims seeking to enforce rights under Section 7 and that Thoma would not believe on face value that the language precluded him from filing a charge with the Board." Id. at *8. The ALJ disagreed and explained that the test to determine whether a practice violated the Act is an objective one, and was not dependent upon an employee's subjective interpretation. Id. Thus, Thoma's subjective belief as to whether the arbitration agreement precluded him from filing a charge was not relevant. Id. at *10. The ALJ further determined that because the language in the arbitration agreement violated the Act, it fell "within the FAA's savings clause." Id. at *11. As a result, the ALJ stated that the FAA did not preclude the finding of a violation. Id. The ALJ also ruled that the parties stipulated that Respondent's arbitration agreement had been in effect since at least March 17, 2016, and that it was in effect at the material time periods set forth in the complaint, including the period of time when Thoma filed the charge and amended charge. Accordingly, the ALJ found that the complaint was not time-barred by § 10(b) of the Act. Id. at *12. Therefore, as the ALJ held that Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices, the ALJ ordered Respondent to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. Id. at *13-14. Specifically, the ALJ ordered Respondent to rescind or revise its arbitration agreement, and to notify employees that it has done so. Id. at *14.

Jock, et al. v. Sterling Jewelers Inc.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 9634 (2d Cir. June 1, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendant discriminated against them in its promotion and compensation policies and practices in violation of both Title VII of the Civil Rights Act and the Equal Pay Act of 1964 ("EPA"). On February 2, 2015, following the grant of Plaintiffs' motion to refer the matter to arbitration, the Arbitrator, operating under the auspices of the American Arbitration Association ("AAA"), issued a class certification award addressing Plaintiffs' motion to have opt-out classes certified for both the Title VII claims and the EPA claims. The Arbitrator certified Plaintiffs' Title VII disparate impact claims for injunctive and declaratory relief only (and denied certification of Plaintiffs Title VII disparate treatment claims), and denied certification of an opt-in class action for Plaintiffs' EPA claims. Plaintiffs subsequently re-filed their EPA certification motion, and amended it to seek certification of an opt-in collective action under 29 U.S.C. § 216(b). The Arbitrator subsequently granted Plaintiffs' motion. The Arbitrator also tolled the statute of limitations for the EPA claims so that individuals could opt-in to the EPA collective action if their claims arose on or after October 16, 2003. Defendant moved to vacate the Arbitrator's conditional certification award and order on tolling insofar as these rulings tolled the statute of limitations for Plaintiffs' EPA claims. The District Court held that it has no jurisdiction to review the Arbitrator's conditional certification award and tolling order because these rulings were not "final" arbitration awards. On appeal, the Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's ruling. The Second Circuit found that the District Court's order neither confirmed nor denied confirmation of an arbitral award or partial award, but only held that the it lacked jurisdiction to consider an interim decision of the Arbitrator. Id. at *2. The Second Circuit agreed, and thereby affirmed the District Court's ruling.

Jock, et al. v. Sterling Jewelers Inc.,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 13243 (2d Cir. July 24, 2017). Plaintiffs brought a class action alleging that Defendant discriminated against them in its promotion and compensation policies and practices in violation of both Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Equal Pay Act ("EPA"). In 2008, Plaintiffs voluntarily re-filed their claims as a class arbitration with the American Arbitration Association ("AAA"). On February 2, 2015, the Arbitrator issued a class certification award addressing Plaintiffs' motion to have opt-out classes certified for both the Title VII and the EPA claims. The Arbitrator certified a class for injunctive and declaratory relief only for the Title VII claim (while at the same time denying certification of Plaintiffs' disparate treatment claim under Title VII), and denied certification of Plaintiffs' EPA claim. Defendant challenged the Arbitrator's authority to assert jurisdiction over absent class members, i.e., those individuals – approximately 70,000 employees and ex-employees – beyond the 254 named Plaintiffs and opt-ins. The Arbitrator rejected that challenge to her authority and issue her class certification award. On Defendant's petition to vacate the class certification award, the District Court also rejected the challenge to the Arbitrator's authority, and affirmed the class certification award in part. Defendant subsequently appealed the District Court's order confirming in part the Arbitrator's class certification award. Id. At the outset, the Second Circuit noted that it may vacate an arbitration award "where the arbitrator exceeded her powers, or so imperfectly executed them that a mutual, final, and definite award upon the subject matter submitted was not made." Id. The Second Circuit stated that the question before it was whether the Arbitrator had the authority to certify a class that included absent class members, i.e., employees other than the named Plaintiffs and those who had opted-in to the arbitration previously. Id. Defendant contended that the Arbitrator's authority was limited to those who had consented to her jurisdiction, and the "absent" class members had not done so, and the Arbitrator's class certification award – to the extent it purported to bind those "absent" class members – was in excess of her authority. The Second Circuit held that the District Court did not squarely address whether the Arbitrator had the power to bind absent class members given that they never consented to the Arbitrator determining whether class arbitration was permissible under the agreement in first place. Id. at *3. Accordingly, the Second Circuit concluded that the District Court erred in finding that this question had been conclusively resolved. Id. The Second Circuit reasoned that the District Court must decide whether an Arbitrator, who may decide the question whether an arbitration agreement provides for class procedures because the parties "squarely presented" it for decision, may nevertheless purport to bind non-parties to class procedures on this basis. Id. at *5. The Second Circuit therefore vacated and remanded the District Court's ruling for further consideration of whether the Arbitrator exceeded her authority in certifying a class that contained absent class members who did not consent to the Arbitrator's authority.

Jones, et al. v. Singing River Health Services Foundation,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 229 (5th Cir. Jan. 5, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of employees in three consolidated class actions, alleged that Defendants recklessly disregarded the under-funding of employee pension plans. On appeal, Defendant asserted that the gateway issue of arbitrability must itself be submitted to an arbitrator and the District Court erred in failing to compel the Lowe class to arbitrate its claims. Defendant KPMG audited the annual financial statements of Defendant SRHS from 2008 through 2012. Plaintiff Lowe was a former employee of SRHS and was a vested participant in the Plan. KPMG performed work for SRHS and the Plan pursuant to engagement letters, which required that disputes or claims arising out of or relating to the contract must be submitted to arbitration. Id. at *2. The letters also defined the scope of KPMG's audits and KPMG's role as auditor. Plaintiff Lowe filed a class action against KPMG, SRHS, the Plan trustees, and others in February 2015, alleging that KPMG was aware of or recklessly disregarded the under-funding and was therefore complicit in the breaches of fiduciary duty by the Plan's trustees. Plaintiff Lowe's suit against KPMG was consolidated procedurally with the Jones case and the Cobb case, as all arose out of the alleged under-funding of the Plan. KPMG moved to compel arbitration in the Jones and Lowe actions. Id. at *3. After reviewing allegations in both suits, the District Court granted the motion in Jones but denied it in Lowe. Id. Neither Plaintiff Jones nor Plaintiff Lowe was a party to the contracts between SRHS or the Plan and KPMG. Both accused KPMG of wrongdoing in its role as auditor of the Plan. The District Court held that the Jones class, whose pleading specifically invoked the engagement letters, must submit to arbitration under the doctrine of equitable estoppel. Id. at *4. The District Court observed that the factual allegations pled by Plaintiffs in Jones relied upon the professional standards required by the engagement letters. The Lowe class, in contrast, pled solely common law claims and made no factual allegation invoking the engagement letters. KPMG argued that the Lowe claims actually relied on the engagement letters, because the letters defined the scope of KPMG's contractual role with SRHS and the Plan, and therefore equitable estoppel compelled submission of the class claims in Lowe to arbitration. The District Court disagreed and denied Defendants' motion to compel. On appeal, the Fifth Circuit stated that the question was whether the arbitration terms in KPMG's engagement letters could be enforced against the non-signatory class in Lowe by virtue of equitable estoppel. The Fifth Circuit opined that KPMG offered little evidence to prove that Plaintiff Lowe's common law claims could only be determined "by reference to" the engagement letters. Id. at *8. The Fifth Circuit found that Plaintiff Lowe alleged that KPMG "knowingly participated in the plan trustees' breach of fiduciary duty." Id. at *10. The Fifth Circuit determined that those trustees were neither coextensive with SRHS nor parties to an arbitration agreement with KPMG. Id. at *11. The Fifth Circuit held that it was clear based on Plaintiff Lowe's pleadings and the arguments offered by KPMG, that Lowe's claims were not directly dependent on the engagement letters. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit concluded that the District Court did not abuse its discretion, and affirmed the decision denying Defendants' motion to compel arbitration.

Jones, et al. v. Waffle House,* 866 F.3d 1257 (11th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff, a job applicant at one of Defendant's chain restaurants, brought a class action alleging violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") after he was rejected from a job at the location in Ormond Beach, Florida. Id. at 1261. Plaintiff claimed that Defendant violated the FCRA by failing to give him a copy of his background checks and to give him the opportunity to dispute the checks. While the class action was pending, Defendant obtained a job at another of Defendant's restaurants located in Kansas City, Missouri. Plaintiff signed an arbitration agreement in connection with his employment in Kansas City, which covered all claims and controversies past, present, or future, arising out of any aspect of or pertaining in any way to his employment and that contained a delegation provision requiring that an arbitrator resolve any dispute related to the enforceability of the agreement. Defendant moved to compel arbitration when it learned of Plaintiff's employment and the agreement. The District Court denied Defendant's motion. On Defendant's appeal, the Eleventh Circuit vacated the District Court's decision and remanded with instructions to compel arbitration. The Eleventh Circuit held that Defendant was entitled to compel arbitration under the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") given the FAA's presumption in favor of arbitration, and the District Court was obliged to enforce the parties' clear intent to arbitrate these issues. The arbitration agreement had a broad, valid, and enforceable delegation provision expressing the parties' clear intent to arbitrate gateway issues of arbitrability, including the interpretation, applicability, enforceability, and formation of the agreement. Likewise, Plaintiff failed to show that the arbitration agreement was substantively or procedurally unconscionable. The Eleventh Circuit rejected Plaintiff's claims that the arbitration agreement improperly interfered with the District Court's managerial authority over class actions. The Eleventh Circuit concluded that the fact that the arbitration agreement was pre-signed by Defendant's general counsel did not render it an improper ex parte communication in violation of Florida Rules of Professional Conduct since Plaintiff did not disclose his pending suit when he signed the arbitration agreement. Accordingly, the Eleventh Circuit vacated the District Court's decision to deny Defendant's motion to compel and remanded the case with instructions to compel arbitration and stay the case pending arbitration. Id. at 1273.

Joseph III, et al. v. Select Staffing,* Case No. 17-CV-6134 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 6, 2017). Plaintiff, an employment applicant, filed a class action alleging that Defendant procured a background check on Plaintiff without proper notification or authorization in violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Defendant filed a motion to compel arbitration of Plaintiff's claims and to dismiss the class claims. Id. at 1. Plaintiff's counsel conceded the validity of Defendant's motion, and the parties subsequently filed a joint stipulation to dismiss Plaintiff's class claims and stay the action pending arbitration of Plaintiff's individual claims. Id. In 2013, 2015, and 2017, Plaintiff had completed an application for employment with Defendant that included an arbitration provision. Id. at 2. Plaintiff initialed or signed a separate section of the application stating that he agreed to resolve by arbitration any dispute relating to or arising out of his employment or termination of employment, and that he waived his right to bring or join any type of class claim in any Court. Id. The Court rejected the stipulation; instead, it determined that a valid agreement to arbitration existed and that it encompassed Plaintiff's claims. Id. Accordingly, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration of Plaintiff's claims and dismiss the class claims. Further, since all of Plaintiff's individual claims were subject to arbitration and because Plaintiff waived his right to pursue a class action, the Court exercised its discretion to dismiss the action. Id. Accordingly, the Court dismissed the action an denied the parties' joint stipulation as moot.

Noye, et al. v. Kelly Services, Inc.,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 183604 (M.D. Pa. Nov. 6, 2017). Plaintiff filed a class action alleging Defendants violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act's ("FCRA") disclosure requirements, and the requirement to provide applicants with a copy of the report and a description of consumer rights. Id. at *5. Plaintiff interviewed for a job through the staffing company Defendant Kelly Services ("Kelly") for a position with Defendant Johnson & Johnson ("J&J"). Id. at *2. A Kelly recruiter offered Plaintiff a job and Plaintiff verbally indicated that he wanted to accepted the job, and the recruiter requested that he then complete Kelly's on-line application. The application contained an arbitration screen with a link to a document titled "Dispute Resolution and Mutual Agreement to Binding Arbitration." Id. at *3. In the application, Plaintiff informed Kelly that he had been convicted of a crime. After completing the on-line application, Plaintiff signed an employment agreement for J& J that a Kelly employee administered. Id. at *4. A Kelly employee signed the employment agreement and a Kelly "on-boarding coordinator" then sent Plaintiff an email that he had "been hired" and welcoming him to the Kelly team. Id. at *5. Subsequently, the Kelly recruiter informed Plaintiff that J&J could not hire Plaintiff, but that Kelly would keep him in mind for future opportunities. Id. at *4. Plaintiff alleged that J&J decided not to hire Plaintiff because of a background report that Kelly had purchased. Kelly filed a motion to compel arbitration and stay the case. Id. at *6. The Court denied without prejudice Kelly's motion to compel arbitration and ordered the parties to conduct limited arbitration-related discovery. Kelly subsequently renewed its motion to compel arbitration and to stay the case pending completion of the arbitration. The Court granted Kelly's renewed motion and stayed the case. At the outset, the Court ruled that Plaintiff entered into a valid arbitration agreement. Id. at *12. Plaintiff did not dispute the existence of the agreement, but asserted that he could not recall the agreement. Id. at *10. However, in his deposition Plaintiff testified that it was a "safe assumption" that he electronically signed the box confirming acknowledgment of being provided a copy of the arbitration agreement and that he clicked on the link offering a copy of the agreement. Id. at *11. The Court determined that the record was undisputed that Plaintiff's electronic signature was required to proceed past the arbitration screen and submit the application to Kelly. Accordingly, the Court ruled that there was no genuine dispute of material fact that Plaintiff electronically received and signed the arbitration agreement. Id. at *12. The Court rejected Plaintiff's argument that the arbitration agreement was superseded by the employment agreement. The Court ruled that the employment agreement and arbitration agreement could be read to "stand together," as the arbitration agreement and the employment agreement covered different territories. Id. at *16. The Court also reasoned that the arbitration agreement could be revoked or modified only in writing by Plaintiff and an authorized representative of Kelly, and the employment agreement made no reference to the arbitration agreement, did not include an integration clause, and did not state an intent to revoke the arbitration agreement. Id. at *17. The Court also rejected Plaintiff's argument that the arbitration agreement was unconscionable, ruling that it was neither procedurally or substantively unconscionable. Finally, Plaintiff claimed that the arbitration agreement did not cover this dispute as it was a pre-employment dispute. The Court rejected this argument and concluded that Kelly had hired Plaintiff. Furthermore, the Court ruled that the arbitration agreement covered Plaintiff's claims, since Plaintiff's § 1681b(b)(2) and § 1681b(b)(3) claims alleged violations of the FCRA for employment purposes. As such, the Court granted Kelly's motion and ruled that Plaintiff's claims against Kelly were subject to arbitration and stayed the pending action.

Peng, et al. v. Uber Technologies,* 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 25840 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 23, 2017). Plaintiffs, a group of drivers, brought a putative class action alleging that Defendant breached their contracts and failed to pay Plaintiffs money owed. Defendant moved to compel arbitration, and the Court granted Defendant's motion. Plaintiffs were all native Chinese speakers who spoke little or no English and argued that they were not bound by the arbitration agreements because the terms were not reasonably communicated to them and they did not knowingly agree to the terms. Id. at *12. Plaintiffs assented to two substantially similar electronically signed service agreements, one in April 2015 and one December 2015, that modified the previous agreement through clicking on the "Yes, I agree" buttons. The April 2015 agreement contained a clause that Defendant could modify the agreement at any time. Id. at *2. The December 2015 agreement stated that each Plaintiff had 30 days to opt-out of the agreement. After clicking "Yes I agree," there was a further affirmation of assent as a large box popped up in bold stating "PLEASE CONFIRM THAT YOU HAVE REVIEWED ALL THE DOCUMENTS AND AGREE TO ALL THE NEW CONTRACTS." Id. at *18. There was no time limit for Plaintiffs to review the on-line contracts. Id. at *21. The Court rejected Plaintiffs' argument that their assent was not informed because they were unable to read the agreement, which was only provided in English. It reasoned that it is well-settled law that that failure to read a contract is not a defense to contract formation. Id. at *21. Plaintiffs also contended that the December 2015 Agreement should apply only to claims after its issuance; however, the Court found that the December 2015 Services Agreement was the operative agreement for all of Plaintiffs' claims because the April 2015 agreement expressly provided that Defendant could modify the terms and conditions of agreement at any time. The Court ruled that the delegation clause in the December 2015 agreement that delegated the gateway questions of arbitrability to the arbitrator was not procedurally or substantively unconscionable. Id. at *31. The Court opined that the 30-day opt-out provision in the arbitration agreement substantially negated any challenge of procedural unconscionability with respect to the delegation clause. Id. at *34. The Court also rejected Plaintiffs' argument that the delegation clause was substantively unconscionable because it required drivers to pay "exorbitant arbitration fees and attorneys' fees." Id. at *39. The Court found that Plaintiffs did not make a showing of their inability to pay for arbitration or that the cost differential between arbitration and litigation was so substantial as to deter them from bringing their claims. Id. at *40. Second, the Court reasoned that the December 2015 agreement contained a provision that circumscribed the fee-splitting requirement in the April 2015 agreement, because it stated that: (i) the drivers would not be required to bear any greater costs than if they had filed the action in a court of law; and (ii) Defendant would bear all the arbitration fees until the dispute was resolved. Id. at *41. Thus, Plaintiffs would not have to bear any fees or expenses beyond what they would have had to pay to pursue this action. The Court also rejected Plaintiffs' argument that the class action waiver was unconscionable, as the U.S. Supreme Court has issued multiple decisions holding that class action waivers in arbitration agreements were enforceable. Id. at *42. The Court also rejected Plaintiffs' argument that the class action waiver violated the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"), since even if Plaintiffs were drivers under the NLRA, the Second Circuit had ruled that a class action waiver in arbitration did not violate the NLRA. Id. at *43. As such, the Court granted Defendant's motion to compel arbitration. Id. at *44.

Varela, et al. v. Lamps Plus,* 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 14284 (9th Cir. Aug. 3, 2017). Plaintiff brought an action asserting claims of negligence, breach of contract, and invasion of privacy when Defendant allegedly released his personal information in response to a phishing scam. Defendant moved to compel a bi-lateral arbitration pursuant to an arbitration agreement (the "Agreement") it drafted and required Plaintiff to sign as a condition of his employment. The District Court found that the Agreement was a contract of adhesion and ambiguous as to class arbitration. The District Court construed the ambiguity against Defendant, and compelled arbitration of all claims by allowing a class-wide arbitration to proceed. Id. at *2. On appeal, Defendant argued that the parties did not agree to class arbitration. The Ninth Circuit disagreed, and affirmed the District Court's ruling. The parties agreed that the Agreement included no express mention of class proceedings. The Ninth Circuit therefore used state law contract principles in order to interpret the Agreement. The Ninth Circuit explained that in California, a contract is ambiguous "when it is capable of two or more constructions, both of which are reasonable." Id. at *3. At its outset, the Agreement contained a paragraph outlining Plaintiff's understanding of the terms in three phrases, including: (i) assent to waiver of "any right I may have to file a lawsuit or other civil action or proceeding relating to my employment with the Company;" (ii) waiver of "any right I may have to resolve employment disputes through trial by judge or jury;" and (iii) "arbitration shall be in lieu of any and all lawsuits or other civil legal proceedings relating to my employment." Id. The Ninth Circuit determined that a reasonable interpretation of the expansive language would be that it authorizes class arbitration, as class proceedings could be part of a "lawsuit or other civil legal proceeding." Id. The Ninth Circuit further found that the construction was supported by the paragraph below the statements, captioned "Claims Covered by the Arbitration Provision." The first sentence contemplated "claims or controversies" the parties may have against each other, which Defendant argued supported purely binary claims. Id. However, Plaintiff's claims against the company included those that could be brought as part of a class. The Agreement specifies that arbitrable claims are those that "would have been available to the parties by law," which the Ninth Circuit noted would include claims as part of a class proceeding. Id. at *4. Further, the paragraph listed a non-limiting, vast array of claims covered by the arbitration provisions, including many types of claims for discrimination or harassment ("race, sex, sexual orientation . . .") that are frequently resolved through class proceedings. Id. The paragraph also excluded from the Agreement two types of claims, but not class or collective proceedings. Id. at *5. Additionally, the Ninth Circuit noted that the Agreement authorized an Arbitrator to "award any remedy allowed by applicable law," which it stated would include class-wide relief. Id. The Ninth Circuit therefore found that because the Agreement was capable of two reasonable constructions, the District Court correctly found ambiguity. By accepting the construction posited by Plaintiff, i.e., that the ambiguous Agreement permitted class arbitration, the Ninth Circuit determined that the District Court properly found the necessary "contractual basis" for agreement to class arbitration. Id. at *5-6. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision granting class arbitration.
